2. There is reason to believe that the arrangement and consolidation of the various groups of rocks, which compose the earth's crust, took place at different periods and under different circumstances. This is indicated both by their mineral character and by the order in which they are placed one above another, clearly shewing that they followed each other in succession, and after intervals of time. Some of the upper strata, for example, contain portions of those which lie beneath them, a character which demonstrates that the deposition of the one must have preceded the formation of the other, and that the consolidation of the lower must have been completed before the upper or derivative strata could be formed out of their ruins. The proof arising from the existence and distribution of organic remains is still more decided. The probability is strong that rocks, which contain no trace of these interesting relics, were produced prior to the existence of either vegetable or animal life, or by the agency of heat, as in the case of granite and whinstone, whereby their characters would be obliterated. On the other hand, rocks which are distinguished by remains belonging to different genera and species, must obviously have been formed under different conditions or states of the earth, when its temperature and other arrangements, its distribution of land and water, were more favourable for the production and sustenance of certain kinds of animals and plants, rather than others which could not have existed in the same circumstances. In those strata which are deepest, and which must, consequently, be supposed to be the earliest deposited, forms of organic life are not only comparatively rare, but different from those which occur in the higher strata, and it is only in the loose or slightly consolidated strata of gravel and sand, that the remains of animals are found, approaching nearest in character to those which now people the globe. There is thus, not only evidence of succession in the formation of rocks, arising from the order of their superposition, but still more directly from their organic contents, which clearly establish the fact that the revolutions which have occurred among the dead inert masses of the earth, have been contemporaneous with great and extensive changes in the various forms of organic life in the vegetable and animal kingdoms.

3. There is evidence of the existence of a higher as well as more equable temperature existing over the earth's surface during the deposition of the older strata, than now prevails. The present living productions of nature are essentially different in different latitudes; their forms, magnitude, and numerical abundance being determined, in a great measure, by the nature of the climate in which they subsist. This is particularly the case with vegetables. Plants of every kind are stunted as well as rare in the Arctic Regions, and, in proportion as they approach the tropics, they are found to increase in number and in size. Nor is the animal kingdom exempt from the operation of this law. Every country claims something peculiar to itself, and nothing can differ more than do the inhabitants of the warm equatorial climes and those of the cold icy regions of the north from each other. Accordingly, when we examine the several classes of organic remains, we discover indications not only of a higher temperature than now anywhere exists on the earth's surface, but we discover also a gradual diminution of temperature as we descend from the ancient to the more recent strata. The gigantic vegetables which are found in the coal formation are allied to the flora of equatorial countries, and demonstrate, from their large development and immense abundance, the high temperature as well as great humidity of the atmosphere which prevailed at that period. The reptiles, and the great amphibia, with bodies like turtles, but furnished with necks longer than their bodies, to enable them to dart upon their prey, or to feed on vegetables growing in the shallows of the primitive ocean, seem to shew a state of things considerably different from the present. The temperature, besides being higher, was also more equable and uniform over the globe. The proof of this arises from the universal distribution of the same species of plants and animals, which are found not to have been limited to particular countries or bounded by geographical lines, but to be co-extensive with the strata in which they occur. Thus, in a variety of climates, and in very distant parts of the globe, secondary strata of the same order are found, and they contain generally the same kind of organic remains. Similar fossil fish bones are found in the limestones of the old and new continents, and the same species of plants, which are so abundant in the coal-measures of Great Britain, have left proofs of their existence, luxuriance, and abundance, in every quarter of the world. The monuments, in short, of extinct generations of animals and plants are as perfect as those of extinct nations; and from the pillars and temples of Palmyra we do not more certainly infer the existence of a race, by which they were reared, superior in cultivation to the present wandering Arabs of the desert, than we are entitled to infer from the relics of the once animated forms beneath the surface of the earth, a higher and more equable climate to nourish and sustain them. The source of this heat is now universally admitted, by the learned, to be the interior of the earth itself, of which volcanoes, says Sir Humphry Davy, are still the evidences; "and on this subject, my notion," he adds, "may, perhaps, be more trusted, as, for a long while, I thought volcanic eruptions were owing to chemical agencies of the newly discovered metals of the earth and alkalies, and I made many and some dangerous experiment in the hope of confirming this notion, but in vain." The source of the moisture, or greater humidity of the atmosphere, may have arisen from that state of things, when "there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground," and which, in all probability, may have been occasioned by the high temperature then existing on the earth's surface, exciting much evaporation from the primeval waters, and which the comparatively colder atmosphere would speedily condense into "mist."

4. The sea and land have, in many places, changed situations. If, for example, along the shores of the sea, we find plants, shells, and other marine productions, cast upon the dry land, we infer, with certainty, that the waves of the ocean have extended thus far. There is a limit, indeed, to the encroachments of the sea, and beyond a certain distance its proud billows are not permitted to roll, but still the effects of its operations are easily distinguished from those of any other agency, and wherever we find, in vast accumulations, any marine productions, we perceive, at once, an adequate cause by which to account for the phenomenon. Now, innumerable proofs of this kind are afforded by the several deposits, with their imbedded remains, which have been enumerated above. The Alps, the Himalaya mountains, and the Andes, all contain strata which are filled with productions of the ocean, and, lofty as their snowy peaks are now raised, they must, at one time, have formed the bed of the sea. The mountain limestone of Great Britain consists chiefly of animal remains, and thereby yields incontestible evidence of its marine origin,—the corals, encrinites, orthocera, nautili, and terebratulæ, of which it is nearly composed, being all inhabitants of the deep.

The remains of the coal-field exhibit the trunks, stems, leaves, and sometimes the pericarps of vegetables; and in considering their original habits, and the circumstances under which they were deposited, we must transport our imaginations to a period when the whole face of this country was still buried beneath the waves, from which scattered groups of primitive islands alone emerged, covered by the luxuriant tribes of plants of which these relics are still preserved. Suppose this country, by some extraordinary catastrophe of nature, to be submerged under the bosom of the sea, and again, after the lapse of years, to be elevated to its present position, and consider what must be the result: whatever now exists upon the surface, plants, trees, animals, man, and all the works of his hands, would be covered with the deposits of sand, mud, and gravel, which are continually forming on the bed of the ocean, and would constitute the organic remains of the era in question. How different from those in any of the preceding groups! and what a striking contrast would our temples, our bridges of iron and granite, our steam and war ships, present to the bones of the sauri, and other extinct animals, in the older strata! Whoever dwells upon this subject, must be convinced, that the present order of things, of which man forms the head, has succeeded to a very different condition of the earth's history, when the dry land was separated from the waters, and rose above the waves; when other forms of life existed, which have now no types in being, and the remains of which are entombed in the solid rock, striking monuments of the revolutions of nature.

Such are some of the curious and interesting speculations which the existence of organic remains naturally suggests. Accustomed, as we now are, to slight changes in the course of nature, and to but little alteration on the earth's surface, it is with difficulty that we can bring ourselves to believe in the mighty revolutions which are thus brought to light. Researches of this kind have, indeed, by many, been regarded not only as useless, but as dangerous and presumptuous, from the supposition that they encroach upon matters which have not been revealed, and which the author of the brief narrative of Creation did not consider as proper for man to know. But the same argument applies equally to every subject of science; and, if good against geology, must prohibit at once every kind of inquiry into the works of God. Questions, apparently still more beyond the reach of human investigation, have been completely solved, and important truths elicited respecting the wisdom, and goodness, and power of Jehovah: revelation has been confirmed by them, and the piety and faith of many warmed and established; and why may not man, who has numbered the planets, calculated their weights, and measured their distances, presume to trace the operations by which the surface of the globe has been reduced to its present habitable condition? Certain it is, that the world was in a state of chaos and confusion. It is equally demonstrable, that many living substances, plants and animals, were successively formed and destroyed, and are now imbedded in its rocky strata. No relic of man has been found. Mountains have been raised, plains levelled, islands formed or separated from continents, and the waters collected so as to leave an elevated land. Is it possible not to trace design in all this; not to see the earth gradually adapted for its last and highest inhabitant; and while it was yet unprepared for him, Divine Beneficence communicating happiness, by diffusing life and beauty over his works? "Thus saith the Lord that created the heavens, God himself that formed the earth, and made it, he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited."

Look, then, upon the terraqueous globe as the entire workmanship of God, his intelligent and benevolent production. See how all its parts have been arranged and distributed by his matchless skill and contrivance. He made it, and he can change and modify every department of nature, the living as well as the inanimate portions of it, so as to suit his own sovereign pleasure and purposes, and the wisdom, goodness, and grandness, by surveying these wonderful operations of his hand, in all their richness, majesty, and diversity.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul:
That changed through all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in th' ethereal frame,
Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glow's in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
To him no high, no low, no great, no small;
He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all!"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

"But it displeased Jonah exceedingly, and he was very angry."—If ever any good man exceeded all his brethren in selfishness, it was the prophet of Gath-Hepher. He seems determined to have his own will, whatever becomes of the will of God and of the people of Nineveh; and if the Lord saith, "My will shall be done," Jonah swells with pride, and becomes very angry with him. This is more unreasonable than for a glow-worm to say to the sun, "Withdraw thy light, let me shine and illuminate the heavens in thy stead." He thinks that God should give way to him, rather than he to God. Self-will is the most deformed monster in all creation; the most active and mischievous of all evil spirits; it works powerfully in every human breast; it governs countless millions with cruel tyranny, and fills the whole world with guilt and misery. What is self-will? It is a contest between man and his God, who is to have his way. Man wants God to give up his own plans, and to come over to his plans; and because the Lord refuses to comply, man grows angry, and quarrels with him. God, in his great mercy, would save Nineveh from destruction. No, says Jonah, let them be destroyed, every man, woman, and child. And because the Lord would not yield to his cruelty, but pursue his own benevolent will, Jonah was exceedingly displeased, and grew very angry, merely because the Lord preferred his own will to his. We are all too nearly related to Jonah: every child of Adam wants to have his own will, and quarrels with earth and heaven when he has not his own way. What means all the discontent, murmuring, peevishness, and complaining that are found in every dwelling, and which fill the whole earth? They mean this, that men are quarrelling with the God of heaven, because they cannot have their own will. Very few men are contented, happy, and thankful. Nine-tenths of mankind are unhappy, always fretting and complaining as if the Lord dealt very hardly with them. But when you come to examine closely into the cause of their murmurs, you find it is nothing more than this,—self is not gratified. God is pursuing his own plan, and will not give way to them, and they, like Jonah, are displeased exceedingly, and are very angry. Few have been sufficiently aware of this evil. Listen, ye peevish angry souls! let me argue the point with you, and ask a few questions. Is not the will of God always right? Are not his ways perfect? Is it possible for him to err in judgment? Or could he possibly order things in a better manner than he does, under all circumstances? You must allow that his wisdom is infinite, that his whole plan is of grace, whatever pain it brings, and that he cannot possibly err. And pray what is your own will? Is it equally wise, correct, and good, as the will of God? No; it is generally foolish, erroneous, and destructive of happiness. It proceeds from self, leads to mischief, and ends in misery. And this is the will which you set up in opposition to the will of God; instead of seeking his glory, you seek to please the flesh; yet for all this, if your will is crossed, you are exceedingly displeased, and grow very angry. Pray think deliberately for one moment, who should have his some peevish, angry soul, replying to all this, "Ah! Sir, this is fine talking, and easy in theory, but very difficult in practice." What is difficult in practice? Submitting to what God is doing? To whom is this difficult? Not to the faithful, that are brought into the obedience of Christ; but to the proud unbeliever, the selfish worldling, and all that live after the flesh. It is not difficult to grace, but to corruption; it is your self-will, unbelief, and hardness of heart, that makes quiet submission to the will of God a hard lesson to you. Were the most perverse and obstinate struck to the ground, with Saul of Tarsus, they would soon cry with him, "Lord! what wilt thou have me to do?" The self-willed sinner is no way satisfied with all that has been said, but still replies, "Ah! it is easy for you who are out of trouble to talk at this rate; were you in my case, you would be as discontented as I am." Certainly I should, if I had no more grace and self-denial. But where is the wisdom or advantage of contending with God, and quarrelling with his appointments? What do we get by fretting and murmuring, but increase of guilt, and heavier burdens to carry? What God lays on man is light, to what man lays on himself: and God will not give him strength to carry the addition he makes to his appointed burden; therefore it must weigh heavy upon him, and this accounts for the deep groans we hear from many to whom the Lord gave but a light cross to bear.—T. JONES of Creaton.

The Believer must maintain a Prayerful Spirit.—Although the believer is not required to be ever in the external posture of prayer; although set and unbroken petitions cannot, in such circumstances as his, be his habitual employment, still it is possible, it is incumbent on him, it is his privilege and happiness, to maintain a prayerful spirit. Is it his calling to go down to the sea in ships, and to do business in great waters? The stormy winds may be raised, the waves may be lifted so as to mount up to the heavens, and toss down again to the depths. His soul may be weary in him because of trouble,—he may reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and be at his wit's end. But maintaining the spirit of prayer, he cries aloud to the Lord in his trouble, and he brings him out of his distresses. He makes the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still, and he thus shows himself to his servant, to be the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea. Is it his calling, as was that of the shepherds of Bethlehem, to tend flocks by night on the solitary plain, or to keep watch over them on the remote and silent mountains? Like his divine Saviour, who rose up a great while before day, and departed into a solitary place, and then prayed, he, in the maintenance of a prayerful spirit, continued all night in prayer to God. Luke vi. 12. And then it happens to him as it did unto Moses, when, on Horeb, he kept the flock of Jethro; the Lord Jehovah manifests himself to him, shewing him great sights, and proclaiming himself to be the deliverer of him and of all who trust in his name. "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. I have seen the affliction of my people, for I know their sorrows." Then it happens to him as it did to Bethlehem's shepherds; he receives such communications from heaven, as give him expanded and ennobling views of the dignity and glory of the Saviour, and his sufficiency to supply all his wants. The Gospel of his grace he sees, more than ever, to be good tidings of great joy to his otherwise despairing and perishing soul; and with exulting heart, and in unison with the praises of angels, he gives glory to God in the highest, that on earth, and to his own spirit, there is peace and good-will from his reconciled Father.—SOSTHENEUS. ## THE HOME OF THE CHRISTIAN'S HEART.

"Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."—MATT. vi. 20, 21.

In the sunshine of peace, unseduced by its pleasure
Far, far from the world, is the Christian's treasure;
Nor, though chilled by adversity, weary and worn,
Is his courage o'erwhelmed, or his spirit forlorn;
For his hope is fixed, and his treasure lies
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

Though toss'd in his bark on life's troubled sea,
As he hurries along to eternity,
Faith pierces the gloom, and dispels his fears,
For a vision of bliss to his soul appears!
That haven of rest, that peaceful lies
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

The warm sunshine of friendship, around him that smiled,

And life's weary pilgrimage sweetly beguiled,
May have left him forsaken, those troubles to brave,
'Mid the shadow of death, and the chill of the grave;
But he looks to a Friend that never dies,
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

And his fairest hopes of earthly bliss,
May fade in the prime of their loveliness—
And the rays of delight, when they brightest gleam,
Be dispelled like the glow of a fevered dream,—
But he knows of bliss that all change defies,
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

When affections are blighted, and withered the heart,
Though bitter the pangs from those objects to part,
Around whom his heart-strings too closely were twined;
Yet, by trial enlarged—by affliction refined,
And weaned from the world—his affections rise
To the home of his heart beyond the skies!

But, oh! think not his heart and his feelings are dead,
To the beauties his Maker around him has spread;
Nor think that his spirit can find no bliss
Within this fair world of loveliness—

Its joys he can feel, and its beauties prize,
But the home of his heart is beyond the skies!

Yes! he loves them with transport none else can partake,

For he values the gifts for the Giver's sake;
And nature assumes a yet lovelier smile,
When he views her, a glorious altar pile,
Whence, grateful praise to his God may arise,
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

He thinks with delight on those happy bowers,
That beguiled his childhood's fleeting hours,
And ne'er can discover, where'er he may roam,
A spot so beloved as his dear native home!
Yet it is not there his treasure lies,
The home of his heart is beyond the skies!

His home on the earth he may dearly love,
Yet the place of his rest is in heaven above;
And he reads with delight, in the sacred page,
Of a higher and nobler heritage:—
For, bought with a matchless sacrifice,
Was the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

Earth's enjoyments are fleeting, its pleasures are vain,
Its cares, its ambition, bring sorrow and pain!
But think not his prospect is bounded by time;
He has views more exalted, and hopes more sublime!
For he knows of his glorious destinies
In the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

Death nms him prepared— is a message of peace—
A mandate of mercy to give him release—
His Saviour is with him—the valley is past—
Those accents of triumph and joy, were his last!
And, freed from its prison, his spirit flies
To the home of his heart, beyond the skies!

ALEXANDER MACDUFF.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dr Adam Clarke.—The late Dr Adam Clarke, when but a little boy, one day disobeyed his mother, and the disobedience was accompanied with some look or gesture that indicated an undervaluing of her authority. This was a high affront; she immediately flew to the Bible, and opened on these words, Prov. xxx. 17, which she read and commented on in a most awful manner:—"The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." The poor culprit was cut to the heart, believing the words had been sent immediately from heaven: he went out into the field with a troubled spirit, and was musing on this terrible denunciation of divine displeasure, when the hoarse croak of a raven sounded to his conscience an alarm more dreadful than the cry of fire at midnight! He looked up and soon perceived this most ominous bird, and actually supposing it to be the raven of which the text spoke coming to pick out his eyes, he clapped his hands on them, and with the utmost speed and trepidation, ran towards the house as fast as the state of alarm and perturbation would admit, that he might escape the impending vengeance!

This is the time for labour.—Arnauld, one of the Port Royal divines, visiting Nicole, another, to assist him in a new work, the latter observed, "We are now old; is it not time to rest?" "Rest!" returned Arnauld, "have we not all eternity to rest in?"

Augustine.—Children, who are blessed with parents that pray for them, should be very thankful, as they are delivered from many evils into which others fall. Augustine, who lived many hundred years ago, and who was afterwards a very eminent preacher and writer, had a mother who was eminent for piety, and endeavoured to instil into his infant mind the doctrines of divine truth, recommending what she taught by a holy life. But he was very sinful, and was led away by evil companions into great transgressions. His mother continued to pray constantly and earnestly for him. She applied to a good Christian minister to talk with him; who, after much conversation, assured her that her prayers and tears could not be lost. Those prayers were indeed at length heard; the preaching of another minister brought him to a state of seriousness and prayer, and he became a very holy and useful man.

EVERY CHRISTIAN IN HIS OWN SPHERE
A MISSIONARY.

BY THE REV. JAMES BEGG, A.M.,

It is the imperative duty of all Christians, to promote the eternal salvation of men. Strictly speaking, no man can provide for his brother's eternal peace. But, in the very same sense, no man can provide for the present comfort of any human being. Without the immediate providence of God the builder builds, and the watchman watches, the husbandman sows, the merchant traffics in vain. The bread which perisheth and that which endures unto everlasting life, both come equally down from heaven. The eternal God, of his great liberality, not merely makes the harvests come round in their abundance, and sends corn, and wine, and oil, that man in the midst of his sinfulness may be filled with joy, but hath, from all eternity, provided for the eternal happiness of those who shall be saved. Both these treasures have been put into earthen vessels, and strictly speaking, it is not the providing of them, but the distribution, which is left to man. And what ought to be impressed upon our minds is, that the duty of spreading these eternal benefits abroad, is binding not merely upon the ministers of the everlasting Gospel, or upon kings and rulers, although, in this work, they should stand forth prominent, but upon all Christians as such. The whole members of the Christian Church should be constantly at work, like the little leaven hid amidst the mighty mass until the whole is leavened.

The instant a man becomes a Christian, he devotes himself to the service of Christ in all that he is, and has, and hopes to possess. He is, in the strong language of Scripture, a living sacrifice, and whether he thinks of the eternal God coming down from heaven, and, in human nature, enduring such agonies, that he might be raised to glory—or reflects that Christ is now in heaven again, waiting till many souls be brought to glory, till all his enemies be made his footstool—or looks upon the countenances of the men that pass along the streets, and remembers that they must all live throughout a long eternity, and that for that eternity few of them are prepared—or upon the changeless glories of heaven—or the dread solemnities of a judgment day—the endless torments of the regions of woe—upon waiting expecting angels—upon the zeal of his fellow-Christians—upon the cold indifference of others—upon all the objects of the spiritual world around him, and all the hurrying objects of a quickly coming eternity—he sees a thousand inducements to be up and doing whilst it is day; and his zeal will not expend itself in feeble efforts within his own little circle, but he will rejoice in every institution whose object it is to bring perishing men to see the King in his beauty and the land that is afar off;—he will love as his own soul the men by whom such institutions are promoted, he will regard all who oppose them as his own enemies.

This is no exaggerated description of genuine Christianity in its practical exhibitions, and if we have never been conscious of any such feelings, we have in the strongest possible way, before angels and men, denied the faith. God has positively commanded us all to do good and to communicate—to save the souls of our brethren from death, that thus we may cover a multitude of sins,—to walk in the steps of our great Redeemer, who was always pointing the views of men towards heaven. This is not left to our volition, but has all the authority of a positive command, and to refuse obedience to it, is to turn our backs upon Christianity, and to break away from under the authority of God. It is as much to disobey the Almighty, in whom we profess to trust, as if we violated the second, or third, or any other of the commandments—as if we set up an idol in our dwelling-places to worship—or appropriated to ourselves our neighbour's wealth, or violated the Sabbath-day. To be convinced of the truth of these statements, let us only conceive how we ourselves would regard such conduct in one of the high intelligences of heaven. If, when a mandate went forth from the eternal throne of God, commanding Gabriel to fly to the uttermost ends of the earth on some mysterious and lofty enterprise, instead of being off with the speed of lightning, he turned sullenly away and attempted to find his own pleasure amongst his companion spirits. This would be at once an open revolt against God, and it would be vain for such an angel to say, that he believed the right which God had to utter such a command—his conduct would condemn him, and would be a breaking up at once of all the harmonies of heaven. And if the earth is only a nursery for that glorious place above, and if Christians are to be trained here to the same implicit and rejoicing obedience which angels display, it is plain, that if they turn away from obeying a commandment, as plainly revealed in Scripture, as if a voice from the eternal Sanctuary had proclaimed it in their hearing, their conduct is exactly that of the rebellious spirits of God. And how can they hope to be suffered to mingle with angels, when they die, or how can they dare to go down on their knees when none but the eternal God is a witness, and pray that the Almighty's will may be done on earth as the angels in heaven perform it? how can they dare to do this when that Omniscient Being knows, and their own consciences tell them, that they are the very persons who stand in the way of the fulfilment of their prayer, and that they do what they can by their neglect to frustrate the great and holy purposes of Jehovah? They are worse than infidels who are in such a case—for they are traitors within the camp—they profess to acknowledge their obligations to a Saviour, only to show how they can treat them with contempt—to realize a great eternity only to prove to all men that they can despise its amazing vastness—to believe in the existence and authority of a God, only that they may prove with what daring hardihood they can trample that authority under their feet.

Upon whatever object a man's heart is fixed, that will he desire above all things to promote; and if we have faith at all in the great realities of an eternal world, and are, in any way, distinguished from hypocrites and unbelievers, we can never rest satisfied so long as men are perishing around us for lack of knowledge. And yet there is no delusion more common; maintained not merely in the market-place, but in the very house of God,—in the seat of Moses, and by some of the professed ministers of truth, and alas! very frequently exemplified than that of supposing that Christianity is a thing of calmness and contemplation, which does not obtrude itself upon the notice of the world, or unsettle the strongholds of iniquity, but steals into heaven in secret. Our position, on the other hand, is, that if Christianity is not open and determined, it has no existence, and that such feeble time-serving Christians are worse than infidels. If the salvation of man were an object of small importance, then could we imagine that we might be indifferent respecting it, but if it be an object, compared with which the whole world sinks into insignificance, then the man who is loudest in warning others of their danger,—the man who is first in activity,—he who casts himself into the breach and beats back the enemy,—is the chosen of God, baptized with fire and sealed to the day of redemption: and that fire passes by sympathy from heart to heart,—opposition gives way before it, —it is strong as death, and many waters cannot quench it. Is it possible that men should be zealous in accomplishing every object, however base, and that there should, in those who are really his servants, be no zeal in the cause of God who created all? Where shall we look for the true temper of Christianity? Shall we look towards our Saviour himself? The theory of which we have spoken receives no countenance from his example. How many cities did he visit, how many heavenly discourses deliver, how many gracious miracles perform, how many scribes and pharisees rebuke, how many fervent prayers utter during the short period of his ministry? His zeal burnt like a flame, iniquity was ashamed and hid itself before him, perishing sinners clustered round him as their great deliverer; the zeal of heaven seemed, for a season, to have come down to earth; it was as his meat and drink to do the will of God, and to finish his work. Or, shall we look to the great apostle of the Gentiles; shall we see him in Jerusalem, preaching so powerfully, that the very murderers of our Lord fly for refuge to the cross which they had impiously lifted up; shall we see him at Athens, and Galatia, and Corinth, and Ephesus, making men pull down their temples of idolatry, and cast the gods which they had worshipped to the moles and to the bats, bring out their books of sorcery and burn them in the presence of all the people? What a mighty stir is here! and how does this undaunted man, with the love of the eternal Saviour in his heart, and the book of salvation in his hand, fly from sea to sea, and from city to city, heedless of his own safety, for he is in perils often by land and by sea, in the wilderness and in the crowded city, and amongst false brethren; but he has formed the noble resolution, not to go down to his grave till he has proclaimed to his perishing brethren the means of their eternal safety. His zeal was only kindled by opposition, and with the fire of a seraph he carried on his high designs. Was this Christianity? Or, shall we take, in our own land, those men of vehement spirit, who shook "the idols of Rome out of their niches, and swept them forth from our isle," changing a wilderness of darkness and degrading superstition into a smiling garden, which the Lord hath blessed, emancipating a whole nation from the most degrading of all captivities, and handing down to us the most unspeakable blessings? Were these Christian men? and can we possibly belong to the same family with them, if when the same degradation is beginning to oppress our countrymen again,—when the same darkness of ignorance is beginning to gather its fearful gloom around us,—when the same world is still lying in wickedness, we pass heedlessly on, without putting forth one wish, or making one effort to accomplish the same glorious objects. Does it never strike you, that instead of measuring Christianity by the standard of your own doings, you should measure your own doings by the standard of Christianity? and that if you are the men we have at present described, you are those very lukewarm professors of Christianity who have practically, and in the strongest way, denied the faith, and are an abomination in the sight of God? What an awful statement is that made by our exalted Saviour, "I know thy works that thou art neither cold nor hot; so then, because thou art lukewarm, I will spue thee out of my mouth." "Curse ye Meroz said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE LATE REV. WILLIAM GUTHRIE, A.M., MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL AT FENWICK.

THIS excellent minister of Christ was born at Pitforth in Angus-shire in the year 1620. He was the eldest of a numerous family, all of whom were trained up in the fear of the Lord by their affectionate and pious parents. At an early period he exhibited indications of genius far beyond his years, and it was resolved, accordingly, that he should be trained up for one of the learned professions. With this view, when his education at school was completed, he was enrolled as a student at the University of St. Andrews. During the period of his college life he enjoyed peculiar advantages, being under the guardianship and tuition of his own cousin, the well-known Mr James Guthrie, who held at that time a professorship of philosophy in the New College.

Having finished his literary course at the university, and obtained the degree of Master of Arts, he commenced the study of Theology, and in this department of knowledge he enjoyed the very high privilege of being a pupil of Samuel Rutherford, who was then Professor of Theology in St. Andrews. Mr Guthrie had from childhood evinced a serious disposition, but, under the ministrations of this eminent servant of the Redeemer, he was aroused to an anxious inquiry after the way to eternal life. He felt deeply his lost condition as a sinner, and his obligations to that Almighty Saviour who had interposed for his deliverance, and, under a sense of these obligations, he resolved to dedicate himself henceforth to the service of the Lord in the work of the ministry. That he might be disencumbered from worldly cares, he made over to a younger brother the estate of Pitforth, which fell to him as being the eldest son, and carried forward with entire singleness of mind that preparation for the sacred office on which he had entered. At length, having passed his trials with distinguished ability, he was licensed to preach the Gospel in August 1642.

Animated by a sincere desire to serve God in the Gospel of his Lord, Mr Guthrie's pulpit appearances were characterised by a peculiar vigour of thought and ardour of devotion, which rendered him very acceptable as a preacher. The fame which he had acquired at college led to his appointment as tutor to Lord Mauchlin, eldest son of the Earl of Loudoun, who was then Chancellor of Scotland. About a year after he had entered the family he preached in the parish church of Galston, on a preparation day before the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The neighbouring parish of Fenwick was vacant at that time, and a few of the inhabitants happening to be present when Mr Guthrie preached at Galston, were so delighted and edified with his discourse, that they prevailed upon their fellow-parishioners to make choice of him as their pastor. A call was accordingly made out by the parish of Fenwick, and the Presbytery, on the 7th of November 1644, ordained him to the sacred office.

The scene of usefulness on which Mr Guthrie was now called to enter was one which required much prudence and laborious exertion. Fenwick had previously formed part of a large and overgrown parish, over which, from its overwhelming magnitude, the pastor had found it impossible to exercise a careful oversight. The consequence was, that the people, destitute of pastoral superintendence, and unaccustomed to attend religious ordinances, had become quite indifferent to religion, and their moral condition was, of course, proportionally low. They were wandering without a guide, habitually profaning the Sabbath, and shewing themselves to be utter strangers to the power, and, in many instances, to the very profession, of religion. But under the ministry of Mr Guthrie this state of matters did not long continue. Absence from the house of God soon became as rare as it had formerly been frequent; domestic devotion, which had been almost unknown in the parish, became extensively prevalent, and the whole moral aspect of Fenwick underwent a striking change. And to what was all this due but, under the divine blessing, to the indefatigable exertions of their new pastor. He was instant in season and out of season, both in preaching the Word and in domiciliary visits among the people of his charge. He was suitably impressed with the responsibility of his office, and he counted no labour too great if, by any means, he could fulfil the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus. In the preparation of his discourses he was diligent and conscientious, and so much was he admired as a faithful, energetic, impressive preacher, that people flocked from a great distance to enjoy the benefit of his ministrations. His church, which was large, was soon crowded to excess, and though a great part of his audience were thus under the necessity of remaining without, his powerful voice and animated delivery put it in their power to hear him even out of doors.

In the more private department of his pastoral duties he was equally acceptable, entering the dwellings of his parishioners with an affability and kindness which speedily endeared him to their hearts. They respected, they esteemed, they loved him, and every word, therefore, which came from his lips, was listened to with intense interest and marked attention. For the spiritual instruction of the young he was peculiarly solicitous, and although Sabbath schools were then unknown, the frequent opportunities of catechising the young which the arrangements of the Church of Scotland have, in every period of her history, afforded to the diligent and faithful pastor, were eagerly embraced by Mr Guthrie for attracting their tender minds to a serious consideration of divine truth. In visiting the sick, he displayed a remarkable skill in accommodating his remarks, both in conversation and prayer, to the peculiarities of the case, and hence his appearance in the chamber of the afflicted was always hailed with peculiar delight. To those of his parishioners who were irregular in their attendance on divine worship he spoke with great plainness and fidelity, and, in many cases, he was successful in gaining them over to a habitual observance of the ordinances of God.

In the course of a year after his settlement in the parish of Fenwick, Mr Guthrie married Agnes Campbell, daughter of David Campbell, Esq. of Skeldon, in Ayrshire, an alliance which proved a source of much comfort to him, throughout the whole of his future life. Shortly after, he was chosen by the General Assembly to attend the army as chaplain, and after fulfilling his duties in that capacity for some time, he returned to his parish with more ardent affection than ever for his parish and his home. The fame of his talents as a preacher spread far and wide, and frequent invitations were sent to him from different places to become their pastor. He received calls from Linlithgow, Stirling, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, all of which, however, he declined. He was devotedly attached to the parish and the parishioners of Fenwick, and nothing could tempt him to quit a situation so congenial to his retired habits, and where his labours were so eminently useful.

The following testimony to his character as a pastor, is from the pen of Mr John Livingstone, who knew him well:—"In his doctrine, Mr William Guthrie was as full and free as any man in Scotland had ever been, which, together with the excellency of his preaching gift, did so recommend him to the affections of his people, that they turned the corn-field of his glebe to a little town; every one building a house for his family upon it, that they might live in the enjoyment of his ministry."

As an instance of the dignity and authority of his manner it may be mentioned that, "on one occasion, when assisting the Rev. Andrew Gray of Glasgow, at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, during the time that Cromwell's army was in Scotland, a few of the officers of that army were in church, and had formed the impious resolution of a promiscuous participation of that holy ordinance, and were in the act of coming forward in the crowd, when Mr Guthrie, in language and in a manner that perfectly overawed them, obliged them to retreat to their seats again; and this, too, when no civil authority could avail any thing against a power which had become predominant in the country."

The restoration of the unhappy house of Stuart to the throne soon put an end to the ministry of Mr Guthrie, as well as of many other godly Presbyterian ministers in Scotland. Both he and his parishioners saw that the day of their melancholy separation from one another could not be far distant; and their gloomy forebodings were speedily realised. Faithful pastors were expelled from their charges, and a fierce and bloody persecution deluged Scotland with blood. Mr Guthrie remained in Fenwick as long as he could with safety, but at length he was compelled to abandon it on the 24th of July 1664.

The Earl of Glencairn, who was then Chancellor of Scotland, was much interested in the case of Mr Guthrie, and, accordingly, he applied in his behalf to the Archbishop of Glasgow, but in vain. "It cannot be," was the haughty prelate's indignant reply, "he is a ringleader and keeper of schism in my diocese." The pastor of Fenwick was suspended, and a curate was employed to preach the church vacant. This cruel act on the part of the Archbishop, threw the parish into a state of the most intense sorrow. The Wednesday before the commission took effect, was observed as a day of humiliation, on which occasion Mr Guthrie preached from these words: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." On the following Sabbath, being the day fixed upon for the execution of the Archbishop's tyrannical edict, he again met the people in the morning, that they might engage together in religious exercises for the last time. It was a most affecting occasion. The whole assembly were in tears as they listened to the parting admonitions of their revered pastor. He dismissed the congregation about nine o'clock, and returned to the manse, there to await the arrival of the curate who was appointed by the Archbishop to give effect to his arbitrary sentence. The messenger at length arrived, escorted by a troop of horsemen. The interview which took place on the occasion, between Mr Guthrie and the curate, it may be interesting to narrate.

"The curate, on entering the manse, shewed, 'That the bishop and committee, after much lenity shewn to him for a long time, were constrained to pass the sentence of suspension against him, for not keeping of presbyteries and synods with his brethren, and his unpeaceableness in the Church, of which sentence he was appointed to make public intimation to him, for which he read his commission under the Archbishop of Glasgow's hand.'

"Mr Guthrie answered—'I judge it not convenient to say much in answer to what you have spoken; only, whereas you allege there has been much lenity used towards me, be it known unto you, that I take the Lord for party in that, and thank him for it; yes, I look upon it as a door which God opened to me for preaching this Gospel, which neither you nor any man else was able to shut, till it was given you of God. And as to that sentence passed against me, I declare before these gentlemen, (the officers of the party,) that I lay no weight upon it, as it comes from you, or those who sent you; though I do respect the civil authority, who by their law laid the ground for this sentence; and were it not for the reverence I owe to the civil magistrate, I would not cease from the exercise of my ministry for all that sentence. And as to the crime I am charged with, I did hold presbyteries and synods with my brethren; but I do not judge those who now sit in these to be my brethren, but men who have made defection from the truth and cause of God; nor do I judge those to be free or lawful courts of Christ that are now sitting. And as to my unpeaceableness, I know I am bidden follow peace with all men, but I know also, I am bidden follow it with holiness; and since I could not obtain peace without prejudice to holiness, I thought myself obliged to let it go. And as for your commission, Sir, to intimate this sentence, I here declare, I think myself called by the Lord to the work of the ministry, and did forsake my nearest relations in the world, and give up myself to the service of the Gospel in this place, having received an unanimous call from this parish, and being tried and ordained by the presbytery; and I bless the Lord he hath given me some success, and a seal of my ministry upon the souls and consciences of not a few that are gone to heaven, and of some that are yet in the way to it. And now, Sir, if you will take it upon you to interrupt my work among this people, as I shall wish the Lord may forgive you the guilt of it, so I cannot but leave all the bad consequences that follow upon it betwixt God and your own conscience. And here I do further declare before these gentlemen, that I am suspended from my ministry, for adhering to the covenants and work of God, from which you and others have apostatized.'

"The Lord," said the curate, 'had a work before that covenant had a being, and I judge them apostates who adhere to that covenant. I wish, not only that the Lord would forgive you, but, if it be lawful to pray for the dead, (at which expression the soldiers laughed,) that the Lord would forgive the sin of this Church these hundred years past.'

"It is true," replied Mr Guthrie, 'the Lord had a work before that covenant had a being, but it is as true that it hath been more glorious since that covenant; and it is a small thing for us to be judged of you in adhering to that covenant, who have so deeply corrupted your ways, and seem to reflect on the work of reformation from Popery these hundred years past, by intimating that the Church had need of pardon for the same.—As for you, gentlemen, added he, directing himself to the soldiers, 'I wish the Lord may pardon you, for countenancing this man in this business.'

"One of them scoffingly replied, 'I wish we never do a greater fault.'

"Well," said Mr Guthrie, 'a little sin may damn a man's soul.'

After this interview, Mr Guthrie entertained the curate and the soldiers with the utmost hospitality and kindness, supplying them with suitable refreshments, and conversing with them without displaying the slightest degree of irritation or unbecoming harshness.

The suspension from his ministerial duties per-severely upon the naturally weak constitution of Mr Guthrie. He lived for some time in the parish, but never preached. An event, however, occurred, which tended, in some degree, to divert his mind from the scene of his usefulness. The brother on whom he had and it therefore returned to its original owner. Mr Guthrie accordingly set out without delay for Pitforthly near Brechin; and, amid the scenes of his early days, he found a refuge from the persecution to which he had been subjected. His mind, however, frequently reverted to the events of other days; his health daily declined, and a complication of severe and painful diseases assailed his feeble frame. And yet, amid the most excruciating pains, he felt a well-grounded consolation in the hopes and promises of the Gospel. "Though I die mad," said he, on one occasion, "yet I know I shall die in the Lord. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord at all times, but more especially when a flood of errors, snares, and judgments, are beginning or coming on a nation, church, and people." His illness, though severe, was short, and endured with a Christian composure and resignation truly edifying and becoming. He died in the house of his brother-in-law, at Brechin, on the 10th of October 1665, in the forty-fifth year of his age.

VINDICATION OF THE CLAIMS

OF HEATHEN NATIONS IN GENERAL, AND INDIA IN PARTICULAR, ON THE BENEVOLENCE OF BRITISH CHRISTIANS.

[From a Speech Delivered before last General Assembly, by the Rev. Dr Duff.]

THERE is an objection than which none more insidious or plausible has ever been advanced, and than which none operates more widely or fatally in the communications of private intercourse. Entitled, for this reason alone, to at least a cursory notice, it is doubly so at the present time, on account of its having been lately ushered into notoriety with considerable pomp and circumstance, by one of our great organs of public opinion. The writer, though at a distance, cannot contemplate, without emotion, the great destitution of the means of grace in this northern division of the island. It would seem as if, in the full glow of philanthropic zeal, he could shed tears of commiseration over the spiritual ignorance and heathenism of our neglected and outcast population. And he thus, in substance, at once appeals to our piety and our patriotism:—"How can ye, the members of the Church of Scotland, think of sending either men or money to Hindustan, to convert the heathen there, that are aliens in blood, language, and religion;—when ye have so many practical heathens, related to you by ties of kindred and of language, at home, at your very door? And how, by so doing, can ye forget the admonitory exhortation of the holy Apostle, 'He that provideth not for his own, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel?'"

First of all, I might retort on this class of objectors, on the score of their own gross inconsistencies. But waiving, for the present, the subject of inconsistency altogether, and cheerfully conceding the lawfulness of applying analogically the Apostle's aphorism, respecting the supply of temporal necessities, to parallel cases of spiritual destitution, I here take my stand, and declare, that, as employed by the objector, it is at once misquoted and misapplied. And why? For the best of all reasons, that it has been quoted and applied for the express purpose of substantiating an egregiously unsound and unscriptural position.

The position, in few words, is this: "That so long as we have 'practical heathens' or unbelievers at home, we ought not to send either men or money to convert the heathen abroad;"—and, in support of this position, the aphorism of the Apostle is quoted and applied.

Now, this position I denounce, in the first place, as unsound and unscriptural, because it is in direct opposition to the whole proceedings and example of the holy Apostle himself, during a life of labour, to biographies of all ages.

The Apostle himself, we know, gloried in proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ, not only to the Jews, but also to the Gentiles, who were "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise." Yea, and in so doing, he often seemed to glory, if possible, still more than in preaching to his own countrymen, whose were the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is "God over all blessed for ever." Figure then to yourselves, the inspired Apostle, standing amid the barren wilds of Scythia, addressing a group of fierce roving barbarians, persuading them by the terrors of the law, and the ardours of that love which many waters could not quench, nor the floods of great waters drown, to repent of their sins, and arise and return to that heavenly Father, who, though he winked at the times of their past ignorance, now wills all men to be saved, and come to a knowledge of the truth; and is ready to welcome every returning penitent as a child, and order him to be clothed with the spotless robes of the Redeemer's righteousness. All eyes are riveted, all hearts arrested, some are filled with alarm by the upbraidings of an awakened conscience and the anticipations of a coming judgment; and others are melted into tenderness at the yearnings of Divine compassion that stream from Calvary's cross.

But, hark! suddenly a voice, in the name of Philanthropy, breaks in upon the moving scene. It is directed to the holy Apostle:—"Why, oh! why, have you come hither? Are there not thousands, and tens of thousands of the seed of Abraham—your own kinsmen according to the flesh, who, as yet, refuse to embrace Jesus of Nazareth as their long expected Messiah, and who, by so refusing, fill up the measure of impending vengeance? Why, then, oh! why have you thus forsaken your own unbelieving brethren in Judea and Jerusalem, and come hither to the uttermost ends of the earth, to seek out and convert these rude barbarians, who are aliens in blood, language, and religion?" "Avaunt!"—replies the holy Apostle, with a vehement earnestness of truth, which, like the touch of Ithuriel's spear, unmasks the reptile that daringly assumes the goodly form of Philanthropy—"Avaunt! I know thy voice. Is Christ the Saviour of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also. I, therefore, as the disciple of the Lord Jesus, feel myself to be debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians—to the wise and the unwise. And in this I supremely glory, that in Christ Jesus, the Saviour of the world, there is neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, male nor female. In Him all are one, and there is no difference."

In the second place, I might proceed at large to show, that the objector's position is grossly unsound and unscriptural, because it is in direct contradiction to the parting command of our Lord and Saviour—in direct contradiction to the entire spirit and design of the Christian economy.

This being the case, I would, with all the emphasis of an overwhelming conviction, assert and maintain, that it is our duty, as a constituted Church of Christ, to do more, tenfold more, than we have ever yet done, towards sending the glad tidings of salvation, not only to India, but as speedily as possible, to all the unlightened nations of the earth. And this I would assert and maintain, for the special reason, among others, that by such faithful compliance with the divine command, and such harmonious concurrence with the spirit of Christianity, we might draw down a larger measure of the divine blessing on our own heads—and thus be the better enabled, more effectually to provide for the spiritual necessities of "our own" people at home—as well as arrest the execution of the divine deed that may speedily come forth, to remove our candlestick altogether, on account of a too long neglected and unfaithful stewardship.

Consider Christianity in its essential spirit. Is it not, like the principle of life, communicative?—and, like the principle of light, diffusive? If, then, we attempt to do violence to this—its essential spirit—by resolving that, so far as we are concerned, it shall not be communicated as spiritual life, nor diffused as spiritual light, among the benighted and famishing nations,—how can we expect the fulness of the divine blessing, even on those labours that are exclusively designed to promote its benign influence, within our own narrow sphere at home?

Again, consider the Saviour's parting command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." Is it not unambiguous in its language, and peremptory in its authority? Taken in immediate connection with the annexed promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world,"—is it not clear as day, that there is not a command in the Decalogue more absolutely obligatory on the world at large, than this is on the Christian Church? If, therefore, any Church of Christ should presume to neglect or despise this solemn injunction of its Divine Head and Redeemer, how can it expect the fulness of his blessing, even in carrying on the great work of reclaiming sinners and edifying saints within its own circumscribed boundary at home?

Every Christian Church has thus a double duty to perform, one, towards its own people, properly so called, and another, towards the world at large. If, therefore, while any Church labours to fulfil its bounden duty towards the former, it, at the same time, neglects almost, or altogether, the fulfilment of an equally bounden duty towards the latter:—If, while the one is done, the other is left entirely, or in a great measure, undone:—If, while the one-half of the debt is cancelled, the other half is left wholly, or in part, undischarged:—How can such a Church, without self-evident delusion, pray to that God, whose appointed ordinance respecting the universal promulgation of his own eternal Word, it practically disregards, for continued health and felicity within its own more immediate pale?

The very law or condition of the existence of Christianity in a state of purity and vigour, is that of constant internal increase: and the law or condition of internal increase is that of perpetual circulation and unrestricted communication outward. In a word, the very law or condition of its continued existence and prosperity, whether in the case of individuals, congregations, or national Churches, is that of increase by means of free distribution. And you may as well attempt to counteract this law, immutably impressed upon it by its Divine Author, and yet expect to retain it amongst you in its state of pristine excellence, as attempt to suspend the influence of that "stupendous energy" which causes the periodical revolution of all worlds, and yet expect to retain the earth we dwell upon, in its previous condition of harmony and beauty.

Analogies, though they may somewhat aid the conception, do but very imperfectly represent this law. Christianity is, in the Bible, compared to an expanding tree, that is at length to embrace all nations in its all-covering shade:—attempt to lay a violent arrest on the tree in its growth, and it soon droops, withers, and decays. It is compared to a fountain that ever overflows, and is never exhausted:—attempt to lay a violent arrest on the salient waters of the fountain, and these will soon force an opening elsewhere, and leave the original reservoir dry. It is compared to a shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day:—attempt to lay a violent arrest on the portion of light admitted into your dwelling, and in the very act of so doing, it becomes extinguished. Thus has it been, eternally and absolutely, with Christianity under all its dispensations, from the beginning of time;—for, in its substance, Christianity is "as old as the creation." The law of existence, immutably impressed on it by the Almighty, being that of internal increase—and the law of internal increase being that of communicativeness:—the instant you attempt to lay a violent arrest on its free communication outward:—in other words, the instant you attempt to monopolize all its blessings, as if exclusively intended for yourselves, instead of regarding them, agreeably to Heaven's grand design, as a  sacred deposit, committed to your trust, for the benefit of a lost and perishing world;—that instant, it ceases internally to increase,—and the instant it ceases internally to increase, it begins to shrink and shrivel; it "decays and waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away."

What an affecting and overpowering motive does this suggest to the making the work of missions, i. e. the divine work of disseminating abroad the blessings of the everlasting Gospel, not a subject of secondary or subordinate interest, but a subject of prime and paramount importance, that ought ever to engross a full share of the best energies of every Christian Church!

In the third place, though the aphorism of the Apostle has been quoted, and applied by the objector in support of a false position, that is no reason why we should not proceed to apply it in support of a true one. The objector has plainly admitted, at least his reasoning has no meaning at all without the admission, that Christians, in general, are bound to provide for the spiritual necessities of "their own." For this most important admission, I would thank the objector from the very bottom of my heart, seeing it supplies me with a new and resistless argument in advocating the special claims of India.

Whatever may be alleged of other heathen lands; if it can be shown of India, in particular, that it is now "our own," will it not follow, as an inevitable consequence, from the objector's reasoning, that we are specially bound to provide for its spiritual necessities, and that too, under the impending anathema, that if we do not, we thereby deny the faith, and are worse than infidels. And if that Christian government which, right or wrong, may have made India "our own," should fail in its high duty in this respect; will it not devolve upon us as a Christian people, and more especially as members of a Christian Church, incorporated with that very Government, to come forth and discharge our share of the obligation?

The only question for determination, then, is, Whether India, in any legitimate sense of the expression, can be really called "our own?" For, if so, the question of duty in providing for its spiritual necessities is already peremptorily decided by the objector in the affirmative.

I ask, then, Is India, or is it not, "our own?" In the language of Cowper, "Is India free? or, do we grind her still?" Ah! never has any country, through such a long succession of ages, been so terribly scourged as India. Dearly has it paid for its diamond and golden mines,—its pearly and coral strands. Look at the unparalleled series of Tartar and Mahomedan invasions. Talk of the volcano, with its sulphureous streams; talk of the earthquake, with its train of chaotic ruins; talk of the hurricane, with its desolating ravages; all the volcanoes, earthquakes, and hurricanes, recorded since the world began, were but partial and merciful visitations compared with the fiery, crashing, whirlwind eruptions of barbaric hordes into the fertile plains of Hindustan! Look at the oft-repeated massacre of hundreds of thousands of unoffending citizens in cold blood! Look at their mangled bodies literally piled into mountains; and their severed skulls into pyramids! Look at the onward march of the savage conquerors. Before them, all is as "the garden of the Lord"—teeming with varied bounties of a gracious Providence. Behind them, all is a desert, naked and leafless, peeled, and stripped bare,—one vast and profound solitude, where, erewhile, was crowded all that is beautiful in form and pleasant to the sight,—one wide and universal sepulchre, where, erewhile, resounded the hum and the bustle of busy men,—and the wailings of widowed mothers and fatherless children, where, erewhile, the voices and the notes of happy myriads rolled along in sportive echoes!

Ah! blessed be God, from such terrific desolations India is now at length happily delivered. By a long train of vicissitudes, unexampled in the annals of time, a small island of the ocean, at the distance of a hemisphere,—an island, whose inhabitants were but naked, prowling savages, at a time when India was the very cradle of civilization, legislation, and philosophy, has now succeeded to the imperial sway of a dominion more extensive and consolidated far, than that of the mighty Akbar, or magnificent Aurengzeb! For, which of India's thrones have we not now cast down? Which of its sceptres have we not broken? Which of its treasures have we not drained? Which of its territories have we not appropriated? What first breathings of impatience under the restraints of our foreign yoke are we not ready to resent as rebellion? What incipient dispositions to transfer allegiance to the lineal representatives of ancient native monarchs, are we not prepared to quash, and capitally punish as high treason against the majesty of Britain?

Are we not, then, at once the conquerors and sovereign rulers of India? Is not India, therefore, in a peculiar sense "our own?" Are not its people, in the highest and strongest sense of the expression, "our own" people?—"our own" fellow-subjects—subjects of the crown of Christian Protestant Britain, as much as the natives of the Hebrides, or the Catholics of Ireland? Are we not, therefore, bound by every obligation, human and divine, to provide for the spiritual necessities of India's children—the spiritual necessities of famishing millions, whom, contrary to their own will, we have compelled, by force of arms, to become "our own" adopted children? Yea, are we not doubly bound to impart to them the treasures of useful knowledge and of Gospel grace, as the only adequate equivalent in our power, in reparation of the wrongs, grievous and innumerable, which in times past they have sustained at our hands? As far as good intentions are concerned, ours may now be truly characterised as a paternal government, that seems sincerely desirous to redress every injury and stanch every bleeding wound. But who can obliterate the long black catalogue of treachery and plunder, devastation and death, that swells the revolting narrative of many of our earlier conquests? Ah! there have been deeds perpetrated by the sons of Britain on the plains of Hindustan,—deeds, that in number cannot be reckoned up in order,—deeds of unutterable infamy,—deeds that are engraven in characters of blood in the ineffaceable pages of history,—ay, and registered, as an eternal memorial against us, in the book of God's remembrance! And shall we withhold the only adequate boon which it is in our power to confer, by way of recompense, on poor, ransacked, pillaged, ravaged, unhappy India? Ah! if we do, methinks the spirits of thousands, untimely slain, will rise up in judgment to condemn us. Methinks, a long eternity of retributive vengeance will seal the merited condemnation. But let us now, if ye will, resolve to shroud the misdeeds of our fathers in the mantle of oblivion. And, over the plains which they have drenched with the blood of the victims of a mercenary policy,—and along the shores which they have strewn with the wrecks of a griping avarice, let us, their descendants and kinsmen, resolve to rear the temples of Zion; those precious monuments of piety and benevolence, which, in the duration of their effects outlast the fabric of the material universe!

Though much yet remains unsaid of what was originally intended, the failure of time and strength compels me to hasten, however abruptly, to a conclusion.

And, in doing so, bear with me when I give vent to the overpowering emotions of my own heart, by exclaiming in the hearing of this great Assembly:—Oh, that as a Protestant nation, and a Protestant Church, we were made to know, at least in this the day of our merciful visitation, our high and godlike destiny, as the Zion and Jerusalem of these latter times, whence glad-some light and liberty might emanate to the remotest ends of the earth! The men of Athens, Pagans though they were, could, with one simultaneous voice, unite in the patriotic shout, "Let us march against Philip; let us fight for our liberties: let us conquer or die." And is it not high time that we, as a Christian people, should join in raising a far loftier note? A note, that might be sublimely responded to by prophets, and apostles, and the whole noble army of martyrs that now encompass us around, as intensely interested spectators, bending from their heavenly thrones? And where, oh, tell me, where can this loftier note be first raised more worthily than in this very Assembly,—the representative Assembly of a Church founded by a race of heroes, whose dauntless spirit, amid cruel sufferings and death, amply proved that on them the mantle of prophets, and apostles, and martyrs had largely fallen? In order to realize so blessed a consummation, would to God that all petty jealousies and ungodly rivalries were for ever annihilated from amongst us! Would to God that all unholy oppositions of partisanship were for ever banished from our shores!—oppositions about questions, many of which, compared with the conversion of a world of lost sinners towards God, are so contemptibly insignificant, that for a whole nation to be agitated by them into turbulence and fury, does indeed,—

"Resemble ocean into tempest wrought,
To waft a feather, or to drown a fly!"

Oh, then, that the middle walls of partition, which at present sever the bleeding Churches of Christendom into so many hostile sections, that frown defiance from each other's battlements, were riven asunder! Oh, that all that profess the faith of Jesus, of whatever name or denomination among men, were melted down by the lightning of divine love, and fused into one homogeneous mass, actuated by one spirit, and raising the one universal shout:—"Let us march against the common enemy of man: let us fight for the spiritual liberties of a world: in the cause of the Redeemer let us conquer or die."

Will this be branded as wild enthusiasm by the cold calculating spirits of a boastful intellectual age? With righteous indignation I must repel the charge. Is it lawful for the British patriot's breast to throb, when he hears the orator exclaim, amid the deafening plaudits of a senate, "Where the standard of England is planted, there, foreign dominion shall not come?" And, is it not a higher and holier enthusiasm in the patriot citizen of Zion to exult, when he hears a voice from heaven's canopy proclaim, "Where the standard of the Cross is planted, there Satan's dominion shall not come?" Is it lawful for the British patriot's heart to vibrate with an undefinable thrill of ecstatic joy, when he listens to the poet's song of the meteor flag of England, which "Has braved a thousand years

The battle and the breeze?"

And is it not a higher and holier enthusiasm in the patriot citizen of Zion to exult, when he hears aloft the flag of the everlasting covenant, which, for six thousand years, has withstood more than the shock of a thousand navies manned by human and hellish foes?—which still moral elements—which shall survive the funeral obsequies of sin, and death, and the grave—and finally wave, in triumph, over the citadels of the nations, when all their pomp and grandeur are swallowed up and lost, amid the overpowering glories of Messiah's reign?

With visions so bright spreading out before us, in the prophetic page, shall we not arise and shake off all earthly dalliance and delay? Shall we not arise and put on the whole armour of God?—Ours is no ordinary warfare; ours, no ordinary struggle.—Oh! let us then arise and go forth to the contest, cheered by the songs of divine chivalry, and animated by the certain prospect of the Victor's crown. Let us go forth in the spirit of ancient warriors, who fought the good fight, and are now inheriting the promises. Let us go forth in the name of Jehovah, Lord of Hosts. Let his standard be triumphantly planted. Let truth and righteousness, salvation and peace, be emblazoned on all our banners. Then shall we be unconquered, and pronounced unconquerable. And then, through our conquest, shall the Church of Scotland be hailed as a blessing by the perishing millions of Hindustan—become a praise and a glory in the whole earth—and cause the chorus of the redeemed swell the louder, when, riding on the chariot of triumph, and attired in the royal robes of victory, they enter the mansions of eternal joy!

THE BELIEVER'S VICTORY OVER DEATH AND THE GRAVE:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM LAURENCE BROWN, D. D.,
Principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen.

“O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.”—1 Cor. xv. 55-57.

A MORE striking or sublime apostrophe than this, “O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?” we shall in vain seek in any of the finest compositions, oratorical or poetical, either ancient or modern. It brings immediately before our view the most terrific objects to the human heart,—death and the grave; and represents the one as armed with that dart with which he is painted, and pointing it at the bosom of every individual of the human race; and the other, as trampling on the mouldering remains, and victoriously exulting over every lifeless body of our mortal species. In a few words, we have here a picture which might be extended over a large canvas, or a representation which might afford an ample theme for the most eloquent tongue, or for the pen of the most exalted and impressive imagination. Then comes the important, the melancholy truth, which must prostrate in the dust every son of Adam, the first transgressor, and fix, in his view, that law which the first human pair, and all their posterity, have violated, and must tremble to read engraven on the everlasting tablet of the Supreme Majesty of heaven,—“The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law.” And last of all, we have that consolatory, that triumphant, exclamation, “But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!”

of sin is the law.” Till sin entered the garden of Eden, there was no death; death lurked in a cavern on the confines of hell; sin accosted him there, and pointed out to him an immense field for his conquests. She took him by the hand, in all his grisly terrors, led him into Eden, and prepared for him his victims. She insinuated her venom into the breasts of our first parents, laid them bare to his dart, which could not penetrate the impregnable steel of innocence. With delight the enemy of God and man heard the denunciation, “In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.” Gen. ii. 17. From that moment he resolved to introduce sin into the world, and to render feeble man her, and his, victim. He presented to Eve the fatal temptation, to which she too easily yielded, and, in order to give it complete success, varnished it with that specious colouring which was most fitted to impose upon an innocent, unsuspecting mind. And the serpent said unto the woman, “Ye shall not surely die. For God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened; and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.” Gen. iii. 4, 5. We know the fatal consequences, and individually experience them.

The first mother of mankind cannot be supposed to have imputed any deception to God. She allowed herself to indulge some vague notion of the prohibition being only some salutary caution against too great curiosity, and she trusted to his mercy. “To be as gods, knowing good and evil,” wholly occupied her mind, precluded reflection, and precipitated her into that fatal deed which entailed misery on her, on her husband, and the whole of their posterity. Had the tempter presented the seduction in all its real terrors, she would have recoiled with horror, she would have abstained, she would have maintained her obedience to God's prohibition, she would have transmitted to all her children of the human race, an uncontaminated and pure nature, and Eden would still have flourished on earth. “As by one man, then, sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed on all men, for that all have sinned.” Rom. v. 12.

As our first parents were tempted, so have all their posterity been tempted ever since that fatal hour. Some specious appearance of advantage or enjoyment is presented before them; it shines with all the variegated colours of the neck of the dove, and it appears, as the dove, harmless; they contemplate it with delight; they observe not its suddenly changing hues; they take it into their bosoms, and fondly caress it, and soon feel it piercing their hearts; they are not aware that a vulture was disguised under the appearance of a dove, and know their mistake only by its preying on their liver. Thus death entered the world with sin, and derived from sin its own sting. For, supposing that death had not been entailed upon mankind, as a judicial infliction, but should be regarded only as the natural consequence of the gradual decay of their corporeal frame. The cessation of terrestrial life could then be viewed merely in the light of ripe fruit falling from the tree, or as a transition from one state of existence into another more exalted. For the immortality of the soul assures us that man shall not absolutely perish; and if he had been free from moral stain, his translation from this world must have been into a better. But his moral corruption has armed death with all his terrors; it has placed man in a state of enmity with a righteous and holy God, and alarms him with the dread of his vengeance. It is this which brings before the view of the dying sinner the grisly image of death, with his dart directly pointed at his bosom, saying, "Thou art my victim, thou canst not, thou shalt not escape! Sin has brought me to thy bedside, and since thou hast admitted her into thy bosom, thou already feelest that sting with which my dart is pointed. I might have killed thy corporeal frame, formed out of the dust, but thy soul, an emanation of the Divine Spirit, I could not touch. This thou thyself hast poisoned, by admitting sin to taint and corrupt it, and must therefore endure the sting with which sin has armed me. Thou art now under my dominion, and I demand thee as my appointed victim. All refuge fails thee. Thy innocence is lost, and, with that innocence, thy hopes of happiness in this and in a future world."

Further, "the strength of sin is the law." "The law worketh wrath; for where no law is, there is no transgression." Rom. iv. 15. The very idea of sin, is the violation of some law by which we are bound, and it is that very law which renders us obnoxious to punishment for this violation. Antecedently to all positive or municipal enactments, man brings with him, into the world, that moral law which is engraven on his heart, and stamped on his intellectual and moral frame. It is this which cheers his soul, when he is conscious of obedience to it, as far as his natural infirmity will permit; sheds a cheering ray over his whole terrestrial progress; amidst the most gloomy scenes affords him internal satisfaction, and induces him to trust in God, the author of that law, even when he has to struggle with the most formidable difficulties, and discovers to him light in his light, when he seems to be surrounded by almost impenetrable darkness. "The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmities; but a wounded spirit who can bear?" Prov. xviii. 14. The natural infirmities to which we are all subject, disease, accidents, disappointment of our dearest hopes, worldly losses, calumny, the malice of enemies, the desertion of false friends; all the external evils to which human flesh is heir, can be borne, be mitigated, or compensated by the conscious reflection of soundness of heart, and a reliance on the gracious providence and protection of a merciful God. But, when the sting is in our own bosoms, when our hearts reproach us, when condemnation is pronounced where acquittal was to be expected, when the last refuge in every other calamity is withdrawn, and no altar is left to whose horns we can cling; gracious God! how deplorable, how desperate is our condition! It is true that men often attempt to "sear their consciences as with a hot iron," or, if they have not yet reached that last pitch of depravity, endeavour, by dissipation, by intoxication, or by worldly pursuits, to abstract their thoughts from themselves, and to scatter them abroad into the world. They wish to superinduce on their minds a callous insensibility, and to reduce themselves to the state of brutes, devoid of all conscious reflection, and capable only of sensible impressions. But, if they succeed in this, it is the cessation of pain which a mortification produces, and is the immediate forerunner of moral death. The attempt, however, is frequently vain, and in the midst of their inebriating festivity they are startled; they behold a hand coming out of the wall and writing. They read in large letters, "Thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting." Dan. v. 25, 26, 27. "Then is their countenance changed, and their thoughts trouble them, so that the joints of their loins are loosed, and their knees smite one against another." Dan. v. 6.

But do not all of us, my brethren, feel that "the strength of sin is the law?" Can any of us fulfil the law of God? Must we not say, that "when we have done all these things which are commanded us, we are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do?" Luke xvii. 10. But, who of us has done these things which were commanded us? Who of us has not failed in every branch, in every point of our duty to God, our neighbours, ourselves? Enter into your own hearts, consider the purity and comprehension of the divine law, compare with those your own dispositions and conduct, varnish not with some specious colouring of self-righteousness the whole of your moral character and complexion, view them in their real light, trace the state of your souls from your earliest years down to the present moment, and say, if "you do not lie down in your shame, and if confusion does not cover you." Jer. iii. 25. If you recoil not from the heart-freezing view, "O wretched men that we are! who shall deliver us from the body of this death?" Rom. vii. 24. "Nay, we had not known sin but by the law; sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in us all manner of concupiscence. For we were alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived and we died. And the commandment which was ordained to life, we found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived us, and by it slew us." Rom. vii. 7-11. "To will is present with us; but how to perform that which is good we find not. There is a law in our members warring against the law of our minds, and bringing us into the captivity to the law of sin. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. vii. 18-23.

What greater victory than this was ever achieved, what victory ever equalled it? The records of history display many heroic exploits, as they are termed, many shining instances of skill, perseverance, and undaunted courage in the field of battle, and in long-protracted warfare. Some of these have been exhibited in defence of the liberties of mankind; some for the maintenance of their civil, some for the recovery, or the security, of their religious rights; but by far the greater number of the most splendid victories, which have attracted the admiration of the world and fixed it in stupid gaze, have had for their object the gratification of lawless ambition, the subversion of justice, and the subjugation of men to unprincipled and merciless tyranny. Such has been the object and the issue of the greater part of those splendid military exploits which blaze on the page of history, and seize on the attention of the captivated reader. They are preceded by terror and dismay. They are followed by devastation, lamentation, and wide-spreading woe. Those victories which have brought real benefits to mankind, are far, far distant springs, in a widely extended wilderness, and seldom permitted to refresh the burning lips of the panting, exhausted, traveller. But inexpressibly glorious, infinitely extensive, is the victory obtained by Christ. It is a victory which brings no calamity in its train, but sheds blessing, and joy, and exultation, wherever it is proclaimed. The trumpet which resounded it over the wide world, and whose sound was reverberated from the concave of heaven, proclaimed, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men." Luke ii. 14. It was a victory purchased, not by the blood of our fallen and perishing race, but by that of the Captain of our Salvation. The victor suffered, and the captives to sin were set free. Christ died, and the sting was plucked from sin. Christ rose from the grave, and the grave lost its victory. Christ fulfilled all righteousness, and the law lost its strength. "Christ ascended into heaven, and led captivity captive; and received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them." Ps. lxxviii. 18.

Christ sat down at the right hand of God, "and ever liveth to make intercession for us. For such an high-priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens." Heb. vii. 25, 26. "Who was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin, and can therefore be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Heb. iv. 15. If we be faithful to him, our interests, committed to his charge in heaven, are secure. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Rom. viii. 1. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Matt. xxviii. 18. "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26; "And when all things are subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject to him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Ver. 28. "Then will the tabernacle of God be with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." Rev. xxi. 3, 4. By the death and atonement of our blessed Saviour, the pardon of sin was insured, and the Supreme Majesty of heaven was reconciled to guilty and penitent sinners of the human race, the dignity of God's law vindicated, and other beings of a superior order were deprived of every encouragement to rebel, from the terrors of unexpiated infirmity. But men were yet to be reconciled to their Creator, to be regenerated to obedience, and rendered fit for the enjoyment of eternal happiness. Of this, their deeply rooted corruption, their inherent weakness, their original taint, derived from the first human pair, their inveterate habit of actual transgression were totally incapable. Christ's victory would therefore have been incomplete, unless this grand work had all been accomplished. It was necessary that he should leave this lower world, and ascend to the right hand of the Father Almighty, and not only intercede for those whom he had redeemed out of every tongue, and kindred, and people, and nations, and plead his blood in their behalf, but send down his Holy Spirit, "to renew them in the spirit of their mind, to work in them, to will and to do of the good pleasure of God," and to qualify them for those blessed mansions which he was preparing for them, "that where he was, there they might be also."

Survey this grand, this beatific, this most comprehensive scheme in all its parts, and you will acknowledge, that every object of sublime contemplation, fades before it as the light of a taper before the meridian blaze of the sun. But why do I say survey it? No created understanding can survey it, in all its bearings and extent. It was conceived, before the foundation of the world, yet, was in part executed on this atom of earth, and is still prosecuted in heaven. It extends not merely to the duration of this terrestrial system, but runs through all eternity? "Into these things the angels themselves desire to look." 1 Peter i. 12. Shall the ignorant, the callous men of this world, whose souls are engrossed by trifles and toys, who, while they imagine that they feed on ambrosia and quaff nectar, yet, like the serpent, the first deceiver, "go on their belly, and eat dust all the days of their life;" shall such pretend, with a look of affected sagacity, but of vacant stare, to despise, to sneer at, this beneficent, this stupendous scheme, one particle of which their emmet-souls are incapable of comprehending? But we, impressed with its grandeur, and warmed with gratitude, for its blessed effects to us, and to all "the redeemed of exclaim, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

THE CREW OF A MAN-OF-WAR.

MR STEWART, in his delightful narrative of a "Visit to the South Seas," thus describes the moral aspect of the crew with whom he sailed:—

Believing with Pope, "that the proper study of mankind is man," I have ever delighted in opportunities of observing my fellows in new lights and relations; and find daily amusement, with an admixture of other emotions, in the development of character among those around me. A man-of-war is a world in miniature, in which every different kind of temper and disposition is to be found, under the various modifications of a diversity of early habits and impressions.

A more interesting and attentive audience than that formed by the five hundred of our crew at worship on the Sabbath, I have seldom addressed; and every look, and the whole appearance of the men, after the first sermon I preached, as I passed among them while at dinner to distribute a set of tracts, plainly told they were far from being indifferent to the services of my office, and regard me personally with feelings of kindness and good-will.

Commodore Thompson informed me at an early period, that it was the desire, both of himself and Captain Smith, to have public prayers daily on board the Guerriere, according to a prescribed, though hitherto disregarded, rule of the naval service. The hour of sunset was fixed on, as the most convenient and most appropriate for the duty; and the first day the weather permitted, it was commenced. A more desirable and salutary observance could scarce be devised, nor one more pleasing and more impressive. It was well remarked in reference to it by a principal officer, though not professedly a religious man, that, wanderers as we are upon the deep, separated widely from all the rest of the world, there should be, at least once in every twenty-four hours, a common and appointed time for all to pause in the daily round of occupation, and, as intelligent and immortal beings, to reflect for a moment what we are, and for what created, what we are about, and whither we are going, unitedly to join in the worship of our God, and anew commend us to his grace and mercy. It is no common spectacle thus presented by our ship, when, as the curtains of the night begin to drop around us, the busy and varied occupation of so large a company is seen to cease, and, at the appointed signal, all, from the highest to the lowest, quietly gather to the altar we have here erected, to offer to heaven an evening sacrifice of thanksgiving and prayer. It is a noble sight to behold men thus situated openly acknowledging to their Maker and to themselves the high source and destiny of their existence; and thus, tacitly at least, encouraging one another to lay hold of the joyous hopes of the Gospel.

To believe it an unwelcome and irksome duty to the crew, is a mistake. There may be individuals who regard it as such; but they are few indeed, in comparison with the many, who give the most evident proofs of the interest and satisfaction with which they engage in it. Ten minutes is the utmost limit of the time thus occupied: the reading of a hymn, or a few verses in the Bible, or the making of half a dozen remarks, to prepare the thoughts and feelings for the more hallowed exercise of a short prayer, constitutes the whole. All give the most serious and respectful attention, while a youthful company of some fifty or sixty, the flower of our crew, usually press closely to me with more than ordinary interest. Among them are several professedly religious, and others seriously take in the service is expressed by a smile of pleasure, or kindly glance from a sparkling eye, as, with the closing Amen, they replace their hats, and join their fellows, turning silently away under the influence of a chastened, if not a devotional feeling.

From the observations already made on the effect of this regulation, I am fully persuaded that a more powerful auxiliary in the discipline of a ship could not be adopted; and that this single service, properly performed, would soon be found to do more in promoting the good order of a crew, than all the harshness of the rope's end, backed by the terrors of the cat-o'-nine-tails. This is far from being my own solitary opinion—it is that of many of the officers on board. Prayers had scarce been established a week, before one of the most skilful and popular, but at the same time one of the most gay and thoughtless of their number, in expressing his sentiments on this subject, closed with the following remark:—"Whatever may be said to the contrary, Mr Stewart, there is nothing like a service of religion in elevating the character of a crew—it makes different men of them, and it is the only thing that will do it;" an opinion in which I fully concur: and were the experiment once rightly made by every commander in our service, I am fully persuaded the same sentiment would universally prevail.

No class of men are more open to convictions of truth than seamen, and none more susceptible of religious impressions, except where the demon of intemperance has incased the soul with adamant. I find no difficulty in gaining access to their confidence; and, in several instances, have met with interested and deep feeling. On a Sabbath evening, not long since, while walking the main deck, I perceived an open-hearted young fellow, with whom I had formed some acquaintance, leaning against a gun; and going up to him, said, "Well, how has the day gone with you?" "One of the happiest I ever knew, Sir," was his reply; "and I have heard many of the crew say the same. I never expected such a Sabbath at sea—earth can scarce know a better." Adding, on further conversation, "When I had been on board the Guerriere several weeks, before you, Sir, joined us, without any public worship, I began to fear I had made a bad choice in coming to this ship; but I was mistaken—this will be a happy voyage to me, and I believe the time will yet come when the ship herself will be called the happy Guerriere!" His face beamed with pleasure as he spoke, and I rejoiced to meet one so warm-hearted and seemingly pious.

I almost daily meet with those more or less interested on the subject. Only a short time ago, while visiting the sick, I observed a middle-aged man following me from cot to cot, but said nothing to him, supposing him an attendant engaged in some duty. At length he himself spoke, saying, "There is no comfort for these poor fellows, Sir, but in the few words you may drop them," adding, while the tears started in his eyes, and his lips filtered as he placed his hand upon his heart, "they are poor sinners, Sir! and I too am a poor sinner—guilty—miserable sinner, Sir! and God in mercy has sent you to preach the Gospel to us. I know well what it is to be weary and heavy laden with sin, and rejoiced from the first moment I saw you, Sir, step upon our quarter-deck." On conversing more fully with him, I had reason to believe that he was sincerely disposed to learn of Him who "is meek and lowly in heart, and whose yoke is easy, and his burden light."

In an adjoining hammock lay a young man slightly ill, and to whom I had the day before given two or three tracts. On asking him how he did, he hid his face in the pillow, and it was some moments before he recovered composure sufficient to say, "For once, at least, in my life, Sir, my hard heart has been touched; melted my very soul! My parents, too, tried to bring me up in the right way; but I have neglected and forgotten all their advice. It is now six years since I have been near them, and they know nothing of me, nor where I am." In a long conversation, I endeavoured to persuade him of his ingratitude to God, his heavenly Father, as well as towards his earthly parents, and left him with the resolution of the prodigal on his lips, if not in his heart.

The more impressive and melancholy dispensations of Providence have not been wanting to add their influence to that of the means of grace, in inclining our minds to thoughts of seriousness and piety. Within the last two days, I have been called twice to perform the saddest office incident to my station, by committing to the deep that which shall be retained in its dark caverns "till the sea shall give up its dead."

A funeral is a melancholy and impressive service any where, but particularly so at sea, and on board a man-of-war. There is something more deeply thrilling in the call of the boatswain, "All hands, to bury the dead!" as it passes through the ship, echoed from deck to deck by his mates, than even in the admonitory sounds of the bell of death on shore. And as for the first time, in obedience to it, I ascended the companion-ladder, and passed through the opening crowd to the side of the ship, where, in the sad preparations of the grave, lay the form of one who, at that hour the day previous, had little thought of being then in eternity. I could scarce command my voice, in giving utterance to the sublime declaration of the burial service, "I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord." The pause, too, preceding the words, "We commit his body to the deep," and then the plunge and splash of the lifeless clay, as it is launched to its watery tomb, speak in a voice more deeply touching than that sent back by the clod of the valley from the narrow-house, when dust returns to dust, and ashes to ashes, in the seemingly more natural cemetery within the church-yard limits.

The person buried was a young man of the marines. He had been ill for a fortnight, but was at no time thought dangerous, and for the last few days was considered convalescent. I first conversed with him upon the subject of religion ten days ago. In reply to the question, whether he had ever thought seriously of the destiny of the soul, his only answer,—and one which he seemed to think abundantly sufficient, as his black eyes filled with tears,—was, "I had a pious mother!" I have seen him daily since, and though confessedly far from God, he appeared persuaded to cast himself, in penitence, upon his mercy, and hereafter to lead a virtuous life. Poor fellow! he little thought his end was so nigh. On attempting to sit up after having been in a quiet sleep, the rupture of an internal abscess took place, and springing in a convulsion from his cot, he fell dead in the arms of his attendant.

His was the first funeral, but we had too sad evidence before us that it was not to be the last. A petty officer was lying at the time in the very jaws of death, and expired the same day. Noble in figure, and of an uncommonly hardy constitution, he died at the early age of thirty, a sacrifice to the demon of drunkenness. Before he was thought in particular danger, a fortnight ago, I spoke to him, in one of my visits, of the importance of being at all times prepared for sickness and death; to which he replied, that he was too weak, both in body and mind, to think on such subjects. Then he was comparatively strong, and perfectly himself; but soon afterward, the "delirium tremens," with all its accompanying tokens of a horrid end, took from him every power of reflection, and he perished a miserable and degraded soul. As I stood by his cot gazing at his convulsed and agonized frame, just before in an effort of anger at a shipmate attending him, he broke out in the most dreadful oaths and curses, sounding in my ears as if they already came from the region of the damned.

To commend his immortal spirit by prayer to the mercy of an Eternal Judge, was all in my power to do; and I turned away with the heartfelt aspiration—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

PSALM LXXVIII. 54-72.

THE first portion of the third period of the history of Israel, under the government of Joshua, it has been shown, in a former number, was a favourable time, in which they adhered steadfastly to the worship and service of God. The period succeeding that, under the Judges, which is now to be considered, is not so favourable. They began gradually to leave their first love. They did not suitably improve their time of rest and prosperity. Instead of keeping themselves humble, and watchful, and thankful for all the great things that God had done for them, they began to think highly of themselves, on account of their distinguished privileges, as if their own arm had gotten them the victory; they relaxed in their watchfulness; they indulged in more familiar intercourse with the remnant of the idolatrous nations that was left among them; they quickly learned their wicked ways; they forsook the service of the Lord, forgetting all his mercies, and turned aside to the worship of false gods. The Holy Spirit was grieved, and his presence was withdrawn. They were left for a time, in some measure to themselves; and they gave full indulgence to their own foolish and wicked imaginations.

What a mournful contrast was thus exhibited to the state in which they were in the days of Joshua! Then the whole nation seemed to be of one mind and one accord, in devoting themselves willingly to the service of God. They were animated with zeal for his glory, and they dreaded anything like an approach to idolatry. They were filled with gratitude for God's mercies: they solemnly entered into a covenant that they would serve the Lord. But now, alas! we see them disunited, and every one walking according to the imaginations of his own heart; we see them forsaking the worship of the living and true God, and turning aside into all the abominations of heathen idolatry. How is the gold become dim, how is the most fine gold changed!

As was to be expected, however, they were not permitted to go on in such wicked ways, without being warned of their danger, and without experiencing the manifestations of God's righteous displeasure. And, generally, the instruments of chastisement were some of the neighbouring nations. They acted for their own gratification, in making incursions upon them, and making them tributary. But they were, unrepentingly, the sword in the Lord's hand, for the chastisement of his own people. And whenever groaning under the yoke of their oppressors, they were brought to a deep conviction of their guilt, acknowledged it before God, and earnestly implored deliverance out of the hands of their enemies, God was graciously pleased, in answer to their prayers, to raise up for them a deliverer. Soon, however, they relapsed into their former wickedness, and were again brought low, and upon their repentance, were again delivered. Such is the melancholy history of Israel during the time of the judges. And from this portion of their history we may learn, on the one hand, how prone we are to forget the obligations that we are under to love and serve God, and to set up idols in our hearts, in preference to God. We see, on the other hand, that God is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another. But, at the same time, he exercises much long-suffering patience towards his rebellious creatures. We may learn, too, that, in the darkest times of the history of Israel, there was still a remnant that feared God; and it was, in answer to their prayers, that God was graciously pleased to interpose for their deliverance.

We come next to the time of the kings of Israel. The Israelites had, for some time, been under the charge of the prophet Samuel, who was the medium of communication between God and them. And then they acknowledged no king but God. But when Samuel, in advanced age, deputed the management of the national interests to his sons, who had not the fear of God, their mismanagement occasioned much discontent, and induced the people to entreat for a king to rule over them, as was the case in other nations. What a sad thing is it when those who bear rule in holy things are not holy persons! Because of them, the name of the Lord is blasphemed, and men are led to abhor the offerings of the Lord. How earnestly should we pray that they who minister at the altar may be holy; that they may have a double portion of the Holy Spirit; and that they may be faithful in the discharge of their trust.

God was much displeased with the people of Israel for asking a king like those of the other nations; for it was in effect rejecting the Lord from reigning over them as their king. But he gave them a king, such as they desired, in his anger, that they might be convinced, by their own sad experience, of the folly as well as sin of their request. Let us beware of setting up our own will in opposition to the will of God, and of being over anxious about the attainment of our own wishes, lest the Lord should, in anger, grant us the desire of our own hearts, and we should be left, in the end, to repent our having preferred our own way to God's way.

But after they had been left, for a time, under the government of Saul, God was pleased to select for them another king, one after his own heart, namely David. And here we enter upon a new era in the history of Israel. Under the reigns of David and Solomon, they attained a state of elevation and prosperity such as has not been equalled in any succeeding period of their history to this day. Nor was it only by the conquest of their enemies, and by outward peace and prosperity, that this time was distinguished. But there appears to have been a great revival of religion throughout the land. David was himself a prophet, and there were other prophets in his time. Solomon, too, was under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and was honoured to be the penman of some of the books of Scripture. He reared that magnificent temple at Jerusalem which David had planned, and for which he had made preparations. And at the dedication of the temple, when an immense multitude of the Israelites were assembled, and when Solomon the king appeared on a brazen stage erected for the occasion, and, in the presence of the vast assembly, kneeled down, and, with his hands lifted up towards heaven, poured forth that fervent and importunate prayer, which is recorded in their history, there is presented to us one of the most solemn, interesting, and impressive exhibitions that are recorded in the history of Israel. Surely the Lord was then graciously present; surely those who were present at that solemnity might well exclaim, "The Lord is in this place; this is none other than the house of God, and the gate of heaven!" Much more might be said, for illustrating the favour which God manifested to the people of Israel, during the time of David and Solomon, but, in these brief sketches, it is intended only to mark some of the most prominent features of their history.

But, before leaving this splendid era, I have to remark that it was eminently typical of that state of special favour of God, of great attainments in holiness, and of great outward prosperity, which shall be enjoyed by this people in the last period of their history, under the reign of the Son of David, when, according to what is foretold, he shall sit on the throne of his father David, and shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Both David and Solomon were types of Christ, representing especially his kingly power and authority. The name David means beloved, and is by the prophets applied to Christ, the beloved Son of God. Solomon comes from a word signifying peace; and Christ is the Prince of Peace. David a great warrior, and having around him many men of valour, and subduing all the enemies of Israel, represents Christ and his heavenly hosts coming to take vengeance on his enemies, to tread them in his anger, and to trample them in his fury. Solomon, again, who had a peaceful reign, when all his enemies were subdued, and sent him presents, and who was not less distinguished by the wisdom and righteousness of his reign, than by his riches, and splendour, and magnificence, represents Christ reigning in righteousness, as described in Psalm lxxii. This Psalm is denominated a Psalm for Solomon, but shall have its full accomplishment in the reign of Christ. Of him it is said, "The kings of Tarshish and the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him."

We come next to notice a very different state of matters in Israel, a sad falling off from the prosperous state in which they were in the days of David and Solomon. The kingdom was rent into two parts, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin adhering to Rehoboam, son of Solomon, and the other ten tribes erecting a new and independent kingdom under Jeroboam, son of Nebat. This kingdom of the ten tribes commenced with an act of rebellion against the God of Israel, in Jeroboam's setting up idols, to prevent his subjects from returning to Judah. It was not to be supposed that a kingdom so begun would prosper. Accordingly, among all the kings that reigned over this kingdom, there was not one who feared God. Religion was generally at a very low ebb among them, and they were ripening for judgment. Yet the Lord had still a remnant among them. There was a young Abijah, even in the house of Jeroboam, in whom there was some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel. There were seven thousand, who had not bowed the knee to Baal. And the prophets Elijah and Elisha were sent to them to reprove them for their sins, to exhort them to return to the Lord, and to warn them of coming judgments. But as they disregarded the repeated warnings which were given them, in the reign of Hoshea their last king, Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, invaded the country, took Samaria, the capital of the kingdom, and carried the great body of the nation captive with him.

The kingdom of Judah survived that of Israel for some years. And although there, too, idolatry, and backsliding, and abounding iniquity very generally prevailed, yet the dark side of the picture is occasionally relieved by a good king reigning over them, and exerting himself to reform abuses, to bring the people back from idolatry, and to establish the worship of God throughout the land. Such were Jehoshaphat, Josiah, and Hezekiah, in whose times the Lord's work was revived among them. But these revivals were generally of short continuance; the people relapsed again into idolatry; so that, after repeated warnings had been given them by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, invaded Judah in the reign of Zedekiah, took Jerusalem, and carried the king, the nobles, and the great body of the people captives to Babylon, according to what the prophets had foretold. What an affecting spectacle is thus presented to us! Are we not disposed to sympathise with Jeremiah in his lamentation over fallen Judah? "How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and cast down from heaven to earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger!"

Let us take warning from what thus befell Israel. We also have been highly favoured above other nations, in regard to religious privileges. But, alas! we have not made a suitable improvement of them; and, therefore, God hath a cause of controversy with us, as is manifest at this day. And if we repent not, we may be assured that heavy judgments are approaching. "Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord; shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christian Charity.—It is a cruel mockery of our nature to represent Christian charity with all the decorations of a heathen goddess, and arrayed in the fond and romantic ornaments that charm and invite the imagination. Alas! Christian charity has no wings to bear her through a purer and loftier atmosphere, while she showers down blessings upon the multitude beneath; she does not drop the sheaf into the poor man's bosom, or the garland upon his cottage, while she passes in her car of triumph over his head. But sometimes she is found in the most loathsome of human habitations, and in contact with wretches, from whose guilt or whose misery the moral sense recoils, and at which the refinement of education shudders in disgust: sometimes her figure is scarcely discernible while she struggles her lonely and weary way through the crowd of poverty, impurity, and sin: she may be seen turning into the dark and comfortless hovel, and speaking the blessed Gospel of God, over the dying embers of a winter's fire, to the shivering, perhaps hardened, beings that surround it: at other times, she stands over the damp and squalid bed, where the frame is racked with suffering and disease, where perhaps conscience is doing her angry work, or is lying still more fearfully asleep. It is folly to attempt to reconcile this to the Christian's mind by painting her with the graces and the virtues in her train. Alas! even the blessed beings that are then perhaps actually around him,—the constituted authorities of heaven, that minister to a Christian's imagination, and upon which his fancy is permitted to repose,—even these often appear to forsake him; the guardian-angel seems to stand far aloof above the cabin that is the scene of pollution and depravity; the waving of golden pinions is but dimly seen through the sciled and shattered lattice; the song of cherubim and seraphim is only heard faintly, aloft and at a distance, through broken intervals, between the shrieks of bodily pains, or the groans of mental agony! But the Christian recollects, that there was one gracious Being who went before him, and who left an invigorating spirit behind him, whose office was to support those whom all the world had forsaken.—Wolfe's Remains.

Affliction a means of awakening the Sinner.—Let us imagine him young, healthy, gay, active, engaged in business, eagerly pursuing the world, and enjoying its comforts amidst a numerous family and circle of friends, as unthinking as himself. In these circumstances, the hand of trouble arrests him, some distressful accident, as we call it befalls him. He breaks his bones and is confined to his chamber; or perhaps he catches a cold which sits down on his lungs, and terminates in a deep decline; or perhaps, he is visited with an epidemic and malignant fever, the infection spreads through his veins, and prostrates him on a bed of languishing, the secret poison of disease blasts the beauty and destroys the vigour of his frame. Pain, universal, and acute, throes through every nerve; he is chastened with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain, his appetite fails, his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. How changed his aspect, pining disease has wasted him down to a skeleton! His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen, and his bones, which were not seen, stick out. Death appears full in his view, and the grave seems ready to receive him; his soul draws near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers. In short,

"He who before could boast a graceful air,
And pampered long in ease, looked plump and fat,
Does all his friends (amazing change) surpris'
With pale lean cheeks and ghastly hollow eyes,
His bones (affecting sight) stare through his skin,
Which lay before in flesh and fat unseen,
His throbbing heart in pain and labour beat,
And life pursued, through every vein retreat,
While all believe each gasp will end his tale,
And death stands ready to possess his spoil."

But whilst this afflicted man's body is, during the progress of his malady, the patient of the physician, his soul is at the same moment the patient of God; a work is going on within which the world cannot see. The Spirit of God is convincing him of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; formerly this poor man had a very favourable opinion of himself, and his convictions of moral guilt were so gentle and moderate, as to sit easy on his mind, without wounding,—he thought it no difficult matter to elude the Divine threatenings, and imagined himself secure, because he was thoughtless of his danger, but now a dreadful sound of vengeance is in his ear, he sees the heinous guilt of his iniquities, he hears with Adam the voice of God, and is afraid, he beholds himself all naked and defenceless before, having nothing to screen him from the wrath of that Almighty Being whom he has offended; all refuge fails him.—The late Dr. HALL of Edinburgh. (A published sermon.)

God the chief good.—I would entreat you to consider with me, that when God at first gave man an elementary body, (i. e., fire, air, earth, and water,) he did also infuse into him an immortal soul of a spiritual substance; and though he gave his soul a habitation in his body, yet he gave it a spiritual dwelling in himself; so that the soul was in the body by location, and at rest in God by union and communion; and this being of the soul in God at first was man's true being, and his true happiness. Now man fell from God, God in his justice left man, so that the actual union and communion that the soul of man had with God at first, is broken off; God and man's soul are parted, and it is in a restless condition. Howbeit, the Lord having seated in man's soul a certain character of himself, the soul is thereby made to re-aspire towards that chief good, even God himself, and can find rest nowhere, till it come to him.—FISHER.

The Use of Wealth.—With respect to the use of riches, he who studies the Word of God, and adopts its principle and spirit, will be at no loss to discover the methods and occasions for exercising his liberty; and every individual must judge for himself, as before God, and having a good conscience, how he shall best stow his abundance; to what extent, and under what limitations. Christianity is not circumscriptive; it enlarges in its views, and adapts itself to all circumstances and situations. Let the Scripture be ever man's standard and guide. Whatever contributes to better the moral, the intellectual, and the physical condition of the human race, lies within the range of his choice; including, under the first of these, that which is of all the most prominent and the most important, namely, provision for the souls of men, through the instrumentality of the teachers of religion and the instructors of youth. The souls of men were the great objects of the Saviour's care, yet he did not forget their temporal necessities; he had compassion on the multitudes, and would not send them empty away; and the most frequent miracles which he wrought were for the direct relief of their corporeal wants or distresses. The field of the Christian, in like manner, though not in the same way, embraces both, and is extensive and diversified as the gifts and dispensations of God, whom he desires to serve. It comprehends all things which pertain to life as well as godliness—the health and comfort of the body, the culture of the earth, the advancement of useful arts and knowledge, in their due order and subordination; and extends from self to the circles of family, of community, of nations, and of mankind. We are not "straitened in God," if we are not "straitened in our own bowels." Some withhold their hand, lest in ignorance they should bestow improperly. But the remedy is pointed out by the patriarch: "the cause which I knew not I searched out." It is not ignorance of fit objects for his beneficence, but unwillingness to discover them, which makes the covetous man thus jealous and fearful of giving amiss.—JAMES GLASSFORD, Esq. (Covetousness Brought to the Bar of Scripture.)

The Strength of the Christian Evidences.—Anxious as we are to put every thing that bears upon the Christian argument into all its lights, and fearless as we feel for the result of a most thorough sifting of it, and thinking as we do think it, the foulest scorn that any pigmy philosopher of the day should mince his ambiguous scepticism to a set of giddy and ignorant admirers, or that a half-learned and superficial public should associate with the Christian priesthood, the blindness and bigotry of a sinking cause; with these feelings, we are not disposed to shun a single question that may be started on the subject of the Christian evidences. There is not one of its parts or bearings which needs the shelter of a disguise thrown over it. Let the priests of another faith ply their prudential expedients, and look so wise and so wary in the execution of them. But Christianity stands in a higher and a firmer attitude. The defensive armour of a shrinking or timid policy does not suit her. Her's is the naked majesty of truth, and with all the grandeur of age, but with none of its infirmities, has she come down to us; and gathered new strength from the battles she has won in the many controversies of many generations. With such a religion as this, there is nothing to hide, all should be above boards; and the broadest light of day should be made fully and freely to circulate throughout all her secretaries. But secrets she has none. To her belongs the frankness and the simplicity of conscious greatness; and whether she has to contend with the pride of philosophy, or stand in fronted opposition to the prejudices of the multitude, she does it upon her own strength, and spurns all the props, and all the auxiliaries of superstition away from her.—The Rev. Dr CHALMERS. (Works, vol. vii., New Edit.)

"Feed me with food convenient for me."—Anxiety for more is vain and unprofitable. All the solicitude indicated by the most care-worn countenance could never yet alter the course of future events, or change the determination of Providence. When a celebrated philosopher in former days contemplated the splendid accommodations of life, far from coveting the goods of fortune, he only observed, "How many things do I not want."—"I am only solicitous about one thing," said another of the ancient sages, "and that is, lest I should fail in some part of my duty, and not act up to the dignity of a man." In truth, the precarious tenure of this world's wealth is sufficient to suppress all immoderate desire of it. Has not the morning sun often seen thousands abounding in flocks and herds, and boasting of their large sums of gold and silver, who, before his going down, had nothing but a grave? Never let the opulent or the proud "mock the simple annals of the poor." Often interesting and instructive are these details, though apt to vanish before the eye which is only accustomed to contemplate the fate of nations and the revolution of empires. Brethren, be not too desirous of temporary distinctions, because you are not sure that you should be the better for them, nor seek to "fare sumptuously every day." Have you not seen, that the flourishing tree, when adorned with luxuriant foliage, or loaded with fruit, is most easily broken by the fury of the tempest? Have you not heard, that the summit of the loftiest mountain meets first the lightning of heaven? In like manner, when you multiply flocks and herds, you not only increase your cares, but present a broader mark to the shafts of misfortune. When "fed with food convenient for you," pay a becoming attention, on the one hand, to frugality, without which none can be long independent, and with which few would be poor. Beware, on the other, of spending your life in anxiety or meanness, in order to increase your worldly store. Surely the wealth of this world is not the best blessing which your heavenly Father has to bestow. In a thousand ways which you do not foresee, He can promote the happiness of those who fear him. In that night when he appeared to Solomon at Gibeon, and said, "Ask what I shall give thee," the answer of that young prince pleased the Lord. Imitating his laudable example, do not desire riches, but rather a spirit of true wisdom, which will direct you to enjoy, with propriety, the comforts of your condition—to despise what is frivolous, and to detest what is base. Instead of panting after temporal honours, cherish a more lofty ambition, and direct your most vigorous efforts to the attainment of those which are eternal. Then, when the destined hour of your leaving the world arrives, like good old Simeon, you shall "depart in peace," esteemed by the wise and regretted by the worthy.—The Rev. Dr LAURIE of Newburn. (Lectures.)

"I," says Christ, "will give thee Rest."—Man! if thou wilt not be obedient to the voice of divine grace, convincing thee and calling thee to repentance, to conversion, and to a living faith, all thy rest is nothing but a false and imaginary rest. It is not only vain and delusive in life, but also at death. For the Spirit of God says, "There is no peace to the wicked." Isa. xlviii. 22. That is, during their lives, they cannot have a tranquil heart, and much less so when they come to die. It is vain and delusive for an unconverted man, who has never been obedient to the call of God, nor suffered himself to be led by it out of the Egypt of his sinful nature, to let himself be consoled, on his dying bed by miserable comforters, and be persuaded, that after his decease, he shall perfectly attain to the promised rest. Alas! it is all a deception! No Peter, nor any one else, who may pretend to have the keys of the kingdom of heaven in his hand, will be able to open heaven for thee, or to give thee the promised everlasting rest in heaven, as far as thou dost not let thyself be brought, by the convincing voice of grace, to true repentance and amendment of life, and be led forth, out of the Egypt of this world, to Christ, the true Joshua; even as he himself invites thee, when he says, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden. Come unto me, and I will refresh you; take my yoke upon you, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." It will never be attained in any other way.—GRAHAM TERSTEGEN. (Spiritual Crumbs from the Master's Table. Translated from the German by Samuel Jackson.)

SACRED POETRY.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONSOLATION.

WHEN sternly howls the storm
 O'er this dark, desert land,
 And sadly walks the traveller,
 Without one guiding hand
 Of earthly friend or loved one near
 To stay his steps or soothe his fear ;

When shivering in the gale,
 Through the deep solitude,
 His dreary way he wildly wends
 O'er rocks and mountains rude,
 What is it nerves his feeble form
 To brave serene the withering storm ?

A care divine he feels
 For ever round him spread ;
 Safe, though no mortal covert shield
 His else defenceless head ;
 The God who rules the tempest's pride,
 And calms the sea, is by his side.

Oh ! it is sweet to lean
 On this Almighty arm,
 To feel that, with this guardian near,
 No power can work me harm.
 Each bitter blast will only prove
 How strong his power, how deep his love !

Yes, if he bid my steps
 In lonely wilds to stray,
 I murmur not, but, like a child,
 My Father I obey ;
 Content, though nature drop a tear,
 To feel that none but God is near.

How can I doubt that love
 Hath marked this painful road,
 When, glittering through its vista dark,
 I view my bright abode,
 And know that loved ones wait me there,
 And heavenly rest, and mansions fair !

Slow moved my lingering feet,
 When, midat earth's fairest flowers,
 My pathway lay, by streams and woods
 To yon unfading bowers ;
 Now desert winds around me roar,
 Onward I haste,—heaven is before !

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Military Students.—The Rev. C. M'Ilvaine, late of New York, now bishop of Ohio, in an address delivered at the anniversary of the Naval and Military Bible Society in London, in May 1830, gave the following pleasing statement:—"I was appointed chaplain to a military academy in my native country. I was forewarned of the rugged soil which I was destined to cultivate ; and was recommended to relinquish all idea of making any progress in the work of the Lord under such circumstances as those by which I was then surrounded. Shortly after my arrival, I received a communication from an officer in the depôt, stating that he should feel himself accessory to a falsehood, did he not distinctly convey to me a faithful account of the position in which I was placed. However I might believe and rejoice in the doctrines which it was my duty to inculcate, there were those among my congregation who believed not a word of them ; and he reckoned himself among the number of the unbelievers. He had to state further, that he believed there was not a person in the neighbourhood who put the slightest faith in my doctrines. I have reason to believe that the individual from whom I received that communication professed opinions little different from those of an atheist. One day, soon after my appointment, a cadet came to my apartments, and told me that his father had recently died, and that he had enjoined him to come and seek my acquaintance. I gave the young man a tract ; it might not produce its effect at the moment, but it was like throwing bread upon the waters : there was little doubt that it would be found after many days. In two weeks from that period, a young man, one of the finest in the academy, came to me, attired in his full uniform : his eyes were filled with tears ; his utterance was nearly choked with emotion. At first it appeared to me that he had been the victim of some sad disaster ; at length, he articulated the words, "Gregory's Letters !" He stated that he had been brought up without religion ; that he had lived unacquainted with God ; that his mind was disposed towards scepticism. Gregory's Letters had fallen into his hands ; and such was the effect which they produced upon his heart and mind, that, when reading them, he could not refrain from laying his hand upon the table, and saying, "this must be true." He told me that he had found a tract in his room, but was ignorant how it came there. I explained to him how that tract had been given away by me ; and how it had found its way to the man by whom it was most needed ! When the young man to whom I had given the tract was on guard, this officer had put the very tract which he had found into his friend's hand, for the purpose of ascertaining how he felt on the subject of religion. The effect was such, that in a short time both were on their knees ; soon after, they came to my apartments, and one of them, throwing his arms round my neck, inquired what he should do to be saved. It soon came to be whispered abroad that many persons were inclined to attend public worship ; and it was not long before there were many professing, steady, zealous, practical Christians. Nor was it long before our prayer-meetings were joined by the professors of military and civil engineering, the professors of mineralogy and chemistry, and the instructor of artillery, and as many as seventeen cadets.

The force of Christian Consistency.—When Lord Peterborough lodged for a season with Fenelon, archbishop of Cambrai, he was so delighted with his piety and virtue, that he exclaimed at parting, "If I stay here any longer, I shall become a Christian in spite of myself."

Be always in the Path of Duty.—The Rev. J. Carter, one of the Puritan ministers, once came unexpectedly behind a Christian of his acquaintance, who was busily occupied in his business as a tanner. He gave him a pleasant tap on the shoulder ; the good man looked behind him, started, and said, "Sir, I am ashamed that you should find me thus." Mr Carter replied, "Let Christ, when he cometh, find me so doing." "What !" said the good man, "doing thus?" "Yes," said Mr C. "faithfully performing the duties of my calling."

ILLUSTRATIONS OF FAITH.

BY THE REV. JOHN CORMACK, D.D.,

No. II.

FAITH VIEWED SIMPLY AS A PRINCIPLE WITHOUT REFERENCE TO ITS OBJECTS.

In a former paper (p. 401,) some observations were made on faith, or belief, as a simple operation of the mind, with the nature of which every one is perfectly acquainted by his own consciousness in the act of believing. It is so simple, that it neither needs nor admits of explanation. In so far as faith itself is concerned, nothing farther remains to be said. But what was wanted, was not explanation, which it rejects, but disentanglement from the manifold mysteries, in which it was shrouded and concealed from the view. It is hoped that the reader will bear this in mind, in the perusal of what remains to be said under the head of "Illustrations of Faith." Much may be said of the objects of faith, and of their influence upon the heart and life, the necessity to the Christian of believing the things proposed to his faith in the Scriptures, and of the blessed and glorious result of so doing, as well as other things of deep interest and importance to the true disciple; but still in all this, it will not be faith strictly so called, as the simple operation of the mind in the exercise of belief, of which we shall have occasion to speak, but of the objects and influence of that principle.

And before proceeding to what more immediately concerns the Christian's faith, it may be profitable to throw together a few brief remarks of a miscellaneous and preliminary nature.

The object of faith is something believed, and, as was formerly remarked, the exercise of the mind in believing, is as different from its object as the agent is from the material, on which he operates. That the thing proposed to the mind be believed, is essential to faith, and is all that is essential to it. The thing believed may in itself be true, or it may be false; but all that is essential to it as a matter of belief is, not that it be true, but that it be held to be true. Thus there may be faith, and that too as strong in a false, as in a true system.

Again, among the things believed, there are some that are purely speculative, and be they in themselves true or false, they are equally without influence upon the heart and life; while other things are practical in their nature, and cannot be believed without producing good or evil in the moral conduct, according as they are true or false. Thus, with regard to things of a speculative nature, we may believe the false notion, that the planet we inhabit is an extended plain; or we may hold the true doctrine, that it is in form a spheroid; and our conduct remains uninfluenced and unaltered, whether we believe truth or error on this subject, or whether we ever heard of the one notion or of the other. This arises out of the very nature of the case, which is so plain as to render any farther remark upon it unnecessary.

But how different where the things believed are practical in their nature, and cannot be believed without exerting a good or evil influence upon the moral conduct, according as they are true or false! We need be under no hesitation in laying it down as an axiom, or position to be admitted without discussion, that truth believed will have a good moral influence, while the belief of error will be productive of evil. Thus the poor deluded Papist believes that his priest can give absolution from sin, and that, upon payment of a certain sum, proportioned to the means of the individual, he will do it. No one can be blind to the effect of such a tenet upon the moral conduct. The individual is left to determine for himself between the love of his sin, and the love of his money. We may just glance at the yet more desolating doctrine of indulgences. I speak historically when I say, that in papal times, a rich family in Scotland built a church in honour of one of the saints, and in requital for the pious deed, the Pope granted an "Indulgence" to the members of the family, and to their relatives to a certain specified degree of consanguinity, for several succeeding centuries; and the period during which they were authorised to sin, without remorse or compunction, is not yet expired. Happily the light of the Reformation dispelled the delusion in this case. But who shall calculate the crimes, of which it was productive before the "mystery of iniquity" was unveiled, and all its abominations, in all their loathsomeness, exposed to view? The same system authorises the doing "evil that good may come." The all-comprehensive good, for which every thing is to be sacrificed, according to the Papal system, is to bolster up the "BEAST,"—the "Man of Sin,"—"that Wicked,"—"even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved." (See 2 Thes. ii. passim.) Here is the effect of error believed! There is no other system so rich in illustrations of our present remark. We might show how it sanctions perjury and murder, and therefore tends to the dissolution of society, and the extinction of all that can sweeten it, under covert of the leading maxim that "no faith is to be kept with a heretic," who, if circumstances admit, is to be punished with confiscation and death. What a striking illustration of the Saviour's prediction, "yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth God service!" John xvi. 2.

These illustrations are demonstrative of the fact, that all that is essential to faith is, that the things believed be held to be true. They may, as in the instances adduced, be directly the opposite of truth; but being practical, or things that cannot be believed without influencing the conduct, they have as strong—I would say stronger—sway over men's actions than the opposite truths. And the reason why I would ascribe stronger sway to "error believed," is that it is in accordance with all the evil passions of our corrupt nature, which gives acceleration to the evil tendency; while "truth believed," has to encounter, and resist, and to overcome these passions, as antagonist forces impelling us in the opposite direction. Hence, also, we may distinctly see how it is that believed truth can triumph only through the power of "God working in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Thus, also, we see how readily men will adopt erroneous doctrines leading to corrupt practice, and how, by being simply left to themselves, without the "strivings of the Spirit," they may attain to the very consummation of moral turpitude. "Judicial blindness," accordingly, is the most awful judgment with which men can be visited, and with which they have been often visited for their pertinacious resistance of the truth. Thus, it is said, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone." Hosea iv. 17. And of the deluded votaries of the man of sin, "because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved; for this cause, God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned, who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." 2 Thes. ii. 10-12. It is this "having pleasure in unrighteousness," that facilitates the rejection of the truth and the reception of those doctrines, which are subversive of good morals; while, if there be an inclination "to do the will of God," the true doctrines of the Gospel will present no difficulties. John vii. 17.

It is of importance for us to bear these things in mind. We have seen that there may be faith as real and strong in what is false, as in what is true. This the Apostle Paul calls "believing a lie;" and the corruption of the "carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and which is not subject to his law, neither indeed can be," so long as it continues carnal, strongly favours the "believing the lie;" and in the same proportion indisposes a man to believe the truth. The cause of all this is the love of sin, which the lie favours and the truth condemns.

I now proceed to consider what is presupposed in believing anything whatever, so that we may be said to have faith concerning that thing. And for the sake of distinctness, I observe,

1. That faith presupposes knowledge. It would be evidently absurd to say of a man, that he believed what he did not know; and equally absurd for any man to say, that he disbelieved what he had never carefully considered. If you were asked, for instance, whether you believed the tenets of a particular philosopher? you are supposed, from the very terms of the question, to be intimately acquainted with these tenets, and to have examined the nature and tendency, as well as the truth, of each of them separately, and to have weighed the justness and consistency of the whole as forming a system. Such a question, in short, supposes you to have sifted, and pondered, and decided, in your own mind. The judge who gives a decision ought to have examined the case.

In the same manner, he who believes the Bible to be a divine revelation, or who has any right to say whether he does, or does not, believe it, is necessarily supposed to be intimately acquainted with its contents, and therefore to have read it frequently and with care; to have considered minutely its doctrines, and duties, and facts, and their bearings upon one another as forming a whole. The man who, without all this knowledge, and all these processes of thought, either receives or rejects the sacred volume, acts irrationally. What can be more contemptible in the eye of reason itself, than the man who, in these circumstances, rejects, or affects to despise, Christianity? And he who professes to believe it, without a sufficient knowledge of its nature and conviction of its truth, is apt to indulge in false hopes, and can experience no solid peace and joy in believing. Doctrines, which he does not understand, cannot form his principles; and precepts, of whose spirituality and extent he is not aware, cannot regulate his conduct. The probability is, that he will dishonour God, and bring reproach upon the holy religion, which he ignorantly professes to believe; or if he abstain from the grosser vices, he can at best have but a name to live while he is dead. Let every professing Christian then remember what is implied and presupposed in believing, "for," as the Scripture says, "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." But farther in order to believe rationally, it is not enough that a man understand what is proposed as the object of his faith :

2. It is necessary, also, that he be convinced of its reasonableness and truth. He must be satisfied in his own mind, and be "ready to give every man that asketh him a reason of the hope that is in him."

But here it is necessary to distinguish. I do not mean to say that it is either necessary or possible for the Christian completely to comprehend, and clearly to explain, every doctrine which the Bible contains, and which he rationally believes. This, however, is no contradiction of what has been already said. Let us take some familiar illustrations.

In the daily transactions of life, there are many things with which we are conversant, which it is as impossible for us not to believe, as it is to comprehend them. The grass grows, the trees put forth leaves and blossoms, and these last are in due time matured into fruits. The fruits, again, being used as food, are changed into animal substances, and various other processes follow. We know that these changes take place. They are familiar facts, indeed, of which no man can entertain a doubt. But in what manner, and by what agency, the Great Creator and Upholder of all produces them, are things that are utterly inscrutable and unknown to the greatest philosopher on earth. Even of our own nature, how little do we know! There are a few facts, by which we perceive that we are "fearfully and wonderfully made;" but our knowledge is much more than counter-balanced by our ignorance; or rather, it is just enough to show us our ignorance. We know that the human soul, that part of us which we more properly call ourselves, is united to the more gross and earthly substance called the body. But the nature of the soul, as a substance, and of its union with the body, lies so distinctly, and so far beyond the reach of our powers, that all men of true wisdom have long ago abandoned the investigation as utterly hopeless.

Since there are many earthly things, then, which it is impossible to understand, and equally impossible not to believe, may we not expect that it shall be yet more so in respect of heavenly things? If every thing in us, and around us, be mysterious, shall we wonder that "great is the mystery of godliness?" Do not reason and analogy prepare us for finding much that shall transcend our powers in the economy of divine grace, and in the nature, character, and work of Jesus Christ, as "God manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory?"

But while we rationally believe doctrines, which we cannot clearly comprehend, we still may, and ought to have good reasons for our belief. The Bible being once ascertained to be a divine revelation, the truth of all it contains follows as a matter of course. Some of its doctrines may be far beyond our comprehension, but being in a book which has been ascertained to come from God, it is not only rational to believe them, but it would be irrational not to believe them.

The evidence upon which men receive the Scriptures as the Word of God, will vary both in kind and degree, according to the capacity, the learning, and the endowments of the individual. But whatever satisfaction the man of learning and leisure may derive from extended investigation, it is pleasing to reflect, that there is one class of evidences which is level to every capacity, and which of itself may form the basis of a rational faith. These are what are called the "Internal Evidences," which are exhibited in the book itself, and its blessed effects on those that believe it. It is to this that our Lord refers when he says, "if any man will do"—that is, be inclined to do the will of God—"he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." Let a man of candour read the sacred record, and he will own that "never book spake like this book—it hath told me all that ever I did;" and when I look at the holy lives of its votaries, I see in their "transformation by the renewing of their minds," the fulfilment of the promises which it contains, and the effectual working of the Spirit of God, to whose irresistible agency it ascribes all the moral good that can ever be found in polluted and rebellious man. With much less evidence than is here supposed, namely, a single conversation with the blessed Jesus, the woman of Samaria was convinced of his divine mission. And how striking was the effect of this conviction! Transported with delight at the discovery she had made, she left her water pitcher at Jacob's well—an instructive fact recorded by the sacred historian—and forgetful of meaner interests, she ran in eager haste to communicate to her townsmen the evidence that convinced herself, that she had seen the promised Messiah. "And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman, which testified, he told me all that ever I did. And many more believed because of his own word, and said unto the woman, now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." John iv. 39.

THE REV. JAMES KIDD, D.D.,

Late Minister of Gilcomston Church, and Professor of Oriental Languages in Marischal College, Aberdeen.

THE subject of our present Sketch was born of humble, yet respectable parents, near Loughbrickland, in the county of Down, Ireland, on the 6th November 1761. Soon after his birth, he had the misfortune to lose his father, and his mother then removed to Broughshane, in the county of Antrim, where James received the first rudiments of his education. From the first leaf of the Shorter Catechism, he was taught the alphabet by his mother; and after spelling and reading each question in rotation, he committed the whole to memory. Thus was he grounded, in the early years of childhood, in the doctrines of that Church of which he became a ...distinguished a member. His industry, however, was not vated by exercise at a period when that faculty is rarely called into action; and to this circumstance may be mainly attributed those wonderfully retentive powers which supplied at will to his capacious mind, the rich stores of ancient and modern literature.

Having mastered his theological horn-book, his mother provided him with a copy of the New Testament, and carefully superintended his perusal of that sacred volume. Commencing with the Gospel of St. John, the pious matron caused him daily to commit to memory the passage he had just read; but what he experienced most useful in after-life from her instructions, was the particular manner in which she pointed out Jesus Christ, in every place where his name was mentioned, uniformly inquiring of her pupil, "Who Christ was? What he did? What he said?" shewing how mysterious he was as God and man, and how graciously and powerfully he exhibited himself in all his parables and miracles. This was real instruction; and it laid a foundation on which her pupil raised an immortal superstructure.

Under such instructions, his mind caught a flame of love for the New Testament. He reposed with it under his pillow at night. It was his last care when going to sleep, and his first when he awoke. His mind expanded in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and his memory became retentive of their truths. When about eight years of age, he went to the Presbyterian Meeting-house of Broughshane (of which his mother was a member) on a Communion Sabbath. Agreeably to the ancient usage of the Scottish Kirk, it was at that time customary for Presbyterian clergymen to be habited in blue when dispensing the Lord's Supper. The appearance of the minister (the Rev. Charles Brown) in this singular dress, the snow-white covering of the sacramental table, the view of the holy elements, the solemnity of the subjects, and the devotion of the people, made an indelible impression on his young mind; and he frequently declared, that on that day, and in that place, he formed the resolution of using every endeavour to become qualified for being a preacher of the Gospel of Christ. To the attainment of his wishes, however, there were many obstacles—the most serious of which was pecuniary disability. Determined to make the attempt, he borrowed a copy of Wittenhall's Latin Grammar, and began repeating lessons to a young man, named James Ritchie, who was accounted the best Latin scholar then attending the school taught by Mr Linton in the neighbourhood, and who became exceedingly attached to young Kidd, and assiduously laboured to promote his improvement. It was now that the embryo professor of languages set to work in earnest. The intensity of his application so absorbed every thought, that his mind was both night and day upon the stretch. He awoke frequently in the silence of night, and lighting what in the country is called a split, looked at any passage in which he found himself deficient, and having mastered the difficulty, consigned himself again to sleep. At the age of nine, he accustomed himself to rise by the first glimpse of dawn, and from that time till his last illness, he continued to inculcate and practise early rising. In this manner, he pursued his Latin studies through the Grammar, Vocabulary, Corderius, and Justin, when death deprived him of his friend and benefactor, Ritchie. New difficulties now presented themselves; but so much had his industry and perseverance attracted general notice, that Mr Allan, a neighbouring farmer, placed him for six months at the school which Ritchie had attended. Here he made rapid progress in the study of Latin, while writing and arithmetic were not neglected; and when he left school, scarcely ten years of age, he was able, with the assistance of such class-books as he could procure on loan, to become his own instructor.

adjacent farm-town, where his success exceeded his best expectations. He afterwards repaired to Belfast, for the purpose of studying under Mr Mason, the most popular teacher of English in the north of Ireland. Having acquired a competent knowledge of teaching, and obtained from Mr Mason the most flattering testimonials of his abilities, he went to Kildownie, where a school-house was erected for him, on the great road between Balleymoney and Ballymena, about twenty miles from Belfast. Here he laboured for about four years with the most persevering activity. And during this period, he was married to Miss Jane Boyd, daughter of a respectable farmer near Ballymena.

Britain having acknowledged the independence of her late colonies in America, Mr Kidd formed the resolution of emigrating to that country, in the hope of being able to push his fortune. He accordingly embarked for Philadelphia, with Mrs Kidd, in April 1784. He carried with him no letters of introduction, and consequently, on his arrival, he had no friends to welcome him. On the recommendation of Mr Little, a schoolmaster in the neighbourhood, he undertook the tuition of a family near New Jersey, and soon after became preceptor in a family in Maryland. After this he removed to Philadelphia, and took part with Mr Little in the labour of conducting his school. And some time afterwards, he was induced to open a classical academy—an undertaking which proved very successful. A vacancy for an usher having occurred in the College of Pennsylvania, Mr Kidd became a candidate, and was elected to the situation. While acting in this capacity, he was enrolled a student in the University, where he went through a regular academical course. During this time, he was also employed as a corrector for the press, and in this situation he first saw the Hebrew alphabet. In a very short time he became perfectly master of the letters and points, and placed himself under the tuition of a Portuguese Jew, by whose instructions, and his own intense application, he became familiar with the Book of Genesis in the course of a few months.

At this period, Mr Kidd's finances were reduced to a very low ebb, owing to the exorbitant charges of his Jewish teacher, and the expenses consequent on a rising family. With extreme parsimony, he had accumulated as many dollars as would purchase a suit of clothes, of which he stood very much in want; but he had likewise, for some time, cast his eyes wistfully upon a Hebrew Bible, in the shop of a Dutch bookseller, to obtain which, was to him an object of extreme solicitude. He had repeatedly called on purpose to see the much wished-for treasure; and oftentimes in passing, he looked at it through the window. While going in quest of the new suit, he went near the book shop. The Bible caught his eye, and that glance was sufficient. The cash was in hand, and his heart greedy for the long coveted object,—the Dutchman was loud in his encomiums on the excellence of the type and the edition. It was enough; our young Hebraist threw down the money, destined for another purpose, and carrying off his prize in triumph, began again, with humility and resignation, to accumulate, by private teaching and correcting the press, the sum requisite to replace his thread-bare garments by new ones. He now occasionally attended a Jewish Synagogue, where he learned to read Hebrew fluently, and became intimately acquainted with the peculiarities of the language and the Jewish ceremonies. Oriental languages became his favourite study; and two designs occupied his thoughts, namely, travelling in the East, or studying divinity in Scotland. He was induced to abandon the former by his intimate friend, the celebrated Dr Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia. At length he embarked for Scotland, carrying with him letters of introduction to many of the most eminent literary characters in Edinburgh. By their advice, he, a second time, commenced a course of academical study, and was enrolled a student of divinity of the Established Church of Scotland. While attending the various duties at College, he opened classes under the immediate patronage of the celebrated Rabbi Robertson, as a teacher of Oriental languages; and his success in this undertaking was so eminent, that when the professorship of Oriental languages in the Marischal College of Aberdeen became vacant by the death of Dr Donaldson, he was, on the recommendation of Drs Hill and Erskine, and other distinguished individuals, appointed to fill that chair. In 1793, Mr Kidd went to Aberdeen and began the duties of his office, which he performed with honour to himself and advantage to the numerous ministers of the Gospel of Christ, who studied the original of the Sacred Scriptures under his care. By his instrumentality, the knowledge and study of Hebrew was revived in the north of Scotland, where this language had been comparatively dormant for a great many years.

Although he had studied divinity for two sessions in the University of Edinburgh, he was so anxious to perfect himself for the ministry, that he attended four successive courses at the theological halls of King's and Marischal Colleges; after which he was licensed as a preacher of the Gospel by the Presbytery of Aberdeen.

Shortly afterwards, he was appointed evening lecturer in the Trinity Chapel, Aberdeen, where he continued to officiate for five years. On the 18th June 1807, he was ordained minister of the Chapel of Ease, Gilcomston, in the immediate neighbourhood of Aberdeen, where he dispensed the bread of life to perhaps the most numerous congregation in Scotland until the period of his death, which took place on the 24th December 1834, in the seventy-third year of his age.

In 1818, the College of New Jersey conferred on Professor Kidd, the unsolicited degree of Doctor in Divinity; an honour, to which his superior talents gave him an unquestionable claim.

Deeply impressed with the responsibility attached to his character as a minister of the everlasting Gospel, Dr Kidd laboured in the discharge of his duty with an assiduity that has seldom been equalled. The dying and the afflicted, the widow and the orphan, were the objects of his daily care; and while he strenuously exerted himself for the relief of their temporal wants, he poured the consolations of religion into their wounded spirits, and taught them to lay their burdens upon Him who alone can administer comfort to the dying, and balm to the afflicted, and who is the husband of the widow, and the orphan's stay.

To idleness, in any of its branches, he was an entire stranger. He knew the value of time, and evinced the sincerity of his conviction by an unremitting activity in doing good to the bodies as well as to the souls of those committed to his care. Before the busy world was awake, he was engaged in cultivating his powers, and preparing his means of Christian usefulness. During all the period of his ministry, he preached three times every Sabbath, besides opening two morning schools and a prayer meeting. He also lectured every Friday evening in the school-room adjoining the Church; and for some months previous to each communion, he preached on Wednesday evening at different stations through the large district of the parish more immediately under his charge. The young men and women of his congregation, before their admission for the first time to the Lord's table, were assembled, in separate weekly classes, during three months previous to the celebration of the ordinance, and were instructed by him in the fundamental principles of our holy faith, and admitted or rejected according to the extent of their knowledge of divine subjects. On the evening of the fast-day, the young communicants and their parents were arranged in the body of the Church, where, after a suitable and impressive address to parents and children, and earnest prayer in their behalf, the young communicants received their tokens in the presence of the congregation.

During the theological session, Dr Kidd taught Hebrew daily in the university; and for a series of years he conducted a private class, the members of which he instructed in the principles of moral philosophy. As a striking proof of the energy of his character, and his talents for organizing plans of usefulness, it may be mentioned, that he established and maintained, in active operation, ten Sabbath schools, at a time when he could exercise no jurisdiction as a parochial minister. He was a warm and steady friend of every scheme which had in view the good of his fellow-men, or of the Church of Christ; and he therefore hailed that day in which slavery was abolished, as one of the brightest in our country's annals. He saw the great and irreconcilable difference between the faith of Protestants and that of the followers of the Church of Rome, and took every opportunity of testifying against the errors of Popery. The Edinburgh Bible Society was an especial object of his affection; and the last time he appeared in public, was at the annual meeting of that Society's Auxiliary at Aberdeen, on the night before he was attacked with his last illness.

As a minister, his language was bold, piercing, and energetic. His manner was warm, fervent, and commanding. His doctrines were highly Calvinistic, and nearly all his discourses were impregnated with the peculiarities of his creed. In support of what he advanced, his appeals to Scripture were frequent and various, and he embraced every opportunity of giving glory to God, and of exalting the Saviour of fallen man. To palliate error, to diminish the magnitude of offence, to remain silent in cases that required reprehension, and to call that an infirmity which merited a severer name, were lessons which he never learned; and no one who attended his ministry expected to hear title complimented, wealth flattered, or vice spared. The ability of making his subject plain to any capacity, was a quality which was universally conceded to him, and much of this talent must be ascribed to his natural power of arranging and systematising his thoughts.

As soon as he entered upon the preaching of the Gospel, all his studies were brought to bear upon the one great object he had in view. He studied men, that he might learn by what means he could most successfully reach their hearts; their weaknesses, their wants, their circumstances, were all looked at as subservient to this end. For the purpose of arresting the attention and moving the affections, he frequently referred, in his pulpit addresses, to scenes of distress, of which he had been a witness; and that he did not always fail in such appeals, many among those who heard him regularly can attest. While the talents which God had given him fitted him to speak with acceptance to every class, from the first he was peculiarly an instructor of the poor. These he made his chief study; and his appeals, which were founded upon a close inspection of their circumstances, and sprung from a real desire for their good, came home to their hearts with irresistible power. As he studied to speak so as to affect his hearers, he found, in his intercourse with them, what was most productive of this object; and hence the style which he adopted, while it was chosen at first from his views of human nature, and the class he was called upon to address, was modified afterwards by his daily experience. An interesting example of this is recorded by himself: "Distributed tokens; and supported the idea of Christ speaking immediately every word, and pause, and sentence, and every hearer believing the words to be Christ's; and kept this idea running through the whole, and I appeared to be far more successful than last night; and the reason I assign is, that last night I kept David always between Christ and the believer, as an example, whereas this night I set Christ immediately before the soul, and I was far more powerful and successful."

The subjects of his preaching were very various. His desire was to declare to his flock "all the counsel of God." Although he sometimes made the hazardous attempt to exhibit precisely the future destinies of the Church, from the prophetic writings, he never forgot that the great work committed to him was to preach the Gospel, and hence—the original happiness and excellency of man—his fall from righteousness and consequent misery—the evil of sin—restoration to peace, and to the favour of God through Christ—and the work of the Holy Spirit, were the great doctrines which he continually brought forward.

It would be an omission to neglect to notice the very great gift of prayer which he possessed. There was a peculiar richness of thought in all his addresses to the throne of grace, whether in public or in private; so much so indeed, that those who made no pretensions to godliness have been known to remark it. There is little doubt that while it was a talent bestowed on him by the Great Head of the Church, it had been carefully cultivated. It is an interesting fact, that for some time before his death, he used to write down what he proposed as the subject of prayer in the Church. In a small MS. book, begun on 1st January 1832, there is an entry in these words: "For some time past I have experienced my intellectual vigour less lively in prayer; in consequence of which, I have in one of my books of skeletons arranged the subject of my prayer for the Sabbath morning, dating every day as it came; and from these subjects, I have arranged my morning prayer for some time back. I now reserve a book for the purpose." On that day, the subject noted is, "For increasing progress in my duty, and in every grace, among all ranks and classes of my flock." This practice he continued without intermission till the day on which he ceased to preach. The subject upon the last Sabbath he occupied his pulpit, being 14th December 1834, is "For the saving experience of the appointment of the Sabbath, and the improvement of time."

As far as is known, Dr Kidd kept no record of his personal experience; the only notices which resemble a religious diary, being those which he was in the habit of making for some years before his death, at the end of his discourses, when the public duties of the Sabbath were concluded. It is gratifying to see, by these short memoranda, that he was himself sustained by the truths with which he fed his people, and that his faith, love, and delight in spiritual things, grew in brightness till he was called upon to depart. On the 15th September 1834, he found himself warranted to speak of his state in the following terms:—"This day I have been blessed with more experience of the nature of my being born again, than ever I had before. My views have been more enlarged—my experience more universal, concerning the work of sin and the work of grace, in both soul and body, than ever I had before. The direct contrast of my feelings has been more evident than ever I experienced before; my feelings or experience I cannot describe, yet I think I know them, and I pray that they may continue. My reasoning runs analogically. I argue thus: My God made me. As a rational being, he endowed me with every power and faculty, both of mind and body. He has in his adorable providence granted me health and rationality hitherto, all my life long—all in a temporal way. But there is a spiritual creation of both soul and body necessary before I really can enjoy God, either in this world or the next; and this, because I am by nature a sinful, fallen creature; and 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God' in heaven. Hence, according to the plan and covenant-purpose of redemption, 'I must be born again,' and this is what I experience—that change—that distinction between 'the old' and 'the new man'; and by this spiritual work, both soul and body are 'created in Christ Jesus unto good works;' 'old things are passed away, behold all things are become new.' Oh! what cause to bless and praise God,—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

While his inward man was renewing day by day, it was obvious to all that his bodily frame was fast decaying. Not having risen at his usual hour (five o'clock) on the morning of the 19th December 1834, his daughter went to see how he was, when he stated that he had been seized with a faintness or stupor on attempting to rise, and that he would indulge a while. He rose about nine o'clock, but feeling very giddy, he lay down on the sofa, and fell into a profound sleep; after which some blood was taken from his arm, which relieved the giddiness much. Next day, (Saturday), the doctor found him writing, and told him he should not have been out of bed. He said he was preparing for Sabbath, and on the doctor remonstrating, he replied, "To-morrow is our collection-day for our Sick Man's Friend Society. Would not a sick man pleading for sick people have a good effect?" The physician insisted he should get help; when he said, "Well, doctor, I have a high opinion of your skill, and much esteem yourself; if you say I shall not go, I will not; but there is not another man in Aberdeen would keep me from my pulpit." He had not the slightest idea that he was seriously ill, and thought that he was indulging the physician by keeping his bed on Monday. Although it was arranged that he should meet his Hebrew class at his own house on Tuesday, he felt anxious to get the air, and went to the College. When he returned, he told his daughter that he thought himself better of his jaunt, but within ten minutes he was seized with apoplexy, and in ten minutes more, appeared to have lost all consciousness for ever. He survived, however, till next day, when he expired very calmly at half-past one o'clock, P. M.

The works which Dr Kidd published, are as follows:—"A Course of Sermons, explaining the goodness of God in dispensing the blessings of the Covenant of Grace, according to the sovereign purpose of his redeeming love," in 1808.

"An Essay on the Doctrine of the Trinity," in 1815.
"A Dissertation on the Eternal Son-ship of Christ," in 1822.

"A Short Treatise on Infant Baptism," in 1822.
"A Small Catechism for assisting the Young preparing to approach the Lord's Table for the first time," in 1831 and 1834.

Since his death, a volume of Sermons, selected from an immense mass of MSS. which he left behind him, has been published, and which shows how much richer his discourses became, as the end of his career approached.

THE EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRANCE.

No. VII.

BY THE REV. JOHN G. LORIMER,

Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

In several of my former articles I have endeavoured to bring out some interesting features in the Christian character of the early Protestant Church of France, and especially in the period of ninety years which elapsed between the granting and revoking of the edict of Nantes.

I have now to direct the reader's attention to another, an additional feature, and that one of great interest and beauty, viz., the sympathy and benevolence which the French Reformed Church manifested for those in suffering. Few aspects of character are more affecting, or more indubitably indicative of Christian principle. It may be added, that, in reference to the French Church, few are less known. The Saviour went about doing good to the bodies and the souls of men, sympathising with the afflicted, and administering suitable relief. So has it been, so will it ever be, with his true followers, according to their circumstances and opportunities. The Protestants of France were not hardened by their own sufferings into a selfish insensibility to the sufferings of others. This is generally the way of the world. As became Christians, their own afflictions only served to make them more alive to the afflictions of those who claimed their sympathy. We have many proofs of this. Not only as individuals, but as a Church, they took up cases of all sorts of distress, individual and collective; those which proceeded directly from the providence of God, and those which were the result of the persecuting wickedness of man. To select a few illustrations. In 1620, Quevedo, a Spaniard, who had escaped from the inquisition of the Romish Church, applied to the Synod of Alex for some relief, that he might live in the profession of the Gospel, for which he had suffered. The Assembly ordered him one hundred livres from the common funds of the Church. The same was to be continued as long as his department justified his profession—was to be put into the hands of the consistory of Montpellier, and paid quarterly, "that so he may learn some honest trade, whereby to gain a livelihood." I need not remark on the union of good sense and Christian principle and benevolence which such charity discovered.

About 1630 and 1645, the Mediterranean was infested with Turkish pirates, who made a prey of all who came within their reach, carrying them to the coast of Africa, and shutting them up in hopeless slavery. Thus did wronged and miserable Africa make reprisals, as it were, upon Europe. The Protestant Church of France, sympathising deeply with the sufferers, issued the following beautiful declaration and resolution, which acquires a fresh interest when we remember how early it was proclaimed, and how narrow and impoverished were the circumstances of the Church at the period. "The maritime provinces making great complaints of the vast number of captives detained in Algiers, Tunis, Sallee, and other places of Barbary and Morocco, and of their sad and woful condition, and that they do indispensably need all the charitable assistance of the faithful to redeem them out of misery—this Synod adjureth, by the bowels of compassion of the living God, and by that fellow-feeling which all members of our Lord Jesus ought to have of one another's straits and necessities, all the provinces, and all the Churches, and every particular individual professor of our religion, to yearn, with bowels of pity, over the affliction of these our poor brethren, and to contribute liberally towards their redemption." After stating in what manner the money is to be collected, the Synod go on to say, "Every province shall send unto the consistory of Paris a list of their captives, and an account of their alms, that so these monies may be employed in the redemption of those captives who are natives of provinces before any others, and after them, as a supplement of charity, for others also, that so this whole work of love may redound to the glory of God, the common edification, and particular consolation of these our poor afflicted brethren." This is a noble resolution, worthy of a Christian Church. While the French Protestants were moved by the claims of humanity and country, their motive was still, in a chief degree, religious. They were drawn out in sympathy and compassion, especially because their brethren were "poor afflicted Christians." Nor did they allow their charity to evaporate in empty words, they embodied it in liberal doings. They collected considerable sums of money, and continued to do so for many years. In 1659, or fourteen years after the date of the resolution which we have quoted, we find them testifying, that the alms obtained from the faithful for this pious work had been most beneficially employed, and they determine, that, seeing there is still a great necessity for this noble charity, they will persevere in it, and press its claims upon all the provinces. Under the influence of Christian principle, they continued in well-doing.

Highly honourable as was this course in reference to their European and Christian brethren, their conduct towards the poor negro slave was, if possible, more noble still. It could not be expected that at so early a period, just views should be entertained upon the subject of slavery. It is only a very short time since proper sentiments became prevalent in our own country; and it is well known, that nations professing Christianity do at the present moment revel in all the atrocities of negro slavery; but as Christianity was the first religious system to condemn slavery, and the Christian fathers the first courageous men to contend for the abolition of slavery, so the Protestant Church, under the influence of that principle which requires man to do to others as he would have them to do to him, stood forward in behalf of the slave. The Protestants of France may rather have denounced the abuses of the slave system, than the false principle upon which it proceeds; but they shewed their humanity and Christianity, when they exhorted the faithful, exactly two hundred years ago, not to abuse their liberty contrary to the rules of Christian charity, "nor to transfer those poor infidels into other hands besides those of Christians who may deal kindly and humanely with them; and above all, may take a special care of their precious immortal souls, and see them instructed in the Christian religion." Had this pious exhortation been sincerely and heartily carried into effect by all who held property in slaves, who can doubt that long ere now slavery would have been everywhere and peacefully abolished?

But leaving illustrations of sympathy and kindness in cases of outward and bodily bondage, we may turn to other manifestations of Christian benevolence. Not unfrequently some particular Church in France was visited with a special affliction of Divine Providence; and in such cases, the Church, as a body, immediately discovered the most open-hearted and open-handed generosity. In 1620, the magistrates and consistory of the town of Privas represented to the Synod of Alex, "the great losses, damages, and afflictions," sustained by them since the death of their pastor, M. Chambaud; so that they were reduced to a lamentable condition. The Assembly immediately ordered six hundred livres to be "given for a present supply," and all the Churches of the kingdom to make a general collection in behalf of the afflicted Church of Privas; and not only so, but the governor of Mountaban, and persons in high rank, as well as the kindred of the late minister, are written to, and earnestly entreated to take special care of the religious education of his children, "that they may not be diverted from the true religion, and trained up in Popish idolatry." These things may seem minute details for the representative Assembly of a large Church to concern itself with; but they shew how warm and enlightened was the piety which reigned in the hearts of its members. In the same year, the Church of Praymiroll presented a petition for immediate relief, owing to the whole town being recently consumed by a most dreadful fire. The case is taken up; the neighbouring provinces are exhorted to assist with special collections; and the afflicted state of the distressed inhabitants is recommended to the general deputies, that by them it may be laid before the king. Cases of famine were met in a similar way.

But, perhaps, the most interesting class of cases are those of neighbouring persecuted Churches, persecuted for the faithful testimony which they held up in behalf of Protestant truth, and the cause of Christ. The Church of France sympathized deeply with all in such circumstances. Among the grounds for a day of fasting, in 1620, we find the Synod enumerating "the late doleful changes happened in the Churches of Bearn, and in divers other Churches and provinces united and incorporated with us, which are either ruined, or upon the very brink of ruin and destruction." The Churches which most frequently appear in the records of the Church of France, as demanding and receiving her sympathy and assistance, are those of the Marquisate of Saluces. These were situated in the near vicinity of the Churches of Piedmont, and were harassed with long continued persecution by the Duke of Savoy, a bigoted Roman Catholic, at whose hands the Protestant Churches of these regions generally suffered severely. So early as 1603, we have the following interesting statement from the proceedings of the Synod of Gap:—"The petition tendered by our brethren of the Marquisate of Saluces, exiled, for the Gospel's sake, from their houses and inheritance, was read, and it was judged reasonable that the Churches of the said Marquisate should be preserved and confirmed in their union and communion of faith and discipline which they ever had with the Church of this kingdom. And, therefore, the king's majesty shall be most humbly entreated to recommend them to the Duke of Savoy, that the liberty granted them by his edicts may be continued and confirmed to them. And letters also to this purpose shall be written from this Assembly to the Duke of Savoy and the Duke de les Diguieres, and the churches of the valleys shall be exhorted to join themselves in a stricter bond of union, as they have done in times of former troubles, one with the other."

The first thing which the Church of France did for their suffering brethren was to give them the advice which seemed most appropriate to their circumstances. Those who still remained in their native land are exhorted to forsake the places where they are constrained to participate in idolatry, and to accompany their banished brethren in bearing the cross of Christ. About this time, letters are received from the Christians of the valley of Barcelona, asking for advice how to conduct themselves, under the apprehension of being deprived, by the Duke of Savoy, "of their precious liberty to profess the Gospel, and worship God according to his holy will, prescribed in the Scriptures." The answer of the Synod is, that they most sincerely condole with them, and earnestly recommend them to a stricter union with the Christians of the other valleys of Piedmont, assuring them of all offers of Christian charity, should they be persecuted or banished. All this was well, but stronger and more decided assistance than that of advice was necessary, and, accordingly, the Protestant Church of France was not slow in awarding it. The persecution of the Churches of Saluces continuing, the Synod of Rochelle, four years afterwards, called upon all the provinces of the kingdom to assist them with extraordinary alms, and on no account to direct any of the money already raised for this purpose to other ends, however praiseworthy and good. Nay, such was the zeal of the Church in behalf of the suffering, and such the urgent necessities of the case, that four hundred crowns were advanced by M. Bernardin, an elder, to be afterwards repaid from the collections and the king's annual grant. And the sums raised by the poor, but still pious, Churches of France were not inconsiderable. The Church of Bordeaux raised four hundred livres, the Church of Rochelle eight hundred, the province of Poitou one thousand four hundred and forty-four, Brittany seven hundred and fifty, Normandy one thousand, Zaintonge one thousand and thirty-six, Orleans and Berry one thousand nine hundred; thus, of five provinces alone, above six thousand livres. All this was very creditable, and, with God's blessing, seems to have been decidedly useful to the cause of the persecuted. Ten or eleven years after, instead of extermination, we read of one Laurence Jolly, one of the exiled Protestants, bringing letters from the Church of Guillestre, which was composed of the poor Salucian refugees, praying the Assembly for a portion of the royal grant for the maintenance of a pastor, "because they are in hopes it may allure and attract a great many others, who are groaning under that sore and heavy persecution, and do hunger after the Word of life, and ardently desire the enlargement of Christ's kingdom." The Church complied with the request, and the very fact that such a request was presented, bears strong testimony to the success with which the persecuted had maintained their ground, and the hope which they entertained of growing strength.

I might refer to other cases of Christian sympathy and assistance, such as that rendered to the Church of Gignac, when reduced by the impetuous assaults of its adversaries to sore affliction and straits; how the professor of divinity in the University of Nismes was sent by the Synod to visit, and comfort, and strengthen the members, and how the province of Languedoc was ordered to defray the expenses of his journey. I might refer also to the eight hundred livres which were paid, in 1631, to the Lord Ramboulet, an elder of the Church of Paris, to be employed by his agent at Marseilles for "the comfort and deliverance of the faithful, who, for religion and a good conscience, kept by them, have been there detained in chains ever since the last commotions." But it is unnecessary to multiply the proofs of a Christian principle and disposition sufficiently conspicuous; the whole is a beautiful manifestation of Christianity in trying times. What a contrast to the narrow sympathy, and cold and selfish doings of the men of the world!

That it may not be imagined the pleasing picture we have been considering was the result of accident or national temperament, I shall produce a few parallel cases from the history of the Protestant Church of Scotland, which will go to show that the cause was deep and all-comprehensive, that Christianity lay at the foundation, and that in all countries its operation is substantially and wonderfully the same. With regard to sympathy and relief in cases of outward slavery, the records of the Church are full of them, through a space of almost two hundred years. So early as 1596, we read in the records of the Presbytery of Glasgow of the parishes being called upon to collect for the support of an afflicted Grecian, who had been ransomed by the Church, for his kindness towards the Christians in bondage. In the small parish of Dunbog, in Fife-shire, one of the smallest in the Church of Scotland, we find that a contribution was made, in 1678, for the relief of some Montrose seamen, taken by the Turks. Two years later, we read of contributions in the same parish for two separate parties of Scotch seamen, taken by Turkish men-of-war, the one being carried to Sallee, the other to Algiers. And if even so small a parish manifested so much sympathy and generosity, well may we conclude that the feeling throughout the country was general and deep. Accordingly, we meet with innumerable cases where the General Assembly enjoined collections for the redemption of men out of slavery: In 1698, for Christians detained in bondage in Barbary; in 1705, for a captive at Algiers; in 1719, for Captain Stewart and his crew at Saltee, in the dominions of the Emperor of Morocco; in the same year, certain presbyteries are required to raise money for the redemption of Matthew Roger, a Borrowstown sailor; in 1734, the sum of fourteen pounds two shillings and tenpence was paid for the release of a slave at Algiers. This, I presume, was William Dowell, for whom I find the parish of Morham, another of the smallest parishes in Scotland, contributed. So lately as 1740, several northern synods were recommended to collect in behoof of Robert Anderson, a captive at Tangiers.

In reference, again, to other forms of distress,—such as calamities proceeding directly from the hand of God,—we meet with the same sympathizing spirit and ready co-operation. In 1598 nine presbyteries are called upon to assist the sufferers by a dreadful fire at Haddington, and Glasgow is one of the number. In 1676 the small parish of Dunbog contributes to the rebuilding of the town of Kelso, destroyed by fire; and in 1671 assists two poor men whose houses were burnt at Sligo in Ireland. In 1733 the parish of Govan aided, by collection, the sufferers by a serious fire at Paisley, and in 1749 assisted a hundred families in the Gorbals of Glasgow, suffering from the same calamity. At a period when insurance against loss by fire was unknown such generous aid was the more valuable.

The most interesting cases, however, and those which most distinctly mark the presence of Christian principle and feeling, were cases of sympathy and aid to Christian Churches in straits and persecutions. There were many such calls, and never did the Church of Scotland fail generously to respond to them. I do not allude to mere cases of Church extension, whether at home or abroad, in Scotland, in Ireland, in America. These were very numerous. I allude to cases where there was actual distress and suffering for the cause of Christ. So early as 1604 the Presbytery of Glasgow made a collection for the persecuted Church of Geneva; and twenty years afterwards, the very period which we are surveying, in connection with the Church of France, the same presbytery collected twelve hundred pounds Scots, for the relief of the French Protestants in Rochelle and Bearn. In 1719 the small parish of Morham in Haddingtonshire, collected for the distressed Protestant brethren of Franconia in Germany, the sum of eight pounds nine shillings and elevenpence Scots. The parish of Govan in 1739 raised money for the persecuted Christians of Piedmont; and there can be little doubt that such parochial collections were general, if not universal. In 1752 the poor Protestants of Breslau in Silesia, received from the Church of Scotland the munificent sum of one thousand one hundred pounds Sterling.

Such are a few illustrations of the sympathy and benevolence manifested by the Protestant Church of France to those who are in suffering and affliction; and such, also, are a few parallel specimens of the same dispositions exhibited in the character and history of the Church of Scotland. And what do such facts prove? They prove how fallacious and untrue is the common allegation of the world and of infidelity, that religious men, in their zeal for the forms of piety, are indifferent to the temporal wants of man. On the contrary, they are the best friends of mere humanity, and, in point of sympathy and liberality, will not only stand a comparison with, but will be found immeasurably to out-distance all the devices and doings of the irreligious, by whatever name they may be called. If any entertain doubt upon this point, let them ask and ascertain what mere worldly men really do for others, and they will doubt no longer.

Another inference deducible from the facts presented is, that true Christianity is expansive in its liberality. Infidels have often objected to the Gospel that even its virtues are narrow and confined, and have talked of a universal benevolence, a citizenship of the world as far nobler, and have hoped to work this out from theories of their own. Let the kindness shewn by the poor Protestant Churches of France and Scotland to the afflicted, wherever they might be found, however far removed, contradict so foolish an assertion. What have infidels; what have the irreligious done to realize their own speculations? Where are the distressed whom they have succoured,—where the record of their liberality? What did they do for those afflicted parties whom impoverished Christian Churches were so forward to aid? The truth is, that though the Gospel lays great stress upon domestic virtues and relative duties, and may be said to start with individual affections, yet it is so truly expansive in its character, that ere long it embraces in its benevolent regards, the whole human race in their noblest interests, while the aim of infidelity to begin with general and do away with particular affections, as narrow, is not only unsuited to the weakness of our nature, but frequently terminates in intense selfishness, nay, must do so, from drying up the very source of large and expanded affections.

THE SPECIAL PRIVILEGES OF THE NOBLES OF ISRAEL:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN WRIGHT,

Alloa.

“Then went up Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire-stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness.”—Exod. xxiv. 9, 10.

IN considering the remarkable passage before us, the grand topic to which I shall direct your attention is the wonderful sight which Moses and the elders of Israel beheld. It was no other than “the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire-stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness.”

I. To whom was the privilege of beholding the God of Israel granted? It was to Moses, the king in Jeshurun, the lawgiver, the mediator between God and the people; to his brother Aaron, who was afterwards consecrated to the high-priesthood; to the sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu; and to seventy of the elders of Israel, chosen, probably on account of their seniority and rank, from the various Hebrew tribes. When the moral law was given, it was in the hearing of all the people, who also beheld the tokens of the divine presence, and were consequently struck with terror; but when this display was made of the glory of the God of Israel, it was not to the congregation in general, but to the select party we have named. So God has given evidence to the whole world of his being and perfections; but to a select class of men has he, with much greater clearness, revealed himself. Christ has manifested his name in a specially bright and heart-affecting manner to those only “who have been given him out of the world.” Of the saints of God, some are more highly favoured with discoveries of his glory than others, because they have better improved the opportunities they have enjoyed. The seventy elders saw more than the people in the camp: Moses, and his minister

Joshua, saw more than Aaron, his sons, and the elders: and Moses was admitted to an intimacy with God, not then vouchsafed to Joshua; for on the seventh day, after leaving the select party in company with his minister, he was summoned alone into the midst of the cloud on the mount, where he remained forty days and forty nights. The more we improve by what we already know, the higher shall we be authorised to climb the mount, the more shall we be enabled to know. In being admitted to this peculiar intimacy with God, Moses was a type of Christ. He dwelt from eternity in the Father's bosom, and is thereby well qualified for acquainting us with the perfections and requirements of God. No mere man hath seen God at any time; but the eternal Son having measured the depths of his infinite glory, and gazing ever on his splendour, can tell us what he is. John refers to this knowledge possessed by the Mediator alone, in saying, "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." As Moses afterward communicated to the people the revelations he had received from God on the mount; so has Christ, the great Teacher, come from God, to tell us what he has seen and heard. To him, therefore, should we look up, that he may manifest to us the glory of the Godhead, that he may reveal to us, by his Word and Spirit, the will of God, for our salvation.

II. Where was this wonderful sight beheld by the nobles of Israel? It was on Mount Sinai, where the moral law had shortly before been given. "Come up," said God to Moses; and the elders went up, not to the summit, but partly up the mountain. Sinai in Arabia, for the reason now specified, is a very remarkable mount; for we cannot help associating with it, the discoveries which God has there made of himself. There, while Moses fed the flock of Jethro, the God of his fathers appeared to him in a bush, which burned without being consumed, and commissioned him to deliver the oppressed Israelites from Egypt. There, with the accompaniments of thick darkness, and thunder, and lightning, was a voice, like the sound of a trumpet, heard pronouncing the ten commandments. There, the nobles of Israel beheld God; and there, long afterward, the Word of Jehovah came to the prophet Elijah, not in the great and strong wind, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in the still small voice. For us, a pilgrimage to Arabia, that we may see Israel's God, is not requisite. The ordinances of grace are the mountains on which he exhibits himself; for his promise is, "In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee." If we enter into our closet, and shut out the world from our thoughts, and, in submission to the influences of the Holy Spirit, engage aright in the exercises of meditation and prayer—if we thirst for the courts of the living God, longing for a manifestation of his glory in the sanctuary—if we sit at the table of the Lord, communing in spirit the mount of holy communion with him,—then may we expect such a discovery of the perfections of the Deity to be made to our soul, as can be reasonably looked for in our present imperfect state. Had Moses, and Aaron, and the elders, not climbed the mount, they would not have seen what they were privileged to see: and if we ascend not the mounts of divinely instituted ordinances, we have no warrant for supposing that God will manifest himself to us, otherwise than to the world.

III. When was this great sight beheld by the nobles of Israel? It was after the solemn republication which had just been made of the covenant of grace. While the moral law, as a covenant of works, was renewed on Sinai,—not because the people had any ability of themselves to comply with its requirements, but that, as a schoolmaster, it might lead them to Christ, that they might be justified by faith,—it is not to be questioned, that a renewal was also made of the covenant of grace. What were the sacrifices, and instruments of service, and ablutions, and feasts of the Mosaic economy, then instituted, but shadows of good things to come at the end of the dispensation, the substance being Christ, as Paul largely shows in his Epistle to the Hebrews? Having made this necessary explanation, we request your attention to the context. Moses is commanded to bring up the elders, and directions are given respecting the manner of the solemn approach. Then, we read, "Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the Lord hath said will we do." Next morning sacrifices were offered to the Lord, the blood of which was sprinkled by Moses on the altar and the people, he saying at the same time, "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." God gave himself to the people in a covenant of grace, engaging to be their God; and they gave themselves to him in a covenant of duty, engaging to be his people; and the compact was ratified or sealed by the blood of the sacrifice, which was typical of the blood of Christ, whereby the new covenant or testament has been sealed. Now, it was subsequently to those solemn typical observances, that the Hebrew nobles, who had joined in them, saw the glory of the God of Israel. This suggests to us a very important lesson. We cannot expect a proper view of the perfections of God, till, by uniting us with Christ, he has made with us an everlasting covenant, even the sure mercies of David. Previously to this, indeed, and preparatory for this, we must know something of his character; for how, otherwise, shall we be suitably affected by his terrors, or allured by his gracious promises? But it is only after we have been renewed, according to the provisions of the covenant of grace, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, that we shall have those discoveries of God made to our soul, which shall excite the profoundest gratitude, and admiration, and re-whose hope of acceptance with God rests on the atoning sacrifice of Christ, offered by him on the altar of his divinity, that Paul says, "We all, with open (or unveiled) face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

Some other circumstances connected with this great sight must now be noticed by us. The persons favoured were to worship the Lord afar off. The most gracious discoveries which God makes of himself have no tendency (but the contrary) to lessen the profound reverence with which he must be regarded, and approached by us. Such men as Moses and Elijah, when admitted to intimate intercourse with the Most High, were filled with awe. With the same veneration ought we invariably to ascend the mount of ordinances, where God appears. The Hebrews saw the divine glory together. Moses was alone on Horeb when he saw the burning bush, and alone on the mount forty days. Now, however, others were allowed to share with him in the amazing revelation made to him. Thus their own faith in the revelations made by Moses would be confirmed; and thus were they qualified for preparing the people for such further communications as the inspired legislator should be instructed to address to them. In our closet we see alone the divine glory; in the Church, and at the sacramental feast, we must expect the manifestation in common with our fellow-worshippers. This sight was vouchsafed, that the people might be prepared for additional religious ordinances. It was designed that all Israel, instructed by the elders, should be thus excited to fulfil the more cheerfully their covenant engagement, "All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient."

IV. Let us now show what was seen by the elders of Israel on the mount. They beheld not the substance of God, for he is immaterial, and therefore invisible; nor did they see an image fitted to convey any conceptions regarding the mode of the divine existence, for this charge was given by Moses to the people: "Take ye good heed unto yourselves, (for ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the Lord spake in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire,) lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female." Yet, while the substance of God was, to the elders, and is to us, necessarily invisible, they beheld a striking symbol of his special presence. In the infancy of the Church, Jehovah manifested himself in divers manners; sometimes in dreams, sometimes in an audible voice, sometimes in the oracles of Urim and Thummim, sometimes in human appearance. The man whom Abraham saw just before the destruction of Sodom, with whom Jacob wrestled in Peniel, who stood before Joshua with a sword in his hand, to whom belonged divine names, and titles, and attributes, to whom were ascribed divine works, and to whom was rendered divine worship, was the second person of the Godhead, in the appearance of a man. The high-priest saw in the holy of holies, above the mercy-seat, between the cherubim, the Shekinah, that bright cloud which was the symbol of the divine presence. Now, some such symbol, by which the mind was addressed, through the medium of the senses, may have been seen by the elders of Israel, for it is said, "they saw God," that is, were favoured with some special manifestation of his presence. We are plainly told what they saw. "They saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire-stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness." The sapphire of the ancients was a half transparent stone of deep blue tinged with white, and spotted with stars of a golden colour. This description of the pedestal on which God was seen, evidently fails to convey the impression of its splendour made on the mind of the historian; such is the poverty of human language, that an adequate conception of it could not be conveyed to us. The kindred descriptions in Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Apocalypse, may be examined in connection with our text. The various forms of manifestation addressed to the senses, which we have just considered, were suited to the Church in her earlier days, when the canon of Scripture had not been completed; but when the canon had been sealed, and the last dispensation of the Church,—not to be shaken or removed like the Jewish,—had been fully established, such modes of revelation ceased. God is a spirit; our dispensation of the covenant is more spiritual than the former, therefore we must now expect discoveries of God to be made, not to the senses, but directly to the understanding and the heart. Overlooking, at present, the lessons regarding the Most High, which should be read by us in the volumes of creation and providence, and remembering that God has exalted his Word as the medium of revelation, above all else by which he makes himself known, we shall show briefly, how his glory is to be seen in Christ.

Christ is said to be "the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of his person" or substance; he is called "the image of the invisible God;" the apostle thus writes: "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Christ reveals God by the constitution of his person, viewed as Mediator. He is God as well as man; but, as God, he dwelt with the Father from eternity, and personal properties, not belonging to the Father, are attributed to him. Can clearer or more convincing evidence be given, that, while there is an essential unity in the divine nature, there is a plurality of subsistences, which we commonly call persons? We are not required to believe the manner of the fact, which is not contrary to our reason but above our comprehension; but the fact itself being thus clearly revealed must be received as indubitable. Let us, therefore, on the mount of ordinances, gaze on the glory of the God-man, for "I am in the Father," said he, "and the Father in me; and he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father."

The perfections of God are further displayed in the mediatorial work and grace of Christ. By his work we mean his obedience rendered to the holy law of God under the curse, and the suffering to which he submitted on account of guilt, in the room of those whom he represented in the covenant of grace. He obeyed in every tittle that law which had been issued by himself amid Sinai's terrors, and thus it was more honoured than by the conformity to it of the highest of mere creatures. He satisfied for guilt, and thus were demonstrated the wisdom of God, in reconciling the claims of his justice and faithfulness with the free salvation of man; the holiness of God, in resolving to support the honour of his law and government, at the expense of his Son's blood; the righteousness of God, in not sparing his own Son, who was guilty because of the guilt of his people imputed to him; the amazing love of God, in sending into the world, for the redemption of his enemies, one sustaining the relation to him of only begotten and eternal Son. In reference to the display thus made by himself of the glory of the moral perfections of Deity, Jesus said, "I have glorified thee on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do."

The grace of Christ, or the loving, tender, compassionate manner, in which he dealt with the weak, the timid, the desponding, eminently illustrates the love and grace of God in the redemption of the soul. He, then, who sees Jesus aright with the eye of faith, sees the Father. Thus, in Gospel times, is the vision of God vouchsafed. Let it be our earnest prayer, then, that God may be beheld by us in the face of Christ, and that the vision of his glory may be productive of suitable effects on our heart and our life.

DERIVED FROM MODERN RESEARCHES ON EGYPTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

PART I.

[Extracted from the Athenaeum of July 15, 1837.]

THE discoveries made of late years in Egyptian Antiquities, which seem almost miraculously to have brought the youth, or rather the infancy, of civilization into the presence of its age, after so long an interval of oblivion, have a remarkable interest, from the light they throw on many of the incidents recorded in Biblical history. We need not refer to profane history for proofs of the connection between the ancient Egyptians and the various nomad races of shepherd-kings to which the Israelites belonged. Abraham, the founder of their race, visited Egypt, and found there an organized government. The settlement of the Jews in Goshen seems to have prospered, until "another king arose who knew not Joseph,"—an expression which clearly intimates a change of dynasty. Consequently, as the descendants of Jacob, previous to that event, lived in terms of amity with their neighbours of Mizraim, they must have profited by their superior civilization, and borrowed from them the instruments of agriculture, of commerce, and of luxury. Finally, the Jewish legislator was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians;" and his ceremonial laws contain many traces of usages derived from a higher race, accommodated to a nobler faith and a purer worship.

