Christ honours his people, and testifies his high approbation of them, by the continued ministration of angels. I pretend not minutely to explain how this is the case. But the fact is manifest from the record of God. He gave glory to Peter, by sending an angel to deliver him from prison; and to Paul, by the angel that encouraged him when tossed in the storm. The world of spirits, doubtless, is remote from our view. But were the veil drawn aside that keeps it from our sight,—had we eyes to observe the motions and operations of principalities and powers in heavenly places, what amazing glory would be discovered in the ministration of angels to the heirs of salvation! Should we not see them, here leading some favourite spirit, and there guiding some beloved saint;—on the one hand, strengthening some weak believer, and on the other hand, comforting some disconsolate soul, watching their steps, marking their progress, interested in their conflicts, and never ceasing in their various ministrations, till they should place them safe in their Father's house?

Christ gives glory to his people, and testifies his high delight in them, by the good works and the labours of love which he enables them to perform, and which he is not unrighteous to forget. These works are, in fact, each of them a miracle; they are done contrary to the ordinary course of corrupt nature. They attest the presence of Christ to be with his people. Doubtless, Christians are men of like passions with other men, they are compassed about with many infirmities. They are men, nevertheless, approved of Christ, his power being upon them. There is, in fact, a kind of omnipotence imparted unto them, for through him who strengtheneth them they can do all things.

Christ honours his people, and testifies his high delight in them, by peculiar communications of his grace made to their souls. He loves them and manifests himself unto them; he comes unto them, and makes his abode with them. The love of God is shed abroad in their hearts, by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto them. They are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise;—that Spirit descends into their hearts, and witnesses with their spirits that they are the children of God.

In no small degree does Christ honour his people, and testify his high delight in them, by hearing their prayers, and by the confidence granted them in prayer. Accordingly, he said to his disciples, "if ye ask any thing in my name, I will do it." "I will honour you in my work of intercession,—I will grant your requests,—I will fulfil the desires of your hearts." Who would imagine that such poor imperfect creatures could have such dignity conferred upon them? Yet this honour have all the people of Christ; for this is their confidence, that if they ask any thing according to his will, "he heareth them." Nay, as princes, as men of high and honourable degree, they have power, and prevail with God.

Finally, upon this part of the subject, Christ gives glory to his people similar to that which he has received from his Father, by honouring them with signal tokens of his approbation, in the concluding moments of their mortal life. Having honoured them through life, he ceases not to honour them at the approach of death. Then he enables them to lift up their heads, because their redemption draweth nigh. The departure of Christians from this present world is often a departure in dignity and triumph. Then they are enabled to say, "We have fought a good fight, we have finished our course, we have kept the faith." Having considered this mortal life but as a day, and living unto Christ as the work of that day, they arrive at the glory of saying, as he did, in the evening of it, "We have finished the work which Thou gavest us to do, and now we are no more in the world, and we come to thee."

I am now led, shortly, to remark, that Christ gives glory to his people, similar to that which he has received from his Father:—

IV. As he gives them the certain hope, and will, at last, put them in full possession of that glory which he has received from his Father in heaven. And what is the glory which Christ has received from his Father in heaven? Of this there are sublime descriptions in the divine record. There it is said that God, who raised him from the dead, hath set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; that "he hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that he is Lord to the glory of God the Father."

Now Christ gives his people, at present, the assured hope of sharing with him in all this glory. In this world he gives them power to become the sons of God; and if children, then are they heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, that they may be also with him glorified together. When Christ chooses his people from the world and forms them for himself, besides honouring them with signal tokens of present approbation, he sets exalted joy before them,—he teaches them to hope for the grace that is to be brought unto them, at his revelation,—he appoints unto them a kingdom, as his Father hath appointed unto him. This is their present high attainment, and though it doth not yet appear what they shall be, they assuredly know that "when He who is their life shall appear, they shall also appear with him in glory; and that they shall be like him, for they shall see him as he is." Then shall that prayer be completely fulfilled, which he offered up in his state of humiliation, "Father I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me." What though death shall separate, for a season, their souls and bodies! What though their mortal part be dissolved in the earth! The perishing of the outward man is but the finishing of their course; the dissolution of the earthly tabernacle is only their putting off the garment of mortality; death is just their lying down to rest, their falling asleep in Jesus, that they may rise again to everlasting life.

On the day of the resurrection—that high time to awake out of sleep—on the day of the resurrection, "when Jesus shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe." what a glorious assembly will his people constitute! That which was sown in weakness shall be raised in power, that which was sown in dishonour shall be raised in glory;—every one of them all, with a new immortal body, for he shall change their vile bodies, and fashion them like unto his own glorious body;—every one of them all with a perfectly pure spirit, for they shall be fully conformed to his divine image. And then shall they be publicly acknowledged by himself, confessed before his Father, and presented at his throne, "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." To them, having overcome, "he will then grant to sit down with him in his throne, even as he also overcame, and is set down with his Father in his throne."

And now, brethren, ye who are in truth the disciples of the Lord Jesus, I mean not to detain you from the peculiar service of this day; from participating in that glory which is given you, in your being invited to have communion with Him at his table. Think, then, of all the blessed privileges which to you, as his people, do belong; and whilst you think of them, let gratitude arise in your hearts, and thanksgiving be poured from your lips, to Him from whom they have been received. Yea, when ye think of them, recall to mind the end and design for which they are given. "For ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, that ye should shew forth the praises of Him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." Walk, then, worthy of your high vocation; walk worthy of Him who hath called you to his kingdom and glory.

And to those who are strangers to the glory which belongs to the disciples of Christ, let me only say, what hinders you from being partakers of it? what, but your own unbelief and hardness of heart? Repent ye, then, and believe the Gospel. Be persuaded to come with us and we will do you good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel. I add no more. May the Lord bless what hath been said, and to his name be the praise. Amen.

ORIGIN AND MEANING OF THE NAME BEELZEBUB.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,
Minister of Monimail.

THIS name repeatedly occurs in the historical parts of the New Testament, and is also found in 2 Kings i. 2, where we are told that Abaziah, king of Israel, sent to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, whether he should recover of his disease.

As the names even of individuals were all significant in Hebrew, there is naturally excited some interest to know the origin and meaning of the term. The first part of the word is easily explained. Baal, or Beel, signifies lord, and was commonly given to their different deities by the nations of the East. We read of judgments being denounced against Israel, because they worshipped Baal, Baal-peor, and Baal-berith, the gods of the heathen around them. Considerable difficulty, however, is found in ascertaining the precise import of the latter part of the word. Zebub, in Hebrew, and its kindred dialects, denotes a fly; but commentators have been not a little puzzled in their endeavours to determine why "the lord of the fly" should be made an object of adoration. It may also be observed, that in the original language of the New Testament, the word is Beelzebub, which is said by some (Jerome, and others,) to signify the "lord of dung or corruption;" but how the two names should be regarded as synonymous terms, and why they should be applied to the "chief of the devils," seems at first to be a difficult question.

In this inquiry the Hebrew affords us but little aid. Excepting in the passage already referred to, zebub occurs but twice in the Old Testament Scriptures. In Isaiah vii. 18, it is said, "the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt." This insect is described by Bruce, the well-known Abyssinian traveller, as a large fly, which, at one season of the year, is produced in such abundance, and is so exceedingly annoying in its attacks, as to drive away almost every species of quadruped from the districts in which it is found. It is admirably suited for shadowing forth the desolating scourge which Jehovah was threatening to bring upon his people; but its history affords us no assistance in our present inquiry. The same word is found again in Ecclesiastes x. 1, where it is said, that "as the flies of death (for such is the literal translation of the words) cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour," i. e., by depositing in it the eggs from which the maggots proceed, that make the whole to putrify, "so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour."

On turning for an explanation to Greek and Roman authorities, we find little allusion made to the fly in their mythology. We are, however, told that the Greeks, and more especially the people of Elis, sometimes termed Jupiter, their chief deity, Apomuos, or "the remover of the fly," "because," says Pausanias, a heathen author who wrote an account of their superstitions, "he carries away the flies from the Elian Olympus." The Romans gave a similar title to Hercules, another of their gods, (Clemens Alex.) In examining the collections that have been made of Grecian medals and gems, some farther light is thrown on the subject. A good many of the earlier engravings represent the head of Jupiter with the wings of a fly attached to it, or with two flies underneath it. Sometimes a stone is found, engraved on both sides, representing on the one Jupiter with his sceptre and eagle, and on the other a large and beautiful fly, which prove that, taken altogether, it relates to the god of Elis, (Tassie's Gems, No. 911, 912, &c. &c.) It is also well known that the Greeks employed the butterfly as an emblem of the soul, which is uniformly represented in their engravings by that insect, or by a female figure with butterfly wings. In some medals, for instance, which represent a philosopher leaning on a staff, a scull and butterfly at his feet, shew that the figure is meant for Plato, who wrote a treatise upon the immortality of the soul. It is farther deserving of notice, that a number of the most ancient Grecian gems are cut into the form of a scarabeus or beetle; a superstitious practice, evidently brought from Egypt, from whence the Greeks seem to have derived the art of engraving, as well as their idolatrous ceremonies, (Tassie, Introd.) These facts all point to the fly as the emblem of the departed soul, or to the god of death, who carries them away, while they refer us to the banks of the Nile for more accurate information.

When, in the next place, we peruse the accounts given us of the religion of the Egyptians, we learn that they considered the beetle as sacred; and when we examine their images, and hieroglyphic figures, the representation of that insect is frequently met with. It is sometimes surrounded by rays, which indicate that it is intended either for the sun, or for the deity of whom the sun was an emblem. Now, various authors inform us (Porphyry de abst., iv. 9) that the Egyptians adored the diversified operations and attributes of God, under the form of the different symbolical animals which they worshipped. The beetle must, therefore, have been employed to shadow forth the Creator in some of his great operations. As its figure occurs most frequently in the repositories of the dead, and on sepulchral monuments, we are farther led to consider it as having some reference, either to dissolution, or to the state of the departed. Various authors inform us that the Egyptians held the doctrine of a future existence, and believed that the soul, after death, was carried to a subterranean abode, which they termed Amenthes, a title that signifies "the receiver and giver" (Plutarch de Iside,) and seems to correspond to the Hebrew word Sheol, which, in our translation, is sometimes rendered the "grave," and sometimes "hell," and which denotes merely the place of the dead. The beetle, therefore, was with them the symbol of Him, who is Lord of the dead, and King of the regions below.

All the different fables and hieroglyphics to which we have referred, seem to have arisen from the abuse of a very simple and beautiful similitude. The "shard-born beetle," as an English author graphically terms it, and almost every other species of fly, however beautiful their colours, or active their movements, are bred in corruption; and, as in these instances, the Creator brings life out of death, so does he bring immortality out of the tomb. And as the worm, which, in the earlier stages of its being, draws a loathsome length along, and finds its nourishment in decaying vegetables and putrifying flesh, when the season of its change has come, casts off the slough of its infancy, and mounts on wings of delight, to bask in the sunshine, and sip the fragrance of the flowers; so, from the dissolution of the body, does the spirit of man arise to a new and better state; the mortal puts on immortality, and the grovelling pursuits of earth are exchanged for the glories of heaven.

The Egyptian Lord of Amenthes, with a beetle for his symbol,—the Grecian Jupiter Apomuos, with a fly in the field of his medal,—and the Ekronite Baal-zebub, were one and the same. They are but different names for the Lord of the Grave, the Ruler of Spirits Departed.

This examination into the meaning and origin of the name Baal-zebub, points out the reason why the king of Israel sent to inquire at his shrine, if he should recover of his disease; for who could be supposed by a heathenish mind so able to answer his question as the lord of the dead? It shews, too, the propriety of its application as a title of Satan, of whom the apostle speaks as "him that has the power of death, that is the devil." (Heb. ii. 14.) And it explains the change made on the name by the Jews, in the time of our Saviour, who did not call him Beelzebub, or lord of the fly, because they did not acknowledge his dominion over the departed spirit, but who termed him Beelzebub, or lord of corruption, because death was his work, and he had power over the mortal and putrefying remains.

In tracing the varied superstitions that arose from the abuse of the simple and appropriate emblem which we have been considering, we are forcibly reminded of the wisdom of that command which says, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them." At first sight, it appears impossible that a reference to the natural history of the beetle, in order to illustrate the change that man undergoes at death, could be the source of any evil; yet, from this small beginning, how great and how numerous are the errors that have sprung! Men began by representing in a symbolical manner the operations of the Deity, they gradually came to worship the emblem, and to forget the God, and, at last, they gave to bird, and beast, and creeping thing, the service due to Jehovah. Let us also beware: for if we give to God external service only, if we attend to outward ordinances alone, grasping the shadow and neglecting the substance; if we do not worship Him, who is a Spirit, in spirit and in truth, we imitate their example, and we share in their sin.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Sacramental Address.—Intending communicants, fix your eyes on Calvary, and ask your hearts with what interest and emotion you look upon the scene. Many have sat at the communion table in whose souls the view of Calvary excited no pious and lively wonder, and no felt and holy love. Better far had it been that they had not approached that table. Oh! what would the Saviour think of their conduct? How would he regard them, when he beheld them seated there as his pretended adoring friends, while he knew that in their hearts they were indifferent about him,—that the scene of his agony was barren of interest to them,—that his dying love had not engaged their affection, and did not excite their praise. Oh! how could he regard them but as grievously, basely, daringly, insulting him? I trust, my friends, that Calvary is a scene which has attractions for you—that your eyes are now fixed upon it with admiring and affectionate contemplation—that your hearts are at the spot where Jesus suffered—and that your souls are blessing the Lord, that in the cross, justice and all her terrors have been met, and that in fellowship with her, mercy appears yearning with bowels of heavenly pity, and proclaiming salvation, and saying, "Save from going down to the pit, for behold I have found out a ransom." In the hope that you are now looking to the cross of Christ—that you see it as the single source of all consolation—that you view it with gladness, and lively interest, and do look for acceptance only through the merits of the sacrifice, which its wonders and its love exhibit, I proceed to put into your hands the memorials of that sacrifice. May the Spirit enable each one of you, in the exercise of a lively faith, to say, "He was wounded for my transgressions, he was bruised for my iniquities."

AFTER THE SERVICE.

"Unto them that believe he is precious." They love him supremely, and his praises are often on their lips. The thought of his free, and full, and generous consent, to undertake the business of redemption, excites their liveliest and warmest gratitude. And while they view him with wonder and with love appearing in our world and dying on the cross, they exclaim, "Oh! where should we have appeared but for his marvellous condescension—what should have been our end—how should we have borne its misery! But his blood hath satisfied justice, and his spotless obedience made a sure and perfect title to a happy immortality: and being interested in him, we live. Bless our Redeemer, O our souls. "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." "He was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." "Grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord." Believing communicants, you have been adoring Jesus as your condescending and kind Redeemer, and pouring out your hearts in praise to him for his gracious compassion—his ineffable love. Have you not been praising him too for blessing you with that faith which embraces him, and appropriates him as the soul's salvation? It is his own gift. You were living forgetful of the interests of eternity, and regardless of his cross; and had he not visited you with his grace, you would still have been strangers to him. "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." Whatever measure of heavenly and spiritual consolation you enjoy, believers, you view Christ, and I trust have been praising him, as the source of it all. Do you address God with any measure of confidence as your reconciled Father?—to Christ you are indebted for the blessed privilege. Can your experience tell of any sweet enjoyment of that holy peace which is the portion of the Christian, and a foretaste of heaven?—it came through the blood, and was produced in the soul by the Spirit, of Christ. When enemies assail you, do you find a refuge which bids defiance to their power?—is that refuge any other than Christ? When this wilderness wearies you, when difficulties oppress, and sorrows weigh you down, do you find ought to refresh you again, and to sustain you?—does not the refreshing come from Christ—is it not his grace that cheers, and animates, and strengthens you? Does the hope of glory dwell in you, and do you long for heaven?—other source of such hope than Christ there is none; and it is he that will command the everlasting gates to be lifted up, that you may enter the blessed and everlasting kingdom. You associate, believers, you associate the name of Jesus with all that you are,—with all that you enjoy,—and with all that you hope for. "Unto them that believe he is precious." "The desire of our souls," you are saying, "is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee:" or better still, perhaps you are saying, "Thou knowest that we love thee." Go from his table, praying that a lively faith may ever dwell in you,—that much of the blessedness which true faith brings may ever be enjoyed by you,—that your love to him may be felt by your growing in warmth,—and that you may ever be enabled to address him in these confident words, "Thou knowest that we love thee."—Rev. William Paterson, Missionary in Whiteness and Weesdale, Shetland.

"Lord! remember me."—(A Fragment.)—Yes! Christians! it was Christ who opened the gate of heaven to Adam—and who held it open for Noah, and Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and the long procession of believers who lived from the fall to the fulness of the time! And when that had come—on the day of all others the most solemn that this world ever saw—even the day of his own crucifixion—he opened it to the poor dying malefactor who suffered at his side, and in his agony cried out, "Lord! remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom!" This man sued for mercy, in a general sense, at the hands of Christ—he entreated that when the Saviour had gone to heaven he would bestow a thought of pity and compassion upon him, as an absent distant individual. Perhaps he had no idea that he himself could go to heaven—his hopes were indistinct and undefined, because his knowledge and his faith were very imperfect. But oh, was there not great fervour in his prayer? He little dreamt of being admitted to sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God. But though in this state of mind at noon of the day, yet ere sunset he sat down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in that kingdom! See how the work of grace can be accomplished when the mighty power of a dying Saviour is put forth to effect it! He never dreamt of being allowed to pass under the shade of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God, but that very day he sat under the shade of that tree, and did eat of its pleasant fruits! He never dreamt of quaffing the waters of that river of life which proceedeth forth from the throne of the Lamb,—but in that very hour he tasted and he drank of these pure and living waters! He never thought of being admitted to the palace of the Prince of life,—but that very day he was arrayed in the royal attire, and had the diadem of glory encircling his brow! It was a propitious day—it was a propitious hour—it was a propitious moment! True, the sun was darkened—the whole land was shrouded in blackness—the earth quaked—the rocks rent—the graves were opened—the sleeping saints arose—and the veil of the temple was rent in twain! But the grand, the mighty plans of grace were now consummated—the reconciliation between heaven and earth was at length fulfilled! Oh it was indeed a propitious hour for the offering up of such a prayer! Believers! this, too, is a propitious hour, and a propitious place for pouring out your hearts unto God. It is the house of prayer—and whilst we are about to close our celebration of the memorials of Christ's death, avail yourselves of the moments as they fly. Wait not—say not, when we shall go home, we shall offer up our prayer—now—now—even where we sit, let each and every one of us offer up the fervent prayer, "Oh! let me not continue dry while all the fleece is wet." "Lord! remember me, now that thou hast entered into thy kingdom!" I cannot pass it by, and I will not!—The subject leads to it—the season may impress it. Is there a thief—is there a robber—is there a profligate—is there a hypocrite in this house? Let him hear and fear, and this instant fall down and put up the prayer, "Lord! remember me!" Christians! take comfort from the truth, that at death the soul passes immediately into glory. At three o'clock of the afternoon was the penitent's prayer put up, and the answer received from the Redeemer's lips. Ere the sun had set, his body had been taken down, and thrown away among the carcases on Golgotha, but his soul had winged its way to paradise! Finally, brethren, see that ye ask not too little in your prayers. Oh we are sadly straitened in ourselves—we surely ask too little! there is a strange want of enlargement of heart in our prayers! Remember ye, that when the King of Israel came to weep over the face of the dying prophet, the prophet bid him take his arrows and smite upon the ground. And he took them, and smote thrice, and stayed. And the man of God was wroth, and said, thou shouldst have smitten five or six times—then thou shouldst have smitten Syria until thou hadst consumed it. In like manner should we ask—not once or twice—but six, or seven, or ten, or a hundred, or ten hundred times, and God will grant us the whole desires of our hearts.—[Conclusion of an Address by the late Rev. Dr Jones, after the celebration of the Lord's Supper in Lady Glenorchy's Chapel, Edinburgh.]

The light in which Christians should regard Family Connections.—Important and awful connection! which I wish and pray may be more and more deeply impressed on my mind. How contrary is it to our nature, to consider the nearest relations we have in this light, and to say often and solemnly, my father or mother, husband or wife, children or servants, are the very persons with whom, as I have the most to do, I shall have the most to answer for! They, even they, will be the witnesses, either to attest my life of faith, or to confront my false, though perhaps confident, pretensions to that precious grace. With what circumspection, with what tenderness of love, and with what zeal, should we do good, and edify, and comfort one another, were we to think in this manner!—VZNN.

Peace of Mind.—Let us, therefore, look very carefully, what effect our peace has on our hearts and lives, and are we the more humble or the more proud, for our comfort? Do we walk more closely or loosely with God for this peace? Can we shew that grace and peace grow in us alike? Or, does the one appear less, since we pretend more to the other? By this we may know, whether our peace comes from the peace-maker or peace-marrer; from the God of truth, or father of lies, GUNWAL.

SACRED POETRY.

A DREAM

OF PARTAKING IN THE LORD'S SUPPER.

(November 1815.)

FROM what a banquet I awake!
Still breathing are the words of praise;
O yet again that bread to break,
And yet again that cup to raise!

The table spread,—the symbols placed,—
The Record read, and blessing given;
With holy psalms we slowly paced
Those sacred courts, a type of heaven.

All round the altar, ranged in rows,
In trembling praise then died the song;
A pause to feeling marked the close,
Deep as of Sinai's watchful throng.

But there no pealing thunder broke,
No lightning flashed, no trumpet blew;
God's servant rose and mercy spoke;
"Behold what Christ has done for you!

"That you might live, he bled and died,
Now lives and reigns High Priest above;
Here let your vows be ratified,
Your victim, sin; your incense, love."

The symbols, pledges, circling came,
'Mid aspirations, praise, and sighs;
Each calling on God's holy name;
Faith tasting food that never dies.

My soul in high communion swelled;
God's presence seemed to fill the place!
Each there I loved, in each beheld
The brightness of the Prophet's face.

Such temple is the porch of bliss,—
Such rite the service of the heart;
O may my latest rite be this,
The song begun ere I depart!

The wish remained—the vision fled,—
Night breathed delight, though music ceased;
Dreams, not in vain, the table spread;
For thus to hunger is to feast.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dr Boerhaave.—His knowledge, however uncommon, held in his character but the second place; his virtue was yet much more uncommon than his learning. He was an admirable example of temperance, fortitude, humility, and devotion. His piety, and a religious sense of his dependence on God, was the basis of all his virtues, and the principle of his whole conduct. He was too sensible of his weakness to ascribe anything to himself, or to conceive that he could subdue passion or withstand temptation by his own natural power; he attributed every good thought, and every laudable action, to the Father of goodness. Being once asked by a friend who had often admired his patience under great provocations, whether he knew what it was to be angry, and by what means he had so entirely suppressed that impetuous and ungovernable passion? he answered with the utmost frankness and sincerity, that he was naturally quick of resentment, but that he had by daily prayer and meditation, at length attained to this mastery over himself. As soon as he rose in the morning, it was, through his whole life, his daily practice to retire for an hour to private prayer and meditation; this he often told his friends, gave him spirit and vigour in the business of the day, and this he therefore commended as the best rule of life; for nothing he knew could support the soul in all distresses but a confidence in God; nor can a steady and rational magnanimity flow from any other source than a consciousness of the divine favour.

A Burman Convert.—Mrs Judson, giving some account, in a letter, of the first Burman convert, says:—A few days ago I was reading with him Christ's Sermon on the Mount. He was deeply impressed, and unusually solemn. "These words," said he, "take hold on my very heart; they make me tremble. Here God commands us to do every thing that is good in secret, not to be seen of men. How unlike our religion is this! When Burmans make offerings at the pagodas, they make a great noise with drums and musical instruments, that others may see how good they are; but this religion makes the mind fear God; it makes it, of its own accord, fear sin."

How shall I Pray?—The Rev. Mr Ramflier, of Fulneck, states, that a Hottentot, being under deep conviction of sin, was anxious to know how to pray. He went to his master, a Dutchman, to consult with him; but he gave him no encouragement. A sense of his own wickedness increased, and he had no one near to direct him. Occasionally, however, he was admitted into the family at the time of prayer. The portion of Scripture which was one day read by the master, was the parable of the Pharisee and Publican. While the prayer of the Pharisee was read, the poor Hottentot thought within himself, "This is a good man; here is nothing for me;" but when his master came to the prayer of the Publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" "This suits me," he cried, "now I know how to pray!" With this prayer he immediately retired, and prayed night and day for two days, and at length found peace. Full of joy and gratitude, he went into the fields, and as he had no one to whom he could speak, he exclaimed, "Ye hills, ye rocks, ye trees, ye rivers, hear what God has done for my soul! he has been merciful to me, a sinner."

The Horrid Effects of Ambition.—Dr Prideaux states, that in fifty battles fought by Julius Cæsar, he slew one million one hundred and ninety-two thousand of his enemies. If to this number we add the loss of troops on his own side, and the slaughter of women and children on both sides, we shall probably have a total of TWO MILLIONS of human beings, sacrificed to the ambition of one man!

Two Hottentot Girls.—Mr Read, in one of his missionary excursions, says:—I perceived a farmer's little girl, of five years old, constantly going, as secretly as she could, behind a bush. Coming to my waggon, I said, "What do you do so often behind the bush?" "I go to pray, sir." "To whom do you pray?" "To Christ?" "What do you ask from Christ?" "I ask for grace." To another child of her age, I said, "I hear you often pray; what do you pray for?" "I say, Lord Jesus, here lies a poor sinful child at thy feet; Lord, be gracious to me, and give me grace, and thy Holy Spirit: forgive me all my sins."

ON THE INFLUENCE OF THE GOSPEL IN THE ENLARGEMENT AND ELEVATION OF THE INTELLECTUAL CHARACTER.

BY THE REV. ROBERT COOK,

It is an excellence peculiar to the Gospel of Christ, that in whatever light it is surveyed, it bears the manifest impress of a divine original. Whether we view it in relation to the proofs by which its truth is confirmed, or the sublime doctrines presented to our belief; in relation to its pure and exalted morality, or its kindly aspect on the temporal and eternal welfare of man, it is alike exhibited, "The power of God, and the wisdom of God."

Its direct effects in the improvement of man's temporal condition, have often been urged as proofs of its divinity, and its complete adaptation to the spiritual recovery of a "world lying in wickedness," bespeaks it as the work of the faithful God. Its salutary and incidental influence in promoting the culture of the human mind, and in raising man in the scale of intellectual being, though too frequently overlooked, leads us to admire the divine wisdom displayed in its contrivance, and forcibly recommends it as the most efficient engine in the elevation of the human character.

I. The reception of Christian truth removes the obstacles that retard the expansion of the mind.

Of these obstacles, ignorance is one of the most obvious and determined. A state of ignorance can never accord with the full development of the human character. It is only by the number of objects and of views brought within its range, and by the exercise requisite to make them its own, that the mind can be in the way of rising above its state of natural ignorance. Every accession of knowledge enlarges the sphere of the understanding. "Knowledge is power," but it is power that may be rendered productive of evil as well as of good. It is Christian knowledge that is best adapted to the constitution of the human mind, and by the importance of the truths about which it is conversant, is eminently calculated to enlarge and ennoble its faculties. "The entrance of the word giveth life;" and "the law of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes" that "the god of this world has blinded."

The Christian faith tends to remove slavish subjection to the authority of man in matters of religious belief. There is nothing that more completely paralyses the mind, than the surrender to another's disposal of its inalienable right of private judgment. But this right the Gospel recognises and asserts. It addresses man as a rational being. It challenges the free exercise of those reasoning powers with which he is endowed by his Creator. It commands him to "search the Scriptures" for himself, that he may be able to "give to every one that asketh, a reason of the hope that is in him." It acknowledges no head in matters of faith, save the Lord Jesus Christ. It enjoins him to call no man father on earth, but to "prove all things," and "to hold fast that which is good."

The Gospel received into the heart, likewise effects deliverance from those debasing passions that enchain the mind, and spread disorder through all its faculties. It lays the axe at the root of every affection inconsistent with the dignity of man. It asserts the dominion of reason over passion, of intellect over sense. It reminds us of our high origin, and would withdraw us from every indulgence incompatible with our comfort and safety. It points to our exalted destination, and calls upon us to act a part worthy of such purifying prospects. It directs to the armour whereby a victory over the "lusts that war against the soul," may be achieved; and "the grace of God that bringeth salvation, teacheth us, that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this world."

II. The sublime truths which the Gospel reveals, tend to elevate the human mind.

Building its essential truths on the existence of a Supreme Creator, it refers to his sustaining energy the whole universe of created existence. It represents the sublime idea of an immeasurable world willed into existence, and its varied productions supported by his power. The powerful, the wise, and the merciful Jehovah, it exhibits as alike watching over the minutest as the most stupendous of his works, presiding with equal ease over the movements of the host of heaven, the persecuted remnant, to brave all dangers, and even death itself, in maintaining the cause which they had espoused. Towards the close of his studies, accordingly, he refused to take the oath of allegiance which was ordered to be tendered to every student in divinity. The circumstance which, perhaps, chiefly decided him in favour of the covenanters, was the execution of Mr Donald Cargill, which he himself witnessed, and which made such an impression upon his mind as was never afterwards effaced. From that moment he became zealous and intrepid in the good cause. In the societies which the adherents of the covenant held for prayer and religious conference, Renwick took a conspicuous part, and his remarkable gifts soon became apparent to all his brethren. From the high opinion which they were led to form of his piety and talents, he, along with several other young men, were sent to Holland in 1682, to complete their theological education, and receive ordination.

On arriving in Holland, Mr Renwick repaired to the University of Groningen, where he prosecuted his studies with the utmost diligence and success. At length, through the kindness of an esteemed friend, Mr Hamilton of Lewarden, he was taken on trials for ordination by the Classis of Groningen, an assembly corresponding to the presbytery of the Scottish Church. Mr Renwick's preliminary discourses were much approved by the brethren, but, before proceeding to the solemn act of ordination, he was required to subscribe the formula and catechisms of the Dutch Church. To this, however, he could not conscientiously accede, and the Classis, after consultation, agreed to waive, in this instance, their uniform practice, and to substitute the Confession of Faith and Catechisms of the Church of Scotland. By this means Mr Renwick's scruples were obviated, and he was set apart to the holy office of the ministry. His feelings on this occasion he thus describes in a letter to Mr Hamilton:—

"You know," says he, "what a great work the Lord hath laid upon me, and how he hath laid so many obligations upon me to be for him, and him only. I hope that you will be mindful thereof, praying that he will endow me with zeal, courage, resolution, constancy, tenderness, and humility; and give a door of utterance, that with all boldness I may speak all his words, and that he may follow the same with his rich blessing. I do not think but trials and difficulties are abiding me, but if He be with me, I shall not care. We must not this day seek for ourselves great things, when the Lord is bringing evil upon all flesh, and is breaking down what he hath built, and plucking up what he hath planted. O I must say this indeed to the praise of his free grace, that he is continuing and increasing his kindly dealing with my soul. O that I could praise him, and recommend him to all flesh!"

Immediately after his ordination, Mr Renwick was anxious to return to his native land, that he might share with his persecuted brethren in their trials, and declare among them the unsearchable riches of Christ. Leaving Groningen, accordingly, he set out for Rotterdam, with the view of embracing the first opportunity of embarking for Scotland. As soon as he had set foot on his native shore, he felt himself to be exposed to much danger from his well-known principles, and, after travelling amid great fatigue, and many privations, he reached a company of the Covenanters, who gladly welcomed him as a brother. Though regularly ordained in Holland to the ministerial office, he declined availing himself of his ordination, until he had received a regular call from the people. This, however, he was not long in obtaining, and "the society people," as the Covenanters were termed, were often encouraged, amid their severe hardships, by his faithful instructions. His first sermon was preached in a moss at Darnead, in Clydesdale. In the course of it he boldly exposed the unhallowed principles and conduct of the persecuting party, and called upon the little band, who zealously maintained the truth, to be steadfast and immovable in the great work in which they had engaged. The consequences of this open declaration of the truth were such as might have been expected. Proclamations were issued against Renwick and his party, denouncing them as traitors and rebels. Dragoons were sent out to scour the country in pursuit of them, and the poor persecuted Covenanters were driven to seek shelter in the dens and clefts of the mountain fastnesses. Renwick, however, was undaunted. He preached, baptized, and catechised in the open fields, and often, under cloud of night, did the psalm of praise ascend from groups of his followers, encamped in some rocky cavern, far from the busy haunts of men. The people and their intrepid pastor were alike resolute in the maintenance of their principles. They wandered from place to place, while their ruthless persecutors tracked them in their flight, and murdered them in great numbers; while others were compelled from alarm to forsake their principles. The imminent danger to which Renwick was exposed in Clydesdale led him to pass into Ayrshire, where the following account of his reception at the house of the well-known John Brown of Priesthill is preserved. We extract it from an interesting account of the Life of Renwick, published a few years ago in Edinburgh:—

"Almost sinking with fatigue, he arrived at Priesthill; Brown was from home; and the family were busily engaged in preparing the wool of their flocks for a neighbouring fair. The eldest daughter Janet (by a former marriage) and the herd boy were teasing the wool, and the shepherd was carding it, while Mrs Brown sat nursing her first-born son at one side of the fire, with the faithful watch-dog lying at her feet. At the sound of Mr Renwick's footsteps, the dog started up, and ran to the door, barking at the approach of a stranger. Janet and the herd were almost as soon at the door as the dog, commanding him to be silent. The herd caught the dog in his arms, and returned with him into the house, while Janet followed, leading the stranger, first looking to her mother for encouragement, and then to her guest. She led him to her father's chair with a courtesy that seemed to give rise to strong emotions in his heart. Mr Renwick, who was unknown to any in the house, was pale with fatigue and sickness. His shoes were worn out, and a shepherd's plaid hung round him, seemingly for disguise; for by his dress and speech, they were convinced that he was of superior rank. While the servants gazed on him, Mrs Brown was at a loss to know whether she should welcome him as a sufferer, or consider him as a spy; and she accordingly left Janet to perform the kind offices the stranger required, while she lulled her boy to sleep, by singing a verse of an old song. During Mrs Brown's song, Mr Renwick's countenance brightened up, and he more cheerfully accepted of the child's endearing attentions, who placed him in the warmest corner, helped him off with his drenched plaid, and, in short, imitated all the kind offices she had seen her mother perform to her father, to the no small amusement of the rest of the family. On Mr Renwick it had a different effect. He burst into tears, and cried, "May the blessing of him that is ready to perish rest upon you, my dear bairn. Surely God has heard my cry, and provided me a place to rest my head for the night. O that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, that I might leave my people, and go from them; for they be an assembly of treacherous men."

"At this moment John Brown entered. He gazed at Mr Renwick for an instant, and then, with great deference told him that he was welcome to his house. "Do you know me?" said Mr Renwick. "I think I do," replied Brown. "It was in this house that the societies met that contributed to send you to Holland, and now I fear they have not received you as they ought." "Their reproach has not broken my heart," rejoined Mr Renwick; "but the excessive travelling, night wanderings, unseasonable sleep, frequent preaching in all weathers, especially in the night, has so debilitated me, that I am unfit often for my work. The reproach of those who called me to the ministry I look upon as a device of the enemy to stop the Lord's work; but blessed be his grace that has kept me from mixing anger or scorn of them with my sorrow. Some have declared that I will never be honoured of the Lord to do his poor remnant good. But one thing I know, and may say, that the Lord has done me good. Oh! let none fear a suffering lot. Enemies think themselves satisfied that we are put to wander in mosses, and upon mountains; but even amidst the storms of these last two nights, I cannot express what sweet times I have had, when I had no covering but the dark curtains of night. Yea, in the silent watch, my mind was led out to admire the deep and inexpressible ocean of joy, wherein the whole family of heaven swim. Each star led me to wonder what He must be, who is the Star of Jacob, of whom all stars borrow their shining. Indeed, if I may term it, I am much obliged to enemies; they have covered me many a table in the wilderness, and have made me friends where I never expected them."

"Every one of the family now strove which of them should show the greatest kindness to their much respected guest; while he, by his conversation and prayers, animated and cheered them in their resolution to continue in the faith stedfast unto the end. Having remained two nights under the hospitable roof of John Brown, during which time his health rapidly recovered, Mr Renwick took leave of the family, and recommenced his wanderings among the scattered Covenanters."

Meanwhile the utmost exertions were used to secure Mr Renwick's person, dead or alive, as being the leader of those who firmly adhered to presbyterian principles. By the good providence of God, however, he was often preserved in the most critical circumstances. In proof of this, we may quote his own words, as used in a letter dated August 23, 1684:—

"On the 30th of July, when I was going with other three to the general meeting, we espied two dragoons meeting us, and not expecting any more to be following, we went forward, not dreading them; but when we came within word and shot, we saw a party of about twenty more very near upon us, whereupon seeing there was no probability of resisting them, we turned up to a hill called Dungavel. But my three neighbours being on foot, and I on horseback, they compassed about the foot of the hill, but I took up to the height, being hotly pursued by many of the party; some whereof were at my right hand to keep me from the mosses, and others behind, who always as they came within shot, discharged upon me. So being near unto the top of the hill, and finding myself beset round about, seeing no visible door to escape, I thought fit to quit the horse which I had, and to wait till I saw what God had done in it. Thus I went up to the top of the hill upon foot, and seeing myself so encompassed that I could not run from thence, and that I was in no ways able to fight with them, I judged it best to clap upon the ground; so I went into a cain, which by situation was about six or seven paces of ground out of all their eyes, thinking to lie down upon it, all the hill being green, and bare in that place, knowing that God could carry their sight over it; so coming to the top of it, I espied in it a pit, and lay down in it, winning by God's goodness to a cheerful submission to death, torture, or whatever his will might be. But I was in no small measure confident that no evil at that time would happen unto me. The Lord gave me that Scripture, Psal. vi. 8, "Depart from me all ye workers of iniquity," which was so powerful, that I was made, I think, a hundred times to repeat it over, ere I could get myself stayed; together with that other, Psal. xci. 11, "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways;" which was such unto me, that I lifted up my head to see these angels, but, considering my folly in that particular, I was made to laugh at my own witlessness. So I lay still unto the sunset, sometimes praying, and sometimes praising God; though, ah! I can do neither to purpose. But all the joy that the Lord's works of wonder for me did afford, were swallowed up in sorrow, because of what befel my dear brethren, who (all that were with me,) fell into the enemies' hands, one of them receiving eleven wounds. Then, after all, when I thought of drawing off the hill, not knowing the way to one friend's house in the whole country, I besought the Lord, that as he had hid me, so he would lead and guide me. Thus I set my face towards Clyde, and after I had travelled about four miles, I met with Windhill, with whom I staid about two days, and kept a meeting upon the second night, even while the militia were searching that side of the country; and twice that night I very narrowly escaped, as it had been even out of their very paws. O, time would fail me to relate the Lord's works of wonder for poor unworthy me; for even since, I have in one day escaped three or four signal hazards."

Irritated by the frequent disappointments which the military had met with in their attempts to get possession of the person of Renwick, the Council at length formally cited him to appear before them, and, on his failing to do so, they outlawed him, and offered great rewards for his apprehension. He still, however, persevered in declaring the truth, wherever and whenever he found an opportunity. His feelings at this period he thus records:—

"Though the world think my case most miserable, yet, I think it is so happy that I know not a man this day upon the face of the earth with whom I would exchange my lot. O, it is more sweet and pleasant to be swimming in the swellings of Jordan for Christ and with Christ, than to be wallowing in the pleasures of sin and delights of the flesh; yea, though Christians had not a heaven hereafter, I cannot but judge their case, even here, happy beyond all others, as the Psalmist saith, 'Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time when their corn and their wine increased.' And when the world frowns most, I know it is the time wherein the Lord smiles most upon his own. O, therefore, let none of them fear a suffering lot. Enemies may feel satisfied that we are put to wander in dark stormy nights through mosses and mountains; but if they knew how we are feasted, when others are sleeping, they would gnash their teeth for anger; nay, while they are pining away in dusk envy and pale fear, I am feeding in peace and joy. Let enemies, therefore, never think that they can make the people of God's case miserable, while he lives and reigns; and I know well he hath that to give, and will give it, which will sweeten all the sufferings of his followers. And I may say this to his praise, that I have found so much of his kindness and supply in setting about his work in such hard circumstances, that though the prevailing of a body of death sometimes, and desire to be with himself, makes me long for a dissolution; yet, I think I could be content to dwell, if it were a thousand years, in this infirm and weakened body of clay, with continual toil and hazard, to carry his name to his people. O, poor fools, what can they do? The greatest wrong they can do, is to be instrumental in bringing a chariot to carry us to that higher house, and should we not think this the greater favour? The Lord is still increasing his people in number and spiritual strength; and many a sacrifice he is taking off their hands; for there are not many days wherein his truths are not sealed with blood, and that in all places, so that I think within a little there shall not be a moss or mountain in the west of Scotland which shall not be flowered with martyrs."

Thus was this godly man, in the midst of indescribable hardships and incessant persecution, enabled with the calmness of a true follower of Jesus, to possess his soul in patience, and to preserve that holy serenity and peace, and heavenly meekness which the consciousness of suffering in the cause of truth and righteousness, could alone have inspired.

SCENES FROM THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

BY THE REV. J. A. WYLIE,

Dollar.

THE DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

No. I.

"SURELY the wrath of man shall praise thee." Such was the reflection of one who had been an attentive observer of Providence during his life, who had carefully studied what had happened before his day, and who was guided by the Holy Spirit in the conclusions he deduced from God's dealings with the family of man. "Surely," says he, "the wrath of man shall praise thee." This general principle, ascertained and established by Asaph, from the diligent survey of the divine government, and the careful study of the divine Word, is of the utmost importance to the Christian. When the dispensations of Providence are mysterious or perplexing, when they appear to contradict the express declarations of the Word, and even to shake the foundations of reason, how salutary to reflect, that it is a known principle of the divine administration, that the purpose of God shall be accomplished, and his praise advanced, not only by the obedience of angels, but even by the wrath of men; that events, in themselves purely evil, and productive only, in the meantime, of disastrous consequences, shall, when the whole scheme of God has been completed, add to the harmony of the whole, and appear to have contributed most materially to the accomplishment of its great and beneficent ends.

Some have laboured to explain the origin of moral evil, and to vindicate the character of God in permitting it to exist. We will reap more profit from the study of Providence, if, instead of "dealing in matters which are too high for us,"—of attempting to rise to heights which have no summit, or to descend to depths which have no bottom—we limit ourselves, like Asaph, to the observance of the wisdom of God in overruling evil, and making it the source of good to his people, and of glory to his name. There are mysteries in providence, as well as in redemption. The Christian is not required to be the interpreter of these, for the ways of God are above the thoughts of men. To fathom these depths would be impracticable, to attempt it would be foolish, and not only foolish, but even dangerous. Many, whose ambition has been greater than their wisdom, and whose curiosity has been stronger than their faith, have boldly pushed into these mysteries, and have been overwhelmed in depths where there was no standing. When we behold Herod on the throne, and John in the prison, the one prolonging his wickedness in splendour and triumph, while the piety of the other does not shield him from a violent death, we naturally ask, wherefore should such things be? But it is not necessary that we should know why such things exist; to know the motives of the divine mind, or the particular end to which all the parts of his providence are tending, is not necessary either to our belief in the wisdom of the divine government, or to the performance of our duty: we have been told that "he maketh the wrath of man to praise him;" we have also been told, that however the good man may be oppressed, "it shall be well with him in the end;" "that verily he is a God who judgeth in the earth;" let us rest satisfied with these assurances; and instead of seeking to explain what we do not know, because God has not revealed it, let us believe that we consult our own profit, as well as the divine glory, when we confess the sovereignty of God in permitting such events, his wisdom in overruling them, and his justice in punishing them.

When I speak of justice punishing what sovereignty has permitted, none will understand me as teaching a doctrine, which makes God the author of sin, while its guilt and punishment are rolled over on the creature. For the evil designs which the sinner meditates, and which he endeavours to execute, he alone is responsible; nor does it diminish his guilt, that his plans are defeated by a higher power, and his evil turned into good by a higher wisdom than his. It is no excuse for the wickedness of man that it accomplishes the wise and righteous purpose of God. Such a plea, were it put in and sustained, would justify the most atrocious deeds, and screen the most atrocious characters from punishment. The sinner is justly chargeable with all the evil which he designed, while the good which springs from it is to be ascribed solely to God. The loss of her able teachers, and her faithful guides, has been amongst the heaviest calamities the Church has met with; how often has this trial been inflicted on her, as in the instance before us, by the hand of man? but it has usually happened, when the violence of man has extinguished one light, the providence of God has kindled a brighter; that, however, does not justify the persecutor in shedding the blood of the righteous. John was removed to make way for the Messiah.—"He must increase, but I must decrease." This, however, neither excuses nor palliates the means which Herod employed to accomplish his death. We admire the wisdom of Providence; we condemn and abhor the cruelty of the tyrant.

The Sun of Righteousness has arisen, and is rapidly advancing to his meridian height, when Matthew withdraws our view from His rising splendour, to contemplate the setting of the morning star—the death of John the Baptist. We are introduced to the melancholy story of the death of John by a reference to the increasing reputation of Jesus. "At that time," says Matthew, "Herod the tetrarch heard of the fame of Jesus." A little before this, Christ had sent forth his twelve apostles to preach throughout Judea, and to perform miracles; by their preaching was the fame of Jesus extended, and at last carried to the court of Herod. This Herod is not the king in whose reign Christ was born; he survived only a short time the massacre of the babes of Bethlehem, and was now dead about eight-and-twenty years; his character being universally detested, his death diffused general joy over his kingdom. The present Herod was the son of the former; the title which is here, and elsewhere given to him, is "the tetrarch." This word signifies the governor of the fourth part. At the death of Herod the Great, his kingdom was divided amongst his sons, a fourth part being assigned to each; Archelaus governed Judea, Philip was tetrarch of Iturea, Lysanias of Abilene, and to Herod Antipas (the name by which he is known in history) was assigned the region of Galilee; thus he is commonly termed in the New Testament the tetrarch of Galilee.

The Saviour had already passed two years in preaching the Gospel, and during the greater part of that time, he had laboured in the region which Herod governed, and yet it would appear, that till this moment, Herod had not heard of the name of Jesus. It is the misfortune of those who live in high stations, that while they hear much that they ought never to hear, they live in ignorance of what it most concerns them to know. Amid the cares of government, or the pleasures of his court, Herod forgot the salvation of his soul; his ear filled with the voice of flattery, and his eye dazzled with the light of his own glory, he had no time to listen to the message, or to do homage to the dignity of one infinitely greater than all kings. The Son of God—the Lord of angels—the Prince of all the potentates of earth, was in the world—was in his own dominions, and yet Herod was ignorant of him. “He came to his own, but his own received him not; he was in the world, and the world was made by him, but the world knew him not.”

It is seldom that the Gospel or its preachers find access to the palaces of kings. Pride stands as a sentinel at the door; flattery, and falsehood, and sycophancy walk within, so that honest and plain truth can obtain no audience. She is too homely in her dress, and too plain in her accent, to make a good appearance amid the splendours of rank, and the pomp of power. It is true that religion is just as necessary in the court as in the cottage; that she is just as well fitted to be the companion of the monarch as the companion of the mechanic; it is true that no one has the least reason to be ashamed of her; even though they wear a coronet, she is better than they are, and will reflect more honour on them than they can possibly do on her; but her character has commonly been mistaken; as if her birth was too mean (yet is she born of heaven) to warrant her to intrude into the society of the great, she has generally been banished into the ranks of humble life, and pronounced a fit companion only for those who, not being in possession of wealth or power, have more time to devote to her. On these accounts, she has seldom appeared in the halls of princes; but surely it is to be regretted, that those who have it in their power to do most for God, should be the least disposed to serve him, and that kings should indirectly teach their subjects to contemn their own authority, by setting before them the example of treason and rebellion against the King of heaven.

But notwithstanding all the obstacles with which truth has to contend in making her way to those in high places, when an important purpose is to be accomplished, she receives the aid of divine Providence, and those who formerly despised her are brought to hear, and sometimes to obey her voice. Thus by the ordination of heaven, the name of Jesus, after being known all over Galilee, was at last spoken in the palace of Herod. He was reported as being “a prophet mighty in word and deed,” and that report shook the monarch upon his throne; his countenance changed, and his joints smote one against another. A conscience oppressed with guilt is ever easily alarmed: the falling of a leaf, the moaning of the wind, a shadow by day, or a dream by night, will change the heaven of that mind which is troubled with a sense of guilt, and cover it with clouds and darkness. Thus it was, that Herod could not hear of the mighty works of Jesus without terror. When their report reached him, he started as if he had heard a voice from the grave;—he started like the felon when he hears at midnight the knell of another departed hour, or the approaching footstep of his executioner. When the name of Jesus was pronounced, the shade of John rose before him, and appeared to upbraid him with his crime; conscience whispered that the grave had given up its dead, and sent forth the murdered prophet, armed with higher powers than when he formerly lived, to punish and torment his murderer; pallid with fear, and trembling with apprehension, he said to his servants, “This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him.”

Some have supposed that Herod was a Sadducee, and held the opinion common to that sect, that there was no resurrection. If so, how do we account for his present fears, that John was risen from the dead? It is not difficult to suppose that conscience for the time overcame his scepticism, that fear did the work of reason, and made Herod an unwilling believer in the truths of revelation. How often have we heard of men holding opinions on the bed of death, very different from those which they had stoutly maintained during life. Herod, when he lived in ease, was a Sadducee, perhaps a bold denier of the doctrine of the resurrection; but when conscience knocked and told him of the blood of the prophet,—“This is John,” said he in accents of terror,—“he is risen from the dead!” Thus every sinner is the coward of his own conscience. Who does not pity Herod? Starting at every sound; trembling in the midst of his guards; and sad amid the mirth of his palace. Alas! what can the voice of flattery, or the pleasures of a throne, do for one who is punished by an invisible hand, and pursued by an invisible tormentor? He cannot sleep by night, guilt knocks so loud at the door of conscience; he cannot rest by day, he reads treason in the looks of his dependants, he envies the condition of his meanest slave, who finds that rest on his humble couch, which has fled for ever from the downy bed of his master, and conscious that he has merited it, he lives in the hourly dread of meeting that fate which he indicted on a man more righteous than himself.

Having spoken of the fears of Herod, the historian explains the reasons of these fears, by narrating at considerable length the story of the death of John.—“For Herod,” says Matthew, “had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in prison, for Herodias’ sake, his brother Philip’s wife,” &c.—Matt. xiv. 3–12.

We learn from this account, that John fell, as every faithful servant of Jesus would desire to fall, in the discharge of his duty. He did not die as a fool dieth, nor did he suffer as an evil-doer. He had taught no doctrine opposed to the just authority of kings, or hostile to the peace of their subjects; he vindicated and maintained the supreme authority of the law of God; he rebuked the universal degeneracy of his nation; he went before the face of his Master, in the power and spirit of Elias, till at length he fell, a martyr for the truth.

The morning star of the Gospel rose on the banks of Jordan; on the same spot whence the ancient Elijah had ascended to heaven in a chariot of fire, did the New Testament Elijah appear, preaching the doctrine of repentance, and proclaiming the advent of his Master. The features of his character bore a strong resemblance to those of his prototype. The zeal, the energy, the unbending firmness, and the undaunted fortitude which reproved sin, however humble, or however lofty the rank in which it was found, which distinguished the Elijah of the Old, distinguished likewise the Elijah of the New Dispensation. In meaner particulars even might this resemblance be discovered. “The same John had his raiment of camel’s hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins, and his meat was locusts and wild honey.” The office assigned to him was more honourable than had hitherto been filled by man; and on that account, he is said by his Master to be “greater than a prophet,” and the most honourable of those who are born of woman. His ministry attracted the universal attention of his nation; his audience was composed of persons of all classes, and from every part of Judea; the publican and the pharisee, and even the soldier of Rome, assembled on the banks of Jordan, and he whom battle had not awed, was awed by the moral energy of the preacher: “The axe is laid at the root of the tree,” such was his language; “and every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire.”

The scene of John’s ministry was soon changed from the wilderness of Judea, to the neighbourhood of Herod’s court. The wishes of the king, no doubt, had been signified for this change; but the monarch may be suspected rather of motives of curiosity, than of any sincere desire to profit by the ministry of the Baptist. But although the scene of John's ministry was changed, no change could be discovered in the manner in which his ministry was discharged. He who inherited the power and spirit of Elias, could not be awed by the majesty of kings. Himself greater than a prophet, he yet knew that there came One after him mightier than he, whose presence and authority he felt wherever he went. He viewed man as man, apart from the rank he filled, or the power he wielded; and thus he was the same intrepid and uncompromising reprove of sin in the palace of Herod, as on the banks of Jordan; in the wilderness he neither flattered the passions of the people, nor feared their violence; and in the palace, he disdained to be fettered by the trammels of royal authority. He knew that Herod could kill the body, but that the spirit was beyond his power.

This prince was of an infamous character, and was then living in adultery with Herodias, the wife of Philip, his own brother. Of this John could not be ignorant, and his sense of duty could not permit him to be silent. There are few who would be the reprovers of sin in a palace: there are few, who would be either so honest, or so bold, as to condemn iniquity on the throne; a worldly prudence will suggest to us the propriety of being silent in reference to the sins of those whose wills we cannot control. But John knew, that the authority of the law of God is the same every where; that whatever is unlawful in the subject, is equally unlawful in the prince; that their high station aggravates, instead of excusing their sin, and renders the danger of its being imitated greater; and that as none are above the law of God, so none are above the reproofs of his ministers; and therefore, despising all the consequences which might result to himself, he reprov'd the jealous, dark-minded, and revengeful tyrant; and he did so in the plainest terms; he did not say it is not honourable for thee to have her; he denounced it as a crime, as a breach of the law of God, as a sin; "it is not lawful for thee to have her."

John did his duty; and his reward, no doubt, was such as he expected; although different, certainly, from what it ought to have been. This honest reproof ought to have convinced Herod, that John was the best subject in his kingdom, and the most faithful servant at his court: amid the crowds of flatterers which surrounded him, Herod might have been glad to discover one so bold as to address him in the language of truth: here was a man whom a king might have been proud to possess, and whom he might have delighted to honour; and had he been wise for himself, he would have acted on his counsel, and put away the sin for which he had been reprov'd: but Herod knew not in this his day the things that belonged to his peace; instead of turning his anger against himself, or against the sin that was ruining his soul, he turned it against his reprove. Formerly he had venerated the character of John, he had heard him gladly, and in some things complied with his advice; but when he said to him, "It is not lawful for thee to have her," instantly his veneration was changed into resentment; he burst into a transport of anger, and commanded John to be seized, and thrown into prison.

There is no sacrifice too great for the cause of truth, and the discharge of duty; we may surrender honour, we may part with liberty, we may submit to die, and if by doing so we have served the interests of truth, the sacrifice we have made is not too great. How often do we see the life which has been devoted to commerce, or to discovery, hazarded and lost; and shall the Christian refuse to give, for the honour of God, what thousands are willing to give for objects of far inferior importance? He who hesitates to do so, certainly does not act the most prudent part; has not been careful to store his mind with the highest wisdom; nor has he taken counsel with the best advisers. "He that loveth his life," said the Saviour, "shall lose it, and he that loseth his life, for my sake and the Gospel, shall find it." There is a gain which may be a loss. "Skin for skin," said one, "yea all that a man hath will he give for his life;" but even life may be bought too dear: it is not on earth only that man is to live; and he who sells his future existence that he may enjoy the present, commits a greater folly than the man who buys a moment's ease with a whole lifetime of suffering. The soul may die as well as the body; and he who, to escape the agonies of an hour, would incur the pangs of an eternal death, exposes himself to a loss which no gain can compensate. "I will forewarn you," said the Saviour, "whom ye shall fear; fear him who, after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him." Had John withstood the calls of duty in this one instance, had he not so sternly reprov'd this one fault, he might have continued to enjoy the favour of Herod, and might have lived with reputation at his court: but John neither sought the favour, nor feared the power of the tyrant; and rather than violate the commands of his conscience, he preferred a prison, with the discharge of his duty.

This closed the public ministry of the Baptist. His had been a short course; not longer than three years and a-half had he stood before the nation of Israel preaching repentance: and now the work of John was at an end; he had prepared the paths of the Messiah, and it was proper that he should now retire, and leave the stage open for the appearance of his Master. Providence accomplished its designs by the wickedness of man. The cruelty of Herod was the means of extinguishing the light of the Morning Star, that the Sun of Righteousness might shine forth.

Let us now attend the preacher of the desert, and the reprove of the monarch, to the solitude of his dungeon.

We have already seen John transported from the wilderness to the court; and in the latter station discharging his ministry as faithfully, and reprove sin as boldly, as in the former; saying to the rude soldier, to the abandoned publican, to the proud Pharisee, "O, generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth fruits meet for repentance:" and now saying, to the tyrant on his throne, "It is not lawful for thee to have her." In this we discern a mind incapable of being changed by time, of being awed by power, or subdued by persecution. What a model for every minister of the Gospel! We now behold him carried from the court to the prison. As he had not sought, by unlawful means, to avoid suffering, so we have no reason to suppose that he sank under it when it came; he carried with him to his dungeon the consciousness that his Master's work had been faithfully performed; that he had gone before his face, in the spirit and power of Elias, reprove sin in all, till his course was stopped by the violence of man. Nor was he deserted in his prison; he was cheered by the reports which his disciples brought him, from time to time, of the progress of Christ; and visions of future glory—of the coming greatness and power of the Messiah's kingdom—would flit before the eyes of the prophet, and render him happier in his chains, than his persecutor in his palace.

It does not follow, because we occupy a throne, that we are happy; nor are we necessarily miserable, because we lie in a prison. Happiness is not bound to the loftiest rank; nor is misery inseparable from the lowest external condition. Could we paint the secret terrors that shook the tyrant on his throne, or the secret joys that ravished the soul of the prophet in his prison—the agony of the palace, the bliss of the dungeon—we could shew, that truth is to be courted even when she suffers, and that vice is to be shunned even when she triumphs. The voice of flattery, and the pomp of power, cannot charm to repose that restless adder, an awakened conscience; nor can the greatest tyrant, the heaviest chain, the darkest dungeon, rob us of the favour of God, or shut us out from his presence; they, therefore, cannot make us miserable. How strongly do these considerations enforce the injunction of the Saviour, "Fear not him, who, after he hath killed the body, hath no more that he can do; but fear him, who, after he hath killed, can cast into hell?"

We shall close our narrative at present by remarking, that those who have been eminent for their holiness of life, the rank they have held in the Church of God, the good they have rendered to the world, are worthy of being remembered after they are gone. They may be shut up in prisons, or they may have descended into the grave, but they ought not to be forgotten by those who are reaping the harvest of their labour, and reposing in the shade of institutions reared by their wisdom and courage. With this duty our profit is more connected than their honour. We remember and admire the gifts of God which shone in them, their diligence in labour, their patience in suffering, their constancy in death, not for their praise merely, for they are dead, and are now as far beyond the applause of their earthly admirers as the rage of their cruel enemies—the voice of praise, and the voice of blame: the pencil of the wit and the novelist, which has painted them as fanatics and madmen—and the page of honest history, which tells how noble the cause was for which they suffered, and how noble the spirit in which they suffered for it, both are now alike to them. But although they can receive neither pleasure nor pain from the estimation in which they are held by men, the cause of truth on earth may be affected by the manner in which they are spoken of. It is, therefore, our duty to keep in remembrance their contendings—the generous devotion with which they surrendered, at the call of duty, all that they loved on earth—the fortitude with which they reprov'd sin in those who had the power and the will to resent the reproof—it is our duty, we say, to keep these qualities in remembrance, that we may be animated by their example, and that the same fire may be transfused into our bosoms, which burned with such strength in theirs.

But, it may be asked, has not time avenged the wrongs of the tyrant, and has not a later age awarded the justice which was denied them by their own? Are not their names now mentioned with honour? Has not posterity approved of the principles for which they suffered, and execrated the wickedness of the men who pursued them to the death? We preach sermons at their tombs, and we build monuments of marble above their ashes. With a purer zeal, the poet has embalmed his song, and the historian his page, with the record of their deeds. And what higher tribute can we render? It must, however, be confessed, that there is some difference between being able to discover merit in the dead, and being willing to confess it in the living: the martyrs are no longer on the earth; they have passed to a world where, we feel assured, it is not necessary to maintain truth by suffering; but their cause is on the earth, and he who despises it despises them.

BAPTISM PREFIGURED BY THE DELUGE: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GEORGE ANDERSON, A. M., Minister of the Scotch Church, Alnwick.

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."—JOHN iii. 5.

THIS passage has sometimes been interpreted so as to attach an undue importance to the ordinance of baptism. Men have even contended against the possible salvation of such infants as have died without having had this sacrament administered to them; or have held, that, if they are the subjects of salvation, it can only be through the uncovenanted mercies of God. We maintain, on the contrary, that the phrase "uncovenanted mercies" is altogether unscriptural; and that all the members of Christ's mystical body, whether they may or may not have been baptized, must equally have been born again of those influences emblematically set forth by the sprinkling of water. And that there is nothing in these words, which must necessarily be interpreted as giving to this sacrament a prominence so manifestly at variance with the spirituality of the Gospel dispensation, must appear evident on consulting the context. Our Saviour had previously said, (ver. 3,) "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Such an one must necessarily be excluded from that kingdom as incapable of seeing or appreciating its blessedness. And it is added, (ver. 6-8,) "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Here the reference seems to be altogether to the mighty work upon the heart,—a work, which is undoubtedly mysterious, and, like all the works of Jehovah, even in external nature, incomprehensible to man in the various stages of its progress; but quite palpable to him, by reason of its salutary consequences. If, then, there be nothing treated of in the words above quoted but the regeneration of man's heart, we must conclude, that the two clauses in the former part of our text, are merely two ways of expressing one and the same thing. And wherefore should we be surprised at this, or for a moment regard it as if it were an instance of unmeaning repetition? If there be one characteristic of style more decidedly peculiar to the sacred writers, as compared with those of more modern times, it is their annexing to the formal enunciation of some weighty truth, in a manner fitted to impress the hearer or reader with its importance, another mode of expression, which, without addition or variation, reiterates the same truth. While it must be admitted, that, in the instance before us, both expressions are in some degree figurative, yet the phrase, which is less familiar, has been selected, so as to arouse in the mind associations of interest.

It has been supposed, by an eminent critic of the last age, that the waters of the deluge have suggested the figure which is here employed; and he cites the language of the prophet Isaiah, (xlii. 3,) as capable of similar explication: "Thus saith Jehovah, I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring." No doubt it may be said, with regard to the imagery contained in these words, that there exists a strong analogy between the consequences of an abundant supply of water on a parched and desert land, and those of the Spirit's influences upon the barren soil of the unregenerate heart. But it may be answered, that, had the prophet pointed merely to the fertilizing effect of water upon a dry and sterile tract of country, he would have spoken rather of the mighty river confined within its appointed channel, and, while pursuing its regular and majestic course towards the all-devouring deep, carrying with it, and every where depositing, what was to enrich and fructify the fields; whereas the imagery made use of suggests to us the devastating progress of an angry deluge. It may appear to the reader, that a similar objection must lie against any interpretation which would hold these passages to allude to the flood of Noah. But it should be kept in mind, that, notwithstanding the fearful havoc which was occasioned by that terrible catastrophe among the inhabitants of the then existing world, and all forms of property which they had held in estimation, the blessings which it was intended and fitted to confer upon the human race, if not by its fertilizing influence on the surface of our globe, at least by the deliverance of the fathers of the Church, were immeasurably greater than the temporary evils by which it was to be accompanied, and to be imparted to a multitude unspeakably surpassing in number the victims of its overwhelming progress. Accordingly, the inspired writer, (1 Pet. iii, 21,) not only connects the two things, as he might have done in a passing illustration, but pointedly inculcates upon us that the deluge was a figure, nay, a type of the holy ordinance of baptism, as afterwards to be instituted by Jesus. "Which," (viz., the spirits, unto whom, though now in prison, the Saviour had preached by the Holy Ghost given unto Noah,) "which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noe, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved by water: the like figure whereunto, baptism (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) doth also now save us, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." When we have read this passage of Scripture, we cannot but admit, that the office of baptism was typically set forth by the waters, which in the days of Noah swept over the surface of our world. But even whilst we do so, and while pondering this strong language in which it is so strikingly and so unexpectedly introduced, informing us of what would never have occurred to us, had it not been suggested by revelation, (the abrupt introduction of the subject, too, seeming to indicate a special purpose of stamping it as a revelation particularly valuable:) we may yet feel, that there is no such analogy between the deluge and the shedding of God's Spirit as represented by baptismal sprinkling; as that the mention of that catastrophe should bring to our recollection the weighty truth with which it has been associated by the apostle. On examination, however, we may find, that it is as fit a symbol of the gracious dealings of Jehovah with the Church, as is the beautiful arch of heaven of the faithfulness with which he will remember his promise to preserve mankind from any returning deluge. Even in the latter instance we have to confess, that the symbol and its spiritual intent are but too little associated in our minds; although that meaning was revealed at the first institution of the type. And we cannot be at all surprised, if in the former case also we have, either from a similar indifference or misapprehension, meditated unfrequently and carelessly upon the spiritual interpretation of the great event with which it was so late of being associated.

It may be profitable, perhaps, cursorily, to enumerate a few points, in which analogy may be traced between the high truths, spiritually shadowed forth by baptism, and the flood of Noah, by which it was prefigured. And,

1. Water, which was the element made use of to destroy the old world, is not necessarily a destructive agent. On the contrary, it is essential to the comfort and even to the existence of man. So the Holy Spirit, whose influences are shadowed forth in the water of baptism, and who has gone forth in the name and by reason of the death of Jesus who is the life and light of the world, is He in whom we "live, and move, and have our being." To whatever length the natural man may go, in resistance of God's Spirit, though he should add mockery to contempt, ridiculing the doctrine of his influences, as set forth in the Gospel of regeneration, yet can he not cast himself off from dependence on that great Omnipresent Being. And in this we refer not merely to the adventitious blessings of his earthly lot. The gifts of mind are equally from God. All the evil thoughts and unhallowed feelings of which he is at any time conscious, and which are the fountain of crime, in all its varying degrees of aggravation, are the perversion of a mental or spiritual strength which cometh from Jehovah, and which, if employed as it ought to have been, to his glory, would have conducted to the greatest possible blessedness of man.

2. Even the desolating power with which the waters were armed, when they buried a generation in their depths, was not necessarily the cause of destruction to any. The patriarch was authorized to preach repentance, and he possibly would tell them that their impenitence alone would make the fate of the world inevitable; or, at all events, that, if any cast in their lot with him and his family, there would not be wanting means to justify his preaching, in the accomplishment of their promised deliverance. There appears to be something strikingly analogous in the circumstances of those who are ever and anon engulfed in the billows of Jehovah's wrath, for their persevering neglect of religious advantages. They cherish not, but stifle the convictions of sin in their hearts. And, when the vicegerent of God within them is aroused into action, by such spiritual operations as are common to the hearers of the Gospel generally, they quench his emotions, making their spiritual privileges the cause of a fearfully aggravated condemnation. The Sacred Volume teems with denunciations against the stubborn unbelief of such. "They are condemned already, because they have not believed;" for God hath prepared a spiritual ark, "by the which he condemns the world." And having turned the grace of Jehovah into a curse, it shall at last advance upon them with the appalling aspect and sweeping ruin of an all-devouring deluge. But the everlasting destruction which then shall ensue, cannot be regarded as arising from any thing but the sin of mankind.

3. In both cases there is an ark, from the preservation of which a greater amount of blessedness than of misery will accrue to the human race. The sufferers were lamentably numerous at the flood, "wherein few, that is eight souls, were saved." Still, however, they are unspeakably outnumbered by the myriads who have descended from Noah, and in each succeeding generation enjoyed all the ordinary blessings of a beneficent providence. In like manner, the portion of mankind who shall be finally delivered from all the consequences of their iniquity, in its guilt, pollution, and power, will be "a multitude whom no man can number." The disciples were "a little flock" in the days of our Lord, but they multiplied rapidly on his ascension and the outpouring of the Spirit. Now there is a large mass of sincere worshippers of the Angel-Jehovah. In the days of the millenium, which will probably be a very protracted period, his religion will be universal. When, therefore, we add to the numbers, who, in manhood, shall have enrolled themselves as adherents of the cause of Christ, all those who, in infant years, have been united to the Church above, it becomes apparent that the glory, honour, and immortality, to be inherited by the saints, will far surpass in degree all the evil resulting from unbelief in man.

4. In each case the ark was upheld by the special power and protecting guardianship of Jesus and his Father. Though the capacity of the ark has been demonstrated to have been well adapted for the purpose it was to serve, its particular construction cannot now be ascertained. We may be well assured, however, that whatsoever was its form it could not have been saved from the common ruin but by a providence equally special with that by which its plan and structure were appointed and executed. In like manner, the Church and its ordinances are under the vigilant superintendence of the Almighty King. The foundations of Christian faith are the declaration, "All power is given unto me, in heaven and in earth," and the promise, "Lo! I am with you always even to the end of the world." The secret springs of his providence have been all unveiled in the history of the Church. And, whether in the wonders performed by prophets and apostles, and the primitive Christians generally, or those which were, in great condescension, effected by himself, we behold the evidence of an accumulated mass of resources, which time and eternity will alike fail to exhaust. The surges of tribulation, threatening to overwhelm the Christian;—the depths of temptation, yawning wide to "swallow him up,"—the world, at one time involving its victim in a sea of troubles, and anon joyously floating his leaping bark along the rivers of its pleasures,—the mysterious abyss of terror and pollution, and horrible anguish, (that great deep, from the dreary associations of which Demons prayed to be exempted, and from whose bourn Satan and his hostile legions issue forth to defy the Church and the Church's God;) all will fail alike to endanger or impede the onward course of that little ark, in which the mighty antitype of Noah dwells in all security with the family of his choice! These are upheld in safety and comfort, on the bosom of the Great Eternal, resting on whose sacred influences, the ocean of their holy joy, the vessel of the Church, though it may sometimes seem to stagger and reel, shall ride out the storm unscathed, and arrive at last at a quiet haven.

Finally, as Noah took refuge in the one ark, which had been prepared with the approbation of Jehovah, so we find the Holy Mediator included in that into which his people have been shut by the hand of God. His delights, from eternity, were with the children of men. So when, in the fulness of the ages, he left the throne of his glory, he did not revolt from the humiliating alliance with the flesh and blood of fallen humanity, but rather rejoiced to draw closer and closer the bonds of the union. He was admitted by baptism a member of the Church. He was anointed with the oil of joy above his fellows. He accepted the ministrations of angels, and cultivated, with holy ardour, the fellowship of his Father's Spirit, the absence of whose consolations, in the hour and power of darkness, he so pathetically lamented! In all things but sin he determined to be one with his brethren. And they are to be regarded as one with him, even as he is one with his heavenly Father; in which expression he does not seem to allude to his relation to the Father and the Holy Spirit, personally considered, seeing the latter is not even named, but to the ties of the eternal covenant, binding him down to certain conditions. As his goings forth on this object were from eternity, to eternity they shall endure. When he shall have given up the kingdom to his Father, resigning into his hands the temporary commission to conquer the rebel province, (it being again recognized as a constituent territory, within the circuit of his wide dominions,) he shall be regarded as still subject to his Father, by reason of his continued official connection with the Church, of which eternity shall hail him King! His people too, we are assured, shall reign with Him as kings and priests for ever. The union between them and their glorified Head, shall be lasting as eternity itself, and in the full fruition of heavenly bliss, they shall enjoy a happiness unutterable and inconceivable.

THE MISSION AT POONAH,

A BRANCH OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INDIA MISSION.

[The following interesting account of the progress of this Mission during 1836, is contained in a statement transmitted by the Rev. James Mitchell, one of the Church of Scotland's Missionaries in India, addressed to the Convener of the Assembly's Committee. The document bears date 28th November last.]

In the mercy of God, I have been permitted to labour at the Poonah Station for another year; and in now taking a review of the mission for that period, I feel, that whilst I have reason to praise the Lord for his goodness, I have much reason of humiliation on account of my own shortcomings, and of the little fruit that has as yet appeared. I trust, however, that my labours have not been altogether in vain, and that, should the Lord permit me still to continue to sow and water the seed, there will shortly be a reaping time of joy.

I begin with the preaching of the Gospel. In the Maráthí department, I have officiated daily, except on particular occasions, in the bazárs and streets of the city and encampment of Poonah. I generally devote part of the afternoon to this exercise, and continue from an hour and a-half to two hours in one or more places, to address the people. The number of persons who hear on these occasions is various, but generally considerable. In Poonah itself, I commonly avoid the great thoroughfares, as they are so noisy as to render it difficult to speak so as to be heard, and as I am there more exposed to interruptions. Street-preaching, though it has these disadvantages, yet has advantages too, which could not be so well secured were we to confine ourselves to particular houses on all occasions. The houses are apt soon to be deserted, or to be attended by a few in their vicinity only; in order, then, to come into contact with the people at large, it is necessary to seek them out, and speak to them wherever they can be found. They have, in general, so much apathy on almost every subject connected with moral and intellectual improvement, that though they will hear patiently when addressed, they will exert themselves very little to find instruction in reference to it. When I meet any at these meetings who seem at all impressed, I invite them to call upon me at my house for more particular information, which many of them do.

I have five days in the week stately a large morning assembly of the inmates of the Poonah bázár poor's asylum, which is under my superintendence, and others to whom I read and expound the Scriptures, and then pray with and for them. On Sabbaths, besides the morning meeting just mentioned, I preach, and engage in the usual devotional services of singing and prayer, in a large school-room in the principal bázár, which is attended by the older boys and girls of the schools, inquirers, some gentlemen's servants, and generally a considerable number of town's people, who, when passing, come in, and either remain the whole time, or after hearing a little go out, and are succeeded by others.

During the year, I have continued to take the spiritual charge of the English congregation connected with the mission. The services have been as follows:—Two diets of public worship on Sabbath, one with the soldiers, in the B. E. regiment school-room, on Tuesday evening, and another in our own chapel on Thursday evening. The attendance of all classes has been much the same as in former years. Since the month of June, when the Queen's regiment left the station, we have not had quite so many soldiers, as H. M. 17th regiment, which succeeded it, is yet not complete in respect to numbers, and there do not seem to be many Presbyterians amongst the men. The number who reckon themselves connected with us is about forty. By the removal of the Queen's regiment, upwards of twenty communicants were separated from the congregation. Many of them, I hope, however, to meet in a better world, in a communion that can never be obstructed. To not a few of them, both communicants and others, I had the pleasure of knowing that my labours had not been in vain. Our parting was not without a mutual pang. I pray that they may be kept from the evil which is in the world, and that none of them may come short of eternal life. I may here mention, that our Church members were during the march, as they had been accustomed to do at Poonah, every evening, for reading the Scriptures and prayer. At our last Sacrament, which occurred on the first Sabbath of August, notwithstanding the reduction which had taken place in our members in consequence of the removal of the Queen's regiment, we had fifty-four communicants. It is gratifying to mention, that amongst those admitted to the Church at that time were few individuals from H. M. 17th, all of whom professed that they had received good to their souls since they became hearers with us. May they continue to walk as becometh their profession, that others taking notice of them, may glorify their Father in Heaven!

It has not been in my power to do much for the spread of divine truth in the surrounding country by itinerant preaching. During the year, I have been able to accomplish only one tour of much extent. It occupied most of the months of January and February last. Leaving Poonah, I proceeded directly to Bombay, where I remained for a few days; thence I proceeded through Salsette, accompanied by Dr Wilson. Parting from him at Ghorabandar, I visited Bassin, where I remained three days preaching the glad tidings, and distributing books. I thence proceeded to Bhowndy, where for two days I was similarly employed. I thence crossed over the country, preaching in the various villages of the Konkan, towards the Dakhan, to which I ascended by the Náná Ghát, and spent some days in Jûnr and the neighbouring villages. From this place I proceeded directly to Poonah, visiting most of the villages on the way. I everywhere found the people willing to hear my message, and receive our publications. One young man, who seemed considerably impressed, followed me from Bassin, and remained sometime under instruction at Poonah, but afterwards, as I had reason to express to him my fears of the purity of his motives, he left me for his native place near Jûnr, and I have not since heard anything of him. I feel much the desirableness of tours, and were there another missionary at the station, would be inclined to spend a month now and then in visiting the principal towns of this part of the Dakhan. A person who has not engaged in this part of missionary labour, can have no idea of the degree of knowledge which may in this way be communicated. The preaching of the missionary, and the discussions which are carried on between him and the Brahmáns, before the people at large, excite inquiry, and lead them to read the tracts and books which are left amongst them. They find that their system is assailed and very vulnerable: and the simple and sublime doctrines of our faith take an indelible hold of their understandings. There are now few villages in this part of the country where some of the people, through means of the preaching of missionaries, cannot give an outline of the principal doctrines of the Gospel. Thus the way of the Lord is preparing; all that is wanting is the Spirit to render the Word heard powerful.

II. The next means of advancing the knowledge of the truth, which I have used, is the education of both young and old in the mission schools. These are of two kinds, Maráthí and English, each of which I shall notice in order.

The Maráthi schools are seven in number,—six for males and one for females, containing about three hundred males, and between fifty and sixty girls. The same system of education, so long used in the mission, has been diligently pursued during the past year. All the books which are read are replete with religious and moral instruction. Into one of the schools a short outline of geography and astronomy has been introduced, and explained to the higher class, so as to be understood by them as far as they have gone, and to excite their curiosity. Nothing could prevent us from using Maráthi schools as the means of communicating all the useful, as well as religious, knowledge to the people, had we proper books in the language, and a superior class of native teachers. These defects will, I trust, year after year, be less felt.

One of the six male schools now mentioned has been opened since last year; it is situated within the Poonah jail. Most of those who attend it, about twenty in number, are adults. I was induced to commence the school, from observing that the prisoners were always very anxious to hear the Gospel when I had occasion to visit the jail; that those of them who could read were very desirous to obtain books; and that many of those who had never made the acquirement necessary to profit by them were willing to do so. Mr Bell, the judge, was kind enough to give me leave to open the school, and also, by visiting it for the purpose of examining those who attended, to instruct them as often as I chose. Several of those who commenced were soon able to read the Scriptures, and to answer most of the questions in the elementary catechism; and some of them, in consequence of what they heard, have expressed to me a desire for baptism. One man, in particular, who is possessed of considerable property, and who, though not a scholar, with many others regularly attended the school when I was there, which was the case generally once a-week, to receive religious instruction, has openly declared his reception of Christianity, and has put his wife and son under my instruction, by directing them to receive, and hear what I have to say, as often as I please to visit them, which they seem willingly to do. I have not complied with the wish of any of those individuals, as I think that, in their present state of captivity, they have much temptation to deceive, and perhaps to be deceived themselves, to make professions within the jail, which they would be afraid to make among their friends and acquaintances without. Although I think it right to give them every opportunity of instruction, I would require some very powerful evidences of piety to induce me to baptize any man whilst a prisoner. The number of people attending this school would be more numerous, were it not that most of them are kept engaged in various labours during the day, according to their sentence, and have but little time to spare. This is evidently what cannot be helped.

The girls' school is composed of two divisions, under different teachers. In the first division, are all those who are yet unable to read, and in the other, containing forty girls, those who read, write, and sew. They have also received some instruction in music, according to the native ideas on the subject, and lead this part of our Maráthi worship on Sabbath. This school sustained a severe loss in the death of a lady at the station, who had for more than a year taken a particular charge of it, and who devoted, till her death, which occurred in August last, a considerable portion of her time to its improvement, and had it taught in her own compound. She had acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to enable her fully to communicate instruction to the children herself; and, had it pleased God to have spared her, there is little doubt that she would have seen of the fruit of her labour amongst them. Several of the girls were much attached to her, and often seemed deeply impressed. One of them, since her death, has asked baptism. This girl has a very correct knowledge of Christian doctrine; but some time must elapse before her request is granted, that we may have more satisfactory evidence that a real change of mind has been produced within her. Her father, who is a poor man, wishes her now to be married; but the girl, who is upwards of twelve years of age, is averse to it herself, chiefly, as she says, that she may have opportunity of attending to divine things in the school. A woman, a Maráthi widow, who also used to attend the school whilst under the care of the lady referred to, and who has learned to read and sew, also makes professions of love to the Saviour; I have employed her, on a small salary, to aid the teacher in the care of the girls. As there is no lady just now at Poonah who could take a full and entire oversight of this school, though two have kindly agreed to visit it occasionally, I have removed it into my own compound, that so I may have it in my power more fully to attend to the improvement of the children. I can have no confidence in the usefulness of the teachers without the most unremitting superintendence. This school was lately examined by a lady, Mrs Townsend, who is a Maráthi scholar, and takes an interest in every good work. She expressed herself much pleased with the progress which the girls had made in their various studies, and to encourage them to make still farther advancement, gave such of them who could read, a present of a sari, or dress. The lady referred to, as having laboured in this school, wishing to be still more useful among the native women, had resolved to take charge of an asylum for destitute girls and others who would put themselves entirely under her care, so as to be as much as possible removed from heathen influence, which, it was found, very often blasted, by its evil effect, the most promising blossoms. In order to commence operations in this department, a few huts had been erected, and promises of residence had been obtained from some girls and women, when, lo! she was called to leave the field of labour, and enter into the joy of her Lord. Such an institution, I am convinced, if under the care of a pious and zealous individual, would be of incalculable use.

Since March last, there has been connected with the mission an English school, which has had on the roll between seventy and eighty children, and the daily attendance has been between sixty and seventy. It is situated in the general bázár of the camp, where there is a large and increasing population, and where a knowledge of English is more in request than in any other locality not already occupied. Those in the city of Poonah, who have a wish to make themselves acquainted with our language and literature, have an opportunity of so doing by attending the government English school, superintended by my excellent friend D. A. Eisdale, Esq. As our school is but of recent establishment, and has had to labour under particular disadvantages, in reference to teachers, I have not yet had any public examination of it. The children have, however, made considerable progress in reading and writing, in arithmetic, in grammar, in geography, and in a knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity. Several gentlemen who have visited it, have expressed themselves highly pleased with what has been done during the short time the children have been under our care. I almost daily, when at home, give attendance for an hour or an hour and a-half myself in this school. The present teacher, Mr W. Taylor, though able to teach only the elementary parts of the language, is very diligent in improving himself, and has, under my care, commenced the study of mathematics. He is already sufficiently acquainted with the native languages to be able to explain to the boys the meaning of their lessons, and examine their exercises; but we endeavour to make English itself the mode of direct communication as soon as possible. In the two higher classes very little of any native language requires now to be used. The New Testament is daily read by the boys of these two classes, and its contents are fully explained to them. I have found considerable difficulty in supplying the school with proper books, which I hope will not long be the case. The expenses of the school have been heretofore met by subscriptions and donations, which I have obtained from friends, expressly for this object, amounting to nine hundred rupees.

I have no doubt that our school, though comparatively small, will be found very useful. We can never expect to find, at such a station as Poonah, that desire for a knowledge of English which is to be found in large trading cities. It is here worthy of remark that in Poonah, and through the whole of the Dakhan, a knowledge of English is not particularly an object of desire, even with the great and wealthy; and that in order to communicate with them, and so to enlighten and benefit their minds, Marathi is, and must for a long period continue to be, the medium of intercourse. The case is very different at the great emporias of the country. This consideration should not however discourage us in attempting to do all the good, in this way, in our power; whilst it must urge us on to improve the Marathi schools, as far as our means of so doing will permit.

III. I would now notice the administration of the Sacraments. The Lord's Supper has been administered to the congregation at Poonah four times during the year, and the native church members who have been at the station on these occasions, have united with us in this refreshing ordinance. Three adults have been baptized, one a European soldier, who had not received the seal of the covenant in his youth, and who had lately come under religious impressions; another a Jew, born in India, who had resided some time in Calcutta, and there heard of the Saviour, and was, in a great measure, convinced of the truth of Christianity, but had not been particularly instructed in the faith of Jesus, was baptized in December last, after he had been about eight months under my instruction, and had expressed an anxious wish to be admitted into the Church. I am sorry to say, that on account of an affection of the lungs, he is now much distressed, and not likely to live long. I trust, however, that he is prepared for his great change. The third person is a woman, wife of one of the Church members. She was baptized on the last Sabbath of October. She has for nearly two years been a candidate for this ordinance, and seems a really humble and pious person. A child of one of the native members, and five children of European parents, have also been baptized since last report. These who have offered themselves for baptism, and who attend me for particular instruction at present, are six in number,—two women and four men. They have all, I believe, long abandoned the service of idols, and there are, at least, two of the men, whom I may soon admit into the privileges of the Church.

IV. My time has been so fully occupied with the labours above mentioned, that I have found very little leisure to devote to the preparation of works for the press. I have, however, acted as a member of the translation committee of the Bombay Bible Society, and have, of course, criticised the various portions of the Word of God, which have been submitted to its consideration. In consequence of an appointment from this body, I have completed a translation of the first epistle to the Corinthians, which is now circulating in the committee, and have made some progress in the preparation of the second epistle. I have also acted on the examination committee of the Bombay Book and Tract Society.

I have now mentioned the most important occurrences in my mission for the past year, and although little fruit is apparent, and though it is still rather the day of hope than of realization, I feel that we have no reason to despair, but rather to abound in all faithful and prayerful exertion, assured that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

There is one view of the matter that often deeply afflicts my mind,—the paucity of labourers. Though the field seems white to the harvest, yet we hear of few who are disposed to come to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Surely the fact, that there are around us millions of poor heathen, perishing for lack of knowledge, ought to be a sufficient inducement to many of the hundreds of talented and pious young men in our universities, who are aspiring to the sacred office, to take their lives in their hands, and go forth to their instruction. Surely the greatest honour any man can acquire here below, is to be a diligent and useful labourer in this cause, the cause of humanity and of God. What are six or seven missionaries to the Church of Scotland? Many bodies of Christians, who have neither the wealth nor the piety she possesses, feel no difficulty in supporting a host, compared with such a number. I hope and pray that this blot on the zeal, and, I would say, the gratitude of our National Church, will soon be wiped away, and that she, according to her resources, will be foremost in her exertions for the advancement of the kingdom of our blessed Saviour in the earth.

ARRANGEMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF ROCKS.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

A STILL more striking manifestation of design in the arrangement and distribution of rocks, than that which was mentioned in my former article, remains to be stated. This arises from the inclined position which the several strata are made to occupy. The slightest attention to the composition and structure of the stratified rocks, will satisfy the most ordinary observer, that they have been formed in water, from materials held in solution, or mechanically suspended in a fluid, and that the particles which compose them have been brought together and arranged upon a nearly level foundation. Look into any quarry of freestone to which you may have access, and you will observe that the natural divisions of the rock are still as distinct and fresh as if it had been the work of yesterday, shewing even, by the fineness or coarseness of the stone, and the thin beds of interposed clay, when the waters had been in a placid, and when in a turbid state; nay, in some cases, the very ripple of the wave would seem to have impressed itself upon the mass. Now these originally level and horizontal beds are all, less or more, inclined to the horizon, some of them but slightly elevated, others thrown into a vertical position, and many of them forced up to the summits of lofty mountains, a result which must have taken place since the formation and consolidation of these rocks, as it is evident that, in their loose and unagglutinated state, the materials which compose them could not have been kept together under such conditions. It is owing to this arrangement by which they have been shifted out of their original position, and slipped, as it were, over each other, like the files on an inverted roof, that the several strata have been made to emerge in succession from beneath each other, and all the varieties of the mineral treasures brought to the surface. Hence the diversity of rocks by which our local districts are characterised. Hence, too, by the elevation of the strata, the beautiful variety of hill and valley, of streams, rivers, lakes, and majestic mountain scenery. Hence, also, a provision made for all our agricultural operations, without which the earth would have presented a monotonous plain, with little diversity of climate, or variety of soil, and destitute of all that useful and complex machinery, arising from the fissures, inequalities, and disruption of the rocky strata, by which springs are brought to the surface, and the overflowings of the fertilizing and refreshing rains are carried away. "God putteth forth his hand upon the rock, he overturneth the mountains by the roots; he cutteth out rivers among the rocks, and his eye seeth every precious thing." And amidst such undeniable indications of order and regularity, of a nicely balanced adaptation of means to ends, he must be blind, indeed, who fails to recognise in them proofs of the most exalted attributes of the Creator.

Besides the stratified rocks, to which our remarks have been hitherto confined, there is another class of rocks which occupy an important place in the economy of nature, and to which we would briefly advert. These are the granites and whinstones, of which the highest mountain ranges are usually composed. There are many subordinate varieties belonging to both classes which are characterised by slight shades of texture and composition, and distinguished by different names. One thing is common to the whole members of each group,—they are not disposed in layers, and exhibit no lines of stratification, but exist in shapeless irregular masses (except in the columnar basalt,) throughout the entire mountain chain. These rocks occupy no fixed determinate place in the order of superposition, but seem to be intruded, in the most irregular manner, among the stratified rocks, separating one bed from another, filling up fissures and rents, and binding or interlacing, as it were, the various deposits through which they pass more closely and firmly together. They are often composed of the fragments of other rocks, agglutinated into a compound mass by a base of clay. Remarkable changes are also produced upon all the strata where they come in contact with granite and whinstone,—chalk being converted into crystalline limestone,—limestone into chert,—clay and sandstone into a substance as hard and compact as flint,—and coal is deprived of its bitumen or the quality which renders it so useful as a combustible body. From these, and other appearances, geologists have been led to the conclusion, that these rocks are of later origin than those which are stratified,—that they have been ejected amongst them in a state of fusion,—and, by the expansive force of internal heat, that they have burst through the stony crust of the earth, and elevated the strata which compose it. They are, if we may use the expression, the levers which the Almighty has employed in bringing up the lower deposits to the surface, in laying open the interior "chambers," and in producing all that infinite variety in our earthly habitation which ministers to the comfort and well-being of man. Much seeming confusion and disturbance everywhere mark the course of these rocks, similar, though upon a more extensive scale, to the disorders attendant upon the eruption of a modern volcano; but, throughout the whole, there reigns such a harmony of purpose, that the conclusion is irresistible, that such operations could only have taken place by divine permission, and are in accordance with the divine plan, controlling the most refractory agencies of nature, and causing them contribute to the general good. "The Lord stood and measured the earth, and the everlasting mountains were scattered, the perpetual hills did bow."

There is much in all this to excite our admiration and love, imperfectly understood as the operations of God must ever continue to be by creatures, who, in their highest state of mental illumination, can "know only in part." No adequate cause of creation can be conceived by us, but the divine goodness, and while we never can expect fully to comprehend the wisdom which planned, and the majesty of power which carried into effect the purposes of that wisdom, still the very effort to attain knowledge concerning them fulfils one great object for which man is made curious concerning the works of creation. His intellectual strength is augmented by the attempt, his soul elevated by loftier aspirations than the ordinary objects of human pursuit can gratify, and the mind gradually prepared to adopt those large and worthy views of God and nature, which religion and science equally demand. The Psalmist seems frequently to have warmed the flame of devotion by a survey of the various works of nature; their grandeur, magnificence, and beauty, no less than their variety, often transports him into a fervour that breaks out into raptures of gratitude, and songs of praise. The hundred and fourth Psalm is, among others, a remarkable instance of the taste, genius, and devotion of its author, where he runs over the great master-keys of this harmonious system, the Universe, and joins his voice with the whole chorus of nature, in celebrating the praises of its Author. After a survey of the wonders of the heavens, he descends to the lower regions of the earth, describing, with inimitable beauty and precision of language, its various productions, and the uses they serve to the support of man and beast. The foundation of the steadfast earth—the expansion and course of the fluid waters—their descent from the hills—their meandering through the valleys—their emptying themselves into the ocean—the trees planted by the waters—the grass for the cattle, and the birds singing among the branches—the high hills and rocky mountains—the course and revolutions of the sun and moon—the succession of day and night—the earthquake and the volcano, are all recited as demonstrations of the divine goodness, as all subservient to purposes of beneficence, and as all necessary parts of that great system of the universe, whose Author and Governor is love. Thus, too, will every truly enlightened Christian be affected. In contemplating the many wonders of creation, the variety and beauty of external nature, he will always refer to that infinite wisdom through whose goodness he is permitted to enjoy knowledge; in becoming wiser he will study to become better; his increasing information will be made subservient to a more exalted faith in that blessed "Word" who framed all the worlds; and, in proportion as the veil becomes thinner through which he sees the causes of things, he will admire more the brightness of Him who "was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

On Knowledge of our Acceptance with God.—A close walk with God, is the best preparation for a triumphant death. And the knowledge of our acceptance with God is to be constantly urged as one of the greatest motives to lead a strict life, and to abstain from all appearance of evil, seeing the Holy Ghost, whose testimony alone can satisfy the conscience, will never dwell with the slothful or lukewarm, much less with presumptuous offenders. Remember no command in the New Testament is oftener repeated than "Rejoice in the Lord." Nothing more becomes us than assurance, (in the full view of our unworthiness and corruptions, and the purity of our God,) grounded on the purchase paid for us—on the promise and oath of God. Nothing more honours him, or commends his cause. Nothing more discourages and damps the hearts of men, than to hear those who are acknowledged to be walking circumspectly, and with a single eye, speak in terms of suspicion and fear. This is the device of the enemy, to perplex and vex those who are faithful, by endless fears, and the spirit of bondage. "Ask, and ye shall have," &c. is enough to make us confident.—VENN.

The true nature of Man's goodness.—Good works are the effect, not the cause of God's love.—ROMAINS,

SACRED POETRY.

MARY AT THE SEPULCHRE.

How sweet, in the musing of faith, to repair
To the garden where Mary delighted to rove;
To sit by the tomb where she breath'd her fond prayer,
And paid her sad tribute of sorrow and love;
To see the bright beam which disperses her fear,
As the Lord of her soul breaks the bars of his prison,
And the voice of the angel salutes her glad ear,—
The Lord is a captive no more—"He is risen!"

O Saviour! as oft as our footsteps we bend
In penitent sadness to weep at thy grave,
On the wings of thy greatness in pity descend,
Be ready to comfort, and "mighty to save."
We shrink not from scenes of desertion and wo,
If there we may meet with the Lord of our love;
Contented, with Mary, to sorrow below,
If, with her, we may drink of thy fountains above.

CUNNINGHAM.

THE CHRISTIAN PILGRIM.

PILGRIM, burden'd with thy sin,
Come the way to Zion's gate;
There, till mercy speaks within,
Knock, and weep, and watch, and wait.
Knock—he knows the sinner's cry;
Weep—he loves the mourner's tears;
Watch—for saving grace is nigh;
Wait—till heavenly grace appears.

Hark, it is thy Saviour's voice!
"Welcome, pilgrim, to thy rest!"
Now within the gate rejoice,
Safe, and own'd, and bought, and blest.
Safe—from all the lures of vice;
Own'd—by joys the contrite know;
Bought by love—and life the price;
Blest—the mighty debt to owe!

Holy pilgrim! what for thee,
In a world like this, remains?
From thy guarded breast shall flee,
Fear, and shame, and doubts, and pains.
Fear—the hope of heaven shall fly;
Shame—from glory's view retire;
Doubt—in full belief shall die;
Pain—in endless bliss expire.

Anon.

An important change.—Basak, one of the Hottentot servants who attended Mr Campbell in his journey into the interior of South Africa, evinced an earnest concern to bring his poor ignorant countrymen to an acquaintance with the truths from which he had derived so much benefit. In addressing a mixed company of Hottentot slaves and bushmen, he gave a very striking and rational description of the effect of religion on his mind, and of his transition from brute fearlessness, to religious courage. "Before the missionaries came to us," said he, "we were as ignorant of every thing as you now are. I thought that I was the same as a beast; that when I died there would be an end of me; but after I heard them, I found that I had a soul that must be happy or miserable for ever. Then I became afraid to die. I was afraid to take a gun into my hand, lest it should kill me, or to meet a serpent lest it should bite me. I was afraid then to go to the hills to hunt lions or elephants, lest they should devour me. But when I heard of the Son of God having come into the world to die for sinners, all that fear went away. You soon shall have the opportunity to be taught the same thing."

The Infidelity of Hume.—Hume, the celebrated infidel philosopher, and author of a history of England, was once dining at the house of an intimate friend. After dinner the ladies withdrew; and, in the course of conversation, Hume made some assertion which caused a gentleman present to observe to him, "If you can advance such sentiments as those, you certainly are what the world gives you credit for being, an infidel." A little girl, whom the philosopher had often noticed, and with whom he had become a favourite, by bringing her little presents of toys and sweetmeats, happened to be playing about the room unnoticed; she, however, listened to the conversation, and, on hearing the above expression, left the room, went to her mother, and asked her, "Mamma, what is an infidel?" "An infidel, my dear," replied her mother, "why should you ask such a question? an infidel is so awful a character, that I scarcely know how to answer you." "O, do tell me, mamma," returned the child; "I must know what an infidel is." Struck with her eagerness, her mother at length replied, "An infidel is one who believes that there is no God, no heaven, no hell, no hereafter." Some days afterwards Hume again visited the house of his friend. On being introduced to the parlour, he found no one there but his favourite little girl; he went to her, and attempted to take her up in his arms and kiss her, as he had been used to do; but the child shrunk with horror from his touch. "My dear," said he, "what is the matter? do I hurt you?" "No," she replied, "you do not hurt me, but I cannot kiss you, I cannot play with you." "Why not, my dear?" "Because you are an infidel!" "An infidel! what is that?" "One who believes there is no God, no heaven, no hell, no hereafter." "And are you not very sorry for me, my dear?" asked the astonished philosopher. "Yes, indeed, I am sorry!" returned the child, with solemnity; "and I pray to God for you." "Do you indeed? and what do you say?" "I say, O God, teach this man that Thou art!" A striking illustration of the words of sacred writ, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained strength, because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and avenger."

The Effect of Sabbath School Instruction.—The Rev. Mr Hoover, in addressing a meeting of the Philadelphia Sunday School Union, thus spoke:—"If you had accompanied me in a walk through this district, two years ago, I could have led you to a house, or rather a hovel, not far from this spot, which was used to be the residence of man or beast. There you would have seen a widow, with her seven children, in the rags of poverty, and with the impress of misery on their countenances; the room and its occupants forming a scene of wretchedness seldom surpassed. If you will go with me to-morrow, I will show you the same house, but no longer a miserable tenement. Within you shall behold the same widow, and the same seven children, but clothed in comfortable raiment, and peace smiling in their faces. The Sabbath School teacher has been there, and he has led them to the place of holy instruction. God has visited them in the plenitude of his grace, and five of those seven children give joyful evidence that they have passed from death unto life."

"Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life;
no man cometh unto the Father but by me."—JOHN xiv. 6.

ALTHOUGH it may be granted that there has never existed among mankind, previously to the publication of the Gospel, a system of pure natural theology, such as could, with the greatest ease, be constructed out of those materials which the sacred writings afford, it may appear to some a more questionable proposition, when it is affirmed that reason, unassisted, must be for ever inadequate to the discovery of the only true religion suited to the condition of man. Such an affirmation, however, admits of the fullest and most satisfactory proof. Natural theology is a science essentially defective, and incapable of adaptation to the wants of mankind; and no discoveries of the human mind, however exalted, can remove its innate and irremediable imperfections. Its chief defect consists in its being unable to deal with man as a sinful being, which renders it, under all possible circumstances, totally inapplicable to the condition of our species. It is unnecessary to have recourse to Scripture for a confirmation of the doctrine which asserts the sinfulness of human nature; for however fair such a mode of illustration might be deemed, it is proposed, in contending against those who maintain the claims of natural theology, to meet them on grounds which they themselves would choose. No other evidence, therefore, is demanded of the corruption and sinfulness of the heart of man, than that which is afforded by the page of history, by observation of the actions of our fellow-creatures, and, above all, by the inward testimony of conscience. These afford unequivocal proof that mankind are weak, erring, and guilty creatures, continually sinning against that law of holiness which conscience itself both illustrates and sanctions. How do the doctrines of natural theology, or of human reason, unassisted, apply to the condition of such creatures? How can they be made available in contributing to their security, and in removing those obstacles which stand between them and the enjoyment of happiness?

The foundation of a system of pure natural theology is laid in the acknowledgment of the existence of the one great Creator and Governor of the Universe. All nature bears testimony to the being of God; and his glorious attributes can be distinctly traced in the ample page which his manifold works unfold to the intellectual eye. The vast, the boundless, the inconceivable field of creation, coupled with the maintenance and preservation of all things, according to the grand original design, is a sufficient evidence of Almighty power,—the admirable arrangement by which all the parts are made to contribute to the stability and perpetual operation of the whole scheme of providence, displays the wisdom of God,—and the abundant and never-failing provision for supplying the wants, and continuing the existence of living beings, is a clear indication of the extent and unchangeable character of the divine goodness. The most distinct and irrefragable testimony, therefore, is borne by the works of creation and providence, to the power, wisdom, and goodness of God. If the race of mankind were even laid out of account, there would be abundant evidence of superior power; but the structure of the human body, and in a more particular manner the constitution of the human mind, furnish additional proofs of the being and perfections of God, and these the most wonderful and convincing which can be obtained. In contemplating man as an intellectual and moral being,—in turning our attention to the faculties with which his mind is endowed, to those feelings by which it is actuated, the hopes by which it is animated, and the fears with which it is overwhelmed; and, above all, in reflecting upon the extraordinary powers of conscience, certain views are suggested of the great attributes of holiness and justice, and we are convinced that these are perfections of the exalted and glorious Creator. In regard to the attributes of power, wisdom, and goodness, and the influence which they may be supposed to exercise, reason could give at least a degree of information which, in some respects, might direct mankind in making approaches to the Creator. It is evident, however, at the same time, that the only encouragement which it could afford, and the only consolation which it could suggest, would be such as are suited to the condition of creatures who might be deserving objects of divine protection and of divine love.