Agriculture in Central Egypt appears to have been taken under the protection of the priests and kings. Even in the representation of a victorious monarch coming to pay homage to the gods for their protection, the importance of agriculture is manifested amid all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war;" when the king comes forward to present his offering, a priest holds out to him a bundle of corn, which the monarch cuts through with a sickle before depositing his gifts on the altar. Husbandry, indeed, was the parent of civilization; but in Egypt there were many circumstances which rendered it of peculiar importance. The most influential of these was the limited extent of the fertile ground, the complete dependence of the farmer on irrigation for success, and the short proportion of the year to which agricultural operations were consequently confined. There was no necessity to manure the ground; the seed cast upon the moist earth sunk in of itself, or was trodden down by cattle. The plough was used for harrowing rather than turning the soil; in all representations on the monuments, we see that it follows the sower.

The plough is very simple in its construction. It is sometimes a mere triangle, like the first letter of the alphabet, whose shape is probably derived from this agricultural implement, and it is in such a state managed by the hand. It could only scratch the earth lightly, and was probably only employed to turn a light earth over the seed. There are no wheels to it, and even a handle and traces are wanting when it is not drawn by oxen. In some cases there appears to have been no metal share, but in others it is distinctly exhibited. No figure that we have seen shows it to have been the practice to yoke animals of a different race together; but the prohibition of Moses, "Thou shalt not plough with an ass and an ox together," Deut. xxii. 10, proves that the custom prevailed in Egypt, as it still does in many parts of the Levant.

It would appear that the hand-plough was capable of being used as a pick-axe, and this would be necessary in an irrigated country, for when the water runs off, the soil, which is similar to a drained marsh, becomes hard and stiff.

The monuments prove that several varieties of grain were cultivated, and fully confirm the accuracy of the enumeration in the description which Moses gives of the plague of hail. "And the flax and the barley were smitten, for the barley was in the ear and the flax was balled. But the wheat and the rye were not smitten, for they were not grown up." Exod. ix. 31, 32. It is not so easy to identify the rye as the other produce, but the wheat and the barley occur often enough; and of the flax we have not only the harvest, but all the further processes to which it was subjected.

Very little labour was required between sowing and reaping, for there are scarcely any weeds in Egypt; no traces of the intermediate operations between seed-time and harvest, so important in our system of farming, can be discovered on the monuments. They usually sowed in November and the harvest was ripe in April. The corn is cut with a sickle; its shape does not differ materially from that used at the present day.

The reapers merely cut off the ears, for straw was of no value in Egypt; reeds were a better material for thatching; their cattle and horses seem rarely, if ever, to have been stabled, and consequently litter was not required; the chaff was preferred to the straw for stuffing beds. We find, however, that straw was used in the manufacture of bricks; the stems of the corn left by the reapers were plucked up by the hand for the brick-makers, and as this was both tedious and troublesome, we can estimate the injustice of Pharaoh when

The narrative requires a little explanation, which we shall endeavour to afford. "And Pharaoh commanded the same day the task-masters of the people and their officers, saying, Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves." Exod. v. 6, 7. These task-masters were similar in character to the slave-drivers of the West Indies; they often appear on the monuments armed with formidable whips, and the slaves crouch before them in terror. The usual punishment for negligent slaves was to extend the unfortunate wretch at full length with his face to the ground; his hands and feet were held by his fellow-captives, and an executioner beat him with rods until the anger of the overseer was satisfied. In addition to the task-masters, Moses mentions "the officers;" these were secretaries or clerks, who took an account of all public and private revenues; we find them constantly on the monuments, with their pen and tablet; and it may be remarked as a specimen of Egyptian humour, that the artists invariably give an appearance of shrewdness and cunning to those accountants, who were probably as unpopular in Egypt, as excisemen in England, and tithing-men in Ireland. Indeed, they properly belonged to this class of functionaries, for the king was lord of the soil in Egypt; rent was the tax paid for the support of the government, at least after the period of Joseph's administration. Joseph, as we are informed, "bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them." We must remember that the tyrannical Pharaoh issued his orders, prohibiting the supply of straw, about two months before the time of harvest. If, therefore, the straw had not been usually left standing in the fields, he would have required from the Israelites a physical impossibility; but the narrative shows us that the Israelites found the stems of the last year's harvest standing in the fields: "So the people were scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt to gather stubble instead of straw." Exod. v. 12. By stubble the historian clearly means the stalks that remained from the last year's harvest.

When the corn was cut down, it was not, as with us, bound into sheaves, but the ears were piled in baskets, and carried by labourers to the threshing-floor.

There is very little variety in the shape of the baskets; capacity, not elegance, was the condition of their structure. From the mode of reaping and gathering the harvest, there could be no employment for gleaners, and accordingly we can discover none upon the monuments. Neither is there any appearance of such a festival as harvest-home; the presence of the royal officers to receive the stipulated portion of the produce, which was probably the lion's share, rendered harvest any thing but a joyous season to the agricultural labourer. It was remarked by the members of the French Commission, that there was a great similarity between the joyless looks of the husbandmen on the monuments, and the sombre countenances of the modern Fellahs, whose toil is so wretchedly remunerated. This, however, is only true of the labourers engaged in winnowing and measuring the crop. The threshing-floor appears to have been common to several farms, if we may judge from the number of labourers who bring their baskets to it. Threshing was always performed by oxen, a custom to which we find frequent reference in the Holy Scriptures. One of the Levitical precepts was, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn."

The imperfection of this operation is sufficiently evident, and yet it is continued in most Eastern countries to the present day. This adherence to ancient usages, long after their defects are pointed out, seems to belong to agriculture in most countries; in Ireland it was long usual to set fire to the straw, which was several acts of parliament were passed to put an end to the practice, but so obstinate were the Irish in their adherence to it, that "permission to burn oats in the straw," was the subject of one of the stipulations between the Roman Catholic confederates and the Duke of Ormond, in the Council of Kilkenny. We may add, that a similar usage seems to have been common with our Saxon ancestors, for bran is the past participle of the old verb brennen, to burn. In Egypt it was unnecessary to scorch the corn with fire before turning in the oxen, as the ears were dried in the sun until the outer husk became crisp and brittle; still the crushing out of the grain was so incomplete, that winnowing became a very important operation.

When the oxen had sufficiently trodden the ears, the corn was thrown out altogether into the middle of the floor. It was then flung upwards in the wind, which removed the chaff and broken straw. To this the Psalmist alludes when he says, "The ungodly are like the chaff which the wind driveth away." Psalm i. 4. Unthreshed ears, clods of earth, and gross impurities, were removed by a sieve, and the winnowed heap, which contained many ears of corn not yet broken, or at least imperfectly crushed out, was again subjected to the threshing of the oxen. After this second operation, the corn was once more flung against the wind by a shovel, or a square instrument like a board slightly scooped, similar to the shovels used in corn stores, but without the handle, which, in our translation of Isaiah, is called a fan. "The oxen likewise, and the young asses that plough the ground, shall eat clean provender, which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan." Isaiah xxx. 24. It would appear from a passage in St. Matthew, that the fan was considered the more perfect winnowing implement, for the Baptist, describing the advent of Christ, says, "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." Matt. iii. 12.

The scattered straw, and the light chaff entangled in the stubble, was burned in Syria and Palestine for the purpose of manuring the ground, but this does not appear to have been the practice in Egypt, where, as we have already said, the fertility of the soil depended wholly on irrigation. The winnowed corn was removed to the granary in measured vessels of equal capacity, to facilitate the keeping of a proper account. The royal officer, with his pen and tablet, is always present at the winnowing and storing.

When the corn was stored, the husbandman was at leisure until the next flood. This respite from labour enabled the Egyptians to devote a large portion of their time to processions, religious feasts, and gymnastic exercises. But their horticultural operations required more continuous care, and we know of no other ancient nation in which gardening received so much attention. From the total disregard of perspective in the paintings and bas-reliefs, the representations of Egyptian gardens are very confused, and, at first, suggest very few ideas of beauty. A closer examination proves that their pleasure-grounds were laid out in what used to be called the Dutch style, which was so fashionable in England about a century ago. The flower-beds are square and formal; the raised terraces run in straight lines; arbours of trellis-work occur at definite intervals, covered with vines and other creepers, which it is difficult to identify. Almost the only tree is the date-palm, which seems to have been an object of special reverence. It is always planted in the most exposed and driest part of the inclosure. Some of the ponds are stored with water-fowl, and others with fish. Vegetables are depicted in great variety and abundance. It is, indeed, impossible to look at any representation of an Egyptian garden, without feeling some sympathy the desert. "The children of Israel also wept again, and said, who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick; but now our soul is dried away, there is nothing at all beside this manna before our eyes." Numb. xi. 4, 5, 6.

We find the lotus-harvest usually connected with horticulture; at first, the plant might be mistaken for corn, but it may easily be recognised by the greenness of the stem, and by the waved lines, which show that it was planted in well watered beds. The gatherers of the lotus appear to have cut the stem off close to the roots, with a sickle shorter and sharper than that used for reaping the corn. We clearly see that the lotus reed was looked upon as far more valuable than straw; great care is shown in binding them into sheaves, and those who carry them exhibit an anxious caution against breaking the stem. It is also remarkable that the lotus was gathered both green and ripe, and that the fruit was extracted by drawing the heads through a toothed instrument not unlike that used for cleaning flax; after which the stems were preserved for a great variety of domestic purposes.

The lotus-beds appear to have been kept constantly flooded to the depth of about six or seven inches; the succulent vegetables, and some trees, required to be regularly watered, and in every garden we find several reservoirs established. The water is generally drawn up by the hand, but we find several contrivances to facilitate labour, one of which is in use at this day, in the market-gardens in the neighbourhood of Brentford. It is a simple application of the lever: a stone at one end raises up the bucket from the well by a string fastened to the other, and the attendant has only the labour of pulling down the bucket when empty.

"Hewers of wood and drawers of water" were, and indeed are, proverbially the lowest class of the population in Eastern countries. Indeed, one of the advantages which Moses dwells most upon, to show the superiority of the promised land, is, that it would not require the toil of watering like the land of Egypt. "The land whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs; but the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven." Deut. xi. 10, 11. The phrase, "watering with the foot," which has perplexed commentators, is illustrated on the monuments by our finding chamels or drains cut through the plantations, which may be opened or closed by merely turning the earth with the foot. Cotton was certainly cultivated in Upper Egypt, but we have not met with any representation of the plant on the monuments; at least, none which can be decisively identified. But cotton and the grape-vine belong more properly to the manufactures of Egypt, which we shall examine in a separate article.

The breeding and tending of cattle was an important branch of Egyptian husbandry, but less so than might have been expected in a nation so remarkable for animal idolatry. The cow was sacred to Isis, and was never sacrificed; but the bull is not an uncommon offering. The worship of the bull Apis, was limited to a single beast, whose characteristic marks separated him from the ordinary herd. Large herds of black cattle are common on the monuments; the ox was used both for food and agricultural labour; we have already noticed that it was employed both in ploughing and threshing. Swine were unclean beasts: goats were sacred only in some districts; but sheep, which are so important to modern farmers, occur very rarely.

Great attention was manifestly paid to the breeding and training of horses; they were used for drawing known, for agricultural labour. There is no example of a mounted cavalier, whence it may be inferred, that the use of the horse for riding was unknown in the palmy days of Egyptian civilization. The race of horses seems to belong to the noble breed, of which specimens are still found in the Valley of the Upper Nile and Dongola. In this part of husbandry the Egyptians were so superior, that they supplied war-steeds to foreign nations. It is recorded, that "they brought unto Solomon horses out of Egypt," 2 Chron. ix. 28, for the purpose of mounting his numerous cavalry. No description could convey an adequate notion of the fancy and splendour displayed in the harness and trappings of favourite steeds.

Mules and asses both occur; the latter are very different from the despised animals whose name is proverbially associated with stupidity. The Egyptian ass is a noble animal, inferior only to the horse, and was worthy of bearing the judges of Israel. Deborah's address, "Speak, ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment, and walk by the way," Judges v. 10, ceases to excite surprise at her thus designating the rulers of the people, when we behold how different the animals of which she speaks are from those with which we are familiar.

Camels are very rare, and we have found no example of the buffalo. Aviaries and poultry-yards are not uncommon; we have already said that ponds for water-fowl are the usual ornaments of every large garden.

A SABBATH IN NEW ZEALAND.

The following account is given by Mr Marshall, in his Personal Narrative of Two Visits to New Zealand.

THE pattering of rain upon the roof of my chamber, awoke me a little after the day dawn, and I arose refreshed in body and mind, to enjoy what for many, many months, I had scarce a single opportunity of enjoying apart from the society of men otherwise minded, communion and fellowship with God the Holy Ghost; where there was no eye but his to behold me, no ear but his to intercept my cry. It was a morning of blessedness, and a time of joy, with which those who are strangers to the covenant of promise cannot intramettle, and of which, alas! only those can have any conception, who are born again of water and the Holy Ghost, and re-begotten unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

We met round the breakfast table a large and happy family, consisting of Mr and Mrs Chapman, and several of the Missionaries' sons, whose education has been intrusted to Mr Chapman, and who are boarded in his house. Besides these, there were two who interested me very greatly: one, a little girl, the grandchild of the warrior 'Hongi, who is become, in a manner, missionary property, and, rescued from degradation of the lowest possible kind, perhaps, too, from murder, is now training up among Christians, will be instructed in wisdom and true knowledge, and by the divine grace and benediction, may yet adorn the Gospel of God by his Saviour. The other child was a boy, the son of a New Zealand mother, but having a profligate Englishman for his father, by whom he was deserted. Him Mr Chapman had adopted for his own, in the fond hope of being enabled to save him from the demoralising contagion of native habits, and, at the same time, to insure to him the privileges of a Christian education. After we had breakfasted, the custom of the family was followed, one of the Psalms being expounded to the boys every Lord's Day morning. During the meal-time the conversation had been such as might attract the attention of those young persons, and give them a desire to follow on to know the Lord. Family prayer succeeded this exposition, and at nine o'clock the village bell invited us to go up together to the house of prayer, and mingle with the great congregation.

The chapel at Paikia is extremely neat, I had almost said beautiful. It stands back from the road, in an inclosed square within the fence, on all sides of which the sweet brier forms an impervious hedge, and mixes its perfume with the breeze, thus scenting the pure atmosphere breathed by those who assemble on this spot to worship God; and seeing that Christians are said to be the trees of God's planting, excites the hope that every Christian in this land may raise around the place of his abiding a moral atmosphere both pure and perfumed, and be himself a sweet savour of Christ unto God, a savour of life unto life in them that are saved, and of death unto death in them that are lost. The only defect in this chapel is that it is too small to accommodate the united congregation of Europeans and natives. It has a well-toned hand-organ, which New Zealanders, as well as English, accompanied with their singing, and as its swelling notes came pealing on the ear, bringing with them the music of the "human voice divine," in loud and lofty bursts of praise to the High and Lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, and whose name is HOLY. It was difficult, notwithstanding the tattooed faces before me, to realize the fact that this was taking place on an island of cannibals, and that by far the greater number of the throng whose voices conspired to raise those songs of high religious joy, had been themselves, and that but a very few years before, all savages and all man-eaters.

The same devotional manner, the same appearance of fixed and deep attention, marked the native congregation here, as I had formerly observed at Waimate. And the mode of conducting the service did not very greatly differ, being conducted, for the most part, in the New Zealand tongue. One English lesson was read, and an English sermon also preached. These were rendered necessary by the many Europeans present, comprising the settlers with their families, and the families of the resident Missionaries. It was pleasing to hear that Mr Busby, by constant and unremitting attendance in his place in the church on every successive Lord's day, lends his official sanction to the sacred observance thereof; nor is it less pleasing to believe that all the really respectable settlers in the neighbourhood gladly avail themselves of the public means of grace which the English services at the mission-chapel afford them, especially as some of them come from a considerable distance, and have an arm of the sea to cross on their way. My prayer for all such is, that to the means of grace thus valued by them, may be added the hope of glory, which God vouchsafes to every one sincerely in search of him, and of his great salvation. The English discourse was on these words, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Rev. ii. 7. It was a calm, yet earnest—an affectionate, yet faithful address to the hearts and consciences of all present; and in it the preacher considered, 1st, Who are the parties called upon to hear; 2dly, Who the Spirit to be hearkened unto; 3dly, What the subject matter declared, this last including a description of character, "Him that overcometh," and a concomitant promise. In enlarging upon these several particulars, he carefully distinguished between the use and the abuse of the Christian privilege of hearing the words of God, explained what was meant by the Scripture expression of having an ear to hear, and pointed out by what means that ear could be made to hearken to the voice of the Lord the Spirit. He then exhibited the character, office, and person of the Holy Ghost, as the reprover of the world, the comforter of the Church, and the guide into all truth of as many as trust themselves to his teaching; shewed what has to be overcome, that it is sin, the world, and the devil; and how to overcome it, viz., by a lively faith in Christ maintained unto the end, steadfast and immovable. And, finally, he directed attention to the promised blessing as one that is beyond price, and in no degree admitting of comparison with any of the things of time or sense. In dismissing each separate head of discourse, a personal and practical application of the same was made to us who heard. During the delivery the natives kept their seats, engaged, for the most part, in silent perusal of the words of eternal life in their own tongue.

This service over, I went home with the Rev. H. Williams, and partook of a hasty dinner at his house, it being his wish that I should accompany him to the head of the Kana Kana, where there is a promising body of natives, who receive with meekness the engrafted word. The wind and tide were both in our favour, but some delay occurred through one of the natives refusing to go in the boat, although previously warned that he would be wanted to make up a crew. He was one of the many unbaptized persons who are suffered to remain in the missionary compound, and to avail themselves of the advantages of education to be obtained there, while they are willing to maintain a moral exterior, and careful not to infringe the rules observed by the Missionaries. They are found employment, and receive wages; but old inveterate habits, unsubdued by the working of new principles, refuse at times the restraints of mere law; and that stubbornness of their disposition which is the natural consequence of vicious indulgence in infancy, proves, on such occasions as the present, both a trial to the temper and a hinderance to the labours of the Missionary. The man was soon made ashamed of his conduct, and then evinced not a little chagrin at finding that his place was to be occupied by another.

The sail up the river was very pleasant, and carried us past the Pa of Pomare, of whom I regret to say, that every successive account becomes increasingly sad; his habits are grown so besotted, and his mode of living is so wretched, that his health and vigour of body are very sensibly impaired, and the powers of his mind so diluted by a course of incessant debauchery, as to leave him the merest tool in the hands of the designing men by whom he is surrounded. His Pa is frequently visited, sometimes by a Missionary, at other times by the native preachers; on these occasions the inhabitants are again and again entreated to turn from sin unto holiness, and from Satan unto God. But Pomare's ear can rarely be gained: surrounded by a set of the lowest and most debased Englishmen, they effectually deter him from taking any heed to the things that belong to his everlasting peace.

Idle Company.—I have often thought that, in the day when the eternal state of man is to be determined, the greater part of those that are lost will perish, not through any gross and scandalous iniquity, but through a deadness to God and his love, an ignorance of their own sinfulness, and, in consequence of that, through reigning pride and self-sufficiency. Now, the one great source of all these miserable disorders, or at least by which they are maintained and strengthened, is keeping much company with those whom the Scripture marks out as engaged in talk without sense; company, not with near relations or chosen friends; not with those for whom we have any real or sincere regard, but with those who come to see us, and we go to see them, only because the providence of God has brought us into one town. It is this that devours infinitely precious time, and engages us in mere trifling, when we otherwise should be drawing nigh to God, and growing rich in divine knowledge and grace.—VIGN. ## SACRED POETRY.

SALVATION.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM LAURENCE BROWN, D.D.,

Principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen.

How precious is the gift of God to men,—

A gift by far surpassing all desire,—

Surpassing every human tongue and pen,
And feebly chanted by the angelic quire !

O Holy Spirit ! pour celestial fire,

To warm my bosom with that holy love,

Which, every friend of Jesus, should inspire,
And bid him rise, and soar to climes above.

O ! could I only human bosoms move

To feel what for salvation's gift they owe,—

To feel what real joys they now may prove—

Which spurn each vile enjoyment here below !

O ! could the hearts of men but learn to glow

With fervours which become those, who, redeemed

By Jesus' blood, are snatched from guilt and woe,
And precious by the God of love esteemed.

For, since from heaven salvation's glory beamed,

What can demand such gratitude and praise ?

Can all on earth, of highest value deemed,

Excite such wonder, or such rapture raise ?

Where God to man, corrupted man, displays

The unsullied glory of the eternal throne,

The gloom of justice opes to mercy's rays,

And heaven to earth in reconciliation's shewn,

And peace and happiness from misery's stem are grown.

THE DIVINE OMNIPRESENCE.

THE cloud that guided Israel's host,

With twofold aspect rose ;

On them it beamed with brightest ray,—

Twas dark towards their foes.

God's omnipresence thus presents

Its shades of day and night ;

To sinners it is wrapt in gloom,—

To saints—all full of light.

Why shouldst thou tremble in his sight,

To whom the King of heaven

Hath stretched the sceptre of his grace,

The pledge thou art forgiven ?

Cast off thy fears, and let thy heart

Find courage in the thought,

That nowhere canst thou go, where God,

Thy heavenly friend, is not !

Amid "the busy hum of men"

He girds thee for thy toil ;

And in the shade of solitude

Revives thee with his smile.

He cheers the gloomy vale that bounds

Thy short and anxious race ;

And 'tis because He dwelleth there

That heaven's a blessed place.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Desire for Instruction.—Two youths from Owyhee, the largest of the Sandwich Islands, arrived in America in the year 1809. Their names were Henry Obookiah and Thomas Hopoo. The former narrowly escaped being killed with his father, in one of the sanguinary conflicts then so common among those savage tribes. He was spared only on account of his youth. His uncle was a priest in one of the idol temples, and taught him every morning to repeat very long prayers. After he arrived in America, he was found one evening at the door of the College of Newhaven, weeping. When asked why he wept, he replied, "Because nobody gives me learning." Some pious gentlemen placed him at school, where he made great proficiency in learning. He was able to understand English as soon as he could read it. About a year after his arrival in America, he was overheard to pray in private, as follows : "Great and eternal God—make heaven—make earth—make every thing—have mercy on me—make me understand the Bible—make me good ! Great God, have mercy on Thomas—make him good—make Thomas and me go back Owyhee—tell folks in Owyhee no more pray to stone god—make some good man go with me to Owyhee, tell folks in Owyhee about heaven—about hell ! God make all people good every where—make all good !" He made great proficiency in learning, and gratefully rejoiced in the advantages he enjoyed.—Thomas was nearly washed overboard while on his voyage to America. He also received instruction with avidity, and was desirous that hereafter he might employ the information he had acquired for the benefit of his countrymen.

The early Days of Matthew Henry.—Matthew Henry, the excellent son of an excellent father, was subject, when a child, to repeated indispositions, which, notwithstanding, were so ordered and limited by a kind Providence, as neither to impair his great capacity for learning, nor prevent him from making rapid improvement. He was able to read very distinctly in the Bible when only three years old, making suitable observations on what he read ; and, indeed, as one of his near relations, and the companion of his youth, declares, he very early put away childish things. When he was ten years old, the time from which he dated his effectual calling, he was visited with a lingering fever, which brought him so very low, that his death was every day expected. This was a great trial of the faith and patience of his good parents. His father, who used to say, "Weeping must not hinder sowing," was obliged to go out to a place at some distance to preach the Gospel, and left his son very ill ; but he felt, that he must be about his Father's business. On his return, he found matters much as he had left them—his son, his only son, whom he loved, in extreme danger. There was then at his house, a good old gentlewoman, the widow of the Rev. Zachary Thomas, helping and comforting them under this affliction. Mr Philip Henry told them, "At such a place and time upon the road, I did most solemnly, truly, and deliberately, resign up my dear child unto God, to do what he pleased with him and me." Mrs Thomas replied, "And I believe, Sir, at that place and time, God gave him back to you again." It is certain, that after this he speedily recovered.

THE SOLID FOUNDATION OF THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

BY THE REV. THOMAS ROSS, LL. D.,

THE remarkable singularity of the lives of the first Christians must have frequently induced an inquiry into the motives of their conduct. Their heathen neighbours could not but behold with wonder, the holy, temperate, self-denied deportment of these extraordinary persons; for they thought it strange, that they ran not with them into the same excess of riot. They must have observed, besides, that these persons, whose lives were so unblameable and pure, were often subjected to the most cruel treatment, even to death in its most ignominious and excruciating forms. They saw them, too, submit to their sufferings with an astonishing patience, meekness, and fortitude, and meet the most formidable approaches of death not only without alarm, but even with calm composure, and often with transports of joy; all for the sake of certain articles of faith, with which was connected the hope of some future happiness, and not one of which the most tremendous sufferings could force them to renounce. These things would naturally have excited the curiosity of some, the sympathy of others, and the serious feelings, perhaps of not a few, to inquire into the nature and foundation of this extraordinary principle. And to every one of these, as well as to the rulers and magistrates, who, in their official capacity, should interrogate them, the Christians were commanded to be always ready to give a distinct and satisfactory answer.

The object, or the substance, of a Christian's hope, is beautifully expressed by the apostle, when he calls it the hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved for them in heaven. This implies the hope of the immortality of the soul, of the second coming of Christ, of the resurrection of the body, of a general judgment, and of salvation with eternal glory. This is the hope which Christianity inspires, and of which every Christian is required to be ready always to assign a reason. Yet, is it not a melancholy fact, that, notwithstanding the importance of the matter, and the express command of the Spirit of God, there are many persons amongst us who are totally ignorant on this interesting subject—many who have not the hope of the Gospel in them, and who have never inquired after its nature or its object—many who choose to be called Christians, merely because Christianity is the professed religion of the land—who attend its external ordinances, merely because their fathers did so before them—and who, in the folly and ignorance of their minds, attach the rewards of the Gospel to such an unmeaning service?

But some will say, perhaps, "We cherish the hope of other Christians, and expect eternal salvation as well as they." And have you ever duly considered the object of the Christian's hope? its glorious nature, its infinite importance, and the manner of its attainment? It is not an earthly possession,—it is an heavenly inheritance; it is not worldly riches, and honours, and power,—it is a crown of glory which fadeth not away; it is not the capricious favour of an earthly sovereign,—it is the eternal enjoyment of the God of heaven. Do you profess to cherish this hope? and would you trust the attainment of its object to vague conjecture, or risk its forfeiture by indifference and neglect? You would not act so imprudent a part in any worldly concern, though of infinitely inferior moment. Incur not, then, the charge of such egregious folly, where eternal happiness or misery is at stake. On what foundation, then, permit me to inquire, do you thus rest the hope of everlasting glory? Is it on the mercy of God? a sure, immovable foundation, if you can make it yours, but, at the same time, a foundation on which many have made shipwreck of their souls. Are you then sure that God is merciful? You startle at the question. But let me tell you that there was a time when Adam apprehended not that amiable attribute in the character of God. Where, then, have you obtained this heavenly knowledge? On what authority do you believe the interesting fact? From what source have you derived the important information? Was it from the light of nature? No! This light, indeed, affords the most magnificent display of wisdom, power, and goodness; but of mercy it yields no cheering indications. On the con-condition of man? Is not this whole world a dismal scene of vicissitude, and disappointment, and vexation of spirit? Are not all mankind acting in it, exposed to incessant labour, and toil, and suffering, and at last to death? And do these circumstances contain any indications of mercy in the Sovereign Ruler? Do they not rather prove that the curse of God hangs over the present state of humanity, and that, for aught that the light of nature shows to the contrary, this curse is executed in its utmost rigour? From this source, then, we draw no comfortable evidence of the divine mercy,—no rational foundation can we lay of pleasing hope.

But you will say, no doubt, "We do not wish to trust in vague conjecture, but draw our views of divine mercy from the unerring light of revelation, and rest our hopes of glory on the sacred oracles of truth. Has not God, in his infallible Word, proclaimed his name to be 'The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth?' Has he not again declared, in the most solemn manner, saying, 'As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live?' And has he not invited sinners to come to him with the most gracious promises of mercy and of pardon, saying, 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon?' On such clear and positive declarations, we trust that we can build our hopes with safety."

So far, indeed, you seem to promise well. But if you would erect a fair and lasting edifice on the ground of Scripture, you must take care to search it deep, and take it as a whole; for if you rest on partial views, and parts detached, you may be likened to the "foolish man, who built his house upon the sand: and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it." Does not that same Scripture, which proclaims the name of the Lord merciful and gracious, at the same time declare, that he will by no means clear the guilty? Does not that same Scripture, which declares that the Lord has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, with equal solemnity affirm, "the soul that sinneth, it shall die?" Further, do not the Sacred Scriptures represent God as of purer eyes than to behold evil, and as not able to look on iniquity; as having prescribed a law to his intelligent creatures, and denounced an awful curse on every violation of it, saying, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them;" and as having "revealed his wrath from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men?" Thus we see that the Sacred Scriptures, however graciously explicit in regard to the mercy of God, are no less awfully

It is even proper in this place to observe, that if, independently of revelation, mankind could have conceived any idea of mercy in the divine character, they ought, from the belief of that attribute, to have inferred the absolute justice of the divine administration, and the indispensable necessity of the punishment of guilt. For, mercy being favour shown to the guilty, it implies in its very nature the existence of a law, without the violation of which no guilt can possibly be contracted; and the existence of a law, infers the existence of a lawgiver,—and in the present instance, of a lawgiver, whose glorious perfections must be the unerring rule of his conduct, and the sole foundation of morals. Hence it appears that, if God (I speak with reverence) should deviate from justice, in the smallest possible instance, he would, from that moment, become incapable of conferring mercy. For, the slightest deviation from justice, being a manifest infringement of the law;—the least infringement on the part of the lawgiver, is clearly subversive of its authority—destructive of its very essence;—and it is most evident that, when the authority of the law is destroyed, there can be no more transgression on the part of the creature—no more mercy on the part of the Creator. In one word, God will as soon cease to exist, as he will cease to be holy, just, and true:—and consequently, unless you know how his mercy may be extended to the sinner, in full consistency with all the fair demands of truth, of holiness, and justice, you can possess no rational hope of salvation—you can assign no satisfying reason for the hope which you profess to cherish.

Surely, then, this interesting subject deserves the trouble of investigation—for who would rest the concerns of an eternal existence, on a foundation on which no prudent man would build the slightest worldly advantage? Blessed be God! who has not left us without the means of substantial information on a point so dear to us; but who has revealed to us, in his infallible Word, a scheme of salvation, equally worthy of his glorious perfections, as suited to our deplorable circumstances—a scheme in which "mercy and truth are met together: righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Truth shall spring out of the earth: and righteousness shall look down from heaven." This is a scheme by which, in the triumphant language of a multitude of the heavenly host, glory redounds to God in the highest, and on earth is proclaimed peace, good-will towards men. Let us then search the sacred oracles with diligence and prayer, for a rational and safe account of the plan of our salvation—remembering that "this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and that men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."

In the sacred oracles we find that God, whose character is love, having foreseen the apostasy, and consequent misery, of man, resolved not to suffer him to perish without hope; but graciously said (having previously found an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness,) "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom,"—that he accordingly laid help upon one that is mighty: and exalted one chosen out of the people; in other words, that he found out, and appointed to the office of our Saviour, one who is qualified to act as mediator between God and man—one who was able to bear the curse of the divine law, denounced against transgression—to make an atonement for the sins of men—thus to repair the breach which subsisted between God and his offending creatures, and to obtain eternal redemption for sinners—"God so loving the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." There we find that the ever-blessed Son of God, in conformity to the will of the Father, undertook the redemption of perishing man, even at the expense of his own humiliation, suffering, and death—saying, "sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required. Then said I, lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me: I delight to do thy will, O my God."—That, in order to execute this purpose of love, he who was "in the form of God, and thought it not robbery to be equal with God," in due time, "made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men,"—that in the nature and room of man who sinned, he magnified the divine law by a most perfect obedience; and by his sufferings even unto death, answered all the demands of justice, being wounded for our transgressions, and braised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace being laid upon him, and by his stripes we being healed,—that the Lord is well-pleased for his righteousness' sake, of which he has given the clearest evidence, in having raised him from the dead on the third day, and in having shed abroad the miraculous influences of his Holy Spirit on the disciples, according to the prediction of our Lord,—and finally, that the promise and oath of God are pledged, that whosoever cometh to him by faith in the blood of the Saviour, shall in no wise be rejected, but shall receive the pardon of sin, the gift of the Holy Spirit, and salvation with eternal glory. Accordingly, the apostle, in addressing the wondering Jews, after performing the miraculous cure on the lame man, tells them that the cure was effected, not by any power or holiness inherent in him or his fellow-apostle, but solely through faith in the name of Jesus; and exhorts them, saying, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." And on the following day, being summoned before the great council of the nation, to answer for preaching to the people in the name of Jesus, far from going about to deny the offensive deed, he boldly tells the high-priest, the rulers, and elders, and scribes, "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which was set at nought by you builders, which has become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Such is the scheme of salvation which is revealed in the Sacred Scriptures—such was the foundation of the hope of the early Christians—of that hope which animated them in duty, which supported them in the midst of sufferings, and enabled them to triumph over the terrors of the grave.

THE HISTORY OF A DEAF AND DUMB BOY.

THE subject of my history was a boy as dear to me as ever was a child to its parents. A year and a-half has scarcely passed since I saw him depart to be with Christ; and often do I look back with thankful wonder on his short but happy life, his slow and painful, yet most joyful death: and then I look forward to the period when, through the blood and righteousness of that Saviour whom he so dearly loved, I hope to meet my precious charge in the mansions of glory.

John B— was deaf and dumb. His parents were poor people in a very humble rank of life, and had no means of affording any instruction to their child, whose situation seemed to shut him out from all hope of it. They had one son, a few years older than John, and four daughters. Living in the suburbs of a county town in the south of Ireland, and subsisting on the produce of two cows, with what the father and the eldest son might occasionally earn by working in the fields, they were, of course, very poor. But I was glad to find that they did not consider poverty to be an excuse for vice; and John's mother remarked to me, "Though we could teach our child no good, we have kept him from learning any evil, and have never suffered him to play about the streets with bad children. We watched over him: we could do no more."

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in applying one of his beautiful parables, said, "To him that hath, it shall be given;" and so it proved to the parents of the dumb boy. They did what they could in protecting their child from evil example; and God, in his own time, sent another to teach him that good which they had no means of communicating.

John B— was brought to me by a little companion, also deaf and dumb, towards the close of a cold day in October 1823. He was then more than eleven years old, but looked scarcely nine. His aspect was remarkably mild and engaging, combining the simplicity of an infant with a great deal of respectful modesty. He was poorly clad, but very clean; and when his little bare feet had made acquaintance with the warm hearth-rug before my fire, and a good many wistful looks into my face had convinced him that he had found a friend, he became exceedingly well pleased with his new situation. New, indeed, it was to him; for I afterwards found that he had never before seen a carpeted room, nor any thing superior to the contents of his father's cabin; and I well remember his mounting a chair to peep through what he supposed to be a window, a looking-glass, and falling down in affright at suddenly beholding the reflection of his own face in the mirror.

understanding was concerned. He had, indeed, been taught to bow down before a crucifix, and to the pictures and images that adorned the altar of the Roman Catholic chapel; but this only puzzled him; for, as he afterwards told me, he saw that they were made of wood and paper, and that he was better than they, because, though he could not hear or speak, he could both walk and see, whereas they could neither speak, hear, see, nor walk. Of course he paid no honour to them; nor had any idea entered his mind of the existence of a Supreme Being. In proof of this, one of the first questions that he contrived to put to me, was, whether I made the sun and moon.

It would be impossible to trace the steps by which I was enabled to convey to him the grand truth that there existed One, far above, out of his sight, more dazzling than the orb of day, who had made that orb, and all the objects on which he so delighted to gaze: the starry heavens, the rivers, the hills and vales, the green grass, and all that walked upon it, the birds and the butterflies, the gliding fish, and all that people the universe. It was when he first laid hold on this reality, that his mind seemed to be truly born; it evidently filled the vacuum in his spirit, threw a sunshine over all his contemplations, and so richly was the love of God shed abroad in his heart, by the Holy Ghost, that I have no hesitation in saying he valued every enjoyment, even down to the most ordinary comfort and convenience of life, more as the gift of his Creator, than because of the gratification which he personally derived from it.

But still my dumb boy was only an amiable deist, in his comprehension of the divine nature; and I was well aware that he might thus live and die, and perish everlastingly for lack of saving knowledge. He had, hitherto, no conviction of his own sinfulness; to the need, the offices, the name of a Saviour, he was a stranger; and before he had acquired sufficient skill in language to express or to comprehend the shortest sentence, I was alarmed by seeing symptoms of severe illness, at a time when typhus fever was raging around us. I had already taken him to reside under our roof, for more constant opportunity of instruction; but writing occupied a large portion of my time; and, as I have said, my teaching was directed rather to his heart than his head, in the prospect of a speedy separation.

I now saw that not a day was to be lost in giving him the Gospel, the message of reconciliation, through the atoning blood of our crucified Redeemer.

The way to this memorable conversation was opened, whilst I was secretly praying that the Lord would point it out, by expressing some curiosity as to what became of people whom he had seen carried past to their burial. He signified that their eyes were shut very close, would they ever open them again?

Upon this I threw down my needle-work, and bespeaking, by a sign, his most serious attention, I sketched, upon a paper, a crowd of persons of all ages, and near them a large pit, with flames issuing from it. I told him that the crowd contained him, me, every body; that all were bad; that God was angry; and all must be cast into that fiery gulf. He exhibited great dismay, and anxiously looked for further explanation. I then drew a single figure, who came, I told him, from heaven; that being God's Son, he asked his Father not to throw those people into the fire, and consented to be nailed to a cross to die; and that when his head dropped in death, the pit was shut up, and the people saved. It may well be supposed that I greatly doubted the possibility that such a representation, explained only by signs, should convey any clear idea to the boy's mind; but it is God's will, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe; and I had immediate inasmuch as it proved that he had laid hold on the grand doctrine of substitution. He observed that the sufferer on the cross was but one; that the ransomed crowd were many, very many; and he signified his doubt of God being satisfied with the exchange. The Lord still helped me; I took off my ring, laying it by myself on the table, and then breaking, into many pieces, the leaves and stalks of some decayed flowers in a jar, I heaped them near it, asking, with a smile, which he would have, the one piece of gold, or the many withered fragments? Never shall I forget his look, the beautiful, the brilliant look of sudden apprehension, the laugh of delight, the repeated clapping of his hands, while he declared, by animated signs, that the single piece of gold was better than a room full of old flowers; that the former was like him on the cross; the latter like men, women, and children; and he spelled, most exultingly, "One! One!" Then, with his countenance softening into the loveliest expression of grateful reverence, he looked up, saying, "Good, good One," and ran for the letters to learn to spell his name,—that adorable name which is above every name,—that name of Jesus at which every knee shall bow—I taught him to spell, and then I told him how Jesus Christ was laid in the grave; how, on the third morning, he burst its bars; how he rose to the Father, and would also raise him and me from the dead; and, finally, I assured him that Jesus Christ could see and hear us always; that we might talk to him constantly, and hereafter be with him in heaven.

I should have remarked that, when showing John the pit of flames, I paused to convince him that he, for one, had made God angry; he freely confessed it, by sorrowful looks and gestures, but most vehemently denied that God could be angry with me. Thus he was clearly brought acquainted with the plague of his own heart; and not the slightest objection did he make to the justice of a dreadful sentence against him. This struck me the more, because he was exceedingly jealous of his own rights and reputation, never resting for a moment under any supposed invasion of either; yet he had nothing to reply against God; he tacitly acknowledged his guiltiness, and—it was a most glorious proof of divine teaching,—the love of God, even in delivering his own Son to a cruel death. I saw, with unutterable and overflowing joy, that my poor boy received Jesus Christ as his Saviour; and never, from that happy hour to the moment of his death, did he seem to doubt his interest in the atonement. So beautifully did he realize the apostle's declaration, "Ye are bought with a price," that, without ever knowing those words, he took them for the rule of his life, and found the principles conveyed in them a safeguard against sin in every form; that is to say, sin had not the dominion over him; he hated sin, he dreaded it, he fought against it, often with tears and prayers, and that in matters which would be deemed by many of very slight importance.

I will give one illustration before I quit this part of the subject, merely remarking that the same holy and heavenly wisdom guided him under every temptation. He had a great abhorrence of drunkenness; and, to avoid the beginnings of such a sin, he resolved, with my hearty concurrence, never to taste strong drink of any kind.

On one occasion, about four years after he came to me, he was sent with a note to a friend's house, and, while waiting for the answer, he was pressed to take a glass of wine by a young gentleman, who had resolved to overcome his scruples; the lad refused, but was more importunately urged to take it. His rejection became more firm and emphatic as his thoughtless friend more resolutely persevered, until the latter seized him by the collar, drew his head back, and poured the wine into his lips. In this emergency John set his teeth so firmly that scarcely a drop could pass them, and the contents of the glass ran down over a pretty waistcoat which I had just made for him, and which he highly valued. He said nothing, but buttoned his coat, and returned with the letter; then told me what had passed, showed the stains, and with an exulting smile, concluded by remarking that his waistcoat was spoiled, but God was not angry, for John was not drunk. When adverting to it afterwards, he said that God had made his teeth, and the devil could not get the wine through them.

I have already said that it is not now my purpose to write John's history, and I shall pass over the seven years during which he walked with God on earth blameless, and without rebuke; a silent lovely light, shining among men, so as to compel many to glorify his heavenly Father. Throughout the protracted sufferings of a most lingering decline, the arm of Jehovah sustained him, strengthening him with strength in his soul, and bowing his will into the most filial, most cheerful resignation. Jesus Christ was the theme of his discourse, daily and hourly, in the season of health; and afterwards, when writhing under severe tortures, the sight of which drew tears from me, he would look up in my face with a sweet smile, and tell me that Jesus Christ loved him. Of the effects of this love he had an extraordinary view, which he described to me very soon after he had been brought acquainted with his Saviour; and he repeated it with excessive delight, even at the time when death had actually seized his prey, and below the knees neither warmth nor pulsation remained. It was this: that God had a very large book, on the top of one page bearing the name of John B——, below which were written a great many things wherein John had made the Lord exceedingly angry; that on rising from the grave, God would call him, in an awful manner, to stand before him, while he opened this book, and turned to the page in question; but that though he would hold it close to the sun, yet he could not read one word that had been written, because—and here his face used to kindle and glow with indescribable animation—because when John prayed to Jesus Christ, he took that book, and, passing his "red hand" over the page, left nothing visible there but the blood which had flowed from his palm, when pierced by the nails on Calvary. This thought was his solace through life, and evidently illumined the dark valley of the shadow of death. The possibility of escaping hell otherwise than by the intervention of "Jesus Christ's red hand" would have appeared to him a mockery; and to doubt of Christ's redeeming love to his own soul, I think he would have considered a very deep crime. All have not the full assurance of faith; and I never saw or heard of any instance where it existed so triumphantly as in John B——; while, to the praise of the glory of divine grace be it repeated, that he who clung as a helpless, condemned sinner, to the unmerited love of a ransoming Saviour, was a wonder to all who knew him, for the unblemished purity of his life and conversation.

Every morning, without exception, at the time of family worship, a separate and solemn prayer was offered up for the divine help and blessing on his education; while the sight of the dear dumb boy kneeling beside us, touched our hearts, and put an earnestness into our supplications, which will long be remembered by those who joined in them.

For seven years and a-half, this daily prayer ascended; and precious indeed was the answer vouchsafed; most precious at last, when those cold and clammy hands were exerted to the utmost of their failing strength, to spell on, and to tell me the happy story, how Jesus Christ loved poor John, and how John was going to see the dear "red hand," and to sing with angels for ever. Many a tear had I shed over him during those years; tears of anxiety, of disappointment, of unbelief—almost of despair; but the tears that fell beside his dying couch, were those of unutterable happiness, for I saw the work finished; and my own experience told me that it was the Lord's alone, though he had deigned to carry it on by the instrumentality of my weak hand.

I never shall forget the incredulous smile with which John's father consented to my giving his little dumb boy a lesson every day in reading; nor the grateful tears that flowed when, six months afterwards, both parents said to me, "Take our child; he is more yours than ours, for you have made him a different creature. If you left him now, he would die; he could not bear to live in his ignorance again."

I have frequently been much moved by the animated and feeling descriptions that my dear boy gave of this state of unwilling ignorance. He told me that he used to watch the motion of the sun, moon, and stars—the growth of plants, and the various natural appearances which bespeak the hand of an overruling power, until his tears had flowed, because he could not comprehend the cause of all. But nothing appears to occasion such distressing perplexity to a deaf mute, as the death and burial of his fellow-creatures. The change produced on countenances which used to smile on him—the icy coldness, and total insensibility of the frame; the act of screwing down a coffin lid over it, and of depositing that coffin deep beneath earth's surface, with the solemn act of worship accompanying it; all these are terribly and awfully exciting to him, more especially when he is made to comprehend, by some associate, that his turn will also come; that he, too, must be enclosed in a long box, and deposited in a deep pit, far from the cheerful light, and from all that now helps to gladden his solitary existence.

I never beheld any thing so striking as the avidity with which my poor John caught at the first intimation of a future resurrection from the dead. It evidently removed from his mind a most oppressive weight of anxious doubt. And I think that I may safely assert, that during more than seven years following, scarcely as many days passed, on which he did not refer to it with delight.

SKETCH OF THE
OF THE ANCIENT CULDEES.

No. I.

BY THE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON,
Dunnielen.

HAVING in two former numbers detailed the leading incidents in the life of Columba, "the apostle of the Highlands," and touched upon some of the distinguishing features of his character, we propose to devote this Sketch to an examination of the history and peculiarities of the ancient Culdees of Iona, as forming the second link in the chain of Scottish Ecclesiastical History.

We can scarcely suppose that it will be uninteresting or unprofitable to peruse a narrative of the exertions of a body of men, who, in the midst of growing degeneracy, long preserved their purity of doctrines and morals untarnished;—who, in the midst of growing indolence among the priesthood, continued to labour unweariedly in their Master's service;—and who, when the chains of an impure and imperious Popery had enthralled the mental and spiritual liberties of Europe, ceased not, from their distant inlet home,

"Plac'd far amid the melancholy main,"

"to witness a good confession," and to make a sturdy and unyielding resistance to a tyranny, which succeeded indeed in extirpating, but not in subduing them. To every lover of "pure and undefiled religion," their history can scarcely fail to be interesting,—but more especially to the Scottish Protestant it possesses attractions of a peculiar nature; inasmuch, as it records the early triumphs and struggles of primitive Christianity in his own land; inasmuch, as it claims for the priesthood of Scotland a proud, because a pure superiority, in every point most noble, both of faith and of practice, and displays, on their part, a career of indefatigable exertion, accompanied, through the Divine blessing, by a success unparalleled since the triumphs of the apostolic age.

It is a matter of uncertainty to whom the credit of instituting the Culdee system is due, or in what country it took its rise. The origin of the very name is disputed. Some profess to trace Culdeism back to the very primitive ages of Christianity, while others ascribe its institution to Columba, about the middle of the sixth century. There does not, indeed, appear notice of any distinct associated body of Christians, holding the tenets, and cultivating the manners of the Culdees, prior to the age of Columba; and, therefore, there is a strong probability, that under his auspices first, they were formed into a regularly constituted society; yet, does not this, in the least, militate against the supposition, that the purity of faith and the simplicity of worship which they practised, were introduced into Ireland many ages before; nor does it disprove their own assertion, that the Apostle John had communicated to their forefathers, "those things most surely believed among them."

It suits not our purpose to inquire into the accuracy of the opinions relative to the time and place of their nativity as a body; it is to their history, as a religious society in our own land, that we wish to draw attention; and as it was only after the arrival of Columba in Scotland, and his establishment in Iona, that we have any evidence of their existence, or details of their exertions, we will consider that event as the era of their institution, and that venerable man as the founder of the body.

Regarding Culdeism, therefore, as instituted by this primitive missionary, and its different branches throughout Scotland as under his training whilst he lived, we will pass over so much of the early history of the system, as was touched upon previously, in our sketch of the history and character of Columba; and proceed to glance at the peculiarities in the social constitution and doctrinal views of the body, before detailing the history of their proselytizing labours and their subsequent fate.

The doctrinal opinions of Columba appear to have possessed much of the purity of the apostolic age of Christianity; and his successors seem to have kept fast hold of this noble feature of distinction, even after the moral and religious atmosphere of the Christian world had been contaminated by the pestilence of Papal supremacy. For although Popery had established its sway, and although much that was impure, and more that was absurd, had become inwoven into its texture, as part of the creed by which its votaries were to be regulated;—although, we say, Europe had thus stooped to receive the degrading fetters of a foul and foolish superstition;—in Scotland its ascendancy was long checked by the firm intrepidity of the Culdees; nor did the Papal power, while rearing its throne in Scotland, find any engine, except its favourite instruments of unprincipled duplicity, and exterminating persecution, sufficient for quenching their zeal in the cause of truth, or quieting their struggles in defence of religious freedom.

Columba had, from the first, recommended to his disciples THE WORD OF GOD as the great rule of faith. It was to be their only infallible director; to it they were to refer in all their difficulties; by it they were to abide in all their decisions; it was to be the source of all their knowledge; and however numerous and diversified might be the channels whereby the streams of this knowledge were to be communicated, yet were the holy Scriptures ever to be regarded as the great well-spring, whence the refreshing waters should emanate: Even Bede, when he censures them for their non-conformity to the Romish ritual, admits that "Columba and his disciples would receive those things only which are contained in the writings of the prophets, evangelists, and apostles; diligently observing the works of piety and virtue."

It was this rigid adherence to a one infallible standard, which, coupled with a determined opposition to the grasping ambition of the Romish Church, led in the end to their overthrow; and an honourable overthrow it was, seeing it was endured in defence of that "faith once delivered to the saints!" An overthrow which was preferred to an acknowledgment of such unscriptural innovations as the doctrine of the Real Presence, the idolatrous worship of saints, prayers for the dead, the doctrine of good works as opposed to justification by faith, the infallibility of the Pope, absolution, confession, and others of the Romish tenets, which they resisted with a faithfulness and a firmness, that extorted, even from their adversaries, a tardy testimony to their zeal, their prudence, their piety, and their learning.

But not only did the Culdees differ from the votaries of the Romish Church in these most vital points of faith and doctrine, they also dissented from them on the subject of ecclesiastical discipline, and in their habits as a body of Christian teachers. They disclaimed all right, on the part of the Papal chair, to interfere with their management, or form of government; and adhered, in their capacity as members of the same order, to none of the unsocial restrictions of a monastic rule.

The system of Monachism must have originated in one of two sources; either the gratification of selfish and morbid feelings in a life of seclusion; or the aggrandisement of a body, by rendering every member of that body, in all their feelings, and in all their substance, as "part and parcel" of that society. The founder of the Culdee system had formed too correct views of human nature, and of the duty of men as social beings, not to perceive that such a line of conduct was very far indeed from being the best fitted for the practice of the Christian virtues, and farther still from being the most beneficial for advancing the interests of society at large. Far, therefore, from cloistering themselves in some retreat, whence they could look forth, in frigid unconcern, upon the doings and actings of their fellows; and far from refusing to bear their part in the trials and vicissitudes of life, or to share in its delights; far from confining that love which they owed to the wide brotherhood of the human family, within the limited circle of a monastic fraternity; far from thus sacrificing an ordained duty to a fanatic passion for the aggrandisement of the order to which they belonged, (a practice which, in whatever age or country it has obtained prevalence, has tended to the disruption of all natural and social compacts, and, in the end, to the blighting of every noble and pure sentiment;) far, we say, from acting on such narrow principles, the Culdees laboured for their own subsistence, mingled with their fellow-men in terms of a manly equality, went in and out among their flocks, uprearing no fictitious barrier to exclude the vulgar gaze, and assuming no air of arrogant superiority to protect their sanctity: like other men, they possessed property, and holding the common rites in respect, they bequeathed this property to their descendants, discountmancing the practice, common in monastic institutions, of throwing the property of each individual member into the common treasury of the monastery, in order thereby to swell the authority of the particular establishment, and strengthen its facilities for working evil. In short, the Culdees performed all the ordinary duties of useful members of society; and possessed, as far as we can perceive, no point of character in common with the usual Popish seminaries, except this very general one, that each of their establishments formed a religious order, residing within the same walls, united by the same bonds, and observing the same rule. This rule, said to have been composed by Columba himself, was styled THE RULE OF IONA; "but," to use the words of Dr Jamieson, "although it appears that the Culdees used a certain institute, yet, in the accounts given of them, we cannot overlook this remarkable distinction betwixt them and those which are properly called monastic, that they were not associated for the purpose of obeying this rule."

Each of the separate Culdee establishments comprehended twelve brethren. Columba's chosen associates, limited probably in imitation of the apostolic college, amounted to that number; and his disciples seem to have continued the same practice, from respect to their founder. These twelve brethren were superintended by an abbot, or principal of the college, selected by themselves, generally out of their own number, according as the age, learning, or labours of any of the members entitled him to the dignity; but, at a later period, the office seems, in some instances, to have been retained in hereditary succession.

Considerable warmth has been displayed in the discussion which has arisen betwixt those, on the one hand, who attempt to trace the leading features of Presbyterianism, in the ecclesiastical policy of the Culdees; and those, on the other, who, holding the principles of Prelacy, maintain, that the heads of the establishment at Iona and the other Culdee colleges, exercised the rights, and possessed the authority, of Diocesan Bishops. Our object does not require that we enter into such a controversy. We may, however, remark, that while it is true that the term bishop is often applied to the heads of the Culdee colleges, yet does there appear equally little doubt, that whatever the character and influence of these bishops may have been, they must have been divested of some of the most important and sacred functions which are now the exclusive prerogatives of Diocesan Bishops. We have it affirmed, that the principal of the Culdee college at Iona was always a Presbyter abbot, in imitation of the status of the founder of the order; and this Presbyter abbot evidently exercises ecclesiastical jurisdiction, not over the districts in the neighbourhood of Iona merely, but over all the Culdee churches throughout Scotland. Nay, we find that even the separate establishment which, at a subsequent period, was instituted at Lindisfarne, and the other Culdee colleges in England, were dependent on the parent institution, in doctrine and discipline, although the distance and difficulty of communication did not admit of very frequent intercourse. This superiority, however, which was possessed by the establishment of Iona over all the rest, seems to have been claimed and admitted only because of the superior antiquity and rank of that establishment, and because it had been the source whence all the others had emanated; besides, the authority seems, in no degree, to have been exercised by the Presbyter abbot of Iona, as an individual possessed of that dignity by right of his office, but by the body of seniors or Presbyters with their abbot at their head, in whose name all the decisions of the assembled college were executed, but who exercised no authority which was not previously sanctioned, or rather ordained, by the council of his brethren. Moreover, it seems pretty clear, that the right of ordination also was vested, not in the abbot, but in the council, who only may have commissioned their moderator to bestow it; for we find one of their number stating, that the principles which he held were "received from his elders, who sent him thither as a bishop;" so that, if the Culdee government was really Episcopal, it presents two most unaccountable anomalies, the one of the bishops themselves receiving their ordination from persons unqualified to bestow it, and the other of these bishops continuing for centuries subject to a body of inferior functionaries.

Perhaps some of the darkness that overhangs the question might be removed, by the very natural supposition, that in the later ages of Culdeism, the presidents of the different colleges might be styled by a title then become very general, and to which, as being a scriptural term, they could advance no valid objection. From this the early Popish writers may have argued the similarity between the Culdee form of church government and their own; while Prelatic writers of a purer faith, may unwittingly have adopted the same argument; but affording thereby, no stronger evidence of the primitive establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, from the fact of the term bishop being used as descriptive of the principles of the Culdee colleges, than they do of the divine origin and authority of Diocesan bishops, from the term bishop or overseer being one of frequent occurrence in the New Testament.

The chief employment of the Culdee ecclesiastics comprehended two departments, preaching and teaching,—the one intended to disseminate the truths of the Gospel among the community, through the instrumentality of the public services of the sanctuary, the other, to inculcate its precepts, in private, upon the minds of their people; and especially, to train up the youth, both in the knowledge of the Christian faith and of useful learning, in order that "the Lord might have a seed to serve him, when the existing generation had passed away;" and by this mean, especially, they hoped to accomplish much, because they perceived it to be a much easier task to train the youthful mind to the knowledge and practice of the Christian virtues, than to eradicate the rank crop of vices from the heart of those who had been born and bred amid the mummies of a Pagan superstition.

The fruits that succeeded these exertions of the Culdees, leave no doubt of the ardour and faithfulness of the labourers. The Christianization of almost all North Britain, as well as a great part of England, is amply confirmatory of their assiduity as preachers of the Word; while the celebrity of the school of Iona, throughout Europe, testifies to their activity and success in the cause of education.

We are not able to ascertain the extent of learning embraced by the Culdee course of education; but there are many reasons which would induce us to consider it as neither meagre nor confined. We know that, in addition to the knowledge of theology which Columba possessed, he was also well skilled in law and physic; and while the first of these would undoubtedly form the primary branch in his system of education, it is very likely from the acquaintance with the other sciences, which their master possessed, would also be communicated to his disciples, and that these would form distinct and important branches in that course of education enjoined by him. Traces, indeed, of the medical skill possessed by the Culdees, have continued to exist in the districts adjacent to Iona, being preserved in families, and handed down from generation to generation, until a period comparatively modern; and it is probable that the acquaintance which the Culdee fathers possessed with the science of legislation, may have served in no small degree to account for the rapidity of their success, by its recommending them to the favourable notice of the illiterate governors of a barbarian country.

The belief, also, which has long existed in reference to the extent and value of the library of Iona, is itself no slight evidence of the eminence which its possessors had attained in literature and science. Much, indeed, that has been said upon the subject may be regarded as fabulous, still the belief was too general, and the evidence too systematic, to admit of any doubt regarding the fact of its existence, although its value and extent may both have been over-rated. Its utter disappearance is, indeed, a strange circumstance, but far from sufficient to invalidate the declarations affirmative of its existence, especially if we take into consideration the many changes which befell the monastery, and the many hostile visitations to which it was subjected. For, supposing that some of the relics of its ancient learning had remained until a date posterior to the ruthless ravages of the Danish barbarians, and the relentless enmity of England's first Edward, yet is it most probable that the monks who inhabited Iona at the era of the Reformation, would, on their departure, have left little of value behind them, to abide the just, although perhaps too indiscriminate, indignation of a zealous Reformation,—or to satisfy, at an after period, the curiosity of a tyrant Protector; so that the shelves of the Vatican, or the repositories of Douay and Ratisbon may alone be able to convey information regarding the lost library of Iona.

At the death of Columba, indeed, his seminary seems to have emitted a bright radiance, which reached through the length and breadth of Scotland, dispelling the gloom of Pagan superstition, and thawing, by its warmth, the icy hearts and frozen manners of its rude population. The exertions of the monks of Iona were not confined to the cultivation of the mind merely, but by introducing, and themselves practising, the useful arts, they trained the natives to habits of exertion, and rendered them familiar with some of the comforts and conveniences of life; so that under the influence of pure and pious precept, coupled with a righteous and industrious example, the uncultivated manners of the nation began gradually to be softened, and the character of the people to assume a milder aspect.

A CONTRAST BETWEEN THE UNRENEWED AND THE RENEWED MAN:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. W. NICOLSON,

Minister of Ferry-Port-on-Craig.

“For I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.”
—ROM. vii. 9.

PAUL having, by a process of close and powerful reasoning, proved and illustrated the doctrine of justification by faith, has, with no less zeal and cogency of argument, shown the necessity of sanctification of heart, and holiness of life, in the case of all who are thus justified. This he did, in order to obviate an objection which they who were not under the sanctifying influence of the truth might be disposed to urge against the doctrine in question, namely, that it destroyed the obligation to practical obedience, and also to prevent the licentious use which some might be disposed to make of this doctrine, in supposing themselves to be thereby freed from all obligation to holiness of life. Having thus, upon the one hand, combated and overturned the objections of those whose zeal for the law might induce them to reject the doctrine of justification by faith, and, upon the other hand, shut up the avenue to licentiousness which they who disregarded the law might have conceived this doctrine to have opened to them, he proceeds to illustrate, in strong and powerful language, the different consequences of a right and of a wrong apprehension of the law. In doing this, he declares his own experience upon the subject, showing how he felt, and how he acted, while ignorant of the excellency, the extent and spirituality of the law, in striking contrast with his feelings and his actions, after his mind had been enlightened upon this point. The sum and substance of this experience may be considered as expressed in the words of my text, “For I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.” That is, as if the apostle had said, When I was without the true knowledge of the divine law, and had it only in the letter, but knew not its power, I was, in my own estimation, alive. I conceived myself to be a holy and righteous man, being altogether without any conviction or consciousness of that state of spiritual death in which I then was; but when the commandment came to me in its power, and reached my conscience; when the law in its true character, and in its spirituality, was revealed to me, it then discovered to me my guilt, and sin was exhibited to me in all its deformity, so that I saw myself to be dead in trespasses and in sins. Here, then, we are led to consider,

I. The character here given of a sinner without the law.

And let it be observed, that when the apostle speaks of himself as without the law, it is not to be understood that he was ignorant of the existence and literal requirements of the divine law. On the contrary, he was well instructed therein. Paul was brought up in the knowledge of the Jewish religion, educated under Gamaliel a noted doctor of the law in Israel, and, moreover, was very zealous for the law. His own declaration upon this subject was, that he was taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God; and that after the strictest sect he lived a Pharisee. He was not, therefore, without the literal knowledge of the law. This knowledge, however, being unaccompanied by any spiritual illumination, was altogether unproductive of any spiritual fruits; and of so little value did he hold it, after his conversion to the faith, and so utterly worthless did he regard it, that he declares, concerning himself, that he was then without the law. Notwithstanding his liberal education, notwithstanding his zeal, and his Pharisaical and punctilious strictness about the formalities of his religion, now that he is enlightened by the Spirit of God, and brought under the sanctifying influence of the truth, he regards all this education, and all this his former zeal and strictness, as of no account, in so far as a proper and acceptable obedience to the spirit of the law was concerned. All his knowledge had utterly failed to discover to him the true demerit and malignity of sin. It had utterly failed to discover to him his own moral guilt and pollution.

It had not filled his mind with just views of the holy and spiritual nature of the law of God, nor of the spiritual nature of the service which it required. In all these respects he was then without the law. In so far as the power and spirit of the law was concerned, he was as one who knew it not.

Now, is the apostle to be considered as here stating any thing peculiar to his own case? or does he not assert concerning himself what is true concerning thousands besides? All, as well as the apostle, who are strangers to the spirit and power of the law of God, may be said to be without the law. Nor is it to such as have never had that law revealed to them, that these words apply. If it was true of Paul that, notwithstanding all his learning, and all his knowledge of the letter of the law, he was, nevertheless, virtually without law, so long as he remained a stranger to its spirit and its power, is it not equally true of every other whose heart and whose life may not be under its influence, whatever may be the extent of his learning, or the degree of his attainments? Thus the words of the apostle, in which he declares his own experience, will find their application in the case of every individual among the unrenewed and unsanctified, who, although having the Christian name, and externally enjoying the Christian's privileges, are destitute of the saving knowledge of divine truth, and have never felt its transforming efficacy.

Such, then, being the import of the apostle's assertion, that he was without the law, it is obvious that his life, instead of being what that law required, must have been a habitual contravention of its spirit. And so of all to whom the expression now under review will apply. Even although you may not, like him, hale men and women to prison, and persecute them unto the death, yet if your hearts and affections have not been disciplined into a cordial acquiescence in all its precepts, your perceptions opened to a right apprehension of its holiness and universality, and your whole conduct chastened and purified by an abiding impression of its obligation, you cannot be regarded, in the eye of God, as living otherwise than without the law. Your zeal for its forms may be apparent to all, your punctuality in their observance worthy of all imitation, and yet you may be unsanctified in spirit. The divine beauty and glory of the law you may not have seen, its spiritual power you may not have felt, and hence it may still be said of you, that you are without the knowledge of the law.

In such circumstances as those we have now described, the natural conclusion which we would draw concerning the sinner would be, that he was dead in trespasses and sins. How is it, then, that Paul says of himself, that he was alive? "I was alive without the law once." He could not here mean to assert, surely, that he was spiritually alive; for such an assertion, in the circumstances referred to, would have been directly opposed to the whole tenor of Scripture. To be without the true knowledge of the law, and living in a way utterly opposed to its design, can never imply the possession of a principle of spiritual life. We conceive, then, that when the apostle here says, that, in these circumstances, he was alive, he asserts what he then conceived of himself. In his own view of his case, he was a righteous person. Nothing was then farther from his imagination than to conceive, that he who was so zealous for the law, and so strict in his observance of what he conceived to be its demands, could be at the same time contending against God, and wofully sunk in the polluted mire of spiritual death. No feeling seemed to be more predominant in his mind in those days of his legal religion, than that of self-righteousness. Proud and self-justified, he looked with implacable resentment upon the followers of Jesus; and the deep and humbling consciousness of his own guilt and danger, never took possession of his haughty spirit. The language of his heart was, "Stand by, for I am holier than thou!" With his mind thus filled with the delusive impression of his own righteousness, he had no other conviction than that he was indeed alive, in the fullest sense of the term. This was his belief, and this he here declares, when he says, "I was alive without the law!"

In the context, and in other parts of this Epistle, the apostle gives a full explanation of the principle upon which the human heart thus deceives the sinner. While blind to the holiness and spirituality of the law, sin is not perceived in its true character. The law is the mirror in which the sinfulness of sin is perceived, and its condemning power recognized and felt; if, then, our perceptions of the law be indistinct and erroneous, so must our perceptions of sin. Hence, the apostle says, in the last clause of the preceding verse, "without the law sin is dead;" that is, without a right knowledge of the law, we are not conscious of the motions of sin within us. "Nay," says he, in the 7th verse, "I had not known sin, but by the law." However polluted and sinful we may be, if we have not a clear view of the mirror in which we may see ourselves, our pollution and sin will not be perceived. Being thus unconscious of sin, it remaineth as dead within us, and we suppose ourselves to be free from its contamination and condemnation. And again, where no law is, there is no transgression. And hence the obvious conclusion, that when we do not perceive the law, neither do we perceive the transgression. When we are blind to the nature of the law's demands, we are equally blind to our own deficiencies. And in such a case, the feeling is that we are alive, that our state is good and safe, sound and healthful. This, then, is just the very idea which Paul here declares he had of himself previous to his conversion, when he says, "I was alive without the law once." I conceived myself to be whole and sound in my religious state and character. I was conscious of no principle of spiritual death working my destruction. I thought and felt as if all had been going well with me. I was ignorant of the law, and felt as alive.

Such, then, being the state and character of the apostle previously to his obtaining a right and spiritual apprehension of the law, and consequently a right apprehension of himself, mark the contrast exhibited in his case after his obtaining this apprehension. His lofty thoughts were humbled. All his self-righteousness fled; and, instead of life, he only saw death—instead of health, he saw himself to be overspread with a deadly disease. This will appear more fully, when we proceed,

II. To consider the change which is produced by a right apprehension of the law, and by a proper feeling of its sacred obligation. "When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died."

When you consider the coming of the commandment, as here set in opposition to being without the law, there can be no great difficulty in perceiving its meaning. As, to be without law has been shown to signify, not without a literal knowledge of the law, but without a spiritual knowledge of it; so, the coming of the commandment signifies, not the communication of a knowledge of the commandment in the letter, but the communication of the knowledge of it in its spirit and power. We have already seen, that in the former sense Paul was well acquainted with the law; but now he refers to the period when the heavenly light shone forth upon him, and when the commandment of his God came to him in power, and with divine illumination. This took place with him on the occasion of his memorable journey to Damascus, with intent to apprehend such as called upon the name of Jesus, and to carry them bound to Jerusalem. When prosecuting his journey, filled with the most hostile feelings and designs against the Christians, he was suddenly arrested in the way by a heavenly vision, and then it was the commandment came to him. A mighty revolution was effected in the whole condition of his inner man. His persecuting weapons fell from his grasp. His hostile purposes all vanished. The law and commandment of his God exhibited to his astonished mind a new bearing and complexion. The whole purpose of his soul was changed. Now, how was it that all this was accomplished? Was it by means of any revelation to him of a law of which he had never heard before? Had he been till then ignorant of God's revelations? Is it not most obvious, that there was something altogether different from any external revelation of a law before unknown? The whole was brought about by an internal revelation. It was all the effect of divine and spiritual illumination, whereby light was cast upon purposes and plans of mercy long foretold. The apostle was not remitted to the study of the law, in order to find out the perfect will of God, of which he was so ignorant. The whole of his remaining lifetime might have been spent in this study, without his advancing one step in the removal of that veil which overhung his perceptions. To no such fruitless labour was he set. But there was a power which study cannot command, and an influence which learning cannot produce, put forth upon his mental vision, whereby the darkness of his mind was dispelled, and truths which formerly he could not understand were clearly exhibited to his view. Errors and prejudices, which formerly entangled and perverted his perceptions, were wholly dissipated, and the stubbornness of his unsanctified heart was subdued into the compliance and docility of a child. Although, as his subsequent history abundantly proves, his fortitude and boldness did not forsake him, yet his mind was chastened by the mild principles of the Gospel.

It is easy to see then, brethren, that in bringing the commandments of our God with power and with saving efficacy to the hearts and consciences of sinful men, there is something far different from mere human agency necessary. Useful as that agency may be, in subserviency to the holy will and purpose of God, it is nevertheless totally inadequate of itself to the working out of that change in the moral constitution of man, whereby he becomes a new creature in Christ Jesus. And after all the toils and labours of the most faithful and patient research, man may still be virtually without the right knowledge of the law of his God, and may be spiritually dead when he thinks himself alive. And in all the pride of intellect, and in all the consciousness of lofty attainments, and in all the complacency of Pharisaical self-righteousness, and in all the superciliousness of a fancied superiority to others, may the sinner carry his head in the lofty attitude of an implied defiance of all challenge and of all scrutiny, while in the view of God he may be covered over with the leprosy of sin, and there may not be about him a single feature of a heavenly character. Your knowledge of the law may be extensive and minute, and, like Paul the persecutor, you may be zealous for its forms, and yet the commandment may never have come to you in power; there is a mighty influence necessary to arrest the sinful tendency of your innate corruptions, and to give you the saving and sanctifying knowledge of the truth. The Spirit of God accomplishes this. It is his to renovate the dead soul, and arouse the sleeping energies of the human mind. It is his to remove the scales from the eye-balls of the blind, and to pour celestial light into the dark and dreary chambers of the sinner's breast. Do you ask why Paul designates such a change as this, by saying "I died!" The change in question seems obviously to have been rather a restoration to life—a clearing away of the mists of spiritual ignorance, and an opening of the eyes to a proper view of his most important interests. In trying to estimate the real state of the apostle's mind then, which prompted the expression now before us, we can hardly fail to perceive that his words imply that he died, or became spiritually dead in his own estimation. He then saw himself to be under the influence of spiritual death. He no longer gloried in his fancied conformity to the law of God, for, as that law now appeared to him, he felt that by its sanctions he was held under condemnation. He was just as truly dead in sin before, as he was after the coming of the commandment, but he knew it not. The clearer manifestation of the mirror, brought along with it also the clearer manifestation of the image it reflected. The former obscuration of the glass of the divine Word, caused a dim and indistinct reflection of the face of him who looked into it. The apostle's eyes being beclouded with the dense and defiled atmosphere of spiritual ignorance and legal righteousness, prevented him from obtaining a clear and distinct view of himself. But now this obscuration of the mirror of divine truth, and this bemisting of the apostle's vision, were removed by the cloudless splendour of the Sun of Righteousness, so that the haughty and law-learned disciple of Gamaliel, was exhibited to himself as a poor and guilty outcast from God, and utterly devoid of that righteousness which the law of immutable holiness unyieldingly demanded. One important feature of the change produced then, by a right apprehension of the law, is the totally different opinion which the sinner is led to form of himself. Formerly he gloried in the belief that he was more righteous than others, and for every admitted deficiency he found a ready apology. Now he is ready to hide his face in the confusion and the shame of self-condemnation. "Stand by, for I am holier than thou," was the exclamation of his former self-righteousness; but, "I am vile, what shall I answer?" is now the language of his new-born humility. In the pride of his unsubdued enmity, he formerly demanded, "Who is the Lord, that I should serve him?" but now, in humble submission, he inquires, "Lord, what wouldest thou have me to do?" And it is obvious, that this change in his own view of himself, is what the words of Paul denote when he says, "Sin revived and I died."

But, again, when the change here implied takes place with the sinner, he becomes dead to sin. Formerly he was dead in sin, but now he is dead to sin. Sin has lost its attraction. The deceitful allurements which formerly surrounded it have disappeared, and it stands forth to his now refined and renovated vision in all its proper unseemliness. Now, in the process by which that is accomplished, there is no destruction of any one faculty of the mind; there is only the giving of a new direction to his faculties. The human mind is so constituted, that it must have some object on which to occupy its affections and desires. And, consequently, if you wish to remove your affections from any unworthy object, that must be done by substituting some other object. The mind cannot rest in utter vacuity; and, accordingly, if we would attempt to remove the love of the sinner from sinful objects, we must not think of accomplishing this by a mere act of separation, by merely turning away the affection of love from the unworthy object, and then leaving it to find a resting-place where it may. We must bring another object forward, present it to the affections, and by introducing it, endeavour to displace the other. Hence the sinner does not become dead to sin, merely by ceasing to love it, but he does so, by having his love directed to some other and more worthy object. The love of God takes place and precedence of love to sin; and when the true character of God is perceived, when his glorious perfections and his marvellous grace are revealed in the soul, then does the love of sin give way before this nobler and more satisfying direction and exercise of the affection; thus the renewed soul being filled with the love of God, there is no room left for the love of its former idols. The exercise of desire is still maintained, but it is now maintained in reference to more befitting objects. Sin has vacated the throne of the human heart, because God has claimed and taken possession of it. The world with its vanities has been displaced, not to leave empty the place which they had occupied, but to let that place be filled by other occupants. The affections of the new man are fully as much occupied as before, but they are occupied with better objects, the introduction of which rendered necessary the ejection of the former.

How beautifully do we perceive these remarks verified and illustrated in the history of Paul! Before his conversion, how active and how zealous! Did this activity and this zeal, then, disappear after the heavenly vision by which his persecuting mission was so suddenly arrested? No; we find the same activity characterising him during all his future life; but it was called forth in a far nobler direction, and for a far nobler purpose. If he was ardent in his attachment before, he was no less ardent after his conversion. But his ardour had now another aim, and was under the impulse of purer principles. In turning totally away from the objects of his former pursuit, it was not that his powerful energies might settle down into aimless fatuity, but that they should burst forth with new splendour, and in another field make nobler efforts, and achieve a prouder victory.

So is it with every sinner who becomes a soldier of the cross. Emancipated from the bondage of iniquity, he acquires new vigour with his freedom. The purer atmosphere which he breathes, and the nobler objects which he pursues, give an animation and a vigour which he felt not before, and with his new occupation there is a new character exhibited. Whereas he formerly satisfied himself with an easy profession, now he assumes the attitude of a wrestler. He strives to enter in at the strait gate,—he fights the good fight of faith,—he earnestly contends for the faith,—he reaches forth to the things that are before, that he may attain to the stature of perfection in Christ. Amen.

A SABBATH IN NEW ZEALAND.

AFTER a sail of about twelve miles, the boat was made fast in a small creek, and left there, while we proceeded on foot to the end of the journey, about three miles off, the walk lying through a natural garden of wild flowers, among which a lofty variety of scented myrtle in full blossom, and the beautiful flower of the wild turnip, which grows upwards of six feet from the ground, were most conspicuous. About midway from the landing-place to the village where Mr Williams had to preach, we came to a village densely peopled, but the inhabitants of which continue in the darkness of ignorance, notwithstanding the changes taking place in every direction around them. Here a couple of Englishmen have a saw-pit and reside; these are beginning, it may be hoped, to seek their own salvation; and that beginning displays itself in civility to the missionaries, of whom they now inquire why, in their visits to the villages beyond them, they never stop at the house of those of their own country.

We arrived, in a short time, at the hut of a poor fellow who is in the last stage of consumption, "waiting," to use his own words, "to fall asleep in Jesus, in the hope of being raised again from the dead by him." As Mr Williams meant to have this day received him into the visible Church by the sacrament of baptism, an examination of this invalid took place, in the course of which he gave satisfactory reason for the hope that was in him. He believed himself to be a sinner, he said, and that the whole of his past life must have been abominable in the sight of God; but nevertheless, he trusted in Christ that he was freely and fully forgiven all his sins, and would not be cast into the outer darkness,—"because of what the Bible told him about the death of Christ." If he lived, he hoped to spend all the rest of his days in the service of God; and if he died, he expected to have part in the first resurrection. But, at the same time that he expressed his desire for baptism to be strong, he thought it would be proper to delay it yet longer, lest he should recover strength, and with the recovery be drawn aside to forget God, and so bring reproach upon the cause of the Redeemer. His fear of backsliding had been excited by the consideration of some cases of apostasy among his neighbours, many of whom have been turned aside by a false prophet that has risen up in the neighbourhood of Ranghiva; a native, who sets himself up as a teacher sent from God, and is suffered to deceive multitudes. His followers observe the last day of the week as holy, and desecrate the first. They profess, also, to approve of the sacred books, while they boldly avow their entire rejection of the Missionaries' interpretations. He declares himself to have been formerly one with Christ, but at the same time confesses to have been among the number of those by whom Christ was crucified. He promises peculiar privileges, both in time and for eternity, to those whom he succeeds in deceiving; yet admits his power to be limited, and that there are those who believe in the Saviour through the preaching of the Missionaries, over whom he will not be able to exercise any power, but who will die as they are living, in the faith and hope of the Gospel. His sayings and doings have staggered many, and, being a ventriloquist, he has deceived some and terrified others into the belief and confession of a lie by practising that art, and speaking to them in two voices, one of which he tells them is the voice of Atua, taking especial care at those times to make its oracular saying confirm his own previous declaration.

We soon entered a populous village, remarkably clean and very neatly built, swarms of the inhabitants being in waiting to welcome us. These came forward with the outstretched hand: and Ekerol Ekerol from a hundred voices at once, plainly declared that we were looked upon in the light of "Friends!"

A congregation was speedily gathered in a small square space, formed by three neighbouring huts, a large block of wood serving the Missionary to sit upon, while to the right of him, some old, white-haired chiefs, spread out their mats and sat cross-legged upon them; the inferior persons of the tribe, with the women and children ranging themselves in front and on his left hand, at the same time that a few individuals sat apart within the large porch of an adjoining house, and a very few were engaged at a little distance from the assembly, but within hearing, in cooking the ere-tide meal. They listened with mute attention to Mr Williams's discourse, for upwards of three quarters of an hour, when he was at length interrupted by several voices, some relating what they had been told by the followers of the false prophet; others making mention of the Scriptures which contradict his prophecies. One a chief, and, better still,—a Christian, stated that part of their unbelief consists in denying the possibility of ascending up into heaven, and proceeded to exemplify a part of the doctrine taught by them in this way:—taking two pieces of dried grass, one piece he set upright, and disposed the other in lesser pieces around it, so as to give to each of these the appearance of an inclined plane, and to all of them different degrees of inclination. Such being said to resemble the different ways men take to get to heaven; some walking along level ground go very fast, till they arrive at the perpendicular ascent, but no sooner attempt to climb it, than they lose their footing and fall into a pit below, analogous to hell; others are a greater or less time in reaching the turning point, but none are able to get beyond, except a few whom nothing can separate from Christ; but even these get not to heaven, and only sleep an eternal sleep; while those who believe the impostor's lies are introduced to an Elysium, the delights of which are altogether carnal, sensual, and devilish. Mr Williams having answered the several questions put to him, and apparently satisfied the inquirers, resumed his discourse, and was listened to with quietness till the end.

Taking our leave of these interesting villagers, we walked to another and more numerous cluster of huts, at some distance off, several of the natives going along with us. Part of the way led along the bank of the river, the tranquil repose of whose waters was undisturbed by any passing breath of wind; while on its surface, smooth as the silvered glass, earth and sky met together, as it were to confront one another with looks of peculiar loveliness. A few light and graceful canoes lay floating in readiness for their owners in the clear stream, but lay so lightly there that they seemed rather to grow out of the chrysalis beneath them, than to be altogether foreign and distinct bodies. The sky was almost cloudless, the air serene and calm, every part of the picture in perfect keeping, and the whole scene as though inanimate nature both heard and obeyed the command which saith, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy."

As we struck off from the side of the river, the tolling of a distant bell came tinkling across the valley, and announced the assembling of a body of natives to evening prayers at the village to which we were hastening. We had not much farther to go; but every turn of the path pleased the eye with a change of prospect, while it enabled us to perceive how dense the population is compared with that of the Bay of Islands.

Having at last reached the expectant congregation, I was gratified to find it a large one. Upwards of three hundred persons were there, not, indeed, in a house made with hands, but in a large open space, in the centre of a wide-spread village, with the everlasting hills behind them, and the clear blue sky above, the green sward for their seat, and the homes of their fathers before and on either side of them, to remind of days gone by; and perhaps to tell of obscene rites and unclean superstitions, soon, it may be hoped, to be forgotten for ever, in the universal substitution of a reasonable faith,—a true and spiritual worship. The most and order, prevailed throughout the whole of the service; the responses were audible, distinct, and deeply solemn; the chorus of singers clear, well timed, and harmonious. The ear of every individual seemed bent for hearing, as though to him alone the message was addressed. Just before the close of the sermon, some of the hearers submitted a few questions to the preacher, but evidently with very great deference, and, as I was afterwards assured, for the sole purpose of getting the difficulties explained which occurred to their own minds, or arose out of the subject-matter of discourse. After the sermon, a native Christian offered up an extempore prayer, the whole assembly kneeling, and the most complete silence prevailing. The benediction was then pronounced, which having received, these warm-hearted islanders flocked round their friend and me, to greet us with the customary shake of the hand before we left them. We afterwards visited some sick, and made for the boat, parties of the natives accompanying us, till they reached successively the various by-paths leading to their own homes, before turning into which, they all approached to bid us good-by. The now familiar word, Ekerol friend, with the proffered hand, open as charity, which grasped that held out by us in our turn, spoke volumes to the heart of one whose heart was too full of thoughts, of thoughts themselves too big for utterance, to admit of his more than looking them a long and fond farewell. I have contented myself in barely relating a part of what I saw and heard at this time, for I dare not attempt any thing like a description of my emotions throughout the whole afternoon and evening. While witnessing the artless devotions of these poor half-clad savages, I felt abashed and humbled. While hearing them pray, and sing, and give thanks unto Jehovah Jesus, my Lord and my God, the heart within me fainted, and I could only murmur to my mind's ear:—Of what has been done, by the grace of God, for New Zealand, through the instrumentality of his servants the Missionaries, the half had not been told me.

THE BENIGHTED PILGRIMS.

No. II.

BY THE REV. LACHLAN MACLEAN,

Chaplain to the Lunatic and Blind Asylums, Edinburgh.

In this article we shall consider the nature of the religious exercises in which the insane are now called to engage, and how far these are calculated to produce beneficial effects.

The first exercise, of course, in which the patients join on Sabbath, is that of praise. In our national Psalmody there is nothing to excite these poor worshippers; its simple yet pathetic character, fits it for calming, instead of ruffling, the already disturbed mind. In a Lunatic Asylum this tendency is most unequivocally manifested; for countenances which, on other occasions, by their restless and ever-varying expression, bear melancholy proofs of a strong internal conflict, sink into a state of fixed tranquillity, while the song of thanksgiving is offered up. Whenever, in the experience of the writer, this part of the service was omitted, (which has twice happened through accidental circumstances,) the change in the appearance of the worshippers was strongly marked; they were evidently disappointed: every thing, in a word, testified the delight which they felt in this part of Christian service, and how much they regretted its omission. The power of music on the troubled mind has been the poet's theme in every age; nor has this power, we conceive, been over-rated. In seasons of grief, there are but few who have failed to experience the almost magic influence of harmony in soothing and comforting. The sorrowing believer, above all, who joins his worshipping brethren, will seldom leave the house of prayer without voice proclaimed the praises or uncreated goodness. Before a sorrowing Saviour left the room in which he had partaken of his last earthly feast, a hymn was sung. It was probably a part of the paschal service; it was doubtless in honour of the Father; but it was intended also to comfort his mourning, his despairing followers; to banish for a season, from their overburdened minds, the dreadful forebodings of approaching ruin; to send them with softened hearts, and with subdued feelings, into a conflict, where human strength would avail them nothing. Nor is it presuming too much to believe, that He, who was man in all but sin, should have wished once more to hear the song of praise raised by much-loved voices, that sweet forgetfulness of griefs might visit, for a few moments, his own troubled soul; or that He who in heaven delights in the praises of angels, and the spirits of the just made perfect, should have desired his last moments on earth to be soothed by strains oft heard with pleasure, in many a midnight wandering, though raised by mortal tongues. The hymn was sung in the hour of grief, of weeping affection, and blasted hopes; but if it could have increased their sufferings, it never would have been sung: it was the kind Physician's parting token of love to his brethren, of sympathy with man in his sinless feelings, the balm of consolation to wounded spirits. If then the song of praise is thus beautifully adapted to speak peace to the heavy laden; surely, to the faithful worshipper, whose burden is great, whose sufferings are severe, it may be expected, that the same song will never be indifferent or ineffectual. But Scripture affords us, with respect to music, an example still more applicable—that of the unhappy Saul. Conscience, in this wretched individual, for a time was heard, and partially obeyed; but its strivings were at last withstood; its voice was never silenced, but its dictates were despised; the favour of God was lost, but there were no feelings of sincere contrition; the value of what had been forfeited was acknowledged, still there was no attempt to recover the lost inheritance. The agonies of despair were succeeded by what seems to have been the attacks of periodical insanity. During these dark and moody moments, the miserable man acknowledged the power of music: he was refreshed by strains which, from the character of him who played, as expressed even by Saul's advisers, must have been devotional. The same consequences continued to be experienced, until the guiltless musician became the object of the misguided monarch's relentless hatred.

These statements regarding the influence which music exerts over troubled and darkened minds, may appear to some, perhaps, unnecessary; but as the writer holds it a matter of vital importance to omit nothing that can tend, in any degree, to promote the comfort of persons afflicted by one of the severest calamities to which humanity is exposed, he has been led to show, by a reference to the page of history, and to the innate feelings of our race, that the effect of plaintive and heart-touching harmony on the insane, is merely such as might have been anticipated. Their souls are sad, but even in their saddest moments, fingers and voices that, in other matters, have forgot their cunning, send forth the same strains of melody that were heard in happier days.

On the Sabbath, those who, in early life, when all was bright, loved to join their parents in the song of praise, still rejoice in the melancholy retreat, (the grave, it may be, of every earthly hope,) to raise the same adoring song. Let it, however, be understood, that not merely the music, but, above all, the sentiments uttered, affect and soothe the insane. It may not be generally known, that seldom, comparatively speaking, is the tear of sorrow seen to moisten the eye of madness. "Tears," exclaims the disconsol-late mother, who bends over the cold remains of an only child, "would afford relief, but I cannot weep!" So is it with the lunatic in most cases; the fountain of tears is dried up, the burning brain refuses to send forth the stream calculated to mitigate the very sufferings which it manifests. Yet repeatedly has the writer seen some, even of the most hopeless of his hearers, weep under the influence of sacred poesy. Some curiosity may exist to learn what these passages were: two examples, therefore, may be given, one, that portion of the 24th Paraphrase beginning with the beautiful lines,

"Can the fond mother e'er forget
The infant whom she bore?
And can its plaintive cries be heard,
Nor move compassion more?"

The other that truly applicable part of the 27th Paraphrase, beginning with,

"Yet, looking down, I visit oft
The humble hallow'd cell;
And with the penitent who mourn
'Tis my delight to dwell."

The next duty is that of prayer. From confusion of thought, or the peculiar description of madness, it often happens that the insane cannot pray for themselves, while at the same time they are most anxious that others should pray on their behalf. One affecting instance of this may be related, that of an individual whose former follies seemed to weigh heavy on his soul. Every attempt to lead this person into the place of prayer was in vain; "he was unworthy of such a privilege; he had been a splendid sinner, and therefore deserved not mercy," was his answer. Still the poor mourner, when he thought he was unobserved, approached the door, that he might, by stealth, hear the words of comfort. A weakly frame could not long endure so fearful a conflict; he was soon stretched upon the bed of death, where the writer frequently visited him. To the last, aggravated sin was the burden of his complaint; but though he disclaimed all right to pray for himself, in consequence of the despairing madness with which he was visited, the prayer of another was to him delightful; the folded hands, the uplifted eye, and moving lips, testified how fervently he joined in its petitions. His spiritual instructor was affected on beholding the wreck of a brilliant intellect; but he was also comforted, on witnessing every proof of sincere, of heartfelt contrition; for prayer, to him, although so far as man could judge, he could not offer it up personally, but in the way described, was prized "above his chiefest joy," nay, we might safely say, it was his only joy.

When assembled in the chapel, if solemnity of demeanour, and the most marked attention during the exercise of prayer, are proofs of the respect with which that part of divine service is regarded, then safely may the writer maintain, that in no congregation of worshippers, under the most favourable circumstances, has he ever witnessed greater reverence and apparent devotion, than among these children of misery, during the time he has been connected with them. It may be thought, perhaps, that they are under some restraint, while engaged in worship, for the writer has been repeatedly questioned on this point. In reply, he has merely to state, that he never met a single individual in the place of prayer under personal restraint. The inmates of the Asylum, while worshipping God, certainly are, and he rejoices to declare it, under restraint, but of such a nature as binds the whole Christian world—moral, not physical, restraint. Nor, he is equally happy to state, has this liberty ever been abused. It is often matter of regret to the Christian minister to witness the attention of his flock distracted by, it may be, some very trifling occurrence, even during the most solemn service of the sanctuary. The writer has never as yet been called upon to censure such levity among the poor objects of his care; they either feel so much their need of prayer, or are so completely absorbed in the duty, as to be comparatively indifferent to what is passing around them. Proofs of this will be found in a subsequent paper; at present a single illustrative fact may be stated in the case of a poor man, an inmate, some years ago, of the city Asylum. This person, a native of England, continuing the practice of the body of Christians to which he belonged, was in the habit of kneeling during prayer, and uttering short ejaculatory petitions from time to time, or responding by "Amen," to the different sentences of the speaker. To most, probably, of his brethren in affliction, such interruptions must have been new, yet they remained undisturbed, paid no attention to the stranger, except by moving aside, that they might not incommode him as he knelt.

To offer any general observations on the value or importance of prayer under affliction, would be superfluous, and out of place. The Christian feels that prayer, at all times, is his most exalted privilege on earth; and even the unbeliever himself bears unconscionable testimony to the utility of this all-important duty, when "his voice is taught, by anguish," to utter words formerly strange to his lips. Suffering naturally disposes men, either personally to implore assistance, or to approve of others doing it on their behalf. The same is observable, with few exceptions, among the insane, from such as are above idiocy to those who are a stage below outrageous lunacy.

The unhappy sufferers are, as has been stated, in many instances, ignorant of their real condition; still, most are of course aware, that a change has passed upon them: they no longer behold those who once were, and still are, perhaps, dear to their hearts, although pride and imagined neglect may dispose them to treat such as enemies. They feel that the tie, by which they were bound to their fellow-men, is broken; what they are most anxious to receive from man, liberty, is refused to them. Thrown thus upon their own resources, and left to their own solitary communings, they hear, with gladness, that there is one who rejects no faithful petitioner; that there is a prayer-hearing, a prayer-answering God. The natural principle of dependence upon some higher power, and religious instruction received in youth, strengthen the happy impression; and those who, with difficulty, acquiesce in any proposal made to them, are seen promptly, yet most devoutly, attending to the invitation, "let us pray."

The following incident may be related as one of many proofs of close attention to the subject of prayer. After divine service was concluded, a patient once observed to me, "You prayed to-day for those who had neglected private devotion; I liked that very much, it should be done by every minister, for I fear that duty is too often omitted." Another fact may be stated, calculated to show the advantage of religious instruction in youth. An individual of the most hopeless class, who had been for many years severely afflicted, was visited by me when in a dying state. After prayer had been offered up, in which he appeared to join, his parent, who was present, begged him to pray for himself; with clasped hands, and in broken accents, he repeated the prayer which a mother's love had taught him in infancy. The scene was truly affecting, but it was also peculiarly comforting. It proved that early impressions, which often withstand the sorest pressure of adversity, bid defiance at times, to a certain extent, even to the withering stroke of insanity.

With respect to the character of the discourses delivered to the insane, it may be sufficient to observe, that argumentative sermons are avoided; nor is any alarming view ever brought before them. They are soothed, comforted, encouraged, or entreated, as circumstances require, or as the texts chosen suggest; but no direct allusion is on any occasion made, from the pulpit, to their peculiar condition. The subjects which illustrate Scripture history, the actions of the righteous, the perseverance of God's children, their patience under the various trials of life, or some of the affecting incidents recorded in the sacred volume.

The remark of a female patient, of a very restless and excited character, a few weeks ago, will prove that the discourses heard are sometimes at least well remembered. On leaving the chapel, the woman made some observations upon the sermon; anxious to learn whether these proceeded from judgment or a desire to please, I questioned her upon what she had heard, and ascertained to my surprise, that she both fully understood and faithfully remembered the discourse. The maniac, in reply to a remark regarding her memory, exclaimed with a smile, "Oh! that is nothing, I remember the first sermon I heard in this place a twelvemonth ago, it was about the noble Bereans." On referring to my notes, I found that the poor woman was perfectly correct. Another anecdote, of a different but no less pleasing character, may not be uninteresting. A patient, who had been for the first time in the chapel, was asked by her attendant on leaving it, how she felt herself? "very comfortable," was the reply. "Indeed!" it was then observed, "I was surprised you were so very anxious to go, for I thought the members of your church (she was a Roman Catholic) never wished to hear Protestants." "It matters not," answered the woman, "what the name may be, provided the Gospel is preached."

Many incidents equally gratifying might be recounted,—but for very obvious reasons this cannot be done,—when the writer is so intimately connected with every occurrence. A most important circumstance, however, remains yet to be noticed,—the light in which their spiritual teacher is regarded by such persons. In an asylum, the patients who are, in many respects, mere children, frequently look upon the physician rather as the dispenser of bitter draughts, than the friend, whose energies and skill are continually exercised to promote their health and comfort. The keeper, too, who appears the chief obstacle in the way to freedom, is, as might be anticipated in many instances, regarded with suspicion, the departure of which feeling is often esteemed a favourable symptom. The chaplain, on the other hand, gives no disagreeable prescription, imposes no restraint, but comes to preach peace, to cheer and support the distressed under their sufferings. This of itself disposes his hearers to meet him free from prejudice, and inclines them to communicate to him their fears and sorrows.* At times, indeed, these sorrows may be imaginary, but they do not the less, on that account, stand in need of comfort; frequently, however, they have too good cause to mourn; then may the Christian teacher soothe and relieve the troubled mind; then may he direct, with a blessed result, the mourner to the sufferer's only friend.

With one fact illustrative of this, the present article will be concluded. The subject of the narrative was a man in humble life,—one of those lunatics, before whom visions of greatness and power are continually fitting. The noblest of the laud were allied to him; their palaces were his inheritance; chests of treasure were on their way to him from distant shores, and in his person was vested the most unbounded patronage. Yet, strange to say, although living continually in a world of undying splendour, the poor man's countenance was sad and melancholy in the extreme; he never load of secret sorrow. On one occasion, while standing in the midst of a small circle of his companions in affliction, he abruptly remarked to the chaplain, "I wish, Sir, to ask you a question, but you must first hear my story." Upon being encouraged to proceed, he addressed me as follows: "When a boy, as I was playing beside a cart which had stopped before my mother's door, a dog tied to the cart seized me by the leg and bit me severely; upon hearing my cries, my mother hastened to my assistance, but fell before she reached me and dislocated a joint; she was long confined to bed, and suffered much, but death at last relieved her. Some time afterwards, having done what was wrong, my sister said, better could not be expected of me, for I was the murderer of my mother." The simple, yet affecting, tale of domestic affliction, evidently touched the hearts of those by whom the speaker was surrounded. The poor man's voice trembled with emotion when his mother's death was mentioned; but when the fatal question, which probably has been already anticipated, was asked, his eager gaze and stifled utterance indicated feelings which words cannot describe. "Was I, Sir, the murderer of my mother?" The answer need hardly be stated, the sinful rashness of the remark, and the folly of yielding to it, were pointed out successfully. The man declared himself relieved and once more happy. Soon afterwards, it is pleasing to add, he was discharged. While such an occurrence proves the reliance the insane have on the advice of their spiritual instructor, it may also serve as a caution against using injurious and bitter reproaches. Such expressions, uttered in the moments of unreflecting irritation, are ever dangerous, but peculiarly so in the case of a weak and sensitive mind. There they often produce consequences, which although affection may bewail, it cannot remedy,—suffering and wretchedness, which the grave, the benighted pilgrim's resting place, alone can terminate.

"Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy."—Reason, as well as revelation, requires, that a portion of our time should be set apart to the worship of God. The fourth commandment appoints a particular day for that purpose. The precept, as has been often remarked, is both positive and moral in its nature. Considered in the former point of view, the obligation which it imposed might cease, and accordingly the day was changed; but, considered in the latter, the obligation was permanent, and the duty unalterable. As the Christian Sabbath returns, worship, in sincerity, the Creator and Redeemer of mankind. The business of the present life is sometimes apt to banish thoughts of the next; but this is prevented, by appropriating a part of our time to the exercises of devotion. Although these exercises may occasion a temporary interruption to the pursuit of pleasure and of business, devotion is the most permanent pleasure, and the most important business of all. From the history and practice of the primitive Church, it is evident, that the first day of the week was piously observed in honour of the resurrection of Christ: and on the day sacred to the memory of that glorious event, Christians, it becomes you to "enter into God's house with thanksgiving and the voice of praise." Much have they to answer for who disregard the institution of the Sabbath—an institution of the highest importance, whether it be considered in a religious, moral, or political light. As you value the favour of God, and the happiness of your families, not to mention the welfare of your own souls, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." Is the example of men of fashion apt to mislead you? Ah! do not imitate their folly; for the hour is coming when many of this description will "call on the rocks to cover them."

MY BELOVED IS MINE AND I AM HIS.
CANTICLES II. 16.

EVEN like two little bank-dividing brooks
That wash the pebbles with their wanton streams,
And having ranged and searched a thousand nooks
Meet both at length in silver breasted Thames,—
Where in a greater current they conjoin,
So I my best beloved's am, so he is mine.

Even so we met, and after long pursuit,
Even so we join'd, we both became entire ;
No need for either to renew a suit,
For I was flax and he was flames of fire :
Our firm united souls, did more than twine ;
So I my best beloved's am, so he is mine.

If all those glittering monarchs that command
The servile quarters of this earthly ball,
Should tender in exchange their shares of land,
I would not change my fortunes for them all :
Their wealth is but a counter to my coin ;
The empty world's but theirs, but my beloved's mine.

Nay, more, if those fair Thespian ladies all Should heap together their diviner treasure,
That treasure should be deemed a price too small
To buy a minute's lease of half my pleasure :
'Tis not the sacred wealth of all the nine
Can buy my heart from him, or his from being mine.

Nor time, nor place, nor chance, nor death can bow
My least desires into the least remove :
He's firmly mine by oath, I his by vow ;
He's mine by faith, and I am his by love ;
He's mine by water, I am his by wine :
Thus I my best beloved's am, thus he is mine.

He is my altar ; I his holy place ;
I am his guest, and he my living food ;
I'm his by penitence, he's mine by grace ;
I'm his by purchase, he is mine by blood :
He's my supporting elm, and I his vine :
Thus I my best beloved's am, thus he is mine.

He gives me wealth ; I give him all my vows ;
I give him songs ; he gives me length of days :
With wreaths of grace he crowns my conquering brows,

And I his temples with a crown of praise,
Which he accepts ; an everlasting sign
That I my best beloved's am, that he is mine.

FRANCIS QUARLES.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Christianity often disarms the Enemy.—When Mr Howel Harris began his itinerant preaching in South Wales, which was some years before the Messrs Wesley visited that part of the country, Mr Gwynne was alarmed at his conduct ; and imagining that this Howel Harris might be a political incendiary, he being a magistrate, determined to put an end to these portentous irregularities. For this purpose he sallied out one day ; but said to his lady on going, "I will hear the man myself, before I commit him." The sermon was so truly evangelical, so calculated to arouse the careless, to alarm the wicked, and to encourage the penitent, and the preacher's manner was so zealous and affectionate, that Mr G. thought he resembled one of the apostles. He was so convinced of the purity of his doctrines, and of the benevolence of his motives, that at the end of the discourse he went up to Howel Harris, shook him by the hand, told him how much he had been misled by slanderous reports ; avowed his intention of committing him, had they been true ; asked his pardon ; and, to the amazement of the assembly, entreated him to accompany him back to GARTH to supper. Mrs Gwynne, his lady, was a worthy woman, endowed with a superior understanding, and distinguished by her love of the poor, whom she supplied regularly with food, clothing, and medicine ; but she had the strong prejudices of birth and fortune. She was one of our heiresses, each of whom had thirty thousand pounds for their portion, and had married into opulent families. She was a violent enemy to all Presbyterians ; and when her husband returned, introducing to her Howel Harris, whom she deemed a man of inferior class, an innovator in the Church, and a rebel to the king,—when she heard Mr Gwynne himself, in the presence of his whole family entreat his forgiveness, acknowledge his error, and pay him great respect,—she thought that her poor dear husband must have lost his senses ; and in grief and consternation she quitted the room, nor would return to it till after supper, and till Howel Harris had departed. It is gratifying, however, to add, that such was the effect of Mr H.'s piety, that Mrs G. became reconciled to him ; the family became devoted to God ; their house was thrown open to the minister of Christ, and their daughter became the wife of Mr Charles Wesley. She died but a few years ago, at the advanced age of ninety-six.

Rev. A. Fuller.—On one occasion, the late Rev. A. Fuller, when travelling in the Portsmouth mail, was much annoyed by the profane conversation of two young men who sat opposite. After a time, one of them, observing his gravity, accosted him with an air of impertinence, inquiring in rude and indelicate language, whether, on his arrival at Portsmouth, he should not indulge himself in a manner evidently corresponding with their own vicious intentions. Mr Fuller, lowering his ample brows, and looking the inquirer full in the face, replied in a measured and solemn tone, "Sir, I fear God." Scarcely a word was uttered during the remainder of the journey.

Rare Self-Denial.—I once went to a friend, says Mr Cecil, for the express purpose of calling him out into the world. I said to him, "It is your duty to accept the loan of ten thousand pounds, and to push yourself forward into an ampler sphere." But he was a rare character, and his case was rare. His employers had said, "We are ashamed you should remain so long a serrant in our house, with the whole weight of affairs upon you. We wish you to enter as a principal with us, and will advance you ten thousand pounds. It is the custom of the city ; it is your due ; we are dissatisfied to see you in your present sphere." I assured him that it appeared to me to be his duty to accede to the proposal. But I did not prevail. He said, "Sir, I have often heard from you that it is no easy thing to get to heaven. I have often heard from you that it is no easy thing to master the world. I have every thing I wish. More would encumber, increase my difficulties, and endanger me."

BELIEVING IN JESUS CHRIST.

In these papers, the great aim is scriptural simplicity and Christian edification. However the ambition of novelty may harmonize with the objects of this vain world's literature, it is utterly inconsistent with the simplicity of the Gospel, and the principles of the honest-hearted Christian. We would wish the reader constantly to bear in mind the admonition, "Thus saith the Lord, stand ye in the ways, and see and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Jer. vi. 16. Now it is the long and extensive diverging from these good old paths, on one of the most important subjects, that has induced the writer of these papers, to make an effort, by the divine blessing, to bring back the wanderers to the plain and simple way pointed out in the Gospel. There we find no mystery as to the operation of the mind called faith or belief. Not a human being, Greek or barbarian, Jew or heathen, bond or free, is imagined to be ignorant of it; while, with regard to the things to be believed, and the evidence that the belief is real, as manifested by its fruits, we are to study and seek for all that interests us, as redeemed sinners and immortal beings.

It may be proper, at this stage of our progress, briefly to advert to those great truths, of which the belief, is necessary to salvation. When the heathen jailer at Philippi exclaimed, "What must I do to be saved?" the answer returned was, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." With respect to the act of believing, no information was needed or given; but regarding the things to be believed, it was otherwise; and so we find that, besides the summary answer already quoted, Paul and Silas added such explanations of the scheme of redemption, as were requisite to the clear comprehension and rational belief of it. This information is briefly contained in the sacred historian's language, when he says, "And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house." Acts xvi. 32.

The things to be believed have always corresponded with the things revealed; and they have naturally, if not necessarily, increased in clearness and precision, from the first promise in Eden onward to the fulness of time. The Old Testament, as a whole, constituted a preparatory system. It was merely the "shadow of good things to come." Its illustrious personages were types of a promised Redeemer; and the wonderful interpositions which it records, prefigured the great deliverance from the bondage of sin and Satan, which, in the fulness of time, the Son of God accomplished, by the sacrifice of himself. The faith of the Hebrews was exercised on many occasions, by particular revelations, relative to themselves and to other nations, as well as to individuals. But the centre in which all the lines of these revelations met, was Jesus Christ, emphatically the DELIVERER.

To Adam he was foretold as the "seed of the woman, who should bruise the serpent's head." The heavenly light, of which this was the feeble dawn, continued to brighten with the progression of time; so that the patriarch Job, in his early day, was cheered with the conviction, thus expressed: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Job xix. 25, 26. Isaiah foretold, almost as clearly as the Evangelists have recorded, the birth, and character, and miracles, the sufferings, and atoning sacrifice of this glorious personage; and Daniel fixed the precise period of his coming to "finish transgression, and make an end of sins, and bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and the prophecy." Dan. ix. 24. These glorious predictions have been long ago accomplished. The vision and the prophecy are now sealed up, the canon of Scripture is completed, and the objects of the Christian's faith are distinctly set before him. The gracious message to sinners, accordingly, is now announced in language that is clear, simple, and comprehensive: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." As belief in the Lord Jesus Christ issues in salvation, it may, for the sake of brevity and convenience, be called "saving faith," while we take care not to confound the operation of the mind in believing with the truths on which it is exercised. Some of these leading truths, which will be habitually kept present by the believing soul, as constituting the very food which sustains the spiritual life, it may be refreshing, as well as profitable, more distinctly to notice.

1. Then, I observe, that "saving faith" implies the receiving Christ Jesus in the character, and attributes, and offices, in which he is set before us in the Gospel. In his essential character, he is a divine person, equal with God the Father. In the economy of redemption, he is "Jesus Christ," or the "anointed Saviour," and also "the Lord," or "Ruler," having all power committed to him in heaven and earth. These fundamental articles of our faith are revealed with a clearness and copiousness corresponding with their importance. As we never can be more appropriately employed than in contemplating the glories of the Redeemer's character, as constituting the secure foundation of all our hopes, it may be pleasing and profitable to advert to some of the passages in which they are unfolded. No familiarity with them can ever make them pall upon the ear of him to whom "Christ is precious."

The Gospel of John opens with a full and clear statement of our Lord's divinity. "In the beginning," says he, "was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made." Again, all the attributes of Deity are ascribed to him in the name "Emmanuel, God with us." He whom Peter acknowledged to be "the Christ, the Son of the living God," says of himself, "I and the Father are one," and declares it to be the Father's will, that "all men honour the Son, even as they honour the Father." Now, if Christ were a mere creature, however exalted, such honour would neither have been required nor permitted. It would have been idolatry; and we know who hath said, "My glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images."

2. "Saving faith," implies believing that our Lord Jesus Christ assumed human nature in union with the divine, that he might be in a capacity to work out human redemption. "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people." Heb. ii. 16, 17. The same inspired apostle tells us (Phil. ii. 5-8,) that "Jesus Christ being in the form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death even the death of the cross."

That the divine and human natures exist in mysterious union in the person of Jesus Christ, is not only in itself an essential article of the Christian faith, but is the only solid basis on which our hopes can rationally rest upon him as our Saviour. Unless he were possessed of the divine nature, he never could have merited any thing for us. A created being, no matter how exalted the order to which he belonged, could have no powers or faculties which he had not received; and having received them, the full employment of them in the service of him who gave them can never be more than his duty. On the other hand, as we have already seen, unless Christ, though a divine Being, had assumed the human nature, he could not have been in a capacity to bear our sins, and carry our sorrows, and to suffer in our room and stead, as an atoning sacrifice for our sins. This occupying of our place, which he could do only in our nature, is what is denoted by the word vicarious, which so often occurs in the writings of divines upon this subject. The "vicarious" sufferings of Christ mean the sufferings which he endured in our room and stead.

The faith of the Christian, then, is equally remote from the ancient heresy of the Doctæ, who denied the human nature of Christ, and asserted that his sufferings existed merely in appearance; and from the modern heresy of the Socinians, who affect the name of Unitarians, who deny the divinity of our Lord, and therefore reject that which alone could give efficacy to his sacrifice for sin. Though we have called this last heresy modern, as, in some respects, it is, yet, substantially, it is as old as the days of the apostles; for even in the infancy of the Church there were men who "denied the Lord that bought them." Let it be our care, with lowliness, and humility, and dependence on the teaching of the Holy Ghost, to follow the divine record; and let the name of Emmanuel, God with us, and in our nature, fill our hearts with every lowly and lofty sentiment. Let faith fan the flame of heavenly love, and so shall we taste a felicity which no words can utter, while we "honour the Son, even as we honour the Father, who sent him."

3. Faith in our Lord Jesus Christ implies the perception of the suitableness of the salvation that is in him to our circumstances. The illustration of this truth constitutes a prominent feature of the New Testament, and its influence forms one of the great moving principles of the Christian character. Jesus Christ gave himself an offering and a sacrifice without spot unto God, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and "purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Now there is salvation in none other, "for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we can be saved, but the name of Jesus."

The believer, convinced that he is by nature and practice a sinner, and therefore under the condemnation of the divine law, sees, in the atoning sacrifice of Christ, a purchased pardon, precisely suited to his circumstances. It hath pleased the Father, that in Christ all fulness should dwell, and that out of this fulness his people should receive the supply of all their wants. Hence he is made to the believer wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Thus we are "complete" in him, and therefore "to them that believe Christ is precious."

Of the suitableness of the salvation that is in Christ Jesus, much might be said, but merely to have glanced at it here, must, in the meantime, suffice. It furnishes the matter of many a delightful portion of the Sacred Volume, and is one of the sweetest themes of meditation to the believing soul.

To have distinct views of the suitableness of this salvation, it is evident that we must have clear convictions of our lost and ruined state by nature. Original sin, our inheritance from Adam, must be held as implying guilt and corruption. By this original guilt we are naturally under the condemnation of the divine law; and by our corruption, we are incapable of ourselves to return to God and do his will. Hence the necessity of an atoning sacrifice for sin, that God might be just, while he is the justifier of the ungodly who believe in Jesus; and the necessity of the Holy Spirit, by whose agency "every man that is in Christ Jesus becomes a new creature: old things are passed away, behold all things are become new." It is only when fully convinced of the deeply malignant nature of the spiritual disease with which we are affected, and which, unless arrested in its fatal progress, must issue in the second death, that we can rightly appreciate the interposition of the Great Physician. It is when we look to the rock whence we were hewn, and the hole of the pit whence we were digged,—when we contemplate the horrible pit and the miry clay, in which we were sticking fast, and from which no created arm could deliver us, that we shall fully appreciate the divine deliverance, if it may be said that we shall ever duly appreciate it. We shall at least be enabled, with some measure of appropriate feeling, to join on earth in the anthem of the ransomed above, "unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God, even his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen!"

Such are some of the leading and essential truths of that holy religion, whose comprehensive character it is to humble the sinner and exalt the Saviour.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE AND HOME MISSIONARY LABOURS OF THE LATE REV. ROBERT WHYTE.

By THE REV. ROBERT SMITH,

MR ROBERT WHYTE was the youngest son of Mr John Whyte and Elizabeth Young in Dykescroft, situated in the eastern part of the parish of Kilmarnock. He was born 8th March 1806, and enjoyed from his childhood, the best means of religious instruction and spiritual improvement both in private and public. Under the roof of his worthy parents an excellent example was set before him, and he was early instructed in divine things. His father has long been one of the elders of the Low Church of Kilmarnock, and has always conducted himself in a manner suitable to his office, but his pious mother was peculiarly attentive to his education. She was very much attached to him as her youngest child, and a most amiable and affectionate son; and, therefore, delighted not merely in nursing him with tender care, but in "training him up in the fear, nurture, and admonition of the Lord." And it is a remarkable fact, that this good woman died only three months before him; an event which touched most sensibly his tender and affectionate heart, and injured his health, already in a precarious state. His last illness had commenced before her sickness and death, and the shock of this event fell so heavily upon him, that it produced a relapse from which he never completely recovered. In a very short period he followed her, not merely to the grave, but as we hope into heaven, where their reciprocal affection has been purified and perfected, and they shall neither sorrow nor be separated any more,—"they were lovely in their lives, and by death they were not long divided." In public he enjoyed the ministrations of the venerable Dr M'Kinlay and his successive colleagues. That aged pastor has been above fifty-one years a minister of the Low Church of Kilmarnock and in the course of that long time has had seven colleagues, five of whom are still alive and engaged in other scenes of labour. He has always bestowed great care on his preparations for the pulpit, and with good talents and liberal acquirements has long been one of the best preachers in the Church. He has a fine voice, warm affections, together with extraordinary skill in the composition and delivery of his discourses, and all these have contributed to promote his popularity. For these reasons he has long been followed by great multitudes wherever he went; and by the great body of all classes has, for above half a century, been esteemed one of the best preachers in that part of the country. In Mr Whyte both parent and pastor found an apt and docile scholar. Even from his childhood he was thoughtful and serious, most attentive to the instructions of his parents, and was deeply impressed by the admonitions which they gave him. I am not aware, that he almost ever grieved them or provoked their chastisement. So far from running into the follies and faults of other children, he admonished those around him to shun the vices of youth.

His first teacher, who conducts a public school in the neighbourhood of Dykescroft, furnished me with a very interesting account of his behaviour and improvement under his care. "When he went first to school, about six years of age, he appeared rather delicate, and was not remarkable for the quickness of his apprehension; but by steady and conscientious application to every task assigned him, and in a special manner an irrepressible desire to understand thoroughly every thing he studied, he soon began to excel almost all about him. After they had, in the course of public instruction, read the whole Bible, he not merely remembered the principal historical facts recorded in Scripture, but understood distinctly the leading doctrines of the Gospel; and one day astonished his master by this remarkable declaration after they had finished the reading of the Gospel according to John:—'Surely,' said he, 'no person who believes the Bible can deny that Christ is God, for this Gospel seems to have been written for the express purpose of proving that point.' Nor was it in spiritual discernment and understanding alone that he excelled. He distinctly appreciated the beauties of the different pieces with which he met in reading the collection from various authors that was used in the school. And just as he advanced he became the more distinguished. In the study of Arithmetic some might equal him, and even for a short time excel him, in the readiness with which they solved a question, but he was never satisfied unless he understood thoroughly the nature of the process and the reason of the result, and this is very properly supposed to have laid the foundation of the future eminence which he attained in mathematical science, as well as to have contributed to the accuracy of all his knowledge. When learning English Grammar he could not merely distinguish easily the different parts of speech, but apply correctly the most intricate rules of syntax, and this talent appeared more conspicuous and useful after he began to study Latin. The testimony to his general behaviour at school is more striking and, to a Christian, more touching. He was not merely gentle and docile, and remarkable for the propriety of his conduct, but attentive and industrious. So far from complaining that too much was at any time exacted of him, he never thought he did enough. A desire to be at the head of his class, though he often enjoyed that honour, was no part of his ambition; he was stimulated by the higher motives of a desire of information and a sense of duty. It was seldom, very seldom, that he needed the smallest reproof or correction, and when it was administered, instead of resenting it, and becoming sullen and rebellious, he was humbled and ashamed, and regarded it as a substantial benefit." The worthy man concludes his testimony to the character of his esteemed pupil with this declaration, as true, I doubt not, as it is affectionate: "Indeed a master may teach half a century before he meet with a scholar in all respects like Mr Whyte. I myself have conducted a school for thirty years, and taking him all in all, I have never met with his equal, nor do I ever expect to meet with it again."

His habits of industry and research, and his intelligence and propriety of conduct he carried into every situation; so that when he was at home, instead of being carried away with amusement or even business, he was habitually seen with a book in his hand. In what way soever others might be employed, he was usually to be found in some retired place busy with his favourite study, from which it was difficult to recal him; and even when dragged away, and dispatched for some purpose, he has been known to forget by the way the errand on which he was sent, not from carelessness and far less stubbornness, but because his mind was entirely engrossed with the subject of his present researches. By his habitual industry he soon made such acquirements as can be attained at a country school, and before he left it, he had read all the popular works on theology and history which were within his reach, and was pretty well acquainted with the ancient histories of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, together with the modern civil and ecclesiastical histories of his own country.

In the year 1819 he went to the large academy of Kilmarnock, where he enjoyed every possible facility and assistance in the prosecution of his classical studies under the late Mr W. Thomson, rector of that academy, who was a distinguished scholar and successful teacher. In this favourable situation, he not merely supplied the defects almost inseparable from an education in the country, but distinguished himself from most of his school-fellows. At length he and his friend, the Rev. Mungo Parker, now in Brechin, fairly started off from their class-fellows and pursued their studies, together, with kindred zeal and remarkable success. When they went to Glasgow College in 1822, they continued to distinguish themselves even on that arena of competition, and amid rivals from all parts of the country and from seminaries of the greatest celebrity. On such a field there might be persons of quicker apprehensions and more ostentatious qualities than Mr Whyte, for he was more solid than showy, and was always as remarkable for concealing as others are for displaying their talents and acquirements, but few excelled him in diligence of research, or in the accuracy and extent of their information. And so firmly did he retain what he learned, that, till the day of his death, he was more critically and accurately acquainted with Greek and Latin than most persons are when they have just finished their course of study. But the best testimony to his classical acquirements is a certificate of Sir D. K. Sandford, the celebrated professor of Greek in Glasgow College, in the following terms:—"Mr Robert Whyte was for several sessions a student of the Greek class in this University, and his whole conduct and progress through that course of study has left on my mind an ineffaceable impression of both his moral and intellectual deserts. He is a very good scholar and a most meritorious young man, distinguished by great ardour and assiduity in learning, by excellent temper and extreme modesty, by soundness of knowledge and correctness of demeanour. He has been frequently and justly the subject of academic praise and honours; nor can any one of his standing give fairer promise of a respectable career in whatever province of intellectual exertion his choice or his fortune may hereafter place him." Another branch of knowledge in which he excelled was mathematics, and I take leave to produce a similar testimony in his favour in the terms of Mr P. Wilson, professor of Mathematics in the Andersonian University of Glasgow:—"Having been a student with me for two winters I had ample opportunity of forming a correct estimate of his scientific acquirements, and I can have no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that he is one of the best mathematicians that I have had under my care. The zeal with which he prosecuted his studies, and the correct knowledge which he exhibited of the different parts of abstract science which came under review, led me to form a very high estimate of his attainments."

As I have no wish, however, to give a full view of his intellectual character and literary attainments, I shall not prosecute this matter farther, but only remark, in general, that, animated with a thirst of knowledge, and now enured to habits of patient and persevering study, he pursued with similar assiduity and success his whole course of learning. Like a man who is greedy of gain though from far other motives, "he rose early and sat up late, and did not eat the bread of idleness." So long as his health permitted, he did not allow himself more than five hours of sleep during the night. Whilst such exertions were rewarded by the attainment of great accomplishments, they perhaps sowed the seeds of that disease which cut short his valuable life, and deprived the world of the fruits of his labours. It need hardly be told, that he added rapidly and habitually to the stores of his information, and became one of the most accomplished of his contemporaries; and there was a precision and accuracy in all his knowledge the result of his patient attention and invincible purpose to understand thoroughly every subject to which he applied his mind. He was an excellent Theologian, and in a special manner "was mighty in the Scriptures." He had long delighted in the study of his Bible, and could explain it in the clearest and most satisfactory manner. This was felt sensibly at a later period by those who heard him lecture in public, and in a still more interesting manner in private by the sick and dying, as well as by those in good health, who were inquiring the way to Zion.

I have said all this of his talents and acquirements as a scholar for two reasons, because they were all in the end sanctified and consecrated to the service of God; and because, he was so modest and retiring that he was not fully known even by his class-fellows, and some who might think themselves well acquainted with him. Still he was known by them to a considerable extent, and in all respects to advantage. So much talent and worth could not pass unnoticed nor unappreciated. Though modest and prudent, he was not silent and repulsive. He was communicative and even cheerful; and whilst he never by any mistake offended any one, he made himself agreeable to all. The best of friends see faults in one another and sometimes have misunderstandings and quarrels, but no one found fault with Mr Whyte, nor quarrelled with him. And those who knew him best admired him most, and were fully persuaded of his serious impressions. It is not my intention, however, to dwell upon his religious character till I have disposed of the facts in his short but interesting history.

After having finished, much to his own honour and the satisfaction of his teachers, his course of study, and after being for some time engaged in teaching, both in private families and a public academy, in which it is a remarkable fact that he enjoyed as much the ardent affection of his pupils as the entire esteem of their parents, he was licensed to preach the Gospel by his native Presbytery of Irvine on the 30th April 1833. Soon after he was licensed, he had an opportunity of preaching before the late pious and excellent Rev. W. Wodrow, minister of Dreghorn, who was so much delighted and edified with his discourses, that he declared that his was just the style of preaching which he would like to procure for his own people. And as Mr Wodrow was already labouring under that disease which cut short his valuable life and ministry, he engaged Mr Whyte for his assistant. Accordingly, he began to preach regularly at Dreghorn on the second Sabbath of October 1833. Though this was a very arduous undertaking for so young a preacher, and he was almost overwhelmed, as we shall afterwards notice, by a sense of the magnitude of the work, and his insufficiency for the performance of it, yet he acquitted himself with so much talent and fidelity that the parish became decidedly attached to him, and wished to obtain him for their future minister. The unhappy disputes which have arisen in that parish about the settlement of its ministers are unfortunately known throughout the Church and the country; and, therefore, I allude to the subject, without making the slightest reflection upon any of the parties concerned, simply for the purpose of noticing how the prudence and propriety of Mr Whyte's conduct were displayed in these trying and critical circumstances. Though exposed to the temptation of seeking an early and valuable settlement among an admiring and affectionate people, he never for a moment fanned the flame that prevailed, nor made the slightest attempt to defeat the object of the patron and presentee, so as to bring about his own appointment. And no man has so much reason to admire and love him in this respect as the present incumbent of that parish. Mr Whyte left it on the very evening of the funeral of his kind and beloved friend, which took place in January 1834, and studiously avoided returning to it, except when called thither for the discharge of official duty, that he might not mar the prospects, nor hurt the usefulness of the future pastor of a people who loved him unfeignedly. And no man can repeat a rash word, nor mention an unbecoming thing which he did, either on that or, so far as I know, on any other occasion. But if he was admired and loved in the parish, he was still more valued and esteemed in private, and the longer any one knew him the more he delighted in him. During his ministrations in Dreghorn he lived in the manse, and one or other of the members of Mr Wodrow's father's family had the management of his household affairs. In this manner they became intimately acquainted with Mr Whyte, and being pious and intelligent persons, could appreciate and esteem his wisdom and worth. And when they saw "how holily, and justly, and unblameably he behaved himself among them," and felt how sincerely they enjoyed his intelligent and serious conversation, and joined in his remarkable prayers, they conceived for him the highest respect and admiration, have ever since taken the liveliest interest in his situation, and missed no opportunity of endeavouring to promote his views in the Church, or of ministering to him under sickness and at the approach of death, and that, too, without any selfish feeling, and from no other motive but Christian esteem and affection. By appointment of the presbytery, he continued to preach in Dreghorn every alternate Sabbath till the end of May 1834, though he ceased to live in the parish after the death of the Rev. W. Wodrow. This appointment was renewed by the decision of a majority of the presbytery, but his continuance in the parish was prevented by a protest and appeal against their resolution by the Rev. Mr Campbell of Kilwinning, on the ground that it was injurious to the presentee. So far, however, from resenting a step which broke up his connection with an attached people, he cheerfully acquiesced in it, immediately engaged to assist Mr Campbell in his parish, and associated with him with perfect cordiality. During this engagement four discourses were preached in Kilwinning every Lord's day, there being sermon both in the parish church and at a village in the country every evening. He divided the whole public duty with the parish minister, and here, as elsewhere, recommended himself alike to pastor and people. Mr Campbell, though not agreeing with him in ecclesiastical politics, formed the highest opinion of his worth and accomplishments, and continued to show him the greatest respect till the day of his death.

In the beginning of February 1835 he commenced his labours as a Missionary in the town of Kilmarnock. That large town and parish, which now contains a population of about twenty thousand souls, had only two Churches in connection with the Establishment, till the new church of St. Marnoch's was opened last year. Before this time there was not accommodation for three thousand within the pale of the Establishment. To supply the deficiency, various dissenting houses have been built, and filled with respectable ministers, yet, as always happens in such circumstances, there are many careless and worthless persons, who neglect all religious ordinances, and are living in guilt and misery. Mr Whyte was one of the best possible persons to send abroad amidst such a population. His fidelity and zeal sustained him in the performance of his arduous duties, his clear understanding and accurate information enabled him to deal with the ignorant and persons of unsound principles, and his perfect prudence and propriety of conversation and conduct qualified him to mingle with men of all opinions, both in politics and religion, without either offending or misleading any of them. I venture to say, he enjoyed the most cordial esteem of persons of the most opposite sentiments. In a way peculiar to himself, he held his own firm and decided opinions, and yet did not alienate the hearts of others from him, so as to close their ears against instruction. Besides visiting the people in their own houses several days every week, he preached twice every Sabbath-day at canonical hours in two school rooms in different parts of the town. He enjoyed great acceptance, both in private and public, and what was far better, God honoured his labours by making him useful to the souls of various persons. He led some to attend upon public worship who had long neglected it, and was privileged to be the instrument of leading others from darkness to light, and from the power of sin and Satan to the service of the true and living God. The attachment of these persons to him was remarkable, and accordingly, when he returned, after he had been some time in Lochwinnoch, to preach on the sacramental fast-day at Kilmarnock, a number of them were collected at the gate of St. Marnoch's to have an opportunity of seeing and speaking to their old

Instructor. Many of those persons whom he brought to attend his ministrations in the missionary stations "being now clothed and in their right mind," have become regular members of St. Marnoch's congregation. Such are some of the fruits of Dr Chalmers' plan of "excavating" a degenerate population, and leading them back to their attendance upon the worship of God and the ordinances of religion. Nor was it to those only among whom he steadily laboured that he recommended himself. In the large town of Kilmarnock he was often called to mingle with the more affluent and influential inhabitants, and by them he was esteemed, not merely on account of the propriety of his conduct and the urbanity of his manners, but the more intelligent and serious among them enjoyed and profited by his rational and serious conversation. I am persuaded, however, that none esteemed him more than his fellow-labourers in the ministry. The venerable Dr M'Kinlay has naturally retired, in a great measure, from extraordinary duties, though at the age of eighty years he preaches regularly and vigorously every Lord's day; and as the mission was not connected with Mr Hamilton's parish, he was not brought into so close a connection and frequent intercourse with that amiable and good man, but Mr Strong, the second minister of the Low Church, took a special interest in the mission, and provided for it. This active and popular young minister, who was nearer Mr Whyte's age and standing, gave the best proof of his esteem and affection for him, by treating him like a companion or a brother.

Mr Whyte made no attempt to find a better situation than the one he occupied in Kilmarnock, for one of his principles was not to seek for any place but to go where Providence called him. Perhaps he exercised too much delicacy regarding this matter, and certainly went beyond the maxim of the famous Philip Henry, who was wont to say that "we should follow providence and not force it." In the spring, however, of 1836, he was invited to preach at Lochwinnoch, where the Missionary station had become vacant, in consequence of the removal of the Rev. Mr Munro to Rutherglen, and as there was the prospect of a new church, he complied with the invitation, and was chosen by a large majority. On the third Sabbath of April he commenced his labours in this new sphere, where he continued till his last illness. This situation, though in other respects easy and comfortable, was, in one respect, difficult at first. Mr Munro, besides being a person of excellent talents and warm affections, was a native of the place, and in his case this operated to his advantage instead of disadvantage. He knew every person thoroughly, and had a claim upon the sympathies of many of them; and with that tact and talent at making himself agreeable, for which he is remarkable, he could gain more ascendancy over them than any other person. Besides, his public preaching being remarkable for clearness and earnestness, fancy and feeling, made a great impression, and he soon became a great favourite. The people, deprived of such a person, could not turn at once, with entire cordiality, to another; and Mr Whyte required to be known for some time in order to be fully appreciated and valued. He was modest and prudent in his behaviour, and cautious and reserved in his conversation with strangers; and his discourses were rather solid and serious than showy and pathetic. But he soon gained the approbation and esteem of the wise and good, and incurred the censure of none. By becoming more communicative as he increased in acquaintance, the stores of his mind were opened, and the excellences of his character were developed. His hearers soon found that his discourses were replete with instruction and Gospel truth, and had all the most salutary tendency. He was always at his post and regular in the discharge of every duty. This enabled him to visit the sick and dying regularly and frequently, and by them his ministrations were most highly valued. His easy and accessible manner,—his admirable explanations of the Scriptures,—and his patient and kind attention to all in circumstances when the mind is most susceptible of serious impressions, had a most salutary effect. In a word, when it was found necessary he was ready to serve every one, and never, by any accident, offended any person. Those who knew him best, were loudest in his praise, and he soon became a universal favourite; he gained in the esteem and affection of his people every day he lived among them.

It might have been supposed that, in these circumstances, "as he ne'er did change, so he ne'er would have wished to change his place." And neither would he if he had always enjoyed the clear prospect of a permanent settlement in Lochwinnoch. But as no active steps were taken for sometime towards the erection of a new church, and he became doubtful about his prospects there, he accepted, though he did not work, invitations to preach as a candidate for two other places. In both of these he failed of success. This disappointment affected his modest and sensitive mind very much, for instead of viewing it as he ought to have done, as an evidence that he might sometimes fail in a comparative trial, he looked upon it as a proof that he was not likely to succeed in this, the chief way now, of obtaining a situation in the Church. But his faith and resignation, humility and devotion, were just the more remarkably displayed under these disappointments. "I desire," said he, in a letter to a very kind and valued friend, "I desire to resign myself to the disposal of Providence. If God sees meet to continue me in some subordinate place in the Church the most humble is too great for my deserts. What good may yet flow from this disappointment it is impossible at present to say, but God bids me confide in this that it shall yet prove for good. In the meantime I would desire to improve it by seeking to be more deeply humbled under a sense of my unworthiness of any, the least office in the Church,—to be more submissive to His high and holy will, and to be more diligent in the work to which I am at present appointed. The time will soon be when we must all give in our account, and then if not sooner, perhaps, I shall see the goodness of God in keeping me in a station befitting my abilities, rather than in one more accordant with my ambitious selfish wishes. When we have to give an account of our stewardship, he who has a situation of least responsibility, and the charge of fewest souls, will find his responsibility sufficiently great." His best friends at Lochwinnoch rejoiced at this disappointment, not because they were indifferent to his feelings, but because it secured the continuance of his ministrations among them. Active measures were immediately taken to build a new church, and nothing then troubled him except the temporary apprehension of another popular election, from which he had shrunk, after the disappointments with which he had so lately met. This feeling, however, soon passed away; and I have no doubt that after the erection of the church he would have been appointed to it, and every wise and good man rejoiced in the prospect of having so able and faithful a minister of the New Testament permanently settled among them. He now addressed himself steadily and without distraction to his work, and was as happy as he was highly esteemed. Here he stood more than in any former situation upon the footing of a regular minister. He had the superintendence of the town population of the parish, which he visited not several days every week, like Missionaries in larger places, but once or twice a-week as he found it convenient. In a town containing a population of somewhat less than three thousand souls he did not meet either with the misery or crime that prevail among a larger population, but moved about among a well-conditioned people, who respected the character and received his visits with gratitude. All the more affluent inhabitants esteemed it a great privilege to see him and enjoy his society; the families with which he was most closely connected and frequently associated, retain an impression of his character which can never be effaced, and never was a man more universally esteemed and beloved. All this, too, he could appreciate and enjoy, and he declared that he was, perhaps, never so happy during any period of his life. He felt as if it were too much, and that he wanted one mark of a Christian, that "through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of heaven." As if he had enjoyed a presentment of what lay before him, he wondered if his privileges and comforts would be continued. These, alas! were now about to terminate. His last illness and death, however, we reserve for a subsequent article.

THE CONVERSION OF A HINDU YOUTH.

Extract of a Letter from Rev. W. S. Mackay to the Convener of the General Assembly's Committee.—Calcutta, 24th March 1837.

[It would perhaps be difficult, in the entire annals of missions, to find an account of the conversion of a heathen more fraught with varied interest, than that which is here submitted to our readers, and earnestly recommended to their attentive and prayerful perusal. What a precious earnest of the rich harvest of fruit that promises, ere long, to be reaped by the General Assembly's Missionaries in India! And how ought such an account to stimulate a hundred-fold the missionary zeal and active benevolence of the Christian public at home.]

The school has been visited by the Governor-General, (Lord Auckland,) and his two sisters; they staid a long time, walked round the buildings, and saw nearly all the classes examined. They seemed much interested, and expressed their high opinion of the school to Mr Charles in very flattering terms. His Lordship's visit is important, as being the first ever made by a Governor-General to a Missionary school; and thus showing that our cause is gaining ground. But it is still more important, from particular circumstances connected with Dwar-Kanath's case; for the favourable effects which it has produced on the native mind, have served to counterbalance the outcry against the school, raised by the native newspapers, and we have now about seven hundred and twenty scholars on the list.

Dwar-Kanath's baptism is a most gratifying instance of the efficacy,—not of the labours of this or that individual,—but of the system pursued in your institution. The class to which he belongs consists of about thirty scholars, and Mr Ewart and myself, for some time back, have paid particular attention to it, regarding it as in all respects the most promising class in the school. Such of them as are willing come to Mr Ewart on the Sabbath mornings; and all read the evidences three times a-week with me.

Several of the boys seemed occasionally thoughtful, and we knew that there was much discussion among themselves on the subject of religion, but Dwar-Kanath was not one of those who in any way came out from the rest. About the time of my dear wife's death he suddenly disappeared from the school, and there were vague rumours that he had been forcibly carried off by his father, but we could not get at the truth, until he himself one day walked into our house, and told us his story. It seems that in some discussions on religion, which took place in his father's house, he had expressed himself so strongly in favour of Christianity, that his relatives became alarmed, and his father determined, at all risks, to hinder him from being baptized. Accordingly, one night he was seized a palankeen; while they were on board a river to put him on board a police to his aid, but his youth was mad, and they were then taken to his father's days' journey from Calcutta. cords so tightly round the neck to use his hands from the were now taken off, and iron arms. He was confined in every day by his father. But tinned inflexible. I asked him pity him, he said that the first and beaten like a wild beast, afterwards she also spoke he boy bore the cruel treatment until at length, the father, flexible determination, gave and allowed him to go back the threats and solicitations mediate returned to school, candidate for baptism. We t Charles to baptize him, and to Mr Charles once a-week We soon found that he had a of the leading doctrines of the dences, than we had imagined. sign which man could reasona been under the teaching of t while we were preparing to be carried away by his father, a house in the country, where his pare for his reception at ho Dwar-Kanath made his escape to a neighbouring Missionary; to defray his expenses to Calcu bank of the river till he found prise and delight, walked into had before determined that if h we should give it him, for we threatened his life, and we kn instance where similar threats cution. I, therefore, made a n he lived in our house, going a school with Mr Ewart. We w tized immediately as there coul fitness; but Mr Charles, to a precipitancy, wished to put off or two longer, and to this we sent.

When the father found that escaped from him a second time ing with us, his rage knew no after his son's return, he came t or five of his friends, asking to was immediately admitted, and daily for several days, having sometimes alone, sometimes in man is of a violent and deter much of the ingenuity of his e than their usual spirit. In conv dom lost temper, for we spok kindly, as we could not but pity ther, whose son was about to l what he considered to be worse t in speaking to his son, the expu nance changed at once: his wh passion, he abused him, mocked h on him with his teeth. At on with his son in Bengalee, he tu plained most bitterly that his u him in the grossest language; b their conversation, and the boy b most sensible and moderate answe an offence against God, and unworthy of a father, to speak falsehood before his son; he immediately turned round to his friends, and said he certainly had been telling us a lie, but he would go to the Ganges, and make an atonement, which would set all right.

Seeing that violence only made matters worse, he reminded Dwar-Kanath that he was the oldest son, and that his father-in-law (for Dwar-Kanath is married) had no heir-male; he told him (and the father-in-law confirmed it) that he should inherit all they had; and he pointed out to him certain instances of Hindus, who had been baptized, and were now begging in the streets, assuring him that such would be his fate, as soon as the éclat of his baptism was over. He then ran up to him, and threw his arms round his neck, begging him not to leave his own father and mother, and all that loved him, for strangers and foreigners. It was a scene very painful to us, so painful, indeed, that we all went out, and left them together. Poor Dwar-Kanath behaved nobly. He said that he knew that there was salvation in Christ Jesus, and that he was willing and determined to leave all for him. The father then left him and came to us. His plea to us was, that the boy was quite ignorant of his own religion, and two months under age; and he promised, if we would let Dwar-Kanath go home for a year or two, and if, at the end of that time, the boy was still determined to be a Christian, that we should find no opposition from him; but if not, he would apply to the supreme court immediately for a writ of habeas corpus, and we should not see the boy any more. We told him that his son was free to go or stay as he pleased, and that we had not interfered, even by a word, to keep him with us. I then took him aside, and appealed to his better feelings, as a father, and as a creature of God, hastening like myself into eternity. This I could do with more effect, as he himself, in consequence of late events, had been reading the New Testament, and acknowledged its excellence. At one time he seemed to hesitate, but, after a short pause, he cried out, "No! no! it cannot be; I cannot bear to see my son a Christian!" Poor man! he was unable to conceive that there could be life or truth in our religion; and this somewhat extenuates his faults, for I verily believe that he imputes his son's conduct to obstinacy, and ours to interested motives.

He had several interviews with his son,—all equally unavailing. But the question of Dwar-Kanath's age was very embarrassing. The legal age is sixteen: and from the positive statements of the boy, of many of his friends, and even of the father himself formerly, we knew him to be fully seventeen years of age. His horoscope had been lost; and, of course, if the father chose in the supreme court, to declare he was under age, nothing that we could bring forward would be of any use. This he was determined to do; and we saw nothing before us, but losing the boy again. I consulted Mr Leith, an eminent barrister here, and was sorry to have our worst suspicions confirmed: for not only could the father take away the son, but he might legally confine, beat, and torture him; in fact, according to the law of caste, use any violence short of putting him to death. In this stage of the business, we were most agreeably surprised by a formal manifesto from the father, (in the Chundrika, a native newspaper, the organ of the idolatrous party,) giving up his son. The following is a literal translation:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHUNDRIKA.

"SIR,—My boy, Dwar-Kanath Bhoose, who is about fifteen years old, and has been learning the English language at Mr Duff's school for three years,—by the cunning instructions which he received in that school,—has despised my religion; and, therefore, I have cast him out. The Missionaries have not yet baptized him, tempted me for our religion, have induced me to cast him out; and, therefore, I hope you will kindly publish this in your Chundrika, and thereby let it be known to the Hindu community, that I have given him up, and have no connection with him. KISHOR BHOSE.

"P. S.—This Dwar-Kanath Bhoose has no right to my property; and, moreover, shall not perform my funeral ceremony."

However, this was only a ruse to throw us off our guard: for next day, we received a letter from an attorney, warning us to give up the person of the boy whom we detained. By the advice of Mr Wilson, an elder of the Kirk, and also an attorney, I answered this letter, simply stating that the boy was at liberty, and had never been detained by us. The father, however, had no intention of carrying the case into the supreme court, partly from the hollowness of his cause, and partly from the expense: but two or three days after, Mr Ewart's carriage was stopped at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, in the most crowded street in Calcutta, his horse was thrown down; and the boy forcibly taken away by his father, and a hired band of vagabonds. Mr Ewart had recourse again to Mr Leith for advice; and we attribute much of the fortunate issue to that gentleman, who, in the hurry of an extensive practice, took an active share in the case; gave Mr Ewart the benefit of his advice; went with him to the police office; and, together with his lady, seemed as much interested in Dwar-Kanath as one of ourselves. I need scarce say that he refused all remuneration. By his advice, Mr Ewart prosecuted the father for an assault, with the view of calling for Dwar-Kanath as a witness, and thus, if possible, getting some protection for him. But it had been better ordered in the providence of God. It will scarcely be believed that Dwar-Kanath escaped a third time from the hands of his jailers; and not before time, for they had already begun to give him a drug, with the view of gradually destroying his intellect. It so happened, that a very great holiday occurred, which requires a particular conjunction of the planets, and happens only once in thirty years. Thousands and thousands flocked into Calcutta, to bathe in the Ganges; and the house where Dwar-Kanath was confined was left empty by all but a servant appointed to watch over him. The servant fell asleep; and the boy, seizing the opportunity, let himself down from a window ten feet high, and made for Mr Charles's house; because he knew that pursuit would be made in the direction of our house, and that Mr C.'s lay in the opposite direction. Mr Ewart went for him: he was produced in court, and swore that he thought his life was in danger: his father was then bound down to keep the peace towards him; and two police officers were sent to our house, to prevent his abduction. When his father got him into his power the third time, he abused him loudly, and threatened to kill him, without witnesses, so that nothing could be proved against him. Dwar-Kanath said to him, (as he tells me,) "Father, I am as determined as you are. You may kill my body, but you cannot kill my soul; and, when I am at liberty, I tell you plainly, nothing shall keep me from being baptized." I need not say with what gladness we received him back, and saw him admitted into the Christian fellowship by Mr Charles. His probation was long and painful, such as few are called upon to undergo; but his strength was not his own. I have not left myself room for reflections, nor are they needed. I know you will sympathise with him. He is now an inmate of my house, and I trust will continue to be so, until he is ready to go out as a Missionary to his brethren. During all these trying scenes, he has evinced steadiness, self-possession, and intelligence far beyond his years; and, so far as I have seen, without example among his own countrymen.

May God make him a burning and a shining light, when we are in the grave!

Another young man, (older than Dwar-Kanath, but in the same class,) of very good abilities, was often observed to be thoughtful. He was attacked by fever, and died: but, on his death-bed, he declared to some of his class-fellows, that he had something on his mind; he then told them, that he believed in Christ, and, if he ever rose from his bed, he was resolved to be baptized. He never rose; but, I hope, he is now in heaven.

ANALOGY BETWEEN THE DEATH OF MAN AND THE SACRIFICE OF CHRIST:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES C. BURNS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, London Wall, London.

"As it is appointed unto men once to die,.....so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many."—HEB. ix. 27, 28.

It is the glorious peculiarity of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, as it is the sure evidence of its truth, that it corresponds, at all points, with the testimony of those other two witnesses, whose authority and veracity all mankind acknowledge, namely, with the testimony of experience, which may be said to represent the great world without, and with the testimony of conscience, which represents the little world within; that it not only corresponds with their respective testimonies, but that it illustrates, and reconciles, and confirms them; and, what is best of all, that whatever, in the conclusion to which they lead, or in the discoveries which they bring to us, is dark or gloomy,—whatever is fitted to overwhelm the human spirit by its mysteriousness or its terror, it relieves and eradicates by its own appropriate revelations of wisdom and mercy. For example, (as we are reminded in the words of the text,) experience teaches us, that we "must needs die," and are "as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again;" there being no exception to the rule, which, from the beginning of the world's history, we find to have been universal, that "the dust returns to the earth as it was," that "man goeth to his long home," whatever skill or power may be used to detain him; and reason teaches us, that after death we must needs be judged, there being so much of irregularity and confusion in the present aspect of the affairs of men, that except, on the supposition of a future reckoning and adjustment, we should be compelled to doubt whether we lived under a moral government at all. But experience, though guided by all the lights of reason and philosophy, cannot tell us why it is that such a thing as death exists; why into a world, which else is so fair and beautiful, which bears on its surface so many of the monuments and emblems of immortality, and which, but for the universal gloom that covers it as the dwelling-place of the dying, and the sepulchre of the dead, would seem to contain every thing that is needed to make us happy; why into such a world as this, an intruder so unwelcome, an enemy so relentless, should have been permitted to enter, and that under the government of a wise and benevolent God. Neither can conscience, in its clearest revelations, reveal to us, as a matter of certainty, that there is to be a final judgment, nor why it is that that has become so necessary, nor if it does take place, on what principles it will be conducted, nor to what extent it will be carried, nor what results shall follow it. Here, however, the Gospel comes in, with its supplementary and satisfying information, telling us, that death is neither an original, nor an essential, nor yet an accidental attribute of our nature, but that it is the sovereign appointment of God,—an appointment which the entrance of sin into the world, that first and worst intrusion, rendered just and necessary: and that judgment, which owes its origin to a similar cause, as it is absolutely certain hereafter, so it has been purposely delayed now; that in this world, the preliminary steps of the process only are taken, the indictment served, the warning given, the materials of probation collected and prepared, while in the world to come, the actual decision is pronounced, the sentence executed, and the allotment for eternity assigned to every son and daughter of Adam: "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."

In affording us this information, however, if it had done no more, the Gospel could scarcely be said to have conferred a boon: it were no boon to tell a man, labouring under a virulent disease, where, or how, he caught the infection, if you did not tell him likewise how he might obtain a cure; nor would it be any substantial benefit to an accused or guilty man, to recount to him all the particulars of his approaching trial, to tell him of the time that had been set, of the witnesses that had been summoned, of the jury that had been sworn, and of the principles of law according to which his verdict would be pronounced; if you did not point out to him also some available method of defence, if you did not encourage him by the hope of acquittal and of safety. And so neither would the Gospel have achieved any service worthy of its name, if, along with the solution of the mystery of death, it had brought no tidings of kindlier and more joyful import, or if, when it proclaimed in the ears of a slumbering world, the great and momentous fact of "a judgment to come," it had afforded no intimation of a refuge for the guilty, of a way of escape to the self-convicted and the lost. But this farther service, the text assures us, the Gospel has done; for here the apostle brings before us, as a sample of its peculiar disclosures, other two facts of corresponding magnitude to set over against those of which he had previously spoken; and not only so, but, as when a man of war, who has bravely fought and conquered, sometimes carries his victorious arms into the heart of his enemies' country, and gathers thence the proudest memorials of his triumph; he so uses and applies the otherwise appalling themes of death and judgment, as that in his hands, they are stript of half their terrors, being made not merely to present an apt and vivid contrast to those brighter discoveries which he unfolds of atonement and salvation, but likewise to become subservient to the illustration and enhancement of their reality and glory. "For," says he, "as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

There is, then, in these words, an analogy traced between the appointment of God in regard to man, and his appointment in regard to Christ "the Son of Man;" there is a parallel drawn between those two events, which are the consequents of sin, and those other two which are the means of salvation. To illustrate, in the former part of it, this analogy under one or two of its leading aspects, shall be my object in the following discourse:

I. "As it is appointed unto men to die, so Christ was offered to bear the sins of many." We are thus reminded of the character of certainty by which both these facts in common are distinguished—their unquestionable reality and truth. The certainty of death, first of all, is what I need not surely stay to demonstrate to any one who hears me. You know it, brethren, and you feel it. And though, doubtless, you often contrive to live and act as if you did not believe what you knew, though there are many people in the world who could scarcely be more regardless of it than they are, though they had discovered the art of escaping it—the secret of immortality; yet it is not, you will at once admit, from the lack of proofs and of warnings, (more loud and solemn than ought which human tongue could utter,) but rather from their superabundance, that any one of you has thus been able to acquire the faculty of forgetfulness. You live in the midst of death; you have the "sentence of death in yourselves;" you are "dying daily;" you are dying now; you are advancing always nearer, never going farther from the point at which the messenger waits to meet you. You are lavishly expending every moment, never hoarding up nor increasing the strength, which, in that hour of fierce encounter, is to be laid prostrate—the breath of life which is then to breathe out, to expire. And if, than the testimony of your own experience, any could be deemed more convincing, such a testimony has recently been furnished to you and your fellow-countrymen, in the experience of one "who, if aught within the reach of human effort could have availed, would still have lived to sway the sceptre of peace and righteousness over these realms, whom God had invested with an office and a name, which is the very type and image of his own undying sovereignty, who, in the execution of his honourable, his god-like functions, was upborne by a nation's loyalty and a nation's prayer, but whom neither the dignity of his station, nor the glittering fascination of his wealth, nor the skill of his physicians, nor the love and attachment of his people, could exempt from the stroke beneath which he has fallen, or retain for one moment beyond that solemn hour, when amid the solitude of a bed of languishing, and the stillness of a midnight scene, it was "appointed unto him to die!" "I have said, ye are gods, and all of you children of the Most High; but ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes."

* To explain this allusion it may be mentioned, that this Discourse was preached on the first Sabbath after the death of his Majesty William the Fourth.

It is not, however, merely as a matter of history and fact, that you are here reminded of the certainty of death, (in that view of it, the sinner and the saint stand on a footing precisely similar,) but chiefly as a matter of faith—of faith in its certainty, as the irrevocable ordinance of God. And this is a view of it, which though less fashionable and familiar, it is far more profitable to take. God hath said in his Word, "The wages of sin is death;" and it is just because he has said so, and for no other reason, that death continues to exist; that, in the midst of all other discoveries, no discovery has ever yet been made of a specific to overcome, or of a charm to ward it off; that among the countless tribes and generations of men whom it has successively invaded, not one solitary being has, even by accident, escaped, or been able to survive its stroke. It is not that the law of nature requires a man to die, for there is no such law; the God of nature never revealed it; the works of nature contradict and disprove it; but it is that the law of God's moral government required it; and that in virtue of the sentence which by that law he has pronounced, he is bound to see that its mandate be rigidly and impartially executed. It is infidelity, and nothing else, which leads the world to talk of death as "the debt of nature,"—nature never incurred such a debt; the nature of man was created, if I must so speak, solvent and immortal; it was sin which contracted the debt, and it is the sinner alone who pays it. It is therefore, I repeat, because God is holy to hate sin, and just to punish it, and true to execute every word, whether of promise or menace, which has gone forth out of his mouth,—it is for these reasons, and for none besides, that the ordination of which the apostle speaks, was first enacted in the day when Adam fell; and that now, after ages of vicissitude and change have come and gone, no change has happened to modify or annul the declaration of the text, "that it is appointed unto men to die."

But now, my friends, let me invite you to turn your thoughts for a little to the corresponding fact, of which the apostle makes mention in the history of Christ. "So Christ was offered to bear the sins of many!" "He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross;" "it pleased the Lord to bruise him;" and "the Lord laid on him," or caused to meet in him, "the iniquity of us all." Is that fact, think you, equally certain with the former? It is, and its certainty rests on precisely the same grounds,—not merely on the ground of historical proof, but on the ground of divine determination and appointment.

God said to Adam, "In the day that thou eatest, thou shalt die," and thus death, "entering into the world by sin, hath passed upon all men, inasmuch as all have sinned." God said also to the second Adam, "Thou shalt die," and even as in the former case, the principles of God's moral government required him to perpetuate the consequences of Adam's sin, so in the latter, they require him to perpetuate the benefits of Christ's obedience. For herein, you will observe, lies the parallel, "as it is appointed unto men to die," all of them inheriting death from Adam, and sin as its cause, so Christ died, or "was offered to bear," i. e., to expiate "the sins of many," all of whom inherit life from him, the second Adam, and righteousness as its cause. It is in its vicarious character, that the death of Christ is thus represented as a real sacrifice of substitution, as that very atonement, which had been shadowed forth by type, and emblem, and prophecy, from the beginning of the world, which was first announced in the same moment that the sentence of death was recorded against the human race, and which, in like manner, as its dire effects have pervaded all time, and are destined to continue till the end, is possessed of a virtue to which there is no limit, and exerts its saving efficacy on every one of those who are the selected objects of it.

Thus certain is it, that Jesus died—that he died "as an offering and a sacrifice to God." And mark now, I beseech you, the bearing which the one certainty, spoken of in the text, has upon the other, and the bearing which both of them have upon you. "It is appointed for you to die;" the reason of that appointment is, that you are sinners, not that God "desires your death," but that you deserve it, being sinners. You are unquestionably subject, as such, to his displeasure, against whom you have sinned. The inevitableness of death, proves that, so far as you are concerned, God's anger is inevitable too; that you are at this moment, unless you have been pardoned and reconciled by a special act of grace, lying under it. You are thus in a situation of extreme danger, and, if you were fully alive to it, of extremest misery. You are liable every moment to "be delivered into the bitter pains of eternal death;" but the message which I am here commissioned to bring to you is, that Jesus has already died, and that not for himself, but for you. He has died to "bear the sin," and to bear it away, because of which it is that you suffer. If you will give him leave, he is ready to make over to you the entire benefit of his death; and though he does not promise thereby to exempt you from the stroke of mortality, he does promise to exempt you from what is immeasurably worse—from the wrath of him whose stroke it is, and to give you a share in all those "good and perfect gifts," which divine benevolence and power are able to confer upon you. "The sting of death is sin, but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

II. "As it is appointed unto men once to die, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many." There is an obvious analogy here traced between the unity of these two events, as well as the certainty. Indeed, it is mainly to exhibit this feature of the atonement of Christ, that the apostle makes use of the illustration. In the foregoing verses, he had been proving from various considerations the superiority of Christ's sacrifice to those which were offered under the law; and among the other points of contrast which he mentions as subsisting between them, this was one—that whereas the Jewish sacrifices needed to be frequently repeated, because of their inherent worthlessness and inefficiency, the perfection of Christ's sacrifice gave it both a retrospective and a prospective efficacy, which superseded the necessity of any repetition of it until the end of time. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us: Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others. For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once, in the end of the world, hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And as it is appointed unto men once to die, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many!"

The unity of these two analogous events, then, is here intended to remind us of the completeness or perfection of each,—its completeness in relation to the purpose which it was designed to serve. Brethren, you have only "once to die;" and this, so far from being an alleviation of your sentence, as you might naturally be disposed to regard it, (considering the manifold associations of a painful and a humbling kind which it brings along with it, and which, to encounter more than once, would seem beyond the limit of human endurance,) is, when rightly considered, one of its greatest aggravations,—one of the strongest proofs that could be found of the fearful amount of importance which God, at least, attaches to your solitary tasting of death. You have once to die, and,

1. Thus, you are reminded, that the sentence which condemns you is then fully executed. There is, in the single infliction, and that, too, the work of a moment, "the twinkling of an eye," such a clear and undoubted manifestation of the forthputting of God's hand, for the specific purpose of inflicting it,—such a visible and impressive exhibition of the truth, and holiness, and justice, by which he is committed to the punishment of sin, that it needs not, for any useful purpose, though the thing itself were possible, to be repeated; the demonstration could not be plainer than it is, though you were to die twice or thrice, or many times; yea, it could not be by any means so plain, for then it might be urged, with some show of reason, as it has actually, though most absurdly, been, that death is natural to man as an organized being,—that there is nothing more in it remarkable than in any of those organic changes to which the inferior animals are subject in the different stages of their being,—whereas, in virtue of the peculiar arrangement that exists, whereby all mankind die once, and none of them more, we see in each instance of mortality that happens around us, whether it be of the little babe that inherits the mortality of its parents, along with their sin, or of the old and hardened transgressor, who is driven away in his wickedness, and sinks into a dishonoured grave, a new evidence of the faithfulness of God in executing even the severest denunciations of his Word,—a new illustration of the true saying in the text, that “it is appointed unto men once to die.” Thus, too, you are reminded,

2. That the issues depending on your death are then finally decided. Whatever be the consequences resulting from it, they are then ascertained and fixed irrevocably. As no man hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit in the day of death, still less has any man power to recall it when it is gone. If a mistake be then committed, the mistake is then irremediable. If a false step be taken, the man who takes it, can only leave a warning to others behind him, to be more wary. This, indeed, would be a matter of little moment, if, as the infidel says, death were an eternal sleep; or if, as the Romanist says, there be a place of purgatory, into which death forms the entrance, where all former errors may be corrected, and all former crimes expiated and forgiven; but if, as Scripture declares, death be the introduction of the soul into the manifested presence of the High and Holy One,—if it be the termination of its day of grace—the beginning of its changeless destiny,—if it rivet for eternity the guilt of him who dies unforgiven, and perpetuates in deeper and darker shades of moral turpitude the depravity of him, whether he be prince or peasant, Jew or Gentile, bond or free, who dies unrenewed, then the unity of death becomes a matter of vast, of incalculable magnitude. It serves to concentrate within the brief space of the hour or the moment which it occupies, all that is big with grandeur and solemnity in the countless ages that come after. It holds in its hand, as it were, the balance on whose vibration depends the decision to every man of this one important question, whether he is to spend his eternity in heaven or in hell.

But now, again, let us turn our thoughts from this unattractive, though most salutary theme of contemplation, to that other glorious truth whose brightness shines forth from amid the gloom which envelopes it. “So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many.” “In that he died, he died unto sin once.”

1. Here, too, we are reminded, that the sentence or decree of God the Father, in obedience to which he died, was then fully executed. His death was the termination at once of his obedience and his sufferings,—it was the finishing of the work which had been given him to do. As by dying once, Adam, the father of us all, realized the penalty, so by dying once, Christ fulfilled the promise. As God’s justice was vindicated in the one, his grace was displayed in the other—this truth was magnified in both. In like manner, too, as Adam died in his representative capacity, so that all men must be said to die along with him, so that all his posterity would have died although none of them had ever sinned after the similitude of his transgression; so “Christ, also, hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.” And in virtue of his one sacrifice, he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified; by his single death he exhausted whatever was penal in the sentence to his people; he dissevered death from its connection with sin; he abolished it in every thing except the name, and in the place of it, he purchased “the gift of God which is eternal life through him.” And so you are reminded,

2. That by his once offering of himself, Christ not only settled all former demands, but likewise all the future consequences that were to follow from his death. His death on Calvary was the era from which all future history was to derive its origin and its name,—it was the birth-day of that new and everlasting age which then dawned upon the world,—it was the one grand epoch that is recognized in the annals of eternity! Then the ceremonial law was abrogated,—then the moral law was established on its proper basis,—then the ministry of terror ceased, and the ministry of peace began,—then the Christian Church was established, and the Christian revelation disclosed,—then the world was, for the first time, blessed with the full apparatus of spiritual renovation, and the foundation-stone was laid of that spiritual edifice which ever since God has been rearing among fallen men, and which is “to grow up into an holy temple in the Lord.” And as the Saviour’s death was thus decisive in its results to mankind generally, so likewise is it still in its results to each individual sinner who believes it. From the instant that a connection is formed between his soul and Christ, so as to participate in the benefits of his death, the whole current of that man’s history is changed: He is crucified with Christ,—he is conformed to his death,—he is also buried along with him; he ceases any longer to be a citizen, though still an inhabitant, of this earth; he becomes, by anticipation, a citizen of heaven; he is adopted as the child of God; he has his sins pardoned, and his heart renewed; and he acquires the elements of a holy character, which is to expand and brighten as he proceeds onward in his journey through this world, and which, on his entrance into another, is to reach its full development and perfection amidst the unfading glories of heaven.

THE STING FISH.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDSBOUGH,
Minister of Stevenston.

WE know much less of the habits and history of the fish of the sea, than of the beasts of the field or of the fowls of the air. The beasts of the field may be follow them to their wildest hiding-places. The fowls of the air cannot be always on the wing; and though they were, man can send after them the winged arrow or the more deadly hail-shot. But fishes inhabit an element in which man cannot exist; and though by the net, and by the hook, and by the harpoon, he can cruelly assert some of his original dominion, the poor captives cannot be removed from the watery element but at the expense of their lives; much of their beauty soon disappears, and though in a lifeless state, we may become acquainted with their form, we cannot judge of their motions and habits.

And, yet, little comparatively as we know about the inhabitants of the deep, we must be blind if we do not see the wisdom and goodness of God in various parts of their structure and history. Instead of entering into particulars, let us merely refer to the provision God has made for their defence. Were we to extend our remarks to the molluscous tribes of shell fish whose bodies are so exceedingly soft and tender, we could not but admire the protection afforded them in their shelly habitations, which God has given them the power of forming and enlarging according to their growth; and which, in many cases, are so remarkable for the richness of their colouring and the beauty of their shape. Some of them have an additional defence in the firmness with which they can cling to the rocks, or the rapidity with which, like the spout fish, (solen siliqua,) they can dart into the wet sand. Others there are, who, instead of burrowing in the shifting sand, have their place of refuge in a stable munition of rocks. The borer family (pholus) is of this description, two species of which are found in the rocks at Saltcoats. Inadequate as one would think them for the task, they can bore a hole in the rock suited to their size, as regularly as if done with a carpenter's auger; and so deep, that on any alarm they can retreat into it, and be safe.* Others there are who bore into the hardest wood. Teredo navalis, the ship worm, and the scourge of shipping, is too well known to need any description, though it would save many precious lives, and much expensive copping of vessels, if we knew how to prevent its attacks. The wood-eater (xylophaga dorsalis) is much rarer, though occasionally found in floating wood on this coast. It has a beautiful little shell, singularly grooved and striated, and so limber that it is seldom found entire; and yet by a process which we cannot explain, as it works not only under water, but in the dark, it can scoop out a cell for itself in the hardest wood, so that the piece of timber chosen as the residence of a colony of wood-eaters, soon becomes like a honey-comb.

But ascending from invertebral to vertebral animals, from shell-fish to fishes, we shall see other means of defence provided. Not to speak of the scales which form the general defensive armature of fishes; nor of the osseous plates which, in some of the larger fishes, occupy the place of scales; nor of the formidable teeth with which many of them are amply furnished; let us advert for a little to those that have spines as defensive weapons, or rather to one of this class with which of late I became better acquainted. It is considered as rare

* I found numerous specimens of pholus dactylus lately in this parish, not in rocks in the sea, their natural place of abode, but in the quarry at Ardeer, a mile from the sea. In extending the quarry, the workmen having removed five feet of soil, came to a bed of sea-shells and gravel, and under this they found a thick stratum of shale or slate-slay. This rock I found perforated in many places by the pholus dactylus or borer. The shell, though frail through age, was still in the mouth of the hole, and at the bottom of each hole I found a matted tuft of sea-weed, not petrified, not rotten, but still retaining some of its sap, and so uninjured, that by its puckerings, and minute reticulations, I could easily ascertain it to be enteromorpha intestinalis. The quarry must once have been under the dominion of the sea; but as we have no written record of this, it is not a little wonderful to find so perishable a substance as sea-weed undecomposed after the lapse of probably more than a thousand years! As far as I know, this is the first instance of sub-fossil sea-weed being found so fresh that the species could be ascertained.

many could wish, for it is far from being a favourite. By men of science, it is known under the formidable name of trachinus draco, by fishermen on the west coast, it is called the souter, from its awl-shaped spines; and by boys it is generally called the stanger, or sting-fish, and it is well entitled to the name, as we shall afterwards see.

As a juvenile party were lately catching sand-eels on the shore of this parish, and paddling in the water in search of the eels in the wet sand, a fine boy of the party feeling a fish under his foot, put down his hand, and finding, when he had caught it, that it was not an eel, he held up, with delight, his glittering prize. An elder boy, however, crying out, a stanger! he instantly cast it into the sea, and laughed with joy at having escaped, as he thought, unscathed. But his laughter was soon turned into weeping; for though at first he felt no pain, and saw no wound, in about half a minute the pain became so excruciating, that he was constrained to scream out, and he ran home in a state of great anguish, arising from pain and fear. And we can scarcely wonder at his fear, as he had not heard of the sting-fish before; and found when he reached home, that his acute pain still continued, and that his hand had become inflamed and swollen. He was advised to plunge the hand into hot water, and was glad to find that the pain soon subsided, and that it was nearly well next day.

This fish, when full grown, is about a foot in length, and of considerable beauty. It is silvery below, the back is a light olive colour, and the sides are marked with two or three longitudinal and numerous transverse yellow lines. The first dorsal fin is black, as is also part of the caudal or tail fin. But what we mean chiefly to notice is, its powerful weapons of defence. The black fin on the back is furnished with five spines, which it can elevate at will. There is also a strong spine on each gill cover, and two in the snout. The five back spines, and perhaps the others, are covered with a venomous substance, which it has the power of secreting; and part of this venom lodging in the wounds they inflict, causes the acute pain which those who are stung by it experience.

Instead, however, of maligning for it being clothed in armour, we would acquit it of all malice prepense, and would admire the goodness of the Creator towards it, in furnishing it amidst its numerous enemies with so many weapons of defence. The one which stung the boy was only half grown; and if it can so well defend itself when only five inches in length, how formidable must it be when it attains its full size! And it needs, poor thing, all its weapons, and all their venom, to defend it against its numerous foes. And if the perch, by its venomless spines, can keep at bay even the voracious pike, we doubt not that the poisoned barbs of our little stinger can inspire with terror many a sharp-toothed fish, and many a greedy gull.

Let me entreat all, and in particular the young, to remember, that there is a sting unspeakably more to be dreaded,—a sting laden with such deadly poison, that it can not only kill the body, but ruin the soul. That sting is sin. Sin will assail you in a thousand deceitful forms, and with a thousand alluring wiles. O remember that, however fair its form, and however tempting its promises, it is still that accursed thing which God hates; and that in the end it stingeth like a serpent, and biteth like an adder.

And who is there that has not suffered from the venom of its sting? And when we know that its wound is deadly, and that there is but one antidote, what bounds should there be to our gratitude when we remember, that the all-sufficient remedy which is freely offered is the blood of Christ, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification; and that from his and says, "Come unto me all ye who labour and are heavy laden;" look unto me, and your souls shall live.

THE CONTRAST, OF CHRISTIANITY AND DEISM COMPARED.

No. II.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

FROM a comparison of the principles of Deism and Christianity, let us proceed to contrast the moral influence of both on their respective disciples; and for this inquiry into the character and conduct of infidels, we are happily furnished with ample and authentic materials, both from their own correspondence, and from the lives of the most noted of them, as given to the world by their friends and admirers. "Herbert, Hobbes, Shaftesbury, Woolston, Tindal, and Chubb, were all guilty of the vile hypocrisy of lying; professing to love Christianity, while they were employed in no other design than to destroy it. Bolingbroke, besides being guilty of this odious hypocrisy, was a drunkard, and a person of the grossest licentiousness. Collins, though he had no belief in Christianity, yet qualified himself for a civil office, by partaking of the Lord's Supper; and Shaftesbury, and others, were guilty of the same baseness. The morals of Lords Rochester and Wharton were of the most depraved description. Woolston was a gross blasphemer. Blount solicited his sister-in-law to marry him, and being refused shot himself. Tindal was originally a Protestant, then turned Papist, then Protestant again, merely to suit the times; and was at the same time infamous for every description of vice, and the total want of all principle. Hobbes wrote his Leviathan to serve the cause of Charles I., but finding him fail of success, he turned it to the defence of Cromwell, and made a merit of the fact to the usurper, as Hobbes himself unblushingly declared to Lord Clarendon. Morgan had no regard to truth, neither had Voltaire, as is evident from a letter now remaining, in which he requested his friend D'Alembert to tell for him a direct and palpable lie, by denying that he was the author of the Philosophical Dictionary. D'Alembert, in his answer, informed him that he had told the lie."* To this summary we may add, that Voltaire lived in a state of the lowest licentiousness; and, in company with his infamous paramour, used to amuse himself regularly with opening the letters of his guests, and those that passed through the village post office. When he came over to England, he was entertained by Pope, at whose table he talked with such grossness and profanity, that Mrs Pope was driven from the room. He was afterwards discovered to have come to this country in the detestable character of a spy, and, from his well known looseness of principle and practice, was shunned by every body as a person unworthy of the least confidence. † He too, like several of his brother infidels, made a solemn profession of his faith in the Roman Catholic religion; and at the moment when he was plotting the overthrow of Christianity, and spreading the horrid watchword of "crush the wretch," i. e., Christ, he had the ineffable effrontery to take the Sacrament, and with uplifted eye, and solemn ejaculations, to counterfeit all the emotions of the most fervent piety. Rousseau, who was on a level with Voltaire in his principles of infidelity, went perhaps beyond him in the profligacy and general immorality of his life. Bound in early life an apprentice to an artist, he fled from his master's house, after having robbed it. In Sardinia, whither he charge of theft, took a solemn oath that the stolen goods were given him by a maid-servant, and although the innocent girl conjured him with tears to reveal the truth, he persisted in his perjury, though he afterwards acknowledged the base falsehood when he was beyond the reach of punishment. The subsequent life he led was that of a notorious vagrant, launching out into one scheme of villany after another, pillaging every friend to whom he attached himself, and giving himself up at last to such open and uncontrollable licentiousness, that the most respectable families with whom he had been formerly acquainted denied him admittance to their houses. Tired of the Romish religion which he had twice embraced, he became a confirmed apostate at length, and was so zealous in the propagation of his infidel and demoralizing opinions, that he was banished from his native city of Geneva as an incendiary. The miserable children could not be expected to receive much attention and care from such a father, and accordingly, under pretext of anxiety lest they should waste after his death, but in reality to get rid of them, he was them to a poor-house during his own lifetime. Poor's moral character is thus described by a person who knew him; "He was an unprincipled and despicable traitor, who had sunk in his own estimation, as well as in that of every one else. When he fled to New York from the dungeons of Paris, every good man deserted him, and even deists, that had any regard for decency, crossed the streets to avoid him. He was the most disgusting human being that could any where be met with. Intemperance had bloated his countenance beyond description. A few of his disciples who stuck to him, to hide him from the abhorrence of mankind, had him conveyed to New Rochelle, where they supplied him with brandy till it burned up his liver." The general immorality of Hume's principles is now placed beyond all doubt, by his "Correspondence with several Distinguished Persons," and the profanity of his language in these published memorials of his intercourse with familiar friends, shows, that had he not been refined by the influence of rank and education, he must have vied with the lowest of men in the vulgar grossness of his conversational as much as he did with the most accomplished of his day in the elegance of his published style. Byron was given to the same detestable vice. On his moral character it is unnecessary to dwell, familiar as almost every one is with the incidents of his story; and although one, whose amiable heart was ever disposed to throw a veil over the faults and vices of his literary friends, has recorded it as his testimony, "that the errors of Byron arose neither from depravity of heart, nor from feelings dead to the admiration of virtue," † the impartial and Christian reader will not hesitate to trace the loose and licentious morality developed both in the prose and poetical productions, particularly the last beautiful but pre-eminently wicked production of the noble bard, to the influence of that baneful scepticism which he had imbibed. ‡

With the moral character and conduct of the most noted infidels as thus exhibited, let us now contrast the morality of the Gospel; and who that is in the slightest measure acquainted with the sacred volume requires to be told, that it is of a pure, lofty, and uncompromising character, laying claim to the government of the heart as well as of the conduct, prescribing the faithful discharge of every personal, social, and relative duty, and tending, by its applicability to every scene and circumstance of life, to foster the love and habit of universal goodness. From the inspired records, as well that this beautiful and divine morality has been embodied in the lives of the Christian disciples—that the impious have become devout, and the sensual chaste—that the proud have become humble, and the implacable mild—that the fraudulent have become just—the covetous liberal, and the selfish benevolent—that they whose business it was to gratify every lawless passion, and whose every thought was devoted to the world, have learned to lay their appetites under salutary restraint, and to give their desires a more elevated aim—and that, in short, the highest ambition of all has been directed to the practice of whatever is just, and pure, and honest, and lovely, and of good report. It is true, that the characters of multitudes of Christians come far short of this standard of excellence, and that in following them to the privacy of domestic retirement, and amid the transactions of every day life, we find some even blackened with a catalogue of vices as gross as any that have been fastened on the infidels mentioned above; but these are only nominal Christians, and the grand and not to be forgotten distinction is, that while the vices and the crimes of the infidels flow naturally and necessarily from their principles, those of Christians are diametrically at variance with the laws whose authority they profess to acknowledge. However contradictory and flagitious may be the lives of its professed disciples, the morality of the Gospel remains in its own pure and exalted perfection; and while the infidel system, as modern history too sadly attests, is utterly incapable of inspiring one generous or elevated sentiment, but, on the contrary, uniformly tends to vitiate the understanding, and harden the heart, Christianity has the moral power of bringing all the faculties of the soul into healthful and harmonious exercise; of not only shedding a grace around the most splendid and accomplished character, but of giving to the poor and the uneducated a dignity of sentiment, and a purity of feeling, which philosophy, with all its pretensions, could never impart.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Covetousness.—He who applies himself greedily to acquire and heap up earthly possessions, of whatever kind, may do so, either for the purpose of using them in the gratification of his own desires and pleasures, and the aggrandizement of himself and his family, or merely for the purpose of accumulation and amassing a treasure, without any other immediate and definite end. The sin is the same in both cases. In the former, indeed, some advantage may be derived to others, who, by their labour and skill, minister to the pursuits of the covetous man, and to his means of enjoyment; while, in the latter case, no such consequence may directly follow. But the sensualist and the miser, who, in different ways, thus pursue after their covetousness, lie, in the sight of God, under equal condemnation. The guilt, indeed, may be aggravated in certain cases, by adding to the sin of covetousness other sins to which it often leads. When David coveted the wife of Uriah the Hittite, he added to that first sin those of adultery and murder. When Achan coveted the goodly Babylonish garments, and the silver and the gold of the captives, he added to that sin both disobedience to the command of his superiors, and artful and fraudulent concealment, endangering the safety of the army. The people of Israel and Judah, whom the prophet Micah denounced for “coveting fields which they took by violence, and houses, and taking them away,” (Mic. ii. 2,) added to their greed, injustice and oppression. When Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, followed Naaman, and, under false pretences, obtained from him two talents of silver and two changes of raiment, he added to his sin of avarice the sin of lying, and the sin of dis-when Judas, for thirty pieces of silver, sold his Master, he added to the sin of covetousness the sins of blackest ingratitude, treason, and murder. But, in all these cases, it was still the same sin of covetousness which was the root and origin of these aggravated evils and crimes. It is evident, then, that whether this passion be indulged for the purposes of pride and voluptuous enjoyment, or for the miser's gratification of penurious hoarding, and whether the acquisition of wealth is made by extortion and rapacity, or the more indirect method of fraud, or by unjustly withholding from others that which is their due, the evil and the sin are the same. The prophet thus speaks of Shallum, king of Judah: “Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong: that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work; that saith, I will build me a wide house and large chambers, and cutteth him out windows, and it is ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion: Shalt thou reign because thou closest thyself in cedar? Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him? He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him: Was not this to know me? saith the Lord: but thine eyes and thy heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for violence to do it.” Jer. xxii. 13-17. Yet we see that the judgment is not less severe which is denounced by the apostle against them who hoard up their treasures of gold, and silver, and apparel, till, through accumulation and want of use, they are wasted and become corrupt. “Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you; your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten; your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire: Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.” James v. 1-3.—JAMES GLASSFORD, Esq. (Covetousness brought to the Bar of Scripture.)

Faith and Prayer.—In Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily, that we may be complete in him. Christ is a cabinet of rich and rare jewels, that can enrich to all eternity. There are two keys that use to open this cabinet; faith is a key, for out of his fulness we receive by faith; prayer is another key. If these keys be not in your hand just now; yet surely they are in his hand, who says, “all things are mine.” Oh, bid him cast you the keys, and give you the spirit of faith and prayer.—Rev. RALPH ERSKINE. (Discourses.)

On the Cultivation of the Heart.—The jest and the levity of lawless companionship must be shunned and shrunk from, like the malignity of a pestilence; and science, and business, and innocent amusement, and all other places of escape from a hurtful and most withering infection, are so many distinct resources in this business of moral cultivation. But far the most effectual refuge is, in the contemplation of that ethereal and unclouded purity by which the throne of heaven is encircled, a lifting of thoughts to the august and unpolluted sacredness which dwelleth there, the daily and diligent consideration of that awful sanctuary which is above, where nought that is unholy can enter, and a solemn invocation to Him, before the rebuke of whose countenance all the vanities of a distempered imagination will at once flee away.—Rev. Dr CHALMERS. (Commercial Discourses.)

Reading.—The eager reading of even religious books may be dangerous, and a hinderance to those who are aiming at the true spirit of religion, if they have recourse to them instead of God.—Rev. THOMAS ADAM, (Private Thoughts on Religion.)

SACRED POETRY.

HYMN.

Flow out, my soul, in praise to God!
Hallow His glorious name!
Sound, sound his righteousness abroad!
His matchless love proclaim!

Whose Son forsook the Angel host,
Laid heaven and bliss aside,
Came down on earth to seek the lost,
To save the sinner died.

Rarely, but possibly, a friend
May for a friend atone,
In jeopardy of life defend,
And ransom with his own.

Once in a world such gracious love
A righteous man may win;
Christ with the blind and thankless strove,
And suffered for their sin!

To break the power of Satan's bands,
To free the willing slave,
He gave his cheek to smiters' hands,
His body to the grave.

O may his praises evermore
Our ransomed breath employ!
The life He suffered to restore
Be his, with grateful joy!

From royal hands a gift how small
Hath subjects' peans moved;
What owe we to the King of all,
Who gave his Son beloved!

MRS G. G. RICHARDSON.

A PARALLEL.

SWEET is the April morn,
When the tender buds appear,
And the song of birds on the breeze is borne
In chorus loud and clear.

Rich is the robe of June,
When the year is in its prime,
And the sun, enthroned 'mid the splendours of noon,
Lights up our northern clime.

Yet the calm hour of even
Is dearer far to me,
When the harvest moon from her path in heaven
Looks down on land and sea.

Youth, and its pleasing toys,
Pass rapidly away,
And riper years, with their mingled joys,
Are not less brief than they.

When pleasure's race is run,
When her songs of gladness cease,
And the harvest of life shall be hastening on,
O! may its sign be peace!

MISCELLANEOUS.

The effect of Christianity in ennobling the Character.
—A gentleman of very respectable appearance called rather early one morning at the house of the late Rev. John Cooke, of Maidenhead, and requested to see him. As soon as Mr C. entered the room, he said, "Sir, I am an entire stranger to you, and it is business of no very pleasant or ordinary kind that has brought me to Maidenhead. Some years ago, an estate was purchased, for which an adequate value was given at the time. But I find, on looking over the deeds, that although it has been in the possession of my family many years, the sale is not valid nor my title good, until it is signed by one John Cooke, who was, at the time of sale, a minor. After much search, by the aid of my legal advisers, I have ascertained that you are that John Cooke; and now it depends on you, whether what my father honourably purchased, but your father dishonestly sold, shall continue in the possession of my family or not." The gentleman then, most frankly opened, and exposed to Mr Cooke a bundle of parchments, containing all the particulars of the sale, with the deeds that had been executed. At the time of this application, the estate, it is believed, was worth between three and four hundred pounds per annum. Mr Cooke, after looking over the writings, replied to the following effect:—"Sir, I feel for the situation in which you are placed. The estate is the just right of myself and family, and in point of law I could dispossess you and your family; but as I am satisfied, that whatever injustice has been practised on the part of the seller, you have acted honourably in the purchase, and have actually paid another the price of what is mine; to set your mind at rest, I will affix my signature, although by doing so I shall alienate from my family what they ought to possess. I do so, Sir, under the influence of those principles which the Gospel teaches me, and humbly depending on the care, and wisdom, and bounty of that heavenly Father who took me up from my youth, who has always supplied my necessities, and on whose promise I rely, that he will give me all things needful for life and godliness." He then affixed his signature and seal to the title-deeds. The gentleman went away amazed at his nobleness of mind, and admiring those principles, which had induced him so generously to concede all he could have desired, without even hinting at the necessity of a compromise, or asking any compensation.

Be ye not Unequally Yoked.—I called in, writes the late excellent Mrs Huntington, by accident, as we say to-day, at a miserable looking house, where I found a poor afflicted woman, of twenty or thirty years of age, whose case affected me much. She has one child three months old, and one eighteen months old; is in miserable health herself; and has an intemperate, unkind husband. She appeared broken-hearted, and almost bereft of reason. She was once the subject of serious impressions. But an imprudent marriage has ruined her, at least for this world. She is in a wretched, dirty house, with her husband's father and mother, and a flock of miserable children; all of them are addicted to drink; quarrels among parents and children, until midnight, are frequent. I saw only the mother-in-law. But the scene I witnessed was an emblem of hell. The poor young woman is in a state little short of despair. She says it is impossible for her to have a moment alone, and that her husband and mother-in-law will not let her read the Bible. She said to me, "O, if I could go and stay at your house but one night!" It seemed as if God had directed us to the place; I hope for good. I cannot keep this poor young creature out of my mind. If God sent us there to be the instruments of saving this soul from death, what a mercy it will be! O that the Redeemer would pluck this helpless one out of the jaws of the lion!

ON THE COMMON PHRASE,
"THE LAWS OF NATURE."

No. I.

THE use of general terms, or short and comprehensive modes of expressing some general result, is of great advantage to mankind, by enabling them to communicate the leading principles of knowledge in a brief, and where the terms have been accurately defined and are well understood, in an intelligible manner. Indeed, the use of general terms is indispensable to science of every kind, physical, mental, moral, and theological. But this advantage is, as usual, attended by its own corresponding disadvantages. If such terms be not understood, they cannot convey any information. If they be misunderstood, they will convey erroneous notions. And if men do not take the trouble to make themselves masters of their meaning thoroughly, they may serve little purpose, but to be employed as cloaks to hide a culpable degree of carelessness and ignorance. There is, perhaps, no general term which has been misused, in all these respects, more commonly, or with more injurious effect, than that to the examination of which we are now about to proceed, namely, "The laws of nature." Often has it been our lot to hear some mere smatterer in natural science exclaim, "O, that happened in consequence of one of the common laws of nature," in order to put a stop to any further inquiry into the true character of the wondrous works and ways of God; and not seldom have we heard such replies of petulant ignorance acquiesced in, as sufficiently explanatory of the matter. Now, before men acquiesce in any answer so very vague and general, it would be well if they would endeavour to ascertain whether they had any distinct notion what they meant by the term, "the laws of nature." To this inquiry no satisfactory answer could be given, without having first considered what is meant by the word Nature, then what is meant by the word Law, and then what is meant by these words combined into one general term, "the laws of nature."

VOL. II.

By the word Nature, is generally meant the material creation—sun, moon, and stars, this world, with all its component parts and various productions, animate and inanimate.

Again, when we subject to a minute examination the various parts of the frame-work of the material creation which are within our reach, we find each part characterised by some permanent, and as we might term it, constitutional peculiarity, distinguishing it from every other part; and by no art or skill can we cause one natural object to assume permanently the characteristic of any other. These permanent and invariable peculiarities of character, we may term, in individual objects or productions, the Laws of their individual nature; and taken as characteristic of an entire class of objects or productions, we may term them the general laws of that class. But when we have in this manner applied the term law, to indicate the permanent peculiarity, or distinguishing characteristic, of any object in nature, we must not deceive ourselves, by supposing that we have obtained any knowledge of what that distinctive characteristic essentially is. All that we really mean by such a term is—that peculiar mode of existence which gives individuality of character to any object, or class of objects, in nature.

The term law, then, as applied to nature, implies in its simplest acceptation, the mode of existence peculiar to any object in nature, distinguishing that object from every other. But it is also applied in a more complex and extensive acceptation, to indicate modes of action in the material creation. It is found, for example, to be a general fact, that all heavy bodies will fall, if unsupported; that water will always flow downwards, if unobstructed, &c.; and by an extensive analytical investigation, it is ascertained that all heavy bodies tend to a fixed centre, and this uniform principle being capable of explaining all the peculiarities of such cases, is designated by the general term, gravitation, or the law of gravitation. This term is used to imply a general mode of action, or rather of being acted upon, in the material creation; but it, in reality, no more explains that mode of action, than the more simple law in the individual explains its mode of being. We cannot tell by what law of nature, as we term it, or mode of being, it is, that gold is yellow and not white, that a rose is not a pink; neither can we tell why it is that heavy bodies do tend to a centre, though we may conceal our ignorance in either case, by asserting, that it is in obedience to a general law of nature. By the term, "laws of nature," we neither mean, nor can mean any thing more than the permanent modes of being, or of acting, which have been observed invariably to prevail throughout the material creation. The use of such terms may aid us in scientific researches, but the reason and origin of these laws must be sought for in another quarter.

If our inquiry be into the origin and reason of that simplest acceptation of the term, a law of nature, which means the mode of existence peculiar to any object in the material creation, there is no other answer can be given, than that any object exists as it is, and not otherwise, because the Creator has willed that such should be its peculiar and distinctive mode of existence. Every thing is what it is, because God made it so; and man can no more change its peculiar character, than he could have called it into being. That law of nature, then, which may be seen in any individual object, is nothing but the will of God materially expressed in that object; and the constant permanency of that law, preserving to the object its own peculiar character, is nothing but a manifest proof of the unchangeableness of God's creative will. In like manner, those more complex laws of nature, which refer to the general modes of acting in the material creation, may be proved to be nothing but the modes of acting which God has prescribed to himself in his government of the material universe; and their unvarying constancy has its being in his unchanging character and will. The laws of nature, then, are but the laws, or rather the will of God; and what we term their steadfast uniformity of operation, is but a manifestation of his unchangeable character and attributes. If these views were clearly apprehended, and constantly borne in mind, when men use that common phrase, "the laws of nature," instead of their employing it as a sufficient explanation of the wonders of nature, and by its means endeavouring to avoid all reference to the Author of nature, shutting, so far as their mental perceptions are concerned, God out of his own universe, it would lead them to perceive God everywhere, in every thing; and in the minutest arrangements, that contribute to form the beauty and the order of an insect's wing, or the petals of a flower, equally as in the harmonious movements of suns and systems, they would read the proofs of his unerring wisdom, his all-present and all-ruling power, his all-preserving goodness, and his all-embracing love.

But there is a very common way in which men escape from this conclusion, without being obliged distinctly to deny it; or to put to themselves the question in a plain and intelligible form, whether they mean to admit or to reject it. They admit, that every thing is what it is, because God created it so; but the unchanging constancy with which its characteristic peculiarities are maintained instead of ascribing to the constant presence of the will of God in them, they explain by saying, "That God impressed certain laws on nature, in obedience to which it continues to exist, and to act, with unchanging uniformity, because these laws are invariable in their operation." The extensive employment of such an evasive attempt at explanation, even by men of scientific acquirements, is a very remarkable proof of the skill of the human mind in self-deception. The emptiness of the sophism would at once be perceived, if men would examine accurately what the language employed really meant; or whether it had actually any definite meaning at all. What is the meaning of "a law impressed on nature?" or, what, in this acceptation, does the word law itself mean? A law is not a thing—it has no substantive existence of its own. It cannot be seen in its own separate individuality, moulding, with powerful hand, material things into conformity with its sovereign pleasure. Law is merely mind willing the exercise of its energies in some peculiar manner. Its essential residence, therefore, must be in mind alone, of which it is merely an energetic modification, or the uniform operation of some governing attribute of mind.

This may easily be illustrated by reference to human law. The laws of a nation are merely the mind of the nation putting forth a governing power, according to the determination of its deliberate sovereign will. Human laws have no positive, substantial, personal existence, apart from the mind of the nation; and should the mind of a nation change in any point, the law would of necessity on that point, and by that change, immediately disappear. The permanence of human laws depends upon the fact, that the human mind possesses a remarkable consimilarity in all its leading elements, and under similar circumstances will almost always operate in a similar manner. We are accustomed, indeed, to talk of human laws, as if they possessed an embodied being, and were endowed with powers of independent, self-enforcing energy; whereas, their only embodiment is in the persons of those human agents, whose own minds being actuated by these laws, impel them to put forth their personal energies for the enforcement of attributes and determinations purely mental. A law cannot be impressed on a nation, and modify its conduct by external influence; but it may be infused into the mind of a nation, and guide its conduct by internal influence. The simple truth is, that law is a term applicable to mind alone: it exists only where mind is; in mind alone it has its essential being, and by mind alone it acts and governs.

By this we may see the absurdity of saying, that "certain laws have been impressed on nature in obedience to which it continues to exist and to act." It cannot surely be meant by those who use such language, that law has been externally applied to the material frame of creation, like a seal to softened wax, and has there left an indelible impression, which has ever since characterised, and for ever will continue to characterise, the universe. This would, indeed, be to compress the universe under the spell of a more stern and despotic fatalism, than ever was dreamt of by the blindest advocates of the most direct and irresistible physical necessity. But those who use such language, have no intention of conveying any such idea. They merely wish to escape from the recognition of God, as the only omnipresent Ruler of the universe; and for that purpose, they represent Him as calling nature into existence, impressing upon it certain laws for its future government, and then leaving it to the operation of these laws,—like a machine constructed after a certain plan, set in motion by some biasing impulse, and then left to the blind operation of its internal structure, and its external impulse, without the presence or the guidance of any intelligent controlling principle. Is not this at once to deny to God the government of his own creation, and to worship those visionary “laws of nature,” which are to them in the room of God? Is not this at once atheism and idolatry of the vainest, blindest, and most infatuated kind? Such vain and weak fancies were less unpardonable, when uttered by the unenlightened Epicurean philosophers of ancient times; though not the less reprehensible, as derogatory to the character of the Supreme Being, and degrading to man: but what shall we say of men who can, even in our own times, set forth such antiquated crudities with a solemn and self-important air, as if they were the perfection of philosophy, and that too, a philosophy hitherto unimagined?

THE LAST ILLNESS, DEATH, AND CHARACTER, OF THE LATE REV. ROBERT WHYTE,

BY THE REV. ROBERT SMITH,

MR WHYTE had a severe attack of jaundice in the end of 1836, and though he recovered from it, he was ever after liable to indigestion and bilious complaints. In the course of the summer of 1836, he complained occasionally, and became thinner and less robust than formerly. A cough, which had troubled him from his childhood, was increased, and he was apt to become exhausted and feverish from cold or fatigue. In the end of November, after encountering a severe storm, he became unwell and feverish, but preached, though with great difficulty, on the forenoon of the first Sabbath of December, to his own people. He was so fatigued that he could hardly reach home, and he never entered the pulpit again. The fever was indeed soon reduced, and his strength so far restored, that he could visit some of his friends in private; but his recovery was so slow, that a brother who came to see him urged him to return for some time to his father's house. Unwilling to quit the scene of his labours, he resisted the proposal till it was suggested that his native air might, as it had done before, expedite his recovery, and thereby enable him to resume the sooner those labours in which his heart was so much engaged.

To this suggestion he yielded, and set out for Dykesgroft in the beginning of 1837, saying to his friends in Lochwinnoch he hoped to return very soon. Still, when he moved away from his peaceful and happy residence, he looked wistfully round on all he was leaving behind, as if he had felt a presentiment of what actually happened, that he might never see them again. He reached his native place in safety, and did not suffer much from his journey; but he did not recover as he expected. Soon after his return, his affectionate and beloved mother was taken ill, and died rather suddenly and unexpectedly. The grief and fatigue occasioned by this event, produced a relapse and return of fever, from which he never completely recovered. His strength, however, was so far restored, that he could take some exercise in the open air: and in the hope of restoring his strength more rapidly, he accepted an invitation to visit the comfortable and hospitable mansion of Viewfield, near Mauchline, where he recovered the society which he had enjoyed so much at Dreghorn. His medical friends, however, soon perceiving, that his case had become hopeless, apprised the family of this, and it was deemed expedient to make him acquainted with his situation and prospects. As the consumptive patient is often, by hectic excitement, and the insidious nature of his disease, inspired with false hopes of recovery, so Mr Whyte does not seem to have altogether escaped this delusion, for he did not till about this time resolve to resign his situation in Lochwinnoch; and then he did it in terms as expressive of attachment to his people, as of fidelity to the Master whom he served. “After much serious thought,” said he in a letter to me from Viewfield, “and not, I trust, without the guidance of the great Head of the Church, I have come to the resolution of resigning my charge in Lochwinnoch. This, the state of my health renders imperatively necessary. Even under the most favourable circumstances, I could not hope to be able, for many months, to undertake my duties; and even then, I fear, they could be discharged only in such a manner, as would neither satisfy my own conscience, nor edify the people. With these views, I feel myself bound in justice to them, and in faithfulness to that Master whom I desire to serve, to resign my charge; and now only regret, that my attachment to them, and the hopes I was led to entertain of a speedy recovery, by which I would have been restored to my former pleasing duties, should have prevailed with me to defer so long taking this most painful step. In announcing my resignation to the committee of management, I beg that you will express to them my sense of the many obligations I lie under to them for the kindness which I have uniformly experienced at their hands. Had the Lord of the Vineyard so willed it, I could have wished to spend and be spent among the people of Lochwinnoch; but He has otherwise determined, and His holy will be done. And now that I am about to bid adieu to this pleasing scene of my labours, my prayer to God is, that He would send such a one to labour in my room as, by the grace given to him, may labour with more ability and faithfulness than he who now demits his charge, and may have his reward in a far more abundant harvest of success.”

This resignation was not accepted; but it was more from affection to him, and a reluctance to think of any other person so long as he lived, than from any firm hope of his ultimate recovery.

When informed of the serious aspect of his disease, though perhaps for a little disappointed and solemnized, he was neither shocked nor overwhelmed. He preserved his usual equanimity and resignation, and just laboured harder to make sure of his interest in Christ, and to prepare for eternity. He was solicitous to avoid converse upon every subject except those which were of a religious nature, and delighted in no book so much as his Bible. His friends in Viewfield had much serious and improving conversation with him, of which I can only give a few specimens. He remarked on one occasion, "how well fitted to purify and elevate the mind, was the frequent contemplation of heaven, and looking forward to it." At another time, after noticing the great variety that was to be found of one flower, he observed, "if this world, upon which God in his Word has stamped vanity, be so beautiful and excellent, what must heaven be!" Speaking of the example of Christ, he said, "that in reading his life, he had been struck with this circumstance, He never resented any personal indignity offered to him, but where the glory of God was concerned he shewed his indignation." When one said to him, "that the nearest idea we could form of the happiness of heaven was derived from the society of believers on earth," he answered, "next to communion with God; but a believer's communion with God must furnish us with the nearest idea of the happiness of heaven." The same person said, "that the precept, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself,' was less understood and obeyed than any other," to which he replied, "To love God is still less attended to. How much kindness is there to be met with; and that, even from persons not living under the influence of religion!" And to illustrate this, he said, "What would you think of a child who should show all manner of kindness, and behave in the most amiable way, to the other children of the family, and yet should neglect or show disrespect to his own parents!"

It might have been supposed, that one so amiable from his earliest years, whose character and conduct had been so uniform and consistent, and who had been so diligent and faithful in the discharge of every duty, would have experienced great comfort and joy under sickness, and at the approach of death; and yet the exercises of his mind were rather entire resignation and holy tranquillity, earnest desire and humble hope, trembling faith and fervent prayer, than the full assurance of faith and joy unspeakable and full of glory. Should any wonder at this, I would remind them, that this is not an uncommon thing even in the experience of eminent Christians. I shall produce one example of this from a memoir of the life of the late learned and talented, pious and zealous Dr Hamilton of Strathblane. "From the time," says he, "that I knew the value of religion, I wished to enjoy assurance of my personal salvation; and often in the course of my ministry, I urged my hearers to secure the knowledge of their own relation to the Redeemer. I was hopeful that on my death-bed I should be blessed with joy, or at least filled with good hope, and honoured with peace. I was, therefore, exceedingly surprised and disappointed, both in 1826 and 1833, when I believed myself dying, to find that I was deprived of that high hope and joyful expectation which I had so much coveted, and so long prayed for. I was blessed with peace and hope, but I had no joy." Now as this was the confession of one much older, and in various respects still more eminent, than Mr Whyte, it need not be wondered at if he made a similar confession. He was reduced to a state of great weakness, and had only spiritual life, to sustain him. He was naturally extremely modest and diffident of himself, and withal was very jealous of any mistake in a matter of so momentous a nature. "It was always my practice," said he, "to speak cautiously of the final destination of others, and now I must speak with great diffidence of my own." Accordingly, he complained to many who visited him, of weak faith and want of assurance, of the coldness of his love to God, and his remaining corruption. Still he appeared peaceful and resigned—declared his persuasion that he had passed from death unto life—and was sustained by a humble hope, and sometimes enjoyed as much comfort as he expected. He was earnest in his desires, and assiduous in his endeavours to live near to God, and to enjoy fellowship and communion with him. To accomplish this, he not merely presented frequent and fervent prayers, but sometimes took a particular subject and meditated upon it, in order to fix his mind; and when, through infirmity of the flesh or spirit, his thoughts wandered after vanities, he mourned over it.

In addition to his own prayers, he solicited the prayers of others, saying, "He had much need of the prayers of the faithful." His soul followed hard after God; and if he was sometimes afraid to say, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee," I am sure he could adopt the characteristic language of J. Earle, "I cannot say that I do love thee; but I am sure I can say, that I would love thee. This thou knowest that knowest all things. I can appeal to thee, that, if I might have my wish, I would love thee better than any saint on earth, yea, than any angel in heaven does. I had rather love thee as I ought to love thee, than be master of all the treasures on earth, rather than have all the monarchs of it at my feet, rather than have all that the world admires at my disposal. I had rather (Lord, thou knowest!) die in an ecstasy of holy love, and breathe out my soul into the arms of the holy Jesus, than live ten millions of years, yea, to all eternity, in the fullness of all created enjoyments."

In spite of his modesty and self-diffidence, the evidence of Mr Whyte's love to God sometimes broke out unconsciously. He acknowledged to his friends, that he had great pleasure in thinking of the love of God, remarking, "It is not merely said, God loves, but God is love, even love itself." When he became so feeble and exhausted before death, that he dosed away much of his time in sleep, he mourned over this misspending of time, as he called it, saying, "If he loved his Saviour more, he would not sleep so much." The spirit truly was willing, even when the flesh was weak.

After he had been fully apprised of his danger, he resolved to leave Viewfield and return home, to spend his last days and close his eyes under his father's roof. On a day fixed, his medical adviser, Dr Aitken of Kilmarnock, who was an early and devoted friend, and not more remarkable for his skill in treating the case, than for the affectionate care with which he watched over him till he was laid in the grave, as well as for his solicitude that his memorial should not perish when he was gone,—this faithful friend accompanied him in the carriage on his way home, that he might administer to him such assistance as he required. He said little for several miles after they left Mauchline, as if he had been looking out upon every house and field, tree and stream, for the last time. And it was not till they came to the neighbourhood of Loudon churchyard, where his mother had lately been buried, and in which he was soon to be laid, that he was roused from his musings. After some remarks upon the fineness of the scenery, and the sentimentality which it was calculated to awaken, he addressed his friend, not in a sentimental, but solemn and serious strain, about the value of the soul and the interests of eternity, which he thought the best requital he could make for all his kindness, and the best legacy he could leave him. At Dykescroft he was visited not merely by many of his former friends, from Kilmarnock and Lochwinnoch, but by his early companions from different parts of the country, with all of whom he conversed in a manner agreeable to the view which has been given of the frame of his mind, asking counsel and encouragement from his seniors and fathers in the Church, and tendering advice and warning to his companions and early friends. But the members of his father's family were the objects of his special solicitude and care. He often spoke to them in a very impressive manner of their mother's death, and exhorted them to improve it. Adverting to the precarious state of his own health, he said, "If it had been the will of God, he could have wished to recover, but he hoped he could submit to his destination." "It is a small matter," added he, "whether we be taken away early or at a late period; if early, we are removed from trials and temptations." When requiring the attention of his friends, and obliged to observe the regimen of the physician, he said, "It is a pity that this vile body, which is just sinking into the grave, should often demand more sollicitude than the precious and immortal soul." He told them he saw more and more the vanity of every thing in this world, and the necessity of preparing for another and a better. He declared there was no book to him like the Bible, and he delighted especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews. He made them read the Scriptures to him, and often expounded the passage read, going over all the leading topics introduced. He complained, sometimes to his friends, as well as to others, of obscure apprehensions and weak faith, a cold heart and languid affections, but said he was labouring to get above these imperfections; and so far did he succeed, that he declared, in the end, he did not wish to return to the world, but was willing to depart out of it. Though he had been happy, too happy, in his last situation, as he thought, to live sufficiently above the world, yet he was just as happy now. Accordingly, during many long and sleepless nights, when asked if he was getting any sleep, he would have said, "No, but I am resting well;" at other times his answer was, "I am passing the time very pleasantly;" or, "I am sorry I sleep too much. If I loved my divine Master as I ought, I would not sleep away my precious time." Allied to this feeling was a desire he expressed for heaven, "because it is a place of perfect purity." When one of his brothers said to him, "I think your situation enviable," he replied, "Yes; you are entering on the world; soon you will be in the middle of life, and in a little old age will overtake you. This is only a world of trouble; there is no real happiness here." Two nights before he died, when his friends were all gathered around him, he gave them a solemn advice to prepare for their latter end. When he became feeble towards the close of life, he sometimes breathed forth this short aspiration, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." And after a considerable struggle with pain and bodily anguish, which ceased some time before death, I am satisfied the prayer was answered, and on the morning of the 22d April, his soul passed into glory.

The following notice of him by an early friend, who knew him well, and could appreciate his talents and worth, appeared in the Ayr Advertiser a few days after his death:—"Died, on the 22d April, at his father's house, Dykescroft, in the parish of Kilmarnock, the Rev. Robert Whyte, preacher of the Gospel. He was a young man of high attainments and great Christian worth. At the university he was distinguished for his proficiency in classical, in mathematical, and theological learning. Afterwards as an assistant to the late Rev. W. Wodrow of Dreghorn, as town missionary in Kilmarnock, and finally in Lochwinnoch, he discharged his allotted duties with such fidelity, such Christian wisdom, and such a high regard to the welfare of souls, as showed that he was one who might have adorned any station in the Church, and proved an eminent blessing to any people. In him were found exalted piety, a thoroughly Christian character, great knowledge of the doctrines of Scripture, and great ability in unfolding them. In the full exercise of faith he met the appointment of his divine Master, to whose will he had ever sought to render a meek submission, and from whom alone he expected or could receive his reward."

The leading features of Mr Whyte's character may be easily gathered from the outline of his history which has been given. His understanding was naturally acute and vigorous; it was improved by assiduous and persevering industry, and enlarged by varied and extensive acquirements. His was the merit of being indebted still more to patient culture than to original endowment. His intellectual powers were more remarkable than his imagination or fancy, and yet his taste was accurate and refined, being improved by his classical acquirements. But it is his highest praise to say that his heart was still better than his head. Better regulated and more equable affections are seldom to be found in a human breast. Indeed, he was so faultless from his childhood, and so conscientious in every thing that he did, that I am inclined to think he feared God from his youth; for such amiable dispositions and inoffensive conduct do not naturally flow from the corrupt heart of man. I am aware, however, his own opinion was, that he did not pass from death unto life till he arrived at the years of maturity; yet, modest and jealous of himself as he was, he did not deny that he had experienced a saving change; and I have seen few persons who afforded more evidence of it. His piety towards God was evinced in a habitual regard to his approbation and zeal for his glory. When told of the esteem which he enjoyed, he said it was a comparatively easy matter to please men, but he felt it a very different matter to walk so as to please God. He delighted in his Word and ordinances, and, we have seen, was so eager to be restored to his labours in the Church, that he could enter, in no ordinary degree, into the sentiments of his divine Master: "My meat and my drink is to do the will of my heavenly Father, and to finish his work." Whilst he was sometimes afraid to say he loved God, and often complained of the coldness of his heart, yet he evinced the reality of his affection, not merely in longing and striving after divine communion, but in the complacency and delight which he felt in meditating on the love of God. His prayers afforded striking evidence of his piety and devotion. There was, indeed, no display in them more than in any other public duty that he performed, and nothing very palpable and impressive to obtuse worshippers, but there was a solemn earnestness, and rich variety, that struck the intelligent and experienced Christian. I never could trace the least sameness in his prayers; and the variety and unction which they contained evinced an ever wakeful exercise, both of the understanding and the heart, in the performance of the duty. Another proof of his piety was his conscientious discharge of every duty, and perfect resignation under the heaviest afflictions. No person could be more regular and methodical in attending to every thing committed to his care, nor more scrupulous and conscientious in performing every duty as in the sight of God. But it is still more difficult to suffer than to do all the will of God, to submit with cheerful acquiescence to the greatest disappointments and the sorest trials; and this attainment was his. Mr Walker of Truro, in his "Christian," represents the rebellion of the human will against the holy will of God as the very essence of human depravity, and an entire resignation of our will to his as the perfection of Christian character. Now, if we are to judge by this test, Mr Whyte had attained great perfection of character. His faith and patience were long and severely tried by the alternation of hope and fear during his protracted illness, but this produced no rebellion of mind. He had laboured to prepare himself for the work of the ministry by extraordinary exertions and fervent prayers for divine grace; had made great acquirements, and enjoyed encouraging acceptance. He had just reached his thirty-first year, was fixed in a situation, where he was singularly happy, and was furnished with the prospect of entering upon the fruit, and reaping the rewards of those labours in which he had expended so much, when, by the hand of God laid upon him, his prospects were blasted for ever; and yet the calm and complacent expression never departed from his countenance, only give a few specimens. He remarked on one occasion, "how well fitted to purify and elevate the mind, was the frequent contemplation of heaven, and looking forward to it." At another time, after noticing the great variety that was to be found of one flower, he observed, "if this world, upon which God in his Word has stamped vanity, be so beautiful and excellent, what must heaven be!" Speaking of the example of Christ, he said, "that in reading his life, he had been struck with this circumstance. He never resented any personal indignity offered to him, but where the glory of God was concerned he shewed his indignation." When one said to him, "that the nearest idea we could form of the happiness of heaven was derived from the society of believers on earth," he answered, "next to communion with God; but a believer's communion with God must furnish us with the nearest idea of the happiness of heaven." The same person said, "that the precept, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself,' was less understood and obeyed than any other," to which he replied, "To love God is still less attended to. How much kindness is there to be met with; and that, even from persons not living under the influence of religion!" And to illustrate this, he said, "What would you think of a child who should show all manner of kindness, and behave in the most amiable way, to the other children of the family, and yet should neglect or show disrespect to his own parents!"

It might have been supposed, that one so amiable from his earliest years, whose character and conduct had been so uniform and consistent, and who had been so diligent and faithful in the discharge of every duty, would have experienced great comfort and joy under sickness, and at the approach of death; and yet the exercises of his mind were rather entire resignation and holy tranquillity, earnest desire and humble hope, trembling faith and fervent prayer, than the full assurance of faith and joy unspeakable and full of glory. Should any wonder at this, I would remind them, that this is not an uncommon thing even in the experience of eminent Christians. I shall produce one example of this from a memoir of the life of the late learned and talented, pious and zealous Dr Hamilton of Strathblane. "From the time," says he, "that I knew the value of religion, I wished to enjoy assurance of my personal salvation; and often in the course of my ministry, I urged my hearers to secure the knowledge of their own relation to the Redeemer. I was hopeful that on my death-bed I should be blessed with joy, or at least filled with good hope, and honoured with peace. I was, therefore, exceedingly surprised and disappointed, both in 1826 and 1833, when I believed myself dying, to find that I was deprived of that high hope and joyful expectation which I had so much coveted, and so long prayed for. I was blessed with peace and hope, but I had no joy." Now as this was the confession of one much older, and in various respects still more eminent, than Mr Whyte, it need not be wondered at if he made a similar confession. He was reduced to a state of great weakness, and had only spiritual life, to sustain him. He was naturally extremely modest and diffident of himself, and withal was very jealous of any mistake in a matter of so momentous a nature. "It was always my practice," said he, "to speak cautiously of the final destination of others, and now I must speak with great diffidence of my own." Accordingly, he complained to many who visited him, of weak faith and want of assurance, of the coldness of his love to God, and his remaining corruption. Still he appeared peaceful and resigned—declared his persuasion that he had passed from death unto life—and was sustained by an humble hope, and sometimes enjoyed as much comfort as he expected. He was earnest in his desires, and assiduous in his endeavours to live near to God, and to enjoy fellowship and communion with him. To accomplish this, he not merely presented frequent and fervent prayers, but sometimes took a particular subject and meditated upon it, in order to fix his mind; and when, through infirmity of the flesh or spirit, his thoughts wandered after vanities, he mourned over it.

In addition to his own prayers, he solicited the prayers of others, saying, "He had much need of the prayers of the faithful." His soul followed hard after God; and if he was sometimes afraid to say, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee," I am sure he could adopt the characteristic language of J. Earle, "I cannot say that I do love thee; but I am sure I can say, that I would love thee. This thou knowest that knowest all things. I can appeal to thee, that, if I might have my wish, I would love thee better than any saint on earth, yea, than any angel in heaven does. I had rather love thee as I ought to love thee, than be master of all the treasures on earth, rather than have all the monarchs of it at my feet, rather than have all that the world admires at my disposal. I had rather (Lord, thou knowest!) die in an ecstasy of holy love, and breathe out my soul into the arms of the holy Jesus, than live ten millions of years, yet, to all eternity, in the fulness of all created enjoyments."

In spite of his modesty and self-diffidence, the evidence of Mr Whyte's love to God sometimes broke out unconsciously. He acknowledged to his friends, that he had great pleasure in thinking of the love of God, remarking, "It is not merely said, God loves, but God is love, even love itself." When he became so feeble and exhausted before death, that he dosed away much of his time in sleep, he mourned over this mispending of time, as he called it, saying, "If he loved his Saviour more, he would not sleep so much." The spirit truly was willing, even when the flesh was weak.

After he had been fully apprised of his danger, he resolved to leave Viewfield and return home, to spend his last days and close his eyes under his father's roof. On a day fixed, his medical adviser, Dr Aitken of Kilmarnock, who was an early and devoted friend, and not more remarkable for his skill in treating the case, than for the affectionate care with which he watched over him till he was laid in the grave, as well as for his solicitude that his memorial should not perish when he was gone,—this faithful friend accompanied him in the carriage on his way home, that he might administer to him such assistance as he required. He sat a little for several miles after they left Mauchline, as he had been looking out upon every house and field, tree and stream, for the last time. And it was not till they came to the neighbourhood of London church-yard, where his mother had lately been buried, and in which he was soon to be laid, that he was roused from his musings. After some remarks upon the fineness of the scenery, and the sentimentality which it was calculated to awaken, he addressed his friend, not in a sentimental, but solemn and serious strain, about the value of the soul and the interests of eternity, which he thought the best requital he could make for all his kindness, and the best legacy he could leave him. At Dykescroft he was visited not merely by many of his former friends, from Kilmarnock and Lochwinnoch, but by his early companions from different parts of the country, with all of whom he conversed in a manner agreeable to the view which has been given of the frame of his mind, asking counsel and encouragement from his seniors and fathers in the Church, and tendering advice and warning to his companions and early friends. But the members of his father's family were the objects of his special solicitude and care. He often spoke to them in a very impressive manner of their mother's death, and exhorted them to improve it. Adverting to the precarious state of his own health, he said, "If it had been the will of God, he could have wished to recover, but he hoped he could submit to his destination." "It is a small matter," added he, "whether we are taken away early or at a late period; if early, we are removed from trials and temptations." When requiring the attention of his friends, and obliged to observe the regimen of the physician, he said, "It is a pity that this vile body, which is just sinking into the grave, should often demand more solicitude than the precious and immortal soul." He told them he saw more and more the vanity of every thing in this world, and the necessity of preparing for another and a better. He declared there was no book to him like the Bible, and he delighted especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews. He made them read the Scriptures to him, and often expounded the passage read, going over all the leading topics introduced. He complained, sometimes to his friends, as well as to others, of obscure apprehensions and weak faith, a cold heart and languid affections, but said he was labouring to get above these imperfections; and so far did he succeed, that he declared, in the end, he did not wish to return to the world, but was willing to depart out of it. Though he had been happy, too happy, in his last situation, as he thought, to live sufficiently above the world, yet he was just as happy now. Accordingly, during many long and sleepless nights, when asked if he was getting any sleep, he would have said, "No, but I am resting well;" at other times his answer was, "I am passing the time very pleasantly;" or, "I am sorry I sleep too much. If I loved my divine Master as I ought, I would not sleep away my precious time." Allied to this feeling was a desire he expressed for heaven, "because it is a place of perfect purity." When one of his brothers said to him, "I think your situation enviable," he replied, "Yes; you are entering on the world; soon you will be in the middle of life, and in a little old age will overtake you. This is only a world of trouble; there is no real happiness here." Two nights before he died, when his friends were all gathered around him, he gave them a solemn advice to prepare for their latter end. When he became feeble towards the close of life, he sometimes breathed forth this short aspiration, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." And after a considerable struggle with pain and bodily anguish, which ceased some time before death, I am satisfied the prayer was answered, and on the morning of the 22d April, his soul passed into glory.

The following notice of him by an early friend, who knew him well, and could appreciate his talents and worth, appeared in the Ayr Advertiser a few days after his death:—"Died, on the 22d April, at his father's house, Dykescroft, in the parish of Kilmarnock, the Rev. Robert Whyte, preacher of the Gospel. He was a young man of high attainments and great Christian worth. At the university he was distinguished for his proficiency in classical, in mathematical, and theological learning. Afterwards as an assistant to the late Rev. W. Wodrow of Dreghorn, as town missionary in Kilmarnock, and finally in Lochwinnoch, he discharged his allotted duties with such fidelity, such Christian wisdom, and such a high regard to the welfare of souls, as showed that he was one who might have adorned any station in the Church, and proved an eminent blessing to any people. In him were found exalted piety, a thoroughly Christian character, great knowledge of the doctrines of Scripture, and great ability in unfolding them. In the full exercise of faith he met the appointment of his divine Master, to whose will he had ever sought to render a meek submission, and from whom alone he expected or could receive his reward."

The leading features of Mr Whyte's character may be easily gathered from the outline of his history which has been given. His understanding was naturally acute and vigorous; it was improved by assiduous and persevering industry, and enlarged by varied and extensive acquirements. His was the merit of being indebted still more to patient culture than to original endowment. His intellectual powers were more remarkable than his imagination or fancy, and yet his taste was accurate and refined, being improved by his classical acquirements. But it is his highest praise to say that his heart was still better than his head. Better regulated and more equable affections are seldom to be found in a human breast. Indeed, he was so faultless from his childhood, and so conscientious in every thing that he did, that I am inclined to think he feared God from his youth; for such amiable dispositions and inoffensive conduct do not naturally flow from the corrupt heart of man. I am aware, however, his own opinion was, that he did not pass from death unto life till he arrived at the years of maturity; yet, modest and jealous of himself as he was, he did not deny that he had experienced a saving change; and I have seen few persons who afforded more evidence of it. His piety towards God was evinced in a habitual regard to his approbation and zeal for his glory. When told of the esteem which he enjoyed, he said it was a comparatively easy matter to please men, but he felt it a very different matter to walk so as to please God. He delighted in his Word and ordinances, and, we have seen, was so eager to be restored to his labours in the Church, that he could enter, in no ordinary degree, into the sentiments of his divine Master: "My meat and my drink is to do the will of my heavenly Father, and to finish his work." Whilst he was sometimes afraid to say he loved God, and often complained of the coldness of his heart, yet he evinced the reality of his affection, not merely in longing and striving after divine communion, but in the complacency and delight which he felt in meditating on the love of God. His prayers afforded striking evidence of his piety and devotion. There was, indeed, no display in them more than in any other public duty that he performed, and nothing very palpable and impressive to obtuse worshippers, but there was a solemn earnestness, and rich variety, that struck the intelligent and experienced Christian. I never could trace the least sameness in his prayers; and the variety and unction which they contained evinced an ever wakeful exercise, both of the understanding and the heart, in the performance of the duty. Another proof of his piety was his conscientious discharge of every duty, and perfect resignation under the heaviest afflictions. No person could be more regular and methodical in attending to every thing committed to his care, nor more scrupulous and conscientious in performing every duty as in the sight of God. But it is still more difficult to suffer than to do all the will of God, to submit with cheerful acquiescence to the greatest disappointments and the sorest trials; and this attainment was his. Mr Walker of Truro, in his "Christian," represents the rebellion of the human will against the holy will of God as the very essence of human depravity, and an entire resignation of our will to his as the perfection of Christian character. Now, if we are to judge by this test, Mr Whyte had attained great perfection of character. His faith and patience were long and severely tried by the alternation of hope and fear during his protracted illness, but this produced no rebellion of mind. He had laboured to prepare himself for the work of the ministry by extraordinary exertions and fervent prayers for divine grace; had made great acquirements, and enjoyed encouraging acceptance. He had just reached his thirty-first year, was fixed in a situation, where he was singularly happy, and was furnished with the prospect of entering upon the fruit, and reaping the rewards of those labours in which he had expended so much, when, by the hand of God laid upon him, his prospects were blasted for ever; and yet the calm and complacent expression never departed from his countenance, and far less did the voice of complaint proceed from his lips. He was scarcely conscious of the stirring of a rebellious feeling within him. His conversation and letters were full of expressions of patience and resignation. And when a kind friend, who thought he might want comfort and encouragement regarding this matter, told him of an eminent Christian who, notwithstanding the patience which he seemed to possess, had to struggle with many a rebellious feeling, this simple-hearted believer replied, "He could not say that, but said he thought he could cheerfully resign every earthly tie, were he sure of an interest in Christ; but, he added, he felt a great want of love to God, and of the fruits of the Spirit," which he repeated, and then burst into tears, and continued depressed for some time. These, I venture to believe, were precious tears, and evinced a longing after God, which is always gratified; for a blessing is pronounced upon those who are in this condition by the faithful and true Witness: "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

His kindness and charity toward men, neither he himself nor any other person could doubt. No malign feeling was harboured within him, and no uncharitable word or action proceeded from him. I do not remember to have ever seen even anger stirred up in him by any provocation; and though his earlier or older friends may have seen this, yet I am sure they have seldom seen any one obey better the precept: "Be ye angry and sin not, let not the sun go down on your wrath." I never heard him utter a severe sentence, nor knew him do an unkind thing. He was a dutiful and affectionate son and relative. One reason why he expressed a wish to live, was that "he might be a stoop to his aged and bereaved father in his declining years;" and we have seen how much tender concern and kindness he showed to all his friends under sickness and at the approach of death. He evinced his benevolence to others, not in expressions of affection, for he was not profuse in these, but in substantial acts of kindness. He was always amiable and obliging, gave no offence, and missed no opportunity of doing good. He complained of no trouble, and arrogated no merit for any thing he did. He never consulted his own ease or indulgence, but was always ready to do cheerfully whatever he could to gratify or oblige those around him. His best acts of kindness, however, were shown to the souls of men, not merely in public instruction and private conversation, but in visiting the sick and dying. To them he showed the greatest attention, exercised great patience and assiduity in communicating instruction, correcting their errors and removing their difficulties; in warning them to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on the hope set before them in the Gospel. In consequence of all this his memory is very precious to this part of his people.

I shall only notice, further, the extreme modesty and humility of his character. One might have supposed that the talents and acquirements which he possessed would have made him vain and ostentatious, but he was far removed from this. Like many more of real talent and learning he was humble and unassuming, and I have often thought his diffidence would have embarrassed him, if his quick sense of propriety had not kept him from every thing that was awkward. This feature of his character was noticed by every person who knew him, and led some to offer him that encouragement which they thought his modesty required. But so humble was he that he was more apt to resent this than any other kind of treatment. When it was suggested to him that perhaps it was granted to him to be the means of as much good, in the few years he was a preacher, as if he had been ordained and had enjoyed a long ministry, seeing God could work through his ministrations, as much in a short, as in a long period; he replied, with great humility, that "he had little to encourage him in reflecting upon his ministrations; there had been too much self-seeking, and too little done for the glory of God." As an apology for the suggestion, it was added he had always displayed great singleness of heart, and needed to be encouraged; he replied, "He needed no encouragement, but required to be humbled to the very dust." A similar conversation took place between him and one of his brothers, when he was mourning that his ministrations had been barren and unprofitable. His brother said the best of men had the lowest opinion of themselves, and he thought he was too severe in judging himself, but he checked him, saying, "He ought not to flatter him, for he had great need to be humbled." He not merely walked before God "in all lowliness and meekness," but "in lowliness of mind, esteemed others better than himself." I have heard him speak of a friend as so decidedly superior to himself that they were not to be compared at all, while that friend would just as readily have acknowledged his superiority in various acquirements and accomplishments. His modesty did not appear to embarrass him in the performance of public duty, during the time that I knew him, but it perhaps fettered him and made his instructions less palpable and expressive than they ought to have been, and at one time, it was very painful to him. When he commenced his labours at Dreghorn, he wrote one of his earliest friends that "he ascended the pulpit trembling, and left it blushing;" and he told me he was ashamed to meet any person on retiring from Church, as if he had been liable to be reproached for handling the Word of God unworthily, and trifling with the souls of men; and it was not till he was told of an intelligent person leaving his own parish to hear him, and found that he enjoyed the general esteem of those to whom he ministered, that his mind was re-assured and he gathered a little confidence in the performance of public duty. So much, however, was he at first humbled, under a sense of the unworthy manner in which he had performed it, that a person in the family in which he resided, has noticed him continue visibly depressed for a day or two afterwards. This circumstance led to another display of delicacy and propriety of feeling. This kind friend, observing his sadness, suspected that he found something uncomfortable in his situation. And when he again saw the pain he was giving, he was constrained to explain the cause of his depression, and to tell that it did not proceed from any thing in his situation, nor even from mortified pride, because he had not acquitted himself well before men, but because he had been able to do so little to promote the glory of God, and the edification of the people committed to his care.

I shall not mention any other single feature of character, but notice the remarkable combination and union of talent and acquirement, wisdom and worth, in Mr Whyte. You might meet with individuals of still greater abilities and learning, taste and accomplishment, ardour of mind, and affection of heart, and whose general character was more marked and eminent, but you would find few indeed who combined all these excellencies in so high a degree.

Still, I do not mean to say that he was perfect. I have quoted many acknowledgments of imperfection and corruption in his own words, and do not allege that they proceeded altogether from humility. He was, indeed, one of the most irreproachable men in the eye of the world, but in many things we offend all in the sight of a holy God. His excellencies were not fully seen at first, and he remained always averse to professions of kindness and a display of talent. This he carried to a fault. His modesty and reserve, extreme prudence and caution, prevented him sometimes from expressing what he knew and felt, when he might have done so with propriety and advantage. This accuracy and fastidiousness hampered him, both in his less interesting and impressive than they ought to have been, to ordinary hearers. At first, I thought the severe affliction with which he was visited was intended to correct the imperfections of his character and instructions. It was calculated to arouse him, and lead him to burst the fetters by which he had formerly been straitened, and to make him preach the Gospel with more than his wonted earnestness and affection. I expected that after having looked death in the face, and looked forward into eternity, he would have spoken with the plainness and power of a dying man addressing dying sinners; and I am aware that this was his own impression and purpose. He declared that if he was restored to his ministrations he hoped to preach the Gospel with greater simplicity and godly sincerity, fidelity and fervour, than he had ever done before. He likewise told his predecessor that he would conduct himself in a different manner in visiting the sick, though he had recommended himself very much by his discharge of this duty. He could not, indeed, direct them to any other Saviour, nor communicate any other kind of instruction, but he resolved that his conversation with them should be more entirely and exclusively serious. He seems to have felt, more than ever, that the redemption of the soul is precious, and that its eternal interests are not to be trifled with by unprofitable introductions, nor the effect produced by a solemn address to a dying man, to be effaced by being followed with secular or trifling conversation. He evinced the sincerity of those declarations by complaining of those who talked about worldly affairs in his chamber of sickness, and by the faithfulness and fervour, unlike his former modesty and reserve, with which he addressed some of those who visited him during his last illness.

But it was not the will of God to restore him to his labours in the Church. His divine Master had prepared him early for the general assembly and church of the first-born whose names are written in heaven, and therefore came to him and said, "Well done good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." He was not however, cut off suddenly, and in an appalling manner. He lived several weeks after he had become extremely feeble and emaciated, to exhibit the faith and patience, peace and hope, which the Gospel inspires. And it was not till his life had been spun out to the last thread, that the immortal spirit winged its way to that purity and felicity, communion and joy, after which it had longed so much in this world.

I saw the precious dust after the spirit was fled, and there was nothing revolting in the sight. Though only the skin covered the bones, the features were calm and pleasant; and the fixed eye was turned up towards heaven, as if the soul had been breathed forth in prayer, and the body looked after its glorified companion, and longed to follow it and be reunited to it again,—an event which awaits it. For we are not left to sorrow over the death of believers, as others who have no hope, for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

"Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit, rest thee now;
E'en whittle with us thy footsteps trod,
His soul was on thy brow.
Dust to its narrow house beneath,—
Soul to its place as high;
They who have seen thy look in death
May never fear to die."

HOME.

BY CHARLES MOIR, Esq.

IN A former paper, I sketched out some of those ties that bind the heart of man to his native country; I attach him to home.

By every one, in whatever station in life he is to be found, whether in the abode of poverty, or in the stately mansions of the great, this feeling is acutely experienced. Over home, however homely, there rests a sacred halo, whose beams radiate from the heart. It is to man, like a fertile island rising amid the troubled waters of life; a haven, where the tempest-tossed mariner finds a secure footing; where the wanderer through the desert of life, can rest himself in peace.

I am ever jealous of the man whose heart warms not at the recollections of home. For it is there where the fire-side pleasures have their own peculiar domain; where, separated from the external world, heart meets heart in sacred communion; where no deceit is known, and joys and griefs alike are shared. What being, separated from his kindred, sighs not, as memory conjures up from her secret hiding places those happy hours over which time and distance only throws a more bewitching charm; those long winter evenings, when the storm without only gave an additional delight to the smugness of the social circle; the happy faces beaming in the glow of the reddening hearth, while the mother or sister reads from the sacred volume the touching tale of Joseph and his brethren, or the beautiful pastoral of Ruth and Boaz? These are the bright remembrances which the life of every one, from the peer to the peasant, hoards up among the heart's choicest treasures. In the hour of trouble, the memory reverts to them as a soothing balm to the wounded spirit; for they speak of other and more happy days; they breathe of youth and health, of peace and happiness.

Sacred, indeed, is the very name of home to many; how sad it is to think it is not so to all! But there are some instances, and in justice to my country I must say these are few, where that influence is not sincerely felt. To those miserable abodes, where vice and intemperance are daily inmates, rooting out those social pleasures, and that sweet communion of feeling, so essential to the happiness of home, what remembrance can attach but that of rooted aversion? Poison domestic happiness, and you kill one of the heart's best affections. Shut out from home, deprived of that which proves a healing balm to his brethren around him, man feels like a weed cast carelessly on the ocean of life. The world is indeed before him where to choose; but there is no spot more beloved than another round which the affections entwine, and he feels himself lonely, and an outcast indeed. Like the prophet of old, his heart in very truth "falleth him." How much indeed of the real happiness of man springeth from the sacred fountain of home! And knowing this, what dreadful responsibility attaches to those who would shut up to us this one great source of happiness—a pious household, and contented minds!

In Scotland, more especially, where the influence of religion and morality has been greatly felt, the tie of home is peculiarly binding. Round the clean swept hearth of the peasant's abode, what sight can be more interesting than that of a family met after the toils of the day, holding sweet communion together; and their simple repast over, kneeling down, in company, to offer up their united prayers to Him who has provided so much good for them. And He who loves to look upon the grateful heart,

"Will hear their prayer, and bless their home with peace."

This is no fanciful picture. It is happily yet to be met with in many of the cottages of our industrious peasantry. Long, indeed, may the blessed influence of religion shed its light into the homes of our poorer brethren, rendering them the abodes of contentment, joy, and peace.

"May the hearth of their childhood be sparkling and bright,
Where their earliest footsteps trod gaily and light;
Where they offered their prayers to the Father above,
With a father's blessing and mother's love;
Where, in seasons of trial and tempests of pain,
They may long to shelter from trouble again:
For, like mariners escaped from a stormy sea,
'Tis there the wandering frame would be."

Heaven is spoken of in Scripture as the home of the Christian. "In my Father's house," (or home) says our blessed Saviour, "are many mansions." And what can be more beautiful than the opening lines of the forty-third paraphrase of the 25-28 verses of John xiv.

"You now must hear my voice no more;
My Father calls me home;
But soon from heaven the Holy Ghost,
Your Comforter, shall come."

Whether treated figuratively or otherwise, home is ever chosen to express some sacred spot over which the affections hover with ceaseless solicitude. There, our earliest impressions are formed,—the first dawns of intellect penetrated our infant mind. Within the little circle of its walls we received those pious instructions which, well-grounded in a heart too apt to turn from the truth and seek after evil, has coloured all our after-life, and made us useful members of society. There our best affections were rooted, and the waters of our corrupt inclinations turned into fountain-heads of goodness. The tender ties of brother and sister, of parent and child, are there felt in all their endearing earnestness.

What are all our after friendships to those formed within the happy circle of home? Will the cold forms of worldly acquaintanceship, for I can give it no warmer title, having for its basis self-interest, and standing on the insecure footing of worldly prosperity, atone for the loss of that sacred endearment of early communion, when heart meets heart in kindred sympathy? We may profess to look back with little solicitude over the opening years of life, and on the home of our infancy, while we are still lingering amid the scenes of our boyhood, and prosperity smiles upon our lot. But should the dark hour come, and that too when separated by leagues of land and ocean,—for the true touchstones are distance and privation,—to what direction will our thoughts and affections tend? Let sickness lay its paralyzing hand upon us in a foreign land, and the silence of our sick chamber be broken only by the voice of strangers, and in that hour of suffering, will all their proffered kindness atone for the absence of familiar faces,—for the loss of those offices of kindness, and of that real solicitude with which the mother's heart yearns towards her child, or the wife for the object of her choice; when man feels his strength decay, and his body is bowed down by disease? Then, indeed, is home most precious. In the time of trouble—in the days of sickness, when the world is shut out, and the heart turns within upon itself for consolation; in these times of secret communion, how will it brood over happier hours, call up from the dust faces long since passed away from earth, trace on the tablet of memory, if distance intervenes, that sacred spot of earth,

"Where the home of our infancy stood; "

once more gather its little circle together, con over the pious instructions of a deceased parent, and invest the solitude of the darkened chamber with all the cheerfulness of the place of our youth!

Montgomery, the author of some of the best sacred lyrics in the language, in the opening of one of his more elaborate poems, thus alludes to home:—

"There is a spot of earth supremely blest,
A dearer, sweeter, spot than all the rest;
Where man, creation's tyrant, throws aside
His sword and sceptre, pageantry and pride,
While in his softened looks benignly blend
The sire, the son, the husband, brother, friend:

¶ Slightly altered from an anonymous Poem on Home.

There woman reigns; the mother, daughter, wife,
Strews with fresh flowers the narrow way of life:
In the clear heaven of her delightful eye
An angel-guard of loves and graces lie:
Around her knees domestic duties meet,
And fire-side pleasures gambol at her feet.
Where shall that land, that spot of earth be found?
Art thou a man? a patriot? look around:
O thou shalt find, how'er thy footsteps roam,
That land thy country, and that spot thy home!"

Well may we bless the Author of all good, that we live in a country where the endearments of home are felt to their fullest extent. Over the length and breadth of our land the blessed light of religion is spread. By the unceasing efforts of a ministry untired in the work of goodness, and with the powerful aid of our admirable parochial system, pious instruction, hand in hand with liberal education, has penetrated the dwellings of our poorer classes. And that home is ever most loved from which the light of truth has banished the darkness of ignorance. With how much truth the poet says,—

"For as refinement stops, from sire to son,
Unaltered, unimproved, the manners run,
And love, and friendship's finely pointed dart
Falls blunted from each indurated heart."

It is the light of education, founded on "that knowledge that maketh wise unto salvation," that yields us added charm to our domestic pleasures. Take youth brought up in the house of idleness and profligacy, into whose ear the wholesome lessons of pious instruction were never poured, whose early years had been neglected, or, if attended to, the only education imbibed, that of the easiest method of over-reaching his neighbour, and by petty frauds accumulating the perishable things of time, and contrast such a character with the modest and unassuming man, trained up in the path of duty, taught to fear God, which is the beginning of wisdom, well grounded in the sacred truths of religion, and whose mind has been strengthened and enlarged by an enlightened education, and say which will prove the most useful member of society. Undoubtedly the latter. How much, then, do we owe to that Church which, under its admirable economy, spreads such blessings among the homes of our poorer brethren! Long under its paternal care may the hearts of our peasantry be encircled by a pious and God-fearing people, with whom the Bible may be a constant companion, as well in the day of prosperity as in the dark season of adversity; whose stay may be placed on the Father of all good, for wherever true piety, and wholesome early instruction, well grounded in the hearts of a family, are to be found, depend upon it that there domestic happiness and social comfort are experienced in an equal degree, and that within its walls will be found much of that true patriotism,

"Whose first, best country ever is at home."

As the hours we pass in the bosom of our family are those that dwell longest in the memory when the hour of separation comes, let us, as far as lies in our power, endeavour to spend them, so that their after recollection may be unmixed with bitterness. We must ever bear in mind that every good gift comes from God, and that to Him we are accountable for all we think and all we do. Whatever degree of domestic felicity we enjoy, let us not forget the Source from whence the blessing sprung; whatever social endearments are ours, let us remember the liberal hand that dispenses them. When the sunshine of prosperity has set in upon our dwelling, and every thing prospers in our hands, and all that the heart can desire is ours, let us be thankful, for He who gives us all things has great pleasure in a grateful heart. And should the dark night of adversity settle down, and our prospects blacken, still let us say unto ourselves, "We have received good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil? blessed be the name of the rod;" and bow ourselves cheerfully beneath his chastening rod.

Thus tempered, home will be ever dear to us. Separation from its peaceful pleasures will only make us the more earnestly desire them. The world, with all its manifold enticements, will fail to interest us. To one little spot, as to a common centre, will all our affections tend, and as our domestic pleasures increase, so will our heart melt within us, and we will feel charitably inclined to all our brethren. For pleasing, indeed, should it be for us at all times, more and more, by salutary discipline, to subject our minds and our affections to the influence of that blessed injunction of our divine duster, "to love our neighbours as ourselves."

THE CHARACTER AND THE PEACEFUL DEATH OF THE RIGHTEOUS.
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SMITH,
Minister of Lochwinnoch.

'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.'—Pa. xxxvii. 37.

THE exhortation contained in this verse, is at all times as necessary as it is important; for we naturally look to any period of life, rather than to its latter end, and we too often turn away from that event which we are here commanded to mark and improve. The young do, indeed, look before them, but it is not to death and eternity. It is to the maturity of life, and the consummation of their hopes; when they expect to have reached those honours, and accumulated those riches, or acquired those accomplishments, and gained those rewards which they admire and envy in others. On the other hand, those who have reached maturity, and, it may be, have enjoyed some degree of prosperity in the world, and yet have not derived from it that satisfaction and happiness which they expected, again look back upon their early life, and long for the health and hilarity of youth which will never return, but they will not lay their latter end seriously to heart. Although you had hitherto derived from the possessions and enjoyments of this world all that you expected, yet no man can be pronounced happy till death. For Solomon says, "Though a man live many years, and rejoice in them, yet, let him consider the days of darkness, for they will be many." In a word, though you had the security of complete felicity during your whole life on earth, if you are to be miserable throughout eternity, it would be but a poor portion after all. "For what would it profit a man though he could gain the whole world and lose his own soul." But the truth is, the possessions and enjoyments of this world are as unsatisfactory as they are transitory; and depravity and sin are always the procuring cause of misery. Solomon was the wisest and richest, the most peaceful and prosperous king of his day; and yet how much shame and suffering did the criminal indulgence to which he was tempted by wealth and prosperity entail upon him before he died! Take another example from a different source. It is recorded of a heathen prince, proverbial for his riches, that he displayed all his affluence and magnificence to an ancient sage, with the vain hope of being pronounced the happiest man living. But he was disappointed with this uncourteous reply, that no man can be pronounced happy till he die; a statement which he found fearfully verified in his own experience, by the calamities which soon befel him. I hope the words of the text will be found peculiarly suitable to the circumstances in which we are at present placed, as they are remarkably descriptive of the character and latter end of one who was last week consigned to the silent tomb, * who was very valuable to you and very dear to me, and regarding whom I will say, in the language of Scripture, "I am distressed for thee, my brother. Very pleasant hast thou been to me," and very amiable and faithful in all thy behaviour. In the illustration of the passage before us, I shall, with an humble dependence upon divine grace, attempt to illustrate,

I. The character spoken of in the text; the man whose latter end is peace, is said to be perfect and upright. It is of importance to notice this circumstance, because all are not warranted to die in peace. The unregenerate may say, "peace, peace, to themselves, but sudden destruction cometh upon them." But it may be said, that if perfection be necessary to secure peace and salvation, who then can enjoy these blessings, "for there is no man that liveth and sinneth not." In many things we offend, and in all come short of the glory of God. It is necessary, therefore, to explain in what sense believers may be said to be perfect and upright; and I remark,

1. That they are perfect with regard to their justification and acceptance with God.

As soon as, under a sense of their guilt and depravity, misery and danger, they are led to look to Jesus Christ for the pardon of sin and justifying righteousness, and cleave to him in the exercise of a faith, which is of the operation of God, they are freely and fully forgiven all their past iniquities, and accepted as righteous before God, on account of the imputed righteousness of the Redeemer. They are lovely through his loveliness put upon them. They are as completely acquitted in the eye of the divine law, as if they had never broken it; and are no more liable to final condemnation, than if they had been always perfectly innocent and highly meritorious. For there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. God cannot, indeed, forget their past sin, but he will no longer impute it to them. He is not blind to their future offences, and on account of them, "he may visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes; nevertheless, his loving-kindness will he not utterly take from them, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. His covenant will he not break, nor alter the thing that has gone out of his mouth;" and it is this: "Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, * Preached after the death of the late Rev. R. Whyte, Preacher of the Gospel at Lochwinnoch, a Memoir of whom is published in the present and immediately preceding number.

that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified."

2. A believer may be said to be perfect, inasmuch as he is sincere in his profession, and upright in his conduct.

The second feature of character, then, mentioned in the text is distinctly exhibited by him. He is upright in heart and life. Though imperfect and corrupt, erring and sinful, so long as he remains in this world, yet he is sincere in his devotion to the service of God, and conscientious in the discharge of all the duties incumbent upon him. True Christians really believe those things which they profess to believe. They unfeignedly hate every evil thought and affection, are sincerely desirous to love God and man, and to cultivate all the graces of the Spirit. They abhor the guilt which they condemn, and approve of the righteousness which they practise. They know they are not perfect, but no man laments and condemns this so much as they do themselves; and "the evil which they do they allow not." They strive against all sin, and have an honest and earnest desire to walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless; and their frequent and fervent prayer is, that "the very God of peace would sanctify them wholly, and that their whole spirit and soul and body may be preserved blameless to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ."

3. A believer may be said to be perfect and upright, because he is impartial in the culture of every grace and in the discharge of every duty.

There are men who are willing to mortify many corruptions, and to forsake many sins, but there is some favourite propensity which they will not mortify, and some darling sin which they will not forsake. There are others who cherish much that is good in their hearts, and perform many duties substantially important in themselves. But there is some one thing to which they cannot reconcile their minds; and they do not consider all the commandments of God concerning all things to be right. Herod heard John the Baptist gladly, and did many things which he enjoined upon him, but when he reproved him for his favourite indulgence, he cut off the head of his reprove, instead of cutting off the right hand that offended him, and that occasioned his perdition. The young man in the Gospel, unlike Herod, was free from all gross sin, but he loved the world more than God, and we have reason to believe that his avarice was the ruin of his soul. How many, alas! in every age and country, perish by the same sin; and there are others who plead for some other secret fault or positive sin, saying, "O spare this one; is it not a little one!" Some, again, cannot bring their minds to the discharge of one or another painful and humiliating duty. Naaman the Syrian, after he was cured of leprosy by Elisha, the prophet in Israel, resolved henceforward to offer sacrifices to no other god except Jehovah; but he would not abandon an honourable and lucrative situation, and refuse to enter an idol's temple, and bow before a false god. He thought it enough, perhaps, to do so with mental reservation, and without religious homage, though he was countenancing idolatry, and encouraging others in the practice of this sin; and he felt his conduct to be so equivocal and dangerous, that he said, "The Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." Now, no perfect and upright man would act in this manner. No honour nor emolument could tempt him to live in the habitual neglect of any duty, nor the habitual commission of any sin. I do not mean to say that he does not feel the peculiar strength of some corrupt propensities, and powerful temptations to the commission of some sin, or the neglect of some duty; for every man has what is called in Scripture his own iniquity, the sin that doth most easily beset him: but instead of pleading indulgence for this sin, or abandoning any painful duty, he is just most jealous and watchful against his own iniquity, and most afraid of the neglect of unpleasant duties. I have only to add,

4. That every true believer aims at perfection.

I have already spoken of his impartiality in abhorring every thing that is evil, and cleaving to all that is good; but I am now to bring before you a higher object. He aims at perfection in all things. Instead of pleading indulgence in any corruption or sin, he is solicitous to be in all respects perfectly holy. If he might obtain his desire and an answer to his prayers, he would never harbour an evil thought, nor cherish an unholy affection, utter a foolish word, nor commit a sinful action; and one of the things which makes heaven supremely desirable to him is, that there he will sin no more. He is grieved that his heart is so cold and corrupt, that he loves his God and Saviour so little, and does so little to promote his glory, and the best interests of his brethren of mankind. He never cherishes the feeling which corrupt nature is apt to suggest, that it is enough if he be pardoned and justified, and his soul safe for eternity. No man wishes to go to hell, but the unregenerate want no more religion than is enough to qualify them for heaven. He has no sympathy with such persons, but he sympathises with the great apostle of the Gentiles, when he said, Phil. iii. 12-16, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may attain unto for which also I am apprehended of Jesus Christ. Brethren, I count not myself to have attained: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Let us, therefore, as many as be perfect, (in the sense explained,) be thus minded; and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal unto this unto you." Religion is not, with a perfect and upright man, merely a question of happiness.

ither in this world, or in that which is to come, out of holiness in heart and life: and, therefore, he would labour to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord, irrespective of any advantage derived from it, either in time or through eternity. There is no measure, then, as there is no mercenary motive in his culture of holiness, and he will never sit down satisfied till he attain perfection. Thus he will never attain in the present life, but at death he will be made perfect in holiness, and then pass into glory, where he shall be for ever with the Lord. This leads me to direct your attention,

II. To the blessedness spoken of in the text,—"the end of the perfect and upright man is ease."

I might show, that he dies at peace with God and man, and often enjoying peace of mind and good hope through grace of everlasting salvation; but I suppose the last of these ideas is chiefly intended in the text. As soon as a man is justified through the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, he enjoys peace with God, and does not need to look forward to the end of life for this blessing: but he does not at once enjoy peace with his fellow-creatures, nor peace of conscience; and even after these have been attained, they are not uniformly enjoyed throughout life. The very perfection of a Christian's character provokes the envy and hatred of the wicked, and his uprightness in reproving their sin, and urging upon them the discharge of duty, embitters their hostility. But he may in the end overcome evil with good, acting upon the rule laid down in Scripture: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." If, in some instances, he should fail, after all this, yet the approach of death and eternity may accomplish what he has not been able to accomplish in the course of his life. His enemies are not likely to pursue him with their hatred to the very grave. When their consciences tell them that it was a sense of duty which moved him to do what offended them, and they see him dying full of faith and hope, their hearts must be hard, indeed, if they be not melted into feelings of compassion and kindness.

But whatever be the feelings of others towards him, he cherishes no resentment towards them. A true Christian never hates any man, and can always forgive and do good to his worst enemy. And there is no time when his heart is more likely to be expanded with mercy and love, than when, through the mercy of God, and the righteousness and grace of Jesus Christ, he has the near prospect of escaping all the sin and misery of this world, and entering upon that state where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." He, therefore, dies at peace with all men.

But it is obvious to remark, that there is here a special reference to that peace of mind which the perfect and upright enjoy at the approach of death. This is not always attained as soon as a man passes from death unto life. For some time the faith of the Christian is weak, and he experiences much anxiety regarding his character and prospects. His peace is often broken, and his fears alarmed. But in proportion as he goes on towards perfection, he often rises above his fears, and is "built up in holiness and comfort through faith unto salvation." Instead of being alarmed at the approach of death, he sometimes experiences a blessed tranquillity and holy joy, fervent love, and heavenly hope. I admit that this is not universally nor uniformly the case. There are some believers who are much troubled at the approach of death, and have fearful apprehensions in the prospect of eternity. And even those who rise above these fears, are occasionally disturbed and alarmed, and complain, with the Psalmist, "Why standest thou afar off; wherefore hidest thou thyself?" Some of the oldest and most eminent believers are fearfully assaulted by Satan upon the approach of the king of terrors, as if God meant thereby to afford encouragement to young or less perfect Christians. He leaves his most distinguished servants to engage in a contest for which he has given them grace and strength, that by their victory they may cheer on those who are more unequal to the struggle. These, however, are rather exceptions than the general rule with regard to his dispensations of providence and grace. When Christians walk in darkness, and struggle with fears and difficulties under sickness, and at the approach of death, they may not have been perfectly sincere and upright in the course of their lives. They may not have maintained, with sufficient zeal, a warfare against corruption and sin, nor attained that perfection of character at which they should have aimed. It is no doctrine of mine that men must look to any attainment of their own as a ground of acceptance, or source of comfort, either through life or at death, for all our confidence and hope at all times must rest wholly on the mercy of God, reigning through the righteousness and grace of Jesus Christ. But God is equitable in the dispensations of his grace as well as of his providence; and, therefore, those who have most simply and zealously devoted themselves to his service, and have done and attained most in the divine life, usually enjoy the greatest peace and hope, light and joy, in the prospect of eternity. And, oh, what a sight is this, my brethren, to behold a man, especially if he be in the prime of life, and when about to enter on the fruits of his labours, looking round on all he is leaving with perfect complacency and resignation, and looking forward to death and the grave, to an unseen and endless eternity, with peace and joy! The world and all that it possesses have lost their charms for him, or rather he can give them all up cheerfully for the sake of higher possessions and enjoyments. Death has been disarmed of its terrors, for Christ has taken away its sting and enabled him to adopt the triumphant language of the Apostle Paul, "O death, where is thy sting; O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law, but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Similar to this is the song of joy and triumph, in the words of the Apostle Peter, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in these last times." The death-beds of such persons have no terrors. One, in this sinful and miserable world, might be tempted to envy them, and to wish that his soul was in their soul's stead; "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Turn aside, then, my brethren, and contemplate a scene of this kind. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

This is the duty enjoined in the text, and I have now only, in this application and improvement of the subject, to impress the duty upon your minds. You are here enjoined to mark the perfect and behold the upright, not that you may detect some remaining corruption in them, as a ground of condemnation,—not even as the subjects of barren admiration and useless praise, but that you may imbeibe their spirit and imitate their conduct; that you may choose their God for your God, and their Saviour for your Saviour,—may be as zealous and useful as they were through life, enjoy as much peace and hope in death, and the same glory and felicity throughout eternity.

But as every lesson is more powerfully enforced by example than precept, I cannot better improve the lesson taught in the text, than by reminding you of the example of him, who for sometime laboured in this place in holy things, but "has now rested from his labours, and his works do follow him." I am sure that every one of you must have felt how suitable all that has been said was to his character and conduct. "Integrity and uprightness preserved him." Never did you meet with a more sincere and simple hearted Christian, nor one more steady and conscientious in the discharge of his duty. And seldom, if ever, have you seen one attain greater perfection of character. I feel that what was said after the death of my much loved and dearly lamented friend, the late Rev. Mr Geddes, was eminently applicable to him. "No doubt," said Dr Brown, in his funeral sermon, in some such words as these, "No doubt, he must have had his imperfections and corruptions, his errors and sins, like every fallen son of Adam, but, I confess, I never saw them." In like manner, I am bound, in justice to Mr Whyte, to say, that after the closest and most frequent intercourse with him, so long as he lived among us, I never saw any thing offensive either in his conversation or conduct, and the longer and more intimately I knew him, the more he rose in my admiration and affection. And how agreeable to all this was his death! The language of the text describes it most accurately and graphically; "The end of that man was peace." He complained occasionally of weak faith and cold affections, but the serenity of his mind and its habitual tranquillity beamed through his very countenance, and prognosticated his transition to that place where there is fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

SKETCH OF THE
OF THE ANCIENT CULDEES.

NO. II.

BY THE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON, Dunnichen.

HAVING briefly described in our former article the doctrines, the habits, and the ecclesiastical policy of the ancient Culdees, we now proceed to inquire into the success which attended their labours.

The centuries which have elapsed, and the assiduity with which, at an after period, the partisans of the Romish Church attempted to efface all memorial of any system purer than their own, render it a matter of some difficulty to trace out the progress of these primitive missionaries; nor does it appear necessary for our present purpose to do any thing farther, than barely to enumerate some of the districts where they had planted settlements, and acquired an almost unlimited authority.

Columba had done much during his life of devotion, for the cause of Gospel diffusion, among the tribes of Caledonia; and we require no stronger testimony of the ardour with which his successors prosecuted the same grand object, than the widely ramified interests of their body. We have only to glance at the number,—the widely separated situations and the importance of their religious establishments, to be convinced both of their energy and of their sagacity; for traces of their exertions are to be discovered in almost every important station and commanding locality, from the Pentland Frith to the Solway.

Abernethy, long the seat of the Pictish court, seems to have been one of the most important of the Culdee establishments on the mainland, as early as the beginning of the 7th century. Next to it, perhaps, in dignity was Dunkeld, which rose to importance under Constantine, King of the Picts, about a century later; and on which the honour of the Culdee primacy was conferred, after the repeated desolations of Iona by the Danes. Situated in the gorge connecting the southern and the northern districts of Scotland, it had a hold upon both; but never, until episcopised by Rome, does it seem to have assumed any dignity, or exercised any authority, except those which it had received by translation from Iona.

Monasteries were at different periods reared throughout the whole country; of which the most prominent were those of St. Serf in Lochleven, founded about the commencement of the 8th century, Dunblane, Brechin, Mortlach and Monimusk in Aberdeenshire, St. Andrews, Kirkcaldy, (Kirk Culdee), Dumfries, Mailross, Cranond, Kirkcudbright, (Kirk Culbert); having its own religious establishment, alone with the light of Christianity, like so many bright jewels in an ocean coronet.

The exertions of the Culdees, however, were by no means confined to Scotland. At a very early period there are accounts of Christians existing in the South of England, resembling the Culdees in character; and who disclaimed communion with those Romish embaseries, who were crossing over from the continent for the purpose of reducing Britain to an acknowledgment of the supremacy of the holy See. About the commencement of the 7th century, however, we have authentic evidence of a Mission of the Culdees into England. Oswald, king of Northumbria, established a monastery in Lindisfarne,—and having been himself educated by the Culdees, he invited the abbot of Iona to supply a superior for the infant institution. From that time forward, Lindisfarne served as a nursery for Christian teachers to disseminate the truth of God throughout the less enlightened districts of the south; and through the exertions of Missionaries from that monastery, England seems to have been Christianized nearly as far South as the Thames. The era of Culdee ascendancy in England, however, does not seem to have been of long continuance, after this period. The Romish Church was making strong efforts to gain such a fair province to her spiritual empire,—and as the Culdees refused to defer to the Papal authority, either in point of doctrine or discipline, its partisans employed all their subtlety to undermine the authority of the native clergy among the people, and to destroy their influence with the nobles and the king. And at a synod held at Whitby, for the purpose of debating their points of difference in the presence of king Oswy, Colman, at that time the head of the establishment in Holy Island, “perceiving that his doctrine was rejected, left his bishoprick at Lindisfarne, and returned into Scotland.”

There are abundant proofs, in the history of these times, of the irreconcilable differences, in form and doctrine, that existed betwixt the native Church and Romanism, and of the unbending resistance which the Culdees opposed to the encroachments of Papal supremacy. Almost all the Culdee clergy in England resigned their livings, and returned with Colman to Scotland, and many of them afterwards bore the brand of excommunication, some even the flames of martyrdom, rather than apostatise from the faith of their fathers. Nor does this opposition seem to have existed in Britain merely, but in Ireland also, where the aid of a foreign tyranny was found necessary, in order to establish a throne for Popery, over the ruins of the native faith.

Such being the doctrines and dispositions of the Culdees, it was not likely that a policy, so unscrupulous as that of Rome, would long brook such a rivalry, without putting every engine in exercise for overthrowing opposition. At an early period, measures were planned for the purpose of subjecting the Culdees of Scotland to the Papal sway; but unhesitating and unprincipled as the partisans of Papacy have ever been, in the measures which they have adopted, yet were their schemes, in their origin, generally characterized by a caution, which, although it might render their movements more tardy, did not, by any means, render them less fatal;—affording sufficient evidence of their possession of a full share of the serpent's wisdom, however slender their claims to the harmlessness of the dove. Perceiving that the public mind would not brook the immediate and violent expulsion of a religious body on whom the nation had looked for centuries, as their spiritual directors, the Romish policy at first tended rather to undermine than to overthrow—to weaken gradually, in order the more effectually to exterminate. The simplest mode of procedure, and one to which the sagacity of the Papal agents failed not to have recourse, was to employ all those arts, (and nobody knew better how to exercise them than they,) which appeared most favourable for seducing the simple minds of the British clergy from the primitive faith. The success of this plan seems to have been very limited. Adomnan, indeed, at one period abbot of Iona, was during a visit to England, A. D. 702, induced to conform to the rites and doctrines of the Church of Rome. Upon his return to Iona, he used every endeavour to induce his brethren to follow his example, but without success; “for,” says a Papal writer, “he (Adomnan) was not able to reduce to a better mind the monks who lived in the island of Hi, over whom he presided as ruler.” Some instances may be found, in after times, of leading Culdee ecclesiastics, who joined the Romish Church, but these both rare and isolated; so that we read of David I. being necessitated to appoint foreigners to vacant benefices, as the native clergy would not conform to the Church which he was determined to uphold.

Failing thus in the attempt to allure the family of Iona to apostasy, the next expedient tended to weaken the hold which the native clergy had on the public affection and the national esteem. And this the Popish emissaries attempted to effect, by lessening the temporal power of the Culdees,—by divesting them of their public influence,—by increasing the number of Episcopal Sees,—and by presenting an incessant contrast bewixt the unostentatious simplicity of the native forms, and the imposing pomp of the Romish ritual. When, however, these gentler measures failed of effecting the purpose intended, the Romish priesthood began to employ means less congenial to the spirit of that Christianity, of which both parties were professors.

It is recorded that some few years after the death of Adomnan, Nethan, king of the Picts, the third of that name, instigated by one of the Popish ecclesiastics, “expelled the family of Iona beyond Drumalbin,” (the Grampians,) “and established at Iona an abbot and monks more submissive to the Papal authority.” Several years afterwards, however, upon the demise of Nethan, the family of Iona, (as the original Culdees were styled,) seems to have recovered their ancient residence and privileges, and to have enjoyed comparative tranquillity, until, during the 9th and 10th centuries, the Danes, by repeated descents, once and again ravaged the island, plundering the monastery and murdering the ecclesiastics, after which the remains of Columba were removed from Iona to a more secure resting-place; and although notice is found of Culdees resident there, until about the beginning of the 13th century, yet had the importance of the establishment declined, until nothing remained except the expiring twilight of its once glorious sunshine.

But in thus pursuing the fate of Iona, we have somewhat overstepped the regular progress of the history of the Culdees. The reign of David I. seems to have been the most disastrous to their power. From the moment of his accession to the throne, his leading object was to crush the native form of worship, and erect the Papacy upon its ruins. For this purpose, he loaded the Romish ecclesiastics with favours, and the Romish establishments with grants of land to such an extent, that he also well earned the title of being a sore saint to the crown: and that he might accomplish his purpose the more effectually, he introduced canons regular into all the Culdee abbacies, in order to lessen the influence of the primitive possessors, in those districts particularly, where their authority was predominant.

By degrees the canons, protected by court influence, and with the sanction of the royal authority, began to assume the internal management of the convents; for David I. enacted, that where the Culdees conformed to the Romish rule, they might be allowed to retain quiet possession of their benefices, but that in the event of their resisting, they should either be summarily ejected, or at least that, whenever vacancies occurred, these should be supplied by ecclesiastics inimical to the Culdee interest.—Such was the course pursued in the different Culdee establishments, particularly those of Monimusk, Abernethy, Brechin, Dunkeld, and St. Andrews; and to such an extent was the practice persisted in, that the Culdees, at last, feeling themselves degraded, by continuing as mere subordinates in situations where their right to rule had formerly been undisputed, not only retired in great numbers from their charges, but withdrew altogether from the ecclesiastical profession, so that the bishop of St. Andrews addressed letters to clergy and laity throughout the realm, prohibiting them from countenancing or harbouring such as had thus returned to the secular life.

But subtle and vigorous as were the measures employed by the Papal power, to crush Culdeeism and gain ascendancy in Scotland, yet such were the spirit and intrepidity of the native preachers, and such besides was the hold which they had of the affections of the great mass of the community, that bridled and curbed as they were by the influence of the court and the nobles, yet did they long repel with success the yoke of Papal superstition: nor have we any evidence of the authority of Rome being acknowledged, or any Papal legate being received in Scotland, until De Crema came in that capacity as far as Roxburgh, where he received the submission of the monarch himself, and a few of the nobles; but even at that time, very few indeed of the people of Scotland seem to have participated in the act; nor does there appear any instance of an appeal being made, by the clergy of Scotland, to the See of Rome, until the meeting at Norham, to decide the question of the claim of the archbishop of York, to be metropolitan of Scotland. Even then the clergy of Scotland seem to have adopted submission to Rome, as the least dangerous of two alternatives; and young Murray, while claiming the protection of the holy See, hurled against England the charge of ingratitude with great power, and with most honourable reference to the former exertions of the Culdee preachers: "It is true, English nation, thou mightest have been noble, and more noble than some other nations, if thou hadst not craftily turned the power of thy nobility, and the strength of thy fearful might, into the presumption of tyranny, and the knowledge of liberal science into the shifting glosses of sophistry; but thou disposest not thy purposes as if thou wert led with reason, and being puffed up with thy strong armies, and trusting in thy great wealth, thou attemptest, in thy wretched ambition and lust of domineering, to bring under thy jurisdiction thy neighbour provinces and nations, more noble, I will not say, in multitude or power, but in lineage and antiquity; and to whom, if thou wilt consider ancient records, thou shouldst rather have been humbly obedient, or at least, laying aside thy rancour, have reigned together in perpetual love; and now with all wickedness of pride that thou showest, without any reason or law, but in thy ambitious power, thou seekest to oppress thy mother, the Church of Scotland, which from the beginning hath been catholic and free, and which brought thee, when thou wast straying in the wilderness of heathenism, into the safeguard of the true faith and way unto life, even unto Jesus the author of eternal rest. She did wash thy kings, and princes, and people, in the laver of holy baptism; she taught thee the commandments of God, and instructed thee in moral duties; she did accept many of thy nobles, and others of meaner rank, when they were desirous to learn to read, and gladly gave them daily entertainment without price, books also to read, and instruction freely; she did also appoint, ordain, and consecrate thy bishops and priests; by the space of thirty years and above, she maintained the primacy and pontifical dignity within thee on the north side of Thames, as Bede witnesseth. And now, I pray, what recompense renderest thou now unto her, that hath bestowed so many benefits upon thee? is it bondage, or such as Judea rendered unto Christ, evil for good? It seemeth no other thing. Thou unkind vine, how art thou turned into bitterness? We looked for grapes, and thou broughtest forth wilde grapes—for judgment, and behold iniquity and crying."

After this, however, appeals to Rome became more common, and nearly a century afterwards, we find an appeal carried thither by the Culdees themselves, against the canons regular, regarding the management of St. Mary's Church, in St. Andrews; which, as might have been anticipated, terminated in the success of the popish party, and tended to hasten the overthrow of the already tottering fabric of Culdeeism. Their submission to Rome seems only to have been extorted, after the body had been so stunned by the violence and duration of the contest, as to be almost on the point of expiring; and after the close of the thirteenth century, they ceased altogether to be spoken of as a distinct and separate society.

Isolated and petty establishments may have existed,—and a few of the youth may even afterwards have continued to be trained up in the "good old way of their fathers," and some expiring struggles for independence may have been attempted; but they were only the struggles portending dissolution, hourly becoming fainter and fainter, until the living principle became at last utterly extinguished.

Almost at the moment, however, that the crafty and crooked policy of Rome had compassed their ruin, and trampled on the purity of the primitive faith and worship in Scotland, we are furnished with a striking evidence of the wisdom of the great Head of the Church, in not "leaving himself without a witness," in any land.

The Culdees, as we have seen, ceased not to exist as a body, until nearly the beginning of the fourteenth century. By that time the great Reformation was dawning on the continent, and even in England, and at a very early period afterwards made its appearance in the more remote districts of Scotland: men, professing scriptural opinions, appearing, in great numbers, and testifying against the corruptions of the Church of Rome. May we not suppose, that although, to all outward appearance, the Culdees had been exterminated, yet had there been preserved a goodly residue, "who had never bowed the knee to Baal;" and whose children trained up in the purity of the faith, took the earliest opportunity of uprearing the banner of the Reformation? And may we not also consider it probable, that the remains of that spirit, which had induced their fathers to contend so gallantly for the independence of their Church, and the simplicity of her worship, may have been the spark, which, at a future day, awoke all the national energies of Scotland to resist the yoke of Prelatic servitude?

Thus have we touched briefly upon the early establishment of Christianity in Scotland by Columba,—of its progress under his successors, and of the subjugation of the ecclesiastical independence of the nation to the Papal Supremacy. We hope to prosecute the subject still farther, by inquiring into the history of the reign of Popery in Scotland, and of the moral and spiritual darkness which, under its tyranny, overspread our land. In the meantime we rejoice if, in any degree, we have assisted in recalling to memory a page in our history not inglorious or uninteresting, because almost forgotten,—but well stored with details of the struggles and triumphs of our ancestors, in the cause of the "faith once delivered to the saints;" or in leading attention to a body of ecclesiastics, who have been traduced by Papists, misrepresented by Prelatists, and too much neglected by Presbyterians.

We look back proudly, and with good reason too, to the age of our Reformation struggles, and boast of the faithfulness which characterized the martyred defenders of our Covenants;—we need not however be ashamed to extend our researches beyond such modern limits, but may find our Church's annals emblazoned with records of earlier triumphs and of earlier toils, and read registered therein the name of many a spiritual hero, whose memory ought to be embalmed in the hearts of their grateful posterity.

A CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHER'S VIEW OF PRAYER.

EULER, a highly gifted man and true philosopher, gives many excellent warnings against pretenders to science, who go adrift, having no anchor for their soul:

"Or, shipwrecked, light upon the coast False fires that others may be lost."

We are not the inhabitants of a forsaken and a fatherless world. Our God is the hearer and the answerer of prayer. The following extract from Euler's Letters to a German Princess, shows how simple a thing it is for a mind truly enlightened to believe, not only that God is, but also that he is the rewarder of all them that diligently seek him.

"Before continuing my remarks on philosophy and physics, it is of the last importance to show your Royal Highness their connection with religion. However absurd and foolish the sentiments of a philosopher be, he is so headstrong that he will not admit of any religious sentiment or doctrine which is not conformable to his system of philosophy; thence most of the sects and heresies in religion have arisen. Many systems of philosophy are really in contradiction with religion; but divine truths might well bear down human reveries if the pride of philosophers offered no obstacle.

"If true philosophy sometimes appear contrary to religion, that contradiction is only apparent, and we must never allow ourselves to be blinded by objections. I am going to lay before your Royal Highness an objection which almost all philosophical systems furnish against prayer. Religion prescribes to us this duty, with the assurance that God will grant our wishes and prayers, provided they be conformable to the precepts he has given us. On the other hand, philosophy teaches us, that all the events of this world happen conformably to the course of nature established from the beginning, and that our prayers cannot cause any change unless it be maintained that God works continual miracles in favour of our prayers. This objection is all the stronger, since revelation itself assures us that God has established the course of all the events in the world, and that nothing can happen which God has not foreseen from all eternity. Is it then credible, say they, that God will change this established course in favour of all the prayers that the faithful address to him? It is thus that unbelievers try to shake our confidence. But I observe, first, that when God established the course of the world, and arranged all events which were to happen, he had respect at the same time to all the circumstances which should accompany each event, and in particular to the dispositions, to the wishes, and prayers of each intelligent being, and that the arrangement of all events was made quite in accordance with all these circumstances. When, therefore, a believer now addresses a prayer acceptable to God, he must not imagine that that prayer has only now arrived at the knowledge of God. He has already heard that prayer from all eternity, and since this merciful Father has judged it worthy of being regarded, he has arranged the world expressly in favour of that prayer, in such a manner that the fulfilment might be a consequence of the natural course of events. It is thus that God grants the prayers of believers without working miracles, although we have no reason to deny that God has worked and may still work true miracles. This fact, that the order of the world is fixed, far from rendering our prayers useless, as free-thinkers affirm, rather increases our confidence, teaching us the consoling truth that all our prayers have already been presented, from the beginning, at the foot of the throne of the Almighty; that they have their place in the plan of the world as data, according to which, events should be ruled agreeably to the infinite wisdom of the Creator. Would they suppose that our condition would be better, if God had no knowledge of our prayers before we offered them, and then to reverse the order of nature in our favour; that would be very contrary to the wisdom of God, and would weaken his adorable perfections. Would there not be reason, then, to say that this world was a very imperfect work? That God might indeed wish to favour the petitions of the faithful, but that not having foreseen them he was obliged to interrupt the order of nature every moment, if he would not altogether neglect the wants of intelligent beings, who form the most important part of the world. For to what end create this material world, full of the greatest wonders, if there were not intelligent beings capable of being attracted to the adoration of God, and to the closest union with their Creator, in which, without doubt, their greatest happiness consists? Hence, we must absolutely conclude that intelligent beings and their welfare must have been the principal object with God in fixing the arrangement of this world, and we may be assured that all the events which take place in the world are in the most wonderful union with the wants of all intelligent beings, in order to conduct them to true happiness. No constraint, however, can take place, on account of the liberty which is as essential to spirits as extension is to matter. Thus, we must not be surprised if there are intelligent beings who never arrive at their happiness. It is in that union of spirits with the events of the world that divine providence consists, in which every one has the consolation of participating; so that every one may rest assured that from all eternity he is included in the plan of the world, and that even all that happens to him is in the closest connection with his most pressing wants, and which tend to his safety and salvation.

"How much should this consideration increase our confidence in, and our love for that divine providence, on which all religion is founded! Hence, your Royal Highness will see, on these grounds, philosophy can make no successful assault on religion."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Resignation.—Real heartfelt submission to the will of God in pain, sickness, crosses, every thing, never was the work of a man's own spirit; and when it comes from above in answer to prayer, is full amends for all we can suffer. By pain God drives me to prayer, teaches me what prayer is, and inclines me to pray. Why should a man complain, or think his lot hard, when he has God to live with, and order all his affairs in this world, and to do so when he dies? Submission to the will of God, with experience of support in pain, sickness, affliction, is a more joyous and happy state than any degree of health or worldly prosperity. If chastisement is a token of God's love, why should I faint under it, or so much desire release from it, till it has done its work? I must suffer and die,—with the help of God I will suffer and die.—ADAM. (Private Thoughts.)

A true saying.—Better men reproach thee for thy conversion, than conscience reproach thee for thy obstinacy. The reproaches of an awakened and wounded conscience, will be very terrible, not to be denied, not to be answered, not to be endured. As long as Job's heart did not reproach him, but witnessed his integrity, he could bear his unfriendly friends' censures and reproaches the better.—An Old Author.

SACRED POETRY.

HEART NOTES.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDBOROUGH,

A CORD unseen binds to the natal son
Our willing hearts. Than thread of gossamer,
Though finer far, we own its mighty power.
Nor yields the harpsichord to beauty's touch
More rapturous response, than yield our hearts,
Whene'er in after-life this cord is struck,
Though earth's diameter should intervene
Betwixt us and the spot that gave us birth,
Where first a mother's cherished name we lisped,
Or clomb a father's knee; or waxing strong,
Strove in the wave, or on the sunny plain,
In sportive rivalry with loved compeers;
Or in the village school, the path of lore
Delighted trode, and grasped the wished-for prize.

More blessed be whom cord of heavenly love
Binds to the world unseen. Thrice blest the man Whose heart the Lord has touched, and touching said,
"A wake, awake, dead heart!" and as he spake,
The quickening SPIRIT breathes, the soul awakes,
And 'scaped the doom of death, now pants for heaven.
Yielded the heart till then but jarring sounds;
Or if at times a dulcet strain was struck,
The stunted strain spoke but of earth and time.
But now, like harp new strung, in nobler lay,
The heart can tell of HIM who taught its cords
Strains which might stay an angel on the wing,
On radiant pinions poised, to lend an ear
To sweeter hymns than sung in Eden's bowers
The primal pair, the loveliest work of God.
Of goodness infinite, of boundless power,
Of wisdom wonderful in all his works,
Enraptured they would sing. But man renewed
Can strike a loftier note than ever thrilled
In sinless Paradise th' unsullied heart,
Or woke the infant echoes as they lay
In peaceful slumber near the tree of life.
For man redeemed can sing of mercy; sing
The blissful song which angels cannot learn,
Which cheers his pilgrimage, and fits the heart
For sweeter symphonies in Zion's land.
Feeble, indeed, his song while here below;
And yet, at times, burns not the holy flame,
When in the sanctuary His praise he hears,
Who died, though Prince of life, to save from death,
And lives, that we may live for evermore?
These joys are preludes of the bliss to come.
See you these swallows, now that autumn's breath,
And shortening days, proclaim a winter near,
How thick they congregate on turret-top,
With twittering song to cheer each other's heart,
And prune the willing wing for timely flight
To lands of brighter sky and balmy breeze?
Even so believers up to God's own house,
As travellers Zion-ward, delight to go,
To hear and sing of Christ, and trace the way
Which leads the ransomed to Emmanuel's land.
As beats the pilgrim's fainting heart with joy,
When in the wilds of some far distant land,
Remote from early friends, he sudden hears,
In accents sweet of Scotia's Doric tongue,
Some tuneful lay, erst heard by classic Tweed,
Or splendid Clyde, or lovely banks of Ken,
Recalling now the distant and the past,
With all the vividness of life and truth,—
Even so at Jesus' name, our Saviour-God,
Th' enraptured soul, rising on wings of fire,
Transcends the little bounds of earth and time,

Mounts to heaven's portals, scans the realms of joy
Beholds the martyr band,—the anthem hears
Of saints in light, once known and loved below,
And, rapt in beatific vision, cries,
"How long! how long! when shall I be with Christ!
When shall I strike these glorious golden harps!
When shall I join your holy, happy throng!
Even now fulfil thy promise, Zion's King.
Come, quickly come! Amen, even quickly come!
He comes! he comes! I hear his chariot wheels!
O mercy infinite! He comes to save!
I see his radiant smile! I hear his voice!
His voice is love! His promise is fulfilled,
And, bliss ineffable! I am the Lord's!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

Talent combined with Piety.—Ann Baynard, descended from a very ancient and respectable family, was born at Preston, in Lancashire, in the year 1672. Her parents perceiving her lively genius, joined with a natural desire for learning, gave her a very liberal education, which she improved to the best and noblest purposes. She was skilled in the Latin and Greek languages, in mathematics, and philosophy. Her compositions in Latin displayed uncommon facility and elegance of expression. She had a strong and exact memory, a comprehensive and exalted mind, coveting more and more knowledge. "In this particular alone," she would often say, "it is a sin to be contented with a little." But, with all her genius and her acquirements, she was free from vanity and affectation. With profound humility and prostration of mind, she testified with Paul: "I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord." She used often to say, "that human learning is of little worth, unless, as a handmaid, it leads to the knowledge of Christ revealed in the Gospel, as our Lord and Saviour." "What avails," said she, "Solomon's skill in the works of nature, if we do not discern the God of nature? Of what advantage is it to be versed in astronomy, if we never stand by our holy practices, to arrive at the blessed region; or to be so skilful in arithmetic, that we can divide and subdivide to the smallest fraction, if we do not learn to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom? or to understand the diseases of the body, if we do not know where to find the balm of Gilead, the wine and oil of the good Samaritan, the Lord Jesus, to pour into the wounds of our souls?"

A Deaf-Mute.—A gentleman in Paris, superintendent of an institution for the instruction of deaf and dumb children, was asked by a friend permission to propose an inquiry to the children under his care, with a view to ascertain the extent of their mental improvement. Having received permission, he wrote the question on the wall, "Doth God reason?" One of the children immediately wrote underneath, "God knows and sees every thing. Reasoning implies doubt and uncertainty; therefore God doth not reason."

TAKE HEED WHAT YOU THINK.

By JAMES GLASSFORD, Esq., ADVOCATE.

It is a common saying, and, under due limitation, expresses an acknowledged truth, that "thought is free." But an important distinction must be attended to. For, in its more common and popular acceptation, the saying includes two things very different in their nature and effect, namely, that our thoughts are independent of control from our fellow-men, and also that, being spontaneous in their rise and exercise, they are, in like manner, withdrawn from our own jurisdiction, and are among the number of those operations and agencies for which we are not properly accountable. Now, the former proposition is true, but the latter is not, except in a very qualified sense, otherwise we should be placed in a very different situation from that in which we actually stand. If we had no power to regulate the train of our thoughts and imaginations, which are the material as well as instrument employed in reasoning, or to govern the early suggestions of affection and desire, which lead to action, the ground of that responsibility which we feel, both for our intellectual judgments and our moral conduct, would, in a great measure, be removed and taken away. But we have the testimony of conscience, as well as the authority of revelation, that we are answerable for our evil thoughts as well as for our evil deeds. And a moderate degree of attention to the actings of his own mind will satisfy every one that this responsibility attaches not only to such thoughts as have acquired the character and force of intentions and settled purposes of action, which is the most important acceptation of what is called in Scripture the thoughts of the heart, but also to the preceding steps of their progress while they yet remain as apprehensions and suggestions of the fancy. And the reasons are sufficiently obvious. For experience shows how intimate is that connection between the first rising of sinful or of idle imaginations and their unfolding into act, which is described by the apostle, (James i. 15,) how directly the indulgence of vain and foolish thoughts leads not only to vain and foolish words, but to forbidden and sinful actions.

VOL. II.

What are the declarations of Scripture upon this point? We read there, in the description of the early wickedness of man upon the earth, that God saw "that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. vi. 5. In the prophet's rebuke of Judah for their sins, he charges them with the "vain thoughts" which lodged within them. Jer. iv. 14. Our Saviour, in describing those things which, proceeding from the heart, defile a man, mentions, in like manner, first, "evil thoughts." Matt: xv. 19. The Psalmist declares that he hates "vain thoughts." Ps. cxix. 113. And the apostle gives a catalogue of good and virtuous thoughts, to be understood, of course, as in contrast to those which are evil and forbidden. Phil. iv. 8.

The inference which must obviously be drawn from these and similar declarations and warnings in the Word of God is, that men shall be called to account, not only for their deeds, and for their words, but for their habitual and indulged thoughts also. And the supposition, too often entertained, that we have not the power of governing this part of our frame, rests on a mistake, as these passages of Scripture sufficiently prove. Our own experience, in like manner, bears testimony to the fact. It is true, indeed, that we cannot suspend, much less stop, the current of thought. Its course proceeds uninterrupted, like the breath we draw, and the blood that circulates in our veins. It is true, also, that the conception and imagination of what is sinful arises often in the mind without concurrence of the will, and may return again and again without making us partakers of the sin itself and guilt. For, as strongly, and perhaps not very warrantably, expressed by the poet,

"Evil into the mind of God or man
May come and go, so unapproved, and leave
No spot or blame behind."—PAR. LOST, B. v.

The intrusion of such conceptions may be altogether involuntary. It is only when accepted and harboured that they defile and corrupt. But the question is, how far, and in what manner, their inroads may be checked, and their perpetual or frequent recurrence prevented.

There are various ways in which evil thoughts have their origin in the mind of an individual. They spring up from the native and inward corruption of his heart. They are excited by outward objects acting through the sense upon that favourable soil. They may be insinuated by contagion and example of others, through books which he reads, or conversation of those with whom he associates. But in whatever way they do arise, their influence may be counteracted, and their direction regulated. In some of these cases, a repetition of the occasions which have induced them may be avoided; and where this cannot be done, or done effectually, where they have as it were a spontaneous birth, that is to say, through means unexpected or unobserved, still it is in our option either to lodge and entertain, or to exclude and banish them. For, as every thing will minister occasion of evil to him who is inclined towards it, so may that influence in every case be resisted, and rendered of no effect by the will. Evil and corrupt thoughts may be supplanted, by calling in those which are harmless and pure. As he who discovers a serpent in his path will seek refuge from it by flight, so he who is surprised by evil imaginations, if aware of the danger, will retreat, in mind, to a position of safety. Christ, when tempted by the adversary of man to thoughts of presumption and worldly glory, repelled him by the Word of God. And this weapon is still possessed of all its power. In this inward temptation, as in every other, the command is, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." So likewise the dangers arising from "evil communications" are to be avoided by the choice of proper associates; according to the example of the Psalmist, "I am a companion of all them that fear thee." Psalm cxix. 63. And the precept of the apostle is to the same effect, 1 Cor. v. 11.

But, independently of the positive sinfulness of certain trains of thought, the power and habit of governing this part of our frame is an attainment of great importance, and the cultivation of it an evident and necessary duty. As in all other mental exercises, a strong effort is requisite in the beginning; but when persevered in for a little time, the difficulty vanishes. This is a part of education inferior in value to no other; but which, being less obvious than the rest, and operating inwardly, is apt to be overlooked. We seldom think of putting a curb on these secret movements of the mind, or consider that there is any danger from their unlimited indulgence, so long as they do not break into outward and irregular acts. Yet the restraint in question is a necessary and important branch of self-denial; that great moral as well as religious principle and discipline, applicable to the intellectual part, as well as to the affections and desires. The exercise of what we call imagination, or that rapid flow of conceptions and images which pass in succession through the mind, and by means of which we draw so great a variety of airy pictures, is a source of pleasure permitted, like all the other gifts of God, for benevolent purposes, and designed for important ends. But like other mental as well as bodily powers, it requires its particular culture; a culture, however, in the present case, not so much of incitement as restraint. Christianity forbids not any exercise of the intellect, but only an undue measure of indulgence, or the application to improper ends. That character of mind to which we give the name of imagination, may be directed & uses not merely agreeable but excellent. The sacred writings abound in sublime and beautiful examples of rich compositions, which add both variety and charm to the instruction conveyed: but this tendency of the human mind, if not restrained and chastened, leads rather to evil, or at all events to excess. It is an important lesson, therefore, which ought early to be taught, and which it is the object of these remarks to enforce, that every one may, by habitual effort and attention, obtain a control over his thoughts, no less than over his actions; and that the exercise of this power is productive of the most important results. Let any one who is harassed by the intrusion of idle and unwelcome conceptions, or any one who doubts the possibility of commanding those daily thoughts and imaginations which spring up involuntarily, and of regulating their course, and turning them into other channels at his pleasure, make the experiment sincerely, even without external aid, but exerting a resolute effort of the mind to call in another train, and he will soon be convinced of the extent to which this mastery may be acquired.

Outward means are, however, most frequently resorted to for the purpose of changing the current of inward suggestion, and often prove effectual. Every one is aware of the influence which the objects and scenery of nature possess in relieving the mind, and putting to flight; sometimes even at once, the irksome and painful images which have haunted him. The balm of the air, the breath of flowers, the green robe of the earth, or leafy thicket, with other charms of natural sights and sounds, will often exercise a sovereign influence in dissipating thoughts of gloom. Or the resources of art may be called in for a similar purpose. When the evil spirit came upon the unhappy king of Israel, he had recourse to the harp of David. And they who, like Saul, may be visited with dark imaginations, will not seldom find a measure of consolation and calm to their troubled fancy in the sweetness of musical concord. Other helps of an outward kind will be no less availing; such as social intercourse, change of pursuit or study, and still more, engagement in the appointed duties of life. Or where the habitual train of thought does not run to the extreme of anxiety and fear, but in the opposite and more usual direction of carelessness, levity, there, of course, the remedy must be sought in a treatment directly the reverse. But against the whole of the methods now referred to one exception lies, or at least one qualification is applicable, that they are attempts at cure, not at prevention,—palliatives only, not effectual correctives; that they do not go to the root of the evil. In order to keep this important part of our frame in a healthy state, the duty must be early inculcated, and the lesson learned of subjecting it to authority, and taking heed what we think. Where the impression of this duty is strongly made in the beginning of life, and this habit of command has been formed, no outward circumstances or events, neither the bustle of business nor the retirement of solitude will have power greatly to disturb the mind, or turn aside and alter its course against our own consent.

And here, above all other authority, the Bible affords both the rule and the example. "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity," says the inspired Psalmist; "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts;" thus seeking the divine direction and guidance in this as well as other parts of duty. And that the result corresponded in his case to the excellence of the method, and the earnestness of the suit, is sufficiently plain. "In the multitude of my thoughts within me," he says elsewhere, "thy comforts delight my soul." "When I awake I am still with thee." "I hate vain thoughts, but thy law do I love." Jeremiah, habituated to prayer, still calls upon God from the dungeon; and Paul and Silas, in their prison-house, still praise him. And as to the method by which vain and evil thoughts may be habitually excluded and repelled from the mind, it is pointed out, among others, by the apostle, namely, by lodging and giving entertainment to thoughts that are good; whatsoever things are true, and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report, in which there is any virtue, and any praise, to think upon these things. Phil. iv. 8.

Let it always be remembered, then, that the regulation of our daily thoughts is an important duty, no less than the regulation of our speech and behaviour. In one respect, indeed, the former requires even greater watchfulness and care than the latter, because on these secret actings of the mind there is no restraint from the knowledge and observation of our fellow-creatures, and a respect for their opinions; which, though they are motives of a secondary kind, have a considerable influence in controlling both our actions and our words.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
THE REV. HENRY VENN, RECTOR OF YELLING.

BY THE REV. J. HENDERSON,
Minister of St. Enoch's Parish, Glasgow.

THE name of VENN has long been well known; but it is of late only, and chiefly through means of a Memoir written by his son, and published by his grandson, that we have become acquainted with the particulars of his life and character. These cannot be made too extensively known. The admirer of his writings has, in his case, no cause to fear, that intimacy with the author will dissipate the charm, or damage the moral impression they have produced. In the author of the "Complete Duty of Man," he will see the most finished and attractive exemplification of the living power of those principles and precepts, which he has in his work so successfully expounded and enforced.

Henry Venn was born at Barnes, in Surrey, in March 1724. In his youth he was, like most other boys of spirit and talent active, and impetuous, and imprudent; the subject of keen and violent tempers and prejudices, but withal of kind and generous dispositions, and a favourite with his friends and companions. His early education was conducted at home, his father being his teacher. At this time he experienced a remarkable preservation, which, as displaying God's signal care over the life of his future servant, is worthy of being recorded. "When perfect in his lessons, he had always freedom to go out to a small court roofed with heavy tiling, until his father had leisure to hear him. On one occasion, having asked leave to go out as usual, his father refused it. Supposing his request, which was easily denied, to have been misunderstood, he shortly after renewed it, but was again peremptorily refused. Soon after, his mother came into the room, and seeing him looking out at the window, she, of her own accord, asked if he might be allowed to play, but her request also was refused. She thought this extraordinary; but her surprise was changed into astonishment and gratitude, when, a few minutes afterwards, the roof fell in, under which, had her request been granted, her boy must have been crushed to death. His father acknowledged that he had no particular reason at the moment for denying the wonted permission, but having once refused he thought it proper to persist in the refusal." This reminds us of a similar interposition in the case of John Newton, afterwards an eminent Christian and an honoured minister, but at the time a profligate sailor boy on the coast of Guinea. When making his way to the boat with which he was sent stately ashore for a supply of water, the captain of the vessel said to him, with a peremptory and angry tone, "You don't go, sir!" The boat, which of course set off without him, was upset on returning to the ship, and all on board of it were drowned. Newton's captain, like Venn's father, acknowledged that he had no reason for issuing the interdict. In both cases, we see the caprice, as well as the wrath of man, fulfilling God's purposes, and strikingly overruled by him for the safety of his servants. To regard as accidents such events, in which, as the results manifest, the interests of individuals, and of the Church of Christ, are so extensively involved, were strangely irrational: the proof, not enlarged, but of limited views of God's wondrous providence, which is over all our goings, and numbers the very hairs of our head.

The ancestors of Henry Venn, for many generations, had been clergymen of the Church of England; and, though discovering no symptoms of a serious or spiritual mind, he was early destined by his parents to perpetuate the succession, by entering the Church. His education was accordingly directed so as to accomplish him for the ministry; and although a stranger to the power of spiritual religion, the whole of his school and college life seems to have been marked by the highest propriety of outward conduct. In the year 1747, he received orders, and soon after entered on the functions of his sacred office. His state of mind at this time is thus described by his biographer: "Religion had made no particular impression on his mind. He was moral and decent in his conduct, regular in his attendance on public worship, but he was a stranger to that influence of religion which gives it a predominance in the mind over every thing besides, and to those views of the benefits and excellence of the Christian dispensation which render the Saviour the object of the highest regard and affection." At the same time, he possessed high ideas of clerical decorum, and was scrupulously conscientious in acting up to his convictions of duty. Under this feeling, as his biographer conceives, from the day he entered the pulpit, he renounced cricket, at which he was a dexterous and devoted player, throwing down his bat and saying, "Let who will take it, because I am to be ordained on Sunday, and I will never have it said of me, Well struck, parson!" If we are not mistaken, a more accurate analysis of the motive or principle manifested on this occasion might discover less of conscientious feeling, than of a mere proud regard to his official dignity. In after life, he himself ascribed very much to this step, saying, he owed his salvation to it, and characterising it as an act of resolute self-denial. How far it might be a means to his preservation we know not; but it was not any act of self-denial, it was denying one part of self to indulge or magnify another—he sacrificed his love of amusement to his pride of character. The time when he passed from the state of nature into the state of grace, seems to have been, not when he threw away his cricket bat, but when, in the exercise of his ministerial function, he was arrested by an expression in the Form of Prayer, which he had been accustomed to employ, without, however, apprehending its true import. "That I may live to the glory of thy name," was the expression. As he read it, the thought forcibly struck him, "What is it to live to the glory of God's name? Do I live as I pray? What course of life ought I to pursue to glorify God?" The prosecution of the inquiries thus suggested led to a juster conception of "the chief end of man," which, with characteristic conscientious energy, he straightway followed out by a corresponding change in his mode of life. We can imagine with what depth of sympathy and interest this circumstance would be listened to by Lady Glenorchy, who, at a later period of his life, was Venn's intimate friend, and whose religious life, like his, was dated from her serious attention to the noble answer given to the question which stands first in the Assembly's Shorter Catechism, "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him for ever."

The sequel of Venn's life presents an instructive and attractive illustration of this lofty aim of human existence. Above many who are in the main animated by a sincere regard to it, he lived to the glory of God's name. Having got the true idea of Christian life, he sought, and watched, and laboured to embody it. He gave himself much to reading and meditation, to prayer, and fasting. He did not, indeed, make these things his religion, as too many do; but he used them with all diligence as means, in the neglect of which true religion cannot prosper in the soul. The adoption of these habits separated him from the gay world, with which he had been till now intimately associated; and under their practical effects, he became speedily formed into habits of active usefulness in the work of the Gospel. For four years, he held the curacy of West Horsley, in Surrey. There he was the instructor of the ignorant poor. His parsonage, at the hour of prayer, was, not we own, much to our taste; the resort of some thirty or forty of his parishioners, who joined in his family worship. A great increase took place in the number of stated communicants in the parish; and his zeal and success in the work of the ministry, provoked very many of his brethren—the more slothful, to envy and reproach; the more serious, to love and to good works. It was during his residence at Horsley, that he gave one of the finest proofs of noble disinterestedness and devotion to the honour of his Lord that we remember to have read or heard of: "Sir John Evelyn was patron of the living of Wotton, in the neighbourhood of Horsley, a living worth between two and three hundred pounds a year. He was very anxious to keep up the due knowledge and worship of God in his parish. It was an object of importance to him to have at Wotton a clergyman of exemplary character. The Squire of Horsley applied for the living to Sir John for Mr Venn, as a man who would suit Sir John's views; and when the patron's mind was all but made up to appoint him, Mr Venn turned the decision in favour of Mr Bryer Broughton, secretary to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Having a high esteem for this man's Christian character, and judging him to stand more in need of the preferment than himself, though he had not at the time above eighty pounds a-year, he wrote an anonymous letter to Sir John, giving a true and faithful account of his friend's character, and recommending him to the living. Sir John, after due inquiry, presented Mr Broughton; and Mr Venn found satisfaction in the promotion of his friend, and in the service done by his faithful ministry to the cause of Christ, which was ample compensation to himself for his own arrested preferment.

It is remarkable that while he was acting in this spirit of noble disinterestedness, his views of evangelical truth were very imperfect and confused. He was a disciple of Law, aiming at a high perfection, but not yet acquainted with the true secret of successful progress in the Christian life. Law's errors, however, by and by, served to wean him from his undue leaning to his mystical sentiments, and to bring him more simply to the Scriptures as the standard of truth; and by this means he was taught to rely, undividedly, on the merits of Christ, and the power of his Spirit. His preaching, taking its tone from his own increasing light, became more than it had yet been, the preaching of Christ, of his sacrifice, his righteousness, his spirit, and it is instructive to observe, that it was now accompanied with greater efficacy and a more abundant blessing. In 1754, Mr Venn undertook the curacy of Clapham, which he served, as the English phrase is, for five years. In this charge he seems to have become in labours more abundant, and here, too, he began to be the object of that opposition to which, in England, more than with us, and in England then, more than in England now, the preacher of the doctrines of grace is more than usually subjected. To these trials connected with his publication, were added, at this time, the heavy affliction: to an active and zealous servant of Christ, of eight months' sickness. But these trials of his faith and patience were more precious than gold. They were the means, in the hand of the refiner, of purifying his soul of Levi. So great was his advancement in this season of his affliction, in Christian knowledge and experience, that he found his former sermons no longer sufficient to express his views and sentiments on many of the more important subjects of divine truth,—a blessed fruit of affliction which afflicted servants of Christ should earnestly watch and look for, and which, as with the truly devout of his servants, a common fruit of trouble, should serve to reconcile their people, to the temporary privation of their public ministrations.

In 1757, Mr Venn was married to a lady of congenial principles and character, and in 1759 he was translated from Clapham to the vicarage of Huddersfield in Yorkshire. This change was not attended with any improvement in his income, the living of Huddersfield being under a hundred pounds a-year, but it was a large and important parish, and this, after what we have seen of him, we will allow, was the ruling motive. Its importance as a sphere of ministerial labour, was soon apparent. His ministry was very popular: his church was the place of crowded resort and of intensest interest. At this time the Gospel was preached in few pulpits of the English establishment. The word of the Lord was rare in those days. It came, therefore, with the power of an unheard-of novelty upon the minds and hearts of those who heard it, and became in his mouth the wisdom of God, and the power of God, unto the salvation of many of his flock. The account given of the effect or impression of his preaching upon his hearers, is deeply interesting. They were not accustomed, in retiring from church, to cavil and criticise, or to commend the preacher. "They went home in silence, musing seriously on what they had heard, and of those who went to scoff, many remained to pray." One remarkable instance of this effect of Mr Venn's preaching is recorded by his biographer, which is too instructive to be omitted. "A club, chiefly of Socinians, in a neighbouring market-town, having heard much censure and ridicule bestowed upon his preaching, sent two of their body whom they considered the ablest to detect absurdity, and the most witty to expose it, to hear this strange preacher, and to furnish matter of merriment for the next meeting. They went accordingly, but could not but be struck, as they entered the church, to see the multitude that was assembled together, and to witness their anxiety to attend the worship of God. When Mr Venn ascended the reading desk, he addressed his flock as usual, with a solemnity and dignity which showed him to be deeply interested in his work. The earnestness of his preaching, and the solemn appeals he made to their conscience, deeply impressed them, so that one of them observed, as he left the Church, surely God is in this place, there is no matter of laughter here. This gentleman, a Mr Kershow of Halifax, immediately after called on Mr Venn, told him the purpose for which he had come, and begged his forgiveness and his prayers. He separated from the Socinian congregation, and from that time to the hour of his death, became one of Mr Venn's most affectionate and faithful friends."

While thus growingly honoured in his ministry, he was suffering under severe trials; his income was inadequate to his expense. In addition to the support of a growing family his narrow means were taxed by the claims of a hospitality which they could not meet, for his house was the resort of all, in a wide extended neighbourhood, who wanted counsel or conference on the concerns of their souls. His anxiety arising from pecuniary embarrassments seems for some time to have overcome his faith, or at least to have sorely disturbed his peace. In these times his wife's counsel was of essential service in helping him to cast his care on God, and his conduct and experience in these circumstances present remarkable evidence of the triumph and reward of his faith, at a time when the severity of the trial was enhanced by the symptoms of incipient consumption in his own body, and so presenting the painful prospect of his leaving a fatherless and unprovided family behind him. He was given to understand that a lady to whom his ministry had been singularly blessed, had been pleased to requite her obligations by making him heir to her property, which was very considerable. And we may not doubt that he gladly accepted the intended favour, and persuaded himself that it was a seasonable gift from God, for the relief of his mind, and for the comfort of his family. Perhaps he might have so reasoned and felt, in regard to it, but the following letter which he addressed to the lady, on hearing of her kind intention, will show in what a pure lofty sphere his spirit moved: "My very dear Friend,—I understand, by my wife, your most kind and generous intention toward us in your will. The legacy would be exceedingly acceptable, and I can assure you the person from whom it would come would greatly enhance the benefit. I love my sweet children as much as is lawful, and as I know it would give you pleasure to minister to the comfort of me and mine, I should, with greater joy, accept of your liberality. But an insurmountable bar stands in the way,—the love of Him to whom we are both indebted, not for a transient benefit, for silver or gold, but for an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us. His honour, His cause, is, and must be, dearer to his people, than wife, children, or life itself. It is the firm resolve of his saints, yea, doubtless, I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord. To be, therefore, a stumbling-block in the way of any that are seeking him,—to give the least countenance to any that would be glad to bring his followers into contempt, and call in question their sincere and disinterested attachment to him would grieve me while in health, darken my mind in sickness, and load me with self-condemnation on a bed of death. How would it also render all my exhortations feeble, and make them be accounted only as pulpit declamation, if, when I was pressing that solemn truth upon my people, 'Love not the world, neither the things in the world,' they could say, our minister, however, was careful to secure the favour of this rich proselyte, and, at length, to gain sufficiently by her! After the most mature deliberation, therefore, it is our request, which we cannot permit you to refuse us, that you will not leave us any other token of your regard than something of little value, but what it derives from the giver. If it should please God that our connection should be prolonged some years, we shall, in our hearts, still more abundantly enjoy your friendship when we are sure that we are not in danger of being influenced by a regard to our own interest. And if we must soon have the cutting affliction of losing you, you may depend on it, we shall not less affectionately make mention of your name, and your unfeigned love for us both in Christ Jesus, than if we had what the world esteems the only substantial proof of your regard. As for our children, whom many will think that we have not the love for that we owe them, by refusing your great favour, I would say only this, we both know of no inheritance equal to the blessing of God; and the certain way of securing it, as far as means can avail, is to be found ready to love or suffer any thing sooner than to incur the appearance of evil."

We can readily believe that the part which Mr Venn acted in this matter, will, in this selfish and money-loving world, be judged unnecessarily fastidious, not demanded by any law of God, and scarcely defensible on the ground of common prudence. But supposing that you do not vindicate his wisdom, who but must admire his jealousy of God's honour,—his zeal for God's cause,—his confidence in God's goodness? Such extreme delicacy and elevation of feeling recalls to our mind the conduct of Ezra, who would not ask human help, as Venn refused to take it, lest it should bring reproach upon the God of Israel; "I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way, because we had spoken to the king, saying, the hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him, but his power and his wrath against all them that forsake him."

This trust in God, under which he was thus led to refuse the gift, which he dreaded might weaken his ministry, and bring reproach upon God's cause, was strengthened in the mind of Mr Venn, by much signal experience of God's faithfulness to him. His instant wants were often supplied, from unknown sources. He had frequent proof of the old saying, that man's extremity is God's opportunity. On one occasion, when pressed by a tradesman for payment of a bill, he saw and sought no refuge but in making his wants known unto God, and when yet upon his knees, an anonymous letter was brought to him inclosing a bank note of fifty pounds.

While at Huddersfield, in 1763, Mr Venn published his well known and valuable work, the "Complete Duty of Man." It had been begun in an earlier part of his ministry. We have understood that it was written with the view of superseding a work which had long been held "needful for all families,"—"The Whole Duty of Man." This last book, though the production of a mind of much greater vigour and richness than Mr Venn's, is miserably low and defective in its views of Christian doctrine and, from its exten-

give use in England, served to extend and perpetuate its own legal views and spirit. Mr Venn's work was an effort, and a successful one, to substitute a manual of Christian duty, which should deduce duty more directly from evangelical doctrine, and tend to form the character of men on principles and motives more decidedly scriptural. The happy application of Christian truth to Christian duty forms the charm and value of his book, and it has proved not only very popular, but very useful. It has passed through twenty large editions. On its first publication, the instances were frequent in which the reading of it became the means of saving conversion; and some of these, which are recorded, must have yielded to its author some of the most luxurious moments of delight. One case may be mentioned, as in itself interesting, and, in the manner of its discovery exhibiting one of the finest displays of his Christian self-denial:—"Whilst at Helvoetsluis, waiting for a fair wind to convey the packet to England, he was walking on the sea-shore, where he saw a person who, from his dress and manner, he supposed to be an Englishman, and whom, therefore, he addressed in English. The gentleman informed him that he was a Swede, though he had lived long in England, and was well acquainted with the language and manners of that country. This circumstance induced him to enter into conversation with him. The subject of religion was soon introduced, when, to Mr Venn's great pleasure, he found his companion to be a decided Christian. The stranger invited Mr Venn to sup with him, and then, after much interesting conversation, took out of his portmanteau a book to which, he said, he owed all his impressions of religion, and presenting it to him, asked if he had ever seen it. This was his own work; and it cost Mr Venn no little effort to suppress those emotions of vanity which would have induced him at once to discover that he was himself the author of it." A man under the power of vanity would not have made the attempt to conceal himself in such circumstances, or would have failed in it; and Mr Venn, in this instance, demonstrated as convincingly that of men he sought not glory, as before he had made it evident that he used not his religion as a cloak of covetousness.

In 1767 Mrs Venn died, leaving him in charge of five children, over whose education he watched with judicious, and kind, and pious care. About the same time his own health began to give way, under the rack of unceasing and exciting labour. And though with many scruples in his own mind, and against the strong and tearful remonstrances of his much loved and loving flock, he left Huddersfield, and accepted the rectory of Yelling, in Huntingdonshire. It is interesting to know that the effects of his ministry at Huddersfield did not vanish with his departure from it. Much fruit remained; and many years after, when his son visited this scene of his father's labours, he found many still alive adorning, by their Christian conversation, that Christian doctrine which had first been communicated to their consciences under his father's faithful and efficient ministry.

His cure at Yelling formed, in every respect, a great contrast to that which he had left. Yelling was a small country parish. The congregation, at first, consisted of some twenty or thirty rustics; and though there is enough in the interests of as many immortal souls to bring out all the energies of the simple-minded minister of Christ, it was altogether natural that the change should deeply affect the mind of Mr Venn, who seems to have felt that he had both fallen back into obscurity, and withdrawn from the means and opportunities of usefulness. These feelings seem to have painfully lain upon his spirits. They were yet more deeply felt when his health was restored, and he saw little evidence of God's countenance being given to his labours among the few to whom they were now confinied. It is not for us to venture any conjecture as to the reasons in Providence for this turn in the way by which Mr Venn was led. It might be, in the first instance, to beat him off from a spirit of self-sufficiency, which success is but too apt to engender in the best, even of good men. However, Mr Venn was ultimately not less useful in Yelling than in his former more active field of exertion. By and by his flock came to value his ministry, and derived from it much profit. Besides, he was now advancing to that period of life when a man's usefulness is altered in the manner of it rather than diminished in its extent. The activities of youth, which bulk most in the public eye, and sound loudest in the public ear, were over, but the not less powerful, though more peaceful and unobserved influence of established character, and of matured experience, had now come in place of these; and from his proximity to Cambridge, it was most advantageously brought to bear upon the principles and character of many of the students at that university. Mr Robinson of Leicester, Mr Simeon of Cambridge, the most eminent patron of the cause of religion and of religious ministers in the Church, Professor Farrish, and many more, whose names are since honourably known as faithful and successful ministers of the Gospel in the Church of England, were brought acquainted with him from his vicinity to the place of their studies, and have owed themselves, under God, debtors to his Christian instruction, and counsel, and example, for their own knowledge and love of the truth. In this light, the step which threatened to limit has been overruled to extend the Christian influence of this good man. And he is entitled to be regarded as one great instrument in that rise or revival of evangelical ministrations in the English Church which, in the commencement of Mr Venn's ministry, was all but banished from her pulpit.

At the age of sixty-eight Mr Venn retired from active duty, and lived in the bosom of his family, who had grown up in those Christian sentiments and habits to which it had been the object of his instructions and prayers to form them, and who requited his pious care by every becoming expression of filial affection. His latter days were full of peace and honour. In contradistinction from the old age of too many religious professors, whose hearts become cold, and their mind vacant, and their temper fretful and unhappy, he continued to bring forth all the fruits of grace in old age; his temper, though naturally keen, was subdued to the gentleness of Christ; his affections, always warm, were now meliorated and sanctified by the influence of spiritual and heavenly objects, and he seemed to exhibit more of the purity, and the love, and the peace of heaven as daily he drew nearer to it.

We cannot omit to mention here the prosperity of his family in the world. We have seen that he would not, to secure a provision for them, hazard injury to the cause of Christ, by bringing suspicion on the purity of his own motives as its minister. The history of his family is a delightful fulfilling of the promise, that those who thus honour God, God will honour; and a proof that Mr Venn, in thus refusing for his family what appeared to him a suspicious benefit, took the best way to secure for them a better inheritance. So far as appears, they were all heirs of the best inheritance,—the favour God bears unto his own,—and besides, they were not suffered to want any worldly good. His eldest son, the Rev. John Venn of Clapham, was an esteemed and useful minister of the Gospel, and his daughters were both, during his life, married to gentlemen of Christian reputation, and high worldly respectability. Does not the good man leave an inheritance to his children?

With the exception of "The Complete Duty of Man," Venn's works, so far as we know, have not been much read in Scotland. From the extent of their sal-they would appear to have been popular, and, it may be presumed, useful in England. His "Letters," which have been added to his memoir, and compose the greater part of the volume, are, to our taste, most admirable. Sound in principle, devout and benevolent in feeling, they exhibit their author as one who was as strict and enlightened in self-denial, as highly superior to the world, as simply and nobly devoted to God, as any man we remember to have read of.

THE CONTRAST,

OR CHRISTIANITY AND DEISM COMPARED.

No. III.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

WE have in the two former papers endeavoured to exhibit the contrast between deism and Christianity in their principles and moral influence. One important point of comparison still remains, and that is, to contrast the opposite systems as to the comfort and support they give to their respective disciples at the hour of death. The materials for this part of our subject are, of necessity, not so ample as those which relate to the principles and moral conduct of infidels; for the last moments of such persons being witnessed, in general, only by their immediate friends, whose natural tenderness or prudence would suppress any circumstances of a painful nature, very little is known concerning them except what is favourable to their reputation, or if otherwise, what has been gleaned from the testimony and reports of those whose professional character or other circumstances, gave access to their chamber and bed-side. Nevertheless, busy curiosity, or perhaps a better motive—a zeal for the honour of the Gospel, and for the best interests of humanity, has drawn aside the veil, and revealed to us scenes and incidents in the winding up of the life of many of the most noted infidels, which it may be useful to place in contrast with those that characterize the death-bed of the genuine disciples of Christianity. Rejecting all communications of this kind which rest merely on vague and unfounded rumour, or whose authenticity is not established by unimpeachable testimony, we submit the following to the notice of our readers. Referring to some of the celebrated disciples and abettors of deism in modern times.

Hobbes, who has been already mentioned in the course of these papers as an inveterate infidel, indulged in very bold and presumptuous language when speaking of God, of Christ and his Gospel. Yet this apparently courageous unbeliever was, in private and when alone, the victim of ungovernable fears. During the night he constantly had a candle burning at his bed-side, and when through any accident it had been extinguished, and he found himself awaking in the dark, he was overwhelmed with terror till it was again lighted. He attained the great age of ninety, and his last days were so cheerless, and his whole mind had become so completely blank as to futurity, that with a sigh, he confessed to a friend, he was going to take a leap in the dark.

The Honourable Francis Newport, who unhappily imbibed infidel opinions at an early age in 1692, was a member of a small society, whose only object was to qualify one another for dexterity and skill in inventing wickedness. A severe illness, the consequence of long and unrestrained intemperance, reduced him not only to extreme bodily weakness, but to a state of the most intolerable mental horror. His expressions were the most terrific that it is possible to imagine, and in whatever circumstances he was, he drew only presages from every thing around him, of his certain ruin for ever. Looking towards the fire-place, he exclaimed; "Oh! that I was to lie on that fire for a thousand years, to purchase the favour of God, and be reconciled again. But it is a vain wish, millions of years will bring me no nearer the end of my tortures. O eternity, who can paraphrase these words—for ever!" His death overtook him in this dreadful state, and indeed the whole of this unhappy man's closing life, was a scene of such unutterable misery, arising not so much from bodily pain as from anguish and remorse of conscience, that the account is one of the most deeply affecting narratives anywhere to be met with.

Mr Emerson, an eminent mathematician, was an infidel, and a person unhappily of immoral life, miserably addicted to drunkenness and profanity. During his last and severe illness, he would often crawl about the floor; sometimes praying, sometimes cursing, and at last died in a most melancholy state, uncheered by a single ray of hope.* Voltaire, the brilliant leader of the light literature and sceptical philosophy of the last century, took suddenly ill on returning home after having been elated with the plaudits of the theatre, where one of his dramatic pieces had been acted. The attack proved of so serious and obstinate a character, as to baffle all the skill and energies of the physicians, who were obliged to announce to the unhappy patient, that he had nothing to expect but a fatal result. The news came upon him like a thunder-bolt; and immediately his courage forsook him, and he became the prey of the most horrid remorse by which a human being perhaps was ever racked. The scene cannot be described so well as in the language of the Abbé Barruel, who relates it in his History of Jacobinism: "Immediately," says the historian, "on the news being spread that Voltaire was on his death-bed, his friends crowded around him, and his brethren of the Illuminati exhorted him to die like a hero. In spite of their admonitions, he sent for the curé (the parish priest) of St. Gervais; and, after confession, signed, in the presence of the Abbé Mignot, his nephew, a recantation of his former principles. After this visit, the curé was no more allowed to see him. His former friends having obtained possession of his house, interdicted all access to him. It has, however, crept out, by means of the nurse who attended him, that he died in unutterable agony of mind. D'Alembert, Diderot, and about twenty others who beset his apartment, never approached him without receiving some bitter execration. Often he would curse them, and exclaim, 'Retire! It is you who have brought me to my present state. Begone! I could have done without you all, but you could not exist without me; and what a wretched glory have you procured me!' These reproaches were succeeded by the dreadful recollection of his own part in their conspiracy against religion. He was heard, in anguish and dread, alternately supplicating and blaspheming that God against whom he had conspired. He would cry out, in plaintive accents, 'Oh Christ! Oh Jesus Christ!' and then complain that he was abandoned by God and man. It seemed as if the hand which had traced the sentence of the impious king of old, now traced before his eyes his own blasphemies. In vain he turned away from the contemplation of them. The time was coming apace, when he was to appear before the tribunal of Him whom he had blasphemed, and his physicians, particularly Dr Tronchin, calling to administer relief, thunderstruck, retired. His associates, no doubt, would have willingly suppressed these facts, but it was in vain. The Marechal de Richelieu fled from his bed-side, declaring it to be a sight too horrible to be endured; and Dr Tronchin observed, that the furies of Orestes could give but a faint idea of those of Voltaire."†

* D'Alembert, his companion in infidelity, died in a state of mind equally distressing. The chamber of Condorcet was strictly guarded, that no one might enter; a circumstance that proves he was afraid of disclosing the painful remorse that agonised him. Diderot and Gibbon laboured hard to occupy their minds deeply with the most trifling amusements.

The close of Paine's life was a scene of horror. During the paroxysms of his suffering, he would cry aloud to the Saviour, whom he had blasphemed by his writings, in a tone of voice that alarmed the household, and at length, he expired unregretted and despised by his adopted countrymen.* The day preceding Hume's death was spent by him in an affected indifference about that momentous event, playing a game at whist, reading Lucian's dialogues, and making puerile witticisms on the interview he expected soon to have with Charon—the heathen ferryman over the river of death. These facetious attempts of the departing sceptic can scarcely allay the rising and obdurate doubt, that they were forced to keep up the sinking spirits; and if we may credit reports circulated at the time, and believed by Wotherspoon and others,† who, we may be assured, would not adopt them on slight or equivocal evidence, the closing scene of this arch-infidel was clouded by a remorse and despair, scarcely, if at all, different from that which had characterised the death of the philosopher of Ferney. Percy Shelley, a friend of Lord Byron's, who was a professed atheist, was expelled from Oxford for publishing a silly pamphlet "On the Necessity of Atheism," and was as much noted for the looseness and irregularity of his life, as for the undoubted strength of his genius. While sailing with Byron and other friends, on a pleasure trip to Sicily, suddenly the sky lowered, and a tremendous storm arose, during which their slender yacht was tossed about in a manner that gave them little hope of being able to weather the tempest. To increase their misery, they descried breakers a-head, and his Lordship, always the last to yield to the influence of fear, exclaimed, "Cry to God for mercy, we are all lost." What a change took place on the manners of all, who, a little before, had been amusing themselves with all sorts of impious and blasphemous witticisms. Shelley, in particular, who had been the foremost of the infidel band, appeared to have lost all energy, and the horrors of approaching death made him weep like a child; he now called upon God, in moving accents of serious prayer, and implored the protection and mercy of that Being, whose existence he affected to disbelieve.‡

Whilst the principles and views of the infidel prove such miserable comforters at the hour of death, let us see how bright is the hope of the Christian. In that momentous crisis, when the wisdom of the philosopher forsakes him, unable to dispel his doubt or remove his anxiety, when the scepticism of the infidel resigns his bosom to darkness and despair, the Gospel holds out to the believer a holy and substantial joy, with which a stranger cannot intermeddle. It inspires him with a serenity which no sufferings can discompose, communicates a peace which sustains his departing spirit, and enables him sometimes to rise into an ecstasy of triumph, which the happiest on earth might envy, and the brightest angel admire. While there is not one solitary instance of any having regretted, at the hour of death, embracing the hopes and promises of the Gospel, the page of Christian biography records many a splendid trophy over the power of death, in the case of some who having had, during life, their conversation in heaven, were cheered, and animated, and blessed, during the hours of a calm and patient departure, and of others who exulted amid the blaze of the fagot * Horne's Introduction. † Professor Silliman's Travels.

‡ Many other notices of the death-beds of notorious infidels might have been added, but enough has been related for the purposes of a contrast. In the Spectator, Connoisseur, and Dr Young's Centaur, the reader will find additional notices.

and the gloom of the grave, as if they were already treading on the confines of heaven, and breathing the gales of immortality. And what was the principle which could thus sustain them amid the shock of expiring nature? Listen to their dying testimonies, and these will tell you that nothing but unshrinking confidence in a crucified Saviour could diffuse over the departing spirit the waters of heavenly consolation. It was the knowledge of that life and immortality which the Gospel has brought to light,—it was the possession of that sovereign antidote against the fear of death, that, through faith, it would be swallowed up in victory.

Reader! look on this picture and on that; think of infidelity unhooking all the principles of reason, and setting the mind adrift on the boundless sea of uncertainty, blackening the life with the deep hues of universal moral depravity, exulting in the distance in the gloomy prospect of annihilation, but resigning its disciples, on the verge of death, to hopeless, irremediable wretchedness; then think of Christianity, pointing to a Being of the purest and most gracious character as its author, prescribing duties which God only can require, holding out promises which God only can execute, refining and elevating the tone of the moral feelings, and inspiring such good hope through grace, that not one has ever had reason to allege that it has disappointed or deceived him; and, after this contrast, you will, and must, adopt the conclusion of the poet,

"That if we trace the globe around,
And search from Britain to Japan,
There shall be no religion found
So just to God, so safe for man."

THE PEACE OF GOD AND THE MEANS OF ITS PRESERVATION IN THE SOUL:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MUIR, D.D.,
Minister of St. Stephen's Parish, Edinburgh.