There can be no ground of confidence to fallen and guilty creatures in the wisdom, power, or even the goodness of God, unless these perfections are separated from others of a different nature—unless holiness, and justice, and truth, formed no portion of the glorious assemblage of divine attributes. As the Creator is not only infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness, but in holiness, justice, and truth, no approach unto him can be acceptable upon the foundation of the former class of attributes, which would be inadmissible upon that of the latter. And as man is an erring and sinful creature, it must be apparent that human reason, which clearly demonstrates the holiness, and justice, and truth of God, is incapable of making any provision whereby guilty beings can be reconciled unto him, or of pointing out the way by which they may draw near unto his awful throne. The sinner's conscience convicts him of flagrant and oft repeated guilt,—suggests in no doubtful manner the indignation and wrath of a holy and righteous God, and even indicates the probability of punishment greater and more durable than any which can be inflicted in a fleeting and perishable state of existence. How are these terrors to be encountered by natural theology, even in its purest and most perfect form? What single feeble ray of hope can any or all of its doctrines pour into the distracted mind of the sinner? Where are its consolations to be found? Reason, perhaps, may suggest that God's goodness is infinite, and that as man is confessedly an imperfect being, God will forgive him, and not inflict upon him that punishment which his sins deserve. But what is this vaunted reason that dares to mark out a line of procedure for the great moral Governor of the world, which would compromise the purity and perfection of his divine nature! If we have evidence that God is good, we have also evidence that he is holy and just. We are not entitled, therefore, to suppose any circumstances under which he would act contrary to any of the perfections of his nature, or to imagine that his dispensations would be such as to exalt any one of these perfections above another, or to make the manifestation of a few of them be at variance with the bright assemblage of the whole. To pardon the sinner irrespectively of the claims of justice, might seem to some an act of goodness worthy of God; but to others who take an enlarged and comprehensive view of all the perfections of God, unconditional pardon must appear irreconcilable with the glory and majesty of the divine nature. And as far as the ordinary operations of God's moral government can be comprehended by us, we perceive that sin is a real cause of divine wrath, and that it is followed in the present world by pain, disease, and premature death. The shallow doctrine of repentance removing the guilt of transgression, and procuring the favour of God, is equally delusive as the plea which is founded upon God's goodness, as opposed to some of his other attributes. Laying it down as an incontrovertible truth that God is holy and just, repentance makes no provision for the satisfaction of the infinite purity of the divine nature. An assertion, therefore, of its efficacy is but a repetition of the error already alluded to, which consists in appealing from the holiness of God to his mercy, and thus attempting to effect a separation which is impracticable, between the great and glorious attributes of the Almighty.

Unless natural theology be capable of suggesting those methods by which sinful creatures, such as mankind confessedly are, can approach with confidence unto the throne of an infinitely just and all-holy God,—it is apparent that defects of an altogether irremediable character attach to it, which must render it at all times unsuited to the wants of our species, and utterly inefficient as a great and universal instrument of moral renovation. It is most certain, however, that it can suggest no such methods, but must make an unchanging appeal to the mercy of God—to the total neglect, and even to the disparagement of his infinite holiness, and his eternal justice. It is precisely where natural theology has failed; and where, under all possible circumstances, it must ever fail, that revelation comes to the aid of man, with all its treasures of knowledge and consolation. It is with man, as a fallen and guilty being, that it enters into communication; it is the very existence of sin and misery that forms the groundwork of that assistance and comfort which it affords. Acknowledging the infinite wisdom, and power, and goodness of God, it exalts them not into any undue pre-eminence, such as is subversive of the glory of other perfections of the divine nature. To the holiness and justice of God it does infinite homage and reverence; and the vindication of their inalienable claims is the main foundation on which the scheme of redemption rests. From the very moment that the parents of the human race fell into sin, both they and their posterity stood in an altered position with respect to the Creator; and every revelation of his will, which was made in the successive ages of the world, bore a prominent and unvarying reference to the melancholy change which had been introduced. The very first promulgation of the will of God, after the fall, dealt with man as a sinful being; and the original promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent, was but the earliest intimation of a plan for the satisfaction of the holiness and justice of God, which was developed, according to different modes, in the succeeding periods of Old Testament history, and at length received its final accomplishment on the cross of Calvary.

The abandonment, by the Son of the Most High, of all the glory and happiness of the God-head—His taking unto himself a human nature—His submitting to all the pains and sorrows of humanity—His magnifying and honouring the law of God by a perfect obedience—His endurance upon the cross, of the penalty of imputed guilt, in all its intensity, constituted the foundation of the everlasting covenant of grace by which divine mercy is extended to the chief of sinners, consistently with the satisfaction of all the claims of divine justice, and upon a plan by which the interests of the one are reconciled with those of the other. The sufferings which Christ, our blessed Saviour, endured, were the penalty which holiness and justice exacted, on account of original and actual transgression; and in virtue of these sufferings alone could pardon be extended to the guilty. The debt which is due by the sinner is demanded of the holy and righteous Son of God, who, by reason of that sacrifice of infinite value which he offered up, was able to cancel and extinguish it, in behalf of all who believe in his name. Being "justified by faith, they have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ,"—even through the blood of the everlasting covenant. The adorable Son of the Most High, while he satisfied the claims of eternal justice by his sufferings, vindicated the purity and majesty of the law of God by his sinless obedience; and not only is the penalty of guilt remitted to believers, but through the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to them by faith, they are accepted as righteous in the sight of God. Nor is the admirable character of the Gospel revelation less conspicuously displayed in that effectual renovation which it accomplishes, through which the soul, that was once dead in trespasses and sins, is raised to the enjoyment of a new and spiritual life. Saving faith is the gift of God, and in all who believe in the Lord Jesus, the Spirit of the Father dwells. Through his mighty power a vital and effectual change is produced in their souls; they become "new creatures, being born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." They hate sin as dishonourable to Christ; and their faith in him produceth the peaceable fruits of righteousness. The spiritual life advances in their souls; the same divine agent who began the good work, continues to bring it forward until they are sanctified and "sealed unto the day of redemption."

It thus appears that the revelation of the will of God, in the covenant of grace, through our Lord Jesus Christ, is the only true religion which is adapted to the condition of mankind as sinful beings. Any attempt, therefore, to oppose what are unfairly considered the doctrines of natural theology to the truths of revelation, betrays ignorance as well as presumption. However highly the religion of nature may be extolled by some, this is a fact, which can never be too often repeated, that it is essentially and radically defective in its principles, and can, under no possible circumstances, admit of application to the sinful state of human nature. The unavoidable conclusion, therefore, at which we must arrive is, that divine revelation is indispensably necessary for enlightening mankind in the knowledge of spiritual truth, and for opening up to them the only possible mode of salvation, through the blood of a crucified Redeemer.

THE LATTER DAYS OF PRESIDENT EDWARDS.

THE treatment which Mr Edwards had experienced at Northampton, excited a lively interest in his favour on both sides of the Atlantic. His correspondent, Dr Erskine, was exceedingly anxious that he should come to Scotland, but he shrunk from the thought of leaving his country, without an evident call to take such a step; and in the gracious providence of God, events soon occurred which rendered this unnecessary.

Early in December 1750, Mr Edwards received proposals from the church and congregation in Stockbridge, to become their minister; and about the same time similar proposals were made to him by the "Society in London, for Propagating the Gospel in New England, and other parts adjacent," to become the missionary of the Housatonnucks or River Indians. This tribe being at that time located in Stockbridge, and its immediate vicinity, Mr Edwards accepted of both situations, and accordingly removed thither. About this time the Mohawks, and some other tribes, showed a remarkable desire to have their children educated, and, accordingly, were induced to send them to school at Stockbridge. The French having been apprised of the exertions of the English, in behalf of these unenlightened wanderers, wished to enter into a league with them, and immediately adopted every expedient to prevail upon them to emigrate into Canada, so that the time in which Mr Edwards entered on his duties at Stockbridge, was one in which the welfare of the British Colonies was intimately concerned.

It being found impossible to educate the children of the Indians, so long as they were allowed to remain with their parents, commodious boarding schools were erected, and, by the exertions of Mr Edwards, competent teachers were procured, and a regular system of education commenced. To teach the children the English language, Mr Edwards saw was absolutely requisite, their own language being, as he himself states, "extremely barbarous and barren, and very ill fitted for communicating things moral and divine, or even things speculative and abstract." There being no Bible, too, in their own language, made this object one of still greater importance. Diligent and devoted though Mr Edwards was, his labours among the Indians were not crowned with corresponding success. During his residence at Stockbridge, he was accustomed to preach two discourses in the week to the whites, as well as one, by an interpreter, to the Housatonnucks, and one to the Mohawks; and also to catechise, once a-week, the children of each of these classes of individuals. If his success then was small, no one can say that it arose from remissness on his part. In a letter to Mr M'Culloch of Cambuslang, Mr Edwards, in the year 1752, thus states the prospects of the mission:

"The Indian affair, which the last year was attended with so pleasing and glorious a prospect, has since been unspeakably embarrassed, through the particular schemes of certain individuals, who are opposed, in their councils and measures, to the commissioners of the society in London, and are, to their utmost, striving to accomplish their designs in opposition to them, and in this great contest I am looked on as a person not a little obnoxious. They belong to a family of some note, who vigorously abetted and set forward my opposers at Northampton, and were a chief occasion of my removal from that town, to whom my settlement at Stockbridge was very grievous, who now take occasion to exert themselves to the utmost to weaken my interest and influence, and, I have all reason to think, would, if it were possible, undermine me, and procure my removal far hence. Many endeavours have been used to disaffect my people towards me, but all in vain. They are all firmly united to me, excepting the forementioned family. Endeavours have been used also, to disaffect some of the commissioners, but wholly in vain. They seem to have their eyes very wide open, as to their particular designs and schemes, and to the true spring of their opposition. We hope for an end of this lamentable contest before long. But its effects, hitherto, have been very sorrowful, especially with regard to the Mohawks."

Mr Edwards was not allowed to live long in peace, but was exposed to continual opposition and annoyance from the family mentioned in his letter to Mr M'Culloch. In the report for 1752, which was read to the legislature, when Mr Edwards was at the distance of one hundred and fifty miles, many statements and insinuations were made with the obvious purpose of disparaging his character. In a letter which he wrote to head quarters, on the subject, he exposed the motives which actuated those who were bent on his removal, and ably and successfully vindicated his own character.

This was not the last attempt made to have Mr Edwards removed from Stockbridge; but instead of giving them in detail, suffice it to say, that these attempts, instead of injuring his character, only incurred disgrace on his heartless opponents. Mr Edwards, indeed, became more and more firmly established in the good opinions and good wishes of those who took an interest in the success of the mission. But these endless disputes, and the conduct of those opposed to him, though they did not in any way hurt his character, yet produced lamentable effects on the state of the mission. A part of the Mohawks, disgusted at the management of the mission, actually retired, and the rest were threatening to retire to their own country, while the Housatounucks, for the same reasons, refused to have any intercourse with them. Not long after, the rest of the Mohawks, who had manifested exemplary patience under the vexations and embarrassment to which they had been subjected, relinquished their lands and settlements at Stockbridge, and returned finally to their own country.

While his attention was so much taken up with these circumstances, as well as with his other arduous duties, we might well suppose that Mr Edwards found no time for any additional labours. But what is our surprise to find that it was in such a distracting time that Mr Edwards wrote his work on the "Freedom of the Will." And how does it increase our astonishment when we find that it was composed in four months and a-half. Sir Henry Moncreiff, in his life of Dr Erskine, says, "Whatever opinion may be held with regard to Mr Edwards' arguments, it must appear astonishing to those who are capable of appreciating the difficulty of his subject, that in nine months from the date of this letter, (a letter to Dr Erskine, in which Mr Edwards mentioned his having commenced it,) he could write Dr Erskine that he had almost finished the first draft of what he originally intended." It had escaped Sir Henry's notice that Mr Edwards mentioned, in one of these letters, that he had not been able to put pen to paper for more than four months after he had commenced. There is, perhaps, no similar example of power and rapidity united, to be found in the annals of mental exertion. There were many circumstances, however, that ought to be taken into consideration, with regard to Mr Edwards' effort. It was written at a time when, in addition to the duties of a parish, and two distinct Indian missions, he was involved in the perplexities and embarrassments of a furious controversy, the design of which was to deprive himself and family of their daily bread. In such a state of things, and with his mind thus distracted, did Mr Edwards complete his long formed plan, which was at length to cause such mighty changes in the systems of theology, and to force his unwilling opponents themselves to confess that it raised its author to the highest rank among metaphysicians, and entitled the name of Edwards to be handed down with that of a Locke and a Leibnitz.

In July 1754, Mr Edwards had a most severe attack of ague and fever, which lasted until January. As may well be supposed, it wholly disqualified him for writing even to his correspondents, and greatly enfeebled his constitution. In the course of the spring following he commenced two other treatises, the one, "A Dissertation concerning the end for which God created the World," and the other, "A Dissertation concerning the Nature of True Virtue." The war of this year was most disastrous to the colonies, and the frontier settlements, of which Stockbridge was one, were exposed to unceasing anxiety and alarm, from their constant liability to attack from the French and savages. In the autumn, several of the inhabitants of Stockbridge were killed by these marauders, in consequence of which it became a garrisoned town.

In the year following, the danger of the frontiers became extreme, and the friends of Mr Edwards became alarmed for his personal safety. He, however, remained firm at his post, for he trusted in the God of Jacob who hath promised, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee: and through the rivers, they shall not overwhelm thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." It is probable that about this time Mr Edwards commenced his work on Original Sin, and that he devoted the leisure hours of the summer, autumn, and winter, to the preparation of it for the press. Although thus buried in his retreat, far from the busy haunts of life, his talents were not lost to the Christian world. The true Christian, indeed, wherever his lot may be cast, finds some way or other of advancing his Redeemer's kingdom on earth.

In Sept. 1757, Mr Edwards' son-in-law, the Rev. Aaron Burr, president of the college at Princetown, died. Two days after, the convocation of the college met and elected Mr Edwards his successor. The news of his appointment to the presidency was quite unexpected, and was matter of no small astonishment to Mr Edwards, who looked upon himself as in many respects ill qualified for the situation. In a letter which he wrote to the trustees, thanking them for the honour they had done him, he gave a most candid and humble statement of defects which he thought disqualified him for accepting the office. While he was in this state of suspense, he resolved to ask the advice of a number of brethren in the ministry, on whose judgment and friendship he could rely. They met accordingly, and having heard the application of the agents of the college, Mr Edwards' own account of the matter, and the objections of his people to his removal, determined that it was his duty to accept of the invitation to the presidency of the college.

"When they published their judgment and advice to Mr Edwards and his people, he appeared uncommonly moved and affected with it, and fell into tears on the occasion, which was very unusual for him in the presence of others; and soon after, he said to the gentlemen who had given their advice, that it was matter of wonder to him that they could, so easily as they appeared to do, get over the objections he had made against his removal. But as he thought it his duty to be directed by their advice, he should now endeavour cheerfully to undertake it, believing he was in the way of his duty." Accordingly, Mr Edwards set out for Princetown in January, and left his family at Stockbridge, intending to remove them thither in the spring. His arrival at Princetown occasioned the greatest joy in the college. Soon after entering upon his office, he commenced preaching in the college hall, to the great acceptance of his hearers.

"During this time, Mr Edwards seemed to enjoy an uncommon degree of the presence of God. He told his daughters he had once great exercise, concern and fear, relative to his engaging in that business, but since it now appeared, so far as he could see, that he was called of God to that place and work, he did cheerfully devote himself to it, leaving himself and the event with God, to order what seemed to him good."

The smallpox was then raging in Princetown, and Mr Edwards, by the advice of his physician, was inoculated. The symptoms seemed favourable, and, to human observation, all danger seemed over. But God's ways are not as our ways; we know not what a day may bring forth. A secondary fever commenced, and, on account of a number of pustules in the throat, the obstruction was such, that the medicines necessary to check the fever could not be administered. All hope was at an end, and he himself was sensible that the hour of his departure was at hand. He called his daughter to his bedside, and addressed her as follows:—

"Dear Lucy,—It seems to me to be the will of God: that I must shortly leave you, therefore, give my kindest love to my dear wife, and tell her that the uncommon union which has so long subsisted between us, has been of such a nature, as, I trust, is spiritual, and therefore will continue for ever, and I hope she will be supported under so great a trial, and submit cheerfully to the will of God. And as to my children, you are now like to be left fatherless, which, I hope, will be an inducement to you all, to seek a Father who will never fail you."

He said but little in his sickness, but shewed the greatest patience and resignation:—

"Just at the close of life, as some persons who stood by, expecting he would breathe his last in a few minutes, were lamenting his death, not only as a great frown on the college, but as having a dark aspect on the interests of religion in general, to their surprise, not imagining that he heard, or ever would speak another word, he said, 'Trust in God, and ye need not fear.' Having said this, he fell asleep; and his unfettered spirit winged its way to that higher world, where 'they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.'

"Servant of God, well done!
Rest from thy loved employ,
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy."

The physician who attended him in his illness thus writes to Mrs Edwards:—

"Never did any mortal man more fully and clearly evidence the sincerity of all his professions by one continued universal, calm, cheerful resignation, and patient submission to the divine will, through every stage of his disease, than he; not so much as one discontented expression, nor the least appearance of murmuring, through the whole. And never did any person expire with more perfect freedom from pain; not so much as one distorted hair, but, in the most proper sense of the words, he fell asleep. Death had certainly lost its sting as to him."

The accounts of her husband's death reached Mrs Edwards when she was in a very feeble state of health, but though it was evident to all around that she felt her loss, yet her conduct called forth their admiration rather than pity. She did not, however, long survive her husband; she died in September the same year, at Philadelphia, whither she had gone on a visit, and her remains were conveyed to Princetown. Within the short space of one year were laid, side by side, in the grave, his son-in-law, Mr Edwards himself, his daughter, and his wife. Not many months before, some of them were distant from one another not less than one hundred and fifty miles: they "were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their deaths they were not divided."

Such are the chief incidents in the life of Mr Edwards. We cannot, however, conclude without taking a glance, however cursory, at his character as a private Christian, as a preacher, and as a writer.

As a private Christian, few have equalled, and still fewer surpassed Mr Edwards in perseverance in well-doing, in close walking with God. The glory of his Maker was the chief end for which he lived, and his whole trust was placed on the God of Jacob, with whom he maintained the most open and confidential intercourse. If to cherish the most exalted views of Christ and his salvation; if to have no separate interest from that of the Redeemer; if to exercise a filial and delightful sense of dependence on the Holy Spirit, for the daily communication of grace; if to regard communion with God as the very life and sustenance of the soul; if to delight in perusing God's Word, and singing his praises in public and private; if to observe frequent days of fasting to discourse, and repent of, and renounce sin; if to maintain a constant warfare against sin and temptation; if to converse daily and familiarly with death and judgment; if to acknowledge the divine hand in all the events of life; if to exhibit a calm and sweet submission to the divine will under every trial; if to live with God from day to day, and from hour to hour, so as to be habitually conscious of his presence; if to converse with Him, as a Father, concerning infirmities, and sins, and dangers, and duties, and trials, and sorrows, and prospects, constitute a true Christian; then, undoubtedly, Jonathan Edwards was a saint indeed.

Mr Edwards so observed the Sabbath as to make it a day of real religion, so that he not only strictly conformed his conversation and reading to the great designs of its institution, but did not allow himself to indulge in any thoughts not of a decidedly religious character. He was accustomed to search the Scriptures daily, and to study them so perseveringly, as to perceive his knowledge of them gradually increasing. As to his private devotion, of course we cannot speak, but if the devotions of the closet exercise a powerful influence on the occupations of the day; and if we may judge from his daily conduct, we will be constrained to confess that they were not neglected. Indeed, it is impossible that any man could have done what Jonathan Edwards did, and borne what Jonathan Edwards suffered, and with the same calm resignation, without being much in prayer. His diary, however, throws a little light on this part of his character, and from it, it would appear, that, like the Psalmist, he was in the habit of calling on the name of his God at morning, at evening, and at noon. His self-examination was regular and searching. Every morning he endeavoured to foresee and guard against the dangers of the day. Every night he carefully reviewed the conduct of the day, inquiring carefully in what he might have acted better, and keeping an account of every thing in which he had done wrong. This record he reviewed at the end of the week, month, and year, that he might know his own condition, and humbly confess his sins before God.

Like every true Christian, Mr Edwards considered the poor, and was extremely liberal to the distressed. The ministers of Christ have much more in their power, and do really much more for the poor, than many generally suppose. Though in many cases unable to contribute much in money, yet, like Peter, such as they have they give. They exert a wide influence, and by recommending to their hearers liberality to the poor, they contribute largely indeed. And thus did Mr

Edwards; he insisted much on private beneficence, both in his sermons and in familiar conversation.

It has often been remarked of Mr Edwards, that he was very reserved. This may to a certain extent be admitted. "He possessed," says his biographer, "but a small stock of animal life; his spirits were low, and he had neither the vivacity nor strength of lungs to spare, that would have been requisite in order to render him what might be called an affable, sprightly companion, in all circles." To his intimate friends, however, he was very different; to them he was always free of access, kind and condescending; and though not talkative, yet affable and free.

"His conversation with his friends was always savoury and profitable: in this he was remarkable, and almost singular. He was not accustomed to spend his time with them in evil speaking, or foolish jesting, idle chit-chat, and telling stories; but his mouth was that of the just, which bringeth forth wisdom, and whose lips dispense knowledge. His tongue was as the pen of a ready writer; while he conversed about heavenly and divine things, of which his heart was so full, in a manner so new and original, so natural and familiar, as to be most entertaining and instructive, so that none of his friends could enjoy his company without instruction and profit, unless it was by their own fault."

In his family Mr Edwards was truly beloved, and like Abraham of old, he ruled his house well. He maintained an uninterrupted affection and esteem for his amiable consort. He was accustomed frequently to converse with her on matters of religion, and used to pray with her at least once a-day. He took a most fatherly concern in the affairs of his children, and by accustoming them to the yoke in their youth, produced ever after a cheerful and willing obedience. He took opportunity to converse with them separately about the concerns of their souls, and warned, exhorted, and directed them as occasion required. In family worship, he was most regular and conscientious, and was accustomed to question his children on that portion of the Scriptures which was read, and to explain any obscure passages in it, and enforce the duties therein recommended. On the Saturday evenings, he observed a custom, which distinguished the good old times of our own country, viz., to call his family together, to join in praising God and praying to him, as a fit introduction to the sanctification of the Sabbath. However delightful it might be, our limits will not permit us to dwell any longer on this part of Mr Edwards' character. Suffice it to say, in the words of one who knew him well: "The humility, modesty and serenity of his behaviour, much endeared him to his acquaintance, and made him appear amiable in the eyes of such as had the privilege of conversing with him.—The several relations sustained by him, he adorned with exemplary fidelity; and was solicitous to fill every station with its proper duty.—In his private walk as a Christian, he appeared an example of truly rational, consistent, uniform religion and virtue; a shining instance of the power and efficacy of that holy faith, to which he was so firmly attached, and of which he was so zealous a defender."

As a preacher, Mr Edwards, during his lifetime, acquired a very high character. Often, when deeply impressed with his subject, he discoursed for hours, and yet his hearers were sorry when he concluded. He used frequently, when at Northampton, to go to distant parts of the country to preach, and in many cases, his discourses produced remarkable effects. One of these instances is thus mentioned:—

"When they went into the meeting-house, the appearance of the assembly was thoughtless and vain. The people hardly conducted themselves with common decency. The Rev. Mr Edwards, of Northampton, preached; and before the sermon was ended, the assembly appeared deeply impressed, and bowed down with an awful conviction of their sin and danger. There was such a breathing of distress and weeping, that the preacher was obliged to speak to the people and desire silence, that he might be heard. This was the commencement of a general and powerful revival of religion."

The remarkable effects of Mr Edwards' preaching, was not owing to any of the customary arts of eloquence, or to any oratorical gesture. His voice was weak and languid, his style had no claims to elegance or even to neatness, and his matter was plain and familiar, but his sermons were tinged with the deep and pervading solemnity of his mind. He had, at all times, a solemn consciousness of the presence of God, as every look and action showed. He had, too, a knowledge of the human heart and of its operations, which has been seldom equalled. His knowledge enabled him to speak home to the heart, and his hearers felt that he told them all things that ever they did, and, like the woman of Samaria, reasoned that he came from God. His whole desire was that what he said might be the means of saving souls, and he brought all the powers of his mind, and all the feelings of his heart to his assistance. He spoke because he believed, he felt what he preached to be true, and he spoke from experience. The following is the testimony of an American divine on the subject:—

"If you mean, by eloquence, what is usually intended by it in our cities, he had no pretensions to it. He had no studied varieties of the voice, and no strong emphasis. He scarcely gestured, or even moved; and he made no attempt, by the elegance of his style, or the beauty of his pictures, to gratify the taste, and fascinate the imagination. But, if you mean by eloquence, the power of presenting an important truth before an audience, with overwhelming weight of argument, and with such intensity of feeling, that the whole soul of the speaker is thrown into every part of the conception and delivery, so that the solemn attention of the whole audience is rivetted, from the beginning to the close, and impressions are left that cannot be effaced, Mr Edwards was the most eloquent man I ever heard speak."

But the grand secret of Mr Edwards' success is this, that though he planted and watered, God gave the increase. He was a man of prayer, and daily realised the presence of the Comforter, who blessed his exertions, and made him the instrument by which he should add to the church such as should be saved.

As a writer, Mr Edwards is well known, and has been acknowledged, even by his opponents, to hold a very high rank. In defending the doctrines of Scripture, and in elucidating their truths, he stands unrivalled. In argument he forces conviction upon the reader, and, as if in triumph, continues to argue long after all necessity for it has vanished. "The gordian knots of sophistry, which had so long perplexed and confounded divines, he untied fold by fold." He followed error through her misty windings, exposed her claims to the homage of man, and boldly and strenuously asserted the rights of truth, and obtained for her that honour of which she had so long been robbed.

"He eyed afar
Philosophy upon her steepest height,
And with bold step and resolute attempt,
Pursued her to the innermost recess,
Where thrond' in light, she sits the Queen of Truth."

His grand distinguishing characteristic as an author, is his fervent uncompromising love of truth. He had no favourite preconceived notions, he searched Scripture for the greater part of his philosophy, and when to throw light on any portion of it was his aim, he did it not by keeping back any passages bearing on the subject, but allowed each to have its due prominence. His writings are all tinged with his piety, and owe to this many of their charms. "Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh."

But, to conclude. For gigantic powers of mind, for intense piety, for true moral greatness, it is not easy to find his equal. No one can study his life, or his character, without being convinced that he was indeed a great man. Splendid talents, unaccompanied by virtue and moral worth, render a man rather an object of pity than of admiration. For let him take the highest flight he can, we can still retort upon him the accusation that the chief end of his existence is yet to be fulfilled. What a bright and lovely halo does vital religion shed around the memory of the great in intellect! It is this that constitutes Mr Edwards' claims to greatness. In whatever aspect we view him, we have an object of admiration—whether as a philosopher or a Christian,—as a theologian, clad in the bright armour of truth, and fighting the battles of the faith—of a diligent, devoted, and successful labourer in his Master's vineyard. His praise is in the Church of Christ, and there his name shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Among the learned, too, his name shall be revered so long as profound reasoning has any charms. If we search the ranks of the high in intellect, where shall we find his superior; or among the names of the faithful shepherds of Christ's flock, where one more devoted; or among the many and bright names of those who have followed the steps of their Redeemer, where one more persevering, more watchful, or more humble than he? And how does it increase our admiration to behold him descending from the heights of science, and instilling into the minds of Indian children the lessons of heavenly wisdom!

"Oh! I would walk
A weary journey, to the farthest verge
Of the big world, to kiss that good man's hand,
Who in the blaze of wisdom and of art,
Preserves a lowly mind, and to his God,
Feeling a sense of his own littleness,
Is as a child in meek simplicity."

Greatness and humility are alike compatible with, yea, they are the fruits of, genuine piety. By the magic spell of Christianity the lion and the lamb lie down together, and all that is exalted and noble in intellect, is combined with the most heartfelt humility. Lo, these are the triumphs of the cross!

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,
Minister of Cramond.

NO. II.

"Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee, and thou shalt tread upon their high places."—Deut. xxxiii. 29.

THESE words of Moses represent the nation of Israel as distinguished above all the nations of the earth, in regard to God's gracious interposition in delivering them out of the hands of all their enemies. And this distinction has been plainly intimated to us in Scripture, as has been shown. Some of the important purposes that were to be answered by this arrangement, so far as the Scriptures throw light upon the subject, have also been mentioned. And these things will be still further illustrated in the course of setting before our readers an outline of the history of this people, as it may be collected from the Scriptures. The most interesting period of their history is yet future, namely, that state of great outward prosperity and great spiritual enjoyment to which they shall be exalted, when they are again gathered from all the countries whither they have been scattered, and finally established in their own land. To this period the passage quoted from Deuteronomy does principally refer. For although there may have been a partial fulfilment of it in some of those signal deliverances which God hath already wrought for the nation of Israel, yet these deliverances were only the pledges and types of a more complete deliverance to be wrought for them out of the hands of all their enemies at a future period. Here our only guide is the light of prophecy—and happily, the prophets have furnished us with much information with regard to the final destinies of this people. It is a subject on which they seem to dwell with delight: their souls kindle into rapture: they tune their harps to loftier strains of heavenly melody: they call upon all nature around them to participate in their joy. The wilderness and the solitary place are called upon to be glad, and the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose. But what the prophets have foretold of that glorious period will be better understood by tracing the history of the nation of Israel from the beginning.

The whole history of Israel may be comprehended in seven periods; each of them being marked by signal interpositions of Providence, and a very remarkable change in their circumstances.

The first period of their history includes the time from the call of Abraham, which may be termed the laying the foundation of the nation; the time of the patriarchs' sojourning as strangers in the land of Canaan; the time of Israel's sojourning in Egypt, and being under the oppressive bondage of Pharaoh; and the time of their deliverance from the land of Egypt and from the house of bondage, by the mighty hand of God, under the guidance of Moses, the Lord's servant. This first period includes a space of about 460 years.

The second period is their sojourning in the wilderness. In this period was the giving of the law from Mount Sinai; the erecting of the tabernacle, with the appointment of all the institutions of the ceremonial law; God's gracious presence with them, by the symbol of the pillar of cloud by day, and pillar of fire by night, with many other signs and wonders, both of judgment and mercy, and their establishment in the land of Canaan, after subduing their enemies, under Joshua, the captain of the Lord's hosts. This was a period of 40 years.

The third period includes their residence in Canaan, first, under Judges, then under Kings, of whom David and Solomon were the most distinguished. The dismemberment of the kingdom into the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, in the time of Rehoboam and Jeroboam; the carrying away captive first the ten tribes, composing the kingdom of Israel, and afterwards the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, that constituted the kingdom of Judah, who were carried to Babylon. This period consists of upwards of 600 years.

The fourth period consists of their state of captivity at Babylon for 70 years. This was a dark time in their history; when they hung all their harps upon the willows by the rivers of Babylon, and wept, when they remembered Zion. But it was instructive; and the gloom was alleviated by the promise of deliverance, and by the joy of their return to their own land. "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dreamed. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing: then said they among the heathen, the Lord hath done great things for them. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

The fifth period consists of their establishment in their own land, after the Babylonish captivity under Ezra and Nehemiah, and the ministry of the latter prophets. It includes also that long dark period from the time of Malachi to the coming of Christ, that was lightened only by a short-lived revival under the Maccabees. It includes also the time of Christ's sojourning on earth, the ministry of his apostles, and the destruction of the temple and of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the whole nation by the Roman armies. This was a period of upwards of 600 years.

The sixth period includes their history from that time to this day, and on to their final ingathering to their land. This is the longest and darkest night that they have yet passed through. It has already lasted for nearly 1800 years, and how long it may yet last it is not for us to say. It may however be hoped that the greater part, by far, of this long night is now over. The faint dawn of the morning seems now to be breaking in; a morning that shall usher in the brightest day that has ever shone upon Zion hill and Salem's towers and palaces.

The seventh period consists of their re-establishment in their own land, under the happy reign of Messiah. This is indeed their seventh period—their Sabbath of rest, and peace, and joy. Yea, it shall be the jubilee of all the earth, when the nations shall be blessed in Christ, and when all nations shall call Him blessed. This period consists of 1000 years, and brings down the history of Israel to the final and general judgment; the consummation of the great work of redemption, when the top-stone shall be put upon the glorious fabric, with shoutings of, "Grace, grace unto it.—Amen."

1. Even from the rapid glance that has thus been taken of the history of the nation of Israel, it must be evident that there is something very remarkable, wonderful, and interesting about that people. Their history may be traced from their commencement to the end of time. Of no other nation under heaven can this be said. The origin of other nations is involved in obscurity and fable—and in their progress they come to be mingled with other nations, so that the nations of antiquity are lost in more modern nations that have sprung out of them. But here is a nation that, amidst all the changes and revolutions of other nations, and amidst all the vicissitudes which they themselves have undergone, remain still the same nation, and will do so to the end of time. Can we fail to discern herein the doing of the Lord, and it is marvellous in our eyes?

2. The history of the nation of Israel should be the more interesting to us, because it is given by the pen of inspiration. The histories of other nations are given us by fallible men; and, while they contain much valuable information, yet they have many errors and false statements; and particularly, may often be mistaken when they attempt to trace events to their causes, and to unfold the motives by which the principal actors have been influenced. But in the history of this nation every thing is stated in a strict accordance with truth, and we are let into the true springs and motives of men's conduct by Him who knows perfectly the hearts of all men. And, further, we may be assured not only that every thing is correctly stated, but stated in the way that in the wisdom of God was best calculated to promote our improvement—to make us wise unto salvation.

3. The history of the nation of Israel should be farther interesting to us, when we consider that the history of the other nations of the earth stands intimately connected with its history. The rise or fall of the greatest empires in the world, it will be found, has a peculiar reference to this people. They have been raised to be a scourge to them, and they have fallen in the controversy of Zion. "I am the Lord thy God, the holy one of Israel, thy Saviour. I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life." And, again, it is written, "Shall the prey be taken from the mighty, or the lawful captive delivered? But thus saith the Lord, even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away, and the prey of the terrible shall be delivered: for I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children, and I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine: and all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour, and thy Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob."

THE SAVIOUR'S URGENT CALL:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. D. PITCAIRN,
Minister of Ewie and Rendall, Orkney.

"Behold, I stand at the door and knock."—REV. iii. 20.

THESE are the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Head of the Church. They form part of the address which the Apostle John was instructed to write to the angel of the Church of Laodicea, and, through him, to all the members of that professedly Christian community. And we think that, under any circumstances, they are calculated to produce a very serious and solemn impression. But when we reflect on those particular circumstances of the Laodicean Church, which led to such an expression of watchful interest on the part of the Saviour, we can never sufficiently admire the long-suffering forbearance and patience which are here blended with a warning at once so alarming and so affectionate.

We learn from history that the idolatrous city of Laodicea had been visited by the apostles of our Lord at an early period, and that the preaching of the Gospel among its inhabitants had been accompanied with such an effectual blessing, that a large and flourishing Church was speedily planted. For a series of years, those who embraced the profession of Christianity, manifested its sanctifying power in a becoming walk and conversation. But the very privileges they enjoyed, and the attainments in the knowledge and obedience of the truth to which, by divine grace, they had reached, gradually fostered a spirit of pride and self-confidence, and subverted that spirit of humble and thankful dependance on the God of their salvation, which was both their duty and their strength. And when the work of spiritual declension had once begun, it advanced with such rapid steps, that before half a century had elapsed, the members of this Church, at first so promising and so prosperous, sunk into that state of lukewarmness, which, of all other states, is the most delusive and dangerous. It is recorded to their shame, that, in the service of Christ, they were neither cold nor hot. They were neither the avowed enemies nor the decided friends of Him whose name they bore. But although the genuine spirit of devotion had evaporated, they still fancied that all was well with them, because they had not renounced the outward forms of Christianity. And placing an undue reliance on their gifts and on their advantages, they said that they "were rich, and increased in goods, and stood in need of nothing," while He, who viewed their condition with an unerring eye, declares that they were "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

And yet in the case of these apostate Laodiceans, we see that he is reluctant to abandon them, notwithstanding the neglect and the provocations he had received at their hand. Although they had perversely withdrawn from his service, and expelled him from that highest place in their affections, to which he was entitled, he does not cease to desire their truest welfare, nor to expostulate with them on their ingratitude and guilt. In the strong and touching language of the text, he reminds them that his omniscient eye was upon them, that he was thoroughly acquainted with all their conduct, and that their real characters lay naked and open to his view,—“Behold, I stand at the door.” Surely an announcement like this was admirably fitted to rouse them from their spiritual lethargy, and to convince them of their spiritual danger, to dispel their treacherous hopes, and to give energy to those fears which had been studiously suppressed. The very idea of that Saviour being so near to them, whose grace they had perverted, and whose goodness they had despised, was enough to smite them with remorse, and to excite the most painful upbraidings of conscience. But when their neglected Saviour not merely announced that he stood at the door as an exile, but added that still he “knocked” for admission to those hearts which were his rightful residence, and where he was entitled to expect a joyful welcome, and a cordial homage, this was, above all, calculated to melt them into penitence, and to rekindle the fire of love to him who thus lamented their spiritual declension, and longed for their spiritual recovery. “Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me.”

But if it was true in reference to the Church of Laodicea, that our Lord Jesus Christ stood at the door and knocked, and if the consideration of this truth affects our hearts, it becomes us to remember that the same is true in reference to ourselves, and this should affect us still more deeply. For when it is solemnly commanded at the close of the epistle, “he that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches,” we are hereby summoned, by the highest authority, to regard the admonitions, and reproofs, and warnings, originally addressed to the seven Asiatic Churches, as addressed to each individual, in every age, and in every country, who professes to believe the Gospel, and who is called by the name of Christ.

Is it, then, really the case, that the Lord, who once shed his blood on Calvary for the remission of our sins, but who is now exalted at the right hand of the Father, far above all principalities and powers, still casts upon us a watchful eye, and says to any of us, “Behold, I stand at the door and knock?” Yes, my friends, this is true; and would we only realize this truth, it might fill many amongst us with alarm, or with self-abasement, or with that godly sorrow which worketh repentance not to be repented of. As a Church, we do not exactly resemble the people to whom the words of our text were specially addressed, a people of whom the Omniscient Saviour had not one word to utter in the way of commendation. As a Christian community, we are not sunk into the same deplorable condition of universal apathy and lukewarmness. Blessed be God! we can look to a few whose hearts are warm with his love, and whose lives are devoted to his service. But whilst it is too true that there are always to be found many professing Christians, who are in a declining state, there are also many others, alas! how many, who have nothing more, and who never had anything more, of Christianity than the empty name. These persons, living in the enjoyment of frequent opportunities of public worship and religious instruction, and perhaps even partaking of the holy sacraments of the Church, are apt to flatter themselves that they are “rich, and increased in goods, and stand in need of nothing;” whereas it is painfully evident that, as yet, they are ignorant of their own spiritual poverty and wretchedness, and destitute of any participation in the unsearchable riches of Christ—those durable riches which alone can satisfy the wants of an immortal soul.

Now, dear brethren, as it cannot be denied that, in our own favoured land, there is at present a wide-spread Christian profession, and very much activity, so far as concerns the mere externals of religion, it is of the utmost importance that you should be guarded against the danger of resting in a form of godliness, to the exclusion or denial of its power; and, therefore, we should wish that all of you gave earnest heed to the monitory voice which speaks to you in the faithful and affecting language of the text, “Behold, I stand at the door and knock.” We think these solemn words, coming from the lips of a loving but neglected Saviour, can scarcely fail to occasion some misgivings in the stoutest, and some relents in the hardest, heart. They force upon your attention the alarming fact, that He who will ere long be your righteous Judge, is even now the constant spectator of all your actions; although you see him not, he is at the door; and they testify against you, whatever profession you make, that he still stands without. He has not been admitted to that place in your affections which none else deserves to occupy. And if you spend a thought on the dignity of his person, on the wonders of his love towards you, and on the magnitude of the blessings with which he desires to enrich you, O how deeply humbled should you be on account of the thoughtless, or, it may be, scornful contempt with which you have hitherto treated the God of your salvation, and of the injury you have done to yourselves in excluding such a blessed, and blessing, friend from your hearts!

But there is yet another view of the subject on which we would have you to dwell, and that is, the attitude of forgiving and beseeching importunity in which the compassionate Saviour still recommends himself to your regards. He is unwilling to give you up to your own infatuated waywardness. Notwithstanding your misimprove-ment of the manifold advantages he has conferred upon you, and your sinful indifference to his dying love, and to his holy injunctions; notwithstanding your wilful rejection of the grace which has often been offered, but never accepted; or your marked declension from the grace which would have been continued, had it not been abused; notwithstanding your blinded attachment to the things of the world, your headlong perseverance in the ways of sin, and your provoking disregard for the holiness of his character, for the honour of being numbered with his friends, and for the happiness of enjoying his favour; notwithstanding all these indignities and provocations, he is reluctant to leave you to perish in your sins. He sees, he pities, he laments the career of folly and of guilt you have so long pursued, and, in tenderest mercy, he reminds you that still he stands at the door and knocks, not as yet with the sword of justice in his hand to execute the threatened sentence of condemnation, but as an Almighty Saviour, ready to dispense a generous pardon, and anxious to deliver you from the wrath to come. And he continues standing and knocking, not for the mere purpose of disturbing your deceitful peace, or filling your minds with needless fears, but that you may be persuaded at last to listen to his affectionate entreaties, and no longer to sin away the time of your merciful visitation. O what a wondrous manifestation is this of divine forbearance and love! Instead of leaving you to solicit the inestimable blessings of sin forgiven; and of reconciliation with God,—blessings which you so much need, blessings which none save himself can bestow, and blessings which it behoves you to seek with a ceaseless importunity,—he himself comes, offering what you will not deign to ask, and urging on your acceptance, as a free gift, what you are neither able to procure, nor worthy to receive. Surely the consideration of treatment so condescending and kind, would you only consider it, is calculated to subdue your impenitence, and to win you to the love and to the obedience of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We therefore beseech you, with all earnestness, to hearken to the merciful warning of the text—a warning which not only has respect to your own perilous condition, and bids you instantly awake from your spiritual slumbers, but which also has respect to Him who gives it, and exhibits his character in a point of view so very encouraging and endearing. We beseech you to believe it as an unquestionable truth that, to all of you who have not already received the Saviour, and are resting upon him alone for salvation, the words of the text are as pointedly directed as they were to the lukewarm Laodiceans. And if this fact really is believed, we are convinced that none of you, without some strong emotion, can hear your redeeming God declare, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

It is possible that some of you may palliate your indifference about spiritual things, and your disobedience to the heavenly voice, under the idea that the Lord Jesus Christ does not actually address himself to you in the language of warning or of invitation. Now, in order to shew the fallacy of this idea, we would put the question,—On what grounds do you imagine that you are excluded from the Saviour's compassion, or placed beyond the reach of his notice? Perhaps you rashly conclude, that He who is now enthroned in celestial majesty, receiving the homage of angels and of saints, cannot stoop to take an interest in you; and that amidst the immensity of his concerns as the Head of the Church, and the head over all things for the Church, it is not to be expected that he will make your particular circumstances the object of his attention. Ah! my friends, is not this excuse nothing else than the dictate of pride, under the specious garb of humility? Were you truly humble, you never could regard yourselves, in any one respect, or at any one moment, as independent of "Him who upholdeth all things by the word of his power." And did you sincerely desire or intend to honour the Saviour, you would not dare to harbour in your minds an idea so derogatory to his omnipresence, as to suppose that he ever overlooks any one, even the meanest of his creatures,—an idea so contrary to all that he hath said and done, as to suppose that in the exercise of unwearied mercy, he does not mourn over every sinner, who will not come unto him and live. What was it but his intimate acquaintance with the circumstances of its self-righteous and self-devoted inhabitants, that drew from him such a pathetic lamentation over Jerusalem? And what was it but their determined rejection of himself and of all his proffered grace, that brought tears to his eyes as he beheld the city? Say not, the Saviour was then tabernacled on the earth as a man, and holding personal intercourse with those who were the objects of his observation and pity. He carried with him to heaven the same knowledge of human character, and the same feelings towards the human race. And it was long after his ascension that the epistles to the Asiatic Churches were dictated by him, every one of which furnishes us with irrefragable proof, not only of the exact and ceaseless watchfulness which he exercises over every Church and over each individual member, but likewise how thoroughly he searches the hearts, and understands the whole affairs of men. O! do not give place to self-deception. For although you can neither look upon Christ with your bodily eyes, nor listen to him with your bodily ears; yet, every time you read or hear his blessed Gospel you may, and you ought, to realise his presence with you;—you may, and ought, to consider what you read or hear, as expressly addressed to yourselves. Believe, then, that even at this moment, the ever-present and all-merciful Saviour says unto you:—"Behold I stand at the door and knock."

But, it is far from being improbable that there may be persons amongst us who attempt not formally to deny that the Lord Jesus Christ inspects all the Churches with an omniscient eye, and condescends to speak to every individual. This much they profess to believe, and so far with their lips at least, they honour the Saviour. But how sadly do they dishonour him, and how inconsistently do they act, if they nevertheless continue unawed by his presence, and regardless of his admonitions! And why is it so with many? Why is it that you will not listen to the Saviour's warning voice?—that you will not yield to his gracious entreaties?—that you do not admire the exceeding riches of his grace?—that you do not open wide the door of your hearts for his welcome reception? O! my friends, consider well. Is the Son of God unworthy to be your guest? Or, are the forgiveness of sins, the favour of God, and a place in the heavenly kingdom, of such trifling importance, that their possession should cause you no anxiety? Some of you, perhaps, are so self-righteous as to conceive, that to you the warning of the text is inapplicable,—that you are regular in the performance of moral and religious duties, and circumspect in the whole of your deportment,—that you stand upon vantage ground when compared with others around you;—in fact, that you are spiritually rich and increased in goods, and that on these accounts you need neither the inspection nor the reproof of your Lord. This is pride without any disguise. But in your hours of sober reflection, surely you cannot think so highly of yourselves, and so meanly of Him with whom you have to deal, as ever to imagine that your imperfect services are commensurate with the requirements of the divine law, or that your shortcomings are so insignificant that they will escape the divine displeasure. The warning of the text is indeed to you most necessary. For whilst you remain so satisfied with your own doings, rest assured that the Saviour has no place in your heart. He stands outside the door, but O! be thankful that still he knocks for admission; and be persuaded no longer to resist his entreaties, lest he abandon you for ever.

THE BOMBAY MISSION.

A BRANCH OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INDIA MISSION.

THE following account of the operations of the Rev. Dr Wilson, Bombay, is given in a letter addressed to the Rev. Dr Brunton, dated 28th Nov. 1836. It contains a detailed and very interesting view of the indefatigable exertions, during last year, of that truly devoted missionary:—

I. The services of the mission, in the native languages, are highly important. Every morning my domestics, and as many other persons as I can get to attend me, are assembled for the perusal of the Scriptures, and interrogation as to their meaning; and exhortation and prayer. In the evenings, when my health and other duties permit, I preach the glad tidings of salvation in those situations in the city in which large and attentive audiences can be procured, and in which such interruptions as are to be regretted seldom occur. On Sabbaths, I have two catechetical exercises; one for the benefit of the more advanced children attending the Maráthí and Gujaráthí schools; and one for the members of the native Church, and those who may be proposing to join their communion; and two diets of public preaching.

One of these, in the lecture-room of the mission, is well attended by various classes of Heathens and Muhamadans; and the other is the means of the instruction of two native poor's asylums founded by the benevolence of the Bombay community. On Thursday evenings, I preside at a meeting of the converts and inquirers, for prayer and the study of the Scriptures, which is found highly beneficial for their advancement in Christian knowledge and experience. On Saturday afternoons, the teachers of the schools are examined on the more difficult subjects on which they give instruction during the week. By all these means, and by the abundant circulation of books, a knowledge of Christianity is very extensively diffused; much inquiry is excited; many prejudices are weakened; and convictions, some of which have issued, and others, it is to be hoped, will issue, in conversion, are produced. Rejoiced am I to have the fullest approbation of the Assembly's committee in reference to these operations, and the expression of their earnest hope that they may be continued. If God give me health, and strength, and opportunity, this hope will never be disappointed; and if that blessing which the promises of God, and present appearances lead us to anticipate, be communicated, it will be a hope which will not need to be ashamed.

II. In the schools in which the native languages are taught, there is an attendance of 811 persons; of whom 619 are boys, and 192 are girls. In the conducting of these humble, but, as far as the diffusion of Christian knowledge, the improvement of native society in general, and the probability of ultimate conversion to God, are concerned, most important institutions, I enjoy the assistance of one of the converts, whose zeal and judgment afford me much satisfaction. I hope to be soon able, having placed some of the most promising pupils in the English school for a superior education, to furnish them with teachers of greater ability than those who are at present connected with them; and to get some cheap erections prepared for them in different parts of the city, in which the scholars will have better accommodations than those which they now enjoy, and in which I may conveniently assemble the parents when they are inclined, as they frequently are, to attend the regular examinations, and to listen to the exhortations which follow them. The female schools are all under my own eye, being located within the mission premises. The instruction of the more advanced classes is often advantageously accomplished when they are together.

III. While I yield to no individual in India in my sense of the necessity of ministering in the vernacular languages, the grand medium for the instruction of the millions of the people, I am no less decidedly convinced of the solemn duty of officiating in English, the medium through which the higher classes of the natives in this town are in general most accessible, and in which indefinite stores of knowledge can most easily be communicated to them and others, connected with all the branches of science and theology. On the assurance which I have on this subject, I endeavour faithfully to act, both in the English school and in the mission-house. I conduct two regular services weekly in the latter place, one of which is a lecture on the propagation of Christianity. I have gone regularly over the Acts of the Apostles, comparing them with the Epistles; and have analysed, and familiarly commented on, the information found on the subject of my discourse in the writings of the apostolical Fathers, and the Apologies of Justin Martyr and Tertullian.

IV. The operations of the mission connected with the press have been very considerable during the past year; and I trust that, through the divine blessing, they will not be without beneficial effects among the people. The Second Exposure of Hinduism in Maráthí, in reply to Núrúya Ráo of Sátará, forming 166 pages, and of which 1500 copies were printed, was published about the beginning of the year. Many copies of it have been purchased by the natives, or presented to them by European friends anxious to arouse them to inquiry as to the nature of those unhallowed speculations, and polluting superstitions, of which they have so long been the dupes, and of which, if they forsake them not from the convictions of their heart, enlivened by truth and the Divine Spirit, they will infallibly be the victims. The work, as well as that which preceded it on the subject of which it treats, is in the course of being translated into the Hindavi by one of the London Society's missionaries at Banáras; and applications have been made for copies of it for translation into two other Indian dialects—a circumstance which marks the kind feelings of my fellow-labourers of different denominations of Christians zealously seeking the conversion of this great country. My reply to Hájí Muhammad Hásham in Persian, embracing a pretty full discussion of the points at issue between Christians and Musalmáns, has within these few weeks been published by the Bombay Tract and Book Society. It forms a pamphlet of 112 pages; and the edition consists of 2000 copies, which are getting rapidly into circulation, both in India and Persia. I have completed the publication of most of the Maráthí MSS. left by my dear wife. The expense of printing them has been generously defrayed by the Hon. J. Farish. They consist principally of abridgments of Rollin's Ancient History of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, Medes and Persians, and Grecians, and notices of the fulfilment of prophecy respecting some of the people now mentioned, principally from the excellent work of Dr Keith, and Devotional Exercises prepared for the benefit of the converts. Besides the works now mentioned, various Maráthí Tracts have been printed at the lithographic press of the mission, which is now in excellent order, and admirably adapted to the Oriental languages.

All the publications in Maráthí and Portuguese, &c., of the Tract and Book Society, I have edited during the past year. I have also edited several portions of Scripture for the Bible Society, of whose Maráthí and Sujaráthí Translation committees I am the secretary, and in connection with which I have spent not a little time in the revision and criticism of several pieces of composition. A few tracts I have edited for Christian friends. Nothing but the absolute necessity of my engagements with the press, and my ardent hope of their great productiveness, could reconcile me to them. It is not necessary for me to say any thing more respecting certain literary papers which I have been lately called to print or prepare, than that I have had the moral improvement of the country in view when engaged in the inquiries in which they have originated.

V. I formerly directed your attention to the admission of two young Hindú females into the visible Church. I have now the pleasure of informing you, that on Sabbath the 20th of this month, I was privileged to baptize other two Hindús, a man aged 26 years, and his wife aged 17 years. They are of humble caste, but of respectable character, and quite able and willing to support themselves by their honest industry. The husband was brought under serious impressions during my tour in Gujarát and Rach, having been engaged by me to aid in carrying books, and considerably alienated from Hindúism by the haughty treatment which he received from the Bráhmans at the holy island of Bet. Both he and his partner have been taught to read in the mission schools since they commenced their religious inquiries. When they were baptized, two of the other scholars stood up before a large audience, both of natives and Europeans, and solicited me to receive them into our communion. They, and others, will probably ere long join it. Mr Mitchell dispensed for me the sacrament of the Supper to fifteen converts, whose walk and conversation become the Gospel, on the evening of the day to which I have now referred. Their children, and the catechumens, took their seats behind them when they surrounded the table of the Lord. You will fervently pray that their love of the Redeemer may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment; and that they may shine with the effulgence of personal holiness amongst their benighted kindred and countrymen; prove "written epistles of Christ known and read of all men;" and cause the Word of God to sound forth not only in their neighbourhood, but throughout the province. And you will no less fervently pray, that he who now addresses you, may, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, proclaim to all classes of the community, the glorious Gospel of the blessed Saviour; and may ever recognise that solemn trial which awaits him, when "the Lord Jesus Christ shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and his kingdom."

THE EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRANCE.

No. V.

BY THE REV. JOHN G. LORIMER,
Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

THE period of history at present under consideration stretches from 1596 to 1685. This was the period of ninety years, during which the Protestant Church enjoyed the protection of the edict of Nantes, poor and imperfect as that protection often was. I am noticing the most interesting points in the character and proceedings of the Church throughout this protracted era, and in the last paper, referred to her strong love of theological knowledge, and anxiety to diffuse it, as evinced in her encouragement of the publication of good books, and collecting them into libraries.

We must now turn, for a little, to the love which she showed for the Word of God. Already have we seen, that the Reformers in France early discovered a strong partiality for the Scriptures. One of their first steps, four-and-twenty years before they were publicly organized into a Church, was to translate the Word of God into their native tongue; and, after the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Church encouraged the issuing of improved versions, both at Geneva and Rochelle, and, under God, she was very much indebted to the light thus diffused, for the measure of success with which she stood out the dreadful persecution to which she was subjected. When we look into the period of which I at present write, we find the same love for the Scriptures, and anxiety to spread abroad their blessed knowledge. It has been common, of late, for the advocates of the Church of Rome, feeling how odious is the position which their Church has long occupied as the enemy of the Scriptures, now to turn round and appeal to the various translations which Roman Catholics made of the Word of God, in whole or in part, into many European languages, even before the era of the Reformation. It is certain that such translations were occasionally made, but how often did they consist of mere parts of the Scriptures, and in most expensive forms? How often were they a mere literary curiosity, or a Popish paraphrase? How frequently did the translator and the readers suffer for their pains? And how certainly were the body of the people always prevented, alike by their own inability to read, and the prohibition of the priest, from generally availing themselves of the Word of life? Not a few were the copies which were ignominiously burned and destroyed. Far different was the spirit and conduct of the Protestant Churches. They were built upon the Bible, rejoiced in it, largely diffused it, and called upon all to read it, and regulate their faith and practice accordingly. Never did they shrink from the Scriptures, and far less destroy them as a noxious book. The Church of France, in 1603, complains of the scarcity and dearness of the Bibles printed at Geneva; and the General Assembly write to their brethren there not to take amiss that they preferred the Bibles of Rochelle. So zealous were the French Protestants in the cause of Bible dissemination, that they appointed a standing printer and publisher, and, in the year referred to, "exhort him to hasten a new impression, and to vend it at as low a price as possible." And why? That the Word of God might be accessible to all, to the poor as well as the rich. What a contrast to an Italian Popish version of thirteen volumes, and a Spanish one of eighteen volumes! To make the new French version admit of easier reference, one of the ministers is requested to make "a good index" to it. There are few better signs of the religious improvement of Ireland, at the present day, than the strong demand for Bibles with references, even where a common copy is already possessed. In 1600, we read of the printer at Rochelle bringing out a new edition of the Bible in a lesser form, "and that might easily be carried anywhere in the pocket," and of lists being added of those texts which are most proper and pertinent for confirming the truth and confuting error. And eight years later, we read of a printer at Montauban publishing an octavo New Testament. In this last case the errata were so numerous, that the Assembly, justly jealous for the honour of the Word of God, and the good of the Church, ordered the pastors to recall and cancel it. All these things indicate zeal for Bible circulation in a right way. And the general result of the translation and circulation of the Scriptures in France, and other nations generally, is well stated by Diodati, professor at Geneva, in a letter to the French Church, asking their permission for his Latin and French translation in the year 1637:—

"Antiquity reaped much fruit this way, as St. Augustine and divers others have witnessed; but the Christian Church in our days hath enjoyed it most abundantly. For the sweet odours disperst abroad by the new translations of the Bible in divers languages, within these five-and-twenty or thirty years, is wonderful, and they have largely contributed to the edifying, instruction, and confirmation of saints. The English translation, for its great fidelity and clearness, weareth a shining crown of glory upon its head; those two German ones of Piscator and Cramerns, for their noble qualities and conditions, are exceeding useful, and have done a great deal of good; the new Polonian, made and printed at the instance of the Prince of Badzeville, is of that esteem to allure the present king of Poland to read it, and to enamour him of it, though he be a prince of a contrary religion; the new Dutch translation, which is just now coming into the world, sets persons a-longing for it, because of the excellency of its work, the number and abilities of its workmen, the time they have spent in the doing of it, and for the great helps the Lords' States General have afforded them to effect it; and the Old Testament, which is now working off at Zurich, in the purest Switzer language, must needs be of a raised worth, by that taste we had of the New, which is already printed; the new Spanish translation of Cyprian de Vallera hath produced incredible effects in Spain, no less than three thousand copies having penetrated, by secret ways and conveyances, into the very bowels of that kingdom. Let others publish the fruit of my Italian version both in Italy and elsewhere. If it were expedient and becoming me, I could bring forth numerous examples of it, and those also attested by persons of unstained credit and reputation."

We have had occasion to notice many interesting facts in the history of the Church of Scotland, parallel to similar facts in the history of the Church of France, and the resemblance does not fail in the matter of the Scriptures. So early as 1526, many copies of Tyndale's version, which was printed on the continent, found their way into Scotland, and were very generally read. This, with the use of other means, so hastened on the Reformation, that, in the course of seventeen years, the Parliament decreed it to be lawful to all to read the Word of God. Hitherto it had been death to attempt it; and though this act did not secure a universal protection; though, in spite of it, men continued to be burnt by the Popish priests, for no other crime than possessing or reading the Scriptures, still the decision of Parliament was followed with the best effect. "Then," says Knox, "might have been seen the Bible lying almost upon every gentleman's table. The New Testament was borne about in many men's hands." As might have been expected, under such influences, the Reformation grew in strength, and in 1560 had risen to such a magnitude, that the Protestant Church became the recognised Church of the country. In the same year the English exiles at Geneva, made a new translation of the Scriptures, to which many valuable notes were appended. This version was used by Knox, and was circulated to a great extent, both in England and in Scotland. As printing had originated on the continent, so it could be executed more cheaply and perfectly there than in this country. Hence, for a long time, editions of the Scriptures, which were chiefly intended for Great Britain, were printed in some of the large Protestant continental towns, and then imported. So early, however, as 1565, the Psalms of David, in Scotch metre, issued from the humble printing press of Scotland, and about the same time an impression of the Geneva Scriptures, to the extent of seven thousand copies, was carried to poor popish Ireland, and sold in the course of two years. This shews how strong was the thirst for Bible knowledge at that early period. It had been well if it had been nourished into growing power through succeeding years. It is a remarkable fact, that our fathers not only fully provided themselves with the Scriptures, but in 1567 had the book of common order, with Knox's prayers, translated into Gaelic; and Dr M'Crice doubts not that, in the same century, they had the Psalms in Gaelic. One might be ready to think that books could be of little use to a population in the circumstances of the Highlanders. It appears, however, from the researches of the Rev. Dr Lee, that reading and writing were not, even at that period, very rare accomplishments in Argyleshire, and other parts of the Highlands, and that the complaints were more frequent there were no good books, than that there were not persons able to read them. If even the Gaelic population formed thus early an object of Christian care and attention to the Church, we cannot doubt that the Lowland population were watched over with, if possible, still more parental affection. Well as Scotland was supplied with the Word of God, both from England and the Continent, she would bring out an edition for herself; accordingly, in 1575, proposals were made, by a printer, to the General Assembly, to publish an edition of the English Scriptures from the Geneva version. The Church cordially entered into the plan, and by way of encouraging the work, it was agreed that burghs and parishes should advance money to defray the expense, on the understanding that, to those who thus contributed, the Bible, when printed, should be cheaper. Regent Morton subscribed a large sum, not from the public purse, for no edition of the Scriptures was published in Scotland at that period at the government expense, but from the collections of parishes ordered by the Church. Thus the first edition of the whole Bible ever printed in Scotland, was published, with a dedication to the king, in 1579; and it was required by Act of Parliament, and under a penalty of ten pounds, that every family should have a Bible and a Psalm-book, and searchers were appointed to see that this act was carried into effect. Whatever some may think of the apparent severity of this law, none can question the zeal for the dissemination of the Word of God which it discovers. During the next forty-five years no fresh edition of the whole Scriptures issued from the press of Scotland; but in 1610, the same printer republished the same version, with the exception of some change on the New Testament, taken from another version; and the Synods required every parish church to purchase a copy, under the penalty of a fine. We must not imagine, however, that these two native editions supplied all the wants of Scotland for nearly half a century. No, we read of the Scotch printer bringing out an English edition with the Scotch Psalms, at Dort, in 1601, evidently for the use of our country, where such Psalms could alone be in demand; and, in addition to this, we have to bear in mind that both in London and on the continent there were a multitude of editions of the Psalms and Catechisms, and the whole Bibles published for the Scotch market. It is known that there were not less than thirty editions of Buchanan's Psalms imported into this country, during the forty-five years of which I speak. In the same space of time, it is estimated, there could not be less than a hundred editions of the various translations of the Bible printed in England, and that not less than twenty of these were absorbed by Scotland; and the number of copies in these editions was not small or inconsiderable. It appears that one impression, at a later day, amounted to nearly eight thousand copies, and that the demand for the Psalms in metre was at the rate of twenty thousand yearly. The annual copies of the whole Scriptures cannot be estimated at a much lower number, and considering the comparative poverty and small population of Scotland, what an idea do these facts suggest of the religious spirit of our fathers, their devoted love, and unwearied use of the Word of God. It is a curious but interesting circumstance, illustrative of the views which I have been presenting, that in 1637, when there was an open resistance to the imposition of the English service book, it is said a shower of small clasp Bibles followed the stool of Jenny Geddes, amounting, in number, to "whole pockfulls," proving at once the indignation of the people, and the abundance of the Scriptures. Twenty years afterwards, we are assured by Kirkton, that "every family had a Bible, and was able to read it;" and twenty years again after that, in days of hot and intolerable persecution, we find the king's printer in Scotland bitterly complaining of "great sums of money" being daily expended upon foreign Bibles, that is English Bibles printed out of Scotland.

It is unnecessary to pursue the investigation farther, with reference to English Bibles, but it may not be uninteresting to mention a few facts, in reference to the Scriptures in the Gaelic language. The Protestant Church of France had only to provide for one language, the Protestant Church of Scotland had to provide for two. We have seen that even in the sixteenth century there is reason to believe the Psalms of David were circulated in the Gaelic tongue; and in the middle of the seventeenth, about 1650, we find the Synod of Argyle publishing the first fifty Psalms in the same language. Twenty-seven years later, or about 1687, the Hon. Robert Boyle, of London, a name dear to every Christian heart, had the Irish Bible of Bishop Bedell published at his own expense, and two hundred copies sent down to the Highlands, on the conditions that the ministers should "read some chapters every Lord's day to the people," and that the Bible should be taken care of "as for the use of the parish." This reading of the Word of God excited great interest, so much so that the Bible travelled through different parts of the parish during the whole week, and was testored upon the Saturday evening or the Sabbath morning, that it might be read publicly to the assembled multitude, as a part of divine worship; and as a proof of the salutary effect of even this imperfect diffusion of the knowledge of the Word, it may be mentioned, that in the troubles which followed the revolution of 1688, in the Highlands, scarcely any of the natives who had received Bibles, or been instructed from them, were implicated in hostility to the revolution settlement.

Immediately after the revolution an impression of the Irish or Gaelic Bible was printed in London, and three thousand copies of the Bible, one thousand of the New Testament, and three thousand Catechisms transmitted to the care of the agent of the Church of Scotland, for distribution in the Highlands and Islands.

It is an interesting fact, that one thousand pounds Scots, or eighty-three pounds six shillings and eightpence, Sterling, were given out of the vacant stipends, for binding the Gaelic Bibles, and the balance, if there were any, was to be devoted to the publication of a new edition. In 1699 a fund was begun by the Church for printing another impression; and sixteen years later there is an earnest demand, from several places, for more Bibles, so much so, that the commission are treated to do their best endeavour to procure them. In the meantime, the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms, which contain a large body of Scripture, were translated and published. So early as 1708 a letter is written to the Synod of Argyle, requesting them to undertake the work. Shortly after, a collection is made to defray the expense; and in 1714 the Confession appeared, and ten years later the two Catechisms. This was a most important publication, and quite in keeping with the other exertions of the Church at the same period, to provide the destitute parts of the Highlands and Islands with the blessings of religious instruction. At the beginning of the century, a work was revived and enlarged in which the Church had been engaged many years before. Bursaries of ten pounds a year were raised by the Synods for the encouragement and support of young men at college, having the Gaelic or, as it is called, Irish language. These were continued for four years to each student, and strict care was taken, not only as to the punctual payment, but as to the real Gaelic knowledge and acquirements of the young men at college. In 1704, when the Lowlands had come to be well supplied with ministers, one-half of the bursaries, which had served as an encouragement to young men having English, were transferred for the use of those having Gaelic. About the same period, the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, began its inestimably important labours, and by the establishment of schools, the translation of works of practical divinity, the employment of catechists and the establishment of libraries, was honoured to effect a vast amount of good, which eternity alone will be able fully to reveal. Were it not that I wish, at present, to restrict the reader's attention to the Gaelic Scriptures, I might mention many pleasing proofs of the zeal, both of the Church and of the Society, in attending to the spiritual wants of the Highlands. To recur to the Scriptures; though I have not been able to lay my hands upon any document which shews that the Scriptures, in the Gaelic language, were translated, in Scotland, previous to 1767; yet, from the anxiety displayed in other ways, to promote the spiritual welfare of the Highland population, and the actual fact, that there were copies in England, I cannot doubt that many were obtained from London. The delay of the new translation, in this country, seems to have been owing to an unhappy idea, in which even intelligent and good men concurred, after the sad Popish rebellions in 1715 and 1745, that it was essential to the civilization of the Highlands, in the first instance, to abolish their language.

This impression, by no means an unnatural one, of course, for a time, postponed the translation into Gaelic, but gave new animation to the efforts of Christians, through English channels. After trial for a season it was found, that this was not the way of getting rid of the language, and that the Christian instruction, conveyed through the medium of English, was partial and imperfect. Hence good men recurred to the former idea of reaching the people through the Word of God, translated into their native language; and so, in 1767, the New Testament, translated by the Rev. James Stewart, of Killin, under the care of the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, was published in an edition of not less than ten thousand copies. It may be mentioned that the great Dr Samuel Johnson heartily approved of the object, and encouraged the translator in his important undertaking. Thirty years after, a second edition was published by the same society, of course before the days of the Bible Society, amounting to the immense impression of nearly twenty-two thousand copies. The Old Testament was published in parts as it was translated. Collected together, it was printed in 1802, to the extent of five thousand copies; and five years afterwards an edition of twenty thousand. In 1810 the Old Society printed the New Testament anew, in an edition of ten thousand copies, so that in about forty years it had been instrumental, under God, in putting sixty-six thousand copies of the Gaelic Scriptures into circulation, without counting the parts of the Old Testament, or the editions of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the latter of which now came into considerable circulation. It is an interesting fact, that so early as 1782, collections were made throughout the church, and in subsequent years repeatedly renewed, to defray the expense of the Gaelic translation. In 1816 it was considered desirable to revise part of the translation of the Old Testament. This was done, and in the course of a few years a quarto edition was brought out under the care of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge and a committee of the General Assembly, which for excellence is not surpassed, it is understood, by any modern version of the Scriptures. So impressed were the Lords of the Treasury with the great services which had been rendered to the cause of God, and the moral and religious interests of the Highlands, by the labours of the late eminent Reverend Dr Stewart of Luss, son of Mr Stewart of Killin, as a translator of the Gaelic Scriptures, that in 1820 they awarded him the sum of one thousand pounds. Previous to that period, and since, various large impressions of the Scriptures have been published by the British and Foreign, and latterly by the Edinburgh Bible Society, and instead of perpetuating the language, it is believed, never was the anxiety to acquire English stronger or more general in the Highlands than at this present time.

Thus, it appears that both the Protestant Church of France, and the Protestant Church of Scotland, were remarkable for their love of the Word of God, and their anxiety to disseminate it; and what higher testimony could be given in behalf either of an individual or a Church? Next to the love of God himself, what is more beautiful or befitting than the love of his Word? Indeed they are identical. Few tests of religious character are better or more conclusive than the way in which men feel towards the Scriptures, and in which they treat the Scriptures. How often does the Psalmist tell us of his love for the Word of God; and whatever scoffers, and the supporters of an apostate church may allege to the contrary, the benefits which attend the wide and indiscriminate circulation of the Scriptures are incalculable. The twelve millions of copies which have been scattered during the last thirty years by the Bible Society, may seem a vast number, and some may think there has been no corresponding fruit, but could we estimate how much evil has been prevented, which, but for them, would have burst forth, how much substantial good has actually been wrought out; and what trains have been laid for infinitely more in the future, no philanthropist, and much more no Christian, could hesitate for a moment to approve of, yea, to rejoice in the sacrifice.

The Misery of Hell.—The great aggravation of this misery will be its eternity.—That when a thousand millions of ages are past, their torments are as fresh to begin as at the first day. If there were any hope of an end, it would ease them to foresee it; but when it must be for ever so, that thought is intolerable: much more will the misery itself be. They were never weary of sinning, nor ever would have been, if they had lived eternally upon earth, and now God will not be weary of plaguing them. They never heartily repented of their sin, and God will never repent him of their suffering. They broke the laws of the eternal God, and therefore shall suffer eternal punishment. They knew it was an everlasting kingdom which they refused when it was offered them, and therefore what wonder if they be everlastingly shut out of it; it was their immortal souls that were guilty of the trespass, and therefore must immortally suffer the pains. Oh, now, what happy men would they think themselves, if they might have lain still in their graves, or continued dust, or suffered no worse than the gnawing of those worms! Oh! that they might but there lie down again; what a mercy now would it be to die; and how will they call and cry out for it, "O death, whither art thou now gone? Now come and cut off this doleful life! Oh! that these pains would break my heart, and end my being!" Oh! that I might once die at last! Oh! that I never had a being! These groans will the thoughts of eternity wring from their hearts. They were wont to think the sermon long, and prayer long; how long then will they think these endless torments? What difference is there betwixt the length of their pleasures and of their pains? The one continued but a moment, but the other endureth through all eternity. Oh! that sinners would lay this thought to heart! Remember how time is almost gone. Thou art standing all this while at the door of eternity; and death is waiting to open the door, and put thee in. Go sleep out but a few more nights, and stir up and down on earth a few more days, and then thy nights and days shall end; thy thoughts and cares, and displeasures, and all shall be devoured by eternity; thou must enter upon the state which shall never be changed. As the joys of heaven are beyond our conceiving, so also are the pains of hell. Everlasting torment is inconceivable torment.—BAXTER.

Discontent.—Murmuring persons think every thing too much that is done by them, and every thing too little that is done for them: God is as far from pleasing them with his mercy, as they are from pleasing him with their duty.—DYER.

Growth in Grace.—He that sits down content with the grace he hath, and is not pressing forward towards perfection, and striving to grow in grace, to get the habits of it more strengthened and confirmed, and the actings of it more quickened and invigorated, it is to be feared hath no grace at all; but though he sits ever so high, and ever so easy in his own opinion, yet sits down short of heaven. Where there is life, one way or other there will be growth, till we come to the perfect man. Job xvii. 9.—"He that hath clean hands, shall be stronger and stronger." Paul was a man of great attainments in grace, and yet we find him forgetting those things that are behind, and reaching forth to those that are before.—MATTHEW HENRY.

SACRED POETRY.

ROM. I. 14.—“I AM DEBTOR.”

WHEN this passing world is done,
When has sunk yon glaring sun,
When we stand with Christ in glory,
Looking o'er life's finished story,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know—
Not till then—how much I owe.

When I hear the wicked call
On the rocks and hills to fall,
When I see them start and shrink
On the fiery deluge brink,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know—
Not till then—how much I owe.

When I stand before the throne
Dressed in beauty not my own,
When I see thee as thou art,
Love thee with unsinning heart,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know—
Not till then—how much I owe.

When the praise of heaven I hear,
Loud as thunders to the ear,
Sweet as harp's melodious voice,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know—
Not till then—how much I owe.

Even on earth, as through a glass
Darkly, let thy glory pass,
Make forgiveness feel so sweet,
Make thy Spirit's help so meet,
Even on earth, Lord, make me know Something of how much I owe.

Chosen not for good in me,
Wakened up from wrath to flee,
Hidden in the Saviour's side,
By the Spirit sanctified,
Teach me, Lord, on earth to shew,
By my love, how much I owe.

Oft I walk beneath the cloud,
Dark as midnight's gloomy shroud;
But, when fear is at the height,
Jesus comes, and all is light;
Blessed Jesus! bid me shew
Doubting saints, how much I owe.

When in flow'ry paths I tread,
Oft by sin I'm captive led;
Oft I fall—but still arise—
The Spirit comes—the tempter flies;
Blessed Spirit! bid me shew
Weary sinners, all I owe.

Oft the nights of sorrow reign,—
Weeping, sickness, sighing, pain;
But a night thine anger burns,—
Morning comes and joy returns;
God of comforts! bid me shew
To thy poor, how much I owe.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Greenland Family.—A Greenlander, who dwelt for many years at no great distance from the mission-house, in the early period of the Moravian mission, had much intercourse with the brethren, but could never resolve to forsake his land, where he was held in great repute; his daughter, however, was baptized, and went to reside with the missionaries. Her father was much enraged; but, in reply to his angry expostulations, she modestly told him the reasons of her decision, and the happiness of the believers, concluding with saying, “So happy may you also be; but if you will not, I cannot stay and perish with you.” This softened his heart, and he began to weep; went with her to the mission-house, and declared that his intention now was, not to take away his daughter from the baptized, but rather to go with her. He desired him only to engage her, with another or two, to help him to put his matters in order. This was done, and at length he himself came, say the missionaries, with his two sons, and the rest of his household, and said, “Now I also come to you, and will not leave you again. I only wish that the rest of my children may soon be baptized, for they are young, and have a desire after our Saviour. As to myself, I am in a very indifferent state, and am not likely to come to much; but yet, at lying down and rising up I call to mind what I have heard of our Saviour, and I am come hither on purpose to hear more.” He came also, frequently, to inquire whether his grown son was not soon to be baptized. “I, myself,” said he, “dare not think of baptism, as I am very bad, and old too, and incapable of learning much more; but yet I will live and die with you, for it is very reviving to me to hear of our Saviour.” “What simplicity and integrity of mind!” says Mr Crantz; “might not this heathen put us in mind of our Saviour's words concerning the Centurion at Capernaum:—‘I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.’ Mat. viii. 10. And will not many from the east and west, and from the north and south, sit down in the kingdom of heaven; while to others, who could boast, ‘We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets,’ it will be said, ‘I know you not, whence you are?’ This man afterwards believed, with his whole house.”

The Rev. Mr Polk, of America.—The Rev. Mr Polk, at a western general meeting of the Religious Tract Society, stated that he had a right to speak of the value of tracts, because, under God, he was indebted for all he knew of Christianity to a tract. In an institution for the education of young men, in his own country, out of two hundred and fifty individuals, there was not one who was a Christian; and though the minister laboured among them with great zeal, he seemed to labour in vain. At last he got a young man to go through the building, and distribute some religious tracts. He left a tract on infidelity in one of the rooms, where two young men lodged together, one of whom was apparently of doubtful principles. The other, however, got hold of it, and read it. It arrested his attention, and set his mind on inquiring; and he afterwards fell in with Dr Olinthus Gregory's “Letters,” which led him to procure a Bible. The truths of that blessed book were brought home to his mind with great power, and he became a converted man. And his conversion was the beginning of a revival of religion in that place, during which twenty others of the young men, and some of the professors, became converted to Christ.

IS IT A VALID OBJECTION TO THE TRUTH OF REVELATION THAT IT HAS NOT BEEN UNIVERSAL?

PART I.

BY THE REV. PETER CURROR,

Minister of St. Martin's.

It has often been alleged by those who have taken the side of infidelity, that if a revelation was to be given, as all stood in need of it, all should have been favoured with it; that it should have been uttered in tones which every ear might hear, or written in the sky in characters which every eye might read. They have held that there is injustice in shedding its light only on some favoured spots, and leaving darkness lying thick and unrelieved on all other regions; that this is the tyranny of a capricious despot, not the act of a beneficent sovereign. And they have run into the conclusion, that all this being unlike the character of a righteous God, a dispensation so partial and capricious in the distribution of its privileges cannot have come from him.

Now, we do not dispute the facts on which this argument rests. This revelation was long in the hands only of a single nation, and however bright and promising may be its present prospects, it does not yet embrace above a sixth part of the human family. But though this is true, it does not follow that the argument raised on it is sound; a tottering fabric may be reared on a rock. To render an argument valid two things are necessary; the premises, as logicians speak, must be true, and the conclusion to which the argument conducts us must be legitimately drawn. If there is a flaw in either the one or the other, the whole argument is worthless. To make this plain we shall give a case. A particular action has been performed; it is ascribed to a particular individual, but it is maintained by those who profess to know this individual, that it is so unlike his character that they instantly conclude that it cannot have been performed by him. If it is an act of forgery or theft, they may be so thoroughly convinced of his honesty, that without listening to the evidence, they spring to the conviction that it was not, and could not be committed by him. Now this reasoning would be destroyed if one or other of two things were true. If they were mistaken in their estimate of this individual's character; if he were ascertained to have previously performed actions as dishonest as this, or if it was discovered that there was no dishonesty in the action after all, that though it had worn this aspect at first sight, on closer examination all had turned out to be fair and honourable; in either case their conclusion that the act in question could not be performed by the specified individual, would be proved groundless. Another case may be taken. It is reported of an individual, who has the credit of an upright and benevolent character, that he had bestowed all his wealth on one of a dozen of his kindred, who all stood in the same relationship to him, and whose claims upon him, therefore, were all equally strong. Some who know his character, think such conduct inconsistent with it, as well as unjust in itself, and refuse their belief that he could have done anything of the kind. Now they might be convinced that their reasoning, and the unbelief in which it resulted were both without foundation, on our satisfying them that there was no injustice in the act itself, that none of them had any claim upon him, no right to look for anything from him but what proceeded from his good will, and that no injustice would have been done, whether he had divided it equally among them, withheld it from the whole of them, or given it all to one. Or their reasoning would be alike shown to be unsound, if we proved to them that this individual had been previously in the habit of acting in the same capricious way in bestowing his favours, choosing rather to give great largesses to one or two, than to give smaller gifts to a greater number. Either of these proofs would manifest the groundlessness of the objection that such an act could not be performed by such an individual.

In like manner, the objection to revelation, that it has not been universal, and could not, therefore, have come from God, will be destroyed if one or other of two things are true. If it shall turn out that there is no injustice in that feature of revelation which they specify as unjust, it is manifest that from that feature no conclusion can be drawn that this revelation could not have come from a God of justice. Or if there are other actions from the hand of God, acknowledged on all sides, even by the objectors, to be his, which are of the same character with the one specified, and bearing equally the marks of apparent injustice, it is again alike manifest, that the character of that feature of revelation—its apparent injustice—furnishes no argument against its having proceeded from God.

First, then, is there any injustice in communicating a revelation to some and not to all? Injustice is committed only when some rights are violated. Are there any rights violated here? Is there anything withheld from us which we had a right to receive? If there is, then may we complain of being aggrieved; if there is not, no such complaint can honestly be made. Revelation furnishes a remedy for evils which we had brought upon ourselves. Had justice been only left to take its course, these evils, in all their bitterness, we should have had to abide. It is of favour altogether that justice has been arrested in her career of vengeance, that that vengeance did not sweep over every son and daughter of the human family. And he who bestows anything of favour may, without any violation of justice, select the objects on which he bestows it, make them as few or as numerous as he pleases, and bestow it upon them in any amount which he pleases. If a man has an inheritance to bequeath, if there are a dozen standing to him in the same relationship, he may desire to keep it entire, and may bestow it wholly on one. The others might, no doubt, regret that they were not the objects of his choice, but they would never think of alleging that he had done them an act of injustice. If a hundred men have united in rebellion against the state, if their crime has been clearly proved, sentence of death passed on them, and the hour fixed for their execution, the king, while resolved to uphold the authority of the law, might have a disposition of mercy that was melting over so wholesale an execution, and might pardon twenty, thirty, fifty, or more of them. This would be an act of mere favour; and those on whom justice took its course might regret that they were not its selected objects, but they would never think of charging their sovereign with injustice. Our situation is similar. We had all broken a law, whose penalty was death. Its condemnation righteously rested on every human head. No injustice would have been done us though its vengeance had been discharged on every member of the human family. What there would have been no injustice in inflicting on all, there is no injustice in inflicting on a part. It is of mere favour that any are rescued from this condemnation. Where all is of favour no rights are infringed. Those who are left to abide their punishment are no worse than they would have been had no interference of mercy been made. No injustice is done to them. And there is nothing, therefore, in such an interference unworthy of the character of a just and righteous God.

But it may, for any thing we know, be only a question of the degree in which the favour is bestowed. We do not know what influence flows from redemption to those to whom it has not been made known. We know that, in one respect, they, in common with the whole race, are sharers in its benefits. They are now in a state of retriave, which redemption alone has purchased for them. They are indebted to it for many forfeited enjoyments still reserved to them. The sun still shines upon them; the earth still vegetates for them; their food is still pleasing, and not bitter to their taste; the air which they breathe is still the breath of life, and not the pestilential minister of death; they have still the enjoyment which is wrought off by the healthful play of all their organs; they have still the delight which circulates through the channels of family affection, along the links of kindred and the ties of friendship; they have the joys of companionship, and they have the varied pleasures of intellectual occupation. All these were forfeited by transgression, but through the influence of redemption they are still reserved. And since its benefits reach them in this life, it may also, for any thing we know, ameliorate in some degree their condition in the next. It may soften the stroke of their vengeance; it may reserve for them some lingering rills of enjoyment. All the denunciations of vengeance in the Bible, are addressed to those to whom salvation has been offered, and by whom it has been rejected. The Jews were within reach of salvation, while yet the plan of redemption was unknown to them. The prayers and alms of Cornelius were accepted before the Gospel had been preached to him. The bare supposition, that the scheme of redemption may pour some ameliorating ingredients into their eternal cup, is enough to repel an objection resting on so unsubstantial a basis as that which we are now considering. And if it in any measure does so, the consequence would then be, either that the objection is groundless, or that God is bound to bestow equal degrees of enjoyment, of knowledge, and of intelligence upon all his creatures. Either the objection is groundless, or there was injustice in creating angels with higher intelligence than man, in creating one man with higher intelligence than another, in bestowing a loftier intellect on Newton and Milton than on the humblest ploughman or artizan, or a cry might be raised from the whole races beneath us, that they were not gifted with the intelligence of man. This we presume no one will maintain; but no one who is not prepared to maintain it, can consistently urge it as an objection to revelation, that it has not been universal.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF

THE LATE REV. ANDREW THOMSON, D.D.,
Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

THE name of this eminent servant of Christ is still fresh, we doubt not, in the recollection of our readers. From his splendid and varied talents, and unceasing energy, faithfulness and zeal in the discharge of his important and manifold duties, he was enabled to render essential service, not only to the Church of which he was so bright an ornament, but to the interests of Christianity in general; and though upwards of six years have passed away since his voice was for ever silenced by death, his memory is now, and long will continue to be held in sweet and grateful remembrance. The high place which during life he occupied in the estimation of the religious community of Scotland, shewed him to have been a man of more than ordinary attainments and usefulness, while the deep and thrilling sensation produced throughout the land by his sudden and unexpected removal, proclaimed in language not to be mistaken, that a "Master in Israel" had fallen. But while the death of such a man, and at such a period, was justly to be regarded as a public calamity, it must not be forgotten that our loss has been his gain; and that though he has laid down the weapons of his spiritual warfare, he has in their place taken up the palm of victory, and received the crown of glory.

In preparing the following imperfect sketch of the life of this distinguished individual, we have been considerably indebted to the short, but excellent, Memoir prefixed to the posthumous volume of his Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations.

Dr Andrew Thomson was born on the 11th July 1779, at Saughbar, in Dumfriesshire, of which parish his father, the late Reverend Dr John Thomson of Edinburgh, was at that time minister. Little is as yet publicly known regarding his early history, but it appears that without affording any striking proof of premature talent, he was distinguished in his younger days for intelligence and vivacity, and for that open-hearted and manly character by which, in after life, he was so remarkably characterised.

After going through the usual course of classical and theological study, he was, in the beginning of the year 1802, licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery of Kelso; and having soon after received a presentation to Sprouston, in Roxburghshire, he was ordained on the 11th of March following, and immediately commenced his ministerial labours in that parish. He was soon after married to Miss Jane Carmichael, his union with whom was productive of great happiness and domestic comfort, and was interrupted only by the lamented event, which if it excited such universal regret abroad, must have shed a peculiarly dark and desolating gloom over the joys and prospects of an affectionate family.

Dr Thomson's ministry, during his incumbency at Sprouston, was characterised by the same faithfulness which marked his subsequent labours. The Catechism on the Lord's Supper, which he published at that time for the use of the young people in his parish, has been of great service to many besides those for whom it was originally intended; and as a proof of the general estimation in which it is held, it may be mentioned, that it has passed through upwards of thirty editions, and more than one hundred and forty thousand copies of it have been sold. Besides devoting unremitting attention to the immediate duties of his parish, he also began at this early period to take an active part in the important business of the Church Courts.

After remaining for a period of about six years at Sprouston, he received a presentation to the East Church, Perth, to which he removed in the year 1808, and there his ministry was equally acceptable as in his former charge. It was not long, however, before, his talents becoming more extensively known, he was promoted to the vacant charge of the New Greyfriars Church, in the city of Edinburgh. On commencing, in the spring of 1810, his stated labours in this important situation, he made a most favourable impression on the minds of his hearers. Many who were attracted by the brilliancy of his talents and the eloquence of his preaching, became regular attendants on his ministry, and not a few owe their earliest religious impressions to the sound, practical, and efficient instructions, which they were at that time privileged to receive from him. The peculiar doctrines of Christianity which he saw it his duty to bring most prominently forward in his discourses, were not at that period so generally acceptable as at present; but it is almost needless to state, that these doctrines were laid before his hearers with all that candour and faithfulness by which he was ever distinguished. Indeed, no feature in his character was more strongly developed than his aversion to any improper compromise or concealment; and though this circumstance was occasionally, in controversy, productive of consequences by no means agreeable to himself, he was thereby often enabled to render eminent service to the cause of truth, while others shrunk back from the unpleasant but salutary duty.

St. George's Church, which had been for some years building, having been opened for public worship in the month of June 1814, Dr Thomson was selected by the Magistrates and Town Council as the most suitable minister for so influential and important a station. The difficulties to be encountered in collecting and retaining a large congregation in this new sphere of usefulness, situated as it then was at the extremity of the city, were not few. His was a mind, however, not to be discouraged; but rather stimulated to exertion by difficulty. And while he at once devoted all the energies of his powerful mind to the discharge of his multifarious duties, he soon had the satisfaction of finding the pleasure of the Lord prospering in his hands, and of seeing his labours crowned with abundant success. The congregation by whom he began to be surrounded, was of the highest respectability, and to many of them he was enabled, under the blessing of God, to be of great spiritual service. The respect shewn to him by his people was gratifying in the highest degree, and over them he soon acquired an influence scarcely ever possessed by any preacher. "Nor," says the author of the Memoir, "is it necessary to say, that he owed this enviable ascendancy to no compromise of principle,—to no unworthy accommodation of divine truth to the prejudices of his audience. In addressing himself to a congregation peculiarly exclusive and sensitive, he stood upon the high ground of his office as an ambassador for Christ; and with the apostle of the Gentiles, to whose bold unfeared character his own, in many points, bore a striking resemblance, he determined to know nothing, as the subject of his ministry, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. How fully, effectively, and perseveringly he adhered to his system, the recollection of his hearers, as well as the strain of his published discourses, amply testify. The peculiar qualifications which he brought to his task are, at the same time, not to be overlooked. To a manner of great animation and fire, yet restrained and dignified, he added a style of uncommon simplicity and spirit, which nature enabled him to set off to advantage by the tones of a voice remarkable for compass and harmony. He delighted in argument, but his arguments were of that direct, palpable, practical character which stimulate attention, and admit of being appreciated and followed by the most ordinary understanding; while the truths he laboured to establish were all of acknowledged importance, bore so intimate a relation to the system which, as a Christian minister, it was his province to illustrate and enforce, and came so closely and powerfully home to every man's heart and conscience, that nothing could appear more natural than the pains he took to explain and defend them. As in the clear fountain of his thoughts, there were no turbid elements, no confusion of ideas, no obscure images, no surface on which a wayward fancy could paint the fluctuating figures of its own changeful extravagance; so, in his discourses, all was simple, perspicuous, unaffected, and intelligible. Imagination was not, perhaps, his distinctive faculty; yet even of the glow and peculiar effect of a well disciplined imagination, his compositions were not destitute. When he chose, he could be tender, descriptive, and impassioned, and when he indulged neither in declamation addressed to the fancy, nor in appeals which went to the heart, he uniformly commanded attention by the clearness of his statements, the force of his reasonings, and the pointed and practical strain of his exhortations. It has been well remarked of him, that few men, and especially few public instructors, ever displayed a greater acquaintance with human nature, or could turn their knowledge to better account. His hearers accordingly, however secular their habits, could not but feel that they were addressed by one intimately conversant with life and manners; they could not evade the force of his arguments and lessons, by ascribing them to the ignorance or austerity of their instructor; they could not but perceive in his delineations of character, a faithful mirror, in which their own modes of thinking and acting were exhibited to the life; nor could they be insensible to the value of warnings and of counsels, in which the acuteness of the man of liberal ideas and of general observations, was blended with the wisdom of the moralist, and the sanctity of the Christian and the Divine. To causes such as these, accordingly, we are to ascribe the high place which Dr Thomson acquired and held in the estimation of the religious public of Edinburgh. Nor, in any review of the religious history of the period, will the deserved fame of Dr Thomson be overlooked, as one of the causes of the revived taste for the faithful preaching of the Gospel, which has happily characterised Edinburgh for the last fifteen or twenty years."

By the young people of his congregation he was more than usually beloved, and their affection was responded to on his part by the most laborious and diligent exertions for their spiritual improvement. Many of them still bear in mind the affectionate addresses, and sound and wholesome advices which, from time to time, they received from him, both publicly and in private, and look back with melancholy satisfaction on those pleasant hours which, in Sunday classes and week-day meetings, he so unremittingly devoted to their spiritual instruction.

But these labours among the young were not confined to the congregation. He soon found there were many in the parish whom his Sabbath ministrations could not reach, either from their not attending Church, or requiring more instruction than could be given them on that day. To meet their case, he collected funds for the erection of a school in Young Street, where the children of the poorer classes of his parishioners might receive the elementary principles of education and religion at a cheap rate. To this school it was Dr Thomson's practice to devote entire days of his valuable time, and, till a teacher was trained by himself, and qualified to follow out efficiently his own plans of instruction, he regularly attended at nine o'clock every morning, and commenced his self-imposed but laborious task. In no circumstances, perhaps, did he appear more truly great than when thus unostentatiously engaged in these labours of love; and so completely did he accommodate himself to the understandings of the children, that instead of being awe-struck in his presence, they seemed apparently as happy under his instructions as when engaged in their innocent amusements. For the use of the children attending this school, he prepared several excellent manuals of education, one of which, "Collection" for the highest class, contains many original compositions, and is justly held in very high estimation.

It is known to many that Dr Thomson took also a great interest in the improvement of the psalmody of the congregation of St. George's. Possessed of a fine ear and taste for music, he was well qualified to effect a salutary change in this important part of the services of the sanctuary. He drew up a collection of the most approved psalm tunes, all of which he carefully revised, and added several original compositions, and a few of his own of great beauty. The improvement which within these few years has taken place in this part of public worship, in many of the congregations in Edinburgh, and throughout the country, may, in no small degree, be ascribed to the unremitting exertions made by him in this respect.

Though Dr Thomson appeared to great advantage in the pulpit, those who knew him best, perhaps admired him even more in the private ministrations of his parish. In every house which he entered he was received with a hearty welcome, and when he departed he carried with him the good wishes of all. But more especially in seasons of domestic distress his presence was found to be peculiarly useful and acceptable. While with the utmost sympathy and tenderness he poured the words of consolation into the ear of the disconsolate and afflicted, he, at the same time, was enabled, in a singularly happy manner, to superadd such spiritual instruction and admonition as he thought necessary. His well-timed addresses at these seasons have been productive to many families not only of comfort but of great and lasting benefit. Numerous also were the chambers of death which he was called to visit, and when neither the world nor its enjoyments have been able to yield the slightest peace of mind in the prospect of dissolution, his voice has often been heard amid the sorrows of these dark and trying scenes, rising before the throne of God in accents of the deepest tenderness, leading away the soul from all earthly refuges, and commending it to the mercies of an all-sufficient and compassionate Saviour.

With the assistance of some friends, Dr Thomson had commenced, in the month of August 1810, the publication of the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. Of this periodical he continued, for the twenty years which elapsed from its establishment till the time of his death, its only and unassisted editor, except on occasions when necessarily absent from town. The amount of labour which he thus voluntarily undertook was very great, and it is known that he spent many an almost sleepless night in making the necessary preparations for its publication. In the course of his career both as an editor and a minister of the Gospel, Dr Thomson found himself often reluctantly dragged into controversies which occasionally exposed him to calumny and reproach. To use the language of Dr M'Crie, who has also since gone to his eternal rest, "he was not exposed to the woe denounced against those of whom all men speak well. He had his detractors and enemies, who waited for his halting, and were prepared to magnify and blazon his faults." Of him it may be said, as of another Christian patriot, no man ever loved or hated him moderately. This was the inevitable consequence of his great talents, and the rough contests in which he was involved. His generous spirit raised him above the indulgence of envy and every jealous feeling, but it made him less tolerant of those who displayed these mean vices. When convinced of the justice of a cause, and satisfied of its magnitude, he threw his whole soul into it, summoned all his powers to its defence, and assailed its adversaries, not only with strong arguments, but with sharp, pointed, and poignant sarcasm; but unless he perceived insincerity, malignity, or perverseness, his own feelings were too acute and too just to permit him, gratuitously, to wound those of others. That his zeal was always reined by prudence; that his ardour of mind never hurried him to a precipitate conclusion, or led him to magnify the subject in debate, that his mind was never warped by party feeling; and that he never indulged the love of victory, or sought to humble a teasing or pragmatic adversary, are positions which his true friends will not maintain. But his ablest opponents will admit, that in all the great questions in which he distinguished himself, he acted conscientiously; that he was an open, manly, and honourable adversary; and that though he was sometimes intemperate, he was never disingenuous. Dr Thomson was by constitution a reformer; he felt a strong sympathy with those great men who, in a former age, won renown, by assailing the hydra of error; and of civil and religious tyranny, and his character partook of theirs. In particular, he bore no inconsiderable resemblance to Luther, both in excellencies and defects; his leonine nobleness and potency, his masculine eloquence, his facetiousness and pleasantry, the fondness which he shewed for the fascinating charms of music, and the irritability and vehemence which he occasionally exhibited, to which some will add the necessity which this imposed on him to make retractions, which, while they threw a partial shade over his fame, taught his admirers the needful lesson, that he was a man subject to like passions and infirmities with others. But the fact is, though hitherto known to few, and the time has now come for revealing it, that some of those effusions which were most objectionable, and exposed him to the greatest obloquy, were neither composed by Dr Thomson, nor seen by him, until they were published to the world; and that in one instance, which has given rise to the most unsparing abuse, he paid the expenses of a prosecution, and submitted to make a public apology, for an offence of which he was innocent as the child unborn, rather than give up the name of the friend who was morally responsible for the deed;—an example of generous self-devotion which has few parallels."

Dr Thomson at all times took an interest in the business of many of the public charities and societies connected with Edinburgh. He was never unwilling to give his powerful assistance, either in aiding in their management, or pleading their cause from the pulpit. It is indeed matter of surprise how he found time for the multifarious duties which he was, in this and other respects, called to perform, no less than of admiration at the apparent ease and cheerfulness with which he went through them all. Superadded to his other labours, must, in particular, be mentioned the leading part which he took in the business of the ecclesiastical courts. In these courts, indeed, he was for many years preceding his death, acknowledged as the leader of the party to which he was, from principle, attached. The amount of personal labour and anxiety which was thus devolved upon him it would not be easy to estimate, and few men, it is believed, could have so long sustained the unceasing demands which, in addition to his other duties, were thus made on his time and exertions. He was, however, admirably qualified to occupy such an important and commanding station. Not only was he well acquainted with the laws of the Church, and the different forms requisite in conducting business, but for ability and readiness in debate he stood almost unrivalled. Many will recollect the bursts of eloquence which they have heard from his lips in the General Assembly, and the ability, dignity, and ease with which, even on the spur of the moment, he could reply to the arguments of an opponent. The important objects which he often had in view were, no doubt, sometimes thwarted by large majorities, but his intrepidity and fortitude never forsook him, and want of success only produced in him redoubled exertion.

This is not the place, nor have we any wish to enter on the protracted discussion to which the proceedings of the directors of the British and Foreign Bible Society, regarding the circulation of the Apocrypha, unfortunately gave rise, and in which Dr Thomson took so prominent a part. While, however, some of the consequences which ensued from these discussions were deeply regretted, and by none more than Dr Thomson himself, it will be admitted by every unprejudiced mind, at all acquainted with the circumstances of the case, that the practice complained of called most loudly for redress, and that the great principles maintained in this controversy, on his part, had for their only object the preservation and purity of the Word of God without mixture, diminution, or addition.

The discourses which Dr Thomson delivered, and afterwards published, the winter preceding his death, on the doctrine of "Universal Pardon," were highly seasonable and useful at the time, and contain a triumphant refutation of the errors they are intended to expose. These discourses are regarded by many as the best specimen of the diversified talents of their author; and certainly display his ability to great advantage, not only as an acute reasoner, but as a profound theologian and Scripture critic.

The leading part which he took, in regard to the important subject of the abolition of negro slavery, must not be passed over without notice. This was the last public question to which he devoted the energies of his powerful and versatile mind. With characteristic boldness and magnanimity he set his face against all partial measures for the improvement of this system of bodily and mental oppression, and in the midst of much opposition, stood fearlessly forward, the avowed, determined, and able advocate of immediate emancipation.

A meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society having been held in the month of October 1830, Dr Thomson attended, and after Mr Jeffrey (now promoted to the bench) and other speakers had addressed the meeting, and stated their views as to the proper time for abolition, he rose from the centre of the room, and craved permission to explain the conclusions at which he had arrived. "With a power of argument, and an earnestness and elevation of tone which can never be forgotten, he entered on the subject; and in a brief speech, explained the points in which he differed from the former speakers, as well as those in which he agreed with them. Never was the triumph of truth and eloquence more complete. Before he had concluded, the majority of the meeting was with him: the confidence of the directors of the society in the measures they had come forward to recommend, was shaken; and, in the rapturous acclamations of a crowded assembly, he had the satisfaction of listening to the first echo, which Great Britain, through all her provinces, has since sent back, to the call of justice and religion, in behalf of the injured children of her colonies."

At a subsequent meeting of the friends of immediate abolition, Dr Thomson attended along with the directors of the Anti-Slavery Society, who now almost unanimously coincided in his views. The speech which he delivered on that occasion was perhaps the most splendid effort of his genius, abounding in high and elevated feeling, and carrying conviction irresistibly home to the understanding and the heart. Rarely have we witnessed such unequivocal symptoms of admiration and enthusiasm, as this brilliant effusion of his eloquence produced on the densely crowded meeting assembled on the occasion. The concluding paragraph of his address is so beautiful and so characteristic of the determined views which he entertained on this great question, that we cannot resist recalling it to the recollection of our readers:—"If," said he, "there must be violence, let it even come, for it will soon pass away—let it come, and rage its little hour, since it is to be succeeded by lasting freedom, and prosperity, and happiness. Give me the hurricane rather than the pestilence. Give me the hurricane, with its thunder, and its lightning, and its tempest;—give me the hurricane, with its partial and temporary devastations, awful though they be;—give me the hurricane, with its purifying, healthful, salutary effects;—give me that hurricane, infinitely rather than the noisome pestilence, whose path is never crossed, whose silence is never disturbed, whose pro-even of the glow and peculiar effect of a well disciplined imagination, his compositions were not destitute. When he chose, he could be tender, descriptive, and impassioned, and when he indulged neither in declamation addressed to the fancy, nor in appeals which went to the heart, he uniformly commanded attention by the clearness of his statements, the force of his reasonings, and the pointed and practical strain of his exhortations. opponents will admit, that in all the great questions in which he distinguished himself, he acted conscientiously; that he was an open, manly, and honourable adversary; and that though he was sometimes intemperate, he was never disingenuous. Dr Thomson was by constitution a reformer; he felt a strong sympathy with those great men who, in a former age, won renown, by assailing the hydra of error; and of civil and religious tyranny, and his character partook of theirs. In particular, he bore no inconsiderable resemblance to Luther, both in excellencies and defects; his leonine nobleness and potency, his masculine eloquence, his facetiousness and pleasantry, the fondness which he shewed for the fascinating charms of music, and the irritability and vehemence which he occasionally exhibited, to which some will add the necessity which this imposed on him to make retractions, which, while they threw a partial shade over his fame, taught his admirers the needful lesson, that he was a man subject to like passions and infirmities with others. But the fact is, though hitherto known to few, and the time has now come for revealing it, that some of those effusions which were most objectionable, and exposed him to the greatest obloquy, were neither composed by Dr Thomson, nor seen by him, until they were published to the world; and that in one instance, which has given rise to the most unsparing abuse, he paid the expenses of a prosecution, and submitted to make a public apology, for an offence of which he was innocent as the child unborn, rather than give up the name of the friend who was morally responsible for the deed;—an example of generous self-devotion which has few parallels."

Dr Thomson at all times took an interest in the business of many of the public charities and societies connected with Edinburgh. He was never unwilling to give his powerful assistance, either in aiding in their management, or pleading their cause from the pulpit. It is indeed matter of surprise how he found time for the multifarious duties which he was, in this and other respects, called to perform, no less than of admiration at the apparent ease and cheerfulness with which he went through them all. Superadded to his other labours, must, in particular, be mentioned the leading part which he took in the business of the ecclesiastical courts. In these courts, indeed, he was for many years preceding his death, acknowledged as the leader of the party to which he was, from principle, attached. The amount of personal labour and anxiety which was thus devolved upon him it would not be easy to estimate, and few men, it is believed, could have so long sustained the unceasing demands which, in addition to his other duties, were thus made on his time and exertions. He was, however, admirably qualified to occupy such an important and commanding station. Not only was he well acquainted with the laws of the Church, and the different forms requisite in conducting business, but for ability and readiness in debate he stood almost unrivalled. Many will recollect the bursts of eloquence which they have heard from his lips in the General Assembly, and the ability, dignity, and ease with which, even on the spur of the moment, he could reply to the arguments of an opponent. The important objects which he often had in view were, no doubt, sometimes thwarted by large majorities, but his intrepidity and fortitude never forsook him, and want of success only produced in him redoubled exertion.

This is not the place, nor have we any wish to enter on the protracted discussion to which the proceedings of the directors of the British and Foreign Bible Society, regarding the circulation of the Apocrypha, unfortunately gave rise, and in which Dr Thomson took so prominent a part. While, however, some of the consequences which ensued from these discussions were deeply regretted, and by none more than Dr Thomson himself, it will be admitted by every unprejudiced mind, at all acquainted with the circumstances of the case, that the practice complained of called most loudly for redress, and that the great principles maintained in this controversy, on his part, had for their only object the preservation and purity of the Word of God without mixture, diminution, or addition.

The discourses which Dr Thomson delivered, and afterwards published, the winter preceding his death, on the doctrine of "Universal Pardon," were highly reasonable and useful at the time, and contain a triumphant refutation of the errors they are intended to expose. These discourses are regarded by many as the best specimen of the diversified talents of their author; and certainly display his ability to great advantage, not only as an acute reasoner, but as a profound theologian and Scripture critic.

The leading part which he took, in regard to the important subject of the abolition of negro slavery, must not be passed over without notice. This was the last public question to which he devoted the energies of his powerful and versatile mind. With characteristic boldness and magnanimity he set his face against all partial measures for the improvement of this system of bodily and mental oppression, and in the midst of much opposition, stood fearlessly forward, the avowed, determined, and able advocate of immediate emancipation.

A meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society having been held in the month of October 1830, Dr Thomson attended, and after Mr Jeffrey (now promoted to the bench) and other speakers had addressed the meeting, and stated their views as to the proper time for abolition, he rose from the centre of the room, and craved permission to explain the conclusions at which he had arrived. "With a power of argument, and an earnestness and elevation of tone which can never be forgotten, he entered on the subject; and in a brief speech, explained the points in which he differed from the former speakers, as well as those in which he agreed with them. Never was the triumph of truth and eloquence more complete. Before he had concluded, the majority of the meeting was with him: the confidence of the directors of the society in the measures they had come forward to recommend, was shaken; and, in the rapturous acclamations of a crowded assembly, he had the satisfaction of listening to the first echo, which Great Britain, through all her provinces, has since sent back, to the call of justice and religion, in behalf of the injured children of her colonies."

At a subsequent meeting of the friends of immediate abolition, Dr Thomson attended along with the directors of the Anti-Slavery Society, who now almost unanimously coincided in his views. The speech which he delivered on that occasion was perhaps the most splendid effort of his genius, abounding in high and elevated feeling, and carrying conviction irresistibly home to the understanding and the heart. Rarely have we witnessed such unequivocal symptoms of admiration and enthusiasm, as this brilliant effusion of his eloquence produced on the densely crowded meeting assembled on the occasion. The concluding paragraph of his address is so beautiful and so characteristic of the determined views which he entertained on this great question, that we cannot resist recalling it to the recollection of our readers:—"If," said he, "there must be violence, let it even come, for it will soon pass away—let it come, and rage its little hour, since it is to be succeeded by lasting freedom, and prosperity, and happiness. Give me the hurricane rather than the pestilence. Give me the hurricane, with its thunder, and its lightning, and its tempest;—give me the hurricane, with its partial and temporary devastations, awful though they be;—give me the hurricane, with its purifying, healthful, salutary effects;—give me that hurricane, infinitely rather than the noisome pestilence, whose path is never crossed, whose silence is never disturbed, whose pro-

considerations of expediency. And, doubtless, in some parts of the sacred narrative, the two subjects are treated of in immediate connection. Besides, as the service alluded to was often rendered for value received, the period of its continuance might at any time be resolved into an equivalent in money, and having assumed the form of a pecuniary obligation, be dealt with accordingly. But though the term release in our translation may seem to favour this view, the original word does not support it, and the more general opinion, among the ablest expositors, is, that the manumission of those Israelites who might fall into a state of bondage to their brethren, was provided for on other grounds, and in virtue of a distinct law. Such a condition was certainly recognized; but public regulations were so framed in reference to it, as to preclude gross abuse, while it lasted; and being deemed an evil, it was limited to a short duration. "If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve; and in the seventh, he shall go out free for nothing." The term of servitude here specified does not appear to have been necessarily affected by the Sabbatical year. The horrors of slavery, as realized in modern times, and under Christians, were utterly unknown among the children of Israel. But that is a subject which well deserves more particular and separate notice.

The fourth thing enjoined on the Sabbatical year was the public reading of the law during the feast of tabernacles: "And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, when all Israel is come to appear before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing." Many perhaps, at first sight, may be inclined to attach but little importance to this part of the institution. Upon examination and reflection, however, the subject will be seen in a different light. In this ordinance we have one of the most impressive instances of the care that was taken, under the Old Testament, to make religion a great national concern, and to acknowledge, with every demonstration of reverence, the paramount authority of the divine law. Not merely were the males required to be present at this solemn septennial observance, but the whole nation; that is, all were invited, and as many as could possibly attend, came forward. "Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law; and that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it." The nature of the case, of course, required that numbers of persons, properly qualified, should be engaged in the reading of the law, at different stations, in order that all might have an opportunity of hearing distinctly. And, according to Jewish authorities, the king, judge, or high priest, was the chief reader, first in the court of the tabernacle, and afterwards in that of the temple. How striking must have been the effect of so imposing and edifying a service! How vast the concourse assembled on such occasions! May not this have been the great congregation to which the royal Psalmist refers? And could the chosen race have met together under circumstances better calculated to dispose the mind for serious and lasting impressions? They were all relieved from the care of their worldly concerns, and especially from the anxiety which unavoidably attends a state of pecuniary embarrassment. At such periods they would enjoy a precious opportunity of listening to the statutes of the Lord their God, without interruption or distraction.

Such were the peculiar observances of the Sabbatical year; and surely no exertion can be taken to any of them, as unreasonable, if we admit the authority by which they were enjoined. But it has been asked, and that without the least wish to cast any slight upon the institution, how were the Israelites employed during so long a period of cessation from their ordinary agricultural pursuits? And it is, no doubt, a matter of importance to supply a suitable answer; for the total unrestrained idleness of a populous nation, during a whole year, could scarcely be supposed to be unaccompanied with serious evils. The year of release, however, was not a season either of listless vacuity or lawless excess. One prominent part of the usual occupation of the people would remain nearly the same as at other times. While the tillage of the ground was intermitted, the care of cattle would still require considerable attention. And religious exercises seem to have been engaged in, throughout the course of the Sabbatical year, with greater ardour and solemnity. The grown up members of the community were expressly commanded to give almost universal attendance, at one period of it, on the public reading of the law; and is it not highly probable, that their leisure at home was spent, in part at least, in the instruction of their children in the knowledge of the holy oracles? This most important and interesting duty, in those days of primitive simplicity, appears to have been almost wholly committed to the hands of parents themselves. The facilities for the efficient performance of it were, at the same time, extremely few, or rather it was encompassed with innumerable difficulties. The art of printing was unknown. Written copies of the law must have been comparatively inaccessible to many. Perhaps, too, the process of elementary teaching was but imperfectly understood. And if, with all these disadvantages, the religious education of the Hebrew youth had been attended to only during the intervals of labour in ordinary years, and we do not mean to insinuate that it was then overlooked, it could not have been carried to that degree of proficiency which the earnest and frequent exhortations of Jehovah, by his servant Moses, obviously rendered imperative on the chosen people. "And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart, and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." Would not this delightful task, binding as a duty at all times, furnish ample occupation, and be especially obligatory on the year of release? And, on the supposition that no other instructor of the young was provided or available, would even a seventh part of a father's time be too large a proportion to bestow on so essential and momentous an object?

With regard to the subsequent history of the year of release, the information contained in the inspired pages is not very abundant. From this circumstance, many writers of note have been led to infer that it soon fell into neglect. Several of these have stated this opinion so strongly, as to make it appear that the institution proved next to abortive. But for such a sweeping conclusion there is manifestly no ground. Various facts are recorded in the Hebrew annals, which seem to imply that the Sabbatical year was observed, or, at least, that some of its duties were remembered, at the different periods when they occurred. Of this we find an instance, 2 Kings xix. 29., where God, by the mouth of Isaiah the prophet, addresses king Hezekiah in these words, "Ye shall eat this year such things as grow of themselves, and in the second year that which springeth of the same; and in the third year sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof." Again, the solemn public reading of the book of the law, in the reign of Isaiah, appears to involve a recognition of the Mosaic injunction to that effect, given, Deut. xxxi. 10-13., in direct connection with the year of release.

And the grievances mentioned, Neh. v. 1-5., are thought to have taken place on the Sabbatical year as an aggravation.

Even those authors, however, who are disposed to limit the regular observance of the institution in question, to the shortest period, admit that, in all probability, it continued to be kept, more or less strictly, down to the days of Solomon. And their reasons for supposing that it ceased to be observed about that time, are derived from the duration of the captivity, in regard to which, it is said, that the remnant of the house of Judah should be carried away to Babylon, "To fulfil the word of the Lord, by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed his Sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years." The inference here drawn is founded upon the supposition that Sabbatical years are meant in this passage. A computation is then made backwards for seventy shemittahs, or periods of seven years. But if this view of the case proves the early and protracted neglect of the rest of the land, does it not prove yet more clearly, the importance attached to its due observance, by God who appointed it?

That the Sabbatical year was observed, with greater or less strictness, in the latter ages of the Hebrew commonwealth, there is evidence to shew. Josephus, after relating the courteous address of Alexander the Great to Jaddus, makes the following statement: "The high priest," says he, "made answer, they only desired his (Alexander's) leave to enjoy the freedom of their own country-laws, and that they might be exempted from the seventh year's tribute; which was all granted them." Now, that this petition was founded on the fact that the Jews of these days abstained from cultivating their fields on the seventh year is plain, from what the same historian records immediately after, concerning the Schemites or Samaritans. They, pretending to be Hebrews, preferred a request for the same immunity from the seventh year's tribute, and enforced it expressly by this argument or reason, "That they did not sow that year." But Alexander put them off in the meantime, on the ground that he had not the same satisfactory information respecting them as he had respecting the Jews.

Tacitus also reckons the Sabbatical year among the peculiar ordinances of the Jews. After having adverted to the weekly Sabbath, which he, under the influence of heathen delusion, conjectured might have been observed in honour of Saturn, a pagan divinity; and very probably the Moloch of Scripture, which the Israelites were commanded to hold in abomination, he relates that on every seventh year the Hebrews intermitted the cultivation of their lands, charmed, as he expresses it, with the pleasures of indolence. So futile is the reasoning even of that sagacious Roman with respect to the nature and origin of Hebrew institutions.

The year of release, though evidently a temporary ordinance, was admirably fitted to serve many important purposes, both spiritual and secular, among God's ancient people.

The Almighty had in a most wonderful manner, by visible intervention in their behalf, brought the Israelites into the land of Canaan; and they received a right to the occupation of it in a very peculiar and miraculous way. He bestowed it on them as a gift, directly from himself, and therefore justly required of them an explicit acknowledgment of the tenure on which they held it. The divinely appointed observances of the Sabbatical year obviously implied such an acknowledgment, at the same time that they secured to the chosen race many advantages. They tended to keep up a salutary sense of dependence on the care and bounty of God among the wealthy. They perpetuated the privileges, and promoted the comfort of the poor, without being designed to screen or encourage the fraudulent. And by their means a favourable opportunity was also afforded of preserving from generation to generation an intimate acquaintance with the law and worship of the Lord their God.

But, further, the suspension of temporal pursuits, and the obliteration for a time of all the limits of predial possessions, taught an instructive lesson as to the transient nature of every earthly distinction. The remission of pecuniary obligations, too, was well calculated to remind the whole community of the need that sinful men have of God's pardoning mercy; and it is highly probable that in the petition of the Lord's Prayer, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," there is an allusion to this general release. Would not, then, the more spiritually minded Hebrews feel themselves called upon by such impressive and significant observances to look forward to a better country, "that is, an heavenly,"—where the blessed inhabitants should enjoy not a temporary, but an uninterrupted and eternal repose—where no jealous and narrow boundaries should separate the lot of unmingled happiness in which all the Israel of God would share with unrestrained freedom and unabating delight—where the privileges of the saints should be for ever exempted from all liability to forfeiture, and their portion of felicity rendered incapable of diminution—and where it should no more be necessary to repair, by toilsome journeys, to the courts of the earthly Zion, in order to listen to the public and solemn reading of the law for the sake of instruction in the path of duty; because there every glorified spirit, being fixed as a pillar in the temple above, would reflect, according to its measure, the bright features of the divine image in the unfading lineaments of knowledge and holiness?

THE NECESSITY OF CONVERSION:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ANDREW THOMSON, D. D.,
Minister of St. George's Parish, Edinburgh.

"Verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."—MATT. xviii. 3.

THE kingdom of heaven has different meanings in Scripture. It sometimes means the Gospel dispensation, and sometimes the state of happiness which is reserved hereafter for the righteous. Here it has the former signification, as we may see from the first verse of the chapter, in which we are told that the disciples asked Jesus who was the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. They were thinking, indeed, of preferment and honour in a temporal kingdom; still, however, it was the kingdom of the Messiah, to whose greatness they aspired, or in other words, that new order of things which he was expected to introduce for the regeneration and redemption of the world.

But as to all practical purposes the two meanings are the same. They are, at least, inseparably connected. He who embraces the Gospel is certain of ultimate admission into the happiness of eternity. And that happiness can never possibly be the portion of those by whom the Gospel is rejected and despised. Entrance into the one kingdom is the sure pledge and the only preparation for entrance into the other. And in this respect they may be considered as identified.

Unquestionably, my friends, the privilege to which our Saviour here directs the attention of his disciples, is of incalculable value. It is nothing less than the eternal salvation of the soul, and, compared with this, every thing else fades away into utter insignificance. What though you possessed all which a present world could afford of honour, and power, and wealth, and pleasure, if yet you were not to be partakers of life and immortality in the world that is to come? But if you are interested in the favour of God, and have obtained the forgiveness of your sins, and can entertain the well-grounded hope of future and everlasting glory, you need care but little what portion you have of temporal good. You have all that is indispensable to your real and permanent felicity. There is nothing left for you either to desire on the one hand, or to regret on the other.

Now, one should suppose that a privilege so great and invaluable would be the object of universal ambition and pursuit,—that every one would be anxious to obtain and to enjoy it,—that the multitudes of rational and immortal beings, before whom it is placed in all its worth and importance, would never be satisfied, amidst their richest earthly attainments, till they could consider themselves as heirs of the kingdom of heaven. And yet how many are there by whom it is regarded with absolute indifference! They either do not think of it at all, or when it presents itself to their notice, they treat it as an idle dream, which may suit the views of hypocrites and fanatics, but which is utterly unworthy of a moment's serious consideration. Deluded and miserable beings! They wantonly or deliberately cast away from them the happiness which lasts for ever, that they may not be disturbed in the joys that last but for a moment, and that perish in the using. The deception, however, in which they are indulging cannot continue long. Their eyes will one day be opened to see their folly. "And verily they shall have their reward."

But, my friends, you will perhaps say that you are not among the number of those whom I have now described. You wish to enter into the kingdom of heaven,—you have an ardent desire to partake of the blessings of the Gospel,—you are even counting upon that as an attainment which you have already made,—and you have a strong and confident expectation that your course shall terminate in that state of blessedness to which the religion of Jesus calls and invites you. Would to God that in all this none of you were deceiving yourselves. And, I trust, that, with not a few, it is but the language of sincerity, experience, and truth. But it may not be unnecessary nor uncharitable to remind you that such pretensions have not always their foundation in reality, and that with respect to some of those who have concluded that they are sharers in the benefits of the Gospel dispensation, it must be asserted that whatever they may imagine, they are in possession of no such privilege. They are still far from the kingdom of heaven. And why? Just because they have not done, and are not, what our Saviour peremptorily requires them to do and to be. The character and the privilege are closely, they are indissolubly united, and where the former is not exhibited the latter cannot be enjoyed. Unless you comply with what the Gospel demands, it is impossible that you should participate of the mercy and happiness which the Gospel promises. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." Here is the test by which your spiritual state is to be determined. By this you are to ascertain whether or not you are indeed in that condition in which you had flattered yourselves that you were. You must examine your own heart and conduct, according to the criterion which our Lord has furnished in the words of my text, and you must come up, in some good measure, to the rule he has laid down, before you can infer, with any degree of propriety or of certainty, that it is well with your soul for time and for eternity.

Well, then, my friends, have you been converted and become as little children?

I do not ask you when your conversion happened, and what were the particular circumstances that occasioned or that attended it. In many cases, indeed, these questions may be put with as much propriety, and answered with as much certainty, as the question to a mariner, at what season it was that he escaped from shipwreck, or as the question to a convalescent, what were the first and strongest symptoms of his returning health, or as the question to a philosopher, at what period of his career he abandoned the old system and embraced the new. But it might be that you could not give a satisfactory reply to the questions I have stated, even though you were in the very state for ascertaining which, they would be submitted to your consideration, and therefore, I do not put them, lest they should only serve to perplex and distress you. But the expediency still remains of asking you, whether you have been actually converted? whether this fact can be established upon good grounds? whether you possess within yourselves, and are exhibiting before others, sufficient evidence of that transformation, by the renewing of your mind, which every child of Adam must undergo before he can be either safe or happy? In consequence of your original apostasy from God, his image was effaced from your souls,—has that image been restored? You had become prone to sin,—is sin now the object of your hatred and your avoidance? You had ceased to feel and to practise that devotedness to your Maker, which is at once the honour and the felicity of his rational creatures,—is it now your ruling desire, and your habitual endeavour, to submit to his will, and to live to his glory? If not, then you are not truly and effectually converted—you are still in your sins—the Gospel dispensation has no blessings in reserve for you—into the kingdom of heaven you cannot possibly find admittance.

But our Saviour does not rest with the mere general idea of conversion. He is much more particular, and illustrates his meaning by referring to the exercise of a specific grace, which lies at the foundation of the moral change he speaks of, and accompanies it in every stage of its progress. It is the grace of humility. We learn this from the occasion on which the words of my text were spoken,—they were spoken in reply to a question of the disciples, respecting those who were to be raised to the highest distinction and authority in the Messiah's kingdom; and we learn it from the sentiment and phraseology of the fourth verse, in which our Saviour says, "Whosoever shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."

Now, the primary idea which is here suggested, seems to be indifference to the objects of worldly ambition. The disciples were mainly occupied with imagining the grandeur which they were destined to reach in the temporal kingdom which they expected their Lord to establish. Upon that they had set their affections; to that they were continually and eagerly aspiring; and they were ever anxious to know which of them would be chosen and honoured to fill the most dignified station, and to enjoy superiority over his brethren. Jesus told them, that these were vain, delusive, and unworthy thoughts; that they must renounce the love and the pursuit of such grandeur as that about which they were so solicitous; that they must feel as little desire for it, and as little concern about it, as if they were little children, to whom its attractions and its very existence were unknown. And the lesson which he thus inculcated upon them, is substantially applicable to all who look for an entrance into the kingdom of heaven,—understanding that phrase in the sense which he attached to it. You cannot be supposed to fall into the mistake which they committed respecting the Messiah's kingdom; and do not, therefore, need the correction and the caution upon that point which he administered to them. But, notwithstanding this, you may be under bondage to the same carnal ambition which perverted their minds, and be loving the world and the things of the world as if that were the proper object of your regard, and as if that were to be your only and your sufficient portion. And my friends, let me ask you if this be indeed the case? Are you specially attached to those possessions and gratifications which this earth is capable of affording? Is it your most anxious inquiry, what shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed? Do your riches increase, and are you setting your heart upon them? Are you covetous of power, and honour, and fame, joyful when you acquire, and miserable when you lose them? Is secular business withdrawing your attention from the one thing needful? Are you devoting your precious time to sensual pleasure, or to idle amusements? In short, has a present world so much ascendancy over your minds, as to keep them away from God and from eternity? Then you are not converted. You are under that very dominion from which the Gospel is intended to emancipate you. You have not embraced that spiritual and glorious liberty of which it entreats you to accept. And before you can consider yourselves as in a state of safety, you must exchange those carnal dispositions by which you are now enslaved, for the holy and heavenly dispositions which are inculcated by our Saviour, as absolutely and in every case indispensable. You must just do what the disciples did. As soon as they were rescued from the delusion under which they had long laboured, as to the nature of the Messiah's kingdom,—as soon as they were convinced that it was a spiritual kingdom and not of this world,—they became like little children, and cared no more for the greatness which had formerly dazzled their imagination and engrossed their thoughts; and not only parted with all, that they might follow Christ, but took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and willingly exposed themselves to every variety of hardship and suffering, that they might obtain the crown of life and immortality. So must it be with you, my friends, if you would enter into the kingdom of heaven. As to the things of this world, which have hitherto enthralled your thoughts and affections, you must become dead and indifferent to them,—they must no longer occupy the throne of your hearts,—you must regard them no more than if you were little children, whose minds are not enlarged enough to comprehend them, and whose passions are not yet kindled to desire them, and whose capacities are not yet competent to relish and enjoy them. And instead of running the race of earthly ambition, and panting after objects which might gratify your love of pleasure and exalt you above your fellows, you must be content with whatever lot your Lord may have assigned you, and have your heart elevated above the sordid dust on which you tread, and be looking beyond all that is most splendid and fascinating in this terrestrial scene, to the purer and the brighter regions that lie beyond it. This is a humility by which you shall be finally exalted. And it is thus you are to prove the reality and the completeness of your conversion.

There is another species of humility which our Saviour may be reasonably supposed to have in his eye, as entering into the idea, or constituting the evidence of conversion. I mean humility with regard to the whole plan of salvation. The disciples did certainly so far believe in Christ, and love him. But the pride of their hearts was not yet fully subdued. They were still the victims of intellectual and moral prejudice, which prevented them from submitting to the instruction and guidance of their Master, with that entire surrender of themselves as to belief, and temper, and practice, which his divine authority claimed. And it was not till after his ascension into heaven, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit, that they exhibited convincing tokens of having renounced every high thought which exalted itself against the knowledge and obedience of Christ, and given themselves up implicitly and unreservedly to his direction in the way of life. Now, a similar change must be effected in every one of us ; we must become in this manner, and to this extent, humble as little children, that we may be the true disciples of the Saviour, and finally enter into the kingdom of heaven. Nothing can be more obviously necessary than this. The very nature and character of the Gospel presupposes that we are in such a state, as to require us to entertain the most abasing views of our own insufficiency. It is a light for them that sit in darkness,—a remedy for those who labour under disease,—a plan of deliverance for creatures who are exposed to danger,—a source of consolation for the sorrowful and hopeless,—a scheme of mercy and redemption for a world involved in guilt, depravity, and destruction. Without it we are utterly undone ; and, therefore, we are called upon to receive it, and to acquiesce in it, with the utmost lowliness and resignation, and instead of putting any trust in our own capacities or attainments, to repose with unlimited, unsuspecting, confidence in the wisdom, the grace, and the power of Him who has come in the name of the Lord to save us. This is the frame of mind to which we must all be brought, and in which all of us must be found working out our salvation, if we would have evidence of our being converted, and secure admission into the heavenly world. There is nothing so natural to us as a proud and overweening conception of our own merit. There is nothing, at the same time, so hateful to the God from whom we have apostatised, or so directly opposed to our reception of saving truth. And, consequently, there is nothing from which, in its every feature and operation, it is so necessary for us to be rescued. If this pride be allowed to reign in our souls, the Gospel must then, of course, be treated with neglect or contempt. It is only when this pride gives place to humility that we are in a condition to receive the Gospel, to understand its value, to submit to its authority, and to relish its blessings.

But let me ask you, my friends, if you are conscious of having this temper and disposition prevailing within you, and if it is permitted to exercise a governing influence over all the regards which you pay to the Gospel, and to Him who has revealed it ? If, instead of applying for instruction in divine things to the wisdom which cometh from above, and thinking it enough to warrant your belief in any doctrine that it is supported by "thus saith the Lord," you make your own understanding the test of religious truth, and will not admit into your creed what does not coincide with your own system of opinions, though plainly taught in your Bible, and endeavour to explain away the scriptural statements which you do not like ;—if, instead of resting upon the righteousness and strength of Him who is your appointed Redeemer, and who is mighty and able to save you to the uttermost, you place your dependance upon something in yourselves, and plead your own merit as the ground of your acceptance, and trust to your own resources as if these were in any measure adequate to your spiritual necessities ;—if, instead of putting yourselves under the absolute government of Christ, and saying to him, in the language and in the spirit of unreserved submission, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do !" you rest satisfied with a partial respect to his authority, and refuse to perform certain painful duties which he has enjoined, and remain attached to certain favourite indulgencies which he has prohibited ;—if this be the case, then pride still lords it over your heart and conduct, and with no truth nor reasonableness can it be said that you are converted. In these and in all other respects, you must become as little children. Sensible of your ignorance, and of your incapacity, by any effects of unenlightened reason, to make yourselves wise unto salvation, you must sit in the attitude of humble, unpretending learners, at the feet of the great Prophet who speaks to you from heaven, and receive, in faith and love, all the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth, or which he has instructed his apostles to communicate, and, with the simplicity of new born babes, desire the sincere milk of the Word that you may grow thereby. Conscious of your weakness and inability as to all that respects your deliverance from sin, you must lean upon the arm of your mighty Redeemer—you must look to him as the only foundation of your confidence and your hope—and remembering, that when you were ungodly, and without strength, he died for you, amidst all the alarms which guilt and danger may awaken in your breast, you must flee to him as your refuge and your help, and trust in the encouragement which he gives you when he says, in the tone of compassion and omnipotence, "Fear not, for I am with you ; be not dismayed, for I am your God." Convinced that you have neither authority nor wisdom to regulate your own ways, and that without divine superintendence you could not walk steadily and perseveringly in the path of righteousness, you must place yourselves under the rule of the King of Sion, you must take the law from his lips, you must yield a cheerful, and impartial, and constant obedience to his holy commandments,—supplicating him for help to resist temptation, and animated with the hope of that glory which is to crown your steadfastness in the work of the Lord. It is only when such is the temper which you cultivate, and such the principles which you cherish, and such the conduct which you maintain—it is only then that there is evidence of the work of conversion having been accomplished in your hearts, and that you can entertain the hope of being ultimately partakers of that happiness to which the Gospel of the kingdom has taught you to aspire.

And now, my friends, having made these remarks on this most interesting and important subject, I request your serious and considerate attention to them. Some, no doubt, will be disposed to ridicule what has been said as fanciful or fanatical. Ridicule, however, is not the proper test of any truth, least of all is it the test of divine truth; and let such scoffers be warned, at least if they will not believe, that the day is approaching when their mirth shall be turned into mourning, and when the words of the Lord Jesus, which they now mock at, shall judge and condemn them.

There are others who cannot take the trouble, or make the sacrifices, which conversion requires at their hands, though they are convinced of its necessity. But why talk of trouble or of sacrifices, when the fruit of it all is to be everlasting life? Nothing surely can be reasonably grudged, which is to terminate in such a great and glorious result. And He who calls upon you to be converted, and to become as little children, has promised to be your help in the time of need, and to give you his Spirit to make you a willing and obedient people in the day of his power.

And there are not a few who know that they must be converted, and intend to give themselves to this necessary work, but who procrastinate from day to day, and from year to year, as if every thing else were of greater consequence than turning to God. Ah! my friends, time is short, and time is uncertain. Trust not to a future opportunity, while it is called to-day. The period to which you are delaying your conversion, may never arrive. Death may snatch you away in an unexpected moment; and then a moral change is impracticable and impossible. Now then repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out. "Turn ye, turn ye; for why will ye die?"

And let those who have turned to the Lord, and tasted that he is gracious, abound in thanksgiving for his distinguishing and converting mercy. Let them magnify him who has called them out of darkness into his marvellous light. Let them live to his praise and glory. Let them be encouraged, by the assurance that He who has begun a good work in them, will perform it until the day of Christ. And let them, by their prudent counsel, and by their holy example, and by their pious labours, study to convert their brethren to the knowledge and obedience of the truth, and thus co-operate with that blessed Redeemer, to whom they owe their eternal hope, and who has left upon record that awful yet compassionate declaration, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

THE HERMIT CRAB, AND THE PARASITE ACTINEA.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDSBOURGH,
Minister of Stevenston.

WELL may we say "the Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." "The earth is full of thy riches, so is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. These wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. That thou givest them they gather: thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good."

What wonders are there in the mighty deep! And how many lessons are yet to be learned from the countless creatures which it contains! We felt considerably interested of late, in contemplating the wisdom and goodness of God, as manifested in the natural history of two little inhabitants of the changeful sea; the Hermit Crab, and the Parasite Actinea, whom we conjoin for a reason that will afterwards appear.

The Hermit Crab can scarcely be unknown to those who have ever engaged in the delectable amusement of gathering shells on the sea-shore. It inhabits univalves, and is generally supposed to be a young lobster. It is called the Hermit Crab, we suppose, because it lodges in the cavity of the shell, as in a cell. It needs protection, for its tail or hinder part is very tender, being destitute of the crust, by which the body and claws are protected; and would be very liable to injury, were it not inserted in the shell. On the least alarm it shrinks into its adopted dwelling-place, so that the whole of the animal is protected by the shell. The shell in which it is found when young, is often the little silver trochus. As it increases in size it removes, and often enters into the common welk; and when it is full-grown, it takes possession of one suited to its magnitude, and is then found in the large roaring buchie, which, in common parlance, we believe, comprehends both the buccinum undatum, and the fusus antiquus of Conchologists.

We shall not do our little marine hermit the injustice to suppose, that it takes violent possession of the shell, during the life-time of its rightful proprietor. We are the more inclined to acquit it of all such piratical practices, from knowing that there is another Soldier, or Hermit Crab, in the East Indies, which, when it has outgrown the shell in which it dwelt when young, is often seen selecting a larger habitation from amongst the empty shells on the shore,—trying several before it can be satisfied,—contending for a fine looking shell with others that are on the look-out for a new house; and if successful, parading up and down in the presence of its weaker antagonists.

We may see the goodness of God in teaching our own little red-coated Hermit of the deep, instinctively to seek, and pertinaciously to cling to, the refuge which has been provided for it; and when we behold it secure from its persecutors, within its shelly habitation, should we not think of the Lord's far greater goodness to us, in providing for us an impregnable city of refuge,—a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the storm,—in which, amidst the munition of rocks, we may bid defiance to our most formidable foes.

But it is time that we should turn to our Actinea, for which we do not know any English name. The Actinea is a Zoophyte, that is, it partakes of the nature both of a vegetable and an animal. There is one kind of Actinea very common on our shore, adhering to rocks like a little hemispherical mass of brown jelly. In this state it seems lifeless; but if observed for any time when covered with sea-water, it will soon be seen to spread out its numerous feelers like the petals of a flower, so as considerably to resemble a double Anemone.

As far as we know, however, the Parasite Actinea has not been observed by the naturalists of this country. In the "Annales des Sciences," published at Paris in August 1836, it is mentioned by M. Dugès of Montpellier as a new species. It has been known to us for more than seven years, and it is not very uncommon on the shore of this parish. We were indebted, however, to the French naturalist for some interesting traits of its history. It always attaches itself to a univalve shell, and never to any but those that are inhabited by the Hermit Crab, Pagurus Bernhardus. The only shell on which we have observed it, is the Natica glaucina, better known to our children by the name of China Welk; but though we observed the Hermit in the shell, we were not aware till we read the article by

M. Dugès, that the Zoophyte was never found adhering to any shells except those which the Hermit Crab inhabited.

As they are thus conjoined, and as the mouth of the Zoophyte is always opposite to the mouth of the crab, M. Dugès supposes that the Actines feeds on the remains of the Hermit's food. What a beautiful arrangement is thus made by Him, who is wise as he is good, for the support of one of his seemingly helpless creatures! Who knows but the little Zoophyte, feeble though it seems, may, in some way or other, play the part of the lion's provider? M. Dugès has given it the name of L'Actine parasite, and we are not disposed to quarrel with the specific name, provided it be understood in its original sense. Greek scholars know, that the word parasite originally signified one who takes his food along with another, an invited guest, and not as it did afterwards, one of those contemptible beings, who gain their welcome to the feast by flattery. Our little Actines gains his welcome by his worth. He is a tent-maker, and he enlarges the bounds of the Hermit's habitation, so as to form a pavilion of finer workmanship than any of which Solomon, in all his glory, could ever boast. That the Hermit is a gainer by the partnership, is evident from this, that he might at any time, if he were so disposed, dissolve it. He has only to quit his hold, and the poor Actines would be at the mercy of the waves. He keeps his hold, because the Actines, by enlarging his mantle, and strengthening it by a herby substance which he has the power of secreting, forms a cell suited to the increasing size of the crab, and capable also of containing its numerous eggs. See we not here the advantage of dwelling together in unity; and how much it is the duty of the strong to be helpful to the weak, and that even the weak may have the pleasure of contributing to the happiness of the strong.

As God, we doubt not, has adorned this little creature that we may adore Him in his works, we must not fail to mention the beauty of this unnoticed Actines. It is of a soft consistency, not unlike that of the human eye. The milky white ground is marked with numerous dots of the most brilliant purple; and from these dots or pores proceed, at times, very delicate threads of the richest violet colour. Surmounting the shell, it thus forms for the little Hermit a lobed cloak of richer colouring than any imperial robe.

"Who can paint like nature!" and if nature's God adorn with the most brilliant colours of the rainbow this little Zoophyte, which forms the link betwixt animate and inanimate creation; and if he bind together by a covenant of reciprocal advantages these tiny messmates of the deep, O, will he be forgetful of those for whom, at an inconceivable price, he has provided the hidden manna, and the pure streams of the water of life; and whom beholding in the face of his Son, he has bound unto himself in a better covenant, saying, "I will be merciful unto your unrighteousness; your sins and your iniquities will I remember no more."

ON GRATITUDE.

By THOMAS BROWN, Esq.,

Author of the "Reminiscences of an Old Traveller."

GRATITUDE, like some other words flourishing in our dictionaries, is of very doubtful application, and seldom witnessed as an active principle in the commerce of life. Considered as a great moral virtue, it is valued by every one, and there is nothing, to all appearance, which hurts the pride and feelings of a man so much as to be supposed insensible to, and ungrateful for favours received, and benefits conferred. Such, however, is the depraved and callous state of the human heart, that a feeling predominates the very reverse of that of gratitude, and no man who has had much experience will attempt to deny or controvert this melancholy fact.

Where does man, for example, shew a proper degree of gratitude towards his Creator? He may, no doubt, attend public worship, and also, in private, address his prayers and supplications to the Author of his existence; but where is the warmth of devotion, the melting of the soul in gratitude, love, and praise? From the moment man enters on the stage of the world, till the period of his dissolution, he is engrossed by the cares, and trials, and pleasures of this passing scene; his thoughts are rivetted to the earth, and he looks unmoved on the sublime objects of nature, and is unaffected by these demonstrations of a Creator's mercy and love. He sees, every morning, the sun rise above the horizon, to give life to the vegetable world, to illumine the whole face of nature, and to animate and cheer the heart of man, and he passes on without being lost in admiration of the sublime spectacle, and without pouring forth his whole soul in gratitude to the Great Source, the divine Architect of this stupendous fabric. Does man ever think of the days of his infancy, when an unseen power watched over his cradle, when an unseen hand protected him from danger, when a goodness beyond compare fashioned his body, and gradually developed the faculties of his mind? Does he ever look back to a more advanced period of life, when the Almighty, in mercy, led him through dangers innumerable, prospered all his undertakings, and bestowed upon him so many unmerited blessings and comforts? Then, when the last stage of all is closed by mental and physical decrepitude, the same beneficent power sheds a mild influence over the sick-bed of the dying, and cheers the drooping soul in the last moments of existence. In the midst of all such blessings, thoughtless man passes on, seldom or ever thinking on the Source of these ever renewed mercies. His reasoning powers are directed towards other objects, his desires confined to the possession of worldly wealth and distinction, which he knows, in a few short years, must pass into other hands, and he is convinced, at last, on the borders of the grave, that he has been drawn away by shadows, and misled by the gay and airy phantoms of his deceitful imagination.

Such, to the end, is his thoughtlessness, his inconsistency, his ingratitude! He leaves the world with regret, and to the last moment of existence he clings to the false and glittering treasure which had been the summit of his ambition, as if its possession was destined to be the sole object of an immortal soul!

If we look to the concerns of life and the conduct of man, throughout the whole of his earthly pilgrimage, we see the same coldness, indifference, and ingratitude towards his brethren of mankind. Engrossed by his own private views, he thinks of nothing but self-aggrandisement, in defiance of the ties of nature and the laws of morality. There are, no doubt, splendid exceptions to this sweeping observation. There are characters which appear upon the stage of the world, still retaining the stamp of a divine impression, and whose kindly and benevolent feelings are ever actively manifested in assisting, in relieving, and in loving their fellow-creatures; but these form a small proportion only of the great family of mankind, and the reward of their good actions is in their own feelings; for from those on whom they bestow their kind and affectionate regard, they seldom experience any thing but coldness, indifference, and ingratitude. With what constant solicitude and care does the fond mother watch over the early years of her rising offspring! What pains are taken to rear the young plant, and to water it with the tears of tenderness and love! How anxious are the parents to furnish the young mind with lessons of virtue and goodness,—to expand the faculties, that they may, in due time, blossom into usefulness, and produce fruits in abundance,—to prepare their children to act their part honestly and honourably in society, so as to be a credit to themselves and their connections. In how many cases are all the cares and troubles of the parents thrown away; how often is their wisdom, the fruits of long experience, held in derision; their advice despised, as the offspring of timidity and foolish old age, and their love and affection repaid with disobedience and ingratitude!

The rash youth enters upon the stage of life, confiding solely in his own wisdom. He launches his little bark, and begins his voyage to unknown regions, fearless of the dangers he has to encounter; for a time he goes on prosperously, every thing smiles around him, and he thinks he has discovered at last that the wisdom of youth is better than an age of experience. In the midst of security his prospects change, the sky begins to lower, the clouds of disappointment gather around him, he is tossed about by the eddies of contending currents, and at last his frail vessel is either wrecked on far distant lands, or suddenly disappears in the gaping Maelstrom. He now awakes from his dream of security; and when reason and reflection resume their dominion, he thinks with remorse on the foolish, unnatural, and ungrateful part he has acted towards his best friends and wellwishers. He tries to regain the ground he has lost, but 'tis in vain; he endeavours to establish a character for steadiness and consistency, but 'tis too late; he looks to the friends of his youth, to his old advisers, for their assistance and support, but 'tis fruitless. He has lost their attachment by his folly; he has forfeited their friendship by his self-sufficiency, rashness, and ingratitude, and he never recovers their affection, which is alienated from him, and conferred upon other more deserving objects. Thus he is left to pine away, and to end his days in sorrow and neglect; the world abandons him to his own resources and reflections, and to that cold, calculating philosophy, which never cherished, never communicated the kindest feelings of our nature. The man who has no gratitude, sooner or later becomes the dupe of his own machinations and selfishness, and he discovers, when too late, that it is much easier to deceive himself, when he thinks himself secure, than to impose upon others by his flimsy artifices. When men are grateful for favours conferred upon them, they will continue to be rewarded with the regard and good will of others. They must be open, candid, and sincere. Cloisters and convents are the proper abodes of mystery and jesuitism; where there is no confidence, there can be no friendship, and those who have not the feeling of gratitude in their nature, will be guilty of the meanest and most ignoble artifices to obtain their end.

Louis XIV. of France, at the end of his reign, after carrying on interminable war with all his neighbours, persecuting and exterminating his Protestant subjects for their religious opinions, and squandering the wealth of the nation in acts of senseless prodigality among his flatterers and dependents, observed to one of his courtiers, "When I bestow a favour, I make a hundred persons discontented, and one ungrateful," thus affording a memorable example of the depravity and meanness of the sycophants who surrounded his throne.

It is pleasing to record an anecdote displaying feelings of a very different and more amiable nature, which occurred in France in the reign immediately preceding this. The French Academy was then founded under the protection and special patronage of the Prime Minister, the Cardinal Richelieu. The principal charge of finishing the dictionary of the Academy was committed to Monsieur de Vaugelas, one of its members, on whom, through the interest of the cardinal, a pension was bestowed by the king, of two thousand livres. After this circumstance was known, Monsieur de Vaugelas waited on the cardinal, who said to him, smiling, and in reference to the wording of the dictionary, "Well, Sir, you will not forget, I hope, the word pension;" M. de Vaugelas immediately answered, "No, my lord, and still less that of gratitude."

If we thus see earthly potentates, clothed for a while with a little brief authority, exposed so often to the depravity and ingratitude of men, how shall we feel when we carry our thoughts to the sublime and transcendent spectacle of our merciful Saviour and Redeemer, suffering on the cross for our sakes, and exposed to the taunts, contumely, and base ingratitude of a bigoted and ignorant multitude—who, "when he was reviled, reviled not again;" but, with peaceful submission to the will of his Father, and under sufferings the most agonizing, he left an example to the human race in every age, which it is their duty and their interest ever to keep in view, and, as far as they are able, to imitate.

Resignation to the divine will has been the comfort and the solace of good men at all times; and while they are conscious of the integrity of their intentions, and fulfil, as far as they are able, the duties imposed upon them, they may look with indifference on the ingratitude of man, and will ever find consolation in that exquisite peace of mind which arises from the nature of their own reflections, and which gradually prepares them for the reward of their anxiety and labours while on earth,—joy without end in a better world.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Condescension and Love of Christ.—The meanest beggar, the vilest wretch, the most loathsome, depraved, abandoned sinner, is perfectly welcome to the arms and heart of the Saviour, if he comes with the temper of the penitent prodigal. To all who come with this temper, he ever lends a gracious ear, he listens to catch the first penitential sigh, he watches their feeble steps towards the path of duty, he prevents them with his grace, hastens to meet them, and while they are ready to sink at his feet with mingled shame, confusion, and grief, he puts underneath his everlasting arms, embraces, cheers, supports, and comforts them, wipes away their tears, washes away their stains, clothes them with his righteousness, unites them to himself for ever, and feeds them with the bread and water of life. Thus he binds up the broken reed, enkindles the smoking flax, and, like a most tender, compassionate shepherd, he gathers the helpless lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom. Thus, by the condescending grace of our Immanuel, heaven is brought down to earth; the awful majesty and inaccessible glories of Jehovah are shrouded in a veil of flesh, a new and living way is opened for our return to God; and sinful, guilty worms of the dust may talk with their Maker face to face, as a man talketh to his friend. Trembling sinner, desponding Christian, why do you linger, why do you fall back? It is to Christ, it is to Jesus, it is to the babe of Bethlehem, to a man like yourselves, to the meek and lowly Saviour of sinners, that I would bring you. Here are no terrors, no flaming sword, no burning throne to appal you. Come, then, to his feet, to his arms, to his heart, which overflows with compassion to your perishing souls. Come and contemplate the glory of the Father, full of grace and truth, and receive of his fulness grace for grace.—PAYSON.

The Hour of Death.—Recollect there will be an hour of your life,—the last,—when the sweetest music that ever reached your ear would be the voice that would whisper, with an authority from God, that "yours was the kingdom of heaven." It would make the blood thrill freely again through the frame from which it was just ebbing and subsiding; it would make the faint lips colour and utter a gasp of thankfulness, that appeared to have been locked in everlasting silence; it would make the eyes open with a gleam of joy, that appeared to have been closed for ever. Have you felt any thing like this?—Wolfe's Remains.

THE SABBATH.

LORD of the Sabbath and its light !
 I hail thy hallow'd day of rest ;
 It is my weary soul's delight,
 The solace of my care-worn breast.
 Its dewy morn—its glowing noon—
 Its tranquil eve—its solemn night—
 Pass sweetly ; but they pass too soon,
 And leave me sadden'd at their flight.
 Yet sweetly as they glide along,
 And hallow'd tho' the calm they yield ;
 Transporting tho' their rapt'rous song,
 And heav'nly visions seem reveal'd :
 My soul is desolate and drear,
 My silent harp untun'd remains ;
 Unless, my Saviour, thou art near,
 To heal my wounds and soothe my pains.
 O ever, ever let me hail
 Thy presence with thy day of rest .
 Then will thy servant never fail
 To deem thy Sabbath doubly blest.

EAST.

A SABBATH MEDITATION.

WITH silent awe I hail the sacred morn,
 That slowly wakes while all the fields are still ;
 A soothing calm on every breeze is borne,
 A graver murmur gurgles from the rill,
 And echo answers softer from the hill,
 And softer sings the linnet from the thorn ;
 The skylark warbles in a tone less shrill.
 Hail, light serene ! hail, sacred Sabbath morn !
 The rooks float silently, in airy dove ;
 The sun a placid yellow lustre throws ;
 The gales, that lately sighed along the grove,
 Have hushed their downy wings in dead repose :
 The hovering rack of clouds forgets to move :—
 So smiled the day when the first morn arose.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Death of Eliza Cunningham.—Miss Eliza Cunningham was the niece of the Rev. J. Newton, of London, and, on the death of her mother, was received and adopted into his family. "From what I had heard of Eliza," says her excellent uncle, "I was prepared to love her before I saw her ; although she came afterwards into my hands like a heap of untold gold, which, when counted over, proves to be a larger sum than was expected." Her delicate constitution received a severe shock before she left Scotland, the place of her nativity, so that, during her residence in London, she languished more or less under disease, which, at length, terminated in a fatal consumption. A little before her death, Mrs Newton said to her, "My dear, I have been very anxiously concerned for your life." "But I hope," said she, "my dear aunt, you are not so now. My views of things have been for some time very different from what they were when I came to you. I have seen and felt the vanity of childhood and youth." "I believe, my dear Eliza," continued her aunt, "you have long made conscience of secret prayer." "Yes," she replied, "I have long and earnestly sought the Lord, with reference to the change that is now approaching. I have not that full assurance which is very desirable ; but I have a hope, I trust a good hope ; and I believe the Lord will give me whatever he sees necessary for me, before he takes me hence. I have prayed to him to fit me for himself ; and then, whether I die sooner or later, it signifies but little." On the day of her death, when her physician asked her how she was, she answered, "Truly happy ; and, if this be dying, it is a pleasant thing to die." To her uncle she said, "I would not exchange my condition with any person upon earth. O how gracious is the Lord to me ! O what a change is before me !" Looking affectionately at her aunt, she said, "Do not weep for me, my dear aunt ; but rather rejoice, and give praise on my account." To her most constant attendant, she said, "Be sure you continue to call upon the Lord ; and if you think he does not hear you now, he will at last, as he has heard me." She spoke a great deal to an intimate friend, who was with her every day. Amongst other things, she said, "See how comfortable the Lord can make a dying bed !" After her uncle had prayed with her, she exclaimed, "I am ready to say, 'Why are His chariot wheels so long in coming ?' But I hope He will enable me to wait his hour with patience." "Towards seven o'clock," says Mr Newton, "I was walking in the garden, and earnestly engaged in prayer for her, when a servant came to me, and said, 'She is gone !' I ran up stairs, and our whole little family was soon collected round her bed. She lay upon her left side, with her cheek gently inclining upon her hand, as if in a sweet sleep ; and I thought there was a smile upon her countenance. Never, surely, did death appear in a more beautiful, inviting form ! We fell upon our knees, and I returned, I think I may say, my most unfeigned thanks to our God and Saviour, for his abundant goodness to her ; crowned in this last instance by giving her so gentle a dismission." Thus died this pious and amiable young lady, in the fifteenth year of her age.

Rev. Robert Hall.—A remarkable instance of the ardent attachment of the late Rev. Robert Hall, to the memory of his father, occurred on a visit to Armsby, his native place ; and is thus related by the Rev. Dr Cox :—On the way from Leicester his mind was filled with recollections of his father, and the scene of his earliest days. No sooner did he enter the house, than he hastened into the parlour, fell upon his knees, and poured forth the most fervent and humble supplications. Wishing not to interrupt these sacred moments, the two or three individuals who witnessed the intensity of his feelings, withdrew. Soon afterwards he went into the burial-ground, and dropping on his knees at his father's grave, with his hands extended over the top of the monumental stone, and his eyes closed, but at intervals lifted up to heaven, he offered up a most remarkable prayer. It showed that a holy fire was burning within, and was characterised by simplicity, pathos, earnestness, and humility. He breathed forth an impassioned desire to "join the blessed company above," entreated that he might be permitted to know "his departed father, and that their united prayers on earth might then be turned into praise, while they together beheld their Redeemer face to face."

THOUGHTS ON THE UNION OF THE DIVINE AND HUMAN NATURES IN THE PERSON OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER WATT, A. M.

THAT the union of deity and humanity did exist in the person of Christ when on earth, and still exists in heaven, is a truth with which most of us have been familiar from our earliest years; and it is a doctrine which it is essential for every man to believe before he can obtain any just views of the Gospel scheme of salvation. The union of these two natures in the person of the Son of God did not at all change the distinctive properties of either. As Immanuel God with us, Christ was invested with all the attributes of the Godhead; while as man, all the innocent feelings, wants, and infirmities of our nature, are ascribed to him. As God, he knew all things, he was everywhere present, and he frequently manifested exhibitions of divine power. As man, he suffered hunger and thirst, he was weary and sorrowful, he was mortal, and at last yielded to the power of death. Hence we sometimes find the limited powers of a finite being ascribed to Christ, and at another time the perfections of divinity are said to belong to him. In the former of these characters, Christ is represented as being ignorant of the time when the last judgment shall take place: "Of that day knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son;" and in the latter he is said "to know all things." This mysterious union of the divine and human natures, in the person of our Redeemer, is an indissoluble and eternal union. Christ will never lay aside that nature, in which the work of man's redemption was finished. That nature arose in triumph from the grave, and ascended in glory to heaven. In this nature, Christ, at this very moment, continues to discharge the triumphant part of his mediatorial work, appearing in the presence of God for us as the great High Priest of his redeemed people. And in this nature shall the Son of man come at the last day to judge the world; and through eternity, the Lamb that was slain, shall continue to be the everlasting light of heaven, and the glorified head of the whole creation. When we glance at the work of redemption which Christ had to accomplish before any one sinner could be saved, we can hardly fail to be struck with the depth of the divine wisdom which is displayed in the constitution of Christ's person, as the man Christ Jesus, and yet "Him in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." He had to atone for human guilt, and to satisfy the demands of God's violated law. For such an undertaking no being in the wide universe could have been qualified. There was to be united in one person the wonderful combination of a being possessing the same nature as that in which man had sinned, and that nature in all its original purity and innocence,—of a being clothed in humanity, and yet having a right to dispose of life as a substitute for others,—of a being whose obedience and death would possess such a value as to render them an adequate atonement for sin, which is an evil of infinite magnitude. Deity could never have suffered, and every created intelligence would have successively sunk under the load of human guilt, had they attempted to bear its overwhelming weight, or to make satisfaction for transgression. It is in the person of him who was God-man that we see a Mediator who could stand betwixt God and a rebel world, and who was in every way fitted to make reconciliation by the blood of his cross. The very act of Christ's taking a human body and a human soul into union with his divinity, was the volition of Deity contemplating all the results which were to flow from that union. He assumed human nature for the express purpose of laying down his life a ransom for many, and over that life he had a supreme control. All that Christ did, therefore, while on earth, may be considered in one view as the volitions of Deity acting in concert with those of his humanity. The divine nature of Christ thus stamps its own dignity upon the whole mediatorial work of Christ: it was the work of God manifest in the flesh. It is this consideration which imparts a moral value to the obedience of Christ as made under the law,—a value which never could attach to that of any other created being, however pure and perfect its obedience might be. It was the human nature of incarnate Deity which appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh, and was placed in circumstances of trial, temptation, and sorrow, which never were, and never could be, the lot of a being of spotless innocence, unless voluntarily submitted to. Christ submitted to a life of ignominy and woe, which perhaps no created being, however holy, could have endured without sin, as no holy creature had ever till then experienced any thing but happiness under the moral government of God. But perfect moral purity and uninterrupted sorrow were, for the first time, to dwell in the same bosom. Nor can we rightly estimate how much the aid of Christ's divinity was necessary to support his human nature when exhibiting to heaven and earth the new moral phenomenon of a life of holiness being that of unparalleled suffering and grief. There must have been a strength of temptation continually presented to Christ, and a power of resistance and of patient endurance manifested on his part, of which we can form but a feeble idea. The broken law was thus magnified in that very nature in which it had been transgressed, while, at the same time, the glory of divine perfection was intimately connected with every one act of that obedience.

But not only in the life, but still more strikingly in the atoning death of Christ, do we see the necessity of "God manifest in the flesh," coming into the world as the substitute for sinners. The sacrifice which was to atone for human guilt required to be of infinite value, and yet only a finite creature could suffer and die. Neither the sufferings of men nor of angels could have exhausted the wrath of God due to sin. It was the mysterious death of the Son of God upon the cross, who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself as a sacrifice to divine justice, which possessed value enough to take away the sin of the world. It was humanity suffering, while Deity stamped its own glory on the sacrifice, which presented to the Almighty an all-sufficient propitiation for transgression.

In a practical point of view, how admirably suited to the circumstances of our fallen nature is this doctrine! In the human nature of Christ, have we not the love of God to sinners brought down to our capacities, and manifested through the sympathies and feelings of our own nature? Oh! how unlike a mere cold speculation, how fitted to affect the heart and all the moral sensibilities of the soul, is the eventful history of the tender-hearted God-man, while living amongst sinners on earth! As no man ever spake like this man, so no man ever acted like him, in whose bosom compassion ever dwelt, and whose commiseration with human woe, no apathy ever chilled. Read the reality and depth of the divine love to sinners, in every act of benevolence which the Saviour performed, as well as in every suffering which he endured. Who can peruse the simple story of the evangelists, without perceiving that he literally went about doing good? No sufferer ever applied to him and was denied relief, he was ever ready to console the mourner, and to heal the wounded in spirit. How often did his presence gladden the disconsolate dwelling, and how frequently was his power exerted to relieve the distressed! Think of the cases of the importunate centurion, of the imploring Jairus, of the mourning widow of Nain, and of Lazarus; and never was commiseration for the sufferings of others more affectingly exhibited than at the very moment when, as the Son of God was extended on the cross, abandoned by heaven and earth, the condition of his sorrowful mother called forth his compassion, and he exclaimed to him whom, while on earth, he loved most, "Behold thy mother." In the numerous instances of the Saviour's love which he has left on record for our encouragement, do we not see exhibited in the most striking manner, his willingness to save to the very uttermost, every sinner who flies to him as the only refuge for the guilty? While the compassion of him who, when on earth, was the friend of sinners, and the comforter of the mourner, is a view of Christ's character so well fitted to gain the affections and to hush to rest the disquietudes of the afflicted, how suited, at the same time, to convey solid peace and everlasting consolation to the awakened mind of every sinner, is the consideration that every invitation, every promise, every encouragement which proceeded from Christ's mouth, were the words of "God, manifest in the flesh." It is this conviction which invests them with all their power to dissipate the sinner's fears, and to awaken in the mind of the believer an unshaken confidence. His words ought to be as spirit and life to the soul, and to abide in us as a well of living water, springing up unto eternal life.

But this union of deity and humanity is also intimately connected with all that Christ is now carrying on in heaven for the salvation of his people, as well as with what he has already finished on earth. As our great high priest, Jesus has passed into the heavens, to appear and to intercede in the presence of God for us. It is his glorified human nature in which he acts in that character. By appearing as the Lamb that was slain in the midst of the throne, he makes the incense of that sacrifice, which he once offered on earth, still ascend before God as an everlasting memorial of his redeeming love to man, and of the efficacy of his atonement, as the ground upon which every blessing is dispensed to his Church upon earth. No doctrine is more essential to the Christian's stability, peace, and consolation, in every situation in which he may be placed, than the belief, that the same Saviour who died on earth, and manifested such love to sinners, now lives and reigns in heaven as a compassionate high priest, who is touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and who himself having suffered, being tempted, is able to sympathise with those who suffer, and to succour those who are tempted; and that, as the mediatorial King of Zion, he has all power committed to him, for the purpose of strengthening, supporting, and defending those who are his followers. However numerous, therefore, may be their spiritual enemies, and whatever may be the difficulties with which they are called to struggle, yet he will lead them in triumph over every obstacle, and finally make them more than conquerors through Him that has loved them.

This view of God manifest in the flesh, acting as our Mediator in the presence of God, is what every man professes to believe who makes mention of the name of Christ in his various acts of religious worship, and who, in that name, concludes all his petitions, as the only medium through which they are to find acceptance with the Almighty. And were the power and faithfulness of the Redeemer, as the exalted, living head of his Church, more firmly believed in and relied upon by Christians, would not this belief banish from the mind many a fear, and administer consolation in many a time of trial? Into his hand is specially committed the mediatorial government of our world, and in that hand he holds the destiny of every nation, as well as of every individual; and he is now saying, amid all the proud waves of the world's present infidel opposition, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF JAMES RENWICK,

THE LAST OF THE SCOTTISH MARTYRS.

In the beginning of the year 1685, Charles the second died, and the covenanters enjoyed a short respite from the fierce persecutions with which they had been visited. A few months, however, had only elapsed, when James VII., who succeeded his brother Charles, openly avowed it to be his determination to extirpate Presbyterianism from the land. Against this popish and tyrannical monarch, Mr Renwick, at the request of the United Societies, drew up a declaration, which was published at Sanquhar on the 28th of May. A few days before the appearance of this declaration, the Earl of Argyll, with the consent of a number of exiled noblemen, set sail for Scotland with an expedition, intending, if possible, to overturn the government of James. It was fully expected by the Earl and his adherents, that their enterprise would be gladly hailed by the covenanters. In this, however, they were disappointed. Mr Renwick, in the name of the party, declined all interference, chiefly on the ground that the expedition "was not concerted according to the ancient plea of the Scottish covenanters, in defence of our reformation expressly, according to our covenants, national and solemn league."

This refusal was a source of great uneasiness to Mr Renwick, from the reproaches which were heaped upon him, more especially by some of the Presbyterians who had come to Scotland along with the Earl of Argyll. One of the most virulent calumniators of Renwick was Robert Cathcart, who accused him of error, heresy, and pride. These accusations were fully answered, but no means were left untried to weaken the influence and destroy the usefulness of this devoted servant of the Lord. With the utmost meekness he endured all the reproaches of his open enemies or pretended friends; but his mind was deeply affected by the alienation of one who, though personally unknown to him, was dear to him as his own soul. This was Mr Alexander Peden, who had put faith in the statements of Mr Renwick's opponents, and had, in consequence, disclaimed all interest in him. It is gratifying, however, to think that on his death-bed Mr Peden acknowledged the error into which he had fallen. Having sent for Mr Renwick, the following interview took place:—

"Are you the Mr James Renwick about whom there is so much noise?" "Father," replied Mr Renwick, "my name is James Renwick, but I have given the world no ground to make any noise about me, for I have espoused no new principles or practices, but what our reformers and covenanters maintained." Mr Peden then desired him to give a distinct account of his principles, which Mr Renwick having done, the dying saint thus addressed him: "Sir, you have answered me to my soul's satisfaction. I am very sorry that I should have believed any such evil reports of you, which not only quenched my love to, and marred my sympathy with you, but led me to express myself bitterly against you; for all which I have sadly smarted. But, Sir, ere you go, you must pray for me; for I am old, and going to leave the world." With this request Mr Renwick cheerfully complied; upon which Mr Peden took him by the hand, saying, "Sir, I find you a faithful servant to your Master. Go on in a single dependence upon the Lord, and ye will get honestly through, and clear off the stage, when many others who hold their heads high will lie in the mire and make foul hands and garments."

Mr Renwick felt too strongly the importance and responsibility of his office as an ambassador of Christ, to be deterred by reproach or persecution from making full proof of his ministry. He preached, catechised, and dispensed sealing ordinances to the oppressed wanderers, who were scattered up and down the country like sheep upon the mountains. His adherents, instead of diminishing, were every day on the increase; and it soon became apparent to the Council, that unless decisive steps were taken, they would become a very powerful body. The most strenuous efforts, accordingly, were made to crush the good cause, and, as one of the most effectual means of doing so, the military not merely dragged to prison, or cruelly murdered all the covenanters who fell in their way, but they redoubled their exertions to secure the person of Mr Renwick, whom they considered as the leader of the party. Still he and his followers assembled, as often as they conveniently could, for the worship of the God of their fathers. And not only so, but they held stated meetings to concert measures for their own defence. At one of these meetings a paper was drawn up, entitled the "Informatory Vindication," which having been revised by Mr Renwick, was printed in Holland, and circulated throughout the kingdom. In that paper they avowed it to be their determination to maintain and contend for the principles of the Reformation. A declaration of this nature only enraged the government the more against them. James, accordingly, under the mask of tolerating "moderate" Presbyterians, issued three different proclamations, threatening vengeance against the more resolute of the party. Some individuals, not being aware of the hidden purpose which the crafty monarch had in view, to support Popery, accepted the indulgence held out to them. Mr Renwick and his adherents, however, decidedly refused to avail themselves of the offer made, declaring that "nothing can be more vile than when the true religion is tolerated under the notion of a crime, and when the exercise of it is allowed only under heavy restrictions."

The decided opposition which Mr Renwick had made to the indulgence, led those who had yielded to the tempting bait, to load him with reproaches and calumnies of every kind. But, amid all the persecution of treacherous friends, he manifested an equal firmness with that which he had displayed when exposed to persecution from his open enemies. He knew that, in present circumstances, his time on earth would be short, and therefore he exerted himself to the utmost in warning, exhorting, and encouraging his afflicted countrymen. "Our troubles are growing," says he at this time,

"and enemies are stretching out their hands violently to persecute; and they want not instigations from our false brethren; so we are made the contempt of the proud, and the scorn of them that are at ease. Our sufferings were always rightly stated, but never so clearly as now; and why should we not endure these trials? for they shall work for truth's victory, and Christ's glory. O let all the suffering remnant keep clean hands, for therein shall be their strength; and wait with patience, for He will not tarry, who cometh to plead his own cause, to lay claim to his own interest, that is basely and deceitfully abandoned, and betrayed into the hands of man, to give a fair decision."

Mr Renwick's zeal in his Master's cause, far from being checked by the dangers to which he was subjected, only became the more ardent and persevering; and although the council had, in the course of five months after the toleration was granted, made no fewer than fifteen desperate attempts to apprehend him, this devoted servant of God continued instant in season and out of season, preaching the Gospel both publicly and privately. It was evident, however, to himself as well as to his friends that, amid such vigilance on the part of his enemies, and with a price of one hundred pounds set upon his head, he must ere long fall a victim to the relentless fury of James and his minions. Knowing, therefore, that his end was approaching, he drew up a paper against the indulgence, and hastened to Edinburgh, in the beginning of January 1688, with the design of presenting it to a meeting of the tolerated ministers which was expected to take place. Finding, on his arrival in town, that the information he had received, concerning the meeting, was incorrect, he lodged his protestation in the hands of Mr Hugh Kennedy, the moderator of their last meeting. He now set out for Fife where he preached several sermons, and again crossing the Firth, preached at Borrowstouness. This was the last discourse Mr Renwick preached in public, and the concluding sentences of it clearly show the fidelity and uncompromising firmness with which he declared the truth. "It is a sure token of sad wrath and desolation approaching, when preaching hath little or no other effect than to make the hearts of people more fat, their ears heavy, and to shut their eyes that they neither see, hear, nor understand, for then may we look for dreadful desolations, as it is in Isa. vi. 9-12. O, this is the great sin of Scotland, that the report of the Gospel hath not been believed by the generality of the people; that that which the faithful ministers of Christ have had in commission from him to tell them, hath not been credited as it should. And what doth this say, but that desolation and wrath are approaching? Happy are they who are preparing for the same."

Mr Renwick returned to Edinburgh on the 30th January, and lodged in a friend's house on the Castle-hill. Here he was apprehended. A custom-house officer having received information, went to the house, pretending to be in search of contraband goods. No sooner had he got admission than he recognized Mr Renwick, and called his associates to assist him in carrying "the dog Renwick," as he termed him, to prison. Perceiving that he was now in imminent danger of being taken, however, the intrepid covenanter made a violent effort and escaped, but having received a blow from one of the party, he fell several times in running down the Castle-wynd, and he had scarcely reached the head of the Cowgate when he was seized and lodged in the guard-house. He was afterwards committed to prison, and laid in irons.

"Chan. Of what persuasion are you? Res. of the protestant presbyterian persuasion." Chan. How comes it to pass that you differ so much from other presbyterians who have accepted the toleration and owned the king's authority? And what do you think of them? Res. I am a presbyterian, and adhere to the old presbyterian principles,—principles which all are obliged by the covenant to maintain, and which were once professed and maintained by the nation from 1640 to 1660, from which the clergy have apostatised for a little liberty—they know not how long,—as you yourselves have done for a little honour. Chan. We believe that these are the presbyterian principles, and that all presbyterians would own them as well as you, if they had but the courage."

On the 3d of February, Mr Renwick was served with an indictment to stand trial before the High Court of Justiciary. Meanwhile his mother was permitted to visit him in prison. On one of these occasions, he expressed to her his regret at parting with his poor flock, but he added, "'That if it were his choice, he could not think of it without terror to enter again into, and venture upon, that conflict with a body of sin and death; yet if he were again to go and preach in the field, he durst not vary in the least, nor finch one hairbreadth from the testimony, but would look on himself as obliged to use the same freedom and faithfulness as he had done before.' On another occasion his mother having asked him what were his feelings in so trying a situation? 'Since my last examination,' replied Renwick, 'I can hardly pray.' Seeing her startled at his answer, he added, 'I can hardly pray, being so much taken up with praising, and ravished with the joy of the Lord.' 'But how shall I look upon that head,' said she, 'and those hands set up among the rest upon the ports of the city? I have so much of self, that I shall never be able to endure it.' With a smile, he told her that she should never be called upon to endure such a trial; 'for,' said he, 'I have offered my life to the Lord, and have sought that he may bind them up, that they may do no more; and I am persuaded that they shall not be permitted to torture my body, nor touch one hair of my head farther.'"

His trial took place on the 8th of February, and the charge of treason against the king's majesty, having, after a mock investigation, been pretended to be established against him, he was sentenced to be executed in the Grassmarket, on the Friday following. On being asked by the Lord Justice General if he desired longer time, he immediately replied that, "it was all one to him; if it were protracted it was welcome; if it were shortened it was welcome; his Master's time was the best." In hope of his making concessions he was respited till the 17th. All, however, was to no purpose. He remained firm to the true covenanted presbyterian principles.

During the short time allotted him before the day of execution, Mr Renwick was much harassed by repeated visits from Popish priests and others, who used all their endeavours to urge him to recant. Dalrymple, the King's advocate, also entreated him to sue for pardon, and to own the authority of the King. Petitions were written by several individuals, praying for a commutation of his sentence; but on being sent to him for his signature, he positively refused, lest he should in the slightest degree countenance the idea that he was guilty of apostasy. On Tuesday the 14th, he was brought before the council and again examined, chiefly in regard to the "Informatory Vindication." He decidedly refused, however, to testify against his brethren. After this examination, he was observed to be remarkably cheerful, and on one of his friends asking him "How he did?" he replied that he was well, but he hoped in three days to be still better. The day before his death, he wrote what is termed his dying testimony, an extract from which may be interesting.

"Now my dear friends in precious Christ, I think I need not tell you, that as I have lived, so I die in the same persuasion with the true reformed and covenanted Presbyterian Church of Scotland; that I adhere to the testimony of the day, as it is held forth in our Informatory Vindication, and in the testimony against the present toleration; and that I own, and seal with my blood, all the precious truths, even the controverted truths that I have taught. I would exhort you to make sure your personal reconciliation with God in Christ; for I fear many of you have that yet to do, and when you come where I am, to look pale death in the face, you will not be a little shaken and terrified, if you have not laid hold on eternal life. I would exhort you to much diligence in the use of means. Do not fear that the Lord will cast off Scotland, for he will certainly return again, and show himself glorious in our land. But watch and pray, for he is bringing on a sad overthrowing stroke, which will make many say, that they have easily got through, that have got a scaffold for Christ. I may say this to his praise, that I have found his cross sweet and lovely to me; for I have had many joyful hours, and not a fearful thought since I came to prison. I am now longing for the joyful hour of my dissolution, and there is nothing in the world that I am sorry to leave but you; but I go to better company, and so I must take my leave of you all. Farewell, beloved sufferers and followers of the Lamb; farewell, Christian intimates; farewell, Christian and comfortable mother and sisters; farewell, sweet societies, and desirable general meetings; farewell, night wanderings in cold and weariness for Christ; farewell, sweet Bible and preaching of the Gospel; farewell, sun, moon, and stars, and all sublunary things; farewell, conflicts with a body of sin and death: Welcome, scaffold, for precious Christ; welcome, heavenly Jerusalem; welcome, innumerable company of angels, and general assembly and church of the first-born; welcome, crown of glory, white robes, and songs of Moses and the Lamb; and, above all, welcome, O thou blessed Trinity, and one God! O Eternal One! I commit my soul into thy eternal rest."

On the day of his execution, Mr Renwick wrote a letter to his old and steady friend, Mr Hamilton of Lewarden, declaring that he still adhered to the principles which he held when he first entered on the ministry. As a last attempt to procure from him a recantation, the captain of the jail waited upon him a few hours before the closing scene, with the earnest request that he would affix his signature to a petition which he laid before him. This however he positively declined. His mother and sisters were now permitted, along with one or two friends, to see him, and having partaken of some refreshment with them, he spent the few moments which remained, in exhortation, prayer, and praise. Perceiving his mother weeping, he gently cautioned her against giving way to undue sorrow, adding with peculiar emphasis, "If ye love me, rejoice that I am going to my Father, to obtain the enjoyment of what eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived." He prayed earnestly for the suffering remnant whom he was leaving behind him, that God would protect them. When the drum beat for his execution, he exclaimed, "Let us be glad and rejoice; the Bridegroom is coming, and I can, in some measure, say, I am ready." After the usual preliminaries, he was conducted to the scaffold, which he ascended with the greatest alacrity and cheerfulness. Here he was met by one of the curates, who officiously accosting him, said, "Mr Renwick, own our king, and we shall pray for you." "I am come here," replied the martyr, "to bear my testimony against you, and all such as ye are." "Own our king, and pray for him, whatever ye say of us," returned the curate. "I will discourse no more with you," rejoined Mr Renwick; "I am in a little to appear before him who is King of kings, and Lord of lords, who shall pour shame, contempt, and confusion, on all the kings of the earth who have not ruled for him."

"He then sang part of the hundred and third Psalm, and read the nineteenth chapter of Revelation; after which he prayed, commending, like Stephen, his spirit into the hands of his Redeemer, and the cause for which he suffered, to be vindicated, in the time and manner appointed by the Most High. He once and again blessed the Lord, that he had honoured him with the crown of martyrdom; 'an honour,' he said, 'which the angels themselves were not privileged to enjoy, being incapable of laying down their lives for their princely Master.' He at one time complained of being annoyed in worshipping God; but immediately added, 'I shall soon be above these clouds, then shall I enjoy thee, and glorify thee, without interruption, for ever.'

"Notwithstanding the base practice of the beating of drums, of which he had complained when engaged in prayer, he addressed the spectators to the following effect:—"Spectators, I am come here this day to lay down my life for adhering to the truths of Christ, for which I am neither afraid nor ashamed to suffer; nay, I bless the Lord that ever he counted me worthy, or enabled me to suffer any thing for him; and I desire to praise his grace, that he hath not only kept me free from the gross pollutions of the time, but also from many ordinary pollutions of children; and such as I have been stained with, he hath washed me from in his own blood. I am this day to lay down my life for these three things: 1st, For disowning the usurpation and tyranny of James, Duke of York. 2d, For preaching that it was unlawful to pay the cess expressly exacted for bearing down the Gospel. 3d, For teaching that it was lawful for people to carry arms for defending themselves in their meeting for the persecuted Gospel ordinances. I think a testimony for these is worth many lives; and if I had ten thousand, I would think it little enough to lay them all down for the same. Dear friends, I die a Presbyterian Protestant. I own the Word of God as the rule of faith and manners. I own the Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, Sum of Saving Knowledge, Directory for Public and Family Worship, Covenants National and Solemn League, Acts of General Assemblies, and all the faithful contentings that have been for the work of the covenanted Reformation. I leave my testimony, approving the preaching of the Gospel in the fields, and defending of the same by arms. I adjoin my testimony to all those truths that have been sealed by blood, shed either on scaffolds, fields, or seas, for the cause of Christ. I leave my testimony against Popery, Prelacy, Erastianism, and other hereasies; against all profanity, and every thing contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness; particularly against all usurpations and encroachments made on Christ's right, who is the 'Prince of the kings of the earth,' who alone must bear the glory of ruling in his own kingdom, the Church; and in particular against the absolute power usurped by this usurper, that belongs to no mortal, but is the incommunicable prerogative of Jehovah; and against this toleration flowing from that absolute power."

"Here Mr Renwick was ordered to be done; to which he replied, 'I am almost finished;' and then added, 'Ye that are the people of God, do not weary to maintain the testimony of the day in your stations and places; and whatever ye do, make sure of an interest in Christ; for there is a storm coming that shall try your foundation. Scotland must be rid of Scotland before the delivery come: and you that are strangers to God, break off your sins by repentance; else I will be a sad witness against you in the day of the Lord.'

"His persecutors now peremptorily commanded him to go up the ladder. Here he prayed amidst great inruption, saying, 'Lord, I die in the faith that thou wilt not leave Scotland, but that thou wilt make the blood of thy witnesses the seed of thy Church, and return again and be glorious in our land.' He then said to his attending friend at the time the napkin was tying over his face, 'Farewell! be diligent in duty; make your peace with God through Christ; there is a great trial coming. As for the remnant I leave, I have committed them to God. Tell them from me not to weary, nor be discouraged in maintaining the testimony; let them not quit nor forego one of those despised truths. Keep your ground, and the Lord will provide you teachers and ministers; and when he comes he will make these despised truths glorious in the earth.' He was then turned over the ladder with these words in his mouth, 'Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, Lord God of truth.'

Thus died at the early age of twenty-six, one of the most upright and consistent ministers of the period, and one who had suffered much in the cause of Christ, with a heroism and unflinching fortitude, worthy of the last of that noble band of martyrs, who sealed with their blood their devoted attachment to the covenanted work of Reformation in Scotland.

EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHEME.

No. III.

THE additional information which the committee obtained in consequence of the visit of their deputation to the Western Isles, led them to be, if possible, more zealous than ever, in the truly patriotic object which was committed to their hands. They had succeeded so far in their great design, as to have established, previous to the meeting of the General Assembly in 1828, no fewer than seventy schools in the more destitute places of the country; and they now proceeded to direct their attention more particularly to various circumstances connected with the complete efficiency of these schools. The books employed were of course Gaelic as well as English; the former having been prepared expressly for the Assembly's schools by the orders of the committee; the latter being those which the late Dr Thomson had prepared for the use of schools. In addition to these, Dr M'Leod, formerly of Campsie, now of Glasgow, was employed by the committee to draw up a Gaelic Collection, consisting of entertaining as well as instructive pieces, suited to the tastes and circumstances of the Highland population. This was the first book of the kind which was ever published in the Gaelic language, and from the interesting and judicious manner in which it was executed, its appearance was hailed with joy both by old and young.

At the meeting of the General Assembly in 1829, the committee reported the number of schools established as amounting to eighty-five. For the proper management of these schools, every possible precaution had been taken. Qualified teachers had been selected; school regulations had been drawn up, and sent to each station; suitable school books had been prepared, and the careful superintendence of the parochial ministers and Presbyteries of the bounds had been secured. To ascertain, however, still more satisfactorily, the actual condition of the schools, the convener was requested to visit personally, and examine the Assembly's schools in those districts of the country which had not fallen within his former journey. This tour, in which Dr Baird was accompanied by Mr Gordon, secretary to the committee, occupied upwards of two months. Their route extended to more than 2300 miles, and lay through the shires of Perth, Inverness, Moray, Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness, the Islands of Orkney, and Shetland. They inspected, in their progress, thirty-eight schools, with the management of which, with very few exceptions, they were fully satisfied. This visit, like the former, proved of great advantage to the committee, by putting them in possession of much valuable statistical information respecting the Highlands and Islands.

In the course of the same year, a most important addition was made by the committee to the efficiency of their educational system, by the establishment of school libraries. Early in January 1820, they issued books from their depository for the formation of libraries at no fewer than fifty-five different stations, each library consisting of fifty-six volumes, Gaelic and English. These volumes, it was arranged, should remain at the station to which they were forwarded for two years, when they should be exchanged for a different set of books from a neighbouring station. This plan of itinerant libraries, which has been acted upon for many years in the Lowlands, is obviously calculated to be of peculiar benefit in the Highland districts. In speaking of the nature and design of these libraries, the committee thus express themselves:—

"It will be recollected, that they consist partly of books of a religious description, and partly of such as contain useful and entertaining knowledge—interesting histories—voyages and travels—biographies—sketches in civil and natural history. A considerable portion of the volumes forming these libraries, particularly those of a religious description, was intentionally selected rather for the instruction of the adult population, than of the young attending school. Though issued only to scholars, they will easily be accessible through them to their families, and to the whole grown up population in the neighbourhood; and the committee have ever been most anxious that so important a benefit should be communicated as extensively as possible, under those regulations for preventing its abuse to which they have subjected the librarians. A great part of the duty committed to them by the General Assembly respects the education and religious instruction of the grown up population in the Highlands, known to be, in all that respects general knowledge, much inferior at present to the common people in other parts of the country. This object the committee have not been able to attempt in any manner at once so effectually, so extensively, and at so little expense, as by the establishment of school libraries. By that plan, as well as by the institution of Sabbath evening schools, they have the satisfaction to know, that, while they have thought it proper to abstain, in the present circumstances, from the appointment of catechists, they have contributed, in no inconsiderable degree, to the religious and moral instruction of those among the Highlanders who cannot be expected, like their children, to give attendance at school for a merely elementary education.

"In resolving on the establishment of school libraries, the committee were fully assured, not only that they were to be the means of very great improvement, but that the Highlanders, from their situation and their poverty, did not enjoy, and could not procure, any such benefit for themselves. Scarcely any but a few school books had been known in the districts to which these seeds of civilization have now been scattered. It is considerably more than a century since nineteen presbyterial and fifty-eight parochial libraries were planted in the Highlands by the General Assembly, on much the same views and expectations which have now influenced the committee: hardly a vestige of these libraries now remains. The field was uncultivated; and the people of the Highlands, in their ambition for improvement, and in their impatience of inferiority, had long waited for a renewal of the benefaction which is now held by the same ranks of their countrymen in the south.

"The committee have the testimony of their teachers to the lively gratitude with which the people have every where received this boon conferred upon them by a protecting and beneficent Church, supported by a generous public. They trust that, by the divine blessing, it may produce all the effects of intellectual and spiritual improvement, for which it has been intended."

Having now established the highest number of schools which the funds they could reasonably expect would support, the committee were under the painful necessity of resisting numerous and pressing invitations which were made to them from different quarters, where the destitution was unquestionable. They felt it their duty to employ themselves rather in superintending and providing for the maintenance of the schools already in existence. These were in the first instance elementary, supplying merely the necessary branches of education; but while this is the primary object which the Assembly's committee have always kept in view, they have uniformly imparted the higher branches of instruction wherever a desire for them was expressed by the people. It is not to be expected, however, from the condition and circumstances of the Highland population, that what is termed a liberal education could be much in demand. Accordingly, we find the committee reporting in 1830, that "the proportion of those who study the higher branches of instruction afforded by the schools is not more than one to fifty-four of those who are confined to the common elementary branches."

To impart mere secular knowledge, however, was not likely to promote the moral improvement of the country, and therefore religion has ever held a prominent place in the system of education of which we are now treating. Besides the institution of Sabbath evening schools at most of the stations where the adults, as well as young people, have an opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of divine things, the all-important truths of the Bible are brought conspicuously forward in the regular routine of the daily schools. In reference to this subject, the committee state:—

"The regulations on this head are: that in all the schools the Scriptures shall be read daily as a school-book,—that the passages read shall be explained in a manner suited to the capacities of the scholars, and shall be employed as exercises both of the memory and the understanding,—and that the catechisms shall be learnt, and that as intelligently as possible, by all who are capable of reading them. These methods of religious tuition, it is believed, are now common, with a few exceptions, to all schools subject to the superintendence of the Church of Scotland. The committee report, from authentic information, that they are effectively and reverently observed in the schools more immediately dependent on the General Assembly.

"That every scholar should be subjected to daily tasks of a nature purely religious, is due to the transcendent importance of that branch of education; and it will not contribute to the welfare of any seminary, that, among other articles of instruction, that which inculcates the principles of the Christian faith and practice should hold, or should appear to hold, a secondary place. The committee are of opinion, that this should form, not only a separate and specific object of study in every school, but that, as far as possible, it ought to be interwoven with all other studies which have for their end to qualify the pupils for the business and for the ordinary duties of life, and without which, if that be their purpose, every scheme of education must necessarily be imperfect. It is under this impression that the elementary school books employed in the Assembly schools have been composed so much of Scripture extracts, and refer so frequently to the interesting and instructive topics of Bible history."

This plan has been found at once practicable and efficient, and well deserves the attention of all who are employed in legislating on the subject of education.

While thus engaged in prosecuting the benevolent scheme of education intrusted to them by the General Assembly, the committee were called to lament the loss of one of their number, whose wisdom and penetration, and sound practical judgment, had been of inestimable advantage to them in all their deliberations. We refer to the decease of the Rev. Dr Andrew Thomson.

It had been, from the commencement of the Scheme, the wish of the committee that the schools should not be dependent for their support upon the necessarily fluctuating income arising from subscriptions, donations, and annual collections, but it was their great anxiety, that if possible, a permanent fund or capital should be realized, such as would impart stability to the system. To the attainment of an object so desirable, they resolved to direct their efforts, and it was with peculiar pleasure, therefore, they learned, that as the commencement of such a fund Dr Andrew Bell of Cheltenham, the distinguished inventor of the Madras system of instruction, had bequeathed to them a legacy of five thousand pounds. The conditions on which the munificent donation was bestowed, the committee readily accepted, and more especially, as the Madras or monitorial system had been in operation from the beginning in the greater number of their schools. Thus was the foundation laid of a permanent capital, and though the interest which, of course, was alone available, amounted to no more than one hundred and eighty pounds a-year, yet the committee felt no small encouragement in thinking that the fund, thus established, was likely to receive frequent and considerable accessions through the benevolence of individuals. The claims of the Scheme were still urgent, and it was to be hoped, that the public would readily respond to the call thus made upon their bounty. In the mysterious providence of God, however, the streams of liberality were now (1831) diverted into other channels. The cholera raged in many parts of the country, and called away the attention of the people from almost every other object. The natural consequence was, that during that year the expenditure of the Assembly's Committee exceeded their income by several hundred pounds; and it became necessary for the Assembly at their meeting in May 1832, to issue an earnest recommendation of parochial collections in behalf of the Educational Scheme. The following year, however, was scarcely more productive than the preceding, arising probably from the large demands previously made upon the public, in consequence of the prevalence of cholera, but more especially, from the great mass of parishes in Scotland not having adopted the plan of regular parochial collections,—a plan which, if steadily followed out, would be productive of an annual income sufficient to enable the committee to carry forward with the utmost efficiency, the noble, patriotic, and truly Christian Scheme in which they are engaged.

ALL CHRISTIANS ARE NOT ALIKE.

SECTION VI

THE INFLUENCE OF CHURCH CONNECTIONS.

AN English or Irish Christian may usually be distinguished from one of the same rank and situation in Scotland; and, judging from specimens which have fallen in our way, and from intercourse with clergymen and others belonging to the country, we believe that American Christians may in general be distinguished from both. This is, no doubt, in part, owing to a diversity of national manners. The general frankness of the English, and still more of the Irish, is usually contrasted with the alleged reserve of the Scotch. And Americans are, we believe, considered as differing from both; as having the openness of the one, and some portion of the system and rationality of the other, but wanting alike in the bluff honesty of the former, and the solidity and perseverance of the latter. There is, perhaps, something like this observable in their religious character. The general frankness of English and Irish Christians, and the touching simplicity of their personal religion, have been frequently noticed. On the other hand, the depth of feeling, and strength of moral character, often observed among even the unlettered Christians of our own land, are equally noticeable. And the general activity and unrestrained freedom of American Christians are not less characteristic. These differences ought, we doubt not, to be in part referred to national character, and national circumstances. There are other causes, however, more directly associated with religion, which ought not to be overlooked. The original education of the young in these different countries is different. In Scotland, catechetical instruction has long prevailed; and in most religious families, children are thus made acquainted with divine truth as a system, and their after reading is naturally thrown into this form. In the Episcopal parts of England and Ireland, this is, we believe, much less general; and even when catechisms are learned, there is less of the rationale, and more of the simple affirmation. In the religious society of America, the methods employed are perhaps more varied and more mixed. But what is more important, the education of their clergy, and their style of preaching, are different. In Scotland, systematic theology greatly predominates. In the Churches of England and Ireland, it has long been comparatively neglected, and many of their brightest ornaments have been taught their divinity chiefly from their Bibles. In the United States, the period of study is comparatively short, and the branches numerous. Hence, among other results, the elaborate and philosophical style common in Scotland—the more direct, and, in many cases, fresh and scriptural style of the English—and, perhaps, the more varied, but generally hortatory style of the Americans. Speaking of these more exactly, we are disposed to regard what may most properly be called the American style of preaching, as consisting in direct and reiterated appeals to the conscience—the English, in persuasive, and touching appeals to the heart—and the Scotch, in exhibitions of truth, chiefly addressed to the understanding. The natural, as well as observed, effect is, that the Scottish Christian should understand well the grounds of his faith, and yet, perhaps, be in danger of resting in the knowledge and apprehension of the thing rather than in the feeling of its power. The English Christian, in like manner, feels more, but is in danger of assuming that he is a Christian, simply because he has been persuaded to become one. And the American, less tender in his feelings, and perhaps less systematic in his knowledge, is nevertheless convinced, and acts on the conviction. And yet he also has his fault. He is apt to conclude hastily, and chiefly because he has now determined to serve God. There is another element mingling in the formation of these different characters. In Scotland, the form, as well as the substance, of religion is strictly Calvinistic; and hence much is practically resolved into the purposes and sovereignty of God. The operations also of the Spirit upon the heart, form special grounds of judgment in determining character. And so it is, that men are more reluctant to speak of themselves with confidence, and that they rather discourage positive avowals on the part of others. In England and Ireland it is different. Although their creed be substantially Calvinistic, some of their doctrines, and most common modes of expression, proceed upon other grounds, and cherish other feelings. So well is this difference generally understood, that we recollect hearing the venerable Dr Marshman say, that he always allowed Scotland a large per centage on the actual amount of her Christians when compared with England; both being judged of according to their usual and ordinary expressions of Christian feeling. The avowal of Christian character in the States, seems to be more decided, and perhaps not less readily given than in England. It is made upon distinct and assignable grounds, but these are apt to turn very much on mere convictions as to the past, and resolutions for the future. We will not be understood as describing the entire character of any one individual, and much less of any class. We have merely pointed to what appears to be the distinguishing feature of each, and hence we have described it, as bordering on something positively erroneous. Far, however, is our aim from wishing to hold up to reproach even such peculiarities. They have all of them grown out of respective circumstances, and it is especially the duty of each to copy what is more excellent from others, and to spread the skirt of charity over what he may even disapprove. Much good might indeed be derived from an enlarged examination of Christian character, Christian doctrine, and Christian education, in the different Protestant countries of Europe and America. We, who are ministers, might improve our own modes of teaching, from such a comparison; and much might, in this way, be done for general but especially for clerical education. It is not, however, so much to improve Christian character as to enable us to judge rightly concerning it, that we have been entering on these comparisons; and therefore is it our duty to infer that those differences greatly mar our apprehensions of Christian worth in other Churches than our own. We look for what is in a great measure peculiar to ourselves, and finding others deficient in this, we impute it to a deficiency of Christianity; or observing similar peculiarities which are strange to us, we are apt to argue from them that there is something essentially wrong.

There are other distinctions, though perhaps less noticeable, among different denominations of the same country. It would be absurd to maintain such divisions if there were not alleged causes of separation, and these, whether well or ill founded, will, especially during seasons of controversy, appear great. Like the walls of some fortress, during a siege, every stone of which is valued as if it were gold, these are made much of, because they are the very bulwarks of parties. It would be in vain to lament such dissociating feelings, they are to a certain extent inseparable from the carnality of unsanctified nature, and they will always be found to wither and decay, at least in spirit, with an increase of true godliness, and sometimes simply by being let alone. But it is not of the existence of such differences that we wish at present to speak, but of the diversity of Christian character growing up under them, and modified by them. Something of the kind will be found in every Church, and the more limited the society, the more likely will peculiarities of character become strong and observable. Now, it is needful for all in these circumstances occasionally to look beyond their own communion, to make themselves in some measure acquainted with the Christianity of others, and always to make a certain allowance for prejudice, when judging of those to whom any may be specially opposed.

There are, on this subject, two modes of acting, so like each other as sometimes to be called by the same name, and yet so opposite in principle as to be the one duty, and the other sin. Some would have all distinctions obliterated; and to gain this they would dispense with much that is by others held essential to true worship and right government and discipline. They would have each to regulate almost entirely his own opinions and conduct, and yet to be regarded by others as holding communion with them, chiefly because he chose so to do. Every project tending to such an issue ought to be regarded as unprincipled, unscriptural, and unholy. But there is another tendency more truly catholic, and throughout commendable. There is among all true Christians, however distinguished by name or modes of worship, a common relationship, and with it the indwelling of a common Spirit. Let men cultivate, more assiduously, this unity of the Spirit, in the bonds of fraternal affection; and let them study more at large, and, amidst its greatest diversities, the Christian character, and they will not fail to see, in many of the distinctions and separations of brethren, their failings rather than their wickedness, and while they themselves maintain all that they hold to be truly matters of conscience, they will yet feel towards such as differ from them as towards brethren in Christ. Feelings such as these, and the general cultivation of such a spirit, will lead to unity, and through unity to union. "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

RESIGNATION UNDER AFFLICTION :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. LAWRENCE MOYES, D.D.,

Minister of Forglan.

"The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"—John xviii. 11.

It was in circumstances peculiarly affecting that these words were uttered. Our Lord had come up to Jerusalem, for the last time, to accomplish the great object of his mission. He knew that his hour was come, and no longer sought to elude the malice of his enemies. Having expressed a wish to eat the Passover, preparations were accordingly made, and all things being ready, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. In the course of the Supper he disclosed to them the certainty of that melancholy event, which now hung in gloomy prospect over his mind. He told them that one of them should betray him, and immediately after, he instituted that holy ordinance, by which his death is shewed forth; and distributed bread and wine, as the symbols of those sufferings which he was soon to undergo, and as memorials of them to future ages. And when they had sung an hymn they went forth into the Mount of Olives, to a sequestered place called Gethsemane, whither our Lord had frequently retired to indulge in devotional exercises, and in meditation on the great work which he had to perform. It was in this solitude and silence of the night, that he was to feel the awful effects of becoming sin for us, and of being subjected to the inexorable demands of divine justice. Every thing had conspired to render this midnight scene solemn and affecting. The preliminary steps seemed to point to some great event, and to prepare the mind for heavy trials. Judas had already risen up from the table with malice and treachery in his heart,—the Sacrament of the Supper had been celebrated in the most solemn and impressive circumstances,—the disciples had been perplexed, trembling between hope and fear, and Jesus himself was beginning to feel his soul sorrowful even unto death. These sad preludes were soon to be illustrated and confirmed,—the bitter cup was now put into his hands,—the agony which now wrung his soul forced the sweat from every pore, like great drops of blood, and thrice laid him prostrate on the ground, to pour forth his cries for relief: "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." It was during this terrible conflict, when he was forsaken of his God, and left to feel all the bitterness of that punishment which our sins deserved; when his few chosen friends had fallen asleep, when he had none in heaven or in earth to comfort him,—it was at this awful crisis, under the pressure of unutterable woe, when Judas, with an armed band from the chief priests and elders of the people, came suddenly upon him, to seize his person, and to deliver him over into the hands of his enemies,—the disciples were now roused from their lethargy, and Peter, having a sword, drew it, and seemed resolute in his Master's defence. But the Lord Jesus, whose kingdom was not to be established by force of arms, desired him to put up his sword into its scabbard, and, like him, to learn submission to the will of God; "the cup which my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it." Besides making use of this devout acknowledgment as a reason why Peter should at once refrain from acts of violence on his behalf, he employed it also as a lesson to us, as a call to be like-minded, and alike disposed to be patient and resigned; when the cup of affliction is put into our hands, to express ourselves also in the devoted language of the text, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

In discoursing more at large on these words, I propose, through divine assistance, to state some of the reasons we have for adopting the same language in all our afflictions and sorrows, and then to offer a few remarks, by way of inference, from what has been said; and may the Holy Spirit enrich our hearts in the knowledge of divine things, and impress them with a just sense of our duty at all times and in all circumstances.

I. We ought to adopt the language of the text, because our lot is ordered and directed by a perfect Being: The cup which our Father hath given us, shall we not drink it? It may be necessary, in the outset, to observe, that there is a difference betwixt the natural and the moral law of the divine government. There is a physical relation founded upon the very nature of things, which invariably distinguishes the course of Providence in many of the evils which we suffer. There is, for instance, a necessary connection between certain sinful habits and their respective accompaniments. Vice generally and certainly leads to misery; but there are certain species of it, that are attended with their more immediate and appropriate effects, such as murder, rapine, falsehood, uncleanness, intemperance, extravagance. These are followed by their natural punishments, which flow as naturally from them, as a stream does from its source. This is a cup, then, which men put into their own hands; they mix in it the poison, and they must abide the effects. They commit the crime, and the penalty must be inflicted. It is cause and effect, an established order of things, which proceeds as invariably, and is as much the result of fixed laws, as the course of nature itself. You would think it a bad plea for the spendthrift to ascribe his necessities, or the felon his untimely fate, to the inflictions of an overruling Providence. They have been the planners and framers of their own destiny; they have been guilty, with their eyes open to the penalty, and now it must be paid, or the connection between a cause and its effect would cease to exist. But there is a moral or a discretionary principle also on which the divine administration is conducted. The Supreme Being, with reverence be it spoken, takes a more immediate charge of our moral discipline, and of everything that is calculated to improve our moral and religious condition. There he assumes the controlling power, and applies the rod, as it were, with his own hand, and in a way which he knows to be best fitted to the various exigencies of our state. Then he gives us the cup which he hath mingled, and from him we ought to receive it with resigned and willing hearts. How many edifying examples have we of this pious and elevated frame of mind in the lives of the faithful in all ages? It would make a Christian at the present day ashamed to complain, even under severe visitations, were he to consider the heavy trials that have been cheerfully undergone for God and a good conscience; were he to see the venerable confessor torn from his family, and condemned to pass years of cold and hunger on a solitary rock, or in the loathsomeness of a dungeon; were he to see the aged parent forced to witness the lingering tortures of his beloved children, and, at every stroke of the executioner, breathing out, amid all the agony of natural affection, "God is merciful!" Such true believers, instead of complaining, even gloried in tribulation. They saw the hand of God in all the afflictions with which they were afflicted; they knew that every dispensation was wisely and well ordered, under the control of an all-powerful and perfect Being, and they rejoiced that they were accounted worthy to receive any mark of distinction, either in the way of judgment or mercy. The people of God have still the same feeling of sacredness and respect towards the dispensations of Providence; in all their sorrows and sufferings they know that they are under the care of the Almighty, who can at once recall his messengers, and raise up those who are bowed down. Were we at the mercy of a capricious, tyrannical being, who had no fixed moral rule of acting, and whose power over his avenging ministers was but limited, then we might justly tremble under the rod, and fear lest more should be laid upon us than we are able to bear. It is some false conception of this kind that strips many a poor bewildered sufferer of all mental stay, and reduces him to despondency, and at last to despair,—even to the awful necessity of lifting up his hand against his own life. This desperate remedy was recommended to Job; when his cup was about full, he was called upon to give up the hopeless struggle, to throw back life and all its bitterness in the face of his oppressor, to curse God and die. But he took a more religious view of his situation. He still trusted in God that he would deliver him, and the rod was withdrawn, and the evening of his days was made to go down in peace. It is not by murmuring or repining that we are to expect an alleviation of our misery. The chastisement may be continued with increased severity, so long as the heart continues hardened and impenitent; and the pressure of woe is sometimes seen weighing down the weary, but infatuated, sufferer, even to the very dust. It is by raising our hearts unto God in the time of trouble, and seeing his perfect nature overruling and directing all the visitations of his providence; it is by seeing his gracious presence in the darkness and in the solitude, that we can get a stay for the one to rest upon, and a well grounded hope of better things to come. Then will we drink the cup that our Father hath given us in all meekness and submission, resting assured, that infinite power can at once dispel the darkest cloud, and that infinite wisdom will always do what is best.

II. The language of the text ought to be ours in all our sorrows and sufferings, because the cup which is given us is intended for our benefit. It is intended to rouse us from carnal sloth and security. This is a state into which many well meaning, well disposed persons, as man may be judged of by man, are very apt to fall. Circumspect and regular in their moral and religious duties, without entering much into the spirit of religion, and, consequently, without zeal or any religious excitement, they naturally get into a certain cold, routine habit, satisfied with their state, and giving themselves very little trouble to inquire into its real merits. This is a very dangerous infatuation, as it lulls to rest, and to a delusive hope of reconciliation and peace with God, while there is no vital sense of religion in the heart. The well meaning person may remain in this state of delusion longer than the daring offender may be suffered to trample upon the divine authority; for there is more hope of the ungodly and the sinner than of him. Satisfied with himself, and taking it for granted that he is doing his duty, and that all is right, he slumbers on till his eyes are at last opened, and perhaps when it is too late. How precious the call that awakens them out of this sleep of spiritual death! Instead of repining at the cup, how thankfully ought we to receive it—how submissively and devoutly ought we to drink it! Its contents, although bitter to the taste, are salutary in their effects; their very pungency stirs up the lethargic powers to sensibility and action, and gives a new and more vigorous tone to the whole system. Yes, affliction comes like a messenger of foreboding aspect, to arouse the careless and the secure,—to shake that heaviness from their eyes, which had closed them to sin and danger,—and to let them see themselves as they really are, an affecting and a melancholy sight. Sophistry and delusion cannot long exist beside sickness and death; the appeal is too plain and powerful to be parried by those self-complacencies which had stood their ground in more favourable circumstances. It comes home to the heart, and unfolds its inmost recesses to the astonished view. Appalled at the sight, the poor deluded pretender is at once amazed and overwhelmed. Is this the state of my heart? O how unfit I am for being laid upon that bed, where my friend now lies, or for appearing disembodied before the tribunal of my God! Is there no help? Is there no relief to be found? Yes, I will arise and go to my Father,—I will implore his forgiveness for the sake of Him, who laid down his life even for the chief of sinners. To awaken such convictions and such holy resolutions, the cup of sorrow is now and then put into our hands; and happy is that man who takes it to his lips with the penitential tear in his eye, and the fervent effusion flowing from his heart, whose soul is melted into all the tenderness of sympathy—into all the fervency of devotion, who cries for mercy over the last struggles of exhausted nature, when the conflict is drawing to a close. In such a frame of mind, dare he to complain, or to arraign, even by the most distant thought, the appointments of Providence? No, he bows with submission under the visitation, and sees in his awakened feelings, the gracious purpose for which it is sent. How many far advanced Christians are there, who have reason to bless God, that the cup had been given them, who can look back to the time of their sorrow, as the dawning morn of their brightest day! Even the poor mourning penitent dries up his tears, and praises the mercy that at first appeared as a heavy judgment, when he begins to feel some inward testimony that he is not to be cast off utterly.

III. Again, the bitter cup is put into our hands to wean our affections from all sublunary things. We are very apt to become too much attached to surrounding objects. Many circumstances concur to produce this effect,—their proximity, their subserviency to our more immediate gratification, and their strong natural claims to our sympathy and our love. These causes, along with others, are intended by the Author of our nature, to have a certain effect, to give a certain interest to our temporal concerns, as necessary to our existence and comfort. But when, through the corruption that is in us, we go beyond this moral boundary, and allow worldly attachments to engross our attention, then we are debasing our minds, and unfitting the immortal principle for attending to the great concerns of religion, and to the things that belong to our eternal peace. Such a corrupt ascendancy is too frequent, and it is the great source of that gracelessness and irreligion, which so much degrades the lives, and endangers the happiness of many professing Christians. Any thing that can check this worldly encroachment,—that can powerfully contribute to keep these aspiring authorities within due bounds, is to be viewed in the light of a remedy wisely adapted to our case. And there is no application so effectual as the rod of affliction. Whether the visitation be upon our persons or our families, it is well calculated to answer the end, and to shew us the vanity and instability of all earthly enjoyments. Whether we have set our hearts upon riches, or pleasure, or honours, or some dear living object, a sick-bed will soon convince us how unavailing these are, and how soon they may be taken from us. Wealth cannot mitigate our pains or heal the wounds of the heart; and, alas, where are the proud, the ambitious, and the gay? Let them step aside to the house of mourning, and there they will see something to humble them, and to show them that all is vanity and vexation of spirit. Let the hand of God be laid upon themselves, and they will at once turn away from their beloved idols, as corruptible things to which they have too often bent the knee, and seek for help where alone it is to be found. Bereavement, so common to the lot of man, successively breaks the ties by which we are bound to earthly concerns, and leaves us a freer and easier course to our Father's house. One cord severed and the rest will have less firm a hold, and the affections will be more disposed to rise to their proper objects, where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God. The interposition, then, is kind and merciful which draws us off from the pleasures and vanities of the world, and from all its dearest enjoyments, and attaches us to religion and to divine things. Let it be thankfully received, and may the blessing from on high ever accompany it.