"Be careful for nothing: but in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."
—PHIL. iv. 6, 7.

THE precept with which the text opens is inseparable from the promise with which the text closes; and the precept is united to the promise in such a way as intimates that submission to the one is preliminary to the fulfilment of the other. "Be careful for nothing: but in every thing by prayer and supplication, make your requests known unto God." Follow that precept; and, as the result, this promise is accomplished in your experience,—"the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

The reference, however, made by the text, is not to the beginning of a privilege, but to the prolonging of it. The privilege is supposed to have actually had a beginning in your experience; and the direction is given to the means which will preserve it free from interruptions, and fix it in the soul. This circumstance ought to be well considered; because, in practically using the text, it might prove fatally erroneous, were all who hear these words permitted to think that, indiscriminately and without inquiry, they may hear them as applicable for comfort and encouragement to themselves. Some are still ignorant of the first principles of the Gospel. Others do not see distinctly the revealed plan of a sinner's pardon and acceptance; or, whatever be their degree of speculative knowledge in the Christian truth, have not embraced with seriousness the proposals of the Christian salvation; or, under the signs of a religious profession that is outwardly consistent, have never cultivated the sentiments of evangelical piety, and are, indeed, estranged from the habits and the spirit of devotion. They, whom these descriptions answer, cannot be addressed by the words of the text; for that were to speak to them of a privilege "keeping hold of their hearts and minds" which they have not yet received. They must be addressed in other language. Let them come to the first principles of the Gospel. Let them consider the value of the divine favour, and their need of it, and the revealed method of introducing them to the enjoyment of it. Let them behold the character and the work of Him who is styled "the Prince of Peace," and whose appearing was celebrated as "peace on earth." Let them look to the Saviour, as appointed by God the Father for the purpose of reconciling sinners to himself. Let them weigh deeply the nature and demerits of sin, of their own sin, which render the atonement of the Saviour exclusively the way of their reconciliation to God. And being "persuaded, both by the mercies and the terrors of the Lord," to "cast down the weapons of their spiritual rebellion," let them enter with humility and thankfulness into the design of the covenant of grace through Jesus Christ. It is alone thus that they shall experience the beginning of the "peace of God," and have the prospect of its "keeping their hearts and minds." For, "being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand." Whoever "standeth in this grace" is called on to receive the privilege of "peace," and is exhorted to employ the means of continuing the privilege free of interruptions. But the text, in prescribing these means, does not become applicable to us till we have received the privilege itself.

Doubtless, this is a soothing injunction,—“Be careful for nothing.” And who would not follow it; and thus leave far behind him what vexes the heart, and knits the brow into wrinkles, and drops poison into the cup, and plants thorns in the securest place of repose? But, is this counsel to be given to him who is ignorant of the Gospel? or to him who, not yet convinced that he needs the salvation offered in the Gospel, is indifferent to the proposals of its grace? or to him who is living in sin,—if not in flagrant iniquity, who is living in worldliness, unprepared for the great change that awaits him, when his soul is to be removed hence,—living on earth, as if earth were his home, the end of his being, his portion? Is the man of this character to be told, that he may drive off every intrusion of fear, and lay his head down on his pillow quite secure, as if all were well? To speak to him thus, were to commit the very crime against which the teachers of Israel were warned, of "saying peace, peace, where no ground of peace is." A great preliminary has to be gone through, both in the duty of teachers, and in the concern of hearers, before this soothing counsel may lawfully be given or taken. There must be the descending into "the root of the matter." The deep, original spring of human disquietudes must be reached. Sin, as the substantial quarrel in the highest relationship which man occupies; sin, as the seditious influence that has wrought on all the powers and affections of the mind, and excited them to rebellion against their Framer; sin, as the serpent that has infused venom into our nature, and troubled it with the fear and curse of death; sin, as the cause of all the misery that has flowed over the soul; sin, as such, must be reached, and brought to light, and exposed. And till sin be thus discovered in its native character and effects, the reconciliation to God which the Gospel proposes will never be sought, and, consequently, the high privilege that arises in this reconciliation never be gained.

Consider how engagingly this privilege is here described.

I. It is "peace." Strong excitements produce in the soul a feverish and unhealthful action. Violent emotions are transient in the measure of their vehemence. Real happiness does not consist in these. Enjoyment is lasting only as it is calm. And what is placid and mild in its influence; what soothes rather than transports; what rests in the stillness of satisfaction, rather than in the throbbings of ecstasy, is alone what is suited to "keep the mind and heart." The privilege of the Gospel, therefore, is named "peace."

II. It is "the peace of God," or the portion of the man who is brought back to God. His soul enters into a divine rest. He is satisfied. He is satisfied with the plan of redemption, by which, out of the state of enmity to God and moral pollution, he is restored to the state of friendship with the Creator, and resemblance to his purity. He is satisfied with the doctrine of grace, by which his native pride is abased, and by which he finds himself cast, without a vestige of righteousness, at the feet of redeeming mercy. He is satisfied with the whole discipline which the Word and the Spirit of God carry on for the purpose of freeing him from his connection with a sinful world, and preparing him for the society and joys of a holy world. He is satisfied with the way through life along which the divine hand is leading him, and, though many a trial be thrown across the path, though suffering follow suffering, and unexpected bereavements of most innocent comforts be inflicted, yet the persuasion that this, and no other than this, has appeared to infinite wisdom as the fitting way along which to conduct him, forms the plea that overpowers every murmur, the argument that answers every objection, the blessed assurance that quiets every fear. Here is "peace," beginning with reconciliation to God, the special effect of faith in his Son, proceeding from the influence of his Spirit, and ever growing while the soul rests on the wisdom, and holiness, and mercy of his character and plans;—"Peace," that is experienced more than words can declare, that is felt rather than seen, that is unobtrusive, deep, and smooth, a stream from the heavenly throne, and rich with heavenly consolation.

III. It "passeth understanding." It is not accessible to worldly wisdom. It cannot be appreciated either in the source or in the effects of it, by the dull perception of men, who have immersed themselves in the dregs of sensuality. It cannot now be fully seen or prized in all its excellences, even by the most sagacious and spiritual of those who have "chosen the good part which cannot be taken away from them." It is infinitely more valuable, as a subject of study and an object of pursuit, than any thing that ever occupied human thought and zeal. And, when the thousands of schemes of good are proved to be as fallacious and airy as the wishes that give rise to them, this possession survives the wreck of all, and can never fade. In its origin, in the power that maintains it, in its hidden blessings, and in its stability, it "passeth understanding."

IV. It is to "keep the heart and mind." Those gratifications, on the other hand, which by numberless arts, are sought after in the world, exhibit their vanity, not only by the transient term of their enjoyments, but by their unsuitableness to the soul. They are at best only partially acceptable. They are condemned and loathed in the after thought. The reflection of "the mind," upbraids with terrible reproofs the indulgences of "the heart." But this is embraced by the whole soul. The "mind" employing every power of research into the grounds and ennobling qualities of Christian peace, is satisfied with their sureness and perfection; and under the sanction of enlightened reason, of reason confirmed in its decision by the authority of its Framer, the "heart" receives and enjoys the portion "through Christ Jesus."

How precious, then, the privilege to which the Gospel proposes to raise us! But Christian believers do not always experience the privilege to which they have access, or do not fully experience it. Owing to various causes, their enjoyment of it is interrupted. Now, one of these causes is over solicitude for the things of the present life; the changes and evils of the world serving to distress us, not only at the time, but by means of anticipation, long before they arrive. What may befall us; the events that, by a sudden stroke, may blight the branches and stem of our prosperity; the sickness that may enter our families, and wither away our children one after another; the disease that may attack ourselves, and destroy the hand of exertion, and reduce us to want; the premature death that, causing our "sun to go down at noon," may leave in darkness and poverty those cherished beings for whom we prayed to be spared a little longer to provide shelter to them when we should have gone hence: these, and other incidents in the human lot, become the materials of solicitude to "the mind and heart."

We are so constituted, that a tendency to see the future, is a part of our mental frame. When sufferings are anticipated, the feelings of anxiety and dread are unavoidable. Who of us can say, that painful suggestions of what may come, have not at times, agitated and racked the soul as in the season of tempests? We have stood gazing as on the troubled sky; and, while, from the casement of our dwelling, we have seen the heaven clouded and vexed, miserable forebodings, as flashes of lightning, have gleamed over all our earthly prospects. Yet, we must not wish for a state of apathy; nor try any means of attaining that indifference which folly would substitute for peace; neither are we to be too much cast down by our experiencing the fears of coming evils, which make the frame of man shrink. In so far as these fears arise from the principles of our constitution, which turn us to self-preservation as a first duty, so far the experiencing of them is not sin. We all know who it was that said, "If it be possible, let the cup pass from me." The portion of our cup, indeed, is, even at the bitterest, a mere drop of gall, when compared with the full draught of sorrow and suffering which, for our sakes, he condescended to receive. And, therefore, the unparalleled greatness of his distresses gives a reason, as well as an emphasis, to those words, which makes the use of them by us, in the view of any sufferings of ours, allowable, only in the way of a very distant accommodation. But still, He was a gracious pattern to us in all things. And, hence, His expression of fear, in the prospect of suffering, is to us a sufficient warrant for believing that, it is not the least measure of insensibility to distresses that is asked of us; that patience is not apathy; that resignation is not the want of feeling. "Thy will be done," are the words that followed the prayer, "If it be possible, let the cup pass;" and these words were the token of perfect resignation; a sign that, even amid the storm of the most awful sufferings, the peace of God reigned in the heart.

And this is the great attainment which we are to long and aim after, that, whatever be the sufferings which we either bear, or have cause to anticipate, we may still, as the token of resignation, as the sign of peace within, be enabled to say, "Thy will be done." But, alas! our difficulty lies here: It is our own will, and not his, that we secretly would see accomplished. We have laid out our scheme for ourselves and our families. We have, no doubt, anticipated difficulties; but, as we think, have provided against them. We have considered the whole plan so long and so maturely, that we do not see how our welfare is to be rightly advanced, unless it be accomplished. This project in business is to go forward thus, and to end thus. This possession is to be disposed of, and that possession is to be gained. One of our children is to be set out in this department, and another is to occupy that. It will take a certain number of years before our designs can all be closed. But as soon as they are terminated, there will be a securing to ourselves of a placid life; an evening of old age, tranquil and at rest; surrounded and cherished by those whom we brought up, and aided, and bound to ourselves by endearing ties. Such are our dreamings. A single item is left out of the calculation; that the reverse, even of to-morrow, may break the whole enchantment, and awaken the dreamers to the clear sight of their desolateness. But we become so pleased and engaged with our plannings, on what we think is best for us, that even when we set fully before ourselves the hazards which our plans may encounter, we are yet averse to relinquish them; we do not cease to cherish them; and so we nourish a will of our own into such strength, that it is prepared to contend even with the will of God. Hence our troubles, and anxieties, and miseries, in the anticipation of reverses. The very notion of a hand being stretched out to derange, or to remove any part of our favourite devices; the thought, especially, that the whole may be overturned, and swept aside, is vexatious; it is abhorrent; we cast it away; it must not be; we could not bear it. Still we are not able to blind ourselves to the fact, that it may be, and that we must bear it. This perception, again, is the cause of a thousand distresses, and of innumerable schemings. How shall we sustain the adversity? Will it not leave us in utter destitution? What shall remain on earth worthy of our care, when that is withdrawn? But, perhaps, the evil may yet be prevented. What new devices, therefore, shall we contrive, in order to ward off the dreaded blow? If we follow this path, shall we avoid it? Or, turning, perhaps, into that other, may we have the prospect of escaping it? Whither shall we move? How shall we conduct ourselves? We cannot tell: Futurity is all dark: Its chances are appalling: Its possibilities are distracting! O! the fears of this vain and sinful world! What do they work in the soul but death!

Wherever these fears intrude, the mind, to the extent of their dominion, is bereft of "peace." And their intrusion, and their dominion, again, are always in the measure in which the will is averse to the will of God. Remains of this aversion do spring up in the minds even of those who, relying on the promises of Christ, have actually experienced true peace. And, in proportion to the degree and continuance of that aversion is the degree and the continuance of harassment and distress. To bring the mind, therefore, to an humble resignation of itself unto God,—to bring it to form and to pursue its plans, always under the lowly, but just consideration, that "no one knoweth what is good for him in this life, which passeth as a shadow,"—to be brought to say, not in the mere formality of expression, but in the conviction, that there is the highest of reasons for establishing the wisdom of the acquiescence, "Thy will be done;" such is the desirable consummation for us,—such is the height of faith's exertion, upon the events and objects of life. Now, it is this very point to which the apostle would lead us, when he exhorts "Be careful for nothing; but, in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, make your requests known unto God." You who have received the source of true peace, by receiving into your mind and heart, the promises of Christ Jesus, the Saviour of sinners; you who have, in some degree, tasted that the Lord is gracious, and that verily there is even a present reward in his service, how would you prolong to yourselves that privilege of your faith,—that last, and holy legacy, which Jesus bequeathed to his disciples, in his ever memorable words, "My peace I leave with you?" How? "Be careful for nothing." Whilst you are allowed to make such prudent calculations and arrangements as your own wants, and the wants of those that depend on you, may require; whilst you are diligent in business, and provide for your selves and others, and act with thought and due concern in the several circumstances and relations of life, yet, still beware of indulging that vain solicitude, that restless and vexing anxiety which, passing away from immediate duty, exercises itself in a distant province, the wants and exertions of which, whatever they are to be, do not yet belong to you. The present is alone what you have to do with. In the view of a future time use the lawful means for the lawful ends, but bear it in mind that the result lies with another Hand than yours. Do your present duty in His strength, and under His authority, and consign events to His arrangement. You may foresee events which, as evils, you dread: but, instead of being thrown into despondency by the prospect of them, go to God in "prayer" and ask that he may avert them from you; or, if that may not be, that he may sustain you under them. You may experience wants which you cannot but feel to be grievous; but, instead of repining at them, go to God with "supplication" and beg that he may relieve them; or, if that may not be, that he may bless the deprivation to you and make you contented. In no condition can you be placed, however, in which you will not perceive, if you look for them, comforts and blessings more than many of your brethren ever had; and, what your sins have forfeited; and, instead of alighting them, because you have not something else that you may wish; instead of undervaluing them, because they are common, or have been long in your possession; go to God, offering to him "thanksgiving," and, by recounting his mercies, stir up the gratitude of your heart for them all. Thus it is, that you will be enabled to withstand the intrusion of those worldly cares and anxieties, which, when allowed to occupy a place in the mind, press their embittering wormwood even into that portion of peace which the promises of the Gospel give you. Thus, devolving the burden of your solitudes on Him who hath said, "I will never leave thee;" thus cherishing, in the exercises of devotion, an unceasing communion of soul, with the source of the wisdom, and power, and goodness, that are all engaged to fulfil the promises and the hopes of grace; thus, "making your requests known unto God," who will accomplish them, if the accomplishment of them is to further your own eternal good, you will be employing the direct means of preserving the tranquillity of the mind as unbroken, as the unavoidable influence of this changing world may allow you to expect. But, I entreat you, be on your guard against inferring that this divine prescription has failed, or that the Word of Christ is forgotten whenever the peace which you may have once enjoyed is interrupted. His Word is not delusive; the means which he appoints have not failed; he does not, he cannot change.—But you change. You are not faithful; you are wavering and unstable; you lose your tranquillity because you lose your trust,—because you abandon the promise,—because you have ceased to be thankful for benefits,—have ceased to supplicate grace,—have ceased to pray against temptation,—have ceased to watch against the intrusion of worldly and wicked cares. Hence the peace of God does not keep the heart and mind. It may have been received, but it is not permanently felt. It may occasionally comfort you, but it does not, as it might, yield the consolation that abideth. Here you mark, however, the effects of your own remissness. You have the principles of religion, but you do not uniformly bring them into exercise. You have the presence of God always with you but you do not realize it, or even think of it, so often as you ought. You have access to the throne of grace, but you do not, with frequency of devotion, go thither, that in every thing, by prayer and supplication, you may make your requests known unto God. Thus you keep not the privilege provided for you, because you do not use the means of retaining it.

On the whole, every discovery, every promise, every hope communicated by divine revelation, bears on the reality of this great privilege. God is revealed as the Father of peace; Christ Jesus, as the Prince of peace; the Holy Spirit the Comforter, as the Messenger of peace. The Gospel is called the Word of peace; the way into which it guides is the way of peace; and the fruit of all its righteousness is sown and reaped in peace. Surely, then, your duty and your interest lie in yielding the whole soul to the gracious influence of this scheme of peace,—in employing every appointed method of preserving its benefits,—in guarding against the approach of whatever might interrupt or lessen its power,—above all, in cultivating, as the chief means of promoting your mental repose, an intercourse of mind with God. Not merely on Sabbath and high festival days,—not merely when you withdraw yourselves to read the Scriptures, and to present your accustomed offerings of devotion,—not merely when some calamity would drive your heart off from the low portion to which it has fastened itself and force it to look to a higher portion, but uniformly, you are to rise, in thought and desire, to Him who made, preserves, and redeems you. A turning and breathing of soul to Him may distinguish, and ought to distinguish, the history of every hour in a Christian's life. What should prevent the soul from unceasingly recurring, with humble confidence and hope, to its supreme good? If the treasure be in heaven, what should keep the heart from ascending to it? Blessed privilege; unceasing communion with God! it brings down the hidden manna, the food of angels; it spreads over you a shield, and gives you strength, amid all your dangers; it animates you with courage for every duty; and in the very tempest of troubles yields to you a portion of that holy rest which was enjoyed by Him who calmly slept amid the storm on the sea of Galilee. "Wherefore I exhort you to be careful for nothing: but in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

THE BENIGHTED PILGRIMS.

No. III.

BY THE REV. LACHLAN MACLEAN,

Chaplain to the Lunatic and Blind Asylum, Edinburgh.

In the two preceding articles, the condition of the insane, and their capacity for receiving religious instruction, have been considered in a manner as general as the writer was enabled to do, from his knowledge of that unfortunate class of individuals. An account may now be given of the effects that have followed the introduction of divine service into the Lunatic Asylum, Morningside, which, from the interest awakened by a similar narrative in a former Number, 11th June 1836, will, it is believed, prove a source of pleasing reflection to every Christian mind.

Some of the facts about to be stated were mentioned in the Asylum Report printed last year, but, as the circulation of that report must necessarily have been limited, it has been deemed advisable to repeat these occurrences here, that the blessed effects of the worship of God, on the insane, may be as extensively known as possible.

Divine service was permanently introduced into the Asylum early in 1832. The duties of chaplain, it must be confessed, were undertaken by me, not without considerable anxiety as to the result, notwithstanding the encouraging effects of the arrangement in the City Bedlam. The condition of the patients in Morningside was so very different, their original status in society was so far superior to that of their brethren in affliction in the other institution, that it appeared to me, from want of more general information and experience at the time, not at all improbable that what had succeeded in the one institution might fail in the other. The conduct of the patients, however, the first time they assembled for worship, dissipated whatever fears were entertained as to the result, and proved that, excepting the feelings with which every Christian teacher ought to deliver the message of an eternal God to the suffering sons of men, the chaplain might safely divest himself of all painful anxiety. Both congregations were found equally attentive and anxious for instruction. In a word, the difference between the two institutions was infinitely less than might reasonably have been expected. Subsequent observations have, to a certain extent, accounted for this last circumstance. Insanity more closely resembles the grave in levelling distinctions than any of the vicissitudes to which man is exposed in his earthly pilgrimage. Although, as has been already remarked, in minute particulars there may be a diversity of features, still in most cases this fearful malady preserves, in every class, its general identity of character. All belong to the same family, and in very many instances, we speak it in sadness, the family resemblance is, alas, too perfect. Without doubt, singular exceptions are to be met with, where, instead of levelling, insanity may rather be said to confuse the distinctions of rank; as for example, when the poor and uneducated man becomes elevated in his thoughts and language, while, on the other hand, the man of a refined and well instructed mind sinks into a state of moping childish idiocy. At times, too, madness makes but a slight, if any, change upon the general deportment; the uncultivated patient retains the same rustic simplicity that marked his conduct in happier days; while the man of talent and acquirements, by his remarks, throws, if we may so speak, a sickening lustre over the wretchedness of his real condition.

Yet, however striking and varied the modifications of insanity may be, still, in by far the greater number of those who are present at divine service, whatever their rank or situation in life may have been, the same subdued, melancholy, and serious deportment is observable.

In fact, the insane, who are capable of joining in religious duties, equally with their sane brethren, acknowledge the power of certain principles of acting, and are, perhaps, even to a greater extent, the children of habit. In a congregation of worshippers, met under ordinary circumstances, the solemnity of their situation, and the importance of the duties in which they are engaged, command the attention of persons of very different ages, stations, views, and feelings. So is it among the insane. The thoughts of God, and the force of early custom, place before us, in the same attitude of reverential awe, individuals who, on other occasions, are diametrically opposed in character and conduct.

But let us suppose, that the members of a Christian congregation have been visited by some general calamity; persons of the most dissimilar habits and conditions will, under the influence of grief, listen with tenfold greater interest than usual to the words of consolation or instruction. The insane always meet under such circumstances, for although unable or unwilling to describe their sufferings, distress produces the same effects upon them as upon the sane, may exert, perhaps we would be justified in maintaining, even a more powerful influence. The unhappy maniac, cut off from the ordinary sympathies and consolations of life, is, in most instances, rendered more willing to receive comfort, when offered in such a way as not to wound his pride or self-love. This, we apprehend, will, to a very considerable extent, account for the similarity of conduct observable among the insane of every rank while assembled for the worship of God.

The foregoing remarks may have appeared tedious, but they were necessary, from the close resemblance which the following narrative bears to that formerly alluded to in reference to the City Bedlam:—

On an average, about one-half of the patients meet on Sabbath afternoon in the chapel. When assembled for the worship of God, their eyes are generally fixed upon the speaker, the passages of Scripture referred to in the discourse are promptly sought out, and the varying expression in the countenances of several, as the words of consolation or advice are addressed to them, proves, that although the mind may be disturbed and darkened, it is not unconscious of the power and blessedness of the only lasting comfort of the suffering sons of men.

Slight interruptions have once or twice occurred, in consequence of severe nervous paroxysms unexpectedly attacking two (I believe) of the patients; none of the rest, however, appeared in the slightest degree disturbed; and whenever the afflicted persons were removed by the attendants, the service was resumed with the same composure as if nothing unusual had happened. Under any circumstances, such conduct must have been gratifying to the preacher; but in a congregation on which the mysterious hand of Omnipotence pressed with resistless force, it was peculiarly pleasing, because indicating perfect consciousness of the duties in which the poor sufferers were engaged. Nor, it need hardly be repeated, do the patients, upon leaving the chapel, lose remembrance of the instructions received; on the contrary, they have frequently made remarks to the writer, which clearly proved that they had closely followed him in all his observations, and, he has been informed by the superintendent, the text and sermon generally form the subject of conversation on the Sabbath evening among the more collected. One or two circumstances, in connection with the foregoing observations, may now be mentioned.

While conversing with the chaplain, one of the patients requested him to preach from a particular text. This request having been complied with, he playfully repeated a common proverb, to the effect, that there are certain persons who, when a little is given to them, desire to take a great deal more, and begged that the subject of discourse for the following Sabbath might be John iii. 3. After the service was concluded, the cause of the selection was explained; he had heard a sermon on the same passage several years before, and not feeling altogether satisfied, in some respects, with the manner in which the subject had been treated, he wished to ascertain in what light it would be viewed by a different individual. The same person, some months afterwards, pointed out another text, Matthew xix. 14. On this occasion, he was supported by the united wishes of his partners in affliction. The death of the superintendent's son had deeply affected the patients, and in this pleasing way they manifested their sympathy with the afflicted parents. It may not be out of place here to observe that the countenance and voice of childhood possess a powerful influence over the insane, frequently producing a momentary calm, and calling forth expressions of tenderness even in their wildest moments.

The same interesting patient, alluded to above, prepared a list, which now lies before me, containing sixty-two texts selected from every part of the Old and New Testaments. It may be gratifying to state a few of them:—Num. xxiii. 10; Josh. xxiv. 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; John xi. 25; Rom. xv. 17; 2 Cor. iv. 6; Gal. vi. 9. The benefits of a religious education were most strikingly exemplified in the case of this individual; even in his saddest moments the Word of God maintained its influence, and proved a source of comfort to his troubled yet highly intellectual mind. He had been the child of many prayers, and although, in some respects, these prayers had not been answered, yet, in others, truly they were not in vain, for he loved the service of the sanctuary, and regarded as his "chiefest joy" the peace-speaking message of salvation.

Proofs still more decidedly convincing of the encouraging effects of religious service in the Asylum may now be given, taken from the bed of death. Affecting are these proofs at all times, but peculiarly so under such circumstances. One of the patients, in a dying state, after conversing for a considerable time on her present condition and future prospects, requested that something might be given to moisten her lips, begging particularly that it might be handed to her by the chaplain. After having received what was desired, she exclaimed in the most earnest manner, "Oh! that I might receive but a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple!" The following night, when the chaplain was in the act of taking leave of her, she grasped his hand, and, with an expression of countenance that words cannot describe, cried out, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me!" In a few hours afterwards she entered into a spiritual world. Another female patient, three hours before death, after having explained in the most satisfactory manner the grounds of her hope, remarked, "If God is pleased to detain me a little longer on earth, (which I think very unlikely) I am ready to remain, yet if it seems good to him, I rather wish to be removed, for this has been to me a life of care and many sorrows; but my Father's will be done." It was formerly observed, that even the fatuous ought not, in every case, to be prevented from participating in the benefits of religious instruction. For so little do we know, or rather so completely ignorant are we of the nature of the immaterial part of man, that the patient who appears to us to be utterly devoid of mental energy and consciousness may, in fact, be merely incapable of speech, or unwilling to give utterance to his feelings, and the mind, instead of being completely dormant, is perhaps in a state of constant activity, receiving impressions from external objects, but unable, or not inclined, to embody these impressions in words; in a word, living for itself alone. A brief illustration of this opinion may be given. A patient, in the lowest stage of idiocy, was regularly, on account of her gentle disposition, brought to the chapel; but it was never imagined that she had the slightest comprehension of the nature of the duties in which all around her were engaged. She scarcely ever spoke, was at all times passive, enjoying, apparently, nothing above animal existence. On her death-bed the chaplain visited her; whenever his voice was heard, to the astonishment of her attendants, the helpless creature, with a smile of delight, seemed to recognise it; she moved her head-dress to hear more distinctly, turned round to the speaker, and, when prayer was offered up, her clasped hands and moving lips left no room to doubt that she was fully aware of her situation, and was even joining in the petition at the throne of grace. The same conduct was manifested on every visit until death relieved the sufferer. The change generally observed in the insane before death cannot account for this occurrence; for, if all in the patient's mind (as was really believed) had been a blank previous to her last sickness, how could she recognise the chaplain's voice and person, and so promptly understand the nature of his visit, and even join in the exercise? The only way in which this difficulty can be solved, is by supposing that, while to all appearance deficient in memory and consciousness, she was yet, to a certain extent, possessed of both, and had thus become acquainted with the speaker in the pulpit, and partially understood his errand, although it had been either out of her power, or contrary to her inclination, to indicate either fact by words or expression of countenance, until the close of life.

If pleasing exceptions have thus been met with among the fatuous, the same have occurred among persons of a very different class. A restless patient who had been regularly in the habit of attending worship, became dreadfully excited on the Lord's day. To ascertain what effect divine service would have upon him, he was brought into the chapel; the moment worship commenced a change passed upon the unhappy man, the song of praise and words of supplication seemed to operate as a spell upon him; he became calm and tranquil, listened attentively to what was said, and remembered it afterwards. On another occasion, when the same individual was nearly in a similar state of excitement, the subject of discourse happened to be the affecting parable of the prodigal son. The poor man's attention was at once secured, the narrative evidently interesting him deeply. When, in the course of the lecture, some remarks were made upon that exquisitely beautiful part of this unequalled picture of paternal tenderness, "when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell upon his neck, and kissed him," the maniac burst into a flood of tears, not of despairing anguish but of heart-relieving sympathy. Some pleasing image stood before him,—some soothing train of thought had evidently engaged his troubled mind, for as he wept he smiled. The memory of the past had, it may be, conjured up some event in boyhood, hallowed by a father's forgiveness—by the outpourings of a mother's love; or the eye of faith dwelt perhaps, on a still goodlier scene, the arms of mercy stretched forth to welcome the returning son, the countenance of uncreated goodness full of benignity to the mourning penitent. Whatever it was, whether earth or heaven, or both conjoined, that had thus affected his soul, the load of many years was, for a time, cast to the ground, and the heart unused to softened feeling experienced, for a season, the blessed effects of kindly emotion.

In addressing the insane it is impossible to avoid occasionally opposing their peculiar opinions and prejudices, but the opposition coming from the pulpit, and being addressed to all, has never produced any unpleasant consequences. Every day we may behold persons in church, or at public meetings, listening, with the utmost composure, to arguments completely at variance with their own sentiments, who, in private, cannot bear the slightest contradiction without yielding to the most ungovernable rage. The same is the case even among the most prejudiced of the insane; what is addressed to them in a sermon, from its apparent want of direct personal aim, excites no angry feelings, although the same remarks, if made in private conversation, would, most probably, cause the most violent excitement.

To illustrate this, I may state an incident that occurred some time ago in the Asylum, in the case of one of the patients who laboured under the strange delusion that death had ceased to exert its influence over the human race. The men of a former generation he imagined were still actively engaged in their several spheres of usefulness. In a word, the world had known no change for forty years. I repeatedly attempted, during conversation, to dissipate this hallucination, but in vain, the man uniformly became irritated, so much so, at last, that I dropped the subject. On one occasion, in the course of my Sabbath duties, I made some allusion to a very interesting death which had happened a few days previous in the Asylum. The above mentioned individual was present, and listened with marked attention and composure to the remarks upon death. At the close of the service, coming up to me, he whispered, in a confidential manner, "My dear Sir, I am sorry to say you are mistaken, they have deceived you too I see; the person is as much alive as you are, but I shall explain the whole matter to you again." While addressing me the expression of his countenance indicated affection and regret that I should have been deceived, as he imagined, but there was at the same time an unusual degree of hesitation in his manner, which, together with the total absence of any thing like anger or displeasure, convinced me that from the pulpit his delusion might be safely, and advantageously, attacked. It is almost super-fuous to observe that the promised explanation was never given, nor did the patient again revert to the occurrence.

THE SPIRITUAL DESTITUTION
UPPER CANADA.

[THE following extract of a letter, dated 12th July 1837, from the Rev. Alexander Gale, minister of Hamilton, Upper Canada, addressed to the Very Rev. Principal Macfarlan, Convener of the General Assembly's Committee on Colonial Churches, will be perused with interest. It describes our countrymen, who have settled in the province of Upper Canada, as lamentably deficient in the supply of spiritual instructors, and we trust that the appeal thus made through our pages will meet with prompt attention from the Christian public, and more especially from the unemployed preachers of our Church.]

I could not, perhaps, begin with a more appropriate statement than by informing you that, at this moment, there is, so far as I can learn, but one Missionary of our Church in the field throughout the whole of Upper Canada. During the last season only three came to us in all, and none of them reached the country before the month of September. In little more than six months two of them were ordained to fixed charges, and the remaining one has just accepted of a call from a congregation within the bounds of this presbytery. Of 1835, I cannot speak precisely as to numbers, but my conviction is, that it was equally unproductive and discouraging to us, in this respect, as 1836; and during what has passed of 1837, not a single additional preacher of our Church has appeared in Upper Canada. Of this most disheartening state of things I am much at a loss to find an adequate account. I cannot believe that the large reserve of unemployed probationers, which the Church possessed when I left Scotland, has been exhausted; and the thought is not to be entertained, that the miserable destitution in spiritual things, under which the Presbyterian population of this country are labouring, could be regarded with indifference by the Church and her preachers, or that they do not acknowledge and feel the duty of contributing to our relief. I fear I must come to the conclusion that the blame lies mainly at our own door; that we have not yet brought our case fully before you; that you are yet unacquainted, through some deficiency on our part, with the extent and urgency of our wants.

In such a communication as this, I can of course do little to supply this deficiency, even in regard to the Presbytery of Hamilton alone. The following statements may, however, enable you to form some idea of our actual condition. The Presbytery of Hamilton, consisting of ten ministers, has under its superintendence a tract of country extending about 250 miles in length, by 60 or 70 in breadth, a large portion of which is well peopled. These ministers, however, are very unequally distributed, seven out of the ten being stationed around the head of Lake Ontario, or within forty miles of it; so that, for two hundred miles and upwards, there are only three ministers. Yet in almost every township of this extensive region, individuals and families belonging to our Church are to be found scattered more or less numerously, and living, in a vast number of instances, in total destitution of Gospel ordinances, the Sabbath almost forgotten, religious instruction neglected, baptism and communion inaccessible, unless in connection with sects and teachers of the most exceptionable character in general, as to their principles and qualifications. Besides those who could only be reached by an extensive missionary system, there is another class of cases, which, though certainly not more interesting or clamant in themselves, do yet attract attention more readily, and are more intimately known to us, I mean those in which considerable numbers of Presbyterians are settled in close neighbourhood with one another. Of these we reckon in this Presbytery alone, not fewer than sixteen or eighteen, from many of which we have had urgent and repeated applications for preaching and other ordinances, together with subscription lists, and other assurances of the disposition of the people to contribute, as far as they can, to the support of Missionaries. As Presbyteries are situated at present, their duties, in regard to such applications, are extremely distressing, obliged, as we are, season after season, to meet their earnest and reiterated entreaties and offers of support, with the painful confession that we cannot help them, that we have no Missionaries to send to them. I cannot attempt at present any thing beyond this brief and meagre statement. At the approaching meeting of Synod, a full representation of our religious destitution will doubtless be prepared for your committee; and as we have an ample pledge for the energetic discharge of its duties in your well known zeal in behalf of the Colonial Churches, I cannot allow myself to doubt that when our wants shall have been made known through you to our countrymen, and especially to the unemployed preachers of our Church, the means of our relief will be placed abundantly at your disposal.

There is one point connected with the support of Missionaries in Canada, which I am desirous of bringing under your particular attention. The funds raised amongst settlers, for this purpose, have hitherto been exceedingly small, and the burden of Missionary maintenance has been principally borne at home. This, I doubt not, has operated, and is still operating powerfully in preventing a greater number from being sent to us. Now I am persuaded that it is in a great measure on account of the smallness of the number of Missionaries, their utter inadequacy to our wants, that the resources of the country have been so little available, and that if a sufficient number were at once sent into the field, their resources would be brought into action; and while the work would be effectually done, the amount of external aid required would be very little greater than is found necessary in conducting the present unsatisfactory and inefficient system. This is easily explained. While we have only one or two Missionaries in the Presbytery of Hamilton, the various stations requiring their services can only be visited twice or thrice a-year; and these rare and irregular services are comparatively ineffectual for the purpose of religious instruction and training, and evidently but little calculated to call forth and secure the united and vigorous efforts of the people for their compensation and maintenance. On the other hand, had we six Missionaries at our disposal, the Missionary ground would be divided among them, so that all the principal stations would be visited regularly once or twice a-month, and the people would feel the value of such ministrations, and contribute readily for their support. You may be inclined to ask, why does not the Presbytery of Hamilton act on these views? I answer, that the Missionaries must be on the field before the plan can be fairly tried with the people; several months would perhaps elapse before it could be brought into full operation, and besides, the smallness of our Missionary fund prevents us from undertaking the previous expenses, the same cause restrains us from incurring the risk of a failure, slight as I believe it to be. I doubt not that these statements will receive your early and favourable consideration. May the Great Head of the Church animate and prosper you in your efforts for the advancement of His cause, and the spiritual welfare of our expatriated countrymen.

SACRED POETRY.

STANZAS.

BY DAVID VEDDER,

Author of "Orcaidian Sketches," &c.

In the year 1544, the plague made such ravages in the town of Dundee, that the civic authorities were under the necessity of placing those who were infected with the malady, without the gates. The amiable and enlightened George Wishart, who afterwards sealed his testimony with his blood, declared the glad tidings of salvation both to the healthy and also to the infected, from the top of the Cowgate port, an antique arch at the east end of the then town. Amidst the many improvements which have taken place recently, this venerable arch, with much good taste, has been allowed to remain.

THE pestilence had stalked abroad,
And stretched his bony hand;
While from his livid jaws exhaled
A vapour o'er the land,
Dense, as of old, the lurid cloud
That swathed Egyptia, as a shroud;
At God's supreme command;
And multitudes, in manhood's pride,
Inhaled the noxious air, and died.

And friend, alas! deserted friend,
And son from sire did flee;
For terror cut the gordian knot
That bound humanity;
And bed-rid eld, and infancy,
Alike deprived of sympathy
And succour, ceased to be;
And thousands in the lazar state
Were thrust without the city gate.

But mercy, with the turbid stream
Of judgment, mingled still;
It issued from the throne on high
A glorious limpid rill.
The Iris of the Gospel glowed
In radiance 'midst the threat'ning cloud
That lowered o'er Zion hill;
For, MARTYRED WISHART! thou wert there
To soothe the anguish of despair.

Above an antique arch he raised
His venerable head;
On either hand, the living throng,
The dying and the dead;
And to the Fount of mercy there
He poured his ardent soul in prayer,
And fervently did plead
That He, their covenanted God,
Would yet withdraw his chastening rod.

He pointed to the cross of Christ,
Whence healing virtues flow,—
Spoke of the sanctifying grace
The Spirit can bestow,—
Told of the great, the glorious plan,
Devised by heaven, that fallen man
Might shun eternal woe,—
Proclaimed aloud, that God is love,
On earth below—in heaven above!

He spoke of scenes beyond the grave,—
Of aramanthine bowers;
The sea of glass—the tree of life—
Its gorgeous fruits and flowers;
The river issuing from the throne,—
The golden harp's celestial tone,—
Thrones, potentates, and powers,
Beyond all, in that bright abode
They'd ever praise the TRIUNE GOD!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rev. Mr Kicherer.—This name will remind the reader of the first Missionary to the African Hottentots. During his early residence among them, he was visited by a man who had been sentenced at the Cape of Good Hope to death, but who had made his escape; and making great pretensions to religion, imposed on Mr K., and induced him to receive him into his house. At night, he slept in a room immediately adjoining that of the Missionary, and rose during the night with the design of murdering Mr K., and making his escape with the property on the premises, to a distant place. At the moment he was proceeding to the bed-side of this good man, Mr K. was suddenly awoke in a fit of terror, and unconsciously cried out as though he was aware of the design of this wicked man, who now became alarmed, and fled.

Rev. John Cooke of Maidenhead.—Few instances can be selected from the records of the providence of God, in which his care has been exercised in the days of thoughtless vanity over those whom he intends to bless with his favour, and to make them useful in his Church, more striking than the following event mentioned in the early life of this good man. When he was yet destitute of piety, he was left one Sabbath afternoon in his master's house alone; and wanting amusement, though he would take a gun, and go into a neighbouring field of oats, to fire at a large number of rooks there collected. The birds hovered over his head, and so great was their clamour, that when he had pulled the trigger of his gun, though he did not hear a report, he supposed that it had discharged its contents. He then rested it on the ground, and blew into the barrel to clear it, as he had seen his master often do, when he had discharged it. The instant he had removed his mouth from the barrel, the gun went off without injuring him.

Rev. Mr Abernethy.—It is related in the preface to a volume of sermons delivered by this good man, that when young, he was diverting himself with a servant who attended upon him on the great bridge at Belfast, and that happening to cast his eye upon something at a distance, it attracted his attention. They instantly ran towards it, and the moment they were clear of the bridge, the arch on which they had been standing fell down. Had they stayed on it a few seconds longer, they must have lost their lives.

Mr Joseph Williams.—This eminent pious man, who lived at Kidderminster in the last century, records in his diary a remarkable interposition of the providence of God, in preserving his family and property from devouring flames. One of his servants one night dreamed that a neighbour's house was on fire, and through the agitation which the dream occasioned, she made a trifling degree of noise, which awoke Mrs W., who was sleeping in a room below. On awaking, she found her room filled with smoke; and when Mr Williams arose and examined the house, he found part of one of the lower rooms on fire; which, but for the singular manner in which they had been disturbed, would have speedily placed the whole family in danger; and as the house was not that year insured, have deprived the good man of nearly all he possessed.

ON THE COMMON PHRASE,
"THE LAWS OF NATURE."

No. II.

BY THE REV. W. M. HETHERINGTON, A.M.,

WE have already shown, that the expression, "a law impressed on nature," if it meant any thing, must either involve the doctrine of physical necessity, of the most stern and terrible kind, or that of Epicureanism, of the most lax and careless kind. But the truth is, though men may think they understand it to have some such meaning, while they would not be willing to admit it to the extent stated above, it has not in reality, nor can it have, any definite meaning at all. We have no knowledge of the manner in which mind acts upon matter; we do not know how our own minds act upon our own bodies. But we do know, that our own minds cannot act upon any material existence except by means of our bodies; nor upon our bodies themselves except by a species of present indwelling power, which we rather feel than understand. The mind can no more move the amputated limb, which it was accustomed to wield at its pleasure, than it can a rude mass of granite torn from the mountain's brow by some convulsion of nature. We have no reason for supposing that mind, any more than matter, can act at all, except where it is present; and as a law is merely "mind willing the exercise of its energies in some peculiar manner," it is utterly impossible to imagine a modification of mind impressed upon matter, and influencing it, and yet mind itself not there. Such language, when analyzed, is found to be perfectly meaningless, and is allowed to pass current only because people are far too much in the habit of allowing plausible-looking nonsense to pass unchallenged, under the cover of its counterfeit character, for sense. Mind is the only moving and controlling principle; mind can act only where it is present; laws are but modifications of mind, having no existence except in minds; the perceived operation of what are termed laws, therefore, is merely the proof of the presence of mind; and what are termed general, or universal laws, are the manifest proofs of the presence and the power of the universal mind—of God himself, the creator and sole ruler of the universe—the Almighty and Omnipresent Jehovah! The laws of nature are the laws of God, their agency is the divine agency, nay, their perceived agency is the perceived presence of Him "in whom we live, and move, and have our being." "For the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and godhead."

They tell us, also, of "organic laws," by which expression is meant those permanent modifying and governing principles which preserve to any individual thing its own identity of character. The essential nature of these "organic laws" is as much beyond our reach, as is the nature of any physical law. We can no more tell by what organic law we have and retain our identity as individual men, notwithstanding the constant flux and change of the particles of matter that compose our bodies, than we can what organic law gave and preserves its physical constitution to the sun. Nor can we, by the operation of our minds, produce the least organic change in our bodily structure, though we may disturb and confuse its various functional operations. We cannot, by taking thought, add a nail's breadth to our stature, or make one hair white and another black. Whence, then, the power and the permanent uniformity of operation of these organic laws? They are from God. What are they,—so completely beyond our search to discover, and our will to direct? They are modifications of the will of God. Organic laws, then, are but the individualized manifestations of the creative and preserving will of the Almighty. Instead of being, as our pseudo-philosophers would have it, the result of organic arrangements, they are the cause of those arrangements, their ruling, developing, and assimilating principle, which at first gave, and still preserves, to every created being, its peculiarity of constitution and character, and its personal identity of existence. Even in those clay-built tenements, then, which our souls inhabit, and in what we term the "organic laws," which regulate our bodily structure, we are brought into immediate contact, if our blinded minds would but perceive it, with the creative, the moving, the moulding, the conserving will of the great, and wise, and gracious God, by whom we were "fearfully and wonderfully made."

Instead of prosecuting this line of investigation any farther at present, we may point out briefly, in the conclusion of this paper, the manner in which the views, we have attempted to establish, meet and refute the loose notions of a spurious philosophising spirit, unhappily too prevalent at the present day. They tell us that there are certain physical and organic laws, governing the world, and every organized being that inhabits it; that there is an adaptation absolutely perfect between the constitution of physical nature and of mankind, and that to act in conformity with these physical and organic laws will insure as much happiness as the nature of man can enjoy, while, to act in opposition to them will immediately be followed by such physical suffering as will operate as a corrective check; and that this is a more just and philosophical view of the nature and condition of man than the views usually given by theological writers. They tell us, also, in perfect consistency with these views, that nothing more is wanted for the complete reformation of man, than the knowledge of these physical and organic laws, to enable him to see that it is his interest always to act in conformity with them, and to know how to do so; while, of course, such doctrines as the fall of man,—the prevalence of sin,—disease and death, regarded as the wages of sin,—the regenerating agency of the Holy Spirit, as the only restorer of man to a state of holiness and happiness, &c., are all rejected as the mere fables of an unenlightened and unphilosophic age. Now we do think that if they would take the trouble of inquiring a little into the grounds of their own philosophy, or even into the meaning of the language they are in the habit of using, they would find themselves brought to a conclusion, very different indeed from that fallacious one in which, at present, they think they have found rest. What do they mean by "physical and organic laws?" If they mean that they have a positive and real existence, then physical and organic laws are their gods! If they do not mean that these laws have any real and positive existence, do they mean to ascribe intelligence and power, capable of ruling all nature, animate and inanimate, with unchanging uniformity, to absolute nonentity? This would be downright atheism or downright nonsense! Or will they allow themselves, under our guidance, to be brought to the more rational conclusion, that all laws, physical and organic, are but manifestations of the power, the wisdom, and the present agency of the creative and the preserving mind and will of God, the creator and ruler of the universe? If to that conclusion they would permit us to conduct them, then we should have little more to do than to remonstrate with them on the fallacious sophistries by which they were deluding themselves and others.

If they will admit that physical and organic laws are merely modifications of the divine will made visible by material phenomena, then there can be no doubt that the "laws of nature," and the laws of God, communicated in the truths of revelation, will concur, because both emanate from the divine mind; and an accurate knowledge of these laws would, in either case, make men acquainted with the will of God concerning them, to a certain extent. It might be expected, also, that there would be a remarkable coincidence between these diversely promulgated laws, because both proceeded from the same divine source, and both had reference to the same creature—man. And such, indeed, there will be found to be, by those who look for it wisely, and from a right point of observation. But at present we dissent from the way in which our would-be-philosophers attempt to give precedence to the laws of nature, as of higher value, or of greater certainty, and more direct importance, than the laws of revelation. We admit it to be true, that man cannot violate any of the laws of nature without suffering an immediate punishment; and that it is very desirable that he should be acquainted with these laws, and avoid that punishment. But so long as men are unacquainted with them, as, to a great degree, even the most enlightened philosopher is, while by far the greater proportion of mankind are utterly ignorant of nearly them all, how are they to be preserved from error and suffering? "By teaching them natural science," our philosophers answer. But revelation points out a more direct and certain path, and one more concurrent with truth and wisdom. It states to us that all error is sin, that sin is opposed to the will of God: in consequence of which it involves certain misery, if committed and persevered in; and it points out to us the path of religious duty, in which, if we walk, we shall enjoy the favour of God, which is essential life, essential happiness. Our philosophers will tell us that this communicates to us no information respecting the physical and organic laws, which it is so essential for us to know and obey. No! Short-sighted and mistaken men! They are looking through the wrong end of the telescope. Have they already forgotten that all law is the will of God? and do they not perceive that all law must, therefore, have had a moral origin, and must ultimately have a moral bearing, connected with God's moral government of the universe? The violation of even a physical law, therefore, comes within the range of a moral offence, and is so essentially, if intentionally committed. The violation of an organic law is even more manifestly so. To indulge in drunkenness, for example, is a violation of an organic law, and will soon be punished with organic disease, and even death itself. But it is also a moral offence, a sin, and is directly prohibited by the revealed Word of God. Now, for the present, the whole question is, whether the argument from the organic laws, or the argument from the revealed prohibition of God, be the more likely way of preventing the commission of the crime of drunkenness. Both arguments are true, but which is the most powerful? Both spring from the same origin,—the will of God; both tend to the same consequence,—God's glory in the welfare of his creature; but the one by a direct, the other by an indirect process. Nay, in truth, the argument from the organic law appeals to merely selfish motives, and therefore both possesses much less force, in not addressing the moral, that is, the governing principle of man, and is much less likely to lead to the only safe result, that is, to conformity with the will of God, not only organic, but spiritual and holy. A similar deduction might be easily made, in almost every possible violation of organic laws, showing that in every instance obedience to the revealed will of God would lead more directly, and with greater certainty, to the same result, so far as the mere physical and temporal consequences to man are concerned; while the study of the laws of nature could not but be a much less safe, expeditious, and powerful guide, even physically, and might utterly fail in reaching the moral nature of man at all, consequently might fail in producing the only truly valuable result, the moral and spiritual improvement of man.

It might also be shown that this would-be-philosophical system is, in reality, unsuited to human nature, and utterly unphilosophical. It necessarily assumes the possibility of man's becoming thoroughly acquainted with all the laws of nature, and the absolutely infinite complexities of these various possible combinations, which is manifestly absurd. Yet if he cannot acquire that thorough knowledge, he must be still exposed, in his helpless ignorance, to the caprice of unknown yet implacable laws. If this be not a condition unsuited to human nature, we cannot tell what is: to insure his right conduct and happiness, his knowledge must be infinite,—to be happy as a man, his wisdom must be equal to that of God! Yet he must not trace the meaning of the language he uses, lest it lead him to revelation, lest he find that the laws of nature are the laws of God; he must imagine powers and principles acting throughout the universe, yet having no actual existence of their own, much less subsisting only and essentially as attributes or modifications of the divine mind and will. And all this, although the revealed will of God would lead certainly and directly to the very result to which he vainly imagines his own impossible notions would possibly lead, if they could by any possibility be realised!

How much more magnificently simple, and profoundly philosophical, are the hallowed truths of revelation! The universe was created by God, in conformity with his own infinitely wise, gracious, and holy will. His infinite Presence pervades it throughout, displaying its attributes in the power, wisdom, and benevolence, which are its characteristics. Glad of su signalizing himself, he accordi enterprise; and having planted vanced ground, was in the act when he received a shot in his beating out any of his teeth, or part of his tongue, went throu out about an inch and a-half on the left side of the vertebra. This event happened about five or six in the afternoon but the army having proceeded in pursuing its advantages against the French, without any regard to the wounded, Mr Gardiner was left all night in the field in the utmost helplessness. His mind, it may easily be supposed, was agitated with many anxious fears, but he afterwards stated that, though he considered his life was preserved almost by means of a miracle, he had little thoughts of humbling himself before God, or of committing his way to him. The impression on his mind seemed rather to be that, desperate though his state then appeared, he would, after such an escape, be still permitted to live. Under this impression, he had recourse to an expedient, which proved successful, for securing his money, of which he had a good deal about him. Expecting to be stripped, he took out a handful of the clotted gore, of which he was frequently obliged to clear his mouth to prevent suffocation, and putting it in his left hand, (which had in it about nineteen pistoles) he besmeared it with blood, so that when it dried, his hand could not easily fall open through any sudden surprise.

In the morning the French, who were masters of this spot, though their forces were defeated at some distance, came to plunder the slain, and one of them seeing that life was almost extinct, was on the point of applying a sword to his breast, when a cordelier, who attended on the plunderers, successfully interposed in his behalf, and got him sent off under charge of a file of musketeers to a neighbouring town. His misfortunes, however, were not yet at an end; for the men having lost their way, and got into a wood towards evening, he was obliged to remain another night in the open air with his wound still undressed, the pain of which had now become so intense, that he earnestly entreated to be instantly put to death. His convoy judging it unsafe to carry him to his destination, he was taken early in the morning to a neighbouring convent, where he was hospitably received and kindly treated; and in a few months he was, under the blessing of God, restored to health, and, by an interchange of prisoners, also regained his liberty.

From this time till about his thirtieth year he was busily engaged in the duties of his profession, in which he soon received promotion, and after serving for some time in Lord Stair's regiment of Scots Greys, and other regiments, he received a captain's commission, and was afterwards promoted to the rank of major in the regiment of dragoons commanded by Colonel Stanhope, afterwards Earl of Harrington. During this period he often experienced the divine goodness in his entire preservation from injury in many hot military actions in which he was called to engage. At a skirmish, too, with the rebels in Lancashire, he particularly distinguished himself, having headed a little body of men, about twelve in number, and set fire to the baricado of the rebels in the face of their whole army, and amidst volleys of shot, by which eight out of the twelve that attended him fell. All these years, however, were spent in entire alienation from God, and in the constant pursuit of criminal pleasures, which he regarded as his supreme good. But, notwithstanding these indulgences, his mind was not at rest, and though to many he was known by the appellation of the happy rake, he felt, as many under similar circumstances have done, that, in the midst of his pleasures, he was of all men most miserable. On one occasion, on being congratulated by some of his dissolute companions on his distinguished felicity, a dog happening at that time to come into the room, he could not forbear, in the bitterness of his spirit, from groaning inwardly, and exclaiming, "Oh that I were that dog!" Sometimes, too, the convictions of conscience, and the remonstrances of reason, wrought upon him to such a degree, that in the midst of his forgetfulness of God, he was impelled to attempt to pay him some acknowledgments, and, accordingly, for a few mornings he actually repeated in retirement some passages from Scripture, which he still retained in his memory, acknowledging the mercies he had received, and the ill returns he had made for them. But as his heart was as yet unsoftened, his life, it may be supposed, remained unchanged, and the absurdity of confessing sins he had no desire to renounce, so forced itself upon his conscience, that, in a state of horror, he deliberately laid aside prayer altogether, as being, in his state of mind, a daring and impious act of profanity.

Though the conviction of the evil of his ways continued occasionally to force itself upon his mind, yet as this conviction was invariably overborne by the strength of fresh temptations, his heart, as may easily be conceived, became even more hardened as he advanced in years, and notwithstanding some fresh deliverances from danger which he experienced, no salutary change was produced upon him. On one occasion, when riding quickly down a declivity in the streets of Calais, his horse threw him from the saddle, and so pitched over him, that when he rose, the animal lay beyond him, and almost dead. On another occasion, a few weeks afterwards, in returning from England in the packet boat, he encountered so violent a storm, that all on board expected in a few minutes to perish. In these circumstances he did pray, and that very fervently, and it so happened that while he was crying to God for deliverance, the wind fell, and quickly after they arrived at Calais. But, notwithstanding these merciful preservations, no serious impression was made on his heart, and his attachment to the sinful pleasures of the world continued as devoted as ever.

A time at last came when it pleased God to stop him short in his career of sin, and savingly to convert him unto himself. The circumstances connected with this event, which happened when he was in the thirty-second year of his age, are of so remarkable a nature, that we shall transcribe the account of it, as related by the late eminent Dr Doddridge, to whom they were communicated by Major Gardiner himself:—"This memorable event," says Dr Doddridge, "happened towards the middle of July 1719; but I cannot be exact as to the day. The major had spent the evening (and, if I mistake not, it was the Sabbath) in some gay company, and had an unhappy assignation with a married woman, of what rank or quality I did not particularly inquire, whom he was to attend exactly at twelve. The company broke up about eleven; and not judging it convenient to anticipate the time appointed, he went into his chamber to kill the tedious hour, perhaps with some amusing book, or some other way. But it very accidentally happened that he took up a religious book, which his good mother or aunt had, without his knowledge, slipped into his portmanteau. It was called, if I remember the title exactly, 'The Christian Soldier, or Heaven taken by Storm,' and was written by Mr T. Watson. Guessing by the title of it, that he should find some phrases of his own profession spiritualized in a manner which he thought might afford him some diversion, he resolved to dip into it; but he took no serious notice of anything he read in it. And yet while this book was in his hand, an impression was made upon his mind (perhaps God only knows how) which drew after it a train of the most important and happy consequences.

"There is, indeed, a possibility that while he was sitting in this attitude, and reading in this careless and profane manner, he might suddenly fall asleep, and only dream of what he apprehended he saw. But nothing can be more certain than that, when he gave up this relation, he judged himself to have been as truly awake during the whole time as he ever was in any part of his life; and he mentioned it to me several times afterwards as what undoubtedly passed, not only in his imagination, but before his eyes.

“He thought he saw an unusual blaze of light fall upon the book, while he was reading, which he at first imagined might happen by some accident in the candle; but lifting up his eyes, he apprehended to his extreme amazement, that there was before him, as it were suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, surrounded on all sides with a glory; and was impressed, as if a voice had come to him, to this effect, (for he was not confident as to the precise words) ‘Oh sinner! did I suffer this for thee, and are these thy returns!’ But whether this were an audible voice, or only a strong impression on his mind equally striking, he did not seem very confident, though, to the best of my remembrance, he rather judged it to be the former. Struck with so amazing a phenomenon as this, there remained hardly any life in him, so that he sunk down in the arm-chair, in which he sat, and continued, he knew not exactly how long, insensible; which was one circumstance that made me several times take the liberty to suggest that he might possibly be all this while asleep. But however that were, he quickly after opened his eyes, and saw nothing more than usual.

“It may easily be supposed he was in no condition to make any observation upon the time in which he had remained in an insensible state; nor did he, throughout all the remainder of the night, once recollect that criminal and detestable assignation which had before engrossed all his thoughts. He rose in a tumult of passions not to be conceived, and walked to and fro in his chamber, till he was ready to drop down in unutterable astonishment and agony of heart, appearing to himself the vilest monster in the creation of God, who had all his lifetime been crucifying Christ afresh by his sins, and now assuredly saw, by a miraculous vision, the horror of what he had done. With this was connected such a view, both of the majesty and goodness of God, as caused him to loath and abhor himself, and to repent as in dust and ashes. He immediately gave judgment against himself; that he was most justly worthy of eternal damnation. He was astonished that he had not been struck dead in the midst of his wickedness; (and which I think deserves particular remark) though he assuredly believed that he should erelong be in hell, and settled it as a point with himself for several months, that the wisdom and justice of God did almost necessarily require that such an enormous sinner should be made an example of everlasting vengeance, and a spectacle as such both to angels and men, so that he hardly durst presume to pray for pardon, yet, what he then suffered was not so much from the fear of hell, though he concluded it would soon be his portion, as from a sense of that horrible ingratitude he had shown to the God of his life, and to that blessed Redeemer who had been, in so affecting a manner, set forth as crucified before him.”

Whatever opinion may be formed of this remarkable event, there can be no doubt that it was, under God, the means of producing a most saving and permanent change on the whole frame and disposition of Major Gardiner's mind, and though he had lived for many years utterly regardless of his immortal soul, and in the practice of the grossest immoralities, he was, from this time forth, enabled to see the evil of his ways, and to take up his cross and follow the Saviour. For three months succeeding the event in question, he experienced little of the joy arising from a sense of pardon, but was, on the contrary, oppressed with the conviction that he would, in all probability, quickly perish. He was not, however, entirely given over to despair, but was enabled at a throne of grace, to cry earnestly and frequently for forgiveness and reconciliation. He freely told his most intimate companions of the change which he had made on his course of life, and embraced every opportunity of opposing the principles of infidelity and practices of vice; and in this line of conduct he was enabled steadfastly to persevere, even to the end of his life, in spite of all the raillery to which he was exposed, and which at first was extremely distressing to him. These feelings, however, he was soon enabled entirely to overcome, and the ridicule and opposition which he at first encountered, by and by gave place to respect and admiration. His mind also soon reached a more comfortable state; the darkness that enveloped his spirit was dispelled by the cheering beams of the Sun of Righteousness, and his soul was filled with the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

On one occasion, about a year after his conversion, when on a visit to a person of distinguished rank, a number of his former companions, were, at his own request, invited to meet him, in order that he might have an opportunity of acquainting them with the nature and cause of the change that had taken place upon him. Accordingly, when the cloth was removed, and the servants had retired, he shortly explained to them the views which he entertained of religion, and challenged them to propose any thing they could advance to prove that a life of irreligion and debauchery was preferable to the fear, love, and worship of the eternal God, and a conduct agreeable to the precepts of his Gospel; he failed not also to assure them that, after having run the widest course of sensual pleasure, with all the advantages the best constitution and spirits could give him, he had never tasted any thing that deserved to be called happiness, till he had made religion his refuge and delight. These well judged explanations, if they did not convince those present, at all events, raised him in their estimation, and instead of losing any one valuable friend by this change in his character, he was only the more regarded by those who could not persuade themselves to imitate his example. When the discussion was finished, the master of the table ended the matter with this remark, “Come let us call another cause; we thought this man mad, and he is in good earnest proving that we are so.”

Major Gardiner had, sometime after his conversion, commenced a practice, which he continued almost uninterruptedly to the end of his life, of rising regularly at four o'clock every morning, and devoting two hours to the exercises of reading, meditation and prayer; and when at any time the duties of his profession required that he should be out before six in the morning, he rose so much the earlier, so that if a march or a journey required him to be on horseback by four, he would be at his devotions at farthest by two. He also took care to secure time for retirement in the evening, and was thereby greatly comforted and strengthened for the trials and duties to which he was called.

In the year 1724, having, for some time previously, in consequence of a reduction in the regiment, been out of a commission, he again entered the army, as major in Croft's regiment of Dragoons, and shortly afterwards was promoted to an older regiment, commanded by the Earl of Stair. About two years afterwards he was married to the Right Honourable Lady Frances Erskine, daughter of the Earl of Buchan. As may be supposed, he was from this time most regular in his observance of family worship, a duty which he never suffered to be omitted, on account of any guests who happened to be present. He was also most exemplary in his attendance on public worship, and took especial care that all under his charge should accompany the heads of the family to the house of God.

A few years after his marriage, he was advanced to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, in the same regiment of Dragoons in which he had served since 1724, and for many years subsequently the duties of his profession called him to different quarters, both at home and abroad, and

It is believed that he was present at almost every battle that was fought in Flanders, while the illustrious Duke of Marlborough commanded the allied army there.

Colonel Gardiner was greatly beloved by the soldiers under his command, and though he was careful at all times to maintain regular discipline among them, he made himself, on all proper occasions, accessible to them, expressing a concern for their interests, distributing any preferments in his power according to merit, and regularly visiting any of them, when prevented by sickness from attending to duty. While he did not allow his own religious exercises to interfere with the parade, or any other duty to which the welfare of the regiment called him, he was, at the same time, careful not to suffer these things to interfere with religion, and endeavoured, instead of having his men employed about their horses and their arms during the hours of divine worship, to have them drawn up just before it began, and himself at their head, to march from the parade to the house of God.

During his residence in Flanders he had a great deal of duty to perform, and in some marches had the care of more regiments than his own. Amid all the fatigues and labours, however, to which he was exposed, he was enabled to maintain a close and humble walk with God, and to submit, with unswerving confidence, to all the dispensations of his providence. About the year 1742, an illness which, from his disinclination to leave his post, he had for some time neglected, gradually increased upon him, and at length ended in a severe and alarming attack of fever, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered; but in looking forward to eternity both now and subsequently, he felt no painful alarm,—death was disarmed of its sting, and his confidence and trust in his great Redeemer, remained altogether unshaken. "Let me die," says he, "when it shall please God, or wherever I shall be, I am sure I shall go to the mansions of eternal glory, and enjoy my God and my Redeemer in heaven for ever."

Having shortly before his illness, received promotion to the command of General Bland's regiment of Dragoons, which happened to be quartered at that time in the neighbourhood of his own residence, near Prestonpans, he set out for Scotland as soon as his returning strength permitted. He passed through London about the middle of June 1743, where he had the honour of receiving from the Prince and Princess of Wales the most flattering tokens of their favour and esteem, and then set out for Bankton, where he chiefly resided till the memorable period of his death in 1745. It is believed, that since he had a family he had never previously been so much at home, or from his childhood ever resided so long a period in any one place. Most of his time here, when not occupied with the duties of his profession, was spent in retirement and in delightful converse with his God and Saviour.

In July 1745, his health still continuing very delicate, he was persuaded to take a journey to Scarborough, intending afterwards to proceed to London, and also to pay a visit to his intimate friend Dr Doddridge, at Northampton. The rebellion, however, which broke out at this time, quickly recalled him to active duty. His regiment was ordered to Stirling; and in the castle there, his lady and eldest daughter enjoyed the last happy hours of his company, some eight or ten days before his death.

Notwithstanding the feebleness of a broken constitution, Colonel Gardiner still maintained the same spirit and heroic bravery by which he was previously distinguished. He had indeed often expressed a wish, that if it were the will of God he might have some honourable call to sacrifice his life in defence of religion and the liberties of his country; and now, when the seeming hour of danger approached, he met the summons with the greatest readiness. The soldiers under his command appeared also for a while to have imbibed the spirit of their leader, and in their march from Stirling could scarcely be prevented from making incursions on the army of the Pretender, which by that time very near them. Colonel Gardiner, however, as is well known, received orders to march as fast as possible, to strengthen and support Sir John Cope's forces at Dunbar. This hasty retreat, combined with the surrender of Edinburgh to the rebels, struck a panic into both regiments of dragoons, very prejudicial to the success of their subsequent operations, and particularly distressing to Colonel Gardiner. He seems, indeed, at this time, to have anticipated the event which afterwards took place, and to have formed the resolution that he would not, in the case of the flight of those under his command, retreat with them. To a person from Edinburgh, who visited him the day before the action at Prestonpans, he used words to this effect: "I cannot influence the conduct of others as I could wish, but I have one life to sacrifice to my country's safety, and I shall not spare it."

The following particulars regarding the latter hours of this brave and good man, are thus narrated by Dr Doddridge, who received them chiefly from John Foster, the Colonel's faithful servant: "On Friday, September 20, 1745, (the day before the battle which transmitted him to his immortal crown,) when the whole army was drawn up, I think, about noon, the Colonel rode through all the ranks of his own regiment, addressing them at once in the most respectful and animating manner, both as soldiers and as Christians, to encourage and engage them to exert themselves courageously in the service of their country, and to neglect nothing that might have a tendency to prepare them for whatever event might happen. They seemed much affected with the address, and expressed a very ardent desire of attacking the enemy immediately—a desire in which he and a very gallant officer of distinguished rank, dignity, and character, both for bravery and conduct, would gladly have gratified them, if it had been in the power of either. He earnestly pressed it on the commanding officer, both as the soldiers were then in better spirits than it could be supposed they would be after passing the night under arms, and also as the circumstance of making an attack would be some encouragement to them, and most probably some terror to the enemy, who would have had the disadvantage of standing on the defensive—a disadvantage with which they would have been more struck than better disciplined troops, especially when they fought against the laws of their country too. He also apprehended, that, by marching to meet them, some advantage might have been secured with regard to the ground, with which it is natural to imagine he must have been perfectly acquainted, as it lay just at his own door, and as he had rode over it so many hundred times. When I mention these things, I do not pretend to be capable of judging how far this advice was on the whole right. A variety of circumstances, to me unknown, might have made it otherwise. It is certain, however, that it was brave. But it was over-ruled, in this respect, as it also was in the disposition of the cannon, which he would have had planted in the centre of our small army, rather than immediately before his regiment, which was in the right wing, where he was apprehensive that the horses, which had not been in any engagement before, might be thrown into some disorder by the discharge so very near them. He urged this the more, as he thought the attack of the rebels might probably be made on the centre of the foot, where he knew there were some brave men, on whose standing he thought, under God, the success of the day depended. When he found that he could not carry either of these points, nor some others, which, out of regard to the common safety, he insisted upon with unusual earnestness, he dropped some intimations of the consequences which he apprehended, and which did in fact follow; and submitting to Providence, spent the remainder of the day in making as good a disposition as circumstances would allow.

“He continued all night under arms, wrapped up in his cloak, and generally sheltered under a rick of barley which happened to be in the field. About three in the morning, he called his domestic servants to him, of whom there were four in waiting. He dismissed three of them, with most affectionate Christian advice, and such solemn charges relating to the performance of their duty, and the care of their souls, as seemed plainly to intimate that he apprehended it at least as very probable he was taking his last farewell of them. There is great reason to believe that he spent the little remainder of the time, which could not be much above an hour, in those devout exercises of soul, which had so long been habitual to him, and to which so many circumstances did then concur to call him. The army was alarmed by break of day, by the noise of the rebels' approach, and the attack was made before sunrise, yet when it was light enough to discern what passed. As soon as the enemy came within gun-shot, they made a furious fire; and it is said that the dragoons, which constituted the left wing, immediately fled. The Colonel, at the beginning of the onset, which in the whole lasted but a few minutes, received a wound by a bullet in his left breast, which made him give a sudden spring in his saddle; upon which his servant, who led the horse, would have persuaded him to retreat; but he said, it was only a wound in the flesh, and fought on, though he presently after received a shot in his right thigh. In the meantime it was discerned, that some of the enemy fell by him, and particularly one man, who had made him a treacherous visit a few days before with great professions of zeal for the present establishment.

“Events of this kind pass in less time than the description of them can be written, or than it can be read. The Colonel was for a few moments supported by his men, and particularly by that worthy person Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney, who was shot through the arm here, and a few months after fell nobly in the battle of Falkirk, and by Lieutenant West, a man of distinguished bravery, as also by about fifteen dragoons, who stood by him to the last. But, after a faint fire, the regiment in general was seized with a panic; and, though their Colonel, and some other gallant officers, did what they could to rally them once or twice, they at last took a precipitate flight; and, just in the moment when Colonel Gardiner seemed to be making a pause to deliberate what duty required him to do in such a circumstance, an accident happened, which must, I think, in the judgment of every worthy and generous man, be allowed as a sufficient apology for exposing his life to so great hazard when his regiment had left him. He saw that a party of the foot, who were then bravely fighting near him, and whom he was ordered to support, had no officer to head them; upon which he said eagerly, in the hearing of the person from whom I had this account, ‘Those brave fellows will be cut to pieces for want of a commander,’ or words to that effect; which, while he was speaking, he rode up to them, and cried out aloud, ‘Fire on, my lads, and fear nothing!’ But just as the words were out of his mouth, a Highlander advanced towards him with a scythe fastened to a long pole, with which he gave him such a deep wound on his right arm, that his sword dropped out of his hand; at the same time, several others coming about him, while he was thus dreadfully entangled with that cruel weapon, he was dragged from off his horse. The moment he fell, another Highlander, who, if the king's evidence at Carlisle may be credited, (as I know not why it should not, though the unhappy creature died denying it,) was one M'Naught, who was executed about a year after, gave him a stroke, either with a broad-sword or a Lochaber-axe, (for my informant could not exactly distinguish,) on the hinder part of his head, which was the mortal blow. All that his faithful attendant saw further at this time was, that as his hat was fallen off, he took it in his left hand, and waved it as a signal to him to retreat; and added, what were the last words he ever heard him speak, ‘Take care of yourself;’ upon which the servant retired.”

This attendant, having fled to a mill distant about two miles from the place where the Colonel fell, changed his dress, and, disguised like a miller's servant, returned with a cart as soon as possible, being nearly two hours after the engagement. He found his master still breathing, but plundered of his watch, and other things of value, and even stripped of his upper garments and boots. On being taken up, he opened his eyes, but was unable to speak; and in this condition was conveyed to the Church of Tranent, from whence he was taken to the minister's house, where he continued breathing, and frequently groaning, till about eleven in the forenoon, when death put a final period to his sufferings, and permitted his emancipated spirit to return to God who gave it.

From the time Colonel Gardiner fell, it was no longer a battle, but a rout and a carnage; and many cruelties were inflicted by the rebels on the king's troops. The Colonel's house, which was in the immediate vicinity, and still exists, was also plundered of every thing valuable, and all his papers thrown into the greatest confusion, and for some time it was used as an hospital for the reception of the wounded.

His remains were interred on the Tuesday following, at the Parish Church of Tranent, and were attended to the grave by many persons of distinction, who, though the country was then in the hands of the enemy, were not afraid of paying this last mark of respect to the memory of so excellent and honourable a man.

In perusing these particulars of his life and death, our readers cannot but have been impressed with the sovereignty of the grace of Almighty God, in thus converting into a monument of his goodness one who, in his younger days, had unhappily been so fearfully and so totally estranged from him. May his example, while it should prevent any in similar circumstances from utterly giving way to despair, stimulate them also to flee, like him, to the refuge set before sinners in the Gospel, where, and where alone, they can expect to find rest or peace unto their souls! If those having authority over others did but exhibit as much humility and consistency of character as was exemplified in the latter days of the life of this distinguished Christian hero, it is impossible to estimate the blessed effects which might thereby result, not only to themselves, but to all under their command. For, “to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace.”

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL IN INDIA.

[In presenting to our readers the following letter from the Rev. Dr Wilson of Bombay to the Convener of the General Assembly's Committee, dated 27th May 1837, we cannot refrain from expressing our heartfelt gratitude to Almighty God for the evident tokens of his approbation with which the labours of the Assembly's Missionaries, both at Bombay and Calcutta, have been recently blessed. They have all of them proved themselves hitherto, without exception, to be “workmen that need not to be ashamed;” and strengthened and encouraged, as they will no doubt be, by the valuable addition which has been made to their number in the appointment of Mr Macdonald, the Christian public may rest assured, that their confidence in this little band of Apostolic Missionaries is far from being misplaced. It is impossible, in fact, to look back upon the labours of these men since the commencement of the Mission, without entertaining the most sanguine expectation, that he who hath blessed them in the days that are past, will bless them still. The interesting events which Dr Wilson mentions, are such as may well awaken lively interest in every Christian mind. They are thus stated in his own words :]

You will be happy to learn that on Sabbath the 14th of this month, I had the privilege to baptize two native adults, and one native child, before a very large and deeply impressed congregation of their countrymen and Europeans. Of the adults, one is a young man of respectable character and information. About eight months ago he became convinced of the utter falsity of the faith of his fathers, and the truth of Christianity, by the perusal of my Exposure of Hinduism, and a portion of the Sacred Scriptures, both of which, it is remarkable, he received in loan from a Gosávi,* and since that time, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his friends, one of whom seems now inclined to imitate his example, he has been most regular in his attendance upon me for instruction, and made gratifying advances in knowledge and feeling. He has been admitted as a scholar into the General Assembly's Institution, with a view to his preparation for future usefulness among his countrymen.† The other individual is a promising young woman, educated in the Ladies' School for Destitute and Poor Native Girls, and who formerly received much attention from its lamented founder,‡ and is well acquainted with the principles of Christianity, and whose conduct, it is hoped, is habitually under their influence.

On the occasion referred to, I preached in Maráthi, on the conversion and baptism of the Philippian Jailor. At the conclusion of the services, the son of one of the former converts was admitted into the Church as a communicant; and nine natives publicly renounced idolatry, and were acknowledged as catechumens. Four of them have been educated in, or are at present in attendance on, the vernacular schools of the mission. The others are indebted to the simple preaching of the Gospel—which is divinely adapted to men of every degree of capacity and attainment—for their knowledge and convictions. You may easily imagine what my emotions were, when they rose, one after another, and in the midst of friends and foes, declared themselves to be on the Lord's side; and you will understand how "I rejoice with trembling" when I now intimate their decision. The prayers of yourself, and of the other supporters of our cause, are most anxiously requested on their behalf, that they may be enlightened and purified by the Holy Spirit, and in due time admitted to the enjoyment of the privileges which they seek to obtain.

Since my visit to Gos, four young respectable natives of that settlement have been admitted into our institution; and a Brahman convert to Roman Catholicism, the first whom I have seen in India, has just come to me from thence, professing to renounce the errors of the second paganism in which he has found himself unhappily involved.

in the way of discharging that important duty. Both parties are known to one another—the people whom the pastor calls upon from house to house, are those to whom he preaches the Gospel on the Sabbath-day, so that he has only to repeat and enforce the solemn truths formerly addressed to them, whilst they will be prepared to hearken to one so well known, and to profit by his earnest and affectionate exhortations. It is, however, one of the many great evils, arising from the long neglect of the religious interests of our large towns, that although they are also divided into parishes, the parochial system there is not yet attended with the same advantages which it is capable of producing in the country. The people in towns frequent the different churches, without much regard to the parochial distinction, so that comparatively few attend their own parish church, by which means it comes to pass that when a minister is anxious to visit not only his congregation, but the inhabitants of his parish, he labours under many difficulties. The parties are not so well acquainted with each other,—he is not the man whom they ordinarily hear on the Lord's day, and on this and other accounts, the visit will be attended with far less benefit. Such are the circumstances in which I feel myself to be placed at present. In addition to a congregation, a parish containing several thousand souls is intrusted to my superintendance. Its religious and educational interests have been, in some measure, though still very imperfectly, attended to; and it has also been visited by the missionaries, elders, and myself, but amidst all the disadvantages which have already been stated as inseparable from the present state of the parochial system in large towns. But being resolved again to call on you all, and yet feeling the uselessness of a visit so transient and repeated only, as it must necessarily be, at distant intervals, it has occurred to me that a brief exhortation in this form, such as I could leave behind me, would be the best way of meeting these difficulties, and, through the divine blessing, might be attended with good effects.

Such are my reasons for making this address, and yet I cannot but feel that these will be insufficient for securing it a cordial welcome. A paper of a religious character is regarded with indifference or with aversion, when one treating of the most frivolous or even improper subjects will be eagerly received and read. Allow not, my dear friends, this feeling to exist. Say to yourselves that it is folly, nay, unspeakable madness, to indulge it. Let each of you remember that, whether you regard it or not, you have an immortal soul, and will appear in judgment before God, and will live in woe or in happiness for ever; and that it is your first duty to attend to the things that belong to your eternal peace, before they are for ever hidden from your eyes. Put away, then, the reluctance you may feel to enter upon the perusal of this address, and lift up your hearts to God in earnest prayer, that he would enable you to go through it with seriousness, and understanding, and self-application, and that he would bless it for the promotion of your spiritual good. And now, perhaps, you will begin to read it, but may not go far before you find yourselves opposed to the statements it contains. You may say, "the subject is most important indeed, but we do not like this view of it,—it is the same that ministers are always holding out,—sin, Christ, faith, and other doctrines, of which we have enough already." Here, again, let me implore you to consider that religion is not only the most important of all subjects, but that God himself has given us a revelation concerning it, and that all he has declared will most certainly be found to be true. Consider, now, that what we are about to say is not our own opinion of religion, which you may despise, but that it is the truth of the living God, which you are bound to receive, as you will answer to him on that great day when you, and I, and all men, will appear before his judgment-seat. Let me exhort you, then, to proceed, with these views, to consider the following propositions, which are not only drawn from the Bible, but expressed in its very words, so that there is no room for a moment's hesitation or doubt, and may the Holy Spirit open your hearts to understand and receive them. Beginning with the truths which declare what your real character and condition are in the sight of God, we say, in the words of Scripture,

I. That "the sin is the transgression of the law, and that the soul that sinneth shall die."—1 John iii. 4; Ezek. xviii. 4; Rom. vi. 23.

This you may be enabled to understand, by considering that laws are made for the government of a country, which the people are required to obey, under a penalty of imprisonment, banishment, or death, for the violation of them. Now, the whole world belongs to God. He is the King of kings, and the Lord of lords. To his government all mankind are subject, and he has given them a law, which is, that they should "love the Lord their God, with all their heart, and soul, and strength, and mind, and their neighbour as themselves."—Matt. xxii. 37–40. This "law is holy, just, and good."—Rom. vii. 12. He commands you to give it a perfect obedience, in thought, word, and deed, and declares that the slightest transgression exposes you to the penalty; for cursed is he that continueth not in all things to obey it. Gal. iii. 10. Cursed! it is an awful word, but one which God has employed, and calls on you to ponder, as meaning the heaviest judgment which he could inflict or man could endure; even eternal separation from his own glorious presence, and a subjection to spiritual, temporal, and eternal death. Such is the nature of sin in the sight of an infinitely holy and just God, and such the sure portion of him who is, in any degree, guilty of committing it. Here say not, even in thought, that this statement, however appalling, does not concern you, for God, in his Word, declares, II. "That all have sinned," Rom. iii. 23; Eccl. vii. 20; 1 John i. 8, "and that death hath therefore passed upon all men."—Rom. v. 12, vi. 23; Gen. ii. 17.

The meaning is, that all men, and you among the number, all of you, without exception, young and old, male and female, rich and poor, have sinned,—have turned away from God,—been living in opposition to him, and been chargeable with innumerable transgressions of his law. And, oh! think what it is to break the law of God, to rise up in rebellion against the Ruler of heaven and of earth, and continually, and in every form, to be guilty of sin, which he who could destroy you in a moment regards with infinite abhorrence. Your own consciences must thus tell you that you deserve his displeasure; but in addition to this, you have already seen how his Word declares that you have actually incurred it. You have seen that the sin of which he now convicts you is the transgression of a law which brings down death on him who violates it, so that you are already under this awful condemnation. Yes, you are even now under this sentence. God has begun to execute it against you. You are, at this moment, poor, miserable, and dying creatures. And why? Just because you are condemned. The dreadful day, however, remains to be revealed, and is certainly approaching, when the sentence will be carried into full execution against you; "For," in the words of an apostle, "we know Him that hath said, vengeance belongeth unto me. I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord will judge his people. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." Heb. x. 30, 31. Fearful, indeed! May the Lord make you all feel that it is so, and prepare you to receive the glad tidings of the Gospel, for,

III. "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." 1 Tim. i. 15; John iii. 16; Rom. v. 7, 8; 1 Peter iii. 18.

God the Father and God the Son entered into a covenant for the salvation of a people. Is. xlii. 5, 6, 7; John vi. 38, 39; John xvii. 1, 2, 3, 23. This was made known in various ways after the fall of man, and throughout succeeding ages, until the time when the Eternal Son, who was with God, and was God, veiled his glory, and became both God and man, that he might give a perfect obedience to the divine law, in the room of the elect, and make atonement for their sins by his own sufferings and death. Is. liii.; Rom. iii. 24, 25. God now declares, that the law which they had broken has been honoured by the obedience and propitiation of the blessed Redeemer; and that, upon account of his meritorious work, he is willing to forgive all your sins, and to bestow upon you a surer and more blessed portion than Paradise itself. Matt. i. 21; John i. 29; iii. 14, 15, 16, 17; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, &c. A glorious change, you feel disposed to say, and truly no language can express the gratitude and joy which should fill the soul on the announcement of those glad tidings; but let each of you pause, and ask himself this solemn question, Shall I be pardoned and made happy, in consequence of this wonderful redemption? Hear the answer, as proclaimed by the Lord Jesus himself—

IV. "He that believeth in the Son hath everlasting life." John iii. 36. See the reply to the question of the awakened jailer of Philippi, Acts xvi. 30, 31, &c.

What is meant by this declaration, you will understand on referring to the instance already given, of our obligation to obey human laws. Suppose a person to have transgressed these laws, and to have become liable to punishment, and a powerful friend to have interfered on his behalf, and succeeded, so that the king declares himself ready to pardon the criminal, and restore him to his former condition, and sends a messenger with this gracious announcement, who comes to him, lying in his dungeon, and tells him of the kindness and success of his friend, and how he is commissioned to offer him a free pardon, to open his prison doors, and restore him to light, and liberty, and happiness. Suppose the man to hearken with mingled eagerness and astonishment to all this, then to reflect with sorrow upon his past offences, to receive with gratitude this unexpected favour, and to be determined to show his sense of it in the loyalty and devotedness of his future life, and under these impressions to go forth. Behold that man put in possession of the pardon, released from bondage, restored to the bosom of his family, and living as a dutiful and obedient subject. Thus, saith an apostle, "God is in Christ Jesus reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses to men. And hath committed to us," (speaking of ministers,) "the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as if God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." 2 Cor. v. 19, 20, 21. In this way we, your ministers, come to you as messengers from God of the glad tidings of the Gospel, and he who believes on the Son of God acts like the person before described. He truly feels how sinful and guilty he has been before God, and how justly he is exposed to eternal death. He sees the infinite mercy of God the Father in sparing not his only begotten Son. He sees the infinite compassion of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for him, and of what a complete salvation he has been the author. He accepts that salvation. He puts on, by faith, Christ's righteousness, as the only way to be righteous before God, and being pardoned and accepted, he is moved by love to Him for such a display of mercy, and devotes himself entirely to his service. He feels what the apostle means by saying, that "if any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature: old things pass away; behold all things are become new." 2 Cor. v. 17. The Scriptures, he may before have, in a great measure, neglected, or perused with little heartfelt interest, but now they are "better to him than thousands of gold and silver." Ps. cxix. 72. Prayer he may either have omitted or formally discharged, but now he engages in it with earnestness, and faith, and frequency. See Paul, Acts ix. 11, &c.

The public or private ordinances of religion he also regards with different feelings, and can say, with something of the Psalmist's spirit, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts. My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of our God." Ps. lxxxiv. 1. The person is short, who believeth on the Son, has new views, principles, and desires. He is born again, John iii. 7, as the Saviour says. He loves God, the Word, his ordinances, his throne of grace, as people, and seeks in all things to advance his glory. He hates sin as the cause of Christ being brought to the cross, and the commission of which would, as it were, crucify him afresh. In all the relations of life, he acts as if beholding Christ, and will be found a faithful husband, an affectionate parent, a dutiful son, upright, sober, industrious, desirous to do good to all men as he has the means and opportunity, to relieve their temporal wants, to promote their spiritual interests, and to make the will of God be done on earth as it is in heaven. He grows in grace, in meekness, in holiness; and at death, he goes to mingle with those blessed spirits whose song throughout eternity is, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, unto him be glory for ever and ever." Rev. i. 6. Thus, he that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but the same gracious Being who uttered these words, immediately adds the following:—

V. "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii. 36; viii. 24; Mark xvi. 16; 1 John v. 12; Rev. xxi. 8.

The conduct of such a man may be shown by adducing the former illustration of the person who had been sentenced to death for his violation of the laws of his country, to whom a messenger with free pardon was sent, and by whom it was received with feelings of deep sorrow for his past offences, of heartfelt gratitude for the undeserved favour, and of sincere desire to serve faithfully his sovereign. Suppose that, instead of this, he had said, "I am not conscious of my crime—I have been unjustly convicted and condemned—I will not receive your pardon—I will remain in my cell with my chains upon me, with my bread and water, until the day arrives for my public execution." What astonishing, inconceivable delusion you say; and yet such is the man who believes not the Son of God. For you have seen how a believer feels and acts. He discovers his guilt and danger as a transgressor of the law of God. He discovers Christ as an all-sufficient and willing Saviour, and gratefully receives the forgiveness which he freely offers, and dedicates himself to his service. Now, not to believe on the Son is just the reverse of all this. It is, as if the man were not to feel that he was in such a state of sin and misery as had been represented—as if he thought he had no need of such a deliverer—as if he refused to receive pardon or any other kind-ing at his hands, and as if, not in words yet in heart, he said, with the Jews of old, "I will not have Jesus Christ to reign over me." Luke xix. 14. This is not believing on the Son of God, from which you may learn, that unbelief is not, as some allege, a mere opinion, which they may entertain or not without being accountable. You will now see, that not to believe on the Son of God is as if a man said he was determined not to repent of his sins, nor to take God's pardon, nor submit to his authority, but would remain a transgressor and a rebel to the last. It also shows, how justly it is declared that such men "shall not see life," but be doomed to everlasting death on the day of judgment. They had before merited it by their innumerable sins, and now they reject a forgiveness purchased with the blood of the Eternal Son of God! Therefore, their sins will never be pardoned—their souls will not be made holy, nor meet for heaven—they will never in time, nor in eternity, know what true happiness is. On the contrary, "the wrath of God," it is said, "abideth on them," words expressive of all conceivable misery; for what else but unchangeable, everlasting, unmitigated misery, can be the portion of that man who lives and dies under the wrath of God. And yet, astounding as is the infatuation, and dreadful as is the condition of those who believe not the Son of God, such is the state in which all of you, if left to yourselves, will be found to be: for,

VI. "Light has come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light." John iii. 19; i. 5; v. 40; xvi. 9; Acts xiii. 41; Eph. ii. 1.

Surprised as you might be at the man who, when doomed to death, refused pardon, and was at length brought out to receive his punishment, yet in these words Christ declares all men are acting in the very same manner. When the light of heaven comes down to them, when God, in Christ Jesus, offers to forgive, to pardon, and to bless them, they shun this light, they refuse these blessings, they prefer abiding in the darkness and degradation of their own natural state, and make choice of death rather than life. "They hated knowledge," saith God, "and did not choose the fear of the Lord. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own ways, and be filled with their own devices." Prov. i. 29, 30. How many, in our own country, and in our own city, are walking in the way described in this awful passage! How many, also, although constantly warned of their sin and danger, and earnestly entreated to believe and to repent, do, nevertheless, care for none of these things, and live on in impenitence, defying God! The last day will be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon than for them. Matt. xi. 21-23.

But if men do thus reject the grace that hath appeared bringing salvation, how, it may be asked, shall any be saved? We answer, that the covenant of God with his Eternal Son stands sure, and will be accomplished, notwithstanding that men, left to themselves, do thus reject its gracious provisions, for the Lord Jesus Christ hath said, that although "they will not come to him that they may have life," (John v. 40,) yet,

VII. "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." John vi. 37-39; Isaiah liii. 10-12.

Hereby signifying that all those whom God will give to the Redeemer, in the covenant of grace, shall be enabled to see in what a state they are, and to believe in the Son of God as the Saviour. The Holy Spirit—the third person in the glorious Godhead—performs this great work of making men partakers of the redemption purchased by Christ. In the words of that admirable Catechism, with which you should all be familiar, "He convinces them of sin and misery, enlightens their minds in the knowledge of Christ, renews their wills, and thus persuades and enables them to embrace Jesus Christ freely offered to them in the Gospel." And believing on the Son of God, they are pardoned, sanctified, and saved. Thus the Jews were led to Christ on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. ;) thus the Apostle Paul was brought to him, (Acts ix. Gal. i. ;) and in this way also the jailer at Philippi, (Acts xvi. 30.) Nor is the necessity for this great change by the Holy Spirit confined to any age. All of you must be convinced, enlightened, and converted by grace, as these persons were, though not in all respects in the same manner, "for except a man be born again," says the Saviour, "he cannot see the kingdom of God." John iii. 3. And this great truth ministers, parents, and teachers, should constantly enforce, leading every one for himself to consider that he must be born again, as a pious minister of the seventeenth century did. One Sabbath evening after having received an answer to the question "What is effectual calling?" and having explained it, he proposed that the question should be answered by changing the words us and our into me and my. Upon this proposal a solemn silence followed; many felt its vast importance, but none had courage to answer. At length a young man rose up, and, with every mark of a broken and contrite heart, by divine grace was enabled to say, "Effectual calling was the work of God's Spirit, whereby convincing me of my sin and misery, enlightening my mind in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing my will, he did persuade and enable me to embrace Jesus Christ freely offered to me in the Gospel." The scene is described as having been truly affecting, and would to God that he would raise up more in our churches, families, and schools, who could, from the heart, give a similar declaration!

In conclusion, God himself hath now declared to you that sin is the transgression of his law, and that eternal death is the portion of him who is guilty of it. He declares that you have all sinned, and are exposed to this awful condemnation; that his Eternal Son has become a Saviour by his perfect obedience and atoning death, and that he offers through him the remission of sins and restoration to his favour; that he who believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and that he who believeth not shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him; that, nevertheless, no man of himself, sees his need of Christ, and that all men reject his proffered mercy; that in fulfilment of God's eternal purpose to save a people by Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit awakens them to a sense of their danger, and leads them to believe on the Son, "in whom they have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." Col. i. 14. And now your own consciences must suggest how important it is that you should ascertain whether you have been brought into this state, and how necessary, according to the exhortation of the apostle, that you

VIII. "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith, and prove your own selves." 2 Cor. xiii. 5.

What duty, indeed, so momentous, and requiring such immediate and solemn regard as this of self-examination? Standing, as you are, on the brink of an awful eternity, not knowing but that this very night you may be summoned into it, and remembering the words of Christ, that "he who believeth shall be saved, and he who believeth not shall be condemned," (Mark xvi. 16,) how earnestly should you inquire whether you have been enabled to believe in Christ or not, and are now in a saving union to him!

Let me, therefore, implore you to make the inquiry, and to ask yourselves such questions as the following, which the previous statements will suggest:—Have you been awakened to a sense of your guilty and ruined condition? Have you seen your own utter helplessness, and that without a Saviour you will sink and perish, and have you beheld "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world?" John i. 20. Have you come to the fountain of his blood that you might be washed and sanctified, and have you experienced that change of heart, and do you manifest that purity, consistency, and growing holiness of life which are the sure attendants upon saving faith? Not only examine, but prove yourselves, says the apostle. Let it be a deliberate, serious, earnest, searching inquiry, with the Word of God in your hands, and with such a prayer as the Psalmist's, "Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." Ps. cxxxix. 23. And if, as there is too much reason to fear, there are many, many of you who have never been brought to Christ, let me beseech all such to consider the condition in which they are, and that if they die in it, they will die under the terrible burden of innumerable, unpardoned transgressions, and exposed to all the consequences of God's unremoved wrath. Be thankful that you have not been cut down in such a state, that "God is still long-suffering towards you, not willing that you should perish, but be brought to repentance," (2 Peter iii. 9,) and that Christ is now exalted a Prince and a Saviour to grant you this repentance and remission of sins. Acts v. 31. Nay, Christ is nearer to you than heaven. "Behold," he says, "I stand at the door and knock, and if any man open to me, I will come into him and sup with him and he with me." Rev. iii. 20. He is now knocking at the door of your heart, and seeking to come in, that he may abide in you, and be your Redeemer and your portion forever. Will you refuse entrance to the Son of God,—the compassionate Saviour! Oh! that the Holy Spirit would open your hearts, so that Christ, the King of Glory, may enter in and dwell there, the pledge and the beginning of a blessed and everlasting communion!

"I call heaven and earth to record, this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore, choose life that both thou and thy seed may live." Deut. xxx. 19. Such were the words of Moses to the children of Israel, delivered a little before his death, in an address, wherein, with great earnestness and affection, he had warned them of their duty to God and their own souls. In now hearing a similar testimony among you, I would earnestly implore you not to cast it carelessly away, but consider it as coming from one who has no other object in view by it than your eternal good, and anxiously desirous by this means to advance you. Read it again and again. Study the passages of Scripture quoted or referred to. Consider them together and meditate upon it. Be sure that you pray God to bless it. The subject is worthy of all this concern, and you cannot neglect it with safety. For, though you and I may never meet again in this world, we will both stand before God in judgment, and, in that solemn prospect, I call heaven and earth to record, this day, against you, that I have set before you life and death. O that you were wise, that you understood this, that you would consider your latter end!" Deut. xxxii. 29. So prays your affectionate pastor.

THE AIR OF THE ATMOSPHERE, AS CONNECTED WITH RESPIRATION.

If we suppose the atmosphere deprived of heat, and light, and moisture, and of all those other heterogeneous particles which are either naturally or accidentally contained in it; there still remains the medium which is the receptacle or vehicle of those various substances, and this medium is indeed that which, in common apprehension, is understood to be the atmosphere itself.

Of the vital importance of atmospheric air, no formal proof can be required; for every one capable of the least reflection must know, that its presence is almost constantly necessary to the existence of man, from the moment of his birth to that of his death. Of all other external aids, we may be deprived for a comparatively long time without danger, or even without inconvenience; of light and heat for instance, and of food and sleep; but we cannot be deprived of the air which we breathe even for a very few minutes, without dreadful distress; or, if for more than a very few minutes, without the extinction of life.

This vital importance of the air depends, probably, on its capability of assisting to withdraw from the body, chiefly through the agency of the lungs, portions of that peculiar principle called carbon; the permanent retention of which would be incompatible with the continuance of life. And the union of this principle with one of the constituent parts of atmospherical air is probably effected in the lungs during the process of respiration; the compound passing off in the act of expiration, in the state of an aeriform fluid, called carbonic acid gas.

But, in order to give a clear idea of the nature of the process of respiration, it will be necessary to explain more particularly, not only the constitution of that portion of the atmosphere which supports this process, but some of its chemical relations to other substances. Atmospherical air, then, considering it in its adaptation to the process of respiration, consists of a mixture or combination of two aeriform fluids, which are very different from each other in character, but intimately blended together in the proportion of four to one. Of these two fluids that which is in the smaller proportion is not only capable of supporting life, when respired or breathed alone, but is capable of supporting it for a much longer period than an equal volume of atmospherical air would have supported it; and if, instead of being employed for the process of respiration, it be made the medium of supporting combustion, the consequent phenomena are still more remarkable; for the combustible body not only burns for a longer time than it would have done in the same quantity of atmospherical air, but it burns with an intensity much more vivid; the light of the flame being in many instances too powerful to be easily borne by the eye. On the other hand, that constituent part of atmospherical air, which is in the greater proportion, not only will not support either life or flame, even for a short time, but extinguishes both almost in an instant.

By numerous experiments, which it is at present unnecessary to describe, it has been ascertained, that many of the metals are capable of attracting and combining with this respirable part of the air; during which process the metallic body assumes an earthy character, and becomes increased in weight; while the weight of the air, in which the experiment has been conducted, becomes diminished exactly to the amount in which that of the metal has been increased: and, at the same time, the residuary portion of the air which has been employed in the experiment, equals only about four-fifths of the original volume; and is now incapable of supporting either life or flame. But, by processes well known to chemists, the metallic substance may be made to yield a quantity of air equaling that which has been lost during the experiment, the metal at the same time returning to its original state and weight; while the air, thus separated, if added to the residual portion, not only restores the volume and weight of the original quantity, but also its power of supporting life and flame.

If, instead of a metal, certain inflammable substances be employed, similar changes are effected on the air; and the inflammable substance, together with an increase of weight and other alterations, acquires acid properties; and hence that respirable portion of the air has, from a Greek derivation, been called oxygen; as being the effective cause of the acidification of those inflammable bodies. It has moreover been ascertained that, during combustion, a piece of pure charcoal weighing twenty-eight grains combines with as much oxygen gas as would weigh seventy-two grains: and, as the volume of the gas employed remains the same at the end of the experiment that it was at the beginning, provided it be brought to the same degree of temperature and atmospherical pressure, it appears that the carbon is, as it were, held in solution by the gas; and as this chemical compound of carbon and oxygen possesses acid properties, it is called carbonic acid gas.

A volume of this gas, then, which weighs one hundred grains, consists of twenty-eight grains of carbon chemically combined with seventy-two grains of oxygen: and it has certain properties, by which, without the labour of actual analysis, it may be recognised from any other gas; among the more important of which, for our present purpose at least, is the readiness with which it communicates a wheyish appearance to lime-water, when made to pass through that liquid. Making use of this character as a test, any individual may easily satisfy himself that, during the process of respiration, a quantity of carbonic acid gas passes from his lungs; for if, after having inhaled a portion of atmospherical air uncontaminated with any mixture of it, he breathe slowly through a narrow tube, the further extremity of which is immersed beneath the surface of a portion of lime-water, he will observe that, as the bubbles of air rise through the lime-water, that liquid becomes opaque; and the opacity thus communicated to the water can be shown to be the result of a compound formed by the union of the carbonic acid, which has evidently been given out from the lungs, with the lime previously held in solution in the lime-water.

Let it now be kept in mind that a hundred cubic inches of carbonic acid gas, under ordinary circumstances, weigh a little more than forty-six grains, and that a quantity of the same gas weighing a hundred grains contains twenty-eight grains of carbon, and the following statement will be easily intelligible. It appears, from experiments which have been made for the purpose, that during the process of respiration in an individual of ordinary size and health, about twenty-seven cubic inches and a-half of carbonic acid gas are given off from the lungs in the course of one minute; which, at the end of twenty-four hours, would amount to 39,600 cubic inches, or in round numbers 40,000; and as 100 cubic inches weigh  $46\frac{1}{2}$  grains, 40,000 would weigh 18,532 grains. Then, since a quantity of carbonic acid gas, weighing 100 grains, contains twenty-eight grains of carbon, a quantity weighing 18,532 grains would contain 5190 grains, or nearly eleven ounces, at 480 grains to an ounce; so that a quantity of carbon equaling two-thirds of a pound in weight, is daily discharged from the blood by means of the simple process of respiration.

In an illustration of the general question of the adaptation of external nature to the physical condition of man, it is clearly immaterial whether, during the process of respiration, the carbonic acid is supposed to be produced by the union of the carbon of the animal system with the oxygen of the air respired; or whether, as is possible, the carbonic acid, having been previously formed in the body at large, is given off in the form of carbonic acid gas from the lungs, while the oxygen gas of the atmosphere is absorbed by those organs. The main point to be considered is, the fact of the removal of that quantity of carbon, which could not be retained with safety to the life of the individual; and when we consider that the entire quantity of the carbon, thus discharged, is collected from every the most interior and remote part of the body, how worthy of admiration is the economy of nature in producing the intended effect! The air is the medium through which the carbon is to be discharged; and yet the constitution of the body is such, that the air could scarcely be introduced into any of its internal parts without occasioning the most serious consequences, if not death itself; but by means of the circulation of the blood, that beautiful contrivance intended primarily for sustaining the nourishment, and warmth, and life of every part, the noxious principle is conveyed to the lungs, where it is of necessity brought, if not actually, yet virtually, into contact with the air; and thus it is effectually removed from the system.*

COMMUNION SERVICES.

BY THE REV. PATRICK BOOTH, A.M.,
Assistant Minister of Innerleithen.

No. 1.

BEFORE COMMUNION.

"THOU preparest a table before me," said the Psalmist, "in the presence of mine enemies." The wicked, even his enemies and his foes, had come upon him to eat up his flesh, but they had stumbled and fallen. A host had encamped against him, yet his heart had not feared. Though war had risen up against him, in the Lord had he had confidence. Many, indeed, there had been which had said of his soul, there is no help for him in God. Yet the Lord had been a shield for him,—his glory and the lifter up of his head. He had cried unto the Lord with his voice, and the Lord had heard him out of his holy hill. Therefore had he laid him down and slept; he awoke in safety, for the Lord sustained him; and now, with well-founded and unshaken confidence in the mighty hand and out-stretched arm which had proved his unfailing stay and his defence, and which he knew would prove the source of final and decisive victory, he sat down to the table which the Lord had prepared for him in the presence of his enemies, as calm and undismayed as if they had been far and for ever distant, and was not afraid of ten thousands of people that had set themselves against him round about.

And, my brethren, we too are surrounded with enemies, the world, the flesh, and the devil; we have experienced their attacks, nay, we have been the subjects of their pernicious and tyrannical dominion, and yielded a place to their slaughtering legions in the very citadel of our hearts. From that stronghold, I trust, they have been dislodged, and scattered before the breath of the Spirit of the Lord. Your presence here this day, if you have come with the mind and soul of Christians, is a pledge to that effect. But although I trust that the banner of the cross now floats on the towers which Satan once called his own; if his hosts are dispersed, think not that they are yet exterminated; if they are cast down, flatter not yourselves that they are destroyed; if they have been driven from more direct and open warfare, suppose not that their wiles are exhausted,—that in ambush they watch not for the perdition of your souls. You are observed by them at this moment; there is still craft in their stratagems, and venom in their darts. They murmur at the feast which has been set before you; they repine at the strength which you will thereby acquire for the renewed combat. But if ye are the true soldiers of Christ, his banner over you is love, and their most fiery darts will fall powerless on his protecting shield; for fierce as was their array,—high as were their hopes,—united as were their efforts,—and desperate their assault, yet impotent were all their struggles on that memorable night when this table was first spread,—when this bread of life was first broken,—and this cup of salvation first poured out. What they deemed the trophies of their final victory, proved the emblems of their irretrievable defeat. In the name of the Lord ye shall still destroy them; dread not, then, their presence, whilst you partake of the symbols of his redemption and his love.

AFTER COMMUNION.

"Surely the Lord is in this place; surely this is the gate of heaven;" but ye have not yet made good your entrance; the struggle is not ended; the victory is not complete. At this quiet, and tranquillizing, and encouraging feast, you are apt to forget that you are in an enemy's country, but you are still in the presence of your mortal foes. That they are unseen makes them just the more to be dreaded,—that they fight by stratagem just calls the more loudly for vigilance,—that their plan of attack is unknown, just demands the stronger a guard to be posted at every assailable point. Cease not from watchfulness until the warfare is ended; indulge not in security until the final victory is won. You have now but refreshed yourselves for a continuance of the conflict; go forth in the strength of the Lord, conquering and to conquer. This is not the career of your rest; expect it not until, with the sweet aid of the Spirit, you have driven the last antagonist from the battlements of the New Jerusalem. Manfully bow down under the privations of the campaign; endure hardships as good soldiers of Christ. Shrink not from your duty, or from the posts of danger; who would be absent from the point where glory is to be won? Who will not the earthly hero suffer in the cause of freedom and the career of conquest; shall the champions of the cross present a less resolute front in opposition to the tyranny of sin and of Satan, and to make Cassar and Eden his own? How questionable are the objects for which the weapons of this world are often called to do their work of destruction; but how pure and valuable is the triumph which the weapons that are not carnal achieve! We sicken at the details even of earthly victory, but the victory of redemption has rendered the honour without the least ground for one bitter reflection or a single sigh. All is glory and all is gain.

A melancholy uncertainty attends every earthly contest. The wisest plans are often disconcerted, and the most sagacious calculations disappointed. The most courageous perseverance must often yield to the measure of events; the most undaunted bravery frequently falls short of the object at which it aims. The most fearless designs are baffled, the most able combats are defeated, and the battle is not to the strong. Be it the Christian warfare there is no such doubt or uncertainty. The contest may seem protracted but the result is certain,—the struggle may be painful but the victory is secure. Where there is determination there is success, and the warrior on that battle-field has no reward. It is not, my fellow-soldiers in this great and glorious cause, that our enemies are few or powerless, or that our most vigorous and united efforts are equal to their defeat. But greater is He that is for us than all that are against us, and when we are weak he is strong. We go not a warfare at our own charge. Our sufficiency is of God. Trust not, then, to your own resources, nor go forth without the armour of defence and the weapons of attack with which he has provided you. Let your loins be girt about with truth, and your heart defended with the breast-plate of righteousness. Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; let the hope of salvation be your helmet. Above all, take the shield of faith, as a gird on the sword of the Spirit, and with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, commit yourselves to the Lord, and all-wise, and Almighty leader, who hath already shed his own blood as the price of that victory to which he calls you to advance. Implicitly trust to his sufficiency, obey his directions, and submit to his discipline.

And whilst the assured hope of a triumphant termination of your warfare stimulates you to heroic exertion, for the same holy purpose reflect on the consequences of defeat. When the earthly arena of man's strife is traversed,—there lie heaps of the dead and the dying; the roar of the battle is ended, or the thunders of the now distant conqueror, in pursuit of the retreating vanquished, are too faint to drown the agonized and expiring nature. The night is approaching at the sound the blood runs cold. But the enemy has done his worst; and the dead are in the land of the fulness, and the weary will soon be at rest. But when will the victim of Satan be relieved, when will his wounds be healed? Will death eternal end his sufferings, or the red flames of hell diffuse a joyous light o'er his dark eternal dungeon? "O! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people!" But the brave earthly conqueror, who escapes the dangers of the field, has a welcome awaiting him at home, and the thanks and rewards of his country. And the spiritual victor has a welcome in store for him in heaven,—his leader's celestial kingdom shall be his everlasting home,—a mansion in his Father's house shall be his eternal reward,—the companions of his warfare shall be the companions of his bliss,—the songs of angels shall celebrate his triumphs,—their hallelujahs shall greet his return,—from every stain of the conflict he shall be washed in the fountain of living waters,—and, as toils and troubles at an end for ever, his God shall wipe away all tears from his eyes. Go forth then, my brethren, to fight the good fight, and by the blessing of the Lord, may the glory and the victory in Christ be yours. Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christian Life.—What is misfortune? Whatever separates us from God. What a blessing? Every means of approximation to him. No right opinions, clearness of comprehension, or fulness of belief in religious matters, signify any thing to our establishment and conversion, unless they are from God. The crosses and mortifications we meet with from others, are a precious means of humbling, instructing, and improving us; we could be undone without them. If God gives internal comfort, it is not that we may live upon it, but to support and animate us to some farther end. Bearing with yourself in the want of spiritual strength, or absence of spiritual comfort, is neither more nor less than bearing with God, and the effect of no common grace. It is a hard thing for a real Christian, fearing and striving against all sin, to be patient with it in submission to the divine will; but what can we do if God is pleased to suffer it in us, as he does for wise purposes to humiliate us, to convince us of our dependence, to keep us close to Christ? So the Apostle Paul exulted in the weakness of God, and could defy remaining corruption to condemn him. The moment we think that we have overcome sin, we shall desert Christ. We may know by our affection to the Sabbath, whether eternity will be forced upon us. The journey through life, is as Peter's walking on the water, and if Christ does not reach out his hand, we are every moment in danger of sinking. Grieve for nothing but sin, and for not grieving for it; rejoice only in Christ's victory over it, and recovery to God by him, and pure devotion to him. O that I may from henceforth think with horror, astonishment of soul, and the most perfect detestation of indulging a wish, or keeping any thing in my heart that would keep God out of it. I hope I shall make a noise, and I know what it must be,—God and his will, Christ and his work, the Spirit and his baptism of fire.—ADAM. (Private Thoughts.)

The Happiness of a glorified Spirit.—Would you now where I am? I am at home in my Father's house, and the mansion prepared for me there. I am where I would be, where I have long, and often, desired to be; no longer on a stormy sea, but in a safe and quiet harbour. My working time is done, I am resting; my owing time is done, I am reaping; my joy is at the very height of harvest. Would you know how it is with me? I am made perfect in holiness; grace is swallowed up in glory; the top-stone of the building is brought forth. Would you know what I am doing? I see God; I see him as he is, not as through a glass darkly, but face to face; and the sight is de-anafornig, it makes me like him. I am in the sweet employment of my blessed Redeemer, my Head and Husband, whom my soul loved, and for whose sake I was willing to part with all. I am here bathing myself at the spring-head of heavenly pleasures, and joys unutterable; and, therefore, weep not for me. I am here keeping a perpetual Sabbath; what that is, judge by your short Sabbaths. I am here singing Hallelujahs incessantly, to Him who sits upon the throne, and rest not day or night from praising him. Would you know what company I have? Blessed company, better than the best on earth—here are holy angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. I am set down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God, with blessed Paul, and Peter, and James, and John, and all the saints; and here I meet with many of my old acquaintance that I fasted and prayed with, who got before me hither. And lastly, would you consider how long this is to continue? It is a garland that never withers; a crown of glory that fades not away; after millions of millions of ages, it will be as fresh as it is now; and, therefore, weep not for me.—MATTHEW HENRY.

Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.—Beware that temporal motives and aims do not intrude in matters of Christian beneficence, and mix themselves with acts of a strictly religious character. This unhallowed union takes place in different ways; but these may, in the greatest number of cases, be resolved into ostentation, or a selfish desire after the good opinion of our fellow-men. This is the principle and motive of the Pharisee, who performs his alms-deeds, as he does his religious worship and services, to be seen of men; but is directly opposed to the Gospel principle and precept, requiring that these deeds should be done in secret; that is to say, from the inward principle of duty, and motion of the affections, as distinguished not only from the mere outward act but from all desire of human applause. Although there is no age and time of the world where these unworthy motives do not operate, yet there are certain seasons and states of society where they are apt to prevail to a greater extent, and with a more numerous class of persons than at others. And it will be allowed, that one of those periods is the present day, when extensive and powerful associations have been formed for religious purposes, which embrace a large portion of the community, and of which the proceedings are carried on with great publicity, and proclaimed, as it were, on the house-tops. Men of worldly, or at least doubtful minds, may, in such circumstances, not seldom be induced to take a part in these operations, with the hope of sharing in the honour of the work; or, at all events, of rising in the estimation of their fellow-creatures, and obtaining, at the expense of some pecuniary sacrifice, perhaps of no great amount, the rank and character of Christian philanthropists. It is to be feared that if the operations of those great religious societies could be conducted so as not to meet the public eye, if they too, could, like individuals, not let their left hand know what their right hand doeth, the amount of their revenues might suffer no trifling diminution. Whether, and how far, the treasure swelled by such contributions, may, notwithstanding the unworthy motives of those who so contribute, be overruled for the promotion of pure and truly Christian ends, is not a question to be decided by man. But, with respect to the individual acting on such worldly inducements, who shall say that he is authorised to expect any profit from the deed to his own soul? "Verily," says the Saviour himself, "he has his reward;" inasmuch as that applause on which he secretly set his heart, will be certainly bestowed; but, in so far as the false principle operated, there too must his reward not only begin, but end.—JAMES GLASSFORD, M.B. SUGGESTED BY THE FOURTEENTH VERSE OF PSALM CIII.

"He knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust."

BY A FIFESHIRE FORESTER.

To thee we return, though from thee we have strayed,
For we know that thy mercy is great as thy power;
Oh stretch forth thine arm, and come to our aid,
For strong is the tempest, and dark is the hour!

With snares and temptations our path is beset,
And the shadows of death have encompass'd our way;
Be near in the day of our trouble, and let
Thy hand in the storm be our strength and our stay.

Our sins, and our wanderings, are known unto Thee;
Our wants, and our weaknesses, all Thou hast scan'd;
To Thee, for a refuge from these, we would flee,
To repose in Thy shadows—be fed by Thy hand!

We are weary—and Thou, in thy mercy, hast said,
"To the weary and laden sweet rest I afford;"
Oh grant us the blessings for which we have prayed,
The peace which proceedeth alone from the Lord.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rev. J. Wesley.—Mr Wesley, the father of the Rev. John Wesley, was roused by the cry of fire from the street; but, little imagining that it was his own house, he opened the door, and found it full of smoke, and that the roof was burnt through. Directing his wife and two girls to rise and flee for their lives, he burst open the nursery-door, where the maid was sleeping with five children. She snatched up the youngest, and made the others follow her; the three eldest did so; but John, who was then six years old, was not awakened, and in the alarm was forgotten. The rest of the family escaped—some through the windows, others by the garden door; and Mrs Wesley, to use her own expression, "waded through the fire." At this time, John, who had not been remembered till that moment, was heard crying in the nursery. The father ran to the stairs, but they were so nearly consumed that they could not bear his weight; and being utterly in despair, he fell upon his knees in the hall, and in agony commended the soul of the child to God. John had been awakened by the light; and finding it impossible to escape by the door, climbed upon a chest that stood near the window, and he was then seen from the yard. There was no time for procuring a ladder; but one man was hoisted on the shoulders of another, and thus he was taken out. A moment after the roof fell in. When the child was carried out to the house where his parents were, the father cried out, "Come, neighbours, let us kneel down; let us give thanks to God! He has given me all my eight children: let the house go, I am rich enough." Mr Wesley remembered this providential deliverance through life with the deepest gratitude. Under one of the portraits published during his life, is a representation of a house on fire, with the scriptural inquiry, is not this a brand plucked out of the burning?"

Josephus the Historian.—In the beginning of the Jewish war, this eminent man commanded in Galilee. When Vespasian, who was a general of the Roman army under the reign of Nero, had conquered that country, Josephus was at Jotapata. He and forty more Jews had concealed themselves in a subterranean cavern, where they formed the desperate resolution of killing each other rather than surrender themselves to the Romans. Josephus, having been governor of the place, and therefore entitled to priority in point of rank, it was at first proposed by the rest to yield it to him as an honour, to become the first victim. He, however, contrived to divert their minds from this, by proposing to cast lots for the precedence; and after thirty-nine had balloted and killed one another, he and the other who survived, agreed not to inter their hands in one another's blood, but to deliver themselves up to the Romans. Upon this, Josephus surrendered himself up to Nicanor, who conducted him to Vespasian. In this extraordinary manner was the life of this eminent man spared, that he might write his history, which in many instances has confirmed and illustrated the sacred volume, and in other ways been useful in every subsequent age.

Rev. D. Tyerman.—When a young man, and connected with others who, like himself, regarded not the Sabbath as the day of the Lord, Mr T. had planned a Sunday-party down the river Thames, as far as Gravesend. On the Friday night, when he lay down to rest, a transient misgiving whether it was right so to profane the Sabbath of the Lord, gave him some uneasiness, but he overcame the monitory feeling, and fell asleep. On Saturday morning the thought again crossed his mind, but again he resisted it, and resolved to meet his companions. He was about to rise, but fell asleep again, and had a somewhat singular dream, which impressed his mind, so that he would not go. He was not superstitiously observant of dreams, but he regarded the admonition. The party went without him; and on the following Tuesday morning, he was greatly surprised and affected to find from a newspaper, that the identical boat in which he was going had upset, and the party, and all on board had perished. He was struck with the interposition of Divine Providence in his favour; very properly regarded it as a call to devote himself to God; turned from sin to holiness, and afterwards became a useful minister of Jesus Christ.

The life of a good man preserved.—Posidonius, an old life of Augustine, relates, that the good man, on one occasion to preach at a distant town, took with him a guide to direct him in the way. This man, by some unaccountable means, mistook the usual way, and fell into a by-path. It afterwards proved, that in this way the preacher's life had been saved, as his enemies, aware of his journey, had placed themselves in the proper road with a design to kill him.

Providence always watchful.—In the year 1732, Dr Gill had a memorable escape from death in his own study. One of his friends had mentioned to him a remark of Dr Halley, the celebrated astronomer, that close study preserves a man's life, by keeping him out of harm's way; but one day, after he had just left his room to go to preach, a stack of chimneys were blown down, forced their way through the roof of the house, and broke his writing table, in the very spot where he sat a few minutes before he had been sitting. The Doctor very properly remarked afterwards to his friend, "A man may come to danger and harm in the closest well as in the highway, if he be not protected by the special care of Divine Providence."

THE MEANS OF PROMOTING REPENTANCE.

BY THE REV. JOHN MACFARLANE,

THIS grace of the Christian life, as we have seen in a former paper, forms an essential part of salvation. Like every other grace, it is to be referred to His divine influence, who is described in Scripture as "the author and finisher of our faith." But, in the production of this, as of every other saving effect upon the soul, our own powers of knowledge and reflection are brought into active exercise.

And, first, we perceive the evil of delay, whether in the original exercise of repentance, or in renewing it, after having relapsed into a state of spiritual decay. It cannot be doubted that this Christian grace is necessary both to our safety, and our happiness. There is, indeed, so general a persuasion of this truth, that few, even among the most careless and profligate, do not hope to repent before they die. But, delaying a serious application to the means of repentance till some future time, they are still indulging in the love of sin, combined with ignorance and presumption. Did they feel that the true perfection and happiness of their nature consisted, in an exemption from every kind, and degree of moral pollution, they could not fail to seek the immediate attainment of that, which they knew would make them happy. Delay to abandon any course, implies a present inclination to pursue it. If they have any wish, therefore, to repent, while repentance is delayed, it is not because they desire to be freed from the slavery of sin, but because impenitence is associated in their minds, with an alternative which they cannot contemplate without dismay. Meanwhile it is becoming less likely every day that the careless sinner shall ever repent. He is daily receding from the point to which divine grace invites him. He is rendering the veil that is upon his heart, more impervious to the beams of celestial truth. Each successive intimation of conscience, each suggestion of the Spirit that now strives with him, each admonition of Providence that is resisted or forgotten, leaves the heart, as in the case of Pharaoh, more hardened than before. Independently of the hazard he runs of being this night consigned to the place where there is no more room for repentance, he is advancing with a steady pace, to that fatal insensibility of mind, which is the last stage of the sinner's progress to destruction.

Delay in renewing the exercise of repentance is scarcely less dangerous in their case, who, although they may suppose that they have already experienced this saving effect, have relapsed into indifference and sin. A state of spiritual decay, whether it arises from the insidious encroachments of sloth, from the withering influence of unacknowledged sin, from the deadening effect of carnal indulgence or worldly society, or from whatever other cause, invalidates all the evidence of repentance ever having been exercised. No one can have either the consciousness, or the comfort, of having ever been truly penitent, who is living in the habitual neglect of positive duty, or in the habitual indulgence of a careless or worldly spirit. In such a case, may not every former appearance of repentance have been a delusion? The genuine penitent cannot realise such a possibility without bitter anguish of heart. The very supposition that the power of sin should ultimately prevail, even more than that the punishment of sin should finally be inflicted, is the most appalling reflection that can arise within him. Yet certain it is, that even this reflection is not sufficient to prevent backsliding from the path of obedience. Not that the reflection is wanting in power, but because the truth which it involves is not fully realised. The mental vision has waxed dim, the sensibilities of the soul have grown torpid, and thus truth has become, in a great measure, inaccessible to the mind.

Should any one whose eye rests upon this page be conscious, or suspect that such is his state, let him now, ere one of the hours that ascertain and measure the period of his existence, shall have been numbered with the past, let him seek grace to renew the exercise of repentance. His case is sad, and his suspicions concerning himself may be dark indeed, if earnest expostulation be necessary to excite him to this duty. He who has ever felt the relief of unburdening the load of his guilt, in ingenuous confession, and deep prostration of spirit before the throne of the Eternal; he whose mind has ever hailed the bright prospect of complete deliverance from the power of corruption, has tasted a sweetness that embitters the streams of sin, and has seen a light that deepens the gloom of the dark mountains of vanity. Let him not remain at a distance from the source of his happiness. Let such a train of reflection as this, quicken his return:—I cannot forgive myself for having deviated so far from the path of duty, and for having allowed my heart to grow so cold towards my heavenly Benefactor. But the sullen and obstinate spirit which would obstruct an unfeigned confession of my guilt, and prevent my casting myself anew at the footstool of divine mercy, is the very essence of misery. I can only be happy in my Father's love. Or, shall I maintain a provoking and sinful alienation of heart, till he visit my "transgression with the rod, and mine iniquity with stripes," and by a terrible, but kind necessity constrain my return to himself? How much more becoming as well as safe, now to acknowledge my guilt, to seek a broken and contrite heart, and to sue for forgiveness, than over me, even over me, a reclaimed wanderer from his family, the great Parent of the universe may pronounce this memorable language, expressive at once of his compassion, and of his complacency, "This my son was dead and is alive again, he was lost and is found!"

Since a contrite heart is so necessary and desirable, our thoughts should be often, and seriously directed to those contemplations which, by the blessing of God, are fitted to promote it. And it will be found, I believe, of great use for inducing or increasing such a frame of mind, to fix the attention for some continuance, upon a particular sin with which we may have been chargeable. By this means a clearer insight is acquired into the depravity which sin in general involves.

A strong disposition is evinced by men to evade the humbling but salutary conviction of personal guilt, by the general acknowledgment of the possession of a sinful nature, which they share with the whole human race. But such an acknowledgment does not affect the heart. Nor does it seem that the doctrine of the universal depravity of mankind, even when most powerfully demonstrated, has been usually the means employed by God, in producing a contrite spirit. The mind escapes by the very generality of the truth, from its particular application. In no instance, indeed, is the human mind deeply affected by general statement. An interest is felt in an individual case of woe, which fails to be awakened when that case is multiplied by a thousand. A single charge of guilt brought home to the conscience has most frequently been the instrument of awakening repentance. The apostles were taught through this aperture, to pierce, with the arrow of conviction, the heart fortified in the panoply of security and delusion. The sin of crucifying Christ, alleged against the Jews on the day of Pentecost, was that which "pricked their hearts" and prompted the inquiry, "men and brethren what shall we do?" By a similar process the mind of the Philippian jailer seems to have been led to ask, "what shall I do to be saved?" The question appears to have been suggested by a view of the guilt and danger he had incurred, by his inhuman treatment of Paul and Silas. He saw the divine power miraculously exerted in their behalf, and the imminent peril to which he was himself exposed. More accurate views of his general sinfulness were the consequence of this first impression, when they spoke unto him the Word of the Lord, "And he believed with all his house."

And I will venture to say, that there is no individual, how blameless soever his external conduct may be, who cannot recall some one, perhaps flagrant act of sin, which memory has recorded, and which conscience condemns. The time, place, circumstances, rise before the mind, with an impressive, appalling distinctness, which perhaps the hand of many years has not been able to efface. Conscience has written upon the tablet of memory as with a pen of iron, and the point of a diamond, when, and where, the truth has been violated,—the inhumanity perpetrated,—the act of injustice or oppression committed, the lewdness or impurity conceived or practised,—the calumny circulated, the Sabbath profaned, or the name of God taken in vain; each of which acts, independently of other offences, and of general sinfulness, subjects to the sentence which the law has denounced "against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men."

Let him who would acquire just views of sin, dwell in his thoughts upon such a case as will surely occur to him, if he is at all accustomed to review his past life, with a careful, and inquiring eye. Let him think of this instance in its source and in its consequences. By tracing it back to the fountain whence it flowed, he will discover that that fountain is impure, otherwise it could send forth no such stream. By surveying its results, he will perceive that it alone subjects him to condemnation. If unrepented, unexpiated, unforgiven, it will ruin him for ever. Nor will he see this alone. It will be an inlet to new and humbling discoveries. He will see that this bitter fruit of sin and misery, grows upon a corrupt tree, and that, although in this one instance it has reached a greater than usual maturity, by being placed in circumstances favourable to its development, all the offspring of the same vitiated plant must partake of the same deadly qualities. By induction of particulars, he will thus ascertain the general truth—the root and source of all evil. By the application of a principle which has contributed more largely than any other to the increase of human knowledge—even, that by examining and comparing the different appearances of nature, we can alone, with certainty, infer the existence of a general cause—he, by dwelling in his thoughts upon particular acts of sin, will, through divine teaching, arrive at the saving knowledge of the truth, which, in its practical results, will be of infinitely more value to him than all the discoveries of science—even, that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

And, finally, for the purpose of promoting a contrite spirit, let me accustom myself to reflect upon the estimate formed of sin by the Ruler of the universe. A criminal at the bar, is not likely to judge aright, of the equity of the sentence by which he is condemned. Besides the depravity which his very situation seems to imply, self-love is powerfully engaged to prevent his estimating the claims of justice. In such a case, every one will admit that the judge is better qualified to decide than the prisoner. So it is with sinners, in reference to the true character and consequences of sin. Their depravity, and their selfishness both obstruct their view of the truth. The decision of the Judge of all, in this as in every other case, is just and right; and that decision is most fully and clearly expressed, in his recorded dealings with the children of men.

In the two most momentous facts connected with the history of our race, the infinite malignity of sin in the estimation of a holy God, is most signally displayed,—the expulsion of Adam from Paradise, and the death of Christ upon the cross. These events were both occasioned by sin. Let me ponder well the simple fact, that for one single act of disobedience against God, and that too an apparently trivial act, our first progenitors were expelled from the Garden of Eden, and entailed death, in all its latitude of meaning, upon themselves and their posterity. Let me ponder well the extraordinary fact, not the less extraordinary because it has become familiar to my mind, that to open a way for the manifestation of pardoning mercy, the co-equal and eternal Son of the everlasting Father, became a man of sorrows, and exhausted in his blessed person the cup of the divine wrath. When I look to the flaming sword which guards the approach to the tree of life, and look to the sacrificial lamb, that was “without blemish and without spot,”—in the one do I see it written in letters of fire, and in the other inscribed in characters of atoning blood, that Jehovah “will by no means clear the guilty.” But especially, let me look to the cross of Christ, for while it proclaims that sin is an infinite evil, it tells that it may be forgiven. There flows from it a softening, and healing influence to the soul. The manifestation it affords of the holiness, and of the love of God, is the means which the Spirit of all grace has ever employed to produce “repentance to salvation not to be repented of.”

THE LATE WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, ESQ.

THERE are few names more closely and indissolubly associated with all that is benevolent and philanthropic than that of Wilberforce. It is enshrined in the hearts of thousands as encircled with immortal honour, and as emblazoning the page of history with a glory more pure and imperishable than aught that warrior ever won. This man was, in the most emphatic sense of the expression, a benefactor of his species; and it is interesting to trace the personal history of one who was the honoured instrument, in the hand of Providence, of effecting one of the most signal triumphs which has ever been accomplished in the cause of humanity.

Mr Wilberforce was born at Hull, on the 24th of August 1759. His early education was received at the grammar school of that town, under the superintendence of the Rev. Joseph Milner. It would appear that, even in childhood, his mind was seriously impressed; and, speaking of this period of his life, spent at Hull, Mr Scott, in his funeral sermon, says:—

“I have been favoured with the sight of several letters written by him from this place, which, amidst all the vivacity and playfulness belonging to his years and his character, discover a serious and feeling sense of religion, and even a distinct insight into the leading doctrines of Christianity. He alludes repeatedly to the preaching of Mr Milner, of which he evidently retained a very pleasing recollection, and on which he says he should rejoice again to attend; he takes a lively interest in the success of Mr Milner's labours, and those of other pious ministers; expresses much aversion to the theatre, and deprecates being compelled to attend its exhibitions; but, on the whole, is well content with all that might befall him, believing that it would work for his good.”

At the age of twelve, Mr Wilberforce was removed to a school in the neighbourhood of London, where he resided with a pious uncle and aunt. It was here that he was first introduced to the Rev. John Newton, who appears to have been so much struck with the young man's countenance and manner, that fifteen years after, when in very different circumstances, they again met, Mr Newton mentioned to Mr Wilberforce, that, from the period of the early introduction just mentioned, he had not failed constantly to pray for him. The fact is curious and interesting, and may well give rise to serious reflection, as to the probable effect of the prayers so assiduously and earnestly offered. The great day alone will reveal how much of Mr Wilberforce's progress in personal piety and public usefulness was due to the effectual fervent prayers of the devoted pastor of Olney. The intercessions of the righteous in our behalf are a greater boon than we imagine; and who can tell how many of his choicest blessings descend to him from above, in answer to the benevolent and disinterested prayers of a Christian friend?

Mr Wilberforce remained but a short time in London, when he was removed to a grammar school at Pocklington, Yorkshire, under the care of the Rev. Mr Baskett. There he continued for three or four years, at the end of which time he was entered as a student at Cambridge. During his studies at the university, he was exposed to many temptations, from the influence of ungodly companions; and although he never associated with them in their vicious schemes, the effect upon his mind was decidedly injurious. Religious impressions were to a great extent effaced, and worldly feelings and inclinations assumed the ascendancy in his heart. He entered as a fellow-commoner at St. John's College; and while he prosecuted his studies with considerable diligence, he was accustomed to complain, in after life, that his progress had not been such as he could have wished. He obtained no academical honours; but his proficiency in classical acquirements was generally acknowledged. In 1781, he obtained the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and in 1788 that of Master. It was while at College that he became intimately acquainted with Mr Pitt, and their friendship continued unbroken till the death of the latter statesman in 1806.

When Mr Wilberforce had reached his majority, he was surprised and delighted by his unexpected election to represent his native town in Parliament. The honour was the more gratifying to his feelings, as it was quite unsolicited on his part. This event was the commencement of his public life; and he entered upon his parliamentary duties, no doubt, under a deep impression of the responsibility of the office to which he had been chosen. In the first Parliament in which he served, his youth and inexperience prevented him from taking an active part in public business. A new Page liament having been summoned in 1784, he was elected for Hull, but immediately resigned it on being chosen member for the county of York. The honour of representing that large and important county he enjoyed in six successive Parliaments, until he resigned the office in 1812, on account of his growing infirmities.

At the outset of his parliamentary career, Mr Wilberforce soon felt that the life on which he had entered, involving, as it did, much bustle and excitement, was by no means favourable to his progress as a Christian. His company was much courted, he found himself surrounded by men of mere secular ambition, his mind was engrossed with party questions at a period of peculiar political ferment, and the entire atmosphere which he breathed was one of all-absorbing worldliness. In these circumstances, it is not surprising that the tone of his piety should have been lowered. But it pleased the Almighty to arrest the progress of this carnality of mind, and through the instrumentality of private friendship to lead Mr Wilberforce to reflect more seriously upon the things which belonged to his eternal peace. The circumstances which produced this pleasing change are thus mentioned by Mr Scott:—

"In the latter part of the year 1784, and again in 1785, Mr Wilberforce travelled on the continent with a party of friends. The late Dean of Carlisle, Dr Isaac Milner, was his companion in the same carriage; and here these highly-gifted friends discussed various interesting topics together. Religion was of the number; and, on one occasion, Mr Wilberforce having expressed respect for a pious clergyman, adding, that he 'carried things too far,' his friend pressed him upon this point. 'What did he mean, by carrying things too far, or being too strict? On what ground did he pronounce this to be the case? When we talked of going too far, some standard must necessarily be referred to: was the standard of Scripture exceeded? or could any other standard be satisfactorily adopted and maintained? Perhaps it would not easily be shown, that, where things were carried, as it was alleged, too far, they were not carried beyond the rules of Scripture, but only beyond what was usually practised and approved among men.'

"Mr Wilberforce, when thus pressed by his friend, endeavoured to explain and defend his position as well as he could; but he was dissatisfied himself with what he had to offer; in short, he felt that his own notions on the subject were vague and untenable. A lodgment was thus made in his conscience; matter for serious thinking was suggested; and his thoughts could find no rest till they found it from the Word of God, and the adoption of a scriptural standard, by which to form all his judgments, and regulate all his conduct.

"Another incident in the history of his mind at this period, as related by himself, is not less interesting and instructive than the preceding. 'As I read,' said he, 'the promises of Holy Scripture, 'Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you; God will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him; Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; I will take away the heart of stone, and give you the heart of flesh; I will put my laws in your hearts, and write them in your inward parts; I will be merciful unto their unrighteousness, and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.' As I read these passages, it occurred to me to reflect, if these things be so, if there be any truth in all this, and if I set myself to seek the blessings thus promised, I shall certainly find a sensible effect and change wrought within me, such as is thus described. I will put the matter to the proof; I will try the experiment; I will seek, that I may find, the promised blessings.' He did so; and the result was peace, and liberty, and victory; peace of conscience, and purified affections; deliverance from those sins which had ensnared him, or held him in bondage; 'the victory that overcometh the world,' and boldness 'to confess Christ before men.' 'He had the witness in himself;' a sensible evidence bore that the Word of God is true, and that he had not in vain sought the fulfilment of its promises to himself."

With a mind thus awakened to a sense of the paramount importance of personal religion, Mr Wilberforce once more sought the acquaintance of the Rev. John Newton, from whose conversation he derived much solid instruction, and by whom he was recommended to attend the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Scott at the Lock Hospital. The benefit which he derived from waiting upon the ministrations of this faithful messenger of Christ he thus states:—

"This was a period of my life when it was peculiarly important to me habitually to attend the ministrations of a sound and faithful pastor; and I willingly assented to Mr Newton's earnest recommendations of Mr Scott. I soon found that he fully equalled the strongest expectations that I had formed of him, and from that time for many years I attended him regularly, for the most part accompanied by my dear friends—both, alas! now gone to a better world—the Hon. Edward James Eliot, and Mr Henry Thornton. We used to hear him at the Lock in the morning; Mr Thornton and I often gladly following him for the afternoon service into the city, where he had the lectureship of Bread Street Church. All objections arising from an unfavourable manner were at once overruled by the strong sense, the extensive acquaintance with the Scriptures, the accurate knowledge of the human heart, and the vehement and powerful appeals to the conscience, with which all his sermons abounded in a greater degree than those of any other minister I ever attended. Indeed, the substantial solidity of his discourses made those of ordinary clergymen, though good and able men, appear comparatively somewhat superficial and defective in matter."

At this period of his life, when Mr Wilberforce had openly avowed himself a professed follower of the Lord Jesus, several of his Christian friends, with more than sound judgment, urged him to withdraw from public life, as exposing him to many temptations which might impede his advancement in the Christian course. To such a step, however, Mr Scott offered the most strenuous resistance, urging upon him the necessity of maintaining the position in which Providence had placed him. And it is well for the cause of righteousness and humanity that his judicious friend and pastor prevailed. Mr Wilberforce remained in Parliament, and without fettering himself with the trammels of any political party, exhibited to the world a bright but rare example of a senator actuated throughout by sound Christian principle, which he was not ashamed openly to avow. And, in the providence of God, few men have been more highly favoured in urging forward the great cause of pure benevolence and moral improvement in the world. To see the accordance of any measure with the revealed will of God, was sufficient to summon to its support his most energetic and determined efforts. The great subject, however, with which his name is closely, nay, indissolubly connected, is negro slavery, a subject to which he dedicated his life, and he enjoyed the high privilege of living to see the triumphant issue of all his laborious exertions, and his most fervent prayers.

Shortly after Mr Wilberforce was first honoured with a seat in Parliament, the awful horrors of the slave trade, as carried on by British ships on the coast of Africa, had begun to awaken the sympathy of some individuals more especially belonging to the Society of Friends. One young man, Mr Thomas Clarkson, who was at that time a student at Cambridge, was led to make inquiries into the subject, and so deeply was his mind impressed with its importance, that he resolved to abandon the Church, in which he had a fair prospect of preferment, and to devote himself to the cause of the injured Africans. It was in the end of the year 1785, that he commenced his great work. His first object was to call public attention to the subject in every possible way. With this view he published a prize essay which he had written upon it at Cambridge, and seeking all the additional information he could acquire, took means to circulate it as extensively as possible. He waited on the leading members of the two houses of Parliament, and endeavoured to put them in possession of the facts of the case, and to rouse them to take an interest in it. Amongst others, he called upon Mr Wilberforce, and it may be interesting to peruse, in Mr Clarkson's own words, the reception he met with from one who was destined, in the hand of Providence, to be the main agent in accomplishing the great design.

"On my first interview with him, he stated frankly that the subject had often employed his thoughts, and that it was near his heart. He seemed earnest about it, and also very desirous of taking the trouble of inquiring further into it. Having read my book, which I had delivered to him in person, he sent for me. He expressed a wish that I would make him acquainted with some of my authorities for the assertions in it, which I did afterwards to his satisfaction. He asked me if I could support it by any other evidence? I told him I could; I mentioned Mr Newton, Mr Nisbett, and several others to him. He took the trouble of sending for all these. He made memorandums of their conversation, and, sending for me afterwards, showed them to me. On learning my intention to devote myself to the cause, he paid me many handsome compliments. He then desired me to call on him often, and to acquaint him with my progress from time to time. He expressed, also, his willingness to afford me any assistance in his power in the prosecution of my pursuits."

From the date of this interview with Mr Clarkson commenced the interest which Mr Wilberforce took in the great question of the slave trade. Occasional meetings of the friends of abolition were now held at his house, and measures were concerted with the view of forwarding their purpose. At length in 1787 Mr Wilberforce came forward as the parliamentary leader of the abolitionists; and though, even from the first, he met with warm support from Mr Pitt and Mr Fox, the leaders of the two opposite sides of the house, he had the utmost difficulty in exciting a general interest in the question. By the great majority of the members he was viewed as advocating not merely an impolitic but an impracticable measure. His, however, was not a mind to be daunted or discouraged by difficulties or opposition. He felt conscious that he was engaged in the cause of injured humanity, and though repulsed again and again, he persisted in urging the woes of the oppressed negro upon the notice of Parliament. And it was not until twenty years had elapsed that the victory was gained, and the act for the abolition of the slave trade passed both houses, and received the royal sanction. The joyful feelings of Mr Wilberforce on that occasion it is easier to conceive than describe. He had borne much obloquy and unmerited reproach; his virtues had been misrepresented, his feelings had been lacerated, his personal character had been attacked, but nothing could divert him or drive him away from the great design to which he had dedicated his life. Instead, however, of dilating upon this point, let us give place to the eloquent language of Sir Samuel Romilly.

"But, Sir," said that distinguished statesman, "if such be the feelings of those who have borne only part in this transaction, what must be the feelings of my honourable friend, Mr Wilberforce? What is there in the wide range of human ambition which could afford pleasures so pure, gratification so exalted, as he must enjoy? When I look at the man at the head of the French monarchy, surrounded as he is with all the pomp of power, and all the pride of victory, distributing kingdoms to his family, and principalities to his followers; seeming, as he sits upon his throne, to have reached the summit of human ambition, the pinnacle of earthly happiness; and when I follow him into his closet, or to his bed, and contemplate the anguish with which his solitude must be tortured, by recollections of the blood he has spilt, and the oppressions he has committed; and when I compare with these pangs of remorse the feelings which must accompany my honourable friend from this house to his home, after the vote of this night shall have accomplished the object of his humane and unceasing labours,—when he shall retire into the bosom of his delighted and happy family,—when he shall lay himself down on his bed, reflecting on the innumerable voices that will be raised in every quarter of the world to bless his name; how much more enviable his lot, in the consciousness of having preserved so many millions of his fellow-creatures, than that of the man with whom I have compared him, on a throne to which he has waded through slaughter and oppression! Who will not be proud to concur with my honoured friend in promoting the greatest act of national benefit, and securing to the Africans one of the greatest blessings which God has ever put in the power of man to confer on his fellow-creatures?"

While thus engaged with the most unwearied activity, in promoting the great public undertaking in which he had engaged, Mr Wilberforce had not been the less attentive to the study of divine truth. No cause appeared in his eyes to equal in importance the salvation of the never-dying soul. Meditation and prayer, therefore, combined with the diligent study of God's holy Word, was the habitual employment of his retired hours; and the result of this well-spent time, was the publication, in 1797, of a volume, which has done incalculable benefit to the cause of evangelical truth in England. Previous to the appearance of this work, which is entitled, "A Practical View of the prevailing Religious Systems of Professed Christians," the peculiar doctrines of our most holy faith were rarely dwelt upon from the pulpits of the establishment, and among the higher classes of the laity they were held in little or no esteem. The object of the distinguished author of the "Practical View," was to contend not with the infidel or sceptic, but with the nominal professor of Christianity, or, in his own words, "to point out the scanty and erroneous system of the bulk of those who belong to the class of orthodox Christians, and to contrast their defective scheme with a representation of what the author apprehends to be real Christianity."

A work exhibiting such a design in the very front of it, and issuing too from the pen of a layman, who had acquired no small celebrity from his parliamentary talents, soon attracted a notice almost unprecedented. Men of all classes eagerly perused the strange and unexpected volume. It became the general talk, not merely in London, but throughout the country; and the ability and eloquence, and high-toned piety, which pervaded every page, recommended it alike to the man of refined and cultivated intellect, and to the illiterate but simple-hearted Christian peasant. This was evidently an extraordinary performance, a literary as well as a religious phenomenon; and though its arguments might be resisted by those whom no argument can reach, they were such at all events as commanded respect. None could deny, that the author was at once a man of sincere piety, of refined taste, and high talent.

That a work of this nature, issuing from such a quarter, would excite opposition, was nothing more than what might have been expected, but instead of checking, this served only to promote the sale of the work. The Socinians, particularly, poured forth both from the pulpit and the press the most virulent attacks. All, however, was unavailing. The author remained unmoved, and deigned not to pen a single line in reply to any one of his numerous opponents. The work, meanwhile, made rapid progress in public estimation, and soon became a general, nay, an almost universal favourite.

"It is a most noble and manly stand for the Gospel," said the Rev. Thomas Scott, in 1797; "full of good sense, and most useful observations on subjects quite out of our line, and in all respects fitted for usefulness; and, coming from such a man, it will probably be read by many thousands, who can by no means be brought to attend either to our preaching or writings. Taken in all its probable effects, I do sincerely think such a bold stand for vital Christianity has not been made in my memory. He has come out beyond all my expectations. He testifies of the noble, and amiable, and honourable, that their works are evil; and he proves his testimony beyond all denial. He gives exactly the practical view of the tendency of evangelical principles, for which I contend; only he seems afraid of Calvinism, and is not very systematical; perhaps it is so much the better. It seems, likewise, a book suited to reprove and correct some timid friends, who are at least afraid of the Gospel, being far more prudent than the apostles were; or we should never have been able to spell out Christian truths from their writings. But it is especially calculated to show those their mistake, who preach evangelical doctrines without a due exhibition of their practical effects. I pray God to do much good by it; and I cannot but hope that I shall get much good from it, both as a preacher and a Christian."

In how many instances the "Practical View" of Mr Wilberforce has been beneficial to the souls of individuals, will only be known on the great day when the secrets of all hearts will be revealed. There is one, however, which has been made public, and which, as related by an individual of deservedly high repute in the Church of Christ—the Rev. Leigh Richmond—we shall give in his own words:

"I feel it to be a debt of gratitude, which I owe to God and to man, to take this affecting opportunity of stating, that to the unsought and unexpected introduction of Mr Wilberforce's book on 'Practical Christianity,' I owe, through God's mercy, the first sacred impression which I ever received, as to the spiritual nature of the Gospel system, the vital character of personal religion, the corruption of the human heart, and the way of salvation by Jesus Christ. As a young minister, recently ordained, and just intrusted with the charge of two parishes in the Isle of Wight, I had commenced my labours too much in the spirit of the world, and founded my public instructions on the erroneous notions which prevailed amongst my academical and literary associates. The scriptural principles stated in the 'Practical View' convinced me of my error, led me to the study of the Scriptures with an earnestness to which I had hitherto been a stranger, humbled my heart, and brought me to seek the love and blessing of that Saviour who alone can afford a peace which the world cannot give. Through the study of this book, I was induced to examine the writings of the British and foreign reformers. I saw the coincidence of their doctrines with those of the Scriptures, and those which the Word of God taught me to be essential to the welfare of myself and my flock. I know too well what has passed within my heart, for now a long period of time, not to feel and to confess, that to this incident I was indebted, originally, for those solid views of Christianity, on which I rest my hope for time and eternity. May I not, then, call the honoured author of that book my spiritual father? And if my spiritual father, therefore my best earthly friend? The wish to connect his name with my own was natural and justifiable. It was a lasting memorial of the most important transaction of my life; it still lives amidst the tenderness of present emotions as a signal of endearment and gratitude; and I trust its character is imperishable."

After Mr Wilberforce retired, in 1812, from the responsible situation which he had so long held as one of the representatives for the county of York, he continued to sit for the borough of Bramber till the close of his parliamentary life in 1825. Though he faithfully attended to his duties in the House, he seldom took that prominent part in its discussions which he had formerly done. In the cause of the Negro he still felt a lively interest, and by his speeches, his writings, and his votes, he endeavoured to carry forward the great work of our Emancipation with as much energy as he had sought to promote the abolition of the Slave Trade, which he had the privilege of seeing so happily brought to a close, at least as far as the legal sanction of Great Britain was concerned. Wherever the interests of religion were likely to be advanced, Mr Wilberforce was at his post, and more especially when the question was under discussion, in 1813, as to the renewal of the East India charter, it was mainly to the exertions of this enlightened Christian statesman that the vast empire of the East was thrown open to the labours of the Missionaries of the cross.

It was observed by Mr Wilberforce's friends, that as he advanced in years he became more habitually absorbed in spiritual and divine things, and so great was the happiness he felt in the contemplation of eternity, that he remarked, "The last year has been the happiest of my life." He declared himself "quite prepared for the worst." Baxter's "Dying Thoughts" was the companion of his dying pillow, and he died as he had lived, trusting solely to the merits of the Redeemer. "Adieu me," said he, "I have nothing to say but the publican's plea, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'" In the exercise of this lively faith his bappy spirit winged its flight to the regions of immortal bliss on Monday, July 29, 1833, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

The following anecdotes of the private character of Mr Wilberforce we extract from a neat little memoir of him drawn up by the Rev. Thomas Price, to which we have been indebted for the materials of the above sketch.

"The private character of Mr Wilberforce was as amiable as his public course was upright. It is not unfrequently been found that the bustle and excitement of a public life, unfit men for the more calm and sedate duties of the domestic circle. The ambitious statesman often regards his home with indifference. His eyes are too tame to awaken his sensibilities, or to induce him to occupy much time in their cultivation. But I was far otherwise with Mr Wilberforce. He repaired from the senate to his house with evident delight, and borrowed happiness from the joy his presence imparted. He partook of the pleasures of domestic life with a zeal of which most politicians are destitute. 'He was extremely fond,' says a relative, 'of children, and would enter into their gambols with the gaiety of a school-boy. We need scarcely add that he was the idol of his own household. Their veneration, their filial attachment, bordered on enthusiasm; their hourly attendance on him resembled the maternal anxiety of a widowed parent for an only child. Mr Wilberforce was particularly happy in conversation; his memory was richly stored with classical allusions; a natural poetry of mind constantly displayed itself; a melodious cadence marked every thought and every expression of the thought. He was seldom impassioned; not often energetic; but his tones were mellifluous and persuasive, exactly according to the sentiment they conveyed."

"His attachment to the Established Church was well known, and greatly contributed to the favourable reception of his "Practical View" in the higher classes of society. Sometimes, however, he attended at dissenting places of worship; and on one occasion, partook of the Lord's Supper with non-conforming Christians."

gentleman having expressed some doubt of this circumstance, and Mr Wilberforce being asked if the report was correct, replied, in a tone which indicated surprise, 'Yes, my dear; is it not the Church of God?' So completely free was he from the narrowness and intolerance of the partizan.

"He was eminently a man of prayer. His intercourse with God was habitual, and hence resulted the consistency of his life. 'Perennis of the highest distinction,' says the Rev. Joseph Brown, in his funeral sermon, 'were frequently at his breakfast-table, but he never made his appearance till he had concluded his own meditations, reading his Bible, and prayer; always securing, as it were, to God, or rather to his own soul, I believe, the first hour of the morning. Whoever surrounded his breakfast-table, however distinguished the individuals, they were invited to join the family circle in family prayer. In reference to his own soul, I am informed, he set apart days, or a part of them, on which he had received particular mercies, for especial prayer. 'Now,' would he sometimes say to those attending him, 'I shall not want you for some time.' Those who were accustomed to his habits knew that he devoted those hours to meditation, and reading, and prayer. When a clergyman, who had been visiting, was about to leave, 'Stop,' said Mr Wilberforce, 'I must assemble my children.' He did so. 'Now,' said he, 'before you go, you must pray with them.'

"One beautiful point of his character I must just notice: not only did he pray in his closet, and with his family; but if his domestics were ill, at their bed-side, there was their valued master praying with them—praying for them."

"Mr Scott also, in his funeral sermon, bears a similar testimony to the religious character Mr Wilberforce maintained in his family. 'The following incident,' he says, 'came almost within my own knowledge. A minister of state called upon him on some public business on a Sunday; he at once excused himself, saying, he would wait upon his lordship at any hour he would fix the next day, but he was then going to church. And this was after he had already attended the morning service. It was his maxim, that every man should be the priest of his own household; and this character he would never resign, though he might from time to time delegate it to others. Hence, even when he had clergymen present, of whose assistance he would at other times gladly avail himself, yet he would frequently conduct the daily religious services in person. And here, we are assured, 'the fulness and richness of his expositions of Scripture, and the fervour of his supplications, were such as none can forget who ever were present at them.' And then the full effect would be given to all this among the members of his household, by the tenderness and consideration which he ever showed for them. 'If any of his domestics,' said one frequently resident under his roof, and on the most familiar terms, 'if any of his domestics show a ruffled temper, or fall into misconduct, the case is met rather with pity than with resentment, and anxiety is shown to restore the offender, like a sick member, in the spirit of meekness.' This was the rule of his family. Though much conversant with the world, he entered into no compromise with it as to the way of spending his time, or countenancing its vain amusements. He had no leisure, and, what is the great thing to be aimed at, he had no heart for such frivolities; but quite the contrary. Indeed, I have observed, however others may plead for such indulgence, that those who have been previously most acquainted with them, and best know their effects, on becoming decidedly religious, most strictly renounce them, and protest most strongly against them. Finally, the spirituality of his mind under the press of public business, and amid the succession of persons who crowded upon him, was truly surprising. He seemed always ready for devotional exercises, and for religious conversation, in which the heart evidently bore as large a share as the understanding. And at church he ever appeared to be one of the most devout and fervent of worshippers.'

"His devotional engagements gave energy to his public life. He came forth from his closet strengthened with might in his inner man, and was thereby enabled to achieve what would have overwhelmed many other minds. It was his own conviction, that he never could have sustained the labour and stretch of intellect required in his early political life, if it had not been for the rest of his Sabbath; and that he could name several of his contemporaries who had experienced a premature death, or fallen into the more dreadful catastrophe of insanity and suicide, in consequence of its neglect.

"Humility was by no means one of the least prominent features of his character. 'Walking in the Isle of Wight,' says the Rev. Joseph Brown, 'a person begging approached him, using the most flattering language. Do not so,' said Mr Wilberforce to the beggar, 'I am only a poor sinner like yourself.'

"Of his extreme humility, I experienced an instance which at once astonished and embarrassed me. One day, in conversation, Mr Wilberforce kindly gave me some advice. I expressed my thanks, and said how much I should feel indebted if, in conversation or correspondence, he would at all times be my counsellor, and, if necessary, correct me, and point out my faults. He suddenly stopped, (for we were walking together,) and replied, 'I will; but you must promise me one thing.' 'With pleasure,' I answered, little thinking what it was. 'Well, then,' continued Mr Wilberforce, 'in all your conversation and correspondence with me, be candid and open, and point out my faults.'"

COMMUNION SERVICES.

BY THE REV. PATRICK BOOTH, A.M.,

Assistant Minister of Innerleithen.

NO. II.

BEFORE COMMUNION.

"THE cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" Words of perfect resignation,—so simple, so touching, and so unaffected, had they been uttered even by a sufferer, whose pains and sorrows are the fruits of his own errors, are fitted to reach every susceptible heart, and to banish from the Christian breast every other feeling but that of compassion. But by whom were these words uttered? By him who suffered for iniquities which were not his own. Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows; and as "Lo! I come, I delight to do thy will," were the words of firm resolution and cheerful acquiescence in which he addressed his Father, when the mighty load was proposed to him; so under its most bitter endurance, the language of patient and unrepining resignation, and unchanged and unchangeable constancy uttered by him, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, shall—"The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

It was the last evening of his life. He had delivered his farewell address to his disciples. His own sorrows occupied but the second place in his soul. "Let not," said he, "your hearts be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me." He loved them from the first of time—he loved them to the last. But he knew how poor was the support which they were to afford him in the trials which were now at hand. Their spirit, indeed, was willing, but the flesh was weak; and in words of mingled compassion and disappointment he predicted, "All ye shall be offended because of me this night," as it is written, "I will smite the Shepherd and the sheep shall be scattered."

"Then cometh Jesus with them to a place called Gethsemane." Unto the three disciples whom he had chosen from among the twelve he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death: tarry ye here and watch with me." How cheering are the presence and watchful care of friends; how much does their affectionate anxiety lighten the heaviest load of suffering, and brighten the darkest hour of life! But He who had yet to be forsaken by God was now neglected by man; and it was not the least melancholy moment of his earthly existence, which wrung from him the gentle yet heart-breaking complaint, "What I could ye not watch with me one hour?"

Afflictions are never to be desired for their own sake; and He who left us an example that we may follow his steps, at once pointed out our duty, and proved the intensity of his agony by his thrice repeated prayer, "O my Father, if it be possible,"—if it be not necessary for the redemption of the world, and the manifestation of thy glory,—“let this cup pass from me.” The presence of an angel strengthened him, but did not withdraw the bitter draught, “and his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling down to the ground.”

The shadows now began to deepen, the gloomy portents of his approaching doom thickened around him. The lanterns and torches of the band that came to seize him appeared through the foliage amid the blackness of night. The dismal scene was in frightful agreement with the hellish deed. This was the hour and the power of darkness. Unnecessary weapons were brought against Him “who gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair.” The leader of his enemies was his own familiar friend, and the fondest token of love was selected as the signal of his destruction. He was in all points tempted like as we are, and laboured under all our sinless infirmities; and doubtless an enfeebled body, and unhinged imagination, exhibited in the darkest colours, and added to the horrors of his situation. But what increased his sorrows could not shake his constancy; and it was at this awful hour, when wading through this horrible pit, and this miry clay, to the doom which he knew lay before him, that he calmed the re-awakened affection, and subdued the unreflecting enthusiasm, of a generous follower in these pathetic words, “The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?”

“The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?” But how altered are the circumstances under which that cup is this day set before us! The reign of terror has become the kingdom of peace, the fruits of guilt have become the price of pardon.

I leave you to your own reflections, whilst I put into your hands the symbols of Him whose visage was marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men.

AFTER COMMUNION.

The cup which our Father hath given us, shall we not drink it? Shall we despise and reject the cup of salvation, and account the blood of the covenant, wherewith we are sanctified, an unholy thing? Shall we lightly esteem that which was purchased at so great a price, and reject the counsel of God against ourselves? Shall we repair to streams of false delight, and forsake the fountain of living waters? Shall it be to us in vain that through the tender mercy of our God the day-spring from on high hath visited us,—in vain that we have seen his salvation? Shall we hear, as though we heard not, his invitations of mercy, “O Israel thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help?” Shall it be to us, as though it had not been, that the Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, who for our sakes trod life’s thorniest paths, has now ascended up on high, leading captivity captive,—has received gifts for men,—has become a prince and a Saviour to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins?

The cup which our Father hath given us, shall we not drink it? The commandments which he hath prescribed to us, shall we not keep; the laws which he hath given us, shall we not obey; the path which he hath marked out for us, shall we not walk in it; shall we abandon the guide which he hath assigned us to lead us to the rest which remaineth for the people of God?