IV. Once more the bitter cup is put into our hands, that we may hasten our preparation for death and judgment. The unruffled tide of health and prosperity is apt to produce a dangerous degree of ease and tranquillity. We float along upon its smooth surface, calmly and imperceptibly, without being excited or disturbed by any thing peculiarly awakening or obtrusive in our progress. In this state of monotonous and lulling enjoyment, we become insipid and thoughtless, not caring much when or how our journey is to terminate. But let a sudden blast stir up the bosom of that element on which we had been gliding in perfect security, and threaten destruction to our frail bark, and we are immediately aroused to a sense of danger, and to the necessity of speedy exertion for reaching the haven in safety. We are now and then assailed, sometimes suddenly and unexpectedly, to awaken us to reflection, and to the importance of renewed effort in preparing for that last event which is to decide our fate for ever. Lest the sweets of life should prove an intoxicating draught, and relax our vigilance and activity in our preparatory course, we have the cup put into our hands to counteract the effects of tranquil enjoyment, and to brace up the mind for its great and arduous duties. There are few, indeed, capable of discriminating properly who have not experienced the truth of this,—who have not been powerfully called upon in the time of trouble to double their diligence,—who have not silently withdrawn from the sad scene, to implore grace and strength, and to vow a solemn dedication of soul and body unto God. Such a use of the trial is extremely natural; it is sent for this purpose, and how obvious and impressive must the improvement be to every serious and well disposed mind? It is easy to see that the warning is given to remind us of our frailty, and of the danger of slumbering through a work which would require more time and exertion than we are able to bestow. The argument is strikingly exemplified when some heavy affliction stares us in the face like a spectre of portentous aspect, and says in a deep, a sepulchral tone, “be ye also ready.” The call is so awful and affecting, that it would be difficult to select a case in the progress of a holy life, where it has not been heard with effect, rousing and animating to higher efforts in rising to a meetness for glory and immortality. Will the desire to rejoin our beloved relatives who have been taken from us, not stimulate us to perseverance in well-doing? Will not the solemn anticipation, that we may meet again to part no more, fill us with fresh ardour to begin and to pursue our Christian race, that we may at last obtain the prize, and with them become partakers of eternal life? All this is to be learnt, and imbibed, and pressed home from the cup of affliction. It is put into our hands to free the soul from earthly habits, to withdraw it from earthly things, and to bring it into closer communion with God, and with the glories of the upper sanctuary. Why then should a living man complain? why should we not look to that cloud of witnesses, who through faith and patience are now inheriting the promises? Why should we not contemplate a still nobler witness, enduring the cross and despising the shame, and learn to express ourselves in the same language of holy resignation; “The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it.”

From what has been said, we may perceive how incumbent it is on us to be resigned to the will of God at all times, but more especially, when his chastening hand is upon us, and when the rod is applied to rouse, and to elevate, and to sanctify the soul. Were we to take a proper view of the divine dispensations, were we to consider them in their origin, their object, and their tender and merciful administration, we would have reason to be thankful, and to praise that beneficent power on which our safety and happiness depend. Could we, for a moment, unveil futurity and see the hidden purposes of the Almighty, we would bless his all-gracious interpositions, for having, by gentler dispensations, prevented trials which would have sunk us to the grave. But O could we view the all-wise Disposer of our lot, as we ought to do, could we view him as a kind and an affectionate parent, who is watching over the spiritual improvement and happiness of his children, could we say the “cup which my Father has given me,” we would see great cause to be patient and resigned, yea, to rejoice in the Lord, who is training us up in his own way for a high place in the heavenly mansions. He certainly has a right to do with his own what may seem meet in his sight, and from the perfect wisdom and benignity of his nature, he will always do what is right and what is most for their good. His children may rest assured that they are in the hands of a parent who chasteneth in love, and whose darling attribute is mercy, and that when the gracious purpose is answered, the trial will cease, and the tears be wiped away. Seek to know God, then, as a merciful and a reconciled father; strive for admission into his family, among those who have received the spirit of adoption, and you will look up to him as dutiful and affectionate children, and account the light afflictions of a moment as not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall afterwards be revealed. May God, of his infinite mercy, bestow upon you this distinguished privilege of being sons and heirs of eternal life, and to his name be the praise. Amen.

THE ANCIENT MONACHISM OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

BY THE REV. ROBERT K. HAMILTON, A. M.,

No. III.

FIRST FORMATION OF MONASTERIES—PACHOMIUS—HIS RULE—FIRST CONVENTUAL INSTITUTION FOR FEMALES—RAPID EXTENSION OF MONASTICISM IN AFRICA AND THE EAST.

THE principle of seclusion now began to exhibit itself on a more extended scale, and under a somewhat different aspect. Hitherto the recluses had lived totally apart from, and independent of, one another, each occupying his own solitary cell, and adopting whatever form of the ascetic life was most congenial to his taste and habits. Now, however, their numbers, especially in Egypt, had so much increased, that it was difficult, even for the most unsocial and austere, to avoid the intercourse of those in whose immediate vicinity he lived. Instead, therefore, of single individuals betaking themselves to the solitude of the desert, assemblages of such recluses, in greater or smaller numbers, began to be formed, and the regulations originally prescribed by Anthony, for the conduct of individual monks, came, in progress of time, to be applied to the administration of these newly organised societies. In the societies or communities thus formed, the germ of the future monastery may, for the first time, be recognised: and from the period which witnessed their formation, is to be dated the true origin of that which, strictly speaking, we term MONASTICISM, or the monachism of the cloister, as distinguished from the monachism of the cell. The members of these communities, however, did not yet submit themselves to the rules of any particular system of discipline; nor did they, as was the case at a later period, reside within the walls of a single place of abode. Their monasteries, if they may be so termed, appear to have consisted merely of an assemblage of walled huts, or similar rude dwellings, arranged in a certain order, and in some cases encircled by a wall surrounding the whole extent of the community. From these huts being so placed as to leave between them regular open spaces like streets, these primitive monasteries received the name of Laura, a term which, in the Greek, signifies literally, a broad street or alley. (1) The Laura, the earliest species of the monastic structure, was thus different from the Cœnobium, or proper monastery, the erection of a subsequent period, which consisted of a single large building, in which all the members of the monastic community resided, and lived in common.

The consent of antiquity ascribes the first formation of a regular monastic community to PACHOMIUS, a monk of Egypt. (2) This individual, who appears to have possessed considerable powers of mind and energy of character, was originally a heathen soldier in the army of the Emperor Maximin, under whom he served in the war against Constantine and Licinius. In the course of the campaign, he happened to be quartered in a village inhabited almost entirely by Christians, by whom he and his companions were treated with such singular benevolence, that he was led to inquire what that religion was which produced such estimable fruits. The ultimate result of his inquiry was his conversion to the faith of the Gospel. At the close of the war, having returned to Thebais, the country of his birth, he placed himself under the instruction of an aged recluse named Palemon, who, like most of the monks of that age, was a professed teacher of religion. Having, under his direction, been subjected to a severe and lengthened novitiate, and having made successful progress in all the austere virtues of the ascetic life, Pachomius, pronounced worthy of the vocation to which he aspired, betook himself to the seclusion of the desert. Amid the crowd of recluses by which it was now peopled, he might, like many others, have lived and died nameless and unknown. But, prompted by ambition, or, it may be, influenced by a less narrow and selfish spirit than the generality of his brethren, he aimed at higher objects than those which the ordinary monks were content to pursue. Perceiving the disorders which prevailed amongst the Anchorites, who were now thickly scattered over the plains of Egypt, and the evils arising to the ascetic institution generally, from the want of any fixed principles of government and discipline, he formed the design of uniting the recluses of a particular district under the rules of a common system, and of inducing them to reside within the limits of a fixed and circumscribed locality. With this view, and as most suitable to his purpose, he selected the island of Tabenna, (3) in the Nile, where he erected a rude monastery, occupied at first only by about an hundred inmates. The numbers, however, rapidly increasing, other monasteries were added, both on the island itself and on the contiguous shores of the river, until at length, under the name of the Congregation, or Cœnobium of Tabenna, he presided over an association of four separate monasteries, containing in all a community of not fewer than nine thousand monks. The formation of this, the first Christian monastery, took place about the year 340. The antiquity of its origin, and the reputed sanctity of its inmates, contributed, for many centuries, to attach to the congregation of Tabenna a high reputation in the eyes of the Church. (4) The rule or system of discipline which Pachomius administered, and which, according to the superstitious belief of the age, had been communicated to him by an angel, has been handed down entire to the present day, and as the earliest example of the mode of administering monastic institutions, is a curious and interesting relic. The following are its chief provisions: The monks were to be so distributed throughout the monastery, that three should occupy each cell. Their secular occupations were various kinds of manual labour, chiefly the cultivation of the ground. Their religious duties almost entirely those of devotion, prayers being required to be said twelve times a-day, and as frequently by night. To facilitate the performance of these continual acts of devotion, the whole community was to be divided into twenty-four classes, designated by the different letters of the Greek alphabet, each of which conducted, in rotation, the offices of conventual worship. In regard to food and fasting, (important elements of monkish religion,) Pachomius wisely laid down no imperative rules, leaving each one to observe that degree of abstinence which he himself deemed most suitable. With respect to clothing, their only garments were to consist of the skins of goats, rudely prepared, and were never to be taken off or changed, except when the communion was to be administered. Their places of repose, in accordance with the prevailing spirit of the age, were to be so constructed, as to prevent the body from being fully extended while sleeping. No strangers were to be admitted into the order till after a novitiate of three years duration. (1) These constitute all the specific provisions of the rules. In addition to them, the duty of general submission to the authority of the head of the institution was understood to be required. But what is worthy of remark, as illustrative of the difference between the monachism of that period and of more recent times, nothing possessing the character of a vow was imposed, nor was any one expected to remain a member of the community longer than suited his own inclination.

Pachomius, although in some respects in advance of the age in which he lived, does not appear to have been exempted, as some provisions of his rule sufficiently indicate, from the prevailing passion for arbitrary and self imposed austerities. Helyot informs us that he never slept but in an upright position, refusing even to lean for support against the wall of his cell, that he constantly wore a shirt of hair-cloth, and that he never changed his dress, until it became absolutely necessary, for the sake of cleanliness, to submit it to the process of ablution. These unseemly habits the reverend father views as evidences of peculiar sanctity and self-denial. (2)

In addition to his reputation as the founder of the first monastery, Pachomius is also believed to have been instrumental in the formation of the first conventual establishment for females. The following were the circumstances which led to this event:—During his seclusion on the island of Tabenna, he was visited by his only sister, anxious to behold a brother from whom she had been so long divided. But the stern recluse, in conformity with a vow he had made never to speak to woman, refused, notwithstanding her repeated solicitations, to admit her to an interview. He sent her, however, an injunction to imitate his example, by withdrawing herself from the world, and to form an institution for those of her own sex, similar to that which he had himself founded. With these instructions she complied, and, under the superintendence of Pachomius, a place of retreat for female recluses, over which

Another rule of much larger dimensions, containing no fewer than 128 chapters, and bearing the name of Pachomius, is to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and at the end of some editions of Cassian. But it has never generally been received as genuine, and according to Du Pin, on such a subject a high authority, it bears internal evidence of being the production of a much later period.—DU PIN'S Ecclesiastical History, Vol. ii. p. 55. she presided, was in a short time formed on the neighbouring island of Tismene. As Pachomius died in A.D. 348, the erection of this, the first Christian convent, (1) may be dated somewhere between the years 340 and 350. The conventual profession does not, however, appear to have been so popular, at this period, as the monastic. In A.D. 420, the nunnery of Tismene contained only four hundred inmates, (2) whereas the monastery of Tabenna, even in the lifetime of its founder, numbered more than twice as many thousands. Indeed, the progress of the conventual institution, compared with the monastic, was for long very tardy; and it was not till the commencement of the eighth century, as we learn from Hospinian, (3) that the erection of nunneries became, in any measure, general.

The date now assigned to the first foundation of conventual institutions is somewhat later than that generally claimed by the writers of the Church of Rome. According to the learned men of that persuasion, two female saints, Synclctica and Basilissa, who both lived nearly half a century before the sister of Pachomius, contest the honour which we have assigned to the latter. (4) It does not, however, appear, from any evidence to which we have had access, that either of these ladies, although eminent recluses of their day, attempted the formation of what may be considered as a conventual establishment. It is, besides, extremely improbable that the convent, the less popular institution of the two, should, in point of time, have preceded the monastery. The title, therefore, to the honour in question must, we conceive, be awarded to the nameless sister of the abbot of Tabenna; for, to the disappointment, doubtless, of the fair sisterhood of modern days, the designation of their illustrious foundress has, unhappily, been engulfed in the oblivious stream of time. (5)

The example and influence of Pachomius led to the formation of numerous similar communities throughout all parts of Egypt, by almost the whole of which his rule was adopted. (6) At Panos, Thebes, Oxyrinchus, and Rinocorura, extensive congregations were formed. On Mount Nitria, in Scetis, to the south-west of Alexandria, a monastery of three thousand monks was established under the superintendance of the Amon, or Ammonius, formerly mentioned. This institution subsequently became so extensive, as to comprise within its limits fifty distinct monasteries. At Arsinoe, on the Nile, Serapion presided over a still larger commu-

(1) We must not, however, imagine that this rude institution resembled, in any very essential features, the conventual establishments of modern times. We bestow on it the name of convent rather as anticipative of what it was destined ultimately to become, than as indicative of what, at the time in question, it really was.

(4) The antiquarian reader will find the details of the controversy in Helyot, tom. i. Dissertation Préliminaire, par. 8. The learned father is himself a Synclcticta.

(5) As it is my intention to confine myself, as exclusively as possible, to the history of the monks, I have not deemed it necessary to advert particularly to the progress of the monastic spirit amongst those of the opposite sex. It is sufficient here to observe, that from a very early period of the Church, earlier even than the age of asceticism, it was the practice for females to adopt a profession of celibacy, and to withdraw themselves as much as possible from intercourse with the world. They did not, however, like the Anchorites of the day, immerse themselves in total seclusion, but continued to reside with their parents, or other relatives, and, where their circumstances required it, were supported by the Church. But about the commencement of the fourth century they began, by degrees, to assimilate their habits to those of the monastics. Their discipline, however, was never so strict, nor their moral conduct so pure as that of the monks. Even so early as the age of Cyprian, melancholy evidences exist of the licentious habits which had already dishonoured their institution.—Vide CYPRIAN de Habitu Virginum. HOSPINIAN., lib. iii. c. 12, and BINGHAM's Antiquities, book vii. chap. 4.

(6) The rule of Pachomius seems to have been in very general repute in the East until that of Basil superseded it. Even after that period, it did not entirely disappear, for as late as the middle of the eleventh century, Anselm, Bishop of Havelberg, relates that he saw, in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, a monastery of this ancient order, containing a fraternity of five hundred monks.—HELYOT, tom. i. p. 136.

nity, consisting of the immense number of ten thousand recluses. In other parts of Egypt monasteries were likewise formed by Macarius, Isidore, Dioscorus, and Apollonius; and a multitude of others, too numerous to be mentioned in detail, rapidly arose on the banks of the Nile, in the valleys of Nubia, and amid the deserts of Cyrene. (1) Thus Egypt, the mother of ancient superstition, became again the parent of a fanaticism scarcely less powerful than that which, in former ages, had thronged with licentious worshippers, the altars of her Isis and Osiris. (2)

About this period, also, Monastic Institutions were established in Palestine, through the instrumentality of Hilarion, of whose ascetic habits we have already spoken. "By his influence," says Jerome, "innumerable monasteries arose throughout the whole of this province, and to him all the monks eagerly repaired." From this period, so rapid was the progress of the Monastic System in Syria, that it even began to vie with Egypt in the number of its religious communities, and the fame of its ascetics. (3) Of the latter, by far the most eminent, not excepting even their founder Hilarion, was Ephraim, a monk of Mesopotamia, well known to all readers of the history of the Church, as EPHRAIM THE SYRIAN. In such an imperfect sketch as the present, it is impossible to do justice either to the genius or character of this truly eminent man. The numerous works he has bequeathed to posterity are imperishable evidences of the superiority of his talents, the devotedness of his labours, and the fervour of his piety. And tinged, though the latter was, with the prevailing and almost unavoidable spirit of asceticism, its genuineness was incontestably evinced by the deep humility by which he was himself characterised, and by the Christian benevolence which marked all his conduct towards others. By those who, on such subjects are qualified to judge, he has been ranked as a public Christian character, next to Cyprian of Carthage, and Ambrose of Milan. The chief influence he exerted in the cause of monachism was by his works. He died in A. D. 380. (4)

In the region of Edessa, (5) monasteries began at this time to be formed under the superintendance of the monk Julianus; and in Armenia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, the increase in the formation of these institutions was almost as rapid as in Palestine and Egypt, owing, chiefly, to the influence of Eustathius, Bishop of Sebastia, in Armenia, to whose exertions, also, in another circumstance to be presently noticed, monachism was indebted for much of its subsequent stability and success. At this time, likewise, the monastic system was introduced into the eastern parts of Asia Minor by Aones, called by Sozomen, from the influence he exert-

(2) The wild enthusiasm with which Egypt embraced every form of monastic superstition almost justifies the sarcastic irony of Mr Gibbon's remark: "The Egyptians," he says, "who gloried in that marvellous revolution, were disposed to hope, and to believe, that the number of the monks was equal to the remainder of the people; and posterity might repeat the saying, which had formerly been applied to the sacred animals of the same country, that a Egypt it was less difficult to find a god than a man."—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. 37, vol. vi. p. 242, (edit. 1807.)

(3) ALTERRARA, lib. i., cap. 2. The chief immediate followers of Hilarion, in the conduct of the monastic institutions of Palestine, were Anselmus, Alexis, and Alaphio, in memory of whom, as well as of their illustrious predecessor, the inhabitants of the country were for long accustomed to observe a day of festal solemnity. (5) Of the monks of Edessa, one of the most eminent was Abraham, commonly called the Ascetic, a man who appears to have acted to the austere religion of the cell, a singular degree of evangelical zeal. Although chiefly living in seclusion, he occasionally quitted his retreat, and like Anthony, sought the intercourse of men only to promote their spiritual welfare. During the last and most prolonged of these evangelical missions, he was the means of diffusing a knowledge of the Gospel, throughout a large district in the vicinity of Edessa, the inhabitants of which had, till that period, continued pagan. The particulars of this event are briefly related in MISSA's volume ii. pp. 259-60.

ed in that country, the Anthony of Syria; and, about the same period, into Galatia and Cappadocia by Leontius, afterwards Bishop of Ancyra. (1) From Syria the institution ere long passed into Persia, where, under the sanction of Mohammedanism, it still continues to exist. (2)

Before the close of the century, A. D. 400, the system had extended itself as far alongst the southern shores of the Mediterranean as the western confines of the modern Tunis, and flourishing monasteries existed in the provinces of Carthage, Thagaste, and Hippos. (3) To the south it had penetrated into the still less accessible regions of Abyssinia and Ethiopia, where it had been introduced, along with Christianity, by Arrogavius, a disciple of the abbot of Tabenna. (4) Thus, in an incredibly short period of time, had this novel and singular institution firmly established itself throughout the whole of Christianized Africa, and in every part of that vast and populous region, which stretches from the fountains of the Nile and the banks of the Euphrates, to the shores of the Euxine and the Archipelago.

THE HOUSE SPIDER.

By the Rev. David Esdaile.

"There be four things which are little upon the earth—but they are exceeding wise:—the spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces."—Proverbs, xxx. 28.

THE creature whose name is prefixed to this article is familiarly known as a domestic inmate, whose labours give no small trouble to the careful housewife. The mode in which it weaves its web, its voracity, cunning, and boldness in attacking its prey, are circumstances which have attracted universal attention. But there is a peculiarity in its habits which I have never seen noticed, and which affords remarkable evidence of the instinctive wisdom with which it has been gifted by the all-wise Creator. I allude to the manner in which it takes down its web, and to the reason of its destruction. One blowy evening my attention was attracted by a little black object waving in front of my study window. On getting up to see what it was, it proved to be a spider busily engaged in demolishing his net. The method taken was this:—Beginning at the circumference of the circle he grasped a certain number of the radial, or main lines, and pulling them towards him, and rolling them up in a ball, kept moving briskly to the centre. Arrived here, he clutched the collected material, and with a sudden jerk threw it away. The same process was repeated till his work was done.—No human fingers could have coiled a number of ropes with greater skill. Indeed, as he rocked in the breeze, occasionally steadying himself, and throwing out his hands for support, he was the very image of a sailor in a gale; climbing, struggling, and hauling. The puzzle was to guess his motives. These I found out, by observing another web, the demolition of which was just commencing. I noticed that it was very dirty, so much so as to be visible even to a careless fly. The spider, it occurred to me, was thus in danger of starvation; he must change his quarters, or die. Whether he had a peculiar attachment to the place, or whether he found his present station a good one for casting his net, it is not for me to divine; but certain it is, that next evening he spread it exactly where it was before.

(1) SOZOMEN, lib. ii., cap. 33, 34.

(2) SOZOMEN, Ibid. The monastic orders of Mohammedanism are, at present, thirty-two in number. The most ancient, that of the Oiwarnes, dates its origin from the year 766. In many respects they closely resemble the monkish institutions of Christianity, and were evidently formed after their model. For particulars on this subject, the reader is referred to a recent work, "The History of Mohammedanism and its Sects," by W. C. Taylor, B. A., London, 1834.

(3) ALTHESSA, Asceticism, lib. i., cap. 3.

(4) The monks of Abyssinia and Ethiopia, many of whom exist to the present day, designate themselves as belonging to the order of Saint Anthony, but they observe no uniform system of government or discipline. They are now generally known by the name of Maronites. HILTON, tom. i., chap. 2.

One of the most curious parts of the proceeding was this:—After gathering up his snare till only a few threads were left, as points of attachment to the window, he walked along these and cleaned them so carefully that at last they were barely visible.

The manner in which he converted his limbs into a brush, and the complete success of his exertions were both equally admirable. My conjecture that the dirtiness and consequent uselessness of the web, were the cause of its destruction, was verified by subsequent observation.

In these proceedings we have a double proof of creative wisdom. The web is constructed so as to be taken down with ease, that it may be replaced by one more serviceable. The sagacity of the spider in detecting and removing an obstacle in the way of a comfortable subsistence, and the caution of the fly in avoiding manifest danger, are each of them evidence how great is the divine care in providing for the wants, and guarding the existence of the meanest thing that lives.

It is hoped the observer will not repeat an experiment which I shall mention, but not for imitation, as it might prove fatal to a creature whose ingenuity should protect it from cruelty. I touched the web with various articles, in order to ascertain whether a spider, like other cunning folk, might be "taken in his own craftiness." He merely looked out, to show his wakefulness, and made no attempt to approach what was put in his way, until I suspended in the meshes, and gently moved, a fly-hook, of the smallest kind, used by anglers, and known under the name of the midge fly. This was pounced upon in greedy haste, but when, instead of a warm insect, he embraced cold steel, the disappointed glutton paused for a moment, then precipitately fled, nor could any temptation draw him from his retirement; thus reading the experimenter this moral:—"No wise man should twice fall into the same snare."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Worldly Business ought not to interfere with Duty.—

In the vocabulary of covetousness, worldliness means industry; although it is obvious to every Christian observer, that the pretended industry of many a religious professor is the destruction of his piety, and will eventually form the ground of his condemnation. Idleness is his pretended aversion. His time, his strength, his solitudes, are all drained off in the service of Mammon; while nothing is left for religion, but a faint sigh, a hurried, heartless prayer, and an occasional struggle so impotent as to invite defeat. "But Providence," he pleads, "has actually filled his hands with business, without his seeking, and would it not be ungrateful to lose it by neglect?" But have you never heard, we might reply, that God sometimes tries his people, to see whether they will keep his commandments or not? And may he not be now proving how far the verdure of your piety can resist the exhaling and scorching sun of prosperity? Besides, is it supposable that God intended you to interpret his grant of worldly prosperity into a discharge from his service, and a commission to the service of Mammon? And, more than all, significantly as you may think his providence invites you to labour for the bread that perisheth, does not his Gospel, his Son, your Lord and Redeemer, call you a thousand fold more emphatically to labour for the meat which endureth into everlasting life? You may be misinterpreting the voice of his providence—the voice of his Gospel you cannot misunderstand; it is distinct, imperative, and incessant; urging you daily to "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness."—Rev. J. HARRIS. (Mammon.)

SACRED POETRY.

STANZAS ON SYMPATHY.

BY SIR WHITE LAW AINSLIE.

WHAT is it that's bestowed on man,
To man alone is given,
A sign of God's most gracious plan,
That we were meant for heaven?

A ray of the immortal soul,
Which warms our mortal clay;
Which, hallow'd by divine control,
Shall rise to brighter day;

A precious power, that has the art
To heal what'er's amiss,
To tranquillize the bleeding heart,
To soften wretchedness.

When want and wailing call for aid,
Aid may be granted soon;
But, trust me, 'twill be doubly paid,
If blended with this boon.

Yon beauteous mother mourns the fall
Of her brave warrior boy;
Could all that might be said recall
The sunshine of her joy?

That helpless widow wastes in woe,
Beside a husband's grave;
Could counsel stop the tears which flow?
Or words from sorrow save?

No! Such vain efforts yield no balm
To succour the distress'd;
Nor do they, for one moment, calm
The anguish of the breast.

What is it, then, that CAN relieve
The sorrow and the sigh?
It is, while greeting those who grieve,
We greet with sympathy!

So shall we more resemble Him
Who pray'd and died for us;
Who, seeing Mary's eyes grow dim,
Would weep for Lazarus!

FUNERAL HYMN.

THOU art gone to the grave!—but we will not deplore thee,

Though sorrows and darkness encompass the tomb.
Thy Saviour has pass'd through its portal before thee,
And the lamp of His love is thy guide through the gloom!

THOU art gone to the grave!—we no longer behold thee,

Nor tread the rough paths of the world by thy side;
But the wide arms of Mercy are spread to enfold thee,
And sinners may die, for the SINLESS has died!

THOU art gone to the grave!—and, its mansions forsaking,

Perchance thy weak spirit in fear lingered long;
But the mild rays of Paradise beamed on thy waking,
And the sound which thou heardst was the Seraphim's song!

THOU art gone to the grave!—but we will not deplore thee,

Whose God was thy ransom, thy guardian, and guide;
He gave thee, He took thee, and He will restore thee,
And death has no sting, for the Saviour has died!

HEBER.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Special Providence.—The following simple and affecting narrative is related by Dr Krummacher of Elberfeld, in Prussia, in his valuable work entitled "Elijah the Tishbite:"—"Who else was it but the God of Elijah, who, only a short time ago, in our neighbourhood, so kindly delivered a poor man out of his distress; not, indeed, by a raven, but by a poor singing bird? You are acquainted with the circumstance. The man was sitting, early in the morning, at his house door; his eyes were red with weeping, and his heart cried to heaven, for he was expecting an officer to come and distract him for a small debt. And whilst sitting thus, with his heavy heart, a little bird flew through the street, fluttering up and down, as if in distress, until, at length, quick as an arrow, it flew over the good man's head into his cottage, and perched itself within an empty cupboard. The good man, who had little imagined who had sent him the bird, closed the door, caught the bird, and placed it in a cage, where it immediately began to sing very sweetly, and it seemed to the man as if it were the tune of a favourite hymn, 'Fear thou not when darkness reigns;' and as he listened to it, he found it soothing and comfort his mind. Suddenly some one knocked at the door. 'Ah, it is the officer,' thought the man, and was sore afraid. But, no, it was the servant of a respectable lady, who said that the neighbours had seen a bird fly into his house, and she wished to know if he had caught it; 'Oh yes,' answered the man, 'and here it is,' and the bird was carried away. A few minutes after, the servant came again. 'You have done my mistress a great service,' said she, 'she sets a high value upon the bird, which had escaped from her. She is much obliged to you, and requests you to accept this trifle, with her thanks.' The poor man received it thankfully, and it proved to be neither more nor less than the sum he owed! And when the officer came, he said, 'Here is the amount of the debt; now leave me in peace, for God has sent it me.'" —In a letter to one of his children, Mr Venn says: "Terrible is the falling away of any who make profession, and act quite contrary to conviction. A lady here, (Huddersfield,) thus relates her own case: 'Once Mr _____ and I were both in the right path. I drew him into the world again. I am now the most miserable of beings. When I lie down, I fear I shall awake in hell. When I go out full dressed, and seem to have all the world can give me, I am ready to sink under the terrors of my own mind. What greatly increases my misery is, the remembrance of the dying speech of my own sister, who told me she had stifled convictions, and obstinately fought against light, to enjoy the company of the world. 'Sister,' said she, 'I die without hope. Beware this be not your own case!' 'But, indeed,' said Mrs _____, 'I fear it will.' Pray, my dear children, for singleness of heart, and for such a revelation of the excellency of Christ Jesus, as will leave no place for halting or dividing your affections. May they all centre in Him!'"

Having put your Hand to the Plough, look not back.

WHETHER IS THE CONVERSION OF THE SOUL TO GOD THE EFFECT OF HUMAN OR OF DIVINE POWER?

BY THE REV. W. NICOLSON,
Minister of Ferry-Port-on-Craig.

IF men were willing to refer the settlement of this question to the plain statements of the Word of God, we should think there could be no great difficulty in coming to a conclusion concerning it. In support of the doctrine of free grace, and the necessity of divine agency to bring us into a state of acceptance with God, we may refer to the words of the apostle in Eph. ii. 8, "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." It is not easy to conceive a more explicit affirmation than this, that the work of our salvation is of God's free grace; and, as if to make this matter, if possible, more plain, he immediately adds, "Not of works, lest any man should boast." Thus the apostle, both in negative and positive terms, states this doctrine, clearly evincing that man cannot merit salvation by any righteousness of his own. And, in other parts of Scripture, the necessity of the Spirit to produce the very first tendency of the soul to holiness, is made obvious by the description given of the moral state and character of unconverted men. If it could be shown that there exists in the soul of the sinner, independently of any influence of the Spirit renewing it, an inclination to love and serve God, then, by virtue of that inclination, man may be held qualified to do the will of God. But no such inclination is ascribed to him in the Word of God. On the contrary, it is affirmed that he has no such inclination. It is affirmed that his inclinations are of the very opposite tendency. He is described as wholly inclined to evil: "There is not a just man upon the earth that doeth good, and sinneth not;" "There is none righteous, no, not one;" "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually;" "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, who can know it?" "The carnal mind is enmity against God; it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God;" "We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags, and we all do fade as a leaf, and our iniquities, like the wind, have carried us away." If, then, this be a true description of the state of man, will it be maintained that he has any inclination to love and serve the Lord? The very opposite is broadly and undisguisedly taught in these declarations concerning him. Does love to God exist in that heart which the Spirit of inspiration has declared to be desperately wicked? Can he love or serve God, of whom it is here affirmed, that his mind is enmity against God? Is that man qualified of himself to do the will of God, of whom the Spirit of God says, that he cannot please God? Surely a grosser delusion never took possession of the mind of man, than the belief, in the very face of these announcements of holy writ, that man is not by nature wholly sinful, or that he has of himself virtue and rectitude enough to hate and resist evil, and to love and practise holiness. This is setting the authority of Scripture at utter defiance, and setting up, in opposition to its express affirmations, the arbitrary and erroneous conceivings of the human mind.

Resting our convictions, then, upon these clear and unambiguous statements of the Word of God, it must be laid down as a first principle, that man in his natural state neither loves God, nor is inclined to serve him. This we hold to be one of the plainest truths of the Bible. And keeping it in view, it will serve to show the fallacy of the doctrine which they teach, who conceive and affirm, that it is only after man has himself proceeded a certain length in the path of obedience, that the Spirit of God takes him up and conducts him the rest of his way. Such a conception as this obviously arises from the erroneous belief that man can of himself turn to God, and yield to him a service worthy of acceptance. But if his mind be enmity against God, how can his actions be acceptable? If his heart be wicked and deceitful, how can his life be holy? To teach men, then, that they must repent, and believe, and obey, and then the Spirit will be given them, is just teaching the very opposite of what the Word of God teaches, as to the way of our coming to him.

The Spirit is represented as himself the agent in producing faith and repentance. To say, then, that men can do this without the Spirit, or before they receive the Spirit, is virtually to deny the necessity of the Spirit altogether. Why promise the Spirit at all if man can believe and obey without him? But how can man commend himself to God by works performed before receiving the Spirit, if all such works be only the fruit of a carnal mind? How can our righteousness commend us to God, if that righteousness be declared to be but filthy rags?

It being evident, then, that the Word of God regards the unrenewed sinner as in a state of complete alienation from him, it necessarily follows, that to act agreeably to our natural feelings and propensities, is to act in opposition to the will of God. Hence, before the sinner can act in conformity to the will of God, his natural feelings and propensities must be changed. Now, the question just comes to this,—Can the sinner do this himself? can he change his own feelings and propensities? or must this change be effected by some other influence? They whose opinions we are now combating, must hold, either that the sinner does not require any such change, or that he can effect it himself, either of which suppositions can easily be shown to be unsound; for, to say that he does not require this change, is to deny the Scriptures, which uniformly teach the necessity of the sinner being born again, and being made a new creature. And no less absurd is it to say that this can be effected by the sinner himself, for this is supposing him to put forth volitions of which he is not possessed, and to exercise powers which as yet he has not received. This change being of a moral nature, must be effected in accordance with the will; but the very supposition that the sinner is under the influence of alienated affections, is utterly inconsistent with the idea of his having a will for effecting such a change as is here referred to. So long as the sinful tendencies remain without any counteracting influence, the sinner will act by these tendencies alone. A sinful propensity cannot resist itself, it must act according to its own nature. To say that the sinner can implant new principles and inclinations in himself, is to say that man can re-make himself, and is, therefore, to assert an impossibility. As well might we say that they who are dead can make themselves alive, or that that which is not can create itself.

Thus it appears that if we are to admit the truth of the scriptural representation of the state of an unrenewed sinner, we must, upon the clearest principles of reasoning, also admit that so long as he is left to the influence of his own propensities, he will continue in that state. Reformation cannot be effected by the volition and agency of a moral being, all whose affections and desires are opposed to reformation. And, therefore, whenever a change from sin to holiness is effected, it must be by the operation of a power distinct from, and superior to, the moral agent on whom the change is produced. The soundness of this reasoning may be overlooked, or it may be denied by the self-righteous tendencies of man, but the eternal principles of truth remain stable as the throne of Jehovah, and the glory of that moral renovation, which is effected by divine grace alone, will never be ceded to the helpless and guilty objects on whom it is accomplished.

Having thus seen that the conversion and reformation of fallen man is a work for which he is altogether inadequate, the next question that presents itself for our consideration, in this discussion, is, by what power is this work accomplished? Now this question receives a full and complete answer in the words of the Apostle Paul, "We are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus, unto good works."—Eph. ii. 10. Here believers are expressly said to be the workmanship of God. Now, unless it be meant that they are his workmanship, in a sense altogether different from that in which all men are his workmanship, the assertion of the apostle would be utterly pointless and unmeaning. All men are the workmanship of God by creation, but to have asserted this in the passage quoted, would have tended, in no degree, to illustrate the doctrine which the apostle was teaching. The workmanship here referred to, therefore, must imply a work altogether different from man's creation by God. And this is put beyond all dispute by the apostle's own words, for he not only says, "we are his workmanship," but he adds, "created in Christ." So that the workmanship here mentioned, refers to our union with Christ by regeneration, and implies a work through which they who are not in Christ have never passed. The apostle is teaching that our salvation is of grace, and in proof and illustration of this, he asserts that the very first step of this work of salvation, in its application to the sinner, is an act of divine power, even a new creation, a making of the sinner a new creature in Christ. This declaration of the apostle, then, strikes at the very root of Arminian doctrine, and overturns it as an unscriptural figment. It draws a line of demarcation between the clean and unclean, the whole and the maimed, and fixes the commencement of all acceptable obedience as the important period when the sinner is created anew in Christ Jesus. And if any thing more were necessary to explode the one opinion we now advert to, and confirm the other, it is contained in these words, "unto good works." The saints are created anew in Christ Jesus to this end, and for this purpose, that they may perform good works; clearly implying that their works are not good until this change be produced upon them. If, without this divine agency, good works may be performed, it never, surely, would have been taught by the Spirit of God, that these good works are the fruits of this divine agency. It would be utter vanity to attach such importance to this work of the mighty power and free grace of God, as is done by the apostle, were it true that good works could be performed without it. True repentance and holy obedience, then, are the fruits of a divine influence in the soul. It is God, by the Spirit, who begins the good work within us, and it is he who carries it on unto perfection. "It is by the grace of God that we are what we are." "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be the glory."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
THE REV. HUGH BINNING.

COMMUNICATED BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNS,

THE subject of this memoir was born in 1627. His father, John Binning, was proprietor of the lands of Dalvennan and Machimore, in Ayrshire. His mother was Margaret M'Kell, a daughter of the Rev. Matthew M'Kell, minister of Bothwell. Alexander Binning, the second son of John, to whom he had assigned Machimore, was married to a daughter of Alexander Crawford, Esq. of Kerse, the mother of John Binning, a writer in Edinburgh.

The circumstances of the family were thus favourable to the obtaining for Hugh the great advantage of a liberal education, "the good effects of which appeared very early upon him, the greatness of his spirit and capacity giving good grounds to his parents to conceive the pleasing hopes of his future eminence. When he was at the grammar school he made so great proficiency in the knowledge of the Latin tongue, as to excel most of his fellows, even such as were older than himself. When his companions went to play, he chose to employ himself either in secret duty with God, or conference with religious people, having an indifference to youthful sports, not from any moroseness or melancholy of temper, being rather of an affable and cheerful disposition, but from a preference to the more grave and serious pursuits, and a deep sense of the preciousness of time. Religious exercises were his choice, in which he spent the time he could spare from his studies." "He began to have sweet familiarity with God, and to live in near communion with him, before others had begun to think seriously of their condition as sinners." When he had attained to his thirteenth year, such was his experience in the ways of God, that the most judicious and exercised Christians in the place, confessed they were much edified, strengthened, and comforted by him; nay, that he provoked them to diligence in the duties of religion, being abundantly sensible that they were much outrun by a youth.

He had scarcely reached his fourteenth year when he entered on the study of philosophy in the University of Glasgow, wherein he made very considerable progress, outstripping most of his fellow-students, so as to be taken notice of by the professors and students; and while he made proficiency in the liberal sciences he advanced also in religion. Notwithstanding his surprising attainments, his remarkable acumen, and ready apprehension of things, whereby he was able to do more in one hour than many others could do by hard study and close and continued application, and though on these accounts, he was much respected by the eminent ministers of the city, and learned professors of the university; yet he was ever humble, never exalted above measure, nor swelled with the self-conceit which is but too often prominent in youths of pregnant parts, and which is so injurious to themselves, as well as distressing to their best friends. He passed Master of Arts with great applause, and having his mind stored with an uncommon measure of the knowledge of literature, which is said to be the handmaid to religion, he began the study of divinity, with a view to serve God in the holy ministry. At this time there happened to be a vacancy in the College of Glasgow, by the resignation of Mr James Dalrymple of Stair, who had been Mr Binning's master, afterwards the great Lord Stair, the author of the Institutions of the Law of Scotland, of a System of Physics, valued greatly at that period, and of a Vindication of the Divine Attributes, possessing great force of argument and sound knowledge.

Mr Binning was determined, after much entreaty, to stand as a candidate to succeed his late teacher. The professors of the college, according to the usual laudable custom, gave public notice of the vacancy to all the universities of the kingdom, inviting such as had a mind to dispute for a professorship of philosophy to sist themselves before them to compete for that preferment, giving assurance that without respect of persons, the place should be conferred upon him who should be found "the more worthy," and "the more learned." The ministers of the city of Glasgow, considering how much it was the interest of the Church, that well qualified persons should be put into the professorship of philosophy, and that universities by these means would become most useful seminaries for the Church; and knowing that Mr Hugh Binning was eminently pious, and one of a solid judgment, as well as of a bright genius urged him to sist himself among the competitors, and at last prevailed upon him, with great difficulty, to enter the lists before the professors. There were two other candidates, one of whom had the advantage of great interest with Dr Strang, principal of the college, and the other was a scholar of great abilities, and of the same sentiments with the doctor, in some problematical points of divinity, which, with great subtlety, had been debated in the schools. Mr Binning so managed the dispute, and so acquitted himself in all the parts of trial, that to the conviction of the judges, he very much excelled his rivals; and as to the precise point of qualification, in respect of literature, there was no doubt of his superiority. The principal however, and some of the faculty who joined him, though they could not allege that the candidates they appeared for had an equality, much less a superiority in the dispute, yet argued that, other things being equal, the person they inclined to prefer was a citizen's son, having a good competency of learning, and a person of more years and of greater experience, than Mr Binning could be supposed to have, and consequently more fit to be a teacher of youth; that Mr Binning being but yesterday a fellow-student with those he was to teach, it was not to be expected that the students would behave to him with that respect which should be paid to a master. To this it was replied that Mr Binning was such an able scholar, so wise and sedate, as to be above all the follies and vanities of youth; that he knew well so to act as that no one should "despise his youth;" that what was wanting in years was sufficiently made up by his singular endowments. A member of the faculty perceiving the struggle among them to be great, (indeed the affair seems to have been very fairly argued on both sides,) proposed a dispute between the two candidates extempore, upon any subject they should be pleased to prescribe. This put an end to the division, when those who opposed Mr Binning not being willing to expose their friend again in the lists with such an able antagonist, yielded the question, and Mr Binning was elected. Mr Binning was not full nineteen years of age when he commenced regent and professor of philosophy, and though he had not time to prepare a system of philosophy, having to commence teaching the class almost immediately on his election, yet such was the quickness and fertility of his invention, the tenaciousness of his memory, and the solidity of his judgment, that his prelections to the scholars possessed much depth of learning, and perspicuity of expression. He was among the first in Scotland that began to reform the philosophy of mind from the barbarous terms, and unintelligible distinctions of the schoolmen, and the many vain disputes and trifling subtleties which rather perplex the minds of youth than furnish them with solid and useful knowledge. He continued in this professorship for the space of three years, and discharged his trust so well that he gained the general approbation of the university for his academical exercises; and this was the more wonderful, that having turned his thoughts towards the ministry, he carried on his theological studies at the same time, in which he was well fitted to make progress by his deep penetration, and a memory so strong that he scarcely forgot any thing he had read or heard.

During this period of his life, he gave a proof of the great progress he had made in the study of divinity, by a discourse which he composed on that choice passage of Scripture, 2 Cor. v. 14, "The love of Christ constraineth us." This performance he sent to a certain lady in Edinburgh, who, having perused it, judged it to be the work of some eminent minister in the west of Scotland, and put it into the hands of the then Provost of Edinburgh for his opinion. His lordship was so well satisfied with it, that, supposing it to be taken from the mouth of one whom the city had formerly resolved to call, he could not be satisfied till a call was brought about to him to be one of the ministers of the city. But when the lady returned to Glasgow, she found her mistake, by Mr Binning's asking the discourse from her. This was the first discovery he had given of his great dexterity and ability in explaining Scripture. At the expiration of his third year as a professor of philosophy, the parish of Govan became vacant. Before this time, the Principal of the College of Glasgow was also minister of Govan; for Mr Robert Boyd of Trochrig, a person of very great learning, as his Commentary on the Ephesians and his Hecatombæ Christiana testify, returned to Scotland, after he had been minister of Vertal in France, and Professor of Divinity at Saumur, and was settled Principal of the College and minister of Govan; but this being attended with inconvenience, an alteration was made, and the presbytery having in view to confer the situation on Mr Binning, took him upon trials, in order to his being licensed as a preacher. After being licensed, he preached at Govan to the great satisfaction of the people. He was some time after invited to be minister of that parish, and the presbytery having heartily approved of the call, they brought him forward for ordination about the twenty-second year of his age. As a part of his trials, they prescribed to him a common head on divine influence and free-will; the occasion of which was, that Dr Strang, the Principal of the College, and a member of the presbytery, had vented some peculiar notions on that profound subject. Mr Binning delivered a very elaborate discourse, to the admiration of all who heard it, and gave in, according to custom, his thesis to be impugned by the members of the presbytery. The sentiments contained in it were directly opposed to those avowed by Dr Strang in his prelections to the students on that controversy. The Doctor being pitched upon to be one of his antagonists, found his credit and reputation at stake, and exerted his metaphysical talent on that occasion; but Mr Binning maintained his ground by the weight and solidity of his defence, to the great satisfaction of all who were present, so that some were pleased to say, that young Mr Binning was the old learned Doctor; nay, the Doctor himself, after the dispute, admiring Mr Binning's abilities and parts, said, "Where has this young man got all his learning and reading?" When he had finished his trials, he had the unanimous approbation of the presbytery, nay, their declaration of his fitness to be one of the ministers of the city, having in view to bring him back again to their society, whenever, as would probably soon happen, the Professorship of Divinity should become vacant. He was, considering his age, a prodigy of learning; for, before he had arrived at the twenty-sixth year of his life, he had such a large stock of useful knowledge, as to be at once a philologist, a philosopher, and illustrious theologian, and might well have been an ornament in the most famous and flourishing university in Europe. This was the more astonishing, if we consider his weakness of bodily frame, which rendered him unable to read much at one time, or to undergo the fatigue of assiduous study; but this was well supplied, by a peculiarly retentive memory, and by a solid, penetrating judgment, so that, with a singular dexterity, he could bring forth his knowledge seasonably, and communicate it to the use and advantage of others, drained from the dregs he found about it, or intermixed with it, insomuch that his knowledge seemed rather to be born with him, than to have been acquired by laborious study. From his childhood he knew the Scriptures, and from a boy he had been under much deep and spiritual exercise, until the time of his entrance upon the office of the ministry, when he came to a great calm and lasting tranquillity of mind, being mercifully relieved of all those doubts which had, for a long time, greatly exercised him; and though he was of a tender and weakly constitution, yet love to Christ, and a concern for the good of precious souls committed to him, constrained him to such diligence in feeding the flock, that he resolved to spend and be spent in the work of the ministry. It was observed of him, that he was not much averse, at any time, from embracing an opportunity and invitation to preach before the most experienced Christians, the learned professors of the university, or the ministers of the city; and when one of his most intimate friends noticed in this a difference from the modesty and self-denial which appeared in the whole of his conduct, he took the freedom to ask him, how he came to be so easily prevailed upon to preach before persons of so great experience and judgment, whose eminent gifts and graces he highly valued and esteemed? Mr Binning made this excellent reply, "That when he had a clear call to mention his beloved Master's name in any place, he had no more to say but 'here am I, send me.' What am I, that I should resist his heavenly call? and when He whose name is holy and reverend is spoken of, and to, and is there present, the presence of no other person is to be regarded or dreaded, and, under that impression, I forget who is present and who is absent." Though he was studious, and much intent on fulfilling his ministry, he turned his thoughts to marriage, and married a virtuous and excellent person, Barbara Simpson, daughter of Mr James Simpson, a minister in Ireland. Upon the day on which he was to be married, he went, accompanied by his friends, to an adjacent country congregation, to hear sermon. The minister of the parish delayed commencing the service till they should come, hoping to put the work upon one of the ministers he expected to be there; but all of them declining it, he next tried if he could prevail upon the bridegroom, and succeeded, though the nature of the occasion seemed to be somewhat unseasonable for his being employed in that work. It was no difficult task to him to preach upon a short warning; having a prompt and ready gift, he was never at a loss for words and matter. Having stepped aside for a little, to premeditate and to implore his Master's presence and assistance, for he was ever afraid of being alone in that work, he went to the pulpit, and preached upon 1 Peter i. 15, "As he who called you is holy, so be ye holy, in all manner of conversation." On this occasion he was so remarkably helped, that all acknowledged that God was with him of a truth; and the people of the parish, who had come to hear their own minister, a truly pious and excellent man, were so surprised and taken with him, as if God, besides his ordinary resident, as Mr M'Ward expresses it, had sent them an extraordinary ambassador to negotiate a peace between God and them, and a skilful suitor of a spouse for Jesus Christ, the blessed bridegroom, that he might present them as a chaste virgin to his divine husband.

Although he studied in his public discourses to condescend to the capacity of the humbler sort of hearers, yet, it must be owned, that his preaching was not so much suited to a country congregation, as it was to the judicious and learned. The subjects of sermons are so numerous and varied, and the manner of disposing the thoughts so different, that no fixed and invariable method can be prescribed, that shall agree to every man's taste, and to every subject. Mr Binning's method was peculiar to himself. He was no stranger to the rules of art, and knew well how to make his method subservient to the subject he handled; and though he tells not that his discourse has so many parts, yet it wanted not method. His diction and language is easy and fluent; void of all affectation and bombast; every period has a kind of undesigned natural elegance about it, which arrests the reader's attention, and always pleases; so that considering the time he lived, it might be said he carried off the palm of oratory from his contemporaries in Scotland, and was not at that time inferior to the best pulpit orators in England. The comparison of Binning with Scougal and Leighton, in regard to sweetness and elegance of style, as well as sublimity and richness of sentiment, will not be unfavourable to our author; while in evangelical savour and soundness he excels the first of these eminent writers, and is certainly not behind the latter. That great divine, Mr James Durbam, an excellent judge, gave this verdict of him, that there is no speaking after Mr Binning; and truly he had the tongue of the learned, and knew how to speak a word in season. The subject-matter of his sermons is mostly practical, yet natural and argumentative, fit to inform the judgment, and move the affections. And, when controversies came in the way, he showed great acuteness in discussing and determining them, and no less skill in applying them to practice. His discourses were so solid and substantial, and so heavenly and sublime, that they not only feed, but feast, the reader. Mr M'Ward says in his letter, "That, as to the whole of Mr Binning's writings, I know no man's pen, on the heads he hath handled, more adapted to edification, or which, with a pleasant violence, will sooner find a passage into the heart of a judicious experienced reader, and cast fire, ere he is aware, into his affections, and set them into a flame. The subjects he discourses on are handled with such a variety of thought and expression, that the hearer or reader is taken with it, as if he had never met with it before. He brought forth the old, with such sweetness and savour, as it seemed still new; and the new retained its first sweetness, so as never to grow old.

He, and some young ministers in the same Presbytery, who had been fellow-students of divinity when he was professor of philosophy, kept private meetings for Christian fellowship, and their mutual improvement; but finding that he was in danger of being puffed up with the high opinion they had of him, he broke up these meetings, though he still kept up a brotherly correspondence with them, for the vigorous prosecution of their ministerial work. He studied to be clothed with humility, and to hide his attainments under that veil. Although he wanted not matter and words, wherewith to please and profit all his hearers, yet at every thought of his appearing in public to speak of God and Christ to men, his soul was filled with a holy tremor, which he vented by saying, "Ah! Lord, I am a child, and cannot speak: teach me what I shall say of thee, who cannot order my speech by reason of darkness." In his first sermon on the fourth question of our Shorter Catechism, he expresses himself in a most elegant and rapturous manner: "We are now," says he, "about this question, What is God? But who can answer it? or if answered, who can understand it? It should astonish us on the very entry to think, we are about to speak and to hear of his majesty, 'whom eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of any creature to conceive what he is.' Think ye that blind men could understand a pertinent discourse of light and colours? Would they form any suitable notion of that they had never seen, and which cannot be known but by seeing? How then can we speak of God, who dwells in inaccessible light?"

He was a great student in the works of creation and providence, and took much pleasure in meditating upon what is written in these volumes. The wonders he discovered in both, led him up to the infinitely wise and powerful Maker and Preserver of all things. Once when he came to visit a gentleman of good learning, and his intimate acquaintance, he took him into his garden, and in their walk he discoursed with him, to his great surprise, of the objective declarations which every thing makes of its Almighty Creator, and talked of the wisdom and goodness of God, particularly in clothing the earth with a green garb rather than any other colour; and having plucked a flower, he so dissected and anatomized the same, as to set forth the glorious perfection of his Maker in a most engaging and instructive manner.

But the main object of his devout contemplations was, God in Christ reconciling the world to himself; for God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, had shined into his heart, to give him the light of the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ; so that he not only understood the mysteries of the kingdom of God himself, but it was given to him to make others know them. His preaching was in the demonstration of the Spirit, and with power. His sermons are the very transcript of what had past betwixt God and his own soul. He spoke and wrote from experimental knowledge, and did both because he believed. He constantly contended for the articles of faith and the truths of religion, and could never think of parting with one truth, or the least grain of truth, being persuaded that Christian concord must have truth for its foundation, and holiness for its attendant, without which it will decline into a defection, and degenerate into a conspiracy against religion. As to the duties of Christianity, he enforced the performance of those with all the arguments of persuasion; so that, through the blessing of God, his pulpit discourses became the power of God to the illumination of the understanding of his hearers, the renovation of their natures, the reformation of their lives, and the salvation of their souls. The difficult part of a reprove he acted in the most prudent and gaining manner. When he took out the mote from his brother's eye, he did it with all tenderness, and with the tear in his own eye. His words wanted neither edge nor point for drawing blood, when the case of the offender made it his indispensable duty; and when he was necessitated to use sharpness with any, they were convinced that he honestly and sincerely intended their spiritual good. His compassion on the ignorant, and on those that were out of the way, made it evident, how much he considered himself as encompassed with infirmities, and so within the hazard of being tempted. He was a person of exemplary moderation and sobriety of spirit, and studied to promote love and peace among his brethren in the ministry, and had healing methods much at heart. He had a temper that is rarely possessed in one of his age; but ripe grapes were found on this vine in the beginning of spring, since he lived so near the Sun of Righteousness, and lay under the plentiful showers of divine grace, and the ripening influences of his Holy Spirit.

No. II.—THE DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

HEROD would have proceeded to greater extremities against John, had he not been restrained by two considerations. He would have deprived the prophet of life, as well as of liberty, but, in the first place, he feared John, "knowing that he was a just man and an holy;" and, in the second place, he feared the people, "because they accounted John as a prophet." Let us briefly illustrate the influence of these motives on the mind of the king.

With the character of John, Herod enjoyed many opportunities of becoming well acquainted; and the result was, a high veneration for the Baptist; and although the king had been thrown into a transport of rage, by the faithfulness and the boldness with which he was reproved for his sin, he could not divest himself of the deep impression which the superior sanctity and honesty of John had made upon his mind; and he was obliged, in his secret soul, to respect and fear the man whom he persecuted. The falsehood and flattery of their slaves must be evident, at times, even to princes; the character of John, as exhibiting a strong contrast to that of those by whom Herod was surrounded, must have filled him with admiration. It was a singular sight, and one that is rarely seen; living at a court, John was uncorrupt; dwelling in a palace, he loved his God better than his prince, and served both with equal fidelity; with surprise and awe must Herod have looked on one, who could not be won by his blandishments, nor subdued by his power; who was uncompromising and unchanged, amid the dissolute and complying members of his court.

There is a subordination of rank in the world of mind, as well as in civil society; and there is no necessary, and at times only is there any accidental, connection between the order to which we belong in the former, and the station we fill in the latter. Mind stands as high above mind, as the hielr of the empire, in the eye of society, is distinguished above the son of the beggar; now, this difference of moral rank is perceived, as if by intuition, when mind approaches mind; there is the majesty of contour, and the repose of strength, which, like the insignia of civil dignity, indicate to the mental eye the order of their possessor; and as the larger masses in space govern the smaller, so spirits of lower rank do voluntary homage to those of higher. This moral subordination is the appointment of God; it is more ancient than any of the conventional forms of society, and the dignity it confers is recognized by all creatures, being, in fact, the measure of our distance from the divine throne. Now, there are times and circumstances in which the appointment of the Creator operates, and that of creatures is suspended,—when minds fall into the order which properly belongs to them, and when the weak and the worthless sink to their level, despite all the advantages which rank, and power, and wealth can confer. This explains to us, why it was that the simple reproof of John, "It is not lawful for thee to have her," smote with such tremendous force the guilty king; it was the descending space through which it passed which gave to it (if we may use the phrase) its momentum; and as the monarch sunk before the prophet, and each for the moment assumed his proper place, Herod felt awe as well as anger.

The second motive by which Herod was restrained from proceeding to greater extremities against John, was "the fear of the multitude." If John was feared by such a man as Herod, to whom, on many accounts, he must have been obnoxious, it is not surprising that he was venerated by the people. If Herod had consulted only his own feelings, he would immediately have put the Baptist to death; and to this step he was vehemently urged by Herodias, who dreaded the influence of the preacher; but the reverence in which he was held by all men, rendered this, in the meantime, unsafe, and Herod found it necessary to withdraw him for a while from public view, that, being out of sight and out of mind in the solitude of a prison, he might afterwards do with safety what, in the meantime, he dared not do. Thus, although Herod "feared not God," yet he "regarded man;" he did not hesitate to destroy the peace of his mind, and to expose himself to the wrath of an Omnipotent Avenger, and yet he would do nothing which might render his throne insecure, and awaken the resentment of his subjects. Never yet did a sinner exist who had emancipated himself from every restraint; those who refuse to be held in the fetters of man, are yet bound by secret and invisible ties; where human fear can accomplish nothing, the fear of conscience, and of a judgment to come, sometimes exert a salutary influence; and those again who spurn this restraint, who have said with the fool, "there is no God," are yet influenced, as Herod was, by the fear of man. Few are possessed of so extensive means of doing either good or evil as those who occupy thrones; and yet, from the instance before us, we learn that even they cannot accomplish all the evil which they design; the same power which guides those orbs which roll on high, which sets a limit to the waters of the ocean, when its waves would invade the dwellings of man, governs and restrains those who, otherwise, are possessed of absolute and uncontrolled power. There is One, whose power none can resist, whose purpose none can defeat; "He is terrible to the kings of the earth."

We will now pursue the history of the prophet. We have already seen John thrown into prison for no fault of his, and his ministry put a stop to, merely on account of the faithfulness with which he discharged it. But the darkest part of the picture is yet to be exhibited. The cruelties already inflicted on the Baptist could not satisfy the savage and relentless woman whose hatred he had incurred. Herodias could not enjoy security in her sin while the prophet lived, and her fell revenge could be sated only with his blood. For the reasons of policy we have already explained, Herod could not comply with her urgent request, that John should immediately be put to death; but revenge is patient as well as cruel; as the bird of prey desecrates its victim from afar, so revenge sees her hour approaching, and waits with patience till it has come. Herodias had resolved that John should die, that the blood of the prophet should wash out the affront he had put upon her, and enjoying, in the meantime, a sort of satisfaction from the purpose she had formed, she sat down to watch the arrival of the fitting hour for executing it.

Such an opportunity occurred during the festivities which were held on the birth-day of Herod. "But when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod." On this occasion, it was usual with Herod to give a supper to his lords and captains, and all the officers of state in Galilee. To grace the solemnity, and please the king, the daughter of Herodias, most probably Salome, her daughter by her former husband, Herod's brother, was introduced, and danced before them. Living at a court where a high price was set on such accomplishments, and having, no doubt, the advantage of excellent masters, she was able to perform her part well; her dancing attracted the notice, and called forth the applause of the company, and especially of Herod,—"she pleased Herod." With how small a matter will even great men sometimes condescend to be gratified! Here we behold a king, laying aside his state, forgetting the cares of government, and deigning to find delight in the dancing of a girl, displaying in this matter, an interest as intense as if he had been raised to empire only that he might encourage arts so noble, and possessed of treasures only that he might reward their patrons, with a liberality, which did not know within what limits to confine itself! David was wont to seek relief from the duties of his throne, in the devotions of his closet, "what time my heart is overwhelmed and in perplexity, I will go to the Rock that is higher than I." In secret his chafed spirit drank at this heavenly fountain and was refreshed. His closet was as another landing placed in some happy clime, whither the curse had not come, where the Sun of Righteousness always shone, and from which he returned laden with spices more fragrant than ever grew on earth. How beautiful is rank when thus illustrated by piety! How august is power when thus controlled by wisdom from above! and how well fitted are those, for being intrusted with the rights of man, whose own hearts are under the influence of the love of God! But alas! it has been the too frequent practice of monarchs, in all ages, to devote those hours which they were able to redeem from the cares of ambition or government, not to the pages of the Word of God, but, like Herod, to the "wine-cup and the dance."

Some amusements are innocent and lawful in whatever light they are viewed; others, although innocent in themselves, become unlawful, from the circumstances which attend them, and the sins to which they may lead, and to which there is a peculiar tendency in their nature to lead. Some pieces of amusement are to be condemned, as being inconsistent with the gravity and sincerity of the Christian's deportment; and, if it be said that they accomplish some good, that good might be accomplished by other means less liable to objection. With respect to that amusement which led to the martyrdom of John, we are aware that it has now been reduced into a science, and is accounted a necessary part of every polite education,—with what improvement to our minds or our morals, we could never distinctly comprehend. Had the daughter of Herodias not danced, John would not, at this time at least, have been put to death. "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" How dangerous is it to tamper with the lusts of the flesh, or to stray, even for the shortest time, in the path of forbidden enjoyment! "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright: At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

When we enter on the path of iniquity, it is vain to say that we will go to a certain length, and there stop,—that this shall be the limit of our course, and, beyond it, no power, however great, no temptation, however strong, shall be able to carry us. We calculate as if our strength were the strength of stones, and our flesh of brass; as if the line which we have drawn by the hand of calm reason, would be respected in the fiery sweep of passion. The only step of such a course which is fully in our own power, is the first. The only question which is left for our decision, in reference to this matter, is, whether we shall enter at all on this path; not when or where our course shall terminate. It is ours to kindle, not to quench the conflagration—to let loose the flood, not to restrain its fury. Who would have thought when the daughter of Herodias began to dance, that this would lead to the murder of John? and yet, we see the watter passing from one stage to another, by a train of very natural sequences, till at last it arrives at this melancholy issue. This is the course of all iniquity, and the fate of all those who surrender themselves to the influence of temptation; they proceed from evil to worse, by stages which are short, by degrees which can scarcely be measured, but their progress still going on, they at last reach a point, where it would have been thought impossible, both by themselves and others, they should ever be found. Many a course has had as melancholy a result as that of the dancing of Salome, whose beginnings, perhaps, were more justifiable than that of hers. We may not be able to mention the exact grounds on which any action, or piece of amusement, is to be condemned; but, if we feel in our own hearts that it is unlawful, this should teach us that it is dangerous, and ought to be shunned. The injunction of the apostle is, "abstain from all appearance of evil."

Events of a very different character were passing that night in the palace and the prison of Herod. The king and his lords, dissolved in the wine-cup, were feasting their ears with the lewd song, and their eyes with the lascivious dance. Herodias, nursing her implacable revenge, and thirsting for its gratification, was watching her opportunity to compass the death of the prophet; and her daughter, flushed with youth and pride, and fortified by vanity and impudence, was exerting herself to gratify Herod and his courtiers;—such was the scene which the balls of the palace exhibited. Let us leave the revelry of the court, and visit, for a short while, the silence of the prison. We descend into its darkness, and discover there one greater than kings—greater than prophets—the most honourable of those who are born of women. How fragrant is this prison! How glorious the form that stands amid the shadows of the dungeon! And what awe, such as we never felt before kingly majesty, do we feel in the presence of the martyr! His dwelling is the iron cell, "his feet are hurt in fetters," yet kings have trembled before him; on that head the storms of tyranny have burst, yet it has not bowed to the wrath of man; sacred, venerable, august, yet clothed with a humility which tells us that he is the messenger, not the Master.

It was no honour to Herod that he could call a palace his dwelling, or a throne his seat, while he was degraded by the vices of his life, and the crimes of his government; we may be high in rank, and yet not great; we may have a patent of nobility, and yet not be noble; and as it was no honour to Herod that he possessed a throne, so it was no disgrace to John, or to the cause for which he suffered, that he lay in a dungeon. Truth can accommodate herself to times and circumstances, and when she is banished from the courts of princes, she can dwell in a prison among felons. But in the prison, no doubt, the one enjoyed that pure satisfaction, that ravishing delight, which arises from a consciousness that duty has been done, and that God has been honoured, to which the other was a stranger amidst the applause and splendours of his court, and to possess which, he no doubt, would willingly have given his crown. What a blessing is it, that peace of mind, that true happiness, may be found in the discharge of duty, and can be obtained in no other manner! Wealth and power may be obtained sometimes by falsehood, by crime, by injustice; but peace of mind—never. Amidst the splendours of the empire the person is miserable still; on the very pinnacle of human glory, he is more wretched than the most abject of those who are dazzled when they lift their eyes up to the height on which he stands. High and glorious as he is, he is but a gilded monument of woe. In the instance before us, how much happier, how much more honourable was the occupant of the prison, than the occupant of the palace! mirth laughed in the one, silence reigned in the other: "For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool." "Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful, and the end of that mirth is heaviness."

Herod, as we have already said, was well pleased with the dancing of the daughter of Herodias, and we have no wish to detract from her merits in this respect, but we cannot so readily approve of the extravagant and foolish liberality with which Herod proposed to reward her. "Whereupon he promised, with an oath, to give her whatsoever she would ask." How trifling the service! How large the reward! Salome has danced; the courtiers have applauded; Herod has been gratified; and the treasures of an empire are scarcely adequate to testify the gratitude of the monarch. Name your reward, said the king, in language which savoured not a little of ostentation in the presence of his lords, and in which, it is not unreasonable to suppose, wine had an influence; name your reward, and if my throne can command it, or if my kingdom can furnish it, it shall not be wanting. To make the matter worse, the seal of an oath was set upon the promise of the king; as if Herod intended to teach his courtiers that his simple affirmation was not to be trusted, unless the force of his oath was superadded. "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" said the Lord of the vineyard. He who is the universal proprietor, and to whom the earth and all its fulness belongs, may claim this right; but monarchs are only stewards over the goods of another, which they are bound not to abuse; and they sin against society as well as against God, if they squander the riches they possess on the most infamous, or the most frivolous of mankind. Some have thought that the promise and oath of the king arose in the depths of policy; were parts of a scheme previously concerted between him and Herodias, to cut off the Baptist, and that the grief he exhibited, when the request of Salome was presented to him, was feigned, not real. The extravagant liberality of Herod, for so trifling a service; his binding himself by an oath, as if to furnish an excuse before-hand; the ready consent he gave to the death of a man he had formerly venerated, would render this supposition probable, were not the known character of Herod, that of irresolution; one likely to be driven to wickedness by the influence of others, but unlikely to perpetrate it, on any steady plan he himself had formed.

There was silence in the royal apartment when the daughter of Herodias entered. Not long had she been absent in consultation with her mother, at once the parent and the counsellor in wickedness, and now she stood before the king to present her request. All the lords of Galilee bent forward in eager expectation to catch the sound of her words, and learn what, amongst the many objects of desire which a kingdom presented, had fixed the choice of one so young. She spoke, and the silence became deeper, "Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger." Herod heard her words, and sorrow, like a cloud, settled upon his brow. "The head of John!" And the recollection of the many virtues of the preacher returned to his mind. "John was a just man and a holy." Pity, for a brief space, shone in the eyes of the tyrant, but anon it faded, as the reproof of John rose to his memory; he again heard the voice of the Baptist saying, sternly, "it is not lawful for thee to have her;" and anger shot forth its fiery ray, and quenched the light of every softer emotion; he looked round upon his courtiers, and their looks appeared to upbraid him for his irresolution; they said or seemed to say, "will pity for a despised prisoner, lead you to violate your oath, and refuse the daughter of your queen?" Pride mounted highest in the mind of the monarch, and in that moment nothing was remembered but the reproof of John, and his own oath to Salome. "Yes, I have sworn it, John must die."

Herod had indeed sworn, that whatever the daughter of Herodias should ask, he would give to her: but his oath was necessarily to be understood of all things lawful; for no man has power to bind himself to do what the law of God has commanded him not to do. It does not admit of doubt, that an unlawful oath is not to be kept: we sin in making it, but we commit a greater sin if we keep it. The law of God is the supreme authority; and whatever is opposed to its enactments, is by that superior authority discharged. If the daughter of Herodias had acted literally on the grant of the king, and proposed that he should divide his kingdom, and make her the ruler over the half of it, would not Herod have found means to evade his oath? And yet, rather than be an accomplice in the murder of this good man, he ought to have been willing to have given her his throne, his crown, and all that he possessed. Had Salome asked his own head instead of that of John, would not Herod have insisted that his promise was not to be kept? And yet, had he been a man of integrity, he would sooner have given her his own head, than consented that the head of John should be cut off. Herod had said, "even unto the half of my kingdom;" and he redeems that pledge with a gift, which the whole of his kingdom could not have purchased. Than have redeemed that pledge as Herod redeemed it, better far had he taken the loveliest jewel from his crown and given it to the daughter of Herodias; better far had he planted his own diadem on the head of Salome, and gone from his royal throne to sit in dust among the captives of his prison-house. Ancient resentment against the prophet, the fear of incurring the scorn of his courtiers and the upbraidings of Herodias, the partner of his crimes, prevailed against the pleadings of mercy and justice. There was no statement of the crime for which John was to suffer; there were no forms of trial; there were no tedious delays between the sentence and the execution of it; in fine, there were none of the barriers which modern times have erected between the wrath of despots and the lives of their subjects; and no sooner was the sentence given, than a messenger was sent to execute it.

While the death of John was thus hastily resolved upon in the palace of Herod, what may we imagine were the musings of the prophet in his prison? Is it unlawful to suppose that the Master he served had sent his angel to assure him, that in a few moments his earthly sorrows would be ended, and his heavenly glory begun? That in a little he would hear the voice of the oppressor no more, but be relieved at once from the chain of Herod, and the garments of mortality? Shut out from public labour, he passed his hours in prison, no doubt, in looking forward to the triumphs and the sufferings which awaited the Church of God. In the reports which his disciples brought him, from time to time, of the progress of Jesus, he could trace the dawn of the Gospel day; and his soul was filled with unutterable joy, when he thought that the hour was near when the light that was now breaking duskiy on the mountains of Judea, would shine, in all the glory of day, on the broad fields of the Gentile world. At other times, the darkness of coming evil—the gathering of those storms, from which he knew he would be hid in the quiet grave—would fall upon his eye, and weigh down the spirit of the captive more heavily than could the chain of Herod. But anon the clouds would roll away, and the days of peace and glory, revealed in prophecy, would shine in the bursting and glowing future, and the martyr would continue to gaze till his dungeon glowed with light, and resounded with his song. Such were the musings of the prophet, when his prison-door opened, and the messenger of death stood before him.

This was sudden, but John was prepared: his work was done, and by this death was he now to glorify God. We behold him rise up, and with a firm voice command the officer of the king to obey the orders of his master. A flickering light quivers through the dungeon—the gleam of the executioner's sword; and the revenge of Herodias is gratified, and the prophet dismissed to his glory. Oh! the happy exchange. John has left the darkness of his prison, and soared, like the eagle, to the world of eternal day; and he is now, without the fear of bolts or fetters, and far beyond the wrath of Herod, walking at liberty in the streets of the New Jerusalem. He has been faithful unto death, and has received the crown of life.

Formerly the disciples of John had loved him as a master, but now they venerated him as a martyr. He was their master no longer; the same sword which had mangled his body, had dissolved that relation; but love is stronger than death; and when they learned that he had fallen by the order of the king, they came forward to testify the veneration in which they held him, the love they bore to his character, and the advantage they had reaped from his instructions, and performed the last service, which he needed, or which they could render, "they took up the body and buried it." He did not sleep in marble, nor were his virtues written on tablets of brass; his labours and sufferings were inscribed on the pages of the Word of God, and his funeral sermon was preached by the Saviour. "What went ye out to the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out for to see, a prophet? Yea, I say unto you more than a prophet. For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee."

While one system of events is in progress, it is generally impossible to vindicate the providence of God to man; but no sooner has the system been concluded—no sooner has the last act of the series taken place—than the explanation is easy, and now a child may discover what the most accomplished student of the ways of God was formerly unable to penetrate. If we look not beyond that scene which closes with the death of the prophet, nothing is seen but mystery, and nothing is felt but doubt. We retire, asking, in the agony of bitter uncertainty and disappointment, "Doth God know? Is there knowledge in the Highest? Why should Iniquity be permitted to lift up her head upon a throne, while Truth is obliged to hide her's in a prison? They break in pieces thy people, O Lord, and afflict thy heritage. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. Yet they say, the Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard this." And if we find any relief from doubts so agitating, it is only in the remembrance that there is a world beyond the present, where truth shall rise to her native dignity, and be crowned with her native honours, while iniquity shall sink to her proper level, and be lost for ever in those depths out of which she arose. But it is not the usual method of God to delay so long the vindication of his providence; even in time, the future often vindicates the past: and if we carry our views forward a few years from the death of John, we behold the ways of God to all these individuals explained. We find, that the mirth of the palace is gone, and that silence is come in the room of noisy revelry. We behold those who for a brief space shone there, overwhelmed with misfortune, drooping in exile, wandering friendless in foreign lands, and some of them perishing miserably by a cruel death. And as to the prophet, the victim of royal injustice and feminine revenge,—we behold the prison exchanged for the palaces of glory, the silence of the dungeon for the songs of paradise, the society of felons for the Princes of the universe, and the frown of a monarch of earth for the smile of the King of Heaven.

THE OFFENCE OF THE CROSS:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ANDREW MILROY

"And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me."—MAT. xi. 6.

SUCH was the declaration with which our Lord concluded the full and decisive evidence he had furnished to the Baptist's disciples of his being in truth the promised Messiah. To them it was a solemn warning against the influence of any prejudices they might have conceived towards him, a faithful intimation of the awful danger to which they should expose themselves if they remained at a distance from him, refusing to acknowledge him in the high character in which he claimed to be received. But while this was the primary occasion and purpose of this declaration, it is evidently one of no mere limited application. It is couched in the most general terms—"whosoever"—and stands on record as an admonition from the Faithful and True Witness, to which it concerns all who are privileged to hear his words earnestly to give heed. There are indicated in it several important truths: the truth, that such was the holiness and benevolence of Christ's personal character, such the purity and excellence of his doctrine, such the demonstrative wisdom of his miracles, that it is only through the influence of moral perversity blinding the mind that any can be offended in him; the truth, that notwithstanding the holy lustre of Christ's life upon the earth, notwithstanding the loveliness of his doctrine, and convincing proofs of his divine mission, yet multitudes, yielding to their corrupt hearts, should reject him and set him at nought; the truth, finally, that the consequence of such rejection should, in every case, be the ruin of the immortal soul, while the blessed fruit of not being offended in him, would be found in present peace and eternal felicity.

I shall not at this time attempt to illustrate the passage under all these views, but, proceeding upon the fact, which, alas! is too palpable to be denied, that multitudes are offended in Christ,—so offended as not heartily to close with him as their Redeemer, I shall endeavour to set before you one or two of the grounds of this offence, one or two of those things on account of which men are prejudiced against the salvation of Christ, adverted, in our progress, to the real source of this offence being taken, to its consequent guilt, and tremendous danger. And while we are engaged in this meditation, let there be on every mind a feeling of jealous self-scrutiny, a fear of falling after the examples of unbelief, a holy dread lest the reception we are giving to the Saviour should, on any point, be partial or reserved, a fervent desire to have every thought and imagination brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. May the Great Master of Assemblies bless his own Word, and render it now and ever, mighty to the pulling down the strongholds of sin and Satan!

What, then, are the prejudices through which men are ensnared to refuse their highest mercies? It were vain to attempt to trace the endless variety of obstacles which occur to different minds, and prevent them from cordially accepting the Saviour. It will suffice to suggest the more general and prominent.

And, first of all, I would remark, men are offended in Christ, and refuse to come to him on account of the doctrines which he taught and which he has left on record and enjoined his servants to inculcate, as essential to salvation.

And why should man be offended at the doctrines of Christ? Did not he speak as never man spake? Did not even his adversaries bear witness to the gracious words which proceeded out of his lips? and is there not in the annunciations of the Gospel all that can comfort, and elevate, and bless the soul of man? True; yet there is at the same time much to humble, much to come into collision with the pride and loftiness of the deceitful heart, much to call forth the same expression of dislike, which we find to have been uttered by our Lord's personal hearers, on one occasion when he had been forcibly opening up the poverty and wretchedness of man in himself, and the blessedness of union to Him who was come to ransom, and dignify, and fill the soul. "Many of his disciples, when they heard this, said, This is an hard saying, who can hear it; and from that time many of them went back and walked no more with him."

There is much contained in the Gospel indeed, on which we may expatiate, without offending the carnal tendencies of the heart. There is something pleasing in that life and immortality, beyond death and the grave, which it brings so gloriously to light,—something that commands the admiration in the holy purity and rich benevolence which breathe throughout the precepts it enjoins, held out to us as they are in living lustre, practised to perfection in the life and actions of Him who inculcated them. There is something soothing and attractive in the tenderness which the Gospel expresses towards the suffering and afflicted, and in the gracious assurances of help and deliverance which it brings. On such topics, therefore, the Gospel can be tolerated even by the worldly mind; on these the preacher of righteousness may expatiate without offending the inward thoughts of pride; in those merely partial and general views of divine truth the spirit of a man may find complacence, while it is really ignorant of the grand substance of the Gospel annunciation, and ready to be offended with the self-abasing views which it presents to every child of Adam.

The grand annunciation of the Gospel is evidently this, "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." It announces, in a word, the plan of the Godhead for the recovery and restoration of ruined perishing sinners. In order, therefore, to its being cordially embraced, it is indispensable that men should perceive themselves to be in a spiritually lost and perishing condition; should be sensible that they have undone themselves, and that their help is found in God alone. And it is quite manifest that though men may attend to some parts of the Gospel, may even take pleasure in dwelling on some of the glorious views which it unfolds, yet, if they do not receive it in its substance, if they do not give heed to it as the revelation of the mode of their recovery, they are virtually chargeable with rejecting it, and can have no part in the benefits which it offers. Now there is in man a natural blindness and insensibility to the reality of his spiritual misery and destitution, and there is also a natural revolting of the heart from the humiliating picture. There is, on the one hand, such a pre-occupation of the mind with objects without, that there is little turning of the thoughts inward; and there is on the other, such an aversion from recognising our morally lost condition, that even after we acknowledge it in words, we are far from being inwardly and really persuaded of it. And as it is only they that are sick that need a physician, and seek to apply to him, men, not being convinced of their spiritual malady, or, at least, fancying that they can cure themselves, do not, in good earnest and with all their hearts, apply to that sovereign Physician who is come to restore health, and vigour, and life to the soul of man, enfeebled and ruined by sin. When this is the case, the Gospel evidently is not received, it is not welcomed as the tidings of great joy to perishing sinners, it is refused in its most substantial points, and by this refusal men shew that they are offended in Christ, inasmuch as they do virtually declare that they are not so undone as to stand in need of his mediation, and do not acknowledge him to be just such a Saviour as their situation and exigencies demand. It is plain that there may be various degrees in which men may be offended in Christ; some may be so hardened and so self-satisfied, and so reckless as to deny the necessity of his mediation altogether. Others may be so ignorant and stupid about spiritual things as never to think, with any interest or attention, about Christ and his salvation. Others, again, may pacify their consciences by the plea of a future and more convenient season; and others may deceive themselves by a sort of half-reception of him as their Saviour, that is, by thinking so well of themselves, of what they have done and are doing, as to suppose this will go so far towards their justification, and that the righteousness of Christ will make up the rest. All these classes are guilty of being offended in Christ; it is true of them all that they see no beauty in him as the Gospel holds him forth, that they should desire him; and if one can form any estimate of the state of men's minds from the line of conduct they pursue, or the mode in which they express their sentiments, it is lamentable to think how large a number are embodied in these several descriptions. With respect to all these, the ground of offence is this, that the Gospel offers them what, through pride and blindness, they are averse to receive. It calls them to lie low in the dust of self-humiliation, as rebellious undone sinners, and to embrace Christ as the bread of life, who shed his precious blood for the life of the world, through whom there is procured pardon, grace, life eternal.

This was the hard saying which those who followed Christ of old could not bear, and which still is the rock of offence to disobedient unbelieving ones. Men go about to establish their own righteousness, and will not submit to the righteousness of Christ their surety. They will consent to be debtors in part to divine grace, but will not give all the glory of their salvation to God. They will not agree to stand on a footing with the guiltiest of men, and obtain pardon through the merits of Christ, as equally an exercise of sovereign compassion and love. The doctrine of the cross, in short, is an offence; it presents to them views of God's holiness, of the evil of sin, and of his abhorrence of it, which they cannot receive; it stains all the glory of man, and proclaims that but for the sufferings of our surety we must all have descended into the pit of destruction, and that, if we do not take shelter under the merits of his obedience and death, we must perish for ever. It claims absolute prostration of every high thought, and holds out encouragement and hope only to the convinced, and humbled, and self-despising; and on account of these its great features, it is an offence to the unsubdued lofty spirit of worldly men.

Let me urge this matter on your attention with all earnestness. Are you ready to own, that if ever you get within the threshold of the celestial mansions, it must be by the act of sovereign love manifested in Christ Jesus? Do you feel, that separated from him you have no life—no hope; and do you not merely acquiesce in such views and sentiments, but do you cleave to Christ as your life, with something of that eager intensity with which a drowning man would grasp the hand stretched forth to save him from his perilous condition? These are not abstract inquiries, touching points of no vital interest, but they relate to that on which turns our eternal prospects—even the state of our regards towards the Redeemer of men. "He that hath the Son hath life, but he that hath not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." Now, no man can have the Son in the sense here meant; no man can truly rely on him, with full purpose of soul, till pride has been abased, and he has been made to see himself as he is—poor, and miserable, and wretched, and blind, and naked. All who are not thus convinced,—who are not brought to see themselves outcasts and rebels, unworthy of a place in their heavenly Father's regards, are offended with Christ,—they either slight his salvation, or they absolutely refuse it. He is thus to them, a rock of offence and a stone of stumbling; yet he is the head of the corner,—foolish are those builders who reject him. Blessed is he, whosoever he be, who perceives him to be altogether lovely. Beloved brethren, may this blessedness be yours and mine.

A second ground of offence, on account of which men refuse to close with Christ, is, the greatness of the claims he prefers to our entire homage and obedience.

It is true, the yoke of Christ is easy, and his burden is light,—none of his commandments are grievous, his service is perfect liberty, and in becoming his servants, we find rest unto our souls; but it is true also, that his claims are high,—yea paramount, that he will admit no rival in our affections, no object to dispute our devotedness, or hinder our submission. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me, is not worthy of me;" here is the high test of real discipleship—a test, alas, which few will stand. I need not stop to shew how just these claims are, notwithstanding their magnitude, for their justice will be admitted by all who regard Christ in his true character as God manifest in the flesh. The point which we are interested in observing now, is, that men take offence at the extent of the demand which Christ makes on their love and obedience; just as we find it to have been at the first promulgation of the Gospel, that its claims, not merely to superiority but to exclusive truth, were an offence to the votaries of idolatry. The idolaters of that day would willingly enough have admitted the Christian religion to a place with the worship of their multiplied divinities; but they could not brook its lofty demands to be received as alone the will of God for man's salvation. Even so, in our times, many seem quite ready to admit, that Christ has some claims on their regard, that religion has a title to some portion of their thought and attention; but they are averse to allow Christ to be all in all, the source, the end, the example, of their whole life and actions, just as it was with that youth to whom Christ addressed these words: "Yet lackest thou one thing; sell all that thou hast and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me. And when he heard this, he was very sorrowful, for he was very rich." This young man was willing to do so much, but he was not ready to do all; he would give so much of his affection and of his fortune to the service of Christ, but not the whole, and this reserve proved the hollowness of his heart, the absence of sincere principle,—the sad fact, that he was offended in Christ. With how many, alas, is it thus! How few are those who can in truth say, "Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest;" and yet if we are not prepared to say this, we cannot be Christ's disciples. This is a subject demanding our serious attention. Christ claims the heart, the whole heart, an undivided allegiance. He will accept of nothing less, are you prepared to give him what he demands? Do you renounce the other lords and gods who have had dominion over you, and resolve henceforth to make mention only of the God of Israel? Do you cheerfully and entirely yield yourselves to the Saviour, counting yourselves not your own, but bought with a price, and, in doing so, are you influenced by a lively perception that such a consecration is required, not only by duty and interest, but by the care you have for your best happiness here? Do you feel that there is delight in being near Christ, in walking after his precepts, in seeking to advance his glory, and can you testify, "Thou hast put gladness in my heart more than in the time that their corn and wine are increased?" If so, then happy are ye. You are not offended in Christ, but are embracing him as your righteousness and strength. Is there not reason, however, to fear, lest it should not be thus?

Is there not in many minds, especially in the young, a shrinking from any vivid recognition of Christ's claims, a secret unwillingness to be entirely his, a fear that by such a dedication much of the happiness to which they look forward in this world would be forfeited, that they would be prevented from enjoying the amusements and frivolous pleasures on which their hearts are set? Trained in a reverential respect to the institutions of religion, they wait upon them regularly, and count it right to observe the stated seasons of devotion; but the gay and sprightly heart revolts from a solemn unreserved consecration to the Saviour, as if this were for ever to shut them out from the associations and enjoyments of this present life; and hence it is that multitudes continue to halt between two opinions, persuaded, on the one hand, that "fleeing to Christ is the only measure of safety," and reluctant, on the other, to part with those vain pursuits which amuse and deceive the heart. It is a false estimate, no doubt, which such persons form of the demands of Jesus, when they conceive that he calls us away from all pleasure and enjoyment. When a man becomes a Christian, he does not lose his pleasures, but he changes them—he forsakes lying vanities, and chooses the ways of wisdom. Ask a sincere disciple of Jesus, one who has been converted from the error of his way, which has been the happier portion of his life, and what will be his answer? Will he say, that had he counted the cost, he would not have enlisted under the banner of Christ? or will he tell you, that he never knew happiness till he abandoned the ways of the world, and betook himself to the green pastures and still waters by which Christ leads his people, and gives them rest? The testimony is uniform; and yet the old device, that religion is a gloomy thing, prevails to scare away unstable souls, and to make them offended in Christ. Gloomy! How can the religion of Jesus be charged with this character? Does it not present before us the most endearing and lovely views of the divine attributes, calling us to come to God as our reconciled Father in Christ, forbidding all the fears and disquietudes of the guilty mind, removing all the perplexities and doubts of the spirit, when looking forward to eternity, assuring us of the reality and unchangeableness of God's love to such as seek him, of the unceasing exercise of his affectionate care, both when he visits us with the sunshine of prosperity, and when he obscures our path with the clouds of adversity and trial. It is amazing how this false idea, proceeding from the father of lies, should have obtained so wide a prevalence—how an untruth so palpable should have passed so current in the world. If by happiness, indeed, is meant, the round of idle dissipation, the whirl of vain folly, a perpetual immersion in gay scenes and exciting pleasures, then be it far from me to speak falsely for God, or to say, that a truly religious person can spend his days so unprofitably; but if happiness mean, that calm and delightful enjoyment which arises from the consciousness of being at peace with God, from being employed in pursuits agreeable to his will, and whereon we may implore and expect his blessing, from having all the bounties of Providence sweetened to us as descending from a gracious Father's hand, and all the varied afflictions to which humanity is incident, alleviated by the thought that they are the appointed chastisings of a tender all-wise Parent—if happiness mean inward comforts, benevolent affections in full play and exercise, hopes enkindled, and stretching forth into eternity, then happy only is the man who is not offended in Christ. This real, this permanent happiness, which you will be able to retain not merely in the days of health and vigour, but amid the assaults of adversity and weariness of a sickbed, you can find only in Jesus. O seek it in Him, and you will not be disappointed; but seek it honestly, not by keeping a wistful eye upon the world, upon the fascinations of sight and sense, and trying to combine the service of God and Mammon, but by unreservedly resolving to obey the demands of Jesus, believing that all who gather not with him, do scatter abroad. His claims are high, but be not offended with their extent—they are right in themselves, and cannot be resisted without guilt and folly; and in yielding to them, you secure your own present and eternal well-being.

CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

No. X.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,

Minister of Monimail.

THE LAWS OF NATURE.

THE laws of nature are generally considered as including all that man can discover of the appointments of God, without having reference to the Book of Revelation. Some have spoken of them with less respect than they deserve, while many have, on the other hand, extolled them as if they were all-sufficient; but, amidst all the controversies that have been raised respecting them, it is remarkable that there has scarcely been any endeavour made to classify or describe them. In consequence of this neglect innumerable mistakes have arisen, and the truth has been darkened by words without knowledge. In order, therefore, to avoid misconception, we must begin by describing the different classes into which they may be divided, and thus pave the way for investigating the analogies they present, and the differences that they exhibit. By following this course our progress, if slow, will be sure; and if we fail of throwing light upon the subject, we will at least have deepened the darkness that surrounds it.

The laws given by the great Creator, as shewn forth in his works of creation and providence, may be best arranged by referring to the different natures of the creatures to whom they are assigned. They will consequently be divided into four general heads, namely, those given to inanimate matter; those assigned to matter when animated or organized; those that regulate animals guided by instinct, and those that are appointed to direct the conduct of rational and accountable creatures. These distinctions are so evident that their propriety will be readily allowed.

1. When we consider matter in an inanimate form, such as we see it in earths, stones, metals, liquids, and airs, we find certain properties inherent in it, of which some are universally diffused, and belong to every material substance, while others are peculiar to particular kinds. In our former numbers we described the more general properties, such as extension, cohesion, mobility, &c., each of which may be considered as founded on a commandment given by the Creator, who has ordained that matter shall occupy space, and resist the touch; that its various particles shall attract each other, in different manners and degrees, according to circumstances; that it shall be acted upon by heat, electricity, and chemical agency, and that it shall be moved and stopped according to settled rules. The laws thus given to inanimate matter are sometimes distinguished by the name of physical or material. We have already given a brief explanation of a few of the most important; but it would be altogether impossible even to enumerate the whole. They form that wide field which it is the object of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry to survey; and this field is so extensive, that we can only be said to have glanced at its borders, notwithstanding all the progress that science has made.

2. When matter is acted upon by the vegetating principle of plants, or the living spirit of animals, we find it exhibiting new forms and obeying new rules. Thus God appointed "the earth to bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind;" and, we accordingly find, that plants continue to grow out of the soil; that they absorb from the earth, and air, those particles of which their various parts are composed; while these, again, are so arranged that every plant has its own peculiar leaf and flower, stem and fruit; and all of them, after having flourished for a time, wither and decay. With regard to animals, we are told that God said, "Let the waters bring forth abundantly, the moving creature that hath life; and fowl, that they may fly above the earth, in the open firmament of heaven." And again, "Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind," and agreeably to this command, animals are brought forth and live; they extract from the food that they eat, the matter that forms their muscles, blood, and bones; and having fulfilled the brief term of their existence, they die, and return to their original dust. In all the changes which matter undergoes, when thus organized, we trace certain methods of procedure, either common to every kind of plant and animal, or peculiar to each individual species. These we term organic laws; they regulate matter when acted upon by the mysterious agency of animal and vegetable life; they form the province of the botanist, physiologist and anatomist; they are yet more varied and numerous than the former class, and by their mutual harmony, and by their adaptation to the other laws of nature, shew forth in the most wonderful manner the wisdom and the power of God.

3. The third class includes those instinctive faculties and feelings by which the lower animals are entirely guided, and by which man is also in a great measure influenced. These powers and appetites are not very numerous, but they appear under such a vast variety of modifications, that they present a subject yet more difficult and intricate than either of the two preceding divisions. The power of voluntary motion, of breathing, sucking, swallowing, and digesting; the different senses of sight, hearing, taste, touch, and smell;—the power of perception, imitation, memory, and reasoning, in so far as they are given to the lower animals, form what may be termed the instinctive faculties; while the love of life, the appetites of hunger and thirst, the feelings of sexual love, of parental solicitude, benevolence, fear, and a few others, which are common to man and the lower animals, constitute the instinctive emotions. These are found more or less in all living creatures, and afford in their diversified operation abundant subject for the inquiry of the naturalist. On the one hand, they merge into the organic laws, so that it is difficult to determine the boundary dividing them, and on the other, they so assimilate to reason, that it becomes a much more arduous task than is commonly imagined, to define with precision, the distinction between them. When we apply the term laws to the determinations of instinct, we are merely to be understood as saying, that God has appointed a peculiar pleasure to accompany certain actions, by which there is naturally excited a corresponding desire of engaging in them when an opportunity of doing so occurs. When, for example, the stomach is empty, and food presented, we know that eating will produce gratification, and feel an inclination to partake of the victuals which are set before us. But there is no imperative command given either to gratify these desires or to repress them; and we can attribute to them neither merit nor guilt. It is not the mere instinctive emotion that brings condemnation, but the cherishing and indulging of it when the higher law of duty requires that it should be repressed. We are commanded to forgive, as we hope to be forgiven; yet, if insulted and injured, we may "be angry and sin not." It is, again, no crime to be hungry, though food should be forbidden, and our Saviour did not transgress in the wilderness though "he was an hungered;" but he would have sinned, had he gratified this instinctive longing for food by following the counsel of the tempter.

4. The last class of laws which God has enacted, comprehends the precepts of the moral law, given to intelligent creatures, such as angels and men. As was just observed, it is no easy task to point out the precise distinction between "the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth;" yet some of the more peculiar characteristics of rational creatures may in a moment be distinguished. In man we see not only a higher range of faculties and more elevated feelings, but a breathing after immortality, that betokens a creature destined for a life to come. There is also given him a peculiar power, evincing the working of a rational mind, by which he is enabled to arrange and condense the information communicated by the senses and instinctive perceptions, and to form an idea of qualities considered apart from the bodies in which they are found; and, above all, there is bestowed on him a sense of moral good and evil, to regulate and restrain the animal appetites and feelings. To this the name of conscience is given. By means of these powers man is enabled to comprehend the nature of the Deity, to discover the object and design of Jehovah's procedure, and to understand the duty which he owes to his God. They are the peculiar characteristics of a rational and accountable creature. They belong to that nobler part of man, which assimilates him to the angelic creation, to that never-dying soul, which though it be conjoined to a material frame and to animal appetites, is yet distinct from both, and can live, and feel, and act, though separated from them. The universal and almost intuitive belief of mankind, leads us to regard the soul as immortal, and as endowed with powers and feelings altogether different from those of the brutes; dissimilar in their nature as well as higher in their degree. We are conscious of a spirit within us which elevates us as much above the lower animals, as their instincts raises them above minerals and plants, and for which a peculiar system of laws has been provided. The rules laid down for the conscious actions of a rational creature, may be either obeyed or transgressed; but the laws given to other classes of beings cannot, by any possibility, be broken. Man is left to the freedom of his own will, but to inferior creatures no such license is allowed. The moral law tells us what ought to be performed; the laws given to material nature, instruct us as to that which must and will be done,

The operation of the peculiar faculties of the soul is referred to by the Apostle, when he says, "The invisible things of God, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead;" and when he tells us that "when the Gentiles do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law, are a law unto themselves, which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness."

When we endeavour to investigate the law which the Creator has implanted in the heart and conscience of man, we find various circumstances concurring to embarrass our progress. Man is a strangely compounded creature; he is actuated, on the one hand, by instinctive appetites like those given to the brutes; he is directed, on the other, by those moral precepts which are the transcript of Jehovah's character, the guide of angels, and the rule of the divine procedure; and it is exceedingly difficult to unravel the motives of a being who has been not unaptly termed, "a worm—a god!" He is, moreover, fallen and sinful; and while he remains unconverted, exhibits the anomalous condition of a creature wholly disinclined toward that which is good, yet checked and restrained in his pursuit of evil; and when he has been converted, he presents the inexplicable mixture of light and darkness, of holiness and sin. We need not wonder, then, though many contending theories have been advanced respecting the object that man should pursue as his chief end, the law that he should follow, and the motives by which he should be excited. But amid all these contending systems, reason and Scripture, if carefully regarded, alike declare, that the only authoritative rule, and the only unerring guide is the WILL OF GOD. Some are directed merely by the counsels of prudence, which may be termed an enlightened regard to our own interest; others actuated by natural benevolence, seek, at the same time the good of society; (and these motives have no doubt a legitimate influence on our minds,) but unless we have respect to the divine appointment, our conduct can neither have sanction nor guidance. We may follow the dictates of prudence, we may relinquish present ease and pleasure in order to secure future enjoyment, we may renounce the grovelling indulgence of sensual appetite, and pursue the noble delights of intellectual refinement, but unless we listen to the counsels of heaven, we never can know wherein our chief happiness lies, and unless we own the divine authority, there is no law that requires us to pursue it. If we choose that which is good it is well; but if we prefer that which is evil, no man has a right to reprove us. In judging of the conduct of others, we always make a distinction between want of prudence and want of principle; we pity the folly of those who exhibit the first, we condemn the sin of him who gives evidence of the second; and while we remonstrate with those that injure themselves, we punish him that is injurious to his neighbour. It is only when the precepts of God are applied to the regulation of every word and deed that the maxims of prudence have the authority and power of a law.—We may, in like manner, listen to the dictates of benevolence, but unless we are taught of God, we have no means of ascertaining the line of conduct that will most directly tend to the general good. He alone, who knows the future, can determine the means by which the destinies of our race may be advanced, and he alone, who is eternal, can point out the path to immortal bliss. Without reference, moreover, to the Sovereign of all, there is no authority by which the counsels of benevolence can be enforced. It is not enough, as some imagine, to tell us that benevolence, or desire for the general good, and conscientiousness, or love of justice, and veneration, or regard for that which is venerable, are the highest and noblest of our feelings; that their exercise will produce the most refined and permanent satisfaction, and that by listening to them, rather than to the lower propensities, the happiness of mankind generally will be promoted. There will ever be multitudes who prefer the gratification of present humour to the hope of a distant futurity, who relish more keenly the gross pleasures of appetite than the refined enjoyments of intellectual taste; and who deny that society has any right to demand such sacrifices from them. Nay, even the best of men will find the fine-spun theories of sentimental benevolence weak as the spider's web, when opposed to the force of appetite and passion. It is only when the heart is awed by the fear of God, and when the mind is led to own its obligations to Him, that we will steadily and zealously seek the good of our fellow-men. Even allowing the dictates of benevolence and prudence to be agreeable to truth, we must also recollect that they have only a reference to one-half of our duty, they are at best but a fragment of the law to which intelligent creatures should be subject, and deprived of the sanction of divine authority can scarcely be considered as having any force at all. But viewed in connexion with the obligation under which we lie to Him that made us, interest and duty are found to be one, and every conceivable motive combines to urge us on in pursuit of our own highest happiness, and of society's furthest advancement.

A SKETCH OF AN HOSPITAL SCENE IN PORTUGAL.

"I wish to give you," said a British officer, in a letter to a friend during the Peninsular war, "some idea of a scene I witnessed at Mirando do Cerro, on the ninth day of our pursuit. Yet I fear that a sight so terrible cannot be shadowed out, except in the memory of him who beheld it. I entered the town about dusk. It had been a black, grim, and gloomy sort of a day—at one time fierce blasts of wind, and at another perfect stillness, with far-off thunder. Altogether, there was a wild adaptation of the weather and the day to the retreat of a great army. Huge masses of clouds lay motionless on the sky, and then they would break up suddenly as with a whirlwind, and roll off in the red and gloomy distance. I felt myself in a state of strange excitement. My imagination got the better of any other faculties, and I was like a man in a grand but terrific dream. Thus feeling, I passed the great cross in the principal street, and suddenly fell in with an old haggard-looking wretch—a woman, who seemed to have in her hollow eyes an unaccountable expression of cruelty—a glance like that of madness; but her deportment was quiet and rational, and she was evidently of the middle rank of society, though her dress was faded and squalid. She told me, without my asking her, in broken English, that I should find comfortable accommodations in an old convent that stood at some distance among a grove of cork trees; pointing to them at the same time with her long shrivelled hand and arm, and giving a sort of hysterical laugh, 'You will find,' said she, 'nobody there to disturb you.'

"I followed her advice with a kind of superstitious acquiescence. There was no reason to anticipate any adventure or danger at the convent; yet the wild eyes, and the wilder voice of the poor creature, powerfully affected me; and I went on, in a sort of reverie, till I had walked up a pretty long flight of steps, and was standing at the entrance to the choisters of the convent. I then saw something that made me speedily forget the old woman, though what it was I did see, I could not, in the first moments of my amazement and horror, very distinctly comprehend.

"Above a hundred dead bodies lay and sat before my eyes, all of them apparently in the very attitude or posture in which they had died. I looked at them for at least a minute before I knew that they were all corpses. Something in the mortal silence of the place told me that I alone was alive in this dreadful company. A desperate courage enabled me to look stedfastly at the scene before me. The bodies were mostly clothed in mats and rugs, and tattered great-coats; some of them merely wrapped about with girdles of straw, and two or three perfectly naked. Every face had a different expression, but all painful, horrid, agonized, bloodless; many glazed eyes were wide open, and, perhaps, this was the most shocking thing in the whole spectacle,—so many eyes, that saw not, all seemingly fixed upon different objects, some cast up to heaven, some looking straight forwards, and some with the white orbs turned round, and deep sunk in the sockets.

"It was a sort of hospital. These wretched beings were mostly all, either desperately, or mortally, wounded; and after having been stripped by their comrades, they had been left there dead and to die. Such were they, who, as the old woman said, would not 'trouble' me.

"I had begun to view this ghastly sight with some composure, when I saw, at the remotest part of the hospital, a gigantic figure, sitting covered with blood, and almost naked, upon a rude bedstead, with his back leaning against the wall, and his eyes fixed directly on mine. I thought he was alive, and shuddered, but he was stone dead. In the last agonies he had bitten his under lip almost off, and his long black beard was drenched in clogged gore, that likewise lay in large blots on his shaggy bosom. I recognised the corpse. He was a sergeant in a grenadier regiment, and was, during the retreat, distinguished for acts of savage valour. One day he killed with his own hand Henry Warburton, the right-hand man of my own company, perhaps the finest made, and most powerful man in the British army. My soldiers had nicknamed him with a very coarse appellation, and I really felt, as if he and I were acquaintances. There he sat, as if frozen to death. I went up to the body, and raising up the giant's muscular arm, it fell down again, with a hollow sound, against the bloody side of the corpse.

"My eyes unconsciously wandered along the walls. They were covered with grotesque figures, and caricatures of the English, absolutely drawn in blood. Horrid blasphemies, and the most shocking obscenities in the shape of songs, were in like manner written there; and you may guess what an effect they had upon me, when the wretches who had transcribed them, lay dead corpses around me. I saw two books lying on the floor. I lifted them up; one seemed to be full of the most hideous obscenity; the other was the Bible! It is impossible to tell you the horror produced in me by this circumstance. The books fell from my hands; they fell upon the breast of one of the bodies: it was a woman's breast. A woman had lived and died in such a place as this! What had been in that heart, now still, perhaps only a few hours before, I knew not. It is possible, love strong as death—love, guilty, abandoned, depraved, and linked by vice unto misery—but still love, that perished but with the last throeb, and yearned in the last convulsion towards some one of these grim dead bodies. I think some such idea as this came across me at the time; or has it now only arisen?

"Near this corpse lay that of a perfect boy, certainly not more than seventeen years of age. There was a little copper figure of the Virginia Mary round his neck, suspended by a chain of hair. It was of little value, else it had not been suffered to remain there. In his hand was a letter; I saw enough to know that it was from his mother. It was a terrible place to think of mother—of home—of any social human ties. Have these ghastly things, parents, brothers, sisters, lovers? Were they all once happy in peaceful homes? Did these convulsed, and bloody, and mangled bodies, once lie in undisturbed beds? Did those clutched hands once press in infancy a mother's breast? Now all was loathsome, terrible, ghost-like. Human nature seemed here to be debased and brutified. Will such creatures, I thought, ever live again? Robbers, incendiaries, murderers, suicides, (for a dragoon lay with a pistol in his hand, and his skull shattered to pieces,) heroes? The only two powers that reigned here, were agony and death. Whatever might have been their characters when alive, all faces were now alike. I could not, in those fixed contortions, tell what was pain, from what was anger—misery, from wickedness.

"It was now growing dark, and the night was setting in stormier than the day. A strong flash of lightning suddenly illuminated this hold of death, and for a moment showed me more distinctly the terrible array. A loud squall of wind came round about the dwelling, and the old window casement gave way, and fell, with a shivering crash, in upon the floor. Something rose up with an angry growl from among the dead bodies. It was a huge dark-coloured wolf-dog, with a spiked collar round his neck; and seeing me, he leaped forwards with gaunt and bony limbs. I am confident that his jaws were bloody. I had instinctively moved backwards towards the door. The surly savage returned growling to his lair, and, in a state of stupefaction, I found myself in the open air. A bugle was playing, and the light infantry company of my own regiment was entering the village with loud shouts and huzzas."

Such are the horrors of war, and it is impossible surely to read the description of scenes like these, without breathing an earnest prayer that the reign of the Prince of Peace were established on the earth, when men shall learn the art of war no more.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Convictions of Sin.—If I mistake not, you are apt to be cast down in the view of our extreme depravity, whereas you should not, in the least degree, be less confident of your eternal salvation for such humbling views. Flesh and blood never produce them, nor our enemy the wicked one. Conviction of our evil nature is from on high, and cometh down from above. It is peculiar to the saints in Jesus Christ, and works in them humility, and love, and adoration, and a most thankful acceptance of Christ. Before the veil is taken from our hearts, it is only from report we prize him, and for what we hope one day to get from him. But when we feel the corruption of our nature—envy and pride, impurity and unbelief, and hardness of heart and brutish stupidity, in secret prayer and in public—then we can sigh and groan, being burdened; and then we know, that we are as vile and wicked, to the full, as the word of God declares us to be. Many and great are the spiritual advantages attending this very humiliating sight of our condition: it stops our mouths from railing and evil speaking, it inclines us to take the lowest place, it makes us poor and of a contrite spirit, and to tremble at God's Word, if he were to enter into judgment with us. Now this is the very disposition and temper he declares to be well-pleasing in his sight. It is well for us he doth so; for if I may judge of others by myself, after thirty-six years attention and care, and earnest seeking after God, I have more reason than ever to say, "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing."—VENN.

Sufferings are necessary.—Alas! if we did not sometimes feel the spur, what a slow pace would most of us hold towards heaven. Judge, then, whether thou dost not go more watchfully and speedily in the way to heaven in thy sufferings, than in thy more pleasing and prosperous state.—BAXTER.

SACRED POETRY.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

TRUE happiness had no localities,
 No tones provincial, no peculiar garb.
 Where duty went, she went; with justice went,
 And went with meekness, charity, and love.
 Where'er a tear was dried; a wounded heart
 Bound up; a bruised spirit with the dew
 Of sympathy anointed; or a pang
 Of honest suffering soothed; or injury,
 Repeated oft, as oft by love forgiven;
 Where'er an evil passion was subdued,
 Or virtue's feeble embers fanned; where'er
 A sin was heartily abjured and left;
 Where'er a pious act was done, or breathed
 A pious prayer, or wished a pious wish,—
 There was a high and holy place, a spot
 Of sacred light, a most religious fane,
 Where Happiness descending, sat and smiled.

CHRIST A PRESENT HELP.

WHEN gathering clouds around I view,
 And days are dark, and friends are few;
 On Him I lean, who, not in vain,
 Experienced every human pain.
 He sees my griefs, allays my fears,
 And counts and treasures up my tears.

If aught should tempt my soul to stray
 From heav'nly wisdom's narrow way,
 To fly the good I would pursue,
 Or do the thing I would not do;
 Still He, who felt temptation's power,
 Shall guard me in that dangerous hour.

When vexing thoughts within me rise,
 And, sore dismay'd, my spirit dies;
 Yet he, who once vouchsafed to bear
 The sick'ning anguish of despair,
 Shall sweetly soothe, shall gently dry,
 The throbbing heart, the streaming eye.

When, mourning, o'er some stone I bend,
 Which covers all that was a friend,
 And from his voice, his hand, his smile,
 Divides me for a little while;
 Thou, Saviour, mark'st the tears I shed,
 For thou did'st weep o'er Lazarus dead.

And, oh, when I have safely past
 Through every conflict but the last,
 Still, still unchanging, watch beside
 My painful bed—for thou hast died;
 Then point to realms of cloudless day,
 And wipe the latest tear away.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rev. John Newton.—The late Rev. John Newton, rector of St. Mary, Woolnoth, London, acknowledges, in his letters, how greatly he felt indebted to his kind mother for the pains she took with him, when quite a child, to instil into his mind the principles of religion; particularly her storing his memory with many valuable pieces, chapters, and portions of Scripture, catechisms, hymns, and poems. These instructions seem to have increased the impressions made by other circumstances, though his heart does not appear to have been effectually brought to God the Saviour until several years afterwards.

The importance of good Religious Tracts.—Extensively as the usefulness of religious tracts may be known, it is probable that comparatively few persons are aware, that to the perusal of some of these small publications, under God, we owe one of the earliest and most eminent of the reformers. A young man of an opulent and noble family in Bohemia, came over to Oxford, about the year 1389, for the prosecution of his studies. When he returned home, he took with him several tracts of Wickliff's. With this gentleman Hus was well acquainted, and obtained from him the loan of these books. They conveyed light to his mind, and powerfully impressed him, that he embraced, and ever after maintained their doctrines. He used to speak of Wickliff as an angel sent from heaven; and would mention his meeting with that author's writings, as the happiest event of his life.

George Burder.—I must never, says the late Rev. George Burder, forget my birth-day, June 5, 1762. It was on a Sabbath; and after tea, and before family worship, my father was accustomed to catechise me, and examine what I remembered of the sermons of the day. One evening he talked to me very affectionately, and reminded me that I was now ten years of age; that it was high time I began to seek the Lord, and to become truly religious. He particularly insisted upon the necessity of an interest in Christ, and showed me that, as a sinner, I must perish without it, and recommended me to begin that night to pray for it. After family worship, when my father and mother used to retire to their closets for private devotion, I also went into a chamber, the same room in which I was born, and then, I trust, sincerely and earnestly, and as far as I can recollect, for the first time, poured out my soul to God, beseeching him to give me an interest in Christ, and desiring, above all things, to be found in him. Reflecting on this evening, I have often been ready to conclude, that surely I was born of God at that time, surely I then was brought to believe in Christ, surely there was something more than nature in all this.

Robert Hall.—When the late Rev. R. Hall was about six years of age, on starting from home on the Monday, it was his practice to take with him two or three books from his father's library, that he might read them in the intervals between the school hours. The books he selected were not those of mere amusement, but such as required deep and serious thought. The works of Dr Jonathan Edwards, for example, were among his favourites; and it is an ascertained fact, that, before he was nine years of age, he had perused, and repeated, with intense interest, the treatises of that profound and extraordinary thinker, on the "Affections," and on the "Will." About the same time he read, with a like interest, "Butler's Analogy." He used to ascribe his early predilection for this class of studies, in a great measure, to his intimate association, in mere childhood, with a tailor, one of his father's congregation, a very shrewd, well-informed man, and an acute metaphysician. Before he was ten years old, he had written many essays, principally on religious subjects.

IS IT A VALID OBJECTION TO THE TRUTH OF REVELATION THAT IT HAS NOT BEEN UNIVERSAL?

PART II.

BY THE REV. PETER CURROR,
Minister of St. Martins.

WE said enough, in our former article on this subject, to repel the objection, in so far as it applies to the nature of the act. We have proved that there is nothing in it unjust, nothing unworthy of the righteousness of its author. There is another method of answering the objection, however, still more satisfactory. The objection is, that there is something in the way in which this revelation has been made known, unworthy the character of God, and that therefore it cannot have come from him. Now, this objection would at once be silenced, if it appeared that God has acted in a similar way in the distribution of other favours; or that the knowledge of other blessings which, like this, he has placed within our reach, has been as limited as the knowledge of revelation. It is thought inconsistent with the character of God that a revelation, professing to disclose truths so important to the well-being of our race, has not been made known to all. Revelation furnishes a remedy for the diseases of our souls. Now, there are diseases to which the bodies of men also have been subjected. Is there any remedy provided for them? and to what extent has the knowledge of that remedy been distributed? Here is a case quite analogous to the question in hand. If we find the knowledge of these remedies universal, then might we have expected that the knowledge of the remedy for our spiritual diseases would have been universal too. If we find the knowledge of the one limited, then may we expect the knowledge of the other to be limited too. Amid the multitude of herbs which furnish our ordinary food, there are interspersed others endowed with virtues which cure the diseases of our bodies. The knowledge of these plants, and of their properties, holds the same place in regard to our physical, as the knowledge of revelation does to our spiritual, diseases. They furnish a remedy for the one, revelation furnishes a remedy for the other. The one remedy, it is agreed, is provided by the hand of God. He created the plants which furnish our ordinary food, and interspersed them with others fraught with peculiar juices for the cure of diseases. Here, then, are two specifics for the diseases of two portions of our nature, the one acknowledged by all to be, and the other professing to be, from the hand of God. Our only business now is with the extent in which the knowledge of these remedies have been distributed. If we find all, peasant as well as philosopher, in every nation, informed of the plants which are medicinal, and of the particular diseases which each is fitted to heal, then should we have expected to find the knowledge of the specific for our spiritual diseases also circulating in every country, from the palace to the cottage. If, on the other hand, we find the knowledge of the one, long scarcely ascertained at all, long limited to a few nations, and narrow in its limits still, we have no reason to expect that, if it came from the same author, the knowledge of the other should be universal. The knowledge of the medicinal virtues of plants, whether we look to its fulness or its accuracy, has all along been exceedingly limited. In ancient times it was but slenderly acquired by the physicians of Greece and Rome. The rest of the world were suffering and dying, either under entire ignorance, or under false views, of it. It is still nearly confined to the few cultivated nations of the earth. The knowledge of medicine has all along, and is still about as limited as the knowledge of revelation. And if the want of universality in the knowledge of the one remedy is not a valid objection to its having come from God, as little is the want of universality a valid objection to the other. No one will venture to draw this conclusion in regard to the former; it is just as incompetent to draw it in regard to the latter.

There are many provisions within the store-houses of Providence, which contribute very much to the comfort of human life, and are essential to the enjoyment of civilized life. These also are from the hand of God. They are wrought out of the raw materials which he has furnished for the comfort of human society. Without the knowledge of their existence, and of the process of manufacturing them, they are useless to us. To what extent, then, has this knowledge been communicated? It has been still more limited than the knowledge of revelation. A free and enlightened government is necessary to distribute the higher enjoyments of which our nature is susceptible. Under the iron rule of despotism, the buoyant independence of the human mind sinks into slavery, its arm of exertion is palsied, its tone of enjoyment is pitched amid low and grovelling pleasures. But free and enlightened governments have been rarely enjoyed. They have been, at least, as limited as revelation. Government, however, is an institution of God; it arises out of the elements of which he has constructed human society. But because he has left so many nations ignorant of that form of it which confers the greatest happiness, no one ventures to conclude that government is not an institution of God. An ample education is another fountain of rich and exalted enjoyments; it furnishes a store of materials for reflection; it lifts us to the capacity of taking comprehensive views of nature and society, of engaging in intelligent conversation; it places us in a higher station in the scale of intelligence, and its enjoyments are perhaps superior, both in quality and amount, to any other which this world can supply. But such an education has been the portion of few. Only a nation here and there has had it within their boundaries at all; and even there it has usually been limited to the small fraction of its population who sat on its pinnacles of wealth and rank. It has been more limited than the knowledge of revelation. Why has it not been otherwise? The structure of human society is from the hand of God. By a slight change in its composition, by a slight infusion of additional intelligence, he could have so framed it that the delights of knowledge and reflection would have circulated through all nations and all ranks. But from the savage wilderness of heathenism, or from the ignorance which hangs over the base of civilized society, no one draws the argument that the structure of human society is not from God. The same might be said of literature and science. They are fraught with a rich fund of enjoyment, but they have been the portion of few. But a very few nations have known anything of them, and in those who did, but a few individuals have drawn of their treasures. This is a fund of enjoyment, provided for us in the store-house of providence. Yet no one concludes, from its limited distribution, that it is not from God. There is a varied and important class of comforts which are possessed by the present, and which were possessed by no other age. The machinery which is impelling our manufactures, is discharging every article of clothing in an abundance, and at a price so cheap, as to cover, with comfort, alike the highest and the humblest in society. Yet the processes which accomplish this, lay unknown for nearly six thousand years; they are known but to a few nations still. But no one concludes from this that the powers of iron and steam, and the uses of cotton and flax, were not imparted to them by the hand of God. The knowledge of good government, the knowledge of true science, that education which lights up the faculties of the human soul in intelligence, feeling, and enjoyment, the knowledge of those provisions which clothe human life with outward comfort, are all more limited in their distribution than the knowledge of revelation. Yet the materials of them all have been furnished by God. This no one disputes. That they have not been universal is never held as an argument against their origin. As little, therefore, is it a competent argument against revelation, that it has not been universal. We see Him making the same limited distribution of the blessings of his providence, as he is making of the blessings of his grace. And this feature being impressed on both, can, to say the least of it, lead to no conclusion that both have not proceeded from the same hand.

But the argument may be carried farther. Not only does the way in which the blessings of providence are distributed neutralise the objection against revelation, it turns that which was used as an objection against, into an argument in favour of, its heavenly origin. It not only rescues a fortress among the out works of a city which had been taken possession of by the enemy, out of their hands, but it converts it into a redoubt of defence to its friends. If, in the gifts which God bestows upon us, we detect a peculiar feature, then, in examining a future gift, with the view of ascertaining whether or not it came from him, if we found it wearing this feature, whatever the character of that feature may be, this certainly would not form any objection to its having come from him; it would, on the contrary, be an evidence that it had. If a parent, through life, had manifested a special partiality for some of his family over others, it would furnish no evidence that his will was forged, that there was there bequeathed a greater share of his property to these than to the rest; it would, on the contrary, be urged, as an argument, that it was genuine.

If God is seen to bestow the gifts of his providence in various degrees, withholding them altogether from many, bestowing them partially on some, and in fulness and maturity only on a few; and this is the way in which the benefits of medicine, of good government, of science, of education, and of outward comforts, are distributed, then, from all these we discover one feature of his general administration; and if any new branch of his administration should be developed, we surely should not be disappointed, we surely should not entertain any doubts that it proceeded from Him, on finding the same features imprinted on the latter as on the former, we should, on the contrary, reckon it a proof that it did. If a tree which has long borne a particular kind of fruit, puts forth a new branch, do we not expect the same kind of fruit on the new branch as on the old? If, then, in this new branch of his administration we find that God is bestowing the gifts of his grace, also, in various degrees, withholding them from many, bestowing them partially on some, and, in their ripened fulness, only on a few, then do we discern the same features marking the new which we saw tracing the old, we see on both the print of the same footsteps, the impression of the same seal, and this, surely, instead of being an argument against, is an evidence in favour of, both having proceeded from the same hand.

It might be worth while, before we conclude, to inquire, Who objects to revelation that it has not been universal? For a city under a siege, it may often be better tactics to make an occasional assault on the enemies' lines, than to linger merely in an attitude of defence within the walls. If we could ascertain who our opponents are, we might discover some point in their lines as vulnerable as that which they are assailing in ours. But whoever they are, to whatever sect they belong, whether that of atheism, deism, mahomedanism, or heathenism, we might retort their own objection upon their own faith. The test which they are applying to revelation, would, if a sound one, be fatal to their own creed. Neither atheism, nor deism, nor mahomedanism, nor heathenism, much less any one form of heathenism, has been universal. But in nineteen cases out of twenty, we should probably find the objector under the banners of deism, believing in one God, but believing in no light, but that of nature, which he has shed over our hopes. On him we might resolutely turn and point his own objection against his own faith. If universality is essential to truth, or, at least, to religious truth, has deism been universal? Have all men agreed in worshipping, and worshipping, by the light only of nature, one God? We need scarcely answer the question; Deists, as every one knows, have been about the most thinly scattered of all sects. Any one of the countless forms of idolatry has numbered a more numerous body of followers than they. Mahomedanism has been far more extensively spread than the opinions which they hold. A single generation of a single nation of the believers in revelation, would probably outnumber all the followers of deism in every age. If universality is essential to truth, there is no truth in the opinions which they hold, no truth in anything which is believed on the subject of religion at all. But it is a maxim among logicians that that which proves too much proves nothing.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
THE REV. HUGH BINNING.

COMMUNICATED BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNS,

THE prevailing of the English sectarians, under Oliver Cromwell, to the overthrow of the Presbyterian interest in England, and the various attempts they made in Scotland, to alter the constitution and discipline of the Church, were the greatest difficulties which the ministry had then to struggle with. Upon this, Mr Binning made the following most excellent reflection, in a sermon preached on a day of public humiliation:

“What if the Lord hath defaced all that this kingdom was instrumental in building in England, that he alone may have the glory in a second temple more glorious.” And when he observed that the zeal of many for the solemn league and covenant (by which they were sworn to endeavour the preservation of the reformed religion in Scotland, and the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland,) was not attended with a suitable amendment of their own lives, he takes up a bitter lamentation over them in a very remarkable paragraph: “Alas! we deceive ourselves with the noise of a covenant, and a cause of God; we cry it up as an antidote against all evil, and use it as a charm, even as the Jews did their temple; and, in the meantime, we do not care how we walk before God, or with our neighbours. Well, thus saith the Lord, ‘Trust ye not in lying words, saying, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these.’ If drunkenness reign among you; if filthiness, swearing, oppression, cruelty, reign among you, your covenant is but a lie, all your professions are but lying words, and shall never keep you in your inheritances and dwellings. The Lord tells you what he requires of you; is it not ‘to do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with God?’ This is that which the grace of God teaches, and this he prefers to your public ordinances, your fasting, covenanting, preaching, and such like.” When the unhappy distinction betwixt the public resolutioners and protesters took place in the Church of Scotland, Mr Binning was of the latter. This distinction proved to be of fatal consequences. He saw some of the evils in his own time, and being of a charitable and healing spirit, with the view to the cementing of differences, he wrote an excellent treatise on Christian love, which contains very strong and pathetic passages, most apposite to the subject. He was no fomentor of faction, but studious of the public tranquillity. He was a man of moderate principles and temperate passions, far from being self-confident in the managing of public affairs, never imposing or overbearing towards others, but willingly hearkening to advice, or yielding to reason.

After he had laboured four years in the ministry, serving God with his spirit in the Gospel of his Son, warning every man, and teaching every man, with great ministerial freedom, that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus, whereunto he laboured, striving according to this working which God wrought in him mightily, he died of consumption, when he was scarcely come to the prime and vigour of life, entering on the twenty-sixth year of his age, leaving behind him a sweet savour after he was gone, and an epistle of commendation upon the hearts of his hearers. While he lived, he was highly valued and esteemed, having been a successful instrument in saving himself and them that heard him, in turning sinners unto righteousness, and in perfecting the saints, and died much lamented by all good people, who had the opportunity and advantage of knowing him. He was a person of singular piety, of a humble, meek, and peaceable temper, a judicious and lively preacher; nay, so extraordinary a person, that he was justly accounted a prodigy for the pregnancy of his natural parts, and his great proficiency in human learning, and knowledge of divinity. He was too shining a light to shine long, and burned so intensely, that he was soon put out, but now shines in the kingdom of his Father in a more conspicuous and refulgent manner, even as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars for ever and ever!

The last sermons he preached were three on Romans viii. 14, 15, “For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father." He concluded the last of these discourses with a reflection on these words, "We cry Abba, Father." "This," says he, "is much for our comfort, that from whomsoever and whatsoever corner in the world prayers come up to Him, they cannot want acceptance; all languages, all countries, all places are sanctified by Jesus Christ, that whosoever calls upon the name of the Lord, from the ends of the earth, shall be saved. And, truly, it is a sweet meditation, that from the ends of the earth the cries of souls are heard, and that the end is as near heaven, as the middle, and a wilderness as near as a paradise; that though we understand not one another, yet we have one loving and living Father that understands all our meanings; and so the different languages and dialects of the members of this body make no confusion in heaven, but meet together in his heart and affection, and are as one perfume, one incense, sent up from the whole Catholic Church, which is here scattered upon the earth. O that the Lord would persuade us to cry this way to our Father, in all our necessities." Thus having contemplated that subject, concerning the adoption of children, he was taken hence, to the enlargement of the inheritance, reserved in the heavens for them, and the Spirit called him, by death, as the voice did John the divine, "Come up hither."—Rev. iv. 1.

He was buried in the church-yard of Govan, where Mr Patrick Gillespie, then Principal of the University of Glasgow, at his own charges, caused a monument to be erected for him, on which there is, to this day, the following inscription in Latin:—

"Here lies Mr Hugh Binning, a man illustrious for piety, eloquence, and learning; a master of languages; an eminent philosopher and divine; moreover a faithful and eminent preacher of the Gospel, who, being taken away in the midst of his usefulness, in the twenty-sixth year of his age, A.D. 1523, changed his country but not his society, inasmuch as while he lived he walked with God. If you inquire farther, I am silent about other things, seeing neither you nor the marble can contain them."

He left behind him a disconsolate widow and an only son, called John, after his grandfather, to whom, at the grandfather's death, was left the estate of Dalvennan, but John having been engaged in the insurrection at Bothwell Bridge, 1679, it was forfeited till the year 1690, when, by the eighteenth Act of Parliament, in the same year, the forfeitures and fines past from the year 1665 to the 5th November 1688, were rescinded. His widow was afterwards married to one Mr James Gordon, a Presbyterian minister in Ireland. She lived to a great age, and died at Paisley, in 1694, which, when the people of Govan heard of, the savoury memory they still had of their worthy pastor made them desire the friends of the deceased, to allow them to give her a decent and honourable burial, beside her deceased husband. "To this day," says the compiler of his life, "1768, Mr Binning is mentioned among the people of Govan, with particular veneration." The books published at different times, under his name, which are contained in the quarto edition, Glasgow 1768, are all posthumous, and for this due allowance must be made. The good effects his discourses had upon his hearers, and the impertunity of many judicious and experienced Christians, to have them published, that they might have the same influence on such as should read them, encouraged some worthy ministers to revise and print them. The first of his works which was printed is entitled, "The Common Principles of the Christian Religion clearly proved, and singularly improved," as a practical catechism, wherein some of the most important foundations of our faith are solidly laid down; and that doctrine, which is according to godliness, is sweetly, yea pungently pressed home, and most satisfyingly handled. Mr M'Ward, speaking of this performance, says, "That it was not designed for the press, that it contained only his notes on those subjects which he preached to his flock." This book is an excellent exposition of the Westminster Confession, as far as it goes, viz., to the twenty-first question. Mr Patrick Gillespie writes a preface to the readers, wherein he expresses his high opinion of it, in the following encomium: "In this book Mr Binning explains many of the fundamental articles of the Christian faith, and had he lived to have finished this work, he had been, upon this single account, famous in the Church of Christ." The work in question was so greatly esteemed in this country, that before the year 1718 there had been no fewer than five impressions, and all these being sold off, a sixth was made in the same year. Mr James Coleman, minister at Sluys, in Flanders, translated it into the Dutch language. In the year 1670, another posthumous work was printed, entitled, "The Sinner's Sanctuary," being forty sermons on the eighth chapter of the Romans, from the first to the sixteenth verse. A pure stream of piety and learning runs through the whole of it, and a very peculiar turn of thought that exceeds the common rate of writers on this choice part of the Holy Scriptures. Dr Hatton, Dr Manton, and others, have expounded this chapter ably, but, so far as he goes, Mr Binning is not exceeded by any of them.

A third Treatise was printed at Edinburgh in 1671, under the title, "Fellowship with God, being twenty-eight Sermons on the 1st Epistle of John, chap. i. and ii., wherein the true ground and foundation of attaining the spiritual way of entertaining fellowship with the Father and the Son, and the blessed condition of such as attain to it, are most succinctly and dilucidly explained." This book was revised and published by one, who, in his Preface to the reader, styles himself, "His Servant in the Gospel of our dearest Lord and Saviour." He commends the Treatise in these terms: "Here are to be found, conviction for atheists, piercing rebukes to the profane, clear instructions to the ignorant, milk to the babes in Christ, quickening and reviving to such as faint in the way, restoratives for such as are in a decay, reclamations after backsliders to recall them, breasts of consolation for Sion's mourners; and to add no more, here are most excellent directions to serious seekers of fellowship with God, to guide them in their way, and help them forward to the attainment of that fulness of joy, which is to be had in fellowship with the Father and with the Son."

The author of the Life prefixed to the edition 1768, from which the preceding account has been chiefly extracted, says, that the rest of Mr Binning's practical MSS. were revising for the press. It does not appear that these have ever seen the light.

In the year 1829, the late venerable Mr Brown of Whitburn published a small work, entitled, "Evangelical Beauties of the late Rev. Hugh Binning, with an account of his Life."

The Edinburgh Christian Instructor, in reviewing this little work, remarks as follows: "We can hardly help thinking it discreditable to the religious taste of the present day, that the works of Binning are so little known. He is a writer of no common order. Although young in years when he died, his judgment and his piety were mature. He was a burning and a shining light while he lived, and his works are fitted to perpetuate and diffuse, now that he has long since gone to his rest and his reward, the illumination which he gave out in his life and preaching. There is a depth and a solidity of thinking about them, a richness of scriptural and pious sentiment, coupled with an exuberance of beautiful and striking illustration, such as none

* There is a neat reprint of the twenty-eight Sermons on Fellowship with God, by the London Religious Tract Society, in which obsolete words are exchanged for others of the same meaning, or explained by a note; a very valuable present to the public.

but a very highly gifted and a sanctified mind could command. We see in them, in fact, a delightful union of true genius, with the most exalted piety; of the fervour and the flow of youth, with the riper judgment and experience of age. There is originality without affectation, a rich imagination without any thing fanciful or extravagant, the utmost simplicity without any thing mean or trifling. We are not conscious of overrating his powers when we say, that neither in the richness of his illustrations, nor in the vein of seraphic piety which pervades his writings, is he at all inferior to Leighton, whom perhaps he, on the whole, most resembles. In what we have said of Binning, we are fully borne out by the recommendations of his works prefixed to this selection, from the pens of the Rev. Dr M'Crie and Rev. John Brown, Edinburgh. We rejoice to see this selection made from the works of one of whom we think so highly. We hope it will be the means of bringing into notice the whole works of the author."

We confess we feel mortified that it should still be the reproach of the religious public of Scotland, that the real excellencies and attractive beauties of Hugh Binning's writings, have not, as yet, been so discerned and felt, as to have brought out a reprint of his works, and in a form worthy of their intrinsic value. We do not do justice, in fact, to the eminent fathers of our Church, among whom Binning, unquestionably, holds a distinguished place.

THE WORLD.

PART. I.—DERANGEMENT.

By THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

THE question about the origin of sin is very different from that which has been so long agitated about the origin of evil; a problem which has puzzled philosophers from the earliest period of mental inquiry, and has led to a more useless expenditure of talent than any subject which has engaged the attention of the human mind. But they who have discussed this question most profoundly, have seldom considered sin in the list of evils. They seem rather to have considered it as a hardship, that the natural propensities should ever be checked, or lead to disastrous consequences; and they have always manifested a tendency to charge God foolishly, because they were not permitted to indulge, without restraint or fear of punishment, the appetites and passions inseparably connected with human nature. Those on the other hand, who know sin to be the transgression of the law of God, are convinced that it is the greatest of all evils; perhaps the only real evil which exists in the world; and that in proportion as it is removed, misery and fear will be banished from the abodes of men.

To be sure even angelic purity, could it be attained on earth, would not exempt the possessor from the stroke of death. But death to a good man is not in the list of evils: it is the messenger that sets him free from the bondage of corruption, and introduces him to the liberty of the sons of God. Neither can death, whether regarded as the fruits of sin, or as the law of nature be regarded as an evil: as the fruits of sin, it is a well-deserved punishment, and prevents the world from being over-run with the greatest of all monsters,—immortal sinners; as the law of nature, and extending to all created beings, it is the means of removing the present actors from the stage, after they have fulfilled their part, to afford room for new occupants, who, in their turn, give place to others; and thus death, which every individual dreads so much, is made the means of multiplying life to an indefinite extent by a constant succession of living creatures, who enjoy the blessings of life, and transmit this boon through countless generations, till the end of the world.

Death was the wages of sin only to man; he had a charter of immortality, on condition of perfect obedience: it could not be so, in regard to the other creatures, they were incapable of sinning, and could not deserve death as the fruits of delinquency; but they fulfilled the purposes of their creation infinitely better by death, and the reproduction of the species, than if they had been permitted to live for ever. And if we may believe geologists, myriads and millions of animals, of strange shape and character, had lived and died before man was created. Milton seems to be strangely at fault, both in his philosophy and divinity, when he represents the beasts and birds of prey, as, for the first time, pouncing on their victims after the fall. Eve is represented as expressing to Adam an anxious wish to remain in Paradise, even in their fallen state.

"So spake, so wished much humbled Eve, but fate
Subscribed not; nature first gave signs, impressed
On bird, beast, air, air suddenly eclipsed
After short blush of morn; nigh in her sight,
The bird of Jove, stooped from his airy tour,
Two birds of gayest plume before him drove;
Down from a hill the beast that reigns in woods,
First haster them, pursued a gentle brace,
Goodliest of all the forest, hart and hind."—B. xl. 101.

Did the poet imagine that the eagle was originally formed to feed on grain like the pigeon, and the lion to eat straw like the ox? Their structure, internal and external, demonstrates that they were intended from the beginning to be what they now are. Man alone had it in his power to operate a change upon his moral nature; and it is the history of that change, and its consequences, to which I am now to call the attention of the reader.

The Sacred Scriptures alone give us any distinct account of the original condition, and subsequent history, of man; and so precise are they on these points, that we can trace an unbroken chain of history from Adam to Moses, and from Moses to the latest of the prophets, all of whom bore testimony to Him who was to be sent for the regeneration of a lost world. The first momentous events in the world's history, by which the condition of man has been affected ever since, are stated in concise and simple terms in the sacred records. The sum and substance of them may be given in the words of the apostle, "By one man's disobedience sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death hath passed on all men, because all have sinned." There are many things connected with this event which the restless curiosity of man would wish to know, but which God has thought proper to conceal, we may be sure, because the knowledge of them is not necessary for our happiness; and, besides, however much may be imparted, there is a point where we must at last stop, and resolve all into the sovereign will and pleasure of the Most High.

If it should be asked, why was man permitted to fall? it might be asked in return, why he should have had a security against sin, which was not even afforded to the angels? for many of them fell from their high estate, and are "reserved in chains and darkness till judgment;" or, as the very learned Joseph Mede translates it, "reserved for chains and darkness at (the day of) judgment." But we may ask farther, would it have been an advantage to be secured against the possibility of sinning? If any are disposed to think so, they must be prepared to maintain that it would have been better for man to have been in the situation of the lower animals, who are kept from sinning by the necessity of their nature, and not by voluntary choice. Had man been placed in such a state as this, he would have been incapable either of sin or of holiness. We can only serve God acceptably when we worship him not by constraint but willingly, not from necessity, but from full purpose of heart.

God made man in his own image, one of the most distinct impressions of which is absolute freedom. He was made "sufficient to have stood, though free to fall," whilst every motive was supplied to preserve this freedom in its proper exercise; the ample bounty of heaven left him nothing to desire but to seek to do the divine will; and it had a necessary tendency to impel him, nay, to do all but compel him, to yield a ready and cheerful obedience. One restraint only was imposed, but it involved no hardship; on the contrary, it was essential to his freedom, it was necessary to constitute him a moral and accountable being; for had there been no law, there could have been no transgression; and a moral law was entirely out of the question; that law was given only to check the enormities of sin; it would have been inapplicable and unintelligible in the state of innocence; it would have been to forbid what man had an absolute repugnance to do. But to abstain from a certain fruit, to which man had neither proclivity nor aversion, was the simplest and most reasonable test that could be proposed to try the allegiance and fealty of man to the Being who had endowed him with such high privileges, and who had imposed only one restraint, the inconvenience of which he could never feel, with the whole riches of the world, besides, open to his enjoyment. The prohibition should have been to him a source of happiness; in everything else he acted in conformity with his own pure and untainted feelings; with regard to this, it should have been his pleasure "unargued to obey;" a dutiful child requires no reason but a parent's will.

The probability is, that man would not have fallen had he not been tempted. But the adversary was at hand, who, artfully and successfully, for his own purposes, plied his temptations, and induced the unfortunate pair to forfeit their happiness, and become rebels against their God. On this deeply mysterious subject we must repress our curiosity and be contented to rest satisfied with the limited information which the Scriptures afford. We learn, then, from this record that there was a revolt among the angels in heaven, and that the apostates were severely punished on account of their rebellion. "God spared not the angels when they sinned, but did cast them down to hell." 2 Pet. ii. 4.

It further appears, that these corrupted beings, like corrupted mortals, find their chief gratification in opposing the will of God, and in alluring associates to the cause of rebellion. What induced the angels to sin we know not; this, however, we know, that they must have fallen by abusing the freedom which is essential to men and angels; and this, farther, we learn from these important facts, that no beings but God, including in the term the divine persons who constitute the godhead, are absolutely perfect and impeccable. "There is none good but one, that is God;" all other beings stand only in him; whilst they look to him they are happy, and prevail by his might; the moment they think to stand by their own power, their strength is withered, their glory is departed, and they are, for the time, outcasts from happiness and heaven. These are no unimportant lessons, and they are emphatically taught by the revolt and punishment of the apostate angels, and by the misery which man brought upon himself by his willful fall.

With regard to the fallen angels, their exclusion from bliss is perpetual and irreversible; with regard to fallen man a remedy has been provided, a ransom has been found. Man had a feeble and insufficient apology, which he did not fail to urge, viz., that he had been misled by the insinuations of the serpent. This was a very insufficient excuse for violating a positive command of God, and, therefore, man has been made dearly to pay for his transgression. Still, perhaps, we may venture to say, that the glory of God was interested in defeating the work of the devil, and in not permitting this fair world to be made desolate, or to become a den of demons; although, therefore, the sentence of death was carried into effect, yet the penitent and pious were encouraged to hope, and look for "a better resurrection." The chief of the fallen angels, through whose temptations man fell, was, perhaps, the very chief of the celestial intelligences subordinate to God. We learn from Scripture, that there is a gradation of dignities among them, designated by the names of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers;" and that all these were made by, and subjected to, the Son of Man. Col. i. 16, 17. The poet who sings of Paradise lost and regained, adopts this idea, and represents repugnance on the part of the first apostate to the supremacy of the Son of God, as the cause of the revolt of the angels, and of their expulsion from heaven. A poet's fancy is no good authority in divinity; and the super-eminent genius of the poet in question, is not sufficient to sway our judgment, especially as he combines unparalleled absurdities with unattainable poetic excellence. Nevertheless, we may safely conclude, that it would not be the weakest and least influential of these spiritual beings that would venture to rebel, and seduce others from their allegiance. Being baffled in his attempt, and his hopes in heaven being blasted for ever, he cast his eyes on the new made world, and its sinless inhabitants; (if geologists will permit us to speak so, for they imagine that the world was created millions of years before man;) the ambition of reigning in their hearts, and of defeating the work of God seized his mind, and he succeeded to the extent of seducing them from God, and securing an inordinate predominance over their feelings and affections.

But all this was without any benefit to the tempter himself: for He, whose almighty power he had in vain attempted to resist in heaven, had prepared for him a still more signal discomfiture, by enabling even weak and fallen man, whom he had seduced, to cast off the yoke of sin, and "to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy."

I have gone as far on this subject as I dare venture; but I have scarcely presumed to speculate beyond the plain letter of Scripture; at least, I have stated nothing inconsistent with its doctrines and its spirit. These high mysteries are frequently brought before our view in Scripture, and the contemplation of them will not be useless if it leads us to adore the unsearchable ways of God; to be thankful for what he has revealed; and to testify our dutiful submission, by humble acquiescence in the appointments of his wisdom. The subjects which I have brought before the contemplation of the reader, are not mysteries without a meaning; they are connected with all the best and highest hopes of men; the whole scheme of our salvation hinges upon them: this scheme was laid in the counsels of God before the foundations of the world: it was fixed and determined in the mind of the Eternal, that the Son of man should be manifested to destroy the works of the Devil: this was not an expedient resorted to as the means of remedying an unforeseen evil; all the evil which sin should produce had been foreseen, and a remedy provided: "We are redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, who verily was foreordained before the foundations of the world, but was manifest in these last times." 1 Pet. i. 19, 20.

Thus, then, the fall of angels, the fall of man, the mysteries of redemption, and the everlasting triumph of the Redeemer, are all inseparably conjoined: and who shall dare to complain, or who may venture to say, why are things ordered thus? Still less reason will we have to murmur or repine, when we come to consider the exalted views which the Gospel revelation has given us of the character and attributes of God; which have been brought to light solely by the manifestation of the divine goodness, in providing a remedy for the infirmities and the sins of men. This, I hope, will sufficiently appear when we come to consider the means which God has provided for the adjustment of the evils and irregularities which sin has introduced.

In the meantime, let us attend for a little to some of the most prominent of these evils. "The wages of sin is death." If death implied an extinction of being, to many it would not be formidable; if formidable to any, it would be so chiefly to the virtuous and good, whose sober habits and well regulated minds enable them to enjoy many rational comforts, which naturally attach them to life, and would make them regard death as the greatest of evils, did they consider it as the final termination of their being: the virtuous Hezekiah seems to have been, for a season, under the influence of such feelings. The wicked, on the other hand, whose habits are alike foreign to virtue and to happiness, and who can see nothing but misery and confusion in this world, or, at least, can taste no true enjoyment, might regard death as "a consummation devoutly to be wished:" and there cannot be a more decided proof of the ineffaceable conviction of future responsibility, than the fact, that so few of the wicked and miserable have dared to put an end to a wretched existence. In so far as regards the general economy of nature, death cannot be accounted an evil: one generation passes away; but the loss is soon repaired, and the affairs of men go on with renovated vigour, and increased knowledge, from the accumulated wisdom and experience of the ages which are past. Why should the present race of mortals monopolize the blessings of existence? In so far as the wisdom and goodness of God are concerned, we may safely say, that these attributes are more conspicuously displayed in giving life and enjoyment to successive millions of beings, than if these blessings were perpetuated to the present generation of men and animals, which could only be done by the exclusion of successors.

But there is a strong additional reason for the removal of man from the present state of being. He cannot even bear great longevity. Take, for example, the antediluvian world. With Adam for a preacher of righteousness among his descendants for nine hundred and thirty years, the knowledge and worship of God were received only by one branch of his family. Though they could have no difficulty in counting kindred, and must have seen that they all belonged to the same stock, yet "the earth was corrupt before God, and the earth was full of violence." What else could be expected from sinners who lived nearly a thousand years, who might almost be said to have the seeds of immortality remaining in their constitution, and probably expected that they might escape the sentence of death? I am fully persuaded that the world never saw, nor can form a conception of such horrible wickedness as was conceived and practised by sinners unrestrained by the fear of death, and of judgment to come; which must, in a great measure, have been the case with the wicked who lived before the flood.

Give earthly immortality, then, to sinners, and this fair world is instantly converted into a Pandemonium; remove the fear of death, and there would be no need of any other hell than this earth: even now the thoughts and imaginations of the hearts of worldly men are evil continually, prone to mere animal gratifications, averse to all spiritual contemplations, bent on encroachment, intent on aggrandizement, mortally hating all and sundry who present any obstacle to headlong indulgence. These are genuine and characteristic features of unrenewed human nature, and all the restraints arising from fear of punishment, poverty, and disgrace, are daily found to be insufficient to repress the ebullition of those fiendish and beastly propensities. It was in mercy, then, that God smote the earth with sterility, and armed every element of nature against the life of man, and raised up competitors in the brute creation to dispute with him the earth's sovereignty, that the daily call for food and security might draw his attention from the indulgence of his grovelling propensities, and compel him to a certain degree of energy, from the necessity of studying the means of self-preservation.

Do we not see, then, the goodness, as well as the severity of God, in making death the wages of sin? Men, indeed, regard it as the greatest of all evils; but God has made it the door to immortality, and the inlet by which souls, purified by divine grace and the discipline of this world, are prepared for the enjoyment of the kingdom of the just. Viewing death, then, merely as a measure of the divine government, it appears a wise and salutary arrangement. It is the vent by which the world is cleansed from its moral impurities; it is the door by which the righteous escape from the miseries of the world, to exchange their sufferings for everlasting happiness; and it makes room for countless millions of intelligent beings who may glorify God on earth, and enjoy him for ever in heaven, instead of those blessings being confined to one generation of men. Nay, were death excluded, and the world stocked with beings as pure as Adam in the state of innocence, even this would be a limitation to the exercise of divine mercy, for the world would soon be filled; there is no room for the unlimited multiplication of the species, except by the removal of old actors from the scene, and the introduction of new aspirants after "glory, honour, and immortality." In this sense, then, it may justly be said, that "death is swallowed up of victory," and that his very ravages contribute to augment the number of the blessed. True it is, we may contemplate with horror, the multitude of thoughtless victims who are daily hurried into eternity. But it will not always be so: Christ's "unsuffering kingdom yet will come," when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth; when men shall be born only to be blessed; till the number of the elect shall be filled up, when Christ shall have delivered the kingdom to God, having put all enemies under his feet. I shall endeavour to illustrate this part of the subject in another essay.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

BY AN AMERICAN.

COMMUNICATED BY D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. I.

THE first English settlement in New England was made by a part of the congregation of the Rev. John Robinson, driven with their pastor by persecution from the north of England to Holland, in the year 1608. Having remained, first at Amsterdam, and afterwards at Leyden twelve years, a part returned to England, and sailing from Plymouth, reached what is now called Massachusetts Bay, and in 1620, founded a town which they called Plymouth. Their number was about one hundred persons. After almost incredible hardships, their settlement began to assume the appearance of prosperity. In less than ten years, their colony increased to 300 persons.

In 1628, a new colony went out from England and founded the town of Salem; and in 1630, another and much larger colony was sent out, and founded Boston. This colony and that of Salem, were under one government, of which John Winthrop was the chief or governor. From these original colonies, many new settlements were made in their respective vicinities. As they were all situations on Massachusetts Bay, they were not far from each other, and as they advanced in numbers they began to act in concert; and from the year 1643, occasionally held meetings, or congresses, of delegates from each town, for the purpose of concerting measures for their common defence against the Indians. The colonies of Plymouth and of Boston, or Massachusetts Bay as it was called, were united in the year 1692, and thenceforth they constituted but one commonwealth, and were governed by the provisions of a royal charter.

At an early period after their settlement, colonies went out from those on and around Massachusetts Bay, and formed settlements in what was afterwards called the Provinces, and at present Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. At a later period, Maine and Vermont were added to the number of New England colonies or commonwealths. The population of these various districts augmented gradually. Many difficulties had to be encountered, one of the most formidable of which was, the hostility of the native tribes of Indians. Several destructive wars were waged with them, ending in the subjection of the aborigines. Meanwhile the work of clearing away the forests, building towns and cities, establishing schools and churches, founding colleges, &c., went on, and at the end of eighty years, the New England colonies embraced a population of nearly 100,000 souls. From that epoch, (1700,) the increase of the population was rapid and without interruption, excepting during the two French wars, as they are called, in 1745-49, and 1754-63, when England being at war with France, involved the colonies in war with the Canadas, (which then belonged to France,) and the war of revolution in 1775-83. During those three periods of war, New England, in common with the other portions of what constitutes the United States, suffered much. It was only, however, a temporary depression. The present population of the six New England States, viz.: Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine, is not far from two millions and a-half. And probably there is not on the globe a country better supplied with a well educated ministry, or the means of popular education. There is probably not a district containing a sufficient population, which has not a school. Besides many academies or high schools, there are twelve colleges, some five or six theological seminaries, and I know not how many medical and law schools in these six states.

Having given a sufficient sketch of the history of New England, I now proceed to describe very briefly, the character of the men who were the founders of the New England colonies, and the authors, under God, of those blessed institutions which have produced many good fruits.

I. The colonists who planted the standard of Christianity and civilization on the shores of New England, were actuated by the noblest motives which could influence men. It is true that they were oppressed and denied some of their dearest rights in their native land. But this could have been borne, nor was redress impossible. Or they could have remained in Holland, and there worshipped God in a manner congenial to their feelings and to their conscience. But they chose to emigrate to an almost unknown land—to inhospitable shores—to an unsubdued wilderness, and this chiefly for the noble purpose of extending the kingdom of the Redeemer. In the statement of the reasons given by the emigrants from Leyden for their removal is the following: "Fifthly and lastly, which was not the least, a great hope and inward zeal they had of laying some good foundations, or, at least, to make some way thereunto for the propagation and advancement of the Gospel of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, in those remote parts of the world; yea, although they should be but as stepping-stones unto others for the performance of so good a work." Eliot and the Mayhews, Sergeant and Brainerd, did not forget this. Their descendants, although alas! they almost forgot it, are now, blessed be God, in these days endeavouring, in some measure, to fulfil the high project which their fathers had in view. Where should the missionary spirit be constantly felt, if not in the land which it peopled? May that spirit long burn in every Christian heart in New England, for she owes it to the country, to the world, to Christ, to fulfil the high destination, which, in the choice of her Pilgrim Fathers, and the providence of God, has been assigned to her! Somewhat of the same spirit influenced many of the individual emigrants in the other colonies which settled in the United States, but not comparable as to extent, and not at all as to organized form, to that which influenced the colonization of New England.

In vain shall we seek a parallel to this in the colonies of other times or countries. An escape from oppression, and often from the restraints of law; a restless curiosity, and a spirit of hazardous enterprise; commercial pursuits, and love of gain; political measures for the increase of power, or for the abstraction of a redundant population, were the causes which led to the planting of all the colonies in the Old World, and, excepting New England, in the New World also. A desire to extend the kingdom of God had nothing to do with the colonies sent forth from Egypt and Phœnicia, from Greece, from Carthage, and from Rome. And it had little, very little to do with those which went forth from Spain and Portugal, from France and Holland, and from Denmark and Sweden, in modern times.

II. Very many of the first settlers in New England were descendants of the most respectable families in England, and made great sacrifices in going to that land. This was remarkably the case with the colony which founded Boston and the neighbouring places. They were not convicts transported for their crimes; they were not men who fled from justice, to find an asylum in that wilderness; nor were they an ignoble rabble, driven by starvation from their native but L-mished land; but they were almost, to a man, in good circumstances in their native country, and not a few were, for those times, wealthy. The respectability of Winthrop, and Stoughton, and Ames, and Chauncey, and Sherman, and Hobart, and Fisk, and Johnson the founder of Boston, and his wife, Lady Arabella, and many more who might be named, is well known. Almost every important town of New England was settled by respectable emigrants, many of whose descendants are now to be found in those places, inheriting not only their names, but also their virtues and their respectability.

III. They had a noble regard for, and interest in, their fatherland, its customs, and its civil and religious institutions. Although they had suffered wrong, and felt it deeply, yet they never could forget that they were English, nor lose their love for England. One reason why the congregation of Mr Robinson in Leyden did not choose to remain in Holland was, that "their posterity would, in a few generations, become Dutch, and so lose their interest in the English nation, they being rather desirous to enlarge his majesty's dominions, and to live under their natural prince."

IV. The first settlers of New England were generally pious, and many of them eminently so. Their religion was strict, affecting their whole conduct, cheerful in the main, though somewhat stern; their morality was excellent; their observance of the Lord's day most rigid and exemplary. They were industrious, frugal, and temperate in a remarkable degree. No people on earth ever acted more from principle in everything. Custom and habit had their influence; but custom and habit with them were founded in principle. They were emphatically men of principle. They had great regard for the Word of God and its precepts. They paid great deference to the divine authority, and but little to that which is human, when not supported by that which is divine. They carried their religion into everything. It was a constituent quality of every action, a pervading element, whose influence was seen and felt everywhere. They were remarkable for their regard to providences. They saw God's hand in every event.

V. In doctrine they were "incorrupt." The fall of man, his total alienation from God, the supreme divinity of Jesus Christ, atonement by his sufferings and death, the necessity of regeneration by the influence of the Holy Spirit, the perseverance of believers in holiness, and their kindred truths and doctrines, were cordially embraced, and faithfully preached. They had their defects, no doubt, and their manner of exhibiting truth was not always felicitous and skilful; yet the great doctrines of the Bible were fully, faithfully, and, in general, successfully delivered. Their ministers were much such men as were their contemporaries Owen, Howe, Baxter, and Bates. The religious instruction of their children was faithful and wonderfully successful. No object was felt to be more important than this by the Pilgrims; and it is remarkable what a blessing attended their solicitude and their efforts.

VI. No people on earth ever estimated the importance of learning at a higher rate than did the colonists who settled New England. They were themselves an educated people. They were an intelligent people. They brought with them the love of letters. There were few, if any, among them who could not read. One of the first subjects to which they turned their attention, was suitable provision for the establishment of common schools and academies. And but few years rolled away before they founded a noble institution for the preparation of ministers of the Gospel, and of men to manage the affairs of state. Many of their ministers were eminently successful.

In the following papers I shall have occasion to point out some mistakes which were committed by the ministry and the Churches of New England, the evil influence of which has reached down to the present time. The Pilgrim Fathers were not perfect men, but, take them altogether, they were such men as the world has seldom seen, and they deserve to be long and respectfully remembered by every American Christian.

CHANGE PRODUCED BY DEATH:

A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. ROBERT SMITH,

"And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, I am a stranger and a sojourner with you; give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight."—GEN. xxiii. 3, 4.

WHEN not merely the whole kingdom, but a large portion of the continent of Europe, has recently been one wide spread scene of disease and suffering, like a great hospital filled with the sick and dying, how much affliction, as well as sin, has passed under that eye which "looketh to the ends of the earth, and beholdeth under the whole heaven." Though the sphere of our vision be more limited, and the range even of our imagination be circumscribed, yet we have seen, or can imagine, many touching scenes of calamity. At present we shall confine ourselves to a view of the revolution produced in our sympathies and feelings by the death of the nearest and dearest relatives and friends, together with one or two reflections thereby suggested.

A remarkable example of this occurs in the eagerness which Abraham shewed to consign his beloved Sarah to the grave, when he said to the sons of Heth, "Give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." His affection for the wife of his youth, and companion of all his wanderings, the sharer of his fortunes, and the mother of the promised seed, was very remarkable, and led him to do the only thing recorded in his history that seemed to be harsh and cruel. For her sake he banished from his house, not merely his handmaid Hagar, but his son Ishmael, and left them to wander, and, for aught that he knew, to perish in the wilderness; and yet mark what a change death produced in this beloved companion. She is no longer the delight of his eye, and the desire of his heart, but he is fain to have her buried out of his sight. Formerly he felt as if he could not live without her, now he can no longer live beside her. Death has quenched and closed that eye, which beamed with affection and intelligence. A livid paleness has overspread the cheek that glowed with health. The lips are closed on which dwelt the law of kindness. The whole frame has become a piece of inanimate clay, and threatens to spread putrefaction and disease around. And, therefore, Abraham said to the sons of Heth, regarding her whom erewhile he loved as his own soul, "Give me a possession of a burying-place, that I may bury my dead out of my sight."

And who is Sarah, and what has she done, that she has become so offensive to him? Why, she is the companion of his youth, united to him by the ties of consanguinity, as well as the strongest earthly tie that binds one human being to another in this world. They had probably grown up together, and engaged in the same amusements, and followed the same pursuits in their earliest and happiest days. Their affection for one another "had grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength," till it was firmly and permanently established by the relation in which they stood to one another. Sarah had every quality, not merely to procure, but to retain his affection. Her external appearance was the least recommendation, though, alas! it be a primary object with many persons; and of it, you will observe, it is said, in the 12th chapter of Genesis, ver. 14, 15, "When Abraham was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman, that she was very fair. The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh; and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house." But the qualities of her mind were a far higher recommendation. We do not, indeed, know what measure of intelligence she possessed; and there is evidence that she was far inferior to Abraham in faith and patience, in temper and kindness. She, indeed, appears sometimes very unreasonable to her lord, as well as harsh and cruel to her domestics. But still, with all these imperfections, we know that she was a pious woman; and as such, her faith is spoken of in Scripture, and her example held up for the imitation of others. She is one of the "cloud of witnesses," whose faith is celebrated in the 11th chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and, so far from being habitually disrespectful to her husband, she is set forth as a model of conjugal respect in the 3d chapter of 1 Peter, ver. 5, 6: "After this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands; even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement." For his sake, or rather entering into his views, and animated by the same spirit, she renounced the religion of her fathers, and forsook the land of her nativity, relinquished all her possessions and prospects, and became a wanderer and pilgrim on the earth. She attended all his steps, and shared in all his fortunes, entered into all his plans, and participated in all his cares, joined with him in every act of worship, and was inspired with the same hopes. At length she became the mother of the promised seed which had so long exercised their faith and solicitude, and opened up to them the prospect of so much honour and advantage. And after more than one hundred and twenty years spent in this manner, (for we have supposed they grew up together from their youth,) by how many ties were they united, and by how many endearing recollections were their hearts knit together! And yet death came and burst these ties asunder; and so great was the change produced, that Abraham, instead of wishing to keep up the connection any longer, was fain to have her buried out of his sight. Alas! what havoc has sin wrought in the world, and what a melancholy change does death produce, and how desirable is it to have the prospect of meeting our friends in a happier land, where there is no separation, and no sorrow, and where death itself shall die!

Many such events as the one now described have lately occurred, and the peculiarities in the case of every individual will be best suggested by his own experience. I shall not speak of the ties which unite those who have sat upon the same knee, and been fed by the same hand, have reclined on the same couch, and kneeled around the same domestic altar, and "who are dearer to one another than any strangers." Nor shall I speak of those friends who are united by community of sentiment and feeling, whose calling and pursuits have brought them together, and whose esteem and affection have been established by time and habit, but they must all be separated at last. Death bursts every tie, and dissolves every connection that is formed in this world, and makes us glad to be separated from those whom we esteemed most highly, and loved most ardently. The ties which unite parents and child are more tender, and more touching. Even at an age when children are altogether helpless and dependent, and can do nothing but awaken solicitude and give trouble, they are very dear, especially to the heart of one parent, and she is very loath to have her infant torn from her bosom. There is something truly painful in seeing persons so young struggling with unknown sufferings, and feeling ills which they cannot express. How appalling the stroke of death when it falls upon infants before they have arrived at intelligence, and have done neither good nor evil in their own persons! And, how are the affections of parents torn, and their hopes blasted by such events! Yet, even these little victims of mortality must soon be consigned to the narrow house. Though the feelings, however, awakened in this manner, be peculiarly tender and touching, they are not the most permanent. The longer a child lives, the deeper and more durable is the wound produced by its sickness and death. He may not merely have become, in some sense, independent of his parents, but be able and willing to afford them assistance, and then his death is a temporal loss. But if, besides this, he lived under the influence of religion, and had devoted himself to the service of God—if he possessed such talents, and had received such an education as enabled him to be useful to others, and to promote his own reputation in the world, though he should not have the prospect of rising to such eminence as to occupy "the high places of the earth," and "read his history in a nation's eyes," his decease is then a peculiarly sore bereavement to pious and intelligent parents, as well as a loss to the community at large. For I must take leave to say, that those who, either in a limited or more extensive sphere, are instrumental in promoting the glory of God, by the instruction and improvement of mankind, are better employed, and greater benefactors to their race, than those who are admitted into the councils of nations, and guide the helm of affairs. No wonder, therefore, though parents value highly such children. But when death arrests their labours, their usefulness is terminated, and their society no longer desired. On the other hand, how unwilling are affectionate and dutiful children to part with their beloved parents, even at the most advanced period of life! They feel the advantage of their experience, and the weight of their lessons. They prize their holy example and fervent prayers; and when a pious parent can do nothing but pray for his children, it is a very great boon; for "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." A pious and dutiful child reveres the hoary head of his venerable parent, and supports his tottering steps till death bring him home to his grave, "like a shock of corn fully ripe, that cometh in in his season." And then he too must say, "give me a possession of a burying-place, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." The case of Abraham, however, is more affecting than any of these; but there is a more touching case still, and you have only to look at the reverse of the picture formerly drawn, in order to see it. Sarah looked up to Abraham, and called him Lord and master, was guided by his counsel, and supported by his arm, and therefore, his death would have been a far greater calamity than her's was. A believing husband, besides being wise and pious, prudent and industrious, is the head and staff of a family. To him all look up for counsel, and upon him all depend for support. He ought to be able to direct amidst all perplexities, and to soothe under all sorrows, to control on all occasions, and to assist in all emergencies. What, then, are the widowed mother and the fatherless children to do, when deprived of the head which guided them, and the arm that sustained them? And how can they part with such a one, and be cast upon their own resources, or, it may be, obliged to look to the cold hand of charity, and endure the insolent scorn of a heartless and evil generation? And yet such is the change that death produces, that even such a mourning circle are fain to remove from the midst of them, him who occupied the chief place, and to have their dead buried out of their sight.

Now, it is obvious to remark, from so many proofs and illustrations of the ravages of disease and death, how foolish, as well as sinful, it is to set our hearts supremely upon any thing in this world. I speak not merely of those riches and possessions which perish with the using, and which add nothing beyond the bare necessities of life to the happiness of any man; nor of those occupations and indulgencies which soon superinduce weariness and loathing; nor of that honour and authority which involve in perplexity and trouble. But it is both sinful and injurious to love excessively any earthly relative and friend. They are indeed all entitled to their own proper place in our hearts, and may be esteemed and loved very highly for their personal worth or useful qualities. The grace of God does not eradicate any lawful affection of the human mind, but confirms and purifies it. You can depend, far more safely upon the affection of a Christian, than upon that of any other person; and you are sure "he will do you good and not evil, all the days of his life." Divine grace only restrains and modifies every inferior feeling of the human heart. It subordinates the creature to the Creator, and teaches us to love father and mother, wife and child, brother and sister incomparably less than God, to devote them all to his service and resign them all to his will. To love any creature supremely is putting it in the place of God, and giving it that throne in our hearts, which is due only to him. It is as really idolatry as the worshipping of other gods than the Lord; and as such is not merely criminal, but injurious. Such unrestrained and excessive attachment keeps the mind restless and unhappy so long as the beloved object lives, and leaves it disconsolate and miserable when it is gone. Such persons are ready to exclaim, with Micah, "They have taken away my idol, and what have I left behind?"

But the Christian has still God as his portion, and the source of his joy. He loves him supremely, and knows how to bow to his authority, and be resigned to his holy will. He endeavours to engage his relatives and friends in his service, and so far as he succeeds he is not left to mourn over the deceased, even as others who have no hope. He feels an unspeakable complacency in the persuasion that they have passed into glory, and rejoices in the prospect of recovering their society in far holier and happier circumstances than those in which they were united in this world.

It is equally obvious to remark, from the scenes described, how much evil sin has introduced into the universe. For it was sin which "brought death into the world, and all our woe." We should remember habitually, and feel sensibly that it is the root of all evil. We should hate it with a perfect hatred, and flee from it as our greatest calamity. If we escape from sin to the Saviour, we are safe, and will be for ever happy. Now all the ills that we see, and all the sorrows that we feel, admonish us to have recourse to his righteousness and grace, and teach us that "sin is exceedingly sinful." But when it sends famine or pestilence into the land, and converts many habitations into houses of mourning, its malignity becomes more conspicuous. Turn into the abode where the king of terrors has left his victim. Behold the weeping relatives gathered around all that remains of one, erewhile very dear and valuable to them. Mark the heaving sigh, and the bursting tear, and see the pale and ghastly countenance so much changed by the stroke of death, that it can no longer be contemplated without pain. The most affectionate friends cannot always look upon it, and all are soon glad to have it buried out of their sight. But if we could draw aside the veil which hangs upon the future world, we should discover more terrible consequences of sin than any that are seen on this side of the grave. For whilst the souls of believers, at death, pass into glory, the wicked are turned into hell, and lie down in everlasting burnings. And if the body be so much changed by death, then I have no doubt the unpardoned and unrenewed soul will be still more changed. If the dead body become so offensive in a few days, that the most affectionate relatives are glad to have it buried out of their sight, how much more offensive will the guilty and polluted, condemned and ruined soul become? At present we feel as if we could hardly be happy even in heaven unless we had our parents and companions, our children and beloved friends, around us, (and their presence would, no doubt, greatly enhance our bliss;) and we think we could not bear to be separated from them for ever, and to see everlasting destruction come upon them, and yet mark what the numerous facts already adduced in illustration of the text, seem to teach us. We will not merely perceive the rectitude of the divine administration, and acquiesce in the sentence of their condemnation; our love to God, and hatred of sin, will not merely prevail over every other feeling, but we could not there bear the presence of a guilty and polluted relative, and would be ready to exclaim, "Banish them out of our sight!" And O! say not this is strange, and unnatural language. If a child, even in this sinful world, may so provoke us to anger, as to obliterate, for a time, our tenderness and affection for him, or so defile himself with sin, and cover himself with shame, as to turn our hearts away from him, and provoke us to disown him, and banish him from our presence, think it not strange if the far guiltier and more polluted souls of the wicked, after death, completely destroy the natural sympathies and affections, towards them, of those relatives and friends who have been made perfect in holiness, and stand continually in the presence of God and of the Lamb. It is painful, it is appalling, especially to a husband, or a parent, to contemplate even the bare possibility of such a consummation. But it is just all the more calculated to rouse us from our lethargy, and call forth the most energetic exertions to pluck the souls of those who are near and dear to us like brands out of the everlasting burnings, as well as to use the greater diligence to make our own calling and election sure. And, to quicken our diligence, let us look at the consequences of sin, not merely in the perdition of a single sinner, but of all the children of condemnation. What will that place be, which is the habitation not merely of solitary individuals, as sinful and miserable as we have described them, but of ten thousand times ten thousand, and millions of millions of fallen angels, and of the condemned children of men? And will we, after all, still harbour corruption, and live in the indulgence of sin, that we may have our everlasting portion with the devil and his angels? If there were no remedy for these evils, it might be prudent, and for our comfort, to close our eyes against them. But a complete antidote has been provided. The Lord Jesus Christ assumed human nature into personal union with his divine nature, and came into this world, and laboured, and died, "to bring men out of a state of sin and misery into a state of justification and salvation." Those who are united to him by faith shall not merely be pardoned and rescued from future punishment, but sanctified and qualified for heaven. As soon as the body falls by the stroke of death, "the souls of believers are made perfect in holiness, pass into glory, and shall be for ever with the Lord." Even the body, though left behind in the grave, sleeps in Jesus, and he will raise it up at the last day. It will then not merely put off the hue of death, and the corruption of the tomb, and become as fresh and beautiful as ever it was in its best days on earth, but far lovelier than anything that is ever seen in this world. "It shall be changed and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, not having spot nor wrinkle nor any such thing." The soul, too, will be still more changed and improved; and the whole man, soul and body, after the morning of the resurrection and the day of judgment, will be raised to an exaltation and glory, a perfection and happiness, "which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive." The redeemed from amongst men will mingle with the society, and participate in the enjoyments, of angels and archangels, and of the cherubim and seraphim, which surround the throne of the Eternal. They shall come to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to God the judge of all, whom they shall see as they are seen, and know even as they are known. "For to him that overcometh," says Christ, "will I grant to sit with me upon my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father upon his throne." And for what do men forego all this glory and felicity, and incur all the degradation and misery of the unbelieving and impenitent? For the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season, yea, for those things which are not; for the wicked are, of all men, most miserable even in this life. The line which separates between lawful and unlawful indulgence, at the same time marks out the boundary between happiness and misery; transgress it, and you will soon bring upon yourself a degree of suffering proportioned to the greatness of the transgression; so that sinners contract guilt without the prospect of a compensation, and embrace misery for its own sake. "Let the wicked then forsake his ways, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

PHILOSOPHY OF THE SOCIAL CONDITION.

No. II.

By JAMES STARK, Esq., Advocate.

IN a former paper, under this head, I offered some observations on the character and condition of man in general; and brought under the notice of the reader two great principles of conduct, namely, piety and charity, the fear of God and mutual love, by the former of which, every creature is bound in every condition of life, and by the latter, man is bound in every condition of social life.

But man is not merely a social being. In no period of his history do we find the human race associating together in what may be called a general or promiscuous state of society, uninfluenced by the ties of country and kindred; but, on the contrary, at all times distributed into little communities, each differing from the others in language, laws, and manners, and every attempt to amalgamate them under one universal monarchy, is fruitless as it is permanently to unite together the drops of quicksilver.

It seems, therefore, a proper sequel to the observations formerly made, to advert for a little to the principle of attachment implanted in the human constitution: the operation of which is to contract the social circle, and divide mankind into associations, fraternities, friendships.

The purpose and final cause of this principle it is not difficult to perceive. It cannot be to counteract or destroy the social character of man. Such a theory would be an impious arraignment of the all-wise Creator, as if he had endowed man with opposite and contradictory powers, and frustrated the work of his own hands. Yet this has, in many cases, been its actual effect. It was so among some, and those the most enlightened, of the ancient heathen, whose intellectual vision, limited as it were by the natural horizon which bounded their country, became, at length, so narrow and contracted, that they were in use to regard every man, who did not belong to their little circle, as creatures below notice, barbarians whom they might at pleasure seize, subjugate, and slay. The same notion sprung up among the favoured people of Israel, who, instead of considering themselves stewards of the divine bounty, and vested with privileges for the benefit of the world, entertained a supercilious contempt for other nations, and spoke of them as but broken branches, (Rom. xi. 17.) cut off from the divine favour, and themselves grafted in exclusively and deservedly to enjoy the root and fatness of the tree. And even among ourselves the operation of the principle has too often been to raise up arrogant and haughty factions in the state, to set houses at variance with each other, and make the blessed Gospel itself to bring "not peace but a sword."

Nothing of all this, however, is the legitimate consequence of the principle, the true purpose of which evidently is to make amends, as we may say, for the limited faculties of man, and by confining his energies, or, at least, their main efforts, within a circumscribed sphere of action, to give them a power and efficacy which they could not otherwise possess. Its existence is a signal proof of the wisdom and beneficence of the Creator, who has thus, in the very act of confining men, and determining the bounds of their habitation, contrived to impart to them a portion of his own infinity. It restricts every one to a particular spot; but there his character is drawn out, his qualities tried and appreciated, and all his talents effective and available; there he is ever present, filling it with his influence,—an image of the infinitely infinite Jehovah, who pervades all space, and is "not far from every one of us."—(Acts xvii. 27.)

Its direct tendency, in combination with the other principles of our nature, is to place every man in a sort of magic circle, which he cannot cross, and where all his feelings are most powerfully, because most closely, affected. Here he imbibes the sentiments and manners of those about him,—here his character is formed,—here his habits are fixed.

This shows us the incalculable importance of our situation in the world and in society. And should lead those who enjoy the blessings of a free government, which extends civil and religious liberty to all; those whose lot has been cast in a land like ours, a land of Bibles, where the Gospel is continually proclaimed, and the Holy Scriptures are constantly open to perusal; and last, not least, those whose infant minds have been sown with the seeds of virtue, and their early years watched over by pious relatives and friends:—to offer up to the Great Disposer of all events, the incense of a grateful heart, in thankful acknowledgments for his goodness, and still more in the rich fragrance of a holy life.

It should also lead every one seriously to reflect on the character and habits of the society which he is accustomed to frequent, and the individuals whom he has chosen for his companions and associates; and, before it be too late, to consider their inevitable effect upon his own. Thoughtlessness here is consummate folly, and procrastination full of peril: he may be sealing his ruin for time and for eternity.

Indeed, when one thinks of the force of example, from the inherent susceptibility of our nature, and, at the same time, the evil influences which everywhere prevail in the world, not merely the wickedness of the wicked and the baseness of the bad, but the frailties of the good, the follies of the wise, and the littlenesses of the great, it may well be questioned whether any thing short of a moral necessity should lead us into connections that endanger our well-being while they subsist, and when they come to be broken up, as all earthly ties must, will shatter our feelings and un-hinge the mind. It would be wiser far, to hang loose to sublunary good, and to stay our hearts upon that great Being, who is without imperfection and without change; or, in the language of Scripture, "to walk with God," that is to say, to realize his character and make it ever present to our minds, and to act at all times as in his sight, and with a respect to his approbation; till, in a sense of which the unity of human friendship and the closest and most lasting relation of life, (Eph. v. 32.) is but an image, we become one with Him, (John xvii. 21.) This would give firmness and consistency to our characters, render our intercourse with the world, in the discharge of the active duties of life, wholesome and salutary, a stream of virtue and of blessing; and fit us for being the supports of society here, and, at length, steadfast pillars in a nobler temple hereafter.—(Rev. iii. 12.)

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Redemption.—When our world fell from its first estate, it became one vast prison; its walls were adamant, and unscalable; its gates were brass, and impregnable; within, the people sat in darkness and in the shadow of death; without, inflexible justice guarded the brazen gate, brandishing the flaming sword of the eternal law. Mercy, as she winged her flight of love through the worlds of the universe, paused to mark the prison aspect of our once paradisaic world. Her eye affected her heart. Her heart melted and bled as the shriek of misery and yell of despair rose upon the four winds of heaven. She could not pass by nor pass on; she descended before the gate, and requested admittance. Justice, raising the flaming sword in awful majesty, exclaimed, "No one can enter here and live!" and the thunder of his voice outspoke the wailings within. Mercy expanded her wings, to renew her flight amongst the unfallen worlds. She reascended into the mid air, but could not proceed, because she could not forget the piercing cries from the prison. She therefore returned to her native throne in the heaven of heavens. It was a glorious high throne from everlasting, both unshaken and untarnished by the fallen fate of man and angels. But even there she could not forget the scene which she had witnessed and wept over. She sat and weighed the claims of all the judicial perfections of Jehovah, all the principles of the eternal law. But, although they rose upon her view in all their vastness, she could not forget the prison. She redescended with a more rapid and radiant flight, and approached the gate with an aspect of equal solicitude and determination, but again she was denied admittance. She stood still; her emotion was visible. Justice ceased to brandish the sword; there was silence in heaven. Is there admittance on no terms whatever? she asked: yes, said Justice: but only on terms which no finite being can fulfil. I demand an atoning death for their eternal life; blood divine for their ransom: and I, said Mercy, at once accept the terms. It was asked on what security, and when they would be fulfilled? there, said Mercy, is the bond, my word, my oath; and four thousand years from this time, demand its payment on Calvary; for I will appear in the incarnate form of the Son of God, and be the Lamb slain for the sin of this world. The bond was accepted without hesitation, and the gate opened at once. Mercy entered leaning on the arm of Justice. She spoke kindly to the prisoners, and gave them some hints of her high undertaking in their behalf. All were amazed, and many melted into tears by this timely and tender interference; and to confirm their hopes, Mercy from time to time led the captivity of some captive, that their salvation might be the pledge and prelude of eventual triumphs. Thus the gathering in of the first-fruits in the field of redemption went on for ages; and at last the clock of Prophecy struck the fulness of the time. Then Mercy became incarnate in the person of the Son of God, who appeared in the form of a servant publishing his intention and determination to pay the mighty bond,—and soon the awful day of payment arrived, then the whole army of the judicial attributes of Jehovah took their stand on Calvary,—with Justice at their head, bearing the bond of redemption. Angels, and arch-angels, cherubim, and seraphim, principalities, and powers, left their thrones and mansions of glory, and bent over the battlements of heaven, gazing in mute arrangement and breathless suspension upon the solemn scene; for now the Mediator appeared without the gates of Jerusalem, crowned with thorns, and followed by the weeping Church. As he passed along the awful array of the judicial perfections of the divine character, none of them uttered a word of encouragement—none of them glanced a look of sympathy to him, it was the hour and power of darkness. Above him were all the vials of the divine wrath, and the thunders of the eternal law ready to burst on his devoted head. And around him were all the powers of darkness on the tiptoe of infernal expectation, waiting for the failure. But none of these things moved him from the purpose or spirit of redemption. He took the bond from the hand of Justice, and moved on to the cross as a lamb to the slaughter; he resigned himself to the attack of ignominy. Then Justice unsheathed the flaming sword, and marshalling all his terrors went up to the altar to enforce his claims; the rocks rent under his tread, the sun shrank from the glance of his eye. He lifted his right hand to the eternal throne, and exclaimed in thunder,—Fires of heaven descend and consume this sacrifice: the fires of heaven, animated by the call, with living spirit answered,—We come, we come; and when we have consumed that victim we will burn the universe. They burst, blazed, devoured, until the humanity of Immanuel gave up the ghost, but the moment they touched his divinity they expired. That moment Justice dropped the flaming sword at the foot of the Cross, and joined the prophets in witnessing to the righteousness which is by faith: for all had heard the dying Redeemer exclaim in triumph,—“It is finished.” The weeping Church heard it, and lifting up her voice, cried,—“It is finished.” The attending angels caught the shout of victory, and winged their flight to the eternal throne singing,—“It is finished.” The powers of darkness heard the acclamations of the universe, and hurried away from the scene in all the agony of disappointment and despair; for the bond was paid, and eternal redemption obtained.—EVANS.

Silence under Provocation, a good thing.—“When our hearts are hot within us, it is good for us to keep silence and hold our peace;” so David did, Psalm xxxix. 2, 3, and when he did so, it was in prayer to God, and not in reply to the wicked that were before him. If the heart be angry, angry words will but inflame it more and more, as wheels are heated by rapid motion. One reflection and repartee begets another, and the beginning of the debate, is like the letting forth of water, hardly stopped when the least breach is made in the dam; and, therefore, meekness saith, by all means keep silence, and leave it off before it be meddled with. When a fire is begun, it is good, if possible, to smother it, and so prevent it spreading. Come on, let us deal wisely, and stife it in its birth, lest afterwards it prove too strong to be dealt with. When the spirits are in a ferment, though it may be some present pain to check and suppress them, and the headstrong passions hardly admit the bridle, yet, afterward, it will be no grief of heart to us. Those who find themselves wronged and aggrieved, think they may have leave to speak; but it is better to be silent than speak amiss, and make work for repentance. At such a time, he that holds his tongue, holds his peace; and if we soberly reflect, we shall find we have often been the worse for our speaking, but seldom the worse for our silence. If others be angry at us without cause, and we have ever so much reason on our side, yet oftentimes it is best to adjourn our own vindication, though we think it necessary, till the passion be over; for there is nothing said or done in passion, but it may be better said and done afterwards. A needful truth spoken in a heat, may do more hurt than good, and offend rather than satisfy. The prophet himself forbore even a message from God, when he saw Amaziah in a passion. (2 Chron. xxv. 16.) Sometimes it may be advisable to get some one else to say that for us which is to be said, rather than say it ourselves. However, we have a righteous God to whom (if we do in meek silence suffer ourselves to be run down unjustly,) we may commit our cause, and having his promise, that he will “bring forth our righteousness as the light, and our judgment as the noon-day,” (Psalm xxxvi. 6.) we had better leave it in his hands, than undertake to manage it ourselves, lest that which we call clearing ourselves, God should call quarrelling with our brethren. David was greatly provoked by those that sought his hurt, and spoke malicious things against him, and yet saith he, “I as a deaf man, heard not, I was as a dumb man that opened not his mouth.” Psalm xxxviii. 13. And why so? It was not because he wanted something to say, or because he knew not how to say it, but, verse 15, “In the O Lord, do I hope, thou wilt hear, O Lord my God; and what need I hear, and God hear too? Let not, therefore, those that do well and suffer for it, spoil their own vindication, by mistiming and mismanaging it, but tread in the steps of the Lord Jesus, “who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not, but was as a lamb dumb before the shearers;” “and so committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.” It is indeed a great piece of self-denial, to be silent when we have enough to say, and provocation to say it, but if we do thus control our tongues, out of a pure regard to peace and love, it will turn to a good account, and will be an evidence for us that we are Christ’s disciples, having learned to deny ourselves. It is better by silence to yield to our brother, who is or hath been, or may be our friend, than by angry speaking to yield to the devil, who hath been, and is, and ever will be, our sworn enemy.—MATTHEW HENRY.

Motives to Repentance.—God now commanded all men everywhere to repent. I lay this command across your path. You cannot proceed one step farther in a sinful course without treading it under foot. You are urged to an immediate performance of this duty, by a regard to your own interest, for, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. You are urged to it by all the blessed angels, who are waiting with desire to rejoice in your conversion. Above all, you are most powerfully urged to it by the blessed Redeemer, who you are under the strongest possible obligations to love and obey. He has done and suffered much for you. For you he has toiled, bled, and died; for you he cheerfully endured the scoffs and cruelties of men, the rage and malice of devils, and the overwhelming wrath of his Father’s wrath. In return for all this, he merely requests you to repent and be happy. If you comply with this request, he will see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. O then, be persuaded to give glory to God, to his Son, and to the blessed angels, to meet this day a festival in heaven, by repenting. Even now your heavenly Father is waiting for your return, and the Redeemer stands ready with expanded arms to receive you. Even now the white robes are ready to be provided, and the fattened calf is made ready to feast returning prodigals. Even now angels and archangels are ready to pour forth their most joyful songs to celebrate your return. Will you then, by persisting in impenitence, seal up their lips? Will you say there shall be no joy in heaven this day on our account, God shall not be glorified, Christ shall not be gratified, angels shall not rejoice, if we can prevent it? If there be any, of whose feelings and conduct this is the language, I solemnly, but reluctantly, declare unto you, in the name of Jehovah, that God and his Son shall be glorified, and there shall be joy in heaven over you, notwithstanding all your endeavours to prevent it. Never shall any of his creatures rob God of his glory; and if you will not consent that his grace shall be glorified in your salvation, he will be compelled to glorify his justice, in your everlasting destruction. If you will not allow the inhabitants of heaven to rejoice in your repentance, their love of justice, truth, and holiness, will constrain them to rejoice in your condemnation, and to sing Alleluia! while the smoke of your torment ascendeth up for ever and ever.—PAYSON.

Rules for the government of the conduct.—I desire to know no other business than to please and honour my God, and serve my generation in the short allowance of time that I have here, before I go hence and be seen no more. Shall I commend to you the lesson I am about to learn? It is to be entirely devoted to the Lord, that I may be able to say after the apostle, "to me to live is Christ." That in all my actions, whether sacred or civil, I may be doing but one work, and pursuing one design. My desire is, that God may be pleased by me, and glorified in me, not only by my praying, and preaching, and almsgiving, but even by my eating, drinking, and sleeping, and visits, and discourses; that I may do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving glory to God by him. Too often do I take a wrong aim, and miss my mark; but I will tell you what are the rules I set myself, and strictly impose upon myself, from day to day: Never to lie down, but in the name of God, not barely for natural refreshment, but that a wearied servant of Christ may be recruited and fitted to serve him better the next day; never to rise up, but with this resolution,—well, I will go forth this day in the name of God, and will make my religion my business, and spend the day for eternity; never to enter upon my calling, but first thinking I will do these things as unto God, because he requireth these things at my hands, in the place and station to which he hath appointed me; never to sit down to table, but resolving I will not eat merely to please my appetite, but to strengthen myself for my Master's work; never to make a visit, but upon some holy design, resolving to leave something of God wherever I go. This is that which I have been for some time learning, and hard pressing after, and if I strive not to walk by these rules, let this paper be a witness against me.—REV. J. ALLEINE (in a letter to a friend.)

The Destruction of the First-born.—Could I tell you, with the certainty of a divine commission, that God was this night to pass through the midst of your families, to overwhelm you with such a visitation as he sent on Egypt, that at the dead of night his power was to be felt in every dwelling, laying your first-born in the dust, and saddening every household into the solemnity of a funeral; could I tell you that, with a secrecy which defied all precautions, in a way to which you could offer no resistance, and with a power, before which you would be forced to feel your own nothingness, he was to rob you of your dearest treasure, heedless of all the tender ties and dear domestic sympathies which were then to be torn asunder; could I tell you this with a divine authority, and were you to receive it as divine, I should have a communication to make, to which, I am persuaded, not one member of a family now present could be indifferent, whether he himself were marked out as the destined victim or not, and one which would awaken a sense of instant and pressing danger too importunate to be resisted! And could I tell you at the same time, that by an appointment, assured on the same authority, the life of your children would be spared to you, that there was a way opened for their deliverance, that, whilst you could give nothing sufficiently precious to effect it, God himself had provided a lamb for the ransom,—that its blood had been actually shed, and needed only to be applied for their safety, I am persuaded that I would have a communication to make which would interest every better feeling of your nature, and awaken a desire to participate in its blessings, proportioned to the danger from which it gave you the hope of a sure deliverance! And yet this were fitted to convey a very imperfect idea of the truth which our text declares. The danger under which it supposes you to lie is one far more widely spread, and more fearful in its nature; the deliverance which it announces is one far more precious than even the redemption of your first-born. The reality of the coming woe, and the value of the provided refuge, may be seen in the preciousness of the blood required, in order to avert the one and to insure the other; and we may read at once the reality of our misery, and the reality of our safety, in the declaration, that "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us."—REV. JAMES MARTIN, (Discourses.)

Time is short.—The drowsy careless temper will not last long. Conversion and condemnation are both of them awakening things, and one of them will make you feel ere long.—BAXTER.

Aversion of Man to contemplate a future state.—Let every man judge himself how his natural heart shrinks from the contemplation of a future state of being; how he shudders to look into eternity, as into some dreary and bottomless pit. What a cold and dismal thing does immortality appear; and what a refreshment it is to his spirits to withdraw his thoughts from the consideration, and return to his beloved earth! And then, only observe with what eagerness and desperation he gives up soul and body to the pursuit of things which he knows full well will soon be to him as if they had never been. And yet, this man, if you were to ask him the question, would tell you that he expected to live for ever; and that, when his body was mouldering in the dust, from which it was taken, his soul would plunge into an ocean of spirits, without bottom and without shore. This, he would tell you gravely, as a matter of course, and then only observe him for one week, or for one day, or for this day, which has been sanctified to immortal purposes, and you will find his cares, his hopes, his fears, his wishes, his affections, busied and bustling about this little span of earth, and this little measure of time which he occupies; and death finds this immortal being making playthings of sand, and carries him away from them all, into a land where they shall all be forgotten. This is a strange and astonishing contradiction,—the only thing that looks like a blunder through all the works of nature. Every thing else seems to know its appointed time, and its appointed place; the sun knows his place in the heavens, he does his duty in the firmament, and brings round the seasons in their order; and the ocean knows the boundaries beyond which it must not dare to pass; every animal knows the home that kind nature has provided; "the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." Among all the creatures that surround us, we are the only beings that look not to our native home; the only beings that seem to have broken the laws of nature; to have forgotten our Owner, and the mansions of our Father's house.—Wolfe's Remains.

It is better to go to heaven poorly, than it is to go to hell richly.—DYRA.

THE DEATH OF THE SCEPTIC AND CHRISTIAN.

—How will the sceptic brave the hour
Of death's divine, inexorable power,
When all this fairy world shall glide away,
Like midnight dreams before the morning ray?
See! how he shudders at the thought of death;
What doubt and horror hang upon his breath;
The gibb'ring teeth, glaz'd eye, and marble limb,— Shades from the tomb stalk out, and stare on him!

Lo! there, in yonder fancy-haunted room,
What mutter'd curses trembled through the gloom,
When pale, and shiv'ring, and bedew'd with fear,
The dying sceptic felt his hour drew near;
From his parch'd tongue no sainted murmurs fell,
No bright hopes kindled at his faint farewell;
As the last throes of death convuls'd his cheek,
He gnash'd and scowl'd, and raised a hideous shriek;
Rounded his eyes into a ghastly glare;
Lock'd his white lips—and all was mute despair!

Go, child of darkness, see a Christian die,
No horror pales his lip, or rolls his eye;
No dreadful doubts, or dreamy terrors, start
The hope Religion pillows on his heart.
When with a dying hand he waves adieu
To all who love so well, and weep so true:
Meek, as an infant to the mother's breast
Turns fondly longing for its wonted rest,
He pants for where congenial spirits stray,
Turns to his God, and sighs his soul away.

JOY IN HEAVEN OVER THE PENITENT.

THERE'S joy in heaven when falls the tear
The mourning sinner sheds;
And angels hope, when mortal fear,
In lowliest meekness treads:
The path of trial Jesus trod,
To lead the sinner back to God.

Whose strength, the Spirit—hope, the cross,
And heaven his ceaseless prayer;
To whom all gain is counted loss,
Which may not enter there:
His treasure is laid up above—
His Saviour's unexhausted love.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Neglect no opportunity of doing good.—At the annual meeting of the Religious Tract Society, in 1832, the Rev. W. W. Robinson, A.M. of Rochford, stated, that in going a few miles from his own parish, to officiate for a brother, he took some tracts in the chaise, and his companion distributed them as he went along; passing a baptist chapel, and seeing a number of persons entering it, he did not think it necessary to give them any tracts, as he considered they where accustomed to hear the sound of the Gospel: but his companion observed that it could do them no harm, a sentiment in which he agreed, and some were given away. A day or two afterwards, the minister of the place sent word that one of his hearers, a married woman, who had received one of these tracts, had been a member of the Church, but her husband persecuted her, and would not allow her to have her dinner whenever she went to chapel, which privation she readily submitted to, so that she might enjoy the privilege of attending the worship of God. On the day in question she went home, and was treated in the usual way: the tract which she had received she invited her husband to look at: he did so, and in the course of a few minutes burst into tears, and told her she might have her dinner. After reading the tract through, he asked her if she would go to chapel again in the evening, to which she answered in the affirmative, on which he insisted on going with her; and on the following Tuesday he was found at the prayer-meeting. Thus he was first arrested by a tract, and subsequently became converted to God.

An African Slave.—The first time the Rev. John Campbell went to Africa, visiting a meeting of slaves, and observing one among them who was particularly attentive, he was induced to make some inquiries respecting him. He was informed that this man had long been an eminent Christian; and that formerly he had endured much opposition from his employer on account of his religion. One day his master assured him, that if he went to hear the missionary preach, he would flog him. The poor slave, with simplicity and Christian meekness, replied, "I must tell the Lord that." The saying so wrought on the mind of his master, that he not only permitted him to go, but his other slaves with him; and after a while, he and his wife were found there also.

Effect of Early Piety.—Children, says the Rev. W. Jay, have conveyed religion to those from whom they ought to have derived it. "Well," said a mother one day weeping, her daughter being about to make a public profession of religion by going to the Lord's table, "I will resist no longer. How can I bear to see my dear child love and read the Scriptures, while I never look into the Bible,—to see her retire and seek God, while I never pray,—to see her going to the Lord's table, while his death is nothing to me? Ah," said she, to the minister who called to inform her of her daughter's intention, wiping her eyes, "Yes, Sir, I know she is right, and I am wrong,—I have seen her firm under reproach, and patient under provocation, and cheerful in all her sufferings. When, in her late illness, she was looking for dissolution, heaven stood in her face. O that I was as fit to die! I ought to have taught her, but I am sure she has taught me. How can I bear to see her joining the Church of God, and leaving me behind—perhaps for ever?" From that hour she prayed in earnest, that the God of her child would be her God, and was soon seen walking with her in the way everlasting. Is this mere supposition? More than one eye, in reading this allusion, will drop a testimony to the truth of it. "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." May God bless us, and make us blessings.

Effect of Consistency.—Mr Innes, in his work on Domestic Religion, mentions a fact strikingly illustrative of the power of consistent conduct. A young man, when about to be ordained as a Christian minister, stated, that at one period of his life he had been nearly betrayed into the principles of infidelity; "But," he added, "there was one argument in favour of Christianity which I could never refute,—the consistent conduct of my own father!"

BY THE REV. JOSEPH THORBURN,

THESE are few, who are walking in the fear of God, who have not reflected—perhaps compelled by painful experience—on the influence of society upon their minds. It is seldom, however, that we find Christians giving sufficient importance to the works which they peruse. Yet, whether we look to facts, or to the fitness of literature to exert a power on the mind, that influence must be allowed to be very great. At the present time, this instrument of good and evil requires to be carefully watched, as every mind is liable to be more or less affected by it. Where men cannot purchase books, there are many who are ready to give or to lend. A man is judged of by his company,—his associates. Do his books form no criterion? When you are ushered into the room of a stranger, for the first time, and see on the elegant commode, or the humble book-shelf, an array of authors, does not the hasty glance, which you cannot help casting over the books before you, affix in your mind a certain moral and intellectual character to the person whom you have not yet met, and with whose tastes and pursuits you were hitherto unacquainted? On conversing with the individual, it is every way likely that you will find you have been, upon the whole, correct in your judgment. Do you find the man of pleasure invite the serious Christian to his table, and to the unreserved intercourse of social life? No; and why, but because the conversation of such a man would cast a gloom upon those subjects of thought, those forbidden themes in which he delights to indulge. The very presence of a godly man would itself spoil his entertainment. It is for a similar reason that those who are careless about their best interests, will gather around them such books as tend to establish them in the principles they hold, and afford gratification to their minds.

When any one has been led by the Spirit to hearken to the voice of God, almost the first change which catches the eye of observers is that of his friends and associates. He has connected himself with a different class of persons, with those who are seeking a resting-place on high, at least who appear to him to have this object in view. Many know what it costs to separate ourselves from those whom we have long called our friends, but there is also a sacrifice to be made to conscience and to duty among our companions of the book-shelf, which is not without suffering. The test of divine truth is applied to them, and it is only when they harmonize with this, that those even which are endeared to us, by many interesting associations, are allowed to remain. Of those persons who were converted by the instrumentality of Paul's preaching at Ephesus, it is recorded that "Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver." What is eloquence, or taste, or pathos, or intellectual vigour to the believer, if they hinder, nay, if they do not tend to promote that complete change of his moral being, after which he aspires, and which his gradual sanctification causes him to hope he aspires not after in vain? It is interesting to see the young Christian, at such a time, estimating the value of the loftiest minds, and to reflect that his mode of computation is according to the standard of heaven; he uses a balance, so to speak, borrowed from the pattern of that which is deposited in the upper sanctuary. Books, therefore, may be viewed, in some measure, as friends and companions, rising or falling in our esteem and affection, not, however, according to their changes, but our own. But there is even more reason that we should be put on our guard as to the character of books, than of mankind, before we yield up our minds to their influence. A man of dangerous principles carries their refutation, and a warning against their adoption, in his life and conduct. He enunciates his principles,—they seem plausible,—but see him act, and their unsoundness is at once apparent. Only let the principles of an author be ingeniously stated, strong expressions of the excellence of his views set forth, and protestations of candour and virtuous intention on the part of him who recommends them, and, however dangerous his doctrines may be, it is every way likely that they will exert a certain amount of influence in the way of evil upon the reader. There is something, too, in the manner in which books address us, which makes them more readily received and listened to than individuals. They address themselves to classes, and are therefore exempt from the invidiousness of personality. There is no assumption of superiority. They flatter our pride by calling upon us to judge them, and do not offer to judge us. Hence, while argument seldom ends without irritation, reading is a soothing employment. Error makes its way undisputed, for this very reason, that those powers of the mind, whose peculiar province it is to watch for, and to resist it, are not in active exercise. Stone after stone is laid, and a structure is raised without the sound of the hammer being heard. The moral is, to watch books as you watch men, or rather with more carefulness, as the danger is greater.

It is desirable, in our intercourse with our fellow-men, that we should have good ground for believing that those with whom we associate are deeply convinced of the importance of living to God. Without this preliminary point being settled, there will be continual jarring of views and difference of tastes, not on minor, but on the most important and fundamental questions. And what is more, we shall be exposed, unconsciously, to be drawn away from the principles and practices we have been wont to prize, that is, if we have any love or respect for their persons or judgments. And, for the same reason, is it not equally necessary for our moral well-being, that we shall be well assured before we yield ourselves to the influence of an author, that we are listening to one who is thoroughly convinced of the truth of the great doctrines of the Gospel, beside which, every other subject, in the eye of enlightened reason, must be viewed as insignificant? If the importance of this be denied, true consistency should make us also argue, that there is no call upon us to scrutinize the principles of those with whom we mingle in society, that our intercourse may not be injurious.

It is admitted that some, in order that they may be acquainted with the present state of society, and make advancement in knowledge connected with their particular calling, require to consult books which offer no pretensions to be under the influence of Christian principle. To shut ourselves out entirely from such literature would bring us to the alternative of which the apostle speaks, in reference to those who would decline all intercourse with unbelievers, "we must needs go out of the world." Yet, with this admission, it can scarcely be disputed, that generally, even among serious Christians, there is more dedication to literature uninfluenced by a Christian spirit, than is necessary for performing their part in life intelligently. To render such reading safe at all, it will become us to bear upon our mind, that it has a tendency to secularise; and to diminish, in the eyes of the Christian, what ought to be an abiding conviction,—the supreme importance of divine things; and where an author has failed to connect facts in nature or in providence with God, it will lie with us to supply the deficiency. In this way alone can Christians be safe in perusing books not of a religious character. Some have found the influence of such works so prejudicial, so apt to blunt the sensibility of religious feeling, that they have abandoned all literature that was not strictly Christian.

In his communications with his fellow-men, how often is the Christian compelled to cease from making even the best he meets, his pattern in all things; for God, in his wisdom, has left some marks of imperfection, some remains of a sinful nature upon all, which death only will remove; and how often then does he turn to Him, in whom dwelleth all wisdom! Words are the representatives of conceptions, and human conceptions are more conversant with finite imperfection than with infinite excellence; and we imperceptibly, and often without being able to help it, make heavenly things nothing more than an enlargement of earthly things.

How great a matter of thankfulness, then, that God, in mercy, has given us, for our daily and prayerful perusal, A BOOK, wherein is set forth the perfect exhibition of his own wisdom, and power, and holiness,—having no error intermingled,—able, through his blessing, to make us wise unto salvation,—transforming every soul, which yields itself to its influence, into a likeness to God himself,—which tells the earth's eventful history,—which discourses of angels, and which records the transactions of heaven,—even HIS OWN WORD. To its guidance let us commit ourselves without hesitation; and the more we are imbued with its spirit, the more meet will we become for a higher and more blessed state of being.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF CAROLINE ELIZABETH SMELT.

EARLY piety is peculiarly engaging, lending, as it does, a lustre, a beauty, and a grace, to the character of the young. And in no instance could the truth of this remark be more strikingly exemplified than in the amiable and accomplished young lady whose life we are about to sketch. Her career was short, but it was long enough to exhibit the brightest and most beautiful traits of the mature Christian. She lived in faith, and died in the joyful hope of a glorious immortality.

Miss Caroline Elizabeth Smelt was born in the city of Augusta, in the State of Georgia, North America, on the 28th December 1800. Her parents were of the highest respectability, and affluent in worldly circumstances. Dr Smelt, her father, was a practising physician of considerable eminence in Augusta, and having realized an independent fortune, he retired from active business to spend the remainder of his days in the bosom of his family. Caroline was much beloved by her parents, and, in very early life, began to exhibit marks of intelligence beyond her years. Her dispositions, too, were remarkably tender and winning. At the age of four she was sent to school, where she made the most satisfactory progress. As soon as she could read she took a peculiar delight in the employment, and shewed a ready understanding of what she read.

When Caroline was in her eighth year, her little heart was grieved by the death of a sister only three years younger than herself. The afflictive dispensation produced a deep impression upon her mind, and from that period she was accustomed to date her first serious thoughts of religion. She was observed now to lend greater attention to the instructions which her parents sedulously endeavoured to impart, and when her mother, as was frequently her practice, invited her to retire along with her for private prayer, Caroline evinced a readiness to engage in the exercise which was remarkably pleasing. In the beauties of nature she felt an inexpressible enjoyment. She was an enthusiastic lover of flowers, both on account of their beauty, and as bearing the stamp of the divine perfections. In the acquisition of knowledge she spent much of her time, so that before she had reached her sixteenth year, though her bodily constitution was weak, her mind was stored with much valuable information.

The time had now arrived when Caroline, having completed her education, was about to be ushered into society. This was, of course, a season of much anxiety to her affectionate mother, who was naturally afraid lest the allurements of a vain and fascinating world should prove injurious to the spiritual interests of her dear child. Resorting, therefore, to a throne of grace, Mrs Smelt prayed earnestly that Caroline's tender mind might be kept in the fear of God. And her prayers were heard. Caroline took no delight in fashionable parties; her chief enjoyment was found at home amid the peaceful comforts of domestic life. Though cheerful, she seemed to have a peculiar relish for retirement, and her mind seemed to be more than ever occupied with the great objects which concern an immortal being. Her mother often tried to lead her into conversation on matters of religion, but whenever reference was made to her own experience, Caroline would invariably weep, without giving her kind and anxious parent any definite information upon the subject.

In the course of the winter of 1815, Caroline engaged in a Scripture class, composed of young ladies, for improvement in their knowledge of divine truth. About this time Mrs Smelt felt more than usually anxious about the eternal interests of her dear child, and frequently retired with her to secret prayer. She was apprehensive that the naturally delicate frame of Caroline would, ere long, yield, and to many of her friends she expressed a fear that she would soon lose her. "I fear that the worm," she said, on one occasion, "is already at the root of my gourd; I feel an awful presentiment that my Caroline will descend to an early tomb." A feeling of this kind led her mother to be doubly solicitous about her spiritual condition. Caroline, however, still preserved the same invariable reserve, in reference to her own personal experience. At length, when her mother urged her, on one occasion, to be more communicative on a point so important, she replied, "My dear mamma, I have no confidence in myself; I hope to do that which is right when I shall have more experience. I desire to belong to the little flock, but I am too unstable."

Some time after this interview Mrs Smelt was seized with a severe attack of fever, in consequence of waiting by the bed-side of an orphan child, who had died of fever in their neighbourhood. Caroline paid her mother the most devoted attention during her illness, and she could scarcely be prevailed upon to quit her bed-side. A conversation which took place between them we extract from the published memoir.

"Mrs Smelt, although her symptoms were favourable, yet felt great depression of spirits. Caroline perceived it, and tried every way to comfort her. She would say, 'My dear mamma, you will get well; I feel a happy assurance that you will recover.' To this Mrs Smelt replied, 'You may be mistaken, and you are one of my greatest causes of distress.' 'Why so, my dear mamma!' said Caroline. 'Because,' said Mrs Smelt, 'I have never discharged my duty as a responsible mother, in the way in which I ought to have done it; and I fear that at the bar of God I shall be found awfully delinquent; I have not been as much engaged for your eternal welfare as for the perishing things of time. And now, should I be removed, how soon may you forget the feeble instructions I have given you! whereas had I been more zealously engaged in pointing out to you the way that leads to eternal happiness, I might have hoped that the Lord would not only acquit me, but take you under his special care in this life, and in his own good time receive you to himself.'

"Caroline then burst into tears, drew near to her mother, and with great feeling said, 'My dear mamma, you will stand acquitted. What could you have done that you have not done, to bring me to Christ? If I have been inflexible, that is not your fault. I am truly distressed to think I should occasion you one uneasy moment. I desire to comfort you. Oh! tell me not that you feel any condemnation on my account; indeed you are clear of my blood; and I hope you will live to see all you so earnestly desire. I am not so graceless, perhaps, as you may suppose. The Lord has been striving with me for many years, and I have not been entirely thoughtless. No, indeed; for I have long wished for an interest in the great atonement. I have long desired to become one of the little flock; but I feared I was too inexperienced, too ignorant, too unstable, and too unworthy, to make a public profession of my faith in Christ. O mamma! I have long wished to tell you what was passing in my heart; but I feared to excite hopes in your affectionate breast which might never be realized, and the greater condemnation would be my portion. But I have now come to a decided stand. It may give you some comfort to hear some of my late exercises. I feel as if I could no longer keep them a secret from you. I ought to have told you them before, and you would have strengthened me. I felt this the other night, when I thought I should lose you; and I then determined, that if the Lord spared your life, you should know all. Oh! I see in the hour of sore distress, that all created comforts are but broken reeds; that if we have not God for our friend, 'vain is the help of man.' This I realized in the night when you were taken sick. It was the first time I ever tasted the bitterness of real sorrow. I had been that afternoon and evening much exercised, at the dying bed of our little friend. I never had such feelings all my life; I viewed with horror the change in her countenance—I saw her struggles—the sight was more than I could bear: I said, is this death? He is indeed the king of terrors. I was about to hasten home. I stopped a little longer; I thought I would summon fortitude to stay and see the end—a convulsion came on—I was exceedingly alarmed—I thought I must retire; but in an instant it occurred to me, that I too would have to die; and if every one who might be around my dying couch, should act towards me as I was about to do towards her, not one would have firmness enough to see my end; and how should I feel, to be deserted at such an awful moment? I prayed for strength to enable me to stay and be useful, and that the whole scene might be sanctified to my soul. I felt more composed, and strove to do some acts of kindness to the poor little girl. I tried to fan her, and to wipe the cold drops from her face; but my nerves were too feeble, and my agitation too great to do anything. I sat down and meditated on what was passing. I felt concerned for the soul of the child. She had entered on her fourteenth year—I thought her at an accountable age. She had been brought up in Christian principles; but during her tedious illness, had not uttered one pious expression, one holy desire, but had manifested great alarm at the idea of death; and until deprived of speech, had expressed strong hopes, or a firm belief, that she should recover. I felt deep regret that this was the case with too many that were older than she. I then asked myself this question, Had you been called to such a bed as this, would you have been ready or willing to go? The answer was, No. I felt at that moment as if death were armed with ten thousand terrors. Oh! how fervently did I desire that the Lord would not call me till I was made fit for his acceptance. I wanted to feel that love casteth out fear; but I was tempest-tossed, and could realize nothing that was comfortable. I returned home melancholy and oppressed, and found you had retired to bed with a high fever. My heart was overwhelmed with apprehensions for your life, and for my own soul. I could not conceal my distress. Papa thought I would alarm you, and insisted on my going to bed. I was compelled to retire, but sleep I could not. When I entered my room, I prostrated myself at the footstool of mercy. Oh! how I entreated the Lord to spare your precious life, and to seal me his own for ever. I felt as if no power on earth could relieve me. Some such reflections as these then passed through my mind:—You see now what a vain bauble this world is. What a change have a few hours made in your feelings! and a few more may produce still greater. You may lose your mother, and what will become of you then? who will guide your erring footsteps? who will give you sweet counsel? who will soothe and comfort you in the hour of sickness, as she has done? with a bursting heart, I answered, No one. My agitation increased violently,—I could not lay my troubles before you. I was alone, and, for the first time in my life, I felt deserted. The fear that I should lose you was uppermost. I saw that I deserved chastisement, and felt the frowns of Providence which I had deserved. At this moment I thought I heard you groan—I could no longer keep from you—I ran down stairs, and entreated papa to let me remain with you. He kindly consented; and the residue of the night was spent in prayer to God, and serious reflections; for I could not sleep. I sometime thought I would give worlds, if I possessed them, to know that the Lord was my friend. I clearly saw that no power but his could deliver me, and that it was vain to expect relief from any other quarter. I felt as if the world would contain nothing that could afford me any consolation, if you were removed; and particularly, I should never forgive myself for not having improved, as I ought, the many lessons of useful instruction you have given me.”