The cup which our Father hath given us, shall we not drink it? Shall we doubt that he is still our Father, when he visits us with the wise, and good, and salutary, though painful dispensations of his providence? Shall we forget that whom he loveth he chasteneth,—that when we endure his afflictions he dealeth with us as sons? Shall we fail to remember, amidst the dark and mysterious, and sorrowful methods of his grace, that “He who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up to death for us all, will with him freely give us all things?” No, my brethren, with God’s help we will form better resolutions than these before we leave the table of the Lord. May he, by his Holy Spirit, enable us, under all our sorrows, to think of Him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be weary and faint in our minds; amidst all our temptations to follow his example who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; and against all the convictions of sin, and accusations of conscience, to plead the merits of Him, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. When thus to live is Christ, to die is gain. “Blessed are they who shall drink of the fruit of the vine new with him in his Father’s kingdom.” Amen.

THE PASCHAL LAMB :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT MENZIES,

“For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us.”—
1 COR. v. 7.

SPEAKING of the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish worship, St. Paul declares that they are a shadow of things to come, but the body is Christ. You know, my brethren, it pleased that adorable Being, whose wisdom is unsearchable, and his ways past finding out, to develope, by slow and progressive degrees, the great scheme of our salvation. Immediately subsequent to the fall, he vouchsafed to our first parents the promise of a Deliverer, who should restore to them the innocence and felicity which they had so unhappily forfeited; and in every succeeding age, until it was at last accomplished, to holy men whom he chose for the purpose, he repeated this promise, accompanying each repetition of it by increased light and information respecting its import. Even in the days of the patriarchs, we find not a few types and figures, of divine appointment, fraught with mysterious meaning, pointing to a bright and happy future, and giving such intimations respecting the promised Messiah, as were well calculated to feed the hope and the faith of God’s ancient people. Under the Mosaic dispensation this is still more the case; here the types and figures have not only multiplied in number, but increased in clearness and significance. In fact, the entire ritual is just as it were, like a vast mirror, in which the great Deliverer, and all the blessings of the new and better covenant, are reflected from afar, and in which they were not obscurely intimated to the chosen people.

But of all the figures and adumbrations of the ceremonial law, there is none more curious and memorable than the paschal lamb. In this instance so strong is the resemblance, and so numerous the points of conformity betwixt the shadow and the substance, the type and the antitype, that it is altogether impossible to compare them without being profoundly struck by the palpable traces of divine contrivance, and without admiring that overruling wisdom which, in this legal sacrament, vouchsafed to God's Church of old so clear a lesson respecting the great Deliverer that was to come, and which now affords, in the same, so incontrovertible a proof of the divinity of our religion, to confirm the faith of modern believers, and to put to shame the obstinacy of the infidel.

For only reflect, my brethren, how beautifully the moral character of the Saviour is shadowed forth in the dispositions of the animal that was here selected as the victim. The lamb, you know, is, of all creatures, the most gentle, and, therefore, surely the fittest representative of Him who could say concerning himself, "Take my yoke upon you, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls." The lamb is innocent and harmless; and was not the blessed Jesus likewise holy and harmless, kind and merciful to all who asked his aid, and doing injury to none? The lamb is patient and unresisting, dumb before her shearers, and licking the hand about to shed her blood; and does not the evangelical prophet bear testimony to Jesus, that though oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth, but gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair? He hid not his face from shame and spitting. When he was reviled, he reviled not again, and when he suffered, he threatened not. And oh! what a brightness and lustre does the patience of our divine Master assume when we remember, that although content to appear beneath the guise of bleeding, helpless, and unresisting innocence, he was yet as the lion of the tribe of Judah, armed with the might of omnipotence, and could have petrified his tormentors with a look, or commanded the lightning of heaven to consume them in the twinkling of an eye!

The paschal lamb was to be taken from the flock. And so was Jesus raised up from among his brethren, having become a partaker of our flesh and blood. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is written that "he took not on him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham, because it behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren." Highest honour ever conferred upon human nature, that, notwithstanding all the infirmities, and all the blots with which sin has impaired its perfection, and effaced its primeval beauty, the Lord of glory condescended to wear it! Noblest distinction of the race of Adam, to count the Son of God himself as a kinsman and brother!

The paschal lamb was enjoined to be without blemish. And was not He, who through the Eternal Spirit offered himself to God, likewise without blemish and without spot? In assuming our nature, he assumed not the pollution with which it is infected. No taint of sin ever defiled the spotless purity of his heart, or obscured the holy beauty of his life.

The paschal lamb was to be a male of the first year. And does not this affectingly shadow forth the brief term of our Saviour's sublunary existence, and the early and premature fate by which he was cut off,—cut off by his cruel and remorseless countrymen, in the flower of his youth? Does it not also seem to indicate his fitness to be the food and nourishment of the soul,—a food sweeter far to the sanctified taste than the sweetest carnal delights and satisfactions to be found beneath the sun!

The paschal lamb was to be taken from the fold on the tenth day of the month, and kept to be slain upon the fourteenth. It was thus to remain four days destined and set apart for its sacred use. Here let us wonder and be amazed at the depths both of the wisdom and knowledge of that God who governs the universe, and with whom a thousand years are but as one day, and one day as a thousand years. For mark the memorable coincidence; just four thousand years had elapsed from the time when the promise of a Deliverer was given to Adam, to the time when that promise was fulfilled in the bloody death of Jesus Christ. Moreover, just four years before he met his fate, had he quitted his paternal roof to devote himself to the work appointed him by his Father. In fine, it was on the fourth day preceding his crucifixion that he bade adieu to the scene of his duties and public ministry, and made his solemn entrance into Jerusalem, the appointed theatre of his sufferings, there to complete that work by dying upon the cross.

If these points of resemblance in the paschal lamb to the person of our blessed Master are curious and interesting, we shall find many equally striking in the manner in which the two victims were slain.

The paschal lamb was to be killed by the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel. The sacrifice was to be, as it were, a great public act, in which all the nation conjointly was to have a hand. And can it ever be forgotten how memorably this was exemplified in the murder of our Lord? Did not all with one accord, the Roman governor and the Jewish king, the priests and the people, the scribes and Pharisees, conspire to persecute and to slay him? Torn and divided by clashing interests on every other point, they agreed in nothing save in deadly hatred to the Saviour. Not content with the bitter mockery of the thorny crown, the blows and scourging which had been inflicted on him, the assembled nation, collected around the hall of Pilate, as if with one voice, raised aloft the loud and universal shout, saying, "Away with this man. Crucify him, crucify him; and let his blood be upon us and our children!"

The blood of the paschal lamb was not, like that of other sacrifices, to be poured upon the ground. No; it was to be treated with the reverence and respect due to every thing set apart for a sacred and religious use. It was to be received into a basin, and sprinkled, not on the threshold, where the foot might tread, but on the lintel and the door-posts. Surely a speaking emblem this of the precious blood of Christ—that object of highest esteem and warmest affection to all who know its peace-speaking power—that costly treasure of the Church, which, in the heavenly sanctuary, is continually presented by our Great High Priest to the Father, in expiation of human guilt, and which, woe be to the man who dares to profane or count an unholy thing.

Not a bone of the paschal lamb was to be broken. And how memorably the hand of God brought about the fulfilment of this particular in the case of the Saviour, is testified by St. John, xix. 32–36: “Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs....For these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken.”

Its flesh was forbidden to be sodden with water; it was strictly enjoined to be roasted with fire, that terrible and destructive element. And thus was pictured forth the fierce and burning anger of the Lord, which the sins of a rebellious world had kindled, and which raged so hotly against him who put his soul into our souls' stead, and as our willing substitute bore the burden, and endured the punishment, of our transgressions.

The paschal lamb behoved to be sacrificed in Jerusalem. On the first occasion, indeed, it was slain in Egypt, and for many subsequent years in the desert. But God had enjoined, that when the Israelites should be settled in Canaan, it was in the city and the place which he should choose to put his name, that they were to bring and slay their victims. Read the precept, Deut. xvi. 5: “Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of the gates, which the Lord thy God giveth thee: but at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover.” Accordingly, from the days of David, the whole nation made an annual visit to Jerusalem for this purpose. And, answerably to this it was, that in that guilty city, whose streets were already red with the blood of so many of God's messengers and prophets, stoned and slain by their countrymen for the testimony which they bore to Jesus, Jesus himself suffered and died. He had declared the necessity of this circumstance: “It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem.” And again, “Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished.”

It but remains to mark one more coincidence: it is that of time. The paschal lamb was appointed to be slain upon the fourteenth day of the month Abib, and on the evening of that day. We know, from the Evangelists, that, by the hand of a mysterious Providence, in that month, on that day, and at that very hour, while the priests were busy in the temple slaughtering the paschal victims of the nation, that nobler victim, which they all prefigured, was nailed to the cross, and bowed his head, and in due time gave up the ghost.

But however curious and instructive it may be to trace in these facts connected with the paschal lamb such lively and memorable points of similitude to the person and sufferings of our divine Master, there is a still deeper interest in tracing the analogy betwixt the ends and purposes for which they were respectively put to death.

In the account of the institution of the passover, you learn the strange and memorable use to which the blood of the paschal victim was to be applied. The wrath of Jehovah was impending over a guilty land, and a guilty nation. Egypt had filled up the measure of her iniquities, and the hour of retribution, which had been for a while delayed to give space for repentance, had at last arrived. Long had the wrongs done to God's chosen people, the galling bondage, the fierce oppression, the emaciating and unprofitable toils to which they were condemned; long had the murder of the Hebrew babes, remorselessly consigned to the muddy waters and slimy crocodiles of the Nile; long the wailings of Israel's mothers, the despairing appeals of her hoary sires, and the curses and execrations which broke from her indignant youth; oh long had these ascended in mournful unison to heaven, calling for vengeance and retribution! Nor did they call in vain. Heaven heard, and interfered at last. Commissioned by Jehovah, Moses comes, knocked at Pharaoh's gate, and, in the name of Him by whom he was sent, demanded the deliverance of his injured people. The proud monarch despised alike the message and the threats of the prophet. Accordingly, plague after plague, the plague of the waters turned into blood, of the frogs, the lice, the flies, of the murrain, the boils and blains, the plague of the hail, the locusts, and the darkness, are sent in terrible succession, to waste the land, and awe Pharaoh into submission. Obstinate was his resistance; but who ever hardened himself against the Lord and prospered, who shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble? What Jehovah doth not bend, he yet can break; and, therefore, when all milder methods had been tried in vain, he resolved, by a last, a severe and dreadful stroke, to avenge at once the injuries of his people, and his own insulted authority. The destroying angel is summoned, and receives the dread commission that night to pass through Egypt, and, entering every door, to cut off the hope of the family. Not one was to be spared, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sat on his throne, to the first-born of the captive that was in the dungeon, yea, and even the first-born of cattle. I attempt not to paint the terrors of that night, too dark and dreadful for fancy to conceive, or language to express.

Think only of the sudden paleness and dying shrieks of the victims, smitten at every age, from feeble infancy to blooming manhood; think of the loud wailings of the distracted mothers, of the speechless agony of the bereaved fathers, and the general consternation and dismay that overspread the land, tying every tongue, and arresting the throbbings of every pulse. On that awful night, and amidst that universal havoc, how fared the people of the Lord? The Lord of Hosts was with them, and the God of Jacob was their refuge. Not only did they escape unharmed; they were not even afraid for the terrors of the night, nor for the pestilence that walked in darkness. A thousand fell at their side, and ten thousand at their right hand, but it did not come nigh unto them; only their eyes beheld the reward of the wicked. And to what did they owe their marvellous preservation? Behold upon the lintels and the door-posts of their houses those red and gory streaks, and see in them the mystic token, and heaven-appointed means of their safety and protection! Yes, brethren; they were saved by the blood of the paschal lamb: for the Lord had commanded them to take and sprinkle it on the lintel and side-posts of their doors, and he had promised—a promise which he faithfully kept—that when he saw the blood he would pass over them, and not suffer the destroyer to enter into their houses to smite them, when he smote the land of Egypt.

And did you never hear, my brethren, of a like deliverance accomplished by a like means? Only a deliverance far more comprehensive in its extent and in which we have all a nearer interest. Surely you know that this globe which we inhabit, as a theatre of guilt and crime, and the race to which we belong, as the sinful posterity of a rebel and apostate sire, had provoked, like Egypt, the anger of Jehovah. Over the wide earth, created to be the happy abode of innocence and peace, but now profaned by our impiety and contaminated by our guilt, he might have sent forth the destroying angel, flying on the wings of darkness, and with the sword of vengeance in his hand, he might have commissioned him once more to execute a wide and indiscriminate havoc among the habitations of men, cutting off not the first-born only, but son and sire together, yea, exterminating the guilty species both root and branch. And what arrested the arm of vengeance? Why is it that we are this day alive, blessed with so many proofs of our heavenly Father's love, fed by his bounty, protected by his shield, upheld by his arm, guided by his Word, and enriched by his grace? Why is it that we are permitted fondly to look forward to the better things which he has promised to do for us in a happier land beyond the grave? Our text alone can answer this question. It is because "Christ our passover was sacrificed for us." Through his blood alone have we obtained redemption. Taken by the hand of faith, and sprinkled upon the conscience, it becomes our shield and safeguard in every peril. The sacred token marks all who bear it as the people of the Lord, and securely protects them from the fiends of darkness and the angels of destruction. The wondrous virtue of this blood has hitherto preserved the world uninjured and the human race alive, and on the last day, the terrible day when God shall come for judgment, it is only through the wondrous virtue of this blood that we can hope to escape the fiery indignation which in full vials shall be poured out upon the impenitent and unbelieving, involving them in everlasting and irretrievable perdition.

Finally, the ancient passover procured for Israel emancipation from bondage and oppression. As a means to that it was at first appointed, and as a memorial of it the Lord commanded the passover to be afterwards observed as an annual festival. Not only did the blood of the paschal lamb protect them from divine wrath, but it opened, as it were, the gates of their prison-house, and paved the way of their escape from Egypt. Terrified and amazed at the havoc which had been wrought, and seeing, in the safety of Israel, a palpable evidence that it was by Israel's God, and on Israel's behalf, that the vengeance had been executed, the Egyptians no longer desired their stay. The proud oppressor "rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians, and called for Moses and Aaron, and said, rise up and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel, and go serve the Lord as ye have said." It is added, that "The Egyptians were urgent upon the people that they might send them out of the land in haste, for they said we be all dead men." Thus emancipated from their bondage, and no longer restrained, the children of Israel followed their heavenly appointed leader, and the same night which had been signalized by so great and memorable a deliverance, beheld the hosts of the Lord with their backs upon Egypt, where they and their fathers had dwelt four hundred and thirty years, and whose soil they had so plentifully watered with their sweat and their tears, travelling, with rapid pace, and with still more eager hopes, to the happy land of which the Lord had said that he would give it to them.

And surely, my brethren, it is not hard to see, shadowed forth in this consequence of the ancient passover, the still more signal deliverance of God's people, in every age, from the spiritual thralldom of sin and corruption. Alas! by nature we are all bondsmen and slaves. The oppressed and toil-worn brick-makers of Egypt afford but too sad and close a counterpart to the state in which we are involved by nature, and in which we are all born into the world. Is there not a tyrant who lords it over us, proud, cruel, and inexorable as Pharaoh? Have we not within our bosoms severe and merciless task-masters, who impose upon us hard and bitter labours, and pay us no other wages but shame, and remorse, and eternal death? Not less intolerable nor less degrading is this bondage, because we sometimes are so infatuated as to love it, and so debased as to hug the chains which gall and disgrace us. Oh, where shall we find a deliverer to break our fetters and procure us emancipation? Look again to the great Paschal Lamb. "If the Son shall make you free, then shall ye be free indeed." His blood not only shields from the penalties, but delivers from the power of sin and Satan. He gave it for our ransom, and, except itself, there is nothing in the universe which can supply motives persuasive and powerful enough to subdue our evil passions and move us to renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and to give ourselves up as the willing servants of holiness and God. "The love of Christ constraineth me," says the Apostle Paul, "for I thus judge, that if one died for all then were all dead, but He died that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them and who rose again."

Let me only add, in conclusion, that we cannot reasonably expect to share in these blessings without a personal application of the blood of Christ.

PART II.

[Extracted from the Athenæum of July 22, 1837.]

WINE must always have been a rarity in Egypt; for though its use was permitted to the priests, the people were only allowed to drink it at certain festivals, especially that of Artemis Bubastus, when, as we are informed by Herodotus, more wine was consumed than in all the year besides. At other times they drank a kind of beer made from barley. This liquor being used chiefly by the middle and lower castes, we are not to expect any details of its manufacture on the monuments. If there were any, it would be difficult to identify them, for, from the account given us by Herodotus, it is manifest that the Egyptian beer was a sort of sweet wort, it was but slightly fermented, and as no hops were used in the manufacture, it was probably made only in small quantities, as the occasion required. Yet, from the monuments, we infer that the cultivation of the grape was at one time popular in Egypt, though it could only have been cultivated with success in a few of the high-lying districts; and when commerce enabled the Egyptians to import wine from other countries, better and cheaper than they could manufacture it themselves, they had the good sense to abandon this unprofitable branch of industry, and direct their attention to commodities for which nature afforded them greater facilities. In the age of the patriarch Jacob, wine must have been manufactured in Egypt, else it is fair to infer that he would have sent it with the other products of Syria, which he gave to his sons, for the purpose of conciliating Pharaoh's minister, his unknown son Joseph. "Take of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds." Gen. xliii. 11. But from the enumeration of the judgments that God was about to inflict on the land of Egypt, in the days of the prophet Isaiah, it would appear that the vines were not important, for their destruction forms no part of the prophet's denunciations against Egypt, as it does of his menaces against the Syrians and Chaldeans.

Other circumstances, indeed, tend to prove that the cultivation of the vine was not very extensive; we find it in almost every instance planted in the gardens; there are few, if any, separate vineyards. A greater number of labourers is found attending to the vines than to any other horticultural produce; whence we may conclude, that their cultivation required more than ordinary care, and was a luxury of the rich, rather than an occupation of the people.

Great care was taken to keep the roots moist; they were inclosed by a mound or wall, and water was brought to them by one of the labourers. Belzon found the grape-vine growing wild in the region of Fayoum, near the lake Meris; but from him, and from other authorities, we learn that the fruit is deficient both in quantity and quality.

The grapes, when collected, were conveyed in baskets to the wine-vat. This was not a moveable utensil, but a cistern, either dug or built, generally the latter; when the fruit was collected in this receptacle, men and women were employed to crush it by treading. To this operation, there are frequent allusions in Scripture. Bishop Lowth has dwelt forcibly on the poetic beauty of the delineation of divine vengeance, by imagery borrowed from the wine-press, in Isaiah's description of the Messiah's victory over his enemies. "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-va? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come. And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore, mine own arm brought salvation unto me; and my fury, it upheld me. And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury, and I will bring down their strength to the earth." Isaiah lxiii. 1-6. In this noble burst of poetry, the word "alone" has a peculiar emphasis, because it was usual for several persons to tread together in the wine-press. The crushing of the grapes, the spurting forth of the purple juice, and the dark stains on the vesture, naturally suggest an image of the waste and destruction ensuing from the triumph of some mighty conqueror. To the Hebrews, it was a familiar illustration, for, in their language, "blood of the grape" is an ordinary expression for vice.

Treading out the grapes was an exhilarating employment; in all the representations of the process we imagine that we can see joy and merriment, proceeding even to extravagance, on the countenances of those engaged in it. This circumstance explains another image of divine vengeance in the prophecies of Jeremiah: "The Lord shall mightily roar from his habitation; he shall give a shout, as they that tread the grapes, against all the inhabitants of the earth." Jer. xxv. 30. We find women sharing the pleasing toil of grape-pressing; the Greeks, as we are informed by Anacreon, excluded them from an employment likely to inspire them with a love to the intoxicating juice.

Indeed, so great was the general joy inspired by the vintage, that its cessation is one of the punishments denounced by Jeremiah against Moab: "And joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab; and I have caused wine to fail from the wine-presses; none shall tread with shouting; their shouting shall be no shouting." Jer. xlviii. 33. We have a similar allusion to the joy of the vintage in Isaiah's denunciation,—which is also against Moab: "And gladness is taken away, and joy out of the pleasant field; and in the vineyards there shall be no raging, neither shall there be shouting: the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses; I have made their vintage shouting to cease." Isa. xvi. 10.

The crushed pulp of the grapes sunk into the bottom of the vat or cistern; the expressed juice flowed out through a spout inserted in the side of the cistern, about one-third of its height from the ground. The juice was imperfectly extracted by the treading process, and another operation was required to render available what remained in the trodden pulp. For this purpose a bag, made of flags or rushes, was provided, in which the pulp was placed, and compressed by twisting the ends of the bag with staves or hand-spikes. The editor of the Pictorial Bible, a work whose judicious illustrations convey fuller and more perfect information than all the folios of the commentators, confirms our theory, that the bag was used to extract the juice from grapes already subjected to the treading operation, by observing, that there is an intermediate process in the supply of fruit to the bag-press; the grapes are deposited in large buckets, and not brought directly from the vines, as they are to the treading-press.

Fishing is one of the employments most frequently depicted on the monuments. It is recorded, as a fearful aggravation of the first plague of Egypt, "the fish that was in the river died," Ex. vii. 21; and the first great complaint of the Israelites, when they murmured against Moses in the Desert, was, "We remember the fish that we did eat in Egypt freely." Num. xi. 5. Isaiah alludes to the importance of fish to the Egyptians, when denouncing divine vengeance against them: "The fishers also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish. . . . And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make sluices and ponds for fish." Isa. xix. 8—10.

We have briefly noticed flax and cotton in our account of the agricultural produce; we have now to examine their importance to the manufacturing population of Egypt. When the prophet wishes to describe the misery which the foolishness of the Egyptian princes was likely to bring on the labouring classes of their subjects, he mentions the weavers as next in importance to the fishermen: "Moreover they that work in fine flax, and they that weave networks, shall be confounded." Isaiah xix. 9. Instead of "networks," the margin of our Bibles has "white works," which is the true translation; the prophet alludes to the cotton manufacture, which has been so often confounded with linen both by ancient and modern writers. The linen and cotton were exported in the shape of yarn. We are told that "Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn; the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." 1 Kings x. 28. And the linen of Egypt was highly valued in Palestine, for the seducer, in Proverbs, says, "I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt." Proverbs vii. 16. Spinning was wholly a female employment; it is rather singular that we find work frequently performed by a large number collected together, as if the factory system had been established three thousand years ago.

In almost every example of embroidery we find the mistress of the house either superintending the work or actually engaged in it. Our classical readers will remember that Andromache was thus employed when she received intelligence of the death of Hector:—

Far in the close recesses of the dome,
Pensive she ply'd the melancholy loom;
A growing work employed her secret hours
Confus'dly gay with intermingled flowers,
Now from the walls the clamours reach her ear,
And all her members shake with sudden fear;
Forth from her ivory hand the shuttle falls,
Alarm'd, astonished to her maids she calls.

Ibid., XXII.

Surcoats ornamented with needle-work formed no small part of the ancient warrior's pride. An allusion is made to the custom in the most striking passage of Deborah's triumphal hymn, "The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots? Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself, Have they not sped? have they not divided the prey? to every man a damsel or two; to Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, meet for the necks of them that take the spoil." Judges v. 28—30. The repetition of the "divers colours" in this passage, is a strong proof of the value that was anciently set on this embroidered work.

Herodotus assures us that weaving was especially the business of men, but his observation must be understood to apply to the public manufactories rather than to the employments of domestic life. The most beautiful specimen of it which we have yet seen is given by Minutola, from the tombs of Beni Hulsan, vol. ii. plate 24; it would be impossible to exhibit its peculiarities without the aid of colours, but they may perhaps be understood from the following description. The weaver's loom is held fast by four blocks, securely imbedded in the ground; the workman sits on that part of the web already finished, which is a small delicately chequered pattern of yellow and green; the materials spread around prove to us that the byssus, or cotton employed in the manufacture of the richest cloths, was dyed in the wool before it was placed in the hands of the weaver. It is manifest also, from the account Moses gives us of the furnishing of the tabernacle, that the wool was frequently coloured before it was given to the female weavers and spinners. He says, "all the women that were wise-hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen." Exodus xxxv. 25. The sacred historian also mentions a material for spinning which we have not positively identified on the monuments, though we think that in some instances its presence is probable: "And all the women whose hearts stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair." Exodus xxxv. 26.

Moses is the first who mentions the preparation of gold in wires to be interwoven with the more precious cloths. "And they did beat the gold into thin plates and cut it into wires, to work it in the blue, and in the purple, and in the scarlet, and in the fine linen, with cunning work." Exodus xxxix. 3. Cloth of golden tissue is not uncommon on the monuments, and specimens of it have been found rolled about the mummies, but it is not easy to determine whether the wire was originally interwoven, or subsequently inserted by the embroiderer.

Perhaps the most singular instance of mutual illustration between the scriptural records and the Egyptian monuments is derived from the forty-fifth Psalm, in connection with the subject under discussion. It is generally supposed that this Psalm was a hymeneal ode composed on the occasion of Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, although it is allowed on all hands to have a much higher purport, prophetically referring to the majesty and grace of the Messiah's kingdom. As many of the illustrations we have derived from the monuments are new, having escaped the notice of the commentators, we shall follow the order of the Psalm rather than of the main subject, the textile fabrics of Egypt, in the order of our remarks. The title of the Psalm is of some importance; it is headed, "To the chief musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil, a song of loves." The word Shoshannim has puzzled the commentators, Jewish and Christian; it signifies "lilies," and they all declare that "lilies" have nothing to do with the subject of the ode. But, as we shall presently see, this hymeneal ode was intended to be sung by the female attendants of the Egyptian princess, and they are called "the lilies," not only by a poetic reference to the lotus-lilies of the Nile, but by a direct allusion to their custom of making the lotus-lily a conspicuous ornament of their head-dress. Shoshannim, then, instead of being the name of an unknown tune, as most of the commentators assert, is a poetic allusion at once to the country, the beauty, and the dress of the female choristers.

Maschil signifies "instruction;" the word rendered "of loves." (Jedidith) signifies also "the beloved one," or, by a slight change in the pointing, "the lovely or beloved girl;" that is, the female attendants for whose instruction the ode was composed.

Let us now turn to the thirteenth and fourteenth verses. "The king's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework; the virgins, her companions that follow her, shall be brought unto thee." The first clause refers to the light fine texture of the Egyptian muslins; they were so delicate as to receive the name of "woven air," through which the whole form is distinctly displayed.

We have already mentioned the use of "wrought gold" both in the weaving and the embroidery of Egypt. The latter, of course, is alone referred to by the term "needle-work," but we do not find, from the monuments, embroidery much practised as a trade distinct from weaving. It is sufficiently evident, from what has been said, that the art of dyeing had made as great progress as that of weaving. The various colours, white, yellow, red, blue, green, and black, are met with in beautiful perfection, but without mixture, for it appears that the Egyptians did not know how to produce a variety of shades by mixing and blending their colours. In one of Rosellini's plates, however, we think that we have found an example of an attempt to produce the varying shades of shot-silk. But no one can look at the number and richness of the colours without being compelled to inquire whether their dye-stuffs were indigenous or imported from abroad. We have reason to believe that the blue is derived from indigo, which neither the monuments nor the historians notice among the productions of Egypt. It was most probably obtained from India. In a naval combat on the Red Sea, forming a compartment in one of the pictures supposed to represent the wars of Sesostris, we have Hindûs, or a nation cognate to them, engaged in fight with the Egyptians, and if there was a warlike, there might also have been a commercial intercourse between the two nations. It is probable that dye-stuffs were obtained from the Tyrians; their scarlet and purple colours have been always celebrated; they had an extensive commerce through Babylon with the interior of central Asia; and their trade with Egypt was so extensive that they established a factory at Memphis, under the protection of their national goddess Astarte. This intercourse must have been anterior to the days of Solomon, for in his hymeneal ode, one of the encouragements he holds out to his Egyptian bride is, "The daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift." Psalm xlv. 12. In the time of Ezekiel, the Tyrian trade with Egypt, and its description, is one of the chief features in his account of the wealth of Tyre. "Fine linen, with brodered work from Egypt, was that which thou spreadest forth to be thy sail." Ezekiel xxvii. 7.

We cannot conclude this portion of our subject without some reference to the works in metal, which rank next in importance to weaving. It would appear that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, for all the implements not formed of gold and silver, are painted green, and must manifestly have been made of brass. We need not remind our classical readers that all the weapons mentioned by Homer are said to have been formed of this metal. Casting must have been carried to a high degree of perfection, for most, if not all, of the war chariots are brazen; a circumstance proved not only by their green colour, but by the lightness and neatness of their wheels, and their beautiful ornaments, too elaborate to have been carved. Swords, quivers, knives, axes, and adzes, are all formed from the same material, and even some bows appear to have been formed of this metal. As there were no mines in Egypt, it seems probable that the great quantity of metal required in the arts was obtained from the interior of Africa. Copper, in hardness, bears the proportion to iron of about eight to nine, and was therefore not very much inferior to it before the art of forming the latter into steel was discovered. The monuments clearly show us that iron was either unknown or unused in the flourishing days of the Pharaohs, and the circumstance tends strongly to demonstrate the antiquity of the Pentateuch, and consequently its authenticity as a contemporary document, when we find that invariably the metals described as employed for use or ornament, are those only which appear on the ancient monuments of Egypt. Thus Bezabel is said to have been instructed "to devise cunning works, to work in gold, in silver, and in brass." Exodus xxxi. 4. It may be necessary to add, that in Hebrew the same word signifies both brass and copper; our translators invariably use the former, even when the native expression is mentioned. The account given of the structure of the tabernacle proves that metallurgy must have been well understood in the days of Moses, and from the description of the golden calf, we may infer that the casting of idols and statues was no uncommon practice. Gilding was certainly understood by the Egyptians, for we find traces of it on the mummies and the mummy cases. It would be too long a digression to examine whether the "overlaying the boards of the tabernacle with gold," Exodus xxxvi. 34, refers to gilding or a covering of thin plates; but, in support of the former view, we may notice that the weight of the plates would have rendered the tabernacle very difficult of transport, and a positive incumbrance to the Israelites in their journeying through the desert; the amount of gold, too, collected by Moses, would not have supplied sufficient material for plates, however thin, to cover the entire edifice; and, finally, the word here rendered "overlaying," is the same used to describe the decorating of the carved work in Solomon's temple, which must have been gilding, as plates, however thin, would have concealed the tracery and foliage described to have been wrought with so much artistic skill.

Metal mirrors were in common use among the ancient Egyptians; they occasionally appear on the monuments, and are mentioned by Moses in the account of the brazen laver. "He made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the looking-glasses (metal mirrors) of the women assembling." Exodus xxxvii. 8. The Egyptian women of rank appear to have used mirrors of burnished silver. Bells, chains, ear-rings, and other metallic ornaments, are not only depicted on the monuments, but found in the tombs.

A LETTER TO A CHRISTIAN FRIEND IN AFFLICTION.

By THE REV. S. SIMPSON,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Usher's Quay, Dublin.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I am glad to find that you are so much recovered from the severe indisposition of body with which you have been lately exercised. Sickness is one of those evils sin has brought upon us, and from which few are always exempt in this mortal state. The human frame is of so delicate a make, so tender in all its parts, that it is easily impaired, and sometimes the least inattention will lay a foundation for some dreadful disease, which will not lose its hold, till it has destroyed the vitals, and brought its possessor to the house appointed for all living. However, I would be thankful, with you, that the Lord has been pleased to restore you your wonted health; and I hope that you will be able to see, that the Supreme Disposer of all events hath been infinitely wise in causing you to pass through the fire. As we are sometimes led to set a greater value upon our blessings, by being for a time deprived of them; so, perhaps, (after this trial,) should you enjoy your health in future, you will be more thankful for it, and more careful of it.

Need I remind you, that no child of God escapes the rod? He "scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not?" Heb. vi. 12. The wicked are often permitted to enjoy uninterrupted tranquillity, in the pursuit of earthly vanities, and in the gratification of their own corrupt desires; but our Heavenly Father loves his children too dearly, and has purchased them at too exalted a price, to suffer them to fall a prey to the god of this world. He allows the ungodly to enjoy their short-lived happiness now; but having reserved a better inheritance for his people, he trains them up by certain rules, and according to a certain plan of discipline, till all the dross of their character is purged away, and they are fitted for the presence of angels and glorified saints above. And what child of God ever escaped affliction? If we look at Moses, at Abraham, at Job, at David, at Daniel, at the apostles, and at all the first Christians, we see that the page which unfolds their history is but the record of their afflictions. And why should any disciple of Jesus suppose that he shall escape affliction? Is the servant greater than his master? And shall we be ashamed to follow in His footsteps, who was emphatically "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief?" Affliction, my dear friend, is the consecrated path that conducts to heaven; and it is "through much tribulation that we are to enter the kingdom." Acts xvi. 22.

Some of the dispensations of Divine Providence are exceedingly painful and mysterious. They deprive us of property, of health, and of the desire of our eyes, with a stroke. They make our hearts desolate, and render our house "the house of mourning." But, when sanctified, they are often the means of more than ordinary communion with our God. We see his hand guiding and inflicting them; we hear his voice speaking to us by them; we feel his influence accompanying them; and we say, "It is the Lord,—let him do what seemeth good in his sight." And when this is the case, we have fellowship with God, and the merciful design of affliction is answered. For as Absalom set Joab's field on fire, in order to gain an interview with him; so God often sends some fiery trial to us, for the very purpose of bringing us nearer to himself, that we may have fellowship one with another; and though the furnace through which we have to pass be seven times heated, yet one like the Son of man is always there, and there "we have fellowship with him in his sufferings." Blessed Jesus! thou hast been a man of sorrows; thou art touched with the feeling of all our infirmities; every string that trembles in our bosom, produces a vibration in thine own; and thou art nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and savest such as are of a contrite spirit.

Let us, my dear friend, seek rightly to improve every trying dispensation. When we feel the smart of the rod in our persons, our families, or our circumstances, let us examine ourselves, and, under divine assistance, seek to know the reason why God contends with us. Perhaps there is, as one remarks, some sin unmortified, some temper highly offensive in his sight, some neglected duty that looks us in the face and reproaches us, some idol to which our hearts cling with criminal determination. Perhaps our closet testifies against us, that we have not frequented it; our Bible, that we have not perused it; our sanctuary, that we have not profited by its ordinances. Be assured, that when God afflicts, it is not without a cause. O try, then, to find out the cause; and pray that it may be removed—that the frown of your heavenly Father may be exchanged for his gracious smile. Then only do afflictions benefit us, when they check our pride and vanity, when they strengthen our faith, when they enliven our zeal, when they revive our hope and joy, when they diminish the influence of present things, when they quicken the wheels of Christian obedience, and prompt us to a more uninterrupted communion with God. By these few hints, you may know whether your afflictions have been sanctified to you; and if they have not, do not wonder if they are repeated: indeed they will be repeated, if you are a child of God.

The design of affliction is to awaken to reflection, to abase in penitence, and to bring the soul to God. But how alarming is the situation of those who, after all they endure, remain impenitent, unconverted, unsanctified! It is a grievous thing to suffer, and not to be benefited by suffering; it presents a melancholy case to pass through scenes of adversity, and to be no better for them; yet this, alas! is no uncommon case, and the issue must be dreadful. Let us lay the subject to heart; it demands the closest application. Those who continue unhumiliated and unholy under the discipline of the Almighty, and against the voice of his Son, will ere long have to make a dismal exchange of worlds; they will pass from trials here to bitter anguish hereafter; and will sink from the sorrows of time into the unutterable torments of eternity. May God, of his infinite mercy, prevent this wretched result! May we have an interest in the paternal love of God; may we have the eternal Jehovah as our covenanted Father, and our never changing friend. O! if we have but the "everlasting arms underneath us," in affliction or in death, we shall have a pillow on which to rest with composure and delight. What is all the world without this? To enter the furnace of affliction without the attendance of the Son of God, is to have the first sparks of the flames of hell kindling upon us! But, O forget not that Jesus is the way to his Father's heart—the only way. In your union to him, you will have a pledge of all present and all future good. With his arm on which to lean, the wilderness, even of this perplexed life, will begin to wear a smile, and the desert of affliction itself will blossom as the rose.

I hope, my dear friend, that the Lord will go on to restore your wonted health, that your animal frame may be strengthened, and above all, that you may enjoy the blessing of Him, in the light of whose countenance is life, and whose favour is as the cloud of the latter rain. If he be with us all will be well, whether we are in health or sickness, prosperity or adversity, life or death; but without him, we can do nothing, enjoy nothing, or say nothing to any good purpose. The most abject situation is pleasant when he smiles—the most elevated miserable when he frowns. We are ready to sink under the smallest trial, destitute of his presence; but we can rejoice in the greatest, when he communicates to us his grace. Happy are those who see themselves weak, that Christ may strengthen them,—that feel themselves as nothing, that Christ may be all and in all unto them. Such will be able to discern his wisdom in all the dispensations of his providence, and admire his wonderful love and unmerited kindness in the work of redemption, while they are enabled to be submissive and patient in every trial, happy and composed in every difficulty, thankful for every cross as well as for every comfort, and at last go off triumphantly to the world of glory above.

That we may enter into that rest which remains for the people of God, is the prayer of your unworthy but willing servant.

INVITATION TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

THIS is the feast of heavenly wine,
And God invites to sup;
The juices of the living Vine
Were press'd to fill the cup.

O bless the Saviour, ye that eat,
With royal dainties fed;
Not heaven affords a costlier treat,
For Jesus is the bread.

The vile, the lost, he calls to them
Ye trembling souls, appear!
The righteous in their own esteem
Have no acceptance here.

Approach, ye poor, nor dare refuse
The banquet spread for you.
Dear Saviour, this is welcome news,
Then I may venture too.

If guilt and sin afford a plea,
And may obtain a place,
Surely the Lord will welcome me,
And I shall see his face.

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE REDEEMER,— A SACRAMENTAL HYMN.

THE Saviour, what a noble flame
Was kindled in his breast,
When hastening to Jerusalem,
He march'd before the rest!

Good-will to men, and zeal for God,
His every thought engross;
He longs to be baptized with blood,
He pants to reach the cross.

With all his sufferings full in view,
And woes to us unknown,
Forth to the task his spirit flew;
'Twas love that urged him on.

Lord, we return thee what we can!
Our hearts shall sound abroad,
Salvation to the dying Man,
And to the rising God!

And while thy bleeding glories here
Engage our wondering eyes,
We learn our lighter cross to bear,
And hasten to the skies.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Drunkard reclaimed.—The following anecdote was related by John Eastward, of Yorkshire, a hawker:—As I passed through a village in Yorkshire, I asked a poor woman to buy a religious tract. She replied, "Away with you and your tracts." I turned round and threw one in at the door, and the wind carried it under the table. The man of the house came home, saw it, took it up, and read the title, "Wonderful Advantages of Drunkenness;" he left his dinner, and put it in his pocket. After he got to his work, he read it again. In the evening his companions missed him at the ale-house; and when they saw him, they inquired where he was on the preceding evening. He said he had been reading a religious tract. At this account of himself, they one and all laughed, and said he was going to turn Methodist. His neighbours said, "John P. was sober last night;" which quite surprised them, as this seldom occurred. But from this time he kept from the public-house, and began to pay his debts. His wife told all who inquired about him, that the cause of the great change, was reading a religious tract, entitled, "The Wonderful Advantages of Drunkenness," which a poor man had thrown in at their door. After being away two years, I returned to that neighbourhood again. I stopped at a public-house, about two miles distant from the village before named, and offered my tract for sale. One of the persons in the room, with a dreadful oath, said, I was one of those ranters or methodists that had made their companion mad. The woman of the house said, "Do you call him mad? Then I wish you were like him; then you would pay the five pounds you owe me; for he has paid me every farthing he owed me, and all in less than two years." On entering a house, about a mile further, I was informed, that the tract I had thrown, two years before, into a poor man's house, had made him another man. At length I arrived at the village. A woman looked very hard at me, and said, "Are you not the man who sold me some tracts about two years ago?" I said I was. Then she said, "I have eighteen-pence, which a friend left for you, and now you must go with me to the house where you threw the tract in, which the wind carried under the table, and I am quite sure the woman will not tell you to go away now." As soon as I entered, the woman informed her I was the old man she so much wished to see. She cried out, "What! that dear man you threw in the tract?" and, running, she took hold of my hand, and said, "I humbly beg your pardon for what I said; I was in a passion, and vile and wicked." She bade me sit down to dinner, and said her husband would be there in a few minutes. As soon as he came in, she told him who I was. He took me very kindly by the hand, and said, "Blessed was that hour when you threw the tract into my house, and thrice blessed is that God who directed you to one so wicked, wretched poor and wretched; spent most of my time in the ale-house; but now, thank God, I have a house of my own, and it is my greatest delight to come home after the labours of the day, and talk of the goodness of the God which directed me to the reading of the tract, 'The Wonderful Advantages of Drunkenness.'"

The Power of the Word.—In the parish of the late Rev. L. Richmond, was a dissolute, thoughtless man, who bitterly persecuted religion in those who professed it. He had formed a secret resolution never more to enter the church. Circumstances, however, constrained him to alter his determination. Mr R. preached from Psalm li. 10; "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." Sharper than a two-edged sword is the Word of God; and in its application by the power of the Spirit to this poor man, it proved to be "the hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces." He confessed, that immediately on his return home, he, for the first time, fell on his knees, and with tears and tears poured forth the strong emotions of his heart in the language of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

FAITH CONSIDERED AS A DUTY,—OBJECTIONS.

THE last topic considered was, what are the things to be believed concerning Jesus Christ, of which the blessed result is the salvation of him who believes them. This is what is commonly expressed by “saving faith.” We shall now consider this faith in Christ as a “commanded duty,” and we hope to show that the command is reasonable, and that the objections to it are futile and untenable.

To show that it is a commanded duty, we have only to quote the apostle’s language, 1 John iii. 2, 3, “This is His commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.” Every one knows that what are called good works consist of obedience to the commandments of God; and in accordance with this, our Saviour calls obedience to the command to believe in him a “work;” and as involving all good works, and all that constitutes them good, he calls it “the work,” and “the work of God.” The connection in which the passage occurs is this: our Lord having fed the five thousand with five loaves and two small fishes, the multitude came next day to hear his instructions; and in reference to the miracle by which he had satisfied their hunger, he exhorted them not to “labour or work for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto everlasting life. Then said they unto him,” under the influence of that carnal tendency, which renders men desirous to establish a claim of right on the divine favour, “what shall we do that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, this is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.”

There is no man, except the brutalized victim of vice, and devoted slave of Satan, that ever doubts the reasonableness of being commanded to obey God; yet, somehow or other, it will be found, in point of fact, that men limit their notions of obedience to outward acts. They feel the reasonableness of engaging in the the worship of God, and ous, and compassionate t seem to overlook the or to these acts, and the wa an abomination in the sig is love to God, on the or fellow-creatures, on the ot that “love is the fulfilli he particularly noted, we God with all the heart, a mind, and to love our ) Now, I am not aware reasonableness of the generally at least, even c are living in enmity to then, can there be love ti belief; not only in the ex butes and qualities of the indeed, is the object of possesses? Any man that thinks that all that constitutes ob to the mental powers and as it is commonly expres and the heart. It is the t school of Christ, by whic for heaven. It is by this by our bodily organs, and which they are composed, God himself; and it is or

Him who is a Spirit is impressed. It is the training of this immortal part of us, and that which we more properly call ourselves, that is the great object of all the divine communications made to our guilty race. It is the right government and exercise of these powers that constitute duty; and as to the corporeal organs, they serve the purpose for which they were formed, when they are under the direction and guidance of the nobler faculties. This is all so plain and incontrovertible, that one is almost ashamed to dwell on it, or introduce any illustration of it; but when we consider how many there are who, from want of reflection and discrimination, are apt to confound the plainest truths, then we see the necessity of giving "line upon line, and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little." Let us, then, take a very simple illustration: We employ an ingenious artist to execute some nice piece of mechanism, and he does it to our admiration. Now, on what is it that our commendation is bestowed? Is it on the artist's bodily members, that were employed in the work, or the tools he used? No; but it is on the presiding mind, that directed these bodily members, and guided them in the employment of these tools. So in the Christian's obedience, however we may admire the outward acts of firmness, and fortitude, and self-denial, and his manifold and unwearied labours of love, it is on the inward invisible presiding mind, directing every bodily act, that all our commendation is bestowed. It is to the faith and love that guided that mind that we trace the noble outward acts. The tree was made good, and therefore its fruits are good. We may see, then, how it is that, without faith, there can be nothing good in us, and how it is that "whatsoever is not of faith is sin." We may see, also, the reasonableness of the command to believe God's testimony concerning his Son, and of our eternal happiness depending on our doing so, as the Scriptures frequently declare that it does, in such language as this,—“he that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned.”

Innumerable passages to this effect will occur to every one acquainted with his Bible, where the most tremendous punishments are threatened against unbelief, as a failure in the most important of all duties, and in a duty, without which none other can be acceptably performed. We have more than once alluded to the declaration, that “without faith it is impossible to please God.” But if it were not a reasonable duty, the absence of it would not and could not be punished by the Judge of all the earth, who can do that only which is right.

Without farther quotation from Scripture, which we have seen to be very explicit, we shall notice an objection, which ignorance, prejudice, or impiety has urged against the position, that faith is a reasonable duty. The objection is, that faith does not depend upon ourselves. It is an act of the mind, which we cannot control, and is altogether independent of the will. When sufficient evidence is produced, we believe whether we will or not; but when the evidence either is, or appears to be deficient, belief becomes impossible, as, in the other case, it becomes unavoidable.

In this objection, which is here exhibited in its most imposing form, there is, as in every other plausible error, some mixture of truth; and the quantity is just what is sufficient, with superficial minds, to gild over the pill of error, and to give a fair and false appearance to the poison which it contains.

It is true that we cannot, and should not, believe without sufficient evidence; and when we possess, or rather when we candidly attend to sufficient evidence, it is impossible not to believe. Here, however, there is much of the truth concealed, and, as it were, put out of the way. We cannot believe without evidence. True; but cannot we avoid attending to the evidence, and thus escape the conviction which it would produce? We may say, and say truly, that we cannot see without light; but cannot we shut our eyes against it? or, by immuring ourselves in a dungeon, may we not, with our eyes open, avoid every ray of it, even when the sun pours upon the world the full flood of his noontide effulgence?

The application of all this is too apparent to be pointed out. We know that the same cause operating in the same circumstances, will always produce the same effect. Every mind, therefore, that is equally well informed, and equally free from prejudice and the love of sin, will be affected in the same way by the same evidence. Now, if great, and good, and learned men have been convinced by what has had no such effect upon others, to what is the difference of result to be ascribed? Is it to the men, or to the evidence? The evidence remains unquestionably the same; just as the sun shines, whether we bask under his cheering beams, or retreat to the inmost recesses of the deep and dark caverns where no ray can penetrate. Hence our Lord's explanation of the whole matter, and the justness of the doom that awaits those who shut out the light: “This,” says he, “is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.” John iii. 19. Men remain ignorant of the principles of the Gospel, because they know this much of their holy nature, that they are at variance with their guilty passions and unhallowed pursuits; and as to the evidence of divine truth, they will no more examine it with candour, than the criminal will bring into view the evidence that condemns him.

Such are the true causes of all the insincerity that can exist in a Christian country. It is all to be traced to the corruption of the human heart, and a disinclination to have that corruption exposed, condemned, or abandoned. It is our unquestionable duty to honour God; and in order to do so, to investigate truth, and to act according to it when discovered. It is equally plain that every man who remains in unbelief, without sufficient evidence of the truth is within his reach, must stand condemned as guilty of violating a "reasonable duty."

We may be allowed here to assume, what has been demonstrated a thousand and a thousand times, that, with a rightly constituted and candid mind, the evidence for the truth of the Gospel, and therefore of every fact and doctrine which it contains, is manifold, strong, and irresistible. It requires but the exercise of a clear head and an honest heart to come to the knowledge and belief of the truth; and if this happy result be prevented by the perversion of the noblest powers of our nature, is it not just and reasonable that those who are chargeable with such guilt should suffer the doom, unutterable and unending, that is denounced against the unbeliever? For it is the doom attached to the violation of a duty, that, in every aspect of it, is reasonable in itself, and which, if performed, secures the blessedness in time, and through eternity, of him who humbly and faithfully endeavours to perform it.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF JEAN ANTOINE CADIOT
OF GURAT AND VAUX IN FRANCE.

THE Protestant Church of France has of late years excited peculiar interest among the Christians of other countries. It has evidently awakened to a greater zeal in behalf of the doctrines of the Reformation, and both among its pastors and people there has been a revival of vital religion, which, in many districts, has brought over numbers from the corruptions of the Romish Church. Among these converts to the Protestant faith, we have selected one as the subject of our present sketch.

Jean Antoine Cadiot was born in 1797, in the Commune of Bors, in the department of Charente. His parents destined him at an early age for the pastoral office, in connection with the Roman Church, to which they themselves belonged; and as the young man early exhibited proofs of decided talent, he passed through his course of study at the ecclesiastical seminaries of Sarlat and Angoulême with the marked approbation of his instructors. Having received ordination from the bishop of the diocese, he was soon intrusted with the pastoral cure of the parish of Gurat and Vaux. While engaged in preparation for the ministerial office, the mind of Cadiot had become acquainted with the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, and as he still continued to study the Word of God, with a simple desire to know the truth, that, with all fidelity, he might declare it to his people, the Lord was pleased gradually to enlarge and rectify his views of divine truth. He now preached the Gospel with all conscientiousness and earnestness, and his parishioners crowded to hear his public sermons, and even to wait upon his private instructions. The result was most encouraging. Many eagerly inquired the way to Zion with their faces thitherward. Perceiving the unscriptural nature of many of the ceremonies of the Romish Church, both pastor and people were eager to rid themselves of all such unhallowed observances. But in this they proceeded with as much caution as was consistent with a firm adherence to principle. Their caution, however, was of no avail. A persecution arose against this devoted minister of the cross, and he was cruelly and an outcast for the cause.

Young Cadiot was not secuting the sacred work felt the power of the truth his own soul, and he burned the glad tidings of salvation banished from the Church passing over to Jersey and prepare himself for return minister; or, if his enemies tended to proceed as a Mission, however, had other of Cadiot began to decline where he connected himself with the congregation of that town. worldly interests, but he had his firm determination which had so basely and for his fidelity in his Master.

Though destitute, however, view, he was not forsaken to him a kind friend, in the M. Soulier, who received to his children.

Before this period, Cadiot his late parishioners, giving principles which he had for leaving the Church of was productive of much reared people for whom it plain impressive statements he, "no, my dear parishioners the religion of the Lord those ordinances of men, tempted to make a means of ed myself more strongly to salvation in him alone; not tions of men, nor resting In the shelter and quiet whi ed, the young convert now paring two other pastoral treatise in opposition to the several months his health c the 1st of July 1824, he symptoms began to develop too evident to M. Soulier a teresting young friend had now become an object of p Protestants of Anduse. A his bedside, to listen to his informed that he was dying, moved. He lost no time in he once more addressed a rishioners, headed by these: death-bed," and it runs thus

"DEARLY BELOVED PARISHMENT such as the present, strongly impressed than ever to your consciences, and to proved to yourselves, that t cisely what you would wish when death shall burst the soul in the mortal body? that while in perfect health ciently serious on matters of that we pay no regard to 'the one thing needful,' in comparison of which all other things are as nothing. I mean the need—the urgent need of having recourse to the divine mercy, by faith in and through the grace which is in Christ Jesus: but now that this day I find myself stretched on the bed of death, I feel great uneasiness on your account, and tremble, when I think on the state of your souls, and the situation in which many of you are placed. I have summoned up my little remaining strength to endeavour to avert a great evil, your everlasting condemnation, in warning you, it may be for the last time, that there is salvation in none other but the Lord Jesus Christ—to seek it elsewhere is a delusion, which will most assuredly not fail to precipitate into the gulf of eternal misery those who suffer themselves to be misled by its deceitful light—there is yet time for you, my dear friends, to awake from that death-sleep in which you have been so long pining. Look around you, and you will see that it is the merciful goodness of God which has spared you hitherto. Had not his kindness sustained you, you would have been long ago cast into the place where mercy enters not. Oh then, since you perceive the danger from which he has delivered you, let not the time of your gracious visitation be lost,—it is a time of grace—of mercy and of peace!"

Thus far had he dictated when he was unable to proceed. He gradually became weaker and weaker. M. Soulier waited upon him with all the tenderness and affection of a father, and the interviews which passed between them he has faithfully recorded. The following extracts may be useful:—

"The next day being the Sabbath, before day-break he said to Madame Nougier, the mistress of the house, 'To-day is the day of rest: if the Lord would vouchsafe to make it that of my rest, it would be a happy event for my soul.' He repeated the same to M. Soulier, and added, 'All days are days of grace—every hour—every moment—is an hour and a moment of mercy; while we are unconverted, we are infidels.' He said a little after, 'This body of dust must be destroyed, that it may rise again a glorious incorruptible body.'

"The evening of the day before his death, M. Soulier found him surrounded by many pious Christians, who, anxious to take a last farewell of this devoted servant of the Saviour, and to profit by his instructions, were on their knees around his bed, when he thus expressed himself:—"I cannot speak," said he to them; "but my desire, my great desire would be to transfuse into the soul of every one who hears me, a sense of the need I have experienced, and do still experience, to be more closely attached to Jesus. You are young, but alas! you see the Lord makes no distinction. He calls the young, as well as the old, to render their account, and to appear before him. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

"Long before it was light, on the day of his death, he sent for his friend, wishing to say something more on the benefit he had derived from the afflictions with which he had been tried; after this he heard with great attention some chapters read from the New Testament. He had not for a long time closed his eyes, in consequence of his sufferings; but now, looking forward with faith to the repose of the grave which awaited his body, while his soul dwelt with delight on the glory to be revealed on its release from earthly troubles, he burst forth into a rapturous prayer, beginning, 'Morning star from on high! brilliant star of day! raise thyself up,—come to enlighten me!' It was remarkable for the scriptural view he took of the salvation of mankind by the blood of Christ."

The last struggles of nature cannot be described better than in the words of M. Soulier:—

"In the morning he prayed often, but in a weak lower, or more feeble voice; I heard at one time these words, 'It has pleased Thee to prolong my trial, in not granting me sleep; thy holy name be blessed! O! it is doubtless to purify my body and soul that I must do so; this is clearly revealed in thy Word.' 'You cannot sleep,' said I to him, having observed his anxious desire, for some time, to find repose, 'but you shall find spiritual repose on the bosom of the Saviour, and fall asleep in his arms.' 'O yes!' said he, 'that is my hope.' Having requested a draught of the freshest water I said to him, 'In a little you will satisfy your thirst at the fountain of living waters.' 'Oh! yes,' said he, in reply, 'those are the truly good waters,—these only refresh the body; but those of heaven which flow from Jesus the Fountain of living waters, which spring to everlasting life, will refresh the soul for ever.'"

"Finally, his last moments drew nigh; we were all on our knees around his bed, and did not suppose he was now able to hear us praying, but as I concluded, I expressed myself thus, 'Lord Jesus come, gather thy soul into thy bosom!' he repeated the word 'Come!' and when I had said 'Amen, and Amen!' he also repeated 'Amen!' A little after we prayed again, not having the least idea that he yet heard us, but when I had again repeated 'Amen!' his eyes, which had been half-closed, were opened a little wider, and elevated towards heaven. These two words were the last he dying lips uttered, and the last expression of his piety was the uplifting of his eyes to heaven. Shortly the Lord came indeed, to transport, from time to eternity, the immortal soul which he had given him, and which he had redeemed with no less a price than his own most precious blood."

Thus died, on Monday, 19th July 1824, in the 27th year of his age, one who had been rescued from the darkness of Papal ignorance, and introduced to a clear experimental knowledge of divine truth. His life was short, but it was long enough to evince that he had become a child of God and an heir of glory.

A SKETCH OF THE EARLY HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN SCOTLAND

BY THE REV. JAMES BRYCE,
Minister of Gilcomston Parish, Aberdeen.

PERIOD I.

FROM ITS INTRODUCTION TO A.D., 432.

At the time when the Son of God came into the world, the inhabitants of Scotland well deserved the epithet of barbarians, which the Greeks and Romans arrogantly applied to all but themselves. Virgil has mentioned the entire separation of the Britons from the rest of the world, and Catullus speaks of them not only as extremely remote, which might apply to their insular situation, but also as horrible, which might refer to their fierce and savage aspect, as they were accustomed to paint their faces, and other parts of their bodies, with war-paint. That part of Britain to the north was much less productive than that to the south of the river Tweed, and from its distance, as well as from the enmity which generally subsists between barbarian tribes, it was deprived of the advantages which might have been derived from intercourse with the nations of the continent. It is probable, the poverty of the inhabitants of Scotland, more than their warlike prowess, preserved their independence, and the Granpian mountains presented a natural barrier, beyond which the conquerors of the world were either unable or unwilling to penetrate. The natives of Italy shivered amid the frosts and snows of Caledonia, and the hardy soldier turned with disgust from the stormy hills, where the objects calculated to true, while the circumstances connected with it are false. The story is this: Victor, Bishop of Rome, was requested to send some preachers to Scotland, which he did, and their preaching was attended with the most astonishing success. Never did any people lay aside idolatry with such readiness, or embrace the doctrines of the Gospel with such eagerness. They came in so great numbers to receive baptism, that duly to administer it became a very oppressive duty. This is Dempster's account of the matter; but the narrative of Buchanan is much more sober. He intimates, that Donald I., and several of his successors, had great difficulty in bringing the people to embrace Christianity; and this fact is more consistent with what may be supposed to be the circumstances of the case. The Druids had been intrusted with extraordinary powers, and possessed great influence, and they would not be slow in using their power and influence in their own behalf. They could scarcely be ignorant of the gradual diffusion of Christianity over western Europe, and their knowledge of this fact would only serve to sharpen their jealousy. History has, indeed, preserved no memorials of the victims of Druidical persecution; but well knowing how men placed in similar circumstances have uniformly acted, we can have no doubt that the authority which they exercised would not be resigned without a tremendous struggle. While Christianity was confined to a few individuals in different places, any public profession of it must have been attended with very serious danger. But the case must have been greatly altered, when the king and his nobles were converted. Their conversion was a powerful lever, by which the public mind was to be moved, and by which the resistance of the Druids was to be overcome. Still the influence of the Druids with the people, must have been set in opposition to the example and influence of the king; and this, in all probability, formed a part of the difficulties to which Buchanan simply alludes as standing in the way of the introduction of Christianity. One thing is certain, whether the conversion of this monarch be true or false, Christianity, in the beginning of the third century, began to be more widely diffused in Scotland, and the Druidical superstition began at that time to fall into disrepute. Had the records of that age come down to our times, it is not improbable we would have found the Druids maintaining as fierce a struggle for preserving their superiority as the Church of Rome maintained at the Reformation. The successive pages of history present us with new actors and new circumstances; but the principles of the human heart are in every age, and in every climate, uniformly the same.

The reign of Donald I. in Scotland corresponds to that of Severus at Rome, and the history of that Emperor enables us to perceive, that the opposition of the Druids did not constitute the only difficulty which stood in the way of the introduction of Christianity into this country. After almost incredible exertions, Severus obtained the empire of the world, and he was doomed to experience, that true happiness and lasting satisfaction are not necessarily connected with the most exalted rank, and with the most extensive power. In his advanced age, the enmity of his sons towards each other embittered his existence. The luxury of the capital only served to increase their mutual hatred, and Severus heard, with pleasure, of an invasion of the Roman province of Britain by those who dwell beyond its northern boundary. He left Rome, and took his sons along with him, to wage war with these presumptuous barbarians. Old, and enfeebled with disease, he encountered the storms and colds of Caledonia. He passed the wall of Antoninus, and pushed northward without meeting an enemy. He penetrated to the northern extremity of the island, an achievement which was accomplished by the loss of fifty thousand men. The perseverance of Severus tamed the spirit of the Caledonians, and they sued for peace, which was granted, on condition that they would surrender their arms, and cede a large portion of their territory. But their submission was only for a time. When the Roman legions returned to the more genial climates of the south, the Caledonians again assumed their attitude of sturdy independence. The Emperor was exasperated—he was determined to wage against them, a war of utter extirpation—and was only prevented by his death, in the year 211, from carrying his bloody purpose into execution. It may be easily supposed that these events were unfavourable to Christianity, and that the Druids were able, for a time, to arrest its progress.

The age of Severus and his sons has been fixed upon as that period when Ossian wrote the poems which are known to the literary world by the translation of Macpherson. If the writings of Ossian be genuine, they would go far to overturn all the conclusions which have now been drawn, in regard to the existence of the Christian religion in Scotland during the two first centuries; for he does not make the most distant allusion to Christianity. But the same objection applies, with equal force, to the Druidical superstition, which is not so much as mentioned in any of the poems of this ancient Caledonian. It would be travelling out of our path to enter upon an investigation of a subject which has been so keenly controverted; but in epic poems of such length as Fingal and Temora, we might have expected, that some mention would have been made of the religion which then prevailed. The classical scholar would be at no loss to collect a system of Grecian theology from the Iliad; and if Ossian really wrote in the age of Severus, it is somewhat singular that he should not have made a single allusion to the religion of his country.

It can scarcely have escaped the observation of those who have studied this portion of the history of the Church, that many years must be passed over without a single incident which may give interest to the narrative. The progress of the historian along this barren portion of our country's history, may be compared to the journey of a traveller through a wilderness, which presents the same stern aspect of irreclaimable sterility, and whose dreariness is only sometimes relieved by the sparkling fountain and the verdant oasis, and sometimes by the simoom and the whirlwind. From the age of Severus to that of Dioclesian, there is no record of the progress of religion in the northern part of this island. It would be rash, however, to conclude, that Christianity was extirpated either by the Druids on the one hand, or by the unsettled state of the country on the other. The princes and men in authority were probably opposed to the Christian religion, and the Christians were compelled to be silent, or to maintain their profession in the midst of difficulties and persecution. In the preface to Knox's History of the Reformation, which was written by David Buchanan, the revival of Christianity is said to have taken place under the reign of King Crathallinus; but Buchanan, the historian, assigns to this event a later date, in the reign of Finormachus. The Church of Christ, under the Emperor Dioclesian, was visited with the tenth persecution. It raged with great severity for several years, and there were not wanting numerous witnesses to the truth and value of the Gospel. But it is worthy of observation, that persecution has always been an instrument in the hand of Divine Providence for the extension of the Church. When Paul and Silas were imprisoned at Philippi, the conversion of the jailer was the consequence; and when the Jews raised a tumult at Thessalonica, so that the apostle was forced to leave it by night, this occurrence became the occasion of the glad tidings of salvation reaching Breen. So it was with the persecution which began to rage in the year 302; for a number of Christians took refuge from its fury in Scotland. These refugees are spoken of as Britons, by which we are probably to understand those who inhabited the southern part of the island. But there can be little doubt, that many of different nations sought security for the exercise of the Christian religion under the mild reign of Fincormachus.

At this period mention is first made of the Culdees, who were a kind of monks or anchorites, remarkable for the purity of their doctrines, and the holiness of their lives. They sought retirement and solitude, and, after their death, the cells in which they dwelt were changed into churches. Their name, formerly written Keledei, was derived, in the opinion of Buchanan, from Cél, the place of their retreat, and Dr Jamieson gives a decided preference to this etymology. The history of the Culdees will occupy our attention in a later age. In the meantime it may be remarked, that the arrival of so many Christians in Scotland gave an impulse to the true religion, which it never afterwards lost. The cells of the Culdees must have been the places of public resort, where the people were instructed in the doctrines of the Gospel, an inference which we are entitled to draw from the fact, that cells and churches were synonymous terms. It might be matter of prudence to assemble in places distant from towns and villages, so long as a majority of the population were opposed to Christianity. But in the next age, when Druidism began to decay, these solitary spots were hallowed by the recollection of the persons who inhabited them, and of the instructions that were there delivered. Immediately churches were erected, to which they gave the names of the holy men who had formerly dwelt in the cell. Hence we have such names as Cel or Kilbride, Kilmarnock, Kilwinning, &c. To the same source may we trace the custom of burying in or near churches. The inhabitant of the cell would probably be buried near the place where he had lived, and others, from a feeling which cannot be severely censured, might be anxious to lay their bones near the dust of the holy and the good. Over the graves of the saints, churches were frequently built, and though much superstition resulted from the practice, it only shows that the best and purest feelings of the human heart may be perverted, and may indirectly lead to error and to sin.

The next prominent event connected with the progress of religion in Scotland occurred during the reign of the Roman Emperors Arcadius and Honorius. At this period the light of history becomes much more steady, and the account of the progress of Christianity more continuous. The first person mentioned by name, who held the rank of a minister of Christ, was Ninian, whose origin is not easily traced. Some state that he was nephew of Martin, Bishop of Tours, but Usher rejects this opinion, as resting on no ancient authority. There seems to be no good reason for admitting the fact of his relationship, and yet there may be some truth in the statement of Fordoun, who asserts that he enjoyed the bishop's conversation, and profited by his instructions. Others are of opinion that he was a Briton by birth. Bede and William of Malmesbury, who both use nearly the same words in speaking of his origin, have recorded this fact, and the writers of his life maintain that he was of royal descent. He obtained the rudiments of his education in Britain, and afterwards studied for several years at Rome. The remainder of his life was spent in preaching the Gospel in different parts of Scotland. Bede distinctly states that he chiefly laboured among the southern Picts, who are supposed to have inhabited the country known by the name Novantes in the time of the Romans, and now called Galloway. But much obscurity hangs over the very boundaries of the Pictish kingdom, and it is matter of dispute whether that people ever possessed any territory so far to the south. As it would be idle to dispute about a name, it may be admitted, without difficulty, that the inhabitants of Galloway, particularly Wigtonshire, enjoyed the benefit of Ninian's ministerial labours. He erected, near the seashore, a church of stone, which, from its materials, was called Candida Casa. It appears, from the expressions of Bede and others, that edifices of stone, even for the worship of God, were extremely rare in those times; and it is certain that, till a much later period, they were constructed of wattles. The place where Ninian's church was built is now called Whithorn, in Wigtonshire, and is thus described by John of Tynemouth: "It was shut in by the sea, only on the north side a way is open to any who may choose to enter." Candida Casa is said to have been dedicated to St. Martin, but it will still require to be proved that the dedication was the act of Ninian. The student of Church history must carefully distinguish between the simplicity of the fourth century and the superstitious ceremonies of the eleventh and twelfth. According to the episcopal writers, he was the first Scottish bishop. In the sense in which Presbyterians understand the meaning of the term bishop, it is impossible to give our assent to this statement. There were undoubtedly bishops in Scotland long before Ninian was born; but if it be meant diocesan bishops, with princely revenues, such as Geoffrey of Monmouth says were bestowed by King Lucius on the four archbishops and twenty-eight bishops, into which, as he condescends to inform us, England was divided in the year 164, we most distinctly deny that Ninian was a bishop at all. He had a number of fellow-labourers, whom he might direct and advise in the management of the affairs of the Church, and this might be expected from his high character and attainments, but several centuries elapsed after the death of Ninian before Scotland was made acquainted with the benefits of diocesan episcopacy.

Though the scene of Ninian's labours was chiefly the neighbourhood of Candida Casa, he seems to have occasionally visited other parts of the kingdom for the purpose of preaching the Gospel. The people's gratitude and reverence were manifested by calling many places by his name. Traces of these may be found in several of the northern counties, as far north as the Shetland Islands, and in the islands of Mull and Bute. The parish of St. Ninian's, near Stirling, is another instance. The name of this place seems to have been Ecclesia Sancti Niniani, which was contracted into Eccles, by which the village of St. Ninian's was long known, and which it still retains in the Gaelic language. Since the time of the Reformation, its present name has prevailed, a memorial, in all probability, of the diligence and fidelity of this eminent saint, and of the gratitude of the people for the benefits of his preaching.

Ninian was made to feel that, in the work of propagating the Gospel, the disciple is not greater than his Master. He is said to have experienced the persecution of those who professed to be his followers, and a cave on the coast of Wigtonshire, in the parish of Glasserton, is mentioned as having afforded him shelter and protection. It still bears the name of St. Ninian's Cave. He was borne triumphantly through all his difficulties, for "underneath were the everlasting arms." His useful life was terminated in the year 432, and the day of his death, which was the 16th of September, was long held in remembrance, not only by those who listened to his instructions, but also by their descendants through many generations. According to Usher, who quotes from John Bale, he wrote a volume of meditations on the Psalms, and another, which seems to have consisted of a collection of the sayings and opinions of the saints. Enough is known of this eminent individual to entitle him to a high place among the benefactors of mankind. He was distinguished for the extent of his learning, and for the holiness of his life. It was usual in those days to ascribe to men of exalted piety the power of working miracles, which may be supposed to have arisen from the Almighty giving immediate and striking answers to their prayers. His many virtues are manifest in the reverence with which his character is uniformly mentioned by the writers who lived nearest to his times; and had his life been accurately written, and handed down to us, it would only have increased our admiration of his efforts in promoting true religion among a rude and barbarous race; it would have shown to us the numerous difficulties with which he had to struggle, and the means by which they were overcome; and, above all, it would have unfolded the weakness as well as the strength of his character, for the writers of the lives of the saints are apt to forget that, after all, they were but men. From the age of Ninian, Christianity took fast hold of the minds of the people, and the darkness of idolatry vanished wherever he appeared. It was the boast of Augustus, that he had found Rome built of brick and he left it of marble; Ninian could not say that he had erected palaces or founded cities, but his was a work of a far loftier description. He embellished Scotland with ornaments that know no decay,—he was the instrument of renovating the minds of the people, and of turning a large portion of the population from the worship of devils to the worship of the true God.

SAINTS IN THE HOUSEHOLD OF CÆSAR :
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. HUGH RALPH, LL.D.,
Minister of the Scotch Church, Oldham Street, Liverpool.

“All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar’s household.”—PHIL. iv. 22.

CÆSAR, you are aware, was a title given by a decree of the senate to all the Roman emperors, from the time of Julius Cæsar to the destruction of the empire. The emperor, now living, was the execrable one, Nero, Claudius Domitius Cæsar, and, consequently, the words may run, “All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Nero’s household.”

The Christians of these early times lived, indeed, as members of one body. They sympathised in each others joys and sorrows. They did not know each other after the flesh, but after the spirit, and recognised brethren among those whom they had never seen, and of all ranks where they partook of their principles, dispositions, and hopes. Hence so many of the epistles close with affectionate remembrances to different members of the Church of Christ in different situations.

But these words are not introduced to your notice, at present, to enforce on you the duty of affectionate sympathy and intercourse between the disciples of Jesus, however that duty be lost sight of in these less perilous times, when the storm is not so apparent without as to make all friends who are within. They involve a fact which is well deserving our attention, incidentally informing us that there were Christians even among the domestics of Nero, a man, whose name is yet adopted to signify all that is base, and who was especially guilty of the most cruel acts towards Christians.

Among these domestics, it would appear there were some Jewish slaves, according to Josephus, who was introduced to the Empress Poppæa by one of them, Rome being at the time full of them. These, and perhaps others, had heard Paul, in his own hired house, and had become converted to the Christian faith. No doubt the principles of the Gospel would spread among the persons about court, whether of the family of Nero, or the officers of his court, or his guards, as well as the servants. Thus, however, there were, in the palace of this profligate emperor, menials who had embraced the Christian religion, and fulfilled its obligations, even while their royal master was its bitterest enemy, and the court generally breathed the air of persecution.

On the fact thus stated and explained, the following important and interesting conclusions, to which we shall, in dependence on divine grace, direct your attention, are founded.

I. Christianity is no respecter of persons.

Accustomed, as we are, to pay deference to rank, and riches, and abilities, we naturally, and insensibly, expect, that persons possessing these would be first invited to become disciples—that these would first comply with the invitation—or, that should these reject it, there would be evidence enough it ought not to meet with a welcome any where. And, in point of fact, false religions usually address themselves to exclusive classes, an acquaintance with them being confined to the more philosophical, or the more learned, or the more influential in other respects. They are supposed to be too sacred for the vulgar, or the vulgar are to have portions merely doled out to them, and not to inquire for themselves, or take precedence above all, according to the extent of their acquirements of the highest kind. “Have any of the rulers believed?” has been the common cry; and the populace imitated them either in their belief or unbelief.

It did not remain however, for extended observation alone to show, that Christianity met its votaries especially among those who are least esteemed in the world. At its first announcement, these were first addressed. These are continually assumed, by its earliest propagators, to be at least on an equality, as to condition for receiving it, with others. These actually first embraced it; and that, especially among these, it would be received, those who announced it distinctly declared. “Unto the poor is the Gospel preached,” said its Author and substance; and his apostle, who, of all others, might have been tempted to say differently, consistently asserts, “not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and have things of the world, and things which are despised hath God chosen, yea, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are."

Not that Christianity will not endure the light of the loftiest intellect, or may not be embraced by those who are in the upper walks of life. In every age it has had some of every condition; and it is curious to observe, that if there were one or two minds in any age of such an order that all others bowed to them, these have been on its side.

But the majority of mankind are in the humbler walks of life, and Christianity is a general benefit. Our Saviour would have all men his followers. He offers the blessings of his purchase to all, and consequently has no limitation in his mission to the great, but rather takes pains to encourage those who are least esteemed worthy that title.

And the poorer classes have, in one sense, greater need of the blessings of the Gospel. Shut out from much of the knowledge that expands the mind, of wealth or honour that occupy and please, they more require a religion that discloses the most extended information, offers a balm to the wounded spirit, makes the poor in this world rich in faith, and comforts all who mourn.

Besides, were those only, or generally, who are great in this world to follow Christ, that homage would be done to intellect or possessions, which belongs only to God. Those who are elevated in these respects, are proud enough already, without supposing that their exclusive character obtains for them the smiles of heaven, or the hope of eternal life. And the first duty of every creature is to give glory to his Creator. Therefore, that men may see how they are just what God makes them, frequently the wise, and the mighty, and the noble, are the enemies, while the poor, and the least gifted, are the friends of the Saviour. A powerful, and, from his luxurious living, a too popular Nero, aided by his court, makes a spectacle of inflicting excruciating torments on Christians, while some of his servants embrace their faith, and, from out of the lowest rooms of the palace, send kind remembrances to them, which ascend as a grateful incense before the throne of Him who had advanced them to the glory of the sons of God, while he had passed by the royal house, to whom, in other respects, they were inferior. There were saints in the household of the wicked Nero.

II. The followers of Christianity will be supported in the exhibition of it in scenes of severest trial.

One can scarcely conceive a more perilous situation than the one in which these servants were. Nero's profligacy was by no means of a common kind; and while he kept around him persons who, to flatter his propensities, would render the whole household a scene of debauchery, he was instigated by the direst hatred towards Christians, accusing them of crimes of which he was guilty himself, and then taking the delight of a monster in witnessing them suffer in the most ingenious forms of torture on account of them. How circumspect must they have been not to bring reproach on the cross of Christ, and how faithful not to abandon it! And how difficult must it have been to have lived a life of faith and prayer in a household whose whole air must have been tainted with sin, and whose head descended to the meanest arts to accomplish his purposes!

And yet it appears, from the simple fact that they were particularly desirous to send their good wishes to the beloved Philippians, that they had singularly illustrated the power of the Gospel, even in such circumstances as these. They must have had considerable intercourse with Paul, and that, too, in prison. They must have maintained their Christian profession in the palace, otherwise he would never have honoured them with that most honourable of names—saints. And that they, from out of the emperor's palace, should discover more eagerness than others to express their Christian sympathies with the Philippians, through the medium of an eminent apostle, who had been imprisoned by their master for preaching the faith they embraced, shows they were, as Daniel in the court of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, true to their religion in the most unfavourable circumstances.

In short, we recognise in these servants persons who discharged the ordinary duties of life under the influence of Christian principle, and who, when necessity required, evinced their devotedness by a regard for the interests of the Church of Christ generally, though they must have lived in continual fear of infection from the unwholesome atmosphere they breathed, and examples they saw, and injury from the arm of power which had bound the man who had been the instrument of their greatest liberty.

Servants, indeed, now a-days, cannot be subject to trials as severe as those to which these domestics in Nero's palace were subjected. The general attention to Christianity irradiates those who deny the heavenly source of its beams, and a purer morality and greater toleration is the result. It may be, however, that servants may have heads of families who make riot on the Sabbath, deride the fidelity of a pious menial, obstruct his or her course through the arrangements of the family, and thus aid, if not cause, the degenerate habits of servants, so much complained of. But servants, if truly disciples of Christ, will find direction in their difficult path, receive grace to bear injury with meekness, limitation in Christian privileges with patience, temptation without falling a prey; and through their unpretending, but consistent walk, and their heartfelt prayers, and possibly becoming suggestions, those whom they serve may come to serve a common Lord, and their very illustration of the Christian character may thus be returned tenfold into their own bosom. A little maid in the family of the proud Naaman, you are aware, was thus instrumental in his conversion, by means of that affectionate interest she took in her master's welfare,—an interest which every servant ought to feel. And from the fact that, in another part of this epistle, Paul speaks of his bonds being known in all the palace, it is not improbable these pious servants there had successfully explained the Christian religion to persons in office about court, and obtained, in this way, lenity to the apostle, whom they regarded as their spiritual father, though the mind of Nero was inaccessible to their influence. What a blessing to a family are such servants!

III. Christianity is compatible with any calling not simply unlawful.

These servants in the palace of Nero were, indeed, in a situation dangerous to their principles and peace, and for their pleasure and profit would have preferred a family where more favour was shown to the now rising sect of Christians, as it was called, and more respect was evinced to the more ordinary restraints of morality. Their consciences, however, enlightened from on high, did not tell them they did wrong in remaining in the service of Nero, and they continued, therefore, to fulfil their duties faithfully, though deprived of many valuable privileges. And Paul, in transmitting their affectionate salutation, seems not to have entertained the thought that they could not continue in Nero's family and remain faithful to Christ.

In this fact, then, we have a striking example of that lovely feature of Christianity, that it allows the conditions of society to be what they may, speaking generally, and only spreads a purifying influence over it, giving directions to men in all stations, and calling out their thoughts and feelings rather to the better land, where eminent grace is the only distinction. On this principle it may, with safety to all political institutions, be preached over the wide earth, as it offers no opinion on these, but would infuse principles whereby they may be rendered pure and solid. And on this principle, too, its votaries may be found in the highest walks of information and enterprise, as well as in the lowest, among throned kings as well as destitute peasants, and in callings that are full of temptations to assimilate the mind to their worldly nature.

It may be, indeed, that the state of society is radically at variance with the first principles of moral obligation, though, in detecting this, we should be aware how we take our own theoretical notions, instead of the light of God's Word; and in this case, of course, it declares war against the whole, nor will it rest without demanding an immediate—an entire change. And it may be, again, that the office aspired to, the traffic engaged in, or duty required, is inconsistent with Christian fidelity, and, therefore, on no account, and for no worldly gain, dare a Christian step forward; and should he do so, he will be driven from the course he has entered on by perpetual rebukes of conscience.

But where, on enlightened views, no such fundamental error is found, there is the utmost liberty allowed. Accordingly, pious princes have wielded the destinies of empires. Chief officers of state have bowed subjection to the King of kings. Men of exalted science have esteemed it nothing in comparison with the knowledge of Christ. The navy and army have had disciples. Men of distinguished commercial energy and enterprise have been fervent in spirit serving the Lord, as well as not slothful in business, and that, too, in scenes where sorely tempted to barter their integrity. And, lowest in the scale, servants have been in ungodly families, who, nevertheless, have discharged their duties faithfully, and without bringing reproach on the cross by repining at opposition or unnecessary abandonment. There were saints in the household of Nero. It is, in truth, a bad account of a man's Christianity when it leads him to break loose from the relations of life, and on the ground of what he would deceptively call mere spiritual feeling, to neglect its duties. This is a spirit of indolence, and self-indulgence, and pride, but not of Christianity. Her records are full of instructions to the different members of the social edifice in different relations, assuming, too, those to whom duties are owed are not Christians, and, instead of attending to these, many have escaped a real cross to die a martyr to its shadow. How different the conduct of these domestics of wicked Nero, who were so faithful to him as to be retained in his service, while they were so faithful to Christ, as to obtain the name of saints from the apostle, and to their brethren the Philippians, as to send them kind remembrances! And how different, too, from the directions of the same Paul who requires subjection of Romans, while a Nero was on the throne.—who orders that if a man will not work he should not eat,—who has instructions to wives and husbands, where of different religions,—and who would have servants obedient even to unbelieving masters! There were saints, I repeat the instructive fact, in Cæsar's household.

The nature of the fact again calls our attention especially to servants. They are to perform no duties which are simply unlawful. Their piety, however, can never be an excuse for wrath, or indolence, or contention. If desirous to recommend a religion they may not see practised, they are to do it by surpassing worldly people in conscientiousness, fidelity, and gentleness. Their trying situations afford scope for the exhibition of Christian principle. And while they meekly exemplify it, God's eye is on, and his strength with, them. They will allow Nero's must have been a household, in primitive times, singularly trying to Christian servants, and yet there were saints in it, and saints, too, who were interested deeply in the welfare of the body of Christ.

These remarks are peculiarly important to persons commencing the Christian profession, who are too apt to run from a cross in professedly going to one; but they apply generally wherever perverted views are entertained of the Gospel, as if it broke up the relations of life, while it is in these its power is best seen.

Our first reflection on these observations is, how humble should the greatest, how thankful should the poor be!

Are you elevated in natural power or acquired learning—rich and influential? Lay every possession at the feet of Jesus. He resists the proud.

He gives grace to the lowly. Become teachable and guileless as a child, and prefer the distinction of the poorest saint to that of a sinner in a robe of purple, faring sumptuously every day.

Are your capacities and education moderate, and your means scanty? Be grateful. Gifts that have tempted many souls to perdition have never been yours. Your Saviour was in a low estate. Though he was rich he became poor, and has thus set a pattern to you, while in setting it he makes you rich. You especially he calls for, you especially require the soothing influence of faith. You may be God's children though the meanest servants; and where is Nero with all his money now, and where the saints in his family? Where is Dives, and where is Lazarus?

Our second reflection is, we should go forward to duty without fear. God leads believers into trouble that he may speak to them,—speak of a death they are too careless of—of a world they are too fond of. God leads them there that they may know the might of his sustaining arm. God leads them there, too, that graces otherwise dormant, and having no opportunity of exercise, may be brought to light. But he leads none there to leave them there. In the hour of sorest peril they receive most support. He takes care of them now as well as then.

Is this your path then? Enter on it and you will find difficulties disappear as you proceed. On the words of the text the learned Beza has this comment: "What else is this but that God reigned in hell? Who is he that will harm you if ye be followers of that which is good! Even there his hand shall lead you, and his right hand hold you." And, therefore, we shut up the whole subject with the reflection, that we should fulfil our various duties under the influence of Christian principle. Are we heads of families, we should take much of the blame of degenerate servants on ourselves;—see to their instruction in religion—allow them due leisure—give them opportunity of attending the house of God—and be kind and sympathizing to them. Are we servants, we should consult our master's interest—bear with his severity—pity and pray for his irreligion—perform his work. Are we in a calling which occupies much time, and wastes much energy, and leads into great temptation, we should pursue it in a spirit of faith and prayer, believing that if it is our duty to leave it God will open the way, and if not he will give the strength to endure. Thus will we reflect honour on our faith. Men will see no palpable unreasonableness in it. Our light will not shine obscurely before men. And how profitable both now and hereafter thus to live! With such a life we are most likely to insure present comfort; and, at all events, will have that peace of conscience, possessing which, a Christian servant in the palace was richer than the emperor himself.

But this life will soon be over. Another arrangement of ranks will take place. The first will often be last and the last first. The unknown, unnoticed, pitied, derided poor saint, will ascend and be happy, while the man with whose praises all Europe resounds, if not a Christian, will be miserable. In hell will he find, in no language of parable, there is a thirst that is never quenched, and a flame that never expires.

Seek then the honour that cometh from God only. Aspire to be his sons—his heirs,—heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ.

THE METEOROLOGY OF PALESTINE.

[From the Edinburgh Cabinet Library,—“Palestine,” by Dr Russell.]

UNDER this head we include the usual properties of the atmosphere which minister to health and vegetation, for it has been justly remarked that Syria has three climates. The summits of Libanus, for instance, covered with snow, diffuse a salubrious coolness in the interior; the flat situations, on the contrary, especially those which stretch along the line of the coast, are constantly subjected to heat, accompanied with great humidity; while the adjoining plains of the desert are scorched by the rays of a burning sun. The seasons and the productions undergo a corresponding variation. In the mountains the months of spring and summer very nearly coincide with those in the southern parts of Europe; and the winter, which lasts from November till March, is sharp and rigorous. No year passes without snow, which often covers the surface of the ground to the depth of several feet during many weeks. The spring and autumn are agreeable, and the summer by no means oppressive. But in the plains, on the other hand, as soon as the sun has passed the equator, a sudden transition takes place to an overpowering heat, which continues till October. To compensate for this, the winter is so temperate that orange-trees, dates, bananas, and other delicate fruits, grow everywhere in the open field. Hence, we need hardly observe that a journey of a few hours carries the traveller through a succession of seasons, and allows him a choice of climate; varying from the mild temperature of France to the blood-heat of India, or the pinching cold of Russia.

The winds in Palestine, as in all countries which approach the tropics, are periodical, and governed in no small degree by the course of the sun. About the autumnal equinox, the north-west begins to blow with frequency and strength. It renders the air dry, clear, and sharp; and it is remarkable that on the seacoast it causes the headache, like the north-east wind in Egypt. We may farther observe that it usually blows three days successively, like the south and south-east at the other equinox. It continues to prevail till November, that is, about fifty days, when it is followed by the west and south-west, called by the Arabs “the fathers of rain.” In March arise the pernicious winds from the southern quarter, with the same circumstances as in Egypt; but they become feebler as we advance towards the north, and are much more supportable in the mountains than in the low country. Their duration at each return varies from twenty-four hours to three days. The easterly winds, which come next in order, continue till June, when they are commonly succeeded by an inconstant breeze from the north. At this season the wind shifts through all the points every day, passing with the sun from east to south, and from south to west, to return by the north and recommence the same circuit. At this time, too, a local wind, called the land-breeze, prevails along the coast during the night; it springs up after sunset, lasts till the appearance of the solar orb in the morning, and extends only a few leagues to sea.

Travellers have observed, that thunder, in the low lands of Palestine, as well as in Egypt, is more common during the winter than in summer; while in the mountains, on the contrary, it is more frequent in the latter season, and very seldom heard in the former. In both these countries it happens oftenest in the rainy season, or about the time of the equinoxes, especially the autumnal; and it is farther remarkable, that it never comes from the land-side, but always from the sea. These storms, too, generally speaking, take place either in the evening or morning, and rarely in the middle of the day. They are accompanied with violent showers of rain, and sometimes of uncommonly large hail, which, soon covering the face of the country with stagnant water, give rise to a copious evaporation.

The phenomenon alluded to by the prophet Elijah is still found to diversify the aspect of the eastern sky. Volney remarks, that clouds are sometimes seen to dissolve and disperse like smoke; while, on other occasions, they form in an instant, and from a small speck increase to a prodigious size. This is particularly observable at the summit of Lebanon; and mariners have usually found, that the appearance of a cloud on this peak is an infallible presage of a westerly wind, one of the precursors of rain in the climate of Judea.*

Waterspouts are not unfrequent along the shores of Syria, and more especially in the neighbourhood of Mount Carmel. Those observed by Dr Shaw appeared to be so many cylinders of water falling down from the clouds; though, by the reflection, it might be, of these descending columns, or from the actual dropping of the fluid contained in them, they would sometimes, says he, appear at a distance to be sucked up from the sea. The theory of water-spouts in the present day does in fact admit the supposition here referred to, that the air, being rarefied by particular causes, has its equilibrium restored by the elevation of the water, on the same principle that mercury rises in the barometer, or the contents of a well in a common pump; but the opinions of the learned traveller on this subject are extremely loose and unscientific, and are only valuable in our times, as marking a certain stage in the progress of meteorological inquiry.

The same author has recorded a fact which we have not observed in the pages of any other tourist. In travelling by night in the beginning of April, through the valleys of Mount Ephraim, he was attended for more than an hour by an ignis fatuus that displayed itself in a variety of extraordinary appearances. It was sometimes globular, and sometimes pointed like the flame of a candle; then it spread itself so as to involve the whole company in its pale inoffensive light; after which it contracted and suddenly disappeared. But in less than a minute it would begin again to exert itself as at other times, running along from one place to another with great swiftness, like a train of gunpowder set on fire; or else it would expand itself over more than two or three acres of the adjacent mountains, discovering every shrub and tree that grew upon them. The atmosphere from the beginning of the evening had been remarkably thick and hazy, and the dew, as felt upon the bridles, was unusually clammy and unctuous. In such weather similar luminous bodies are observed skipping about the masts and yards of ships, and are called by the mariners corpusanse, a corruption of the cuervo santo, or sacred body, of the Spaniards. The same were the Castor and Pollux of the ancients. Some writers have attempted to account for these phenomena, particularly for the ignis fatuus, by supposing it to be occasioned by successive swarms of flying glow-worms, or other insects of the same nature. But, as Dr Shaw observes, not to perceive or feel any of these insects, even when the light which they produce spreads itself around us, should induce us to explain both this appearance and the other on the received principle, that they are actually meteors, or a species of natural phosphorus.*

A TESTIMONY TO THE SUPERIORITY OF A RELIGIOUS CHARACTER IN THE HISTORY OF JABEZ

"Jabez was more honourable than his brethren: and his name called his name Jabez, saying, Because I bare him much sorrow. And Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, O that thou wouldest bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldest keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me! And God granted him that which he requested."—1 Chron. iv. 10.

For beauty, simplicity and comprehensiveness, this passage may be pronounced quite inimitable. A hand holding the pencil of inspiration, alone could have drawn, with such delicacy, vividness, and truth, so exquisite a portrait of character. The mind's eye dwells upon it with rapturous and increasing delight. It is a portrait, the more you behold it, the more beauties you discover. And as if to heighten the effect, you have only the outlines portrayed, and your imagination is stimulated to fill it up, and yet it is so fine, that you fear to put forth a rude hand, lest you spoil it.

The sacred historian is engaged in making a collection of genealogies from Adam to the captivity. In perusing this record, the idea that most naturally arises in the mind, is the transitory nature of worldly life. Of the many individuals, famous, perhaps, in their generation, even then, when the historian wrote, nothing remained to tell of their existence but the name. The eye travels, in a twinkling, over centuries of years, and thousands of human beings. The world is made, as in vision, to pass before you: not that living, bustling, noisy world it once was, but in its true character and importance, such as it ought to appear to you now, and such as it will appear to you when you have done with it; and what is it like?—a shadow, a dream. Men cannot see the world aright when carried round in its dizzying circle; but look at it here; read its paltry history; see how little of it divine wisdom has deemed worthy of being rescued from oblivion and handed down to us! Important and interesting it may have appeared to those who then lived, and recorded, it may have been, in monumental stone or brass, but God, who can estimate events according to their intrinsic worth and relative importance, has given us the most striking proof of its utter insignificance by assigning it so small a place in his holy record.

The mind, ruminating on this, is brought into a melancholy mood, and receives a salutary impression. Must I, whatever wealth, or grandeur, or power I attain, come to this? Must my name, and nothing but my name, be set down beside ignoble names, and the eye of futurity pass carelessly over it? And what if this honour, poor as it is, be denied me; if my very name be at length erased from the emblazoned parchment, or the sculptured urn? Then, in pursuing fame, I am pursuing a phantom, and I will pursue it no longer.

But this consideration is rendered still more impressive, when we observe whose names are here recorded. The historian does not give a pedigree of the world but of the Church, and only such of the world are introduced as had any connection with the Church in the course of its history. All its little importance is derived from this circumstance alone. Otherwise, it is of no value in the sight of God, and its existence, so far from being recorded, would not even be prolonged.

In perusing this barren genealogical record, it is refreshing to meet with such a passage as this: or inaptly compared to an oasis in the desert, that same verdant spot which sometimes unexpectedly appears to the wayworn traveller, just, it may be, when about to sink down in despair and die, and assures him of the near vicinity of water. Amidst the dearth of high moral excellence, it would seem, as if the spirit of God, for the honour of the Old Testament Church, had rescued from oblivion this portion of its history not recorded by Moses. Its history, as recorded by him, refers to its more public transactions, and seldom descends to the affairs of families and individuals, except so far as they bear on the general and external state of the Church; and yet, it is only from such a history, that the real condition of the Church in respect of vital religion can be known; and, because, such a history on a large scale is impossible, the Church has suffered in the estimation of its enemies. That part of its history which meets the general observation, is full, for the most part, of heresies, and schisms, and "every evil work." But could the historian descend into its inner-chambers; into the privacies of domestic life, and still more, into the hearts of individuals, he might compile a history full of the most beautiful exemplifications of the power of the truth. "The King's daughter is all glorious within." Therefore it is for the honour of God and of his Church, that persons eminent in piety should, in all ages, be generally known and remembered. "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance."

For this reason the Spirit of God has preserved the name and character of Jabez, and by "this, he being dead, yet speaketh,"—speaketh for the glory of God—speaketh for the honour of the Church—speaketh for our instruction.

To this eminent distinction he was raised for his eminent piety. It does not appear that he came necessarily within the scope of this genealogical record, as the names of his parents are omitted. So that his singular piety alone brought him into such singular notice. While the rest of his brethren, because destitute of piety altogether, or not remarkable for high attainments in it, are passed over, as unworthy of notice, his name and character are emblazoned in sacred heraldry, and have acquired a renown lasting as their imperishable record.

A finer testimony to the superiority of a religious character over every other cannot be imagined, and we shall proceed to illustrate and apply it.

It generally happens, even in families where all, or most, are truly pious, that one, by the distinguishing grace of God, excels all the rest: and it sometimes happens that in families there is but one whom grace has yet converted. Now, in all these cases, he that is farthest advanced in religion is another Jabez, and "more honourable than his brethren."

He is so in the estimation of God: for "them that honour me, I will honour." He is so in the estimation of all who are capable of appreciating true greatness, and he ought to be so especially in the estimation of his brethren. But we know that this is not always the case. A pious member of a graceless family is often exposed to scorn and opposition, while they are "more honourable" who excel in natural parts and elegant acquirements. On the first appearance of seriousness, every attempt is made to drive him from it, and no argument is more commonly used than this,—that such serious religion is mean, illiberal, dishonourable, unworthy of high birth and high minds: and, in fact, the loss of not a little of the esteem of the world, is, more or less, according to circumstances, the certain result of becoming truly religious. Not every kind of religion, indeed, will have this effect; for a certain degree or appearance of it, adds weight and grace to a character in the eyes of the world. But such religion as that of Jabez, prayerful, holy, close walking with God, which, if there be any truth in the Bible, made him

"honourable" in the estimation of God, will not do so in theirs. Such religion is painful to them, and the more closely it comes into contact with them, as in the family circle, the more will their dislike be felt and exhibited.

The world, which is at variance with God on all points, is so also on this. Its ideas of honour are formed on principles entirely opposed to him. "These were more noble than those of Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so." "The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour." "Virtue," understanding by this true religion, "is the sole nobility." It is the impress of the divine image upon the soul, and surely it is honourable to be like God; else what is honour. The saints need not fear to challenge the world on this point. The world cannot bring forward any circumstances which in their estimation, infer honour, of which the saints are not possessed in a higher degree. Is it honourable to be nobly born? Then the saints are honourable, for they are "born of God." Is it honourable to have titles? Then the saints are honourable, for they are "kings and priests unto God." Is it honourable to have a splendid inheritance? Then the saints are honourable, for they are "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." "This honour have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord."

A spiritual discernment is necessary, however, to perceive the worth and beauty of true godliness. The world cannot admire what it does not discern. When men are spiritually enlightened to behold the glory of Christ, then only will they behold his image reflected in his saints. When He is honourable in their estimation, then will they be. It is characteristic of a citizen of Zion, that in "his eyes vile men are despised, but he honoureth them that fear the Lord." David declares that the saints are the "excellent of the earth," in whom was all his delight; and he expresses his contempt of the wicked in these strong terms: "Do I not hate them, O Lord, that hate thee, and am I not grieved with them that rise up against thee? yea, I hate them with perfect hatred, I count them mine enemies."

A family, therefore, instead of despising and persecuting one that is truly religious, has much reason to love and honour him, to thank God for conferring on them so great a blessing, and to imitate his example. Surely there is no good reason for any prejudice against him. Grace improves the character of every one who is the subject of it, and leads to the faithful discharge of relative duty. A pious member of a family will always be a more obedient son or daughter, a more affectionate brother or sister. Whence come those jarrings that ever and anon disturb the peace of domestic society, but from those passions which grace, more or less, in every instance subdues? Grace makes the proud child humble, the giddy child sedate, the stubborn child obedient, the morose child pleasant. A parent, even leaving the eternal well-being of his family out of view, cannot but desire them to be brought under the influence of those principles which will infallibly strengthen his own authority, and insure their correct conduct in the world. But what principles will do this but those of religion, which change the heart? How often has the fond parent seen a dear and amiable child, in whose affections, and in whose integrity and steadiness he thought he could confide, break through all the restraints of education, good example, honour, and self-interest, and go every length in wickedness! Surely he cannot fail to see, unless he is blind, that something higher and more influential is necessary.

On the other hand, how miserable is the family, and there are many such, not one of whose members is under the influence of divine grace! Alas! for such a family. May sovereign grace have pity on them, and make at least one trophy. Tremble ye graceless households! The blessing of God is not among you! The ark of God is not among you! The divine presence is not among you! There is not one by his prayers and his example to hallow your society! Ye are cursed in your basket and in your store; in your going out and in your coming in; in your lying down and in your rising up; in your eating and drinking; in your society and comforts! There is an awful threatening recorded against you: "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not upon thy name." There is also a gracious promise, which we beseech you to plead: "And I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and will bring you to Zion."

It is a signal instance of divine goodness when all the members of a large family are converted. How delightful the contemplation! The ties of relationship sanctified and drawn closer by grace;—members of the same family on earth, and of the same spiritual family, born of God—living here in harmony and holy fellowship, and journeying to the same home, never to be separated. A pious member of a family, whose natural affection is not diminished but increased by grace, must feel indescribable pain at the thought of being severed from those he loves, himself removed to a happiness they can never share in! How heart-rending,—and it will be often witnessed at the last day,—the parting of husband from wife, parents from children, brothers from sisters! Who that has any natural affection does not shudder at the possibility of this, and who would not make every effort to prevent it? Every pious member of a family will earnestly, yet prudently, pray and labour for the salvation of the rest; for which duty, as it is difficult and delicate, divine direction is to be implored. And it is encouraging to mark that divine grace seldom visits one without visiting others. There must be a beginning, and beginnings in the kingdom of God are small, but who can predict the issue! The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a grain of mustard seed, and to a little leaven. How highly honoured are they who, being themselves first brought to the knowledge of the truth, have been the means of introducing it into circles hitherto ignorant of it! This is not unfrequently the case. Even parents have been indebted for their religious knowledge to a favourite child, to whom they were bound by every tie to have first communicated it. Thus has the order of nature been reversed, and the parents have become spiritual children, and the children spiritual fathers. We need not say how much such parents will honour such children.

Let all families, then, consider how the case stands with them, in respect of religion. Are any of their members yet under religious principles? and if so, in what estimation are they held? If there be a Jabez among you, then you are highly favoured indeed. See that you honour him whom God honours. Be assured, whatever you may think, he is the pearl among you. He may be inferior in age, and in worldly accomplishments; but in all that is truly great, truly useful, aye, and truly ornamental, he is incomparably your superior. Imitate his example. Let the only rivalry among brethren be, who shall be most eminent in religion. In seeking for this honourable distinction, no envious feeling will be cherished, as in seeking after earthly honours. It is a paltry pre-eminence in a family or tribe to be the first-born, and heir to a title and a fortune; but it is a glorious distinction to be first in the graces of the divine life: and here, as in other points, such is the sovereignty of divine grace, the first is sometimes last, and the last first.

And surely great encouragement is held out in this passage to the truly pious, and under the contempt and persecution of the world they have need of it. Well may they bear it all, being so highly honoured by God. He does, indeed, sometimes so order affairs in this world, as that they attain to much general estimation: they become great in wealth, like Job: their influence is vast and extensive, like Daniel: their name is widely known and lasting, like Jabez. But should this be denied them, as is often the case,—should they live unknown, die unregretted, and soon be forgotten, they have other honours awaiting them. Their names are written in the Lamb's book of life. They shall "be openly acknowledged" at the last day, and raised to an inconceivable height of dignity in heaven, while they who here despise them, and are themselves the "honourable of the earth," shall at last become the sport of devils, the pity of angels, be covered with shame and confusion, and banished from the face of the Judge, and from all happiness for evermore. "And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book; and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. Then they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

Besides the personal character of Jabez, there is another circumstance related by the historian, which imparts additional interest to it;—"And his mother called his name Jabez,"—sorrowful,—saying, "because I bare him with sorrows."

The doom, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow," was here fulfilled in a more than ordinary measure. But though she had much sorrow in his birth, she had much joy in his life. Amply was she repaid for all the sorrow of his birth, and all the anxiety and trouble of his childhood, in the virtues that adorned his character. Could she have known his future history, she would have given him another name. But she did not foresee that the cause of her greatest sorrow was to be the cause of her greatest joy. And thus it often is in similar cases. Little can parents foresee of the future character and destiny of their children, and frequently are their anticipations disappointed. Eve called her first-born Cain, "for she said, I have gotten a man from the Lord," or "the man the Lord," meaning, as some think, the promised Messiah; but he turned out a murderer. Much rejoicing is there often at the birth of a child who is yet to prove a grief and disgrace to his parents, and "bring down their grey hairs with sorrow to the grave;" and on the other hand, much anxiety and trouble have they about one who is yet to prove an honour and a comfort to them. So little can they foresee of the designs of God, and so little should they anticipate good or evil. It is not for them to be anxious about this, but to commend their children to Him who has promised to be their God and the God of their seed to latest generations, and to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

As Jabez was a pious man, he could not be unmindful of his duty to his mother. His love and gratitude would be increased by the consideration that she "bare him with sorrow." Among the many motives to love and obey a mother, this is the strongest, and to every feeling mind, irresistible. What claims she has on our affection! Under God, we owe our existence to her; she has fed us from her gentle breast; she has sat by our cradle; she has carried us in her arms; she has watched and laboured for us; and shall we not at least make some return for all this? But what greater joy can we yield her pious heart, than to walk in the ways of the Lord! "Though I had no other motive or reason to be religious," said the pious and judicious Hooker, "I would earnestly strive to be so, for the sake of my aged mother, that I might requite her, and cause the widow's heart to sing for joy."

On the other hand, what a grief are wicked children to pious parents; and not unfrequently are they thus tried. Adam, Noah, Jacob, Eli, Aaron, David, Hese-kiah, Josiah, had wicked sons. It is a common remark, and it is every day exemplified, that parents cannot give their children grace, yet they have many gracious promises. By baptism he takes them and their children into covenant with him, as of old by circumcision, and thus are they entitled to plead for covenant grace upon covenant promise. And who is entitled to say that such plea shall in any case fail?

History affords no finer illustration of this than the case of Augustine. Long did his mother Monica travail in birth for his conversion, and many tears and prayers did she pour forth on his behalf. She was encouraged to persevere by Ambrose, who remarked, that a child of so many prayers could not perish, and it proved true; for, when upwards of thirty years of age, he was converted, and became a "burning and a shining light."

And Scripture has afforded several instances for our encouragement, and, doubtless, the history of the Church could afford thousands. "The words of king Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him." "When I call to mind the unfeigned faith that is in thee, (Timothy,) which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures."

"And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—These words were uttered in celebration of the return of the Israelites from the Babylonish captivity. But, without doubt, they refer also to the events which should happen in the Church in subsequent ages. From them we propose to illustrate, first, How it is that believers are, according to the words of the text, dignified with the appellation of the "ransomed of the Lord." To be ransomed means deliverance from a state of slavery, or of distress, on account of a price which has been paid. By attending to the history of man, from the very beginning of time, we will find that he then, by his apostasy from God, fell under the bondage of sin and death. To redeem the human race from such a woful condition God found out means, consistently with law, justice, propriety, and right. His own Son appeared in our nature, and by a life and death of suffering, atoned for the sins of the world. With the utmost propriety, then, believers may be styled the "ransomed of the Lord." Second, The predictions that are here given concerning them. They shall return from sin, from error, and from passion; they shall return and come to Zion. Mount Zion was the place where God peculiarly manifested his presence to the Jews. They there, however, saw only "through a glass darkly," but in the Zion which is above, the ransomed of the Lord shall see him face to face, and shall know even as they are known. They shall return with songs. How can they refrain from celebrating the goodness and loving-kindness of their God in redeeming them from the power of corruption, and on account of what he has done for their souls! They shall come with joy. Joy is the expression of any pleasant emotion; and surely the blessings of redemption are calculated to produce the most delightful feelings. It is termed everlasting joy, in opposition to the fleeting and short-lived pleasures of sin. This joy, it is said, will be upon their heads, in allusion to the crown bestowed upon the conqueror, or to those garlands of flowers which decked the brow of the successful candidate at the public games. "They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." As the darkness naturally departs upon the rising of the sun, or the weak force retreats before the strong, so the consequence of obtaining joy and gladness is, that sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Third, It is then that these predictions shall be fulfilled. They shall be accomplished upon the conversion of a sinner to God—more especially when he is recovered from partial backslidings—and above all, at death and judgment. It is then, that with the greatest propriety, he may be said to return to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy. It is then the portals of eternal bliss shall be thrown open. It is then he shall obtain joy and gladness; it is then, that sorrow and sighing shall for ever flee away.—Recollections of a Sermon by the late Rev. Dr Jones of Edinburgh, delivered in his Chapel on the evening of a Communion Sabbath, in September 1795.

Afflictions.—Afflictions are frequently sent to wind up our affections to a holy pitch of importunity, to bring us oftener into the presence of God, and to make us stay longer when we are there. We complain in prosperity that we have no time to serve him and enjoy him as we could wish, and he, in mercy to our souls, gives us the time we want, by confining us to our chambers for a few weeks or months, and disengages our thoughts from the world, by disappointing our favourite schemes. We should not have read of Jacob's spending the whole night in prayer, or of his princely spirit and mighty conquest, but for Jacob's affliction. If God has not manifested himself to you, as he does to his people, and if the burden of guilt and sorrow lies heavy upon your conscience, do not despair, beloved. Continue knocking, for "to him that knocketh it shall be opened." This is the infallible method of gaining his friendship. It is obedience to his own command. If, when he says to you seek ye my face, your heart says to him, "thy face Lord will I seek," ere long it will be your privilege to say, "The Lord hath granted me the petition which I desired of him." Therefore, if he close the door of his chamber it is not to keep you out, but to teach you to knock louder. If he cover himself with a cloud, that your prayer cannot pass through, it is only that the vehemence of the breath of prayer should dissipate this cloud, and open to you the sunshine of his countenance. If he seem to depart farther from you, it is only to provoke you to follow him; as the disciples at Emmaus, who, as St. Luke asserts, when the Saviour came thither, and "made as though he would have gone farther, constrained him, saying, abide with us." Let nothing intimidate you. "Clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Bear the indignation of the Lord, because you have sinned against him, but cast not away your confidence, which has great recompense of reward. You deserve his frown,—wait his smile. He smites you, but it is for your advantage, and who would not bear correction from such a hand?—SHERMAN. (Guide to God.)

A willing people.—If God hath made you willing, it is well; the day of power hath made you so. If you be presently willing, peremptorily willing, pleasantly willing, and universally willing; presently willing, not offering to delay; peremptorily willing, saying, I must have him or I perish; pleasantly willing, content joyfully to sell your all for the pearl of great price; and universally willing, willing to have Christ in all his offices to be a Saviour from sin as well as from hell; I say, if you be made willing, and can be active in coming, the willing soul is the welcome soul. But if you find difficulties and objections, and cannot be active, then oh! yield yourselves passive; if you cannot be so active as to come in without compulsion, then yield yourself passive,—that is, willing to be compelled and drawn in; do not resist the Holy Ghost, and his drawing motions and influences; do not resist the call of the Gospel, but lay yourself open to be compelled,—that is, to be convinced, to be converted, to be persuaded, to be entreated to come in that our Lord's house may be filled.—RALPH ERSKINE. ## SACRED POETRY.

A HEBREW MELODY.

ON Carmel's brow the wreathy vine
Had all its honours shed,
And o'er the vales of Palestine
A sickly paleness spread;
When the old seer, by vision led,
And energy sublime,
Into that shadowy region sped,
To muse on distant time.

He saw the valleys far and wide,
But sight of joy was none;
He looked o'er many a mountain side,
But silence reigned alone,
Save that a boding voice sung on,
By wave and water-fall,
As still, in harsh and heavy tone,
Deep unto deep did call.

On Kison's strand and Ephratah
The hamlets thick did lie;
No wayfarer between he saw,
No Asherite passed by:
No maiden at her task did ply,
No sportive child was seen;
The lonely dog barked wearily,
Where dwellers once had been.

Oh! beauteous were the palaces
On Jordan wont to be,
And still they glimmered to the breeze,
Like stars beneath the sea!
But vultures held their jubilee
Where harp and cymbal rung,
And there, as if in mockery,
The baleful satyr sung.

But who had seen that Prophet's eye
On Carmel that reclined!
It looked not on the times gone by,
But those that were behind:
His grey hair streamed upon the wind,
His hands were raised on high,
As, mirror'd, on his mystic mind,
Arose futurity.

He saw the feast in Bozrah spread,
Prepared in ancient day;
Eastward, away the eagle sped,
And all the birds of prey.
"Who's this," he cried, "comes by the way
Of Edom, all divine,
Travelling in splendour, whose array
Is red, but not with wine?"

Blest be the herald of our King,
That comes to set us free!
The dwellers of the rock shall sing,
And utter praise to thee!
Tabor and Hermon yet shall see
Their glories glow again,
And blossoms spring on field and tree,
That ever shall remain.

"The happy child, in dragon's way
Shall frolic with delight;
The lamb shall round the leopard play,
And all in love unite;
The dove on Zion's hill shall light,
That all the world must see.
Hail to the journeyer, in his might,
That comes to set us free!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

Moravian Brethren.—During the rebellion in Ireland in 1793, the rebels had long meditated an attack on the Moravian settlement, at Grace Hill, Wexford county. At length they put their threat into execution, and a large body of them marched to the town. When they arrived there, they saw no one in the street nor in the houses. The brethren had long expected this attack, but true to their Christian profession, they would not have recourse to arms for their defence, but assembled in their chapel, and in solemn prayer besought Him in whom they trusted to be their shield in the hour of danger. The ruffian band, hitherto breathing nothing but destruction and slaughter, were astonished at this novel sight: where they expected armed hands, they saw them clasped in prayer, and the whole body of men bending before the Prayer of Peace. They heard the prayer for protection, the request for mercy to be extended to their murderers, and the song of praise and confidence in the sure promise of the Lord. They beheld all in silence, and were unable to raise a hand against them, and after having for a night and a day lingered about, they marched away, without having injured a single individual, or stolen a loaf of bread. This singular mark of the protection of Heaven induced the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to bring their goods, and ask for the protection of these Christians.

The power of kindness.—Mr Rule was minister of Alnwick, in Northumberland, during the period of persecution. When he was compelled to resign his charge, he went to Berwick, where, for the support of his family, he engaged in the medical profession. His enemies continuing their persecution, engaged some of the worst of men to waylay and murder him. A messenger was sent to him at midnight, to request him to visit a person in the country who was represented as very ill. The good man expressed so much sympathy for the supposed sick person, and so readily prepared to go to his relief, that the heart of the messenger melted, and he could not forbear telling Mr Rule the whole affair. Thus his life was spared, and God showed how easily he can bring to nought the counsel of the wicked.

Rev. Mr Ruggles.—This good man, who was an American minister, had a remarkable preservation from death. While he was once preaching, a party of Indians came suddenly upon the congregation, scattered them, and carried him away into the forest. At first he was left under the charge of two women, while the men went to rest; but his female keepers, as well as the faithful dogs, falling asleep also, he took the opportunity to make his escape. He had not gone far before he heard the alarm-cry, and the crashing of the bushes behind warned him that the enemy were already in close pursuit of him. In his distress he crept with little hope of safety, into a hollow tree, at whose base there happened to be an opening, through which he could squeeze his body, and stand upright within it. The Indians soon rushed by in full chase, without stopping to search his retreat, and, what is more extraordinary, their dogs had previously smelt about the root of the tree, and ran forward without barking, as though they had discovered nothing.

ON THE COMMON PHRASE,
“ THE LAWS OF NATURE.”

No. III.

IN our former papers on this subject, we endeavoured to show, that the laws of nature were none other than the laws of God; or rather, the every-where present power of God, working in accordance with his wise and holy will; and that this was the only meaning which these terms could convey, if accurately understood, whether as physical or organic laws. This view being admitted, it manifestly follows, that there may be expected to be many points of evident resemblance, many striking analogies, between the laws of nature and the truths of the Bible,—that is, between the will of God in creation, and the will of God in revelation. These resemblances have often been remarked, and almost as often distorted and abused by the opponents of revelation. “Revelation,” say its sophistical opponents, “tells us nothing which nature does not, or might not, tell us; it is therefore unnecessary; and if unnecessary, its very claims to be revelation prove it to be untrue, because God does nothing unnecessarily.” Such were the arguments employed by philosophical infidels in a former age; and the similarity of the process of reasoning carried on by some in our own days, must be abundantly evident, though as yet they have not ventured to state the result so plainly. Yet these analogies might be admitted to their utmost legitimate extent, and even traced farther than the worshippers of the laws of nature are accustomed to trace them; and shown, nevertheless, to lead to conclusions exactly the reverse of those held by deistical writers,—shown to lend the utmost support even to the peculiar doctrines of revelation, which their limited range and inferior value were able to lend.

Before attempting to show how this might be done, one preliminary remark must be made. The laws of nature would of course operate with the same fixedness of aim and regularity of order, whether their operations were perceived by men or not; but if not perceived, they could convey no intelligence to man respecting the will of the Author of nature. The information which they do convey, therefore, must actually depend more upon the clearness and soundness of the perceptive faculties and reasoning powers in the mind of him who surveys them, than upon the essential wisdom inherent in these modifications of the divine creative and preserving mind. If, therefore, we had no other guide than what we can learn of the laws of nature, it might follow, that we should never accurately understand those laws, and so never obtain a guide at all. The laws of nature cannot explain themselves; much less can they explain the truths, which are the laws, of revelation. The laws of nature may, indeed, serve to illustrate revelation,—inasmuch as there must be a resemblance, in some respects, between the laws of nature and those of revelation, because both are manifestations of the divine mind; but revelation alone can both approve itself, and explain the laws of nature. The one may be the type, the other is the antitype; the one may indicate, the other reveals. The only true mode to be pursued, therefore, is to view the laws of nature in the clear light of revelation, not revelation through the distorting dimness of nature. It is scarcely necessary to add, that this by no means involves the consequence of checking a legitimate exercise of reason in studying natural science, lest it should seem to controvert our preconceived notions respecting what religious truth would, in certain cases, require. Nature and revelation never contradict each other, though they may sometimes seem to do so, when the dictates of either, or of both, are misunderstood, and though nature is often arrested by anomalies which she cannot explain, and mysteries which she cannot fathom, and must at all times fall immeasurably beneath those pure and untroubled regions of the upper heavens, where revelation chiefly soars, in the enjoyment of light uncreated and full of glory.

It is very usual, for example, for a certain class of sentimentalists, to look around them on the fair face of nature, and beholding there innumerable proofs of surpassing goodness and bounty, they draw the conclusion, that it is not possible to believe, that a God of such boundless goodness, as his works prove him to be, can permit his favoured creature, man, to fall into utter and everlasting misery, on account of certain trivial transgressions, as they tenderly term them. In this plausible sophism they confide; and on their assumed confidence in the mercy of God, they build their hopes of everlasting happiness. Why will men so miserably deceive themselves? Why will these philosophical, or amiable, or romantic worshippers of nature, not mingle a little reason in their admiration, so that, when they talk of "looking through nature up to nature's God," they may obtain a more accurate view of his entire character, instead of dwelling exclusively on certain favourite attributes, and thus at last forming a god-like unto themselves, and idolizing an imaginary deity of their own? The God of nature has indeed stamped proofs of his benevolence upon all the workmanship of his hands; and all the laws of nature, as they are called, are productive of good and happiness so far as they are properly and regularly obeyed. But do our amiable admirers of nature find that any of her laws can be violated with impunity? On the contrary, is not every such violation followed certainly, and often instantaneously, by a suitable punishment? What law of nature is more general, or productive of more good, than the law of gravitation? Let a man violate it, by casting himself from a precipice, and he is immediately punished by death or dreadful bruises. Food and drink are provided for our sustenance, and a very benevolent law of nature has rendered them as pleasurable as they are necessary; but let this law be violated by excess in either, and the most painful, and even fatal punishment will speedily avenge the violation. From even the laws of benevolent nature, then, if rightly understood, men might learn, that it is not possible to violate any of the laws of nature; that is, of the laws of God, physical, mental, or moral, without exposing themselves to sure and adequate punishment; and consequently, that the notion of a God of infinite mercy alone, by whom punishment will not be rigidly inflicted to all its due extent, is nothing better than a brain-sick fancy, entertained to their own grievous delusion, by a set of purblind gazers upon half-seen nature,—dreaming philosophers, who, never seeing more than half the truth, cannot accurately be said ever to have seen it at all.

There are, however, other men of the philosophic cast, who, seeing deeper than the sentimentalist, recognise a retributive, or self-avenging power in the laws of nature, closely resembling what revelation asserts respecting the laws of God, but, instead of regarding this as corroborative of revelation, seem to think that it supercedes the necessity of revelation altogether. They hold, that a due acquaintance with the laws of nature would enable men to act so thoroughly in conformity with them, as in every instance to avoid their violation, and escape the penalty. A little more of even their own philosophy would tell them that it is utterly impossible for the human mind ever to become acquainted with all the possible combinations of what are termed the laws of nature; and observation might tell them that men are very far from complying constantly with the dictates of those laws which they most distinctly understand. It is not difficult, often to show a man what it is both his interest and his duty to do, but it is a very different matter, indeed, to persuade him to yield obedience. What is not man's obedience to even the laws of nature commensurate with his knowledge of them, as should be, were the system to which we are adhering true? To this question these philosophers of somewhat larger grasp of mind can give no satisfactory answer, in accordance with their theories; so that the whole value of their theories consists in the destruction of the more fine theories of the sentimentalists, while they are themselves left in difficulties altogether inexplicable, without recourse being had to the aid of revelation.

The truth is, that the anomalies of nature are altogether inexplicable, except by revelation. All nature obeys its laws unerringly; and hence the natural argument, proving the universal government of an all-wise, all-powerful, and unchangeable God. Man alone errs. Why? In consequence of possessing a free will? But that will, however free, might surely have acted right free as well as wrong. Can nature explain this anomaly? Perhaps man errs in consequence of not knowing the laws of nature. Do the brutes know these laws? No; yet they err not. Does man constantly keep those which he does know? Far very far the reverse. The system of our philosophers can give us no assistance here; but revelation can. It tells us that man has a moral nature, and by moral laws alone can he be adequately governed. He has violated these moral laws, and he suffers,—suffers in the moral anarchy into which his being is cast, by the revolt of his animal appetites and passions against the supremacy of his moral attributes and religious principles; by the consequent degeneracy and degradation of the condition into which he has sunk; and in the physical evils to which he is now especially exposed, owing to the subjection under which he now lies to his material and animal nature, therefore to merely physical laws, and to the physical maladies which avenge their violation. According to this the scriptural view, the very physical sufferings which afflict man have their origin in his violation of those moral and divine laws to which his spiritual being owed supreme religious obedience. His original nature and condition were not subject to laws merely physical and organic, though it had no tendency to transgress them. And even now, fallen and degraded as he is, he spurns their control, and suffers rather than submits; because he is still instinctively conscious of an immortal spirit within him, which will soon to no authority but that which proceeds directly and immediately from the Father of Spirits. This revelation alone can furnish; hence revelation alone can reach the moral malady under which the immortal spirit languishes, and explain the mysteries of man's dark and troublous existence.

There is another important topic which the laws of nature, perhaps, seem dimly to hint at, in weak and faltering accents, but which revelation can alone adequately state and explain. Nature, it is remarked, punishes every violation of her laws. But is this punishment vindictive? is it corrective? When disease assails a man because he has violated some organic law, does it terminate of itself, after it has sufficiently punished the erring individual? The sad experience of every day tells us that it has no such tendency; that, on the contrary, if some remedial measure be not applied, the disease will not terminate but by the destruction of the sufferer. There is nothing in the disease which tends, or can possibly tend, to heal itself. A cure is to be obtained only by the application of some external remedial measure; the office of which is, to exhaust the virulence of the disease, or supply new vital energy, and thus restore health. Nay, even the boasted vis medicatrix nature, or remedial power of nature, as physicians term it, operates in one or other of these methods, and not otherwise; the morbid matter may be absorbed and disappear, or be expelled by the pouring of new untainted life into the diseased part, but either of these is possible only through its union with the source of life, or a restoration of suspended vital action. Every disease has destruction for its essence, and death for its aim; because in its simplest character every disease appears as a violation of those organic laws, which are the embodied manifestations of the creative will of the God of life; and the healing power must be furnished from some kindred source,—kindred, yet untainted with that violation.

How, then, does revelation solve this mystery? It tells us, as before, that all physical malady is the result, or the embodiment of moral malady: and it explains the mystery of external sanative applications, of remedies brought from some untainted kindred source, by revealing to us the mystery of redemption,—God manifest in the flesh,—permitting sin, that mortal malady of the soul, to exhaust its malignant virulence, by pouring its deadliest venom on his sacred head, and by his union with human nature, infusing a new untainted stream of vital godliness into the soul of man, even life eternal.

But there is one point in which the admirers of the laws of nature think they perceive an irreconcilable contradiction between Nature and Revelation. We are told in Scripture that, “the wages of sin is death,”—that “by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin:” whereas, our philosophers assure us that this cannot be true, because death must have been natural to man, as is evident from the organic laws of his physical constitution. Did it never occur to these philosophers, that the whole of this reasoning of theirs is founded upon an unproved assumption? We might admit, that the organic laws of the human frame, whatever is meant by that phrase, prove man now destined to inevitable death: but man is now a fallen being, and the peculiarities of his fallen state can prove nothing whatever respecting the peculiarities of his unfallen state. Their whole argument depends upon the assumption, that the operation of the organic laws of man's physical structure have sustained no injury or alteration by the fall,—an assumption which never can be proved,—which is indeed stamped with improbability, while the reverse is, to say the least, extremely probable, even to reason, apart from the strong statements of Revelation. They may, indeed, deny the doctrine of the fall; but this would only be to shift their ground, and open the discussion of the question in the regions of moral philosophy or pure theology, with which, we fear, they are not very conversant. Or, they may produce an evasive argument, and attempt to prove that death must have been natural to man, even had he not sinned and fallen; because the whole world would not have been able ultimately to have afforded even standing-room to the still-increasing, never-diminishing multitudes of mankind. But what do they mean by the term death? If they mean merely a change from one scene or state of being into another, we admit the probability, that death, in the sense of a change of scene or state of being, may be natural to man,—might have been so to unfallen man. But if they mean the dark and painful process by which body and soul are at present separated, we reject the assumption entirely. Regarding death in its essential aspect, as a change of state, there are at least three kinds of death with which we are more or less acquainted: viz., death by disease or violence, death by old age, and death by translation. With the two former kinds we are all sufficiently familiar;—examples of the third, have been made known to us in the instances of Enoch and Elijah, and are not obscurely referred to by Paul, when he says, “we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.” Now, who will venture to say, that if man had never fallen, this painless translation into a higher, holier, and more glorious state of being, might not have been all the death that generations innumerable, yet sinless all, should have ever known? We will not confidently assert that this is the primary law of change, and the only one natural to unfallen man; but we do not hesitate to say, that it completely neutralizes the sophistical objection stated above, reconciles what we know of fallen man, with what Scripture testifies of his original state and his ultimate destinies, partially unveils one of the deepest secrets of our nature, gives additional precision and significancy to some of the mysterious events and statements of Revelation, points out to us another aspect of the manifold wisdom of God, and brings us nearer in adoring love to Him, “who was dead, and is alive, who has the keys of Hades and of death,” and in whose sinless kingdom his faithful followers shall live and reign for evermore.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF IGNATIUS,

ONE OF THE EARLY FATHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

IT IS UNKNOWN OF WHAT PARENTAGE THIS ILLUSTRIOUS MAN WAS DESCENDED, OR TO WHAT COUNTRY HE ORIGINALLY BElonged. Some have supposed him to be the little child whom our Lord took and placed in the midst of his disciples, when he declared to them, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." But whether Ignatius be here referred to or not, it is generally admitted that he enjoyed the benefit of the instructions of the Apostle John.

Little has come down to us in regard to the early years of this distinguished Christian father. That his character must have been held in the highest estimation, however, is obvious from the fact, that he was invested by the apostles with the office of Bishop, or pastor of the Church at Antioch—an office which he filled for forty years with great honour and usefulness. During this long period, Ignatius discharged his ministerial duties with such fidelity, that, amid the fiery trial through which the Christian Church passed in the reign of the Roman Emperor Domitian, many were encouraged to hold fast their profession, by his godly example and exhortations. Persecution raged around him, but he remained unmoved, longing for, rather than dreading, a martyr's crown. And though the accession of Nerva to the throne was followed by a state of temporary peace, the holy man ardently coveted the honour of dying for the sake of Christ. "I eagerly wish the lions to be prepared for me," says he, "and pray that they may be found ready against me: them also I shall encourage, that they may quickly devour me, not as sometimes, when they have left the faithful untouched. But should they not be inclined when I am willing, I shall even assault them with violence." These sentiments, though they may sufficiently display the holy ardour by which the soul of Ignatius was animated, are by no means accordant with that submissive spirit which dictated the language of the apostle: "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you; and having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith."

The wish of Ignatius to seal his testimony with his blood, was at length gratified in the reign of Trajan, about the year 107. The Emperor, marching in all the pride of conquest towards Armenia and Parthia, stopped at Antioch; and, incensed against the Christians because of their resistance to idolatrous practices of every kind, he resolved to punish them. The venerable Bishop of Antioch, anxious to deliver his people from the vengeance of Trajan, boldly presented himself before the haughty tyrant. The interview which took place on this occasion, strikingly displays the courage and undaunted firmness of Ignatius in confessing Christ:—

"When Trajan beheld Ignatius, he exclaimed, 'What impious spirit art thou, both to transgress our commands, and to ensnare others into the same folly, to their destruction?' Ignatius answered, 'Theophorus ought not to be called so, forasmuch as all evil spirits are departed from the servants of God. But if thou callest me impious, because I am hostile to evil spirits, I own the charge in that respect, for I dissolve all their snares through the inward support of Christ, the heavenly King.'

"Traj. Who is Theophorus?"

"Ign. He who has Christ in his breast.

"Traj. And thinkest thou not that gods reside in us also, who fight for us against our enemies?"

"Ign. Thou mistakest in calling the demons of the nations by the name of gods. For there is only one God, who made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and one Jesus Christ, his only-begotten Son, whose kingdom be my portion.

"Traj. His kingdom, do you say, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate?"

"Ign. His kingdom who crucified my sin, with its author, and put all the fraud and malice of Satan into the feet of those who carry him in their hearts.

"Traj. Dost thou then carry him who was crucified within thee?"

"Ign. I do, for it is written, 'I dwell in them, and walk in them.'

"Trajan then pronounced the following sentence against him: 'Since Ignatius confesses that he carried within himself that which was crucified, we command that he be carried to great Rome, there to be thrown to the wild beasts, for the entertainment of the people.'

"This barbarous sentence, far from intimidating the martyr, filled his soul with joy. 'I thank thee, O Lord,' he exclaimed, 'that thou hast vouchsafed to honour me with a perfect love towards thee, and hast made me to put on iron bonds with the Apostle Paul.'

The sentence pronounced upon this holy man was what he had long coveted, and, accordingly, with thanksgiving to God, he voluntarily surrendered himself into the hands of the guards who were appointed to convey him to Rome. After conducting the aged saint on foot to Seleucia, his persecutors put him on board a vessel which was to coast the southern and western parts of Asia Minor. On arriving at Smyrna, he was refreshed by meeting with the venerable Polycarp, who encouraged him to maintain his confidence steadfast unto the end. Deputies from various churches in Asia flocked to console him in the prospect of his approaching martyrdom. His soul, however, far from needing consolation, was filled with holy joy and triumph, and in such a spirit he penned, while at Smyrna, epistles to the Churches of Ephesus, Macedonia, Tralles, and Rome. From Smyrna Ignatius sailed to Trossa, and thence by Neapolis to Philippi, where he was received with the utmost kindness by the brethren. He was now led on foot through Macedonia and Epirus, when he embarked for Italy. On reaching Puteoli, he expressed a wish to be permitted to proceed by land to Rome, that he might tread in the footsteps of the Apostle Paul. This, however, was denied him, and he was conducted by sea to Ostia, only sixteen miles from Rome. As soon as the Christians heard of his approach, many of them came from the city to meet him. The first impulse of their hearts was to condole with him on the awful prospect which awaited him; but, with heroic courage, he commanded them to be silent, reminding them to value exalted honour that man is called who is privileged to suffer for Christ.

With firm and unflinching step Ignatius entered Rome, when he was immediately conducted to the house of the prefect. The day of his execution was appointed, and although the streets of the city had often resounded with the cry, "The Christians to the lions!" it was intended that the punishment of the venerable Ignatius should be as striking as possible. Accordingly, the most solemn of the Roman festivals was selected as the fittest period to effect their murderous designs. Meanwhile the brethren urged upon the aged prisoner to effect his escape. No entreaties, and ever, could prevail. He looked forward with joy to the day of his execution, and when it did arrive, he calmly prepared for death. Kneeling down with his friends, he prayed earnestly for the Church, that the Almighty would interpose in its behalf, and put a stop to the persecution. Then rising from his knees, he was led into the Amphitheatre, where, amid assembled multitudes, on a signal being given, the wild beasts were let loose upon him, and speedily no remains of the aged saint were to be seen save a few bones, which his friends carefully gathered up and conveyed to Antioch.

Thus died, about the commencement of the second century, one who, throughout a long life, had served the Lord faithfully, and who counted it his highest ambition to suffer with Christ, resting in the firm conviction that, at length, he and his beloved Master would be glorified together.

HEBREW GLEANINGS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SIMPSON, A. M., Minister of Kintore.

No. III.

THE JUBILEE.

THE jubilee was hailed with the liveliest demonstrations of joy by the ancient Hebrews. Every association connected with it, inspired feelings of cheerfulness and delight in all the sons and daughters of Israel. The very name given to this season of rejoicing, according to some authorities, was derived from the trumpet, which, with its glad and animating sounds, announced the arrival of a new and happy epoch; though, according to others, and perhaps with better reason, it was indicative of the restoration of all things to their originally established position, whereby every man resumed, or succeeded to, the place and the inheritance in the tribe of his fathers, which belonged to him by unalienable birthright. And, in accordance with this latter interpretation, Josephus translates the term jubilee by a Greek word which signifies liberty.

The institution was altogether very interesting and remarkable. It was strictly peculiar to the Hebrews. Some of the ideas involved in it, seem to have occurred to other nations, and are indeed natural to the human heart. It is the blameless wish, nay, the bounden duty of man, to provide for and secure, as far as he can, the comfort and credit of his descendants. This wish, when followed out consistently with the revealed will of God, and in subserviency to the course of his providence, is highly commendable. But the principle that dictates it, when left to the direction of the carnal mind, becomes both sinful and pernicious. How ambitious are self-important and earthly-minded mortals to transmit their honours and possessions to the latest generations of their posterity, purely from vain-glorious motives! And how many a futile attempt has been made for that purpose, without any reference to the divine approbation! Man, forgetful of the situation he now fills, as a fallen and perishing creature, would fain discover the means of obtaining for himself, at least, a representative immortality here below. What he knows he must soon relinquish on his own part, he is extremely desirous should be retained by his offspring, according to his appointment and disposal. This, however, in any thing like a strict sense, is utterly unattainable in a world where sin prevails. The nearest approach to it is certainly to be found in the provisions of the Hebrew jubilee. But even by that ordinance of God the object was realized only once in half a century. And this approximation was continued in force merely for a time, and in order to the accomplishment of infinitely higher and nobler ends.

The jubilee was most solemnly and expressly instituted by God. "And thou shalt number seven Sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven Sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound, on the tenth day of the seventh month; in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family." A difference of opinion has arisen, however, as to the precise year in which the jubilee was observed, whether on the forty-ninth or the fiftieth year. It is argued, in favour of the former view, that the other supposition is open to the objection that the land, according to it, must have lain uncultivated during two successive years, the previous being necessarily a Sabbatical year, while, at the same time, no specific promise is clearly made of an adequate additional supply of the means of subsistence. But this fact, though worthy of attention, is surely not so insurmountable an obstacle as to set aside the explicit and repeated mention of the fiftieth year. It is, doubtless, a sound maxim in the interpretation of Scripture, never to call in the aid of miracles, where facts and events can be accounted for on the principles of reason, and by the operation of natural causes; but the mere consideration of economizing, so to speak, miraculous intervention, should not lead us to interpret the sacred text otherwise than according to its grammatical import. And in such cases as the present, does not the divine command imply a corresponding assurance of all the means requisite for its proper observance? Of the protracted suspension of agricultural labour, and the consequences to which it might have led, important uses have been made. From that circumstance a proof has been derived in favour of the divine legation of Moses; because no wise lawgiver, unless really commissioned from heaven, would have ventured to involve himself and his system in so formidable a difficulty. And it has also been observed, still more conclusively with regard to the jubilee, as well as the Sabbatical year, that no people would have submitted to receive institutions so obviously interfering with their temporal interests, except on the clearest warrant of divine authority. To the last inference it may, no doubt, be plausibly objected, that many a costly, and even painful, religious observance has been complied with on very slender, nay, on false grounds. But there is this distinction to be kept in view, that such observances, on the part of ancient or modern devotees of heathenism, have generally, if not always, been either the result of temporary ebullitions of zeal, or the acts only of individuals; whereas the Hebrew institutions in question were observed deliberately, steadily, and by a whole nation.

We find a very explicit allusion to the jubilee in the book of Isaiah. The description there given of it is so clear and striking, as to show sufficiently that its joyful observances, and salutary operation, must have been familiar to the mind of that prophet. It is not to be forgotten, indeed, that he employs it to illustrate an event of which it gives only an imperfect representation. But still his words convey a lively picture of its leading features, (Isa. 1-3;) of which passage Bishop Lowth gives the following excellent translation, wherein the spirit of the original is very faithfully and happily expressed:—

The Spirit of Jehovah is upon me,
Because Jehovah hath anointed me,
To publish glad tidings to the meek hath he sent me;
To bind up the broken-hearted:
To proclaim to the captives freedom;
And to the bounden, perfect liberty;

To proclaim the year of acceptance with Jehovah ;
 And the day of vengeance of our God.
 To comfort all those that mourn ;
 To impart (gladness) to the mourners of Sion ;
 To give them a beautiful crown, instead of ashes ;
 The oil of gladness, instead of sorrow ;
 The clothing of praise, instead of the spirit of heaviness.

From the time of the captivity the more prominent and public provisions of the jubilee were discontinued. And some of these had, perhaps, ceased to be complied with even before that period. This conclusion, however, does not follow from the silence of the Scriptures so necessarily, as has often been asserted; for in all such cases, it would seem to be more in accordance with the course of things to assume, that institutions once solemnly established by divine authority continued to be regularly observed, if no mention is made of their neglect or suppression, than to infer their extinction solely from the absence of information respecting them. After the return from Babylon circumstances were much changed, and the law of inheritance was placed on a new footing. But though possessions could then be no longer restored as formerly, would not the expectation which the Hebrews still cherished with unabated ardour, that their ancient polity and independence were yet to be revived, powerfully tend to keep up many of the observances connected with the fiftieth year? And would not these, as well as the predictions of a happier era under the Messiah, become dearer to the fallen Israelites in direct proportion to the depression they suffered in the scale of nations, and the bereavement they sustained of almost all their high peculiar privileges?

It is the opinion of some eminent chronologists and critics that the jubilee was recognised, and most probably observed by the Jews, as far as their outward circumstances and national corruption allowed, down to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The chief proof, however, adduced in support of this view is the obvious application to himself by our Lord of the passage, which he read in the synagogue of Nazareth:—"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of the sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." These words, which Luke states were found in the prophecies of Esaias, and which have been already adverted to, as there contained, do not exactly correspond either to the original Hebrew, or to the Greek of the Septuagint. But the variations are not such as materially to affect the scope of the quotation. And the declaration of our Lord in reference to the tenor of what he had read, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears," as it certainly affixes to the passage a typical import, is thought also to warrant the conclusion, that he began his ministry on the very year of the jubilee, and that the audience he addressed was fully aware of the fact, and readily acquiesced in his statement of it.

The jubilee began in the first month of the civil year of the Hebrews, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical, which would correspond to the end of September according to our reckoning. It commenced with festive rejoicings; and these alone engrossed attention for nine days. The tenth was spent in solemn fasting, being the great day of atonement. And the peculiar provisions of the institution were after that carried into effect. "From the beginning of the year," says Maimonides, "down to the day of expiation, the bondmen were not liberated, neither did they serve their masters, nor yet were the inheritances restored. What then was done during that interval? The bondmen ate and drank and were merry, and every one of them put a crown upon his head. At length when the day of expiation was come, the elders of the Sanhedrim blew with the trumpets; and instantly the bondmen became free, and inheritances were restored to their proper owners."

The jubilee was calculated to answer many important ends. The more prominent of these we shall briefly consider.

The first object of the jubilee was the periodical restoration of liberty to Hebrew bondmen, and of the inheritances in Israel to the lineal descendants of the original possessors.

Many vain attempts have been made, both in ancient and modern times, to establish a perfectly equal distribution of property among the members of a community. Fanciful theorists have sometimes dreamed of such a state of things, without any sinister or selfish design; and factious discontented men have often claimed in its favour, from very suspicious motives. The arguments for such a system of social order, however, are too palpably absurd to impose upon any person of common reflection. The scheme is impossible with men continue as we find them, so differently constituted as to bodily strength and mental endowments. And even if it were possible, considering the vast diversity of moral character and habits of industry, would it not obviously imply the greatest injustice? As long as unequal advantages are conferred by Providence, a law will the outward situations of men differ, more or less, in respect to wealth and influence, and in respect to personal accommodation and comfort. To restrain the exertions of the more intelligent and active would be to abridge the means of human happiness; and to deprive them of the fruits of their labour or skill would be an act of manifest iniquity. The Hebrew jubilee was instituted with no such intention. It came into operation in such a way as to involve no violation of pre-existing rights. At the period of its commencement none could claim a prescriptive possession. All became equally and at once interested in the observance of the new arrangement; and every subsequent transaction was entered into with a knowledge of the various liabilities arising out of it. The statute, too, was imperative, with regard to liberty, as with regard to inheritance in land. Even those who had declined to go out free at the end of six years of servitude, were declared to be emancipated on the arrival of the jubilee. The object, therefore, most obviously and immediately intended by this institution was to preserve among the chosen people a perfect parity, as to personal freedom, and to keep up that modified equality, as to outward possessions, which was established by divine appointment at the original partition of Palestine. But the results, though in themselves desirable, in the peculiar circumstances of the Israelites, must not be viewed as constituting the principal end contemplated. There was manifestly designed something much higher and more spiritual.

The second object of the jubilee was the preservation of the order of descent clear and distinct, with reference to the promised Messiah.

In order to render the completion of the prophecies concerning Christ perfectly obvious, it was necessary that the distinction of tribes and families should be strictly maintained. But any mere formal injustice to that effect, however imperatively given, would scarcely have been duly observed in opposition to the ordinary course of human affairs. With the view, therefore, of securing this point effectually, an ordinance was divinely instituted which perpetuated the original distribution of property among the children of Israel. God, in this matter, while carrying forward his own holy purposes, took into account, if we may use the expression, the tendencies of our fallen nature, and made even the imperfections of man subservient to his designs. The most important temporal interests became dependent upon the accurate preservation of genealogies, a consideration that would insure proper attention to the subject, when reasons less evident, though really of greater essential weight, would have failed. And would not the searching scrutiny which must thus have been exercised over the operation of the law, by all parties concerned, completely prevent the success of unfounded pretensions to any of the privileges of birth-right?

It was promised to each of the three Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that the Messiah should spring from their posterity. To Israel on his death-bed a more definite intimation was given, assigning to Judah the high honour of being the ancestor, according to the flesh, of the Saviour of mankind. Again, when his offspring had become a numerous tribe, a further limitation was made and announced. The family of David was declared to be that out of which the expected deliverer should arise. But could these, and similar predictions, have been verified after a long series of ages, had not such an institution as the jubilee existed among the Israelites? If things had been left to flow in the common channel of events, the usual results would have inevitably followed,—the line of descent, in the great majority of instances, would have soon been involved in irretrievable confusion. Only a few families, of the noblest extraction, in any other nation, can lay certain claims to a remote ancestry. The case among the ancient Hebrews was very different. The antiquity of the proudest pedigree, in modern times, is but of yesterday compared with that of the meanest branches of the peculiar race. The ordinance under present consideration, served to clear up all obscurity on the subject of descent, at the end of every fifty years. And there is ample proof to show that the most scrupulous attention was paid to this point, down to the period of the Messiah's advent.

That Jesus of Nazareth was a branch out of the root of Jesse, and a descendant of Judah's royal line, was not only affirmed by the followers of our Lord, but also corroborated by many undesigned testimonies, and not denied even by his enemies. Two of the evangelists trace the order of his descent through different, though perfectly consistent channels, up to the same source. It was testified, on all hands, that the Messiah, when he did appear, should come as David's son. And did not the two blind men sitting by the wayside, when they heard that Jesus passed by, cry out, saying, "Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou son of David?" Again, did not the multitudes that attended Christ's public entrance into Jerusalem with one voice exclaim, "Hosanna to the son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; hosanna in the highest?" Such was the honour explicitly rendered on that remarkable occasion, to Jesus the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee. And though Joseph and Mary were in poor and lowly circumstances at the birth of our Saviour, they were obviously recognised to be of David's house; for was it not expressly on that ground that they repaired to Bethlehem to be enrolled there? The jubilee, in their case, no more brought back the inheritance, but it was doubtless mainly instrumental, under Providence, in preserving a knowledge of the lineage of their family.

The third object of the jubilee was to afford a typical representation of the state of things, in a spiritual view, under the Gospel.

Our Lord, as has already been stated, made this use of Isaiah's description of its principal features. The strictly peculiar provisions of this institution were, the liberation of all Hebrew bondmen, and the restoration of inheritances. And each of these is clearly susceptible of a typical application.

Every Israelite that had fallen under bondage to any of his brethren, was entitled to freedom after a servitude of six years. But if any one in such a condition should choose, when that period arrived, to remain in the house and service of his master, it was lawful for him to do so. But the term of this new voluntary engagement was not necessarily for life. The expression for ever, as applied to it, must be understood in a limited sense; for at the commencement of the jubilee no option appears to have been left or allowed. It was as obligatory on the one party to go out free, as it was on the other to grant liberty.

But how infinitely more valuable than any external freedom is that moral emancipation which the Gospel proclaims! By nature we are all in a state of spiritual thralldom; and we are enslaved not to a brother, but to a master, or rather tyrant, who is utterly inaccessible to the feelings of pity or compassion. We are the bondmen of sin and Satan. This condition is worse than that of the Israelites, even when groaning under the most grievous exactions of Egyptian bondage. But from this degrading servitude, there is deliverance provided. The Saviour redeems his people from the power of the oppressor. He breaks every yoke—the yoke of every evil influence. The Christian enjoys the glorious liberty wherewith Christ hath made his people free; and his heart being enlarged, he delights to serve God in righteousness and holiness before him all the days of his life.

Again, man was originally the possessor of a fair inheritance. The delights of the garden of Eden formed but a portion of his felicity. He enjoyed the favour of his Creator, and was blessed with his immediate converse and communion. But this lot of happiness unspeakable, was all forfeited by Adam's apostasy. Our great progenitor was ignobly expelled from the scene of his former bliss; and his posterity have inherited from him a birth-right only of guilt and sufferings. The loss thus sustained, however, is not irretrievable. We could never of ourselves, indeed, regain the paradise out of which our first parents were driven, nor deserve to enjoy the high privileges with which they were at first favoured; but God, in his mercy to our sinful race, has opened up a gracious way of recovery by the cross of his incarnate Son. Through our Saviour's infinitely precious blood, not only are the moral debts, the sins, of the believer cancelled, and his spiritual freedom achieved, but a title is also purchased for him to that inheritance on high, which is "incorruptible, and undefiled, and which fadeth not away."

The Messiah came to raise our fallen state, and to repair the fatal consequences of man's rebellion. His birth was celebrated by a choir of angels, who sang, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, and good will to men." The opening of his ministry was announced by his forerunner, John the Baptist, as the commencement of a holier and happier era—as the coming of the kingdom of heaven. These intimations far exceeded the glad sounds of the trumpet of the jubilee, both in sublimity and importance; and how largely have they been already fulfilled! By the introduction and spread of Christianity, the greatest moral revolution has been effected that the annals of mankind bear on record. Its triumph is far from being yet complete, but its benign influence is now felt in almost every region of the globe. There is still, indeed, much reason to lament, that the lives of many professing Christians are at variance with the spirit of the Gospel; and vast sections of the earth's surface are still involved in the darkness of heathenism. But much has clearly been accomplished, in the course of Providence, towards the spiritual renovation of the world. The empire of ignorance and error is shaken to its centre. The most ancient habitations of Pagan superstition exhibit manifest signs of an approaching overthrow. The promised reign of peace and happiness, arising from the universal diffusion of the principles of pure and undefiled religion, evidently draws nearer. "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Thus shall the kingdom of grace gradually make way for that of final and eternal glory. For the redeemed of the Lord, out of every kindred and tongue, the true Israel of God, shall return and come to Mount Zion above, with crowns of everlasting joy upon their heads; and the days of their mourning shall be ended.

THE NECESSITY OF A REVIVAL OF RELIGION:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JAMES BURNS, A.M.,
One of the Ministers of Brechin.

"Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee?"—PSALM LXXXV. 6.

THIS psalm or prayer was composed and offered up, when the Church of God was in an afflicted state. The Psalmist blesses God for former mercies and deliverances, for his kindness to the land of Judea and to their fathers, and for forgiveness and favour manifested towards them. The consideration of these encouraged him to apply, in name of his people, for favour and loving-kindness to themselves at that time, which is generally supposed to have been after their return from Babylon, when they still were under some tokens of divine displeasure. They beg for converting grace, as at verse fourth, "Turn us again, O God of our salvation." They beg for the removal of divine displeasure,—"Cause thine anger toward us to cease." In the words of our text they implore a revival of the cause of God in their hearts, and in their nation and Church; in the way of earnest expostulation they apply to God, who allows his worshippers to be thus importunate in reasoning with him; "Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee?"

It cannot be difficult to show that this is a petition most suitable to our case, whether as individuals, as families, or as congregations. At no time can a revival of religion in our hearts, and in the world around us be unnecessary or undesirable. The more it flourishes, the greater concern there should be for its further prosperity. But when religion is at a low ebb, when iniquity aboundeth, and the love of many waxeth cold, then it is high time for its friends to step forward, and to use every means in their power to prevent its farther decline, and to revive its decaying interests. It may be proper and useful to show, as we propose, by the divine blessing, to show, what need there is of a revival of religion among us. And, in general, it may be observed that there is such an appearance of indifference or deadness in spiritual concerns, that the need of a revival is very evident. The marks of this indifference or deadness are too plain and numerous to be mistaken by any; and,

I. One mark is a partial and careless attendance on ordinances. There are too many, in our highly favoured land, who are seldom or never seen in the house of God, and who thereby openly proclaim their indifference, nay, their aversion to religion, that they "care for none of these things." There are multitudes who easily find excuses for absenting themselves, and who, consequently, do not seem sensible that it is both a duty and a privilege thus "to draw near unto God." If the mind and heart were in a right state, there would be a strong desire for, and a great delight in, such opportunities. In common life it is uniformly seen that, whatever employment or society men are fond of, they do not neglect, they do not seek after excuses for absenting themselves. So would it be here, if there were a real and earnest desire of holding intercourse with God, or of becoming acquainted with his holy will. We would not be, like Doeg the Edomite, "detained before the Lord," kept, against our will, engaged in his service. This must indeed be "bodily exercise which profiteth little." It is too plain a sign of indifference when persons are generally late in their attendance; thus neglecting part of the worship of God, and engaging in the rest of it without that composure of mind which is so desirable and necessary. Connected, also, with this partial or broken attendance, is that listlessness of mind, that vacant countenance, that gazing around them, which are so frequently to be seen in our worshipping assemblies. A spirit of lively devotion is the very opposite of all this: its language is, "I love the habitation of thy house,"—"One day spent in thy courts is better than a thousand,"—"My heart is fixed, my heart is fixed, I will sing and give praise,"—"My soul wait thou only upon God."

II. Neglect of family religion is a plain mark of indifference. There is a great want of early instruction. Most parents, indeed, give an education to their children suited to their station in life, but it is, in general, an education which only fits them for the business of a present life. Although teachers of youth are unquestionably bound, if they have any just sense of their duty, to instil the principles of religion into the tender minds of their charge, yet this necessarily falls to be the special concern of parents, with whom their children associate at all seasons. We see that, in the character of the saints in Scripture, their attention to family instruction is particularly mentioned. It was God's declaration concerning Abraham, "I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him." Joshua declared, "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." And Moses gave it in solemn charge to the Israelites, to "speak of the things of God when they sat in the house, or walked by the way."

This neglect is blameworthy both in parents and teachers. It shows that neither their heads nor their hearts are occupied about religion in good earnest, when they content themselves with teaching their young charge only a form of words, without talking with them familiarly concerning the way of salvation, and the way of duty. It is long before a form of words, however good, comes to be fully understood or attended to by youthful minds. Does it therefore follow that no ideas, such as they can understand, are to be taught them in such language as is plain to their capacities? Surely not. Otherwise they may, and too often do, die without any clear knowledge of God and of Christ, although arrived at an age in which they might have acquired it had due pains been bestowed. The rudeness, the ignorance, the carelessness, the profaning of the name and of the day of God, with which many young persons among us are chargeable, are very much to be ascribed to the want of early, plain, practical instruction. Youthful minds, though heedless, are easily impressed, and generally retain a lasting impression of what is early taught them. What a plain, undeniable mark of indifference, when they are taught every other kind of knowledge more than that knowledge which is life eternal, and for lack of which many are destroyed!

The neglect of the worship of God in families, which, indeed, is alas! very common among us, is a striking proof of the need of a revival. Many plead their inability, or their being afraid to engage in such exercises; that inability, if it be really true, shows an ignorance which is utterly inexcusable; and fear, or false shame, is altogether disallowed by our Lord, when he says, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me or of my words, of him also will the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father and of the holy angels." There can be no doubt, then, indifference or spiritual deadness lies at the bottom of such neglect. For wherever persons become deeply concerned about their own souls, and those of their families, they break through every such objection, and experience a freedom and enlargement in the duty, of which they could have formerly had no idea. It can be said of such a one as it was said of Saul of Tarsus immediately after his miraculous conversion, "Behold he prayeth!" And I have often thought the performance of this duty on the Lord's day only, or on such solemn occasions, although better than a total neglect, is too plain a symptom of lukewarmness or indifference. It looks as if the things of the world were thought to deserve more care and attention than those of the soul, as if the body needed to be every day supplied with food, but the soul might safely be allowed to famish. It shows an insensibility of spiritual wants, and of the need of a daily supply of knowledge and of grace.

So far we have treated of outward, visible marks of indifference, and consequently of the need of a revival of religion. There are others of a more inward, invisible kind, which a knowledge of our own hearts will best discover to us, as well as show us in how far we are chargeable with them. I therefore mention,

III. Formality and hypocrisy as marks of spiritual deadness. Public and family devotion may be regularly observed, but it is evidently dangerous to rest in the mere outward performance of them. If it proceeds from custom, or from a regard to decency; or if we are satisfied with having gone the round of external performances, this is formality and hypocrisy. Hypocrisy, indeed, in its utmost extent, includes an intention to deceive our fellow-creatures, by assuming appearances of religion without the reality. But it does exist even when there is no decided intention of this kind. When the heart is not engaged, when we are not concerned about beneficial effects being produced in our hearts and lives, this is self-deception,—an imposing upon ourselves. This is to have "a form of godliness, denying the power thereof." Each of us must here judge for himself. But let us be concerned to be impartial in judging. Let us seriously weigh the motives which influence us in our observing the institutions of divine worship, whether in public or private. The few visible good effects which are produced in most men from their observance of these things, afford too plain a proof that their hearts are not right with God, "that they draw nigh to God with their mouths, while their hearts are far from him." Alas! it is to be feared the generality of those who attend on ordinances most punctually may be compared to the door on its hinges, moving backward and forward without making any progress. How common it is to see persons sitting forty or fifty years under a Gospel ministry, perhaps a powerful and searching ministry, and yet, after all, careless, unconcerned, worldly-minded! Many come and go to the house of God, and are still the same, or rather more and more hardened. No exhortation, no reproof has any lasting effect upon them. The drunkard still loves his cup, the covetous his money, the dishonest his unjust gains. This shows that no divine blessing attends their "bodily exercise," which, of course, "profiteth little." There is great danger of this formal, customary, unprofitable service, from the general corruption of the human heart, and from the long habit of attending on religious ordinances. Accordingly, it has been remarked, and seemingly with great truth, that where people have been long favoured with a Gospel dispensation, it is very rare to witness any remarkable change on the character of persons advanced in life. They generally go on as they have been wont to do, and die as they have lived, secure and hardened. But when the Gospel is first brought to a place with power and in purity, it often impresses the heart of the aged as well as the young. This appears to be the usual course, although we must not "set limits to the Holy One of Israel," who "hath all hearts in his hand."

Not only is it to be feared the great bulk of hearers of the Gospel are chargeable with this formality and hypocrisy, this mere outside religion; but the people of God themselves are not free from this charge. Although they will consider seriously for what purpose, and with what views, they engage in devotional exercises, and will have the glory of God and their own edification mainly at heart, yet I may appeal to themselves, how often do your thoughts wander from the great object which you profess to have in view? Vain thoughts lodge within you, and your desires after divine things become cold and languid. But this may lead me to observe,

IV. That the weakness of the graces of God's own people shows the need of a revival. Although, on some occasions, and with some of God's people more than others, their graces are in lively exercise, faith strong, love warm, hope steady, "great peace and joy in believing," yet at other times they "go mourning without the sun," their hearts faint, and their hands hang down. Their faith becomes weak and wavering. They want a steady, realizing view of spiritual and divine objects. Sometimes they are left to doubt the very existence of a God and a Saviour, of a heaven and a hell, and at any rate, to question their own personal interest in the blessings of salvation. "Because of abounding iniquity" in their own hearts and in the world around them, "their love waxes cold." They too often do not feel that high esteem of the divine perfections and excellencies which these deserve, and they want that delight in contemplating and adoring these grand objects which their value demands, their hearts being weighed down by inferior attachments, by a too keen relish and enjoyment of present perishing objects. No wonder that their hopes of the favour and enjoyment of God here and hereafter, become wavering and unsteady. When faith is weak, and love waxes cold, it would seem presumptuous to entertain strong and steady hope. The graces of the Divine Spirit in the hearts of God's people are thus mutually connected. They are either in a vigorous or in a declining state together.

Along with this decaying, languishing state of their Christian graces, the risings of sin, the remains of indwelling corruption, are felt within them. They are harassed by vain, wandering, foolish, impure imaginations. In proportion as their desires after God are cold and feeble, their desires after present objects are warm and strong. The world presents its smiles to allure them, and to keep down their hearts from aspiring after spiritual objects; or its frowns to deter them from following duty and conscience, and heavenly objects. Satan presents his temptations along with those of the world, and of his own heart, in betraying them to sin. He has both wiles and fiery darts; and it is difficult to discover which of them is most dangerous. The Christian is not ignorant of the devices, while he pleads the promise that the Lord will "bruise Satan under his feet shortly," and at the same time complies with the command—"resist the Devil."

The weakness of grace, and remaining sinfulness, are the grief and burden of all God's genuine children. They do not reckon it sufficient merely to acknowledge and complain of them in a cold and formal manner, but they are deeply humbled at the view of themselves, and earnestly prove the Psalmist, "Revive and quicken me, for thy name's sake." Those who have most of true grace, are most sensible of their own sinfulness, because they have deeper views than others of the evil of sin, and of the divine purity. While others are thoughtless and easy about their state, the genuine children of God labour, and watch, and pray, that their souls may prosper, and be in health; are anxious about the revival, from one season to another, of the work of grace in their own souls, and in the hearts of others connected with them; and thus that religion may be revived in the world, and in the Church at large.