This was the first free, unrestrained communication of her religious views and feelings, which Caroline had made to her mother, and from that hour she conversed readily on experimental religion. Mrs Smelt's recovery was rapid, and Caroline felt grateful to the Almighty in having prolonged the life of so valuable a parent. The days, however, of the amiable Caroline herself were fast drawing to a close. On the morning of the 28th of August 1816, little more than a fortnight after she had been so alarmed on account of her mother's illness, she was seized with a violent and dangerous fever. The disease advanced with singular rapidity, and her parents began to dread the worst. Mrs Smelt was frequently engaged in prayer for the dear child, not so much for her recovery, as for the salvation of her soul. A few passages from the dying experience of this interesting young woman will no doubt be acceptable to our readers:—

“In the course of the day, Mrs Smelt said to her, ‘My dear Caroline, you are now on the bed of affliction; I hope you do not neglect to call upon the Lord.’ She replied, ‘Oh! mamma, do you think I could neglect so important a duty?’

“In the afternoon, some friends called to see her. She did not converse much, but was to appearance entirely calm. When they were about to leave the house, Mrs Smelt accompanied them to the door. Having felt an unusual degree of peace and comfort all that day, she detained one of the ladies for a few moments, to converse about Caroline's case, and her own views of the subject. They had not stood long, before she was informed by a servant, that her daughter wanted her. She hastened to her; and as she approached her bedside, Caroline addressed her in these words: ‘My dear mamma! I do not want you to leave me at all; you are such a rich blessing to me, that I wish you constantly in view.’

“Mrs Smelt then sat down, and was requested by her to read a portion of Scripture; which was done. She then said, ‘My dear mamma, I have been much disturbed in mind to-day; but I felt reluctant to oppress you with more trouble than you have already, and therefore forebore telling you. But I cannot conceal it any longer.’ Her mother then invited her to tell her all. She said, ‘that she had all day been disturbed by this passage of Scripture, “The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved.” It is continually in my mind, and fills me with dreadful apprehensions.’ Mrs Smelt then observed, ‘if that passage gives my darling distress, let your mother direct you to a few of the precious promises: “Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.” Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.’ She said she felt oppressed with a sense of sin. Her mother then repeated, ‘Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.’

“Mrs Smelt observing her to be much agitated at that time, was enabled, with great energy, to say to her, ‘My beloved daughter, the Lord says, “Turn ye to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee.” This promise is sent to you, my child, as certainly as it was sent to me many years ago.’ She replied, ‘Do you indeed think so, my mother?’ Her mother assured her that it was her belief. She then requested her mother to pray with her. A female friend being present, they kneeled by her bedside, and addressed the throne of grace in her behalf. The necessity of exercising a lively faith in the merits of a Redeemer was then strongly urged upon her. She said she wanted to feel that she had an interest in Christ—that she feared she had never been regenerated; repeating, ‘Except a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.’ ‘O that I could know that I had passed through the new birth!’ Her mother begged her to look to the compassionate Saviour, and be comforted.”

The resignation and calm serenity which Caroline evinced during her illness, were truly remarkable. She was not only resigned to the will of God, but spent much of her time in consoling her afflicted parents, adducing such arguments, and such passages of Scripture, as she considered suitable to their situation. Thus, on the 8th of September, we find the following description given of her frame of mind:—

"Several dear friends sat up with her that night. A little before midnight she became silent; and it was hoped that she had fallen asleep. She lay very quiet for some time—perhaps an hour. She then spoke, and asked for her mother. Mrs Smelt was sitting by her; but the room had been somewhat darkened to favour sleep, and she did not at first distinguish her from her other friends.

"She then said, 'My beloved mother, I have been praying that your faith may be strengthened, and that the Lord would comfort you and my dear father. Her mother then embraced her, and desired her to try, if possible, to get a little sleep. To this request Caroline readily yielded obedience; and lay for a considerable time as if asleep. She then spoke audibly, and said, 'Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, passed through the fiery furnace, and not a hair of their heads was singed; for they loved God, and he was with them. I love him also, and he is with me. Oh! my mother, the fever is high; but the Lord will sustain me, and will bring me through like gold tried and purified. He has been very gracious to me to-night. I calculated on a very painful one; but I said nothing, knowing that my heavenly Father would not inflict one unnecessary pain, but would order all things well. Notwithstanding my faith was strong, I felt my feeble nature shrink from the idea of fresh blisters to my body, and cataplasms to my feet. And when my medical friends suggested the necessity of their immediate application, I made no resistance; for I had resolved, when I was first taken sick, to be a submissive patient, if the Lord would strengthen me to improve the visitation to his honour. I knew that my dear father and mother would be much distressed,—that they would feel anxious that every effort should be made for my relief. How unkind! how undutiful, then, would it appear in me, to disappoint their wishes, and increase their anxiety, by refusing to use the appointed means! But when I heard the plan for the night, my heart sunk within me. In a few moments, I was enabled to raise my soul in prayer to my heavenly Father. I petitioned for grace, divine grace, to sustain me. I immediately had such a view of my Redeemer's sufferings, that I felt willing, yea happy, to submit to any pain. When the blisters began to draw, I felt the anguish most sensibly. I raised my heart again in prayer; and in a very short time was enabled to say, with great sincerity, Not my will, O heavenly Parent, but thine be done. I soon felt not only comfortable, but such a sweet composure of mind,—so heavenly, so entirely peaceful, that I fell into a delightful sleep. When I awoke, I found those precious lines of Dr Watts present to my memory:—

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are;
While on his breast I lean my head,
And breathe my life out sweetly there."

The next morning she spoke as if she felt that death was at hand. She admonished her friends who came to visit her, to strive above all things after an interest in the Redeemer; and upon her mother she enforced that holy submission to the divine will, by which we most effectually glorify God. An entire and unreserved acquiescence in all the dispensations of Providence, Caroline knew to be the privilege, no less than the duty, of the true Christian. And while, therefore, she manifested in her own department, a readiness to say in all things, "Thy will be done," she felt that her beloved parents were about to endure a trial in which faith and patience were peculiarly requisite:—

"With a countenance beaming with divine love, and a voice most harmonious, she said to her mother, 'O my beloved mother! weep not for me. My sufferings will soon terminate. Blessed be God! who hath not turned away my prayer from him, nor his mercy from me. Through the blood of the cross, death is disarmed of all his terrors; the grave, to which I am hastening, is deprived of all victory. Oh, the boundless goodness of God! thus to support a frail worm of the dust: What is man, that he should be mindful of him? or the son of man, that he should visit him? I am going to that happy land, so finely described by Dr Watts;' repeating the following lines with great emphasis:—

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign:
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers:
Death, like a narrow sea, divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dress'd in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood, While Jordan roll'd between."

"She did not finish the hymn, but addressed some young friends who had just entered the room:—'You see before you,' said she, 'a young, timid, delicate female, not seventeen years old—the only child of my beloved parents—surrounded with all the comforts of life—nurtured with peculiar tenderness, in the bosom of parental affection, from my earliest infancy, and always sheltered from the rude blasts of misfortune—blessed with the friendship of an extensive acquaintance, and beloved by all my dear relations. I could add many other considerations calculated to attach me to this world; but I can say, with holy joy, farewell to all! yea, I desire to depart, and be with Christ, which is far better. I am going to my Redeemer's kingdom; his arms are open to receive me. O! the incalculable benefits resulting from the religion of Jesus, the once crucified, but now gloriously exalted Son of God. What but this, my friends, could sustain me in this trying hour? My sensibility is not blunted. My heart was formed for sympathy and the sweets of friendship. I am sensible of the sorrow which my departure will occasion in the breasts of those whom I tenderly love; but I commit them to the care of One who is able to console them, and who will, I trust, prepare them to join me in the regions of eternal glory, where we shall part no more. O! my dear young friends, allow me to entreat you to embrace this religion. To a bed of death you will all have to come; and at the bar of judgment you will have to give an account of all the deeds done by you in this world; and if the Saviour is not then your friend, I tremble to think of your fate. O! close with the offers of mercy. Now is the accepted time; to-day is the day of salvation. When I am gone, will you ever think of me? Will you strive to remember the displays of God's mercy to me? and, will you endeavour to obtain his favour also, that you may finish your course, as I hope to finish mine, rejoicing in redeeming love, comforted and sustained against every fear? I feel peace in my heart, and joy unspeakable and full of glory."

"After being some time silent, she said to Mrs Smelt, 'My mother, let me see you put on the Christian's beautiful robe—holy submission. You will not be left alone, for the Lord is your friend, and he can be more to you than ten sons and daughters. Your case is by no means a new one. Recollect the trials of the mother of our blessed Redeemer. She was called upon to give up her only child—she did so. He died a most cruel and ignominious death. He had none of the temporal comforts which I enjoy,—no friends to soothe his sorrows,—no bed on which to rest his weary limbs,—no kind attendants to administer a cooling draught to quench a parching thirst; no, he had to drink vinegar and gall. His blessed mother was not allowed to sit by him, as you sit by me, and receive divine comfort from his sacred lips. O my dear mother I think of these things, and believe yourself blessed. Let your faith rise in lively exercise, to the sufferings of the Son of God. View him in the garden; go with him to Pilate. See his patient meekness! Like a lamb dumb before his shearers, so he opened not his mouth. He suffered, the just for the unjust, and by his stripes I am healed. He died that we might live. He bore our sins in his own body. He was God over all, blessed for ever, and yet he submitted to the death of the cross, that a perishing world might be saved. When I take a view of his compassionate mercy to rebellious sinners, I am lost in wonder. When I see his sacred temples perforated, and encircled with a crown of thorns, I am ready to cry out, And did my Saviour suffer thus? for whom and for what was he thus afflicted and scourged? In a moment, I answer, For me—poor unworthy me; and not only for sinful me, but for you, my mother, and for as many as will believe in his all-sufficient atonement. When, with the eye of faith, I see my immaculate Saviour extended on the cross, my heart dissolves with tenderness and gratitude. I feel humble and submissive—ready and willing to suffer anything; yea, feel happy in being thought worthy to suffer, for you know, whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

To her young friends she spoke with the utmost freedom, calling upon them to seek the Lord early, and they would assuredly find him. On the subject of worldly amusement she thus expressed herself:—

"Let no person, endowed with rational powers, call them innocent or harmless. How can that be innocent, which leads to a prodigal waste of precious time? How can that thing be called harmless, which leads to an unnecessary exposure of health? How can that amusement be innocent, which has not the glory of God for its object? How can that amusement be harmless, which has a direct tendency to unfit the mind for devotional exercises? We are such frail creatures that we constantly require some excitement to lead us to God, and not to estrange us from him. Will any venture to say, that they have been brought to love the Lord Jesus better, by having attended a theatre or a ball-room? I presume not. I can say, from my own experience, that I never derived solid improvement, or real pleasure, from either. From neither of them have I ever derived anything which could afford my mind the least satisfaction in hours devoted to self-examination, nor anything to strengthen the soul against the terrors of death and judgment. I consider them worse than vanity—they are exceedingly sinful."

For a time she appeared to rally, and hopes of her recovery were entertained. But these, alas! were fallacious and delusive. She felt that, ere long, she would be called to cross the Jordan of death. Her last farewell to her flowers and little garden is peculiarly beautiful and affecting.

"It was near sunset, and a most beautiful evening. As soon as she saw her flowering shrubs, (several of which were loaded with rich flowers,) she broke forth in the most exalted strains of admiration, and adoring ejaculations, to the Great Architect of the universe. She commented sweetly on the particular time of the evening;—it was admirably adapted to sacred contemplation;—then on the serenity of the azure vault of heaven; then on a floating white cloud, and remarked the harmony which subsisted, and was apparent, in all the works of God. She then asked, 'Why do frail mortals seek pleasure in noisy, tumultuous amusements, when such an ample volume lies open to their view?' She then took leave of a favourite shrub, saying, 'Farewell, my innocent friend; your fragrant blossoms have often regaled my senses, while my thoughts have ascended to Him that made both you and me. I have often plucked your flowers, and ran with delight to present them to my mother; but other hands will now gather your blossoms. Farewell, my tree; I long to be in the garden above."

'The finest flower that ever blow'd
Open'd on Calvary's tree,
When Jesus' blood in rivers flow'd,
For love of worthless me.

Its deepest hue, its sweetest smell,
No mortal can declare;
Nor can the tongue of angels tell
How bright the colours are.

But soon, on yonder banks above,
Shall every blossom here
Appear a full-blown flower of love,
Like him, transplanted there."

"Her countenance beamed with radiance, when she said, 'Farewell, garden, delightful spot for innocent amusement! My infant feet have often trod your walks;' and smiling when she repeated, 'they will never walk them again.' She then listened, with apparent rapture, to the notes of a little bird, that was perched on a tree near her window, until her soul seemed transported to heaven. She soon afterwards desired her mother to bring the Bible to her, and read the 121st Psalm, the whole of which she was enabled to apply to herself. Mrs Smelt then read to her some passages in Isaiah. Caroline exclaimed, 'It is the word of God; I feel it in my very soul. Isaiah is a divine prophet; he is my prophet!'

"A friend entered soon afterwards, to whom Caroline said, 'My dear aunt, I have taken leave of the garden this evening, and have felt so happy, so entirely filled with divine love, that my room has appeared like a little Bethel, or the gate of heaven.' She then desired her mother to read to her aunt the same psalm over again, saying, 'Every word of that psalm is applicable to me, for the Lord has preserved, and will keep me to the end, even for ever and ever.' She then repeated to her friend many of the sentiments which she had just before uttered to her mother, on the subject of the garden. After which she said, she had never before seen nature dressed in so beautiful a robe, that a peculiar brightness or lustre appeared to rest upon every flower, and upon every leaf—that the whole sky, and even the little cloud, seemed to bear a strong impress of her Maker's glory, and concluded with the following beautiful lines:—

'The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim."

The closing scene was calm and peaceful. She had earnestly prayed that her dear parents might be spared the anguish of witnessing, in her case, the agonies of death. And her prayer was remarkably fulfilled.

"Her father, during the remission of his fever, was enabled to visit her chamber, in company with her mother, during the time of her sleep, which immediately preceded her decease. They saw that it was the sleep of death; for to their repeated calls she made no answer. Once, and only once, when standing by her bed side, they united their voices in calling 'Caroline, oh Caroline! our beloved daughter, shall we never more hear the sound of your harmonious voice? It is your father and mother that thus call you.' She made an effort to open her eyes, and to move her lips to speak, but could not. However, she was enabled to smile. She lay like one reposing in health, perfectly calm. They impressed a kiss of affection on her lips, repeating, 'It is your father—it is your mother.' She made no signal of sensibility except another smile. Mrs Smelt repeated her visits again and again to her, before she departed. She viewed her dying daughter with a solemn pleasure, and found herself frequently breathing, 'O may my last end be like her's!' The fervent prayers of two friends, who called in a little before she fell asleep in Jesus, contributed much to her comfort. She felt indeed that the cup which she had to drink was bitter; but she was enabled to say, with submission, 'Not my will, but thine, O God, be done.'

Thus died, in her seventeenth year, the excellent and devotedly pious Caroline Elizabeth Smelt. And how earnestly ought we to pray, on perusing such a narrative as this, that we also may be privileged to "die the death of the righteous." Such a wish and prayer, however, is often breathed without any sincere desire to live in faith that we may die in peace. Holy living is the grand preparative for holy dying, and to expect that we shall attain the latter, without a habitual anxiety to cultivate the former, is to entertain a delusion fostered by the great enemy of souls, for the accomplishment of our spiritual and everlasting ruin.

THE COUNTRY OF THE CHALDEES.

CHALDEA OR CHASDIM, like demons, like plunderers, like beasts, or like fields, is a name often used synonymously with Babylonia, and applied to the Plain of Shinar; but the country of Chaldea in its limited extent lay south of Babylonia. Its right name is not Chaldea, as it was called by the Greeks and Romans and is translated in our Bibles, but Chasdia and Chusdia, as it is written in the Hebrew text; and the inhabitants were termed Chasdim and Chusdim, or the children of Chush, the son of Ham and grandson of Noah. Various opinions, however, have been maintained by the learned respecting the origin of the Chaldeans. Michaelis considers them to have been a foreign race in Assyria, and is inclined to derive them from the Chalybes of the Greek geographers, who are called Chaldi by Stephen Byzantium. His chief reason for this opinion is founded on the names of the Chaldean or Babylonian kings, preserved in Scripture and also mentioned by Ptolemy, which differ from the Assyrian names, and bear an apparent resemblance to those of some northern nations of Slavonic origin. On the other hand, Adelung contends that all these names are resolvable into the Hebrew or its cognate dialects, and he considers the Chaldeans or Chasdim as a mountaineer people from the north of Mesopotamia, but belonging to the Assyrian or Semitic race. One thing at least is certain, that the Chaldeans and Babylonians are generally mentioned as the same people, from which we may infer that they were of the same origin; and when they came to reside in the same country there could be no difference between them. There were nevertheless some tribes who were eminently distinguished by the name of Chaldeans. These were celebrated for philosophy and divination, from whom emanated the Magi, the Aruspices, and the Soothsayers, from whom and from the Egyptians, according to Strabo, the learning of Greece was derived; but how the term Chaldeans, which originally belonged to a people, became limited to a priesthood, can never be satisfactorily ascertained.

Next to the Hebrews, the Chaldeans were the most ancient people among the Eastern nations who were in a general sense acquainted with philosophy. The Egyptians always maintained that the Chaldeans were a colony from Egypt, from which they derived their learning; but it cannot be denied that the kingdom of Babylon, of which Chaldea was a part, existed before the Egyptian monarchy, and it is probable that the Egyptians were rather indebted to the Chaldeans. There is little dependence to be placed on the accounts transmitted to us of the Chaldean philosophy. Our knowledge of it is chiefly derived from the Greeks, whose pride induced them to consider the Oriental nations as barbarians, and whose vanity led them to despise and ridicule their learning. The Chaldeans themselves, having adopted a symbolical mode of instruction, considerably obscured and mystified their own doctrines. About the beginning of the Christian era, moreover, a race of pretended philosophers appeared, who, in order to attract notice to their extravagant and fanciful theories, pretended that they held the opinions and taught the wisdom of the ancient Chaldeans and Persians, from spurious books which they ascribed to Zoroaster, or to some other Eastern philosopher. Astronomy, or rather astrology, formed a great branch of their learning; and whatever may have been the perfection to which they had carried that science, it is undeniable that at the time of Alexander's conquest of Babylon, astronomical observations existed which are affirmed to have reached back for nineteen centuries, thus commencing shortly after the time of Nimrod. They were probably the first people who made regular observations upon the heavenly bodies, and hence, in subsequent times and in various countries, the name astronomer became synonymous with that of Chaldean. At Babylon the continual clearness of the sky and the peculiar brightness of the stars greatly facilitated their astronomical observations. Yet all these, according to Strabo and other ancient writers, were applied to establish the credit of judicial astrology, by which those called the Chaldeans, of whom we read in the Book of Daniel, or the college of the Magi, maintained their authority and influence in the state. They employed their pretended skill in calculating nativities, in foretelling the weather, predicting good and bad fortune, and other practices of a similar nature. The Chaldean priesthood was not strictly hereditary, for we find, in the case of the Prophet Daniel and his companions, that even foreigners might be admitted into it, if fitted for it by early education. At their head was the Master of the Magicians whose influence was considerable, if the statement of Josephus is correct, that upon the death of the father of Nebuchadnezzar, which took place when that prince was absent on a military expedition, the High Magician, administered the affairs of the kingdom until his arrival. They were divided into the several classes of interpreters of dreams, astronomers, and soothsayers. If they had any sacred writings, they would be the expounders of them to the initiated. They did not confine their residence to Babylon, but resided in various places throughout the plain of Shinar. Their character was similar to that of the Persian Magi, with whom they are often confounded by the Greek historians. The influence they possessed was undoubtedly founded on their pretensions to knowledge; yet their power appears never to have been so great at Babylon as it was in the Persian court, if we are to judge of the manner in which they were treated by Nebuchadnezzar, who threatened them with the most summary vengeance if they did not recall to his recollection the dream which he had forgotten, and explain it to his satisfaction.

Like other ancient systems, the Chaldean philosophy consisted of what was taught generally to the people, and what was exclusively explained to the initiated. To the former they pretended that all human affairs were regulated by the stars, and that they only were acquainted with the nature and laws of their influence; thus affecting the power of prying into futurity, which encouraged the most superstitious, and sanctioned the most idle, fraudulent, and dishonest practices. The Chaldean priests were careful to prevent the spread of information amongst the people; they delivered their opinions under the disguise of dogmas, thus wisely accommodating themselves to the exigencies of the times, or the pleasure of the ruling powers, without the hazard of detection. They enjoined the worship of the sun, moon, stars, and planets, whence they derived the arts for which they have been celebrated—magic and astrology. The former had no connection with what is commonly understood by the term witchcraft, or a supposed intercourse with evil spirits, but consisted in certain religious rites or incantations, which were supposed to produce beneficial effects, aided by the influence of good dæmons or other invisible agents. The latter was founded, as is already hinted, on the supposition that the stars have an influence either beneficial or malignant on the destinies of men.

A different course of instruction was communicated to the initiated. They were taught the great truth that there is one God, the Father and Lord of all, who governs the world by infinite wisdom, and superintends the affairs of men. The admission of this truth was indispensable to substantiate their religious rites, for those rites were addressed to a supposed race of spiritual beings who derived their existence from the Supreme Being, the source of all intelligence. But this belief was not peculiar to the Chaldeans. From the most remote times men always believed in one Supreme Deity, the fountain of all those divinities which they supposed to preside over all the several parts of the material world; and this, as Dr Enfield remarks, was the true origin of all religious worship, however idolatrous, not excepting even that which consisted in paying honours to dead men.

The Chaldeans held that the world originally consisted of chaotic masses of earth and water, enveloped in the most impenetrable darkness, and that the supreme deity, whom they designated Belus or Baal, formed the present globe by dividing this humid mass. They taught that the human mind is an emanation of the divine nature. Plutarch informs us, that they asserted lunar eclipses to result from that part of the body of the moon which is destitute of fire, being turned towards the earth; and Seneca records another of their tenets, that when the planets shall meet in Cancer, the world will be consumed by fire; and when they shall meet in Capricorn, the world will be destroyed by an inundation. They alleged that the form of the earth resembled that of a boat. It is singular that the Chaldeans should have illustrated the dimensions of the earth, by estimating that a man who walked constantly a league an hour would make the tour of the globe in one year, which gives a diameter not very distant from the actual fact. From this circumstance it has been well observed, that the records of the human race do not present a contrast more striking than that between the primeval magnificence of Babylon and its long desolation; and there are few reflections more interesting than this, that in the solitary spot now covered by vast heaps of undistinguished rubbish, we have still the remains of a people who made the first astronomical observations many centuries before the site of London was probably trodden by human foot.

Such are a few notices respecting the Chaldean learning or philosophy, which from its great antiquity is necessarily uncertain and limited. The ancient writers generally agree that Zoroaster was the founder of this system, but vain have been the attempts to draw aside the veil of obscurity which covers this celebrated name; and Fabricius appropriately remarks, that the accounts which have been given of him are so confused and contradictory, that it would be a task of much greater labour than profit to compare them. It is altogether conjectural whence the name of Zoroaster is derived, or to how many eminent men it belonged. Some have maintained that he was a Persian; others, that there were six distinguished founders of philosophy of this name. Ham, the son of Noah, Moses, Osiris, Mithras, and others, both gods and men, are asserted to have been different names of Zoroaster. "No greater uncertainty, however," says Dr Enfield, "attends the history of Zoroaster than that of other ancient heroes and wise men who were the first authors of civilization or inventors of arts and sciences, with respect to whom it is now scarcely possible to separate the real incidents of their lives from the fables with which they are involved."

The Chaldee language is a dialect of the Hebrew, and its forms, names, pronunciation, and divisions of the letters, are the same. It was anciently spoken throughout all Assyria, Babylonia, Syria, and Palestine, and is still the language of the Churches of the Nestorians and the Maronites, in the same manner as the Latin is the language of the Roman or Western Church, the members of which are hence often called Latin Christians, to distinguish them from the Greek, Armenian, and other communions.

The "land of the Chaldees" has long been a scene of "perpetual desolation." Its "storehouses" are empty, its "treasures" are robbed, the "abundance of its treasures" has disappeared, and the country is now so dry and barren that it cannot be tilled. The ancient cities it contained are either desolate, or their sites cannot be discovered, and the whole country "is strewn over with the débris of Grecian, Roman, and Arabian towns, confounded in the same mass of rubbish."

MAN CREATED IN THE IMAGE OF GOD:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM NISBET,

Minister of New Street Parish, Edinburgh.

"So God created man in his own image."—GEN. i. 27.

MANY delight in being able to relate the famous deeds of the renowned individuals from whom they are descended, take much pleasure in having it in their power to speak of a long line of honoured and illustrious ancestors, and love to let their neighbours and associates know that they are connected with the high and noble of the land; and, by people of such a character and turn of mind, the genealogical tree is inspected with earnestness of spirit; the book of heraldry is studied with uncommon care, and the age-worn chronicle is looked into, with anxious eyes, to see if they can possibly discover that they belong to the house and the lineage of those who have held a conspicuous place in the historic page. But, assisted by the Sacred Volume, the meanest, no less than the mightiest, of the offspring of Adam, are allowed to cast their contemplations backward, to the important period when time began its course, and to behold, in imagination, the originally happy and unfallen pair who first set foot upon the surface of our globe, and so to learn that, in dignity and rank, the founders of their family were far above themselves; for Moses, in his inspired and beautiful account of the creation, presents to our astonished view the world without form and void, and thick darkness brooding over the face of the deep; he proceeds to unveil the stupendous work through its different steps, and its various stages, and lets us see object after object, in regular succession, rise from the chaos, at Jehovah's resistless command, until a few faint rays of his underived glory were reflected in the fabric which his hands had reared, until he pronounced the things which he had made to be very good, until the heavens and the earth, and the host of them were finished, and the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God did shout for joy. When this spot of earth had been formed by the Almighty Father; when the solid ground had been severed from the swelling surge; when the greater and the lesser lights had been set in the firmament to shed lustre and influence below, to show the loveliness of nature's external aspect, "to divide the day from the night," and to be "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years;" when the fish of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, had been summoned from nonentity forth into existence; and when an abode, that was certainly fair to the sight, and exceeding rich in the bounties of Providence, and largely stored with the benefits and luxuries of life, had been thus prepared for the reception of our favoured race, we find that he called a solemn council in the sanctuary above, to decide upon breathing the vital breath into the nostrils of a being made after his own likeness, and nearly resembling himself; and "so," as we are informed in the emphatic language of our text, "so God created man in his own image."

In discoursing from these words, we merely intend to inquire in what respects the human race may be said to have been, at first, created in their Maker's image, and then to apply the subject.

The God whom we adore is, in the Scriptures, described as a spotless Spirit, possessed of every conceivable perfection; and although, in kind accommodation to our weak capacities and feeble powers, he is sometimes represented as a Being having bodily organs and corporeal parts, we are assured that the Most High hath no visible shape; it is distinctly declared that he dwelleth amid light that is inaccessible, and we are informed that no one hath seen his face, and therefore it could not be in outward form or external aspect that man, in the beginning, resembled the Almighty, and we must look for the likeness in his soul, or, at least, we must suppose that it consisted in something that lay concealed from mortal view. It is true that when Moses, the servant of the Lord, descended from the summit of the holy hill, where he had seen the lightnings flash, where he had heard the thunders roar, and where the law had been delivered into his hand, the fashion of his countenance was altered in such a manner, and so celestial a lustre encircled it, that the people of Israel were unable to look upon it, and he was compelled, for a season, to put over it a veil; it is true that the visage of Jesus did shine with surpassing brightness, and his robes were radiant, and his garments glistening and white, when he stood upon the mount of transfiguration; and it is true that one of the angelic ministers, whom John beheld whilst he sojourned on the isle of Patmos, was "clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire;" and therefore we may, with the utmost safety, imagine that he who inhabited Eden, and kept up constant communication with the regions of righteousness, had a measure of majesty in his mein, of which his posterity have been deprived; but we believe and maintain that his resemblance to our Sovereign Ruler lay in the knowledge with which his mind was endued, and the faculties with which he was favoured, in his purity of character and rectitude of conduct, and in his dominion over the inferior creatures, and the glory, and honour, and immortality with which he was crowned.

1. Man may be said to have been created in his Maker's image, because of the knowledge with which his mind was endued, and the faculties with which he was favoured.

If we look within ourselves and cast our eyes without upon the numberless animals by which we are surrounded; if we consider the noble nature of the faculties with which we are endowed, and take into account the want of intelligence which the wisest and the most sagacious of the inferior creatures display, we cannot fail, even at first sight, to perceive that we are favoured with more knowledge than the beasts of the field, and with much greater understanding than the fowls of the air; that we are fitted to burst in sunder the fetters that bind us to this transient scene, and soar away upon the wings of thought to worlds far distant from our own, and rise above this cloudy clime to that lovelier land, where the cares of life are no longer known,—the land that lieth beyond death and the grave; but we have good and substantial ground to believe that the powers of our mind have been sadly impaired by our apostasy and fall, that our talents have been fearfully deteriorated by our departure from the paths of peace, and that our reason, even in its workings about temporal affairs, has, in our lost estate, become woefully weak; and been robbed of that light and illumination by which it was once characterised.

We do still, indeed, in our thinking and immortal part, bear a faint resemblance to the Father of our spirits; in our being able to form skilful and consistent schemes, and to devise various and complicated plans, and to carry them on to their completion; we show a shadowy likeness to the Lord of all; but before our understandings were darkened by sin, we certainly saw with much clearer eyes, and bore a much closer similitude to "Him whose wisdom is unsearchable, and whose ways are past finding out; who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working;" for our thoughts could, doubtless, grasp things about which they now grovel in the dust, and our acquaintance with divine doctrines and incumbent duties was extensive, and accurate, and full. Adam might not be able to comprehend the mysterious fact that there is a trinity of persons in the Godhead, nor to explain how the co-existent, and co-equal, and co-eternal Three are One; he might not be able to read, with absolute precision, the book of Providence, and he might not be able to penetrate the thickly woven veil that hid from human view the future fate of material and intelligent worlds; but, as it was said by Paul, in his epistle to the Colossians, that those whom he addressed had "put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created him," we are warranted to draw the conclusion that he was not ignorant of the existence of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, that he was fit to deduce inferences from considering the objects wherewith he was surrounded, and that he could climb, so to speak, the battlements of heaven, and that, in consequence of these things, it might be said that he was like unto the King of kings; and who can deny this, that takes the pains to reflect, that we argue the existence and the intelligence of the Deity from our own faculties and powers, and that on the infidel we can triumphantly urge the questions, "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that framed the eye shall he not see? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall he not know?" And who can deny this, that takes the pains to reflect, that from the movements of the muscles of our body, we can form a faint idea of the method in which the divine mind is able to operate on inert matter, is able to keep the sun, and the moon, and the stars, in their settled courses, and to wield the weapons of his warfare, and ride on the tempest and direct the storm?

2. Man may be said to have been created in his Maker's image, because of his original purity of character and rectitude of conduct.

We have already seen that Adam resembled the Ruler amongst the nations, inasmuch as he was possessed of exalted faculties and powers far superior to those of the beasts that perish: but, as the inhabitants of hell and the dwellers in the place of woe, are by no means devoid of intellect and understanding, and yet they are wretched so worthless and so wicked that they cannot think a good thought nor do a good deed; as many of the gifted of our race have been backsliding and rebellious; and as painters and poets, with their splendid endowments, and the votaries of learning and the sons of science, have been often impious and profane, have set at defiance the sovereign of all, and have been carnal, and sensual, and devilish, we believe that man's likeness to the Lord of Sabaoth principally lay in his perfect and unsullied purity of character; and we believe that, according to the language of Paul, when alluding to the new man in his epistle to the Ephesians, his likeness to the Lord of Sabaoth chiefly consisted in "righteousness and true holiness." No evil passion rankled in his breast, but the signs of undisturbed serenity were stamped upon his brow, his will was in unison with the will of his Father,—his affections were fixed on proper objects,—he walked in the ordinances and commandments of the Almighty blameless,—he was acquainted with his duty, and he was fit to perform it faithfully and well. He was devout and just in his disposition, for he gave Jehovah the honour which was due, and he generously loved the animated beings that had sprung from the teeming earth,—his conscience was calm, and his heart was kind, and he was neither assailed nor led away by "the lust of the flesh," nor "the lust of the eyes," nor "the pride of life." Innocence, as in letters of gold, was written on his forehead and his hand, and he was like an instrument of music which is complete in all its parts, and which, when tuned and touched by a skilful master of melody, sends forth enchanting strains and emits harmonious sounds,—he was like an unmarred vessel, in whose formation the potter has taken more than ordinary interest, and on which he hath bestowed peculiar pains and uncommon care; and his soul was like a sea of glass, on which there does not blow one unseasonable blast, whose smooth and smiling surface is not broken by one breath of wind, and which from morn to noon, and from noon to night, is unruffled by a single breeze. In our lapsed and low estate we cannot take delight in any object without our delight being tinged with the alloy of guilt, and we cannot grieve or be angry without mingling much that is bad with these feelings of the mind, but, at the beginning, his spirit was free from blemish and from spot, and his body was obedient to that spirit, and so our covenant-head was created in his Maker's image, in the image of Him "in whose sight the heavens are not clean, and who charged his angels with folly;" in the image of Him "who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," and who cannot look upon sin except with detestation and abhorrence; in the image of Him before whom cherubim and seraphim, those bright and burning ones, veil their feet and their faces with their wings, and thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers, fall prostrate; in the image of Him who is great and marvellous in his works, and just and true in all his ways, and who, as the Hebrews sang on the shore of the Red Sea, when they had been led by Israel's Shepherd and sheltered by Israel's Shield, when the armies of Egypt had been buried in the deep, and when Miriam, the sister of Moses, and the other women, went out with the timbrel and the dance, who is "glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders."

3. Man may be said to have been created in his Maker's image, because of his dominion over the inferior creatures, and the glory, and honour, and immortality, with which he was crowned.

When our first father was formed of the dust and was placed in his pleasant and peaceful abode, he was constituted head over the creatures that crowd this world, and he was invested with authority and power as the representative and viceroy of the universal Sovereign; for we are informed, that he gave names to the various tribes of animals that moved upon the face of the earth. We learn, that the Almighty made him but a little lower than the angels, and crowned him with glory and with honour, and commanded him to hold undisputed dominion over the works of his hands; and we are told, in the eighth Psalm, that he "put all things under his feet; all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas;" and therefore, although we be now timid, and fear the tenants of the forest, although we be easily inspired with dismay when we meet the monster of the desert, and although we often-times take causeless alarm, and flee when none pursueth, we thus once resembled the lofty One who sitteth on the throne that is high and lifted up, who swayeth the sceptre of unbounded empire, who ruleth in the armies of heaven, and who is to reign whilst eternity rolls on; and, as the seeds of dissolution were not sown in Adam's frame, as the undying and imperishable spirit embalmed, so to speak, its material tenement, its tabernacle-house, its cottage of clay, and as he was happy, and would have certainly continued surrounded by the signs of gladness and of joy, either in the land below, or the land of felicity above, we may well believe and maintain that he was created in Jehovah's image, in the image of Him who is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever, who is without variableness or the least shadow of turning, who is emphatically called "the King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible, and who is from everlasting to everlasting God."

We would now employ a few words by way of application.

It is evident that our silver hath been converted into dross, and our wine been mingled with water; that the gold hath become dim, and the fine gold been fearfully changed; that "Ichabod," the glory hath departed, hath been written upon the foreheads of the members of our race, and that the temple, reared by the Lord, hath been laid in ruins; but a gracious covenant was entered into between the Father and the Son, "to deliver us out of the estate of sin and misery, and to bring us into an estate of salvation;" and we are told, that we may be reconciled to God "through the blood of the cross," and that we may be blessed "with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." Let us seek, then, the Holy Ghost to be given from on high, in order that we may be united to the divine Redeemer by a true and living faith, and so may be accepted in Jesus "the beloved," in order that we may be sanctified and rendered meet for "the land of uprightness." Lamentable, it ought to be borne in mind, must be the lot of those who trust in any vain ground of confidence, and who refuse to lay aside every weight, and to act as if crucified unto the world; for such build their house, as it were, upon the shifting sand of the sea-shore, and despise and reject Him who suffered the just for the unjust, and who is the only Mediator; and, as our first parents were banished from the bowers of the terrestrial paradise, when they had eaten of the forbidden fruit, the celestial paradise shall be kept incorrupt and pure, and nothing that is defiled can enter "the new Jerusalem." But though surrounded by the signs of desolation, believers may rejoice; and, amid causes for mourning and the exercise of sorrow, believers may be glad, for the beauty of Jehovah is upon the favoured ones who are born again: their moral features are marvellously altered, and, "with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord," they are "changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord:" and it doth not yet appear what the children of the kingdom shall be; but we know that, when He, who is the great King, and the great Judge, shall appear, they "shall be like him," for they "shall see him as he is."

EXPERIENCE OF THE HEATHEN.

THEIR RESPONSIBILITY.

THE most opposite opinions have been entertained by different men as to the precise limits to which the human mind is capable of extending its discoveries in regard to matters of religion. On the one hand, it has been confidently affirmed by some, "That men are fully able, of themselves, without foreign assistance, to discover all the articles of natural religion that are necessary to their happiness; and that a wise and good God can impose upon mankind nothing relating to religion, that is not discoverable by the human mind." On the other hand, it has been boldly maintained by others, "That mankind, left to themselves, without supernatural instruction, are not able, by their reason alone, to discover the being of God, and the immortality of the human soul, in the knowledge and belief of which all religion is founded." The former of these opinions, expressed as it is in terms so positive and unequivocal, is liable to the strongest objections, because it exalts the powers of unassisted reason to a degree that is inconsistent with right conceptions of the ignorance and depravity of human nature, and in the spirit of undisguised infidelity sets the Bible aside, as altogether unnecessary either for our happiness or instruction. And the latter, though advocated by men of Christian character, and with the laudable design too of placing, in the strongest light, the paramount and indispensable necessity of divine revelation, is carried, we conceive, to the opposite extreme, and is open also to objection, inasmuch as it seems to imply that there is no such thing as natural religion, which is tantamount to the affirmation, that every man shut out from the light of Christianity, must be doomed to a state of hopeless and irrecoverable darkness as to every thing like moral obligation, and, of course, divested of the character of a responsible being.

But whilst we hesitate to give an unqualified assent to either of the opinions to which we have adverted, we may gather sufficient information from the Word of God to enable us to come to a right conclusion on the subject. For what is the argument of the Apostle Paul? Why, he declares, in the plainest and most decisive terms, "That God will render to every man according to his deeds, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile: for there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law: For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. For when the Gentiles which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another."

Now, from these statements, we conceive ourselves warranted to infer, that the means of attaining, in some way, to the knowledge of the great truths of natural religion, have certainly been placed within reach of the heathen world. In what way, however, we do not pretend to determine. For aught that we can prove to the contrary, it may be, to some extent at least, by the exercise of unassisted reason, or through the instrumentality of ancient traditions, or even by means of some communicated fragments of revealed truth. But whether it be by these, or by any other means, is not a question which we take upon ourselves to decide. For it is, we think, a matter of little consequence what the means are, or how they operate, or in what way they become accessible to the great majority of mankind, provided only they are capable of bringing them to a right understanding of their own position as religious and accountable beings. And such, we conceive, is the point which may, on scriptural grounds, be maintained in regard to the heathen world in general. At the same time, it does not necessarily follow, that the means to which they have access, are, in all cases, productive of their legitimate results; or, in other words, that they so operate on their consciences, as to lead them invariably to the choice of that which is good, and the renunciation of that which is evil. It is, on the contrary, an undeniable fact, that there are multitudes amongst them, who are not only living in direct opposition to the law of nature, but who are even involved in the grossest ignorance respecting the first principles of religion. Such a fact, however, is not to be accounted for by supposing that the means of attaining both to clearer views and to holier conduct have been placed absolutely beyond their reach. It is rather the result of their own carelessness and depravity, in running counter to the dictates of their own consciences, and recklessly neglecting the very means which, as reasonable beings, they were bound to have improved to the utmost of their power. And therefore, we conclude, that they are chargeable with guilt, and obnoxious to condemnation, just as truly, though not certainly to the same extent, as the men who, though encompassed with all the privileges of a Christian land, are nevertheless walking on in darkness and in vice, going astray after vanity and lies, and altogether alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them.

In illustration of these remarks, we make the following extract from the Memoirs of the Rev. David Brainerd, relative to the religious opinions of the Indian tribes amongst whom he laboured:—

"I have taken much pains," he says, "to inquire of my Christian people, whether, before their acquaintance with Christianity, they imagined there was a plurality of great invisible powers, or whether they supposed but one such being, and worshipped him in a variety of forms and shapes; but I cannot learn anything of them so as to be fully satisfied upon the point. Their notions in that state were so prodigiously dark and confused, that they seemed not to know what they thought themselves! But so far as I can learn, they had a notion of a plurality of invisible deities, and paid some kind of homage to them promiscuously, under a great variety of forms and shapes. It is certain that those who yet remain pagans pay some kind of superstitious reverence to beasts, birds, fishes, and even reptiles; that is, some to one kind of animal, and some to another. They do not indeed suppose a divine power essential to, or inhering in, these creatures, but that some invisible beings, not distinguished from each other by certain names, but only notionally, communicate to these animals a great power, either one or other of them, just as it happens, or perhaps sometimes all of them, and so make these creatures the immediate authors of good to certain persons. Hence such an animal becomes sacred to the persons to whom he is supposed to be the immediate author of good, and through him they must worship the invisible powers, though, to others, he is no more than another creature. Another animal, perhaps, is looked upon to be the immediate author of good to another person, and, consequently, he must worship the invisible powers in that animal.

"After the strictest inquiry respecting their notions of the Deity, I find that in ancient times, before the coming of the white people, some supposed that there were four invisible powers, who presided over the four corners of the earth. Others imagined the sun to be the only deity, and that all things were made by him; others, at the same time, having a confused notion of a certain body or fountain of deity, somewhat like the anima mundi, so frequently mentioned by the more learned ancient heathens, diffusing itself to various animals, and even to inanimate things, making them the immediate authors of good to certain persons, as was before observed, with respect to various supposed deities. But after the coming of the white people, they seemed to suppose there were three deities, and three only, because they saw people of three different kinds of complexion, viz., English, negroes, and themselves.

"It is a notion pretty generally prevailing among them, that it was not the same God made them who made us, but that they were made after the white people; which further shews, that they imagine a plurality of divine powers. And I fancy they suppose their god gained some special skill by seeing the white people made, and so made them better; for it is certain they look upon themselves, and their methods of living, which they say their god expressly prescribed for them, as greatly preferable to the white people, and their methods. Hence they will frequently sit and laugh at them, as being good for nothing else but to fatigue themselves with hard labour, while they enjoy the satisfaction of stretching themselves on the ground, and sleeping as much as they please; and have no other trouble but now and then to chase the deer, which is often attended with pleasure rather than pain. Hence, also, many of them look upon it as disgraceful for them to become Christians, as it would be esteemed among Christians for any to become pagans. But though they suppose our religion will do well enough for us, because prescribed by our God, yet it is noways proper for them, because they are not of the same make and original. This they have sometimes offered as a reason why they did not incline to hearken to Christianity.

"They seem to have some confused notion about a future state of existence, and many of them imagine that the shadow, or what survives the body, will at death go southward, and in an unknown but certain place, will enjoy some kind of happiness, such as hunting, feasting, dancing, and the like. And what they suppose will contribute much to their happiness in that state is, that they shall never be weary of those entertainments. It seems by this notion of their going southward to obtain happiness, as if they had their course into these parts of the world from some very cold climate, and found, the further they went southward the more comfortable they were; and thence concluded that perfect felicity was to be found further towards the same point.

"They appear to entertain some faint and glimmering notion about rewards and punishments, or at least happiness and misery in a future state, that is, some that I have conversed with, though others seem to know of no such thing. Those who suppose this, seem to imagine that most will be happy, and that those who are not so will be punished only with privation, being only excluded the walls of that good world where happy souls shall dwell. These rewards and punishments they suppose to depend entirely on their conduct as to the duties of the second table; that is, their behaviour towards mankind, and seem, so far as I can see, not to imagine that they have any reference to their religious notions or practices, or any thing that relates to the worship of God. I remember I once consulted a very ancient but intelligent Indian upon this point, for my own satisfaction. I asked him whether the Indians of old times supposed there was any thing of the man that survived the body? He replied, 'Yes.' I asked him where they supposed its abode would be? He replied, 'It would go southward.' I asked him further, whether it would be happy there? He answered, after a considerable pause, 'That the souls of good folks would be happy, and the souls of bad folks miserable.' I then asked him who he called bad folks? His answer was, 'Those who lie, steal, quarrel with their neighbours, are unkind to their friends, and especially to aged parents, and, in a word, such as are a plague to mankind.' These were his 'bad folks,' but not a word was said about their neglect of divine worship, and their badness in that respect.

"They have indeed some kind of religious worship, are frequently offering sacrifices to some supposed invisible powers, and are very ready to impute their calamities, in the present world, to the neglect of these sacrifices, but there is no appearance of reverence or devotion in the homage they pay them; and what they do of this nature, seems to be done only to appease the supposed anger of their deities, to engage them to be placable to themselves, and do them no hurt, or, at most, only to invite these powers to succeed them in those enterprises they are engaged in, respecting the present life. In offering these sacrifices they seem to have no reference to a future state, but only to present comfort; and this is the account my interpreter always gives me of this matter. 'They sacrifice,' says he, 'that they may have success in hunting and other affairs, and that sickness and other calamities may not befall them, which they fear in the present world, in case of neglect; but they do not suppose God will ever punish them in the coming world, for neglecting to sacrifice.' Indeed they seem to imagine that those whom they call 'bad folks' are excluded from the company of good people in that state, not so much because God remembers and is determined to punish them for sin of any kind, either immediately against himself or their neighbour, as because they would be a 'plague' to society, and would render others unhappy if admitted to dwell with them. So that they are excluded rather of necessity, than by the act of a righteous judge.

"The Indians also give much heed to dreams, because they suppose the invisible powers give them directions at such times about certain affairs, and inform them what animal they would choose to be worshipped in. They are likewise much attached to the traditions and fabulous notions of their fathers, who have informed them of divers miracles that were anciently wrought among the Indians, which they firmly believe, and thence look upon their ancestors to have been the best of men.

"To these superstitious notions and traditions, and this kind of ridiculous worship, the Indians are extremely attached; and the prejudice they have imbibed in favour of these things, renders them not a little averse to the doctrines of Christianity. Hence some of them have told me when I have endeavoured to instruct them, 'that their fathers had taught them already, and that they did not want to learn now'"

We make no attempt to trace out the path by which these heathen tribes were guided to the religious notions which they entertained. The fact, however, is unquestionable, that in one way or other they were made acquainted with the leading principles of natural religion. They knew enough, for example, of a God, of a future state, of the distinction between right and wrong, of the separation of the righteous from the wicked, and of a good world beyond the grave, as needed only to be faithfully observed, to become, as it were, "a law unto themselves," bringing them under the weight of solemn obligations, and inferring their responsibility at the bar of God.

But accountable as we must admit them to be for all that they knew, or were capable of knowing, we are far indeed from affirming that their responsibility was felt by themselves in such a way as was suited to their circumstances, or conducive to the best interests of their souls. The reverse of this was the case, if not universally, at least with the great majority of them. In point of fact, we find them still attached to the most degrading superstitions, subject to the influence of the strongest delusions, and removed to an immeasurable distance from the holiness without which no man shall see the Lord. And thus, though we cannot resist the conviction that the means placed at their disposal were ample enough to establish their responsibility, and in the case of their neglect to bring them in as guilty before God, yet we see at the same time, in the depravity that still reigned with unrivalled supremacy in their hearts, an argument altogether irresistible, in demonstration of the urgent and indispensable necessity for the mightiest of all the engines which have ever borne with effect on the otherwise impregnable corruptions of our fallen nature—even that Gospel which is the wisdom of God, and the power of God unto salvation, unto every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

He went about doing good.—This is the pattern for every Christian. He is a counterfeit one who does not strive to imitate it. The strength, the alacrity, the joy of the soul is connected with this imitation. Religious people are heavy, and moping, and cast down, principally because they are idle and selfish. The active benevolent spirit of watching for opportunities to do essential service to our fellow-creatures, they often feel no more than the profane. What then avail doctrines believed to no good purpose? Usefulness is the very excellency of life. No man, in the real Church of Christ, liveth unto himself. Every true Christian is a tree of righteousness, whose fruits are good and profitable unto men. He is glad to help and to comfort others. He is diligent and industrious. He speaks to edification; dwells in peace, and gentleness, and love. He reproves what is wrong by an excellent example, and recommends, by his own practice, what is pleasing to God.—VENN.

The opinions of the World.—The opinions of the world, as to virtue and vice, are not only ruinously false, but they are as changeable as they are false. What, in one age of the world, would have branded a man with infamy as long as he breathed, becomes not only pardonable, but reputable in another. The customs of the world, and the fashionable crimes of society, are shifting from age to age. For one instance out of a hundred: some time ago, there existed a nation where theft was honoured, as a proof of skill and dexterity; while, in that very same nation, drunkenness and immodesty—intemperance of any kind—would have ruined a man's reputation for ever. Now look at the change! In our days, the one is stigmatized with punishment and dishonour, while men often boast of their achievements in the other. How is a man to be guided by this childish and despicable world, that has not yet learned, in six thousand years, to guide and regulate itself; that calls a thing virtue at one time, and vice at another; that call evils good, and good evil; that puts bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter? Let him put it aside from him with contempt, and let him "remember his Creator." He will not shift and change with times and seasons. The fashions and opinions of the world may turn round and round with the world itself; but the law of God stands unchanged and unchangeable as the God that endureth for ever and ever: they have perished, and shall perish; but He hath remained and shall still remain; the fashions and opinions of the world shall all "wax old as doth a garment, and he shall fold them up, and they shall be changed; but he is the same, and his years shall not fail."—Wolfe's Remains.

HEBREW IDYLS.

BY PROFESSOR TENNANT.

No. IV.

REUEL, THE SEER;

FOUNDED ON THE 20TH CHAPTER OF 2D CHRONICLES.

SCENE—Engedi, and its Neighbourhood, on the Western Shore of the Dead Sea.

GLADNESS at eve fill'd Maon's plains;
The vintage-feast rejoiced her swains;
And sound of tabret, pipe, and song,
Rose from each happy hamlet-throng;
Whilst, underneath the palm-tree's shade,
The dance's tangled sports were play'd;
But, ere the day-spring, loud around,
Was heard of rushing foes the sound;
And Peace's dance-directing voice
Was changed for Warriors' clanging noise:
Mount Seir's pass, with din and shout,
Had pour'd the desert's children out;
The Moabite, with javelin long,
And quiver charged with arrows strong;
The Ammonite, from th' eastern land,
For battle busk'd, with sword in hand;
And Dedan's troops, in rich attire,
Hot from the desert, breathing ire;
And Midian's sun-burnt children bold,
Their camels collar'd gay with gold;
Chariots of high and glancing wheel,
And steeds restrain'd by burnish'd steel,
Filling each vineyard, field, and way,
With battle's terrible array.

Engedi's people, from repose
Wak'd by that rush of raging foes,
Fled fast from village, field, and fold,
To mountain-top, or cavern-hold,
There, safety for a space to find
From Israel's foes in wrath combin'd:
Engedi's hill, and dell, and den,
Were fill'd with terror-stricken men;
Thither the shepherd drove his flocks,
Up to the stronghold of her rocks;
Thither the hurrying herdsman sped;
Thither the vineyard-keeper fled;
Grape-gatherer and husbandman
Thither confus'd and trembling ran,
With household train of wife and child,
Weeping, as up the rocks they toil'd,
To embrace the refuge of her wild.

Amid the crowd that fled by night
From Maon to Engedi's height,
Reuel, the shepherd-seer, (bereft
Of sight, but bless'd with better gift!)
Had left his peaceful cot, that stood Embower'd mid Maon's myrtle wood,
And by his sons, was, up the steep,
Led to Engedi's deserts deep:
As up he clomb the weary road,
And tottering, trembling, onward trod,
"Bear me," he cries, "my children dear!
To Ziph's high cliff, that riseth near;
So shall your journey short'ned be,
For these your little ones and me;
And better thence ye shall decree
The rout of Israel's enemy!"

His children dear, at these commands,
Uptook him gently in their hands,
And bore him up to where on high
Ziph's soaring crag invades the sky.

The sun had o'er the sea of Lot
His shafts of morning radiance shot,
And all the cliff's dusk summits now
Were blazing with the golden glow;
When Reuel's children up had clomb
The long ascent; and now were come
Ev'n to its topmost peak, that stands
High-towering o'er the neighbour-lands
Commanding prospect wide and far,
Thence south to Edom's mountain-bar,
All the fair vineyards spread below,
Engedi's groves of stately show,
Hebron's far hill, and Mamre's plain,
And Hormah, Arad's old domain.

They set their sire, the seer, upon
His rugged resting-place of stone;
And, round and near him, where he sat,
With gentle ministrations wait:—
A song of thanks then first arose
To Him, from whom all safety flows,
The true, th' eternal refuge-rock,
Whereto his own, his chosen flock,
In day of terror, wrath, and woe,
Flee, and are saved from deathful foe:—
"Thanks, heavenly Father! God of love!
Whose arm, down-reaching from above,
In hour of danger and alarm,
Uplifts thy people safe from harm!
Thanks, ever fervent and sincere,
From these thy children gather'd here!"

The sun had now, some steps more high,
Clomb the great ladder of the sky,
And fill'd with whiter, proner, rays,
Hazon-Tamar's winding ways,
When to his sons and grandsons near,
Spoke from his rocky chair the seer:—
"Look down, my children! look afar
Down on the vale of Moab's war,
And tell me what ye spy below
Of harness'd steeds and martial show!"

"I see, (his first-born at his side Took up the word, and thus reply'd,)
I see the bands of Moab's war,
King Saraph's pride, the pomp of Ar,
All congregate with spears and shields,
Amid our vineyards, streets, and fields;
I see beside them, marshal'd bright,
The idol-vaunting Ammonite,
Confederate with Moab still,
Against Jehovah's tribes for ill;
I see their gay-forg'd god of gold,
Their Milcom, dazzling to behold,

High held, with glory, and with boast,
 Proud Rabbah's ensign, o'er their host,
 Insulting with brute emblem dead
 The living God that heav'n outspread!
 I see, our gardens camp'd among,
 Mount Seir's sun-burnt children strong;
 The Kenite from his nest of rocks,
 Rapacious of our herds and flocks;
 The Dedanite, Arabia's pride,
 With car and camel at his side,
 All glancing in his war-attire,
 Helm, mail, and sword that shine like fire:
 All these I see with bristly show
 Of war, prepar'd to find a foe,
 And cast forth Judah from the land,
 The gift of his Jehovah's hand:
 Great is that host; their boasting great;
 The valley rings with sound of threat;
 And loud-clash'd shield, and brandish'd spear,
 Announce assault and fury near.
 Save us, O God! for nought can we Against this mighty company!"

He thus, and straight the father said:
 "Fear not, my sons, nor be dismay'd;
 Pause but a little space, and ye
 Soon shall the foe's destruction see;
 For our's to-day is not the fight;
 'Tis His, whose arm is great in might!"

A space they paus'd, and shortly then
 The seer and father spake again:
 "Look down, my children, and behold
 Where Moab hath his war unroll'd;
 Tell me if He, whose is the fight,
 Hath lifted yet his arm to smite!"

"I see the vale from east to west
 Convuls'd, and reeling with unrest!
 A spirit of confusion, sent Down from on high in chastisement,
 Hath seiz'd the mingled hosts beneath,
 Upstirring them to wounds and death;
 Madness hath stricken Moab's sons,
 The Ammonite distracted runs;
 Wild Dedan's warriors to and fro
 Are tost like waves when tempests blow;
 Camel and steed have burst their reins,
 And bound tumultuous o'er the plains;
 'Gainst Seir's sons the hosts conspire,
 Inflam'd at once with mortal ire;
 I see their plum'd helms nod on high,
 I see their glistening javelins fly,
 I see their swords, all red imbued,
 Play fierce, insatiate yet of blood;
 Each against other wroth they fight,
 But most against the Edomite;
 They hurl! they smite! they stab! they fall!
 One murderous rage infuriates all!
 And heaps on heaps of bleeding slain
 Do gather, and upchoke the plain!
 O God of Israel! here we see Thy hand, and thank and worship thee!"

"Look northward now, my son, and tell What thou discern'st in Jeruel."

"I see, amongst the brook afar,
 A moving host in march of war,
 With banners terribly outspread,
 And bristling spears held high o'er head;
 They come—they come—with speed they pour
 Down by Tekoa's white watch-tower,
 And through her winding wilderness,
 Like torrent of the mountains, press!
 I see—I see—I note them well—
 'Tis Judah's force in Jeruel!
 Behold the singers, harp in hand,
 March on before, a solemn band,

With trump and cymbal sounding high,
 And many-chorded psaltery,
 Chaunting aloud the mighty name,
 The God that guards Jerusalem!
 I hear their cymbals as they ring,
 I hear their voices, as they sing,
 'Praise be to Judah's God! O praise
 To Him whose mercy lasts always!
 My father! hear'st thou not their song,
 Their cymbals, as they march along?"

"I list their hymn! Mine aged ear
 A little takes—but sweet to hear!
 The Almighty name, through Judah's coasts
 Rever'd, doth go before his hosts;
 And, in that name, we shall, though few,
 Our multitude of foes pursue;
 Look downward still, my sons, and see If yet the war completed be."

"Down, down Engedi's winding way
 Our people rush as on their prey;
 They mingle, Judah's valiant ones,
 With Moab's terror-smitten sons;
 They charge; one moment lasts the fight,
 Mad Moab's sons have taken flight;
 The Ammonite is fled; I see
 His remnant down the vallies flee!
 His glancing, gay, gold-forged god
 Hath fall'n, and now in dust is trod;
 The brute dead idol on the way
 Lies motionless, now Israel's prey!
 Victorious Israel takes the spoil;
 Gems, gold, and jewels, crown his toil.
 'Tis done, O father! Triumph waits
 Our tribes returning to their gates.
 Glory, O glory, great and high,
 To Him who gives the victory."

He spoke, and for a while the sound
 From Ziph's rude tops was echo'd round,
 "Glory, O glory, great and high,
 To Him who gives the victory!"

They look'd along Engedi's vale,
 Their joyous friends possessed the dale;
 Again they turned their steps to go
 Adown the steep cliff, winding slow;
 Again the blind and aged seer,
 Uplifted by his children dear,
 Downward was borne, in joyous mood,
 Home to his vine-twined cot that stood
 Embowered in Maon's fragrant wood.

The rising sun had seen their tears
 Fast flowing amid fight and fears;
 The moon that rose on Moab's plain,
 Saw all their sorrows wip'd again;
 Again before the cot appear'd
 Fresh altar, of green turf up-rear'd,
 Whereon thank-offering rich consumés,
 Saluting heaven with savoury fumes;
 Again the sound of pipe and song
 Rose from each happy hamlet-through;
 Whilst underneath the plane-tree's shade
 The dance's tangled sports were play'd,
 And Maon's maids in joy's attire,
 Spread to the moon their jocund choir,
 Aye singing, "glory, great and high,
 To Him who gave the victory!"
 The youths responding to the song,
 Hymn'd loud their blooming ranks along,
 "Glory, O glory, great and high,
 To Him who gave the victory!"
 Whilst aged parents sat apart,
 Responding, too, with grateful heart,
 "Glory, O glory, great and high,
 To Him who gave the victory!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Preacher and Hearer.—"THERE was some years ago," says Dr Krummacher of Elberfeld, in his work entitled, "Elijah the Tishbite," "there was not far from this place, a very gifted preacher, who, for several years, preached with great earnestness and success the doctrine of the cross; but who, on that very account, was violently opposed. One of his opponents, a well informed person, who had for a long time absent-ed himself from the church, thought, one Sabbath morning, that he would go and hear the gloomy man once more, to see whether his preaching might be more tolerable to him than it had been heretofore. He went, and that morning the preacher was speaking of the narrow way, which he did not make either narrower or broader than the Word of God describes it. "A new creature in Christ, or eternal condemnation," was the theme of his discourse; and he spoke, with power and not as a mere learned reasoner. During the sermon, the question forced itself upon this hearer's conscience, "How is it with myself? Does this man declare the real truth? If he does, what must inevitably follow from it?" This thought took such a hold upon him, that he could not get rid of it, amidst any of his engagements and amusements. But it became from day to day more and more troublesome, more and more penetrating, and threatened to embitter every joy of his life; so that at last he thought he would go to the preacher himself, and ask him, upon his conscience, if he were convinced of the truth of that which he had lately preached. He fulfilled his intention, and went to the preacher. "Sir," said he to him, with great earnestness, "I was one of your hearers, when you spoke, a short time since, of the only way of salvation. I confess to you, that you have disturbed my peace of mind, and I cannot refrain from asking you solemnly, before God, and upon your conscience, if you can prove what you asserted, or whether it was an unfounded alarm." The preacher, not a little surprised at this address, replied, with convincing certainty, that he had spoken the Word of God, and consequently infallible truth. "What, then, is to become of us?" replied the visitor. His last word, us, startled the preacher, but he rallied his thoughts, and began to explain the plan of salvation to the inquirer, and to exhort him to repent and believe. But the latter, as though he heard not one syllable of what the preacher said, interrupted him in the midst of it, and repeated, with increasing emotion, the anxious exclamation, "If it be truth, Sir, I beseech you what are we to do?" Terrified, the preacher staggers back. "We," thinks he, "what means this we?" and, endeavouring to stifle his inward uneasiness and embarrassment, he resumed his exhortation and advice. Tears came into the eyes of the visitor; he smote his hands together, like one in despair, and exclaimed, in an accent which might have moved a heart of stone, "Sir, if it be truth, we are undone." The preacher stood pale, trembling, and speechless. Then, overwhelmed with astonishment, with downcast eyes and convulsive sobbings, he exclaimed, "Friend, down on your knees, let us cry for mercy." They knelt down and prayed, and shortly afterwards the visitor took his leave. The preacher shut himself up in his closet. Next Sabbath word was sent that the minister was unwell, and could not appear. The same thing happened the Sabbath following. On the third Sabbath the preacher made his appearance before his congregation, worn with his inward conflict, and pale, but his eyes beaming with joy, and commenced his discourse with the surprising and affecting declaration, that he had now, for the first time, passed through the strait gate. You will ask what had occurred to him in his chamber, during the interval which had elapsed? "A storm passed over him, but the Lord was not in the storm; an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire. Then came a still small voice, on which the man enveloped his face in his mantle, and from that time knew what was the Gospel, and what was grace."

A Sabbath Scholar.—The Rev. Dr Morrison, who has been so eminently useful in his missionary labour at Canton, in China, particularly in the translation of the Sacred Volume into the Chinese language, was once a scholar in the High Bridge Sunday School, Newcastle-on-Tyne; and, in a letter to the minister of that congregation, a very few years ago, he referred, with deep feeling, to his standing up in the gallery to be catechised. How much good may be done in the world by Sunday school children, when they devote their hearts entirely to the service of God! And who can tell how great a matter a little fire may kindle? The great benefits produced by means of Sunday schools will never be fully known till the last great day shall reveal them. Then shall be fully seen the blessed results of the instructions and the prayers of the pious teacher. How ought this delightful consideration to encourage those who now devote their time and energies to promote the welfare of the young; and with what fervour should Sabbath scholars pray that they be "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light!"

Sabbath School Teachers.—The Rev. Richard Knill wrote from St. Petersburg, in 1819, as follows:—"As an individual, I feel particularly indebted to such instructions, and to the glory of God I record it, that all the blessings which have been given to others, through my instrumentality, may be traced up to a Sunday school. It was my privilege to be a teacher in a Sunday school at Bideford; hearing a sermon preached in behalf of the institution led me first to think of being a missionary; most of my fellow-students at Axminster had been Sunday school teachers; and out of twenty missionaries, who were my colleagues at Gosport, three-fourths of them had been engaged in the same way."

The reasoning of an African Boy.—Mr Read, a missionary in South Africa, when writing to the directors of the London Missionary Society, in the year 1815, gives a very pleasing account of a conversation he had then recently held with a poor boy, whose heart had been impressed by the grace of God. He asked the boy if he knew himself to be a sinner; and the boy asked him in return, if he knew any one who was not. The missionary then asked who could save him? The reply was, "Christ." He was asked, what Christ had done to save sinners? He replied, that he died upon the cross. Mr Read inquired, if he believed Jesus Christ would save him? He said, "Yes." "Why do you believe it?" "I feel it," said he; "and not only so, but I consider that after he died, and has sent his servants, the missionaries, from such a far country to publish salvation, it would be very strange if, after all, he should reject a sinner."

Minister of Stow.

No. I.

FAITH VIEWED SIMPLY AS A PRINCIPLE WITHOUT REFERENCE TO ITS OBJECT.

THERE is probably none of the pilgrims to the Zion above “with their faces thitherward,” and none of those now in possession of the glorious inheritance, who have not had many doubts and difficulties concerning the nature of faith, and many sad misgivings of heart, as to its being their own personal acquisition. They have read much, and thought much, and even prayed much, that their views might be clear, and scriptural, and saving; and yet in proportion as they have been thus devoutly, and humbly, and earnestly engaged on that in which they justly deemed their eternal salvation to be involved, they have found the darkness deepen, the doubts multiply, and the discomforts increase. The more they have read, and the more they have attempted to think, or rather to remember, for generally they have surrendered the exercise of thought and judgment to the pious and learned divines, by whom they were willing to be led, the more have they been bewildered, and the more of a hazy and obscuring medium has been interposed between them and the glorious effulgence of the Sun of Righteousness.

There can be no doubt that this great evil originates mainly in the multitude of meanings usually attached to the word Faith, and to which I shall not advert at present, farther than to observe, that, in a recent able and learned “Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures,” the author has given us no less than twelve different meanings of the word, while two more, namely, “historical faith,” and the “faith of devils,” usually introduced by divines, have been omitted. He concludes his enumeration with this caution, “These various senses of the word faith ought, as much as possible, to be kept in mind when perusing the sacred writings, lest we fall into the mistake, so commonly committed, of always understanding the same thing by it.” But who shall remember the twelve or fourteen meanings, and remembering them, who shall be found capable of applying them with precision and accuracy? And as to its being a “mistake” always to understand the same thing by it, it will be my endeavour to show that it is “a mistake” to do any thing else. It is proper, at the same time, to remark, that faith, like other words, is sometimes employed with a latitude or comprehensiveness, which its connection at once indicates and explains; as when Jude speaks of “the faith once delivered to the saints,” I believe there is not a mind, that thinks at all, but will understand by it the things delivered to the saints, to be, by them, believed and acted upon, and yet this is not included in the above fourteen meanings. Let it be distinctly understood, that what I propose is, to show the simplicity and the identity, in all cases, of that operation or act of the mind, which we call faith or believing; and in regard of the remarks I have to make, I address my readers in the language of the inspired Paul, “I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say.” Reflect on the operations of your own minds, and take the Scriptures for your guide.

I begin with some remarks on the nature of faith in general; for taken as an act of the mind it matters not what be its object. It has been already hinted that there are few subjects less understood, even by those who possess it. This appears to originate in no cause so much as the simplicity of its nature, and the ease with which it may be understood. Finding that this principle is represented in Scripture as of paramount importance, that it is the link which connects earth with heaven, and which distinguishes the redeemed of God from the world that lieth in iniquity, and that it is the principle by which a meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light is produced; knowing, in short, that it is by faith that the healing efficacy of the blood of Christ is applied to the soul, that without faith it is impossible to please God, and that with faith it is impossible not to please him, men seem unwilling to discover, in what is simple and obvious, a principle which is so noble and renovating,—a principle which is heaven-born, and leads to heaven.

A due consideration, however, of those very characteristics of faith, which have led men to throw so much mystery around it, will create a strong presumption that it must be simple in its nature and of easy comprehension. We are naturally led to infer, that what is of indispensable necessity to all, must be attainable by all. For although "great be the mystery of godliness," and though, in many respects, we at present see through a glass darkly, yet in everything essential to salvation, and therefore, particularly in that, without which it is impossible to please God, the Scriptures represent all things as so simple, that he who runs may read, and the way-faring man, though a fool, or rather, though unlearned, shall not err therein. In connection with this observation, it is to be particularly remarked, that the word faith is never once explained, or defined, from the beginning of the Bible to the end of it. Much is said of its distinguishing characteristics, of its blessed effects, and of its heavenly fruits; much, in short, of what it does, but nothing of what it is. Even the heathen jailer at Philippi, accordingly, is supposed to understand, without one syllable of explanation, the words, "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

The word faith corresponds exactly with belief; so that to believe, and to have faith, signify precisely the same thing. Speaking of Abraham, Paul says, that "his faith was reckoned to him for righteousness;" and expressing the same sentiment, a little before, he says, "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness," (Rom. iv. 9; v. 3.) Whatever is meant by faith, then, and whatever healing efficacy and regenerating power it may imply, is all included in the word believe. Farther proof of this would be superfluous: and surely it cannot be necessary to prove, that the words of Scripture are used in the common acceptation; for if it were not so, the Bible would be unintelligible, a tibus of riddles and enigmas; and it would not be true, that, to the unlearned, and "to the poor, the Gospel is preached."

It being clear, then, that faith signifies the same thing as belief; I may now remark, that this last is so well understood, and so simple in itself, as to admit of no explanation. Every man has a distinct idea in his own mind when he says, I believe this, and I disbelieve that; and so has every one to whom he says so. But any explanation of the import of belief is neither necessary nor possible.

Every one knows that, in order to explain any thing, we must do it by something plainer; and, therefore, when we have come to the plainest of all things, our farther attempts at successful explanation, at least, must cease. Faith, or belief, is of this last kind. It is one of the simple ideas of consciousness; and therefore, as in the case of all simple ideas, words may obscure, but cannot illustrate its import. Although, however, it cannot be defined, or in other words, explained by simpler terms, which in this case do not exist, it has been generally described as "an assent of the understanding to some proposition or narration, which has been proposed to the mind." But if faith, or belief, were not otherwise understood, this would not avail to render it intelligible. We may just remark, too, that this "assent of the understanding," which can mean nothing beyond mere acquiescence, by no means comes up to the full import of faith, or belief.

Having proceeded thus far, I must recall the reader's attention to the statement already made, that throughout the whole Bible there is no explanation of the word faith or belief; that much is said of what it does, but nothing of what it is. And I recall the remark, because there are few who have not read or heard of what has been called a definition of faith, contained in the first verse of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. It runs thus: "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." That these words should ever have passed for a definition with men of learning and talent, as they unquestionably have, can be accounted for only by the fact, that men of the most profound reflection sometimes repeat, without reflection, things that have been repeated before. Even Mr Horne, the only author to whom we have alluded, calls it a "definition," a distinct evidence that the import of that word had not crossed his acute and well-furnished mind at the time. If this be a "definition," then faith is a substance, and farther, it is a substance of a particular kind, the "substance of things hoped for." Now, "things hoped for," are things that are absent, "for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?" So then faith is a substance, and it is an absent substance, while yet its presence and activity as a spiritual and active principle in the believer's mind, are the very things that constitute him a believer! The absurdity of all this is too manifest to admit of a single remark farther; and so we revert to our proposition, that, through the whole of Scripture, without excepting this passage, we are taught what faith does, and not what it is. This idea appears not to have been absent from the minds of our venerable translators, for their marginal reading runs thus: "Now, faith is the ground or confidence of things hoped for." But what is most remarkable is, that Mr Horne himself, in the explanation he gives of it as a definition, completely establishes the view I have given. "Faith," he says, "is defined to be the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, that is, the giving of a present subsistence to things future, which are fully expected, and the proving and demonstrating of things which are not seen." Is not this, then, telling us what faith does, and not what it is?

The intelligent reader will perceive that what has been hitherto said of faith is said of that acting of the mind to which this name is given. Hitherto nothing has been said of what that acting implies or presupposes; nothing of the objects on which it acts,—they may be secular or divine; nay, they may be true or false, and yet the acting itself may and must preserve its characteristic of believing. Nothing has been said of the objects of the Christian's faith; but let it be remembered that the acting of the mind, and the object on which it acts, are as different from one another as the agent and the material on which his skill and power are exercised. Nothing has been said of the divine power requisite to put corrupt human nature into a capacity of seeing and believing divine truth, and putting forth the energies of that nature into a holy and exclusive devotion to the glory of God. These things have not even been alluded to, in order that the simple acting of the mind, as exercised in faith or believing, might be viewed in its native and essential characteristics, disencumbered of all that concerns its objects and circumstantials, and the peculiarities that may, in some cases, originate in these objects or circumstantials. Some of these interesting matters, entering into the very essentials of the economy of grace, may afterwards, if it please God, engage our attention. In the meantime, let the writer and his readers pray, in regard of what has been said, that God would send forth his Holy Spirit into our hearts to lead us into all the truth.

THE EDINBURGH SESSIONAL SCHOOL,— MR JOHN WOOD.

THERE are few subjects more important than that which relates to popular education; and there are scarcely any individuals who have higher claims upon the gratitude of the public, than those who successfully devote themselves to the work of improving the system of general tuition. In this respect we know of no one who holds so high a place as Mr John Wood; and we have, therefore, witnessed with great satisfaction the proceedings which have recently taken place, for the purpose of conferring on that gentleman some mark of the estimation in which his extraordinary services in the cause of education are held by the country. It has not yet, we believe, been fixed upon, in what form the public gratitude should be expressed, but a committee has been appointed with power to raise funds, and to determine on the most proper mode of their application. The contributions, we observe, are proceeding upon a liberal scale; but, as we conceive that they should extend much wider than they have hitherto done, we think that we may perform a useful service to our readers, by giving a brief account of the Sessional School, and of the connection of Mr Wood with that institution. Mr Wood may be considered as a great national benefactor, and we conceive it to be merely an act of justice to aid in making his merits known among all classes; and in doing so, we will be led to make some extracts from Mr Wood's writings, from which parents and teachers, who have not hitherto attended to the subject, may derive hints that they may render available in the practical business of education.

The Sessional School forms a branch of the parochial institutions which were established in Edinburgh in 1812, in consequence of the melancholy disclosures to which the riots that took place on the 1st January of that year led, as to the lamentable extent of juvenile delinquency. The necessity of schools for the religious instruction of the poor on the Lord's day was universally acknowledged; and a body of directors was appointed for organizing parochial Sabbath schools. It being soon discovered that many of the children who were induced to attend these schools were unable to read, the expediency or necessity was forced upon the directors, of establishing a day school where the children of the poor might be instructed gratis, or at low rates, in the ordinary elements of reading and writing.

An institution of this description, accordingly, was opened in Leith Wynd, under the name of the Sessional School, from its connection with the different kirk-sessions. This was on the 29th April 1813. In this school, the system known by the name of Lancastrian was chiefly followed in the arrangements of the classroom, the classification of the scholars, and other external matters. At a subsequent period, many valuable suggestions were received from Dr Bell, which were carried into effect by Dr Brunton* and the late Dr Andrew Thomson, both of whom, for some time, gave daily attendance in the school-room. It was about this period that Mr Wood's connection with the Sessional School commenced. The account of this we think it right to give at full length, in Mr Wood's own words, as forming an era in the history of education:—

"The author's first acquaintance with the Sessional School arose from his connection with the Society for Suppression of Begging, who had placed at that seminary the children that were under their care. It was at that time in its first stage, and was taught by a Mr Brown. The writer's visits at this period, though few, impressed him with a very high opinion of the utility of the monitorial system, if rightly conducted, in furthering the important object of general education. He also paid several visits to the school, after it had received the improvements suggested by Dr Brunton, on his return from London, when it was under the tuition of Mr Bathgate, now one of the burgh teachers in Peebles, and was satisfied that it had indeed, in the meantime, undergone very great improvements, which amply compensated the meritorious exertions of its directors. A circumstance soon after this occurred, which rendered his visits to the school daily. In the course of the winter 1819-20, he had a particular charge allotted to him of the fund subscribed for behoof of the operative weavers, thrown out of employment by the pressure of the times. By a wise resolution of the managers of that fund, it was determined that the draw-boys under their charge should be sent to school; and the very favourable opinion that he entertained of the high state of order and discipline to which the Sessional School had been brought by the exertions of its directors, induced him immediately to suggest that seminary for the purpose. Lads of this description, of course, required incessant superintendence. In consequence of the regular visits which he thus found necessary, he had a good opportunity afforded him of becoming acquainted both with the conduct and progress of the pupils under his own immediate charge, and also with the general condition of the whole school. He was also induced personally to examine the lads, in order to ascertain their proficiency. This was at first done only at intervals, but as his interest in their improvement increased, became more and more frequent, and at length daily. These examinations awakened in the youth additional ardour, which communicated itself to their companions in the same classes. Mr Bathgate, whose zeal never allowed him to omit anything which promised advantage to his school, respectfully requested that he would not confine his attention to these classes only, but would take an interest also in the other classes of the seminary, a wish which was afterwards also communicated in a most liberal and gratifying manner, in a letter from the secretary in name of the directors. In consequence of this request, he did not think himself at liberty to close his labours, when the circumstances which first called them forth were at an end, and they were accordingly continued.

"While he was thus employed, very serious doubts used frequently to come across his mind, whether he was doing all the good, which others were, perhaps, too easily inclined to imagine. The children were taught, indeed, to read, but the doubt was, whether they had been made such masters of their own language, as, in future life, to give them any pleasure in reading, or to enable them to derive much profit from it. They had learned their catechism, but were they much wiser, with regard to the truths which it contained? The Bible was read as a task, but was it not, also like a task, forgotten? The more he inquired into the actual condition of the lower orders, the more he was convinced that reading, together with spelling out the meaning of what they read, was too formidable an attempt to be frequently resorted to by them, and that even of those who did read, few had recourse to the books calculated to give them the most useful instruction, because they were unable to understand their language, while most resorted to works of a lighter and unfortunately less unexceptionable kind, which they found it not so difficult to comprehend. This evil called loudly for a remedy, which the meagre explanations, introduced along with the other practices of the Madras System (however useful to a certain limited extent) did not supply. He, therefore, felt an extremely strong anxiety to give the school more of an intellectual tone, not only to enable the pupils better to understand what they read there, but also to give them a taste for profitable reading, and make them understand whatever they should afterwards have occasion to read. The task did not appear to him to be without difficulty, nor was he unconscious of the presumptuous nature of any such attempt upon his part. Still, however, if he left it untried, the opportunity which he now possessed of doing something, however little, in this way, might be entirely lost. Were he to content himself with proposing the scheme to others, it might, and in all probability would, be treated as visionary. He therefore resolved, silently, to do his best. And so silently indeed, and with so little stir did the thing proceed, that neither the directors, nor even the master, knew what was going on, till they heard the children of the highest class, to whom he first confined his attempt, answering questions of an unusual nature. In the commencement of the attempt, he received even far stronger proofs than he had at all previously anticipated, of its extreme necessity. He found, that he had by no means formed an adequate conception of the gross misapprehensions into which even the ablest children fall, regarding the meaning of what they read. He saw, of course, still more strongly, the necessity of perseverance, and in order the better to accomplish his object, he, with the cordial approbation of the directors, compiled a new school-book, better adapted to his purpose than the highest one at that time in use. As soon as it was sufficiently proved that the plan was both practicable and beneficial, a series of works was prepared for the same purpose, and with the like approbation. The result is well known to all who are acquainted with the school. He shall only now remark that those who imagine that it was from the first anticipated by him in its full extent, pay a compliment to his discernment, to which he feels that he can have no just claim. A far more moderate degree of success was all he then ventured to expect, and an insurance to that extent would have amply satisfied him.—Account of the Edinburgh Sessional School, &c., pp. 25, 29.

Along with the improvements in the reading department new life was given to that of arithmetic. Grammar, geography, and other branches were afterwards introduced, among which was the most important of all, viz., religious knowledge, instruction in which forms a regular part of the daily work of the Sessional School.

In the particulars mentioned by Mr Wood, in the very interesting extract which we have quoted, we find a satisfactory explanation of the wonderful success that has crowned his efforts. He came into a school conducted upon the best principles of education then known, and these principles were carried into effect by an energetic teacher, under the personal direction and superintendence of such men as Dr Thomson and Dr Brunton. In the Madras system there is much that is truly admirable, particularly in the great principle of mutual tuition, and in the scope which the classification of the children affords for the exercise of the principle of emulation. Along with many fooleries, it must be allowed that Joseph Lancaster had ingrafted various important improvements upon the system which he borrowed from Dr Bell. And in a school where the combined excellencies of the Madras and Lancasterian methods were exhibited, many advantages were enjoyed. Mr Wood duly appreciated these advantages, and soon carried them to the utmost extent that their authors could have anticipated.

If Mr Wood had been an ordinary man, he would have rested satisfied with what he had done, and the Sessional School would have been considered merely as one of the best conducted seminaries under the monitorial system. Or if he had been a mere enthusiast or empiric in education, like too many others, upon perceiving that there were defects under the previous systems, he would have set all that had been done by his predecessors wholly aside, and would have proceeded upon some new scheme that was to supersede all the past, and prove a specific for the removal of ignorance, without labour to the teacher or the pupil. But Mr Wood was neither the one nor the other, and, like all men of true genius in whatever department, he appropriated all that was valuable in the labours of those who had gone before him, and made their discoveries the vantage ground from which he rose to new improvements. The essential defects of the Madras and Lancasterian systems consisted in their attaching too much importance to mere forms, and in their addressing themselves to a limited class of faculties. Their machinery, however, afforded scope for calling forth all the mental powers, and of this Mr Wood fully availed himself.

It is obvious that nature has given to Mr Wood that, without which there never will be a good teacher,—we mean delight in the work of tuition for its own sake. It must be taken into account also, when inquiring into the causes of his success, that he was a man of liberal education, and had enjoyed the benefit of the instructions of Dr Adam, rector of the High School, one of the most distinguished teachers under the old system. Mr Wood also engaged in the work, not as a professional schoolmaster, but as a philanthropist. His object was not to establish a high character as a teacher, but to do good to the young persons whom he found in the school. In this way he was freed from any temptation to aim at singularity or novelty, merely for its own sake. He silently made his experiments one by one, ever following nature as his guide; and it was not till an extraordinary improvement was witnessed in his pupils, that even he himself was led to suppose that there was anything remarkable in the method he was following. To this hour it is not the least honourable trait in Mr Wood's character, nor the least distinctive feature in his system, that he makes no pretensions to having introduced a method either essentially new in all its principles, or complete in all its parts. The interesting experiments that are continually going on are ever suggesting new views; and, holding by the same great principles, improvements in detail are introduced, we believe, up to the present hour.

The most remarkable circumstances connected with the Sessional School, are the extent and accuracy of the information of the pupils—the intelligence and wonderful readiness displayed in their answers to the questions put to them upon general subjects—and the life and spirit with which their various tasks are performed. We have been particularly struck with the amount of their scriptural knowledge, and the clearness of their statements upon doctrinal topics; and few visitors, we believe, are present at an examination of any of the classes upon the Scriptures, without being delighted with the views of divine truth that are brought forward, or even without having something new suggested to their minds.

The extraordinary proficiency of the pupils in the Sessional School is, in no inconsiderable degree, to be ascribed to matters of arrangement and order, of which our limits prevent us from giving an account here, and which cannot, perhaps, be fully understood without personal inspection. Much also is owing to the remarkable combination of qualities by which Mr Wood is so eminently fitted for imparting knowledge, and for calling forth into activity the youthful faculties. The general principles, however, on which Mr Wood proceeds, are of such a nature, that every judicious parent, and every teacher of ordinary intelligence, may, to a certain extent, avail himself of them.

"In all their arrangements, they have regarded their youngest pupil, not as a machine, or an irrational animal that must be driven, but as an intellectual being who may be led; endowed, not merely with sensation and memory, but with perception, judgment, conscience, affections, and passions; capable, to a certain degree, of receiving favourable or unfavourable impressions, of imbibing right or wrong sentiments, of acquiring good or bad habits; strongly averse to application, where its object is unperceived or remote, but, on the other hand, ardently curious, and infinitely delighting in the display of every new attainment which he makes. It has accordingly been their anxious aim to interest, no less than to task—to make the pupil understand (as much as possible) what he is doing, no less than to exact from him its performance—familiarily to illustrate, and copiously to exemplify, the principle, no less than to hear him repeat the words of a rule—to speak to him, and by all means to encourage him to speak, in a natural language, which he understands, rather than in irksome technicalities, which the pedant might approve—to keep him, while in school, not only constantly, but actively, energetically employed, to inspire him with a zeal for excelling in whatever is his present occupation, (whether it be study or amusement,) and even where he is incapable of excelling others, still, by noticing, with approbation, every step, however little, which he makes towards improvement, to delight him with the consciousness of excelling his former self." Ibid. pp. 2, 3.

Acting upon these principles, Mr Wood, as soon as the children know their letters, and are able to form them into words of one syllable, takes care that the intellect, and, in so far as possible, the heart and the affections, should be called into exercise, in the performance of every task. The following illustration is given by Mr Wood, from the lessons in words not having more than four letters:—

"God bids the sun to rise, and he bids it set. He doth give the rain and the dew to wet the soil; and at his will it is made dry. The heat and the cold come from him. He doth send the snow, and the ice, and the hail; and at his word, they melt away. He now bids the tree to put on its leaf, but ere long he will bid the leaf to fade, and make the tree to be bare. He bids the wind to blow, and it is he who bids it to be calm. He sets a door as it were on the sea, and says to it, Thus far only must thou come."

"On the above passage, the child is asked some such questions as the following: Who bids the sun to rise? What is meant by the sun rising? Where it rises? When it rises? What its rising occasions? Who bids it set? What is meant by setting? What is meant by dew? What is meant by soil? What good is done by wetting the soil? When the tree puts on its leaf? What is meant by the leaf fading, and the tree being bare? When this happens? What are snow, and ice, and hail?" &c. Ibid. pp. 184, 195.

The same method is pursued in every succeeding step. No word is employed without its meaning being explained: no sentence read, without its separate parts being analysed. There is nothing merely mechanical. The memory is never exercised to the neglect of the other powers. In the religious department, the questions founded on the answers in the Shorter Catechism, the explanations of the parables, and the exercises on Scripture biography, appear to us particularly excellent. We shall conclude our extracts with an illustration of the last named subject, which we give in the hope that it may induce such of our readers as are engaged in the instruction of youth, and especially Sabbath school teachers, to procure Mr Wood's little work on Scripture Biography, and employ it in the work of tuition.

"John the Baptist.—Do you remember any of the prophecies concerning him? (Isaiah xl. Malachi iii. iv.) Who was his father? and his mother? Relate the circumstances attending his birth. Why did he receive the name of John? What is said of him in his early years? Where were those years passed? (Luke i.) What was the occupation of his riper years? Where did he preach? (Mat. iii. Mark i. Luke iii.) Was there any thing particular in his dress? or in his food? (Mat. iii. Mark i.) What remark did the unbelieving Jews make upon the singularity of his mode of life? (Mat. xi. Luke vii.) What duty did he particularly enforce? (Mat. iii. Mark i. Luke iii.) Was he at pains to shew them that repentance implied reformation of life? What did he say upon this subject? (Mat. iii. Luke iii.) What answer did he give to the people when they, before being baptized, asked what they should do? What answer did he give to the publicans, when they asked the same question? What answer did he give to the soldiers? (Luke iii.) Who was the principal personage that he baptized? Relate the circumstances attending that baptism. (Mat. iii. Mark i. Luke iii.) What account did the Baptist give of himself? (John i.) What account did he give of Christ? (Mat. iii. Mark i. Luke iii. John i.) What did he say when he pointed out Christ to his disciples? Do you remember who any of these disciples were? (John i.) What message did John send to Christ? What answer did Christ return? What account did Christ give of John? (Mat. xi. Luke vii.) What death did John die? Relate the circumstances. (Mark vi. Mat. xvi. Luke ix.)"

Mr Wood has now for twenty years devoted himself to the labour of gratuitously instructing the children of the lower classes. In the Sessional School, his success has been complete. But the fruits of his labours have by no means been confined to that seminary. He has given a powerful and general impulse to the cause of education throughout Scotland, and indeed in many other parts of the world. Many of his pupils are now conducting extensive seminaries of education upon his principles. All the teachers employed by the committees of the General Assembly in their schools in the Highlands and Islands, undergo a course of preparatory training under the care of Mr Wood; and teachers from all quarters visit the Sessional School, and carry many of its plans along with them. In consequence of this, more enlarged views are generally entertained on the subject of education, higher qualifications are required in teachers, and views of incalculable benefit open on the intellectual and moral condition of future generations.

THE RAINBOW, A SIGN OF THE COVENANT.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Helensburgh.

"I do set my bow in the cloud."—GEN. ix. 13.
"And there was a rainbow round about the throne, like unto an emerald."—REV. iv. 3.

LET the philosopher consider the rainbow as a phenomenon of nature; it is for the theologian to deal with it as a token of grace. Let others write its history; we prefer to explain and to illustrate its mystery. The bow which, after the deluge, God is said to have "set in the cloud," is not to be considered as having been set there for the first time as a natural sign. From these words we are not to infer that the rainbow was an after thought and an after production of the Creator,—that it was unknown to the antediluvians,—that it neither spanned their skies, nor gladdened their hearts, nor glittered on their mountains; or that the first time it shone forth it served only to gild their graves. All that is to be inferred from these words is, that it was "set," or, as the word signifies more truly, "appointed," then and there, for the first time, as a token of grace, as a sign and seal of the covenant which God had made with Noah. The rainbow which the apostolic seer saw in vision, encircling the throne of God, is generally supposed to have been a sign of the covenant made with Christ, and which, by way of eminence, is usually called the covenant of grace, and of which the covenant made with Noah was a type. The correspondence between the rainbow and the covenant, it may be interesting and perhaps instructive to some to have pointed out and illustrated; and this we now propose to do.

1. Was the bow of God's setting in the cloud?—the covenant was of God's making. "I do set my bow in the cloud," is his language respecting the one. "I have made a covenant with my chosen," is his language respecting the other. The "bow in the cloud," is indeed "the bow of God." That stupendous arch of light, who but He could have cast over the earth? That sacred sign, who could have set "in the cloud" but He who has the treasures of the cloud in his keeping,—its tempests and its thunders. He "who holds the winds in his fists, and the waters in the hollow of his hand?" Yet not more visibly is the "bow in the cloud" the "bow of God," than the covenant of grace is the covenant of God. Not more evident is it that that sacred sign is of God's setting in the sky, than that his is the "rainbow round about the throne." Of the covenant God was not only the maker, but of its making he was the mover; hence these words, "Deliver from going down to the pit, for I have found a ransom." To find out this ransom did he summon a general assembly of angels; did he call a council even of the Trinity? No, the only council called by the eternal Father was held in his own heart; his only advisers were his own thoughts in that council; the only orator that spake was his own grace. Of his making with Christ it is of his making also with man. The acceptance of the covenant on our part indeed, in virtue of which it becomes ours,—ours its righteousness, and ours its rewards,—is a personal act; with our heart it is received, with our hand it is signed; but the will to do the one and the power to do the other are of God. The making of the covenant with us, then, as well as with Christ, is his work, and is to the praise and the glory of his grace; and hence the language of David, "He hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure." As "the bow in the cloud," then, is of God's setting, the covenant, whether considered in relation to the transactions of eternity with Christ, or in relation to the transactions of time with the Christian, is of God's making.

2. Was the "bow set in the cloud" as a sign and a security that the "waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh?" Was it on this account that to the world's "grey fathers" it was an object of wonder and delight? Was it on this account that, in the early ages of the world, when as yet, on the majestic but melancholy face of nature, the scars of the deluge were distinct and deep; when every sight that met the eye of the beholder bore upon it the impress of ruin, and when every sound that broke upon his ear seemed to echo the shriekings of those waters that had so lately rolled their waves of death over the highest mountains, burying, in their unsounded depths, the vast population of a world? Was it, we ask, in these circumstances, when remembrance was so fresh, and when apprehension was so fearful, on this account, that the mother, as she held up her child to gaze on its radiant form, taught him to hail and to bless it as the "bow of God?" To us and to all the tribes of man, wherever its sacred character is known, is it, on this account, an object of highest interest still? While spanning the sky above and brightening the earth beneath, but exercising, as a natural phenomenon, not the slightest influence over its winds and its waves, is the "bow in the cloud" a greater security to the earth, that the waters shall not again overflow it, than the sands by which it is embanked, and the rocks by which it is fenced and girdled? In these respects it resembles the covenant of grace, and answers to the "rainbow round about the throne, and which, in sight, is like unto an emerald." When the winds are up,—when the tempest is forth,—when day is suddenly and awfully obscured,—when it seems as if the windows of heaven were once more about to be opened, and as if the fountains of the great deep were once more about to be unsealed,—when the sea is roaring and the hearts of men are failing them for fear, not only on the open seas in frail and foundering ships, but on the solid land; does a sight of the "bow in the cloud" hush our fears, and banish our apprehensions of a second flood? Thus it is with the sinner when awakened to a sense of his sin and misery, and when filled, for the first time, with apprehensions of the divine wrath, convinced that he is a sinner, but ignorant of Christ as a Saviour; filled with an apprehension of the divine wrath, but without an idea of the divine mercy; brought to a discovery of God as a sin-avenger, but having no knowledge of him as a sin-forgiver—of the law with its penalties, but ignorant of the Gospel with its promises—of Sinai with its tempests, and threatenings, and terrors, but ignorant of Zion with its seal and its sceptre of mercy, its visions of peace, its voices of love and its invitations of grace; he is overwhelmed with a sense of his guilt, and under an apprehension of the wrath revealed against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men, and so justly due to him. The day darkens around him, hope dies within him, and he is all but driven to despair; darkness thus without, and despair within, deep calling unto deep, wave dashing upon wave, the windows of heaven opening, and the fountains of the great deep rending. The Word of God is read by him, or it is addressed to him; "its entrance giveth light." The rainbow round about the throne bursts upon his view; he is struck with its absorbing brilliance and glory; like the "bow in the cloud," he is assured that it is a symbol of mercy, a token of grace; that he who sits on the throne is a God of mercy and of grace; that on that rainbow-circled throne he sits not only willing but waiting to be gracious; that just as every man for whom the rainbow gilds the heavens, who lives beneath its all-embracing arch is safe from the waters of a second flood, so every man who will take hold of the covenant, who will accept of Christ "as the covenant of the people," who will place himself beneath the "rainbow that is round about the throne," is as safe and secure from the wrath to come as if no such wrath were revealed or deserved; he believes, he obeys, he places himself beneath the bow of God, and is saved; nor is he saved only, he feels that he is saved; the burden falls from his heart, the sunbeams play around his head, the calm of heaven descends and dwells upon his soul, the earth brightens at his feet, his closed lips are opened, he breaks into singing, and the burden of his song is, "O Lord I will praise thee, though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me." "Behold God is my salvation: I will trust and not be afraid, for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song, he also is become my salvation."

That the believer never loses this sense of security we do not say, for this were to contradict at once all experience and all Scripture: "Zion hath said, the Lord hath forsaken me, and my God hath forgotten me." "They that fear the Lord, and obey the voice of his servants," are addressed as "walking in darkness, and having no light." The heart of the believer is often burdened, his peace is often disturbed, his hopes—those hopes which soared into heaven—are often darkened, and his lips are often sealed. For a small moment, however, will God forsake him, yes, with great mercies will he gather him. The rainbow that girds and that gilds the throne of God, hidden for a time, bursts upon his view again, and, ere long, while he, who sits "upon the throne" and "the flood," proclaims, "For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I should not be wroth with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."—These words, in the dark and desolate hour of the believer, "makes all things new."

3. Was the "bow set in the cloud" consequently to Noah's sacrifice, in "which God smelled a sweet savour?" The covenant was ratified and revealed, in consequence of Christ's sacrifice, and of God's "smelling a sweet savour" in it.

On the waters "assuaging and abating from off the face of the earth," and on Noah's leaving the ark, which, after floating for months on the bosom of the flood, with the few survivors in its keeping of the race that lay sleeping in death below, rested at last upon the mountain of Ararat, he built an altar to the Lord, and on that altar offered sacrifice, in which it is said that the Lord "smelled a sweet savour;" and because of his being pleased with it, or, as the word signifies, propitiated by it, "He said in his heart, that for man's sake he would not curse the ground any more, and that he would not smite any more every living thing as he had done;" "which things are an allegory." The wrath of God being due to sin, being revealed against it, how was it that, on the entrance of sin, it was not forthwith and fully poured out upon it? Why, instead of darkness gathering around the throne of God, and "thick clouds of the sky," was it encircled with, a "rainbow?" Or if it be said that, on the entrance of sin, darkness gathered there, and "thick clouds of the sky," why did not these clouds burst, and discharge their thunder stores upon the earth? Why, in these clouds, black with "death and woe," as they doubtless were, did he "set his bow" as a sign of grace? Why, in one word, instead of a proclamation of banishment from God's presence, did there go forth from his throne a proclamation of pardon to the guilty, and an invitation of recall to the apostate race of man? For an answer, we bid you turn to the altar and the sacrifice of Christ, "who," says the apostle, "loved us, and gave himself for us, an offering and a sweet smelling savour unto God." The truth of Christ's sacrifice it is not our object at present to establish; we would observe merely that its necessity was absolute. Mercy might have her seat and her sceptre, but justice must have her sacrifice and her sword; a rainbow might be lighted up around the throne of God in heaven, but on the altar of justice a fire must be lighted up on earth; mercy might brighten the throne of God, but justice and judgment must sustain it; it might be converted into a throne of grace, but it must not cease the less to be a throne of glory; for which end, so loving and so lofty, so glorious to God and so gracious to man, Christ gave himself an "offering and a sacrifice of a sweet smelling savour unto God;" while, in token to all the tribes of the earth that this end has been effected, there is a "bow in the cloud," "a rainbow round about the throne."

4. Is "the bow in the cloud" formed by the rays of the sun? Without the sun, would there be no rainbow? Without Christ, the "Sun of Righteousness," there would be no covenant, no "sure mercies of David," no enlightening mercies for the ignorant, no pardoning mercies for the guilty, no adopting mercies for the outcast, no sanctifying mercies for the polluted, and no saving mercies for the lost; but for Him, whose symbol is the sun, there would have been "no rainbow round about the throne."

Again, is the rainbow formed not only by means of the rays of light, but does it present these rays collected and condensed? In the covenant, in like manner, we have not an exhibition merely of single and separate perfections of the divine character, but an assemblage of the whole; not like the light that is everywhere diffused, but like the light, when so collected and so commingling, as to form the radiant bow of heaven. Thus, as the rainbow is the glory of light, the covenant is the glory of God. While creation emits a ray of his wisdom, a ray of his power, a ray of his holiness, a ray of his justice, a ray of his goodness, and a ray of his truth, as a ray of light is emitted from some dim and distant star, from this assemblage of his perfections in the covenant there bursts forth a perfect blaze, as from a constellation of ten thousand suns, when each of them shineth in his strength; and thus, while on creation's scroll the character of God is but half and dimly written, and while those who would decypher its marred and mutilated legends, are perplexed and pained, on the roll of the covenant it is written fully and clearly, so that he "who runs may read," and he who reads must be filled with wonder and joy. Nor is this wonder and joy confined to the bosoms of men; they have been created in the bosoms of angels,—into these "things the angels desire to look." Nor among the objects that have attracted their attention, have any excited a deeper admiration, or rivetted a gladder gaze, or called forth a louder and loftier doxology from their adoring ranks, than when first burst on their view "the rainbow round about the throne."

Lastly, is the "bow in the cloud" indebted not only to the sun for its existence, but to the cloud itself in which it is set, and on which it shines?

It is so with the covenant; not only is it indebted for its existence to the "Sun of Righteousness," but to the dark cloud of sin and hell. Were there no cloud, there would be no rainbow; and had it not been for sin, and death, and hell, there would have been no covenant. As a cloud is the prerequisite of the rainbow, sin is the prerequisite of grace. Had not the sword of justice been unsheathed, the sceptre of mercy would not have been outstretched. Had not the throne of God been insulted by the sin of man, by the Saviour of man it had never become a throne of grace; while, to woo us back to its foot, and to win us back to kneel and to adore there with those elders of light and immortality who surround it, no rainbow had been ever lighted up to encircle and to adorn it. Thus has God brought good out of evil, light out of darkness, and life out of death,—thus, where "sin abounded, grace has been made much more to abound,"—"thus, as it often happens to the evening sun that the clouds which accompanied it in its journey through the firmament, and oft hid its brightness from the observer's eye, form themselves into a gorgeous couch of gold and vermilion, on which the descending luminary seems to settle in majesty, giving beauty to its appearance, and brilliance to its departure,"—and thus, as on the bosom of the cloud, light is reflected in the glories of the bow, and the darker bosom of sin and death, God makes, and will for ever make, to be reflected, the glories of his grace,—and thus, as on the clouds that gather and blacken in our skies, God sets his bow, where it shines in beauty undecaying, and serenity undisturbed, an object of wonder and delight to all the tribes of this lower world, forming on, and reflected from, the clouds that will gather and blacken on the world of woe, the “rainbow that is round about the throne” of God will shine an object of matchless wonder and delight in the gaze of an adoring universe for ever.