VAIN REPETITIONS IN PRAYER.

[From the Second Volume of "Eastern Manners," by the Rev. Robert Jamieson, minister of Westrother.]

IN consulting the works of those who have transmitted to us accounts of the worship of the heathen, we find that it was characterised by the lowest and most grovelling conceptions of the objects of their religious homage; that so far from regarding them as beings whom they could unbosom all their wants, and whose parental care they might depend in every season of trouble and of need, they looked on them as beings of whom it was more their duty and their interest to appease the fury and disarm the hostility, than to secure the presence and the favourable regards; and that, for this purpose, they had recourse to the most violent means which their invention could suggest. crying in the most vehement tones, and with the most extravagant gestures, and protracting their prayers till exhausted nature sunk under the fatigue. Of the prayers of the ancient heathen, the sacred history furnishes two examples; the one relating to the memorable occasion, when the priests of Baal continued their vain invocations to that false divinity from morn till even, in the same unvarying strain, saying all the while nothing but "Baal, hear us;" and the other when the Ephesians cried out in the temple of the tutelary goddess for the space of two hours, "Goddess is Diana." From other sources we learn that similar forms of prayer were employed throughout all the pagan world of antiquity; that even among the enlightened Greeks and Romans, it was customary to repeat their supplications a hundred times, with the view of making a deeper impression on the heart of the deity whom they invoked; and that, in cases of great urgency, after supplicating, with unwearied assiduity, the particular deity to whom they offered sacrifices, they were wont to address all the gods and goddesses in succession, lest any one of them should be adverse to the suppliant. With the modern pagans, the learning of a few prayers comprises, in many places, the whole of a child's education. "The boys are made to rise," says Lander, who particularly noticed this peculiarity of the pagan manners of Africa, "every morning between midnight and sunrise, and are studiously employed in copying their prayers; after which they read them to their master, one after another beginning with the eldest. This is repeated in a shrill hoarse tone, so loud as to be heard at the distance of half a mile at least, which is believed to be a criterion of excellence by the parents; and he who has the strongest lungs, and the clearest voice, and holds out the longest, is reckoned the best scholar." With the Hindus, the repetition of the name of their gods is regarded as an act of adoration. In the performance of this devotional duty, the worshipper, taking a string of beads consisting generally of ninety-nine, repeats the

of his god; and, as he mentions each epithet of the deity, drops a bead, counting, by this means, to a hundred, a thousand, or as many times as he thinks will secure the success of his prayer. Many persons perform this rite by merely counting their fingers, and it is thought by the Hindoos to be so efficacious a mode of supplication, that there is nothing in the way either of recovery from sickness, or relief from misfortune, or success in the concerns of business, which may not be obtained by this persevering repetition of the name of God. Hence the repeated mention of the name of their gods not only constitutes an essential part of the daily worship of the Hindoos, but those of them who aspire to a high character for religion, continue days and nights in this exercise, without any intervals, except what is consumed in sleeping, bathing, and eating.* The native Mussulmans of India do not differ in this respect from the Hindoos. The grand principle of their worship is to have the name of God always on their lips, and they carry it into practice by having set prayers, in which that name is prominently introduced, for various occupations and circumstances. Thus they have a prayer, consisting only of four words, which they invariably repeat over and over when walking, and revolve in their minds one word at every step; and, for the morning, noon, and evening of each day, they have another form of prayer, of which the following is in part a specimen:—Beginning with Bismillah, (that is, in the name of God,) they fall into a stooping posture, and pronounce the words, "Praised be the great God, our preserver," three or four times; then resuming an erect posture, they exclaim, "Thou, Almighty, art the hearer of my praises," three or five times; then, coming to the form of prostration, they first repeat three or four times, "O thou holy and blessed preserver;" and lastly, they repeat, still in the same attitude, for nine times, these words, "O thou that hearest with ears, thou that hearest with ears," &c.† Nor is it only in their temples, or in private, that they go through this round of "vain repetitions." They are generally as scrupulously exact in observing the prescribed form, as they are in attending to the appointed seasons of prayer. When the cholera was raging in Georgia, the Tartars went in solemn mourning procession through the streets, with heads uncovered, and crying out, with clamorous vociferation, the name of God. The following prayer is in use among the aborigines of Madagascar:—"O Eternal, have mercy upon me, because I am passing away! O Infinite, because I am but a speck! O Most Mighty, because I am weak! O Source of Life, because I draw nigh to the grave! O Omniscient, because I am in darkness! O All-bounteous, because I am poor! O All-sufficient, because I am nothing," &c. † Some Brahmins directed Mr Thomas, the Missionary, when he was arguing with them how they should get to heaven, to perform the Zoap,—a prayer which consists, in its greatest latitude, in pronouncing the name of God millions of times, without stopping, or uttering any other word; and some of whom, Mr Thomas knew, have continued the vain repetitions for whole days and nights together, till their mental faculties have been deranged.** Richardson saw two dervishes sit down opposite to each other, and begin throwing their beads from side to side, pronouncing the name of God at each motion, and continuing to do so for an hour or more together, without adding another syllable, or missing a single repetition; and the same traveller mentions his having met a man in Nubia, who was very punctual and ceremonious in his prayers, and, in performing them, repeated the words as fast and as loud as his tongue could give them utterance. The form and words of his prayer were not peculiar, but he had made a vow, for greater devotion, to repeat certain words of the prayer a given number of times, both night and morning. The word Rabbōni, for example, answering to our word "Lord," he would bind himself to repeat a hundred or two hundred times twice a-day; and, accordingly, went on, in the hearing of all the party, and on his knees, sometimes with his face directed steadily to heaven, at other times bowing down to the ground, and calling out "Rabbōni, Rabbōni, Rabbōni, Rabbōni," &c., as fast as he could articulate the words after each other, like a schoolboy going through his task,—not like a man, who, praying with the heart and the understanding also, continues longer on his knees in the raptures of devotion,—whose soul is a flame of fire, enkindled by his Maker, and feeding upon his God,—and who, like Jacob, will not let him go until he bless him. Having settled his account with the word Rabbōni, which the telling of his beads enabled him to know when he had done, he proceeded to dispose of his other vows in a similar manner. Allah houakbar (God most great) perhaps came next, and he would go on as with the other,—Allah houakbar, Allah houakbar, &c., repeating the words as fast as he could possibly pronounce them. When he had done with it, he took up another word, Allah careem (God assisting,) Allah hedaim (eternal God,) Allah delalai (glory to God,) or some other word, or phrase, or attribute of Jehovah, and repeated it over as many times as he had vowed to do. To hear this man repeat his prayers, his variety of unconnected tones, running through all the notes of the gamut, produced quite a ludicrous effect. You would say, he was making a farce of devotion; but to look at him when engaged, nothing could be more serious and devout, or more abstracted from the world. This man was not alone; for almost every ten minutes some one or other of the Nubians in the company was uttering pious ejaculations during the whole course of the day, and going through each word of his prayers like the person mentioned above.* But the most remarkable and strange of all the forms in which the heathen observe their "vain repetitions," is that of the Kalmuc Tartars, whose practice may be described briefly as follows:—They have praying machines, which, in the act of devotion, they turn repeatedly, and in the same manner as one would revolve a wheel. A machine of this kind consists of a small barrel about sixteen inches in length and seven or eight in diameter, covered with red velvet, and having within it a number of written prayers. At each end of the barrel is fixed an axle, one of which has a crank, and to it is fixed a string to turn it round with. It is fitted to a frame, which is covered with cloth of a coarser or finer description, according to the circumstances of the owner. The one of which this account is given, belonged to the Kalmuc princess, and was enveloped in a covering of velvet; and the whole apparatus was set upon an elegant little chest directly before her. When the barrel turns round, it is supposed by the poor ignorant people that the prayers go up to heaven, and the more revolutions that are made, or, in other words, the oftener the writing is uppermost, the more chance there is of their being heard.

* The heathens have often been convinced, by plain arguments, of the folly of such a mode of praying. "Conversing with a company of Brahmins," says Mr Thomas, "I said, how can the infinitely great and holy One be pleased to hear his name so often pronounced from polluted lips? I inquired if the Supreme Being was wise and good, to which they yielded ready answers in the affirmative. I then fixed my eye on one of the nearest Brahmins, and asked him if he had any sons? He said, he had. Whenever you shall return home, said I, suppose your son was to come running to meet you, and falling down at your feet, should cry out incessantly, Peta (father), Peta, Peta, without ever saying another word, what would you think of him? I should think, said he, that the boy was foolish. So I fear, said I, would the wise and good One, if I was in the same manner to call over his holy and reverend name."—Miss. Mag. 1792.

** Missionary Magazine, March, 1792. The modern Jews in Barbary repeat the same prayer a hundred and twenty times, before finishing.—Shaw's Journal, in Missionary Register, 1835.

Those of the Kalmucs who are too poor to purchase, or too unskilful to construct a machine of this superior kind, have small praying mills, like the wind-mills which are given as toys to children with us, to the spokes of which they fasten prayers, written on slips of paper, with paste or small cords. These they set up on the tops of their tents, and as they are turned by the wind, it is imagined that they have a similar effect with the barrel.* Such are a few specimens of the prayers of the heathen, both in ancient and modern times, from which it will be observed, that all of them are founded on the idea that by these repetitions the worshippers can either communicate new and more accurate intelligence of their case to the object of their worship, or that, by their importunate solicitations, they may prevail upon them to interest themselves in the concerns of their creatures. And nothing can more strikingly show how far the Jews, in the days of our Lord, had declined from the purity of worship and of faith that prevailed among their fathers, than their adoption of ideas and practices so low, unmeaning, and contemptible as those.

CHRIST RIDING INTO JERUSALEM.

HAVING cured the two blind men who sat at the gate of Jericho, our Lord proceeded on his journey. We behold him passing on his way, amidst the rich fields of the valley of the Jordan, and under the shade of the palm trees of Jericho, until he enters the gloomy defiles, the scene of his own parable, where the wounded traveller was relieved by the good Samaritan. At one time he talks in familiar language to his disciples, at another he discourses to the multitude; introducing, no doubt, brief but distinct allusions to that bloody baptism which was now near. In this manner did our Lord and his disciples pursue their journey, until they came in sight of Jerusalem. Let us pause here and contemplate the scene of magnificence which opened before them.

The towers and palaces of the Holy City rose in majesty, as in those days when David illustrated her by the success of his arms, and Solomon by the glory of his wisdom. Storm, and siege, and battle, had passed over her; her wall had been broken down, and her temple had been laid in heaps; but the munificence of Chaldea repaired what her arms had wasted, and when our Lord and the disciples drew near, she appeared in a condition which justified her ancient renown—her numberless palaces enclosed within ramparts which bade defiance to human power. The faithful city had become an harlot; murderers now lodged where the prophets and saints of God dwelt in former ages, but Jerusalem still appeared “beautiful for situation, “the joy of the whole earth, the city of the Great King.”

The name and sight of Jerusalem were sufficient to awaken a long train of sacred associations. In that city and nation alone was the name of Jehovah known and his praise celebrated. There the oracles of truth were deposited. There the Shekinah, the symbol of the Divine Majesty, dwelt for ages. There the sacrifices were offered, the types of a greater and a better sacrifice. There reposed the ashes of David, and of the long line of kings who filled his throne. And there too slept the martyred prophets and patriots, whose blood had been shed by her unfaithful children. Every spot was associated with some venerable name, or some imperishable deed of piety or patriotism.

As the disciples drew near, every object must have recalled the past to their remembrance. The road along which they advanced—how often on this path had the armies of Israel gone forth to battle, or returned in victory! The towers which rose before them—how often had the tribes, when in solemn march to appear before the Lord in Jerusalem, descried them from afar, and lifted up the song of salvation! On these walls how often had the banner of the House of David floated! How often had the voice of prophets been heard in these streets! How often had they resounded with the sweet music of the harp of David, or the burning eloquence of Isaiah, or the thunders of some sterner prophet denouncing vengeance against the iniquities of her people! There the good and reforming Josiah had reigned, and there his ashes still slumbered in the grave; and he closed his eyes in mercy upon the evil which came upon his people. On that wall Hezekiah stood, when he received the threatening letter of Sennacherib, and heard the words of Rabshakeh blaspheming the name of the Lord. On the plain below, the Assyrian host lay encamped when they were smitten by the angel. How often had the heights around glittered with the arms of invading foes! They gathered themselves together against her; but when they saw her, they were troubled, fear took hold upon them, and they hastened away. Such, no doubt, were the reflections of the disciples as they drew nigh to the city; and it is natural that the appearance of Jerusalem should recall to their imaginations the glory of the past, and give additional distinctness and force to the dreams in which they had long indulged regarding the still greater glory of the future. They did not doubt that they were now approaching the city, in which the throne of the Messiah, in a short time, would be set up, and that all the nations of the earth would soon be seen crowding to Jerusalem to lay their gifts at her feet.

While such were the reflections of the disciples, the sight of Jerusalem had awakened other feelings in the mind of our Lord. He saw before him the scene of his sufferings. He knew that in that city, and within the short space of three days, falsehood would bear witness against him, and injustice would sit as his judge. Immediately before him was the Mount of Olives, and the Garden of Gethsemane, where his soul was to be sorrowful; beyond them was the Hall of Pilate where his body was to be torn by scourging; and yonder, on the west of the city, was the Hill of Calvary, where he was to expire. The whole scene was now before him, from the opening act of Judas in the Garden, to the closing scenes on the Mount of Calvary. The wickedness of man, and the judicial anger of his Father, were more distinctly embodied, and began to press heavily upon him, now that he was treading the ground on which his last agonies were to be endured. No could he relieve his mind, like the disciples, by indulging in the prospect of the coming glory of Jerusalem. He knew her wickedness, and that she was about to fill up the cup of her iniquity by crucifying himself, and persecuting his servants. He foresaw the fearful doom to which she would thus expose herself. She had rejected the Gospel, and he beheld the dove of peace, with the olive branch, slowly retiring from the city, while the Roman eagle was hurrying fast towards her, bent on vengeance on his wings. Thus, when Jesus came out to the city he wept over it.

At the village of Bethany our Lord halted for some time with his disciples. They were now only two miles distant from Jerusalem; and the road by which they approached it would round the Mount of Olives. Arriving on the western side of this hill, they entered the village of Bethphage, which appears to have been a long irregular street joining the Mount of Olives to the city.

"They drew nigh unto Jerusalem," says Matthew, "and were come to Bethphage, unto the Mount of Olives." Here our Lord halted to arrange for his public entrance into Jerusalem.

This was the occasion of greatest state in the life of the man of sorrows. It was the moment of repose, between the labours of his life, and the awful sufferings of his last hours. When we behold him riding in triumph into Jerusalem, we think of the sun scattering a few beams of majesty—standing forth, for one brief moment, in glory in the heavens, before entering the darkness of the thunder-cloud. But although the occasion of greatest state in the life of the Saviour, how simple were the arrangements he made for it! He did not send a herald before him to proclaim the advent of Messiah the King to ascend the throne of his father David. He did not summon the rulers and citizens of Jerusalem to attend him and grace his progress; nor did he send to tell the doctors who sat in the chair of Moses, that one greater than their lawgiver was approaching to vindicate that law which they had corrupted by their traditions. Even on this the day of his triumph "his heart was not baughty; his eyes were not lifted up:" we hear him giving these orders to two of his servants, "Go into the village over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her; loose them and bring them unto me."

Let no child of God repine. Let him not say that that providence is hard which loads the enemies of God with blessings, and feeds them to the full, while he has not bread to eat. Has God visited and renewed your heart by his grace? Ah! he has conferred a higher distinction on you, than if he had clothed you in purple, and set you on a throne. Has he made you the heir of treasures which are incorruptible and immortal, and do you complain that you have only a very limited portion of those that are soon to perish? Let no temporal privation discourage or dispirit you. Christ lived in the meanest and most straitened condition—in circumstances of the greatest poverty. He might have lifted up his voice, and abundance of waters would have covered him, yet he sat athirst on the well of Jacob. He might have commanded the angels, and they would have brought him bread from heaven, as he had aforetime commanded the ravens to feed his prophet, yet he hungered beneath the fig-tree. He was the author of all creatures whether in heaven or in earth, and had the highest claims on their service; but while he was on earth he did not receive aid from any of them. "For our sakes he became poor." All his journeys throughout Galilee and Judea are performed on foot: on this occasion only did he ride; and so great was his poverty, that he was compelled to borrow from a stranger. But in the lowest estate of the Saviour, the rays of his divine majesty are always breaking forth: and it is worthy of our notice, in this instance, that the proof of his great poverty stands beside the proof of his omniscience as God. Does he stand in need of the ass and the colt? He knows where they are to be found; and he directs his disciples to the spot: "Go ye into the village over against you; in the which at your entering ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat."

Can we read this and doubt that God can ever be in want of agents to do his work? are not all creatures his servants, from those who journey to the sun, to those who creep in the dust, and he has only to summon them into his presence and to lay his commands upon them, and they hasten to execute his purpose? And who shall limit God in the choice of his instruments? May he not call a ravenous bird from the east; a man to execute his purpose from a far country? May he not employ the meanest, as well as the highest of his creatures, as the ministers of his blessings, or his judgments? Christ might have summoned an angel from heaven; he sends two of his disciples to the neighbouring village, where the ass and colt awaited their arrival. He might have gone to the schools of Judea where his Gospel was to be published; he selects his apostles from the sea of Galilee. "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty."

Having received the commands of their Master, the disciples proceeded to the spot to which Christ had directed them, and found the ass and the colt. They were proceeding to loose them, when they were interrupted by the owner: they answered him as Jesus had bidden them,—“The Lord hath need of them;” and he was silent. Whether this person understood the language of the disciples, or knew them to be the servants of Jesus, it is impossible to say; but the God of their Master had sent his angel before them, and made their journey prosperous. Christ has the hearts of all men in his hand, and he can put words into the mouths of his servants which those to whom they are addressed will feel to be irresistible. When, therefore, they are sent on the execution of any task, they ought to go forth, not trusting in their own wisdom to direct them, nor in their own power to remove the difficulties by which they may be met, but observing and following implicitly the instructions of their Lord, and trusting that his power will be exerted through them in the execution of his own work. If they go forth in this spirit, however improbable their success, He who has sent them forth will go before them and prepare their path, and if it be for the honour of his name, he will render their mission successful. The disciples returned with the ass and the colt, and set Jesus thereon.

These were simple arrangements, yet they had been the theme of prophecy. "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold, thy King cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." Nothing can be more beautiful than the prophecy, nor can any thing be more exact than the fulfilment of it. Ages had passed away since this note of preparation was sounded. But He whose coming had been so long deferred, came at last; and he came in the manner described in this beautiful prediction, "lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass;" but the daughter of Zion, so joyful once in the prospect of his coming, had now ceased to look for him; she was unable to recognize in him, who came "riding upon an ass," the warrior who was to conquer the enemies of Israel; she was offended at that lowliness and meekness, which the prophet rejoiced to contemplate, and which he foretold in language so beautiful. The daughter of Zion refused to acknowledge her King.

We have described the arrangements which our Lord made for his public entrance into Jerusalem; let us consider next his procession. The company begins to move forward. He is preceded by those who came to meet him from the city, while the multitude who came with him from Bethany follow after. Both companies carry palm branches and sing hosannas. In the midst, the King of Zion rides in simple majesty, surrounded by his apostles, the future princes of his kingdom. We now behold them descending the Mount of Olives; at this point, Jerusalem came more fully into the view of the disciples. Below them was the valley of Jehosaphat, with the tombs of the prophets. The brook Kedron flowed through it, and must have recalled to their imaginations the flight of David with a few faithful followers, when the hearts of the people were won by Absalom. They again beheld the monarch with his weeping train, hurrying from the gates of the city, and pass in sorrow over the brook Kedron, with his head uncovered, and hastily ascend the mount of Olives on his way to the wilderness. Before them rose the hill of Zion, with the palace and the tomb of David; and as they gazed on it, they must have reverted in thought to those early ages when it was occupied by a citadel of the Jebusites, and the mighty men of David stormed and took it. A little to the north of this was the mount of Moriah; there Abraham bound his son to offer him in sacrifice; now it was crowned with the golden roofs of the temple. But we must not spend our time in imagining the feelings which were awakened in the disciples by the scenery of the holy city; we have something of greater magnificence to attend to. The procession moves on and comes nearer; we already hear the shouting of the multitude, as they sing hosannas to the Son of David. Let us take our stand by the way-side, and behold our Lord pass by in majesty.

"Behold he cometh," says the prophet; and the multitudes reply, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; hosanna in the highest." He comes, but in what manner? not like the conqueror in his iron chariot, but like the Saviour, "lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." When a monarch comes to take possession of his throne it is in glorious state,—his march is heralded by the thunder of a thousand trumpets,—the gilded chariot rolls onward in royal majesty,—and the eye is dazzled by the waving plumes and glittering helmets of the warriors which surround him. Our Lord comes in majesty, but that is the majesty of his meekness; he comes to die for his people. In the same manner does Christ enter within the heart of the sinner; he comes to him not in awful terror as a king, but in grace and meekness as a Saviour. It is not in answer to the thunders of the law, but to the summons of the still small voice that the doors of the human heart are opened. The love of God, as revealed in the Gospel, is the sweet influence that constrains the sinner to submit, and to say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." "In thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness."

It was now the tenth day of the month; and the passover was to be celebrated on the fourteenth. On this evening it was usual to consecrate the lamb that was to be offered in sacrifice; having been examined and found to be without blemish, it was solemnly conducted into the temple by the priests, and devoted to God as the paschal sacrifice. What the law required in the type, was voluntarily performed by the antitype. Christ, our New Testament passover, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, solemnly entered the city in which he was to die, on the very day on which the paschal lamb was consecrated. Thus he fulfilled all righteousness. With what propriety and beauty might he have used the words of his type, when he was approaching to remove the sin of his people, which all the paschal sacrifices, since the first institution of that ordinance, had been unable to remove! "Lo, I come, I delight to do thy will; a body hast thou prepared for me."

But, again, Christ entered Jerusalem as the King of Zion. "Tell the daughter of Zion; behold thy King cometh." True, he was seated upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass; but this was the manner in which the ancient kings and judges of Israel were wont to appear; they rode on white asses; and no doubt Christ had this in view when he entered Jerusalem in this manner. He sent his disciples for the ass and colt, not only that the prophecy of Zechariah might be fulfilled, but that he might be exhibited to the daughter of Zion in the manner of her ancient kings, and that she might be able to recognise him as her king and judge. Let us then prostrate ourselves in reverence before Him who cometh as the King of Zion.

Among the nations of antiquity we find some resemblance to our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. When a general returned from a successful campaign, a triumph was sometimes decreed to him. Seated in his chariot, to the wheels of which the most illustrious of his captives were bound, and displaying in the wagons which composed his train the rich spoils of the vanquished nations, he entered the capital of his country amid the loud acclamations of the citizens, who generally assembled in thousands to witness the spectacle. This is similar in one respect, but it is vastly dissimilar in others, to our Lord's peaceful entry into Jerusalem amid the acclamations of her citizens. The fame of the warrior, the glory of the spectacle, the thunder of the applause are forgotten, when we think of the majesty of Him who came in the name of the Lord. The one was a minister of vengeance; he came from the dim and dreary realms which his sword had wasted; the acclamations which hailed him were mingled with the wail of the widow, and the groans of the depopulated provinces; his garments were stained with the blood of the vanquished, and the captive wept at his chariot wheel:—the other came, "just and saving salvation." He was anointed to proclaim "Ere to the captive, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." The former, elated with pride, flushed with success, was imperious and lordly; the latter came "lowly and riding upon an ass." This is the King of glory, but where is the diadem? This is the Lord mighty in battle, yet he is not girt with the sword of war. There is nothing about him to inspire with awe and dread, nothing to keep his subjects at a distance, but every thing to encourage even the most timid suppliant to draw near. Go forth, therefore, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, and behold your King!

Some of those who attended Christ spread their garments by the way, to give something like pomp and show to the procession, as was usually done at the feast of tabernacles. Christ brings a robe to deck the sinner, and he must put off the garment of his own righteousness, that he may receive the benefit of that which the Saviour brings. Others cut down branches from the trees—from the olive and palm trees which grew beside the path—and strewed them in the way. The palm tree was the symbol of victory, and the multitudes were unconsciously strewing his path: a greater victory than man had ever gained,—in this field on which he was to combat with the powers of darkness, and achieve the salvation of a world. It was a token of their wishes for the prosperity of his kingdom. The whole assembly sung hosanna to him as the Son of David. These hosannas were the first notes of the song of thanksgiving and praise which all nations shall one day raise to the Redeemer. When He who rode in humble majesty into Jerusalem to die, shall come in the glory of his Gospel to overthrow the kingdom of darkness, and exalt righteousness in the earth; to gather together the tribes of Israel, and enlighten the nations of the Gentiles, then shall the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; the valleys shall shout for joy, and the tribes of the earth shall say, "Hosanna to the son of David; blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord; hosanna in the highest!"

The procession approaches the gate of Jerusalem: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." The citizens were astonished when they saw one entering the gates of their city, as their kings and judges in former times were wont to enter them, riding upon an ass, while his numerous retinue were bearing palm branches in token of triumph, and singing hosannas to him as the son of David. The whole city was moved; those who waited for the consolation of Israel no doubt rejoiced; those who looked for a temporal deliverer were offended at his humble appearance; and his ancient enemies, the scribes and rulers, were moved with envy at the homage which he received from the citizens: "Hosanna to the Son of David!" was raised by the multitudes as they walked in procession through the streets; and the walls of the temple replied, "Hosanna in the highest!" But in the city of David, the Son of David was received as a stranger. They said, "Who is this?" Alas! that he should have been unknown, on the very spot where prophecy had foretold his coming, where the sacrifices and types had illustrated his character, and where his own miracles had so often attested his divine power, and proved him to be the Son of God. Yet so it was. "He came to his own, and his own received him not." It is a good sign when some inquiry is made in the soul after the Saviour. It is good when the sinner begins to ask, Who is this? What is his character? What are his offices? What is the extent of his salvation? On what terms will he save me? When these questions begin to be put, it is a sign that Christ is about to enter into the heart: if salvation has not already come to that soul. We hear the multitudes reply, "This is Jesus the prophet of Nazareth." A prophet he had shown himself to be, mighty in word and deed; but could they have given him no higher name? Could they not have said, "This is the Son of David; this is Messiah your King?" Or might they not even have answered, "This is the Lord of Hosts; this is the King of Glory!"

The citizens of Jerusalem only were the witnesses of this triumph; but there is another triumph awaiting the Saviour, of which all shall be the witnesses. Now he comes in meekness to die for his people; but a little, and he will come in thunder to judge the world. Now we may look upon his face, and live; for the glory of his godhead is covered with a veil of flesh: but when his face shall be seen on that awful day, the heavens and the earth shall flee away. Now a feeble company of mortals sing hosannas to Him; then he will be surrounded with the chariots of God, which are twenty thousand; even thousands of angels. Now the path of his triumph is along the road from Bethany to Jerusalem; then the steps of his majesty shall be from the highest heavens unto the earth, and the road of his march will be crowded with all the magnificence of the upper world,—the principalities, and dominions, and thrones of heaven. Now the gates of Jerusalem are opened to admit him; then the portals of heaven will be flung back at his approach. Now he is seated "upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass:" then he will appear on the great white throne; thousand thousands shall minister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him. None shall ask, "Who is this?" On that day his glory will be unobscured, his authority unquestioned, and the reproach of the cross will be rolled away for ever. "This is my Judge!" will the wicked exclaim; "this is my God," will the righteous say, "and he will save me!"

Jesus is ready to Save.—O let no one suffer himself to be deterred by the multitude and greatness of his sins, and be restrained thereby from having recourse to Jesus! Jesus, by the shedding of his blood, has accomplished a perfect atonement for the sins of the whole world. Now, if any one had committed all the sins which have ever been or are still committed by the greatest sinner, he ought not on that account to despond and despair, nor let himself be deterred from taking refuge with Jesus; for the blood of Jesus is more than sufficient for the atonement and forgiveness of his sins. Hasten therefore to Jesus, ye penitent hearts! Hear how our dearest Saviour calls to you: "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, I will receive you; in me alone will ye find rest and peace for your souls; you can find it no where else." We must not, however, have recourse to Jesus in such a manner as to remain in self-security, and merely superficially think Christ has paid my ransom, the blood of Christ is the atonement for all my sins; and thus appropriate it to ourselves merely in idea: O no, dear friends, this will not do; this is not the refuge which brings us peace! Taking refuge presupposes a feeling of necessity, the sight of danger, from which the individual cannot save or deliver himself, and, therefore, he seeks help and protection from some other quarter, from some one in whom we have confidence that he is able to aid and assist us, that he is willing to help us, and upon whom we can depend that he will also do it. The nearer we are to such help and protection, the sooner we can receive assistance. Now the feeling of our necessity, the sight of the extreme danger of our souls, must exist in us, before we look about for a refuge; and then it is that we must flee to Jesus. Who else can help us but Jesus? Who is more willing to help than Jesus? And who is nearer to us than Jesus? Every poor and penitent heart, therefore, ought to turn away its appetite and desire from all its sins and all its wretchedness, and fix it on the grace which is so near to it, on Jesus who is so intimately present; upon that love, that abyss of love which is open to us, and brought so near to us in Jesus, saying, "O Lord Jesus! have compassion upon me! O set my heart at rest! let my sins be blotted out by thy blood. O let me find favour in thy blood!" We must then not grow weary in inwardly hungering, groaning, and longing after Jesus, and for grace and mercy. And when Jesus should even appear to act as a stranger towards us, and as if he would not hear us and deliver us from our distress, we must only persevere like the Canaanitish woman, and continue steadfast; our dear Saviour cannot refrain, he will certainly help us, and grant us every thing that belongs to our peace. Jesus, who drew near to us, even whilst we were still impenitent, will much more draw near to us and come to meet us, like as the father of the prodigal son did, when we approach with true penitence to him. O let us, therefore, be of good courage, and place a perfect confidence in our Jesus! If he has revealed to us the danger of our souls, and given us a desire for deliverance; if he has invited us to come to him and seek help from him; he will also grant us his aid. His heart will melt, so that he must have mercy upon us. Jer. xxxi. 20. He will say to our hearts, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace!" Our hearts will then be pacified, and may continue at ease and in peace.—GERHARD TERSTEEGEN. (Spiritual Crumbs from the Master's Table. Translated from the German by Samuel Jackson.)

Faith and Prayer.—In Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, that we may be complete in him. Christ is a cabinet of rich and rare jewels that can enrich to all eternity. There are two keys that use to open this cabinet: faith is a key, for out of his fulness we receive by faith; prayer is another key. If these keys be not in your hand just now, yet surely they are in his hand who says, "all things are mine." Oh! bid him cast you the keys, and give you the spirit of faith and prayer.—RALPH ESKINE. (Discourses.)

Faith.—God never pardons one sin, but he pardons all; and we dishonour him more by not trusting in him for complete forgiveness, than ever we did by sinning against him. Christ took up all my sins, and bore them in his own body on the cross; and God cannot punish twice, or demand a second satisfaction to his justice. Nothing can pacify an offended conscience, but that which satisfied an offended God, says Henry, and well may that which satisfied an offended God pacify an offended conscience.—ADAM. ## SACRED POETRY.

DEATH OF A YOUNG CHRISTIAN.

O GRIEVE not for him with the wildness of sorrow,
As those who in hopeless despondency weep;
From God's holy Word consolation we borrow,
For souls who in Jesus confidingly sleep.

Lament not your lov'd one, but triumph the rather
To think of the promise, the pray'r of the Lamb:
"Your joy shall be full," and "I will, oh, my Father!
That those whom thou giv'st me may be where I am."

Nay, weep not for him—for the flower of the morning—
So dear to your bosom, so fair in your eyes;
But weep for the souls unbelievingly scorning
The counsel and truth of the "God only wise."

He came to the cross when his young cheek was blooming,
And rais'd to the Lord the bright beam of his eye;
And when o'er its beauty death's darkness was glooming,
The cross did uphold him, the Saviour was nigh.

I saw the black pall o'er his relics extended,
I wept, but they were not the tear-drops of woe:
The pray'r of my soul that in fervour ascended,
Was, "Lord, when thou callest, like him may I go!"

THE LAND WHICH NO MORTAL MAY KNOW.

THOUGH earth has full many a beautiful spot,
As a poet or painter might show;
Yet more lovely and beautiful, holy and bright,
To the hopes of the heart, and the spirit's glad sight,
Is the land which no mortal may know.

There the crystalline stream, bursting forth from the throne,
Flows on, and for ever will flow;
Its waves, as they roll, are with melody rife,
And its waters are sparkling with beauty and life,
In the land which no mortal may know.

Oh! who but must pine, in this dark vale of tears,
From its clouds and its shadows to go,
To walk in the light of the glory above,
And to share in the peace, and the joy, and the love
Of the land which no mortal may know!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rev. James Garie.—This gentleman, with other ministers, attempted, in 1790, to disseminate the Gospel in some of the darkest parts of Ireland. After preaching several months at Sligo, with every appearance of success, a new place of worship was opened, which was attacked and seriously injured, the very day after. These attacks were repeated, till at length it was burnt down. A dreadful outrage was committed on one of the principal friends of Mr G.; and he was in so much danger of a violent death, that he was compelled to change his lodgings every night; but he still continued at his post. One evening a man entered his room with a pistol, threatening to take away his life. Mr Garie, holding up a small Bible, advanced towards him, and with a calm countenance looked him full in the face. Struck with his mild and innocent appearance, the man immediately retired from him, and his life was preserved. Mr Garie afterwards returned to Scotland, settled at Perth, and died in 1802.

Rev. T. Raban.—During the life of this worthy man, who was a Christian minister for many years at Yardley Hastings, he was several times preserved from threatened death. On one occasion, being in an unfinished building two stories high, his foot slipped, and he fell to the ground upon an axe, the edge of which was upright: it cut his hat, but not his head, and he received but little injury. At another time, a large piece of timber, on which he had set his foot, heaved up and fell with him into a saw-pit, and an anvil of a hundred pounds weight connected with it fell upon him, but only slightly bruised his leg. A still more remarkable preservation was afforded him. As he was assisting in raising a beam in a mill, the rope slipped, and the beam under which he stood fell with him the height of three stories, and yet was he saved. And once more, when he was driving a team with a load of hay down a narrow lane; when attempting to pass on to the other side of the waggon, he fell, and was thrown under one of the wheels; but calling out to the horses, they instantly stopped. But while God thus preserves the lives of his servants, that they may accomplish his designs, he often then removes them in a way not expected. Raban was to learn by experience the truth of the friend Cowper's statement:—

Safety consists not in escape
From dangers of a frightful shape;
An earthquake may be hid to spare
The man that's strangled by a hair.

After preaching one Lord's day, and walking home, his foot slipped over a pebble, and he broke his leg, which in a few weeks brought on his death.

A Word in Season.—Charles Simeon of Cambridge, having been preaching in a neighbouring parish, was walking about in the church-yard, reading the inscriptions on the grave-stones. One of these much interested him, and he directed the attention of a woman who was just then passing by. She replied, that the lines contained nothing suitable to her, for she had no interest in the love of Jesus. He felt concerned for her unhappy state, and some days after went to her house, at the distance of several miles, where he found her in great temporal distress. He conversed with her aged mother, and the whole family, and relieved their wants. About a year after, he again visited the parish, and found the poor woman; who told him that when he first saw her in the church-yard, she was about, in a state of mental despair, to drown herself in the neighbouring river; but that his kind conversation had prevented her design, and that his subsequent preaching had produced her conversion to God, and that of her mother; the latter of whom had died in the full assurance of faith.

John Bacon, Esq.—This eminent sculptor and painter, who died in 1789, appears on more than one occasion to have been remarkably delivered from danger. When he was about five years of age, he fell into the pit of a soap-boiler, and would have perished had not a man, who had just entered the yard, observed the fall of his head, and immediately drawn him out. On another time he fell before a cart, one of the wheels of which went over his right hand; but even this accident did not crush, as it fell between two projecting stones.

THE BENEFITS OF SICKNESS.

PART I.

By WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., F.R.S.E.,

President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh.

The title of this paper is not a very engaging one. Had it been "Preventives of Sick-ness," or "Medies for Sick-ness," many would have begun to peruse it with eager attention, who will turn with indifference from an attempt to show that sickness may be a benefit. We are generally anxious about preserving or recovering health; a considerable number of individuals take pains to obtain from books or newspapers such information as possible upon this subject. The present publication is scarcely a fit place for such practical advices: but the benefits of sickness have so strongly impressed upon my observation, I hope a short notice of them may be read with attention, and with profit.

It is a strange notion of some philosophers, that sickness and death are nothing more than stages of life, or two forms of the constitution of man, just as natural and as necessary to us as winter torpidity is to the dormouse, and mortality is to the caterpillar. Such an opinion is derived either from a sullen and stoical apathy of mind, or from a dogged aversion to the statements of Scripture. That sickness is an evil, no one is to be told who has experienced even one of its lightest forms; and if death be not an evil, this is not taught us by our natural feelings, or social sympathies. When the acute pain of inflammation is suffered, or the languor and rigour of fever; when the cold hand of cholera seizes the frame, when consumption melts away strength and substance of the body, when injury robs the once gifted and happy individual of his dignity and enjoyment of reason,—surely sickness is evil, evil to the sufferer, evil to his relations.

When sickness invades the poor man's family, disabling the parent from being the "breadwinner" of his family, showing him his helpless, half-fed children, bringing clamour and discontent into the once neat and peaceful dwelling,—perhaps tempting them to dishonesty and profligacy,—surely there is evil moral evil succeeded to physical suffering.

OL. II.

But God, in the course of his moral administration, extracts good out of evil; he teaches us to do so too; and it is our wisdom, in this as in all other things, to be imitators of God. In this view, the benefits derived from sickness are of a very marked character, and I proceed to notice some of them.

I. Sickness teaches us our dependence on our fellow-men, and our obligations to them.

It may be said, that we do not need sickness to teach us this. No statement can be more correct; for all the arrangements of social life point to us our dependence upon others. Food and clothing are supplied to us by the help of others; and were we unexpectedly called on to procure either from our own resources, the difficulties would be found to be very great. But still those of us who have not had this truth impressed upon us in a practical manner, can have no adequate conviction of it. Sickness often does this. The sick man is unable to do what he used to do before; he is compelled to receive the assistance of those around him, and his complete dependence on others is thus brought home to his mind with a force which is irresistible. Think of a man in robust health, of active habits, at the head of a family, accustomed to guide and direct those about him, "to take the upper hand" in every domestic arrangement, to be busied in duties out of doors, perhaps to watch over the health of others, and to devise and apply the means necessary for the recovery of the sick,—when this man becomes the victim of disease, is unable to leave the house in the prosecution of his business, is compelled, by weakness or by pain, to remain in the lying posture in bed, needs an attendant to give him his food, to smooth his pillows, even to turn him from side to side; when he is unable to hold a pen, and must rely on the kind assistance of another; when he cannot even read, and must receive all his information from the reading or speaking of others,—there is brought home to his mind the practical conviction that man is not a solitary, independent being, that we are all under innumerable obligations to one another, and that were God, in righteous judgment, to punish us for our pride, our selfishness, our unkindness, by leaving us to ourselves without help, we should be indeed most miserable.

Many of us need such a lesson. How apt are we to forget others, to think of ourselves, not only in the first place, but even to the exclusion of others! In our eager pursuit of wealth or of fame, we are ready to forget that others have rights as well as we, and we venture upon actions that will not bear a close inspection. But do we not often forget the feelings of others, and recklessly do or say what is unkind; even when we would not, for the world, injure their purse or their good name? Nay, are not our acts of beneficence sometimes tainted by a proud, unbending selfishness? And in our very mode of doing a right thing, do we not sometimes forget the rule which is enjoined by our blessed Redeemer, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them?" Now, sickness makes a man regret all these things. It brings home to him the conviction of his dependence on those around him; and while he receives their unwearied kindnesses, those thousand attentions which sickness demands, and which the hand of a mother, a sister, a wife can bestow, a kindlier feeling is impressed on the sick man's heart, he feels more grateful to those whose kindnesses he is receiving, he feels more grieved and disgusted in recollecting his own selfishness, unkindness, peevishness, and he resolves, depending on the grace of God, to fulfil better, in the time to come, all his domestic and social duties.

II. Thankfulness to God for his mercies ought to be the primary feeling impressed on us by sickness. Were the chords of our heart strung as they ought to be, they would, first and last of them, vibrate to the love of God. That this is not always the case, is one proof, in addition to others, that we are fallen beings. It appears to me that the sick man usually feels gratitude to man before he feels gratitude to God, but that this latter feeling becomes the predominant one as soon as the sufferer learns to see that his obligations to God are infinite. And should he require any time to learn this? God is the bestower of life; he is the former of our body, and the Father of our spirit. But life might be without enjoyment. He might have created us without the power of receiving impressions of happiness; or, continuing to us our present mental constitution, he might have deprived us of all our sources of enjoyment. What is sickness, but the abstraction of one or more of our sources of pleasure. He might have deprived us of all. The disease under which we suffer consists in pain of one member, or injury of one function;—but every member, and every function might have been similarly affected. We are confined to a sick-bed;—but we have not severe pain, or we breathe with ease, or we are able to enjoy some repose, or, at all events, we possess the blessing of reason. Even in this most afflictive of all diseases, there may be circumstances which are fitted to excite gratitude in the sufferer's friends; and while recovery takes place, not seldom has the sufferer himself cause to bless God that he has been afflicted, for he has learned, as the Babylonian monarch did, "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men," and he is restored to his "right mind" in every respect. The willingness of friends leads to gratitude to Him who has disposed them to be kind. Every one cannot enjoy the assiduities which we are favoured with. The sick are considered among the best as an intolerable burden; little kindness is shown to them, and sometimes their days are shortened by savage cruelties. In no heathen land is there any infirmary for the sick poor; but we are favoured with those blessed institutions, where medical skill and Christian kindness are combined for the welfare of the inmates.

The cheering rays of the morning sun reach the weary invalid, and leading his thoughts to his daily benefactor, he exclaims, "It is of the Lord mercies that we are not consumed, because His compassions fail not. They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness." Evening comes with it a new train of blessings to the sick man, and he again thinks of God: "I will bless thee, Lord, for thou hast made me down in peace, and sleep, for thou, Lord, makest me dwell in safety." The beneficial effects of remedies reminds him of Him by whom the remedies have been so endowed. Who has it been to one remedy the power of moistening the parched tongue? to another the power of allaying pain, and inducing sleep? to a third the power of invigorating the languid frame, and restoring the natural appetite? Each of these is a creature of God, created by him with its appropriate virtues; and the wisdom of man, which suggests the remedy, and directs its effects for the accomplishment of the end, is itself the gift of God, and at his disposal. The mind is thus led to God on a thousand occasions during the pressure of disease. He who is treated during suffering, he is thanked as suffering is alleviated; he is looked upon as the gracious Father, he is felt to be a kind benefactor. Surely, then, sickness is sometimes a blessing. That is a blessed instrument, whether it be a staff or a rod, which leads us to Him.

SKETCH OF THE HISTORY AND CHARACTER OF PHILIPPE DE MORNAY, SEIGNEUR DE DUPLESSIS MARLY.

By THOMAS BROWN, Esq.

THIS zealous and consistent champion of the Protestant cause was born in France in the year 1549, or 1550, or 1551, or 1552, or 1553, or 1554, or 1555, or 1556, or 1557, or 1558, or 1559, or 1560, or Church, and was anxious that his children should all follow the same form of religion; while the mother of the family, on the other hand, secretly adopted the doctrines of the Reformers, and endeavoured to impress similar sentiments on the minds of her children. Philippe, the subject of our present memoir, was, at eight years of age, placed under the charge of his first preceptor, Gabriel Prestat de Sesane, himself an advocate for the new opinions; he was afraid, however, openly to manifest them, knowing that by doing so, he would lose the protection and good graces of the father. At nine years of age, Philippe was taken by his father to Paris, where his education was much retarded owing to bad health.

The principles of the Reformation in which he had been so carefully instructed by his mother, were deeply rooted in his mind, and no influence or example could persuade him to renounce them. On one occasion, while attending the funeral of his father, who died in 1560, he was warned by a Romish priest, who accompanied him, to beware of the opinions of the Reformers, and enjoined to persist in the religion of his ancestors. The lad replied, he was resolved to be firm in what he conceived the service of God; but that when he had any doubts on particular points, he would study attentively the Scriptures and the practice of the apostles. When eleven years old, accordingly, he began eagerly to examine the New Testament in Latin and French, from a Lyons edition by Rouville, praying to God to enlighten his understanding in the knowledge of the true faith, and as he found nothing therein, enjoining invocation of saints, the mass, purgatory, adoration of images, and other tenets and observances of the Popish Church, he resolved by the grace of God to renounce opinions which his father had endeavoured so strongly to inculcate. About this period, Mornay removed to Paris and prosecuted his studies with such unwearied assiduity that his health became again affected, and he was obliged to suspend them for a while, and return to his mother's roof. An ardent desire, however, for learning triumphed over every other consideration, and he went back to Paris, where, after a lapse of four years, he had a visit from his uncle, the Archbishop of Rheims. This high prelate frequently reasoned with his nephew on matters of faith, and endeavoured to bring him back within the pale of the Romish Church; he tempted him with the offer of several livings, and tried to allure him by the views of worldly aggrandisement; but all was in vain, the young man was firm and immovable in the opinions he had adopted. At length he was obliged to quit Paris in consequence of the religious feuds which then prevailed, and he retired into the country, where he composed a poem in French verse on the subject of the civil war then raging, dedicating it to Cardinal Chatillon.

At this period the Protestants were persecuted in all quarters, and flying from place to place. Mornay took refuge at Geneva, where he remained unmolested and employed himself in study, particularly in acquiring a knowledge of the German language.

In 1569, Mornay repaired to Frankfort, and thence to Italy, where he passed his time in literary pursuits and the study of jurisprudence. At Venice he was in continual danger as a Protestant, as well as at Rome, where the French ambassador, at the instigation of Charles IX., tried every means to induce him to renounce the new opinions. From Venice he went to Vienna, and thence to Frankfort, by the way of Hungary, Bohemia and Saxony. At Cologne he became acquainted with several Reformers, who had taken refuge there to avoid the tyranny and perfidy of the Spaniards. He interested himself deeply in the welfare of the suffering Flemings, and became intimately connected with the Prince of Orange, the main support at that time of the Reformed Religion. In the midst of all this, however, Mornay was indefatigable in the acquisition of knowledge, and above all, in spreading with renewed ardour, the religious opinions which were already circulating so rapidly over that part of Europe. In the course of his travels, he went over to England, and was received very graciously by Queen Elizabeth, who held him in much esteem. The same year he returned to Paris, where he met the celebrated Admiral Coligny. At this period, in the midst of apparent security, and in defiance of existing treaties, the massacre of St. Bartholomew took place; an event, for cruelty and atrocity, unparalleled in the history of the world. Mornay, on hearing of the dreadful tragedy, was preparing to inquire after the Admiral, when his own house was surrounded by the murderers. He had, however, time to burn all his papers, and escaped over the roof to the Louvre, and thence into the country. On arriving at his home, he was happy to find his mother safe; and he immediately intimated to her his intention of returning to England. He embarked at Dieppe, and was received by his former friends with the utmost kindness. Some time after, he came back to France, and in conjunction with other partisans of the Reformed Religion, took up arms in defence of their faith. At the head of these illustrious individuals, was the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, and the Prince of Condé, whose various military operations during the civil war, it forms no part of my plan to enumerate. In all these, however, Mornay took an active part. After the death of Charles IX., which happened in 1574, he retired for a time to Sedan to resume his favourite studies; and in the following year, while residing in the duchy of Cleves, he married Charlotte Arbaleste, widow of a distinguished warrior of that time. This lady had suffered much from the persecution of the Papists, was pious and charitable, and entered with zeal into every measure that could be useful in promoting the cause of the Protestants. About the end of 1576, the King of Navarre, on the one hand, and Monsieur, afterwards Henry III., on the other, did every thing in their power to gain over Mornay to their cause, knowing of how much consequence the services of so able a coadjutor would be to them. He hesitated not a moment from principle, to join the former at Agen; and he drew up, by order of the king, a declaration of the reasons of self-defence which obliged the Protestants to take up arms. Under these circumstances, it was deemed advisable to implore foreign assistance, and Mornay was provided with ample powers to treat with Queen Elizabeth, the States of Holland, and the Protestants in Germany. After escaping innumerable dangers, both previous to, and after his embarkation, he arrived safely at Dartmouth, and proceeding to London, was soon after joined by his wife from Dieppe. He stated to the queen, the justice and urgency of the King of Navarre's cause, and the unwarrantable conduct of his enemies in persecuting and murdering the Protestants, without the least regard to existing treaties. The queen supplied him amply with money, and enjoined him to take troops into pay from Protestant Germany, besides doing all in her power to persuade the German princes to join the common cause. This negotiation was facilitated by the intervention of Walsingham and Sidney, then in the queen's councils. All these preparations and precautions, however, became eventually unnecessary, from the circumstance of Henry III. having made peace in September 1577. Mornay took advantage of this suspension of hostilities to resume his studies in retirement. At this period he was occupied with a work on the Truth of the Christian Religion, which he prosecuted for three years, notwithstanding continued bad health, when the civil war having been again renewed, his services were required by the King of Navarre. Further arrangements were, by his instrumentality, entered into with Queen Elizabeth, who privately favoured the cause of the Reformers, in opposition to some of her counsellors, who were jealous of Mornay's ascendancy over the queen, and who did all they could to defeat his plans.

Afterwards he resided nearly two years in Holland and the Netherlands with the army of the Reformers, at the end of which he returned to Paris with his family. On all matters of controversy between the Reformed and Popish leaders, Mornay took a distinguished part, and was constantly employed by the King of Navarre, head of the Huguenots, whose object was to unite closer and closer all parties of the Reformed faith, both political and ecclesiastical. In a letter addressed to the king on the 14th April 1584, signed by Mornay and others of the leaders, it is stated: "The eyes of all France are upon you. You will experience from the nobles submission and fraternity, and from the parliaments love of justice. Above all, fear God, by whom kings reign, and who can remove every difficulty from before you." Having every reliance on Mornay, the king took him at this period into very particular favour, and consulted him on every point where the interests of the Reformed party were concerned.

The hostile demonstrations of the League caused a corresponding movement in March 1585 on the part of the Reformers, and Mornay entered into all their plans with his usual zeal and ability. Their spirited proclamations on this occasion claimed the admiration of all the Protestant states. Henry III. and the League offered to the King of Navarre that they would recognise him heir to the crown of France, provided he would renounce the Reformed doctrines, which having refused with indignation, he was excommunicated by Pope Sixtus V., who, by a formal act, declared him removed from the succession. The war of religion was resumed in the following year with unusual vigour and animosity, and the King of Navarre's life being considered in danger, he was advised by his adherents to leave the kingdom for a while, which, however, he declined doing. In the month of May 1587, the celebrated barricades took place round Paris, and the Duke of Guise having got possession of the capital, the king was obliged to retire. Navarre offered his personal services, and all his means to assist the king. These, owing to a variety of causes, were not accepted, and the civil war was continued with renewed activity. Another trial was made at this period to remove the King of Navarre's scruples on the score of religion, and to bring him within the pale of the Popish Church, but without effect. At length an interview between the two kings took place, and a suspension of hostilities was the consequence when the Parliament was transferred to Tours. Shortly after this, Henry III. was assassinated by Jacques Clement at St. Cloud. This event was communicated to the King of Navarre by Mornay, who added that the crown, instead of being placed, had fallen on his head, and that confiding in the affection of his subjects, he must leave the rest to God, who had hitherto prospered him.

Mornay proposed a general pardon and amnesty, those only excepted who had participated in the murder of the king. He passed almost the whole of 1590 with the new sovereign, who had recovered the greater part of Lower Normandy, but was prevented from approaching Paris by the Duke du Maine, then at Dreux. Some time after, when the king was besieging Paris, Palavicini, a Genevan then residing in England, on account of his religion, was sent by Elizabeth into Germany, to induce the Protestant princes to co-operate more effectually with her in promoting the Reformation in France. Mornay was the mainspring of all these negotiations; the mind of the king, however, was about this period far from being so warm in the cause of the Reformation as heretofore, and he was gradually moved, by motives of state policy, as well as personal ambition to forsake the Protestant cause, and thus wear to himself a throne which had so long been occupied by princes of a different persuasion. In answer to remonstrances urged by the Popish party, headed by the Cardinal Bourbon and other dignitaries, the king was answered on the 18th December 1591, drawn up by Mornay, to the effect, that he was ever ready to receive their advice, and to settle the differences of the Church, while in the midst of arms, he had little leisure to attend to that the measures proposed by them were not exclusively ecclesiastical, and that he would not agree to the decision of the Pope, who had on all occasions assumed so hostile and ungracious an attitude towards him. The king, however, continued to be strongly wretched upon to heal the differences of the nation by becoming a Papist, and, accordingly, at St. Denis, the 25th Jan 1593, his abjuration of the Reformed Religion took place.

This melancholy event formed an epoch in the history of France, and it placed Mornay in quite a new position. A long letter was addressed to the king, wherein a strongly depicted the firm, zealous, and consistent attachment of his friends of the Reformed party, and the long military services in forwarding his cause. He was urged to protect them in the exercise of their religion and to put an end to those differences which had deluged the kingdom with blood. He sent for Mornay who met him at Chartres in September. Here the king renewed his promises of protection, and his assertion of calling national councils to decide on matters of faith, independent of the Pope, which Mornay assured him would never be sanctioned by the head of the Romish Church, as, according to their doctrine laid down at the Council of Trent, their Church was not err.

This negotiation continued for some time, until at length the whole of the deputies, with Mornay at the head, transferred their deliberations to Saumur. The Popish party doubting the sincerity of the king's adherence, and assisted by the Jesuits, employed Jacques Chastel to assassinate him. The attempt was made on the 27th December, providentially without success. The civil war continued with more or less activity between the two parties the whole of 1595, pending the negotiations for general peace.

In August of that year, Pope Clement VIII. offered to give the king absolution on the following remarkable conditions, viz. — That he would invoke the aid of the counsel of the Virgin Mary on all occasions; assist every day at high mass; repeat his chaplet on Sundays, the rosaries on Wednesdays, and the rosary on Saturdays; that he would conform to the laws and regulations of the Council of Trent; educate the Prince of Condé in the Roman Catholic faith; exclude all Protestants from situations of trust or dignity; re-establish the Popish religion in Bearn, replace the bishops, and found colleges; cause his sister to be married to a Roman Catholic, continue the war against the heretics, and exterminate them. All these conditions the king agreed to, except the last, and gave the Pope to understand that he had other means of converting the Protestants than the measures proposed by his Holiness.

The Reformed party, under the guidance of Mornay, resolved to keep firmly united till they could procure some security from the king for the safety of their persons and property, and the free exercise of their religion. Mornay, therefore, as their organ, wrote to the king that, during the whole of his reign, he had served him with fidelity, notwithstanding the opposition of the Parliament and of the League were still maintained against them; that they had seen him change his religion, and treat with the chiefs and partisans of the League to their prejudice; that lately he had received absolution from the Pope, on conditions destructive of their interests; that he could not countenance such openly without offending the Pope; that, however, he was obliged in conscience to protect them, by some public act, from cruelty and oppression. These remonstrances produced, in 1598, the celebrated edict of Nantes, by which security was given to the Reformers for the exercise of their religion, and other favours and privileges, which, as the king and the great majority of the nation were hostile to them, (in as far, at least, as regarded their religious creed;) could not but be considered by the Reformed party as an act of the very last importance.

Some time previous to, and about the beginning of, 1600, the Pope had gained considerable influence over the mind of the king, and exacted of him the publication of the decrees of the Council of Trent, the re-establishment of the Jesuits, and, in a private article, the disgrace and ruin of Mornay, whom in all his briefs, the Pope called his enemy.

The king, incessantly worked upon by the Pope's emissaries, became gradually estranged from Mornay, his old and faithful friend and counsellor. Immoveable in his opinions, nothing could cool the zeal of that great man in the cause of the Reformation; while the king, in order to render himself more and more popular with the great majority of his subjects, professed, with renewed ardour, his attachment to the Romish Church. Mornay's writings on the Eucharist, and other matters of faith, were reviled and suppressed by the opposite party; and he had the boldness to say to the king at an audience, "You, Sire, may be advised, within these four walls, to suppress the truth; but, if it pleases God, I shall make it resound over the four corners of the earth." Shortly afterwards he retired to Saumur, with his family, neglected and in poverty; but his great mind supported him under every privation. In this retirement, while attending Church, on the 13th January 1602, two men were hired by the Papists to assassinate him, and furnished with arms for that purpose. They were seized with remorse, however, at the critical moment, and the fatal deed was not perpetrated. From this period till 1605, he was almost entirely engrossed by anxiety about his only son, who had a distinguished rank in the army, and who was killed that year, in the prime of life, at the siege of Gueldres. The deep interest and sympathy which men of all parties manifested towards the father, proved how high his personal character stood in general estimation. Madame de Mornay, oppressed with grief, survived her son but a few months. But it was some consolation to Mornay that all his daughters were married, and firmly adhered to the Reformed Religion. He had by this time been reinstated in the king's favour, had travelled with him to Paris, and occupied apartments at the Thuilleries, although he would accept no place in the royal councils. In June 1607, he retired again to Saumur. There he composed his work called "History of the Papacy," wherein he shows how, by gradual degrees, the Popes had reached the height of tyranny, as predicted by the apostles; and in the following year, he published, "Meditations on St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, and on Passages in St. Luke's Gospel." These writings, as well as other demonstrations of his unabated zeal in the cause of the Reformation, again estranged him from the favour of the king, although Henry himself was thought by many of the Papists, too lukewarm in his support of their doctrines; and the wild fanatics of that party urged on a monster of the name of Ravallac, who assassinated him on the 14th May 1610.

In the following reign, during the queen's regency, the Assembly of the States was transferred from Chateherault to Saumur, where a considerable disunion and jealousy prevailed among the leaders of the Reformed party; the contending writers on matters of faith carrying on their controversies without intermission. In 1613, when the young king had almost reached his majority, Mornay was doing all he could to establish the Reformers in his favour and good opinion. Nothing very particular occurred affecting the interests of the Reformers, from this period to 1617, when the cabals and intrigues of the Papists in power recommenced with renewed strength and animosity, and various lands belonging to the Reformers were seized by the strongest party. In the month of November, Mornay was appointed a deputy at a meeting of the Notables, who assembled at Rouen, where he was graciously received by the king. On this occasion, by his moderation, he gave general satisfaction; and when the Assembly came to a close, he was warmly complimented by all parties. He returned to Saumur in January 1618, after parting with the king on the best terms. Next year, the king and queen-dowager paid him a visit, and the good understanding was farther cemented by various friendly offices. The Assembly resumed its sittings at Loudun in 1620, where it continued upwards of six months, when Mornay's long established character for honour, consistency, and integrity, procured for him general esteem and admiration; and, through his instrumentality, the future interests of the Reformers were placed on a secure basis. Shortly after his return to Saumur, he was seized with a gentle stroke of palsy, ominous of his approaching dissolution at no distant period. From this time to 1623, he engaged in public affairs as keenly as his shattered constitution would admit, and continued to the last a warm adherent of the great cause he had espoused. Although the king's party took possession of his castle of Saumur, a price was subsequently put upon it, and such a remuneration given as was considered an adequate equivalent. From this period, he passed his time in the exercise of religious meditations, till at length his bodily and mental strength visibly decaying, he was confined to his house at Foret sur Sevres.

The last moments of this great and pious character, after a life so eminently useful and exemplary in promoting the Protestant cause in France, cannot fail to interest those who, from their knowledge of the human mind, are able to appreciate it in all its various bearings. On perusing the foregoing and the following particulars, they will see this virtuous man consistent to the end of his life, and expressing sentiments which in every age, and in every country, tend to elevate and to ennoble the human character. His opinions on matters of faith were adopted at an early period, after the most mature research and deliberation, and acted upon throughout as the result of his firm conviction. He uniformly avowed his abhorrence of the errors and superstition of the Romish Church, on the one hand, and his admiration on the other of those plain unsophisticated doctrines on which our great Redeemer founded his Church, to refresh and console fallen man in his pilgrimage through life.

On the 9th of November, the medical attendants intimated to his surrounding relatives, that his life would not be prolonged above forty-eight hours, and their predictions proved correct. Mornay, with his mind perfectly entire and resigned, passed that interval in the exercise of devotion. The minister of the parish who attended him, informed him of the short period he had still to live. His observation was, "Then I am contented. I forgive all those who may have done me injury, or who might have been so disposed; and I pray to God that he may pardon them, and inspire them with better feelings."

Perceiving that his end was near, he wished to make a confession of his faith, but, unable to conclude it, from weakness, he said, "I have a long account to render, having received much, and profited little." It was observed to him, that he had faithfully employed his talents in serving the Church and advancing the reign of Christ—he answered, “Not to me, but to God be the praise;” and, raising himself, he said, “There is nothing more just, and more reasonable, than that the creature should obey the Creator.” Then, holding up his hands, he added thrice, Mercy, to show that on the mercy of God alone he trusted; declaring that he had lived in the hope of seeing the deliverance of the Church, and had now nothing more to retain him in the world. He then bestowed his blessing on those around him, and on the Churches of Saumur and St. Jouin, remarking, that their congregations were well affected towards the Word of God. He prayed for the Church in general; and that God might deliver it from oppression, and reinstate it in its original purity. He trusted that during his life he had the glory of God only in view; and had firmly resisted the offers made to him to promote his worldly aggrandisement by the sacrifice of his principles, and had defended them by his example, his words, and his various writings.

The pastor then declared to him the doctrine of the remission of sins through the merits and intercession of Jesus Christ the Son of God, and spent the remainder of the day in prayer with him. Five hours before his dissolution, Mornay endeavoured to hold up his hands during prayer. He then desired the 71st Psalm to be read to him, and when done he said, “I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing:” and some time after, he cited from St. John, “Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know, that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.” He enjoined unity, love, and peace, among all his family connections, took final leave of them, and saying, with Simeon, “Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace,” he breathed his last at the age of seventy-four.

THE MORAL AND PHYSICAL EFFECTS OF CLIMATE.

[From Dr Duncan's "Sacred Philosophy of the Seasons."—Summer.]

THAT the whole human race is originally derived from a common parent, must be admitted by all who acknowledge the authority of Scripture, although there have been some daring speculators, who, not more contrary to the dictates of revelation, than sound philosophy, have attempted to maintain an opposite opinion. Whence, then, the varieties of the human race, so remarkable, especially in three great branches, distinguished by their colour into the fair, the yellow, and the black; or, by their aboriginal habitation, into the Caucasian, the Mongolian, and the Ethiopian tribes?

The question cannot be answered satisfactorily in a few words. Nevertheless, there are some well known facts, the mere mention of which may serve to allay the surprise which may at first be excited by the contemplation of these varieties, and may tend to show how consistent such variations are with the physical laws which pervade organized existence. The changes which are naturally effected by cultivation, in the appearance and qualities both of the plants and animals which have been subjected to the influence of man; the effect which a peculiar quality or conformation accidentally occurring in the parent produces in the offspring, frequently observable for many generations; and especially the influence of food and climate on the physical constitution, seem of themselves quite sufficient to account for the remarkable varieties which the human frame exhibits in its different branches. It is to the latter effect that I intend at present to confine my attention.

One remarkable effect of climate is to darken the skin. That this results from the heat of the rays of the sun, may be fairly inferred, not only from the fact that we find the inhabitants of the tropics, without exception, of a complexion more or less tawny, but also from another, and perhaps a more convincing fact, that the descendants of Europeans, when transported to the equatorial regions, assume the blackness after the lapse of some generations. This is strikingly exemplified in the case of a colony of Jews, discovered in the Indian peninsula. Now, that this is a wise provision, we might safely conclude, from what we know of the provisions and accommodations of nature in other cases: but the philosophical principle cannot be assigned. It is true that a black colour, absorbs the heat more readily than a white; and, therefore, if this were the only thing to be attended to, one would expect the complexion of the human body to be reversed in its location, the purest white being found where the rays of the sun were most powerful, and the darkest in the regions lying towards the poles. But there is another principle, which the progress of chemical science has very recently elicited, and which most satisfactorily accounts for the arrangement; it is this,—that a dark surface radiates heat much more readily than a surface of white. Now, the chief source of heat in a living body, is not the external atmosphere, or the rays of the sun, but the animal warmth, as it is called, that is, the heat generated in some hitherto obscure chemical process in the blood. It is of more importance to the comfort and health of the frame, that this internal source of temperature be properly regulated, than that which is external, and this is the provision which the wisdom of the Creator has actually adopted. In the colder regions, the fairness of the skin prevents the escape of the animal warmth; and, in the warmer, a dark colour is induced, that the same warmth may freely escape, thus compensating, in some degree, by this remarkable contrivance, for the differences in climate. The same principle operates, indeed, to a certain extent, even in temperate climates, where exposure to the sun is well known to darken the complexion, and which the return of winter removes.

Another peculiarity induced by climate, is a difference in the freedom and extent of the perspiration, which serves also to modify the heat of the body. In the warmer climates, the pores are comparatively open, and the perspiration issuing freely, carries off from the frame the superabundant caloric, and at the same time bedews the body with a moisture which, in its evaporation, contributes not a little to create an agreeable coolness. But, besides this, there is a remarkable quality in the human body which enables it to resist the application of even high degrees of heat. This has been proved by various interesting recent experiments; and it is on this principle, that some individuals have astonished the public by the exhibition of their power of existing in an oven, or an apartment, heated to such a considerable extent, as to roast the flesh which has been placed by their side. A similar power exists in the living frame, as regards cold; and, in both instances, the habit produces an extraordinary accommodation of the individuals long residents in a particular climate, and more in their progeny after the lapse of some generations.

In another particular, there is an adaptation of climate, of which St. Pierre, alluding to the negro race who inhabit Africa, the hottest region of the globe, thus writes:—"Nature has covered the head of the careless and unindustrious tribes with a fleece more crisp than a tissue of wool, which effectually shields it from the burning heat of the sun. They are perfectly sensible of its accommodation to this part, that they never employ a substitute head-dress, and there is no description of mankind among whom such special coverings, as bonnets, turbans, hats, &c. are more rare than among the negroes. They use such a foreign to them, merely as objects of vanity and luxury; and I do not know of any one that is peculiar to their nation. The inhabitants of the peninsula of India are as black as they; but their turbans communicate to the hair, which, but for their head-dress, would perhaps be frizzled, the facility of growing and expanding."

But the chief physical effect produced by heat of climate, is that of relaxing the human frame, and making it less capable of exertion; and it is very remarkable, as an instance of accommodation to circumstances, that, where this unbracing effect is produced, nature is most liberal in her distribution of esculent plants and fruits; as if it were intended, by this profusion, to compensate for the want of energy in the human constitution.

That some effects of a moral as well as of a physical nature, are produced on the human family, by differences of climate, can scarcely be doubted, though these effects are probably less marked than has frequently been alleged. That sloth, effeminacy, and a tendency to the excessive indulgences of sense, are more remarkably characteristic of the voluptuous regions of the tropics, than of those of sterner aspect, which verge towards the poles, is very generally admitted; and that this difference arises from causes partly physical, and partly mental, can scarcely be called in question.

It is not to be doubted, that a hot temperature of the atmosphere tends to enervate the human body; and it is possible, too, that a similar state of the climate may have some effect in exciting the passions, so far as these are of a physical nature; but if this influence were as powerful as has been alleged, it would be much more uniform and permanent than history proves it to be. The abject Greeks and Romans of the present day, how utterly unlike are they to their predecessors of the ancient world! Yet the climate of these once classic regions, though there is reason to believe it has been in some respects altered by the progress of agricultural improvement in the adjoining continent, is not so different from its former state, as to make any important alteration in the physical state of the human body.

Moral effects, however, are not of so fixed and permanent a nature as physical: they depend on more numerous combinations, and circumstances of a more arbitrary nature; and it is to these chiefly that we are to look for the character produced in man by climate.

The effect of climate in raising an exuberant supply of the necessaries of life, has already been frequently alluded to. This of itself is calculated to create a very marked difference in the human character, and may, without having recourse to any other cause account for much of the difference which subsists between the inhabitants of these regions, and those of climates where nature is less bountiful. Abundance gives rise to indolent and luxurious habits, while privation renders men hardy, intelligent, and adventurous. But this is a moral effect, although it arises from a physical cause. We can now understand why a nation may, at one time, be vigorous, enterprising, and enlightened, and at another sunk in sloth and barbarism, although nurtured in the same climate, and subjected to the same influences of the seasons. The moral causes may be changed. There may be abundance where there was formerly want, and hence a stimulus to exertion may be removed; or an oppressive despotism may have so ground the faces of the people, that they have ceased to possess the moral aspect of free-born men, while they retain all the vigour of their bodily powers.

But there are other causes originating in climate, which operate no less certainly and effectually in producing a moral influence on the minds of men. Among these may be mentioned the alternations of the seasons, which differ in their intensity in different countries, and thus produce a considerable effect in forming what has been called a national character. This may be illustrated by contrasting the character of the French nation, for example, with that of their neighbours in Britain. There is, doubtless, much in this difference of character, which arises from the insular state of the one, and the continental situation of the other. It is to the diversity of condition now alluded to, that we may fairly attribute the warlike propensities of the Gallic nation, and the commercial spirit of the British; and not less, perhaps, the free institutions of the latter, which have for centuries fostered the spirit of inquiry, of enlightened enterprise, and of improvement in all the departments of life. But in comparing the character of the French nation with that of our own country, there is one striking trait, which seems to depend, almost entirely, on difference of climate. I allude to the deficiency of the former in domestic habits. In Britain, our changeable climate, and the long evenings of autumn, winter, and spring, confine the inhabitants much to their homes. There they acquire habits of social intercourse, and of sober reflection. The ties of husband and wife, of parent and child, of brother and sister, are drawn closer as they surround the family fireside, and unbend their minds, or indulge their affections, or communicate mutual instruction. They study, they converse, they join in innocent amusements; and haply a higher theme occupies their attention, which raises their attachments above earthly things, and gives them the "rivet of eternity."

Habits thus formed become permanent, and are extended to all the transactions of life. The employments of summer partake of the qualities impressed on those of the other seasons of the year; and the pleasures of home, with which so many pure and elevating,—I had almost said holy,—principles are associated, and on which so many valuable habits depend, have thus become part of the national character. The inhabitants build villas; they tastefully adorn their grounds; they cultivate their gardens; they surround their houses with comforts, with conveniences, with luxuries; and all these labours are only external indications of the deep-rooted love of home, which has taken possession of their hearts. Hence the natives of our favoured island are, in comparison with those of the neighbouring country, affectionate, social, contemplative; and, may I not add, what is far higher praise, virtuous and charitable, enlightened and religious?

Our Scottish bard, speaking of the cultivation of the domestic virtues, in humble life, which he had so beautifully portrayed in his "Cottar's Saturday Night," says truly,

"From scenes like these, old Scotia's grandeur springs, Which makes her loved at home, revered abroad."

And happily it is not to humble life alone, nor to the people of Scotland, that these virtues are confined: they are every where intimately associated with the employments and relaxations of the middle classes, and shed respectability and value on the character of the highest ranks in the land.

In France, on the other hand, and more especially in her southern provinces, the weather is much more steady and equable during all the seasons of the year, affording free opportunity for exercise in the open air. In that delightful climate, the inhabitants can very generally move abroad in every part of the day; and the evenings, when the family circle might meet together for the enjoyment of domestic charities, are comparatively short. There is little time, therefore, for the formation of that character which depends on the intercourse of the family circle; and the consequence is, that, for domestic comfort, they are even destitute of a word in their language. They know nothing of that simple neatness which adorns our cottage gardens, and the dwellings of our farmers, nor of those elegancies of domestic taste among the higher ranks which have given rise to what has emphatically been called English gardening. The houses of their peasantry, and the chateaus of their gentry, are equally devoid of that air of snugness, convenience, and accommodation, which forms so striking a feature in an English landscape. In truth, they do not cultivate that domestic intercourse, which constitutes so much of the happiness of life among us. It is not at home, but in the sports of the field, or in the bustle of society, or in the excitements of theatrical exhibitions, that they spend their hours of relaxation. It is there that they live, and breathe, and receive enjoyment. The effect of all this is strongly indicated in their character. They are ingenious, but frivolous; sprightly, but heartless; creatures of impulse and excitement, but void of depth and sincerity; or if they apply their minds to study, they are acute and inventive, discursive or philosophical; sometimes, indeed, excelling in the highest departments of intellect, but seldom sober-minded, moral, and pious. It is the fault of their education, originating in an abuse of that beautiful climate which was bestowed on them for a blessing, and may yet, in better times, be destined to be employed in a manner more conformable to the high ends of human existence.

Were we, in like manner, to examine the circumstances which, in other countries, give rise to national character, or serve to modify it, we might probably find, that the moral influence of climate forms almost every where one of its constituent elements. But enough has already been said to show the connection which it has pleased the Creator to institute between mind and matter, even in things which, at first sight, may seem remote and unimportant; and to afford us a glimpse into that complicated and admirable, but sometimes recondite machinery, by which the moral discipline of the world is conducted.

THE CHRISTIAN A DEVOTED SERVANT OF GOD:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. ANDREW HAMILTON, A.M.,
Minister of the High Church, Kilmarnock.

"For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."—1 Cor. vi. 20.

THE essential glory of God is underived, perfect, and unchangeable. No creature in heaven or on earth can add to the lustre of his perfections, or the blessedness of his nature. But creation, which arose at his command, proclaims his eternal power and godhead, and furnishes abundant matter for his praise. The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. The earth throughout publishes his wisdom, power, and goodness. When we survey it, we behold a prodigious variety of living creatures, all admirably adapted, by their nature and instincts, to the circumstances in which they are placed, and serving, without deviation, the end of their creation. There is, however, one exception. How mournful is it that this should be man, who only, of all terrestrial creatures, was formed capable of glorifying God actively! To him the gracious Creator gave a reasonable and holy nature, an extensive knowledge of his perfections and works, and the faculty of speech, that, as the high-priest of nature, he might offer continually the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. But being in honour, he did not continue. He sinned, and came short of the glory of God, and as he was federal representative of his posterity, they were unavoidably involved in the consequences of his transgression.

Thus we fell from the great design of our creation, and the ruin seemed to be irretrievable. But when our strength was gone, and our hope was ready to expire, the God of salvation disclosed, in the first promise, his gracious determination to destroy the work of the devil, by the incarnation and sufferings of our blessed Saviour. In the fulness of time he performed that which he had promised to the fathers, by sending his beloved Son to raise us to a capacity of glory, showing forth his praise. For this cause Jesus obeyed and died, "that they who live should not live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them." 2 Cor. v. 15. When, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, we obtain such a sense of our moral impotency, and numerous violations of God's holy law, as destroys all hope of reconciliation and acceptance by our own obedience, and such attractive views of the grace of the glory of the crucified Saviour, as engage our hearts to embrace him in all his saving offices, we commence the life of faith, and answer, in some measure, the end of our creation by adorning the doctrines of the Gospel in all things. We consider ourselves as bought with an incalculable price, and as under the most sacred obligations to glorify him in our bodies, and our spirits, which are in every view, his property. We entertain towards God sentiments of the highest esteem of love, reverence and observe all his ordinances, acquiesce, without a murmur, in the dispensations of his providence, fulfil conscientiously all the duties which are connected with our lawful occupation and social relations, and employ our talents, whether they are natural or acquired, in promoting the honour of his name, and the interests of his kingdom in the world. The amplification of these particulars will, it is hoped, serve, in some degree, to illustrate our text.

I. All real Christians entertain towards the God of their salvation sentiments of the highest esteem and love.

Moral beauty, which consists in amiable dispositions, and in conduct founded in truth and righteousness, shines with transcendent lustre on the Father of our spirits. All that is excellent and lovely in the creation is an emanation from him. His goodness is boundless as his work, and endless as the ages of eternity. But he is infinitely holy and just as well as good. He cannot look upon sin unless with the utmost abhorrence. Nor can we, whose hearts are depressed and whose lives are stained by innumerable transgressions, love his holiness and justice. On the contrary, we regard them with the strongest aversion, and either overlook them entirely, or contemplating his character, or view them not in the light of the Scriptures, but as they are misrepresented by our own preconceived opinions and prejudices. But when we believe the Gospel, and embrace the Saviour, our misapprehensions of the perfections of God are rectified, even as of them which are most calculated to excite the alarm of impenitent sinners, assume a friendly aspect, and encourage our hope of present safety, and of final happiness. We give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness, as well as of his mercy; his justice invites us to trust in him no less than his goodness, for all these perfections were equally glorified in that atonement which the Redeemer made for our sins; these opposite claims were reconciled in his cross, and they beam forth with the most harmonious and attractive lustre on all who make his righteousness and grace their only refuge. When we regard God, as he has thus revealed himself in the Gospel, with the highest esteem and affection, when we believe his promises, and depend on his power and faithfulness for the accomplishment of them, even though the course of events is calculated to produce anxiety and distrust, we glorify him in our spirits, and entertain sentiments which are suitable to his excellence, and to our circumstances as redeemed creatures.

II. All the disciples of Christ glorify God, by stated attention to the duties of his worship.

Divine worship is properly the external expression of the operation of the fear and love of God in the heart. It consists in the devout acknowledgment of his being and perfections, and in rendering to him that adoration and praise which his infinite glory and innumerable mercies, both common and special, demand. It is, in every view, a most reasonable service, and the chief mean by which the honour of the divine name is maintained in the world. Do we offer praise to God? We glorify him by proclaiming his infinite goodness, wisdom, faithfulness, and power, as these are displayed in all his works, and especially in our redemption by Christ Jesus. Do we confess our sins with contrition and godly sorrow? We glorify his omniscience, which discerns our most secret faults,—his holiness, which abhors them,—and his long-suffering, which has spared us, notwithstanding our multiplied and aggravated offences. In imploring the remission of our transgressions, we magnify his pardoning mercy, and the efficacy of the Redeemer's sacrifice, which renders the exercise of his mercy consistent with the rights of his justice, holiness, and truth. In giving thanks, we declare the bounty of his providence, which daily consults our temporal comfort, and the riches of his grace, which makes the most ample provision for our everlasting happiness. In hearing his word, with faith and reverence, we set to our seal that he is true, and that he is greatly to be feared in the assemblies of his saints. And in going to the table of our blessed Saviour, we publish his love, glory in his cross, from which we derive all our hopes of safety and peace, and express our determination to live and die in his service. Thus all the parts of public worship tend to advance the glory of God, and to impress on the minds of men a veneration for his holy name. And these effects will, for the most part, be in proportion to the number, piety, and humility of the worshippers, and the publicity of their homage. On this account it would seem, the house of God, where he is publicly worshipped, is called the place where his honour dwells; and he is said to love the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

The Christian is therefore glad when it is said to him, "Go up to the house of the Lord." With secret pleasure he adds his voice to swell the song of praise, in the congregation of the saints. With unfeigned humility, he confesses the numerous sins of his heart and life, and beseeches the God of salvation to bless him in Christ, with pardoning mercy, and the communication of sanctifying grace. He hears with meekness, and self-application, the instructions which are imparted to him from the Word of truth, and studies to transfuse their spirit into his habitual conduct. He goes to the table of the Lord, and commemorates, with a sorrowful, yet thankful heart, that death from which he derives spiritual life and health, and all his hopes of seeing God in peace. He esteems a day thus spent in the courts of the Lord, better than a thousand, and would rather be a door-keeper in his house, than dwell in the tents of sin, though the nobles of the earth were to be his associates.

While the disciple of Christ thus consults his honour, by a devout and regular attendance on the public institutions of his worship, he is equally observant of the private ordinances of religion. His house is a Church, in which he himself officiates as priest, and, as far as his influence extends, the breast of every member of his family, is an altar to offer spiritual sacrifices to the Preserver of men. Nor is he less attentive to secret prayer. He esteems it an unspeakable privilege to be allowed to express his gratitude, and to disclose his secret infirmities to a Father's ear, in the privacy of the closet. In the morning, he directs his prayer to him; in the evening, he pours out his heart before him, and implores his blessing and protection. It is indeed true, that sin cleaves to the most perfect of his religious services. A sense of his remaining corruption, often makes him hang his harp on the willows, and mingle his tears with the streams, which were appointed to gladden this foreign land. But he remembers the heavenly Jerusalem, and is comforted; for there he knows he shall utter a song, which shall neither be interrupted by a sigh, nor marred by the intrusions of the spoiler.

III. Believers glorify God, by their calm acquiescence in the dispensations of his providence.

He extends to all the creatures which he has formed, his wise, gracious, and powerful superintendence. No event, however inconsiderable, is left to the direction of chance. The weakest of his creatures is not neglected, the meanest is not despised, and the highest would instantly perish if he should withdraw for a moment his supporting arm and preserving care.

The providence of God is especially conversant about the welfare of those who love and serve him. He entertains the most gracious designs towards them, and he accomplishes these designs by the best and the safest means. He does not so much consult their present profit and pleasure, as their preparation for the enjoyments of that kingdom which his love prepared for them before the foundation of the world. As riches might fascinate their senses, and withdraw their affections from the things which are above, he does not often intrust them with so perilous a gift. In love to their souls, he allows many of them to remain in circumstances which are by no means opulent, that thus they may learn to live in fuller dependence on himself. In this way of continual trust, they are made rich in faith through additional experience of his power and faithfulness, and advance with greater alacrity in the way which leadeth to life. We are very far from asserting, that a man who is rich cannot be a real Christian, but we affirm, on the authority of the Word of God, and in conformity to the actual experience of Christians, that poverty is more favourable to spiritual improvement than affluence.

The Lord farther promotes the sanctification of his people, by the afflictions with which he is pleased to visit them. Sometimes he permits disease to waste the strength of their bodies, and to bring them even to the verge of the grave; and at other times, he removes a wife or a child, the desire of their eyes, and the chief of their earthly comforts. It is impossible for them to view such events with stoical indifference. Nature feels, and droops for a season under the stroke; and surely he who wept at the grave of Lazarus, his friend, will not regard the sigh which heaves their breast, and the tear which steals in silence down their cheeks, as an act of rebellion against his will. They are fully persuaded, that every part of his procedure towards them originates in wisdom and mercy, and that grace may gain where nature loses. The death of real Christians, places them beyond the contamination of sin and the reach of suffering, and admonishes their surviving friends to double their diligence in preparing for that happy country, where they live and triumph in the joy of their Lord. Such considerations, connected with the recollection of the sovereignty of God, moderate their grief, and produce an entire acquiescence in his holy will. They thus reason in the retirement of the closet: The Lord, whose property we are by creation, and especially by redemption, and to whom we surrendered ourselves, and all our interests, even the sacred memorials of those sufferings by which our redemption was accomplished, gave, and we blessed him for his kindness; he has taken away, and we desire to bless and adore him still, for surely he may do what he will with his own. This subjection of heart to the King of Zion, glorifies at once his sovereignty, wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness, and must therefore be as acceptable to him, as it is proper and seemly in us.

IV. Real Christians fulfil conscientiously the duties which are connected with their lawful occupation and social relations,

The Lord in his overruling providence, has assigned to each of us a particular occupation, and we ought, from a regard to his will and glory, to abide in it, and to prosecute it with diligence. Some, however, are discontented with their calling; others are indolent in it, and many who prosecute it with diligence, have no respect to the divine appointment and the credit of religion, but are influenced solely by a desire to make provision for the lusts of the flesh. The Christian, on the contrary, works willingly with his hands, because his heavenly Father has enjoined him to be diligent in business, and to provide things honest in the sight of all men. He discharges with fidelity and patience the duties of his occupation, from a desire that the Lord may be glorified in all things. This, says he, is my employment by the appointment of my God. In pursuing it with assiduity, I serve him, procure through his blessing, the things which are necessary to the subsistence of my family, enjoy peace of mind, and am delivered from those dangerous temptations to which the idler is exposed. As he thus has a regard to the will and glory of God, in prosecuting his ordinary employment, so also, to the natural rights of his fellow-men. He neither defrauds them of their time and labour for which he expects wages, nor takes any undue advantage of their ignorance or necessity in buying and selling, but endeavours to give to all, the things which are just and equal.

He is equally exemplary in his attention to other relative duties. Whether he is a magistrate, or a subject, a minister, or a hearer of the Gospel, a parent, or a child, a master, or a servant, he fulfils the duties connected with the relation, from a regard to the authority, in dependence on the grace, and with a design to promote the glory of God. Contented with his own lot, he envies not the rank of others, but cheerfully renders to all their due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, and honour to whom honour. Nor have his inferiors any reason to complain of his supercilious and overbearing temper, for he is gentle, showing all kindness to all men.

V. The disciples of Christ employ their talents, whether they are natural or acquired, in promoting the honour of his name, and the interests of his kingdom in the world.

The distributive wisdom of God, has bestowed on different men different degrees of mental acuteness, as well as of bodily vigour. Some are endued with a penetrating judgment, a retentive memory, and a fertile and lively imagination. The possession of these talents, gives them a greater ascendancy in cultivated society, than even riches and rank. Others listen to them with attention, regard their opinions with deference, and are contented to be guided by their judgment and example. It is obvious that such persons will either do much mischief, or be extensively useful. When their minds have not felt the influence of true religion, but are, on the contrary, prejudiced against it, their numerous admirers imbibe their sentiments, and decree all who furnish unequivocal evidence of their attachment to practical godliness, as bigots and enthusiasts. On the other hand, when the real Christian whose mind is sanctified through the faith of the Gospel, possesses superior natural talents, they are unreservedly devoted to the glory of God, and render him a signal blessing to the age and place in which he lives. His enlarged and vigorous faculties, and all the influence which they give him over others, are employed in guiding them into those paths which lead to present peace and everlasting happiness. He gently chides the thoughtless, instructs the young and ignorant, comforts the mourner, confirms the wavering, and employs every warrantable mean to reclaim those who have become hardened and wretched in the practice of iniquity. While he thus labours to make men wise unto salvation, he opposes with the whole weight of his talents, those who seek to destroy their souls either by giving them erroneous views of the Gospel, or by attempting to set it aside altogether. He boldly defends the truth, vindicates the Scriptures, repels the attacks of infidels, and represses the insolence of the mouth which is given to blasphemy.

But many of the disciples of Christ are not able to serve his cause in this way. Their minds are neither remarkably acute, nor stored with various knowledge. They may, however, possess other means of promoting the interests of the Gospel, and the welfare of immortal souls; and if they do, they will not remain unoccupied. If God has given them this world's goods, they will employ a portion of them in relieving the indigent, in feeding the hungry, in clothing the naked, in educating the orphan, in providing for the fatherless, and causing the widow's heart to sing for joy. If he has intrusted them with power, they will use it in protecting the weak, in redressing the grievances of the injured, in establishing peace, and in encouraging undertakings which may promote the salvation and happiness of their fellow-men. In a word, whatever may be the nature or the number of the talents which the Christian has received, he will not hide them in a napkin. "Holiness to the Lord," is inscribed on all his endowments, whether they are natural or accidental. He views himself as under unspeakable obligations to that adorable Saviour who gave himself for him, that he might redeem him from all iniquity, and most willingly glorifies him in his body, in his spirit, and with his substance.

From this subject, we learn the benign and salutary influence of a cordial reception of Christ, in all his saving offices. The character which we have attempted to delineate, is formed on a conviction that we are sinners, and ready to perish; on a full persuasion, that God, moved by tender mercy, sent his Son to redeem us from sin and hell, and to render us meet for heaven and everlasting happiness; and on a humble, entire, and daily trust in the Saviour, for all the blessings of salvation. Until we entertain such views of ourselves, and exercise such dependence on him, we cannot be sensible of our obligations to redeeming love, and consequently cannot feel the force of that powerful motive to love God, which our text suggests. Let it not, therefore, be said, that it is of little consequence what a man's religious belief and principles may be, provided his conduct is correct. Our principles have so great an influence on our conduct, that if the one is bad, the other will not be good. "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit." It would be folly to expect grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles. A man of bad principles may sometimes, no doubt, from prudential considerations, and views of utility, be decent in his external behaviour, but nothing will produce that regard to the glory of God, and character of uniform goodness, which we have described, except faith in Christ, and a lively sense of our obligations to his grace.

This subject admonishes those who are not only in spiritual bondage, but in love with their chains, to consider their dangerous condition, and to apply without delay to Christ for the blessings of redemption. You were formed to glorify God, and to find your happiness in the enjoyment of his favour, but you have fallen from the great design of your creation, and become obnoxious to the severest effects of his displeasure. You perceive not the extent of your guilt, you are not aware of the danger to which it exposes you, and of the impossibility of finding substantial happiness in the pleasures and honours of this world. Under the guidance of a deceived heart, you hasten to the different scenes of mirth and amusement, but all your laughter ends in heaviness. The pleasures which are so inviting at a distance, lose their charms as you approach them, and sicken and die in the enjoyment. Your minds are not only disappointed, they are often also vexed, and rendered very unhappy, by those trifling competitions which originate in pride and selfishness. You desire to be first in the circle in which you move,—your neighbour possesses the same ambition, and your interfering claims lead to mutual dislike and detraction. Something which you say or do offends others, or something in their language or behaviour fills you with disgust, and thus, in one way or another, peace is banished from your bosom. Surely if you would stop and reflect a little on what is past, you might feel the force, and admit the truth of Solomon's words, "vanity of vanities, all is vanity and vexation of spirit." In the life of Lady Glenorchy, we are informed that, like many other accomplished young ladies, she was vain, fond of dress, and attached to gay amusements. But about the twenty-third year of her age she was visited with sickness, in recovering from which her thoughts involuntarily turned to the first question in the Shorter Catechism, "What is the chief end of man? It is to glorify God, and enjoy him for ever." Musing on these words, they arrested her attention, and led her to put to herself the important queries, "Have I answered the design of my being? Have I glorified God? And shall I enjoy him for ever?" On reviewing her life of thoughtless gaiety, she found there was no connection between such conduct and the glorifying and enjoying of God, and that, consequently, hitherto she had not answered the chief end of her existence. Her conscience, through the blessing of God, was awakened, she embraced the Saviour whom the Gospel offers, and obtained peace of mind, and, in all the bloom of youth, with all worldly pleasures at her command, she laid herself, her fortune, her honours, and her talents at the foot of his cross. It will be well if you also are excited to consider your ways, either by some afflictive dispensation of Providence, or by this admonition. May the God of salvation, by the enlightening and renewing influences of his good Spirit, show you the folly of your conduct, and the tremendous ruin which awaits impenitent transgressors, and incline your hearts to flee to that gracious Redeemer, who is both able and willing to save you to the uttermost, and to him be all the praise. Amen.

PART III.

Extracted from the Athenaeum of July 29, 1837.]

Few travellers have visited Egypt without commiserating the condition of the unhappy Fellahs; every public work is executed by their unpaid labour—half-naked and half-starved, they toil under a burning sun, to clear out canals or level roads, under the eye of taskmasters, ready to punish with their formidable whip, made from the hide of the hippopotamus, the least neglect or relaxation. Such a sight necessarily recalls to mind the sufferings endured by the Israelites while they were subjected to the tyranny of Pharaoh. "The Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour; and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field; all their service wherein they made them serve was with rigour." Exod. i. 13, 14. The manufacture of bricks from the mud and slime of the Nile appears, indeed, to have been a very laborious, and painful occupation. From the monuments we learn that the labour was principally performed by slaves or captives taken in war. One representation of this manufacture at Thebes displays labourers of three different nations, distinguishable by the different colours of their flesh; among these, the dark red are Egyptians, the light brown and the yellow are foreigners. Some persons have imagined that they can trace a Jewish cast of countenance in the light brown figures, but wherever Jews are found on the monuments, and they unquestionably occur in the painting of a triumphal procession discovered by Belzoni in the tombs of the kings, they are painted deep red, and are distinguished by large beards, bushy hair confined within a band, and fringed garments, none of which characteristics appear in the figures of the brick-makers.

The process of manufacture does not differ materially from that used in our own day. The clay was brought in baskets from the Nile, thrown into a heap, thoroughly saturated with water, and worked up to a proper temper by the feet of the labourers. We observe that the watering and tempering of the clay is performed entirely by the light-coloured labourers, who, as we have before observed, were captives. This labour, in such a climate, must have been very fatiguing and unwholesome, and it appears to have been therefore shared by the native Egyptians. In all ages the rulers of this country have completed their public works by the prodigat expenditure of human life: one hundred thousand workmen fell victims to the toil of cutting the canal which Pharaoh Necho opened between the Nile and the Red Sea: and Mohammed Ali worked up twenty thousand lives in completing a canal between the Nile and the sea of Alexandria. We find from the narrative in Exodus that the Pharaohs imposed the severest tasks on foreigners and subject nations: it is not an improbable conjecture of Rosellini's that the wretched victims of tyranny depicted on the monuments are Greeks and Anatolians, supplied by the slave-dealing, kidnaping Phoenicians, whose piracies on the Aegean and Euxine seas were quite as extensive as their commerce.

The clay, when tempered, was cut by an instrument somewhat resembling the hand-plough, and moulded into an oblong trough; the bricks were then dried in the sun; some, from their colour appear to have been baked or burned, but no trace of this operation has been yet discovered on the monuments.

Pottery was an art in which the Egyptians acquired great perfection: from its frequent occurrence on the monuments, it would appear that the Egyptians, like the Hebrew poets, discovered a moral significance in the motion of the rapid wheel; the formation of a beautiful vessel from the plain clay naturally became a symbol of creation. Thus Isaiah, "O Lord, thou art our father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand." Isa. lxxv. 7. The clay is first rounded by the hands and revolving wheel until it is fashioned in the solid; the upper part by a touch is indented, so as to form the neck.

Jeremiah describes the military preparations of the Egyptians in his account of the battle of Carchemish where Nebuchadnezzar completely routed Pharaoh Necho. "Harness the horses; and get up, ye horsemen, and stand forth with your helmets; furnish the spears, and put on the brigandines." Jer. xli. 4. In connection with this topic, we may take the opportunity of correcting a very common error. In his enumeration of the Egyptian forces, Jeremiah mentions "the Ethiopians and the Lybians that handle the shield, and the Lydians that handle and bend the bow." The Lydians here are not Asiatics, but the Luddin, a nomadic race in Africa. We may also add, that the Babylonians won the battle by their superior dexterity in the use of the sword, a circumstance which Jeremiah has not omitted. "For this is the day of the Lord God of hosts, a day of vengeance, that he may avenge him of his adversaries: and the sword shall devour, and it shall be satiate and made drunk with their blood, for the Lord God of hosts hath a sacrifice in the north country, by the river Euphrates." Jer. xli. 10.

The pyramids, the temples and palaces of Luxor and Karnac, the tombs of the kings, and the royal treasures, sufficiently prove the great skill which the Egyptians had in architecture. The monumental portraits of the building art are very numerous, and they explain to us a curious circumstance mentioned by the sacred historian in the account of the erection of Solomon's Temple. "And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither; so that there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house, while it was in building." 1 Kings vi. 7. This precise squaring and preparation of the stones is detailed frequently; they are accurately measured under the superintendence of a principal architect, the shape marked on the rough block with a dark line, so as to determine the stone-cutter accurately, and a nail or number is fixed to the finished stone, so as to determine its place in the building.

The art of sculpture was limited by very strict rules; there were fixed proportions established for every figure, which the statuary was not permitted to violate; and hence arises the great sameness in the Egyptian statues, and the stiffness for which they are all remarkable. Isaiah describes the process of idol-making very minutely. "The artist stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line; he setteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man, that it may remain in the house." Isa. xliv. 13. When a proper block of marble, or, of granite, had been discovered by the sculptor, the surface was first smoothed, and parallel lines drawn at equal distances, from top to bottom; other lines were then drawn, at equal distances, from side to side, so as to divide the whole into a series of squares. The size of these squares was proportioned to the size of the figure; nineteen of them, according to some, and twenty-one and one-fourth, according to other authorities, were allowed for the height of the human body; when smaller figures or ornaments were to be introduced, the squares were subdivided into smaller squares, in proportion to the reduced size required. The outline was then traced, and as its proportions were invariable, this, which to moderns would seem the most important part of the process, required no great exertion of skill in the Egyptian artist. It was then inspected by the master sculptor, who wrote on various parts of it, in hieratic characters, such directions as he thought it necessary to give to the inferior artists, who actually cut out the figure.

It seems probable that the Egyptians were unacquainted with the use of coined money; there are no traces of such an employment as coining on the monuments; bullion was the instrument of exchange, and the amount of payment was ascertained by weight. When Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah, we are told "Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." Gen. xxiii. 16. The balance was consequently necessary in every bargain and sale. We find it frequently on the monuments.

It would be impossible, in our limited space, to enter on the investigation of the trade and commerce of ancient Egypt. Heeren's volumes contain the fullest information on the subject; and there is a good summary in Dr Russell's excellent work on Egypt, published in the "Edinburgh Cabinet Library." We have already mentioned the probable intercourse with India; the monuments afford us proof that gold, ivory, and slaves were obtained from Ethiopia; the elephant, the giraffe, and the ostrich, are also among the presents which are offered to the Egyptian monarchs.

In private life the Egyptians, the men at least, appear to have been rather a grave people. Gymnastic exercises of various kinds are represented among their popular amusements; practice in archery is a favourite occupation,—indeed, as we have before observed, it was one of the sports of childhood. We may remark, that the Egyptians, like our old English archers, drew the arrow to the ear, not to the breast, as was usual in the heroic ages; and also that the sling, a favourite weapon in Syria and Arabia, seems to have been unknown or neglected in the valley of the Nile.

The amusements of the Egyptian ladies are more frequently represented than those of the men. They appear to have been very much attached to horticulture; the mistress of the house frequently appears in or near the garden. Their favourite flower is the lotus-lily; we have already noticed that it is a common ornament of the head; most of the ladies in the party or assembly represented on the Egyptian picture in the British Museum, hold a lotus-flower in their hands; vases of them decorate the apartments, baskets of them are a common offering from slaves and inferiors. The Egyptian princess in Solomon's Song alludes to this national taste—"My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies. I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine; he feedeth among the lilies." Sol. Song, vi. 2, 3. It is scarcely necessary to add, that this hymeneal canticle abounds with allusions to the garden, and that the productions it names belong to Egypt rather than Palestine.

Cymbals, timbrels, and tambourines, of various shapes, appear in the choral dances and festal processions; the performers, who are females, appear to belong to the lower classes. They are always introduced on joyous occasions, especially in a triumph. This circumstance explains the conduct of Miriam when the Israelites celebrated the destruction of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea. "And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women after her went out with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them and said, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the Sea." Exod. xv. 20, 21.

[The above is the concluding Article of the series on Egyptian Antiquities, as illustrating the Sacred Writings. In their original form, as they appeared in the Athenæum, they were accompanied with wood-cuts,—an advantage of which, of course, we had it not in our power to avail ourselves. In bringing these papers to a close, however, we cannot refrain from reminding our readers, how completely the advance of knowledge in reference to the manners and customs of the ancients, is fitted to silence the infidel and the sceptic. With every new discovery in this vast field of research, the evidence of the truth and consistency of Revelation gathers increasing strength. In this view of the matter, it must be cheering to every Christian to reflect that, as successive ages roll onward, and man is seeking in every possible way to gratify his laudable thirst for information in the varied departments of human inquiry, he is unwittingly accumulating a mass of powerful arguments to show, that the Bible, in all its statements, is infallibly true, and, therefore, "given by inspiration of God."]

HELDAI, OR THE DEDICATION.

Time, afternoon and evening.—Scene, near Minnith, in the land of Gilead.—The Personages are represented as existing during the reigns of Basaha and Ass, thirty or forty years after the death of Solomon.

FROM Gilead's dew-nursed summits high,
The new moon had been seen in sky;
And loud the watcher's trump had peal'd
The tidings down to Bashau's field
Hill call'd it out to hill around;
Vale sent to vale abroad the sound;
Till every town in Israel's land,
From Laish south to Shihor's strand,
With shouts resounding, ceas'd all toil
For new moon's jocund feast, awhile.

Soon then did Israel's sons repair
Exulting, to the house of prayer,
Each with what offering Moses bid,
Bullock, or ram, or sheep, or kid,

With wine to pour out, and to taste,
 In honour of the solemn feast,
 And (offering still to God more dear!)
 Hearts full of love and holy fear;—
 Each altar, throughout Jacob's land,
 Illum'd by sacrificer's hand,
 Sent up its pillar, long and high,
 Of grateful incense, to the sky;
 Whilst, as the sacrifices lay,
 Melting in savoury smoke away,
 Loud blew the priests, that stood around,
 Their silver trumps, with solemn sound,
 Proclaiming, round and far abroad,
 How Israel gloried in his God.

The shepherd Heldai had, that day,
 On Minnith's mount, with citrons gay,
 Attended at the place of prayer,
 And offer'd his burnt-offering there,
 With his glad household by his side,
 Grandsons and sons, his joy and pride:
 These, in their stronger hands, upheld
 Their grandsire as he walk'd a-field;
 These propp'd his steps, now short and slow,
 Up Minnith's mount, where citrons blow;
 These help'd him, from the hill again,
 Down to his cot on Jazer's plain;
 And, when within the vine-weav'd bower,
 Came new moon's feast at twilight hour,
 These, ministrant with kindly care,
 Serv'd the hoar sire with sweetest fare;
 And, brisker bounding to impart
 Of gladness to his aged heart,
 His cup they fill'd with blood divine
 Of Sibmah's grapes, sweet-smelling wine,
 Wine, that on heavenly altar pour'd,
 Or quaff'd beside the manly board,
 For pure libation, and for cheer,
 To God and man alike is dear.

Sunk had in Chittim's floods the light;
 And, over Kedar's wilds, the Night
 Up-rose from Elam's eastern sea,
 Girt with her star-bright family;
 Their talk continued sweet and long,
 Mix'd with the viol and the song;
 They talk'd of Jesse's shepherd son,
 What victories his bow had won;
 His beauty, blooming bright and blann,
 All perfect from th' Almighty's hand;
 His spirit, even from childhood's days,
 Fired from the Lord t' indite his praise;
 His lips, divinely skil'd to sing;
 His hand, to strike th' accordant string:
 They talk'd of Solomon, whose name
 Had walk'd the spacious world in fame;
 His wisdom, whose renown call'd forth
 Earth's farthest queens to praise its worth;
 His kingdom's greatness, stretching wide
 From Shinar's towers to Gaza's tide;
 His person's grandeur, as he shone
 High on his lion-studded throne;
 His house, that stood in towering pride
 On Lebanon's wood-fringed side;
 His chariots and his war-steeds bold,
 Trapp'd with Parvaim's pride of gold;
 His ships, that o'er the Red Sea foam,
 Wafted the wealth of Ophir home;
 His temple on Moriah's hill,
 Earth's joy, which God's own glories fill;
 The molten sea, with lillied brim;
 The wing-expanding cherubim;
 And how, with pomp of solemn state,
 The house to God was consecrate.
 "I saw him, (said the hoar-hair'd sire,)
 The king whom kings combined t' admire,

Stand by God's altar, clothed bright,
 And beaming with celestial light;
 I saw th' inspired monarch kneel,
 Before assembled Israel,
 And spread his hands to heaven in prayer
 Blessing the tribes all gather'd there."

"O father! (here his first-born broke The father's speech, and gently spoke:)
 Thy favoured eye beheld what we,
 Less happy, were not born to see,
 King Solomon in all his state
 Of royal pride, sublimely great,
 What time to Sion at his call
 Up-flocked with joy his people all;
 When with solemnity he vow'd
 And set apart the house to God;
 For we, thy children, born too late
 To witness Israel's happiest state,
 Have seen the kingdom rent in twain
 That scarce doth half her state remain;
 Then tell, O father! tell to these
 Thy grandsons, gather'd round thy knees,
 The dedication-feast's display,
 Salem's most solemn, happiest day;
 That, to their sons, these too may tell
 The glory past of Israel."
 He ceas'd; and, to th' entreating son,
 The sire, obedient, thus begun:

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
 Did Judah's monarch magnify!
 Now on Moriah's mount up-rear'd,
 Earth's joy, God's holy house appear'd,
 Tow'ring in beauty on her steep,
 O'er Hinnom's valley, dark and deep;
 With silver-crested turrets high,
 Mounted midway 'tween earth and sky;
 Opening her golden portals broad
 T' admit the worshippers of God,
 When Salem's king, with wisdom grac'd,
 Proclaim'd the consecration-feast,
 Inviting, in Jehovah's name,
 The tribes to celebrate the same.

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
 Did Judah's monarch magnify!
 Forthwith round Israel's land afar,
 From Dan to Edom's mountain-bar,
 From Rabbah's wall and Nimrim's rill,
 To the great ridge of Carmel's hill,
 Joy took th' inhabitants throughout:
 Tribe unto tribe return'd the shout;
 Forests and fields, and floods and lands,
 With exultation, clapt their hands;
 From hill and vale, from tent and town,
 Elders and princes of renown,
 The old, the young, the great, the small,
 Forth flow'd, at Judah's monarch's call,
 With incense-gift and sacrifice,
 Zion's great feast to solemnize,
 The highways all of hill and plain
 Were fill'd with crowds of jocund men,
 Who, marching Zion-ward, wav'd high
 Their long palm branches in the sky,
 Making the highways ring around
 With hallelujah's hallow'd sound.

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
 Did Judah's monarch magnify!
 I left my flock alone to feed
 On Jazer's brook-nursed flowery mead,
 And, with my father's tribe, up-went Mount Abarim's rock-strewa ascent;
 We cross'd the Jordan, staff in hand;
 We pass'd up Judah's fertile land;
 The cliffs of Jericho, that hung
 O'erhead, as up we travell'd, rung

From multitude of harps, and noise
Of praise from many a tuneful voice:
We pass'd Enrogel's well; we took
Our way o'er Kidron's lucid brook,
Till Sion's mountain rose in sight,
The palace of the Lord's delight;
Tears, tears of rapture did we weep,
As up we clomb the sacred steep!

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
Wide, wide on Salem's mountain stood Assembled Israel's multitude,
Her chiefs and princes of renown,
Her people from each coast and town,
Each tribe with banner and with word
Of joy devoted to the Lord,
Ten thousand thousands crowding all
The mountain's space from wall to wall,
Hailing each late-arriving crowd
With shouts of gratulation loud,
And pointing to the house that stands
Earth's joy, the glory of all lands!
'Behold,' they cry'd, 'th' abode of Him
That dwells between the cherubim!'

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
As Israel's tribes, from every gate
Fast-flowing, stood all congregate,
Forth stept the king with solemn grace,
And, from his high commanding place,
Gave sign that Horeb's ark was plac'd
Beneath the cherubs' wings at rest;
Whereat the people for a time
Stood silent, rapt in joy sublime,
Praise, praise in every heart up-sprung,
But mute was each o'erpowered tongue:
Till Asaph forth and Heman came,
And all their choristers of name,
Arrayed in linen-garments white,
With timbrels, organs of delight,
Psalteries and harps of golden string,
And silver cymbals, glittering,
Beside the altar's horns they stood,
And struck at once their multitude
Of cymbals, that all sweetly ring,
Psalteries and harps of golden string;
Conjoined with these, the Levite throng
'Gan peal their trumpets loud and long,
And high their heav'n-ward voices raise
In one harmonious hymn of praise;
Praise, praise the Lord, (the choirs thus sang That court, and porch, and pillar rang.)
For He is good; and ever sure
His tender mercy doth endure!

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
The people, then, that tranced stood
In ecstasy of prayerful mood,
From that heart-ravishment awoke,
And all at once the silence broke;
Ten thousand thousand voices joined
As if from one enraptured mind,
Were lifted up to heaven, and sang
Till all Moriah's mountain rang;
Hinnom's long valley caught the song,
And sent it to the hills along;
And Judah's hills up-rolled the sound
Wide through the wilderness profound.

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
As thus the hymn of praise was sung,
And trump, harp, cymbal, pealed and rung,
Behold! high o'er Moriah's top
Heaven's cloudless, all-investing cope

Was cleft in silence, and a flame,
From God's high throne descending, came Down on the altar there that stood
Heaped with large sacrifice and wood;
Like a sun-beam from summer's skies
It fell, and fired the sacrifice;
Enveloping each altar's horn
With tongues of fire that wave and burn,
Up-sending, as the meats consume,
Sweet smell of rest, enwrap in fume.

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
Then down upon the temple came
A glory terrible to name,—
The glory of the Lord, too bright,
In its excess, for mortal sight;
A cloud of amber-tinted hue
Attempted it to Israel's view;
It hover'd o'er the temple bright,
Filling the holy place with light,—
Light unapproachable, whose blaze
Dazzled to darkness mortal gaze;
Back from its radiant skirts, retir'd
The priests, nor entrance now desir'd;
Aloof in holy awe they stood;
Whilst all the assembled multitude
Bowed with their faces to the ground,
And worshipp'd low with reverent sound:—
Eternal praise and thanks to Him
That dwells between the cherubim;
O praise the Lord! for ever sure
His tender mercy doth endure!

"Hearken, my sons, how He on high
Did Judah's monarch magnify!
Then stept forth on his lofty place
King Solomon with royal grace;
Majestical he knelt, and spread
High, toward heaven, his hands, and prayed,
Then to the people turn'd his face,
And blessed them from the God of peace,
And bade them join to solemnize
The day with festal sacrifice;
Whereat prince, people, elder, priest,
Prepar'd for offering and for feast;
Mountain and valley soon were clad
With tabernacles green and glad,
Whose walls were willows, interwove,—
Whose roofs, the spoils of palm-tree grove;
And twice ten thousand oxen slain,
From Zion mount to Goath's plain,
Fum'd towards heaven in sacrifice,
Enriching with sweet smell the skies;
In house, and court, and field, and street,
High feast they held, with joy replete;
With flesh of lamb, and kid, and kine,
And flagons of rejoicing wine,
That every face with bliss shone bright,
Each heart was ravish'd with delight;
Seven days, that brought nor care, nor cloy,
They tarry'd at the sacred joy;
Until, at last, the monarch sent
From Salem home the tribes, who went Joyous each Hebrew to his tent,
Grateful and glad that God had shown
His goodness thus to Solomon!"

Thus in his cool vine-mantled bower,
The shepherd-sire at evening hour,
Rehears'd of Israel's glorious state,
And day of consecration great;
Whilst on his aged count'nance hung
His grandsons glad, that caught the song,
And on their memories grav'd it well,
That they might to their children tell
The glory past of Israel!

MISCELLANEOUS.

A bow drawn at a venture.—In the year 1743, the Rev. George Whitefield had resolved to go to America, and had engaged his passage in a ship that was to sail from Portsmouth; but, as the captain afterwards refused to take him, "for fear of his spoiling the sailors," he was obliged to go to Plymouth. While staying there he frequently preached, and an attempt having been recently made to murder him in his bed, much attention was excited, and many thousands flocked to hear him. While he was one day preaching, Mr Tanner, who was at work as a ship-builder at a distance, heard his voice, and resolved, with five or six of his companions, to go and drive him from the place where he stood; and for this purpose filled their pockets with stones. When, however, Mr T. drew near, and heard Whitefield earnestly inviting sinners to Christ, he was filled with astonishment, his resolution failed him, and he went home with his mind deeply impressed. On the following evening he again attended, and heard Mr Whitefield on the sin of those who crucified the Redeemer. After he had expatiated on their guilt, he appeared to look intently on Mr Tanner, as he exclaimed, with energy, "Thou art the man!" These words powerfully affected Mr T.; he felt his iniquities to be awfully great, and in the agony of his soul, he cried, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." The preacher then proceeded to proclaim the free and abundant grace of Jesus, which he commanded to be preached among the very people who had murdered him; a gleam of hope entered his heart, and he surrendered himself to Christ. This sermon was made eminently useful to many other persons.

Obookiah.—The ways of Jehovah in making some persons the partakers of his spiritual favours, and in preparing others for the full discharge of Christian duties, are frequently very remarkable. When the late Rev. S. J. Mills, a truly valuable labourer in the missionary cause in America, and afterwards himself a missionary to the heathen, first went to New Haven in Connecticut to study theology, he became acquainted with a heathen youth, from the Sandwich Islands, named Obookiah, who had been very remarkably saved from death, when his parents and others were killed, and who was now ardently desirous of instruction. He became the servant, the pupil, the companion of Mr Mills, was subsequently called by the grace of God, and furnished the occasion of establishing a prosperous school in connection with the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions.

John Bunyan.—The celebrated author of the Pilgrim's Progress experienced several remarkable providential deliverances. Once he fell into the river Ouse; and at another time into an arm of the sea, and narrowly escaped being drowned. But the most singular instance of his preservation occurred when he was about seventeen years of age. At that time he became a soldier, and at the siege of Leicester, in 1645, being drawn out to stand sentinel, another soldier in the same company desired to take his place: he consented, and his companion was shot in the head by a musket-ball, and killed.

A South Sea Youth.—The Rev. W. Ellis, when describing the idolatry of the South Sea islanders, informs us that when they offered human sacrifices to their idols, a youth educated in the school at Eimeo, very narrowly escaped with his life. This interesting and intelligent young man, whose name was Aberahama, was marked out as a victim; and when the priest's servants came to take him, he fled, but was pursued, shot at, and wounded. When he fell, he crawled among the bushes, and eluded the discovery of his pursuers, though they several times passed the place of his retreat in search of him. When night came, he crept down to his friends, who dressed his wounds and removed him to a place of safety. He lived to enjoy the blessings of the Gospel, and to be the means of imparting them to others.

[The following anecdotes have been forwarded to us by the Rev. Dr Ralph of Liverpool, in the course of whose experience they occurred:]

Nature perverted by Superstition.—Mr Bennet, appointed to visit the stations of the London Missionary Society, once related the following, among other anecdotes, to me:—"A native of Otahete, who had lately embraced the Gospel, was brought before the Church for having relapsed into heathenism, by placing some water in a cocoa-nut for the spirit of his departed wife to feed upon; it being a belief of the country that the intercourse may be obtained with spirits after they leave the world. 'Me leave Word of God for old superstitions?' said he, with great emotion. 'No, no. Word of God grow big tree in my heart.' While he was thus defending himself, the accuser rushed on to the party assembled, and returned with the proof of his guilt in his hand, the cocoa-nut with the water in it, and set it down before him. 'Me leave Word of God? No, never, never!' again he exclaimed, with uncommon sensitiveness; but, hanging his head in great grief, he added, 'My wife and I were very fond of each other. We lived together happily for many years. Leave Word of God? No, no! But I just thought, she might possibly return to me, and so I put down the cocoa-nut and water, lest she might come and take a little.'"

Hell on Earth.—A young man, who had spent a life of irreligion, though often warned of his danger, a length was seized with a fatal sickness. After frequently parrying a request to send for a clergyman with the common answer, "I have never done harm to any one," he reluctantly consented to have one. The clergyman paid several visits without any apparent success. Delirium came on; and, suddenly, while the clergyman was on his way to him once more, he clasped his hands, and screaming, with a voice heard at the distance of several streets, and remembered long afterwards as all but preternatural, he uttered the words, "Fire, fire, fire!" and, in a few moments, expired.

Heavenly Trading.—A child, in a commercial community, on being asked, "What is time?" replied "Time is our principal, and the use we make of it is the interest."

Nature in Heaven.—"Mamma," said a child on her death-bed, whose brother John had departed at an equally early period, a few years previous, in the possession of like precious faith, "do you think we shall know each other in heaven?" "Yes! my dear," replied she; "for God will deny us no happiness consistent with his glory, and that is not inconsistent with it." "Oh! then," exclaimed she, "how Johnny and I will run to meet you when you come there!"

AVERSION TO DIVINE REVELATION, BECAUSE OF ITS PURITY AND HOLINESS—ORIGIN OF IDOLATRY—HIS-TORICALLY ILLUSTRATED.

WE have seen that faith is a commanded duty, and a reasonable one, and that the objections urged against it, however plausible, are utterly untenable. But this being the case, whence comes the acknowledged prevalence of unbelief, and whence the doubts and darkness which the true believer himself so often and so painfully feels, and which he so bitterly laments? Some illustrations, derived from indubitable facts, and the history of our race, will afford a clear and satisfactory answer to these questions.

We have already alluded to the fact that error in doctrine of a practical nature, is more readily believed than truth; and have generally referred to the cause, which is, that error or corruption in doctrine, is more congenial to human nature in its present state, than that which inculcates purity and holiness. To be convinced that this is a fact, is of no small value, and that chiefly on account of the practical bearing which it may be expected to have on the moral principles, and the light which it throws on the believer's mind, regarding the nature and origin of the struggles in which he is engaged, with a "heart that is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." The more intelligently, also, that he understands his actual position, his own feebleness, and the treachery of his enemies within, ever ready to surrender the citadel of the heart to his enemies without: the more will he feel the necessity of distrusting himself, and his feeble purposes, and of placing his whole reliance on the Lord Jehovah, in whom alone is everlasting strength.

The simplest and most effective way of establishing our position, regarding that tendency in our nature, which is the fruitful source of so much evil and unbelief, is by a reference to the history of mankind; and the evidence it affords is uniform and undeviating in every age and region, and among every tribe and kindred of the human race.

Important illustrations might be derived from a comparison of the doctrines of divine revelation with those of human systems, particularly as they regard the attributes of Deity, and the fundamental principles of moral obligation. In glancing at the character of the Divine Being, as set before us in Scripture, we behold it infinitely glorious, and transcendently sublime, exhibiting unspotted holiness, inflexible justice, undeviating veracity, unerring, though unsearchable, wisdom, omnipotence, omnipresence, and immutability; and yet so gracious, and so compassionate is the God of the Bible, that his "goodness is over all his works;" nay, as a comprehensive whole it is said, "God is love." When, again, we look at the leading aim in all human systems, we find that it is to bring down the Deity to a level with humanity, or, in the language of Scripture, to make God "altogether such an one as ourselves." In proceeding to make the manifestations of the tendency of our corrupt nature, we shall see that what may be called the religion of human nature is ever the same in all the multifarious modifications of heathenism, Hinduism, Popery, and Mohamedism. In all of them we perceive one uniform and undeviating effort to supersede divine truth, by substituting such errors as favour the indulgence of the various passions and propensities of carnal and corrupted man.

Now, when we speak of superseding divine truth, it is implied that men were always in possession of it, till they put it away for something else that was more agreeable to them; and matters of fact bear us out in saying that they did this in contempt of the most striking and overwhelming evidence, with a degree of haste, and with a degree of headlong recklessness, that would appear utterly incredible, if it were not utterly undeniable. The explanation of the wonder is to be found in the tendency, or rather irresistible and headlong propensity in men to make God "altogether such an one as themselves," or, in the striking words of St. Paul, it was because "they did not like to retain God in their knowledge." Rom. i. 28. In the brevity indispensably requisite in such papers and such a work as this, things of importance occur, which it is necessary to pass over unnoticed, or to introduce with a superficialness of allusion that is disadvantageous to the subject. In this slight and superficial way, we must at present notice a very common expression, essential to this topic, and that is, the "religion of nature," or "natural religion." Deep is the delusion involved in the expression as it is commonly used. There is a sense in which natural religion, as signifying the religion which nature teaches, has a true and most important meaning. The Scriptures teach us that this religion of nature, or this religion which nature teaches, is so precise and clear in the instructions it gives, as to leave him who continues uninformed "without excuse." "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." Ps. xix. 1-4. So speaks the Psalmist generally; and let us now hear the Apostle more particularly in the application of the subject: "The wrath of God," says he, "is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them: for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse." Rom. i. 18-20. What can be more definite as to the precision and fulness of the lessons of nature on the great matters of religion? It is here affirmed to be so complete, that if there were a disposition to receive instruction and follow it, there would be no deficiency in knowledge, nor in the discharge of the duties which God requires of his intelligent creatures. "They are without excuse."

But as the expression "natural religion" is generally used, it implies that man is left to find out religion for himself from what nature teaches. Now, we have seen, that if he were so left, he would be "without excuse" if he did not receive sufficient instruction. But we now go on to show that he never was so left, that he never was without divine revelation, except when he put it away from him, which he always speedily did, because he "did not like to retain God in his knowledge." Let the reader mark the significant manner in which the word "retain" is here used. We cannot "retain" a thing till we are first put in possession of it; but if it be a thing that we do "not like to retain," we are likely to fall upon various contrivances to get rid of it; or, if possible, and if the thing be susceptible of it, we may mould and modify it into something suited to our taste, and which we shall then like to retain. Now, this may be said to be the history of mankind in regard of the knowledge of the true God, from the first sin in Eden onward through all their generations.

Communion with God constituted the felicity of the first pair in Paradise, and therefore they possessed a right knowledge of his nature, in so far as finite creatures can comprehend it. But mark the change which immediately followed the first transgression. The now unhappy pair began to disrobe the Divine Being of his attributes and to act towards him as if he were altogether ~~an~~ an one as themselves; for "Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God among the trees of the garden." Here is no small degree of practical atheism; for where now are the attributes of omniscience and omnipresence? The promised seed of the woman, however, appears to have been connected with an immediate revelation of mercy addressed to sinners as such, and hence the sacrifices of Cain and Abel prefiguring the true sacrifice for sin in the fulness of time. There can be no doubt that penitent Adam and righteous Abel would communicate to others the divine knowledge which they themselves had immediately received from the Most High. In looking at the whole period before the flood, we have Adam, who lived nearly to the days of Noah, the "preacher of righteousness;" and Enoch, the ancestor of Noah, who, during a considerable portion of the lives of both of them, gave such a resplendent example of a devoted servant of heaven, that he is said to have "walked with God;" and then he was translated to heaven without tasting of death,—"and he was not; for God took him." In the meantime the world had the benefit of his example and instruction, for a period of more than three hundred years. Here, then, we have direct revelation from the creation to the deluge, and all that was requisite was, that men should have "retained" that knowledge. And what is the divine testimony regarding the antediluvian race? "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." For a hundred and twenty years before the awful catastrophe of the flood, the "preacher of righteousness" lifted his warning voice, delivering a message from God himself, which men would not receive but treated it with mockery and insult.

We say nothing of the tremendous judgment by which the whole human race was destroyed, with the exception of a single family consisting of eight souls, the head of that family being Noah, the preacher of righteousness. But let us reflect on the impressive circumstances in which that family had been instructed in the knowledge of God, and the awful events by which it was enforced, as well as the earnestness and affection with which Noah must have practically urged home his divine instruction. Did not these persons, at least, "retain" the knowledge of God? How far otherwise, let the tower of Babel witness! That fruit and monument of idolatry was reared less than a hundred years after the deluge, and while, we have reason to believe, all those who were miraculously saved from that terrible catastrophe were yet alive, being two hundred and fifty years before the death of Noah. The birth of Abraham was just about contemporaneous with the death of Noah; and the calling of ab-father of the faithful took place in the seventy-fifth year of his age. At that time the whole world was sunk in the abominations of idolatry; not one had "retained" the knowledge of God, till it was again directly communicated to Abraham. Now, to this patriarch the Lord himself bears this testimony: "I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment." Gen. xviii. 19. Here, then, is evidence that the knowledge of the true God was again imparted to the descendants and retainers of Abraham, who was a prince of power and influence in his day. The covenant made with Abraham was renewed to Isaac and Jacob, and when the time of deliverance from Egyptian bondage approached, the distinguished prophet Moses was raised up as the immediate ambassador of God to the Israelites. But did they "like to retain the knowledge of God" thus imparted? Think of them beholding the wonders in Egypt and at the Red Sea, with daily manifestations of the divine power and presence in the wilderness; and then think of them at the very foot of Mount Sinai, where the divine glory was displayed amid thunders, and lightnings, and blackness, and tempest; and then mark them as they fashion the golden calf and worship it. The whole subsequent history of this highly favoured people is a continued demonstration of their dislike to retain the knowledge of God. "To them were committed the oracles of God," and to them were sent, from time to time, special messengers and commissioned prophets; but they continued to multiply their idols, and increase their transgressions, till they were driven into captivity. From that time, indeed, it appears that they had ceased to worship material idols of silver and gold, wood and stone; but not less really were they guilty of idolatry, which consists in giving to anything else that place in the heart which belongs to God. They read Moses and the prophets in their synagogues; but they contrived to render this unavailing, for, by their traditions, they made the Word of God of none effect. How they dealt with Jehovah's message of mercy by his well beloved Son, Jesus Christ, whom with wicked hands they crucified and slew, is too well known to be noticed.

With respect to heathen nations, we have seen that they became such by putting away from them the knowledge of God communicated to them at various periods of the world, not to speak of the warnings of Jewish prophets, and the circulation of the Scriptures in the Greek translation, commonly called the Septuagint. In the very days of our Saviour and his apostles, the doctrines of the Gospel began to be corrupted, till at length, in the course of a comparatively short period, the Papal power, in all the predicted lineaments of the "man of sin," had the greater part of the professing Christian world subjected to his iron sway. The Scribes and Pharisees were contented to retain the Scriptures; while, by their traditions, they rendered them of none effect. But the cor-ruptions of the "man of sin," that "mystery of iniquity," were so gross and palpably at variance with the Word of God, that so long as that Word remained in the hands of the people, they could not fail to be at once detected. Recourse was therefore had to the bolder but indispensable measure, of withdrawing the pure Word of God from the people altogether. To have "retained" it, would have ruined the dark projects of the "man of sin."

It seems superfluous farther to illustrate the prevalence of infidelity, and ignorance of the true God, by referring to the true cause of it,—the love of iniquity. Divine truth being corrupted, or put away, idolatry, the handmaid of iniquity, and the agent of Satan, beyond all other causes, was introduced. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things." Rom. i. 22, 23. When men had once given way to the propensity of considering God such an one as themselves, there was no limit to the excesses to which the abominations of iniquity might be carried. Hence human passions, and even vices, were ascribed to the objects of worship, which were multiplied without end. Particular deities were represented as patrons of particular vices; and the worship offered to them, consisted in the practice of the vices of which they were patrons. Now all this took place, not in some region or period of peculiar debasement, but universally, and in every age; not in the savage haunts of some tribe of singular pollution and barbarism, but in the polished states of Greece and Rome, whose boasted literature is set before us, in our youthful days, as models of taste and elegance. But we conclude: and let it be remembered, that ignorance of the true God, wherever and whenever it has existed, is not to be ascribed to the impossibility of obtaining the knowledge, but to the resolute determination not to retain it. What proves this, proves farther the great facility with which men will receive any doctrine, however absurd and palpably at variance with common sense, provided it favour the indulgence of vicious propensities. It is this alone that, in an enlightened age, can account for the continued existence of the monstrous absurdities and moral abominations of the "mystery of iniquity," or "the BEAST." Another thing that naturally follows from the facts adduced, is the difficulty of believing the pure truth of God, as unfolded in his Word; not because of difficulties which the understanding has to encounter, but just because of the purity, moral and intellectual, which it declares to be indispensable to the divine favour, but which purity is the utter aversion of the carnal man.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF

THE LATE REV. ELIAS CORNELIUS,

Secretary to the American Education Society.

THE subject of the following Sketch was born at Somers, Westchester county, New York, on the 30th of July 1794. In the early period of life he gave indications of a frankness and vivacity of disposition, which, while it was pleasing to his parents, led them to fear that he might become an easy prey to temptation. The utmost attention, therefore, was paid to his religious education, and though no traces of piety were observable in his character for several years, it was ultimately seen that the labours and prayers of his pious father and mother were far from being ineffectual. He lived to exemplify the truth of the Scripture declaration, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Though, in his boyhood, however, no marks were observable of his having undergone a saving change of heart, his conduct even then was such as to show, that he was by no means inattentive to divine things. In the conversation of his superiors in age, he seemed to take a lively interest, more especially when serious subjects were the topic of consideration. The hints occasionally dropped on such occasions, were not lost upon the reflecting mind of the boy. He dwelt upon them in his own thoughts, and the effect must have been of the most salutary kind. The impressions thus produced were cherished by the judicious training of his father, who, though immersed in the laborious and harassing duties of an extensive medical practice, sought frequent opportunities of implanting in the mind of his affectionate boy the principles of piety and virtue.

The elementary education of Elias preparatory to his entering college, was intrusted to the Rev. Herman Daggett, under whose care he made great progress in the acquisition, not merely of knowledge, but also of those habits of order, and accuracy, and punctuality, which are of essential service in the ordinary business of life. To the love of arrangement which he had thus imbibed, it may have been owing, that he evinced at college so decided a predilection for natural history. He was little more than sixteen years of age when he was enrolled a student of Yale College, and yet at that early period, he distinguished himself among his classmates, by his enthusiastic attachment to the study of natural objects. In after-life, indeed, he himself regretted that his attention during his academical career had been too exclusively directed to such studies, while many of the other no less important departments of knowledge had been comparatively neglected.

For some years after he entered college, Mr Cornelius is described by his companions as having been "a very thoughtless young man." Not that his habits were openly vicious, but both in thought and affection, this world was his all. He was walking after the sight of his own eyes, and after the evil imaginations of his own heart. To have proceeded in such a course, would have been inevitable ruin, and Mr Cornelius had reason to praise God, both in time and throughout eternity, that in His gracious Providence he was now arrested in his career of heedlessness and consummate folly. The Almighty had much work in store for him, as well as for numbers of his fellow-students; and, therefore, he poured upon the college a copious and refreshing rain of his heavenly influences. A revival took place, during which many were effectually turned to the love and the service of God. Among these was the individual whose history we are now relating. The revival is thus described by one of his companions who was himself a subject of it:—

"It is a remarkable fact, though not solitary in the history of revivals of religion, that there existed at this time in college, and especially in the senior class, several instances, as it afterwards appeared, of solemn reflection on religious truth, produced by causes having no connection with each other. A few individuals during the preceding term, had been led to consult volumes on practical theology, and had advanced so far in their serious inquiries, as to introduce prayer in the rooms. They were deeply impressed with the importance of religion, during the vacation, or at a previous period, by the last warnings of a pious mother, and by various other ways; and yet, on their return to college, no communication was made on the subject, beyond the walls of private rooms. My room-mate and myself had been accustomed, for a season, to unite with each other in prayer, but farther than this, had concealed our emotions in our own bosoms. Happening to be in a room opposite, near the commencement of the term, my class-mates said, 'It is thought that Cornelius has become attentive to the subject of religion, and that that is the cause of the change of his countenance.' The words came to me with great weight, though I made little or no reply. My room, in the appointment of Providence, was directly under that of Cornelius, and according to college custom, we visited each other frequently. On the evening of the same day, if I remember correctly, after the students had generally retired for the night, perceiving that the occupants of the room above were up, from some indefinite motive, or light errand, I went to Cornelius's door, and on knocking, was admitted, though I was surprised to find that the door had been locked. After a few words had passed between us, he said, 'We were about to unite in prayer, and I presume you will have no objection to join with us.' He then kneeled down with his room-mate, and poured forth such a prayer as I had never heard before. The whole ardour of his soul was directed towards heaven, in supplications for blessing on ourselves and others. The next day he called on our room, and earnestly entreated us to commence with him immediately in seeking salvation. Our hearts were full before; and this led to a free communication of our feelings. We now became earnest in our inquiries, and soon it was found that others were in a similar state of mind."

In reference to the same all-important event, another fellow-student of Mr Cornelius, thus writes:—

"When the little college church awoke from its guilty slumbers, and as the result, the effusion of the Holy Spirit was earnestly sought and confidently expected, I well remember, that we considered Cornelius as likely to become a leading opposer of the work of God, and on that account, perhaps, he was made the subject of special prayer. A revival commenced, and in our inexpressible joy, he, if not the first, was one of the first awakened. He early disclosed to me the workings of his mind. There was something about him, which excited the most lively interest in his case. His convictions were unusually deep and painful. Of the character of God, as a holy, righteous, and sovereign being, of the purity of his law, and the extent of his requirements, of the entire depravity of his own heart, and the sinfulness of his past life, he had very clear perceptions. Of the truth of the declaration, 'The carnal mind is enmity against God,' he had most distinctly proof in his own experience. He saw that he was in the hands of God, who was reasonable in his demands, and would be just in condemning the sinner. But his heart rose at times in fearful rebellion against his Maker. Like the 'bullock unaccustomed to the yoke,' he struggled and seemed determined not to submit; and I trembled lest the Spirit thus resisted, would 'let him alone.' The anguish of his soul was almost insupportable."

For some weeks this distressed state of mind continued. He felt like the Psalmist of old, that "against God, against God alone he had offended." Casting himself, therefore, with unreserved confidence upon the divine mercy as it is revealed in Christ, he found peace and rest in his soul. A holy serenity now pervaded his heart, and exhibited itself in his outward deportment.

Early in June 1813, Mr Cornelius became a member of the Church in Yale College. And from that period he continued through the rest of his life, to maintain a consistent walk and conversation. He now directed his thoughts to the ministerial office, and with that view he commenced the study of theology, under the late eminent President Dwight. Religion he felt to be his all in all, and his grand desire was, that others around him might become partakers of the same blessed hope. Accordingly, we find him taking a lively interest in the revival which took place in Yale College during the winter of 1814-15. His ardent zeal on that occasion, is thus noticed by one who was then a member of the institution:—

"The piety of Mr Cornelius was of the active kind. He felt for the souls of those young men whose scepticism, if not infidelity, recalled to mind his own former life when 'without God and without hope in the world.' In some of our usual or stated prayer-meetings, attended by Mr Ingersoll, and a few other pious students, who are now useful ministers of the Gospel, a proposal was made for renewed and increased exertion on the part of Christians in behalf of the fearful state of impenitent students. I cannot, at this distant period of eighteen years, state by whom this proposition was made, but as we looked to brother Cornelius as a leader in those meetings, I am induced to attribute it to him. We accordingly agreed to meet at an early hour in the morning, before prayers, in the chapel. In a short time, students began to feel anxious.

"About eighty were numbered as fruits of the revival in the institution, besides many other persons in the city. Though a number afterwards gave reason to believe they had deceived themselves, yet it was a glorious revival, and many will for ever bless God that Cornelius was there, and laboured for their salvation."

About this time, in consequence of the arrival on the shores of America of four or five natives of the Sandwich Islands, a deep interest was awakened in the minds of many Christians. The result was the formation of a foreign mission school, which owed its origin in a great measure to Mr Cornelius. He used every possible means of rousing the attention of the public to the scheme, as likely to be productive of great advantage. In the course of this year he left college, to spend a few weeks in retired study at Fairhaven, a village in the neighbourhood of Newhaven, Connecticut. Perceiving, however, that the village was destitute of the means of grace, he devoted a great part of his time to their spiritual instruction, and with such success, that many were turned from the service of sin and Satan, to the service of the living God. From the date of his conversion, indeed, down to the period of his finally leaving college, Mr Cornelius invariably spent his vacation in promoting the cause of Christ in one district or another. In the Autumn of 1815, his connection with Yale College closed, and he soon after repaired to Litchfield,

Connecticut, to avail himself of the instructions of the Rev. Dr Beecher. While residing in this place, he was mainly instrumental in the formation of a benevolent society, in connection with the female academy of the town. Once a-week he delivered a lecture to the association, and encouraged and assisted them in their endeavours to do good.

On the 4th of June 1816, Mr Cornelius was licensed to preach the Gospel. At the outset of his career in this public capacity, he met with remarkable encouragement and success. He was employed on an itinerating excursion, to solicit subscriptions and procure collections for foreign missions. The object was one which had long been dear to his heart, and he set out with peculiar ardour and enthusiasm on his benevolent work. In the course of his tour, an incident occurred which displays the fine spirit of Christian humility by which he was actuated. The individual by whom it is related, speaks in the highest terms of the manner in which Mr Cornelius discharged the trust committed to him:—

"Under this commission he preached with great acceptance, in several places in the north-western parts of Connecticut. Many individuals went from town to town to hear him; some of them exclaiming, 'he is a second Whitefield.' It was my privilege to listen to him at Norfolk. His text was Psalm lxxiv. 20. 'The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.' His discourse was in itself excellent. He gave a most striking account of the wickedness and woes of heathenism. His manner was still better. Without any appearance of wild-fire, he was wholly inflamed with his subject. Soon the flame seemed to spread through the house, and kindle every hearer. The effect was most happy. The people contributed much more than he requested. Still his discourse was probably less instructive, and less useful, than if it had been more regularly arranged, and more accurately composed. And now the question with me was, Shall I tell my young brother of his defects? Can I expect that, thus borne onward by such a tide and torrent of popularity, he will be willing to stop and listen to chilling criticisms from me, upon points of comparatively small importance? I concluded, however, that if my counsel should be rejected, the evil would be trifling; that if accepted, the advantage might be considerable. Rousing up all my courage, therefore, I told him my whole heart. Never could I wish any pupil to listen with more respectful and earnest docility, or greater desire to profit to the utmost by every remark. This was sufficient to win my heart. But this was not all. At the conclusion, he manifestly felt more gratitude than he could express. Such was the basis of our friendship—a friendship which continued rising and consolidating till the day of his death—a friendship which, I hope, is destined to flourish and ripen for ever."

The special object of the tour in which Mr Cornelius was engaged, was in support of the foreign mission schools, which, as already mentioned, were first suggested by himself. In the cause, therefore, he felt the deepest interest. On procuring, however, the requisite contributions, it was found that, instead of founding a school at Bombay under the Rev. George Hall, as was at first projected, it would be more expedient as well as practicable to establish schools in the Island of Ceylon. This plan was accordingly adopted, and hitherto it has been attended with the most marked success.

The peculiar zeal and fidelity with which Mr Cornelius prosecuted this first agency, soon led to his employment in another. A proposal was made by the Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, to establish a mission among the Cherokee Indians. For the accomplishment of this purpose, funds, of course, were required, and the prudential committee appointed Mr Cornelius to solicit subscriptions, in support of an establishment for the education of the children of the Indian tribes.

Throughout this tour, which he commenced in January 1817, he met with the most cordial reception and the most flattering encouragement. The most lively interest was every where evinced in behalf of the great object which he was employed in advocating. And even from the officers of government he received warm assurances of friendship and co-operation. "Fifteen thousand dollars a-year," said one of them, "is nothing to this nation, compared to the great interest of civilization and humanity, which I fondly hope could be effectually secured by the judicious application of it in the education of our children of the forests." Thus encouraged, Mr Cornelius proceeded on his journey, pleading the cause of the Indians wherever he found an opportunity. The description which he gives in his journal of various scenes and incidents, is remarkably interesting. We select, as a specimen, his visit to the house of a Cherokee chief—

"On Wednesday, the following day, we went to meet a council of chiefs, to be convened at the house of Charles H., about fifteen miles distant. We rode ten miles, and tarried all night at an Indian house, where we were kindly furnished with such things as it afforded. A bed was thrown upon the floor, upon which we slept comfortably, and in the morning we pursued our journey to the house of Mr H., where we arrived in time to take breakfast with him and the Indian chiefs. The whole scene was to me new, and as interesting as new. In the first place, I was surprised in finding the Indians so comfortable in their circumstances. Of Mr H. I had been told much by my brethren, and I can say, although my expectations were high, they were fully realized. He is a half-bred Cherokee, about fifty years of age. He has very pleasant features, and an intelligent countenance. He speaks the English language with the utmost facility, and with great propriety. I was exceedingly surprised that a Cherokee should be able to obtain so extensive a knowledge of English words as he possesses. He reads better than one-half the white people, and writes an easy hand. For thirty years, he has been, as occasions required, an interpreter for the United States. As a man of integrity, temperance, and intelligence, he has long sustained a most reputable character. Some time since, he made a public profession of the Christian religion, and united himself to the Church under the care of the Rev. John Gambold, the Missionary of the United Brethren, who has for a number of years been labouring in this nation. Since that time, Mr H. has exhibited a character according to the Gospel, and given evidence, which none can resist, that an Indian bosom can become a habitation for the Holy Spirit, and the seat of true Christian felicity. How cheering must be the reflection to the mind of the dear servant of Christ who was instrumental in his conversion to God, that he has, through the favour of heaven, hidden a multitude of sins, and saved a soul from death! Mr H. has taken great pains to educate his children, and bring them up in the practice of the arts of civilized life. He has two sons who read, and write, and speak the English language, and I could not but feel greatly animated to hear the sound of the wheel and the shuttle from the hand of his daughters. This house is built after the manner of the houses of the white people, and better than the habitations generally are in the settlements. It is made of hewn pine logs, is twenty-six feet by eighteen, two stories high, with a double piazza the whole length of the house, ornamented with hand-rails and banisters, and covered with a good roof of shingles, which is not usually the fact in the western country. He possesses the affection and confidence of his countrymen to a high degree, and lately has been promoted to the highest station but one in the nation, that of second chief, or beloved man. Indeed I can truly say, I have seldom been so happily disappointed as I have been in meeting such an Indian as Mr H. I wish all the incredulous people of our country could but see what I have seen in this man, and I think they must blush to say, as I have often heard them say, 'There is something in an Indian wholly peculiar, which will for ever render it impossible either to civilize or Christianize him!' In the case of Mr H. this proposition, in both its parts, is proved false. I have but one subtraction to make from the high character which I think is justly due to Mr H., and even this is less in him than in others who cannot plead as he can; when probably he first owned a slave, that he had not the same knowledge of moral truth as they. Although he is humane to his slaves, a few only of whom he owns, I cannot but say, I should regard him as more deserving of Christian approbation, if he had not acted towards his fellow-creatures in bondage."

After having completed the term of his agency in behalf of the Indians, Mr Cornelius returned to Andover, and on the 28th September 1818, he was married to Miss Mary Hooker, eldest daughter of the Rev. Amos Hoeker, formerly of Goshen, Connecticut. He has devoted himself for several months to the study of theology, and occasionally assisted on the Sabbath some of the neighbouring ministers, particularly the Rev. Dr Worcester of Salem, to whose congregation his services were peculiarly acceptable. The sequel of this Sketch we reserve for our next Number.

THE EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRANCE.

No. VIII.

BY THE REV. JOHN G. LORIMER,
Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

THE next feature which I shall mention in the character of the Protestant Church of France, indicative of its decided Christianity in the ninety years of the reign of the Edict of Nantes, was her anxiety for peace among Christians at home, and union and co-operation among Churches of Christ abroad. There is no call addressed to Christians, more frequent or earnest, than to be in mind and affection. Compliance with it is one of the best evidences of genuine religion. But the reader does not need to be reminded that, to the reproach of Christians, in every age of the Church, the calls have been less attended to. Though, in the fertility of a fallen world, and in the identity of the leading views and hopes, as well as the authority of their Master, Christians have the strongest motives to unity and peace; yet such is the imperfection of their attainments in a present life,—such the power of remaining depravity, that the history of the Christian Church has too often been the history of discord and alienation. Those who should have been united brethren, have been separated as if they were enemies, and that upon inconsiderable points. In saying this, I am far from meaning to join in the immoderate cry of the perpetual war among Christians, and of the impossibility of showing dissension in society, and of the impossibility and so much strife, of ascertaining what is truth, and of the supreme value of peace, no matter what its kind or foundation. I have no sympathy with such a spirit. It is exaggerated and unreasonable, and proceeds upon false and dangerous grounds. Infidels as really differ from each other, and sometimes as hotly, as any Christians do. The points in which Christians are at one are far more numerous and important than those in which they are at variance, and the superior moment of these points to any about which mere men of the world are concerned is the very reason why contests among Christians are so many and long continued. It is easy to have peace and agreement where a mind is dealing about what it considers comparative trifles. But while I hold the objections of infidels against Christianity, from the divisions and discord of Christians, to be utterly unreasonable, and that they themselves are inexcusable in the sight of God, I desire not to be blind to the existence and the evils of that religious dissension which has prevailed so widely in the Christian Church. It dishonours the name of Christ, and reproaches his Gospel,—weakens the influence of Christians, abridges their resources for the good of others, and so hardens the ungodly against the truth, that the Saviour expressly assures us till his followers are “one” the world will not believe the Father has sent him, indubitable as may be the evidences of his divine mission. Most mischievously as separation and strife among Christians may have wrought, we are not to imagine that such an unhappy experience has been uniform and unbroken. There have been periods, rare alas! but real, when Christians generally have been united in understanding and heart, and made it their study and prayer to diffuse abroad the blessings of a universal religious concord. Such was the case with the Christians of the earlier apostolic days, of whom it is recorded, that they were of “one heart.” This was the fruit of their living Christianity; and indeed the more simple and sincere one’s religion is, the stronger will be his love of peace. It is when the cold, and the selfish, and the self-righteous obtain an influential place in a man’s religion, that he will be most ready to quarrel with his Christian brother, and to treat him injuriously. The force of violent persecution, too, from without, has frequently concurred, with the presence of true Christianity within, in bringing about harmony and love. In seasons of trial, Christians individually and as churches are driven together; they become better acquainted with each other; points of inferior moment, which separated them, are sunk, and thus union is created. It is humbling to think that nothing short of persecution should avail to teach Christian love; but such seems to be one of God’s great intentions in permitting persecution, and both in primitive times, and in the early days of the Protestant Church of France, such seems, in part at least, to have been its operation.

Though the motive may have been mingled, I am happy in being able to refer the infidel, the scoffer, and the worldly, to indubitable proofs that all Christians are not, as they allege, given to strife, and division, and hatred: that the Gospel is the grand healer of the dissension which obtains between man and man, and that if they would have the peace and charity which they professedly love so much, they must have recourse to that maligned doctrinal Christianity for which the primitive Christians and the early French Protestants were distinguished.

To allude, in the first place, to the anxiety which the Protestant Church of France manifested for peace and unity in her own borders, we have a striking illustration in the proceedings of the Synod of Privas in 1612. It would seem that, in spite of all the motives to union which a state of partial persecution supplied, considerable division prevailed among the Protestants of France. It does not very clearly appear what was the cause; probably it was the effect of the decrees of their Popish enemies, who laboured to sow discord among the Protestants, as one of the ways of weakening their power. Whatever might be the cause, as soon as the Church was generally aware of the evil, her representative body, the Synod, drew up a long and earnest recommendation, entitled “The Act of Reunion,” in which all the members of the Church, and especially those in influential situations, are called upon to exert themselves with all zeal and affection to bring about complete and universal harmony. Men of infidel leanings have alleged that Christians delight in strife and war, and have turned this as an argument against Christianity; but not to inquire whether multitudes of those whom they account Christians are really so, and deserve any weight in the question, let the following sentences, from the act of the Synod of Privas, be considered, and then let the reader judge whether true Christianity holds any connection with dissension and warfare:—“The present National Synod of the Reformed Churches in this kingdom desiring to secure the peace and union of the said Churches, and inflamed with the zeal of God’s house and glory, and grieved to see Satan sowing the seeds of discord amongst us, which redound to the weakening and infamy of said Churches, and may, in after times, produce worse and more dangerous effects, moved with charity towards the members of our body, and being willing to make some provision for a fraternal concord, the indispensable duty of all the faithful, hath, and doth now resolve to exert itself, even unto the utmost, for the compassing of a blessed and holy peace and reunion among ourselves, under their Majesties’ authority.” All persons are exhorted to labour that the memory of past differences be buried in oblivion, and that all may become peace-makers, “that so the several humours, and different opinions risen up in the Assembly of Saumur, may be balanced, allayed, and composed.” With this view, several gentlemen of the highest rank, lords and dukes (for the Protestant Church could still boast of some of the first families,) were appointed to confer with a committee of the Synod, and with the Government, being first exhorted to lay aside their own differences and resentments, and then do what in them lay to remove the misapprehensions and prejudices of others; and for the better prosecution of this great and good object, the Synod promises to defray any necessary expenses which might be incurred.

Nothing can be more beautiful or earnest than some of the concluding sentences of the act of Synod: “Moreover, this Assembly entreatheth and exhorteth that, for God’s sake and glory of his great name, and their own salvation, and the peace and welfare of the nation; yes, it adjures, by all that is desirable or commendable, the whole body of our communion in general, and every faithful soul in particular, to divest themselves of all animosities whatsoever, and to lop off immediately all dissolutions and dissensions, lest they should be the causes of the dissipation of the churches of God in this kingdom, which have been planted in the blood of infinite martyrs, and preserved by the zeal and concord of our fathers; and that they would at length open their eyes, and see and consider that their churches’ enemies bottom all their designs of ruining us upon our own intestine dissensions, and that, by reason of these, we are become very little and exceeding despicable with our adversaries; and all pastors and elders of churches are enjoined diligently to procure the reunion of the respective members of their flocks, and to lend one another their helping hand to effect so good a work, and mightily to insist upon it in their public sermons and private exhortations and remonstrances.”

Do these things look like indifference to peace? Do they show any love for discord and war? Men, indeed, may be closely united, especially in public objects, and yet be strangers to Christian peace and love. The members of the Church of Rome are an illustration of this; but the French Protestants were animated by Christian motives. They contended for union, not to subvert the interests of party, but for the sake of the Divine glory, and for the wider diffusion of divine truth.

Secondly, Those who were so anxious for union at home, and among themselves, could not be insensible to its claims and advantages among Christian Churches at a distance, and so the Christians of France were most desirous of fraternal correspondence with foreign Churches. They did not, at a time when intercourse with other nations was much more difficult than it is now, think it enough to care for themselves. They comprehended other Christians, though not at one with them in all the external forms of religion, in their sympathy and affection. So early as 1603, we find the Synod of Gap despatching letters to the orthodox universities of Germany, England, Scotland, Geneva, Basil, and Leyden, and to certain gentlemen in London, entreating them to assist in holding a conference with the Lutheran Churches of Germany, that so the schism between them and the Church of France might be removed. Princes also are entreated to assist in effecting this holy union. The great desire is, that all may be more firmly united in the confession of the same doctrine. Four years later, and in furtherance of this object, there are letters from the Prince Palatine and the Ecclesiastical senate of the palatinate, the University of Heidelberg, Synods of Holland and Zealand, the Canton of Bern, and Church of Geneva. These all showing sincere affection for the end in view, the French Synod render most hearty thanks to God, and earnestly hope that, in reward of their perseverance, the Lord will be graciously pleased to touch the hearts of those who yet dissent from and disagree. "And all persons are exhorted to be mighty wrestlers with God, in humble and ardent prayers, that it may be effected." In 1614 the King of Great Britain, by a Mr Hume, a native of Scotland, who had been for some years a minister of the Church of France, sent a letter to the Synod meeting at Tonniere, strongly advising them to procure and maintain a firm union in points of doctrine among the pastors, professors, and other members of the French Church, and not to quarrel with the divines of Germany, or any others. Instead of taking amiss this advice from a foreigner, the Synod humbly accepted and rejoiced in it, and drew up a long chapter entitled, "Expedients for reuniting the Christian Churches which have shook off the Papal yoke, and for composing the differences which are already risen, or may hereafter rise up among them." They speak of a union and agreement between Churches as a most useful, pious, and necessary work, and very feasible, and the differences between them as consisting, not in fundamental articles of faith, but "in the quillets of ceremonies and church government." They propose that a conference should be held of good men, of different Churches and nations, to decide on the terms of union, and that they should begin their labours by partaking together of the Lord's Supper, and calling for a universal fast throughout the churches, "in order to the drawing down of the blessing of God upon it, and to touch the hearts of the people with respect and reverence for it." They propose that sectarian names of distinction, such as Lutheran, Calvinist, Sacramentarian, should be utterly abolished, and that the Churches should be known by the name of the Christian Reformed Churches; and farther, and as the chief recommendation, they propose that, at certain times, there should be an interchange of ministerial services between the pastors of the different Churches, as at present subsists betwixt the Church of Scotland and the Presbyterian Church of Ireland.

Many imagine that the early Protestant Churches were bigots to their own forms; had no sympathy with other Christians, unless in every point they reflected their own image; and that Christians of the present day are much more liberal and reasonable in their respects than their fathers. But this is a misapprehension. The early Protestants, whether Calvinists or Lutherans, were much too warm in their religious stand highly upon forms. It is generally a cold and declining period of the Church which makes relaxations consist in points of external ceremonial. Accordingly, the Church of France, though Presbyterian, was ready to embrace the Lutherans of Germany with open arms; and hence we have the following deliverance of the second Synod of Charenton in 1631, more than two hundred years ago, in a chapter styled, "An Act in favour of the Lutheran Brethren." "This Synod declareth, that inasmuch as the Churches of the Confession of Augsburg do agree with the other reformed Churches in the principal and fundamental points of true religion, and that there is neither superstition nor idolatry in their worship, the faithful of said Confession, who, with a spirit of love and peaceableness, do join themselves to the communion of our Churches in this kingdom, may be, without any abjuration or a made by them, admitted unto the Lord's table with us, and as sureties may present children unto baptism; they promising the Consistory that they will not solicit them, either directly or indirectly, to transgress the doctrine believed and professed in our Churches, but will be content to instruct and educate them in those points and articles which are in common between us and them, and wherein both the Lutherans and we are unanimously agreed." Had such a spirit as this been transmitted to after generations, we would not have been so familiar, as we unhappily are, with separation and exclusion among Christian Churches which hold the same great confession of doctrine and duty; nor would Christians only be beginning to think of the obligations of union. The Protestant Church of France did not confine herself to strong recommendations of peace and union with foreign Churches. These are interesting illustrations of her spirit; but she embodied her sentiments in action. She gladly numbered the ministers of several foreign Churches among her own, and allotted them a sphere of labour within her borders. We read of not less than three ministers of the Church of Scotland being at the same period ministers of the Church of France. So early as 1607, Mr Prosper, a native of this country, was minister of Bourdeaux. On presenting letters from the magistrates and ministers of Edinburgh, and also from the king of Great Britain, to the Synod of Rochelle, praying that he might be released from his charge in France, and restored to the Church of Edinburgh, the Synod earnestly entreated him to consider well all the circumstances, "and to have a tender care and respect to the Church of Bourdeaux, which, by his most fruitful preaching and exemplary godly conversation, had been exceedingly edified." He promised not to move till he saw Bourdeaux better supplied. Mr John Weick, the celebrated son-in-law of the still more celebrated James Knox, was another of the ministers of the Church of Scotland, who became a minister of the Church of France. His services also were gladly received, and highly appreciated. From a short History of his "Life and Sufferings," I extract the following interesting sentences:—"Now the time is come he must leave Scotland, and never to see it again. So, upon the 7th of November 1606, in the morning, he, with his servants, took ship at Leith; and though it was but ten o'clock in the morning, many were waiting on, with their afflicted families, to bid them farewell. After prayer, they sung the 23d Psalm; and so, with a great grief of the spectators, set sail for the south of France, and landed in the river of Bourdeaux. With fourteen weeks of his arrival, such was the Lord's blessing upon his diligence, he was able to preach a French, and accordingly was speedily called to the ministry, first in one village, and then in another. One of them was Nerc, and thereafter settled in St. Jean d'Angely, a considerable walled town, and there he continued the rest of the time which he sojourned in France, which was about sixteen years." Mr David Hume, pastor of the Church of Duras in France, we have seen, was, in 1614, the bearer of a letter from James VI. to the Synod of Tonniens. He also was a native of Scotland, and seems to have been on a visit to his native country when he received the royal commission.

Nor did the Protestant Church of France only avail herself, with all gladness, of the services of foreign ministers; she was not backward, in return, to lend ministers of her own number to those foreign Churches which needed their aid. We read, in 1620, of the Prince of Orange, and the curators of the university of Leyden, applying for M. Rivett, a French minister, to act as professor of divinity, either for life, or till the next meeting of Synod. The Synod of Alez gave their judgment on the request in these words.—"This Assembly, highly valuing the favour and honour of such an illustrious prince, and his great merits, from all the reformed Churches, and that most strict and entire union betwixt the holy Churches of the Netherlands and ours of France, doth yield that the said M. Rivett shall be continued for two years more unto the famous university of Leyden, which term being expired, he shall return to his Church, according to the agreement passed between them."

Such are a few illustrations of the spirit of the early Protestant Church of France; and surely there is nothing in it which savours of the bigoted and exclusive, far less of the bitter and hateful. It is throughout the spirit of peace, and love, and union among all the followers of Christ,—a spirit far superior to that which is entertained and manifested by not a few professedly Christian Churches at the present day.

I need not say any thing, as on former occasions, of the character exhibited by the Church of Scotland in the parallel period of her history. It were easy to show that her love of peace and union at home and abroad was not inferior to that of the Church of France. Her enlarged and generous views of the true nature of the Church of Christ, as discovered in her early standards—the deep interest which she took in the welfare of foreign Churches, though their forms might not all accord with her own, as discovered in her early history, are well known to those who have made the Church of Scotland, even partially, a subject of study. All show the depth of her piety, and rebuke the sweeping charges brought by the friends of infidelity against the peaceable character of Christianity and of Christian Churches. But a vast deal remains to be done in all the Churches of the Reformation before their members shall see eye to eye, and the peace of Jerusalem be universally established. The God of truth has promised, and will accomplish the promise in his own good time. Let us join our prayers for the fulfilment, with those of the ascended Saviour. Jesus said, "I pray for those that shall believe on me through thy (his disciples) word, that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

THE MEANS OF A REVIVAL OF RELIGION: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JAMES BURNS, A.M.,
One of the Ministers of Brechin.

"Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee?"—PSALM LXXXV. 6.

GOD can revive religion when it is at a low ebb, or he can implant it in hearts where it never was before. "With him all things are possible." He can do this with or without the use of means, as seemeth to him best: for "the hearts of all men are in his hands, to turn them whithersoever he pleaseth." By a power and grace which are irresistible, he can lead those who formerly hated and disobeyed him, to love and serve him alone. Not by forcing them against their wills, but by bending the will in a gentle yet efficacious manner, "He makes his people willing in the day of his power." Sometimes the change is very remarkable, and evident to all who knew the person before. When the thoughtless become devout, when the dissipated become sober, and the deceiver learns to speak truth to his neighbour, there is a presumption that a change has been wrought in the heart; for "a tree is known by its fruits." Most frequently the change takes place in a gradual way; and therefore less remarkable, although not less real and effectual. But while God is an absolute Sovereign, "who gives not an account of his matters," and who works when and upon whomsoever he pleaseth, he generally makes use of means, for beginning, and for carrying on the good work of grace or holiness in the hearts and lives of men. At any rate, duty is ours. It belongs to us, as rational creatures, to employ the means which he hath appointed in his Word, and which he hath promised to bless, for promoting the interest of religion in ourselves, and in others around us. More particularly,

I. In order to a revival, let each attend to personal religion. The flourishing of true religion in an age or place, depends entirely, it is plain, on its flourishing in the hearts and lives of individuals. If each were enabled to effect the reformation of one, that is, of himself, the reformation would be universal. It does not require words to show, that this is of the highest importance. For whether we consider the present peace, and comfort, and future happiness of individuals themselves, or the harmony and real benefit of society, both religious and civil, such a revival is devoutly to be desired. Every man must bear his own burden. Each of us ought to consider his own spiritual and eternal well-being as his chief concern. Whatever our state and character be, whether that of saints or of sinners, of renewed or unrenewed men, a revival is necessary. Therefore, ye who call yourselves Christians, think not of standing still. Rest not in any acquirement already made. Remember your state is a warfare, a race, a journey, a fight, in which continual exertion and despatch are needful. Be careful in using that exertion and despatch. No man has a right to be idle,—no real Christian can be idle. He has "a great work to do," even "the working out his own salvation with fear and trembling," with humility and watchfulness, lest he should come short of "the prize of his high calling." If lazy wishes, and feeble desires, would bring a man to heaven, then it would be a well-peopled region. But if it is necessary to "strive to enter in at the strait gate," to "fight the good fight of faith," to "wrestle not only with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers," to "be fervent in spirit serving the Lord;" this should lead many of us to suspect we are not on the right road. It should stir up the most diligent and conscientious to seek a revival and a quickening, to seek to have our hearts more engaged about God and another world, about the spiritual and eternal good of our own souls. Christians! it should lead you to be more "instant in prayer;" more watchful and circumspect in your whole conduct; more on your guard against being led aside by the frowns or by the allurements of the world; more sensible of your own weakness, and of the need of renewed supplies of grace to help, to animate, and quicken you, "in the good and holy ways of God." Ye, again, who "are stout-hearted, and far from righteousness," who are conscious you are not making a real business of religion, that you have hardly a credible profession of it, who are all alive and active about your worldly affairs, but dull and lukewarm about your souls and eternity, one would think it would be easy to convince you of the need of a revival, or rather of a thorough change of state, and yet God alone, by his Spirit, I well know, can convince you of it. But, as reasonable and accountable creatures, we would beseech and charge you, to bestow some thought and consideration on the state of your souls. Fall down before "the throne of grace," and implore of the God and Father of Christ Jesus, that forgiveness, that acceptance, and that grace, which can alone quicken your dead souls, and infuse spiritual life into them. This is the only safe course—this is the new covenant way of salvation, by which alone any can be freed from the lost state into which all are brought by the breach of the first covenant. In this way alone spiritual life will be implanted within you. Being implanted, it will grow and flourish by the same means by which it begins, by continued believing application to the blood of righteousness and grace of Christ Jesus, "in whom it hath pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell." But until it be implanted, it is in vain to speak of a revival, "therefore, awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light and life."

II. Another principal means of a revival of religion is a serious attention to the spiritual concerns of others. Although the concerns of our own souls claim our first and chief attention, yet that attention ought not, and it will not exclude concern about those of our fellow-creatures. When we have learned to set a high value on our own souls, this will show us, at the same time, the worth of the souls of others. The spirit of the Gospel is a liberal spirit. It is the very opposite of that of wicked Cain, who said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" It will lead us to "look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." More particularly, attention to the spiritual concerns of a rising generation will assume a high importance in the view of him who is anxious about the revival of "pure and undefiled religion." Here I must be understood as speaking especially to parents and masters, and teachers, who have the charge of youth committed to them. They are the fathers of the next generation. It depends very much on them whether religion shall revive and flourish, or whether it shall decay, in the succeeding age. Nothing would bid fairer for causing religion to flourish, both now and in the next generation, than for those who have the special charge of youth, to give them a truly religious education, to employ them often in reading the Word of God, to teach them to pray to God themselves, to accustom them to reverence the Sabbath, and to attend the house of God, to communicate plain and familiar advice on all occasions. Thus religion ought not so much to be learned as a set task, which is often dry and irksome, but ought to enter into every thing, into the conversation and the whole behaviour of parents and masters, that youth may be gradually, and as it were, insensibly trained up in the knowledge and practice of it. This is what God by Moses enjoined on the Israelites, as to his laws and ordinances: "Thou shalt speak of them to thy children, when thou sittest in thine house, when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up."

III. Conscientious attendance on the ordinances of religion may be mentioned as another means of a revival. It is good "to wait at the gates, and to watch at the posts of her doors." A blessing may be sent when persons least expect or desire it. For "with God all things are possible." But as long as there is only a customary, formal, outward attendance, no good can be expected. While men satisfy themselves with a partial attendance, admitting nothing as an excuse for their absence, or while they attend the house of God merely because they have been accustomed to do so, or imagine their duty done when they have gone through the outward round, these things show that religion is at a low ebb in their hearts, or rather that there is no true religion there at all. But, on the other hand, when a sense of duty leads us to stand when, like Cornelius and his friends, "we are here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded us of God," when we desire "of giving glory to God, and of getting good to our own souls, then a revival of religion may be expected, or rather it is already begun. And whenever a good work is begun in any soul, it will be performed unto the day of Christ." The Word of God is the grand means of quickening the souls, and of reviving those who are languishing and decaying. David often prays, especially in Psalm cxix., to "be quickened according to God's word," and "according to his loving-kindness." To be instrumental in this work is the most precious sign of the ministry of the Gospel. While the means of it, the enemies of the Gospel, are sometimes been cut to the heart, and constrained to cry out, "What shall we do to be saved?" it is more especially designed for the perfecting of the saints, and for edifying the body of Christ; for building up his Church and people in faith, and holiness, and comfort, unto eternal life. When ministers are enabled to be plain, and faithful, and earnest in declaring the truths of God, "speaking from the heart," evidently feeling the influence of the truth on their own hearts, God sometimes, in a remarkable manner and degree, revives his work in the hearts of men, gives testimony to the word of his grace, and "turns the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." The seed of the Word must be carefully sown; it must be watered by the prayers, if not by the tears also, of those who preach and of those who hear it, if we would expect it to spring up plentifully, and bring forth fruit unto perfection.

IV. Another means of a revival will be, the friends of religion associating more together. There has always been, and ever will be, a real marked distinction between the servants of God and the men of this world. In some states of society such discrimination is not so visible as it ought to be. This is likely to happen, and in fact it does happen, in outwardly peaceable times, such as those in which we live. Times of severe persecution make a discovery of persons and character, to what side they belong. Cold and false-hearted professors "go back, and walk no more with Jesus," when "persecution ariseth because of the word." There is made a visible separation betwixt the precious and the vile. Men either continue firm and united in their attachment to Christ, or they revolt, and return to their former sinful habits and practices. Yet, in every state of society, the genuine followers of Christ ought to seek out and countenance one another. This would afford mutual aid and encouragement to themselves, and enable them more steadily to stand their ground against the attacks of the enemies of them and of their religion. High as was the station which David occupied, yet, says he, "I am a companion of all them that fear thee." It is a part, indeed, of the character of the citizen of Zion,—“He honoureth them that fear the Lord,”—and, while the friends of religion ought chiefly to associate with each other, (excepting in the ordinary business of this world, in which they must meet with persons of every character, otherwise "they must needs go out of the world,") it becomes them to converse together, "to take sweet counsel together" concerning the things of their souls, and of eternity. It is represented by the prophet Malachi as a promising sign of the flourishing state of religion, when "they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." This is a well-known passage for encouragement of occasional, and also of stated, meetings for religious conversation and devotion. As to worldly business, whatever men are in earnest about, they associate, they converse together concerning it; so will it be with religion,—“the one thing needful.” Such associations are at once a happy mean of reviving its interests, and a proof or effect of such a revival. They have generally, I may say always, been found to prevail where religion flourishes, and to be neglected where it is decaying; only, in managing them, much prudence, much humility, much forbearance, much circumspection of conduct, is absolutely necessary,—the deportment of each will be narrowly watched, and any inconsistency will be eagerly discovered and magnified by the lukewarm, and by the profane. I only add,

V. That prayer to God for a revival is a divinely appointed mean for this purpose. This is the means which is used by the Psalmist, in name of the Church, in our text, as well as in many other places, "Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee;"—"Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."—"Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men"—“Appear in thy glory, and build up Zion.” It is God alone, as we formerly observed, who can effectually begin, or promote, a revival of the interests of true godliness. But, it is in the use of means that he generally works. Hence, we have mentioned a variety of means which it becomes us to use. It is the blessing alone which can render any means successful. Prayer is the appointed channel in which this blessing flows. Much is spoken in Scripture of its efficacy: "Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit." Prayer engages Jehovah in behalf of the believing and humble petitioner. Whatever he hath promised, he hath added, "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." Peculiar promises are given to the united social prayers of God's people. Hence, said our Lord himself, "Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven; for where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This is an evident, strong encouragement to congregations, and lesser societies, to unite in solemn believing prayer to the Great Disposer of all Events,—to "the God of the spirits of all flesh," who "hath the hearts of all men in his hands." This is always in the power of the meanest and most obscure worshipper of God. The throne of grace is ever ready of access,—“God’s ear is never heavy that it cannot hear” the supplication and intercession of “his own elect, who cry day and night unto him.” Those who have little or nothing of worldly substance, or influence, or personal exertion, to contribute in promoting the cause of religion, have this, at least, in their power,—to recommend “the cause that is His own,” to the countenance and blessing of Him who rules in the world and in the Church, and over the hearts and ways of men. Let none stand by, and say, We can do nothing in the cause of God: every one has the power, if he has but the will, to study personal religion, and to address the throne of grace. While to this there is every encouragement, on the one hand, there are on the other, heavy denunciations of divine vengeance on the neglect of it; for thus we read in the Book of Judges, “Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty.”

OUR LORD’S INSTRUCTIONS AT A PRIVATE ENTERTAINMENT.

From the Second Volume of “Eastern Manners,” by the Rev. Robert Jamieson, Minister of Westruther.

THE parables of the wedding-feast, (Luke xiv. 7,) of the entertainment to the poor, and of the great supper, were delivered on a Sabbath evening to a dinner party in the house of a man of rank and opulence. These narratives, the object of which was to inculcate the practice of humility and charity, were suggested by the society in which our Lord found himself; and what would have been altogether out of place had the speaker been sitting at the humble board of a Peter or a John, was perfectly suitable to the place and time, and adapted to the manners of the grandees, of whom this company was exclusively composed. The first relates to a disposition which has always prevailed in the East to attach the greatest importance to the distinction of places occupied by the respective guests at an entertainment. The scrupulous exactness with which all the individuals in a crowded assembly are arranged in the order of precedence according to rank, character, or official station; the discomfort betrayed by many if they are not promoted to their proper station, and the longing eyes which others cast to the seats of honour and preference, are apt to raise a smile on the countenances of those to whom such a style of manners is unknown. But it is so prominent and universal a feature in the customs of the East, that all travellers, who have mingled in society there, have remarked it and related many amusing anecdotes, which amply show the propriety of our Lord’s advice to the Pharisee and his guests. “When a Persian,” says Morier, “enters an assembly, he makes the usual salutation of ‘Peace be unto you,’ and then measuring with his eye the degree of rank to which he holds himself entitled, he straightway wedges himself into the line of guests, without offering any apology for the general disturbance he produces. It may be conceived, that among a vain people, the disputes that arise about precedence are numerous; and it was easy to observe, by the countenances of those present, when any one had taken a higher seat than that to which he was entitled. The master of the entertainment has, however, the privilege of placing any one as high in the ranks of the assembly as he may choose; and we saw an instance of it on this occasion, for when the assembly was nearly full, the governor of Kasban, a man of humble mien, although of considerable rank, came and had seated himself at the lowest place,” when Ameen-ad-Dowlah, after having testified his particular attentions to him by numerous expressions of welcome, pointed with his hand to an upper seat in the assembly to which he desired him to move, and which he accordingly did.”† Another traveller mentions his having unconsciously offended the son of his host, by sitting higher up the room than the youth was, though on opposite side of the table;‡ and a third states, that at a wedding-feast which he attended in the house of a Greek merchant at Jean d’Acre, two persons who were seated themselves at the top were noticed by the master of ceremonies, and obliged to move lower down. The Pharisees, like the mollahs or scribes of modern Persia, were particularly remarkable for their arrogance in coveting and occupying the uppermost seats; an anecdote is related of one of their order, at a banquet given by Agrippa in his palace, rushing up to the head of the table, and placing himself in the middle between that monarch and his royal consort, and in his defence the traditional saying, that of a king a wise man, the wise man was the greater.†† A manifestation of this unseemly strife for distinguished seats our Lord had witnessed among the guests at the rich Pharisee; and if he had seated himself at the lowest part of the table, the general reproof of their pride and ambition which thereby conveyed, may be more easily conceived than described.

The second parable (Luke xiv. 12,) delivered to a select company was designed to inculcate the practice of charity in preference to spending their fortunes in a luxurious living. And the substance of this story, that a man of rank and affluence, instead of inviting only his rich friends, and entertaining them in a sumptuous manner, the only result of which would be to secure invitations from them, should provide entertainment for the poor and destitute of every description, thus earn for himself a purer and higher satisfaction than what the most luxurious table can possibly give. The address of such an admonition to a company who regarded our Lord with no friendly feelings, would not have been received with open ridicule and contempt, but not been grounded on a custom well known and common in the East. There, contrary as it is to all the ideas of propriety, men of rank frequently admit their inferiors to their society, and entertain them at their houses; and on whatever principles it may be accounted for, whether it proceed from ostentation, or from a sense of the sacred duty of hospitality, or from the universal custom of not preserving fragments from one meal to another, the grandees of all eastern countries gratify themselves by occasionally inviting to their tables the meanest and most wretched objects that are within reach of their call. Sir John Malcolm relates that a friend of his who was breakfasting one morning with the late prime minister of Persia, was surprised to hear him bid a poor man who had called to see a pair of slippers, sit down at the table, and take breakfast with the party, and they would talk about the purchase afterwards.‡‡ Richardson says, that Effendi, head of the mosque in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, has stated periods of the year for making a feast to the poor. (*) And Pococke mentions, that entertainment given by the governor of an Egyptian age, the guests rose up in succession as they were seated, till, when all had done, the poor were admitted to eat up what remained.* Similar to this account Dr Pococke's, is the testimony of Dr Richardson in regard to a feast to which he was invited in the house of Lord Belmore, at a Shiek's house in Palestine. In all the guests of first quality were satisfied, some respectable people were admitted; and while some portions were carried off to the members of the household who could not appear, there were still many fragments which the poor were invited to partake of. But a circumstantial description of this practice is given by Roberts, whose account of it is so lively and interesting, that we subjoin it in his own words. "When Eastern grandees have resolved on making a feast for one or two hundred poor guests, he despatches messengers into the lanes and the streets to inform the intent, that on such a day rice and curry will be given to all who are there at the appointed time. Long before the hour, the visitors may be seen hending their backs towards the house of the noblemen,—there goes an old man who is scarcely able to move his palsied legs,—there the widow moves her hesitating step,—there the objects, suffering under every disease of our nation, congregated together, without a single tie of connection except the one which occupies their expectations. The food is ready, the guests are ranged in rows on the grass, and the servants begin to hand out portions in order. Such is the hunger of some, they cannot stay to let the mess cool; others, on account of disease or age has made a fatal inroad, can scarcely lift it to their mouths. What a strange scene, to see a bawling for more food, though they are already gorged to the full, others are talking of another feast which is to be given in another village on the morrow, while others, who have got a sight of the benefactor, are applauding his generosity, and pouring the usual eulogium into his ears."†

* It was considered one of the highest marks of respect for the master of the house to desire any man to take the place first in the couch next himself: and Josephus relates a striking specimen of the treachery of Herod, that he secured his throne by giving him the first place at feasts.—Antiquities of the Jews, b. xv. 2.

The third parable (Luke xiv. 15.) was pronounced in reply to one of the company, who, charmed with the picture which Jesus had drawn of humility, charity, benevolence, expatiated on the enviable blessedness of those who should live under that kingdom of God, and these amiable virtues should universally prevail. The design of the story was to show, that multitudes who evinced an ardent desire for that kingdom, were under the influence of many prejudices that would prevent them from entering it. This observation was conveyed, as usual, when he spoke disagreeable truths, in an indirect and inoffensive form of a narrative, denegating the preparations made by a man of wealth for a splendid entertainment to his friends, and the different circumstances of which are all borrowed from the forms of courtesy observed in the East on such occasions. When a person of respectable rank of society proposes to celebrate a feast in his house, he forthwith circulates invitations to the friends he wishes to be of the party, either by cards or by a verbal message, carried by a servant of the house, or a strolling person hired for the purpose, and superbly decked, according to the wishes of his employer. The following is a specimen of the form of invitation: "Such a person (naming him) sends his best compliments to such another person, (naming him also,) and begs to inform him, that as to-morrow there is a little gaiety to take place in his house, he wishes his friends, by their presence, to grace the occasion with their feet the house of this poor individual, and thereby make it a garden of roses, he trusts they will positively come, and honour the humble dwelling of his company."‡ Having, after this fashion, gone to the invited houses, and returned with assurance from the invited friends of their intention to come next day, a messenger is again despatched for them at the appointed time, to inform them that all the preparations for the banquet are completed. This second invitation is included by our Lord, and is very characteristic of Eastern manners. When Sir John Malcolm was invited to dine with the eldest son of the Shah, the invitation was given two days before; and one of the prince's attendants was despatched at the hour appointed for the banquet, to tell him that all things were ready. And Morier also informs us, that having been engaged to dine with a Persian Khan, he did not go till his entertainer had sent to the English ambassador and his train to say that supper waited. After the same manner, the invitations to the great supper, described in the parable, seem to have been issued a considerable time before celebration; and as the after invitation was sent, according to Eastern etiquette, to the guests invited, they must be understood as having accepted the engagement, so that the apologies they severally made were inadmissible, and could be regarded in no other light than as an affront put upon the generous entertainer, and an ungrateful return for all the splendid preparations he had made for their reception.* Enraged, as he had good reason to be, at the gross misconduct of his expected guests, the master of the house issued orders to his servant to go out immediately and invite whomsoever he met in the streets and lanes of the city; for, as the sultry climate does not admit of preserving any part of their meals in the East till another day, it was necessary to throw open the doors to as many of the poor wanderers of the neighbourhood as could be procured; and as, after all,—so liberal had been the scale of preparations on which this banquet had been provided,—there was still ample room and provision for an additional number of guests, the messenger was again despatched to the hedges and trees in the outskirts of the city, and charged to employ the most pressing invitations to those, that were reposing there, to partake of the proffered hospitality of his master's house. This is the description of a purely Oriental scene. Innumerable are the passages that might be quoted from the works of travellers, both in ancient and modern times, giving an account of the straggling parties which are found at the walls of every Eastern town and village, sitting by the bubbling fountain, under the grateful shade of a tree or hedge, and taking their simple repast in that refreshing situation, in preference to all the accommodation and the luxuries the city could offer them. "Often," says Carne, "when fatigued and exhausted with riding or walking through the streets of Jerusalem in the sultry heat of the day, I have gone to the suburbs, and, throwing myself down on the carpet of verdure that was cherished by the shade of the spreading limes, have joined the parties that are always to be found there, engaged with their simple fare of bread and water, and salt;" and once, when, in such a situation, this traveller was reading beneath a palm tree, two venerable Arabs from the village came and pressed him to partake of their hospitality, under circumstances exactly the same as those that led the messenger in the parable to go to the trees and hedges in quest of guests to his master. However unlike, then, these indiscriminate invitations may be to the manners of Europe, the whole circumstances of this parable form a literal picture of the hospitality of the East, both in the earliest times and in the present day, and it is impossible not to admire the divine skill with which our Lord has made the most simple and familiar fashions

* An excuse made by one of the guests was, that he was going to prove some oxen he had bought. It is with oxen that the Orientals generally plough; and as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke is of no use, they never consider any bargain or purchase as final till they have proved it. The purchaser assembles his friends and neighbours, and, after trying the animals in their presence at the different kinds of work for which he is required, and being satisfied, he then fixes a day for settling the amount, and bringing the animal away.—ROBERTS' Oriental Illustrations.

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

No. VIII.

See LAM. i. 1-16.

In the pathetic strains above referred to, does the prophet Jeremiah mourn over the downfall of Judah and Jerusalem, when the great body of the nation was carried captive to Babylon. What a striking contrast is there between their former state, when they were exalted above the nations, when they had privileges bestowed upon them never bestowed upon the other nations, and when they enjoyed peace, prosperity, and security, under the special protection of the Lord their God,—and the state in which they were placed, when deprived of these privileges! The land, once flowing with milk and honey, the choice of all lands, abounding in flocks and herds, in vineyards, and olive yards, and in populous cities, is laid waste, the cities demolished, the fences and hedges broken down, the inhabitants taken away. It exhibits the picture of desolation. The princes, the nobles, the priests, and the people, are carried captive into a strange land. Destitute, many of them, of suitable clothing, in want of food, bereaved, in many instances, of them, of near and dear relatives and friends, exposed to the rudeness of heathen soldiery, and to the taunts and revilings of hard-hearted enemies, who had no sympathy with them in their sorrows, but rejoiced in their calamities, they were in a most wretched condition. Every feature in the picture seems dark and gloomy.

It may be thought, therefore, that, in this fourth period of the history of Israel, their seventy years captivity in Babylon, there is little inviting, encouraging, or promising, and we may be disposed to turn from so mournful and depressing a subject. It is, indeed, to be considered as one of the dark periods of their history: yet it will be found, I trust, like the other periods that have been considered, both interesting and instructive. And that a just conception may be formed of this period of their history, it may be proper to contemplate it in the following aspects.

First, Let us advert to some of the unfavourable circumstances in which they were involved, by their captivity in Babylon. They were banished from the land of their fathers. We are all naturally attached to our native land. It is endeared to us by a thousand pleasing associations: we are bound to it by the strongest ties. Even when, at the call of duty, or from an urgent necessity, we are induced to leave it for a time, still it is with painful regret; our thoughts often recur to it when we are absent; and when we are about to return, we have joy in the prospect; we anticipate the delight to be experienced in revisiting the land of our nativity; our eyes are on the outlook to discern the first glimpse of its distant hills; and when, at length, we set foot on our native soil, our hearts leap with joy; and the land is the more endeared to us, from our having been removed from it for a season. And if there be something revolting to our feelings in leaving our native land, even when we have the prospect of returning, and when our removing is our own voluntary deed; much more must it be distressing to be dragged away against our will, by the hand of relentless enemies, and with little prospect of returning to it again. And thus was it with the Israelites. Many of them, those especially advanced in life, might justly conclude, that they were bidding farewell to their beloved country. Their departure was further embittered by their being spoiled of their goods, and by their houses and lands, and vineyards and olive yards, having become a prey to their enemies.

But, above all such considerations, there was something peculiar in the nation of Israel being obliged to leave their own land, that renders the trial more severe to them than in the case of other nations. It was the land of promise which had been bestowed upon them by God himself. It was the land which he endeared to them by many signal interpositions of his providence in their behalf, which they had themselves experienced. It was the land of which they fondly believed they would have enjoyed the secure possession: and, indeed, would have been the case, had they remained faithful to their covenant engagements. Thus, in being carried away captive from the land of promise, was a severer blow to them than it would have been to other nations. They were bound to their land by stronger ties than other nations were to theirs; and, therefore, the cutting asunder those ties was proportionally more severe. It seemed almost to crush their hopes of again enjoying God's favour, which had been manifested to them for a long course of years. We can, in such circumstances, enter more deeply into the feelings of the prophet, when he appealed to those who beheld the desolation of Jerusalem: "Is there anything to you that pass by? Look and see, if there be any sorrow, like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger." It is as in every case, so more especially in the case of the people of Israel, banishment from their own country was a severe trial.

Second, Another painful consequence of their captivity in Babylon was the suspension of those religious ordinances, which they had been accustomed to observe in their own land. The temple at Jerusalem was the centre of their religious worship. Thither their people went up, at stated seasons, for the observance of their religious festivals; and these were very joyful seasons to those that feared God amongst them. As we have seen in the solemn celebration of the Passover, in the times of Hezekiah and of Josiah; and, as we learn from Psalm lxxxiv., which was probably one of the Psalms that were sung on the occasion of the tribes being assembled at Jerusalem on one or other of the festivals: "Blessed is the man whose strength is in the Lord, in whose heart are thy ways. Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools. They go on from strength to strength, every one of them appeareth before God." Psalm cxv. refers also to those stated times of assembling at Jerusalem for the worship of God: "I was glad when I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, I will build an house unto the Lord, and I will dwell in the house of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord."

But now the beautiful place, where their people were accustomed to worship, was become a desolation. Their holy vessels were taken away; the whole service of the temple was suspended; their name was called Ichabod, for the glory had departed. Instead of the joyful assemblies, where their hearts were glad, where, with the loud-sounding cymbals, and the sound of a pleasant sound, they gave thanks to God, and his mercy endureth for ever; and where, as we read, "Arise, O Lord, unto thy rest, thou, and the Lord, O Lord, unto thy strength," they were now left to weep over the desolation of their sanctuary. And when they sought a retreat from the taunts and reproaches of the spoilers by the river side, where they might have worshipped the God of their fathers, in mourning over their sins, and earnestly imploring his returning favour, in attempting to sing his praise, their voices failed, their fingers could not touch the strings of their harps. The recollection of their native land, of the joyful songs of Zion, overwhelmed them. Many fond remembrances of the joyful seasons of devotion they had merly experienced, burst upon them at once. They could proceed no further: they hanged their harps upon the willows; they wept when they remembered Zion.

Third, If the recollection of the past was thus painful to them, there were also circumstances, in the situation in which they were then placed, that were far from comfortable. There was a sad reverse in their outward circumstances. Many of them had lived in ease and affluence; and the great body of them, though not in affluence, had their patrimony handed down to them from their fathers, that made them, in a great measure, independent. But then the highest and the lowest of them were placed nearly on a level. They had been spoiled of their goods; and they depended for subsistence upon the labour of their hands, and the bounty of those who led them captive. They were obliged to associate with a people of a strange language and of strange manners. And this was more revolting to the feelings of the Jewish nation than of other nations; because they had been, for a long period, separated from the nations, and had been accustomed to look upon them as unclean. And what rendered this intercourse still more revolting to them, was their being thus called to witness their idolatrous worship, which they had been taught to consider as an abomination in the sight of God.

Again, they endured much harsh treatment from their enemies. There might be some exceptions, where they were treated with sympathy and kindness; but the general character of their treatment was that of harshness. Their enemies ruled over them with a rod of iron. They held them in derision, saying, "Where is now your God, in whom ye trusted that he would deliver you?" That this was generally the case, may be concluded from the circumstance that it is mentioned as one of the causes of God's controversy with the kingdom of Babylon, and of the destruction of that kingdom, that they had evil entreated the people of Israel. Thus the prophet addresses Babylon: "Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called the lady of kingdoms. I was wroth with my people, and gave them into thy hands. Thou didst show them no mercy; upon the ancients hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke. And thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever; so that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart, neither didst thou remember the latter end of it. Therefore hear thou this, thou that art given to pleasure, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else besides me, I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children. But these two things shall come to thee in one moment, in one day, the loss of children and widowhood. They shall come upon thee in perfection, for the multitude of thy sorceries, and the great abundance of thine enchantments."

I would further add, that a consciousness of guilt, and a feeling that the anger of God was manifested against them because of their aggravated transgressions, most of all embittered their distresses. Thus we find them, in the book of Lamentations, acknowledging that the displeasure of God against them, because of their transgressions, had brought all their calamities upon them: "Let us search and try our ways, and turn again unto the Lord. Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens. We have transgressed, and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned. Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied. Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayers should not pass through. Thou hast made us the off-scourings and the refuse in the midst of the people. All our enemies have opened their mouths against us. Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolation and destruction."

Thus we have seen the very uncomfortable circumstances in which the people of Israel were placed, during their captivity at Babylon. It may be proper, in taking a review of this period, to advert to the causes that led to so sad a reverse in the circumstances of a people once so highly favoured of God; and to consider also some of the wise and gracious ends that were answered by this afflicting dispensation; to notice some of the alleviating circumstances of their captivity; and finally, to close this period of their history by noticing their joyful return to their own land. These shall form the subject of another article. From the melancholy scene which we have been contemplating, the following lessons of instruction may be suggested.

1. All the perplexities, and disquietudes, and sorrows to which we are exposed, whether as individuals or nations, are to be traced to sin as their procuring cause. Had we been without sin, we should have been strangers to sorrow. It is sin that hath brought upon our bodily frames that long train of painful diseases which are continually preying upon them, and will soon bring them down to the dust of death. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and death hath passed on all men, because all have sinned." It is sin that is the cause of all those perplexities, and fears, and alarms to which we are liable, men's hearts failing them for fear. It is sin that disturbs the peace of society, producing quarrels and contentions, and bloody wars. "Whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members?" It is sin that occasions those awful visitations of God's providence—thunder-storms, and hurricanes, and earthquakes; they are the tokens of his righteous displeasure against sin. It is sin that has occasioned the downfall of all those mighty empires that for a time flourished upon the earth. For while righteousness exalteth a nation, sin will prove the ruin of any people. But all these fatal effects of sin visible upon the earth can give us but a very partial view of the evil of sin. To be fully aware of its dreadful enormity, of its tremendous consequences, we must contemplate that unfathomable abyss of anguish, horror, and despair, which shall be the everlasting portion of all the finally unbelieving, impenitent, and ungodly!

2. Shall we not, then, hate sin with a perfect hatred? shall we not account it our greatest enemy? Shall we not set ourselves in direct opposition to it in all its forms? Shall we not earnestly desire deliverance from its guilt and from its power? O wretched men that we are, while under the influence of so deadly a foe! Who shall deliver us from this body of sin and death?

3. How thankful should we be that there is a way of deliverance from this most tremendous of all evils! We have, indeed, destroyed ourselves by sin, but in God is our help. Christ hath been manifested to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. In receiving him as the unspeakable gift of God, we receive the forgiveness of sin, and adoption into the family of God. "And as it is appointed to all men once to die, and after death the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and to them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation."

Of the Works of God and the Works of Man.—If, therefore, thou wilt work the works of God, thy sweat shall be as fragrant ointment, and thy rest as the Sabbath of God. Thou shalt labour in the sweat of a good conscience; and thou shalt sit down in the repose of sweetest contemplation. But if thou wilt follow after human greatness, thou shalt have, in thy toil, perplexity and sting; and in thy recollections, loathing and reproach. And it happens to thee, O man, according to thy desert; that when thou, who art the work of God, turnest not to him in well pleasing, thy works, too, render unto thee like fruit of bitterness.—

ON THE DEATH OF HIS MOTHER.

WEEP, weep, let all our kindred weep,
 Our parent gone, our pattern fled,
 The object of our care to keep,
 Of love and duty, cold and dead!

Yet what is dead? 'Tis but the dust,
 The vehicle, the tent, the shell;
 She, as a burden, from her thrust,
 When soar'd her soul with Christ to dwell;—

To dwell, where long her wish had been,
 To know the bliss perfection gives,
 To see Him, whom she loved unseen,
 Who for her died, and ever lives;

And as she listens to the voice,
 Which comforts earth, and gladdens heaven,
 Feel how celestials can rejoice,
 While thanks and praise to Him are given.

Count o'er the weeks, and days, and hours,
 Since she has enter'd Jesus' joy,
 And would a selfish wish of yours
 Have kept her here from such employ?

Would you those blissful moments still
 Had coursed beneath the cruel sway
 Of anguish, baffling all our skill,
 Of longings, brooking ill delay?

Count o'er, again, the golden days
 The saint has pass'd in yonder world,
 And as you count, for each give praise,
 And be thy banner, Hope, unfurl'd—

The ecstatic hope, to join her there,
 To learn its wonders from her mouth,
 In heaven's infancy her care,
 As we have been in earthly youth;

To sing with her the hymns sublime,
 By angels fram'd, to Jesus' name;
 To learn her harp's harmonious chime,
 Like her, to celebrate His fame.

From where the parent shines on high,
 Oh, God! the offspring shut not out;
 Guide us, Jehovah, with thine eye,
 And let thine angels camp about.

Purge us from vanity and pride,
 Low-thoughted sense, and selfish aims,
 To live to Him, for us who died,
 To feel and yield Him all his claims.

Protect us, by thy watchful power,
 Through all the evils of our state;
 Like her, receive us at the hour
 When death to heaven shall ope the gate.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Conversion of a Drunkard.—Many years ago, in a regiment of soldiers stationed at Edinburgh, there was a sergeant named Forbes, who was a very abandoned man, who, everywhere that he could, got in debt for liquor. His wife washed for the regiment, and thus obtained a little money. She was a pious woman, but all her attempts to reclaim him were long unsuccessful. During one of Mr Whitefield's visits to that city, she offered her husband a sum of money if he would for once go and hear him. This was a strong inducement, and he engaged to go. The sermon was in a field, as no building could have contained the audience. The sergeant was rather early, and placed himself in the middle of the field, that he might see of view. Mr Whitefield ascended the pulpit; as he only wanted to be able to say that he had seen him. The crowd, however, increased; and when Mr Whitefield opened they pressed forward, and he found it impossible to get away. The prayer produced some impression on his mind, but the sermon most deeply convinced him of his sinfulness and danger. He became a very altered man, and proved the reality of his conversion, by living many years in a very penurious manner, till he satisfied the claims of every one of his creditors.

Piety in a Palace.—A lady, who was in the habit of close attendance on the Princess Amelia during her illness, described some of the later intercourse which took place between the Princess and her son, George III., and which seldom failed to turn on a momentous topic of the future world, as being particularly affecting. "My dear child," said his Majesty to her, on one of these occasions, "you have entrusted a good child to your parents; we have nothing to say with to reproach you; but I need not tell you that it is not of yourself alone that you can be saved, and your acceptance with God must depend on your faith and trust in the merits of the Redeemer." "I trust in it," replied the Princess, mildly, but emphatically, "and I could wish for no better trust." Nothing she are assured, could be more striking, than to see the King, aged, and nearly blind, bending over the bed on which the Princess lay, and speaking to her of salvation through Christ; a matter far more interesting to them both, than all the world could bestow.

A Terrified Persecutor.—The means employed by the blessed God to make sinners acquainted with their sinfulness and danger, and to lead them to implore mercy, are indeed various. To some he speaks by the thunders of his law; others are attracted by the soothing sound of his Gospel; while the elements of nature itself have sometimes been the means of excitation and deep feeling. The excellent Isaac Watts, in his "Treatise on Angels," gives an account of a famous persecutor, who was brought to seek the mercy of God in a remarkable manner. He was out on a journey, with his pious wife, when they were overtaken with a storm of thunder and lightning. He was seized with great terror, and his wife inquired into his situation. "Why," asked he, "are not you afraid?" She replied, "No, not at all; for I know that it is the voice of my heavenly Father; and shall a child be afraid of a kind father's voice?" The man began to reflect that Christians must have within them a divine principle of which the world is ignorant, or they could not enjoy such calmness when the rest of the world is filled with horror. He went to Mr Bolton, an eminent minister, to whom he had been opposed, acknowledged and lamented his sins, and furnished good evidence of a change of heart.

THE BENEFITS OF SICKNESS.

PART. II.

BY WILLIAM BROWN, ESQ., F. R. S. E.,

Late President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh.

IN my former paper, I noticed two advantages derived from sickness, and I now proceed to remark,

III. Sickness puts us in mind of death. It is comparatively few "who, through fear of death, are all their lifetime subject to bondage." Most of us are forgetful and careless to a wonderful degree. We know, indeed, that death is a common occurrence; we observe, in the newspaper, the death of an acquaintance recorded; we are present at the death-bed of a friend; we attend a funeral along the streets into the church-yard; we assist in letting down the coffin into the narrow house, hear the first spadefuls of earth rattle upon it, stay till the green sod is placed on the top, and then return to our home or our business. We witness this, or assist in it again and again; when the clergyman engages in prayer in the house of mourning, we think seriously of the solemn event, sigh for a moment over the lesson of mortality, and thinking we have done enough, we speedily bid it away from our thoughts. No one is so foolish as to imagine that he is not to die, but most of us seem, with one consent, to resolve that we shall think as little about it as possible.

This state of mind often continues during the whole of life, and the approach of death makes no change. Men live fools, and die as they have lived, believing, hoping, fearing nothing respecting a future state. But this is not always the case. When the disease assumes a threatening aspect, when there is long continued pain, or much languor, or much emaciation, when it is evident that amendment is not taking place, when the approved and oft-varied remedies fail in giving the expected relief, the sick man becomes anxious as to the event, and if the word "danger" should drop from the lips of his medical attendant, he feels as he had never done before. Death appears to be no such distant or visionary event as he had always fancied it to be. He thinks of his past life, which had not been regulated with reference to such a result, of his Bible, which he had read in a too careless and indifferent manner, and in looking forward, even as much as his diseased feelings permit him to do, he sees quite enough to distress and alarm him. How true to nature are these statements from Scripture: "Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat, and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses. He sent his word and healed them, and delivered them from their destruction." "He is chastened with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain; so that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. His flesh is consumed away that it cannot be seen, and his bones, that were not seen, stick out. Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers. If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness: then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom."

Is it not good to have our thoughts directed to the event of our own death? Not surely that we should always be dwelling on it, be unfitted for the duties of life, be incapable of partaking in the enjoyments which God has strewed in our path. But is it not good that we should learn to look at things as they really are; to have it brought home to our conviction that we,—that I individually am to die; that my connection with this world in its employments, its friendships, its relationships, is to be broken up; and that I am to enter upon an untried state of existence, respecting which no one can report any information on his own experience?

Besides, death terminates that period of probation and trial which has existed during life, and places the individual before the tribunal of the Judge. We cannot look forward to this without a serious feeling, without an anxious desire to have every thing right for such a reckoning. Who can look back upon his life and feel assured before God? Will any thinking man ever satisfy himself that his life has been faultless? Has he nothing to fear from the decision of a righteous Judge? Many are the known duties which he has neglected; often has he ventured on known transgression; many unadvised words have escaped from his lips; many have been the thoughts which his own conscience disapproved of; seldom has God dwelt in his thoughts as the one object of homage and delight; seldom has the will of God been the rule or the motive of his actions; little has the redeeming kindness of Christ been the animating principle of his conduct.

Now, sickness often has the effect of making a man think seriously of his past conduct, of his danger as a sinner, and of the preciousness of Christ as a Saviour. When the soul is led to rely on Christ, he obtains peace, because he has found safety for eternity; and if he is raised up from his sick-bed again to engage in the duties of life, he has learned a lesson which he never forgets; he performs his duties with more conscientiousness, he is more upright, more humble, more kind-hearted; he is more of a real Christian, and therefore he is a better man. Surely, then, sickness is a benefit.

I have now mentioned three benefits which often proceed from sickness; and I doubt not but many of my readers, who have experienced these, will bear their testimony, that the preceding remarks are, in no respect, over-stated, or over-coloured. Sickness had found them in an unhealthy state of moral feeling, and it was blessed, by the Spirit of God, to bring them to a right state of mind. They had been, in a greater or less degree, careless about their eternal welfare, forgetful of the kindness of God, and indifferent about the interests of their fellow-creatures. Now, they are alive to the magnitude of eternity, they feel their obligations to God, and they view their fellow-men with feelings of duty and affection.

But sickness not only rouses to serious thought for the first time those who had previously been careless and ungodly: its benefits are felt also by those who, though Christians before, have sunk into indifference and worldliness. There is frequent reference in Scripture to the benefits of affliction in this respect; and sickness is just one of the common forms of affliction. The quaint, but expressive Poems of George Herbert, offer one interesting illustration:—

— “ Your heart was foul, I fear.

Indeed, 'tis true; I did, and do commit
Many a fault, more than my lease will bear;
Yet still asked pardon, and was not denied.”

— “ Your heart was hard, I fear.

Indeed, 'tis true; I found a callous matter
Begin to spread, and to exaplate there;
But with a richer drug than scalding water
I bathed it often; even with holy blood.”

— “ Your heart was dull, I fear.

Indeed, a slack and sleepy state of mind
Did oft possess me so, that, when I prayed, Though my lips went, my heart did stay behind.”

— “ Truly, friend,

For aught I hear, your Master shows to you
More favour than you wot of. Mark the end:
The font did only what was old renew;
The caldron supplied what was grown too hard;
The thorns did quicken what was grown too dull;
All did but strive to mend what you had marred, Wherefore be cheered, and praise him to the full.”

Christians need to be roused from a dull and sleepy state, to be excited to active exertion, to have their selfish desires mortified and subdued, to have their love to Christ quickened, and to have their idolatrous love of earthly objects crushed in the dust. This is often done by sickness; and the recorded experience of God's saints abounds with many instances of this kind: “ Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word.”

But this is not always the case. There are many who pass through sickness, long continued and dangerous disease, but who have derived no benefit from the discipline to which they have been subjected. God has graciously preserved their lives, and restored them to health, but they think no more of him than they did before their illness: they do not seem to consider that their lives ought now to be devoted to his service in a very special manner. They had been very near death, and their recovery scarcely expected by their attendants and friends; but they think no more of eternity than they used to do, and they speak of the situation in which they had been, with a levity more like that of the infidel than the feeling of the Christian. They have experienced unwearied attention at the hand of others; but they are as selfish, as haughty, as hard-hearted, as unkind to others as they ever were. This is a melancholy statement, but it is too true; and it is the more melancholy, because many of the persons referred to, when suffering from illness, and when uncertain of recovery, had seemed to be seriously impressed, and gave promise of permanent mental improvement. Many such have eagerly asked a visit of the clergyman, have waited under his conversation, have directed their attention to the study of the Scriptures, have made prayer to God a regular habit, and then, when recovery of health has been established, have thrown aside their penitence and their piety, and furnished another illustration of the true proverb, “ The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire.”

Upon an interesting occasion, our Lord said to the subject of a miraculous cure, “ Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.” Whether or not this man's disease had been inflicted as a punishment for his sin, at least we know, that, in not a few cases, disease is the unequivocal consequence of sin; and in every instance of the kind, it is the wisdom of the individual to listen to the admonition as addressed to himself: “ Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.” The quiver of the Almighty has not yet been exhausted. It contains arrows of greater sharpness: if one does not make the sinner feel, he will send another; and “ it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.” May his grace meet us all to feel! May his Spirit incline every heart: “ Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him: and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.”

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF

THE LATE REV. ELIAS CORNELIUS
Secretary to the American Education Society.

(Concluded from p. 738.)

FROM the popularity which Mr Cornelius enjoyed as a preacher, he was not long in receiving two dist-invitations from churches in the neighbourhood of Andover, to take the pastoral superintendence of them. After mature deliberation and earnest prayer, he consented to become associate pastor with the Rev. Dr Worcester, over the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Massachusetts. In this capacity he commenced his duties on the 22d July 1819, and no minister ever set out upon his arduous and responsible career as an ambassador of Christ, with a more simple and exclusive regard to the glory of God and the good of souls. It was his highest ambition to acquit himself in all things as a "workman that needeth not to be ashamed," "commending the truth to every man's conscience as in the sight of God." His pulpit appearances were peculiarly attractive. His eloquence was powerful, his manner impressive, and his whole aspect, when proclaiming the Gospel, was that of a man who has felt in his own experience its consoling and purifying influence. In the more private duties of the pastoral office Mr Cornelius felt a peculiar pleasure, and accordingly, we find him thus expressing himself in a letter to his Church during a temporary absence:—

"It is now ten weeks since I have been separated from my accustomed field of labours among you. The season has been one of no small privation to me. I can say without exaggeration, that I am never more contented and happy, than when at home engaged in the duties of a minister and pastor. I am deeply convinced that there is no situation in which the warmest and best affections of the heart are called into exercise with more constancy, than that which the relation between minister and people affords. It is a relation, which takes hold of the best feelings, and is consecrated by the dearest interests and hopes."

In the sick-chamber his visits were peculiarly acceptable. His gentleness and sympathizing kindness won upon the hearts of his parishioners in their seasons of affliction. They loved him as a counsellor and a friend, and his instructions were listened to with the greater readiness from the respect and esteem with which they regarded him. By the young of his flock he was highly revered. "Rarely ever," remarked a member of his Church, did a pastor so enlist the affections of children. Every little countenance brightened when he came in sight,—the children loved him indeed." The influence of such a minister on his people was of the most hallowed description. They became thoroughly versed in the knowledge of divine truth, and many of them showed by their whole deportment that they had indeed become "wise unto salvation." As a valuable auxiliary to his ministerial labours, he encouraged in his people a habit of reading. With this view he promoted as far as possible the circulation among them of religious papers and magazines, directing their attention to such as he thought best adapted to instruct and improve them. The death of his colleague Dr Worcester, which took place at Brainerd in the Cherokee nation, on the 7th of June 1823, produced a deep effect upon the mind of Mr Cornelius. He reckoned it one of the chief blessings of his life, that he had enjoyed the friendship and counsel of a man so highly distinguished for his acuteness and Christian worth. They had lived and laboured together with the most unbroken harmony, and in proof of this we may quote a few sentences from the sermon which Mr Cornelius preached on the death of his revered friend and colleague.

"You will doubtless expect that I should say something of the character of Dr Worcester as an associate pastor. On this subject I scarcely dare trust my own feelings. I may, however, be permitted to say that I shall ever regard the period of my connection with him as one of the happiest portions of my life. And whatever may have been the history of other relations of a similar nature, with heart-felt gratitude to God I desire to record of this, that no incident ever occurred, which was known to interrupt its peace or mar its enjoyment for a moment. I weep while I think its endearments are at an end: and that I shall sit at his feet, and receive his paternal instructions, no more."

While at Salem Mr Cornelius was involved in a controversy with the Socinians who were rapidly increasing in that town, as indeed they have been for some time past in the United States generally, and New England in particular. It has been of late disputed, whether it be consistent with fact, that Socinianism is making rapid strides in America, but whatever may be the case with those who bear the name of Unitarians, there are many other sects, such as those calling themselves as if by an exclusive privilege "Christians," who avow sentiments which are no other than those of rank Socinianism. The prevalence of such blasphemous tenets in Salem led Mr Cornelius to enter the lists in defence of the proper godhead of Christ. The tracts which he wrote upon the subject, as well as a sermon upon the doctrine of the Trinity which he published about this time, were considered as satisfactory and decisive on the points at issue.

During the life of Dr Worcester, and to some extent after his death, Mr Cornelius employed a portion of the year in public agencies of various descriptions. One society in particular had often engaged his thoughts,—that which had for its object the education of young men for the Christian ministry. The judicious author of the published memoir of Mr Cornelius, gives the following account of the circumstances which led to the formation of this, and similar institutions, in the United States:—

"The principal argument for their establishment was, unquestionably, the want of preachers of the Gospel in the United States. The supposed deficiency of religious instruction was amply corroborated by the results of the most laborious investigations. It was estimated that the number of clergymen of all denominations, who had been educated at college, was one thousand and six hundred; and that the number of competent ministers, who had not received a public education, was nine hundred; making a total of two thousand five hundred, for the supply of eight or nine millions of inhabitants. A circumstance, which rendered the destitution more affecting, was the singular inequality in the distribution of ministers. In three States and four territories, with a population of three hundred and fifty thousand, there were but seventeen stated preachers of the Gospel. Another very gloomy feature in the picture, was the rapid decrease in the number of ministers, compared with the population. Seventy years before, New England was supplied with one liberally-educated minister for every six hundred and twenty-eight souls, while in 1816, in the United States, there was not one such minister to six thousand souls. The ratio of ministerial supply had been for a long time regularly and rapidly declining. The number of pious young men, who were able to defray the expense of their own education, was proved by the experience of half a century, not to be by any means adequate to provide a remedy for a state of things so deplorable.

The alternative before the Christian community was, therefore, manifestly this: either the number of ministers must continue to decline, or pious and indigent youth must be assisted in their studies preparatory to the sacred office.

The first object of the Education Society was to acquire accurate information as to the actual extent of religious destitution in various parts of the country. With this view, Mr Cornelius was requested, when engaged in his tour, which we have already noticed, in behalf of the Indian Missions, to direct his attention also to the religious wants of the various districts of the country through which he passed. While employed in making the requisite statistical investigations, his interest was awakened in favour of the great design which the society had in view. From this period he evinced a lively solicitude in all their undertakings, and at length, in August 1826, he was unanimously appointed their secretary. To this situation he had been previously chosen on two different occasions, but thinking it his duty to devote himself exclusively to the labours of the pastoral office, he had declined the honour. Applications had also been made to him from various religious societies to take a part in their management, but he had never hitherto been prevailed upon to accede to their request. Now, however, he began to reflect upon the responsibility involved in such repeated refusals; he came to the resolution of laying the whole circumstances, as is frequently done in doubtful cases in the Congregational Churches of New England, before a council of Churches, summoned to deliberate and decide upon the matter. The result of this conference was, that the Church at Salem was still to be permitted to enjoy the Sabbath ministrations of Mr Cornelius, while an associate pastor was to be chosen to aid him in the other duties of his charge, that he might have leisure to perform the duties of his office as secretary to the American Education Society. Notwithstanding the advice of the council, however, his pastoral relation to the Church at Salem was finally dissolved, and he removed to Andover, resolved to dedicate himself exclusively to his new employment.

In entering upon the responsible situation in which he was now placed, Mr Cornelius directed his attention, in the first instance, to the preparation of a brief statement of the principles and objects of the society. One of these objects, devised and executed by his own exertions, was the establishment of permanent scholarships for the young men under their patronage. This required, of course, a permanent fund, which he set himself to procure. Another improvement introduced by the new secretary was the substitution of a system of loan for the gratuitous system which had been hitherto adopted. According to this plan, the money which was given to aid the young men in their preparation for the ministry, was required to be repaid by them within a stipulated period after they had entered upon professional employment. "It is not only a loan without interest until the young man has completed his course, for some time after, and a loan without surety, so that if he dies, the debt dies with him; but it is made with the further most important provision, that if he shall, in consequence of any calamity, or service of the Church, to which he may be providentially called, or the peculiar situation in which he may be placed, be deprived of the means of refunding, he shall present his case to the board of directors, whose duty it is to cancel his debt in whole or in part, at their discretion." This mode of rendering assistance to indigent students has been found far more beneficial in its results than that which was formerly in use.

One very important part of the duties which devolved upon Mr Cornelius, as secretary to the Education Society, was to visit the various colleges and the classical seminaries at which the young men were studying, with the design of ascertaining their progress, and encouraging them by his counsels and his prayers. In the fulfilment of this part of his work he was especially successful, and so won the affections of the students by his tenderness, and faithfulness, and devoted anxiety for their spiritual progress, that he was rewarded by them with the warmest attachment.

In the report which Mr Cornelius read at the anniversary of the society, in the spring of 1827, he made the following appalling statement in reference to the religious destitution of America:—

"Five thousand ministers are needed for our country alone; and yet this society, though it has probably more than any other, has aided but few more than a hundred young men in their preparatory studies. The population is advancing at the rate of one thousand every day; and to keep up with it, and to supply the vacancies occasioned by death, would probably require the addition of five hundred ministers every year. I say nothing of the thousands who are needed to carry the Gospel to those who are already destitute. This is this growing, this alarming deficiency ever to be supplied? Advancing with our present step, we can never overtake the wants of our country, much less the world. More must be done, or vast multitudes of men will go down, as they long have, to the silent death, with not one ray of heavenly light to cheer their path. O when will the groans and dying agonies of a famishing world, that has long cried in vain for bread and water of life, be heard, and the Church of God be roused to action! Followers of Jesus! Can not more be done than has ever yet been done for the perishing millions?"

The greater part of Mr Cornelius' time was spent in travelling throughout the States, endeavoring to promote the great objects of the society. In the course of his visits to the different colleges, he was much impressed with the absolute necessity of combining bodily exercise with mental cultivation, and hence he strongly enforced the adoption of such a system of manual labour as that which has since been adopted in the Theological Seminary at Andover. Spite of the waste of health, and life, and usefulness which has arisen from too close application to intellectual pursuits, Mr Cornelius thus remarks in a public address which he delivered on the subject:—

"The exercise of students should be taken in connection with a suitable diet. That there are several mistakes in regard to the latter as the former, is not of a question by any one who is acquainted with the subject. In vain are all our efforts to promote health and vigour of body and mind if this point is not attended to with care.

"The adoption of some such plan as the foregoing seems absolutely necessary to prevent the waste of health, and life, and usefulness, which the Church of Christ has for years sustained, to the ruin of some of the fairest and brightest prospects which have opened around her.

"There is not, perhaps, a teacher before me, and probably not a pupil nor a hearer, who has not met with some melancholy example of this nature, in the circle of his own acquaintance, or within the limits of his observation. It may have been a youth of many prayers, of rich endowments, and of fond hopes. The grace of God had, in a remarkable manner, qualified him for the difficult and arduous duties of a pastor, or a missionary among the heathen. Years had been spent in disciplining his mind, and storing it with the treasures of knowledge. His last preparations were made, and he stood ready to enter on his work. But the destroyer had marked him for his victim. Long before he completed his course of study, while he plied the midnight lamp, and urged his way with unceasing toil, he undermined his constitution by neglecting to take seasonable and appropriate exercise, and thus fell a prey to disease and death.

'So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
Viewed his own feather on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart:
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel
He nurs'd the pinion which impell'd the steel;
While the same plumage that had warm'd his nest,
Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding breast.'

"The loss which in this manner has so often withered the joys of parents and instructors, and covered the Church with a cloud, is frequently, perhaps I may say usually, aggravated by the fact, that young men of the strongest minds, and of the brightest promise, are the victims.

'Too strong the portion of celestial flame
For its weak tenement, the fragile frame.' "

In the different journeys which he undertook to promote the interests of the society, Mr Cornelius appears to have derived much elevating and pure delight, from the survey of the works of creation. As a specimen, we may select his reflections on visiting the falls of Niagara:—

"A visit to Niagara is suited to lead the mind of a beholder up to God, and it may therefore be rendered a means of sanctification. I have seldom, if ever, spent an hour in devotion with more solemn awe and delight, and the description of God and his works in the Bible have never seemed so grand, as when I repaired one morning before breakfast to the staircase on the American side, for my morning devotions. 'And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluiah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.' I read this and other passages with indescribable awe and delight. I listened while God seemed to speak through the thunders of the great cataract before me. Surely 'great is our Lord, and of great power. His understanding is infinite.' The 148th Psalm is unspeakably grand and beautiful, read at the foot of such a cataract. Still more so if we read in the night season, during a lonely walk around Goat Island, when every thing is hushed into silence, as if to hear the fall of waters echo the praises of the Almighty, in a deeper and more awful voice, while the full moon and twinkling stars look down from the cloudless sky, and join in the solemn chorus which earth and heaven are sending up to their Creator. 'Praise ye the Lord of the heavens; praise him in the heights. Praise him sun and moon; praise him all ye stars of light. Praise him ye heaven of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens. Let them praise the name of the Lord, for he commanded, and they were created.' When the mind has been raised by such sublime passages, and the glorious exhibition of divine power made visible to the eye at the foot of Niagara, to some just conceptions of God, every other portion of Scripture is read with corresponding emotion. The wrath of God against the impenitent appears more terrible, his love and condescension in sending his Son into the world more amazing, and the invitations of his mercy more melting. All this is because the mind is raised above the low and grovelling scenes of time, and made to entertain some faint views of what God is. What then must be the emotions which will be awakened in view of a dissolving world; when the Lord of heaven and earth 'shall come in the clouds of heaven, to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe?'"

In the autumn of 1829, the Education Society removed their seat of operations from Andover to Boston, and the Secretary accordingly took up his residence in the latter place. For several months he supplied the pulpit of Salem-Street Congregational Church there. His labours were highly appreciated, and evidently accompanied with the divine blessing. Scarcely had Mr Cornelius remained in Boston for a year and a half, when, in the course of Providence, he was called to change his residence. In consequence of repeated solicitations, he accepted the office of secretary to the Presbyterian Education Society, whose field of operations, it was now arranged, should embrace nearly all the United States except New England. Having complied with the wishes of his friend that he should embrace the invitation, he removed from Boston to New York in June 1831. It may be mentioned, however, that the Presbyterian and the American Educational Societies were in many respects connected with one another; and hence the acceptance of this additional secretaryship did not involve the resignation of his first office. He still continued to discharge the duties of both with a fidelity and success rarely equalled. So conspicuous, indeed, had his exertions become, that the eyes of the Christian world in America were fixed upon him as the instrument of effecting much good. And accordingly, a vacancy having occurred in the office of corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, he was elected in October, being only a few months after he had settled in New York. It now became a matter of serious consideration, whether it was his duty to accept of this new situation; and it was not without much anxious deliberation and earnest supplication to God for direction, that he at length came to the conclusion, that it was the divine will he should labour in the cause of foreign missions.

In the end of 1831, Mr Cornelius resigned his connection with the American and Presbyterian Education Societies, and entered upon his new labours with a truly Christian spirit. He was evidently advancing rapidly in meetness for the heavenly inheritance, and he seemed to feel that the day of his final redemption was fast drawing nigh. With such an impression on his mind, he exerted himself with even more than his accustomed energy, to promote the noble cause in which he was engaged. To a friend, who remarked that he must not overwork himself, he replied, lifting up his hand impressively towards heaven, "It matters not, if we only reach that bright place at last."

In the course of a few weeks after his appointment as secretary to the Board of Foreign Missions, Mr Cornelius set out for Boston, partly with a view to effect a general arrangement of his duties with the other secretaries of the board, and partly to rouse the zeal of the New England Churches in the good work. During his stay in Boston, he laboured with an energy and perseverance which surprised his friends, more especially as his health appeared to be in a declining state. On Saturday the 4th of February 1832, he left Boston on his return to New York. He had made arrangements to spend the Sabbath in Worcester, Massachusetts and to attend the monthly missionary prayer meeting in Hartford, Connecticut, on the Monday evening. An individual in whose family he had resided, said to him, just as he was leaving the house, "Sir, is it not possible for you to remain with us till you have better health?" He answered, "I think not; my plans are formed, and I must go. I am very desirous to reach my family." "If it may be, I hope, Sir, we shall have the pleasure of welcoming you and your dear family in Boston next May." "Perhaps so," he replied, "but it is my desire so to live, that if I find God is going to call me hence in one half hour, I shall have no place I shall wish to visit, no cares to settle, no friends to see." In the same spirit, he bid a final adieu to many other friends.

On the road he became perceptibly worse, and on reaching Worcester he was in a state of great languor and debility. He remained in his lodgings till Monday morning, when he set out for Hartford to fulfil his engagement. There he took up his residence at the house of the Rev. Dr Hawes, under whose hospitable roof he spent the last few days of his life. His disease, on his arrival in Hartford, assumed a very serious character, and though the best medical assistance was procured, all was unavailing. It might be interesting to quote some passages from the death-bed experience of this devoted servant of Christ, but for this we refer our readers to the published Memoir, drawn up by Mr Edward, with great good taste, judgment, and propriety. Suffice it to say, that he died, after a few days' illness, glorifying that God and Saviour whom, during his life, it had been his unwearied delight to honour and obey.

THE EXODUS.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

No event in the history of the world is so extraordinary as the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites, and none is so well authenticated. Their leader on that occasion, records the event; and being a poet as well as a legislator and commander, he celebrates it in a poem of great sublimity and beauty, (Exodus xv.) honoured and admired by the Jewish nation, from the day that it was sung by Moses, accompanied by Miriam and the women of Israel, down to the present hour.

No such document as this remains in the historical records of any nation. Very rarely are ancient events recorded by contemporary historians, and such notices, when they occur, are valued in proportion to their rarity. The early history of nations is founded on tradition, decked out with fable. It is a considerable time before a nation thinks it worth while to record its history. Its first struggles and migrations are too insignificant to be noticed; and when it acquires a name and a place in the list of settled nations, it aspires after historical notoriety; and vague tradition, guided by vanity rather than truth, forms the first elements of its history. There is no such thing in existence as an account of the first settlement of any ancient nation, written by a contemporary, the history of the Jews alone excepted. How much do we value any document written by an actor in any ancient event! The histories of Xenophon, Polybius, and Cæsar, leader of expeditions and armies, and eye-witnesses of the events which they record, are highly valued. The history of Cicero concerning the events which occurred during his consulship,—the short account by Eutropius of Julian's expedition against the Parthians, in which he informs us that he himself served, are all received with a confidence which we never attach to the narrative of a mere searcher of records, who may be misled by trust to, or misinterpreting, the statements of others.

Moses stands at the head of all historians, in point of antiquity, and station, and influence; for he was the leader and the principal agent in some of the most extraordinary events recorded in the world's history. His works bear an impression of truth, not to be found in any other record, if we except the comparative modern histories of the evangelists and apostles. He records much that is discreditable, both to himself and to the people whom he conducted, which any historian detailing events in which he himself was a participant, would have been anxious to conceal: but his candour is unparalleled; and he records his own infirmities, and the expressed displeasure of heaven, in his account of them, with the same simplicity and candour with which he states the ordinary transactions in which he himself was the chief visible agent.

In giving some account of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, it will be necessary to ascertain, if possible, the district in which they were settled: their removal into that country. They were placed in the land of Goshen. But where is the land of Goshen? Little attention has been paid to this question by travellers in ancient or modern times. The great object has been to visit the stupendous relics of Egyptian greatness, and as these are generally scattered along the banks of the Nile, the travels of Europeans have been, for the most part, confined to the course of the river. It is not there, however, that we are to look for the land of Goshen. What we know with certainty, that it was not far from Memphis, the ancient capital. This we learn from Joseph's message to his father after he had made himself known to his brethren: "Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of Egypt; come down unto me, tarry not: and thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, thou and thy children, and thy children's children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou hast." Gen. xlv. 9, 10.

Here, then, are some elements for ascertaining the locality of the land of Goshen; it was near the capital where Joseph resided; yet it was separated from the rest of Egypt by distant boundaries, and was distinguished by its fertility, and its adaptation to pasturage, a circumstance of essential importance to the Israelites, who were a pastoral people. So much ground is clear; but on which side of the capital it lie? Here we might infer, with great confidence that it lay on the side next to Palestine, the land promise. The settlement of the Israelites in Egypt was never intended to be permanent; it was a temporary sojourn to avoid a pressing calamity; and as Joseph was lord of all Egypt, we may be certain that he would fix his father and his family in a situation best adapted to their present wants, and to their progress, when God's time should come to remove them into the land which he had promised to Abraham as to his seed after him. So fully was Jacob convinced of the truth of this promise, that he made Joseph swear that he would bury him in the sepulchre which Abraham had bought of Ephron the Hittite for the entombment of his beloved wife Sarah. Joseph had the same feelings and impressions, and took an oath to his brethren, not that they should bury his body there, but that they should carry up his bones with them:

be deposited in the cemetery of his fathers, an injunction which demonstrated his strong confidence in the promise which God had given to Abraham, whilst, at the same time, it was evidently prophetic that the fulfilment of the promise was, at that time, remote.

But we have better evidence than conjecture, or probable inference, to prove that the land of Goshen was, in fact, the part of Egypt nearest to Palestine. We learn this from a very brief and incidental notice in the first book of Chronicles detailing the genealogy of the family of Ephraim, the son of Joseph. I quote the passage, as it is decisive on this point, and will be found interesting in other respects. In the seventh chapter of the first book of Chronicles, we have the following particulars, commencing at the twentieth verse: "And the sons of Ephraim; Shuthelah, and Bered his son, and Tahath his son, and Eladah his son, and Tahath his son, and Zabed his son, and Shuthelah his son, and Ezer, and Elead, whom the men of Gath, who were born in that land, slew, because they came down to take away their cattle. And Ephraim their father mourned many days, and his brethren came to comfort him." Here, then, we have an account of a predatory excursion conducted by the family of Ephraim, the son of Joseph, against the men of Gath, the principal city of the Philistines, whose territory bordered on Egypt; and in this enterprise it is more than probable that they were assisted by detachments from the other tribes, for it is added that Ephraim's "brethren came to comfort him."

It will readily appear from this that there was a hereditary hostility between the family of Jacob and the Philistines; they were separated from each other only by the wilderness of Shur, the desolation of which encouraged hostile incursions, when either party conceived that the other was off its guard; and this shows another reason why the Israelites were so anxious to avoid the land of the Philistines, in their departure from Egypt, and consented to all the difficulties and dangers of an untried wilderness, rather than encounter their enraged and implacable neighbours. The incidental fact recorded in the above quotation suggests another consideration of no small interest. It appears that Joseph, on the settlement of his father's family in Egypt, had removed his sons from his own residence, and from the splendours, and allurements, and preferences of a court, that they might be domiciliated with their brethren, and share the portion which God had allotted to the family of Abraham; he was alive when the above-mentioned calamity happened to his grandchildren; for it is said, "Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation." Gen. 1. 23. Here, then, we see in the first of the Israelites who was settled permanently in Egypt, and who actually obtained the highest power and honour which that country could bestow, the same self-denial, the same faith in the promises given to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which induced Moses, two hundred years afterwards, to decline the honour of being called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and to esteem "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." The hopes of the promised land and of the promised seed supported them; the same feelings were cherished by the true Israel of God in all ages of their Church and government; and it is interesting to observe the tenacity with which they cling to this cherished idea, even when they had neither Church, nor government, nor country. This shows, at least, how much the Jewish people, from their origin, in the call of Abraham, down to the present day, have been imbued with the hope of deliverance and of glory through the promised Messiah; and their continued rejection of Him who was sent will be a demonstration of his divinity and power, till "the Gentiles shall come to his light, and kings to the brightness of his rising;" "For I would not that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in: and so all Israel shall be saved." Their very unbelief, then, is a standing miracle, a continuous proof of the prescience and providence of God; and were they to come over in a body to the faith of Christ before the fulness of the Gentiles has been brought in, it would be a falsification of the apostle's prediction, which announces that the great mass of the Gentile nations must be brought into the fold of Christ, before the dispersed of Israel shall be gathered into one, acknowledging "one God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." They must be brought over as a people, and not melt down imperceptibly into the general mass of Christianized nations; otherwise, it would be impossible to tell when the prophecies respecting them were fulfilled; it would be easier to assert that they had completely failed; but God keeps in his own power the times and the seasons, and he has evidently the means of accomplishing the purpose which he has announced, of gathering his ancient people into the Church of Christ; for they are, at the present time, as numerous as ever they were at any period of their power, and anxiously awaiting an opening in God's providence for the recovery of their former privileges: these, in our opinion, they never will regain; but they will obtain what is infinitely better than the recovery of the "beggarly elements," and the re-construction of the exploded system of legal ordinances; they will acknowledge Jesus as "the King that cometh in the name of the Lord;" and then the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God, as the waters cover the sea.

But to return to our subject; we have now seen whereabout the land of Goshen must be, and what was its general character; and if we can discover a district in modern times corresponding, in point of locality and fertility, with the ancient Goshen, it will give a vividness and interest to the sacred history which the mind cannot receive from vague and indistinct generalities. Happily, the district of Goshen is now no longer a secret, and it stands distinguished by such marked features, that, taken in connection with the ancient history, its locality cannot be mistaken. We owe this elucidation to other circumstances than a desire to illustrate Scripture history; I believe the French, during Bonaparte's Egyptian campaign, were the first who unhesitatingly recognized the district of Goshen; and I remember being not a little astonished to find one of them talking as familiarly of Pi-hahiroth, as if it had still been the name of the station mentioned by Moses. Much additional light has been thrown on the subject by the recent survey with a view to ascertain the speediest and most commodious channel of intercourse with India; and I am much indebted to the evidence given before the select committee, as reported and commented on by the Foreign Quarterly Review, which has an excellent article on the subject; Laborde also, in his late journey to Petra, went down the same district, and recognises it at once as the scene of the interesting interview between Joseph and his father, when the aged patriarch came up, at his son's earnest request, to escape the famine which desolated the land of Canaan.

The description of the district of Goshen, under the modern name of Wadi Tomylat, is as follows: It opens gently towards the Nile, not far from Cairo, the modern capital, which is on the opposite side of the river over against the ancient Memphis. In proceeding towards the east, it is hemmed in by inaccessible mountains both on the north and south; its length is about forty miles, with an average breadth of about two, fertile and salubrious in the highest degree, and picturesque by the ruined remains of ancient cities, and the lofty ridges by which it is enclosed. About forty miles from where it opens towards the Nile, it abruptly terminates at what are called the salt lakes, or bitter marshes, twenty-three miles in length by seven in breadth; which, though they are now nearly destitute of water, give unequivocal evidence that they have, at one time, been filled with the waters of the Red Sea, and, in fact, formed its termination towards the north; for from these salt marshes there runs a hollow trough to the distance of thirteen miles due south, terminating at Suez, evidently a narrow channel of the Red Sea, when it was formerly connected with the salt marshes, from which it is now entirely cut off, unless when tempestuous winds, combining with high tides, sometimes force it over the barriers of accumulated sand, a circumstance which happened not many years ago. This, beyond all doubt, is the land of Goshen; it contains, according to the French engineers, twenty thousand acres of rich and productive soil, with an exuberant growth of shrubs and copsewood; there is no other district which corresponds with the features of locality formerly indicated, as characteristic of Goshen, by its proximity to the capital of Egypt, on the one hand, and to the land of the Philistines, on the other; besides, the circumstance of their being "entangled in the land," and shut in by the wilderness, (Exod. xiv. 3) which encouraged Pharaoh to hope that the Israelites could easily be turned back into their former place of residence, is not applicable to any other district in that part of Egypt but that which I have assumed as the land of Goshen.

Another thing will be obvious from the description which has been given of the Wadi Tomylat, the Goshen of Scripture, viz., that if Pharaoh and his host had pursued the Israelites, in the ordinary sense in which pursuing is understood, he would have driven them before him, and a great number of them, at least, might have escaped by the narrow trough which connects the Red Sea with the salt marshes, as that was, in fact, one of the regular roads to and from Egypt. There was probably a narrow canal, at that time, running up the centre of this trough, for the purpose of establishing a conveyance by water from the Red Sea to the capital of Egypt; at least the remains of such a canal are visible through the whole district to the present day; and Bonaparte was the first who ordered a section to be made in the trough already mentioned, when the engineers discovered the canal which, perhaps, had been covered up for thousands of years, (for its construction is ascribed to Sesostris) yet still existing in great preservation. Over this canal there was a regular mode of transit, and had the Israelites been able to reach it before Pharaoh and his host, they would have passed in safety, and without a miracle; he appears to have been perfectly aware of this, and instead of pursuing them down the narrow valley, with an array of "six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt," (Exod. xiv. 7) he appears to have attempted to turn them, by a rapid movement down the southern side of the lofty mountainous ridge which shuts in the vale of Goshen to the south; and it was the will of the Almighty that he should accomplish his purpose; for when the Israelites were encamped at Etham on the very "edge of the wilderness," (Exod. xiii. 20) to which they were bound, the Lord commanded them to "turn, and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baalzephon."

Our total ignorance of the position of these places, may well check all confident assertion; and, therefore, I merely suggest or surmise, that the turning here is equivalent to a backward movement, or, perhaps, merely, facing to the left, so as to lay the whole host of Israel along the salt marshes, then a part of the Red Sea, and extending, as has already been mentioned, twenty-three miles in length, by seven in breadth, and which, when filled with water, must have been considerably deeper than the Red Sea at Suez, as has been ascertained by modern levelling. I conjecture farther, that Migdol, which means a tower, was at the eastern extremity of the mountain ridge which bounded the valley on the south, and Baalzephon over against the termination of the northern ridge; that it was not that the passage was made, and that the Israelites did not touch any part of the present Red Sea.

If there are any who may be inclined to think that this account is contrary to that given in the Scriptures, I have only to say, that the Scriptures alone have compelled me to this interpretation, which has been surmised by others, but for which no reason has been given. Let us attend to the subsequent narrative of the marches of the Israelites, and I think the accuracy of the view which I have taken will be evident. In the chapter following that which narrates the catastrophe of the Egyptians, we read, "So Moses brought Israel from the Red Sea, and they went out into the wilderness of Shur; and they went three days in the wilderness, and found no water." Ex. xv. 22. Now, where is the wilderness of Shur? I make no conjecture on the subject, but give the plain language of Scripture. In the twenty-fifth chapter of Genesis we have the following account of the locations of the land of Ishmael: "They dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is, before Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria." ver. 18. Now, whether we understand Assyria in its restricted sense in which the name was applied in later times, when its empire towards the west was bounded by the Euphrates, or in its earliest acceptation when it comprehended all the country between that river and the Mediterranean, in whichever of these senses we understand the word, it indicates clearly and unequivocally, the Isthmus of Suez, through which every person must pass who goes from Egypt towards Assyria. This desert is of very great extent; its narrowest breadth, measuring from Suez to the Mediterranean, is seventy-five miles, and its length may be stated at more than double that distance. On this extensive waste, then, the Israelites landed, after passing through the Red Sea; but not one inch of it could they have touched, had they crossed any part of the Red Sea, according to its present dimensions.

It is absurd to talk about facilities or probabilities of miracles; every thing is possible to God which does not imply a contradiction, or a violation of his essential perfections. But in the view which I have taken of this subject, the deliverance of the Israelites would appear greater to them than on the common view of the case. Pharaoh's object was to drive them back to the house of bondage; he and his people had a deep interest in this, as it would have been very inconvenient for them to have lost such a vast number of useful slaves. When, therefore, he had fairly overtaken them, after Moses had issued the order for a backward movement to Pi-hahiroth, the strongest and boldest spirits were then in the rear, and when they looked back and saw Pharaoh and his hosts interposed between them and the practical passage which they had contemplated over the narrow trough of the sea already described, their faith and their courage utterly failed them, and they exclaimed, "Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" All hope had utterly fled when they saw their oppressors in a position to drive them back to their abhorred and degrading bondage; every possibility of escape seemed taken away from them, and they expressed their feelings in the language of despair. In these circumstances, how great and unexpected must

* All the maps and descriptions which I have ever seen professing to illustrate the geography of Scripture, with the exception of the Ancient Universal History, lay down the wilderness of Shur on the eastern side of the Red Sea, in direct opposition to the statement of Scripture, as quoted above; being led, or misled, by the generally received opinion, that the Israelites passed the young Red Sea, somewhere above or below Suez. Creighton's passage in 1831, falls into the same mistake.

Lord Valentia, and others, have pronounced, without question, that the salt marshes anciently formed part of the Red Sea.

their deliverance have appeared! No wonder that it should have made an indelible impression on the minds of that generation, and many that came after it, and that it should occupy a prominent place in the lyrical compositions of the Hebrew poets and prophets. "Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan. He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and he made the waters to stand as an heap." Ps. lxxviii. 12, 13. "Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of thy mercies; but provoked him at the sea, even at the Red Sea. Nevertheless, he saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his mighty power to be known. He rebuked the Red Sea also, and it was dried up: so he led them through the depths, as through the wilderness. And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy. And the waters covered their enemies; there was not one of them left." Ps. cvi. 7-11.

Here we may observe, that the Israelites seem to have been almost as forgetful of the judgments and mercies of God, as the Egyptians themselves; as the latter forgot the repeated judgments of God, so the Israelites forgot the many mercies which he had bestowed, and the many deliverances which he had wrought. "They provoked him at the Red Sea," when they doubted the power of God, and disputed the authority of Moses, through whom the Almighty had so often indicated his gracious purposes to the house of Israel.

It may be asked, what is the use of all this minute criticism? Is it not better to take the statements on trust, depending on the authority of the Word of God? They who hold such language, do all that they can to extinguish the light of divine truth: doctrines and facts taken up on trust, and without investigation, can make no salutary impression on the human mind; whatever effects they may produce, they are no better than superstition to those who hold them. Nobody doubts that the destruction of Jerusalem and the desolation of Edom are distinctly foretold in Scripture, and that in both instances they have been fulfilled. And is not this enough? No; the fall of all the ancient nations might have been foretold without the gift of prophecy: they contained within themselves the elements of dissolution; but how impressive is the consummation, when history becomes the interpreter of prophecy, and explains particulars which afford a key and a commentary to statements and expressions which were utterly unintelligible till illustrated by the event! The fulfilment of every prophecy is equivalent to a miracle; and the verification of any event, professedly miraculous, is also equivalent to a miracle; and, in this way, it may safely be said, that miracles shall never cease till the end of the world; for the whole world's history is bound up in prophecies, which will not be completely fulfilled till the final consummation of all things in regard to this world. The leading fact which has influenced my opinion in adopting a new view of the passage of the Red Sea, is the statement of Scripture that the Israelites had their first station after that event, in the wilderness of Shur, which appears to be identical with the wilderness of Etham, and corresponds exactly with the Isthmus of Suez. I wonder that some acute infidel did not discover this, and proclaim the whole account to be a fable; inasmuch as they had no sea to pass, in order to reach that station. But the Scripture tells us, that they did pass a sea in order to reach it; and an examination of the locality proves, that a sea did interpose between them and the wilderness of Shur. They marched along the edge of this sea, in order to reach the narrow trough, already mentioned, which I have no doubt was passable at low water, as it was evidently so shallow as to be insufficient for the admission of ships, till the canal, which still remains, was constructed for the purpose. This canal terminates at the salt marshes, the bottom of which is considerably lower than that of the Red Sea at Suez. For twenty-three miles, therefore, the length of these marshes, the canal was not necessary. But where the marshes terminate, the canal recommences, and runs the whole length of the valley, a distance of forty miles, till it joined the Nile by locks.

Here, then, is a sea lying directly in the way of the Israelites, when they were stopped in their attempt to cross at the canal, or narrow trough, if no canal then existed: and death, or aggravated bondage, must have been their portion, had not God opened a way for their escape, through a deep creek of the Red Sea, which, though now nearly dry, has left unequivocal demonstrations of its former existence.

In an article on the cities of the plain, I pointed out how exactly the physical and geological aspect of the district corresponds with the account of the catastrophe, as given in Scripture: and I hope future investigation will tend to throw much light on the subject which I have now attempted to illustrate. As I do not wish to resume the discussion, I have only to add a few remarks by way of summary and conclusion. I have supposed the Israelites placed along the whole length of the salt marshes, then filled with the Red Sea, by the command to "turn;" equivalent to altering their line of march, and facing the sea, which they had hitherto skirted on their left. In this altered position, to the extent of twenty-three miles, the whole host of the Israelites entered into the sea at once, perhaps about twenty deep, rank and file. There is an absolute necessity for their entering the sea abreast in this manner; for had they entered in the style in which they had hitherto marched, the foremost files would have reached the opposite side, before the rear ranks could have entered the channel; and in these circumstances, the miracle, as detailed in the narrative, could not have taken place.

By adopting this view, another difficulty will be obviated. The whole transaction occupied so short a space of time, that a double miracle would have been necessary, had the event taken place below Suez, as is usually supposed, where the sea is between twenty and thirty miles broad. We do not know the exact time when the Israelites entered the sea, but it was during the night; and when morning appeared, the waters returned in their strength, and overwhelmed the Egyptians. Ex. xiv. 27. From this it would seem, that the Israelites must have been landed before sun-rise; which, considering the distance, according to the common opinion, appears to be impossible, without a miracle, which we have no right to suppose, in this particular, to have taken place. This has puzzled all commentators: and both Jews and Christians, joined by the judicious Patrick, have supposed, that the Israelites, actually, did not pass the sea on the night of the catastrophe, but returned to Etham, from which they had set out; as it is said, that they set out from that place after passing the Red Sea. This difficulty is obviated by supposing, what I believe actually to have been the case, that the salt marshes were reckoned as bounded, in their whole extent, by the wilderness of Etham, and were considered as lying within that district.

CHRIST EVER PRESENT WITH HIS PEOPLE:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES GLEN, A. M.,
Minister of Benholme.

"I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you."—JOHN xiv. 20.

THIS is one of "the exceeding great and precious promises" with which Jesus comforted his disciples when he was about to be separated from them. "I will not leave you orphans," as we read in the margin. Orphan is a word, which of all others gives an idea of the absence of comfort, as the spectacle of a united family, the parents and the children striving, without jealousy and without rivalry, to excel in kind offices to each other, is, perhaps, as genuine a picture of human enjoyment as is to be found on earth. Enter the family over which two affectionate and pious parents preside, and the scene of domestic happiness that presents itself to you, will be apt to make you forget for a moment that this is a world of change and disappointment. You behold contentment and joy beaming in every countenance, and you confess at once that sorrow is a stranger to such a dwelling. Go into the family which death has invaded and sent the parents to an untimely grave, and you behold a scene of the most painful description,—a number of helpless children without a controlling and directing head, each one cast upon the stormy ocean of life, like a frail bark left in the midst of the sea without a mariner to guide its path through the troubled waters. If the orphans are of such tender years as not to comprehend the nature and extent of the loss which they have sustained, you will view them as objects of unmingled pity, deprived as they are of their natural guardians, and thrown in a state of great weakness and helplessness upon the care of a selfish and unfeeling world. They know not the tenderness of a mother's love, nor the kindness and preciousness of a father's care and superintendence. Although their lot may be cast among friends who will supply their temporal necessities, yet they may be exposed to numberless privations and hardships in consequence of the want of vigilant and affectionate parents. And the case of many orphans is indeed much more distressing than this. When the last surviving parent is laid in the dust, the children may be left without maintenance, without protection, without counsel and discipline; they may fall into the hands of unprincipled and hard-hearted relatives, or be abandoned to the neglect and cruel treatment of hired guardians. No condition on earth is, in general, more sad and disconsolate than that of an outcast orphan; no tale so touching as that of the orphan's wrongs and sufferings.

Many are the wants and anxieties of children; and no one is so well fitted to relieve them as the natural guardian—the parent. When the child is born to poverty, no one will submit to so patient industry, and to so self-denying frugality, to supply its necessities, as a parent. When the child is in sickness, no presence will so effectually satisfy the wistful eye of the little sufferer as the presence of a parent; no hand will so gently smooth the pillow of distress as the hand of a parent; and no voice will so sweetly calm the agitated spirit as the voice of a parent. When the child is thoughtless, and wayward, and prone to yield to the power of temptation, no warning comes with so much effect as from the lips of a beloved and pious parent. When the child is inquisitive on the subject of religion, as most children are whose minds are at all directed to divine things, no one communicates religious instruction more impressively than a consistent and enlightened parent. When the child is brought under convictions of sin, and longs not merely for knowledge but for salvation, to whom can he unbosom himself with more confidence than to a godly parent, and who so suitable as such a parent to point his views to the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world? Who will be so faithful and persevering as the Christian parent in explaining the difficulties that perplex the mind of the young inquirer, when he begins in earnest to attend to the things that belong to everlasting peace? Who will pray so importunately that "Christ may be formed in him"? Happy, beyond expression, is the child who has a parent to perform all these kind and important offices in his behalf; and "comfortless," below human estimation, is the child who is deprived of such a parent. He may not for a season be sensible of the full amount of the loss which he has sustained, but he will feel it afterwards in a thousand ways, which we can neither describe nor imagine.

And should the orphan be of such years at the time of his bereavement, as fully to estimate the magnitude of his loss, his case is, for a time at least, more painful and distressing than that of the infant orphan. He has lost not only a guardian and protector, but a companion and friend;—at the earliest, his most attached, his most valuable friend. He has lost one, whose parental care he has been able to appreciate; one to whom he has been looked up with esteem and reverence; one who was dear to him as his own soul, and whose existence seemed essential to his own. Such an orphan is indeed cheerless and comfortless. The distant past happiness seem like a baseless vision; the present is a season of intense agony and mourning, and the future is shrouded in clouds of impenetrable darkness. His case cannot fail to touch every heart in which glows the least spark of human sympathy, and to allay the bursting sorrows of such a sufferer, is one of the most valuable offices of friendship.

Such an office does Jesus undertake in behalf of his disconsolate followers. He foresaw that his departure would plunge them into the depths of sorrow and anguish; and, with more than paternal tenderness of an affectionate parent pitying his beloved children, he gives them the assurance of consolation in his absence. "I will not leave you comfortless." I will not leave you in the most painful and forlorn condition of orphans. I will not leave you destitute of support, protection, instruction, and comfort. I will do infinitely more for you than the fondest earthly parent could accomplish. When he breathes his last, he has nothing to leave nothing with his children but his blessing. He is withdrawn from them for ever. They see him no more, and partake no longer of his offices. But death will not sever the mystical relationship that subsists between you and me. You shall even behold me again with your bodily eyes; and when my presence shall be finally withdrawn from you, you shall continue to be partakers of my spiritual benefits.

"I will come to you." There are three senses in which these words may be understood; and all of them were verified in the happy experience of the disciples.

1. The words imply that Jesus would return to the apostles after his resurrection, and converse with them as before his crucifixion. And O how refreshing was the prospect of such interviews, few and brief as they were! This anticipation was, indeed, well calculated to alleviate their sorrow. What is it that occasions the most poignant distress to the right-hearted youth in the death of a truly Christian parent? It is not that he fears his parent is lost, and that he shall not see him arrayed in shining robes on the morning of the resurrection; but it is that a complete and lasting separation has taken place between him and an honoured parent; and that he shall see his face, and hear his voice, and receive his warm embraces, and enjoy his improving society no more on earth. The shades of evening shall close around the former dwelling of the departed saint, but he returns no more "to bless his household." The beams of the rising sun shall shine as bright as ever on the smiling cottage, but no more the parent gladden the domestic circle when they assemble for their morning devotions. That form which carried joy along with it into the bosom of his family is no more beheld; and that tongue which edified and delighted the listening circle is silent in the grave. The elder branches of the family contemplate the loss of a godly parent with intense but unrepining sorrow; and the little ones who used to cling to his knees to receive his caresses and his blessing, view the empty seat with hearts ready to burst for anguish. And what, think you, would give them instant relief and unbounded joy at such a moment? Would it not be the return of their beloved parent, were such an event consistent with the will of their heavenly Father? Could he have said to them in his expiring moments, "I must indeed die and leave you for a time; but after the lapse of a few days I will return to you again, and then we shall resume our happy intercourse;" would not every heart have bounded with joy at such an intimation? or would not, at least, such a prospect have rendered the pang of separation endurable? Such, then, was the cheering intimation which Jesus gave his disciples. As if He had said: I must soon be parted from you, but I will not leave you comfortless. You must indeed have a season of sadness and perplexity, but it will be short. "I will come to you." I will return in person, and administer to you comfort and encouragement; and then shall your sorrow be turned into joy. And the event answered the intimation. Jesus came to his disciples after he had burst the fetters of the tomb. And the inspired historian fails not to tell us that the disciples were glad when they saw the Lord." Nay, into such a transport of delight were they thrown when they fully recognised the presence of their risen Lord, that holy exultation was for a time the predominating feeling,— "they believed not for joy, and wondered."

2. Jesus came to his disciples by his Spirit. And this I take to be the meaning of the expression which he had chiefly in view. When he returned from the unseen world his stay on earth was short; and, refreshing as his visits to his followers were, they were few, at considerable intervals, and of short duration. But he sent them "another comforter to abide with them for ever." He sent the Holy Spirit to supply his place when his own bodily presence was withdrawn. And thus the promise of Jesus, that he would not leave them comfortless, proved a true and faithful saying. He returned to them from the grave, but not to abide with them permanently. He soon ascended up where he was before; but, in fulfilment of his promise, he sent the Holy Spirit in his room. And as it was the office of this heavenly messenger to testify of Jesus, and to receive of the things that are his, and show them to their souls, by his residence in their hearts Jesus himself might be said to dwell within them. In every new view of divine truth which the Spirit gave them, and in every promise and invitation, warning and exhortation of Jesus which he brought to their remembrance, they felt as if He had been present with them and addressing them. And thus Jesus might be said to be present with them by the indwelling of his Spirit. And hence the language of the Apostle John: "Hereby know we that Christ abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us."

All who know the history of the day of Pentecost are aware, that on that memorable occasion the promise of Jesus was fulfilled. The Holy Spirit came to the disciples in all his fulness of gifts and graces. And from that hour we hear no mourning on their part on account of the withdrawal of Christ's personal presence. Nay, so abundantly was his absence supplied by the sanctifying, invigorating, and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit, that we find them happy, joyful, triumphant. In the midst of opposition and persecution, we read, that "they were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost."

But the gracious promise under consideration, was not confined to the disciples. It extends to believers of every age. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," are the cheering words of Jesus. He still dwells in the hearts of his people by faith. He is ever present with them through the indwelling of his Spirit. And they still know what it is to have "times of refreshing," when Jesus comes to them with special tokens of his love. May he manifest himself still more to our souls, in the reading of the Word, and in the ordinances of his grace, and uphold us in all our sorrows and difficulties with his free Spirit!

3. But, again, Jesus came to and for his disciples at the hour of death. Then the time of separation was over; and Jesus having gone to prepare a place for them, returned to take them to himself, that "where he was, there they might be also." And at this moment, while we are prosecuting our toilsome journey through the wilderness of this world, they rest from their labours, and tune their harps to the praises of "Him who loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood." Ye who know the Lord, comfort one another with these words; for Jesus will come to you also in your dying moments, and his rod and staff will comfort you as you pass through the gloomy valley. Wait then for the coming of your Lord; "for yet a little while, and he that shall come will come." Walk now by the faith of the Son of God; and when "He who is your life shall appear, ye shall appear with Him in glory."

COLONIAL SKETCHES.

No. I.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BURNS, D. D.,
Minister of St. George's Church, Paisley.

THE fathers of the Reformed Church of Scotland were by no means inclined to throw a geographical boundary line around their patriotic and their Christian sympathies. "Within the realm of Scotland," indeed, lay that interesting field, to which were consecrated the peculiar labours and sufferings of their apostolic ministry; but they did not merge in the character of "Scottish ministers" that of members of the Church universal. They contended for the rights and privileges of their own establishment at home, and with a zeal and constancy to which there are few parallels; but they did not consider this as at all inconsistent with a due regard to the interests of other Churches abroad, with which they sought to form alliances more sacred and more spiritual than those to which mere worldly endowments from a common purse can give rise. We can refer, with deep interest, to the "acts" and "actings" of our earlier General Assemblies in proof of the Catholic spirit of our Church, when she maintained a friendly correspondence with the reformed Churches of the continent; when she helped, by her contributions, the poor students of Lithuania; when she sympathised with, and struggled for, the persecuted Protestants of the Palatinate; and when she longed, and prayed, and strove, for the "coming of Christ's kingdom" with "power and great glory."

A Church that felt such interest in those who were associated with her, by similarity of principles, and by fellowship in suffering, could not, by any possibility, be indifferent to the spiritual concerns of her own kindred abroad. It was not, indeed, until the commencement of the seventeenth century, that the Church of Scotland had an opportunity of manifesting her substantial sympathies with her expatriated brethren. The progress of commerce was slow; and other causes than mercantile and commercial speculation contributed to form the ties of continental and foreign relationship. Scottish regiments were long kept in the service of the Dutch republic; and these regiments were viewed by our Church as so many parishes, to which pastors and sessions behaved to be appointed; and "the church in the army," was long an interesting branch of the Scottish Presbyterian system. When the sword of persecution moreover, was drawn against our forefathers, multitudes were driven into exile in foreign lands; and the spiritual interests of our countrymen in Holland and in America became to themselves and to their brethren at home a matter of deep and pungent concern. Besides those who fled, or who were banished to the former of these countries, not a few of the most eminently pious ministers and laymen from England and Scotland became settlers in the transatlantic colonies; and the Church which had been watered by their tears at home, was transplanted to a foreign soil, where it fixed its roots, and extended its healthful branches. In its progressive march, the "spirit of the pilgrims" diffused a blissful influence all around; while they who remained at home were cheered and invigorated by good tidings from abroad.

As illustrative specimens of the interest which the Church of Scotland has taken in the spiritual concerns of her children in foreign parts, we may select the following out of many that might be quoted.

It was in August 1641, that the case of the Scotch congregation at Campvere in Holland came for the first time formally under the notice of the General Assembly. Prior to this period, Baillie and others had corresponded with the minister of the Church at the factory, sending him and his people information of the proceedings in Scotland regarding both the Church and the monarchy, and receiving from them in return such useful intelligence regarding the state of religion and of literature on the continent. Still the Church at Campvere was not as yet "part and parcel" of the Church of Scotland; and it was not till 1642 that an act of Assembly was passed engrafting this interesting branch on the parent stock. The terms of that act are worthy of notice: "A motion was made in the Assembly, that it seemed expedient for correspondence that might be had from foreign parts for the welfare of this Kirk, that the Scots Kirk at Campvere were joined to the Kirk of Scotland as a member thereof." The object of the motion was not to establish a correspondence with foreign parts;—that had been established long before;—and the design of the present measure was to facilitate and systematize this correspondence. Campvere was to be the key of access to foreign parts; and in order that the advantage arising from this connection might be more fully and securely enjoyed, it was desirable that a permanent link of relationship should be formed betwixt the congregation of that place and the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Here again, we have to notice what is said about "the weal of this Kirk," that is, the Kirk of Scotland, as closely involved in the maintenance of correspondence with foreign parts. It was "for" the welfare of the Church at home that an intimate alliance should be kept up with Churches of Protestants abroad; and it was "for" the establishment of this alliance, and the maintenance of the brotherly fellowship, that a motion was made to incorporate Campvere with the Church of Scotland, "as a member thereof." And what was the result? "When motion being seriously thought upon and considered in the Assembly, they approved the motion, and ordered Master Robert Baillie, minister at Cilwinning, to write to William Spang, minister at Campveir, and to request thereof, willing them to send their minister as a ruling elder, instructed with a commission to the next General Assembly, to be holden at St. Andrew, the last Wednesday of July 1642, at which time they shall be enrolled in the books of the General Assembly as the commissioners of the General Assembly of Scotland, from the Scots Kirk at Campveir." This was done accordingly; and from that period down to the present day, the representation of the Scotch Church at Campvere, although that Church, as a distinct society, has ceased to exist, occupies a place on the roll of the General Assembly.

On the first of September 1647, we find the General Assembly transmitting a letter of advice "to their countrymen in Poland, Swedland, Denmarke, and Hungarie," and an excellent letter it is. It is addressed to the "Scots merchants and others, our country people scattered" in those lands; and it opens with the expression of a wish, that "grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ" may be with them. It then goes on to state, that although the Church of Scotland had had great difficulties to conquer in maintaining the true reformed religion among its own members at home, "yet, since the mighty and outstretched arm of the Lord had brought them out of Egypt," and had permitted them again to enjoy the benefits of an established ministry, and regularly organized courts, it had been their earnest desire and aim "to set forth the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the purity of his ordinances, not only throughout Scotland, but in other parts also, so far as God gave them a call and opportunity so to do." Among other things of this nature, "they had more particularly taken into their serious thoughts, the sad and lamentable condition of many thousands of their countrymen who were scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd, and were, through want of the means of knowledge, grace, and salvation, exposed to the greatest dangers, whether through ignorance or through manifold temptations, terrors and false religions, or through the occasions and snares of sin." Feeling themselves thus called on to put them in mind of the one thing needful, they proceeded to administer most wholesome admonitions. They do not disapprove of their countrymen going abroad to follow any lawful calling; yet, "seeing they had travelled so far, and taken so much pains to get uncertain riches which cannot deliver in the day of the wrath of the Lord, and which men know not who shall inherit; they do from affection to the salvation of their immortal souls, most earnestly beseech and warn them to cry after knowledge, and to lift up their voice for understanding; seeking her as silver, and searching for her as for hid treasures; and so imitate the wise merchants in purchasing the pearl of price, and in laying up a sure foundation for the time to come, by acquainting their souls with Jesus Christ, and by faith taking hold of him whose free grace is now offered and held out to sinners, excluding none among all the kindreds of the earth who will come unto him." After an earnest pleading with these merchants on the great concerns of salvation, the Assembly exhort them to "endeavour to have among them the ordinary means of grace and salvation;" "to pray that God would give them pastors according to his heart, who shall feed them with knowledge and understanding;" "to set up the worship of God and ecclesiastical discipline, according to the form established and received in their mother Kirk; and to agree on a way of settled maintenance to pastors and teachers." On their agreeing to some arrangement of this kind, (and their pecuniary means enabled them to do it,) the commission of Assembly are instructed to provide from time to time, "some able and godly ministers for them, as likewise to communicate to them the Directory, for the public worship of God, and the form of ecclesiastical government and discipline, together with the Confession of Faith, and Catechisms." In the meantime, the Assembly exhorts them to attend to the maintenance of the worship of God in their families, and to continue steadfast in the faith in which they were baptized, and to adorn the Gospel by a sober and godly conversation. They also remind these their countrymen abroad, of the sufferings of the parent Church, "for the common cause and Covenant of the three kingdoms," in which "distance of place," ought not to lessen or blunt their sympathy. This letter was printed and published at the time, "in order that it might with greater ease and convenience, be conveyed to the many several places of their habitation or traffique." It is subscribed "in name of the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, by Mr Robert Douglass, moderator." I have little doubt that this apostolic epistle was, in part at least, instrumental in leading to the erection of those numerous Scottish Churches in Holland, and in the northern parts of the continent of Europe, of which Mr Steven has given some interesting notices in his "History of the Scottish Church at Rotterdam." These branches of the parent tree flourished for a season in all the loveliness of spiritual verdure, and our countrymen long "sat under their shade with great delight." But the "reign of terror" from 1660 to 1688 crippled sadly the energies of the Church at home, and her foreign relations must have suffered accordingly. It is very interesting, however, to notice, that in the darkest period of these persecuting times, we find as in the days of the apostles, the "scattered remnant" made the honoured means of sending the treasures of the kingdom to countrymen still farther removed, and of even paving the way for giving the Gospel to the heathen. Mr James Stirling, one of the ministers of Paisley, and author of the historical part of "Naphthali;" and Mr Patrick Warner, afterwards minister at Irvine, went to the East Indies, as chaplains on the establishment of the India Company, and in that capacity were honoured with extensive usefulness.

To come to a later period of the history of the Church. When the celebrated Scottish colony of Darien was set on foot, towards the close of the seventeenth century, the attention of the guardians of religion was strongly directed to it; and the settlers who emigrated from this country on that eventful expedition were amply supplied with faithful ministers, and the "Presbytery of Caledonia" was "orderly constituted." The company who set on foot the settlement had applied to the Assembly for ministers, in order that "a Gospel ministry might be settled, who might instruct our countrymen, and be useful in propagating the glorious light of the Gospel among the pagan natives." The court of directors of the company having cordially invited Mr Alexander Shields, of St. Andrews, Mr Francis Borland, of Glasford, Mr Alexander Dalgleish, and Mr Archibald Stobo, ministers of the Gospel, to be sent to Caledonia to labour "in that pious, necessary, and glorious work," the Commission of the General Assembly gave to these excellent men all due authority to preach the Gospel, to dispense ordinances, to constitute themselves into a presbytery with the usual powers and privileges, and to use all means in their power to promote the conversion of the heathen. They are empowered and advised to subdivide the settlement into so many parishes, of each of which one minister and a suitable number of lay elders and deacons were to take the spiritual charge. A general meeting of the whole inhabitants was to be held, when, with "the greatest solemnity and seriousness, they should avouch the Lord to be their God, and dedicate themselves and the land unto him." The ministers are also instructed to keep up a regular correspondence with the Church, "frequently and fully acquainting her with the whole state of their affairs, and what they may need from her from time to time." They are authorised to rely on the "cheerful forwardness of the Church at home to assist them." Some of these ministers had devoted themselves to this service for "a limited period," and they are not prohibited from returning to their charges at home; but they are "recommended, before any of them come away, to endeavour to settle the Church, and that the concerns of the Gospel be brought to some hopeful pass." So soon as any of them resolved to come home without returning, they are required to give timely notice of it to the Commission, in order that "others may be provided to go in their room." Thus anxious were our fathers to keep up a succession of faithful ministers in the colonies as well as at home, in order that the work "might not fall for the generations that were to come," and that "the children that might be born might rise up and call them blessed." Alas! the "Presbytery of Caledonia" can scarcely be said to have had an existence, except on paper; and the disastrous issue of the expedition seems to have had a most distressing effect in paralysing the zeal of the friends both of commerce and of religion in Scotland. Nevertheless, the movement in favour of the spiritual interests of the Darien colony was a noble one; and the instructions given to the "Presbytery of Caledonia," together with the faithful, but ill requited, efforts of its members, do well deserve to find a place among the "Memorabilia," or, as old Cotton Mather, the historian of the American Churches, would term it, the "Magnalia" of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

ON THE APATHY OF THE HINDUS.

BY THE REV. JOHN WILSON, D.D.,

One of the General Assembly's Missionaries to the East Indies, and President to the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.

IN going to church yesterday, my friend Mr W. and I found, stretched upon one of the public streets, a poor man apparently in the agonies of death. Though he had his head and body uncovered, and a scorching sun was pouring down his rays upon him, there was not found a single native amongst numerous passers-by and spectators, to lift him into the shade; and though he was in danger every moment of having his feeble existence extinguished by the vehicles which were moving along, there was not a single person found to remove him from the middle of the road. This wretched man was lying near the gate of the pinjarapur, an enclosure and hospital lately erected by the Jainas, for the benefit of the brutes, and which, a few months ago, received from Motichand Amichand, (now deceased,) an endowment amounting to two lakhs of rupees. The ostentatious clemency of his neighbourhood to objects which do not require it, and his unpitied and unrelieved misery, made a sad impression upon my mind, and formed a very painful exemplification, of what, alas! to me needs no illustration, of the character of the heathen, as "proud and boasters," but at the same time, as "without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful."

Some months ago, I saw a lofty cocoa nut tree, around the roots of which some gardeners had been digging, with the view of changing its inclination, suddenly fall to the ground with a tremendous crash. I rushed forward to it, that I might learn the fate of a man who was fixed among the branches composing its tuft. I found him crushed beneath the tree, with his limbs broken in two or three places, otherwise sadly mangled, and unable to speak. Several persons, including some women, were drawing water at a well, from which he was not more than two yards distant. Not a single one of them expressed the least compassion for the wretched man; and most of them filled their vessels and attempted to walk off, as if nothing had occurred. I had actually to threaten them, before I could get sufficient assistance to get him extricated! He very speedily expired.

I could fill several sheets with accounts of scenes and occurrences with which I have been personally connected, similar to those which I have now noticed, but I forbear. This apathy of the Hindus, I would remark, however, is that feature of their minds, which too many of our countrymen, who after learning their ways, come forward as their apologists, have denominated a very virtue, "mildness," "patience," or "placidity," and concerning which, they have discoursed with a sublimity amounting to the Pleiades. Verily the Hindu mind is placid! It can behold the scene of human misery with placid as a pool of stagnant water, and as placid as it can behold the funeral pile, which is to consume the living as the dead parent, without a tear can shed the blood of innocent and helpless without compunction. It can calmly look on without fear, and at the same time hail it without paration. It is placid because it is morally torpid is the victim of a creed, for the concoction of the potentates and principalities of darkness have assembled, in laborious and protracted council, the propagation and support of which, they have their chief endeavours, their arch-diabolical Let a man believe that his soul is a disintegrated the Supreme Mind, and that sooner or later, what may be its mishaps in its various transmigrations human, brute, and vegetable forms, it will re-enter mind, and be lost in its immensity, and be wilfully indifferent respecting either his own weal or that of those of his fellow. The beast of the field, the that fieth in the air, and the creeping thing, be a fact, consider as more the objects of his regard intelligent man. "Why," said I one day to the in charge of the pinjarapur, to which I have said "do you here lodge horses and cows, and form a hospital for the reception of men suffering from dire poverty?" "Man can tell his wants," he said simply, "while the irrational animals, as you call them but whom we deem as constitutionally the same yourself, would suffer independently of our interest in the solitude of their own being." It would not been difficult for me to have confounded this by an appeal to his own admitted principles. the ultimatum of the desire of the Hindu and his absorption, any attempt to protract life in any way, merely a retarding of those processes which must necessarily be gone through before that sammum be attained. I thought it better, however, to state and illustrate the doctrine of human responsibility which he had completely overlooked.

I know of an apathy parallel to that of the first which even transcends it. It is that with which inhabitants of India are viewed by the majority of professing Christians, that with which, dear readers, yourselves may possibly be regarding them! The holy and blessed book, which the true and faithful has inspired by his Spirit, to which he has appointed his own signet, which he has put into your hands, which, before men and angels, and his own omniscient you have declared your assent, which you have sworn to make the rule of your faith and obedience, and the veracity of which you have not hesitated to defend the interests of your immortal souls, declares that the heathen, are perishing for lack of knowledge, about to sink to everlasting destruction in the name of woe. God's unsearchable providence, in its wonderful actings and interpositions, and almost without the intention and agency of man, has placed a hundred and thirty millions of them, either under the direct sway, or the efficient influence of your countenance and so ordered it, that the Gospel, a specific for the moral malady, the unequalled product of God's wisdom and power, may be most advantageously offered to them in every way in which it is capable of being proposed in your native land. And yet you have never once heartily prayed, nor contributed, as the ability which God has given you, for their conversion and salvation! You have not personally, nor through the instrumentality of others, told them to flee from the wrath to come. You have not spoken to them the infinitely precious blood of Christ, of the precious fountain which has been opened for sin and uncleanness, and of the refuge which God has provided for the most guilty of Adam's sons. You have not declared to them the "love of the Spirit," ready to renovate their souls, and adorn them with all the beauty of holiness. You have not pointed them to those happy regions, into which they may enter, and in which they may experience fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore. Their moral misery, in short, you have neither pitied nor relieved; and, in despite of the last command of Christ himself, you withhold from them that instruction, which, under the blessing of God, would issue in their unspeakable and eternal happiness. In the day of inquisition, which most certainly awaits you, what will you answer for your hard-heartedness, your supineness, and your apathy?

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Disappointments.—Disappointments are inseparable from the present state of things, in which so many are contending for the same objects, and in which events are daily occurring that mar the fairest schemes, and cloud the brightest prospects of man. Though the inconsiderate and wicked are more exposed to this kind of evil, than those are who "love God, out of a pure heart fervently," and enjoy his favour and direction, yet those who are most devoted to God are not entirely exempted from it. "These endeavour to provide things honest in the sight of all men," for themselves and their households, to give their families such an education as may fit them for occupying advantageous situations in society, and for being virtuous, useful, and respected, and to do many other things, both for the benefit of individuals, and for the general interests of the community, which are good and praise-worthy. For these purposes, or such as these, they often spend much time in anxious deliberation, incur much expense, submit to much trouble, secure the co-operation of many friends, and make use of all suitable means in their power to insure success; and yet they are not permitted to have their hopes and wishes realized. However good and desirable the ends may be at which they aim, it is not always consistent with the wise purposes of God to enable them to attain these ends. Nay, it often happens that adversity breaks in upon them, and deprives them of enjoyments to which they may have long been accustomed; and their expectations of continued prosperity perish. Often when they think that every thing indicates a continuance of their comforts, clouds and darkness suddenly arise and rest upon them, and their lot becomes one of pain and trouble. Still it has something good in it for their souls.—Rev. ALEXANDER WYTHE. (The Heritage of God's People.)

Rest on the Rock—Christ.—Let us, therefore, receive with meekness the word that is grafted in us, which is able to save our souls; and ground ourselves on the sure rock—Christ. For (as the Apostle saith) other foundation can no man lay, besides that which is laid already, which is Jesus Christ. If any man build on this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hay, stubble, every man's work shall appear; for the day shall declare it, and it shall be showed in the fire, and the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work, that he hath builded upon, abide, he shall receive a reward: if any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss, but he shall be safe himself; nevertheless, yet as it were through fire. By fire here doth the Apostle understand persecution and trouble. For they which do truly preach and profess the Word of God (which is called the word of the cross,) shall be railed upon, abhorred, hated, thrust out of company, persecuted and tried in the furnace of adversity, as gold and silver are tried in the fire. By gold, silver, and precious stones, he understandeth them that in the midst of persecution abide steadfast in the word: by timber, hay, and stubble, are meant such as in time of persecution do fall away from the truth; and when Christ doth purge his floor with the wind of adversity, these scatter away from the face of the earth like light chaff, which shall be burned with unquenchable fire. If they then which do believe, do in time of persecution stand stedfastly in the truth, the builder (I mean the preacher of the word) shall receive a reward, and the work shall be preserved and saved: but if so be that they go back and swerve when persecution ariseth, the builder shall suffer loss, that is to say, shall lose his labour and coat; but yet he shall be saved, if he, being tried in the fire of persecution, do abide fast in the faith.—GEORGE MARSH. (Coverdale's Godly Letters of the Martyrs.)

Firmly Believe.—Do you say the testament is written, but my name is not here? Do you make a question of God's part, wondering if Christ died for you or loved you? Make you sure of your own part, and take no fear of God's part. If ye ask for whom Christ died; I answer, for all that hear, be they who they may, a cord is cast into a hollow pit to draw you up and many more; if ye dispute, saying, is the cord cast down for me? I will tell you how you may answer that doubt; catch and hold fast by it for your life, and beyond all question, then, the cord was cast down for you. If ye take the offer, question not his good will; step in, Christ will not ask, to whom do ye belong? and if he ask, say, I am thine; if he deny it, be ye humble and bear it. If ye ask if Christ died for you? he answers you with another question, would ye die for him? or are ye dying of love for him? That answers your question. Sinners are like a number of men swimming in a sea betwixt life and death. Christ and his merits are like a strong boat, and a man holding out both his arms, drawing them in one by one, saying, give me your hand, and he presses them in.—RALPH ERSKINE. (Discourses.)

Ye cannot serve Two Masters.—Therefore I pray you call to mind, that there be but two masters, two kinds of people, two ways, and two mansion-places. The masters be Christ and Satan; the people be servitors to either of these; the ways be strait and wide; the mansions be heaven and hell. Again: consider, that this world is the place of trial of God's people and the devil's servants; for as the one will follow his Master whatsoever cometh of it, so will the other. For a time, it is hard to discern who pertaineth to God and who to the devil; as, in the calm and peace, who is a good shipman and warrior, and who is not. But as when the storm ariseth the expert mariner is known, as in war the good soldier is seen, so in affliction and the cross, easily God's children are known from Satan's servants: for then, as the good servant will follow his master, so will the godly follow their Captain, come what will; whereas the wicked and hypocrites will bid adieu, and desire less of Christ's acquaintance. For which cause the cross is called a probation and trial, because it trieth who will go with God, and who will forsake him. As now in England, we see how small a company Christ hath, in comparison of Satan's soldiers. Let no man deceive himself; for he that gathereth not with Christ, scattereth abroad. No man can serve two masters; the Lord abhorreth double hearts; the lukewarm, that is such as are both hot and cold, he spitteth out of his mouth. None that halt on both knees, doth God take for his servants. The way of Christ is the strait way; and so strait, that, as few find it, and few walk in it, so no man can halt in it, but needs must go upright; for as the straitness will suffer no reeling to this side or that side, so if any man halt, he is like to fall off the bridge into the pit of eternal perdition. Strive, therefore, now you have found it, to enter into it; and if you should be called or pulled back, look not on this side or that side, or behind you as Lot's wife did, but strut forwards on the end.—JOHN BRADFORD. ## CHRISTIAN FREEDOM.

"He is the freeman whom the truth makes free,"
 Who first of all the bands of Satan breaks;
 Who breaks the bands of sin! and for his soul,
 In spite of fools, consulteth seriously;
 In spite of fashion, perseveres in good;
 In spite of wealth or poverty, upright;
 Who does as reason, not as fancy bids;
 Who hears temptation sing, and yet turns not
 Aside; sees sin bedeck her flowery bed,
 And yet will not go up; feels at his heart
 The sword unsheathed, yet will not sell the truth;
 Who, having power, has not the will to hurt;
 Who feels ashamed to be, or have a slave;
 Whom nought makes blush but sin, fears nought but God;
 Who, finally, in strong integrity
 Of soul, midst want, or riches, or disgrace,
 Uplifted, calmly sat, and heard the waves
 Of stormy folly breaking at his feet,
 Now shrill with praise, now hoarse with foul reproach,
 And both despised sincerely; seeking this Alone, the approbation of his God,
 Which still with conscience witnessed to his peace.—
 This, this is freedom, such as angels use,
 And kindred to the liberty of God.

A DOMESTIC SCENE.

'Twas early day—and sunlight stream'd
 Soft through a quiet room,
 That hush'd, but not forsaken seem'd—
 Still, but with nought of gloom;
 For then, secure in happy age,
 Whose hope is from above,
 A father commun'd with the page
 Of heaven's recorded love.
 Pure fell the beam, and meekly bright,
 On his grey holy hair,
 And touch'd the book with tenderest light
 As if its shrine were there;
 But oh! that patriarch's aspect shone
 With something lovelier far—
 A radiance, all the Spirit's own,
 Caught not from sun or star.
 Some word of life e'en then had met
 His calm benignant eye,
 Some ancient promise, breathing yet
 Of immortality:
 Some heart's deep language, when the glow
 Of quenchless faith survives,
 For, every feature said—"I know
 That my Redeemer lives."
 And silent stood his children by,
 Hushing their very breath,
 Before the solemn sanctity
 Of thought o'ersweeping death:
 Silent—yet did not each young breast
 With love and reverence melt?
 Oh! blest be those fair girls—and blest
 That home where God is felt.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Fra Baldo Lupetino, the Venetian Martyr.—The most distinguished of those who suffered death at Venice, was the venerable Fra Baldo Lupetino. The following account of him by his nephew, in a book now become very rare, deserves to be preserved entire:—"The reverend Baldus Lupetinus, sprung from a noble and ancient family, a learned monk and provincial of the order to which he belonged, after having long preached the Word of God in both the vulgar languages, (the Italian and Slavonian) in many cities, and defended it by public disputation in several places of celebrity with great applause, was at last thrown into close prison at Venice, by the inquisitor and papal legate. In this condition he continued during nearly twenty years to bear an undaunted testimony to the Gospel of Christ; so that his bonds and doctrine were made known, not only to that city, but almost the whole of Italy, and by it to Europe at large, by which means evangelical truth was more widely spread. Two things, among many others, may be mentioned as marks of the singular providence of God towards this person during his imprisonment. In the first place, the princes of Germany often interceded for his liberation, but without success. And, secondly, on the other hand, the papal legate, the inquisitor, and even the Pope himself, laboured with all their might, and by repeated applications, to have him from the very first committed to the flames as a noted heresiarch. This was refused by the doge and senate, who, when he was at last condemned, freed him from the punishment of the fire by an express decree. It was the will of God that he should bear his testimony to the truth for so long a time; and that, like a person affixed to a cross, he should, as from an eminence, proclaim to all the world the restoration of Christianity, and the revelation of antichrist. At last, this excellent and pious man, when neither threatenings nor promises could move, sealed his doctrine by an undaunted martyrdom, and exchanged the filth and protracted tortures of a prison for a solitary grave.

The judicious Fuller.—The following passages, from the private diary of Mr Fuller, will tend to illustrate the power of genuine religion, and to induce submission to the will of God, as well as to show the strength of parental affection:—"Death! Death! Death! all around me. My friends die. Three I have buried within a fortnight and another I shall have to bury soon! Death's judgment are all I can think about! At times I am reconciled to whatever may befall me. I am not without good hopes of my child's piety, who now lies dangerously ill, and as to her life, desirable as it is, the will of the Lord be done. A few days after, he wrote:—"But at other times I am distressed beyond due bound. On the 25th, in particular, my distress seemed beyond all measure. I lay before the Lord, weeping, like David, and refusing to be comforted. This brought on me I have reason to think, a bilious colic; a painful affliction it was, and the more so as it prevented my ever seeing my child alive again! Yes, she is gone! On Tuesday morning, as I lay in bed in another room, I heard a whispering. I inquired, and all were silent:—"all were silent!—but all is well! I feel reconciled to God! I called my family round my bed. I sat up and prayed as well as I could; I bowed my head as worshipped, and blessed a taking as well as a giving God.

CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.

By THE REV. GEORGE BURNS, D.D., Minister of Tweedsmuir.

THE survey of human character is at once an interesting and useful employment. It is interesting, as it exhibits the operation of passions extremely diversified in their nature and effects, and thus leads us to contemplate man in a variety of lights. It is useful, as it increases both in quantity and value our knowledge of human nature, and sets before us an example either worthy of imitation, or deserving of contempt. For rendering the survey of character either interesting or useful, it is evidently not necessary that the example contemplated be distinguished by its excellence. The character of a bad man is interesting, though the interest which it excites be not of an agreeable kind. The example of a bad man is useful, though its utility be wholly of a negative kind.

There is, however, one point of view in which the character distinguished by its Christian excellence, and it alone, is either interesting, or really useful; and that is as an illustration of the power and value of real Christian principle. Good example is powerful in producing conviction, as well as in exciting to emulation. It shows to what degree of excellence human nature can attain, and that nothing which the divine law requires of finite beings is either unreasonable or impracticable. And as the triumph of those who have gone before him in the same field of conflict has an inspiring effect on the untried and shrinking soldier; so the history of the conflicts and successes of the children of God in past ages is well calculated to animate the good soldier of Jesus Christ in "going on conquering and to conquer." The test of experiment being thus applied to Christian principle, how do its excellence and glory shine forth! How strikingly is it demonstrated, that while "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal," they "are mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds!" and that, while "the treasure is in earthen vessels, the excellency of the power is of God, and not of us!"

The illustration of Christian principles by suitable examples, has a tendency to bring abstract truths within the grasp of ordinary comprehension; and, by exhibiting their influence in actual life, it gives them an interest and a force which they might not otherwise possess. Truths presented to the mind in a dry and abstract manner, may gain access to the understandings of those who are accustomed to reason and reflect, but they must lamentably fail to affect the heart, and influence the conduct, of the generality of men. It is true, indeed, that the graces which Christianity recommends to cultivation, must ever be attractive and lovely; but their charms are beheld with most advantage, when they are embodied in human character, and adorn the walks of life. To have been simply told, that the patriarch Abraham possessed strong and lively faith, would have made comparatively a slight and transient impression on the mind; but when we are called to contemplate the powerful operation of that heavenly principle in leading him, at the call of God, to abandon the country which was dearest to his heart, to sojourn in a land of strangers, and to summon up the dreadful resolution of becoming himself the executioner of his darling child, we see the sincerity and strength of his faith in the most interesting and impressive light. It would have made no deep impression on the mind, to have been told, in general terms, that Moses was distinguished by the quality of meekness; accordingly, to give interest to his character, and to exhibit its practical excellence, we are called to behold him maintaining a constant struggle with an obstinate and disobedient people. Had the sacred historians contented themselves with the simple assertion, that the Syrophenician suppliant was remarkably distinguished by faith and its attendant graces, or had our Lord granted the object of her petition without putting her principles to any great severity of trial, the interest which her case excites would have been lost, and the strength and beauty of those graces which adorned her character would have failed to impress and to captivate; but when we are called to contemplate her faith struggling with discouragements and fears, and rising superior to their disheartening influence, we behold the excellence of that heavenly principle in a most interesting and impressive light; giving birth at once to unaffected humility, unsuspecting confidence, persevering importunity, and animated hope. In short, we might be pleased and impressed by a descriptive sketch of the beneficial effects which the Gospel is calculated to produce; but this pleasure and impression are equally heightened when we have presented to our view living examples of the mighty efficacy of the Word of truth in changing the sentiments, ameliorating the hearts, and reforming the lives of individual men.

On such grounds as these we may well attach peculiar value to the eleventh chapter of the Epistle addressed to the Hebrews, in which we have a definition of the great divine principle by which all the saints in every age are influenced, and are called to witness many striking specimens of its actual operation. In support of the leading statement with which the chapter opens, we have not to rest satisfied with abstract reasonings, or sentiments purely theoretical, however well conceived and forcibly expressed, under the unerring guidance of inspiration itself. We have proofs in kind, evidences drawn from real life, facts which, of all credentials, are unquestionably the most conclusive. Men who are strangers to the grand master-principle which forms the weapon of the Christian's warfare, are apt to question the reality or genuineness of his profession, nay, the value of religion altogether. Being themselves wholly under the influence of flesh and sense, they regard all reference to unseen and eternal things as visionary, and represent all pretensions to spirituality and heavenliness of mind as hypocrisy or enthusiasm. But here we find an apostle adducing numerous practical illustrations of faith's victory over sense, establishing, by an appeal to witnesses who cannot lie, that "the Christian is the highest style of man," and exhibiting such noble examples of superiority to the terrors and allurements of the world, as cannot fail to call forth the admiration of the wise and good, and "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men."

Hence, we may successfully maintain the vast importance of sacred biography, comprehending under that title not merely the records of "holy men of old," as preserved in the infallible and imperishable page of revelation, but also the annals, "short and simple" though they be, of distinguished worthies of more modern times. To those who may have it in their power to engage in a course of such useful reading, or who may wish to be directed in the business of selecting works of that description for private, circulating, or itinerating libraries, I would humbly suggest the following, as connected with the history of the Church of Christ, and well calculated to stimulate to holy activity and Christian emulation:—Robinson's Scripture Characters; Cox's Female Biography; Memoirs of Knox and Andrew Melville; of Halyburton and Brainerd; of Brown, Buchanan, and Martyn; of Newton and Scott; of Doddridge and Hervey; of Cols. Gardiner, Blackadder, Melville, and Burn; Memoirs of Eminently Pious Women; Memoirs of Newell, Graham, Ramsay, Mills, Huntingdon, and Woodbury; and though last, not least, the

Scots Worthies. From the labours, trials, and successes of eminently pious individuals, we may receive much in the way both of rebuke and of excitement. They throw us, indeed, completely into the shade, but while we feel ourselves humbled by the contrast, the effect will be salutary. The dealings of Providence with them will be most instructive to us, and the same grace which enabled them to overcome, is promised to aid every hour of trial, and to make us "more than conquerors." Imitate, then, their examples. Catch a portion of their fire. Receive the wounds which fell from their ascending chariots, and go forth to victory and triumph in the strength of the Lord God. These were the noblest of all heroes, for they achieved a victory over themselves. These were the most illustrious of all characters for they shall be "held in everlasting remembrance." These were the most happy of all beings, for they enjoyed sources of consolation and joy unknown to others; and when the fleeting dream of felicity flies from its deluded victim and leaves him a prey to real distress, their happiness received a new and inconceivable addition. As from their thrones on high they survey the race and conflict in the world below. "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." "We desire that every one of you should use diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end, that ye be not slothful, but followers of those who through faith and patience inherit the promise."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF CLEMENTINE CUVIER, DAUGHTER OF BARON CUVIER, THE CELEBRATED NATURALIST.

THE name of Cuvier is familiar to men of science—a household word. In the departments of natural history and comparative anatomy, and more especially by his researches in fossil geology, he has attained a higher fame than almost any other of his contemporaries. Though sprung of comparatively obscure parentage, he rose, under Providence, by the force of genius and unwearied application, to be one of the most distinguished men of modern times. "The man who has known this great man," says a writer in the Edinburgh Review, "and have followed him through his brilliant and diversified career, will not charge with overstrained panegyric, when we say, that the lists of fame which we have enumerated, he has not only attained a pre-eminent distinction, but acquired a reputation in each, which might have gratified the ambition of any common aspirant for fame." His talents ranked high both as a philosopher and a statesman. Our object, however, in the present article, is to present him in neither of these capacities, but as the true and amiable, the accomplished, the pious Clementine. Dutiful in her conduct, and affectionate in her attachment, he loved her perhaps too strongly; and when, at length, by the mysterious arrangements of Providence, she cannot err, she was consigned to an early grave. The feelings of the parent were so deeply wounded that his health became permanently affected, and his useful life was brought to a close.

Sophia Laura Clementine Cuvier was born at Paris in 1805. From her childhood she displayed a vigour of mind and a desire for knowledge peculiarly promising in one so young; but what more especially gratified her parents was the gentleness of her disposition and feelings. Her health was never robust; frequent complaints interrupted her studies, but notwithstanding this, her progress was astonishing. And not only in secular pursuits did she evince a desire to excel; in the knowledge of divine things, also, she made the most satisfactory attainments. Reared by her parents in the pure principles of the Protestant faith, she early manifested a lively interest in the Scriptures. She read them frequently, and with an avidity which, under the divine blessing, was followed by a most minute and accurate acquaintance with the truths of the Bible.

At the age of thirteen Clementine accompanied her father on a visit to England, and during this excursion, a circumstance occurred which shows how deeply she was imbued with a spirit of piety and prayer. She accidentally lost a small manual of devotion, which she had been in the habit of using, and, to the surprise of her friends, when the book was found, it was discovered that all the prayers contained in it were not only in the hand-writing of Clementine, but were actually her own composition. As she advanced in years a fine Christian spirit seemed to actuate her whole conduct. In every good work she took a lively interest; she visited the dwellings of the poor, and, supplying their temporal wants as far as possible, she comforted them in their distress, and pointed them to the unfailing source of all true consolation and joy. The Bible was dear to her heart, and she felt a high delight in recommending its glorious truths to others. Often would she seat herself in the cottage of the humble peasant, and with a countenance lit up with holy fervour, her fine intelligent eye beaming with a purer intensity, she would urge, in strains of more than earthly eloquence, the claims of Him who came to "seek and to save that which was lost."

Clementine was one of a committee of twelve ladies who inspect the female school connected with the Lutheran Church in Paris. In the discharge of the duties connected with this office she was most exemplary, visiting not only the classes of the school but the houses of the parents. The case of the poor was never made known to her in vain. She listened to their tale of woe with an attention and tender sympathy which gained their confidence and affection. By her instrumentality, a society was formed of young Protestants belonging to the Lutheran and the Reformed communions, the object of which was to supply food and clothing to the poor. Clementine was, besides, a collector for the Female Auxiliary Bible Society and the Evangelical Missionary Society. She also frequently visited the Alms-house for aged Protestant females, to read the Scriptures and pray with them.

While thus actively engaged in promoting the cause of Christ, to the utmost extent of her ability, this amiable young lady was seized with an affection of the chest, which excited considerable alarm in the minds of her parents and friends. It was towards the close of the year 1826 that the pulmonary symptoms first began to develop themselves; and for nearly three months she was confined to her bed. During this illness her mind was brought more completely under the sanctifying influence of the truth as it is in Jesus. She thought, and read, and prayed much, and her soul thirsted after a nearness of communion with her God and Saviour. Earth and earthly objects dwindled, in her view, into utter insignificance, when compared, or rather contrasted, with things spiritual and divine. She loved to dwell in thought upon the love of Christ; and while it presented itself to her mind in all its impressive grandeur and sublimity, she felt that her affections flowed forth in the most ardent responsive love to Him who hath loved us with an everlasting love, and in mercy hath redeemed us. Now, if not before, she was prepared, in some measure, to comprehend with all saints the height and the depth, the breadth and the length of the love of God in Christ Jesus, which passeth all understanding. While her heart thus glowed with gratitude to a redeeming God and Saviour, she directed her thoughts with the most intense application to the truths of religion. Distant alike from the pride of reason and the bewildering of an ill-regulated imagination, she calmly and impartially examined into her real condition and character, and consulted such works as were likely to enlarge her knowledge both of the letter and spirit of the Bible. The books which were at this time the companions of her sick-bed were Buck's Christian Experience, Scott's Force of Truth, Gregory's Evidences, Appia's Christian Life, and several works of Dr Chalmers. These she read carefully, and extracted those passages which tended to bring her mind and will more completely into captivity to the obedience of Christ.

Though in her reason, however, Clementine was fully convinced of the truth and inspiration of the Scriptures, she complained much that her heart was not sufficiently impressed with the value of those blessings which are proposed for our acceptance as sinners. But she well knew that faith is not of ourselves; it is the gift of God; and, accordingly, we find her writing to a friend in these words: "Every day brings me fresh proof of my own insufficiency; but 'ask, and it shall be given you; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' These words save me from despair." The following sentiments, contained in another letter written about the same time, shows that she felt deeply her obligations to the sovereign grace of God:—"It is not God, the Creator of the world, that we really love, but God the Saviour,—God who receives us graciously. The heart only feels real love to God, as it embraces the mysteries of the Gospel. The mercy of God, his love for sinful creatures, is manifested in an admirable manner and degree in the work of redemption; and when that redemption is embraced, the heart must be regenerated, and consequently filled with love and gratitude to its Saviour; but till then it remains cold and insensible. The grace of God rises in my soul; I comprehend the mercy of the Lord Jesus, and certainly I experience the sweetness of his promises."

With such feelings and desires, the soul of Clementine was soon filled with holy joy and peace in believing. Hence in another letter she thus writes:—"I want to tell you how happy I am: my heart has at length felt, what my mind has long understood; the sacrifice of Christ answers to all the wishes, and meets all the wants of my soul; and since I have been enabled to embrace with ardour all its provisions, my heart enjoys a sweet and incomparable tranquillity. Formerly, I vaguely assured myself that a merciful God would pardon me; but now I feel that I have obtained that pardon, that I obtain it every moment, and I experience inexpressible delight in seeking it at the foot of the cross. My heart is full, and it is now that I understand the angelic song,—'Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will towards men.' But that which has especially affected me, and has, by the grace of God, opened to my view all the tender mercy of the plan of our redemption, is the import of those gentle but assuring words, 'He will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax.'"

As she advanced in experimental acquaintance with Scripture truth, her love of the Bible became more ardent. It was the delightful companion of her solitary hours, and pondering over its sacred pages was to her a higher enjoyment than all that earth could afford. "I experience a pleasure in reading the Bible," she said to a friend, "which I have never felt before; it attracts and fixes me to an inconceivable degree, and I seek sincerely there, and only there, the truth. When I compare the calm and the peace which the smallest and most imperceptible grain of faith gives to the soul, with all that the world alone can give of joy, or happiness, or glory, I feel that the least in the kingdom of heaven is a hundred times more blessed than the greatest and most elevated of the men of the world."

In such a frame of mind the lovely Clementine was truly happy. Draw near, ye fond admirers of the pleasures and fascinations of this alluring and deceitful world; take your seats beside the couch of this dying saint, young, it is true, in years, but far advanced in Christian experience; see the calm serenity, the smiling benignity of her face; listen to the accents of holy resignation which fall from her lips. What is the burden of her thoughts? She has lived in the full enjoyment of the comforts, nay, even of the luxuries of life; she has been beloved, caressed, flattered; nought that could administer to her earthly enjoyment and happiness has been denied her, and yet she speaks not of earth nor of the things of earth. The sunshine of heaven brightens up into a rapturous animation those eyes, beaming with intelligence, which sparkle like gems on her pale, her emaciated countenance. Such was the pious Clementine, as she lay stretched upon her sick-bed, comforting and encouraging all around her with the consolations of the Word of life. To one of her Christian friends she thus wrote:—"Ours is, indeed, a delightful intimacy, for it will never end. Often I anticipate the day when we shall be all united in the same love. Oh! how unhappy must they be who know not the sweetness of such a hope! and what thanks do we not owe to that God who has given us the experience of its power!"

In the beginning of the summer of 1827, Clementine's health appeared to be so far restored that her parents were naturally desirous of seeing her comfortably settled in life. The object of her choice, amid the numbers who aspired to her hand, was a gentleman in every way worthy of the high confidence she reposed in him. The marriage was expected to take place on the 25th of August, and with those chastened feelings which become a Christian in the view of so important a step, she wrote in the following terms to a friend:—"I do not ask of God to make me happy, but to sanctify and purify my soul; and I expect that he will keep and preserve me in the important event. The profound conviction, that there is an infinite and merciful Being, who orders all things, that not a hair of the head falls without his permission, and that he will control every circumstance for my real welfare, gives me an habitual peace and tranquillity which nothing else could inspire."

How often, alas! are our fairest hopes blighted, our fondest expectations disappointed. The thoughts of the Almighty are not as our thoughts, his ways are not as our ways. He dashes the cup of earthly happiness from our lip, that we may learn from our own experience that there is a God who judgeth in the earth. The day of Clementine's marriage was fixed, preparations were made for the happy event, but ere the day came, the lovely, the admired Clementine was laid a patient sufferer on her dying bed. Death had long become familiar to her; she had been accustomed to gaze upon the king of terrors, until, by the habitual exercise of a strong and lively faith, she had obtained the victory over him. On the 16th of August the apprehensions of her friends were excited by the return of a very copious expectoration of blood. She was now obliged to remain in bed, and enjoined to perfect silence. Her countenance bore the aspect of severe anxiety and suffering, but the peace of God kept her calm and heart through Christ Jesus. Frequently were her hands clasped and her eyes directed towards heaven. "God has been ever present with me," said she to a friend; "he has led me; nature recoiled from suffering, and became impatient, but God was ever with me to renew my strength." "Pray for me," she said to another friend, "I can no longer pray."

The intended husband of Clementine was a constant attendant upon her in the chamber of sickness, and he strove by all that care and kindness could do to alleviate sufferings which he was unable to remove. On one occasion, when he seemed to be overcome by the painful feelings which agitated his bosom, she thus addressed him, with a tenderness indescribable: "We must be resigned; do not murmur; without doubt, I shall be grieved to leave so many persons whom I love; but it is the will of God, I am ready." Her submission to the divine will was evidently cordial, not constrained; it was the submission of a dutiful and affectionate child to the arrangements of a kind and indulgent parent. And yet it gave her great uneasiness when any of her friends praised her on account of her patience and exemplary resignation. "It is God that supports me," was her reply, on an occasion of this kind. "I feel that he is with me; and if he leaves me I feel his absence in a moment." "If God grants you patience," said a visitor, "he sees that you merit his favour." "Heh," said she, with evident displeasure, "talk not of merit." Sometimes her sufferings were most excruciating and painful, so that she would long for death to relieve her. "I would rather die at once," she exclaimed, during a violent paroxysm; but observing her sister weeping, she checked herself, "O how selfish I am! I will take any medicine, and try every remedy, because I wish to recover for your sakes." When her father expressed his wonder at the readiness with which she submitted to the most painful remedies, "It is because I wish to get well," she replied, "I am so happy with you." "X, kind father," she exclaimed, with a heart overflowing with affection, "is indeed to me a blessing from heaven."

A short time before her death Clementine presented to her intended husband a copy of Thomas à Kempis' invaluable treatise "On the Imitation of Christ," which she had marked some passages which had struck her in the course of reading. This affectionate Christian friend was unremitting in his attentions to one whom he loved dearest upon earth; and separated as they were about to be for a time, he felt a melancholy pleasure in watching beside her dying couch. One day, while seated by her bed-side, gazing, perhaps, upon the gloomy prospect which awaited him, when he wandered through the wilderness of this world companionless and alone, Clementine broke in upon his meditations with the sudden request, "Lay your head there," and placing her hand upon it, she offered up a fervent prayer in these words, "Lord, bless us both! Let us restore me that I may love thee more; but if thou hast otherwise decided, thy holy will be done."

On the 28th September the disease appeared to have reached its height. She had been delirious throughout the night, but during the lucid intervals which occurred she gave utterance to expressions of lively faith in the Redeemer, and of child-like acquiescence in his holy will. A few hours before her death she said to a friend, "You are my sister in Christ,—for eternity—this is life; there is nothing else deserves the name."

Clementine's last moments were passed in dreadful agony; and though about half-an-hour before her departure she recovered the use of her speech, she was unable to do more than pronounce the names of her friends. She was evidently desirous to address a few parting words to them, but she could only press their hands. When heaving her last sigh, a smile of transcendent loveliness settled down upon her countenance, and her happy spirit passed to the bosom of her God and Saviour.

* A daughter of Madame Cuvier by a former husband.

When the cold remains of Clementine were deposited in the coffin, an incident occurred which it may be interesting to mention. It is customary in France, on such occasions, to raise the hands of the deceased, place them on the breast, supporting them in that position, by some object which was valued by the departed. In this case the attendants had selected a volume of sermons which Clementine had highly prized. When the Baron came to take the last look of the body of his beloved daughter, he inquired what book supported her hands; and on being told, "That will not do," said he, "the Bible was my daughter's book; is there not one here?" An interleaved copy was shown him, which, on looking at the title page, he instantly recognised. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "that was her book," and he placed it under the hands of the lifeless body.

The death of his amiable and affectionate daughter produced a deep impression upon the mind of Cuvier; and though he endeavoured to divert his thoughts by engaging in literary pursuits, he never recovered his wonted cheerfulness and elasticity of mind. The following extract exhibits the distinguished philosopher and statesman in a very amiable point of view.

"It has been related by an eye-witness," says Mrs Lee, the memorialist of Baron Cuvier, "that at the first sitting of the Comité de l'Intérieur at which he presided after the death of his daughter Clementine, and from which he absented himself two months, he resumed the chair with a firm and placid expression of countenance; he listened attentively to all the discussions of those present; but when it became his turn to speak, and sum up all that had passed, his firmness abandoned him, and his first words were interrupted by tears. The great legislator gave way to the bereaved father; he bowed his head, covered his face with his hands, and was heard to sob bitterly. A respectful and profound silence reigned through the whole assembly; all present had known Clementine, and therefore all could understand and excuse this deep emotion. At length Cuvier raised his head, and uttered these few simple words,—'Pardon me, gentlemen, I was a father, and I have lost all.' Then, with a violent effort, he resumed the business of the day with his usual perspicuity, and pronounced judgment with his ordinary calmness and justice."

In closing this brief memorial of a youthful Christian, whose eminence in holy attainments may well make multitudes of hoary-headed professors to blush and be ashamed, we would urge upon the reader, while he sighs over the shortness and the uncertainty of life, to dedicate henceforth every energy of his heart and mind to the great work of preparing for eternity.

THE BENIGHTED PILGRIMS.

No. IV.

BY THE REV. LACHLAN MACLEAN.

Chaplain to the Lunatic and Blind Asylums, Edinburgh.

WHEN overtaken by some unexpected calamity, or oppressed by a load of grief, after the first burst of passion has subsided, man's earliest desire is to impart his sorrows to some friendly ear; as if the sufferer expected, by communicating his griefs to another, to be relieved from a portion of his burden—and such, to a certain extent, is exactly the result. While we treasure up in solitary sadness thoughts that fill the heart with anguish, we feel that our griefs are strictly personal,—but disclosed to another, they lose their individuality of character, and seem to be diminished when shared by the friend to whom we address ourselves. If the desire of thus turning to our brethren for relief, when visited by affliction, proves the social character of the human race, it must also be regarded as one of the kindest provisions of heaven for our comfort in this state of frequent suffering, since it disposes us to ask advice when we are generally but ill qualified to direct ourselves, and inclines us to look for sympathy at a time when sympathy, above all, is what we require. Yet although such is the general character of our race, exceptions too often are to be met with in the case of individuals, who, either from natural temperament, or accidental circumstances, shun all partnership in grief, and brood in silent wretchedness over their concealed sorrows. If persons of such a disposition are occasionally found even among the sane, it may be safely stated that they uniformly constitute no small portion of the inmates of lunatic asylums. In both cases, the first encouraging symptom is a willingness on the part of the patient or mourner to disclose his griefs; without this, the energy of the physician, or the tenderness of the friend, will be of little avail; for, although both may use every means that skill or prudence can suggest, yet unless assisted by the objects of their solicitude, and encouraged by their confidence, the most judicious efforts will, in most cases, prove unsuccessful. This confidence, the insane are, in many instances, singularly unwilling to grant. Soured at the world, irritated by what appears to him an unnecessary and cruel exile, or convinced of the hopelessness of his condition, the gloomy lunatic refuses to disclose the wound that rankles in his breast. While this repulsive feeling exerts its fatal influence over the clouded intellect, it is, we again repeat it, vain in general to expect a satisfactory result. But when the unhappy patient unfolds his feelings, and points out the source of suffering, we can then apply the remedy; and, if insanity proceeds not from some constitutional cause or physical derangement beyond the reach of human skill, the most encouraging anticipations may reasonably be entertained.

In reference to the foregoing remarks, an occurrence of an interesting nature, in which the sad effects of a silent uncommunicative disposition, and the happy consequences of an opposite line of conduct are strikingly manifested, may now be related.

The individual whose case is about to be stated, was, in early life, my class-fellow; we were also members of the same literary society, which latter circumstance enables me to form a more accurate judgment of his talents and principles, than I possibly could have done had we only met in a public class-room. It may be sufficient to observe, then, that I ever looked upon him as a person of unaffected piety, studious habits, and very respectable talents. To the best of my recollection, however, after the lapse of many years, he was of a shy and retired disposition, and of a somewhat melancholy temperament. After the society broke up, we met only casually and but seldom; consequently, my opinion respecting his temperament is not supported by observation carried down to the period of his confinement, but depends upon an early and possibly erroneous impression. It need scarcely be stated that the young man's mental malady had no influence in forming the above judgment, as I would, if asked, have expressed the same opinion, had he never been so situated.

The first time that I visited the asylum, the superintendent accidentally mentioned the gentleman's name and profession, and upon learning that we were acquainted, requested that I would try to ascertain the cause of his derangement, as he conceived it originated, in a great measure at least, in something that still preyed upon his mind, the nature of which, on account of the patient's reserved disposition, he had not discovered. I made the attempt several times, but did not succeed; he met me kindly, even affectionately, and always begged that I would see him soon again; but, excepting the most pathetic expressions of grief for his own sinfulness and unprofitableness as a servant of Christ, he said nothing that could enable me to discover what it was that haunted him night and day; although I perceived at once, by his words, that the mental anguish which he unceasingly endured was principally, if not altogether, caused by some particular incident upon which his mind brooded with fatal constancy. At last I gained the wished for information, and found that he had at one time entered into some arrangements to go abroad professionally; circumstances, however, occurred, which rendered this unadvisable, and the matter fell to the ground. For this change of mind he reproached himself, conceiving that he had wilfully disobeyed the call of God; and, by a gloomy and despairing interpretation of "woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel," concluded, that his everlasting destruction was inevitably sealed, by his having committed an unpardonable sin. Against this opinion I used every argument which the case suggested; the poor sufferer heard me patiently, expressed himself grateful "for the pains I took to convince him he was wrong, wished it were possible to change his mind;" but always concluded, with a sigh, "that it was impossible."

On one occasion, when I called, I found my friend engaged in secret prayer, in which duty I understood he spent the greater part of the day. The all-engrossing subject of his thoughts was again reverted to; and, after about an hour's conversation, I was delighted to observe an alteration in his conduct; he listened attentively to my remarks, stated several objections indeed, but evidently with the desire of having them removed. This was the first day I ventured to entertain hopes of his recovery; nor were my expectations long of being realized; the patient's mental and bodily health rapidly improved. I then recommended that he should devote part of the day to study; the proposal delighted him; by the kind attention of the superintendent, a private room, with every convenience, was provided for him, and he began to compose a sermon.

On my next visit to the Asylum, I went into his study, and witnessed, with no small interest, the accomplishment of the object intended by my advice. Old habits were again formed, and the load that oppressed the troubled soul was removed. After a few commonplace remarks, the young man pointed to his papers, and declared, that now indeed he felt happy and comfortable, and could look forward with delight to the time when he would leave the Asylum, and engage in the active duties of life; events to which I had previously in vain attempted to direct his attention. He was shortly afterwards discharged, and preached on the first or second Sabbath immediately following; I believe on the first.

In the course of a day or two after leaving the Asylum, the then happy man called upon me, and while alluding to his former sad situation, expressed the strongest feelings of gratitude towards the officers of the establishment for their uniformly kind and indulgent treatment. His recovery, he observed, was, in his opinion, in a great measure caused at first by the conversation formerly mentioned; but above all, by the duties of the Sabbath, which, breaking in upon the dull monotonous round of a solitary life, had called into exercise his mental powers, and of course enabled him for a time to forget his sorrows. In support of this I may observe, that even when suffering most severely, he seemed to experience temporary relief during the time of divine service; as he always listened with the deepest attention, and afterwards by his remarks proved that his mind had been completely occupied by the duties in which he had been engaged.

In this way, then, I conceive, the delusion was gradually, and unconsciously for a time on the patient's part, dispelled, and the habit of sober reflection regained, by his being regularly led to meditate upon truths, which otherwise, while wedded to his own gloomy opinions, he never probably would have thought of. Reason, thus permitted at intervals to reassume its place, gained fresh strength by every victory over the disease, until at last it became too powerful to be shaken by the dreams of insanity. It ought, perhaps, to have been stated, that the case at first appeared utterly hopeless; though harmless and inoffensive as a child to others, the worst consequences were to be dreaded to the individual himself. His bodily strength was gone; his mental powers were prostrate, and deprived of all energy, excepting in one fearful line of thought; even had nothing else happened, a broken heart and a wounded spirit would, in all human probability, soon, amidst the struggles of an unassisted conflict, have terminated his earthly sorrows.

It may, perhaps, be thought, that my previous acquaintance with the patient secured me his confidence: this by no means, however, follows as a necessary consequence; for in many instances, such is the singular perversity of a deranged intellect, this fact, instead of forwarding, might have militated against my views. In the case before us, it certainly did aid my endeavours, but not at all to the extent that might have been expected. While the patient lived in the unbroken gloom of insanity, although respectful and kind to me personally, yet early recollection seemed to him a name without a charm. I no doubt frequently spread, if I may so speak, a picture of the past before him, but, after a cold and hurried gaze, he turned to the sad and dreary outline of actual existence. I spoke to him as a friend; he acknowledged, yet slightly dwelt upon the claim, wishing to address me rather as the Christian teacher. In this latter capacity the breach was made; that once gained, private friendship was gladly permitted to assist in securing the opening. In a word, whenever a favourable change was produced upon the sufferer, it proved how dear to him was the memory of the past. Names, where, alas! names alone existed, were repeated with affectionate remembrance, and incidents followed by youthful associations were referred to as sources of pleasing and animating reflection. Without doubt his having known me disposed him to receive me in a favourable manner; for the first time we met he remarked, "I thought when the name was mentioned to me, it might be you: I am glad it is so, for I would have felt had it been a stranger." But, as stated above, until Gospel arguments, precepts, and promises, had softened the lonely heart, that heart remained unmoved by the entreaties of human friendship. The above narrative, although long, will not, I trust, have appeared tedious, as, combined with the facts previously stated, it most distinctly proves, that to the inmates of lunatic asylums the Gospel has not been preached in vain, and that they are, in very many instances, not only able, but willing, to appreciate the blessings of the Gospel.

An occurrence may now be related, which, but for the peculiar character of the subject of this paper, would scarcely perhaps correspond with the gravity of the present work. The occurrence is pleasing, because it exhibits the insane in a cheerful, even playful state: a situation proceeding, in a great measure, from the salutary changes that have of late years taken place in their treatment. While surrounded, on one occasion, by a few of the patients, the conversation happening to turn upon preaching, all with one voice condemned the discourses. Partly to divert their attention, by drawing them out, and partly to ascertain if the insane, in both institutions with which I am connected were of the same mind on this subject, I took the opposite side of the question. After a little argument had passed, maintained by the other party with a good deal of labour and ingenuity, the discussion was closed for the time by my observing, "Well, I shall bring a written discourse with me next Sabbath, and then you can give me your opinion." After the promise was fulfilled, I waited for the opinion of my critical friends. That, as fully expected, gave a most decided preference to the unwritten over the read discourse; while, at the same time, it was plainly, though very politely hinted, that as it was the first, so it would be as agreeable to us.

hearers if it were the last experiment of the kind. I appeared convinced, having gained the desired object, and stated that the argument was at an end. One of the most hopeless, though certainly most talented of my hearers, delighted that I seemed to condemn in theory what I had never approved by practice amongst them, asked, if ever I had heard a story to the point, connected with Dr Blacklock? Upon my replying in the negative, he observed, "Two old women, who had been hearing that gentleman preach, were, while returning home, engaged in discussing the merits of the speaker; one remarked, "I liked him well; but, oh! he stuck close to the paper." "Stuck to the paper!" exclaimed the other, "the minister is stone blind." "Blind!" replied her friend; "would that they were all blind together! we would then surely have less reading." The anecdote was told in a most arch and humorous manner; and, by the effect which it produced upon the small group of listeners, evidently afforded them no small amusement.

Frequently, indeed, I have been astonished at the acuteness displayed by some, even of the most deeply afflicted of the insane, when led into conversation; nor have I been less surprised at the proofs of affection which they have given to those with whom they were intimately acquainted. In fact, scarce a day passes in which such conduct is not manifested. Many instances of this might be enumerated, but it may be sufficient to state one. Under ordinary circumstances, an incident like the following might perhaps appear trifling and unworthy of notice; but will scarcely be regarded in such a light, when the place and situation of the persons alluded to are remembered. Some years ago, at the conclusion of divine service, one of my hearers (in a hopeless state of insanity) remarking that I had caught a slight cold, offered to prescribe an infallible remedy for me,—a quarter of a pound of barley sugar, used at once. I begged my medical adviser to permit me to divide the prescription, but to no purpose: "it must," she exclaimed, "be taken at once, to do any good." About a year and a half afterwards, my watchful friend abruptly remarked, "You are rather hoarse, I perceive, today; did you follow the advice I gave you?" With some difficulty calling to remembrance the said advice, I stated that I had certainly used more than the prescribed quantity since the time referred to. The patient, placing her hand upon my shoulder, and fixing an eager gaze upon me, inquired if I had used the remedy at once? Here I had to plead guilty of disobedience to instructions. "There now," exclaimed the poor woman, while her eyes were actually filled with tears, "you will not follow advice; you ought to do what you can to save life; it is your duty, and you know it well." The conduct of the patient affected me much; it was truly a most unexpected display of kindly feeling in one whose countenance, voice, and whole frame bore at all times melancholy proofs of the sad effects of a continually fevered intellect; yet she, who was herself so prominently the child of misery, could feel, yes, even spare a tear, for others. It was, indeed, as a bright, a sunny spot in some dreary desert, the more lovely when contrasted with the unbroken gloom and desolation of the surrounding scene. Such an incident, I repeat it, would, under ordinary circumstances, be of too trivial a nature to merit the passing notice even of a moment; but viewed in connection with its affecting associations, it must touch the feeling heart, and encourage the efforts of Christian philanthropy in behalf of this deeply interesting, but sorely afflicted, portion of our race. Two mites were in themselves a paltry, a contemptible offering to cast into the treasury, and unworthy of being handed down to the admiration of future ages; but the two mites were the widow's offering, the friendless widow's all, given, too, under the most exalted of motives. Regarded in this light, the offering is no longer insignificant, but rises above all earthly price, and casts into the shade the most splendid gifts of worldly ostentation. So is it in the case stated above; the remarks were, no doubt, childish, the tear was quite uncalled for; but both prove that even the maniac's heart can be moved by sympathy, and that the importance of his message will secure to the messenger the respect, nay, at times, the affectionate regard of his suffering flock.

The two last mentioned anecdotes, besides, are, from their very nature, probably better calculated than even those of a graver description, to remove fear or alarm from the minds of such as may be called to labour among the insane. When treated with kindness, when their confidence is gained, which must be sought with caution, and, above all, when their feelings and wishes are consulted, and their prejudices tenderly dealt with, these poor persons will (I speak from experience) prove that they are still our brethren, and although bowed down in the dust, that they may yet be partakers of our holiest desires and kindest sympathies. In all this, however, it ought distinctly to be understood that, unless supported by the other officers, the labours of the Christian teacher in lunatic asylums will prove fruitless; that support the writer has received, and to it, he cheerfully admits, is to be attributed, in no small degree, the favourable result of the introduction of divine service into the two institutions referred to in this and the foregoing papers. That result has been thus minutely detailed, simply to direct public attention to the strong claims which the insane have upon Christian sympathy; and by showing the equally encouraging effects of religious service in both establishments, to dispose those who have the charge of similar institutions, or whose influence may be sufficient to accomplish such an object, to extend the benefits of divine worship to all the dreary mansions of insanity. Of the propriety of such an arrangement no doubt can now reasonably be entertained; it is only strange that doubts should have existed so long on such a subject, when even some of the sufferers themselves, convinced of the utility of religious consolation, had gone the length of pointing out its advantages. In proof of this, I may be permitted to give the following interesting extract from a letter, written in 1819 by one who had experienced the griefs which he so pathetically describes:—"Where insanity," says the writer, "is not caused by any outward bodily infirmity, it is assuredly a physician of the mind, not of the body, that is most likely to effect a cure; where it is brought on by the person's own evil passions, or those of others (the most common of all cases), who so proper as a physician of the mind to correct such disorders? Where it is occasioned by worldly misfortunes, who so proper to administer consolation and the hopes of a better world? And lastly, where insanity is caused, as it very frequently is, by false and mistaken views of religion itself, who so proper as a clergyman to apply with effect our Saviour's character as the great Physician of our minds or souls?" It is, indeed, sad to think that a mind so intellectual in its habits, and so correct in its conclusions as the above remarks prove, should have been, at the same time, the abode of melancholy disease; but it is also comforting to learn that the amiable and talented writer witnessed, though not, perhaps, in the way contemplated by him, the accomplishment of what he had anticipated from spiritual consolation, and, it may be, personally experienced its blessed effects during the season of his own mental suffering.

The field that has thus unexpectedly been opened to religious enterprise ought not to be left unoccupied; in every corner, then, in every solitary abode of wretchedness let the seed be sown, and the cheering words of heaven's glorious message be proclaimed. Thus may we prove that knowledge is, indeed, in a progressive state, and that, while animated by our fathers' zeal, we are yet guided by sounder judgment, and resolved to atone, as far as in us lies, for the cold neglect of former years, for the aggravated sufferings of the unhappy maniac. Sad, truly, were the lengthened ages of darkness that rolled over the insane. Among the Jews, to escape from the chains and fetters prepared for them by their brethren, they fled from the abodes of the living to the tombs of the departed, the Eastern asylum in all ages for guilt or houseless misery. Sad, too, was their condition, even under a more perfect dispensation, when no voice carried to them the tidings of peace, and no hands were spread forth while the blessing of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit was implored upon their care-worn heads. Their sufferings were naturally great, but alas! these sufferings were increased by their fellow-men, for not only were they cut off from the enjoyment of earthly sympathy, but never led, except in their own lonely musings, to reflect upon what Bethlehem commenced and Calvary completed. They listened not to the words of human friendship, nor were they ever cheered by being reminded of a Saviour's pity, of a Saviour's love to the children of affliction. Had this neglect been caused by indifference to the present or future happiness of the insane, by no language, however severe, could it be sufficiently condemned; but such, we well believe, was not the case; it proceeded from ignorance of the true condition of the lunatic. That obstacle is now, to a certain extent at least, removed, and the experience of every year will, we trust, tend to remove it still more completely. Let the Saviour's command, then, "to preach the Gospel to every creature," be obeyed, as far as possible, in its most general acceptation. Let the Saviour's example of tenderness towards sufferers, such as those for whom we plead, be imitated by announcing to them the gracious purposes of eternal goodness, and encouraging them, even in the lowest depths of misery, to hope for the salvation of a pitying God. Frail man has not, it is true, the power of the Redeemer to rekindle in a moment the quenched lamp of reason, or in a few hours to change the furious maniac into the calm and attentive bearer, "sitting in his right mind," listening to divine truths; but let man use the means, in faith, and the same Spirit who wrought in Judea will still prove his presence by silent, it may be, yet distinctly marked operations; he will still manifest himself, in an especial manner the God of the afflicted, the unchanging friend of the desolate mourner. In this respect, then, it is the Christian's imperative duty to walk in the footsteps of his God, by offering the balm of consolation to every child of sorrow; but oh! above all, it is his duty to soothe the wounded spirit, to support reason when reeling on her lofty throne; to attempt by heaven-born truths to break, if dissipate he may not, the gloomy cloud by which the prostrate intellect is enveloped. By the attempt he may, at least, alleviate the sorrows that he cannot cure, and remove, perhaps, a few thorns from the rough path that leads to the grave, where at last, on nature's humble couch, will rest in peaceful slumber the once throbbing head and broken heart of the poor benighted pilgrim.

THE INDIFFERENCE OF NOMINAL CHRISTIANS TO THE EXTENSION OF CHRISTIANITY:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. WILLIAM LOGIE,

One of the Ministers of Kirkwall and St. Ola, Orkney.

"Am I my brother's keeper?"—GEN. iv. 9.

THE birth of Cain, the first-born of woman, must have been an event peculiarly joyful. Even in ordinary cases, "there is joy when a man is born into the world," which makes the fond mother forget the anguish which she has endured in terms of the original sentence. There were circumstances, however, in the condition of the primeval pair, which must have made such an event productive of more than ordinary gladness. They had been expelled from that happy region, in which they had conversed with heavenly visitors, and had borne with them into the wide world, the comparatively howling wilderness, those social affections for which there seemed to remain no sphere of operation more extensive than their intercourse with one another. The acquisition, therefore, of another, in their own likeness, and the prospect of future and increasing interchange of thought and affection with him, could not fail to assuage the feeling of loneliness and dereliction, which must have weighed down their spirits in their sadly altered condition. These considerations might, doubtless, in part, account for Eve's exulting exclamation on the occasion of Cain's birth, "I have gotten a man from the Lord." But as these words are equally capable of being translated, "I have gotten the man, the Lord," or "the man, Jehovah," there appears much probability in the conjecture of those interpreters who think that Eve expected an immediate fulfilment of God's gracious promise, in the advent of that illustrious offspring of her's, who was to bruise the serpent's head, and that she hailed the birth of Cain as that of the world's predicted Deliverer, who was to wrest from her tempter his usurped dominion, and restore the paradise which, in an evil hour, she had lost. How sad, then, must have been her disappointment in her first-born son, when she beheld in him those dark manifestations of character, which made his countenance to fall, and how bitter and poignant her grief when he whom she had fondly hailed as the Prince of Peace rose up against his own brother and slew him, and the bright star of her hopes went down in guilt, and misery, and blood! How sad and how striking a confutation does Cain's history afford of the vain theory, that crime proceeds not from innate depravity, but from the corrupting influence of evil example! As if to afford a prospective argument against such a scheme, God permitted the very first scion from the stock of fallen humanity—the eldest born of the first sinner—to proceed to the utmost verge of crime, by committing an act which, even in the judgment of man, surpasses all others in turpitude and atrocity. Instructive fact, indeed! The first man born into the world, who had no corrupting society to mislead him, no multitude to follow in doing evil, became a murderer, and the murderer of a brother! It were beside our present purpose, to dwell on the remorse and wretchedness of Cain after the commission of a crime, the very novelty of which must have added to the horrors with which it is ever invested. But misery was not the only effect produced on his soul by the deed he had done. We have, in Cain's case, a melancholy illustration of the manner in which sin produces sin, in which one species of depravity generates another, and the whole soul is inundated with a flood of pollution and guilt, to which one unguarded inlet has given admission. Mark how falsehood and unfeeling selfishness are manifested in the first murderer's reply to his Maker and his Judge, when he calls him to account by that startling interrogatory, "Where is Abel, thy brother?" Cain said, "I know not; am I my brother's keeper?" Ah! Cain, dost thou not know? or rather, has not sin so obscured thy conceptions of Jehovah, as to give thee hope that thy falsehood will blind Him to the sad reality? Shall we more shudder at this barefaced lie, or at the selfishness of what followed, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Even had some evil befallen Abel without his brother's knowledge, there had been great baseness in the unconcern implied in these words, in which Cain disclaims all obligation to look to the welfare of his brother, or ward off from him any danger to which he stood exposed. Had he never murdered Abel, such language would have bespoke a state of mind as detestable as that of a murderer, an indifference to the safety of one connected with him by the tenderest ties. It was saying, in other words, "If Abel has met with any harm, what is that to me? Is it my business to watch for his safety, or am I accountable if he has perished?" The mind recoils with disgust from such cool-blooded selfishness, and ceases to wonder that he who could harbour and express such a sentiment, should imbrue his hands in a brother's blood. Yet, brethren, the spirit manifested in these words has not been confined to Cain, nor to those of his father's descendants, whose feet have, like Cain's, been swift to shed innocent blood. While countless millions stand exposed to a death far more formidable than that which Abel died, even the death, the endless, hopeless misery of the soul, and while the brethren of their flesh, who might be instrumental in snatching them from the yawning pit of perdition, stand aloof from the work, and, like the priest and Levite in the parable, pass by on the other side, does not their conduct speak the language of the first murderer, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Let us for a little attend to the several forms in which this spirit is seen to manifest itself in many professing Christianity. It does so,

I. In a total inattention and indifference to the spiritual welfare of our fellow-men, and especially to the conversion of the nations sitting in darkness. Such indifference is naturally to be expected in those who manifest no concern for the blessings of salvation in their own case; for they cannot be expected to feel any anxiety to procure for others, what they neither feel the want nor know the preciousness of, in themselves. But, for persons making a profession of religion, calling themselves Christians, and manifesting a desire to obtain, or a satisfaction in having obtained the favour of God through Jesus Christ; for them to live in wilful ignorance of what is doing for extending the Gospel-salvation to a world sitting in darkness, or to withhold their aid in rescuing their fellow-men from a wretched eternity, is such an inconsistency as may well suggest a suspicion, that their profession is worthless, and their religion vain. Acknowledging the divine inspiration and truth of the Scriptures, they must admit that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby they may be saved, but the name of Jesus; neither can they be so ignorant of the state of this world, as not to know, that to an immense majority of its present inhabitants that name has never yet been announced, while countless multitudes, who have never heard, or never acknowledged it, are daily passing into eternity, with that sentence unreversed which has gone forth against all of Adam's race as transgressors of Jehovah's law. When we consider how many centuries have revolved since the first publication of the Gospel, it must be regarded as truly mysterious, that, down to the present day, many an extensive region of this fair earth is yet lying in spiritual desolation, the inhabitants bowing down to dumb idols, sacrificing to devils, or deluded by the foolish fables of the licentious and sanguinary impostor of Arabia. It is, indeed, a most melancholy fact, that only about a fifth or sixth part of the whole population of this globe, are yet even nominally the disciples of Him who came to seek and to save the lost, and whose will and charge it was, that his Gospel should be preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem: and the fact is, as we have said, mysterious, as well as melancholy, and must be ultimately referred to the counsels of God, who, while he doth all things well, "giveth account of none of his matters," and to whose arrangements our Lord has taught us to bow, in the language of humble deference, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." Considering that God has declared it to be his will, that all ends of the earth shall see his salvation, and considering how speedily, after its first promulgation, Christianity became the religion of the whole Roman empire, it appears most wonderful, that it is yet unknown to so many millions of our race. It must, however, be remembered, that in the primitive ages an extraordinary dispensation of the Spirit, accompanied by miraculous gifts, was employed for the establishment and spread of the Gospel, God making bare, as it were, his own almighty arm to plant the Christian Church in the midst of its foes, whereas he has ever since left the advancement and completion of the great work, under the ordinary influence of his Spirit, to the instrumental exertions of his professing people, the salt which is to salt the whole earth, the leaven by which the great mass of human society is to be leavened. Much of the mystery to which we have adverted, in the comparatively little progress Christianity has yet made in the earth, disappears when we consider how feebly and imperfectly man has acted his instrumental part in promoting the grand design of heaven. During the many ages in which Christianity was debased into a grovelling superstition, there was, indeed, zeal enough for the propagation of what bore its name, but the emissaries of the Romish Church contented themselves with annexing one country after another to the spiritual domination of the Pope, by whom their inhabitants were handed over to the temporal and tyrannical rule of the despots of Europe, or compelled by bloody wars, threats, chains, and tortures, to make a hypocritical profession of the religion of their masters; or if any of them embraced it sincerely, they received only a new superstition little superior to those which they abandoned, the worship of relics, pictures, and saints, so called, being substituted for that of the stocks and stones which they formerly adored, while that heaven-inspired volume, which contains the true religion of Jesus, was carefully locked up from their perusal. Since the blessed reformation from Popery, great exertions have indeed been made for the conversion of heathens, Mahomedans, and Jews, and especially during the last half century; exertions which, in many regions of the earth, have been crowned with abundant success. Yet the numbers who have thus been brought, not merely to the profession, but to the saving and experimental knowledge of the Gospel, bear a very minute proportion to the immense multitudes of our race who are yet sitting in darkness, utter strangers to the true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. And why is it so, but because a proportion as inconsiderable of the world called Christian have yet devoted either their personal services, or a portion of their worldly substance, to the prosecution of that grandest and holiest of all enterprises, the rescue of a perishing race from destruction? How great, alas! is the number of professing Christians, even of those who seem sincerely to believe in Jesus Christ, and to worship God through him, who can hear of the spiritual destitution and wretchedness of whole nations of their brethren, with a frigid indifference, which seems to say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" How many even consider the narratives of Missionary enterprise as unworthy of their perusal, greedily swallowing the details of warlike or political strife, at home or abroad, while they disregard the annals of the Redeemer's kingdom, amidst the coming splendours of which the poor petty contentions of princes, nobles, and demagogues will shortly sink into everlasting oblivion!

But the spirit of the text is not merely manifested in indifference to the great work of evangelizing the world. We may contemplate it,

II. In the readiness, in the avidity which many professing Christians evince in admitting objections, and joining in censures, against the men and the measures by which that work is carried on.

Since it has pleased God to employ the instrumentality of men in converting and saving their fellow-sinners,—an economy in which his wisdom and kindness are so apparent,—it must necessarily follow that while "the excellency of the power" will more visibly appear to be "of God," yet the work will, in its progress, exhibit some symptoms of the imperfection which adheres to the human agents by whom it is conducted. And if the censures of which we have spoken were directed only, and directed in a meek and Christian spirit, against the errors, and imprudences, and shortcomings of those agents, there would be no room for complaint, but, on the contrary, such censures would constitute a necessary and a salutary control. But we often see the good work itself attacked through the sides of its human promoters, and the whole undertaking scouted and ridiculed on account of the failures or the errors of those who carry it on. If Bibles are improperly bestowed, or abused by those who receive them, Bible circulation is sneered at and condemned; if here and there a Missionary acts imprudently, or a mission fails, all attempts to send a preached Gospel to the heathen are decry'd. Nay, if the great undertaking be not in any particular region of the earth accomplished all at once, if a nation be not born in a day, the objectors to whom we are alluding, with rash and hasty judgment, brand the whole scheme as vain and visionary. How long, and how loudly, were such censures persisted in against the efforts made in our day to Christianize the islanders of the great Pacific Ocean? The Missionaries were long derided and persecuted in those regions, and those persons at home who wished ill to the cause joined in the ridicule, as they would, if in their power, have joined in the persecution. And even of those who had embarked in the arduous enterprise, some few, discouraged by repeated failures, in the faintness of their hearts relinquished the work; but the greater part persevered, "against hope believing in hope," and waiting God's chosen time; and that time at length arrived, when, in the Friendly and the Sandwich Islands, the people turned from their dumb idols to the living God, and now churches and schools, and the arts and institutions of civilized life, are established among those who, about forty years ago, were naked, prowling savages, worshippers of idols, offerers of human sacrifices, murderers of their own children, and addicted to several abominations which can scarcely find a parallel in the history of any other people. And yet, even these splendid triumphs of Christianity have not silenced the cavils of the gainsayers. Freethinkers and worldly-minded travellers have, in short and casual intercourse with those islanders, met with some dishonest men, or some profligate women, and a whole host of infidel pamphleteers and reviewers have raised the cry that the Missionaries have done nothing, and that they have deceived the world with exaggerated accounts of the effects of their labours. Ah! if the success or efficacy of the Gospel in any Christian land were to be judged of on such a principle, where were the country that could be called Christian? Might not a Chinese or a Hindu, by a similar mode of reasoning, prove that there was no Christianity in London, or that Christianity had done nothing for its inhabitants? Are there no bad men, no abandoned worsen there? or, among ourselves, are there no drunkards, no thieves, no lewd persons, whom a traveller might meet with, sooner, perhaps, than he would meet with any other, and would he be justified in judging of the whole by these, and concluding that religious feeling and upright principle dwelt not in our land? Yet such are the miserable cavils, such the revivals of the oft-confuted sophism, that the abuse of a thing disproves its value or its existence, which are too greedily listened to, and too readily believed, by many professing Christians, who thus only prove that they are glad to find an apology for their unconcern in the work of enlightening the nations, and a cloak for the withering selfishness which dwells in their hearts, and speaks that language of the first murderer, "Am I my brother's keeper?" But,

III. Another disguise under which the same wretched sentiment may be found to exist, is in the misapplication of a maxim, in itself true,— "Charity ought to begin at home." There is, say some, ignorance, and vice, and profaneness enough in our own land, and in our own neighbourhood, and we see no obligation on us to care for the distant heathen, till remedies are first applied to these. Most true, indeed, it is, that in spirituals as in temporals, charity ought to begin at home; but the very terms imply that it ought not to end there. Most true it is, that if any provide not for his own, specially for those of his own household, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel; and the parent neglecting the religious education of his own children, or the magistrate failing to support the religious or educational establishments of the place where he rules, or the private Christian doing nothing for the spiritual improvement of his own vicinity, who should yet lavish much on missions for the conversion of the heathen, would be acting a most preposterous, a most inconsistent, and a most unchristian part. But we can affirm, without fear of contradiction, that the persons who shelter themselves under the plea we are now considering, are not those who are most distinguished by their faithful performance of domestic duties, or their liberality in promoting Christian light and Christian principle at home; while, on the other hand, the men who are most dutiful and conscientious in consulting the spiritual welfare of their own households and neighbourhoods, will be found the most ready and willing to extend a helping hand to the efforts made to enlighten other lands. Let no man, then, excuse his parsimony by saying, "Charity begins at home;"—at home let it begin, and we shall hope that, after watering its own garden, it will enlarge its channel, and send forth its streams to fertilize and beautify other fields, to cause the wilderness and the solitary place to rejoice, and the thirsty desert to blossom as the rose.

IV. Another excuse, made by those who lend not their aid to the advancement of the Gospel, is, that "they cannot afford it." Let the rich, of their abundance, send Bibles and Missionaries to the heathen, or schoolmasters to the young Highlanders or young Hindus;—I have received but a small portion of this world's goods—such exertions of beneficence are not for me—"Am I my brother's keeper?" Yes! even you of little wealth and lowly station, even you has God, the Great Proprietor of all, constituted your brother's keeper, the keeper of his soul, the provider, according to your measure, of the means of salvation to every one of Adam's race who needs your aid, and to whom it can by possibility be extended. Your humble station, or comparative poverty, cannot exempt you from this most sacred obligation, this paramount claim of humanity. Did it exempt the servant in the parable from responsibility, that he had but one talent committed to him? So he thought, and wrapped it in a napkin, and hid it in the earth, because it was but one. But what was the judgment of his Lord? "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." God requires not so much from you as from the wealthy, but he demands what you can do for his glory, as imperatively as from them. What you have is all from Him, and it is a light matter that you dedicate a portion of it to the advancement of his glory, and of that work upon earth, which, in his estimation, far excels all others in importance; even the bringing many sons unto glory, many perishing brethren of your own flesh to the fountain of bliss that shall never end. He who gave you all you have, and who can, at his pleasure, take it all away, will bless the store, however small, from which you, with a willing heart, dispense a portion to the spiritual necessities of your brethren. How did he applaud the poor widow of Jerusalem, who cast in her two mites into the treasury! Far from blaming her for giving of her penny, he commended her above all the great ones who cast in much. When, of old, the Lord called in his chosen Israel, to fashion and bring together the various materials and furnishings of that splendid tabernacle, which was a lively type of the Christian Church, did he require, or did he accept only the offerings of the affluent? No, he called on all who were "of a willing heart, on every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whom his Spirit made willing;" and, in obedience to that call, it is written, that "all the willing-hearted among the people came," and while the rulers brought gold, and onyx stones, and spice, and sweet incense, the poor brought their ram-skins, and badger-skins, and the very women that were wise-hearted did spin, and brought of that which they had spun for the service of the Lord's tabernacle, and they brought till it was found necessary to restrain them from bringing, "because the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much." Oh! that there were such a spirit now among the professing people of God, to contribute to the rearing of that nobler tabernacle, that spiritual temple, every stone of which is a "living stone," an immortal soul, placed there out of the Destroyer's reach, and which is destined, through human instrumentality, to rise and grow till that auspicious day, when "God shall bring forth the head-stone thereof with shoutings," the shoutings of the heavenly hosts "saying, grace, grace, unto it." Happy shall he be in that day who has contributed, however humbly, to that blessed consummation, while a fearful curse stands on record against those, who "come not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." But the plea, "we cannot afford it," may be heard from other lips than those of the poor. It is often preferred by those who can find the means of personal decoration, perhaps of intemperate indulgence, but have nothing to spare for the advancement of the cause of God, and the noblest interests of man. Their contribution is not wanting, when the materials are required for a midnight revel, or for furnishing forth some gaudy pageant, or some festival of giddy mirth; and it is no wonder they cannot afford to lend a helping hand to the dissemination of the Bible, or the maintenance of the Missionary, when the claims of God are postponed to those of every frivolous pleasure, every empty vanity, every glittering toy of earth. Till the hearts of such are changed, their gifts to God's treasury are not to be expected, and are not to be desired; for "the Lord loveth a cheerful giver," and scorns the offerings of those who give grudgingly, and not of a willing mind. On such we call not to mingle their extorted gifts with the free-will offerings of the faithful; but on God's people do we call, to be fellow-workers with God,—on the members of Christ's Church do we call, to extend the boundaries of that Church,—on the sons and daughters of the Scottish Church do we call, to strengthen her hands stretched forth to the work of the evangelist—to rally round the standard she has unfurled on the mountains of Scotland, and on the plains of Hindostan, if not by their personal services,—for all are not called to preach the Word,—yet, by stately devoting a portion of their yearly gains to swell those funds, which are to prove the sinews of a warfare with the prince of darkness, and the materials of a triumph, in which all who contribute to it shall partake.

Finally, brethren, anticipate the searching scrutiny and the unerring discriminations of that coming day, which shall discover who have been on the Lord's side, or who have warred against him, or evinced the hostility of their hearts, while a mighty conflict was waging around them between light and darkness, between Christ and Belial, between the Redeemer of souls and the Destroyer of souls; and while partners of their nature were standing on destruction's giddy brink, and a motion of their hand might have saved them, hid themselves from their own flesh, and said, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

A MISSIONARY SCENE AT THE SAMOA ISLANDS.

ON entering the mouth of the spacious and beautiful Leone bay, we were boarded by a person who introduced himself as a "son of the word." We gave him a hearty welcome, and learned, in reply to our inquiries, that in his district about fifty persons had embraced Christianity, had erected a place of worship, and were anxiously waiting my arrival. This information was unexpected and delightful, and I determined immediately to visit the spot. With this intent we lowered our little boat, and approached the shore. When about twenty yards from the beach, as the heathen presence rather a formidable appearance, I desired the main crew to cease rowing, and unite with me in prayer, which was our usual practice when exposed to danger. The chief, who stood in the centre of the assembled multitude, supposing that we were afraid to land, made the people sit down under the grove of bread-fruit, cocoa-nut, and other trees which girt the shore. He then waded into the water nearly up to his neck, and took hold of the boat, when, addressing me in his native tongue, he said, "Son, will you not come ashore? will you not land amongst us?" To this I replied, "I do not know that I shall trust myself; I have heard a sad account of you in this bay, that you have taken two boats, and that you are exceedingly savage; and perhaps when you get me into your possession you will either injure my person or demand ransom for my release." "Oh," he shouted, "we do not savage now; we are Christians." "You Christians!" I said, "Where did you hear of Christianity?" "Oh," he exclaimed, "a great chief from the white man's country, named Williams, came to Savai, about twenty moons ago, and placed some tama-faifo, 'workers of religion,' there, and several of our people, who were there, began, on their return, to instruct their friends, many of whom have become sons of the Word. There they are; don't you see them?" Looking in the direction to which he pointed, I saw a group of about fifty persons seated under the wide-spreading branches of large tau and other trees, apart from those whom he had ordered to sit down along the beach. Every one of this group had a piece of white tau cloth tied round his arm. I inquired of the chief what this meant? when he replied, "They are the Christians, and that cloth is to distinguish them from the heathen countrymen." "Why," I immediately exclaimed, "I am the person you allude to; my name is Williams. I took the workers of religion to Savai twenty moons ago!" The moment he heard this I made a signal to the multitude, who sprang from their seats, rushed to the sea, seized the boat, and carried both it and us to the shore. Upon landing, Amata, the chief took me by the hand, and conducted me to the Christians; and after the usual salutations, inquired where they had heard of Christianity. Upon this, one of their number, rather more forward than his brethren, replied, that he had been down to the "workers of religion," had brought back some knowledge, and was now engaged in imparting it to his countrymen: "And where is our chapel," said he, "don't you see it?" Turning to the direction in which he pointed, I saw a small rustic place of worship, which would hold about eighty or a hundred people, peeping through the branches of the bananas and bread-fruit trees in which it was sheltered. Accompanied by my loquacious friend, and two or three others, I asked him, on reaching the house, who performed service there on the Sabbath-day? To this he instantly replied, "I do." "And who," I inquired, "has taught you?" "Why," said he, "don't you not see a little canoe by the side of your boat, when we carried you on shore just now? that is my canoe, in which I go down to the teachers, get some religion, which I bring carefully home, and give to my people; and when that is gone, I take my canoe and fetch some more. And now you are come, whom we have been so long waiting! When shall your teacher? give me a man full of religion, that I may expose my life to danger, by going so long a distance to fetch it." I was truly grieved at being compelled to tell him that I had no Missionary. On hearing this, he was affected almost to tears, and would scarcely believe me; for he imagined that the vessel was full of Missionaries, and that I could easily supply the demand. This, however, was impossible; but I trust that the day is not distant, when Missionaries will not be doled out as they now are, but when their numbers will bear a nearer proportion to the wants of the heathen. And why should not this be the case? How many thousands of ships has England sent to foreign countries to spread devastation and death? The money spent in building, equipping, and supporting one of these, would be sufficient, with the divine blessing, to convey Christianity, with all its domestic comforts, its civilizing effects, and spiritual advantages, to hundreds of thousands of people.

It will not be supposed that these poor islanders knew much about the principles of the religion they had embraced, neither was there any thing in their dress or persons, except the piece of white cloth round their arms, to distinguish them from their heathen brethren; yet, rude and unseemly as their appearance was, I could not but look upon them with feelings of the liveliest interest, and regard them as an earnest of the complete victory that the Gospel would shortly obtain over the superstitions, the idolatries, and the barbarities of the inhabitants of the whole group.

Another circumstance which added great interest to this scene was, the striking contrast between my reception and that of the unfortunate La Prouse; for if he be correct in the name he has given to the bay, this was the same in which his lamented comrade, M. De Langle, and eleven of his crew were most barbarously murdered.

After viewing their rude chapel, I accompanied the chief to his dwelling, when I inquired if he also had become a worshipper of Jehovah. To this he replied in the negative; but added, "If you will give me a worker of religion to teach me, I will hahitahi, (become a believer,) immediately." It was with sincere regret that I was compelled to say, that it was out of my power to do so; but still I exhorted him to unite with the Christians, and to give them all the countenance he could. Thus were this people, who had been esteemed most ferocious, and who had ill-treated or massacred some of the crews of all the vessels with which they had intercourse, prepared to receive us.

On returning to the ship, I found that Makes and our people had been much entertained by natives from the adjoining valley, who were anxiously waiting to present an earnest request that I would pay them a visit. As soon as I stepped on board, the chief seized me most cordially; but esteeming me greater than himself, he only rubbed his nose on my hand. He then assured me, that he and nearly all his people were Christians; that they had erected a spacious place of worship in imitation of the one built by the teachers at Sapapalii, from which place he had lately come, and brought the lotu; and that he was daily engaged in teaching his people what he himself had been taught by the Missionaries. Upon my saying, that, from my knowledge of the native character, I did not place implicit confidence in all that I had heard, he adopted a most effectual method of convincing me of the truth of his assertion; for, placing his hands before him in the form of a book, he recited a chapter out of our Tahitian primer, partly in the Tahitian dialect and partly in the Samoan; after which, he said, "Let us pray;" and kneeling down upon our little quarter-deck, he repeated the Lord's Prayer in broken Tahitian. The artless simplicity, and apparent sincerity of this individual pleased us exceedingly. We gave him some elementary books, made him a trifling present, and promised, if possible, to call and spend a day or two with him on our return from Savaii.*

COMMUNION SERVICES.

By THE REV. PATRICK BOOTH, A. M.,

Assistant Minister of Innerleithen.

No. III.

BEFORE COMMUNION.

MANY a pompous ceremony of superstition and idolatry has fallen into disuse and oblivion, since the institution of the pure and simple ordinance which we are now met to celebrate. The gaudy inventions of men are lost and are forgotten, but the unadorned arrangement of the wisdom which is from above remains to this day. The gorgeous monuments of conquering heroes have mouldered away, and the place where they stood is unknown; but the unostentatious memorials of Him who expired on a cross, amidst insult and suffering, continue, and shall continue, to the end of the world, protected by his providence, and founded on the affections of a faithful people.

It was on a night of sorrow and sadness, that our Saviour instituted this holy ordinance, and in sorrow and sadness have his followers often done this in remembrance of their Lord. In deserts, and in mountains, and in dens, and caves of the earth, they have sought a shelter from the cruel arm of persecution, and in danger, wretchedness, and concealment, have obeyed the dying command of their Master. But we, my brethren, are this day met for the same sacred purpose, having none to make us afraid. No oppressor threatens us—no fear interrupts our devotions. We assemble at our Lord's table, and depart from it, in peace, and we incur no risk of injury or suffering by serving our God, as his Word commands, and our conscience dictates. What shall we render to the Lord for all his benefits? We will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. We will pay our vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. In the courts of the Lord's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem! In the earnest trust that you have come to present yourselves before the Lord after that suitable preparation, and with that proper frame of mind which will render you acceptable in the sight of Him who, although no longer present to our bodily senses, is not far from any one of us; I shall now proceed to put into your hands the symbols of his broken body and shed blood; and, my brethren, what gratitude ought to fill your hearts, when ye reflect that, although unworthy of yourselves to taste even the crumbs which fall from your Master's table, yet is every true Christian his welcome and honoured guest!

AFTER COMMUNION.

The acceptable guest at this table is he who fears God with all his heart, and who only requires to know his will in order to perform it—who praises him, and prays to him, as the Being on whom his happiness in time and in eternity depends—who gives to him the adoration due to the Author of every good and every perfect gift—who, trusting to his infinite wisdom and goodness, is prepared, at all times to say, "Not my will, O Lord! but thine be done"—who supremely desires the friendship and blessing of him in whose presence there is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures for evermore. The acceptable guest is he who builds all his hopes of salvation on the Gospel of Christ, who regards his blood as the only fountain which cleanseth from sin, who delights to walk even as he also walked, who joyfully acknowledges him before men in the humble hope of being acknowledged by him as his servant before an assembled world at the day of judgment. The acceptable guest is he who does justly, who loves mercy, and who walks humbly with his God—who keeps his body in subjection, and denies all his sinful inclinations—who maintains a strict regard to integrity in all his actions, whose ear is ever open to the cry of wretchedness, and who is always ready to extend to his fellow-creatures that mercy and forgiveness which he hopes himself to meet with. But, blessed be God, not less acceptable than such a one is he who, having done iniquity in time past, desires to do so no more for ever—who comes to offer the sacrifice of a contrite heart for his offences against his God—who, with a deep penitence for his past transgressions, and a fixed determination, with the assistance of the Holy Spirit, in future to avoid every violation of God's laws, desires to have his guilt washed away in that fountain which has been opened to the house of David. If, my brethren, such are the dispositions with which you have this day approached the table of the Lord, were the last messenger at this moment to call you hence, it would only be to invite you to a more glorious feast in those better mansions which are prepared for the just. There stands no barrier between such persons as I have now described and the kingdom of heaven. But remember, my brethren, that the conflict is not yet ended. In the house of God, at the gate of heaven, and when engaged in the most solemn ordinance of religion, pious affections and serious resolutions of holiness may be, and I trust are, the only feelings of your souls. But you are soon to mix again with a world lying in wickedness, where vice, arrayed in a deceitful dress, is ready to seduce you to destruction at every step. The sad history of the world suggests to me the fear that some of you may be tempted to violate the solemn vows which you have now taken,—that some, who have this day commemorated, with contrite hearts, the sufferings of the Redeemer, may yet be engaged in crucifying him afresh, putting him to an open shame, and giving his enemies occasion to blaspheme,—that some, who have tasted the cup of salvation, may exchange it for the cup of drunkenness,—that some, who have come to obtain forgiveness for themselves, may yet deny it to their fellow-men,—that some, who have this day come to be washed in a fountain of living water, may yet be found wallowing in a sink of debauchery. Need I say to such men, that the solemn service of this day will only heighten their condemnation. God is not mocked; and their false professions, and broken pledges, will rise up in judgment against them. That this should be your case, may God forbid! Continue instant in prayer for his grace, which can alone keep you from falling. The wicked may entice you; fools may laugh at you; but whatever others do, seek ye the Lord. The yoke of Christ is easy, his burden is light, and in keeping his commandments there is great reward. I appeal to your own experience this day. But even were it otherwise, were holiness not its own reward, were the service of Christ irksome, and its duties a task; yet, how short the conflict—how little more may remain for us to do! Another month or year, and heaven may be ours for ever. Each succeeding communion, we miss some whom we were wont to meet at the table of the Lord, although a new generation coming forward to fill their place, tends to shut our eyes to the rapidity with which our numbers drop away. To some this is their first communion—perhaps to them it may, assuredly to some it will be—their last. God grant that they may be translated from the Church of Christ upon earth, to his glorified Church in heaven!

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christ the bread of life, and the fountain of living waters.—The Lord was unwilling that man should perish. In the richness of his mercy he desired his salvation. But his law must be honoured in the punishment of guilt, and a spotless obedience yielded to its requirements, ere his mercy, yearning with bowels of pity, can open the gates of the paradise above, and say to the fallen—"Enter in." His infinite wisdom devised a plan whereby he might both be just and justifier of the ungodly—the just God and yet the Saviour. He placed his own Son incarnate in the nature of sinners, and laid upon him the whole weight of the penalty for their transgressions. The curse was rare upon the Man Christ Jesus. He bore it all. "His incarnation, sufferings, and death, the strictness and purity of God's laws have been fully manifested, his authority preserved, and justice satisfied, even in a more impressive way, than if the guilty creatures themselves had been visited with the punishment it demanded." And having rendered immaculate obedience too in the sinner's stead, he hath thus brought us everlasting righteousness, which saves at once from death, and entitles to everlasting life. "Mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other." God is glorified through the work of Jesus, and a way of salvation provided for man. Mercy yearning with bowels of heavenly pity, may we with a full salvation the very chief of sinners, with Justice looketh on in peace, saying, "Yes, thou hast saved the sinner, for I have been fully, gloriously satisfied." It was with the most perfect cheerfulness that Jesus became the Saviour of the guilty. Burning with love for them, he came into the world,—he assumed their nature that he might stand as their substitute,—he suffered all the woes of the curse that was pronounced upon them,—he kept the law in their stead,—his Father heard him say, "It is finished,"—he declared himself pleased with his work,—he exalted him to himself again; and he hath sent forth his Gospel proclaiming redeeming love, and the accomplishment of redemption's work by him; and containing the freest and most pressing invitations to sinners to come to him with a sincere desire for salvation; and the fullest assurance that they who come—that they who come in the spirit of earnest desire—who come because they truly feel their need of him—and who come seeing him to be all their hope—the fullest assurance that they will not apply to him in vain. Let us listen to a few of the gracious invitations the Gospel addresses to sinners.—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Hoi every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come buy wine and milk without money, and without price." "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." "I am the bread of life, he that cometh unto me shall never hunger, and he that believeth in me shall never thirst." The Saviour thus freely and earnestly invites, and at the same time assures the guilty, that they will not approach him in vain. Yes, faithful is he that promises—he will perform. Never did an humble and anxious suppliant find him unwilling to listen to him. Never was there one who drew near to him aright excluded from his presence, and denied admission to the place where he dwells. When Jesus, calling himself "the bread of life," says, "he that cometh unto me shall never hunger," his meaning is,—he that truly believeth on me shall find the most restful desires of his soul satisfied—shall receive the most suitable refreshment and nourishment—shall become content, sooner or later, of the complete enjoyment of what he felt he needed, and anxiously longed and inquired for. And he employs the term "believe" in the latter clause of the verse from which we quote, where changing the idea of the feeling of the soul, he makes use of the word "thirst," in expressing the soul's satisfaction in finding with Christ a free salvation, sweet present peace, and the blessed hope of everlasting glory and rest and felicity: "I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." Having given himself for the life of the world—having made an atonement for man by his death—having wrought out for him a title to everlasting life: he that is convinced of sin and misery—he that sees himself in the light of God's Word to be a condemned transgressor, and feels himself totally helpless—he that in this state goes to the Saviour, hearing his voice in the Gospel calling on him to approach him, and makes request to him for salvation, persuaded that he is both able and willing to save him; and believing that he is the only name under heaven given among men, whereby they can be saved, will find in the salvation of Jesus, that suitableness, and fullness, and comfort, which shall completely satisfy his soul, his anxious, hungering, thirsting soul, and supply him with everlasting consolation. He will indeed find Christ to be "the bread of life;"—he will indeed find that he that cometh to him shall never again have cause to "hunger," and that he that "believeth" on him shall never again have cause to "thirst." For the salvation he is awakened to long for, he shall see in store for him with Jesus in all its richness and extent, and shall fully and freely obtain. He shall obtain the forgiveness of all his sins, however many, however aggravated. He shall obtain the entire removal of guilt from his conscience. He shall be blessed with free justification, and shall be accounted and dealt with, as altogether and everlastingly righteous; and eternal life shall be his portion—he shall live for ever a redeemed and happy child of God. Such are the benefits and effects of the atonement and righteousness of Christ, and an interest therein. "He that believeth shall be saved." "There is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus." Who shall lay any thing to their charge? "It is God that justifieth." He that comes to Christ, approaches him hungering and thirsting. He has desires wrought in his heart which may well be compared to hunger and thirst, as we shall see by contemplating his state of mind. He is awakened to a true knowledge of the divine law. A soul stirring view of it in all its purity and extent is given to him; and he has an alarming sense of his exceeding guilt. He sees himself condemned—justly condemned. He feels himself helpless. He feels that any moment may plunge him into everlasting ruin. O! he is anxious about his undying soul! "May I be saved?" "What must I do to be saved?" he cries. He thinks of Jesus—he looks to Jesus,—with intense earnestness he looks to him. He longs for the comfort which he alone can bestow in circumstances such as his. He sees himself lost without him. "Thou art all my hope, O! Jesus,"—we may conceive him exclaiming, "I must perish unless thou dost graciously bless me with an interest in thy salvation. Behold, I come to thee! O! thou blessed Saviour, have mercy upon me!" O! may not his desires—may not the desires of the awakened sinner, well be compared to hunger and thirst? And when we think of the salvation of Jesus in its freeness and fullness, and perfect suitableness to the sinner's wants, may it not justly be called "the bread of life," and "the fountain of living waters?" And may not faith in its doctrines be conceived by us to nourish and support the soul, just as much as the most suitable food does the body? Bread is not more suited to the hungry, nor water to those who endure the pains of thirst, than the atonement of Christ to supply the wants of the convinced—the distressed—the anxious—penitent sinner.—Rev. WILLIAM PATERSON, Missionary in Whiteness and Weesdale, Shetland.

Scripture throws light upon Scripture.—Every line of the 90th Psalm acquires a new meaning when we read it as "the prayer of Moses the man of God," composed by him before his death, on a retrospect of the events which had occurred in the wilderness. The lofty and enthusiastic, but irregular and abrupt strains in which the heroic prophetess of Mount Ephraim celebrated the victory over Sisera, would have been a poetical riddle, but for the history contained in the preceding part of the book of Judges, and in that of Joshua. How much light is reflected on the book of Psalms, by discovering the particular occasions on which the several odes were composed, and by attending to the various turns of Providence in the eventful life of David! The formation of the universe as described by Moses, the destruction of the old world by water, and of the cities of the plain by fire, the appearances of God to the patriarchs, the deliverance from Egypt, the promulgation of the law from Sinai, the signal interpositions of Providence in behalf of the Jewish nation in the wilderness, and on their settlement in Canaan, the divinely instituted rites of their worship, their priesthood, their tabernacle, their sacrifices, their ablutions, their festivals, their sacred asylums, form the favourite topics from which the prophets draw their imagery, whether they denounce the judgments of heaven on a "gain-saying and rebellious people," or comfort "the mourners in Zion" with the hopes of the restoration of the dispersed tribes of Israel, or celebrate the glories of the kingdom of Him "in whom all nations of the earth shall be blessed."—The late Rev. Dr M'CREE. (Discourses.)

The Process of Ingrafting.—It cannot be unworthy of remark, that a phenomenon so striking as that of the mountain-ash bearing, instead of its own little, sour, and unwholesome berries, large, sweet, and nutritious pears, in consequence of ingrafting, has given rise to a scriptural metaphor most expressive of a like change in our moral nature—one that is true in point of fact, as certainly accomplished by appointed means, and as beneficial in its effects, comparing the fruits of the old nature with those of the new. It becomes not immortal beings to admire the one mystery, and to overlook the other; it becomes not me to tell a fellow-creature the remarkable art by which his trees may be fruitful, without reminding him that he is himself a tree to be ingrafted; and it becomes neither him nor me to study the fruits that we shall gather without considering the fruits which we bear. May we, who are the gardeners in the Lord's vineyard, be wise in the heavenly art, as well as in the earthly, that we may see around us the blossoms and fruits of the ingrafted Word, which is able to save the soul; and may we give ourselves earnestly to the work, lest the Lord of the vineyard cut down our trees, because having come and sought fruit thereon, he found none!—The Rev. NATHANIEL PATERSON. (The Manse Garden.)

Heaven.—My heaven upon earth is communion with God, and therefore nothing else would be my heaven in heaven. We shall never know the thousandth part of our mercies, our deliverances, temporal and spiritual, till we come to another world. Delight in the will of God is the perfection of all intelligent beings, the essence of happiness, the joy of angels, heaven upon earth, and the heaven of heavens. The Christian's hope of heaven, is the sweetness of prosperity and the support of adversity, and cures us at once of all attachment to the world, or expectation of rest in it. This world is the reign of darkness, pain, and sorrow, and we must not expect fully to find God here as a present portion. The Christian believes that he shall know him better, and enjoy him fully hereafter. O my soul, hold fast, and be very thankful for this sweet hope. The highest state of the greatest saint upon earth, is only a small taste or glimpse of heaven, in the first-fruits and earnest of the Spirit. The full harvest is beyond the grave, and is not to be expected in this world. How welcome will death be to those who truly mourn for sin, feel the burden, taste the bitterness of it, and long for complete deliverance from it.—ADAM. (Private Thoughts.)

SACRED POETRY.

DAVID'S ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

THE strong are fallen in the ranks of war ;
 Quench'd is the light that stream'd from Jacob's star :

The prince of Israel's warriors, and the pride,
 Dark Gilboa ! on thy day of havoc died.

O tell it not in Gath, thou vaunting foe !
 Tell not in scorn the tale of Zion's woe ;
 Proclaim not in proud Askalon abroad
 How Israel fell, forsaken of his God.
 Why should Philistia's dames their powers employ
 In frantic strains of sacrilegious joy ?
 Why should Astarte's hostile temple ring
 With shouts of triumph o'er the fallen king ?

Ye fragrant clouds, withhold the expected shower !
 Nor fall, ye balmy dews, at evening hour !
 Pour not your fatness down, as from an urn,
 On Gilboa's mount when vernal months return ;
 Refuse to aid the labours of the swain,
 Nor clothe the parched clod with waving grain.
 For Israel's monarch on thy battle-field,
 Ensanguined Gilboa ! dropt his useless shield ;
 That shield to heathen foes became a spoil,
 As though it shone not with th' anointing oil.
 Through war's thick cloud the sword of Saul had gleam'd,

And noble blood its lustre oft had dimm'd ;
 The shaft of Jonathan, with vengeance tipped,
 The frequent field with battle's wreck had heaped :
 Their course was swifter than the eagle's wing,
 Their fury fateful as the lion's spring :
 In life united, deathless deeds they dar'd,
 And one dark death of shame, alas ! they shared.

The harp, ye weeping maids of Shiloh ! take,
 And bid its sadly-soothing sounds awake ;
 At solemn eve, your olive-groves among,
 Pour forth the sorrow of your souls in song ;
 Lament for Saul,—he who from conquest bore
 The gems and purple robes which once you wore ;
 For now no more ye triumph with your chief.
 Wear, weeping maids ! the sombre garb of grief.

Where is the guardian of thy hallow'd land ?
 O Israel ! where thy patriotic band ?
 How are thy generous sons, the good, the brave,
 Toss'd like the foam on battle's stormy wave !
 But chiefly thou, possessor of my breast,
 O Jonathan ! my early friend, my best !
 'Twas thine the power of sympathy to prove Stable as truth, stronger than woman's love.
 Firm was the tie our kindred souls that bound,
 And fell the fate that such affection found ;
 Not valour could stern ruin's stroke repel,
 Nor virtue shield thee when thy country fell :
 On thee my fondest thoughts I'll still bestow ;
 For thee my fruitless tears shall ever flow.

What canst thou boast ? thou desolated land !
 The shiver'd spear, the bloody, broken brand !
 Thy sons are fallen in the ranks of war,
 And dark eclipsæ hath cover'd Israel's star.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Filial kindness rewarded.—Gustavus III., King of Sweden, passing one morning on horseback through a village in the neighbourhood of his capital, observed a young peasant girl, of interesting appearance, drawing water at a fountain by the way-side. He went up to her, and asked her for a draught. Without delay she lifted up her picher, and with artless simplicity put it to the lips of the monarch. Having satisfied his thirst, and courteously thanked his benefactress, he said, "My girl, if you would accompany me to Stockholm I would endeavour to fix you in a more agreeable situation." "Ah, sir," replied the girl, "I cannot accept your proposal. I am not anxious to rise above the state of life in which the providence of God has placed me; but even if I were, I could not for an instant hesitate." "And why?" rejoined the king, somewhat surprised. "Because," answered the girl, colouring, "my mother is poor and sickly, and has no one but me to assist or comfort her under her many afflictions: and no earthly bribe could induce me to leave her, or to neglect the duties which affection requires from me." "Where is your mother?" asked the monarch. "In that little cabin," replied the girl, pointing to a wretched booth beside her. The king, whose feelings were interested in favour of his companion, went in, and beheld stretched on a bedstead, whose only covering was a little straw, an aged female weighed down with years, and sinking under infirmities. Moved at the sight, the monarch addressed her: "I am sorry, my poor woman, to find you in so destitute and afflicted a condition." "Alas, sir," answered the venerable sufferer, "I should be indeed to be pitied, had I not that kind and attentive girl, who labours to support me, and omits nothing she thinks can afford me relief. May a gracious God remember it to her for good," she added, wiping away a tear. Never, perhaps, was Gustavus more sensible than at that moment, of the pleasure of possessing an exalted station. The gratification arising from the consciousness of having it in his power to assist a suffering fellow-creature, almost overpowered him; and putting a purse into the hand of the young village, he could only say, "Continue to take care of your mother; I shall soon enable you to do so more effectually. Good bye, my amiable girl, you may depend on the promise of your king." On his return to Stockholm, Gustavus settled a pension for life on the mother, with the reversion to her daughter at her death.

Adherence to Truth.—Park, in his travels through Africa, relates that a party of armed Moors having made a predatory attack on the flocks of a village at which he was stopping, a youth of the place was mortally wounded in the affray. The natives placed him on horseback, and conducted him home; while his mother preceded the mournful group, proclaiming all the excellent qualities of her boy, and, by her clasped hands and streaming eyes, manifesting the inward bitterness of her soul. The quality for which she chiefly praised the boy, formed of itself an epitaph so noble, that even civilized life could not aspire to a higher. "He never," said she, with pathetic energy, "never, never told a lie!"

DIFFICULTY OF BELIEVING DIVINE TRUTH—CAUSE OF—FAITH NOT OF OURSELVES, IT IS THE GIFT OF GOD.

THE preceding papers have paved the way for the important subject of the present. The simple act of the mind in believing occasions no difficulty, when disentangled from the crude mass of metaphysics, in which it might be said to have been wrapt up and hidden. The difficulty lies in the nature of the things which divine Revelation requires us to believe. Things which we are naturally inclined to wish to be true, we find great facility in believing to be so. They may be absurd beyond utterance; but if they flatter human pride, or gratify human passions, or pander to “the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, or the pride of life,” they will be readily admitted to be true; and there will be little scrutiny exercised into the kind and the qualities of the evidence on which their credibility rests. But if the things proposed to our faith be directly opposed to all these propensities of our corrupt nature, all becomes instant hostility. It matters not what be the evidence of their truth. The basis on which it rests may be strong as adamant, and the evidence itself may consist of proofs various in kind and manifold in number; and they may have been accumulating for many ages; and the irresistibility of their strength increasingly manifested by every renewed assault made upon them; still it matters not—there are a few short and simple ways of evading it all. Men can shut their eyes upon it. It may be urged with particularity and power, and all that is necessary is just not to attend to it. Thus man can keep themselves in perfect ignorance of the truth, and the evidence on which it rests, while they can readily “believe a lie” when they “have pleasure in unrighteousness.” The historical facts already adduced leave nothing farther to be said in illustration or confirmation of these melancholy truths. And yet we may be hardly prepared for the confession of the celebrated infidel, David Hume, who wrote so much against Christianity. He once owned that “he had never read the New Testament with care.” But let me now ask, whether any professing Christian,—whether the reader of these lines must make the same confession to his own heart?

Some may think it unnecessary to have been so particular in proving and illustrating the difficulty of believing truths that are opposed to all the corrupt propensities of our nature. But if, by the blessing of God, the conviction of this fact has taken place in the hearts of my readers, no labour can be too much that issues in so valuable a result. It will naturally lead to self-examination, and self-knowledge, and self-suspicion, and distrust of that which is “deceitful above all things,” the human heart; and so prepare the man for that work of the Spirit, by which alone we can “receive the truth in the love of it,” and become “wise unto salvation.”

Let us now go on to mark what the blessed Word of God itself says as to the difficulty men have in believing it, and the cause of that difficulty. Weigh attentively the following words: “The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.” 1 Cor. ii. 14. Along with this take the words of the same apostle to the Romans: (Rom. viii. 7.) “The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be,” so long as it continues carnal. “The natural,” or “carnal man,” that is, every man in a natural state, and till he has become spiritual, transformed by the renewing of his mind, “receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God,”—the truths of God inspired by his Spirit,—“for they are foolishness unto him;”—they run counter to all his feelings, affections, principles, pursuits, and maxims of worldly wisdom, and whatever does so, he regards as foolishness. But what is the reason of this decision? Is it that he is a competent, unbiassed, and righteous judge, pronouncing his decision, uninfluenced by fear or favour, sternly adhering to clear and unimpeachable truth, be the consequences what they may? Far otherwise: He does not even know, and is incapable, in present circumstances, of at all comprehending, the things on which he delivers his unhesitating and most unrighteous judgment. The reason is, that he is devoid of the essential quality requisite in one capable of judging of these things: he is "carnally minded;" and these things can be understood only by one that is spiritually minded: "they are spiritually discerned;" and can be comprehended only by one that has been taught, and is under the continual teaching of the Spirit of God.

Before a man can understand, believe, and receive these things, then, he must become "a new creature." He must, as it were, be made over again. And "if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." And who can do this, but "He who at first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, by shining in our hearts, and so giving us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ?"

But this being done by Him who alone can do it, are the difficulties of believing divine truth at length all conquered?—Regeneration, or a "transformation by the renewing of the mind," has indeed taken place; and the salvation of the soul is secure, because "whom the Lord loveth, he loveth unto the end." But instead of the warfare being over, it is only now begun; for till now the man was utterly incapable of fighting the battles of the Lord; and the battles we have more immediately in view, at present, are those he has to wage with the remaining corruptions of his fallen nature.

Let it be here remarked, that while justification and adoption are acts of God's free grace, passed and over in a moment of sovereign mercy, sanctification is a work, consisting of innumerable acts, beginning with conversion, and ending only with the last breath of the human being, when the all-important transition takes place from time to eternity. During all this time the work of sanctification, or making holy, is carried on by the Spirit of God. It is progressive from its commencement till the believer's final day on earth, but it is not till the soul has reached the realms of glory that the work is consummated, or made perfect.

In the mean time, there is a training, by moral discipline, carried on to make the soul "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;" and while the whole is the work of God's Spirit, in concurrence with the human will and affections, which have been moulded and fashioned anew after the image of God, the work is very different from a mechanical operation on brute matter. There is still a remainder of imperfection and carnal nature. Paul, speaking of it, says, "I see another law (from that of the law of God, in which he delighted) in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members." Rom. vii. 23. Hence the struggles, or rather the "fighting the good fight of faith, and laying hold of eternal life." For "we wrestle not against flesh and blood" only, or remaining corruption, but against its powerful and seductive allies,— "against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Eph. vi. 12. Hence the mighty, and irresistible, and unceasing agency necessary to "bring every thought into subjection to the obedience of Christ." Hence we are called to "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling;" not because we are able of ourselves to do it, but because help to our utmost need is afforded us: "For it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." May we not truly say with the apostle, then, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that (faith) not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." Eph. ii. 8.

But is not this "working and doing" in us "altogether of grace,"—is not this making us, after all, mere machines? In some measure it may be so, inasmuch as you had made yourselves by sin, yet more brutalised than brute matter itself. This is just the stepping forth of old satanic pride, the going forth of the pride that cast Satan out of heaven, and Adam out of Paradise, and the principle that prompts men now to go about "to establish a righteousness of their own," instead of leading them to "submit to the righteousness of God by faith." And what saith the Scripture? "Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" And who is it that can make a single one of them unto honour? "By grace," and not by merit, more or less, "are ye saved."

Well, but as to the machine, and the folly connected with the idea. The machine was originally constructed in the most admirable manner, and every pulley, and pivot, and spring, adjusted in a way that admitted of no improvement, and it was put in motion by the master hand that made it; and its movements were such that He whose work it was pronounced it to be "all very good." But after a time, Satan, the rebellious outcast of heaven, in despite of the glorious work, and of Him that made it, set his mighty ingenuity of malice to the task of destroying the fair fabric. He brought with him sin, his right hand agent, who broke the mainspring, and so put the whole beautiful structure in disorder, every part acting in countervailing power against another. In this fearful ruin of the beautiful mechanism, which was "all very good," the mighty Maker again puts forth his irresistible power to restore the work of his own hand, which that ruined work could certainly never do for itself. This is salvation by "grace through faith," the only way in which salvation could ever be accomplished.

If the idea of mechanism, however, is to be admitted; for the sake of illustration, we are to remember that it is a moral and intellectual mechanism. The powers that by sin were perverted, and exercised with objects the very opposite of those for which they were formed, are put to rights again. The enmity of the carnal mind is taken away, and is replaced by the love of God. Then men are made willing in the day of the exercise of God's power. The slave of Satan is made free from the law of sin, and becomes the servant of God, and has his fruit unto holiness, and the end life everlasting. The man is "sanctified by the truth," as the instrument employed by the Spirit, and his eyes are opened, and he "sees light," and the glorious objects it makes manifest "in God's light." He discovers at once, with horror, and with transport, his former and his present state. He now perceives that in his natural state he had been as the maniac in his cell, in the midst of delirium and delusion, wielding his sceptre of straw, and imagining himself a monarch. He is now "come to himself;" and he distinctly sees that his former imagined freedom was the most abject and degrading slavery. But the chain is broken off, the prison door is opened, the captive is liberated; and from his dark and dank dungeon he walks forth breathing the balmy air of heaven, with a world of unutterable beauties before him, brightly illuminated by the Sun of Righteousness.

But still there is, and while on earth there will continue to be, more or less, of remaining corruption, against which he will have to struggle, without finding that he is always successful. Hence, he is frequently found mourning over his deficiency in faith, and love, and new obedience. And, what some will think remarkable, is, that just in proportion to his attainments in these qualities of the "new creature," will be his quick-sightedness to sin. He will see it where, perhaps, at the beginning of his Christian course he did not see it at all; and what was then dim, and scarcely perceptible, now stands forth in most hideous and revolting characters. This is the natural effect of increasing light. Thus it is that we are to understand the language of Paul, when he had made singular attainments in the divine life, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" But he is enabled to add, "I thank God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. vii. 24, 25.

Before concluding this paper, we must make one remark as to the difficulty of believing the things proposed to the Christian's faith. What is its origin? The difficulty originates in the difficulty of loving the things; for it is to love holiness and purity; it is to think, and speak, and act in every thing, little or great, with a single view to please God, and to find our happiness in so pleasing him. It is to live habitually as under his eye, "seeing him who is invisible;" and performing every relative duty, from the most just and generous principles, "loving our neighbour as ourselves." Now this is found to be difficult, because, while on earth, we are at the best sanctified but in part, and so retain a remainder more or less of earthliness and selfishness.

We might here introduce illustrations of the difficulty of believing the pure, simple, and humbling truths of the Gospel, by reference to the various "refuges of lies," to which the awakened soul has recourse before settling down in the humble and firm belief of Gospel truth. We might notice the attempts made to seek peace by keeping the law, then by faith as meritorious, and coming in place of obedience, and by various other devices of men in "going about to establish a righteousness of their own." All these would tend still more largely to establish what, it is hoped, has been abundantly proved, that men are "saved by grace through faith, and that (faith) is not of themselves, it is the gift of God," and the work of his Spirit.

These things being so, the all-engrossing question with the humble inquirer will naturally be, how he is to obtain the effectual working of that divine agent? And we cannot suppose any thing more satisfactory and gratifying to such a mind than the following answer from the lips of the blessed Jesus himself: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" Luke xi. 13.

A SHORT SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF ROBERT AITKIN, A MARYPORT COLLIER.

BY THE REV. W. S. BLACKWOOD,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Maryport, Cumberland.

ROBERT AITKIN was, I believe, a Scotsman by birth, and his family has long been connected with my congregation. He was a collier by profession, and an elder of the Church. When settled here about three years ago, I was given to understand that he was a man of remarkable piety, and my subsequent acquaintance with him fully justified the highest expectations I had formed of his character. His circumstances, indeed, were humble, and had nothing to attract the world's regard. His occupation was mean, and doomed him to a life of the severest drudgery; but this only served to give an additional lustre to his virtues, and stood more strongly contrasted with the dignity and the elevation of his moral character. Doomed, however, though he was to a life of comparative poverty and trial, he was so far from indulging any murmuring feeling, that he has expressed to me his entire satisfaction with what was the most adverse to his comfort, because it originated in the appointment of heaven. He rose about three o'clock every morning, and walked to the distance of about three miles, in all weathers, to the pit in which he laboured. On my once remarking to him, that it was hard to travel so far in a cold winter morning at so early an hour, he replied, "Cold, and frost, and snow, are all God's messengers, and as such I receive them." He rose, however, still earlier than his occupation demanded, that he might have some time to spend in communion with God; and he made a practice of reading a portion, however small, of the sacred volume before he set out to the labours of the day. Fatiguing as were his week day occupations, he was not only regular in his attendance on the sanctuary, but he searched out cases of distress, and at almost every sick-bed was he present, addressing to the afflicted the words of consolation, and offering up the prayer of faith. He was blessed with a remarkable fluency in the discharge of this latter duty; and so engrossed was his mind in its performance, that though he had a defect in his organs of speech, he never in prayer faltered in his utterance. Every one was struck with admiration at the fervour and the readiness with which he poured out his requests at a throne of grace, and listened to him with eager and delighted attention.

He was very zealous for the glory of the Lord of Hosts; and to hear his name profaned was to him the most painful and revolting. Gentle as was his character, he was wont, on such occasions, to rebuke the transgressor; and where this proved ineffectual, as he once observed to me, he lifted up his heart in prayer to God on their behalf. He bore about with him a constant sense of his mortality. He often remarked, that men of his profession were exposed to great dangers, and that many around him had received "sudden calls." He, therefore, felt the necessity of being ready and prepared to meet his God in judgment. But if his piety was thus remarkable, his humility was not less so. This, indeed, was the most prominent and leading feature of his character. Often has he bewailed to me the corruption of his heart, and his feeble impression of the things of eternity. His language was that of the apostle, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" He delighted to converse on the subject of religion, and whenever another topic was started in his hearing, he invariably connected it with his favourite theme by deducing from it some lesson of heavenly wisdom.

In the history of a collier there can be no variety of incident. But I am desirous of placing before the minds of the readers of this work a man who moved in the humblest walk of life, and whose piety surpassed in fervour and elevation what I have ever been privileged to witness. We often meet with characters of imperfect goodness, men of decided piety indeed, but the purity of whose moral worth is sullied by some evident failing which attaches to them. In the case of Robert Aitkin, however, I am not aware that any such defect shaded the lustre of his virtues. His was a character of uniform excellence, complete, to all human observation, in all its parts, and bearing as near a resemblance as, perhaps, in the present state it is possible to reach, to that of the Saviour of sinners himself. He was an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile, a man who might be truly said "to walk with God." His heart seemed to be almost wholly detached from the interests of this sublunary scene, and to be set on those higher interests which engage the affections and the thoughts of the heavenly inhabitants. There are seasons in the history of every Christian when his piety rises above its ordinary level, and draws out his affections to open, lively, and vigorous exercise, but his eye seemed to be ever set on the glories of eternity, and to cast merely a glance on the scenes which were passing around him. Devotion was the very element of his being, and even when not engaged in its outward exercises, he breathed its warmest spirit. It was evident to every one that he bore about with him a constant sense of the divine presence, an awful impression of the importance of eternal things, and that his thoughts never dwelt on the present, without connecting it with the future. Time was identified, in his regard, with eternity, and he seemed to live here with the single aim of preparing to live hereafter. When attired in the coarse and filthy habiliments of his profession, it was difficult for any one, who had a respect to moral worth, to suppress a smile at the strong contrast presented between the moral dignity of the man and his dark and tattered exterior. But if high moral excellence constitutes the chief ornament of our nature, and is what should occupy the foremost place in human estimation, humble individual as he was, it may be truly said of him what was said of Abner of old, "Know ye not that a great man has this day fallen in Israel?"

His natural talents were not of a distinguished order, but he was a man of a sound and solid understanding. He evinced, however, an uncommon sagacity in all matters of a religious nature, and was quite competent "to give a reason of the hope that was in him." He was "mighty in the Scriptures," and had his mind fully fraught with the treasures of heavenly wisdom. I have been amazed at the shrewdness of argumentation he has displayed in maintaining the doctrines of our orthodox faith, and how prepared he was to expose the false principles which lie at the foundation of every heterodox creed. But he was regular in his attendance on public ordinances, and whatever spare time he could command, he spent in the perusal of useful and interesting works of a religious kind. He had thus amassed a considerable store of information, and exhibited a cultivation of intellect much beyond what could have been expected in one of his humble circumstances in life. He was master of many of the most remarkable sayings of ancient theological writers, and could advance them on any suitable occasion with great tact and propriety. "Willson's Afflicted Man's Companion" was one of his favourite authors, and the crying experience of the eminent saints there recorded was the subject of our frequent conversation.

One evening of last month (October) I received the distressing intelligence that Robert had received a severe injury, by the fall of a large piece of coal, or something of that kind, from the mouth of the pit. I took an early opportunity of paying him a visit, though at the time I entertained no apprehension that his wound would terminate in a fatal result. I found him completely resigned to the will of God, and breathing, as he ever did, a spirit of exalted piety. His strength, however, progressively failed, till it became too evident that death was in the cup. On visiting him on a subsequent occasion, I asked him if his mind was in peace, he replied "that it was in perfect peace." He spoke as if his feelings varied, and on my saying to him that "the rock of ages was always the same," he mentioned that that morning, as he was indulging in holy meditation, "his prospects were peculiarly bright and clear before him." He adverted to the delight which that passage afforded him, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." I visited him the evening of the day before he died. I cannot forget the cordiality with which he welcomed me when I came. He was well-nigh exhausted, and the effort which he made to speak to me much beyond the measure of his remaining strength. But the hand of death was upon him, and he instantly relapsed, after a fit of coughing, which the exertion induced, into his former state of stupor and repose. He died the following evening. Though there was no sunshine of elevated feeling to gild the gloom of the dark valley, or to cheer the hour of his departure, of him it may be truly said, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace!"

Robert Aitkin was regarded in this place with feelings of universal respect, as a man of eminent piety and true benevolence. He was no less highly esteemed by his employers. He wrought at a higher rate of exertion than were given to the other colliers, who were engaged in the same kind of labour with himself. This was in consequence of his untiring industry in the prosecution of his calling, and the moral influence which he exerted over the habits of the men. His employers, indeed, remarked that "they considered it quite a blessing to have such a man in their pit;" and I can bear testimony to the kindness which they manifested towards him during his last illness, both by their peasonal attentions, and by the offer of pecuniary aid. Indeed the strongest and most cordial sympathy was evinced for Robert by his numerous acquaintances during the period of his sickness, nor were they wanting in the last tribute of their respect for his eminent virtues. It is customary in this place to summon all the friends and acquaintances of the deceased to the funeral by means of a bell sent round the town, and a service is performed at the chapel in whose burial ground they are interred, similar to those of the Sabbath. Robert was buried on Sabbath the 5th of November, and his remains were accompanied to the grave by a vast throng of mourning relatives and friends. On the evening of that day I preached his funeral sermon, in my place of worship, to an overflowing audience, from Psalm xxiii. 4th verse; "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thy art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." One feeling seemed to pervade the assembly—that of warm admiration of the virtues of the departed, and deep regret at his removal.

The following sentiments expressed in the concluding paragraph of my discourse, were, I am sure, resounded to in the mournful consciousness of every devout mind amongst my people: "But what shall we do, who are united as a congregation, on the removal of so pious and heavenly a man? Who will now bear us on his heart at a throne of grace? Who will intercede with God on our behalf, that we who minister the words of life may have grace given to be faithful to our solemn duties, and that you may hear with a divine power? If the glory is not this day departed from us, it is at least obscured; a man of prayer has been taken from us, and may not the blessing and favour of heaven be withdrawn along with him? He has left us 'faint' indeed, with hearts cold to God and to eternity, but we hope, still 'pursuing;' and if we improve the present painful dispensation, we will make it now our study to walk with God, to run with diligence the race set before us in the Gospel, and thus to tread in the footsteps of the departed. His whole heart was set on the accomplishment of his own salvation, and on the spiritual good of his fellow men, and sure I am that he never bowed the knee at the throne of grace, without supplicating the blessing of heaven to descend both on myself and you. Let us ever remember that a man of prayer has this day been cut down in the midst of us,—that we are thus solemnly reminded of the duty of interceding with greater frequency and earnestness for ourselves, otherwise the melancholy spectacle may, ere long, be presented of a pastor who has no heart to his Master's work, and a people dead to God and to eternity."

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUTRHEAD, D. D.,

No. IX.

See LAM. i. 1-16.

FROM what is mentioned in this book of Lamentations, we may learn what was the state of the people of Judah during their seventy years' captivity at Babylon. It was very distressing, as has been shown in a former number.

It may be proper now, to inquire into the causes which led to so sad a reverse in the state of a people who, from their first existence as a nation, had been separated from other nations, who stood in a near relation to God, and had many distinguished privileges conferred upon them that were not enjoyed by other nations. In contemplating so melancholy a downfall of a people once so highly favoured, we are naturally led to inquire, Wherefore have all these evils come upon them? Thus, those who passed by, and beheld the desolation of their city and sanctuary, are represented as saying, "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus with this land? What meaneth the heat of his great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made with them, when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt: for they went and served other gods, whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them: and the anger of the Lord was kindled against this land, in anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation; and he cast them into another land, as it is this day." Here, then, to see the cause why these calamities came upon this nation, we must bear in mind the distinguished privileges which had been conferred upon them, and their neglect, abuse, and perversion of these privileges. They had been selected from all the nations of the earth to stand in a near relation to God, as his peculiar people. What a high distinction was this! God had solemnly entered into covenant with them, in which He revealed himself to them to be their God, and declared that they were his people, and in which they avouched the Lord to be their God, and so acknowledged themselves to be his people, and in which they solemnly engaged to keep all his commandments. God manifested his gracious presence with them in the tabernacle, and afterwards in the temple. So that it was said of them, "What nation hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is nigh unto us, in all things that we call upon him for?" God was graciously pleased to provide for them stated ordinances of religion, in the observance of which they might have near intercourse with himself, and obtain special manifestations of his love. They were favoured also with the oracles of God, containing a revelation, of his will, and showing how they were to walk and please God. They had also a succession of prophets among them to instruct, admonish, and encourage them. God was pleased in many ways to interpose for delivering them out of the hands of their enemies; and, finally, there was a special blessing upon their land, so that it brought forth plentifully, and was the glory of all lands.

But what return did they render to the Lord for all his benefits? They often forgot God; they abused his mercies; they were prone to follow after the abominations of heathen idolatry; they trampled the divine authority under foot. The Lord warned them, from time to time, by his prophets, rising up early and sending them, that judgments were hanging over them for their transgressions, and exhorting to repent and turn unto the Lord, who was yet ready to heal their backslidings, and to love them freely. But they would not hearken; or if they seemed to repent for a time, they soon returned again to their evil ways. So that the Lord cast off Israel, and gave them up into the hands of their enemies. And when Judah saw what had befallen her treacherous sister Israel, but repented not, and became worse even than Israel, the Lord caused her also to be carried away captive. Whoever will carefully read over the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, will perceive that wickedness had risen to a very great height in Judah, and was greatly aggravated by the many warnings that were given them of coming judgment, before the long threatened vengeance was at length executed, and they were given up into the hands of the king of Babylon.

But it will be useful here to notice some of the wise and gracious purposes that were answered by this afflictive dispensation. For while it was evidently sent as a severe chastisement, and they found it to be so in their sad experience, yet God is pleased to make the severest chastisements minister to the spiritual good of his people. And, therefore, is the exhortation addressed to those under his chastening rod: "Despise set thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Such gracious purposes as these were answered by this dispensation. They were much more deeply sensible of the value of the privileges which they had enjoyed in their own land, when they were for a time deprived of them. We must all be aware how ready we are to undervalue the comforts bestowed upon us, especially when we have long had the enjoyment of them. It is on a bed of sickness that we learn the value of health. It is when sleepless nights are appointed to us that we can estimate the value of a sound sleep. It is the traveller in a sandy desert, under a scorching sun, that can estimate the value of a draught of cold water. Thus the captives of Judah, when in the land of Babylon, were led to form a higher estimate of the privileges which they had enjoyed in their own land. And although they had but lightly esteemed them, when they had enjoyed them, they longed to be restored to them. They wept when they remembered Zion. Again, it is not to be doubted that sin would be embittered to them, when they contemplated it as the procuring cause of their calamities. They would be led to a serious review of their past lives, to see wherein they had offended against God, to mourn over their transgressions, and provocations, and backslidings, and to acknowledge them before God. And the book of Lamentations would be a help to them for awakening and cherishing that sorrow, and contrition, and humiliation to which they were especially called at that time: "The Lord is righteous, for I have rebelled against his commandments. Behold, O Lord, I am in distress; my bowels are troubled: my heart is turned within me; for I have grievously rebelled." Again, this dispensation was fitted to promote amongst them a spirit of prayer. When all other refuges failed, they would look unto the Lord, from whom alone help could come. Thus Daniel, in the land of his captivity, prayed three times a-day, with his window open, in the direction of Jerusalem. And thus in the Lamentations the godly among the Jewish captives are represented as acknowledging their transgressions, and pleading for God's returning favour: "The crown is fallen from our head: woe unto us, that we have sinned! For this, our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim. Because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate; the foxes walk upon it. Thou, O Lord, remainest for ever; thy throne from generation to generation. Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us so long time? Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned; renew our days as of old. But thou hast utterly rejected us; thou art very wroth against us."

Thus it has, in part, appeared that there were alleviating circumstances connected with the Babylonish captivity, and that the Lord had not utterly forsaken them. But the subject may admit of farther illustration. They had among them the Holy Scriptures, in so far as they were then written. The copies might not be numerous: but they would be more highly prized, and more carefully perused by them, when they were deprived of other privileges which they had enjoyed in their own land. They had still the liberty of access to the throns of grace. And though they were then far removed from Jerusalem; yet they still poured out their supplications to the God of their fathers, having their eyes directed towards the temple at Jerusalem. And they were encouraged to do so, from what Solomon had stated in his prayer, at the dedication of the temple, when he was directed by the Spirit to anticipate the very case in which they were then placed. "If they sin against thee, (for there is no man that liveth and sinneth not;) and thou be angry with them, and deliver them over before their enemies; and they carry them away captive into a land far off, or near; and they bethink themselves in the land whither they are carried captive; and pray unto thee in the land of their captivity, and pray towards the land which thou gavest to their fathers, and toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house which I have built for thy name; then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling-place, their prayers and supplications, and maintain their cause, and forgive thy people, which have sinned against thee." They had also the ministrations of prophets, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And it is remarkable that both these prophets, and more particularly Ezekiel, were directed to dwell much upon their final restoration to their own land, and their complete deliverance from all their enemies. This was fitted to soothe and comfort them under the hardships of their captivity. He that intended to accomplish so great a deliverance for their nation, though at a remote period, they might conclude, would not be unkind of them in the depressed circumstances in which they were then placed. It was an alleviation of their distress, too, that their captivity was limited to a certain time. And though the period was long and numbers of them might not live to see its expiration, still the hope of deliverance in the Lord's appointed time cheered and upheld them. Although the vision of deliverance might seem to tarry long, they were still encouraged to wait for it, assured that, in the appointed time, it would come and would not tarry.

It only remains, in closing this period of the Jewish history, to follow them into their own land again, when the period of their captivity was expired. There were apparently many obstructions to the accomplishment of the promise of their return to their own land, which were ready at times to make their faith stagger. But as the time drew nigh, difficulties were removed. The mighty empire of Babylon, with all its wealth and power, and resources, that seemed destined to last for ages, was suddenly overturned, and was succeeded by the Persian empire. And the kings of Persia showed favour to the captive Jews. And they not only permitted their return to their own land, but aided their return, and restored to them the sacred vessels for the temple service that had been taken away by the king of Babylon. And when at length a royal decree was published for rebuilding the city and temple; and the captives were made free, and invited and encouraged to return to their own land; they could hardly believe the joyful tidings. Their mourning was suddenly turned into joy and thanksgiving. "When the Lord turned the captivity of his people, then we were a men that dreamed. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing. Then said they among the heathen, The Lord hath done great things for them. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

1. What a striking lesson of admonition and warning is addressed to us by the subject we have been contemplating! We have long been highly favoured amongst the nations; we have been distinguished in regard to religious privileges; we have had times of great national prosperity; we have experienced many signal deliverances out of the hands of our enemies; we have seen the flames of war and discord spreading around surrounding nations, while we have had a time of comparative tranquillity and peace. But have we remained unto the Lord according to his benefits towards us? Alas! no. The Lord has a controversy with us, and has been giving warnings of judgments, and tokens of his righteous displeasure. And if we turn not unto the Lord, with our whole souls and our whole hearts, we have ground to fear that the threatened blow will be inflicted; that the Lord will remove our candlestick out of its place; yea, that he may cause us to be tracted by civil commotions, and give us up to the will of our enemies.

2. From the subject that has been under consideration we may learn, that it becomes us, in all the most trying circumstances in which we may be placed, to see the Lord's hand in what befalls us, and to acknowledge that our sins and provocations are the great procuring cause of trouble, and the ground of God's controversy with us. We are to acknowledge, that we are punished less than our iniquities have deserved; and why should a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? We are to be thankful for all the alleviating circumstances whereby the Lord hath been pleased to sweeten the bitter cup of affliction; and we are especially to desire, that all those gracious purposes, for which affliction has been sent, may be answered with regard to us: that we may come forth from the furnace of affliction as gold that has been tried in the fire.

3. From the subject that has been under consideration we may learn, that one strong ground of encouragement and support to the people of God, under all their own personal trials, and under all the darkest dispensations of Providence as affecting the Church, is to look beyond their present toings amidst the billows of trials, and perplexities, and troubles, to the great and glorious deliverance which shall yet be accomplished for the Church and people of God, when God will finally turn the captivity of his people, and establish them for ever in their own land, beyond the reach of every danger, and of every foe. "Oh thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted; behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay the foundations with sapphires. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord!"

INFANTICIDE IN THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

THIS practice did not prevail either at the Navigators or Hervey groups; but the extent to which it was carried at the Tahitian and Society Islands almost exceeds credibility. Of this, however, I may enable the reader to form some estimate by selecting a few out of numberless circumstances which have come within my own knowledge. Generally, I may state that, in the last-mentioned group, I never conversed with a female that had borne children prior to the introduction of Christianity, who had not destroyed some of them, and frequently as many as from five to ten. During the visit of the deputation, our respected friend, G. Bennett, Esq., was our guest for three or four months; and, on one occasion, while conversing on the subject, he expressed a wish to obtain accurate knowledge of the extent to which this cruel system had prevailed. Three women were sitting in the room at the time, making European garments, under Mrs W.'s direction; and, after replying to Mr Bennett's inquiries, I said, "I have no doubt but that each of these women have destroyed some of their children." Looking at them with an expression of surprise and incredulity, Mr B. exclaimed, "Impossible! such motherly respectable women" could never have been guilty of so great an atrocity." "Well," I added, "we'll ask them." Addressing the first, I said to her, "Friend, how many children have you destroyed?" She was startled at my question, and at first charged me with unkindness, in harrowing up her feelings by bringing the destruction of her babes to her remembrance; but, upon hearing the object of my inquiry, she replied, with a faltering voice, "I have destroyed nine." The second, with eyes suffused with tears, said, "I have destroyed seven;" and the third informed us that she had destroyed five. Thus three individuals, casually selected, had killed one-and-twenty children!—but I am happy to add, that these mothers were, at the time of this conversation, and continued to be so long as I knew them, consistent members of my church.

On another occasion, I was called to visit the wife of a chief in dying circumstances. She had professed Christianity for many years, had learnt to read when nearly sixty, and was a very active teacher in our adult school. In the prospect of death, she sent a pressing request that I would visit her immediately; and, on entering her apartment, she exclaimed, "O, servant of God! come and tell me what I must do." Perceiving that she was suffering great mental distress, I inquired the cause of it, when she replied, "I am about to die, I am about to die." "Well," I rejoined, "if it be so, what creates this agony of mind?" "Oh! my sins, my sins," she cried; "I am about to die." I then inquired what the particular sins were which so greatly distressed her, when she exclaimed, "Oh my children, my murdered children! I am about to die, and I shall meet them all at the judgment-seat of Christ." Upon this I inquired how many children she had destroyed, and, to my astonishment, she replied, "I have destroyed sixteen! and now I am about to die." As soon as my feelings would allow me, I began to reason with her, and urged the consideration that she had done this when a heathen, and during "the times of ignorance, which God winked at;" but this afforded her no consolation, and again she gave vent to her agonized feelings by exclaiming, "Oh, my children, my children!" I then directed her to "the faithful saying, which is worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This imparted a little comfort; and after visiting her frequently, and directing her thoughts to that blood which cleanseth from all sin, I succeeded, by the blessing of God, in tranquillizing her troubled spirit; and she died, about eight days after my first interview, animated with the hope "that her sins, though many, would all be forgiven her." And what, but the Gospel, could have brought such consolation? I believe that, without the grand truth of pardon by the blood of Christ, I might have reasoned with her from that time to the present in vain. But I forbear all comment; for if such facts fail to demonstrate the value of missions, no observations of mine will do so.

Frequently have our feelings been most powerfully excited, at the examination of our school children; and scenes more affecting than some which have been witnessed on such occasions it is scarcely possible to conceive. One of these, which occurred at my own station at Raiatea, I will briefly describe. Upwards of six hundred children were present. A feast was prepared for them, and they walked through the settlement in procession, most of them dressed in European garments, with little hats and bonnets made by their very parents who would have destroyed them, had not Christianity come to their rescue. The children added much to the interest of the day, by preparing songs with such mottos as the following: "What a blessing the Gospel is!" "The Christians of England sent us the Gospel." "Had it not been for the Gospel, we should have been destroyed as soon as we were born." On some, texts of Scripture were inscribed: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!" "Suffer little children to come unto me," and other similar passages. Inseparable indeed had been, who could have witnessed such a scene.

* It is a fact, which I have often observed, and one worthy of special notice, that the influence of religion is manifested, not only in the character, but even in the countenance, by changing the wild and vacant stare of the savage into the mild expression of the Christian.

without the liveliest feelings of delight. After proceeding through the settlement, they were conducted to the spacious chapel, and opened service by singing the Jubilee hymn in the native language. The venerable old king then took the chair. He had been worshipped as a god, and had led fierce warriors to the "battle and the fight," but he evidently felt that he had never occupied a station so delightful or honourable as that of presiding at the examination of the children of his people. These were placed in the centre of the chapel, and the parents occupied the outer seats. Each class was then called up and examined, and after this, individuals from the different classes were selected, and questioned by the Missionary. While this was proceeding, the appearance of the parents was most affecting. The eyes of some were gleaming with delight, as the father said to the mother, or the mother to the father, "What a mercy it is that we spared our dear girl!" Others, with saddened countenances, and faltering voices, lamented in bitterness that they had not saved theirs; and the silent tear, as it stole down the cheeks of many, told the painful tale that all their children were destroyed. In the midst of our proceedings, a venerable chieftain, grey with age, arose, and with impassioned look and manner, exclaimed, "Let me speak; I must speak!" On obtaining permission, he thus proceeded: "Oh that I had known that the Gospel was coming! oh that I had known that these blessings were in store for us, then I should have saved my children, and they would have been among this happy group, repeating these precious truths; but, alas! I destroyed them all, I have not one left." Turning to the chairman, who was also a relative, he stretched out his arm and exclaimed, "You, my brother, saw me kill child after child, but you never seized this murderous hand, and said, 'Stay, brother, God is about to bless us; the Gospel of salvation is coming to our shores.'" Then he cursed the gods which they formerly worshipped, and added, "It was you that infused this savage disposition into us, and now I shall die childless, although I have been the father of nineteen children." After this he sat down, and in a flood of tears, gave vent to his agonized feelings.

This scene occurred in my own place of worship. I saw the man, and heard him utter these expressions. I shall leave the fact to speak for itself. Many other instances equally affecting might be added, but I shall content myself with mentioning but one more. This related to a chief woman, who had been united in marriage to a man of inferior rank; and it was the universal custom to destroy the children of such an union. The first babe was born and put to death. The father wished the second to be spared, but the mother, and the mother's relatives, demanded its destruction. The third was a fine girl. The father pleaded and entreated that it might be saved, for his bowels yearned over it, but the mother, and the mother's relatives again carried their point, and the babe was doomed to die. One of the numerous modes of infanticide was, to put the babe in a hole covered with a plank to keep the earth from pressing it, and to leave it there to perish. This method was adopted in the present instance. The father happened to be in the mountains at the time of the child's birth and interment; but, on his return, he hastened to the spot, opened the grave, and finding that the babe was not dead, he took her up, and gave her in charge to his brother and sister, by whom she was conveyed to the island of Aimeo, about seventy miles distant, where they trained her up. The husband died, without having informed his wife that their daughter was still alive. After Christianity was embraced, the mother was, on one occasion, bemoaning most bitterly the destruction of her children; when a woman who happened to be present, and who was acquainted with the fact of the child's disinterment, astonished and overwhelmed her with the announcement, that her daughter had been saved, and was yet living at Aimeo. A short time after receiving this extraordinary intelligence, she sailed to Aimeo, and on reaching the shore, hurried with excited feelings to the house of her relatives, and as she approached it, beheld with wonder and delight, a fine young girl standing in the doorway. At once she recognised her own image in the countenance of the child. It was her daughter. She clasped her to her bosom; but I must leave imagination to fill up the scene as she exclaimed, "Rejoice with me, for this my daughter was dead and is alive again." The mother is gone to her rest, but her daughter is, at the present time, an active teacher in our schools, and a consistent member of a Christian Church!

* This chief was an ardent of the highest rank, and the laws of his class required the destruction of all his children. In this infamous society there were a variety of orders, not unlike those which exist among the Freemasons.

The reasons assigned for this inhuman practice afford an affecting comment upon that passage, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." The first cause alleged was their wars. These were so frequent, sudden, and desolating, that mothers have often told me, that to avoid the horrors and distress thus entailed on those who had families, they destroyed many of their children.

A second cause, as we have already intimated, was inequality of station. If a woman of rank was united to a man of inferior grade, the destruction of two, four, or six infants was required, to raise him to an equality with her; and when this had been effected, the succeeding children were spared.

A third reason adduced for the practice was, that nursing impaired the personal attractions of the mother, and curtailed the period during which her beauty would continue to bloom.

The modes by which they perpetrated this deed of darkness were truly affecting. Sometimes they put a wet cloth upon the infant's mouth; at others, they pinched their little throats until they expired. A third method was to bury them alive. And a fourth was, if possible, still more brutal. The moment the child was born, they broke the first joints of its fingers and toes, and then the second. If the infant survived this agonizing process, they dislocated its ankles and the wrists; and if the powers of endurance still continued, the knee and elbow joints were then broken. This would generally terminate the tortures of the little sufferer; but if not, they would resort to the second method of strangulation. We had a servant in our employ for fifteen years, who previously performed infanticide as her trade; and we have many times listened with feelings of the deepest agony, while she has described the manner in which she perpetrated the horrid deed.

What a truly affecting picture do these facts exhibit of human nature, where the light of divine truth has not beamed upon its darkness—where the religion of the Gospel has not exercised its benign influence! They show that the sun may shine for ages, with all his boundless beneficence, and yet fail to kindle in man a spirit of benevolence; that the earth may pour forth her abundance, and not teach man kindness; that the brute creation, impelled only by instinct, may exhibit parental fondness, and man fail to learn the lesson. By no species of ingenuity could we instruct the beasts of the field thus barbarously to destroy their young. Even the ferocious tiger prowls the forest for their support, and the savage bear will fearlessly meet death in their defence. But the facts now stated are only in harmony with innumerable others, which prove that, in every place, and under all circumstances, men need the Gospel. Whether you find them upon the pinnacle of civilization, or in the vortex of barbarism; inhabiting the densely populated cities of the East, or roaming the wilds of an African wilderness; whether on the wide continent, or the fertile islands of the sea; surrounded by the icy barriers of the poles, or basking beneath a tropical sun; all need the Gospel; and nothing but the Gospel can elevate them from the degradation into which they have been sunk by superstition and sin. You may introduce among them the arts and sciences, and by these means refine their taste, and extend the sphere of their intellectual vision; you may convey to them our unrivalled constitution, modified and adapted to their peculiar circumstances, and thus throw a stronger safe-guard around their persons and property, and elevate them from a state of barbarous vassalage, to the dignity and happiness of a free people; but if you withhold the Gospel, you leave them still under the dominion of a demoralizing and sanguinary superstition, aliens from God, and ignorant of the great scheme of redemption through his Son.

Let science, then, go with her discoveries; and philosophy with her wisdom; and law, with her equitable sanctions and social benefits; and let them exert their united influence to bless and elevate our degraded world; but let it be the honour and ambition of the Christian to convey that glorious Gospel, by which alone the regeneration and happiness of mankind can be fully and permanently secured.

THE APPALLING NATURE OF DEATH, AND THE BELIEVER'S SUPPORT UNDER IT:

A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. W. S. BLACKWOOD,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Maryport, Cumberland.

"Yes, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."—PSALM xxiii. 4.

I HAVE often addressed you on the subject of death, and I have done so, because, while in itself it is more important than any other, there is none on which our thoughts are more unwilling to dwell. Every one who has passed the very limits of infancy knows, with undoubted certainty, that he is appointed to die. And yet, with this knowledge, it is matter of familiar observation that death is to few the theme of solemn and habitual consideration. It ranks amongst the articles of their belief, so that there is, perhaps, no one so vain and foolish as to indulge the hope of an exemption from the operations of that law which consigns our bodies to darkness and to dust. And yet, with this general conviction which mankind entertain of their mortality, how lamentably small is the number of those who dwell on this topic so frequently and with such devout and earnest thought, as to invest it with a salutary influence over their mind, and to give to it a practical command over their habits and their history. There is an innate aversion in our nature to the consideration of death. It exhibits to the eye of the imagination so many images of sorrow and of gloom. It is accompanied with so many circumstances calculated to revolt and even to sicken our sensibilities. It suggests to us so much from which we shrink with instinctive recoil, and on which our mind cannot dwell without being impressed with sentiments of sad and melancholy interest, that we are eager to make our escape from this dark contemplation, and if, at any time, it is obtruded on us with a disturbing effect, we seek to dismiss it, and to efface its impressions amid the bustle and levities of the world. But, is it proper or reasonable that this subject should meet such treatment at our hand? Death is, beyond all question, a matter to us of the very last importance. It removes us from the scene of our present existence. It breaks our connection for ever with the things of time. It closes that period of trial and probation which the providence of our wise and gracious Creator has here appointed us to fulfil. It introduces us to that world of spirits for which we were originally destined, and where our doom will be irrevocably determined, according to the principles which have guided us, and the conduct we have maintained in this preparatory stage of our being. And is it proper or reasonable, then, that an event so momentous in itself, and whose consequences expand themselves over the whole range of a coming eternity, should be dismissed from our thoughts as unwelcome and offensive, and so seldom dwelt upon with solemn and earnest consideration? Did all of us cease to exist when our breath has departed,—did the infliction of that stroke which terminates our present life involve in it the subversion of our every interest,—were there no other region to which we were removed, and had we nothing, therefore, to anticipate beyond the period which closes our eyes on this sublunary scene, then would it be the part of wisdom and of prudence to avert our minds from the contemplation of death, and to say, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Yes! but there is in these frail and short-lived tenements of flesh and blood a soul of immortality, which death cannot touch. Our spirits are destined to survive the dissolution of this corporeal frame-work, and to expatiate with improved and renovated powers over another and a wider scene. This is not the place of our abiding residence. We are here only travelling to our true and everlasting home, and according to the sentiments we have cherished, and the part we have performed in this lower world, will death award us our habitation either in the paradise of God, or in the regions of darkness and despair. And why, then, should we be so unwilling to entertain the thought of an event of such weighty and affecting interest? Why should we hurry away our minds from the contemplation of it, as from an object of severe and invincible aversion? Why, amid the busy engrossment of our powers with the concerns of earthliness, should we bury ourselves in so profound an oblivion of that catastrophe which sets us loose from every present interest, and which transfers us to the realms of immortality? Will the terror of those circumstances with which it is accompanied, or the dark and gloomy aspect under which our fancy represents it, justify us in shutting up every avenue by which the thought of it can gain access to our minds, while in itself it is so solemn, and in its results so momentous? O the wretched infatuation of man! to slumber away his days in an almost total oblivion of death, and to give all his attention and his care to the interests of this vain and perishing world! Let us advert,

I. To the description which is here given us of death.

The Psalmist does not, by any means, profess an insensibility to the solemnity of this event, or speak of it as if there were no terrors accompanying it. On the contrary, the very description which he gives of it supposes that it presented to him a formidable aspect, and that, in itself, he regarded it as the proper object of dread and alarm. That man must have reached the last stage of moral insensibility, or must have extinguished the natural sentiments of his heart by imbibing the opinions of an infidel philosophy, whose mind the thought of death does not strike with dismay, and on whom it does not produce an impression of deepest solemnity. The Psalmist here paints it in the darkest and most gloomy colours, and if he rises superior to the apprehension of it, it is because he entertained the conviction that he was shielded by the arm of Omnipotence from the dangers which attended him, and because he enjoyed the communications of his grace. In whatever light we view death, it is clothed, to our imagination, with terror, and is calculated to excite in us emotions of reverence and awe. If we regard it as the termination of our earthly existence, even in this aspect of it, it is an object of sad and melancholy contemplation, and touches the springs of inward sensibility. It breaks those numerous and powerful ties which bind us to our present abode, and puts a final period to all our present joys and hopes. There is in our nature a principle of attachment to the things around us; our hearts contract a liking and an affinity to a scene with which we have long been familiar. Even though it may once have carried no charm to our inward affections, though we could look on it without one emotion of admiration or delight, yet if there be nothing in it to pain or revolt our sensibilities, we will, by the very circumstance of dwelling in the midst of it, and having the interest of our mind ever kept awake with its objects and events, entertain for it some measure of regard, and melt into sadness when we are called to bid it a lasting farewell. We all experience the operation of this principle in respect to that world which is the scene of our present residence. Our mind and our feelings have become familiarized to its objects; they are established in our affections, and we have the practical impression that, in the midst of them, is our proper home. At death, however, every tie which binds us to earth must be rent asunder; every pursuit which had hitherto occupied our attention here will be brought to a termination, and the busy and restless activity of earthly passions will be hushed into perpetual repose. The sun will continue to enlighten our world, but it will never brighten up the darkness of the grave. The tumult of business will continue to be heard, but it will never break the silence of the grave. The seasons will continue to roll in grateful succession over the face of nature, and the earth will smile with its accustomed beauty, but they carry with them no charm to soften or relieve the desolation of the grave. Our dwellings will still be peopled with inhabitants, and our streets be crowded with a living population, but we have been cast out from the habitations of men, and lie cold and insensible in the dark and lonesome grave. This is an object of sad and melancholy contemplation,—to bid adieu to all which now occupies and interests our hearts, to be cut off from among men as though we had never been, and to be shut up in that narrow house, where we shall slumber in the dust of everlasting oblivion! “Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what is it; that I may know how frail I am. Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth; mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Surely every man walketh in a vain show; surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.”

But death also breaks the nearest and the dearest of earthly relationships, and this is one of its most melancholy and forbidding features. We must then leave those to whom our hearts were united by the strongest sympathies of reciprocal endearment, and “with whose existence our own seemed inseparably entwined.” It is death which can extinguish the warmth of friendship, and seal up the springs of tender sensibility. Until the pulse of life has ceased to throb, the general current of affection will never cease to flow towards its objects, and to melt the bosom in kindness and good will. And how severe, then, is the anguish which it must occasion, to be torn away from the embrace of those, in the cordiality of whose attachment our hearts could ever repose, and whose presence and intercourse shed a warm and cheerful light over the path of our earthly history! It may be, a parent must abandon the offspring of his love, who are ready to receive “his parting breath, and to close his beaming eye,” to the mercy of a selfish world, in ignorance whether the current of life may carry them, or what protection may be afforded them against its corrupt and ensnaring power. It may be a child who is bidding a last farewell to the parents who watched his infant slumbers, who were the faithful and devoted guardians of his youth, and whose countenance was ever bright with the smile of kindness and benignity towards him. It may be a brother or a sister, cut down in the flower of their youth, and torn from a weeping family, and the sympathies of whose friendship they had ever been nursed, and by whom they had been trained in the way which leads to God and immortality. O there is no sorrow like unto this sorrow, to leave behind us the objects of our warmest at-our tenderest regard, and to tread singly and alone through "the valley of the shadow of death!"

There is, besides, a shock which nature is apprehended to sustain at the moment of departure, and which it is painful for us to endure. The spirit must be dislodged from that corporeal tenement in which it has so long resided, and by means of which it has maintained all its intercourse and communication with the outward and visible world. The dissolution of this relationship is a violence done to the whole framework of our system, and is, in many instances, attended with the severest agonies of bodily pain. The body is not regarded by us as an incumbrance to the spirit, which it is desirous to throw off, and from which it would be glad to make its escape. There is an intimacy produced between them, as the result of that constant intercourse which is now maintained, and that strong and powerful tie which connects them with each other; and it is painful, therefore, to entertain the thought of separation, and still more painful when the moment arrives in which they must be rent asunder, and their union dissolved.

But the chief reason why death presents to us so formidable an aspect, and why we recoil from it with feelings of such painful aversion, is the darkness resting on the scene which lies before. We are then on the confines of a mysterious region which all must enter, but from whose bourne no traveller has ever yet returned, to declare to us "the reception which he found, or the objects which he met with there." The conceptions we have formed of it are vague and imperfect, and do not at all rest on the testimony of sense, but can only be reached through the more obscure and indeterminate medium of faith. But one thing our conscience leads us to anticipate, and the discoveries of revelation give certainty to the intimation,—that we must then be ushered into the immediate presence of the Most High—that our last and solemn account must be given in—that the whole secrecies of our inward character must be laid open to the view of unspotted purity—and that we are to have pronounced on us that doom which will determine our condition through eternity. Say if death is not, in any point of view, a sad and awful contemplation? But when regarded as the gate which opens into eternity, as the season when we are thus to be called into the presence of our God and Judge, and when our everlasting fate is to be sealed, is it wonderful that it should be invested with a melancholy gloom in the view of all of us, and that it should be denominated "the valley of the shadow of death!" But I gladly hasten to the more agreeable part of our subject, and consider,

II. The support and consolation which may be enjoyed in the hour of death.

It was the Psalmist's confidence in God, as he declares, which enabled him to anticipate death without dismay; and it is this alone which can give composure or elevation to the spirit when we pass through its dark valley. We must cherish the sense of our interest in the divine favour, and be willing to commit ourselves to the divine disposal, in the persuasion that the exercise of divine power and goodness will secure us against every evil, as we have nothing on which our hearts can repose with tranquillity. The stronger impression that we thus have of the divine nearness to us, the more that we realize the intimacy of the divine presence, the deeper the sense of security we will enjoy, and the greater the confidence we will cherish in the most painful and trying circumstances in which we can be placed. If we entertain the suspicion that we are left to ourselves, and have been abandoned by that gracious Providence, which never ceases to attend and to watch over the interests of his people, the valley of the shadow of death must be clothed, to our eyes, in terrors which will depress and overwhelm the spirit. But the believer knows, that "the eternal God will there be his refuge, and that underneath him will be the everlasting arms;" and, therefore, can he adopt the language of the Psalmist, and say, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death; yet will I fear none evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

And how are we to entertain this confidence in God? We must have been brought to an acceptance of Christ as a Saviour, and must have closed with those proposals of mercy which are made to us through Him, otherwise we can never rejoice in the consciousness of the divine presence, or derive from it a sense of security, when we come to pass through the valley of the shadow of death. We must not merely, however, entertain the conviction that He is the Saviour of a lost and ruined world, but we must have embraced Him as our own Saviour, and reposed our trust in Him for eternity. It was this which inspired the mind of the great apostle of the Gentiles with a divine triumph in the anticipation of a speedy dissolution; "I know in whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day." He here points the attention to Christ as the immediate source of his tranquillity. It was to Him he had ever been accustomed to direct his believing eye in the prospect of death and judgment. It was to His divine guardianship he had committed the precious deposit of his soul, and he rejoices in the persuasion that He was able to redeem it, and to bring it at length to the full and complete enjoyment of the blessings of an everlasting salvation. This is the only source whence we can derive tranquillity and peace, when the scenes of an eternal world are opening on our view. This is the only remedy which can expel from the human bosom the alarms of guilt, and which can chase away the darkness resting on the awful prospect which lies before. A hope which reposes in the merit of our own character, can never charm away those apprehensions which disturb our repose. The contemplation of our own excellence and worth can never prove an opiate to that disquietude which will then vex and agitate the spirit. The peace which rests on such a basis, is not the sweet and smiling calm of an untroubled sky, but the deep and sullen stillness which covers the face of the approaching storm. It is the slumber of a blind and deluded conscience, which will be, ere long, roused in avenging fury by the unveiled lustre of Jehovah's purity. It is besides, a peace which the consciousness of guilt is ever liable to disturb, and which, resting as it does, on a basis the most narrow and unstable, can never prove secure. Whose character is marked by such spotless innocence as to challenge the approbation of the Great Searcher of hearts? And must not then the sense of imperfection awaken in the mind suspicion as to our interest in the favour of our heavenly Judge, and cover the valley of the shadow of death, in some measure at least, with the gloom of despair? But he who commits his soul to the keeping of his Saviour, may anticipate his departure not only without dismay, but with a "joy unspeakable and full of glory." In His righteousness there is no taint or imperfection to limit its excellence or to mar its unspotted purity, and we are warranted to repose on it with an unlimited reliance. And how precious does the Saviour seem to the soul of an expiring saint? What a charm does his great work of atonement then carry to his heart, and with what energy does he cling to it when sinking into the depths of eternity, and amid the struggles of an exhausted and dissolving nature! The situation in which he stands opens up to him more enlarged discoveries of the awful holiness of the divine character, and produces in his mind a stronger impression of his guilt and pollution. He is made more alive to the necessity of the righteousness of his divine Redeemer, and in the anticipation of being ere long summoned into the immediate presence of his God, the message of reconciliation comes with a welcome to his ear beyond what it had ever done before, and is endeared to his affections beyond all of which he had hitherto been conscious. It is thus that the mind of the believer is often sustained in a tone of highest elevation, even amid the acutest severities of bodily pain, and looks with a longing and delighted eye on the awful, though glorious, prospect which is opening on his view. "We," says an apostle, "that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up in life." "I know," says Job, "that my Redeemer liveth, and that He will stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though, after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." It was their confidence in God, as his character is revealed in the cross of Christ, which inspired these sentiments, as is declared in the triumphant language of the apostle: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

THE NECESSITY AND ADVANTAGES OF HOUSES OF REFUGE FOR JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

By ALEXANDER WALLACE CHALMERS, ESQ.

Elder of Gilmanton Parish, and Governor of Aberdeen Prison.

THE increase of juvenile delinquency has, of late, excited the regret of every person who has considered the subject, and much anxiety has been manifested in many places to devise means for checking the growing evil. In every large town numbers of boys and girls are constantly to be seen prowling about the streets in search of plunder. Of these, many have either been left orphans, or driven from home by a connection of second marriage, while others have not only been neglected in every branch of duty by their natural protectors, but have actually been tutored by their worthless parents in every species of vice. The consequences are obvious. The destitute get into contact with the idle and vicious, and soon become their lack and associates, at an age when the pollution speedily operates, and when they are easily tempted to yield to the commission of crime; whilst those, whose parents, instead of persuading them to an opposite course, encourage them in their evil propensities, go on with increasing confidence in the ways of sin, until arrested by the officers of justice. Here, it may be thought by some, that the guilty career of the offender will be stopped;—and, no doubt, it is so for a time,—but generally happens that, from the nature and extent of their first offences, young criminals are committed either to jail or bridewell for the short period of twenty, thirty, or, at most, sixty days,—a period quite inadequate to admit of the proper application of the discipline necessary for punishment, far less to produce amendment. On the contrary, it is feared, that the tendency of such imprisonment is, to inure, harden, and gradually train young offenders to endure confinement, without feeling it as a punishment, and thus they persevere in crime, until they become so desperately wicked, and wretchedly destitute, that even a prison, with all its privations, forms a comfortable asylum.

A great proportion of offenders, while under confinement, conduct themselves with propriety, and show decided symptoms of penitence and improvement; but, destitute, on the morning of their discharge, of the means of subsistence, perhaps without friends, and the world refusing to be their friends,—bereft of character, unable, even when willing, to procure employment, and the world's laws giving them no encouragement to return to a virtuous course of life, the only alternative left to them is to starve or to steal, and they consequently take refuge amongst thieves and prostitutes, by whom they are received with open arms, their immediate wants supplied, and any good resolutions which may have been formed in prison are speedily obliterated from their minds. In fact, so eager are these guilty creatures to prevent a diminution of their number from returning to the paths of virtue, that those of them who are at large will most anxiously wait for the termination of the imprisonment of their companions, and lurk about the jail or bridewell, when they are set at liberty, when they immediately lay hands on them, and conduct them in triumph to their usual haunts.

Of such proceedings I have too frequently been a witness; and I give the following as an illustration of what I have stated:—

Two young girls were convicted of theft, and committed to bridewell for forty days; the one had been in confinement on four previous occasions, the other was evidently a novice in crime. On conversing with the latter, I found that her connections were humble but respectable, that she had been for several years a servant in a lodging-house, but having deviated rethe paths of virtue, she had been obliged to leave her situation, and had for some months associated with the most profligate of her sex. She appeared to feel deeply the degradation to which she had been brought, acknowledged that she had enjoyed no real happiness in the course of her short but guilty career, and expressed a determination, as soon as liberated, to abandon her former associates, to return to a relative in the country, and endeavour to obtain a livelihood by honest industry. On the morning of her liberation, I observed several females hovering about the gate, evidently waiting to welcome the companions from whom they had been for some time separated. I mentioned this to the girl, when she at once agreed to remain in her cell until the evening, in order that she might get away, without the risk of being entrapped by her former acquaintances. Accordingly, she was not liberated till between seven and eight at night, but she had not walked thirty yards, when three or four girls started up from behind a hedge, immediately accosted her, evidently overcame all scruples, and marched off with their victim. Since then she has been several times in Bridewell, and is now a confirmed drunkard. Had there been a House of Refuge in Aberdeen at that time, this girl might have been rescued from the hands of the destroyer, and instead of being a moral pest in the town, might have become a useful member of society.

No one becomes confirmed in depravity at once; before that takes place several stages of guilt must be passed through; and if means were used to arrest the progress, on the expiration of first imprisonments, by furnishing the delinquents with shelter, providing them with food, and procuring suitable employment, numbers, just entered within the threshold of crime, might be plucked as brands from the burning, reclaimed from the error of their ways, and brought eventually to become honest and decent members of the community.

While juvenile offenders remain at large there can be no reasonable hope of their amendment, and therefore a house of correction must, in the first instance, be their school. But, before the great end of reformation can be accomplished, an asylum must be provided for the reception of the friendless and the penitent, where the discipline begun in Bridewell would be continued, elementary, moral, and religious instruction imparted, habits of cleanliness, regularity, and order enforced, and useful employment afforded, until such progress in amendment has been made as to justify re-admission to the free intercourse of society, when recommendations could be given, and facilities afforded to the inmates for procuring situations suited to their respective conditions and acquirements.

Of such a nature are the Houses of Refuge which have been established in Aberdeen and other large towns; and these institutions continue to realize from day to day the most sanguine expectations of their supporters.

A House of Refuge is necessary to give to a prison all its perfection and effect. It supplies what the Bridewell system, of necessity, leaves defective; it furnishes an intermediate step between coercive confinement, and unrestrained intercourse with the world; it confirms voluntarily a system of reform which the house of correction has commenced compulsorily, and it gives time for ripening, in sheltering security, any seeds of good which may have been implanted. It furnishes an abode to those young persons who, from the carelessness, or loss of parents or guardians, are left to wander, without a guide and without a home, exposed to every temptation, and too often to the commission of crime. It is a place where the glad tidings of salvation are proclaimed to sinners, and where the wanderer may be restored to the fold of that gracious Being, whose will is, "that not one of these little ones should perish."

Although the House of Refuge in Aberdeen has been only a short time established, much good has resulted from it. In the report of the directors, dated 1st April 1837, they state that during the seven months that the house has been open, one hundred and sixty-one persons had been admitted, of whom ninety were under fourteen years of age. Of these last seventeen had been effectually and comfortably provided with employment in different places in the country,—not a few had been enabled to return to their relatives, improved in morals and health, and thirty-eight then remained in the asylum. From the limited amount of funds at the disposal of the directors, their operations have been very much restricted, and the full advantages of the institution have not been sufficiently developed; but still the results have been such as to satisfy all who take an interest in the asylum, of the necessity for such an establishment.

To many criminals the morning of their liberation from prison is a morning of joy and gladness, but to some it is the harbinger of sorrow and misery. Frequently have prisoners entreated me to allow them to remain in confinement, because they knew not where to go for shelter, and no one would give them employment; but all that I could then do was to give them a recommendation to some of the manufacturers in the neighbourhood, of which few availed themselves, not wishing it to be known that they had been in Bridewell. Now, however, all difficulty is removed, as I have merely to send such persons to the House of Refuge, where they are immediately admitted, and kept till situations are obtained for them.

To show how difficult it is for persons to find employment after being liberated from a prison, I may state the following circumstances which occurred some years since:

A young girl was convicted of theft from a manufactory, and was sentenced to confinement in Bridewell for twelve months. She conducted herself with great propriety during her imprisonment, and when liberated I gave her a very strong letter of recommendation to enable her to get work. In a few days, she called upon me, and stated that she had made application at all the manufactories, but no person would employ her, being afraid to admit her amongst their work people. She then entreated me to allow her to attend at the Bridewell during the day, when she would labour the same as the prisoners, and take what payment I pleased; in fact she would do any thing rather than be driven to the streets for a subsistence. Being anxious to give the girl a fair chance of retrieving her character, and also of testing her sincerity, I consented to her request, and for some time she attended regularly every morning at six o'clock, was locked up in a cell, as if she had been a prisoner, was employed at the ordinary work of the house, and remained till eight o'clock at night. Finding that her conduct corresponded to her professions, I at last mentioned the circumstances, which I have now stated, to an extensive manufacturer in the town, when he agreed to give her a trial, and I am glad to say that she is still in his employment, and has conducted herself with great propriety.

A case of this description is surely of itself sufficient to point out the necessity of a House of Refuge, to which persons similarly circumstanced may have it in their power to go. But this is not a solitary case of the kind; on the contrary, there are many such; and if so, is it not the duty of Christians, of all denominations, to assist, by every means in their power, to rescue their fellow-creatures, guilty and fallen though they be, from the power of him "who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour," and to bring them to Him who is the only "refuge from the tempest, the only covert from the storm" of the divine indignation.

The following case will illustrate a difficulty of a different description, to which juvenile delinquents are exposed on their liberation from prison:—

A boy, about thirteen years of age, belonging to a fishing village, was convicted of theft, and committed to

Bridewell for three months. His behaviour in prison was good, and at the expiry of his sentence he was sent home to his parents. It is well known that the fishers are a peculiar race of people, and that when any one of them is convicted of a crime, the individual loses caste, and is generally driven from the society with which he was connected. Accordingly, when, some time after, the boy was again committed to Bridewell, I was not surprised to learn from him that he had run away from his father's house, because "they did not use him well, and were aye castin' up to him that he had been in Bridewell, and had disgraced them a'." He had come to Aberdeen, got acquainted with some of the young thieves, who infest the streets, connected himself with a band of them that lived with a woman who supplied them with meat and lodging, on condition of their bringing to her what they could steal, and he then became a professed thief. He is now in Bridewell for the fourth time, but when his imprisonment expires, instead of being let loose upon the world, he will be received into the House of Refuge, and care taken to provide for him an honest employment. His present sentence being for a long period, he has been taught to weave, and has made great proficiency in reading and writing, of which he was altogether ignorant when first committed.

The foregoing statements are, I think, sufficient to satisfy every reflecting person of the necessity which exists for the establishment and support of Houses of Refuge in every town in the kingdom, and of the advantages resulting to juvenile delinquents from such institutions. But the inmates of Houses of Refuge are not the only persons benefited by them, for all are more or less interested in their success. Every criminal is like a noxious weed in a garden, which not only cumber the ground, but contaminates and weakens the healthy plants around it. The vicious seldom go on in sin alone. Knowing that their conduct subjects them to suspicion and danger, they are anxious to involve others in their criminality, and hence, they use every means in their power to draw the simple and unwary into their toils, and to make them partakers of their iniquity. The more, therefore, that the weeds of society are rooted out, the more will the good plants flourish and increase, and thus will vice, crime, and misery, be diminished, and the expense thereby entailed on the community, in the shape of poor's rates, rogue money, and other similar taxes, be materially lessened.

To the worldly man, therefore, I say, countenance and support Houses of Refuge. By so doing, you will contribute to check the increase of crime, and thereby render your property more secure; while, at the same time, the demands of the tax-gatherer on your purse will be less frequent.

To the godly man I say, countenance and support Houses of Refuge. By doing so, you will not only enjoy the same temporal advantages as the worldly man, but you will have the satisfaction of reflecting, that you may thus be the means of saving souls from never ending misery. And surely, if any thing can add to the happiness of heaven, it must be the joy experienced by the redeemed, when they behold those who were once "living without God, and without hope in the world," surrounding the throne of God and of the Lamb, and uniting, with "ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands," in saying, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" and, "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever!"

Many persons object to Houses of Refuge, because the apparent good effects resulting from them are not equivalent to the expense incurred. To these I answer, that if one soul is gained to Christ, more is accomplished than finite minds can appreciate. "For what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" or, "what can a man give in exchange for his soul?"

Others object to the establishment of Houses of Refuge, because there is no power to oblige the man to reside in them for a sufficient time, or to subject them to the necessary discipline. In answer to this I can confidently refer to those establishments which have been in existence for several years, and for admission to which there has been no lack of applicants. But should it happen that in any place there is a reluctance, on the part of those requiring such an asylum, to avail themselves of its shelter, then I would recommend to the directors, in the beautiful language of our Saviour, "to go out into the highways and hedge-ways, to compel them to come in," not by the strong arm of the law, but by the great and irresistible force of moral suasion; and I doubt not but the house will be filled.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

An appeal in behalf of the Jews.—It is not a little remarkable, that though the most distinguished of the apostles was sent peculiarly to the Gentiles, (Acts xxvii. 17,) he yet began by preaching to the Jews (ix. 20); and in every city to which he went, sent out the seed of Israel first of all. What anxiety he not feel and express for them, "as his knees according to the flesh?" having "great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart" on their account, (Acts ix. 2); his heart's desire and prayer for them being "that they might be saved," (x. 1.) And let us not should mistake the reason for this, and impute it to any merely temporary or personal consideration, but stated as the cause of this his anxiety in their behalf, that "to them pertaineth the adoption, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." (ix. 4, 5.) And is there any thing here applicable to them now than it then was? Most assuredly not. Nor should we overlook, or forget, the deep interest in them, as they are at this moment, which Jehovah has expressed. Behold how he loveth them. Here is his anger at those who oppress them, though their sins have been the cause. "I am pained for Jerusalem, and for Zion with a great jealousy." I am sore displeased with the heathen that are set against for I was but a little displeased, and they helped to the affliction." (Zech. i. 14.) Here is his remembrance of love at the sight of what their sins daily cause to them. "Since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still; therefore my bowels are troubled for him. I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord." (Jer. xxxi. 20.) Do we not see in these and other passages, that God's eye is resting on them with a peculiar regard? And if we had a single doubt respecting this one declaration of the apostle as to the believing of his brethren, would completely remove it. "They are beloved for their fathers' sake." (Rom. ix. 28.) Consider farther, that God has called attention to his people and engaged our interest in them, positively revealing that in the latter days there shall be Christ's messengers to the mass of the heathen. "I will send those that escape of them to the mountains of Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to the isles of Javan, to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles." (Isa. lvi. 1.) The Prophet Micah has said, "The remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as dew upon the grass," (v. 7.) and the reviving and refreshing which shall come to the nations by them. And then it is added, "The tower of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the latter days, as a lion among the beasts of the field, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep," plainly revealing that a most powerful influence will be exerted them in some way over the whole nations of the earth. All which is urged with equal clearness by Paul when he says, "If the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness?" (Rom. xi. 12.) "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving be but life from the dead." (Ver. 15.) Yes! for aught we know to the contrary, the mass of the earth may remain dead in sin, until life flow into their veins from converted Israel. Israel may be the dew that is to revive the withered and decaying world. Israel may be the first that is to kindle on the world, which is to be to them as stubble. Israel may be the leaven that is to penetrate the mass, the whole lump. Israel, in a word, may be the lever, by moving which, you would move the whole earth. "There shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel—thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself, and be known in the eyes of many nations." (Ezek. xxxviii. 19-23.) Let us also remind you of the peculiar glory brought to God, and, therefore, the peculiar joy there is in heaven when a Jew is saved. The Father rejoices "with his whole heart and his whole soul." (Jer. xxxii. 21.) The Son, surely, is specially glorified, since in each such case it is seen that his intercession for his very murderers avails, and that his blood can wash out the most enormous blasphemy. And the Holy Ghost is glorified; for his power is shown to be most marvellous, since it removes the veil from even such hardened souls, and his love to be exceeding strong in striving with such deep perverseness and malignity, till it overcome. Is there not thus exhibited a most convincing example of the freeness of the grace of God? Does he not thus prove that "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he hath saved us," since he redeems those that were, each like Paul, breathing hot against him? Is it not then a plain duty that you should give a prominent place in your prayers and in your labours to the Jews? Why have we done so little in time past? May we not have lost some blessing hitherto by this neglect? One of the innumerable sins of the Church of Rome is her unceasing hatred of this people. But, may not God have been provoked to withhold some blessing from us also, just because we have held back from that people to whom he has, as it were, by his finger pointed our attention? Is it not every way likely that all our missionary undertakings would prosper in a far higher degree if we were to "begin at Jerusalem"?

They who love God love also his people.—"By this," said Christ, "shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Therefore, "if ye love me, keep my commandments; and this is my commandment, that ye love one another." "This commandment," said his inspired apostle, "have we from him, that he, who loveth God, loveth his brother also. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" Again, "every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him." The connection and the likeness between the parent and the child make the love which is felt for the one extend also to the other. The community of sentiment, too, which prevails among all the children themselves, leads them to love one another. Being "all members one of another," and having all the same general views and interest and united to the same common head, the love of each other becomes one of the distinguishing marks of their character. They, likewise, "esteem one another very highly in love, for their work's sake"—being all engaged in "labours of love," in glorifying him "who is head over all things to the church." This is their love to him expanding itself and taking in those who are the objects also of his love, who live and move in him, and who are united to him as the branches are to the vine, and the members of the body to the head. Hence it is evident that there is no opposition between love to God and love to his people; nay, that the more any one loves the people of God, so much the more he loves God himself. O Lord, may the unfeigned love of the brethren daily grow stronger in my heart, and bear witness that through the grace that is in Christ Jesus, the love of thee has also been wrought in me. Amen.—Rev. A. WYRTE. (The Heritage of God's People.)

On Bridling the Tongue.—In the multitude of words there will be some folly, something that will not tend to edification, something that may rather weary and offend than delight and improve. This evil of over-speaking usually comes from an over-weening opinion of self. Unchastised and unsubdued self is fond of its own display, although it can display nothing; or were it not deceiving or deceived, nothing but its own wretchedness and ruin. The apostle has a striking hint for professors of religion, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain." What is our end in religious conversation? If we speak without a purpose, surely it is folly; if we speak to our own praise, it is wrong to our own souls, and a robbery of God; if we speak for his honour, and the edification of others, we should look up to him for his blessing, that our words, as they ought, may be weighty and wise. In this humble dependence upon God, and with a warm concern for the spiritual welfare of others, our discourses may be comfortable and edifying, both to them and ourselves. A word in season thus spoken, may be remembered and blessed. The more of this kind of conference the better, care being taken of the spirit in which we speak, of the time and propriety of speaking, and of not mixing other things (as is too often the case) with our religious discourse, which may render it trifling or unsavoury. When we have said all we could wish to say upon divine things, it will be profitable to withdraw, that there may be due opportunity for reflection, meditation, digestion, and prayer.—SERLE. (Christian Remembrancer.)

The Time of Trouble.—Seeing, therefore, we live for this life amongst so many and great perils and dangers, we must be well assured by God's Word how to bear them, and how patiently to take them, as they be sent to us from God. We must also assure ourselves, that there is no other remedy for Christians in the time of trouble, than Christ himself hath appointed us. In St. Luke, he giveth us this commandment: Ye shall possess your lives in patience, saith he. In the which words, he giveth us both commandment what to do, and also great consolation and comfort in all troubles. He showeth also what is to be done, and what is to be hoped for, in troubles: and when troubles happen, he biddeth us be patient, and in no case violently nor seditiously to resist our persecutors, because God hath such care and charge of us, that he will keep in the midst of all troubles the very hairs of our head, so that one of them shall not fall away without the will and pleasure of our heavenly Father. Whether the hair, therefore, tarry in the head, or fall from the head, it is the will of the Father. And seeing he hath such care for the hairs of our head, how much more doth he care for our life itself! Wherefore let God's adversaries do what they list, whether they take the life or take it not, they can do us no hurt, for their cruelty hath no further power than God permitteth them: and that which cometh unto us by the will of our heavenly Father, can be no harm, no loss, neither destruction unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adversity, that chance to such as be of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, can be none other but gain and advantage.—BISHOP HOOKER. ## SACRED POETRY.

HAGAR IN THE DESERT.

INJURED, hopeless, faint, and weary,
Sad, indignant, and forlorn,
Through the desert wild and dreary
Hagar leads the child of scorn.

Who can speak a mother's anguish,
Painted in that tearless eye,
Which beholds her darling languish—
Languish unrelieved, and die?

Lo! the empty pitcher fails her,
Perishing with thirst he lies;
Death, with deep despair assails her,
Piteous as for aid he cries.

From the dreadful image flying,
Wild she rushes from the sight;
In the agonies of dying,
Can she see her soul's delight?

Now bereft of every hope,
Cast upon the burning ground
Poor, abandoned soul! look up,
Mercy have thy sorrows found.

Lo! the angel of the Lord
Comes thy great distress to cheer;
Listen to the gracious word,
See divine relief is near.

'Care of Heaven! though man forsake thee,
Wherefore vainly dost thou mourn?
From thy dream of woe awake thee,
To thy rescued child return.

"Lift thine eyes, behold yon fountain,
Sparkling mid those fruitful trees;
Lo! beneath yon sheltering mountain
Smile for thee green bowers of ease.

"In the hour of sore affliction,
God hath seen and pitied thee;
Cheer thee in the sweet conviction,
Thou henceforth his care shalt be.

"Be no more by doubts distressed,
Mother of a mighty race!
By contempt no more oppressed,
Thou hast found a resting-place."

Thus from peace and comfort driven,
Thou, poor soul, all desolate;
Hopeless lay, till pitying Heaven
Found thee, in thy abject state.

O'er thy empty pitcher, mourning,
Mid the desert of the world;
Thus, with shame and anguish burning,
From thy cherished pleasures hurled:

See thy great deliverer nigh,
Calls thee from thy sorrow vain;
Bids thee on his love rely,
Bless the salutary pain.

From thine eyes the mists dispelling,
Lo! the well of life he shows;
In his presence ever dwelling,
Bids thee find thy true repose.

Future prospects rich in blessing,
Open to thy hopes secure;
Sure of endless joys possessing,
Of an heavenly kingdom sure.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Value of the Bible.—In Lord Teignmouth's recently published "Sketches of the Coasts and Islands of Scotland," he mentions, that it was stated to him by the minister of Durness, that every family in his parish assembled daily for the purpose of prayer; his knowledge of the neighbouring parish of Eddiachillis led him to believe that the practice was equally general there; as, indeed, it was throughout this part of the country. Sailing and fishing on Saturday were unknown. The minister acknowledged with gratitude the liberality of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in consequence of an application which he had made for copies of the Scriptures, granted on the liability of dangerous coasts of his parish (including Cape Rath,) to shipwrecks, and the opportunity afforded of thus supplying destitute mariners with the Word of God. He had twice perished with foreign crews, unfortunately cast upon his shores; copies of the Scriptures,—that of the Swedish were wrecked in Loch Eribol, and that of a Danish vessel which was stranded in a storm, near the Mass E received all on board of the latter, at his decease could not make himself understood by them: after discovering their nation, he placed in their hands a copy of the Danish Bible, and observed surprise and delight gleaming from their sorrowful countenances at the sight of their native character, and gratitude for their lips for the sacred boon.

Wonderful effect of preaching Christ.—In the year 1740, a remarkable change took place in the British (Moravians) method of instructing the Greenlanders, and it was attended with such singular effects as merit particular notice. Hitherto they had been accustomed, in the first instance, to direct the attention of the pagans to such truths as were of a preliminary nature, as the existence of God, the creation of the world, the fall of man; a mode of instruction which appears not merely the most rational, but the one which they could have pursued with the smallest prospect of success. It is worthy of observation, however, that reduced to practice, it had proved not only altogether ineffectual, but even seemed a bar to the conversion of the heathen. They now adopted a different method, and directed the attention of the natives, from the first instance, to Christ Jesus, his incarnation, his life, and especially his sufferings and death. In discoursing of these things, the Brethren themselves were often so much impressed, that they spoke in a manner entirely new; the subject so warmed and animated their own hearts, that the words flowed from their lips with wonderful fervour and affection; they were even astonished at each other's powers of utterance. Happily this was attended with corresponding effects on the Greenlanders. It illuminated their dark understanding, melted their stubborn hearts, and kindled in their cold icy breasts the flame of spirituality. This, therefore, may be considered as a new era in the history of the Greenland mission.

HAPPINESS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. J. A. WALLACE,

It may be laid down as a general principle which is capable of the amplest illustration, even in the present world, that there must be some kind of adaptation between the state of a man's mind and the circumstances in which he is placed, otherwise it is impossible that he can be happy. It is not enough that he be brought into a situation which is in itself desirable and advantageous, but it must be such a situation as is precisely suited to his own taste, and disposition, and capacity. We should do little, for example, in the way of contributing to the enjoyment of a blind man by placing him in the midst of the loveliest landscape of nature, or to the entertainment of a deaf man by wakening in his presence the most enchanting melodies of music, or to the gratification of an unlettered man by drawing his attention to the profoundest speculations of philosophy, or to the amusement of a sick man by carrying him on his bed of languishing or of death, and putting him down amid the revelry of some gay and festive entertainment. And why? Not because the landscape, and the music, and the philosophy, and the festive entertainment are devoid of every attraction, and incapable, in any circumstances, of giving enjoyment, but simply because there is no congruity between the state of the man's mind and the circumstances into which he is brought. The things themselves may be the sources of pleasure to other men whose habits and capacities are different from his own, but he himself is without the taste or the aptitude for their enjoyment, and therefore his happiness is as little promoted by means of them, as if he had been left altogether without them.

It is by the application of a principle such as this to the things of God, or to the realities of an eternal world, that we perceive how well and how wisely ordered it has been, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. For wherein does that kingdom consist? In the present world, it consists in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost,—and in the world to come, it consists in the same things, purified from all admixture of evil, and wrought up to a state of perfection. Heaven, therefore, is completely adapted to the final and unchangeable blessedness of the saints, for they are previously invested with the righteousness of Christ, and, through the regeneration of the Spirit, are made perfect in holiness, and consequently there is a perfect harmony between the habits of their minds and the nature of the place. But it is widely different with the workers of iniquity, whose whole souls are devoted to the love and practice of sin. There is the greatest of all contrarieties between the principles by which they are actuated, and the elements of which the kingdom of heaven consists. And, hence, it is as impossible for corruption to inherit incorruption, or for unrighteousness to have fellowship with holiness, or for the sinner to associate for ever with the saint, as for the darkness to exist at the same time, and in the same circumstances, with the light.

Yet nothing can be more common for the workers of iniquity, than to flatter themselves with the imagination, that the only obstacle to their admission into heaven is on the side of God,—that were his consent by any means to be obtained, all other difficulties would immediately dissolve and disappear,—and that, consequently, their translation into heaven, be the state of their minds what it may, would be sufficient of itself to secure their everlasting happiness. The Bible, indeed, may declare in the plainest terms, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord"—that he who hath the right kind of hope in him "purifieth himself, even as Christ is pure,"—and that there "shall in no wise enter into heaven anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, neither whatsoever loveth or that maketh a lie." But these, though the true sayings of God, instead of being distinctly realized, or implicitly believed, are removed as far into the shade as the deceitfulness or corruption of their hearts can carry them. It is enough for them that the idea is fixed immovably in their minds, that heaven is a place of perfect happiness, but without ever considering wherein that happiness consists, or whether it be congenial to the feelings of an unsanctified heart; and that God, moreover, is a merciful being, who will surely make great allowances for the infirmities of their nature, and who, peradventure, will permit them in the end to pass through the gates into the celestial city. It is, however, deserving of the serious consideration of every unregenerated man, that by giving himself to the indulgence of such vague expectations, he is not only reckoning on what never can be realized without a total subversion of the government of God, but on what, if actually brought to pass, would still leave him as distant as ever from the happiness which he hopes to enjoy.

But let us take a case, for the sake of illustration. Suppose that a man has been living all his life long without God, without Christ, and without hope, excluding the divine Being, as thoroughly as he can, from all his thoughts, and plans, and pleasures, and seeking his every enjoyment in the gratification of his evil passions, in the pursuits of earthly ambition, or in the pleasures of a world that lieth in wickedness; then how does he feel? Why, he may contrive to make himself tolerably comfortable, when surrounded by his ungodly associates, or brought within reach of his favourite enjoyments. For, in that case, there is a correspondence between his habits and his circumstances. But let him be withdrawn for a single day from the pursuits on which his affections have been placed; let every faculty of his nature be most intensely occupied in the contemplation of the character of that God who has hitherto been completely excluded from his thoughts, and instead of joining, as in times past, with his companions in iniquity, let him be encompassed with devout and godly men, who are regaling themselves with the beauties of holiness, and whose hearts are panting after the living God, even as the hart panteth after the water brooks, and then he is completely miserable. Though in other circumstances the gayest of the gay, there is now an intolerable restraint upon his spirit, and instead of heartily engaging in the exercises of devotion, or enjoying the fellowship of the men of God with whom he is surrounded, his chief comfort is gathered from the hope of escaping speedily from the bondage under which he is held, and betaking himself, as heretofore, to the scenes and companions of his former sins.

Such, in point of fact, is the sinner's experience in the present world. Let the scene then be changed from earth to heaven, and instead of introducing him to the fellowship of Christians here, let him be admitted to the purer and loftier fellowship of the saints above, and is it to be supposed that he would find himself one iota happier among the sanctified in heaven than he actually found himself among the sanctified on earth? Assuredly not. For, granting, what however can never take place, that he has passed uncondemned, and in his unrighteousness, from the bar of judgment,—that all his apprehensions in regard to the solemnities of that dread tribunal have been removed,—that, somehow or other, he has found his way within the precincts of the celestial city, and has carried along with him all his earthly desires, his beloved lusts, and his sinful habits, yet even in that case he could not be happy. For in heaven there is nothing that can minister to his satisfaction—no worldly business—no carnal indulgence—no sinful companionship—nothing whatsoever that is suited to the habits of an unregenerated sinner. How then could he occupy himself? With whom could he associate? What would be the subject of his thoughts? Or by what means could he contrive to spend the ages of an interminable eternity? Could he venture to approach to God? Who does not see that God, to a worker of iniquity, is the most repulsive object in the universe—that his presence would be a hell of itself? Could he enter into fellowship with angels? Impure spirits. Angels are clothed with the beauties of holiness. These pure spirits can have no sympathy with the workers of iniquity. They would shrink from his approach as from the contagion of a pestilence. Could he mingle with the vast assembly of saints who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb? Oh no! He has no crown—no palm of victory—no celestial harp—he wants the very righteousness which constitutes the raiment of the saints. On that account, therefore, the glories of heaven would be a torment to him. Nay, his misery would be augmented by the splendour of its magnificence. And the mere shade of nakedness, apart altogether from the elements of hell working within him, would keep him separated for ever from all the radiant ranks of the redeemed—a filthy, degraded, and abandoned creature—excommunicated from the fellowship of the blessed spirit—wandering hopelessly amid the solitudes of heaven, like another Cain with the curse engrained into his spirit—a spectacle to be dreaded, and avoided, and universally abhorred—a bloated and accursed leper, whose black and ghastly image, a terror to himself, would be ever reflected from the brilliant pavements of heaven—a leper never sleeping, never cleansed, ever dying, diffusing poison with every breath into the fragrant atmosphere of heaven, and turning the waters of immortality into fountains of pestilence from which no blessed spirit could ever drink.

Such, we doubt not, would be the positive experience of any worker of iniquity, were he actually admitted into heaven without a change and regenerated nature. In fact, he would be nothing, though the toleration were granted him to range uncontrolled amid all the glories of that pure and blessed land. There is a certain own nature that would turn the toleration into a tremendous curse, and render it a punishment. And, therefore, we come to the conclusion, that the heart of every sinner must be completely changed; its principles of action must be rectified; its entire character must be renewed; for so only can an entrance be made into him abundantly into the everlasting glory of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Verily, I say unto you, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Verily, we say unto you, except a man be born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again."

THE RIGHT HON. JOHN GORDON OF LOCHINVAR, VISCOUNT KENMURE.

JOHN GORDON of Lochinvar was born in 1599, in the district of Galloway, where his ancestors had been wealthy proprietors for more than three centuries previously, and many of whom, from the period of the reformation, had distinguished themselves by their adherence to pure Protestant principles. Whether the subject of our present Sketch received a religious education in early life is unknown, but one circumstance may be mentioned, which seems to have been peculiarly favourable to his attaining a knowledge of divine truth. While travelling on the continent for his improvement, when a young man, he resided for some time at the house of Mr John Welsh, the son-in-law of John Knox, who was settled at that time as a minister in France. The intercourse which the young nobleman thus enjoyed with this holy man was, as may well be conceived, productive of the utmost advantage to him on a spiritual point of view. He had not merely the privilege of learning the truth as it is in Jesus, but of seeing its practical influence exemplified in the conduct of his life. On his return from the continent, accordingly, Kenmure showed a high regard for religion, and an earnest desire to communicate its glorious benefits to those around him.

The family seat of the Kenmure family was at that time situated in the parish of Anwoth, which, being united to two other parishes, enjoyed the advantage of public worship only every alternate Sabbath. This was felt as a very serious disadvantage, and Kenmure directed his efforts to procure a disjunction,—an arrangement which he at length happily succeeded in effecting. The next object was to procure a godly minister for the new parish of Anwoth. John Livingston, afterwards minister of Ancrum, was first invited to accept the charge, but that eminent minister of Christ saw it to be his duty to prefer a call to the parish of Torphichen, which was tendered to him at the same time. Though disappointed in this case, however, the choice of the people of Anwoth was singularly happy, having ultimately fallen upon a man of no less celebrity than Mr Samuel Rutherford.

The settlement of Mr Rutherford over the parish of Anwoth, took place in 1627. As soon as he had entered upon his office he put forth all his energies in advising and executing plans for the spiritual interests of his parishioners. In all these schemes he met with the warmest encouragement and support from Lord Kenmure, and his pious lady, whose name must be mentioned to the readers of "Rutherford's Letters." He entered readily into all the views of their devoted pastor, and it was with great regret, therefore, that in less than a year from his induction, Mr Rutherford found himself, by their removal to Edinburgh, deprived of their valuable assistance and co-operation. Though separated, however, from his much esteemed friends and patrons, he continued to maintain frequent intercourse with them by letter.

In 1633 Kenmure was elevated to the peerage, an honour which seems to have been attended with the most salutary effects in reference to his religious character. Unless the mind be strongly supported by divine grace, prosperity, and affluence, and honour, are uniformly found to be injurious to the advancement of vital religion in the soul. A withering carnality of mind, a worldly, an ambitious, a haughty spirit are liable to eat up as a canker every holy principle. The man sinks into a state of cold indifference to the progress of religion either in himself or others. Such was the case with Viscount Kenmure. He had obtained honour from man, and he counted little upon that infinitely higher and more enduring honour which cometh from God only. In this state of mind he withdrew his support from the Church of Scotland, at a time when she was stoutly contending against the haughty usurpations of Prelacy. Anxious to please the court party, he absented himself from Parliament, and retired to Kenmure Castle, in Galloway, which has ever since continued to be the residence of the family. This step was the source of deep regret and poignant remorse to him on his dying-bed. "I deserted the Parliament," he acknowledges, "for fear of incurring the indignation of my prince, and the loss of further honour, which I certainly expected."

On leaving Edinburgh for his seat in the south, Viscount Kenmure took Mr George Gillespie with him as his domestic chaplain, thus maintaining in his family an outward regard to religion. On his death-bed, however, he acknowledged, that the instructions of that worthy man had been too much neglected by him. The world, in fact, appears to have gained the ascendancy in his mind, and for a time all serious impressions had been well-nigh effaced. This, indeed, was nothing more than might have been expected. Having proved himself a traitor to the cause of Christ in Scotland, by withdrawing from Parliament in the Church's sorest extremity, he strove to forget the lively interest he had once taken in all that related to matters of religion. Backsliding in the divine life is only the first stage of a spirit of apostasy; and to such a crisis would the cold indifference of Viscount Kenmure have ere long led. It pleased God, however, to arrest him in his downward career, and by laying him on a bed of sickness and death, to arouse him from his spiritual torpor. In the end of August 1634, little more than a year after he had taken up his residence again in Galloway, he was seized with a violent attack of fever. Shortly before this period, he had begun to see the baseness of his conduct in deserting his place in Parliament at such a crisis; but now when the hand of the Almighty was laid upon him, his soul was smitten with feelings of the keenest anguish. "I have found," said he, in language the most affecting, "the weight of the wrath of God, for not giving testimony for the Lord my God, when I had occasion once in my life at the last Parliament, for which foul fault how fierce have I found the wrath of the Lord! My soul hath ragged and roared: I have been grieved to the heart." And again, referring to the same thing, "Would to God I had such an occasion again to testify my love to the Lord! For all the earth should I not do as I have done. Woe, woe to honour, or any thing else, bought with the loss of conscience, and God's favour!"

In this desponding state of mind Lord Kenmure was happily not permitted to remain long; but, by the faithful instructions of Mr Rutherford, who providentially came on a visit to the castle, he was led to see, that there is mercy even for the chief of sinners. The worthy pastor of Anwoth remained till his Lordship's decease, which took place in the course of a fortnight. The interviews which passed during this period are highly edifying, and afford convincing evidence of the sincere repentance and conversion of the dying nobleman. After the death of Lord Kenmure, an account was published of the "Last and Heavenly Speeches and Glorious Departure of John Gordon, Viscount Kenmure." This work is generally attributed to Samuel Rutherford, and had our space permitted we would have gladly extracted passages from a document so valuable. It has been several times reprinted, but the latest edition is that by Dr Murray, which is printed nearly verbatim from the original impression.

THE LAMB THAT HAD BEEN SLAIN:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. GEORGE ABERCROMBIE,
Minister of the East Church, Aberdeen.

"And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain."—REV. v. 6.

THESE words are part of that revelation which God gave to John to leave with the Churches. Though there are many things in the context of difficult interpretation, and hard to be understood, yet it seems very reasonable to understand the whole of it as a sublime description of the heavenly world: for as heaven is more especially the throne of God, so his throne is there surrounded with various orders of holy angels, the brightest and most excellent of all created beings. These are perhaps described by the four living creatures mentioned in the context; which are rendered "four beasts," in our translation.

These different orders of holy angels are represented to John, in this heavenly vision, as they had formerly been to the prophet Ezekiel, by four kinds of living creatures on earth: the lion, which is famous for boldness and courage; the ox, which is distinguished by laborious, useful strength; man, who excels in knowledge and wisdom; and the eagle, remarkable for swift and lofty soarings.

Again, the four-and-twenty elders may fitly represent the redeemed of mankind, both in the Old and New Testament Church; even patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, and all the spirits of the just made perfect. These are all attendants around the throne of God; and they join with holy angels in adoring Him that liveth for ever and ever. Jesus, our Redeemer, is in the midst of this glorious and happy assembly; and he appears there in his human nature, with the very same body in which he suffered and died for the redemption of his people; which was signified to John by this lively emblem,—his standing as it were a Lamb that had been slain. This seems to be the plain import of the text; which may suggest a variety of pious meditations.

In discoursing further on this subject at present, I propose, with God's assistance,

I. To consider what may be supposed to be the chief reasons, why Christ, in his glorious exalted state, delights to retain the name and character of a Lamb that had been slain.

Here let us only observe by the way, that Christ, as Mediator, was early revealed to mankind by the character of a Lamb, many ages before his incarnation and appearance in this lower world. Thus Abraham, who saw his day afar off by faith, spoke of him by the spirit of prophecy, when he said, "God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering."

The prophet Isaiah foretold his patient sufferings under the figure of an innocent lamb led to the slaughter; and the Apostle Peter spoke of it as a doctrine well known among the people of the Jews, that Messiah was verily foreordained before the foundation of the world, to be slain in due time, "as a lamb without blemish and without spot."

In consequence of these early revelations concerning Christ, as soon as he appeared, and began his public ministry as Mediator upon earth, John the Baptist pointed him out to the people as the Lamb of God, that was come to take away the sin of the world, and called them to behold him in that desirable character with becoming regard. Thus was Christ early revealed to mankind, under the figure of a spotless lamb, to signify at once the innocence and purity of his human nature as Mediator for sinners, his meekness in suffering, and the atonement he was to make for the sins of his people, to reconcile them to God. And this lively emblem is so full of divine consolation to believers, and so strengthening and encouraging to their faith and hope, that our gracious Redeemer delights to retain the same name and character amidst all the glories of his exalted state, perhaps chiefly for these two reasons following:—

1. Our gracious Redeemer, amidst all the glories of his exalted state, may retain the name and character of a Lamb that had been slain, to direct our thoughts, and the thoughts of all his followers, to that meekness, and patience, and cheerful resignation to the will of God, which Christ manifested in all his sufferings for our sakes; leaving us an example that we should follow in steps.

It is remarkable in lambs that they are not so noisy, either dying or in sufferings, as other animals are; but they bear the greatest injuries and even death itself, in such a quiet manner, as make them very fit emblems of a meek and quiet spirit. And, accordingly, we find the evangelical prophet Isaiah comparing our blessed Saviour to a Lamb in his sufferings, on this very account: "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth;" when he was cut off by violence and unrighteous judgment.

Indeed, the meekness and patience of our blessed Redeemer was most wonderful in his suffering, from first to last. He endured the contradictions of sinners against himself, without giving a hard word in return. "When he was reviled he reviled not again: when he suffered he threatened not." "He gave his back to the smiters, and he cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: he hid not his face from shame and spitting." And when at last he came to die, by the hands of his cruel and unjust enemies, he went quietly to his cross like a lamb to the slaughter; because he well knew that thus the earliest prophecies, and the divine counsels concerning man's redemption, must be fulfilled, and that for this very end he came into the world.

Let us learn, my brethren, from this example of Christ, a like quiet resignation to the will of God, under all those sufferings which the wisdom of God appoints in our lot in a present world, which to us is a state of probation and trial. And let us rest assured of it, that "God afflicts not willingly, nor hath pleasure in grieving the children of men," but has merciful designs, even in the severest dispensations of his providence; and what we know not now, we shall be able to comprehend more fully hereafter.

2. The sufferings and death of Christ on earth answered all those valuable ends and purposes, which had formerly been typified and darkly shadowed out, by the slaying of lambs in sacrifice to God. And this may, perhaps, be the principal reason why our glorious Redeemer, in his exalted state, retains the name and character of a lamb that had been slain.

It is worthy of our attention, that from the very days of Adam, down to the coming of our Saviour in the flesh, mankind were directed to seek to appease the Deity, by the slaying of lambs in sacrifice to God. Thus Abel, the son of Adam, brought very early the firstlings of his flock an offering to the Lord, and God had respect to him and to his offering, while he rejected that of Cain, which consisted only of the fruits of the ground.

Now, the original design of offering slain lambs in sacrifice to God, from this early period of the world, was to make a typical atonement for the sins of men, to redeem the forfeited lives of guilty sinners, and to encourage humble penitents to return to God, with humble hope of acceptance and forgiveness. But the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ fully answered all these valuable ends and purposes, of which the other sacrifices were only dark types and figures.

He suffered as a sacrifice of infinite value, to satisfy the offended justice of God, and thus to make a real atonement for sin, in behalf of all who come unto God by him. He died to redeem us from eternal death and misery; he died to make peace, by the blood of his cross, for all repenting sinners,—for all true believers,—and thus to encourage us, through faith in his blood, to draw near to God in every holy duty, as to a God reconciled in the virtue of his atonement. All the other sacrifices of expiation and atonement were imperfect and insufficient as to this grand design. For as they could not make a proper atonement for sin, so they could not deliver the consciences of men from a fearful remembrance of guilt before God. Christ, by his death, was the only true sacrifice, which made an end of sin in its condemning power, and brought in an everlasting righteousness. In him we have redemption, through faith in his blood, even the forgiveness of all sins that are past; and through the Eternal Spirit he offered up himself to God in his death, as a lamb without spot, to purge our consciences from dead works, that is, from a terrifying remembrance of works that deserve death, that we might serve the living God, in holiness and righteousness, without slavish fear.

Thus, my brethren, for our comfort and encouragement, our glorious Redeemer, in his exalted state, retains the name and character of a Lamb that had been slain; and all the redeemed company around his throne in heaven are represented in the context as praising and adoring him in that delightful character: "Thou wast slain," say they, "and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing." But I must proceed to the second division of this subject, namely, to consider,

II. What may be the further ends and designs of Christ's appearing in heaven, under this emblematical character of a Lamb that had been slain.

1. This may be intended as a standing memorial of the guilt of sin.

Nothing could tend more, nor indeed so much, to convince the world of the evil of sin, than the dreadful sufferings which the Son of God endured in his human nature on earth to make atonement and reconciliation for iniquity. Now the same wise design may be still carrying on, by his appearing in heaven with the marks of his sufferings, as a Lamb that had been slain. By this it is declared, in the most awful manner, and a continual remembrance is made of it, "That without shedding of blood there could be no remission," no pardon for guilty offenders, no deliverance for any sinner from the wrath of a holy and sin-hating God, without such a valuable compensation and atonement. And thus provision is made for securing the obedience of the divine laws, not only among men, but also among angels, principalities, and powers, among all the created inhabitants of both worlds. They are taught what a dangerous thing it is to make bold with their duty and offend their Creator, when, at the very same time that they behold God's mercy wonderfully displayed in the redemption of mankind, they have also set before them a lasting monument of his awful divine severity against sin, in his beloved Son appearing as a Lamb that had been slain, to make atonement and expiation for the sins of his people.

2. This appearance of Christ as a Lamb that had been slain, may also be designed as a lasting evidence of the acceptance of his divine atonement and satisfaction.

As in this manifestation of our Saviour in heaven, God's righteous displeasure against sin is displayed in the most striking manner; so, on the other hand, in this blessed vision there is the strongest proof that sin is expiated, justice satisfied, and a sure foundation laid for the pardon and remission of every penitent believer in Christ's meritorious death and sacrifice. Our Redeemer appears in heaven as an innocent Lamb that offered up himself to God, without blemish and without spot. He suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust, when he was put to death in the flesh. And when he stands in the midst of the throne of God, he appears there with the marks of sufferings he endured on earth, not for his own sins, but for the sins of his people, that he might finish transgression, make an end of sin in its condemning power, and bring in an everlasting righteousness. Now, when he appears in heaven in this character, this abundantly speaks forth the acceptance of his sacrifice, the efficacy of his sufferings, and the power of his death for our redemption and remission.

3. This appearance of Christ in heaven as a Lamb that had been slain, may be designed as a continual intercession for his people.

We are told expressly, that "Jesus is able to save to the uttermost all who come unto God by him, because he ever liveth to make intercession for them;" but then it is nowhere revealed that Christ's intercession is performed by an actual voice or language. It seems rather, by his simple appearance in our nature in heaven; in that human nature in which he suffered and died a sacrifice on earth. By this appearance he presents in the sanctuary above a constant memorial of his expiatory sacrifice, even as Aaron presented the blood of the atonement in the Jewish sanctuary before the Lord; and by this very appearance he pleads most powerfully that the virtue of his death may be applied to all his people, for all the happy purposes for which it was designed.

In short, our Saviour's perpetual appearance in heaven in his human nature, with the marks of his sufferings as a Lamb that had been slain, has such a forcible language of intercession as this in behalf of all his people: Behold me, oh my Father, behold me now in a form very different from that in which I was originally,—behold me now dwelling in the nature of man. Remember for what end this human body was assumed, and how it was treated on earth, in obedience to thy will and pleasure; when thou saidst, sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, then said I, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." I delighted to do thy will, and still I take delight to recollect that I fulfilled thy pleasure in every point. I have performed my part of the covenant of redemption, and now I put in my righteous claim for the performance of thy promised part of it also, in behalf of all for whom I descended to earth and died. "Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me may be with me where I am, to behold my glory." I will, that in consequence of what I have done and suffered upon earth, all true Christians, all sincere penitents, all humble believers, may have their sins pardoned, their natures sanctified,—that they may have all needful supplies of divine aid proportioned to their various trials and infirmities, and that nothing may be wanting to begin, carry on, or complete their salvation, and that, at length, they may all be brought where I myself now am, to be happy for ever in my presence and enjoyment.

Thus silently, but powerfully, does our Saviour plead in behalf of all his people, by appearing in heaven with his human body, in the midst of the throne, as a Lamb that had been slain; and thus we have a constant advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the Righteous, who also was the propitiation for our sins; and his blood has been ascribed to it in Scripture, and is said to speak better things than the blood of Abel.

COMMUNION SERVICES.

BY THE REV. PATRICK BOOTH, A. M.,
Assistant Minister of Innerleithen.

NO. IV.

BEFORE COMMUNION.

It is related of a certain victim of severe persecution, that he devoted a great part of his time during tedious imprisonment to studying the works of the most celebrated philosophers; "but which of them he asked, "could say, 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' He found in the simple and unadorned doctrines of the Lord, a consolation which the ingenious speculations of human wisdom could not impart, the cheering light of the Gospel brightened even the gloom of his dungeon, and the prospects which it opened up to him more in this world could either give or take away. It is a distinguishing excellence of our holy religion, that the other blessings lent us by the Lord are ever attendant upon us, and are at best better calculated to enliven our prosperity than to comfort our adversity, its hollow influences, whilst they impart a relish and security to our happiest days, exhibit their full power only when other joys forsake us. Never is the hope of the Christian more steadfast than when the worldly minded cannot see on what his hopes are built. The mists of affliction cannot dim the eye of faith; nor can earthly calamities nor even the king of terrors, stand between the believer and the Almighty Friend, who hath said, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Lo he is with the faithful always, even to the end of the world, and able to save to the uttermost all who come unto God through him. Wherefore let us lift up the hands which are down, and the feeble knees. Let the children of men be joyful in their King; and whilst we partake the memorials of our Saviour's broken body and shed blood, let us present the offering of a grateful heart to him who exchanged the joys of heaven for the sorrows of the earth, that he might bind up the broken heart, proclaim liberty to the captive, and the open prison to them that were bound.

AFTER COMMUNION.

No mere verbal assurances, in however many words, or in whatever language they might have been expressed, could be possibly conveyed to our mind and heart a deeper trust in our Saviour, equal to that which arises from his having passed through life like one of ourselves, and from our having in our hands an authentic memorial of many of the instances in which, in the likeness of man, he assisted, consoled, and protected his followers, and gained their confidence and affection. Therefore, by your example permit me to direct your attention, being leave the table at which you have now commemorated his atoning death. After he had performed the miracle of feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes, he retired to a mountain to pray, and sent his disciples across the sea of Tiberias. The night proved dark and tempestuous, and notwithstanding their utmost exertions they had made but little progress, when Jesus, about the fourth watch, drew near the ship, walking upon the waves. The danger of their situation, and their utter helplessness amidst the solitude of the waters and the gloom of the storm, had unbinged their minds; and when they saw the indistinct form of a human being approaching them, they "supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out." But Jesus said unto them, "It is I; be not afraid." They immediately recognised the Companion of all their dangers, the Master who had never injured, the Friend who had never deserted them, under whose protection they had ever felt themselves secure; and as the child hears the voice of the mother, and all its alarms disappear, so their fears subsided—the tempest lost its terrors, and they joyfully received their Saviour into the ship.

And, my brethren, do unexpected storms never overtake us? Is the sea of life always unruined? Are its waters never troubled? Are its waves less overpowering than those of Tiberias? And, is there no one who takes an interest in our condition? Does no friend secretly follow us? Are we left alone in our dangers and distress? The east wind of adversity rages, the waves of affliction arise, the bark of humanity is ready to perish amidst the storm. Who is this whom the gloom of the tempest half conceals from our view? Is there no friend able and willing to assist us? "It is I," replies our Saviour, "be not afraid; it is I, who can sympathise with your sorrows, because I have felt them; it is I, who, although restored to that glory which I had with the Father before the world began, still look down with a kindly interest on that earth which was once my habitation—who, although I dwell in heaven, yet rule upon earth—who, although seated at the right hand of the Father, am not far from every one of you—who, although, for your sakes, I in mercy permit many storms to surround you, yet will assuredly stay my rough wind in the day of the east wind."

Who is it, my brethren, when poverty threatens us, or when we feel its smart—when our difficulties become so complicated, that we can discover no thread to the labyrinth—when the world, which we falsely imagine so delightful to others, becomes to us a desolate cheerless waste—who is it that is beside us to cheer and support us? "It is I," replies our Saviour, "be not afraid. It is I who had not where to lay my head, who have assigned no path to you which I did not tread myself, who will lay upon you no unnecessary burden, who know that disappointment alone can, in your case, be the way to heaven, who have purchased treasures, and laid them up for you, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal."

Is the exile left without a friend? His earthly home is distant. He is driven, by necessity, to lands unknown. He is afflicted, but no ties of affection bring those around him to his consolation and relief. The associations are torn asunder, perhaps for ever. Those with whom he would have spent his days, he may see no more. Is he then left alone in the world? Is there no one who is a friend afar off, as well as a friend at hand? Yes, my brethren, there is. Who, then, is such a one? "It is I," replies our Saviour, "be not afraid. It is I who, the year of my birth, was forced into exile to save my life—who, in the last melancholy hours of my earthly existence, was deserted in the hands of my deadly enemies by those whom I had chosen my associates, and on whom I had heaped my choicest favours."

Who is it, my brethren, when the Christian friend whom we have esteemed and loved is gone—gone for ever—who penetrates the retirements of grief, and infuses into the dejected heart that consolation which the world can neither give nor take away? "It is I," replies our Saviour. "It is I, who wept at the tomb of Lazarus, who still sympathises with every virtuous emotion of the human breast, in whose bosom your departed friend serenely reposes, who am the connecting link between the friend on earth and the friend in heaven."

And who is it, my brethren, when we are about to follow, when our eyes are closing on this world for ever, when earthly friends, however willing, can do but little for us, when the king of terrors seems to call us his own, when we are about to enter the dark and unknown valley of the shadow of death, who is it that proves the superiority of his friendship, by being able to assist us even then? "It is I," replies our Saviour, "be not afraid. It is I, who have trodden the same dreary path myself, who have smoothed the once terrific way, who to the righteous have stripped death of its terrors, and rendered it the entrance to an inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and which fadeth not away."

Such, my brethren, are the consolations which true Christians—but, remember, they only—derive in the most distressing situations of life, from the assurance, that He who knew, from personal experience, almost every evil to which humanity is liable, is ever near them to afford a proper measure of assistance and support, to sanctify all their sorrows, and keep them within such limits as they shall be able to bear. Our Saviour is now indeed, notwithstanding the reality of his presence, concealed from mortal eyes; but a time awaits every one of us, when we shall see him face to face, when we shall be surprised by his appearance no less than his disciples on the lake of Tiberias, when the circumstances of his coming shall be infinitely more appalling than the dangers and darkness of the storm. The last trumpet has sounded, the sun is turned into darkness, the moon has ceased to give her light, the stars have fallen from their places, the earth is convulsed, the powers of heaven are shaken, and high and low, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, stand trembling amidst the wreck of the works of Omnipotence, to receive their doom for eternity. Who is this great and mighty Judge, who cometh with ten thousand of his saints, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, to execute judgment upon all; whose voice even they that are in their graves do hear, and come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation? Who is this unresisted Potentate, on whose decree my state for eternity depends? anxiously inquires the righteous soul, sensible of its many imperfections, and having its faith and firmness, during the awful moment, shaken by the vastness and the terrors of the scene:—"It is I," replies our Saviour, "be not afraid. It is I, who have given you ample proofs of the sincerity of my friendship, who have purchased your redemption at the price of my blood." They shall not have more satisfaction in hearing his voice, than He will in extending it towards them. Their joy is his joy; their salvation is his crown. The trials of life are now ended; the judgment is past. They are gone together from the scene of terror, to dwell for ever beyond the reach of woe. All sorrow is banished from their breasts, all tears from their eyes, all aspersions from their name. There are no more melancholy bereavements, no more sad separations; friends there are friends for ever; death is swallowed up in victory; and sorrow, and sighing, and sickness, shall be known no more for ever. Amen.

Reflections on seeing Mount Ararat.—"On descending into the plain of Nackshau," says the Rev. Henry Martyn, "my attention was seized by the appearance of a hoary mountain, in front at the other end, rising so high above the rest, that they sunk into nothing. It was truly sublime, and the interest it excited was not less, when, on inquiring its name, I was told it was Agri, or Ararat. At four in the afternoon we set out for Shurror. The evening was pleasant; the ground over which we passed was full of rich cultivation and verdure, watered by many a stream, and containing forty villages, most of them with the usual appendage of gardens. To add to the scene, the great Ararat was on our left. On the peak of that hill the whole church was contained: it was now spread far and wide, to the ends of the earth, but the ancient vicinity of it knows it no more. I fancied many a spot where Noah perhaps offered his sacrifices; and the promise of God, 'that seed-time and harvest should not cease,' appeared to me more anxiously fulfilled in the agreeable plain where it was spoken than elsewhere, as I had not seen such fertility in any part of the Shah's dominions. Here the blessed Saint landed in a new world: so may I safe in Christ outride the storms of life, and land at last on one of the everlasting hills."

The Bible is free to all.—"Many careless, godless, worldly creatures," Mr Whyte remarks, in his work entitled 'The Heritage of God's people,' "attach no importance to this precious privilege; and hence it is that there are so many houses wherein the Bible lies unopened and neglected, and so little Bible-knowledge and Bible-practice can be discovered there. But they who are better acquainted with the riches which are treasured up in this divine repository, value it more highly, and love it more dearly. The pious man, whom Mrs Hannah More has celebrated in her beautiful tract—'The Shepherd of Salisbury Plains'—thus expressed himself to Dr Sterhouse: 'I believe there is no day, for the last thirty years, that I have not looked into my Bible. If we cannot find time to read a chapter, I defy any man to say he cannot find time to read a verse; and a single text well followed, and put in practice every day, would make no bad figure at the year's end; three hundred and sixty-five texts, without the loss of a moment's time, would make a pretty stock, a little golden treasury, as one may say, from new-year's day to new-year's day; and if children were brought up to it, they would come to look for their text, as naturally as they do for their breakfast. I can say the greatest part of the Bible by heart. I have led but a lonely life, and have often had but little to eat; but my Bible has been meat, drink, and company to me; and when want and trouble have come upon me, I don't know what I should have done, indeed, if I had not had the promises of this book for my stay and support.' But it is not to the humble and poor in this world's things alone, that the Bible is precious. The most exalted and the most learned have also seen its value and felt its power. A certain Sicilian king is reported to have said—'The holy books are dearer to me than my kingdom—and were I under any necessity of quitting one, it would be my diadem.' The words of the illustrious philosopher, Boyle, have a similar import—"I prefer a sprig of the tree of life to a whole wood of bay." The distinguished scholar, Salmasius, was of the same opinion, when, on his death-bed, he thus spoke—"I have led a world of time. If one year more were added to my life, it would be spent in reading David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles." The vast importance which Locke, too, the most eminent of English philosophers, attached to this heavenly gift, is evident from the often-quoted and well-known words of his—"Study the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament: therein are contained the words of eternal life. It is God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter." To all who they who truly love God, give a willing assent, from a feeling of the benefits which they themselves derive from it."

Eastern Funerals.—In the East, the grave is universally situated beyond the precincts of the city; the rural spot, where the "forefathers of the race" repose, is generally marked by the presence of a small clump of trees, which give a picturesque beauty to the hallowed quiet that reigns there. The funeral, which takes place commonly within twenty-four hours of the death, is attended by the friends and relatives, and if the deceased has either borne a public character or himself and family been held in estimation, his fellow-citizens pay the last tribute to his memory by a voluntary attendance, in great numbers, on his remains. The corpse is carried by these attendants in turn, on a bier or open board, over which a shroud is cast, the covering that conceals the dead body from the spectators; and the raising of which from the face, which has been done ever and anon by some one or other of the mourners, is the signal for all, and especially for the women, to renew their shouts of lamentation. Corresponding to this description was a funeral procession which Carne describes as seen by him in Egypt. The corpse was borne on the shoulders of six bearers on an open board, completely covered, and followed by a number of women, who uttered loud cries at intervals, to show their sorrow. Henderson gives a similar description of a funeral company which he attended in Tartary. "The body had not been laid in a coffin, according to the manner of burials conferred even on the poorest in Europe, but was simply wrapped round with a white cloth, laid upon a bier or board, and borne by the men to the grave. This mode of performing the funeral obsequies," he continues, "obtains equally among the Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians of the East, and traces its origin to a remote antiquity." There can be no difficulty, then, in understanding the narrative of the Gospel history. The procession without the walls, the simple preparations for the funeral, the attendance of a great multitude of strangers, and the dismal shrieks and weeping of the women, are all circumstances which are witnessed at Eastern funerals in the present day.