While we think, then, on the entrance of sin into the earth, on all that it is, and on all it has done; and while, over the miseries with which this guilty world is full, over its bodily pains, over its mortal anguish, over its blighted hopes, over its broken hearts, over its darkened chambers, over its dying beds, over its crowds of mourners, over its peopled sepulchres, over its sights of sorrow, over its sounds of woe, sounds which, whether issuing from mansions of marble or cottages of clay, from foundering ships, from famishing cities, from plague-struck lands, from the living or the dying, have never ceased to be uttered, and blending in one mighty wail to ascend unto heaven; and while over the new and unexperienced miseries it has yet to be smitten with and yet to endure, over the smouldering fires, over the gathering terrors of its DYING DAY, while, we say, over miseries like these, and over the miseries of the world to come, of which these are but the type, we cannot but “weep and lament;”—is it true that, but for the sacrifice and the death of Christ, the wickedness of man, great as it is in the earth, would have been a thousand times greater;—is it true that, owing to his death, the wickedness of man has not only been stayed from increasing, but the wrath which is treasured up against it from bursting;—is it true that, from all this wickedness, and all this wrath, a way of escape has been effected for us, and revealed to us;—is it true that if, from the entrance of sin, God has taken occasion to demonstrate the inflexibility of his justice, and to pour around it a most awful illustration, he has, at the same time, snatched the occasion, to demonstrate the riches and extent of his mercy, yea, to reveal the very existence of that attribute to his creatures, a perfection till that time unsignalized and unknown;—is it true that if, by the entrance of sin into our world, creation has been covered with ruin, by the blood of the covenant this ruin has not only been retrieved, but gloriously reversed;—is it true, that if the first paradise has been lost, a more blissful paradise has been won;—is it true, that the way to this paradise has been made known, that its gates to all the tribes of man have been thrown open;—and is it true that, with the majestic rainbow of the covenant for their arch, they stand in all their majesty of mercy, open night and day? Say then if, while over the existence, and aboundings, and miseries of sin, we have cause to weep and lament, if, over the existence, and aboundings, and blessings of grace, we have not cause to wonder and to rejoice?

THE NATURAL DEPRAVITY OF THE HUMAN HEART:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES FERGUSON, A. M.

Minister of Inch, Wigtonshire.

“The heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.”—ECCLES. ix. 3.

THE scope of the book of Ecclesiastes is to teach the vanity of all earthly objects, and the “chief end,”—the highest good of man. Undoubtedly, man viewed merely as an inhabitant of this world, entirely engrossed with its pursuits and pleasures, “at his best state is altogether vanity.” He passes his life “in a vain show,” disappears from the field of human existence, and his place knows him no more. It is only by connecting the visible with the invisible world that this earth is redeemed from its vanity. It is immortality that imparts to human existence its grandeur and glory. It is religion that gives to the actions of men an attitude of true dignity.

It is true that this world and its inhabitants, as being the works of God, are all great and glorious. They are full of evidences of divine power, wisdom, and goodness, and are not to be vilified. The royal preacher does not denominate these things vanity. It is the misapplication or perversion of earthly good that is vanity,—resting in the objects of this world alone, without reference to that great Being from whose supreme will they derived their existence, and whose will is also the law of their continuance, and without reference to the ultimate end of creation, and the advancement of the divine glory. Man, in himself, separated from the great Author of his existence, is altogether mean and insignificant. It is God that made him, that preserves him, that redeems him, that designs him for high destinies. It is on God that he depends for the least and greatest of his enjoyments, for the life that now is, and the prospect of a better and immortal life. But if man lives “without God in the world,” and acts independently of him; if his actions have no reference to immortality, then “vanity of vanities” is the characteristic of him, and of all his pursuits.

It is a sad truth, that, by nature, our affections are estranged from God, and our lives contrary to his pure laws. Although He is the fountain of all our happiness, we are alienated from him, and studiously seek to find our happiness from other sources. This is the great malady of our nature, this is the origin of all those exhibitions of vanity which characterise our pursuits. It is, however, the characteristic of the renewed and sanctified creature, that he is, in some measure, delivered from this evil, and led to place his delights in God, and to direct his views to future glory.

It is said in the text, “the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.” This is a true and just description of man in his natural state,—unrestrained by religion—alienated from God—and without that dignified direction of his powers and faculties which ought to distinguish the immortal creature.

I. The text says, “the heart of the sons of men is full of evil.”

“The imagination of man’s heart is evil from his youth.” “The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.” We have within us a “carnal mind,” which “is enmity against God.

for it is not subject to the law of God." There is an "evil treasure" in our hearts, which "bringeth forth evil things." "As a fountain casteth out her waters," so do our hearts cast out wickedness. It is from the heart that the evil actions of the life proceed. It is the well-spring of corruption that is within us, that stains and deforms the outward man.

A pure, perfect, exalted, and truly virtuous frame of mind, implies that God will be revered, and loved, and delighted in, and thought of, as he ought to be. He is in himself all that is glorious and excellent, all that can engage the affections of holy creatures. Can that frame of mind be sound and good which repudiates the love and service of the High and Holy One? Can those rational creatures be pursuing the end and glory of their existence who know not and fear not God? No. This implies a distempered frame of mind, a depraved and degraded nature in the creature. There is no purity, perfection, and soundness in that soul that neglects and despises Him who is the source and centre of all good. And can we say that we reverence and love God as we ought? Can we say that we make him the object of our supreme delight? Can we say that our souls are full of glowing piety? Do our spirits rejoice to seek communion with our great and Almighty Father? Alas! how little are our affections and delights directed to him, how little of pious intercourse have our spirits with him. Sustainer of our hourly existence, and source of all our joys and blessings, though he be, must it not be said of many of us, that he is not in all our thoughts? Must it not be said of many, that they are insensible to all the grandeur of his power, and to all the attractive charms of his mercy? They "live without God in the world," they disown his sovereignty over the affairs of men, they say, "we will not have the Lord to reign over us." The perishing vanities of an hour receive all that homage of the heart which God claims as his due, and which it should be our delight to give. This latent impiety breaks forth in neglect of the ordinances of God, in profanation of his holy name, in acts of irreverence and disobedience. Shall we not, therefore, conclude that "the heart of the sons of men is full of evil?" It is destitute of the prime and most essential virtue, it is full of impiety, the most malignant kind of sin.

The heart that is pure and virtuous will feel candidly, generously, and kindly with regard to others; it will love their persons, and desire their happiness. No malevolent passion will darken it, or obstruct the play of its benevolent sympathies. It will feel for others with lively sensibility, and have a sincere interest in their welfare. But where is the heart that is thus pure and virtuous? Where is the heart, the lustre of whose charity is never darkened? Where is the heart that feels for the happiness of others with all the solicitude of a personal interest? Alas! such pure and virgin gold can scarcely be found in the barren wastes of this world. Is it not the case that the heart is often full of bitterness, and malice, and wrath, and envy, and impatient irritability? Does it not swell with hatred? does it not boil with anger? Instead of rejoicing in the happiness of others, and contemplating their success with complacency, it often pines with secret envy. How often do slight differences divest it of all candid and charitable feeling? How often do trifling injuries awaken the flames of violent resentment, or the smouldering fire of lasting rancour? Does not the heart often derive malevolent pleasure from contemplating the frailties and crimes of others, or feel a cruel joy in their misfortunes and failures? Verily, "the heart of the sons of men is full of evil," full of gall and bitterness and fiendish passions.

The heart that is pure and virtuous will be well regulated, and free from the stains of licentious appetite; its thoughts, and feelings, and inclinations will rise above all that is low, and sensual, and criminal. But where is the heart that is thus pure and virtuous? Does not the imagination too often wander uncontrolled to forbidden and sinful objects? Do not unchaste thoughts and desires sully the purity of the soul? Does not the heart delight in carnal and criminal joys, in pleasures that are low, gross, and sensual? It rises not to the bright atmosphere of moral purity, but broods over the taint and corruption of the world. Verily, "the heart of the sons of men is full of evil," full of criminal thoughts and carnal passions.

The truly excellent soul will be raised above all mean and mercenary motives; it will have no strong and unhallowed love for the gains of mammon. But, alas, how large a share of the affections is engrossed by the wealth of this world! How often is the love of gain the master passion of the heart! How often are the worship, and esteem, and trust, which ought to be given to God alone, given to the perishing treasures of the earth! So distorted is the care and devotion of the heart,—so mean and unworthy are the objects of its affection and pursuit. Again we are forced to the conclusion, that "the heart of the sons of men is full of evil."

We refrain from filling up the picture by materials drawn from the darker passages of the world's history, or the records of crime; we speak of the general state of man, and general history and experience do sufficiently prove that "the heart of the sons of men is full of evil."

Search the heart closely and candidly, and you will discover with what unseemly furniture you have replenished its chambers. The God who made it is denied admittance. Its doors are barred against the light of that heaven for which it was destined; but all that is dark, and vile, and vicious, find within it a welcome and secure abode.

II. The text says, that "madness is in the hearts of men while they live."

No man, however infatuated or absurd, has much self-consciousness of such qualities. He may be sometimes aware that his conduct is different from that of those around him, but his self-love prevents any suspicion that the difference arises from any deficiency of wisdom in himself. In the wildest sallies of his folly he enjoys the complacent regards of his own heart and deals out his unsparing censures on the infatuation of his neighbours. The self-complacency of men, in their most extravagant eccentricities and strangest phrenzies, is often quite imperturbable. Hence arise mutual accusations of folly and madness, often equally just in their application to the mutual accusers, but thrown out with equal blindness of any applicability to themselves. A degree of varied infatuation seems to be the universal characteristic of man. It is in this light that many of our fancies and pursuits must appear in the sight of superior orders of intelligence.

Is there any thing more incompatible with the dictates of reason than the conduct of the miser? To amass riches, not for the sake of their use, not for the sake of the necessaries and comforts which they may procure, but for the mere pleasure of amassing and contemplating the magnitude of the heap, is so inexpressibly absurd that it has been a fertile theme for the satirist in every age. To aim after an honest independence, to seek wealth as the means of procuring the necessaries and comforts of life, are not only intelligible things, but we are prompted to them by a law of our nature. But is there anything in the records of lunacy that can rival the absurdity of heaping up riches, merely for the strange pleasure of contemplating a hoard? This, surely, is one instance in which we are justified in saying that "madness is in the heart." While the miser lives, the whole of his care and affection is devoted to the most stupid and senseless of objects.

But the opposite character of the spendthrift gives us an equal exhibition of the folly and madness of the heart. His thoughtless extravagance, his reckless waste of the means of doing good, his unprofitable squandering of his property, his entailing on himself embarrassment and poverty, are sufficient to evince his infatuation, even in the estimation of sober-minded worldly men.

All the devotees of sinful pleasure are convicted of madness. What can be more insane than to follow those things which lead to lasting regret or painful remorse? How often do men bitterly rue and curse the moments they have devoted to false delights; they feel agonizingly their madness, and loathe it and mourn over it; but, ah! with infatuation still greater, they again plunge into the same guilty excesses, and again suffer all the bitterness of self-condemnation.

Can we conceive madness greater than that of the victim of intemperance? He cannot be blind to the ruin he is inflicting upon himself. He makes his constitution a wreck,—he exposes his life to continual hazard and danger,—he involves his affairs in disorder and confusion,—he impoverishes and neglects the care and interests of his family; his eyes are open to all these sad consequences, and yet, with an infatuation greater than that of the most outrageous lunatic, he clings to that which is the source of all these evils.

The dominion of any passion is a temporary insanity. During a fit of anger a man is blind to the suggestions of reason, he scarcely knows what he is doing,—he does not see the consequences of his conduct,—he is hurried on by a wild impetuosity which he cannot restrain.

These are instances which prove that "madness is in the hearts of men while they live." But we have not yet stated the case in all its melancholy magnitude. The perverse opposition of men to the will, to the threatenings, to the merciful invitations of God, and the indifference which they exhibit to the eternal interests of their souls, still farther prove the marvellous infatuation of the heart.

That the will of the supreme Being is the law to which we ought to be conformed, is what sober and unprejudiced reason declares. The Sovereign of the universe is both capable of enjoining what is best, and has an unquestionable right to demand what service he pleases. Is that heart, then, wise and reasonable which prefers its own pleasures and inclinations to the will of God? Is that mind influenced by sound principles which, in its wretched frailty, follows its own direction, and sets at naught the commands of the Lord of all? We cannot designate, by any softer term, than that of madness, the opposition of heart and life which the creature manifests to the glorious and all-perfect Creator.

Our lives are in the hands of God; "in him we live, move, and have our being." It is in him, also, that our souls will find their highest good and their worthiest object of pursuit. How contrary, then, to every principle of reason and wisdom, is that aversion and alienation to God which prevail so strongly in the human heart! How absurd to seek no communion and intercourse with him whose awful presence ever surrounds us, and whose merciful providence ever upholds us! How foolish and senseless to cast away all our thoughts and affections on worthless objects, and to bestow none of them on the everlasting and unchangeable excellence of God!

Has not God denounced the most fearful threatenings against impenitence and guilt? Can these awful denunciations be read without making our hearts shudder with horror and dismay? Should not the menaced vengeance of the Almighty awaken an awful dread of offending him, paralyze every guilty emotion, and restrain every sinful act? Is it consistent with prudence, with common discretion, to brave the thunders of divine wrath? What, then, are we to say of the strange apathy of the human heart to God's threatenings, of the hardened impenitency which no denunciations of judgment to come, can alarm? What are we to say of those who go on in their wicked course in defiance of the divine displeasure? This must be infatuation! This must be madness! For a frail creature, called from the dust by the power of God, and continually dependent on his pleasure, to stand forth in an attitude of lofty defiance, and to brave the threatened vengeance of that God, in all its most terrible emblazonry, is insanity, unmatched in its kind and degree. Who but a maniac would bare his bosom to the lightning? Who but a maniac would walk through the consuming fire? And shall that man remain unconvinced of madness who provokes all the pains that Omnipotence can inflict?

God's invitations to repentance, and his promises to the truly penitent, are abundant, and full of the tenderest mercy. In his marvellous love he reveals a scheme of recovery and salvation to his ruined creatures; he provides means of assistance and grace adapted to our wants and feebleness; he places before our minds powerful inducements, and stirs our hearts by earnest persuasions. How welcome to the ruined sinner, it might be thought, must be these invitations and schemes of grace. It might be thought that the heart of every fallen man would rejoice at the coming of a Saviour, and would gladly accept of these aids to its feebleness, provided by a gracious God. Nothing must appear so singularly absurd, as that man, in the indifference or carelessness of his heart, or in the pride of his self-confidence, should reject the wisdom and power of God for his salvation. Nothing can be greater infatuation, than that man should despise the treasures of heaven's benignity, and turn a deaf ear to affectionate counsels, and recklessly neglect all those means by which his spirit might be sanctified and adorned for the enjoyment of everlasting bliss; yet, of all this absurdity and infatuation the human heart is guilty. How coldly are the offers of salvation received—how frequently is the grace of God rejected—with what impenetrable resistance does the heart receive the calls and persuasions of the divine Word! All day long does God stretch forth his hands; but, ah! it is to a disobedient and gainsaying people. Is there not infatuation in the hearts of men? Verily there "is madness in their hearts while they live."

That the salvation of the soul is precious—that the attainment of everlasting life is desirable—that our well-being through eternity is of supreme importance—that the happiness of heaven infinitely transcends all the pleasures of this world, are propositions to which our reason instantaneously assents. That these things should have influence on our present lives is acknowledged to be wise and prudent. But, ah! how little do men occupy themselves with the care of their souls! How little do they think of their future well-being! How little do they prepare for that awful eternity, within whose unfathomed abyss they must soon be embosomed! Do not multitudes live as if there was no judgment to come—no land of glory to hope for—no souls to be saved or lost? This surely argues a frenzied state of mind. What! Is there no instinct of self-preservation, that the precious soul should thus be wantonly destroyed? Inconceivable madness! that the happiness of heaven should be relinquished without a sigh, and forfeited without a grudge. What wild infatuation, to court everlasting misery—to expose ourselves to the awful danger of the inextinguishable fire! Yet such is the infatuation the human heart often exhibits. Verily, "there is madness in the hearts of men while they live."

We have now seen, that the "heart of the sons of men is full of evil," and that "madness is in their hearts while they live."

III. The text says, "after that they go to the dead." After a brief existence of evil, of folly, of infatuation, they descend to the grave. This is the end of their days, the termination of their career. The vapour appeareth for a little, and then vanisheth away. The spark gleams for a moment, and then is extinguished amid surrounding ashes. So unsubstantial and fleeting is man's earthly existence.

One might think, that all the ambition, and bustle, and activity, which are displayed on the theatre of the world, would have some more illustrious destiny. One might think, that the world, which awakened such ardent devotion, would bestow some more splendid reward. But all that the world can at last give us is a grave. This is all the reward it will bestow on its most devoted servants. Man frets his brief hour on the stage of time, and then mingles with the dust. "Like sheep they are laid in the grave, death shall feed upon them, and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling."

The grave is the house appointed for all living. We must soon be called to resign our souls to the God that gave them, and to commit our bodies to the earth. The living, active frame, must become a mass of loathsome putrefaction, food for revelling worms, and be resolved into its original dust. "Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth as a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not. There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground; yet through the scent of water it will bud and bring forth boughs like a plant. But man dieth, and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

Thus the dark night of death closes our earthly existence, and, as far as nature can certainly discern, our future prospects. Strain our natural vision to the utmost we cannot see beyond the grave. The bodily eye can discern no blissful isle of future repose beyond the ocean of death. The body possesses no innate power of revivifying itself—of gathering its scattered particles into a fairer and more glorious fabric. It lies "a kneaded clod in the valley," and "shall any following spring revive the ashes of the urn?"

The imagination may dream of purer climes, of calm and verdant regions, to which the soul shall be transported after death; but man has no power in himself, either to prolong or renew his existence. He cannot wing his way to the seat of bliss. He cannot make himself immortal. He lives a life of vanity and wickedness, and then descends to the grave. This is all of his existence that appears to the eye of nature.

Such, then, is man. "Evil is in his heart" continually. "Madness is in his heart while he lives," and after a short and feverish existence "he goes to the dead." How little is there, in this vain show, to fan our pride! Candid self-examination must abase us, and dispel every self-flattering emotion, all self-confidence, and fancied excellence; it should lead us to go to something beyond ourselves, on which to build our hopes, and to dignify our existence.

Ah! what can we expect from ourselves? What can we demand from God? What right can we have to the happiness of heaven, or how can we be prepared to enjoy it? What has there been in a life of evil, folly, and madness, to qualify for communion with God and everlasting blessedness? The withering curse of sin rests upon us. We lie under a sentence of condemnation, and we have no fitness for enjoying the holy beatitude of heaven.

Such is our condition by nature. It is grace that opens up more goodly prospects. The door of mercy is open, and the tree of life expands and flourishes in glorious majesty. The arm of salvation has been revealed, and recovery has been proclaimed to the ruined. "The gift of God is everlasting life, through Jesus Christ." This everlasting life consists not altogether in an immortal existence after death. It is not entirely prospective. It is a spiritual vitality, which must be begun in the present world, and shall be perfected in the skies. It consists in the possession of remission of sins and newness of life, in the enjoyment of divine favour, and the expansion of spiritual graces. In order to possess the everlasting life that is in Christ Jesus, we must be redeemed from the evil, the madness, and the guilt of the heart, and also from the power of the grave. We must be raised now, from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, and hereafter we shall enjoy unfading happiness. Christ conquers all our spiritual enemies, he takes away our guilt, he bestows power to escape the corruption that is in the world, he raises us from the tomb, and brings us to his Father's throne, where is fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore.

Let it be our holy object to escape the evil and corruption of our hearts. Let us no longer madly oppose ourselves to the will, and threatenings, and invitations of God, and ruin our own souls. Let our conversation be in heaven, from whence we look for the appearance of the Lord Jesus, who shall change our vile bodies, and make them like unto his glorious body. Let us always pray for divine grace to sanctify us; and let us make a diligent use of the means whereby Christ communicates the benefits of redemption.

SECTION VII.

RELIGIOUS CHARACTER IN DIFFERENT STATES OF SOCIETY.

THIS branch might be divided into many particulars. There is not a distinction in society which does not go to modify religious character. Some of these, however, stand out more prominently than others, and have, from their importance, special claims on our attention.

Of these, the difference between religious character in large towns and retired country places, is observable. To persons living in the country, who know the religion of large towns chiefly through newspapers, and what they observe of many coming from such places, desecrating the Sabbath and despising every thing strictly religious, it seems to consist very much in bustle, speech-making, and money-gathering, and to be greatly wanting in practical godliness. On the other hand, the inhabitants of towns are very apt to imagine, that every thing in the country is in a very dead and unprosperous state. And should some of the more active among town Christians happen to sojourn for a time in the country, they are disappointed in not finding the same religious machinery at work, with which they were accustomed in towns. There is truth at the bottom of both opinions. The besetting sin of Christians in the country is comparative deadness, or at least inactivity. They want the sharpening of the iron, so much enjoyed in towns. And the besetting sin of townsmen is, the comparative neglect of what is personal and domestic, and the evaporation of religious principle in religious excitement. We will, moreover, admit that an infusion of the zeal of towns may be advantageously applied to many parts in the country, and that some of the habits of the country might be naturalized in towns. But still, means suited to the one may be very unsuitable to the other; and while method is essential to success in both, it must, in both, be adapted to circumstances. In the country, families are apart from each other, or are, at least, less congregated than in towns. They generally know each other, and are often connected by ties of blood and affinity. And even where this is not the case, neighbourhood supplies the place of friendship, or, like it, erects, perhaps, between them an inseparable barrier of distance and discord. Each pious family has about it much of the individuality of a little church, and may command within its own sphere a very decided religious influence. And where several of these live near each other, no formal association could be more efficient than the natural and spontaneous intercourse which springs up between them. In the field, by the way side, in markets, and in each other's houses, they frequently meet, and their intercourse may be perfectly free and unembarrassed. On the other hand, the inhabitants of large towns are collected from all quarters, live often together as the floating tenants of some lodging-house or hotel; know little of each other, except when they meet in public. They are also accustomed to do every thing in public. Business, and politics, and economic arrangements are all discussed in public, and plans connected with them are often carried into effect by associations; and so is also their attempts to do good. It is well that it is so. The thing is practicable. It is suited to their circumstances,—it is so designed of God. In the country, the same means are neither necessary nor suitable. Let us, then, together admire the wisdom of God, in providing for the dissemination and cultivation of practical religion, both in town and country, and by means springing out of their respective circumstances. And while we admire, let us learn to judge charitably of each other. Moreover, it is well known to such as are acquainted with both, that the peculiarities on which a superficial observer is apt to fasten, are but as the shadings of what is complete and substantial underneath. There is much true devotion and deep Christian experience in towns, and there is much of the actual leavening process in the country, though the one be not regulated by the terms of a joint stock company, and the other be away from the retirements of the field and under other canopies than those of heaven.

Considerable diversity of religious character may be also observed in different ranks of society. A well bred gentleman does not cease to be so, on his becoming a Christian. And yet the entire absence of certain forms and peculiarities may induce the belief that he is less serious than if he had conformed to these. Persons of different manners and habits very naturally associate religious principle with its ordinary modes of expression. And as the great bulk of society are accustomed to see but little of the religion of the great, it is not to be wondered at, that they should be mistaken with regard to their mode of expressing it. But this is an obstacle very easily removed. A gentleman of truly Christian character will not find it difficult to establish himself in the good opinion of his poorer brethren. A little friendly intercourse will remove every misapprehension, and procure for him a place in their affections, which gold and silver cannot purchase. But it is not so easy for the great and the noble to become all at once reconciled to the Christianity of the poor. Looking down on the humbler ranks of society, the man of high breeding misses the usual elegancies and refinements which he has been accustomed to associate with the objects of his regard, and in their room he meets with peculiarities that are, perhaps, positively offensive, and he is accordingly apt to impute to principle what is due only to circumstances. But to a mind truly enlightened, there is in all this nothing but what is natural. Religion does not change men's places in society, and as little does it destroy such peculiarities of character. Two circumstances, however, show how parties so dissimilar may be brought together. The one is the sanctifying effect of the Gospel. Sin and sinful habits naturally degrade and brutalize man, and a deliverance from sin, and with it progressive sanctification, do as naturally elevate and refine the whole moral constitution of man. On the other hand, it is sin which makes a man proud of his rank or wealth, and haughty to his inferiors, and, therefore, if he also become the subject of divine grace, he will find a way of expressing himself in a less offensive, if not more kind and winning, even to the poorest of those who are his brethren in Christ. It is thus that, when men's moral distance from Christ has been removed, they become near even to each other. The other circumstance is the sympathy of a believer's heart. We cleave to those whom we love, be their circumstances what they may, and they who truly love Christ, will also love the brethren. In the meantime, we ought all to be on our guard against undervaluing the Christianity of others, because of their different circumstances.

There is yet one other form of diversity to which we are desirous of adverting. Different periods of the same country often differ more from each other than different ranks or even different countries of the same age. During the reformation, for example, the teaching of the Bible, as opposed to will worship, the doctrine of justification by faith, as opposed to human merits, and morality, as opposed to ritual observances, occupied the chief attention of the clergy. And hence the general character of their writings, and with these of that generation of believers. The Bible and the doctrines of the cross were dear to them as religion itself. And yet in some of the subordinate departments of their belief, they were less perfect than after generations. Towards the end of Charles the first's reign, and onwards to the revolution, the special concerns of the Scottish Church were the perfecting of the Presbyterian system, and the maintenance of a covenanted work of reformation. And accordingly, it will be found that these gave a special character to the religious feelings and opinions of that period. These points were of sufficient importance to claim attention in any circumstances, but, as matters were, they were engraven on every pious heart as a necessary part of vital godliness. And accordingly, the prayers and holy exercises of private individuals were usually imbued with a covenanting spirit. Some, disapproving of these matters, deny them even the credit of personal religion, as if it had been merely zeal for the covenants, forgetting that in many cases it was zeal for God which made them zealous for these. Others will have them to be ignorant and superstitious, because, forsooth, they living in the seventeenth century were not imbued with the philosophy of the nineteenth. And others will have it, that they were either insane or gross deceivers, because of their apparent familiarity with God, and their extraordinary confidence in his providence, and in answers to their prayers; equally forgetting the promise, "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be," and that their day was one of sore trial, great suffering, and great devotedness.

Similar changes will be observed in later times. Our country has, more than almost any other, changed during the last sixty or seventy years. The character of the people has changed, their habits of living, of speaking, and of worshipping God have all greatly changed. And so it is that some of the practices, expressive of true godliness, seventy years ago, are now made subjects of ridicule, and those who observed them are spoken of as rude and bigoted. Moreover, there is with this, a disposition to treat every thing which may be of old standing, whether it be itself of permanent obligation or not, as obsolete and intolerable. It is here as in many other things: those who most loudly talk of the refinements of philosophy, are generally ignorant of its spirit. If they were true philosophers, they would distinguish between what is merely manner, and therefore ephemeral, and what is substantial, and which ought to be common to every age. And they would be equally disposed to recognise true religion, whether spoken in the language and expressed in the habits of the eighteenth or nineteenth century.

The peculiarities which we have thus been reviewing ought to put us all on our guard against being guilty of reproaching others; and ought, further, to enable us to understand and judge of religious character, in the diversified forms which it assumes among men. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body being many, are one body; so also is Christ. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."

THE PILGRIM FATHERS AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

BY AN AMERICAN.

COMMUNICATED BY D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. II.

I COME now to the consideration of the measures which were successively adopted in the colonies of new England, and more especially those of Massachusetts, which were, in the course of time, the means of introducing much error in doctrine.

I. The first cause of the corruption of religion in the New England colonies was the half-way covenant plan.

Amidst the zeal of the Pilgrim Fathers for Church order and government, the necessity of the outpourings of the Spirit, and genuine and extensive revivals of religion was too much overlooked. The consequence was, that many of their children, who had been devoted to the Lord in baptism by their pious parents, grew up unconverted, and were not only destitute of civil privileges, but, what was more grievous, were out of the Church, and could not have their children baptized. This was felt to be a great evil. They were generally persons of quiet and moral behaviour, but still not pious. What was to be done for them? and for their children, who were likely to grow up heathen, unbaptized, and without the pale of the influence of the Church? These were perplexing questions. They were first agitated in Connecticut, and gave rise to much anxious feeling in the hearts of pious fathers and grandfathers, as may be readily supposed. They were discussed and decided at a meeting of ministers in Boston in 1657, and in a General Synod in 1662. In these decisions, which were substantially the same, it was not determined that those who gave no credible evidence of piety should be admitted to the communion of the Church, nor was it determined that they could have no sort of connection with the Church, or that their children must necessarily remain unbaptized. A middle course was suggested and adopted, viz., "that it is the duty of those who were baptized in infancy, when grown up to years of discretion, though not fit for receiving the Lord's Supper, to own the covenant made in their behalf by their parents, by entering thereinto in their own persons. And it is the duty of the Church to call upon them for the performance thereof; and if, being called upon, they shall refuse the performance of this great duty, or otherwise continue scandalous, they are liable to be censured for the same by the Church. And in case they understand the grounds of religion, and are not scandalous, and solemnly own the covenant in their own persons, wherein they give up both themselves and their children unto the Lord, and desire baptism for them, we see not sufficient cause to deny baptism unto their children."<sup>10</sup>

The effect of this measure was just what might have been foreseen. It quieted the consciences of many who enjoyed, in this way, a connection with the Church, without piety. Most persons of sober life, when they came to have families, owned the covenant, and presented their children for baptism. But the number of Church members in full communion was comparatively small, and continually diminishing. It is proper to say that the decision of the General Synod, recommended also by the General Court or Legislature, was much opposed, and perhaps never became universal in its practical operation. President Chauncey, Mr Davenport, Dr Increase Mather, and others strongly opposed it. It did not go into effect in Connecticut until 1696.

The measure which I have just stated exerted a most withering influence on the piety of the Churches in the colonies of New England. But that influence was exceeded in injurious effect by that of another measure or practice which gained a footing in the Churches at a subsequent day, and which accelerated the sad declension of religion which had long before commenced. I now proceed to give you some notice of that practice.

II. It was the prevalence, towards the close of the first eighty years after the planting of the first colonies in New England, (about the year 1700,) of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper being a means of grace in the sense of a means of conviction and conversion or regeneration to the unregenerate, as well as a means of edification to believers. This doctrine was openly and strongly maintained by the Rev. Solomon Stoddard, of Northampton, the maternal grandfather of the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, as early as 1675 or 1680. It is true that great opposition was made to this dangerous but plausible error, by the Rev. Dr Increase Mather, who had a public discussion with Mr Stoddard on this subject, and by other ministers, and eventually, and perhaps most ably of all, by his grandson Mr Edwards, who was (during the latter portion of Mr Stoddard's life) his colleague, in the church at Northampton.

The dreadful consequences of this doctrine are too obvious to need many remarks. It did not, indeed, gain a universal, but rather a very wide extended prevalence in New England; and, it is to be feared, in other parts of the whole country also, especially in the Presbyterian churches, thousands of unconverted persons, whose lives were externally moral, entered the Church; and whilst they increased its numbers, diminished its strength and defaced its beauty. From the year 1680 to 1740, very many persons of this description were admitted to a participation in the privileges of the Church.

There was but little strictness in examining those who applied for the privileges of the Church. If they said that they had arrived at what they believed to be the period of life at which they ought to make a profession, and felt that it was their duty to attach themselves to the Church, they were allowed to do so. Let any one only read "An Account of the Revival of Religion in Boston, in the years 1740-43, by the Rev. Thomas Prince, one of the Pastors of the Old South Church," in that city; a small and most interesting work of fifty or sixty pages, published, at first, in 1744, and republished in 1823, and he will see what had become the effects of this pernicious doctrine at that period, although it had been opposed, in some measure, by several of the ministers who preached in that city, at that day. I confess that I have never read that pamphlet without feeling a disposition to lift my voice, and if possible, sound a note of alarm throughout all the Churches, and conjure them to beware of acting upon the principles of this doctrine. Few churches in the United States, would now act avowedly upon this principle; for I believe that almost all require those who would join the Church, to give such evidence of conversion as can be obtained by examination of their doctrines and experience of the power of religion in the heart. But it is much to be feared that these examinations are not so thorough and faithful as they ought to be, and the consequence is that too many are admitted to the privileges of the holy Sacrament of the communion, who give no satisfactory proof that they have been regenerated by the Holy Spirit. Such a course will, any where, fill the Church with those who have no real love of the truth, but who will remain worldly, and, in most cases, hopeless professors of a religion of which they are almost wholly ignorant.

So it was in the churches in Boston, and many other places in New England, one hundred years ago. They became filled with unconverted persons. The next step, or rather an accompanying one, was the introduction of unholy men into the ministry. Superficial examinations of the candidates became almost universal. And when, as was the case for a long time after this declension had become somewhat extensive, the pulpits were very generally occupied with moral, amiable, pleasant, and, in the main, serious men, but such as appeared to know little of heart-religion, then the way was effectually prepared for the introduction of almost any error. It is very difficult for an unconverted minister to be truly orthodox. He may in theory, but not in heart. And it will be very difficult for him to preach the truth faithfully to the hearts and consciences of men. It may be possible to get into the Church, and even into the ministry; but it is another thing to be a truly converted and devoted Christian. O what desolations were brought over the churches in New England, by acting on the principle, not indeed latent and deceptive, as, it is to be feared, it exists still in too many other parts of Christendom, but openly avowed, and carried out into effect, that unconverted persons of moral life have the liberty of coming forward to the communion of the Church.

In my next, I shall take notice of other causes which contributed to lower the standard of religion, and so prepare the way for the springing up and the development of heresy, in New England.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

God as a Father and a Judge.—Take the case of an earthly parent: suppose him to be endowed with all the tenderest sensibilities of nature, conceive of him as delighting in the health and welfare of his children, and, in the exercise of every benevolent affection, lavishing on them all the riches of a father's kindness and a father's care. You say, on looking at his benignant countenance and his smiling family, this is an affectionate father. But a secret canker of ingratitude seizes one or more of his children,—they shun his presence, or dislike his society, and at length venture on acts of positive disobedience; he warns them, he expostulates with them, but in vain, they revolt more and more; and at length, in the exercise of deliberate thought, he lifts the rod and chastens them; and he who once was the author of all their happiness, has become also their calm but firm reprove. And who that knows the tenderness of a father's love, will not acknowledge, that, severe as may be the suffering inflicted, such a man doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of his love? Again, conceive of a man of benevolent feelings invested with the office of magistrate or judge,—conceive that Howard, the unwearied friend of his race, who visited the prisons of Europe to alleviate the miseries of the worst and most destitute of men,—conceive of such a man sitting in judgment over the life or liberty of another, and can you not suppose, that while every feeling within him inclined him to the side of mercy, and his every sensibility would be gratified, were it possible to make the felon virtuous and happy, he might, notwithstanding, have such a deep moral persuasion of the importance of virtue and order to the well-being of the state, that he could consign the prisoner to a dungeon or the gallows, and that, too, with the perfect conviction that it was right and good to do so; while, still, every sentiment of the heart within him, if it could be disclosed, would bear witness, that he afflicted not willingly, and that he had no pleasure in the death of the criminal? Such a father and such a judge is God; and the sufferings which he inflicts, whether they be viewed as corrective or penal, are compatible with the loftiest benevolence in the divine mind. And, unquestionably, the fact, that "God doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men," may, in one light, be regarded as a ground of consolation, inasmuch as it assures us that the Almighty Being, in whose hands our destinies are placed, has no pleasure in the mere infliction of suffering,—that in His holy mind not one passion exists which can be gratified by it, and that, even "as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him."—REV. JAMES BUCHANAN. (Comfort in Affliction.)

Divine Mercy.—And whereas thou thinkest that God is more merciful, why, surely, he knows best his own mercifulness. His mercy will not cross his truth. Cannot God be infinite in mercy, except he save the wilful and rebellious? Is a judge unmerciful for condemning malefactors? Mercy and justice have their several objects. Thousands of humble, believing, obedient souls, shall know, to their eternal comfort, that God is merciful, though the refusers of his grace shall lie under justice. God will then force thy conscience to confess it in hell, that God who condemned thee was yet merciful to thee. Was it not mercy to be made a reasonable creature, and to have patience to endure thy many years, provocations, and waiting upon thee from sermon to sermon, desiring and entreating thy repentance and return? Was it not mercy to have the Son of God, with all his blood and merits, freely offered thee, if thou wouldst but have accepted him to govern and to save thee? Nay, when thou hadst neglected and refused Christ once, or twice, yea, a hundred times, that God should yet follow thee with invitations from day to day? And shalt thou willfully refuse mercy to the last hour, and then cry out that God will not be so unmerciful as to condemn thee? Thy conscience will smite thee for thy madness, and tell thee, that God was merciful in all this, though such as thou do perish for thy wilfulness. Yea, the sense of the greatness of his mercy, will thee be a great part of thy torment.—BAXTER.

The Agency of the Holy Spirit necessary to produce the Benevolence of the Gospel.—The world could not be surprised out of its selfishness, and charmed into benevolence by the mere spectacle, even of divine love. That love can only be understood by sympathy, but for this sin had disqualified us. According to the economy of grace, therefore, the exhibition of that love in God, is to be the means of producing love in us; the glorious spectacle of God, is to be turned into a living principle in us. For this end, the holy, unconfined, and infinite Spirit came down. His emblem is the wind; he came like a rushing mighty wind, came with a fulness and a power as if he sought to fill every heart,—to replenish the Church,—to be the soul of the world,—to encircle the earth with an atmosphere of grace, as real and universal as the elemental air encompasses and circulates around the globe itself, that whoever inhaled it might have eternal life.—HARRIS. (Manmon.)

"The righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe."—The rising sun in summer is not so charming to an eye of sense, as the life of Christ is to a mind which can admire spiritual excellency. So complete an union of every quality, without one single flaw, has compelled his blasphemers to do him honour. And it is common to expatiate on the perfection of his character as a copy for imitation. But here many stop. This indeed gives him pre-eminence above the most admired of men, yet is not half his due. For the Scripture places the sinless life of Christ in an infinitely higher light—not only as a perfect pattern, found in no other man, or as a necessary qualification to make atonement, but as a work of most efficacious beneficence—of a kind absolutely singular, surpassing, beyond all comparison, every other service the Almighty ever received, and reaching in its saving virtue, through all eternity. For no creature can transfer the benefit of his own performances, since perfect obedience is due, from every creature, on his own account, to God, by an indefeasible right: but the unrivalled glory of the life of Christ consists in this peculiarity, that it is the righteousness of God, by which myriads of sinners, to the ends of the earth, and the end of time, are made righteous. To them his righteousness is imputed, because performed by compact on their account, and for their salvation; accepted as such by the Father, and deemed so really theirs, that the righteousness of the law is said to be fulfilled in them, because fulfilled by Christ, who is their surety, and with whom they are one.—VENN.

SACRED POETRY

EZEKIEL'S VISION.

BY ROBERT GILFILLAN.

THE Spirit of the Lord from heaven upon Ezekiel came;
The prophet knew the voice of God, and kindl'd at the same:
"This is the valley of the dead, behold it wide and deep;
Where from their troubl'd dream of life a thousand strong men sleep!
Behold their bones, in countless heaps, that blanch'd and wither'd lie:"—

The prophet look'd upon the bones, and they were very dry.
"Say, son of man, can these bones live, in which no life-springs dwell?"
The prophet answered, "O Lord God! 'tis Thou alone canst tell."
"Then bid them hear the word of God, and this that word shall be,— 'Awake ye dead men from your sleep, the Lord shall set you free;
New flesh upon your bones shall come, and skin shall gather there;
And round the clouded brow of death, I'll stamp my image fair;
And breath I'll give that ye again your Maker's praise may sing;
Then shall ye know that I am God, your Saviour, and your King!"
The prophet rais'd his voice and cry'd, "Ye dead men now awake!"
And, lo! a mighty noise was heard, and all the bones did shake;
And bone to bone together came, each bone into its place;
But cold and lifeless was each form, and ghastly was each face;—
The eye had not yet light—the mouth unmoving, still was dumb,
And from the heart no living stream, in purple tide did come.

"Call on the four winds, bid them blow, and breathe upon the slain,
That they may wake to life once more, and walk the earth again!"
"Come forth, ye winds of heaven! obey His voice who bids ye blow;
And raise the sleepers from their sleep, whom death has long laid low."
The winds obey in songs:—they shout, in lofty notes, his praise,
And high as ever angel soar'd, their voices forth they raise.
The dead men startle at the sound, the breath of life is given
By Him who walks upon the wind, and rules the host of heaven!
The prophet gaz'd with fear and awe to see this living band,
That grew an army great in power—that cover'd all the land.
"Who are the sleepers? Who the dead? Once blind, but now who see?"

Whence is the vision of the bones? and what may those things be?"
"These are the lost of Israel, who, wandering from the way, Refuse the Witness sent from God, their only hope and stay;
Who sleep in darkness and in death, and scatter'd o'er the plain,
Till God's free Spirit o'er them come, and call to life again;
Then shall their dry bones quicken'd be, and they shall hear his word;
And know that Jesus reigns as king, the great and mighty Lord!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

An Indian Conjurer.—Among other converts of Mr Brainerd's, was a man who had been a most notorious sinner, a drunkard, a murderer, a conjuror; but who at length appeared to be an illustrious trophy of the power and the riches of divine grace. He lived near the Forks of Delaware, and occasionally attended Mr Brainerd's ministry; but, for a time, like many others of the Indians, was not at all reformed by the instructions which he enjoyed. About that very time he murdered a promising young Indian, and he still followed his old trade of conjuring, being held in high reputation among his countrymen. Hence, when Mr Brainerd told them of the miracles of Christ, and represented these as a proof of his divine mission, and of the truth of his religion, they immediately mentioned the wonders of the same kind which this man had wrought by his magical charms. As he was, in this manner, a powerful obstruction to the progress of the Gospel among the Indians, Mr Brainerd often thought it would be a great mercy if God were to remove him out of the world, for he had little or no hope that such a wretch would ever himself be converted; but He, "whose thoughts are not as our thoughts," was pleased to take a more gracious and a more effectual method of removing the difficulty. Having been impressed by witnessing the baptism of Mr Brainerd's interpreter, he followed him to Crossweksung shortly after, and continued there several weeks during the season of the most remarkable and powerful awakening of the Indians. He was then brought under deep concern for his soul. His convictions of his sinfulness and misery became by degrees more deep, and the anguish of his mind was so increased, that he knew not what to do, or whither to turn. Soon after this, indeed, he became more calm; but yet, in his own apprehension, he had little or no hope of mercy. Mr Brainerd conversed with him, and said he scarcely ever saw a person more completely weaned from dependence on his own endeavours for salvation, or lying more humbly at the feet of sovereign mercy, than this poor Indian conjuror. He continued for several days to pronounce sentence of condemnation upon himself, yet it was evident he had a secret hope of mercy, though probably it was imperceptible to himself. During this time, he repeatedly inquired of Mr Brainerd when he would preach again. On being asked why he wished to hear the word, seeing that, according to his own account, "his heart was dead, and all was done for ever," he replied, "Notwithstanding that, I love to hear about Christ." "But," said Mr Brainerd, "what good can that do you, if you must go to hell at last?" "I would have others," replied he, "come to Christ, if I must go to hell myself." After continuing in this state of mind upwards of a week, he obtained such a view of the excellency of Christ, and of the way of salvation through him, that he burst into tears, and was filled with admiration, and gratitude, and praise. From that time he appeared a humble, devout, affectionate Christian; serious and exemplary in his behaviour; often complaining of his want of spiritual life, yet frequently favoured with the quickening and refreshing influences of the Holy Spirit. In short, he appeared, in all respects, to possess the character and dispositions of one who was "created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works."

Adversity a Blessing.—The Rev. Dr Lathrop, of America, illustrating, in a sermon, the sentiment that "God often answers prayer in a way that we do not expect," introduced the following facts:—A poor African negro was led, while in his own country, by the consideration of the works of nature, to a conviction of the existence and benevolence of a Supreme Being. Impressed with this fact, he used daily to pray to this Great Being, that by some means or other he might more distinctly know him. About this time he was taken, with many others, and sold for a slave. For a while he hesitated as to the view he had taken of God, and thought that if there did indeed exist a just and good Being as he had supposed, he would not allow fraud and iniquity to prevail against innocence and integrity. But after a while this poor slave was introduced into a pious family in New England, where he was instructed in Christianity, and enabled to rejoice in God as his friend. He was now persuaded of the fact, that adverse providences are often the means of answering our prayers, and conducting us to the greatest happiness.

THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

PART I.

BY THE REV. W. B. NIVISON,

*Formerly one of the Ministers of the Scotch Church
in Amsterdam.*

THE life of our blessed Saviour may truly be said to have been one continued series of instances of humiliation and suffering. His assumption of human nature, and his residence on the earth, were temporary suspensions of his divine and uncreated glory, and could not have been submitted to and endured by him, if a sacrifice or propitiation for sin had not formed an essential part of the Christian redemption. Pain or suffering, under all its variety of forms, is the natural consequence or effect of sin; such an arrangement constitutes, as it were, the basis on which the security and efficiency of the divine government depend; and on this account, before mercy could be shown, or pardon offered to the human race, it became necessary for our Mediator not only to assume our finite and mortal nature, but also to descend to a state of the lowest abasement, and of the bitterest suffering. He was under the necessity of making this great and wonderful sacrifice, that he might be able to remove from us the curse of the good and perfect law we had violated, and to satisfy the justice of the high and holy Being we had offended. We learn from Scripture, that “without the shedding of blood there can be no remission;” and if our merciful High Priest had not interposed to save us by the offering up of his own body, we should have been compelled to endure, in our own persons, and without the faintest hope of forgiveness, the temporal and eternal penalties of our apostasy and disobedience. When the Son of God became incarnate in the fulness of time, and appeared on the earth as the “woman’s seed,” he was fully aware that an afflicted life, and an accursed death, were the divinely appointed means by which he should be enabled to bruise the serpent’s head, and destroy his wide and powerful dominion over every region of the moral universe.

VOL. II.

But there are two parts more particularly of the life of Christ, from which we might almost deduce the doctrine of the atonement, even if it had not been revealed so frequently, and with so much clearness, in the Sacred Scriptures. His agony in the garden of Gethsemane, and his death on the Mount of Calvary, would excite the wonder and compassion of mankind, if they were merely contemplated as historical facts, and not considered at all as forming parts of the “mystery of godliness.” There is something about them so singular, so affecting, and so sublime, as to be equally fitted to engrave upon the mind the loftiest and the tenderest impressions. We see before us a pure, benevolent, and intelligent Being, placed in a condition of life to which he appears infinitely superior; gaining the affection and confidence of all who knew and could esteem his virtues; acknowledging, in every situation in which he was placed, the constant guardianship of an Almighty Providence; adorning his adversity with the humblest patience and the most cheerful resignation; and performing, with a regular, unwearied diligence, works of kindness and mercy, far exceeding the measure of human power and of human charity; we see this holy, humane, and powerful Being, overwhelmed on two occasions with the deepest agony of mind and body, and uttering, at both periods, expressions that not only imply a foresight of his misery, but also a persuasion of its subserviency to some great and important end. There is observed to run throughout the whole of his agony a higher degree and a ruder violence of pain than are ever found in the state and circumstances of a merely human being, even when he is undergoing the most refined torture or the most cruel death. The evangelists are evidently at a loss for words strong enough to express its poignancy, and we cannot help feeling something more to be in the events than what is darkly announced to us by their simple and concise narrations. I intend, in the present article, and in a subsequent one, to offer some remarks on the first of those events, the agony of the Saviour in the garden of Gethsemane.

On the memorable evening of the paschal sup per, our Saviour went out, as he was wont, with his disciples to the Mount of Olives. He had chosen this sequestered and pleasing spot for the scene of his retirement and devotion. It was situated at a convenient distance from the holy city, and afforded him a secure retreat from the harassing pursuit of the people, as well as a grateful shade from the burning rays of an eastern sun. The brook Cedron murmured at its base, and glided gently along through the vale of Jehosaphat, that lay beneath the hill on its western side. He first of all climbed up the Mount of Olives, where, it should seem, he left all his disciples except Peter, James, and John, with whom he descended into the garden. There he began to be sore amazed and very heavy, and said to the disciples, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful even unto death; tarry ye here, and watch with me, and pray that ye enter not into temptation." When he had uttered these sad and melancholy words, he went a little farther from them and fell on his face and prayed, saying, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." The weakness of his humanity was almost overpowered by the violence of the mysterious conflict, though it was supported, at the same time, by the union of the divine nature, and also by the presence of a celestial messenger. For this latter support he was indebted to the ever watchful providence of God. The event of the Redeemer's agony was known in heaven, and created the deepest interest there. The Father, from his throne on high, had observed the opening of the last gloomy scene of his afflicted life. He saw the gathering darkness of its awful hour. He knew the piercing sharpness of its bitter pain. He heard the earnest prayer of his beloved Son. And though the latter was God as well as man, yet an angel, we are told, was sent to him from heaven to impart some additional strength to his mortal frame. Still the trial of his soul increased; and "being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." When the violence of pain had somewhat abated, he rose up from prayer, and when he came to the disciples he found them sleeping for sorrow. Disappointed, perhaps, at not meeting with the sympathy of their attention, as well as of their presence, he said unto Peter, "What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" He accompanied, however, this mild rebuke with a useful exhortation and an affectionate apology; "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak." He retired again the second time, and prayed, saying, "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me except I drink it, thy will be done." And when he came to the disciples, he found them asleep again, for their eyes were heavy. And he left them, and went away, and prayed the third time, saying the same words. Then cometh he unto his disciples, and saith unto them, "Sleep on now and take your rest; behold the hour is at hand, and the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners."

Such is a simple and accurate description of the agony of the Saviour in the garden of Gethsemane. And, we may easily perceive, from its peculiar and violent nature, that it constitutes an essential part of the mysterious train of suffering by which the work of our redemption is formed and completed. His agony in the garden may be called, with more special propriety, the suffering of his soul; his death upon the cross, the suffering of his body; and the union of both, would seem to comprehend a full and perfect atonement. The curse written in the law against sin, our readers will remember, embraces or includes the punishment both of the soul and of the body. The death threatened in the covenant of works, was not only the destruction of the body, but the perdition of the soul. It was not only corporeal, but spiritual; not only temporal, but eternal death. This important fact may probably serve to explain to us, not only the cause, but the severity of the agony in the garden. The Redeemer might at that dread season be bearing in his soul what was sufficient to compensate for the spiritual misery, the mental remorse, the moral despair, that would have oppressed and tormented the guilty minds of the whole human race. He might be drinking, at that sad moment, what was equivalent to the full draught of all the horrors, of all the pains, and of all the fears, that would have filled up to the brim the "red-coloured vial" of the divine wrath. And while undergoing this awful retribution, he would seem to have been forsaken both by God and man. The "hiding of his Father's countenance" is a form of expression we sometimes meet with in Scripture; and when applied to Christ, it conveys a dark but emphatic idea of that harrowing perturbation of feeling, of that utter desolation of spirit, of that overwhelming sense of "heaven's desertion," which were experienced in this hour of darkness by the Substitute of sinners. There was an evident suspension of the filial communion with Godhead—temporary, indeed, as it could not otherwise be, but at the same time real, and marked by the usual accompaniments of horrid consternation and excruciating painfulness. Our blessed Lord was reduced for a season to the wretched condition of a guilty creature, who has been driven from the presence and favour of his Maker—who has become the miserable victim of legal vengeance—who is lost, finally lost, to holiness, to heaven, and to happiness. And as the soul is more susceptible of pain, and more capable of enduring it than the body; so we may conceive better than describe, the inward and invisible agony that preyed upon the vitals of our Lord's spiritual being, and moved "the Man of Sorrows" to pray so often to his Father, and with such anxious entreaty, and with such affecting earnestness, that required the double presence and support of the Deity and of an angel; and that pierced so deeply the frame of his human nature, as to make "the sweat of his body fall down to the ground in great drops of blood!"

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF

THE REV. WILLIAM CAREY, D. D.,

Late Missionary to Bengal, and Professor of Oriental Languages in the College of Fort-William, Calcutta.

THE name of Carey is hallowed in the remembrance of thousands, and few have ever enjoyed a more honourable reputation for extensive learning, exalted piety, and varied usefulness. Of his early days, nothing remarkable is known. His father was a schoolmaster in the village of Paulerspary, in Northamptonshire, having succeeded his grandfather in the same honourable employment. In this obscure locality, William Carey was born on the 17th of August 1761. He was educated under his father's care; and his mind being naturally vigorous, he made rapid progress in the acquisition of knowledge. He soon displayed a considerable taste for reading, and spent much of his time in perusing books of science, history, and voyages. In proof of his ardour in the attainment of knowledge, we may quote the following statement given by his sister:—

"I have often heard my mother speak of one circumstance she had remarked with pleasure in him, even before he was six years old. She has heard him in the night, when the family were asleep, casting accounts: so intent was he from childhood in the pursuit of knowledge. Whatever he began he finished: difficulties never seemed to discourage his mind; and, as he grew up, his thirst for knowledge still increased. The room that was wholly appropriated to his use was full of insects, stuck in every corner, that he might observe their progress. Drawing and painting he was very fond of, and made considerable progress in those arts, all acquired by himself. Birds, and all manner of insects, he had numbers of. When he was from home, the birds were in general committed to my care. Being so much younger, I was indulged by him in all his enjoyments. Though I often used to kill his birds by kindness, yet, when he saw my grief for it, he always indulged me with the pleasure of serving them again; and often took me over the dirtiest roads, to get at a plant or an insect. He never walked out, I think, when quite a boy, without observation on the hedges as he passed; and when he took up a plant of any kind, he always observed it with care. Though I was but a child, I well remember his pursuits. He always seemed earnest in his recreations, as well as in school. Like the industrious bee, he was always gathering something useful. It seemed as if nature was fitting him for something great,—from a child forming him for future usefulness; while, at the same time, he was generally one of the most active in all the amusements and recreations that boys in general pursue."

Being destitute of religious principle, however, young Carey seems to have exhibited in his juvenile years some of the worst qualities of the unrenewed heart; and being addicted to the company of wicked associates, he sunk into the most awful profligacy of conduct. In vain did his father warn him of the dangerous course upon which he was entering. To the solitary counsels and affectionate advices of his parent he lent a deaf ear. It pleased God, however, to lay his hand upon the abandoned youth, and thus to arrest him in his career. From about seven years of age, William was subject to a very painful disease of the skin, which, though it rarely appeared in the form of an eruption, yet rendered the rays of the sun intolerable to him. This of course made him unable to earn a livelihood by any employment out of doors; and his parents being poor, they at length, when he had reached the age of fourteen, bound him apprentice to a shoemaker at Hackleton. For a time he continued to display the same indifference to religion, the same immorality of conduct as formerly; and though he was occasionally exposed to the visitings of an awakened conscience, he strove to repress them; and for this purpose resolved to adopt an external reformation of character, and to pay a scrupulous attention to all the outward duties of religion. To the vital influence of divine truth he was as yet an utter stranger. At this time a circumstance occurred, which shews at once the laxity of his principles, and the complicated stratagems by which Satan endeavours to secure his victims. We present the narrative in the very language of young Carey himself:—

"It being customary in that part of the country for apprentices to collect Christmas-boxes from the tradesmen with whom their masters have dealings, I was permitted to collect these little sums. When I applied to an ironmonger, he gave me the choice of a shilling or a sixpence; I of course chose the shilling, and, putting it into my pocket, went away. When I had got a few shillings, my next care was to purchase some little articles for myself; I have forgotten what. But then, to my sorrow, I found that my shilling was a brass one. I paid for the things which I bought, by using a shilling of my master's. I now found that I had exceeded my stock by a few pence. I expected severe reproaches from my master, and therefore came to the resolution to declare strenuously that the bad money was his. I well remember the struggles of mind which I had on this occasion, and that I made this deliberate sin a matter of prayer to God as I passed over the fields home. I there promised, that if God would but get me clearly over this, or, in other words, help me through with the theft, I would certainly for the future leave off all evil practices; but this theft, and consequent lying, appeared to me so necessary, that they could not be dispensed with.

"A gracious God did not get me safe through. My master sent the other apprentice to investigate the matter. The ironmonger acknowledged the giving me the shilling, and I was therefore exposed to shame, reproach, and inward remorse, which increased and preyed upon my mind for a considerable time. I at this time sought the Lord, perhaps much more earnestly than ever, but with shame and fear. I was quite ashamed to go out; and never till I was assured that my conduct was not spread over the town did I attend a place of worship."

In the course of a short time Mr Carey joined the Baptist communion, and was baptized at Northampton by Mr Ryland, junior. After he had pursued his business with industry, he thought of renouncing the employment of a shoemaker and commencing that of a schoolmaster. For this purpose he removed to Moulton, where, besides conducting a school, he regularly officiated as pastor to a small congregation of Baptists. His flock were few in number, and poor in outward circumstances, and as he had married some time before, his family were increasing, so that his pecuniary resources were sometimes sufficiently scanty. Under all privations, however, he persevered in acquiring knowledge of every kind. From his local situation he had an opportunity of profiting by the conversation and experience of some of the most eminent ministers connected with the communion to which he belonged. To Mr Hall of Arnsby, in particular, father on the celebrated Robert Hall, he professed himself, through life, under the strongest obligation.

While resident at Moulton, Mr Carey's mind became much impressed with the claims of the heathen abroad to the exertions of Christians at home. He proposed the point for discussion at a meeting of ministers, held at Northampton, but his views met with little countenance and sympathy. Instead of being discouraged by the coolness of his brethren, he only directed his mind, with greater intensity to the subject, and composed a pamphlet, pointing out the obligations of Christians to make all possible endeavours for the conversion of the heathen.

In the year 1789 Mr Carey was relieved, to some extent, from his pecuniary embarrassments, by a cordial invitation from a Baptist congregation in Leicester, to become their pastor. He accordingly removed from Moulton, but even in Leicester he was under the necessity of increasing his income by teaching a school, besides receiving assistance from the Baptist fund for the relief of necessitous ministers and churches. Still his labours were incessant, not merely in the multifarious duties of his ministerial office, but in the attainment of useful information. To give an idea of the manner in which he spent his time, we may quote a passage from a letter which he wrote from Leicester, addressed to his father.

"On Monday I confine myself to the study of the learned languages, and oblige myself to translate something. On Tuesday, to the study of science, history, and composition. On Wednesday I preach a lecture, and have been for more than twelve months on the book of Revelation. On Thursday I visit my friends. Friday and Saturday are spent in preparing for the Lord's day; and the Lord's day in preaching the Word of God. Once a fortnight I preach three times at home; and once a fortnight I go to a neighbouring village in the evening. Once a month I go to another village on the Tuesday evening. My school begins at nine o'clock in the morning, and continues till four o'clock in winter, and five in summer. I have acted for this twelvemonth as secretary to the committee of dissenters; and am now to be regularly appointed to that office, with a salary. Add to this, occasional journeys, ministers' meetings, and so forth; and you will rather wonder that I have any time, than that I have so little."

Under Mr Carey's ministry the congregation at Leicester increased in numbers, and he was much esteemed by the inhabitants of the town, both churchmen and dissenters. Still, however, his mind was bent upon a mission to the heathen. He frequently introduced the subject in conversation with pious friends, and at length succeeded in awakening an interest in the object. So early as 1784, a few devoted ministers formed an association at Nottingham, with the view of setting apart an hour on the first Monday evening of every month, "for extraordinary prayer for the revival of religion, and for the extending of Christ's kingdom in the world." This was the origin of the monthly prayer meetings, now held almost universally throughout the Christian world.

It was not till 1792 that, chiefly in consequence of Mr Carey's exertions, the Baptist Missionary Society was organized, and he himself volunteered to be the first to undertake, under their sanction, the responsible office of a missionary to the heathen. He thus alludes to his new vocation in a letter to his father:—

"The importance of spending our time for God alone is the principal theme of the Gospel. 'I beseech you, brethren,' says Paul, 'by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice; holy and acceptable, which is your reasonable service.' To be devoted like a sacrifice to holy uses, is the great business of a Christian, pursuant to these requisitions. I consider myself as devoted to the service of God alone, and now I am to realize my professions. I am appointed to go to Bengal in the East Indies, a missionary to the Hindoos. I shall have a colleague who has been there five or six years already, and who understands their language. They are the most mild and inoffensive people in all the world, but are enveloped in the greatest superstition, and in the grossest ignorance. My wife and family will stay behind at present, and will have sufficient support in my absence; or should they choose to follow me, their expenses will be borne. We are to leave England on the third of April next. I hope, dear father, you may be enabled to surrender me up to the Lord for the most arduous, honourable, and important work that ever any of the sons of men were called to engage in. I have many sacrifices to make. I must part with a beloved family, and a number of most affectionate friends. Never did I see such sorrow manifested as reigned through our place of worship last Lord's day. But I have set my hand to the plough."

The congregation at Leicester were very unwilling to part with a pastor who had endeared himself to their hearts by the tenderness and faithfulness of his ministrations among them; but so frequently and powerfully had he pleaded the cause of the heathen, that they were fully convinced it was their duty, however reluctantly, to acquiesce. Before setting out to India, Mr Carey's mind was thrown into great perplexities by various circumstances of a most distressing kind. For some time his wife appeared to be resolute in remaining at home, and it was not until her sister consented to accompany her to India that she would be persuaded to yield. Mr Thomas, his colleague, who was engaged to accompany him, was detained, in consequence of the claims of creditors, his affairs having previously been in an embarrassed state. And what was most discouraging of all, when at length they had actually embarked at Ryde, the captain of the vessel received an anonymous letter, warning him of his peril against proceeding with persons on board unlicensed by the East India Company. On the receipt of this ominous communication, which had probably been sent by one of Mr Thomas's creditors, the captain required both the missionaries to disembark. Mr Carey and his companion returned to London, disappointed by this apparent frustration of all their hopes. In a few days, however, the dark cloud disappeared. An arrangement was obtained with Mr Thomas's creditors, a foreign vessel was procured, not subject to the control of the Company. Mrs Carey's scruples were overcome, and the whole party re-embarked and set sail for the East Indies.

The voyage was somewhat stormy, but, by the blessing of Providence, nothing disastrous occurred. The missionaries maintained family worship regularly on board, and preached twice on the Sabbath. At length they reached the shores of India in the beginning of November 1793. The missionary party had scarcely landed, when trials of the most distressing kind were appointed them. Their finances were soon exhausted, and Mrs Carey, who had left her native country with reluctance, became still more discontented with her situation; Mr Thomas, whose dispositions were very different from those of Mr Carey, conducted himself, for some time, in a manner scarcely reconcilable with Christian consistency, and, in short, like the boy Brainerd, whose character he so much admired, Mr Carey, at the outset of his mission, was almost conpletely discouraged. An extract from his journal will show the perplexity of his mind at this time.

"This day I feel what it is to have the testimony of a good conscience, even in the smallest matters. My temporal troubles remain just as they were. I have a place, but cannot remove my family to it for want of money. Mr Thomas has now begun to set his face another way. At his motion I went to Calcutta, then to Bandell, at which place all our money was expended. He ordered all the expenses, and lived in his own way, to which I acceded, though sore against my will. He was inclined first, then determined, to practise surgery at Calcutta. I agreed to come and settle as near him as possible, though I had previously intended to go to Gowr, near Malda; and all this that I might not be first in a breach of our mutual undertaking. Now he is buying, and selling, and living at the rate of I know not how much, I suppose two hundred and fifty or three hundred rupees per month, has twelve servants, and this day is talking of keeping his coach. I have remonstrated with him in vain, and I am almost afraid that he intends to throw up the mission. How all these things can be agreeable to a spiritual mind, I know not. But now all my friends are but one; I rejoice, however, that He is all-sufficient, and can supply all my wants, spiritual and temporal. My heart bleeds for him, for my family, for the Society, whose steadfastness must be shaken by this report, and for the success of the mission, which must receive a sad blow from this. But why is my soul disquieted within me? Things may turn out better than I expect: every thing is known to God, and God cares for the mission. O for contentment, delight in God, and much of his fear before my eyes! Bless God, I feel peace within, and rejoice in having undertaken the work, and shall, I feel I shall, if I not only labour alone, but even if I should lose my life in the undertaking."

In a short time, by the kind interposition of that God in whose cause they were anxious to be engaged, the temporal privations of the missionaries were relieved. Mr Udney, an old friend of Mr Thomas, was about to erect two indigo factories in addition to those which he already possessed, and having become acquainted with the destitute condition of the two missionaries, he invited them to superintend the new establishments, offering them such a sum of money as would afford competent support to their respective families, and leave a surplus which might be applied to the furtherance of their missionary labours. This invitation both Mr Carey and his colleague readily accepted, and they entered upon their new employment at Malda, about three hundred miles from Calcutta.

Mr Carey was now placed in a state of comparative affluence, and although his wife's health was so weak that she was utterly unfit to attend to his domestic concerns, and he was constantly exposed to the peculation of native servants, yet notwithstanding these disadvantages, he spared from one-third to one-fourth of his income for missionary purposes.

THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

OF all the parts of the material universe, the solar system is most interesting to man; for though the sun and moon, the earth and planets, are but a minute fragment of a mighty whole, they contain the sphere of all our actions, and, under God, the sources of all our joys. When regarded as a subject of study, they are well calculated for the exercise and improvement of the mind; when considered as a manifestation of the Creator's glory, they are admirably adapted for the awakening of admiration, gratitude, and praise. Some writers on Natural Theology have considered the arguments for the being and attributes of God, which are drawn from the examination of the heavenly bodies, as less satisfactory than those that are founded upon the provisions and adaptations, which appear in the structure of organized creatures; and we allow that the mechanism exhibited in the bodies of animals, and the adaptation of the senses to the elements of which they are cognizant, exhibit more immediately proofs of contrivance, and have a more direct bearing upon the comfort and happiness of sentient creatures, than the revolutions of the stars; but so harmonious are the movements of the heavenly orbs, and so simple are the laws by which they are governed, that our knowledge of astronomy is far more complete and accurate, far more thorough and satisfactory, than that which we possess of any other department of Natural Philosophy; and the arguments which it furnishes are proportionately clear and convincing. We cannot tell whether to-morrow's dawn will bring sunshine or cloud; we cannot calculate the movement of the feather, as it floats upon the breeze; but we can determine the exact place and motion of every member of the solar system, at any period, past or future, however remote, and we can refer all the changes that take place among them, to the operation of those laws by which they are regulated. Though astronomy may not seem at first sight so directly to exhibit the gracious design of the Creator, as some other branches of science, it shews more manifestly his wisdom and power, and with the aid of a little reflection it demonstrates his benevolence too.

The Sun, which occupies the centre of the system, is a stupendous globe, eight hundred and eighty-two thousand miles in diameter, and one million three hundred and eighty-four thousand four hundred and seventy-two times the size of the earth. When viewed through a telescope it is frequently observed to have large dark spots upon its surface, which prove, by their motion, that this luminary revolves on its axis, in a period equal to twenty-five of our days, and in the same direction as the diurnal rotation of the earth, that is, from west to east. Occupying the centre, the sun has, of course, no yearly revolution, but in consequence of the various attractions of the circumrevolving planets, it is agitated by a small motion round the common centre of gravity of the whole system, which, however, occupies a point within the solar mass. Recent observations have led astronomers to conclude that the sun consists of a dark solid ball, surrounded by a luminous atmosphere, and some have even conjectured the possibility of its being inhabited by creatures like ourselves!

Mercury, the planet nearest to the sun, is about thirty-two thousand miles in diameter, and revolves on his axis in nearly the same time as the earth. Its distance from the sun is thirty-six million miles, and moving at the rate of one hundred and nine thousand, four hundred miles per hour, it completes its annual revolution in eighty-seven days and twenty-three hours.

Venus, the planet next in order, is seven thousand eight hundred miles in diameter, it is sixty-eight million miles distant from the sun, the term of its diurnal revolution is twenty-four hours, its annual course is completed in two hundred and twenty-four days and a-half, and the rate of its motion is eighty thousand and sixty miles in the hour. Though this planet be nearer the earth than any other, it is the most difficult of them all to define with telescopes. "The intense lustre of its illuminated

THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

OF all the parts of the material universe, the solar system is most interesting to man; for though the sun and moon, the earth and planets, are but a minute frag-

ment of a mighty whole, they contain the spheres of all our actions, and, under God, the sources of all our joys. When regarded as a subject of study, they are well calculated for the exercise and improvement of the mind; when considered as a manifestation of the Creator's glory, they are admirably adapted for the awakening of admiration, gratitude, and praise. Some writers on Natural Theology have considered the arguments for the being and attributes of God, which are drawn from the examination of the heavenly bodies, as less satisfactory than those that are founded upon the provisions and adaptations, which appear in the structure of organized creatures; and we allow that the mechanism exhibited in the bodies of animals, and the adaptation of the senses to the elements of which they are cognizant, exhibit more immediately proofs of contrivance, and have a more direct bearing upon the comfort and happiness of sentient creatures, than the revolutions of the stars; but so harmonious are the movements of the heavenly orbs, and so simple are the laws by which they are governed, that our knowledge of astronomy is far more complete and accurate, far more thorough and satisfactory, than that which we possess of any other department of Natural Philosophy; and the arguments which it furnishes are proportionately clear and convincing. We cannot tell whether to-morrow's dawn will bring sunshine or cloud; we cannot calculate the movement of the feather, as it floats upon the breeze; but we can determine the exact place and motion of every member of the solar system, at any period, past or future, however remote, and we can refer all the changes that take place among them, to the operation of those laws by which they are regulated. Though astronomy may not seem at first sight so directly to exhibit the gracious design of the Creator, as some other branches of science, it shews more manifestly his wisdom and power, and with the aid of a little reflection it demonstrates his benevolence too.

The Sun, which occupies the centre of the system, is a stupendous globe, eight hundred and eighty-two thousand miles in diameter, and one million three hundred and eighty-four thousand four hundred and seventy-two times the size of the earth. When viewed through a telescope it is frequently observed to have large dark spots upon its surface, which prove, by their motion, that this luminary revolves on its axis, in a period equal to twenty-five of our days, and in the same direction as the diurnal rotation of the earth, that is, from west to east. Occupying the centre, the sun has, of course, no yearly revolution, but in consequence of the various attractions of the circumrevolving planets, it is agitated by a small motion round the common centre of gravity of the whole system, which, however, occupies a point within the solar mass. Recent observations have led astronomers to conclude that the sun consists of a dark solid ball, surrounded by a luminous atmosphere, and some have even conjectured the possibility of its being inhabited by creatures like ourselves!

Mercury, the planet nearest to the sun, is about thirty-two thousand miles in diameter, and revolves on his axis in nearly the same time as the earth. Its distance from the sun is thirty-six million miles, and moving at the rate of one hundred and nine thousand, four hundred miles per hour, it completes its annual revolution in eighty-seven days and twenty-three hours.

Venus, the planet next in order, is seven thousand eight hundred miles in diameter, it is sixty-eight million miles distant from the sun, the term of its diurnal revolution is twenty-four hours, its annual course is completed in two hundred and twenty-four days and a-half, and the rate of its motion is eighty thousand and sixty miles in the hour. Though this planet be nearer the earth than any other, it is the most difficult of them all to define with telescopes. "The intense lustre of its illuminated part dazzles the sight, and exaggerates every imperfection of the telescope, yet we clearly see that its surface is not mottled over with permanent spots like the moon; we perceive in it neither mountains nor shadows, but a uniform brightness, in which we may sometimes fancy that we perceive obscurer portions, but can never rest fully satisfied of the fact. The most natural conclusion to be inferred from the very rare appearance, and want of permanence, of the spots, is, that we do not see the real surface of the planet, but only its atmosphere, much loaded with clouds, and which may serve to mitigate the otherwise intense glare of the sunshine." Mercury and Venus, being included in the orbit of the earth when viewed through the telescope, exhibit phases like the moon; they appear full or round, when we see the whole of the surface that is illuminated by the sun, and crescent-shaped when only a part of it is exposed to our view. They are never seen far from the sun, and are frequently so near that they cannot be discovered at all. When on the eastern side of that luminary, they are called the evening stars, appearing conspicuous in the western horizon, just after sunset; when they are on the western side they rise before it, and appear in the eastern sky as the "sons of the morning."

The Earth is also a planet, and revolves like the others around the sun. Its diameter is nearly eight thousand miles, its distance from the sun is ninety-five million miles, and it completes its annual course in a little less than three hundred and sixty-five days six hours. It travels at the rate of sixty-eight thousand and eighty miles every hour, which motion, though one hundred and twenty times greater than that of a cannon ball, is little more than half as swift as that of the planet Mercury. The Earth, by turning round on its axis every twenty-four hours, from west to east, causes an apparent motion of all the heavenly bodies in an opposite direction. By this rapid motion on its axis the inhabitants of the equatorial regions are carried round at a rate exceeding a thousand miles in the hour, in addition to the inconceivably rapid motion of sixty-eight thousand and eighty miles per hour, referred to before, yet of this we are quite insensible, because every thing around us is moving with the same velocity.

The Moon is not a planet, but only a satellite, or attendant upon the earth, round which it revolves in the period that we term a month. Its diameter is two thousand one hundred and eighty miles, and its mean distance from the centre of the earth is two hundred and forty thousand miles. The principal facts ascertained with respect to it, will form a subject for after consideration.

The planet Mars is next in order; its distance from the sun is one hundred and twenty-five millions of miles, and it completes its yearly revolution in somewhat less than six hundred and eighty-seven of our days. Its diurnal revolution is a little more than twenty-four hours, and its diameter is four thousand one hundred miles. When Mars is examined by a telescope, we find it exhibiting very distinctly the outlines of what may be considered continents and seas. The former of these are distinguished by that ruddy colour, which characterises the light of this planet, which always appears red and fiery, and indicates, probably, an ochrey tinge in the general soil; while the seas, if we may so designate them, assume a greenish hue. As these spots are not always seen with equal distinctness, it has been concluded that an atmosphere and clouds surround the planet; a conjecture that is farther confirmed, by the appearance of brilliant white spots at its poles, which have been supposed, with a great deal of probability, to be snow, as they gradually vanish when they have been exposed to the sun, and are greatest when just emerging from the long night of their polar winter.

Beyond Mars are four small planets, not much larger than our moon. They are named Vesta, Juno, Ceres, and Pallas; and their distances from the sun, and times of annual revolution, are about twice as great as those of Mars. They are so minute, that there is little hope of our ever acquiring much knowledge of their physical condition; one of them, Pallas, is said to exhibit a hazy appearance, indicating an extensive and cloudy atmosphere.

We next come to Jupiter, the most magnificent of all the planets, being in diameter no less than eighty-seven thousand miles, and nearly one thousand three hundred times as large as the earth. It has four satellites, or moons, revolving round it, and exhibiting, as it were, a miniature of the great system of which they are a part. They circle round the primary planet as it does round the sun, and observe, in their revolutions and mutual attractions, the same laws that regulate the planets themselves. The surface of Jupiter is always observed to be crossed by parallel belts, or bands, which, though they vary in breadth and situation, never change their general direction. Branches running out from them, and dark spots intermingled with them, are by no means uncommon; and shew, by their motion, that this planet revolves on its axis, in the surprisingly short period of nine hours and fifty-five minutes. The appearances which these belts present, induces the belief that they subsist in the atmosphere of the planet, and indicate tracts of comparatively clear or cloudy sky, caused by currents, similar to the trade winds that prevail in the tropical climates of the earth, but of a much more steady and decided character. The annual revolution of Jupiter is completed in eleven years and ten months.

A still more wonderful and, as it may be termed, elaborately artificial mechanism, is displayed in Saturn, the next in order of remoteness to Jupiter, to which it is not much inferior in magnitude, being about seventy-nine thousand miles in diameter, and exceeding by nearly a thousand times the size of the earth. This stupendous globe, besides being attended by no less than seven satellites or moons, is surrounded by a double ring, (resembling the wooden horizon attached to artificial globes,) the two parts of which lie in one level, or plane, and are separated from each other by a very narrow interval throughout their whole circumference, as they are from the planet by one much wider. The body of this planet is striped by dark belts, somewhat similar to those of Jupiter, but broader and less strongly marked, and owing, no doubt, to a similar cause. The appearance of occasional extensive dusky spots on its surface, has enabled astronomers to ascertain its rotation, which takes place in ten hours and a-half.

Of Uranus, we see nothing but a small, round, uniformly illuminated disc, without rings, belts, or discernible spots. Its diameter is about thirty-five thousand miles, and its bulk eighty times that of the earth. It is attended by satellites—two at least—probably five or six, whose orbits present some remarkable peculiarities. The year of this planet is equal to eighty-four of ourn.

When we consider attentively the heavenly orbs, the majesty of Him who made the whole is most strikingly shown. Their beauty exhibits his glory; their immense size, and inconceivably rapid motions, give proof of his power; while the harmony and order of their movements, evince the wisdom and uniformity of his laws. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork." "By his wisdom he made the heavens; the sun to rule by day, the moon and stars to rule by night." "He telleth their number, he calleth them all by name."

The distances to which these bodies are removed from us, and from each other, present us with a subject yet more overpowering. We are apt to form very inadequate ideas of their relative magnitudes and orbits. The following familiar illustration, will serve to convey some general impression of the system. "Choose any well levelled field, or frozen lake. On it, place a globe two feet in diameter, this will represent the Sun; Mercury will be represented by a grain of mustard seed, on the circumference of a circle one hundred and sixty-four feet in diameter, for its orbit; Venus, a pea, on a circle of two hundred and eighty-four feet in diameter; the Earth, also a pea, on a circle of four hundred and thirty feet; Mars, a rather large pin's head, on a circle of six hundred and fifty-four feet; Juno, Ceres, Vesta, and Pallas, grains of sand, in orbits of from one thousand to one thousand two hundred feet; Jupiter, a moderately-sized orange, in a circle nearly half a mile across; Saturn, a small orange, on a circle of four-fifths of a mile; and Uranus, a full-sized cherry, or small plum, upon the circumference of a circle more than a mile and a-half in diameter." (Sir J. Herschel.) This gives some idea of the relative positions of the planets; but what are their real distances from the centre of the system? The Earth is ninety-five millions of miles from the Sun; Jupiter, five times as much; and the distance of Uranus is one thousand eight hundred millions of miles! These vast spaces may be calculated and noted down; but in vain do we endeavour to conceive them. A cannon ball, flying with undiminished speed, could not pass from the Sun to the remotest of the planets in four hundred years; and the swiftest bird that ever flew, could not even yet have traversed such a space, though it had commenced its flight on the day when "the waters brought forth the fowl after his kind," and though its wing had never tired, and its progress had received no check! Yet all the space which the solar system occupies, is but a minute fragment of a mighty whole!—a whole, which is proved by science, as well as by Scripture, to be filled by the all-pervading power of an omnipresent God!

Occupied with contemplations like these, how naturally do the words of the Psalmist occur to the reflecting mind: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon, and the stars which thou hast ordained; what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him!" How wonderful is the condescension of our God! The self-existent and all-sustaining Jehovah, in whom every creature lives and moves, and has its being; the incomprehensible Lord, who fills immensity, and inhabits eternity,—dwells with the humble and contrite in spirit; and has exhibited his perfections more gloriously in their redemption, than in the creation of the whole material universe! And why has He done so? Not because man has any pre-eminent claim upon his regard, but in order to shew forth the sovereignty of his procedure, the infinitude of his attributes, and the nothingness of all beings beside. "He hath chosen the mean things, and things despised, and things that are not,—that no creature may glory in his presence."

CRUELITIES OF INDIAN SUPERSTITION.

By THE REV. ALEXANDER DUFF, D. D.,

One of the Church of Scotland's Missionaries to the East Indies.

"The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."—PSALM LXXIV. 20.

[The following extract from an Address recently delivered by the Rev. Dr Duff, in Exeter Hall, London, seems to furnish an emphatic commentary on this remarkable passage of Scripture.]

AN appeal has lately been sounded in your ears in behalf of our suffering countrymen in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. And nobly, and righteously, and in a way worthy of the wealthiest metropolis in the world, has the appeal been responded to. But, why is it, that we should be affected even unto horror, at the melancholy recital of mere temporal destitution, while we are apt to remain so cold, callous, and indifferent, to the call of spiritual necessities that is rung in our ears, loud as the cry of perishing multitudes, which no man can number? Oh! it is heart-rending when we are called on to picture to ourselves a territory—and that too within the British Isles—where sea, earth, and air, have conspired against the wretched inhabitants; where the fields yield no meat, where the flocks are cut off from the fold, and there is no herd in the stall; where fathers and mothers are emaciated into skeletons, and their little ones slowly famishing before their eyes, with the cry of bread upon their lips, which yet father and mother have not to bestow! No wonder though many, in the first gushings of sympathy, should have cried out, "Can imagination itself conceive aught more harrowing to the feelings?" No: nought more harrowing to mere natural feeling can we possibly imagine. But surely, methinks, that, to the higher order of spiritual sensibility, something may be presented more harrowing still. It is indeed dreadful to hear of fellow-creatures perishing by famine and by pestilence: there is, however, associated with such a death, the grand alleviating consideration, that it is by the hands of a mysterious Providence. But I know a land, where earth, sea, and air, conspire in favour of its inhabitants,—a land, so gorgeously clad, that it has been emphatically styled, "the climes of the sun." And truly they are the climes of the sun: for there he seems to smile with exuberant bounty, and causes all nature to luxuriate in her rich magnificence. There, the glowing imagery of the prophets seems almost literally to be realized. The trees of the forest seem to clap their hands, and the little hills and the valleys seem to rejoice on every side. All bespeak the glories of a presiding Deity, and recall to remembrance the bowers of Paradise. But, oh, in this highly favoured land, (need I say I refer to India,) which, for beauty, might be the garden of the whole earth, and, for plenteousness, the granary of the nations,—in this highly favoured land, children are doomed to see their parents, and parents their children, perish!—perish, not because there is no meat in the field, no flocks in the fold, no cattle in the stall, but because they are goaded on by the stimulants of a diabolical superstition to perish miserably by each others hands!

Behold that motley group hurrying, under the piercing rays of a tropical sun, with their living burden, to the banks of the sacred stream. It is a company of sons and daughters piously consigning a sickly parent, for the benefit of his soul, to the depths of a watery grave!

Witness that funeral pile, on which are stretched the putrid corpse of the father, and the living body of the mother. Blessed be God! throughout the British territories, these cruel piles are now extinguished. But the system that prescribed them is not yet destroyed, and the spirit that enkindled them has not yet been extinguished. And, were the strong arm of British power withdrawn to-day, to-morrow would a thousand piles be blazing on the plains of Hindustan. And in the independent states, the horrid rite is as prevalent as ever. To it, therefore, I am still entitled to refer, for a palpable illustration of the power of superstition.

Behold, then, that funeral pile, on which are stretched the putrid corpse of the father, and the living body of the mother. Around it, behold standing the poor hapless children. Standing for what? To excite the yearnings of a mother's compassion, by their sobs and wailings? No. To quench the devouring flames with their tears? No. But, in the name of their gods, to apply the torch that, in a moment, is to leave them fatherless, motherless, orphans, in a friendless world!

Can the policy of hell prevail farther than this? Yes, methinks it can. Concerning children, it may be surmised that their faculties are immature, and that they must be the unwilling instruments, in the hands of a crafty designing priesthood. But what shall we say of parents who, in order to fulfil a vow, or propitiate a deity, can spontaneously resolve to suspend their fond offspring in mid-air, to become an unresisting prey to ravenous vultures and carrion crows? What shall we say of parents, who, as an act of devotion to some blood-thirsty demon, can deliberately throw their smiling infants into the crashing jaws of the monsters of the deep?

But, not to dwell on instances of religious murder, which may be alleged to be comparatively isolated and rare; or, whose atrocity may seem to be partially mitigated by the maddening frenzy of a riotous heathen festival,—O let me crave the special attention of this great audience to a practice which, up to this hour, is in wide and terribly fatal operation. I allude to the revolting practice of female infanticide, in many of those states that are now under the mighty shadow of British protection. Much has been attempted towards its suppression by Walker and Duncan, and other British philanthropists, whose generous interference, in this case, proves that,

"Where Britain's power is felt, Mankind may feel her mercy too."

But, alas, the success of these exertions has hitherto been confined within limits distressingly circumscribed. There is in my possession a portion of the recent report, not of missionaries, of whom it may, though slanderously, be affirmed that they are apt to get bewildered amid the scintillations of a fierce and fiery fanaticism, but the report of a gentleman distinguished in the republic of letters,—the report of a high political functionary of the British government. Here we have the stately march of official form, with its train of stubborn statistics and arithmetical details.

From this authoritative document, it appears that, in a very limited territory, now linked with the destinies of Britain, with a population not exceeding that of a small English county, there are, at least, one thousand female children that annually meet with an untimely end. This is at the rate of thirty thousand for a single generation. And, as the practice has existed from time immemorial, the appalling inference is inevitable that, since the commencement of the Christian era, upwards of eighteen hundred thousand female children, in one small district of British India, have prematurely perished! Perished! how? By the famine that pines in empty stalls, or the pestilence that walketh at noon-day? No. That were, in some measure, a merciful death, as it would be by the righteous, though severe, ordination of Providence. How then? Amid the remorseless atrocities of barbaric warfare? No.

That, too, were comparatively a natural death, as it would be inflicted by the hands of an enemy exasperated with deadly hate. How then? and when? In times of peace, when the trumpet hangs mutely in the hall, as well as when it peals the shout of battle; in times of plenty, when earth, air, and ocean fling stores of affluence from their teeming bosoms; amid the retirements of home, and the stillness of domestic privacy, have the thousands of hecatombs of helpless innocents been cruelly sacrificed!—sacrificed, massacred, butchered! Butchered by whom? By the midnight assassin, wielding the Indian scalping knife and the savage tomahawk? No, no. Let humanity shudder! They are the mothers, the unhappy mothers, who, in the name of false honour, and false religion,* have no compassion on the fruit of their own womb, that imbrue their hands in the blood of their new-born babes!

Oh the fell power of demon pride and bellish superstition! Surely, surely this is the very consummation of Satan's triumph over poor, ruined, infatuated man. And oh! were it only possible to cause this hall to resound with but a faint and distant echo of the groans, and shrieks, and dying agonies of myriads of dejected victims that, from year to year, impurple, with human gore, the streams and the groves, the hamlets and the palaces of India, would ye not arise, and, with one spontaneous and universal impulse, resolve to give no sleep to your eyes, nor slumber to your eyelids, till ye had done all that, in you lay, to sweep such man-destroying, God-dishonouring abominations from the face of the earth?

THE HIGH PRIVILEGE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. W. M. HETHERINGTON, A. M.,
Minister of Torphichen.

"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?" &c.—PSALM xlii. 1-5.

"WHAT is there necessary for man to know," says an eminently pious divine, "which the Psalms are not able to teach? They are to beginners an easy and familiar introduction; a mighty augmentation of all virtue and knowledge in such as are entered before; a strong confirmation to the most perfect among others. Heroical magnanimity, exquisite justice, grave moderation, exact wisdom, repentance unfeigned, patience unwearied, the mysteries of God, the sufferings of Christ, the terrors of wrath, the comforts of grace, the works of Providence over this world, and the promised joys of that world which is to come; all good necessary to be either known, or done, or had, this one celestial fountain yieldeth." That this is no exaggerated estimate of the merits of the Book of Psalms, will be readily admitted by the genuine Christian, who must have often found, in this portion of Scripture, the most suitable language for his soul, in all its varied frames of deep and sincere repentance, trembling hope, rejoicing confidence, and rapturous adoration. There we read the lamentations of a contrite sinner—the confessions of repeated and aggravated guilt, that weigh down his heart and oppress his utterance—language expressive of those hopes of mercy and forgiveness from the God of mercy, which come in glimpses, brightening the very depths of despair—the gradual increase of these hopes, gathering strength from remembered instances of pardon and treasured promises of remission, until, in full dependence upon the gracious word of Him who is faithful and true, the whole liberated soul pours itself forth in fervent halleluiahs of gratitude and love! Thus, under all the modifications of feeling, arising from circumstances widely diversified, acting upon a mind of great power and compass, has the Psalmist given free and undisguised utterance to the inmost thoughts of his heart; and by so doing, has held up to all succeeding times a faithful mirror, in which every one may see a striking representation of what he himself was, or is, or might be, or ought zealously and speedily to endeavour to become.

* The tribes of Rajputs, who are particularly addicted to the practice of infanticide, as remarked by the British Resident in 1834, usually plead, in extenuation, hereditary custom, their high caste, which would be degraded by alliances with inferior tribes, and their inability duly to meet the expenses of a marriage which they deem suitable to their high descent and vain pretensions. Other tribes, such as the Minas, who are equally addicted to the revolting practice, plead, according to the same high authority, an immemorial tradition, inculcating the duty and propriety of destroying their daughters, and adduce divine authority in favour of the practice. "The following incident," adds the British Resident, "will, with difficulty, be believed; its truth may be relied on. As I was riding one morning, accompanied by Lieutenant C., of the 51st regiment native infantry, I passed through the Bundi Mina village of Umroo (in northern India.) I was there beset by the cries of a Mina woman, the wife of one of the patels of the village, who clamorously demanded of me to forbear all endeavours to procure the suppression of an ancient custom, and a religious rite enjoined upon her by divine authority. When I endeavoured to reconcile the unfeeling woman, she boldly avowed that daughters, in their tribe, had been foretold to bring, if preserved, only trouble and misfortune to their families, and that the event (that is, the preservation of the daughters,) could not but be calamitous!"

But while this is the chief characteristic of the Psalms in general, the peculiar meaning of any one Psalm will be rendered much more evident, by attending to the circumstances amid which it was composed, especially when these refer to the various events in David's own chequered life. It is evident that the Psalm before us was composed by David in one of those periods of trial when he was compelled to flee to the hilly country for safety and defence against some powerful enemy. This occurred several times during the life of Saul, and the Psalm might have been poured forth by the persecuted chief during one of these periods. But there are various expressions in it, which do not so well apply to any of these junctures; such as the reference in the 6th verse to the land of Jordan and of the Hermonites, a country situate almost due north from Jerusalem; whereas the wildernesses of Ziph and Engedi, where David took refuge from Saul, were almost due south from that metropolis. David must, therefore, have been in the regions about Jordan, northwards from the capital, when he composed this Psalm. Now, we are told, in the 2d book of Samuel, that when Absalom rebelled against his father, he seized upon Hebron, and the hilly country around it, so often in former days the place of refuge which had sheltered David; and that David was in consequence obliged to flee northward, and betake himself to the district beyond Jordan, which was both mountainous and woody, and had also the river between him and his rebellious son, to be a temporary impediment to the march of the more numerous rebel army. Such circumstances exactly suit the language of the Psalm, and give great probability to the supposition that it was composed at that very time. But there is another allusion, and one of a very touching nature, which, in our opinion, is enough to decide the question, and to fix the composition of the Psalm to the period of Absalom's unnatural rebellion.

In the 4th verse, the Psalmist, in a tone of the deepest pathos, says, "When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me; for I had gone with the multitude: I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy-day." It is quite impossible to attach any other meaning to these words, than that of heavy complaint in being excluded from the enjoyment of these public ordinances of God's worship in His holy place, which had been the source of the Psalmist's sacred delight. But the ark of the Lord had been taken by the Philistines in that battle in which the two sons of Eli were slain; and after its restoration, it remained twenty years in a private house at Kirjath-jearim, "and all the house of Israel," adds the sacred historian, "lamented after the Lord." Not till the eighth year after the death of Saul, did David bring up the ark of God to Jerusalem, to the tabernacle which he had prepared for it in the city of David: not till after that time, therefore, could David, with propriety, have used the language just quoted; for not till after that time could it have been possible for him to have "gone with the multitude to the house of God." There may even be reference to the day of rejoicing when, to use the words of Scripture, "David gathered together all the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand; and David arose, and went with all the people that were with him, to bring up the ark of God. So David, and all the house of Israel, brought up the ark of the Lord, with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet." The remembrance of the fervent exultation of heart with which he had conducted the ark of God into the place which he had prepared for its reception, amidst the shoutings of joy and praise raised by the multitude that kept holy-day to celebrate so propitious an event, together with the remembrance of the many, many times in which he had mingled his voice with that of the thousands of Israel, subsequently, on God's own hallowed day, the sacred Sabbath, while he and they appeared before the Lord, to praise him for his goodness, and to implore a continuation of his precious blessings,—this blended remembrance risen upon the mind of the pious monarch, when driven beyond Jordan by the rebellion of his unnatural son Absalom, and deepened the pangs which wrung his bosom, in his miserable hours of exile and affliction. As he gazed around him, in his wild and woody solitude, on the rugged rocks, and shaggy dells, and waving mountain sides, so unlike the palace-crowned eminences of Jerusalem, or the vine-clad slopes around it; as he listened to the dashing and deafening roar of falling streams, so different from the sweet symphonious harmony of instrumental music, blending with, or rising clear above, the swelling anthem of an adoring multitude, hymning in his own lofty strains the praises of Jehovah, the strong contrast between his former well remembered happiness, and his present extreme distress, inspired him to breathe forth his mighty woe in strains at once mournful and sublime, to the very loftiest degree: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?"

Do not these views of the circumstances, amid which David composed this psalm, add greatly to the interest and intelligence with which you, Christian friends, peruse its deeply pathetic language? But there is one topic on which we have hitherto scarcely touched, and which, nevertheless, is the very one that most demands your attention. To that let us now betake ourselves, during the remainder of this discourse, praying fervently for divine aid to press upon your hearts and minds the important views it is so well calculated to teach.

When a man is plunged into such a state of distress, that he has sustained the loss of everything which he formerly most highly prized,—that he has nothing left but life itself, bereft of all that had formerly rendered his existence dignified and happy,—if he gives utterance to the grief which fills his heart in the hours of his heavy bereavement, we may confidently expect that he will most loudly lament the loss of what he most dearly prized. Approach the sad retreat of the banished man, and ask him what he most deploras in his hour of melancholy musing on joys departed, on the scenes and the events of other days, and from his answer you may form an accurate conception of the master element in his former habits, pursuits, and character. "My scientific instruments, my books, my literary associates," answers the philosopher, the man of learning, the man of genius; "The dear home of my childhood, the haunts of early youth," replies the poetical admirer of nature's romantic beauties, thinking no scene equal to those which first woke his young heart's vernal delight; "My parents, my sisters and my brothers, the friend of my bosom, the partner of my life," is the warm reply of the man of large heart and tenderly affectionate nature; "My brave brethren in arms, the assertors of my country's glory, the partakers of my own," bursts from the lips of the ardent and ambitious warrior. But let us stay our pursuit of imaginary cases, and turn to a reality. In the shaggy gorge of a woody mountain pass, on the eastern bank of the river Jordan, behold a small band of veteran warriors. Their monarch-chief, a grey haired venerable man, sits apart on the fragment of a rock in the entrance of a yawning cave, his dim discrowned head drooping on his breast in deep dejected silence. What are the objects over the loss of which his mind so darkly and so mournfully broods? What is the one object which forms the central and the moving principle of all his woe? Is it the loss of regal power, sovereign sway, uncontrolled dominion, so eagerly sought, so desperately held by kings and conquerors, by men of strong mind and haughty spirit? Is it the loss of pomp and splendour, that spell which fascinates the proud? or of licentious and luxuriant indulgence in all that can gratify the appetites of sense and passion, so eagerly courted by the voluptuous votaries of pleasure? Approach and ask. Nay, speak not, but listen! He raises his majestic head; an air of profound woe, and yet more profound and religious solemnity, gives an expression of indescribable grandeur to the lineaments of his noble countenance. In the rapt voice of inspired song his deep toned accents pour forth the master anguish of his soul, fixing his upturned supplicating eye humbly yet earnestly on heaven. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?" The ingratitude of his people, the loss of his sovereignty, the hostile dangers thickening around and threatening him in his old age, even the base and unnatural rebellion of his beloved son, were all forgotten, or slightly passed over, as things of comparatively little moment: when he thought of his expulsion from the place where alone he could enjoy the privilege of worshipping the living God in the house dedicated to his name. Can anything more strikingly prove the inestimable value attached by David to that sacred privilege, the privilege of worshipping God according to his own ordinances, and in company with the multitude of those who keep holy the day which God hath hallowed to himself? Sharper and more envenomed than a serpent's tooth, was the pang that tore his heart, when he thought of the base conduct of his guilty son, as appears from the inconsolable grief which overwhelmed him on hearing afterwards of his death; but his banishment from the house and the worship of God tried his soul with an agony so much more intense, that even the fiercest of his other woes was absorbed in that vast and overwhelming affliction. Let the voice of the exiled king of Israel, from amidst the fern and savage retreats in which he sought refuge from the murderous pursuit of his rebellious son, teach you, Christians, how to estimate aright the privilege of assembling yourselves together on the day of the Lord, of "going with the multitude to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise."

It will scarcely be objected by any, that David was not in every way qualified to form an accurate estimate of the several values of the particulars of his general loss. There are few stations in life which David had not filled; few sorrows which he had not borne; few kinds of pleasure which he had not enjoyed. He had experienced almost a complete abstract and epitome of human life, and knew well the worth of present and temporal enjoyments, and of future and heavenly hopes. The only present loss that could thoroughly appal his soul was the loss of that which belonged essentially to the future; the loss of nothing on earth could be to him an overpowering loss, but the loss of those ordinances which are the means of preparing for heaven. The sudden bereavement of all those tender and pure delights which cheer and sweeten social existence, were felt as nothing in comparison with the interruption of that spiritual communion with God, which, commenced in time, shall form the glory and the blessedness of every pious soul throughout eternity. Such were the sentiments with which David, the shepherd-king of Israel, the man after God's own heart, regarded the bereavement of the means and opportunities of joining in the public worship of Almighty God. But such sentiments are by no means peculiar to David. They have been, and are, entertained by all, in every age and nation, who have ever felt the pure and elevating gladness of heart and soul, which swells and glows with greater or less fervour in all who join, with sincerity and truth, in the public worship of God, our creator, preserver, redeemer, and sanctifier. To the man who has ever felt the pure, hallowed, sympathetic thrill of genuine, scriptural, and spiritual devotion, as he raised his voice in harmony with a multitude of fellow-creatures praising and adoring God, nothing earthly can equal the loss of that truly inestimable, that heavenly privilege. Innumerable proofs of the truth of this assertion might easily be adduced from the writings of the most eminent Christians in every age and nation; but we need them not. We need only to appeal to the feelings of every true Christian, whether, when deprived, by any dispensation of Providence, of the enjoyment of public worship, that privation has not invariably been felt as the most painful part of the painful dispensation. The loss of health, the loss of fortune, the loss of friends, the loss of home, have often been regarded as all but trifles when compared with the loss of Christian communion with each other and with God. True, there are many, far too many, who disregard the worship of God, public and private, and who could feel no pain in being deprived of all religious ordinances. Such men, indeed, could form no conception of the cause and nature of the mighty griefs which swallowed up in David's mind all regret for the loss of a kingdom and the rebellion of a son. To such men it is not our present purpose to address ourselves, farther than to remark, in passing, that they manifest an abundant degree of self-estimation, to suppose that the carelessness of their ignorant and little minds should be received as in any degree capable of counterbalancing the strong testimony furnished by the conduct and the language of David, that man of large heart, multifarious experience, and fervent spirituality of mind.

One of the things which constitute the excellency of public social worship, is, that it affords, so far as our present condition can, an actual foretaste of the occupations and enjoyments of the blessed inhabitants of heaven, and, consequently, must tend strongly to prepare us for participating in the pure and permanent raptures of their holy and everlasting inheritance. When in the house of God, and on God's holy day, we meet with our fellow-worshippers, and spend the sacred hours in praise, and prayer, and heavenly meditation, while the world's harassing cares are forgotten, and every jarring passion lulled into peaceful and profound repose, our souls the while holding high converse with our Redeemer and our God, do we not feel that if the day, and its hallowed duties and enjoyments, could remain unchanging and interminable, and if our souls could endure unweariedly for ever the full exercise of these holy affections, in the strength of its spiritual life, there would want but little to realize our loftiest conceptions of that glorious and eternal Sabbatism which awaiteth the ransomed people of the Lord? Is it then strange, that those who have been accustomed to enjoy this foretaste of heaven should so deeply deplore its loss? that they should regard every other privation as dust in the balance? that be their other distresses what they might, their sole strong cry should be with David, "My soul thirsteth for God, the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"

It would, no doubt, greatly enhance the anguish of such a bereavement, if it were the direct consequence of personal criminality of conduct; but there are many ways in which men may be deprived of the high privilege of public worship, without any peculiar degree of personal criminality. Disease may, at one blow, prostrate the man of the most vigorous and hardy frame, and confine him to the bed of pain and languor for a lengthened term of tedious years, utterly unable to take one step towards the house of God, while he hears the tolling of the Sabbath-bell, and marks the passing multitude thronging to the church, in answer to its sacred call. Or in the slow, but sure progress of years, the wasting touch of time may shrivel up the bent and tottering structure, once so light, so agile, and so strong; and the dim eye, the dull ear, and the feeble pulse of age, whisper incessantly their melancholy tale of graves, and epitaphs, and worms to the body; of death, judgment, and eternity, to the soul. Yet, while thus trembling on the brink of the dark and narrow house appointed for all living, the very circumstances that urge their instant preparation to meet their God, are those which preclude the possibility of enjoying the few remaining, the doubly precious opportunities of meeting Him in his own appointed ordinances, and there listening to the "ministry of reconciliation," through which alone their parting spirits may obtain that "peace of God which passeth all understanding," to keep their hearts and minds. True, God is not confined to temples made with hands, but can, and does, accommodate the infinite riches of his grace to all the necessities of his faithful and trusting servants. Yet, as every one who has stood beside the sick-bed of an aged, or the death-bed of a departing, Christian, can testify, the subdued and chastened, yet deep lamentation, that it is not now, and again may never be, with them as in times past, when they went with the multitude to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, is that which is most frequently heard from their faltering lips, mingled with prayers for more entire resignation to the all-disposing will of their gracious God, in this their saddest and most grievous bereavement. And dear, inestimably dear, to such faint and way-worn pilgrims of the world, are those pastoral visits which bring to their lonely and solitary abodes the glad tidings of great joy which they so ardently long to hear, so urgently need to make fully their own, before they depart to their dread and final account. Nothing can be imagined more profoundly pathetic than the sad and softened complaint, of half reluctant resignation, falling tremblingly from the tongue of the aged Christian, that, but for want of accommodation within a moderate distance, his, or her, few remaining days might yet be cheered and blessed by again, and yet again, mingling a feeble, but a fervently earnest utterance of praise and adoration with the full voice of the multitude of God's people, in the house dedicated to his name and service,—again, and yet again, enjoy this foretaste of heaven, and heaven's eternal bliss,—again, and yet again, listen to the full and free proclamation of the Redeemer's everlasting love, that having beheld his salvation here, their peaceful departure may be a calm translation into his kingdom of eternal glory.

EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHEME.
No. IV.

IN November 1830, the committee, with the view of ascertaining the actual state of education in the Highlands and Islands, issued a comprehensive schedule of inquiry on this subject, to the parochial ministers of the various districts. Answers to their inquiries were obtained in the course of two years and a-half, so that at the meeting of the General Assembly, in May 1833, a full and detailed report, founded on the returns, was laid on the table. From this document, valuable from the important facts which it contains in reference to the statistics of education, much interesting information may be obtained. The view which it exhibits of the educational wants of the Highland population is truly appalling. It states, for example, as an ascertained fact, that the number of persons, upwards of six years of age, in all the parishes of the Highlands and Islands, who are unable to read, either in the English or Gaelic language, amounts to eighty-three thousand three hundred and ninety-seven! Nearly a sixth, then, of the entire population of these districts is not merely uneducated, but even destitute of the means of education. And of those who have learned to read, a great number have been taught to read in Gaelic only, and numbers more, though they may be stated in the returns as capable of reading in the English language, have been so imperfectly taught that they cannot understand what they read, and, therefore, can take no pleasure in what is to them a mere unprofitable exercise. And as to the other branches of an elementary education, matters are still worse. The art of writing, which is an all but universal acquirement in the Lowlands, is comparatively unknown in the Highlands. In Arran, which contains a population of six thousand four hundred and twenty-seven, only two hundred and eighteen are represented as unable to read, while those unable to write are no fewer than three thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine. A similar proportion probably obtains in the islands of Orkney and Shetland, and although in the other Highland districts, writing is more frequently taught, the number unacquainted with this invaluable art is probably far greater than the number of those who have not learned to read. And the most obvious cause of this lamentable ignorance of even the simplest rudiments of education, is undoubtedly the poverty of the Highland, when compared with the Lowland, districts of Scotland. Hence the necessity for strenuous efforts to supply from without, that instruction which could never be obtained by the internal resources of the districts alluded to. Much has, no doubt, been already done, but far more remains to be done. The fact, already mentioned, is too striking to be lost sight of, that there are upwards of eighty-three thousand persons unable to read the Word of God, either in the Gaelic or English language! This fact is sufficient to rouse the energies of every patriotic, or every Christian mind.

The report which the committee had drawn up, founded on the returns they had received, was printed and circulated extensively throughout Scotland, and among Scotsmen in England, America, and India. And it was well fitted to awaken sympathy in behalf of the Highland population, not merely as displaying the dreadful deficiency of the means of education, but their destitution also in other respects. Thus, from the returns it appeared that in forty-five parishes there were one thousand three hundred and twenty families which neither possessed nor probably ever possessed a single copy of the Word of God, either in Gaelic or English; and there were two thousand and thirty-five families, residing at a distance varying from six to thirty miles from any place of public worship. The committee being thus made aware, to a certain extent, of the actual wants of the Highland districts, were naturally anxious to use all legitimate means for supplying a deficiency so affecting. They made application, accordingly, to the Edinburgh Bible Society, who, with a promptitude worthy of that truly Christian association, placed at their disposal two thousand eight hundred and fifty-five Bibles, and four hundred and three Testaments, in the Gaelic and English language; a gift amounting in value to upwards of six hundred pounds. And, in addition to this munificent donation, the same society offered to grant the committee as many more Bibles as would be sufficient to furnish one copy to every family that might be found to want a Bible, in those parishes which had not yet sent any return.

The committee now began, in 1834, to turn their attention to a very important subject connected with the efficiency of their schools—the necessity of model schools for the training of schoolmasters. The schools of Tobermory and Arran had already attained a character somewhat approaching to model schools, and were frequently resorted to by young men, who were desirous of being initiated in the art of teaching. This advantage, however, was limited to the respective neighbourhoods of those well conducted schools. But one large district particularly attracted the attention of the committee, as being utterly removed from all opportunity of becoming acquainted with the best methods of instruction. We refer to the whole country of Shetland, including twelve parishes and a population of twenty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-two persons. To aid in the erection of a model school for that isolated region, the heritors of Lerwick voted the very handsome sum of five hundred pounds, and it was resolved to select a situation for the school-house in the immediate neighbourhood of that town.

To the institution of a model school for the training of schoolmasters in general, the committee directed much of their consideration, and in the meantime, until their plans were fully matured, the candidates for the Assembly's schools were, and indeed still are, required to attend for several weeks on the Sessional School, conducted by Mr Wood. Under the tuition of that distinguished philanthropist, to whose meritorious exertions we called attention in our last number, they join the ordinary classes of the institution as pupils, and, after a short time, they are employed as monitors, and their education as schoolmasters is not considered as completed till they have acquired considerable experience in the practice of teaching.

Instead of confining their attention exclusively to the Highland districts of the country, the committee resolved, in 1835, to make inquiry as to the state of education in the large towns throughout the country generally. With this view, they circulated a schedule among the parochial ministers of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, Paisley, Perth, and Dundee, requesting information on various points connected with this important subject. The results of this inquiry were such as to awaken the deepest commiseration in every philanthropic heart. To mention only one instance out of many. In five of the parishes of Glasgow, embracing a population of forty thousand eight hundred and fifteen, it appears that there were at the date of the returns, and the evil is daily on the increase, one thousand four hundred and fifty-seven persons, betwixt six and fifteen years of age, unable to read, and four thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, betwixt ten and fifteen, unable to write.

The facts thus brought out, as well as other circumstances connected with this and the other schemes belonging to the Church, awakened a still greater interest in their behalf, and the result has been very gratifying. Presbyteries throughout the Church have formed themselves, in many instances, into associations for the furtherance of these benevolent objects, and the contributions have been steadily on the increase. In Glasgow, more especially, the subject of education has attracted prominent notice; and a Normal School has been established in that town, which, under the superintendence of its able and enlightened rector, Mr M'Crie, is likely to give a new impulse to the art of teaching in Scotland.

To accomplish the various plans which the committee had formed for the improvement and extension of their benevolent scheme, the General Assembly, at their meeting in May 1835, resolved to petition the House of Commons on the subject. This was accordingly done, and the Government entertained the matter so favourably, as to lead the committee to believe that schools would be established in connection with the Parliamentary Churches recently erected in the Highlands. The parishes assigned to those Churches are calculated to contain fourteen thousand eight hundred and thirty-five persons, upwards of six years of age, unable to read; and the endowment of schools, therefore, for the supply of education to so great a mass of the population, was an object earnestly to be desired. Government had already directed their attention to the educational wants of the large towns, and it was voted by the House of Commons, in August 1834, "That a sum, not exceeding ten thousand pounds, be granted to his Majesty, to enable him to issue money for the erection of school-houses, in aid of private subscriptions for that purpose, for the education of the children of the poorer classes in certain great towns in Scotland, and for the erection of model schools in England." The voting of this sum was regarded by all the friends of education as a token for good, and high hopes were entertained that something farther would be done in the good cause. Nor have these hopes been disappointed. The welcome intelligence has been recently received by the Assembly's committee, that Government intend to dedicate a sum of six thousand pounds towards the endowment of schools in each of the districts where Parliamentary Churches have been built. This is a great boon, and we sincerely hope it is merely an earnest of what will yet be done for the uneducated portion of our countrymen, both in the Highlands and Lowlands. Private munificence may do, as it has already done, much, but the rapid increase of the population is such as to call for greater exertions than private individuals can ever command. It is necessary, therefore, that the aid of the Legislature be obtained; and we trust the time is not far distant, when the benevolent wish of a Christian and patriotic king shall be fulfilled, "that every child in the British dominions shall be able to read his Bible."

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

Minister of Crumrod.

No. III.

"And it came to pass, in process of time, that the king of Egypt died: and the children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage, and they cried; and their cry came up unto God, by reason of the bondage. And God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob. And God looked upon the children of Israel, and God had respect unto them." Exodus ii. 23-25.

THE first period of the history of Israel comprehends the time from the call of Abraham onwards to their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt by the mighty power of God, under the guidance of Moses. At the call of Abraham was the first intimation given respecting the nation of Israel that was to be descended from him; and in this first mention of them, they were spoken of as a nation of whom God would have a special care, and to whom he would give the whole land of Canaan for a possession. And what God said of Abraham, "Blessed be he that bleaseth thee, and cursed be he that curseth thee," was intended also to apply to the nation to be descended from him; they being in the loins of Abraham, we may say, when the words were spoken to him. And that the blessing belonged to the nation, as well as to Abraham, from whom they were descended, appears from the prophecy of Balaam, when Balak sent for him to curse Israel. Thus said he, "Balak, the king of Moab, hath sent for me from Aram, out of the mountains of the east, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, come, defy me Israel. How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed? How shall I defy whom God hath not defied? For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him. Lo! the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the numbers of the fourth part of Israel?" And connected with the very first promise of this nation to be descended from Abraham, was the promise, that in him, and in his seed, all nations of the earth were to be blessed. So that here, in the very first mentioning of the Israelites, we have an intimation of the great purpose for which they were then to be separated from other nations,—that from among them the Saviour was to be descended. God, therefore, from the first, was to exercise a watchful care over that nation; for there was a special blessing in it, from which all other nations were in due time to be benefited. On this very account, Satan, the great enemy of God and man, has in all ages peculiarly directed his efforts against Israel, knowing that the hopes of fallen man were connected with them; that so, if possible, by cutting off the Israelitish people, he might ruin our hopes for ever; and, as we proceed in their history, we shall find how wonderfully they were preserved from dangers that threatened their destruction. The command of God, on such occasions, was, "Destroy it not; for there is a blessing in it."

The promise first made to Abraham, that he should have a numerous posterity, who would become a great nation, was renewed to him, when he came up out of Egypt to Canaan. The Lord said, "I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered." Again, the Lord appeared to him, and told him, "That his posterity should be strangers in a land not theirs, and they should afflict them four hundred years." And also, "That nation whom they serve will I judge, saith the Lord." And afterwards, "That they came out with great substance." That same promise was afterwards renewed to Isaac, and also to Jacob, having always connected with it the promise of the seed, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. And observe, how wonderful were the dispensations of Providence for insuring the fulfilment of what God had promised to Abraham in regard to the nation to be descended from him. The envy and hatred of Joseph's brethren, and their selling him to be a bondman in Egypt, was the means, by the overruling hand of God, of providing, in the fat of that land, a residence for the twelve patriarchs and their families, until they became a great nation. And when Jacob set out for Egypt, God met with him at Beersheba, and encouraged him to go down to Egypt, saying, "I am God, the God of thy father. Fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will surely make of thee a great nation." And both Jacob, and his son Joseph, on their deathbeds, made mention of God's promise to give Israel the land of Canaan for a possession. Jacob, in testimony of his belief in this promise, made Joseph swear, that he would bury him in the land of Canaan. And Joseph confirmed to them the same promise, telling them that God would surely visit them, and bring them up again to the land of Canaan. And as a pledge to them of the fulfilment of that promise, he left it as his dying charge upon them and their posterity, that his body should be kept in Egypt, and carried with them, when they should depart from Egypt to go to Canaan. This charge was observed. Joseph's body was embalmed, and put in a coffin, and carefully kept. And thus they had with them, during all the time of their residence in Egypt, in the embalmed body of the patriarch Joseph, a pledge of the promise of God, to bring them again into the land of Canaan. And when the time of their deliverance came, we are informed, that Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, when he led them out of Egypt. They were with them in all their journeys in the wilderness, and were at length deposited in Canaan under the care of Joshua.

After the death of Joseph, but little is known of the people of Israel during their four hundred years' sojourning in Egypt. It appears, however, that in fulfilment of the promise of God, they continued to increase very rapidly, so as to be a cause of jealousy and alarm to the king and people of Egypt. Harsh measures were accordingly resorted to by the government, with a view of diminishing their numbers. They intended to wear out the strength of the Israelites, by making slaves of them, and dooming them to hard labour. But in this attempt they were altogether defeated; the more that they were oppressed, they increased the more rapidly. Even the cruel mandate given them, to cast their male children into the river as soon as they were born, was without the desired effect. An order so repugnant to the strong feelings of parental affection, would not, it is to be supposed, be very rigorously executed. And it seems to have been in force only for a short time. It is very remarkable, however, that, while the bloody order was in force, the compliance of Moses' parents with that order was overruled in the providence of God, not only for delivering him from perishing in the river, but was the means of his becoming the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter. Thus the appointed deliverer of Israel from the bondage of Egypt, was brought up in the palace of King Pharaoh, obtained the best education that Egypt could give, and was thus qualified for the arduous charge with which he was afterwards to be invested, of conducting the people of Israel out of Egypt, through the wilderness to the confines of the promised land. Thus God makes even the wrath of man to praise him, and the remnant of his wrath he will restrain.

Meanwhile, the people of Israel were very heavily oppressed. And what was still a darker feature in their case, the state of religion appears to have been at a very low ebb among them. They had forgotten the promises of deliverance which had been made to them by the God of their fathers, that they should be brought again to the land of Canaan, and provided their bondage had been relaxed, they would, many of them at least, have been content to abide by the flesh-pots of Egypt. And their falling back from the worship and service of God into a lamentable state of spiritual decay and backsliding, was, we may suppose, the cause of their being permitted to undergo the severe chastisement of the Egyptian bondage. They were thus taught, in their own sad experience, that it is an evil and a bitter thing to depart from the service of the living God; and that in times of trial and trouble, it is to God alone we must look for comfort, support, and deliverance.

There was, however, a remnant among them who feared God, though their number was small. Among them were the parents of Moses, since, we find them commended for their faith by the Apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews. In the midst of all their sufferings under the oppression of their Egyptian taskmasters, they that truly feared God among them would still cling to the promise of the Saviour, and would still rest on the assurance which God had given them of their being brought up out of the land of Egypt and out of the house of bondage by the outstretched arm of the mighty God of Jacob. And they would not cease to cry mightily unto the Lord, that he would be graciously present with them in their trying circumstances; that he would have respect to their tears, and sighs, and groans; and that, in fulfilment of his promise, he would come down and accomplish their deliverance.

Now, in this cruel oppression of the people of Israel by Pharaoh and the Egyptians, we have a striking representation of that degraded state, in which all are, by nature, under spiritual bondage to sin and Satan. These, our spiritual enemies, like Pharaoh and the Egyptians, tyrannise over us, they hold us fast, and refuse to let us go. There is this great difference, however, between the two cases. The Israelites were fully aware of their wretched condition; they groaned under it; they earnestly desired deliverance. But many of the deluded captives of sin and Satan lurk their chains. They know not what it is to enjoy spiritual liberty; yea, they boast of their freedom, while they are all the while the bondmen of corruption. But were they once made fully aware of that state of degradation, of bondage and misery in which we are all involved by the fall; then would they cry out for deliverance! "What shall I do to be saved?"

Thus was it with the Israelites. They cried unto the Lord. The Lord heard their cry, and was graciously pleased to interpose and to accomplish for them a glorious deliverance. And although God might have at once effected their rescue by one signal display of his mighty power, he was pleased to accomplish it in a gradual manner, to exhibit, in the case of Pharaoh, the obstinate hardness of the human heart; and that by repeated displays of his almighty power, all Egypt might know, that amongst their gods many, and lords many, there was none like unto the God of Israel. Accordingly, when God, by ten successive strokes of judgment, made his power known, and caused terror and dismay to spread over the land of Egypt, he brought out his people with a mighty hand, and all their substance with them, not one hoof was left behind. Nor did they come out empty-handed. They came out loaded with the spoils of their enemies. The Egyptians themselves were glad to forward their departure; having been taught by their own sad experience, that their Redeemer was strong and mighty.

In this deliverance, the Israelites had a type of a still greater deliverance to be wrought for them out of the hands of all their enemies, in the latter days; and in this deliverance, there was also a type of that spiritual deliverance from the degrading bondage of sin and Satan, which Christ accomplishes in behalf of all who believe. Of which salvation, Zacharias prophesied, when he said, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and raised up for us an horn of salvation in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began, that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us; to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he sware to our father Abraham, that he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, might serve him, without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our lives." And as the Israelites, when delivered from their enemies, were also enriched, so, in the salvation of the Gospel, there is not only a deliverance from the greatest of all evils, but there is the obtaining of the true riches, even gold tried in the fire, that we may be rich. "Ye know," saith the apostle, "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we, through his poverty, might be rich." And as the people of Israel, from being the bondmen of Pharaoh, became the people of God, so, in the salvation of the Gospel, we are delivered from the degrading bondage of sin and Satan, to be adopted into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Farther, the shedding of the blood of the paschal lamb, stood intimately connected with the deliverance from Egyptian bondage. Their having their door-posts sprinkled with the blood of the lamb, was the means of their deliverance from the sword of the destroying angel. And the great deliverance from sin and Satan, was accomplished through the shedding of the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot.

Such, then, is a brief sketch of the first period of the history of Israel; and it is distinguished by a very signal deliverance, wrought out for them by very wonderful displays of the mighty power of God, such as have not been manifested in favour of any other nation. In this we see a confirmation of what the Scripture has so expressly declared, that he hath not dealt so with other nations. And from this period of their history, let us learn,

1. To be deeply humbled in the contemplation of that state of guilt, degradation, and misery, in which we are involved under the bondage of sin and Satan, of which the bondage of Egypt, with all its rigours, affords but a faint emblem.

2. To be thankful for that blessed way of deliverance through the sufferings and death of Christ, pre-figured by the paschal lamb. It is by having his precious blood sprinkled upon us, that we shall be cleansed from all sin.

3. To remember, that having been redeemed at such a price, we are no longer our own, we are Christ's; we are no longer to live to ourselves, but to Him who died for us, and who rose again.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

God's love to his chosen.—How very marvellous is the special love of God to his chosen! Many waters could not quench, all the floods could not drown it. The hatred of hell is unequal to its extinction; the ages of eternity unable to diminish its ardour; the wealth of the universe is insufficient to bribe it from its purposes of mercy. It dwelt from everlasting in the bosom of the Eternal God; and thence did it emanate to expatiate on all the hosts of the blest. But heaven could not hold it, the precincts of that holy place, widely extended though they be, were too narrow for its ever expanding benignity; it burst the sacred boundaries, it descended to the earth, and there its manifestations have not been confined to one country or people; for, wherever man has established for himself a habitation, there does it select its objects. At one time, perhaps, its footsteps are traceable in the sea, as it travels over its waters to visit the cabin and the heart of some far off mariner; at another, it may be seen like a roe or a young hart on the mountains of spices, hastening with joyful footsteps to the relief of some broken-hearted exile in the solitudes in Siberia; now, it may be met with in the lanes of the thickly peopled city, entering the house where disease, and poverty, and death, in terrible alliance, sit brooding together with ominous aspect; and anon, it is found penetrating the thickets of the Canadian wilderness, and leading captive the minds and the affections of their rude inhabitants. At its call, their weapons of war drop from their hands, the battle-cry ceases, and these back settlements of the world resound with the song of the good will of heaven to man.—SOSTHENES. (On Union to Christ and abiding in Him.)

Meditation must be combined with hearing the Word.—As rain, without which nothing can grow, may fall so often, and in such excess, as to prove no less hurtful than a drought, so it is common, very common, for religious persons to hear, and hear, and hear, till they are very little alone,—are utter strangers to meditation,—are as ignorant of the Scriptures, and their interpretation by the Holy Ghost, as those who hear only ignorant teachers. I had rather spend one hour with the dearest friend I have upon earth, than hear him commended for days together. Private prayer and meditation upon the blessed Word of God, is spending our time with the beloved Jesus. The sermon is the commendation of his excellency.—VENN.

Presence of God.—In the depth of the night, when we are left to darkness, to silence, and ourselves, the utter stillness, and the blank void that surround us sometimes bring a powerful sense of God's presence along with them,—and the more we attempt to escape it, the more palpably it seems to gather around us in the obscurity. Some way or other, man can never be totally alone, the very absence of every other being, and of every other object of sense or thought, appears almost necessarily and irresistibly to suggest the presence of God. Then, when we seem to feel ourselves, as it were, under the immediate pressure of the Almighty, the thought will occur, "Was he not equally present this day and every moment of my life? and yet, how little have I been influenced in my heart, conversation, and conduct, by the sense that his eye was everlastingly open upon me, as it is at this instant!"—Wolfe's Remains.

Preparation for Heaven.—They that look for a heaven made ready, should live as if they were in heaven already.—DYER.

SACRED POETRY.

HYMN,

BY ROBERT KAYE GREVILLE, LL. D.

O God! we come before thee,
Oppress'd with doubts and fears;
We cease not to adore thee,
With many sighs and tears.

But thou canst comfort send us;
Oh bid our fears depart!
And joy, if thou befriend us,
Shall reign in every heart.

The gold of earthly treasure,
We count it all as dross;
The sum of earthly pleasure
Is vanity and loss.

On thee, O God! depending,
We seek a nobler prize;
A bright and never-ending
Reward beyond the skies.

To thy own holy mountain,
Oh let us, then, press on!
And drink we at the fountain,
That gives us strength alone!

Oh may we, all things selling,
Obtain one pearl above!
And reach that happy dwelling,
Of everlasting love!

JEHOVAH-JIREH.

BY RICHARD HUIE, ESQ., M.D.

My brother, cease that plaintive moan,—
My sister, wipe those tears away;
What, though your sweetest joys are flown?
What, though your choicest gourds decay?
Earth's bliss is but a summer flower,
Earth's woe a swiftly ebbing-tide;
And still, in each distressing hour,—
Jehovah hears, and will provide!

I too have felt the pelting storm,
Which rent the twig, and parent tree
I too have wept the faded form,
And seen my brightest prospects flee:
I too have mark'd my lov'd ones fall,
In childhood's bloom, in manhood's pride;
Yet faith could whisper 'midst it all,—
Jehovah hears, and will provide!

But what am I? See yonder hill;
The altar's built—the heir is bound;
The patriarch's heart has ceas'd to thrill,—
His hand is rais'd to strike the wound:
When, hark! an angel stops the deed;
Young Isaac's bonds are cast aside;
Behold a meaner victim bleed,—
Jehovah hears, and will provide!

More wondrous yet: when sin had cost
This earth its charms, and man his soul;
When worlds could not redeem the lost,
Nor angels judgment's course control;
The Son of God, in mortal guise,
While friends desert, and foes deride,
On Calv'ry's blood stain'd summit dies!—
Jehovah hears, and will provide!

Then, brother, cease that plaintive moan,—
Then, sister, wipe those tears away;
What, though your sweetest joys are flown?
What, though your choicest gourds decay?

Earth's bliss is but a summer flower,
Earth's woe a swiftly ebbing-tide;
And still, in each distressing hour,—
Jehovah bears and will provide!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Profitable Conversation.—The late Hon. and Rev. W. B. Cadogan, an excellent clergyman at Reading, having been informed that a lady in that town was a pious woman, wished to cultivate her acquaintance, and took an opportunity of calling at her house. On being introduced to the room where she was sitting, he apologized for his intrusion as a stranger, but hoping that he had the happiness of addressing one who was a child of God, and a sister in Christ Jesus, he anticipated both pleasure and profit from mutual intercourse. These words excited the attention, and impressed the heart of the servant, who had shown Mr C. into the room. She retired wondering what these things meant—"a child of God—a sister in Christ Jesus," and was led anxiously to inquire—"Am I a child of God? or is there any possibility of my becoming so?" She retired to her chamber, and for the first time in her life poured out her heart in humble prayer that she might be taught what at present she little understood, and might become the character she considered so honourable and desirable. Her impression proved abiding, and to old age she exemplified the Christian character. What good may arise, under the blessing of God, from a single pious expression!

A negro scholar.—While a naval officer was inspecting one of the schools in the island of Barbadoes, containing two hundred negro boys and girls, a sign was made by one of the children, (by holding up his hand,) intimating that he wished to speak to the master. On going up to the child, who was somewhat more than eight years of age, the master inquired what was the matter. "Massa," he replied, with a look of horror and indignation, which the officer said he should never forget, and, pointing to a little boy of the same age, who sat beside him, "Massa, this boy says he does not believe in the resurrection." "This is very bad," said the master; "but do you, my little fellow," addressing the young informer, "believe in the resurrection yourself?" "Yes, massa, I do." "But can you prove it from the Bible?" "Yes, massa; Jesus says, 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;' and in another place, 'Because I live, ye shall live also.'" The master added, "Can you prove it from the Old Testament also?" "Yes; for Job says, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.' And David says, in one of his psalms, 'I shall be satisfied, when I awake with thy likeness.'" "But are you sure these passages are in the Bible?" Here is a Bible, point them out to us." The little boy instantly found all the passages, and read them aloud.

THE WIDOW AND THE FATHERLESS, THE CONCERN OF ALL CLASSES IN A CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY.

BY THE REV. THOMAS DIMMA, A. M.,

A WIDOWED mother, and orphan children, prefer a claim to attention and friendly assistance, to which no heart could be conceived to be insensible. The sad reverse occasioned by the death of a husband does excite feelings of commiseration, and a family of helpless children is a spectacle which it is not easy to contemplate with a heart unmoved. But when the general sensation occasioned by a recent bereavement has subsided, there is found to survive only a portion of operative and decided benevolence. The majority of spectators retire from the scene, after having laid their offering of lamentation and regret at the feet of the mourners, with the consciousness that they have done to others what they would expect they, in return, should perform towards them. Tears may have been shed, or rather the word that indicates sorrow may have been uttered, but this scene being closed, the bereaved have obtained no certain prospect of substantial relief.

This may be considered an unfavourable or partial view of the workings of that benevolent feeling, conceived to be inherent in the bosom of every human being, but a very slight review of what actually takes place, in scenes of distress, will substantiate the truth of the observation. The widow and the fatherless are conceived to form the special charge of persons in easy or independent circumstances, while those, who occupy the same place in society with the individuals on whom now the mantle of sorrow rests, retire from a sphere which they consider it no part of duty to occupy. The relief of the necessitous, and genuine sympathy with their distress, thus fall into the hands of the higher ranks of the community, while the smaller, but equally effective, contributions of the many are withheld. It is a favourable trait in human nature, that, in a majority of instances, such confidence is not reposed in vain,—those whom Providence has blessed with the means of doing good, are not unwilling to stretch out their hands. The exceptions which do present themselves, confirm the truth of the general observation.

Now, when the active co-operation of those in a humbler sphere is not obtained, we notice the operation of a principle most hostile to a spirit of benevolence, and decidedly subversive of it. It is the duty of the humblest and the most inefficient, to show, at least, a willingness to attempt what they are able to perform, and to co-operate readily in every scheme of benevolence, whose object is the relief, or the partial alleviation, of severe or unlooked-for distress. Were the feeling prevalent, and were exertions simultaneously and heartily made, from every quarter from which the smallest contributions could flow, an agency would be brought into operation, which would be commensurate to the most magnificent results. But such exertions are not made, either because they are conceived not to be called for, or, in some instances, because it has not been conceived necessary to excite a feeling of benevolence in a quarter whence it hath not been accustomed to flow as a legitimate source.

There are cases of distress continually occurring, where ample scope is given for the opening up of every stream of benevolence that can refresh and exhilarate them; and when such examples continually occur, efforts ought to be employed to bring the tale of woe and the circumstances of suffering and bereavement to every door. When this is done, the charity of the Gospel is brought in contact with every man's feelings, and genuine Christianity is then distinguished from the spurious and the pretending. Men may then be taught that the sum of human comfort depends more on the smaller contributions of the many, than on the single operations of the most affluent and powerful. The gentle rain distils, in many small and almost imperceptible drops, a more healthful watering, than in the more copious overflowings of a thunder-cloud; so from the hands of many contributors, flows aid of a more salubrious kind, than if the widow and the fatherless enjoyed only one powerful friend. In the one case, there is the union of brothers, but, in the other, the operation of a cause, distant from the point on which it is brought to bear, and having no other connection with it, than the production of one great and solitary effect.

It happens, in many instances, that the numerous and fancied unimportant exertions of those in the humble ranks are not thought of as an agency of a most invaluable kind, and the humble contribution, because not asked, is not proffered, or because small, is not considered deserving of solicitation. Injury is thus done to many a kind and feeling heart, and the droppings of benevolence are thus dried up, because a channel in which it can flow is thoughtlessly denied. There are many who retire from view with their really effective mite, because they possess not coin of a higher and a more attractive name, who, if solicited, would give with cheerfulness what they now possess, and delight to have the kindly charities kept in play by the small, but frequent, demands that are made upon them. It is well when the sensibilities of a community are thus awakened, and kept in constant play, by the judicious application of the exciting motives that present themselves in the scenes of sorrow and distress that continually occur.

It is, however, a melancholy fact that, in too many instances, the multitude, who could give their mite, withhold it, and throw the support of the widow and the orphan on those who have something to give, and whose duty alone it is conceived to be to relieve the necessitous. The trifle, therefore, which is the right of the sufferer, is thus diverted to another, and, very frequently, a more questionable channel; and those who are liable to the same calamities, live together as if mere words, or sorrowful looks assumed on solemn occasions, were to pass current coin, instead of the substantial aid which, in small sums, flowing from many quarters, would most amply relieve. When the heart and the hand act in unison, then may we look for a healthful aspect of human society; the mild spirit of the Bible is transfused through every bosom, and he that hath his mite, though his all, gives it with a willing mind, knowing that He who rules over all, will never withdraw his aid, nor cramp his labours of love, with a niggardly hand.

There is true satisfaction in being the recipient of the small but willing offerings of a Christian population, ready to relieve a brother in distress; and the influence on the mind of the sufferer is the origin of many a good resolution, and of the purpose to act, as one who has been relieved, and will not descend from the vantage ground on which friends, kindly assisting, have placed him. But there are selfish and cold hearts, which no tale of distress can move, by whom widows, and the fatherless, are not thought of in their lonely habitations,—the orphan's sigh is not heard. Let others relieve, they have no call addressed to them, to which it is their duty to listen; and, distinction if it be, it is theirs to claim it as their own, that the mite craved they cannot bestow, and in the number of those who delight to make the heart of the fatherless to rejoice, they refuse to take a place.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
THE REV. WILLIAM CAREY, D. D.,

Late Missionary to Bengal, and Professor of Oriental Languages in the College of Fort-William, Calcutta.

(Concluded from p. 421.)

The income which Mr Carey derived from his secular employment, was thus amply sufficient for his own support and that of his family. With a disinterestedness, therefore, worthy of his character, he wrote to the society in England whose Missionary he was, to stop the allowance he was accustomed to receive from them. His labours, however, in the good cause, were by no means relaxed. On the contrary, he felt himself bound, now that he had become independent in a pecuniary point of view, to devote his energies, as far as possible, to the great object which had brought him to India. Besides fulfilling the duties of his civil employment with the utmost diligence and assiduity, he attempted native education, acquired the dialect of the province in which he lived, daily addressed the idolatrous natives, often travelled considerable distances to preach in English, maintained an extensive correspondence, and mastered the elements of one of the most difficult and classic languages in the world!

In the following September, (1794,) this indefatigable Missionary was seized with a severe attack of fever, under which he was suffering when one of his children was cut off by the same disease. These accumulated trials he was enabled to endure as coming from a gracious and merciful Father. For the improvement of his health, Mr Udney, his kind patron, proposed a journey towards Thibet for him and Mr Thomas. They both set out, accordingly, on the 20th October, and after some changes, arrangement was made that Mr Carey should settle at Mudnabatty, as in all probability likely to be more healthy.

About this time, both Mr Carey and Mr Thomas were somewhat surprised by the arrival of a letter from home, complaining of the step which they had taken in accepting of a secular employment. The fear which the directors entertained that the missionary spirit might be lost amid the engrossing cares of the world, was natural, though by no means, in his case, well-founded. Both Mr Carey and his colleague were ardently devoted to the missionary cause, and though strictly attentive to their secular duties, they embraced every opportunity of promoting the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. In one of Mr Carey's letters, the following account occurs of the worship of the sun, as practised in some parts of Bengal:—

"The sun, called Soorjyo, or Deebahar, is supposed to be the governor of all bodily diseases, and is therefore worshipped, to avert his anger, and to prevent diseases. Some valetudinarians worship him every Sunday, by fasting and offerings; but he is annually worshipped the first Sunday in the month of May, which was last Lord's day, Jan. 14. The name of this worship is Dhomma Bhau, or Soorjya Bhau. In these parts (for the manner, I am informed, is different in some circumstances, in different places) women appear to be the principal actors in the worship. No one are excluded, and even Mussulmans have sometimes been Hinduized as to join in the idolatry. It was thus conducted: At the dawn of the morning a great number of offerings were carried into the open field, and placed in a row. The offerings which I saw consisted of fruits, sweetmeats, pigeons, and kids: and I suppose other things, as deer, buffaloes, &c., might be offered. By each person's offering is placed a small pitcher-like pot, containing about a pint and a half of water. A device, made of a water plant, a species of phyllanthus, made to represent the sun, is placed on the edge of the pot, as people in England place flowers. The pot, with all its appendages, represents the sun, perhaps as the vivifier of nature. By each offering also is placed a ——— what shall I call it?—an incense altar, or censer. It resembles a chafing dish, is made of copper, and stands on a pedestal about a foot long. It is called a dhoonachee. It contains coals of fire, and has a kind of incense from time to time thrown into it, principally the pitch of the saul tree, called here dhoona. By each offering also stands a lamp, which is kept burning all day; and the women who offer take their station by their offerings. At sun-rise, they walk four times round the whole row of offerings, with the smoking dhoonachee placed on their heads, and then resume their stations again, where they continue in an erect posture, fasting the whole day, occasionally throwing a little dhoona into the dhoonachee. Towards evening, the Brahmun who attends the ceremony throws the pigeons up into the air, which, being young, cannot fly far, and are scrambled for and carried away by any one who gets them, for the purpose of eating. The Brahmun also perforates the ears of the kids with a pack-needle: after which, the first who touches them gets them. About sun-set, the offerers again take up the smoking dhoonachee, and make three more circuits round the row of offerings, making the whole number seven times in the day. I have not learned the reason of this number. After this, each one takes his or her offering home, and eats it, the worship being ended. Then the lamps are extinguished. I had some of these things presented to me; but in order to bear a testimony against the idolatry, I not only refused them, but others also brought on purpose for me by one present, telling them that it was a very wicked thing to eat things sacrificed to idols, which are God's enemies. I preached to them from Rev. i. 16, 'His countenance was as the sun shining in his strength,' and told them of the glories of the Lord of the sun, as Creator, Governor, and Saviour. I had a rich Fakir Mussulman come in the morning to hear me; he came from a distance. I had much talk with him afterwards, in the hearing of the people, who were so credulous as to believe that he had actually that morning, turned a pot of water into milk. I asked him to dine with me (this no native would do on any account,) and observed to the people, that if he could change water into milk, he could change pork into mutton; pork being never eaten by Mussulmans.

"Thus I have given you a short account of this remarkable worship. They have a book of directions for the performance of it, which I am trying to get. If I succeed, I may in a future letter send you a translation of its contents."

Several circumstances now occurred, which, in the course of Providence, led to the transference of Mr Carey to another place, which has since become famous in the annals of missionary operations in India. The indigo works which he and Mr Thomas had been invited by their kind friend, Mr Udney, to superintend, had failed; and though Mr Carey afterwards commenced in the same line for himself, at Kidderpore, about ten miles distant, this speculation also proved unsuccessful. Thus was he once more reduced to great straits in a pecuniary point of view, and had not Providence kindly interposed, his temporal resources would have ere long been entirely exhausted.

About this time, towards the close of 1799, four new Missionaries arrived from England. As the East India Company prohibited their settling in the British dominions, they fled to Serampore, a small Danish settlement, about fourteen miles up the country, on the western bank of the Hoogly. Thus prevented from enjoying the assistance of the newly arrived Missionaries, Mr Carey and his colleague resolved to break up the new undertaking at Kidderpore, and to remove to Serampore.

And, to this they were the more reconciled, as the small factory which Mr Carey had established at Kidderpore was, as has been already remarked, far from being in a flourishing condition, and would, if he did not quit it, plunge him into a state of great worldly embarrassment. He determined, therefore, without delay, to renounce this undertaking, and dedicate himself henceforth to the peculiar duties of his missionary office. And no sooner had the little band of faithful messengers of the Cross completed their arrangements on first settling at Serampore, than Mr Carey employed himself, with the utmost diligence, in preaching the Gospel to the natives of the villages around, in teaching those who solicited instruction in spiritual things, and in translating the Gospel into the Bengali language. In a short time, his industry and learning attracted considerable notice, and he was requested to undertake the Bengali professorship in the college of Fort-William—a college which had been recently founded for the instruction of the junior civil servants of the Company. This appointment, besides rendering Mr Carey once more independent of pecuniary assistance from home, afforded him an opportunity of gratifying his taste for the study of languages. In commencing the duties of his new situation, he found it necessary to compile a Bengali Grammar, for the use of the students intrusted to his care.

The Serampore Missionaries now formed the noble project of translating the Scriptures, if possible, into all the languages of the East. With this view, after having completed the Bengali version, they proceeded to the Hindusthani, Persian, Mahratta, and Oolkul languages. "Perhaps," says Mr Carey, in a letter dated Feb. 27, 1804, "so many advantages for translating the Bible into all the languages of the East, will never meet in any one situation again, viz., a possibility of obtaining learned natives of all these countries, a sufficiency of worldly good things, with a moderate degree of annual assistance from England to carry us through it, a printing office, a good library of critical writings, a habit of translating, and disposition to do it." With such advantages as these, Mr Carey and his brethren entered upon, and carried forward, the great work of translating the Scriptures, with such activity and zeal as has laid the Christian world under the deepest obligations to the Missionaries at Serampore. Besides the labour connected with this department, Mr Carey took upon himself the task of compiling various grammars and dictionaries, which have been of essential service to Oriental scholars.

In a short time Mr Carey's exertions in the College of Fort-William were rewarded by an increase of his salary from five hundred to one thousand rupees per month. While thus prospering, however, in his worldly affairs, he was not a little discouraged by the spirit of opposition which the Government now displayed to the progress of the missionary operations in which he and his brethren were engaged. The circumstances are thus stated in a letter to the society at home:—

"Our brethren, Chater and Robinson, who arrived here last week, went, as is customary, to the police-office to report their arrival; on which occasion some demur arose about permitting them to proceed to Serampore. Brother Carey, therefore, went to town on Tuesday last, and waited on two of the justices of the peace (Mr Blacquiere and Mr Thoroton) about the matter. As he was leaving the office, Mr Blacquiere called him back, and said that he had been directed by the Governor-General to express to him his desire that he would not interfere with the prejudices of the natives by preaching to them, instructing them, or distributing books or pamphlets among them; that he would desire his colleagues to observe the same line of conduct; and that we would not permit the converted natives to go into the country to spread Christianity among the people. Brother Carey inquired if this communication had been made in writing, and was answered in the negative. He then assured the magistrate that we would endeavour to conform to the wishes of government in all that we conscientiously could.

"This prohibition is to us extremely distressing; and is rendered more so, by the encouraging circumstances among the natives, which we have already mentioned.

"As we have scrupulously refrained from intermeddling with politics, we are at a loss to assign any adequate cause of this sudden change. It is certain that Government had not till now any suspicion that evil would arise from our conduct. Brother Carey, in a public speech, since printed, informed Lord Wellesley that he had for several years been in the habit of preaching to the natives. The present Governor-General, in a public speech, also printed, acknowledged with approbation 'the Society of Protestant Missionaries at Serampore.' No political evil can reasonably be feared from the diffusion of the Gospel now, for it has been publicly preached in different parts of Bengal for about twenty years past, without the smallest symptom of that nature. At least a million tracts and pamphlets of different sorts have been distributed in every direction, among the natives, without a single instance of disturbance, except the abusive language of a few loose persons may be so called. To this might be added the experience of the Missionaries on the coast, who have preached the Gospel for a hundred years, and reckon about forty thousand persons who have embraced Christianity. Such long-continued exertions to spread the Gospel, carried on to such an extent, and in such different situations, without producing the smallest inconvenience, may, we presume, furnish a course of experience quite sufficient to remove every suspicion of political evil arising from the introduction of Christianity.

"However great our inclination might be, there is one part of the wish of the Governor-General with which we are unable to comply: we mean that which requires us to prevent converted natives from disseminating Christianity. Native Christians are settled in different places throughout the greatest part of Bengal; and we are by law prohibited to go where they reside. Being, therefore, unable to speak to them on the subject, compliance is out of our power.

"It is difficult for us to ascertain the present path of duty. We are much in the situation in which the apostles were when commanded 'not to teach nor preach any more in his name.' They, it is true, replied, 'Whether it be right in the sight of God to obey you rather than God, judge ye?' Would it be right or not for us to make the same reply in the first instance? On the one hand our prospects of success are obscured, and those opening doors for usefulness, which a few days ago engaged our attention, and animated our exertions, are shut by this cruel message: the consequence is, that souls are perishing on every side, and we are forbidden to administer the remedy which God has put into our hands. To act in open defiance of the wish of the Governor-General, might occasion a positive law against evangelizing the heathen, and at once break up the mission, which has been settled at so great an expense. On the other hand, it is probable that if we yield a little to the present storm, it may soon blow over, and we may not only enjoy our present privilege, but obtain the liberty which we have so long wished for. We, with the advice of our friends, have for the present chosen the latter line of conduct."

Following up the resolution which they had thus formed, Mr Carey and his colleagues patiently waited for the leadings of Divine Providence, the storm soon passed away. The Government orders were formally revoked, and thus light arose amid the darkness. Though cheered, however, by this great deliverance, Mr Carey was visited by a severe domestic bereavement. His wife, who had been in a melancholic state of derangement for twelve years, was cut off by an attack of fever, in about a fortnight's illness. After a short period, he was married to Lady Charles Rumohr, a lady of sincere piety, and warmly attached to the mission.

The following year, (1809,) Mr Carey was seized with an alarming attack of fever, which almost proved fatal. He gives the following account of it in a letter written after his recovery:—

"I have been lately brought to the gates of death by a severe fever. I was first seized with it the last Sabbath in June, as I was returning from Calcutta with brother Marshman. For the first two or three days I took medicine according to my own judgment, but getting worse, medical aid was called in from Barrackpore, a military station on the opposite side of the river from Serampore. For several days I took medicine, which appeared to answer the designed end; but a delirium, attended with considerable fever, supervened, and for a few weeks together my life was in doubt. One or two days I was supposed to be dying. I believe the medical gentleman (Dr Darling) who attended me well understood my case, and treated me with the utmost skill; but I believe my life was given back in answer to prayer. From all that I can find there was a remarkable spirit of prayer poured down upon the church and congregation at Calcutta, on that account; and I have reason to believe that it was confined to our congregation, but was pretty general among the serious people in Calcutta and its environs. On the Monday, the day after I was taken ill, I felt the finishing stroke to the translation of the Scriptures into the Bengali language, which some of my friends considered as the termination of my labours. Now I am raised up, I beg that I may be enabled to go on with more simplicity of heart, and more real despatch and utility, in the work of the Lord."

The Almighty had still work in store for Dr Carey, and therefore he was raised up again from the bed of sickness and apparent death. He was now more than ever anxious to discharge, with all fidelity, his important duties; and while he embraced every opportunity of storing his mind with useful knowledge, his labours in the acquisition of languages, and in the great work of translation, were almost unprecedented. A slight sketch of his exertions in this department may be given in his own words:—

"The necessity which lies upon me of acquiring so many languages, obliges me to study and write out the grammar of each of them, and to attend closely to their irregularities and peculiarities. I have therefore published grammars of three of them, the Sanscrit, the Bengali, and the Mahratta. I intend, also, to publish grammars of the others, and have now in the press a grammar of the Telinga language, and another of that of the Seeks, and have begun one of the Orissa language. To these I intend, in time, to add those of the Kurnata, the Kashmeera, and Nepala, and perhaps the Assam languages. I am now printing a dictionary of the Bengali, which will be pretty large, for I have got to two hundred and fifty-six pages quarto, and am not nearly through the first letter. That letter, however, begins more words than any two others. I am contemplating, and indeed have been long collecting materials for, a universal dictionary of the oriental languages, derived from the Sanscrit, of which that language is to be the ground-work, and to give the corresponding Greek and Hebrew words. I wish much to do this, for the sake of assisting biblical students to correct the translation of the Bible in the oriental languages, after we are dead, but which can scarcely be done without something of this kind; and perhaps another person may not, in the space of a century, have the advantages for a work of this nature that I now have. I, therefore, think it would be criminal in me to neglect the little that I am able to do while I enjoy them."

In 1812, the mission at Serampore suffered a dreadful loss, which threatened, for a time at least, to put a check to their operations. The printing office connected with the mission premises was totally consumed by fire, and all the property, amounting to sixty or seventy thousand rupees, was destroyed; nothing was saved but the printing presses. This calamity excited a lively interest in behalf of the mission, and a subscription was commenced among its friends in India, which speedily amounted to a considerable sum. Thus encouraged by the kindness of Christian friends, Dr Carey and his brethren prosecuted, with renewed ardour, the high and holy duties of their mission. To his individual labours Dr Carey thus alludes, in a letter dated March 20, 1813, addressed to Mr Fuller:—

"I was never so closely employed as at present. I have just finished for the press my Telinga grammar; the last sheet of the Punjabi grammar is in the press. I am getting forward with my Kurnata grammar; indeed it is nearly ready for the press. I am also preparing materials for grammars of the Kashmeer, Pushto, and Billochi languages, and have begun digesting those for the Orissa. The care of publishing and correcting Felix's Burman grammar lies on me, besides learning all these languages, correcting the translations in them, writing a Bengali dictionary, and all my pastoral and collegiate duties. I therefore can scarcely call an hour my own in a week. I, however, rejoice in my work, and delight in it. It is clearing the way, and providing materials for those who succeed us to work upon. I have much for which to bless the Lord. I trust all my children know the Lord in truth. I have every family and domestic blessing I can wish, and many more than I could have expected. The work of the Lord prospers. The Church at Calcutta is now become very large, and still increases. The mission, notwithstanding its heavy losses, has been supported, and we have been enabled, within one year from a very desolating calamity, to carry on our printing to a greater extent than before it took place. I wish we could have communicated to you our real situation, on the day you received the news of the fire. It would have greatly raised your drooping spirits could you have looked forward, or could you have known how we have been supported till then."

The following year, Dr Carey states, in a letter to the same correspondent, that the number of languages into which the Scriptures were either then translated or were still under translation, by the Serampore Missionaries, was twenty-six. And when we consider, that the labour of correcting and revising all of these translations devolved upon Dr Carey himself, we may readily conceive that his exertions must have been truly astonishing.

In 1817 a misunderstanding arose between the Serampore Missionaries and the Parent Society in England, which ultimately, after ten years, led to the dissolution of the connection which had hitherto subsisted between them. It is impossible, within the limits allotted to this sketch, to enter fully into the nature of this dispute; suffice it to state that the society recommended a new, and, as they imagined, a more satisfactory investment of the mission property, and that a number of gentlemen in England should be associated in the trust with the Missionaries themselves. To this arrangement Dr Carey and his brethren declined to accede; and, backed by the Danish government, to which Serampore belonged, they invested the property in a way more agreeable to their own wishes. This disagreement, however, did not, in the slightest degree, interrupt the labours of the Missionaries. They continued instant in prayer, and in every good work. And, accordingly, actuated by the most benevolent and philanthropic views, we find Dr Carey instituting, in 1820, an Agricultural Society in India, under the patronage of the Governor-General, Lord Hastings.

While thus engaged in promoting the temporal as well as spiritual well-being of the people, among whom his lot was cast, this devoted servant of Christ was again visited with a most afflictive calamity, in the death of his second wife. This was a bereavement of no ordinary kind. "My loss," says he, "is irreparable. If there ever was a true Christian in this world she was one."

Dr Carey had now attained a very high eminence as an oriental scholar, and every day was adding fresh stores to his philological knowledge. For many years he had held the office of a professor in the college of Fort-William. With his labours in this department Government were completely satisfied, and in 1823 he received the additional appointment of translator of the regulations of the Governor-General in council, into the Bengali language. Nor were his high literary attainments unappreciated in his own country. At the same time when the Government of India was rewarding his faithful services, various learned societies in England were enrolling his name among their honorary members. Amid all these well-earned distinctions, however, he continued the same simple, humble Christian as before. Trials are the invariable lot of the true believer, and more especially when, as in the case of Dr Carey, he is held in high estimation among men. We have already recorded various instances in which the All-Wise saw meet to subject his honoured servant to painful discipline; and in his latter days he was by no means exempted from salutary chastisement, which, under the divine blessing, tended to promote his advancement in holiness and meetness for heaven. On one occasion, more particularly, in 1823, his life was endangered by an accident which happened to him, while on his way to officiate at Calcutta. It pleased God, however, to restore him, after some months confinement, to his wonted health and activity, with the exception of a partial lameness, which continued till his death. During this illness he had the gratification of learning that he had been unanimously elected to the presidency of the Agricultural Society of India; an institution which he had been mainly instrumental in forming.

After Dr Carey's recovery from the severe accident to which we have referred, though his general health was good, he was subject to occasional attacks of fever and other ailments, which convinced him that his end was approaching. Under this impression he directed his whole energies to the completion of the Bengali version of the Scriptures. With the New Testament, in that language, his labours as a translator commenced, and with the final revision of it they were brought to a close. The faith and holiness of this eminent missionary became more conspicuous as death drew near. Of this his son Jonathan has given strong proof in his brief account of the last days of his illustrious parent.

He had just finished a new edition of his translation, in the Bengali language, of the New Testament, and then remarked that his work was done, that he had nothing more to do but to wait the will of his Lord. Often would he recur to missionary work in India, and say, 'What hath the Lord wrought!' But of his own labours he spoke with much modesty; and viewed himself as an unprofitable servant, needing continually the grace of his Saviour. Notwithstanding his weakness, he would still sit up at his desk, where he was accustomed to labour; and though he could not do much, he corrected a few proofs for the press, and spent much time in reading. Often, during his illness, he lamented his unprofitableness, and was fearful he should prove a burden to others. While in this helpless situation, he was visited by many of his friends, who knew and esteemed his character, and came to condole with him. On one occasion, a minister of his acquaintance called to see him; and, asking him how he felt as to his hopes regarding a future world, his reply was, 'I cannot say I have any very rapturous feelings; but I am confident in the promises of the Lord, and wish to leave my eternal interests in his hands,—to place my hands in his, as a child would in his father's, to be led where and how he please.' In this frame of mind he continued during the whole of his illness. He suffered from extreme debility, but was free from pain, more or less, for six months; but such was his complaint, that it was necessary to keep him very quiet. On more than one occasion his approaching end was immediately expected, but he revived. So much was he at length reduced, that he could not turn himself on his bed. For several weeks all that he could articulate was, Yes, or No, to questions put to him. On the night before his death he breathed hard and was restless; but there were no particular symptoms of dissolution. In the morning, very early, he continued the same, but as the day dawned, it was evident he was sinking. He remained in this state till about seven o'clock, when his spirit took its flight to the regions of eternal bliss, where sin, sorrow, and suffering can no more affect him. The next morning his remains were followed to the Serampore mission burial-ground by a large train of mourners. Notwithstanding it was a wet morning, several gentlemen from Calcutta attended; as did also two officers, and the chaplain of the Governor-General, sent from Barrackpore by the lady of the Governor, to pay the last tribute of respect to his memory; and about seven o'clock the body was committed to the earth, in the certain hope of a resurrection on the last day.

Thus died, on the 9th of June 1834, one of the most eminent scholars and devoted Missionaries that has ever set foot on the shores of India. In talents, erudition, and piety, Dr Carey has had few equals, and if we consider the adverse influences with which, at the outset of his career, he was called to contend, we may well admire the splendour of that genius and the force of that Christian principle by which he was enabled to surmount all difficulties, and to accomplish the great and glorious work for which, in the providence of God, he had been raised up.

SKETCHES OF THE PARISH.

BY THE PASTOR OF THE PARISH OF E—L.

No. III. PART I.

[From an Address delivered on the beginning of January 1833.]

"This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you."—EXODUS xii. 2.—"How is it that I hear this of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship." "I have kept nothing back that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house." LUKE xvi. 2. ACTS xx. 20.

I PUBLICLY.—In the course of the four last years, you will remember that we have had before us, now nearly one-half of the whole of the Old Testament Scriptures. In the book of the Genesis, or creation of all things, we glanced at the history of the world, and the history of the Church. The history of the world, we saw as it were divided into two parts; the first containing the whole history of the old, and the second presenting us with a part and portion of the new world. In that of the old, comprehended in the first seven chapters, we directed your attention principally to the creation and fall of the father of our race, and to the train of evils which it has entailed on us—to his expulsion from the garden of the Lord; for "he drove out the man, and placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life"—and to the accumulated and accumulating wickedness of man upon the earth, till the Lord God Jehovah sent the waters of a flood to sweep away "a world of transgressors." In the history of the new world of men, after the subsiding of the waters, we pointed generally, and as becoming the place and exercise in which we were engaged, at their dispersion, their settlement, and their places of habitation. But we followed particularly, and with wary steps, the patriarchs in their life and wanderings, from Abraham's first journeying toward Canaan, to the last and momentous act of the sons of Israel in a land of strangers. "Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt." Chap. i. 26.

In the history of the Church, (chap. iv. 26,) we considered the work of redemption in many respects similar to the work of creation. In the work of creation it is said, "God called the light day, and the darkness he called night; and the evening and the morning were the first (one) day." chap. i. 5. In the work of redemption, as in creation, we observed, that the evening and the morning form one day, even "the day of salvation." The evening, in its degrees of darkness, precedes the morning in its degrees of increasing light. You remember we said, that the first promise to our first parents appeared to us as in the first faint glimmering twilight of the evening, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." (chap. iii. 15.) And that the same promise was made once, (chap. xii. 3,) and again, (chap. xviii. 18.) and a third time, (chap. xxii. 18,) to the hearts of the faithful, and appeared to us as in the third watch of the night, under the uncertain light of a setting moon, but by him it was seen more clearly, "for in this he saw the day of Christ, and when he saw it he was glad." And lastly, that the self-same promise was repeated to Isaac, (chap. xxvi. 4,) and to Jacob the son of Israel, (chap. xxviii. 14,) and yet again by the spirit of prophecy through the dying Jacob to one of the most highly favoured of his sons, (chap. xlix. 8,) "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise...thy father's children shall bow down before thee...the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." In this we saw, as it were, the first streaks of the dawn; and "the bright and the morning star;" and under stood it as spoken by him "whose eyes were open," and said, "I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Seth." (Num. xxiv. 17.) Yes, Christians! "we have seen his star in the east, and are come this day to worship him."

After having thus looked on the history of the world, and into the work of redemption as given in this inspired history of the Church, we saw, by the little light we had obtained, some substantial shadows of the promised coming reality, some of which we may little more than mention to bring back again the past to your remembrance before you. Adam, then, we observed, "was the figure of him who was to come," (Rom. v. 14;) "as it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening Spirit. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven." (1 Cor. xv. 45, 47.) The days of his coming were shadowed forth by the days of Noah, as we find in the words of Him who was the truth and the light of the world: "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." (Mat. xxiv. 37.) The order and immutability of his priesthood is pointed out by both a prophet, (Psalm cx. 4.) and an apostle, (Heb. viii. 1.) "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek." And, finally, we observed to you, in the way of application, and in bringing down the Old Testament to the New, "that you are come to Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than the blood of Abel." (Heb. xii. 24.) Such is a faint outline of the book of the Genesis, or creation of all things, as we had it before us; and we trust that "the filling up" will again, this day, pass before you in review, with a strong desire to search accurately "to see whether these things be so."

The Exodus, or departure of Israel from Egypt, to drop the past for the present, furnishes us with a particular history of the Church of God for about the space of one hundred and forty-five years, viz., from the death of Joseph in Egypt, till the erection of the tabernacle in the wilderness. This history of the Church, we remarked, sets her before us, "troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." But you will remember, that we divided this book into two particular portions. We saw the first, containing a history of the fulfilment of the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the preceding book of inspiration; and saw it as a demonstration of this: "the Lord is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that he should repent; hath he said it, and will he not do it? Hath he spoken it, and will he not bring it to pass?" (ch. i.-xviii.) We considered the second as a little book of ordinances and laws, which that people were to observe and walk by all the days of their life; and, in the words of the great prophet of Israel, we urged upon each of you what we are commanded to enforce: "Thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." (ch. xix.-xl.) In this book, indeed, we saw both the law and the Gospel. "In it," says one, "there are more types of Christ, than perhaps in any other book of the Old Testament." There is Moses the prophet, (Acts iii. 22;) there is Aaron the priest, (Heb. iv. 14, &c. ;) there is the lamb for the burnt-offering, (John i. 29;) there is the manna which was rained from heaven, (Rev. ii. 17;) there is the rock in Horeb, (1 Cor. x. 4;) there are the tabernacle, the ark, the mercy-seat, the shew bread, &c. In a word, there seem to be all the members which make up the complete shadow of the substance of good things to come; and the Exodus of Israel, from the land of servitude, shadows forth our deliverance from worse than Egyptian bondage.

We remarked, that Leviticus and Numbers made us acquainted with the nature of the Levitical priesthood, (Heb. vii. ;) with the character of the seed of Abraham, which should be as the stars of heaven for multitude; with their ceremonies, their marshallings, their journeyings, and their observances in the wilderness.

We also remarked that "Deuteronomy" is so called from "containing a repetition of the law." We pointed, 1st, at some of the reasons which we thought we saw for the repetition of the law in this book; and, 2<sup>dly</sup>, at some of the particular honours which were evidently conferred on the book itself. 1st, The law was probably repeated because the men to whom and for whom it had at first been delivered, were reduced to a few, to a very few, for "their carcases had fallen in the wilderness;" because Moses himself was also now about to lay down the earthly house of his tabernacle; "to rest from his labours that his works might follow him;" that, therefore, before he leaves the new generation he gives them a new edition of all the old law, with the exception of what had been delivered for the priests, thus teaching them that "precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little," Isaiah xxviii. 10. 2<sup>d</sup>, To the honour of this book, it was to be written upon great stones, plastered over with plaster, when the people had passed over the Jordan, to enter on their promised possession, (ch. xxvii. 2.) It was to be read with solemnity, every seventh year, at the feast of tabernacles, in the place which Jehovah himself should choose, "before all Israel, in their hearing," (ch. xxxi. 10.) It was to be copied by every king that should sit on the throne of Israel, and it was required of him that he should read therein all the days of his life, that he might learn to fear the Lord his God, and "to keep all the words of this law," (ch. xvii. 18, 19.) And it was out of this book that our Lord brought all his answers to the tempter, in the wilderness, as when he said, "It is written, thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God; and again, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," (Matt. iv. 4-7-10.) Finally, we observed, and with this we ended the first year of the four, with regard to all these books we have had before us, that the moral law is still the rule of duty, and that it is binding on Jew and Gentile, on Greek and Barbarian, on bond and free; "that the ceremonial law was the shadow of good things to come; but the body is of Christ."

The first book after the five books of Moses is honoured with the honourable name of him who was an eminent type of that Jesus who leads his people to the Canaan above. The book of the thirteen Judges of Israel, afforded us much interesting as well as useful information, and from it we gathered for ourselves, as men and as Christians, doctrines, precepts, and examples, remarking, "that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the men of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

The kingdoms of Israel and Judah, as described in the books which have their names from the principal parts they detail, were spread out to us as on a map. That chart, we apprehend, you saw at the time distinctly marked and defined with its proper boundaries, and the little colouring we attempted to spread over the whole, will, we trust, bring the past before the eyes of your memory and your faith, so as that things temporal may suggest to you things spiritual, and teach you also of things that are eternal. Yes! the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were to us as the shadows of the kingdom of grace and of glory. And, in conclusion, at the end of another year, we were brought with the subject, to present the prayer we had been taught in our infancy: "Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen."

The little volumes of Ezra and Nehemiah we next looked into, as descriptive of the second Exodus of God's people from captivity and bondage. In these we saw much that was interesting in the political and ecclesiastical history of the Jews. But, my friends, we trust you found the interesting to be the practically useful; "for you know that whatever was written aforetime, was written for our instruction."

The history of Queen Esther, as a sequel to those two, unfolded to us the wonderful workings of the providence of God. The common reader, we observed, like the common observer of passing time, indicated by the moving pointers on the dial of his watch, may rest satisfied with the facts themselves, as they pass solitarily or in succession before him, but the old and experienced disciple in the school of Christ endeavours to look into what is hid from the eyes of the multitude, and after his inspection you may hear him humbly confess, in the words of the prophet, "that he seeth, as it were, a wheel in the middle of a wheel." (Ezek. i. 16.)

The book of Job, we observed, had brought us into the deeper waters of the sanctuary. At first, they were as "waters to the ankle," but, proceeding onward, they became as "waters to the knees;" and having come thus far, we began to experience, indeed, that they were as "waters up to the loins." (Ezek. xlvii. 3, 4.) But you will remember how we first considered briefly the history of the book itself, and looked, next, with devoted attention, into its sacred and interesting contents, and concluded with stating some of its uses to the Church in general, and some lessons to be learned from it, by certain individuals in particular. And in the application, for with the ending of the book we nearly ended another year, we took a reflective glance on the religion of the patriarchs, and, in a farewell word, put you in remembrance of what had been said by the Apostle James; "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy." (chap. v. 11.)

During the winter and spring months of the year which is past, when I thought you had leisure to read and to meditate, I directed your attention and devotion to the holy inspired book of Psalms. We viewed that book together, as an epitome or abridgement of the whole Bible, both of the law and of the Gospel. We hope, in God, that if any good impressions were made, they have not been effaced. Oh! study still this little manual of devotion. And let the feelings of your heart be expressed with your lips, in the words it contains; "Oh how do I love thy law! it is my meditation all the day; through thy precepts I get understanding, therefore I hate every false way." To invite you still more to the delightful and useful exercise, listen to the words of one, (the learned Salmasius,) who was about to leave the world, for it is then that a man will most feelingly speak the truth, and it is then that his words will certainly be most seriously attended to: "I have lost a world of time; if I had one year more I would spend it in reading David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles." Oh! hear also the pious and learned Bishop Horne, speaking of these delightful compositions, and of the pleasure and profit he experienced in studying them, in the following eloquent and devotional language: "Now could the author flatter himself that any one would take half the pleasure in reading the following exposition, which he hath taken in writing it, he would not fear the loss of his labour. The employment detached him from the bustle and hurry of life, the din of politics, and the noise of folly; vanity and vexation flew away for a season; care and disquietude came not near his dwelling. He arose, fresh as the morning, to his task; and the silence of the night invited him to pursue it; and he can truly say that food and rest were not preferred before it. Every Psalm improved infinitely upon his acquaintance with it, and no one gave him uneasiness but the last; for then he grieved that his work was done. Happier hours than those which have been spent in these meditations on the Songs of Zion, he never expects to see in this world. Very pleasantly did they pass, and moved smoothly and swiftly along; for when thus engaged he counted no time. They are gone, but have left a relish and a fragrance upon the mind, and the remembrance of them is sweet."

During the summer months, when I knew you had but little time for reading and research, I brought before you some of the beautiful parables of our blessed Lord and Redeemer, that from them you might improve on what was spread before you on the book of nature, as you ascended the hill, or followed your occupation on the plains, for, by means of nature in these parables, he gently leads his disciples "to nature's God." "I am the good Shepherd; the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. I am the good Shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My father, who gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one." "Behold a sower went forth to sow, and some seeds fell by the way side; some fell upon stony places; some fell among thorns; others fell into good ground."

With these expositions, and during the same period of time, we have had before us a series of discourses, which we shall now arrange for you in the following order. "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God... Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth... He is thy Lord, and worship thou him..... Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve... Yea, thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy strength, and with all thy mind... But remember that God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

After having spoken particularly of the unity of God, (Deut. vi. 4.) we brought before you a part of the mysterious doctrine of the Trinity, with our statements and illustrations solely from Scripture. "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one."

We considered next, and at particular length, the divinity and incarnation of the Messiah, Christ. We dwelt on his sufferings and death,—his resurrection and ascension, with the offices which he executes as our Redeemer, both in his estate of humiliation and exaltation.

We followed up these discourses, with an account of the "personality," "works," "gifts," "graces," and "fruits" of the Holy Spirit. During the bygone year, the following doctrines, as the foundation, along with precepts, in application, to the building us up in our most holy faith, occupied a considerable portion of our time: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." "But he (Jesus) was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." "Except a man be born again, (from above) he cannot see the kingdom of heaven." "In Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (new creation); "in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith that worketh by love." "Marvel not, then, that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." But we particularly put you in remembrance, through a variety of practical addresses, "that this is the will of God, even your sanctification." Let us now, in dismissing these remarks on the past, join with all our heart, and with all our soul, in the words of a prayer, and let us put our petition into the hands of a Mediator,—“Sanctify us, O Father! through thy truth: thy word is truth.” Thus, I trust, I have kept nothing back that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house.

II. PRIVATELY, or from house to house.—In the course of the winter and spring of the bygone year, I visited every one of your families, and sat with you around me in your different dwellings, where I felt most sensibly your general friendly attachment and affectionate kindness. The days employed for this purpose rise again brightly to my remembrance, and they are placed among the number of the happiest days of my life. After having met and conversed with you as individual families, dwelling in unity, we assembled together afterwards collectively, in a place appointed for the purpose, as the few associated brethren of a particular district. My first address, of this season, was to a mixed number. After, therefore, having heard the youth read a portion of the Scriptures, and repeat what they had been preparing for our meeting together, as the humble servant of the Lord Jesus, I earnestly exhorted them, as parents and children, as masters and servants, as saints and sinners, to live the life, and to perform the duties, which the holy Word of God enjoined on them; indeed, the looks of one and of all in this meeting seemed to express this request, "If ye have any word of exhortation, say on." (Acts xiii. 15.)

The next day of our meeting, in a different district, was dark and dreary. When we had gathered round the family hearth of a friend and neighbour, the faint, feeble light, creeping through the dark green glass of the window, suggested a solemn but cheering subject to us, "Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known."—(1 Cor. xiii. 12.)

On another occasion, a number of families, which have ever regularly, attentively, and devoutly waited on the ordinances of God in this place, met together. Could I not but select such a passage as this for their comfort? "I will be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be my people." (Jer. xxxi. 1.)

On another, I met with a few, and, blessed be God, the number is but small of such, who have seldom, and some of them have never, met with us here; say, if the text was too severe that we chose with which to guide our meditations, "Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel." (Acts ix. 15.) That season has never yet arrived.

Again, a few of us assembled together,—and we were but a few,—but we remembered, in our prayers, you who were then engaged in your worldly concerns, and we took for our own encouragement, on the occasion, the promise of our Lord, who is the truth; "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." (Mat. xviii. 20.)

And lastly—for it may seem irksome and tedious to enumerate farther—we concluded our last address by praise and prayer, in the words of "the householder's hymn":—

"O when, in kindness unto me,
Wilt thou be pleas'd to come?
I with a perfect heart will walk
Within my house at home."—PSALM ci.

Now, in conclusion, should a stranger ask us, in something like contemptuous scorn, "What do ye more than others?" we most humbly answer that individual, "It is not that we vainly imagine that we do, or have done more, or that we have done so much, as many of our brethren in the Lord Jesus, or that the little we have attempted to do, humanly speaking, has been done so well as that our own heart and conscience fully approve of it. No; but while we give you this humble and candid answer, we say, that through the grace and strength of our God assisting us, we are ever ready to exert ourselves in the cause of our Master, that we are willing to spend and be spent for Christ, and that we are not ashamed to say, after we have done all, that we are unprofitable servants, we have done that which was our duty to do." "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? nay, but by the law of faith." "God forbid that we should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

But should the stranger again ask us in a different spirit, and after a milder manner, "Why do you cause all this lengthened detail to pass before us at this time and on this occasion?" We have done so, my Christian friend, to refresh the mind of this people; to induce them, by the extended remarks we have now made, to call up for themselves "things new and old;" to incite you also "to make inquiry, to search and to see whether these things be so;" and, finally, to prevent anything like "the poisonous vapour of misrepresentation" from settling among our green hills, where "the silver trumpet of the Gospel" began to sound so early, and has continued to sound so long, so loudly and so clearly. But "how is it that I hear this of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship." I trust "I have kept nothing back that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house."

SUBMISSION TO THE WILL OF GOD:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GEORGE BOAG,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Widdrington.

"And Eli said, It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good."—1 SAM. iii. 18.

HOWEVER dark and mysterious the ways of Providence may sometimes appear, we have sufficient reason to rest satisfied, that these, all things considered, are the most proper and conducive to the general good. When we examine the evils of life, merely with relation to a few individuals, we are too often disposed to say, that it would have been better these had not happened, or that they had appeared in a manner different from what the providence of God thought fit. But on such matters we are very incompetent judges. We see only a small part of the ways of God, and cannot comprehend his general plan, or discover the connection the most minute event in life has with this plan. At present, the wisest and best of men see and know only in part. And as there are many qualities in the animal, vegetable, and mineral tribes, which the most penetrating philosopher has not been able to comprehend; so, in the moral government of God, there are mysteries which will not be clearly unfolded till the time come, when we shall know even as we are known. What we do not perfectly understand, let us not be rash in condemning, lest we be found to rebel against God. But in every thing, let us submit to Him who is the wise disposer of all events; and, even in those dispensations of providence, which wear the most gloomy aspect, recognise the hand of the Almighty, and say with Eli, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

Eli being now advanced to that period of life, which is least able to bear a load of misery, received such a message, as must wring a parent's heart, and bring him down with sorrow to the grave. The guilt of his sons he well knew, but no doubt fondly flattered himself, that the Lord would be merciful to them, and not punish them, according as their sins deserved. Such hopes, however, soon vanished. A messenger from God disclosed to him the signal judgments which were about to overtake his house. His family were to be reduced to extreme poverty. So aggravated was the guilt of his house, that it was neither to be purged with sacrifice, nor offering, for ever. And his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, were, as a signal mark of God's awful displeasure, both to die in one day, and that as a token of the certain accomplishment of all his other threatenings. Though the feelings which such an announcement must have excited in Eli's breast were the most painful, yet he does not charge the Almighty with injustice, but humbly submits to the divine will. Whatever afflictions, then, we may be called to bear, whatever punishments may overtake us for our sins, a consciousness of guilt should silence every murmur, and faith in the divine perfections determine us to say, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good." From these words, I purpose,

I. To shew the extreme folly and impiety of attempting to resist the will of God. Man, in his best estate, is but vanity. Weakness and imperfection are inseparable attendants on humanity. The soundest constitution that ever existed, the strongest arm that ever wielded a sword, aided by the clearest understanding with which any mortal was ever endowed, could never stop the fury of the storm, or prevent the hurricane from carrying desolation along its track. Where is he at whose command the sun will be arrested in his course? Where is he who can unlock the bars of winter, and renew the face of the earth—who can check the progress of disease, and by his own power conquer the king of terrors? Assuredly no child of the dust can accomplish such effects. But, my brethren, all these, however astonishing, are easily effected by Him, who rules in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth.

From eternity he formed the plan of government he is daily carrying on, and no human effort can frustrate his purposes. The most rational and well-concerted plans of mortals may misgive, but one decree of the God of heaven cannot fail in its accomplishment. What absurdity and folly, then, must it be in man, to oppose the designs of the Omnipotent! who says, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." (Isa. xlv. 10.) Our opposition to the will of God can never make him alter his determinations, or fall in the execution of them. Our disobedience, indeed, adds to the measure of our iniquities, and is likely to bring accumulated judgment on our devoted heads, but will never obtain for us the object of our wishes—an exemption from suffering, and fullness of delight.

Again, it is not only foolish to attempt to resist the will of God, but also highly impious. Man is the offspring of God, sent into this world to accomplish the purposes of unerring wisdom, and he has no right to dictate to the Almighty in any case. He is a servant who is bound to obey every injunction of his Lord; and whether the path in which he is destined to move be beset with briars and thorns, or decorated with the more pleasing and inviting flowers of earthly pleasures, still he can have no cause to murmur, seeing his condition in life is the appointment of Providence. And surely God knows what is good for us, better than we do ourselves. He sees how every individual acts in all the complicated situations of life. He directs those events which either elate the mind with joy, or depress it with sadness; and ill does it become guilty and dependent creatures to complain of the ways of God, who has an absolute right to govern them according to his pleasure. That King who is Lord over all, is not a capricious and unfeeling master, requiring hard and rigorous service, but a kind and compassionate father, whose commands never were grievous, and who, in all his dealings with his children, has an ultimate regard to their felicity. To convince them of this, he hath exhibited such instances of consummate love for man, as no created being could ever have conceived. The most precious gift that heaven could bestow has not been withheld. For man, the eternal Son of God died on Calvary, procured the pardon of sin, and opened the gates of Paradise, that all the guilty, obtaining pardon and the righteousness of God by faith, might enter in and live for ever. Oh! what ingratitude and impiety then must mark the character of those who dare resist the will of such a benefactor! If they believe that God is the governor of the world, they surely must be sensible that they cannot be innocent in rebelling against him, and that punishment in one shape or other may be expected to overtake them. If they suppose they may sin with impunity, this is in effect to deny the existence of God, who, if he is, must be just, and, in the energetic language of Scripture, "will render to every man according to his deeds." (Rom. ii. 6.) Indeed, to have just notions of the Deity, and yet indulge in any known sin, (if such a case be possible,) is the grossest inconsistency. To be deliberately wicked, and, with daring impiety, rise in rebellion against the best of all beings; and, at the same time, to be sensible of the punishment due to so aggravated guilt, argues inconceivable depravity. If God has intrusted us with various talents, among which the powers of the mind hold a distinguished place, and for the use of which we are accountable at the bar of his tribunal, we surely must be guilty if we do not employ them for the purpose for which they were bestowed, and may expect that awful sentence to be ours, which is pronounced in the Gospel against that unprofitable servant, who restored his master's talents without increase, "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." (Mat. xxv. 30.) Attend to this, ye who murmur at the dispensations of Providence, and humble yourselves as under the mighty hand of God. Submit, with Christian resignation, to the appointment of heaven, and God will exalt you in due time. This leads me to remark,

II. That a view of the character and perfections of God, ought to determine us to acquiesce in the way of Providence. It is our duty in all things to submit to the will of God, because he is possessed of Omniscience, unbounded goodness, and Almighty power; and, therefore, well qualified to govern the universe. God sees all things at one comprehensive glance, from the beginning of time till its consummation. The most hidden and remote dependencies of things upon one another are open to his observation; the various actions of moral agents are naked before him; and the secrets of the heart have no covering in his sight. Thus, understanding all things, he must ever know what is most proper to be done; and that he is always disposed to do so, his goodness clearly evinces. The benevolence of the Deity extends to all his creatures. For them the sun darts his enlivening beams upon the earth, and diffuses gladness through the nations; for them the earth is blessed with fertility, and replenished with what is conducive to their comfort and convenience. "He opens his hand, and satisfies the desires of every living thing." To the spiritual concerns of men, too, he has been particularly attentive. When they, corrupted by sin, became unmindful of the source from whence their happiness flows, and sought after strange gods, the Almighty raised up prophets and preachers of righteousness, to throw down the altars which superstition had erected, and to lead men to the worship and service of the Deity. Can we review the holy life, atoning death, and glorious exaltation of our blessed Redeemer,—his patient suffering, while here, as an example to all his followers,—the clear direction of his Word, for the regulation of our conduct, and not admire the mercy and grace of God, as manifested toward us the guilty children of men?

But He who is omniscient and benevolent, is also Almighty to effect whatever His wisdom and goodness determine to be done. Yes, He who created all things, both in heaven and earth,—who guides the various orbs that roll in the immensity of space,—who setteth bounds to the ocean which it cannot pass,—who commands the storm to rise or fall, and has universal nature under his control, must surely be superior to all. Possessed of such perfections, God is well qualified to direct all things, and whatever happens by his appointment, must be right, and productive of ultimate good. Under his moral government, there is no station in which a man may not discharge his duty with acceptance, for God requires no more of any man than what he gives him ability to perform. Those who are placed in the higher spheres of life, and blessed with ease and affluence, we naturally think, will not readily complain of the appointments of Providence in this particular. But they, too, have their peculiar anxieties, and do not, in all cases, acquiesce in the will of God. Many, possessed of wealth, lend a deaf ear to the cries of the poor, and hoard up or dissipate that part of their fortune which should have been given to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. This is what is intended by the great Proprietor of all, for "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;" and when thus applied to promote the comfort and happiness of their brethren of mankind, it is productive of the most refined pleasure,—the pleasure of being instrumental in doing good.

And with regard to those who are placed in the lower stations of life, let it be remembered that they are called upon to be equally submissive to the will of God. If their poverty be not the consequence of vice, but the immediate appointment of God, they can have no reason to complain, as he may require what service he chooses from any of his creatures. And if their poverty is the consequence of vice, not only have they as little reason to complain, but that very circumstance should operate as a check to restrain their murmurings. Shall man who is sprung from the dust, and must soon return to it, challenge the doings of the Omnipotent? Besides, poverty is no real evil, for there can be no merit or demerit, either in riches or poverty, considered as the appointments of heaven, nor is the former a stronger indication of God's love than the latter. If the first naturally leads to gratitude, the last is favourable to humility and trust in God, virtues which hold a distinguished place among the Christian graces. Let us then, my brethren, amidst all the vicissitudes of life,—the various trials and severe dispensations we may be called to endure, submit to the will of God, assured that he never afflicts his own children but with a design to promote their good, and say, with the venerable Eli, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

From what has been said, I observe,

1. That since resignation to the divine will is a duty so reasonable, we should endeavour to lead our minds to the Gospel,—to the reconciling love and grace of Jesus Christ, as the only means, under heaven, that will reconcile us to an acceptable acquiescence in the divine dispensations. If we are dissatisfied with the ways of God, how can we look for his approbation! And if this be wanting, all other refuges for happiness will prove delusive. Conscience, if allowed to speak, will condemn our conduct, and banish joy from the heart. It will tell us that punishment is due to such as rebel against God, and condemn his administration. Let us, then, entertain just conceptions of the Deity, and regard him as the governor of all things. Let us meditate on his wisdom, power, justice, and goodness, which render it impossible for him to do wrong. Let our minds ever be impressed with this solemn truth, that his eye is at all times upon us,—that he sees our actions, and knows our thoughts. Were this grand truth duly established in our minds, it would prove a powerful incentive to virtue, and a forcible check to all vice. Will the presence of a friend whom we love, and from whom we expect favours, lead us to be cautious not to offend him, but shew a readiness to comply with his requests? and, will the presence of the great God, from whom every blessing descends, and before whose tribunal we must all soon appear, less influence our conduct? Let us never forget that He who is our present witness, will ere long be our impartial judge.

2. In order to cherish Christian resignation in our hearts, let us reflect on our guilt and imperfections. Ever since the apostasy of our first parents, sin hath prevailed in the world. Being sprung from them we are tainted with corruption, and to our original guilt, are added numberless actual transgressions. Should we attempt to justify ourselves, our own hearts will condemn us. Should we say we are perfect, these would prove us perverse. Being thus guilty, we become obnoxious to the punishment denounced against the workers of iniquity. Whilst we, then, deserve eternal death, shall we complain of temporal inconveniences? Shall we murmur at the dispensations of God, which we do not yet clearly comprehend? As our faculties in this life are very limited, let us not condemn what we do not understand, but rest assured that when we shall know even as we are known, all the works of the Creator will appear to have been done in wisdom. Seeing our own weakness and dependence upon God, let us frequently have recourse to him by prayer, for the assistance of the Holy Spirit, to convince us of sin,—to enlighten our understandings,—to sanctify our natures,—to reconcile our minds to the ways of Providence, that so we may pass the time of our sojourning here in the fear of the Lord, and be admitted, at last, into those mansions above, where there is nothing to hurt or destroy, but where peace and happiness reign for ever.

THE BAT.

Extracted from "Summer," being the third Volume of "The Sacred Philosophy of the Seasons," by the Rev. Dr DUNCAN, Ruthwell.

In ascending from birds to quadrupeds, we meet with a family of animals which seems intended to form the connecting link between the two orders, thus completing the chain of animated nature, in this, as we have seen to be the case in other transitions. This family is that of the bat.

It is not one of the least remarkable proofs of the wisdom of the Creator, that each object or being in nature has been so perfectly fitted for its end, and the station it occupies, that those which, on the first view, are thought mis-shapen or disgusting, become, on closer investigation, the sources of pleasurable and instructive contemplation. Each part is found so well adapted to its use, that the changes which might appear to the superficial observer conducive to elegance or beauty, would but hinder the design, and produce confusion, where all is order and harmony. Of this the apparently ungainly form of the bat is an exemplification. Dabenton thus describes its structure:—"The elbow is found near the knee; the fore-arm is very long, and obliquely extended from above downwards, and from behind forwards, as far as the nose of the animal. The wrist is placed against the ground, and there is but one finger on the anterior extremity, which is the thumb. The knee is raised as high as the lower part of the rump, and the five toes of the hind feet are of equal length, and turned outwards. The arm is extended horizontally, from the front to the back part, and the thigh vertically, from above downwards; the arm is concealed behind the fore-arm, and the thigh behind the leg; they are, moreover, enveloped in the membranes which conceal the tail, and all the hinder parts of the body. Besides the thumb seen on the anterior extremities, there are four other very long fingers, extending from the fore-arm, enveloped in the membrane, and folded, near the elbow, by their extremity."

While on the ground, these long extremities are of little use to it, and it stands propped on the breast, appearing one of the most helpless and awkward quadrupeds in existence. To move along, many different and very fatiguing actions are required. Its pace is heavy and dragging, and it runs in a grotesque and ungraceful manner. The ears are often very large, and, together with the whole membranous surface, are quite naked; the eyes are small, and too weak to endure the light of the sun; and the wide mouth, reaching from ear to ear, completes the uninviting picture. Were we to look no further, we might deem that the skill which lives through all creation, had been withheld from this feeble and imperfect animal. But when, gaining the aid of some slight eminence, it raises its fore-legs, unwraps from about them the numerous folds of its velvet wings, and darts away with tremulous but rapid flight, we see that it is not dependant for change of place, on the motion that has excited our pity; and, on pursuing the investigation, we find that every part of its structure has been so contrived, by a wisdom far above ours, as to make its existence easy and pleasant. Though the arms of the bat are much elongated, the bones of the fingers exceed their whole length. Over these is stretched the leather-like membrane, which constitutes the wing; it is only a prolongation of the skin, the back and belly each furnishing a layer, and yet it appears but a delicate and transparent net-work. Were the membranes, or bones which support it, compact and thick, their weight would disable the bat from using them; but, becoming thinner as they recede from the centre of motion, they are the instruments of its high and unimpeded flight. The pectoral muscles, which move the wings, are strong, and the breast-bone projects, that these may have an ample space for fixing upon. By means of this construction, the bat is enabled to fly very swiftly. It is gradually aroused from the torpor of winter, at the approach of a milder season, and, slowly recovering the power of motion in the dark recesses of its cave, its length goes forth in search of the insects which have been called into life and activity by the returning power of the sun. It readily discerns its prey, even at some distance, and darts at it, ascending at times, in the chase, to a considerable height, though, in general, it finds a more abundant supply while hovering near the ground, or skimming the surface of water. Here the softness of its wings is of essential service, as they swiftly cut the air, without making any sound to warn the insect into flight or concealment. Though in damp weather the bat can remain for days without food, and even sink again into torpor, his appetite is voracious, and he clears the air of swarms of insects, which, if not exposed to that and similar destructive agents, would multiply so fast as to encumber it, and render it unwholesome. The small eyes of the bat are less liable to injury than they would be if larger or more protuberant; and they are not made to bear the glare of day, as its season of activity is during the obscurity of twilight, when alone it can obtain food. As if conscious of this, its exertions are, during that period, unremitting, and often continue till night has established her sable domain. Notwithstanding its faint power of vision, and even when totally deprived of it, the bat pilots himself through the air, with the greatest skill, avoiding every impediment, though no larger than a twig, and accurately seizing its minutest prey.* This is imputed by some naturalists to its acute perception of sounds, and by others to the delicacy of the nerves; but Cuvier, more philosophically, refers it to the sense of touch resident in the membranous skin of the wings, affected by the reaction of the air in a near approach to any object. Here again we must admire the wisdom that launched this little being on its airy way; for, had this skin been covered by the reddish fur which clothes the rest of the body, that keen sensibility would have been destroyed, and the bat must have darted recklessly along, always in danger of being stunned or wounded by striking against objects which it could not discern, and snatching at random, and in vain, for food, till, spent and weakened, it met a painful death. The large and powerful mouth, and sharp teeth of the bat, enable it to put its victims out of pain instantaneously, and by one gripe. While stationary, it frequently fixes itself by the hook of its hind feet, on some projection, and hangs securely, with the head downward, and the wings folded on the breast. This inverted position is most curiously adapted to its wants, and compensates for the difficulty it has in rising from a flat surface; for, by merely loosening its hold from the rock or tree, the creature is at once in the air, on unrestrained and buoyant wing.

The number of species of British bats have been computed by naturalists to be fifteen or sixteen, but if we take into account those that are to be found in foreign lands, we cannot estimate them as fewer than two hundred. Some of these are very large, compared with the kinds we are acquainted with. The kalong, for example, a species described by Mr Horsfield, which is very abundant in the lower districts of Java, is said to be fully five feet in the extent of its expanded wings, and one foot in the length of its body. This is a fruit-eating kind, and they may be found in companies of several hundreds, fixing on a tree for their roosting-place, where, suspended in rows or clusters, by their hinder claws, with their heads hanging downwards, and their wings folded round them, they exhibit a singular spectacle. During the day they are in general silent, though, if disturbed, they utter "sharp piercing shrieks." Soon after sunset, they leave their roosting-place, and begin their nightly search for food.

* Various experiments have, at different times, been tried, in order to ascertain how far, and under what circumstances, the peculiar faculty or sense, which supplies the place of sight, is called into operation; and it has been found that, though the eyes be sealed up, or even removed entirely, and the animal let loose in a room, with a thousand intricacies and objects, it will pursue its abruptly wheeling flight as usual, threading every labyrinth, avoiding every obstacle, and all this with the same ease, quickness, and precision, as would have been the case had the sight been ever so perfect.

The vampire of which such dreadful stories have been told, is of the same tribe. It is a blood-sucking species, and has been said, while banqueting on the blood of its victim, to fan him with its wings, so as to lull him into a profound sleep, from which he never awakes. This is an entire exaggeration. Don Felix d'Azzara, an accurate observer, who had personal experience of their power, says, "The wounds which they inflicted, without my feeling them at the time, were circular, and rather elliptical; their diameter was trifling, and their depth so superficial as scarcely to penetrate the cutis. It was easy also, on examination, to perceive that these wounds were made by suction, and not by puncture, as might be supposed. On so trifling a basis are the airy visions of superstitious terror found frequently to be erected, when subjected to calm philosophical inquiry."

These facts require no comment. Small and uncomely as is the bat, consecrated of old to gloom and Proserpine, there is a multitude of nice adjustments in the mechanism of its frame, and the omission of but one of these would have destroyed the efficiency of all the rest. But nothing is wanting, nothing is out of place. Each part of the structure is in perfect accordance with every other, and all combine to suit the animal to its position in the scale of creation. We admire the gorgeous butterfly, borne past us on the breeze of summer; our eyes pursue the ascending lark, till he is lost in the glories of morning; but Almighty skill is not more apparent in the rich pencilling of the butterfly's wing, than in the soft transparency of the bat's; nor is Almighty goodness less evident in forming the bright eye of the lark, to greet the rise of day, than in consigning the darksome bat to the grey shades of evening. The more eagerly we cast the eye of intelligent inquiry on the meanest and lowest objects in nature, the more clear shall be our perception, increasing at every stage of our progress, of the depths of that unfathomable Wisdom which "Sees all, as if that all were one, Loves one, as if that one were all."

THE PILGRIM FATHERS AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

BY AN AMERICAN.

COMMUNICATED BY D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. III.

IN my last I assigned two causes, which gradually led to the introduction and wide dissemination of the corruption of the true Gospel in the Churches of Boston, and indeed of New England generally. Those causes were: 1. The introduction of the half-way covenant plan. 2. The doctrine that the Lord's Supper is to be considered as a means of regeneration, and that as such it may lawfully be partaken of by the unregenerate of a serious character, who profess to be desirous of obtaining religion.

These causes tended much to reduce the standard of pure religion in the colonies. The last named, particularly, corrupted the Church, by the admission of unworthy members into it, and unworthy ministers into the sacred office. Whitefield, in his visits to America, perceived this, and lamented it. "Many," says he, "that preach the Gospel, I fear, do not experimentally know Christ; although I cannot see much worldly advantage to tempt them to take upon them the sacred function. I fear that many rest in a head-knowledge, are close Pharisees, and only have a name to live. It must needs be so, when the power of godliness is dwindled away, and the form only of religion has become fashionable among a people." Even before this time there is every reason to believe that Arminian and Pelagian errors had commenced creeping in, although they were not openly avowed before 1740. I shall now take notice of some other causes which had a tendency to introduce error, and finally gross heresy.

3. One of these was, the violent opposition which was made, as might have been expected, by many ministers and people to the glorious revival of religion, which commenced in 1734 under the labours of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards at Northampton, and continued, with short intervals, under his labours, and those of Mr Whitefield, Gilbert Tennent, and others, until 1744, and which pervaded New England, and some other parts of the country, particularly some portions of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Great opposition was made by many to this revival. By a few, this was done from honest but unenlightened views; but by many, from hatred to the doctrines of the cross. It is not probable, that there were no mistakes committed by the friends of this work of God's signal love and grace; but the opposition on the part of many ministers and people, was unreasonable, and destitute of a Christian spirit.

The influence of this opposition was very injurious to both the friends and enemies of the revival. The former were too often driven to harsh and exceptionable measures, and to the indulgence of an unchristian temper and course of conduct towards their opposers. Whilst the latter were made more opposed to those soul-stirring doctrines which the friends of the revival held and preached,—became more indifferent to vital religion, and soon avowed Arminianism, and settled down into cold and formal observances and modes of preaching. Of those who pursued this course, the most distinguished and influential was the Rev. Dr Chauncy of Boston, who both preached and wrote against the revival, and did more than any other man in New England to oppose that glorious work of grace, which was the commencement of a new era in many of the Churches in New England, and the ultimate cause of the brighter and better state of things which now exists throughout it. He was at first a professed Calvinist; but in his downward course of error he became an Arminian, and died in 1787 a strenuous advocate for the doctrine of universal salvation: and almost all that opposed the revival became Arminians. As they dreaded "excitement," their preaching became cold, speculative, and treated of general and external morality, rather than of the doctrines of total depravity, the necessity of regeneration by the Spirit of God, and their kindred truths.

4. Another circumstance connected with the state of things, which grew out of the revival above named, and which had an effect to prepare the way for the further spread of error, or rather which removed what might have retarded it in some measure, was the fact, that many of the pious and devoted members withdrew from the Churches where the preaching was so uncongenial to their feelings, and either attached themselves to those Churches of their own denomination where a better spirit prevailed, or joined the Churches of other denominations; thus leaving many Churches to hasten their downward course of error and corruption. In others, the light of the Gospel became extinct at the death of the old members, who had seen better days in the Church, and who still clung around those sacred abodes where so many godly ministers had preached, and where they themselves first felt the power of divine love, and consecrated themselves to the Lord. And when these venerable members of a former generation departed, and the last rays were withdrawn, then was verified the Saviour's remark, "But if the light which is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

5. Another cause of the corruption of religion was the long period of gloom and distraction which commenced with the first French war in 1744-49, and continued during the second French or Canadian war, 1754-63, and through the war of the Revolution, down to the adoption of the present constitution in 1789. During that long period of agitation, men's minds were filled with the engrossing political subjects and events. War is a most unfavourable season for the promotion of religion, especially if the scene of the war is in the immediate vicinity, and affects, personally, the whole community. Besides, the immorality engendered in the army, and disseminated at its disbanding, increased the corruption of the heart of the community, and thus disposed it to embrace error. Moreover, vice flowed in upon the country from foreign shores. All these circumstances repressed the growth of piety, and were, in an inverse proportion, favourable to the propagation of error.

Soon after the Revolution 1775-83, open Unitarianism began to be promoted by the Rev. Dr Freeman, pastor of the church called King's Chapel, in Boston, by the extensive circulation, through the public libraries and otherwise, of the books of Priestley, Belsham, Lindsey, and others. All these concurring circumstances prepared the way for the introduction of heresy, or led to its development.

6. Another cause which greatly promoted Unitarianism in Boston and the surrounding country, during the fifty years of the great declension of religion, and of which the war of the Revolution constituted nearly a central epoch, was the influence of great names. During that period of astonishing indifference to religious doctrine, it was taken for granted, by very many, that such men as Governor Bowdoin, and General Knox, and President Adams, and Chief Justice Parsons, and many others of distinguished reputation, must be right. It is a fact, not to be denied, that most, but not all, of the great men, of that period, were Unitarian, as far as they had any opinions on the subject of religion. This had great influence, not only upon people living in Boston, which is the metropolis of New England, but still more upon men from the interior. Merchants, lawyers, legislators, and others, were in the habit of visiting that city, on business, several times annually, and thus came into company frequently with the distinguished men of that city, most of whom were Unitarians. Of course, they imbibed their opinions, and carried them with them into the towns and villages in the interior, there to be transmitted to others. To this cause of the further propagation of Unitarianism, I ought to add,

7. That this system of religion is one that is exceedingly agreeable to the natural and unregenerated heart. The thoughtless, rich, gay, pleasure-loving, and fashionable world find nothing in it which denies them their beloved enjoyments. It quiets their consciences with the names and forms of religion, and promises them happiness beyond the grave; whilst it demands few sacrifices, nor advances doctrines which are calculated to humble the pride of men. When we consider this fact, in connection with the causes which have already been mentioned, it is not a matter of wonder that Unitarianism made great progress during the times of which I have been speaking.

8. Another cause which has operated to introduce heresy into the churches of New England, and especially of the State of Massachusetts, is the influence which Harvard University has for the last thirty or forty years exerted, by sending forth men into the ministry who have imbibed a corrupted theology. This influence has been very great, and still continues to be great.

That institution, which is situated in the town of Cambridge, four miles from Boston, was founded by eminently pious and devoted men in the year 1636, only sixteen years after the first colony was planted in New England, and only seven or eight years after the arrival of Governor Winthrop and the colony which settled Boston. It is the oldest university in the United States, and in some respects it possesses greater advantages than any other of the seventy or eighty colleges and universities in the country. It was founded for the express purpose of educating a pious and orthodox ministry. Funds were early given by pious individuals for the purpose of supporting a Professor of Theology, who should be required to teach the doctrines of the orthodox faith. For a long period that distinguished institution nobly answered the end which its pious founders had in view. A large number of the earlier New England ministers were educated within its walls. Its Presidents and its Professors of Theology continued for a long period to be sound in doctrine. But in 1804, the Rev. Dr Ware, a Unitarian minister, was appointed Professor of Divinity, by the Corporation or Board of Directors, who live about Boston, and almost all of whom themselves had become Unitarians. In 1810, the Rev. Dr Kirkland, another Unitarian minister, was appointed President of the institution. Since that period, this oldest literary establishment in the United States has been in the power of Unitarians, together with its liberal endowments, its library, &c. Its Professors of the Theological Faculty are all Unitarian, and have under their instruction from thirty to fifty young men annually, preparing for the ministry. From this institution, as from a great fountain, the doctrines of Unitarianism have emanated, and have been diffused, more or less, throughout New England, and especially throughout the State of Massachusetts.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Curse of Worldliness.—Let it be supposed, that at some past period in the history of Britain, news had arrived of an awful visitation of nature, by which one of her distant colonies is in a state of famine. Numbers have died, numbers are dying, all are approaching the point of starvation; besides which, a powerful enemy is gathering on their frontiers, and threatening to hasten the work of death. The government at home opens its stores; public charity bursts forth, and pours relief through a thousand channels. A fleet is freighted with the precious means of life, and dispatched to the scene of suffering, wafted by the sighs and prayers of the nation. For a time it steers direct for its object. But, having lost sight of land, the ardour of those employed, abates, though engaged in a commission which angels might convey, then impressions of its importance fade from their minds. A group of islands lies in their course, and though far short of their destination, they decide to call. Prospects of mercantile advantage here present themselves; the spirit of gain takes possession of them; they are inclined, solicited, prevailed on, to remain. Their original object of mercy is forgotten, the stores of life with which they had been intrusted, are used and bartered, as if intended only for themselves; and thus an enterprize of beneficence on which God had frowned, sinks into a bare mercantile adventure. But the supposition is impossible, impossible in the sense supposed; but in a higher sense it has been realized, and far, far, exceeded. The world was perishing,—the compassion of God was moved,—the means of salvation were provided, and O! at how costly a price! The Church was charged to convey them without delay to her dying-fellow men, and to pause not in her office of mercy, till the lost sinner had enjoyed the means of recovery. For a time the godlike trust was faithfully executed. "An angel flying through the midst of heaven," was an apt representation of the directness and speed with which the Church prosecuted her task. Jesus beheld the travail of his soul and was satisfied. Souls were snatched as brands from the burning. But a change came over her conduct. The spirit of the world returned, and cast a spell on her movements. Continents were yet to be visited, and millions to be rescued, when she paused in her onward course. Immortal men continued to perish by nations; but the agents of mercy had abandoned their work; as if the stores of life with which they were intrusted, had been intended solely for their own use, they began to live unto themselves. An enterprize of mercy, in which God had embarked his highest glory, and which involved the happiness of the world, was arrested, and lost to myriads, by a spirit of worldly gain. For, if at some given period after the first age of the Christian Church, the professed agents of mercy had been sought for, how would the great majority of them have been found occupied and employed, but in "buying and selling, and getting gain." "Each one," says Cyprian, as early as the middle of the third century, "each one studies how to increase his patrimony, and forgetting what the faithful did in apostolic times, or what they ought always to do, their great passion is an insatiable desire of enlarging their fortunes."—HARRIS. (Mammon.)

God's willingness to save.—God offers not only a truce, but a peace, and hath been most active in urging a reconciliation. Can he manifest his willingness in clearer methods than that of sending his Son to reconcile the world to himself? Can he evidence more sincerity than by his repeated and reiterated pressing of our souls to the acceptance of him? God knocks at our hearts, and we are deaf to him; He thunders in our ears, and we regard him not; He waits upon us for our acceptance of his love, and we grow more mad against him; He beseecheth us, and we ungratefully and proudly reject him; He opens his bosom, and we turn our backs; He offers us his pearls, and we tread them under our feet; He would clothe us with pure linen, but we would still wear our foul rags; He would give us angels' bread, and we feed on husks with swine. The wisdom of God shines upon us, and we account it foolishness; the infinite kindness of God courts us, and we refuse it, as if it were the greatest cruelty. Christ calls and begs, and we will not hear him either commanding or entreating. To love God is our privilege, and though it be our indispensable duty, yet it had been a presumption in us to aspire so high as to think the casting our earthly affections upon so transcendent an object, should be dear to Him, had He not authorised it by his command, and encouraged it by his acceptance. But it is strange that God should court us by such varieties of kindness to that, wherein not His happiness, but our affection does consist; and much stranger, that such pieces of earth and clay should turn their backs upon so admirable an object, and be enemies to Him, who displays himself in so many allurements to their souls, and fix their hatred upon that tender God who sues for their affections.—CHARNOCK. (On Enmity to God.)

Love of God.—Among all the natural passions and affections of the human heart, where is the love of God to be found? We love parent and child,—we love friends and country,—we love riches and honour,—we love sin in all its shapes, and we embrace it with all our souls; these affections take their root in our nature, they grow wild in our hearts, and scarcely require cultivation. But, instead of finding religion growing naturally within, only observe with what care and watching and anxiety it must be cherished, and refreshed, and preserved; and if once neglected, yea, but for a little, how soon it begins to wither and decay! Any of the other affections of our heart it would be almost impossible to get rid of; but to acquire and cultivate a spirit of religion, is the slow and patient work of earnest watchfulness and persevering humility.—Wolf's Remains.

SACRED POETRY.

ON THE DEATH OFTHE REV. JOHN BROWN PATTERSON, A. M., Late of Falkirk.

"Merciful men are taken away, none considering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come."—ISAIAH LVII. 1.

AND thou art gone! O spirit bright!
Gone early to thy native sphere,
With kindred seraphs to unite,
And left us sad and darkling here.
Gone, in thy manhood's soaring prime!
Gone, ere thy sun had reached its noon!
Gone! dare we say before thy time?
Gone, oh! we feel, for us too soon!

Thy mind so gifted, yet so mild,
So rich, so bright with classic lore,
Yet artless, gentle as a child,
Meekly its honours won and wore;
Thy heart, so tender and so true,
So warm, so generous, so benign,
Which guile or envy never knew,—
Must we that heart to dust resign!

How short has been thy bright career,
Thou human meteor! through the gloom
This moment gleaming glorious here,—
The next—plunged in the darksome tomb!
This moment, in thy Master's name,
Calling lost sinners back to God,
Another,—o'er thy lifeless frame
Men pile the dust and smoothe the sod!

How dark, full oft, appears to man
The path heaven's own cloud-pillar guides!
Yet Love devised the gracious plan,
And Mercy o'er its course presides.
The merciful are called away,
And few the cause discern; the Lord
Has snatched them from that evil day
When on the earth shall wrath be poured!

Yes, gentle spirit! well for thee
Thy early call,—thy early crown!
When thou hadst but begun to see
The moral tempest's must'ring frown!
Not thine the iron heart and form,
Though thine the moral courage high,
To buffet with the angry storm
That soon may rend our black'ning sky!

So sweetly tempered, and so mild
To thee the mind, soul, feelings given,
Short trial served; thy Saviour smiled,
And called thee timeously to heaven!
From "evil tongues and evil days"
Rescued; farewell, dear friend, to thee!
Thy God, even for thy sake, we praise,
"For with him mercies ever be!"

PRAYER.

OH blessing infinite! beyond compare!
Heaven's choicest boon—the privilege of prayer!
How oft, in hours of sickness and of pain,
When all the sympathy of man is vain,
When fever burns upon the throbbing brow,
And scarce the parched lips can breathe the vow,
The secret longing of the soul sincere,— Felt, but unheard, save by th' Immortal Ear,
Hath call'd such sacred solace from the sky,
As made it peace to live or peace to die!

How oft, when sorrow shadowing o'er the heart,
Hath bid each freer hope of joy depart,
When disappointment, with a wintry frown,
Dashes the golden cup of pleasure down,
And changing tides, on life's uncertain sea,
Alarm the bark of frail humanity,
A single breath of earnest, pious prayer
Hath wooed to sleep the murmurs of despair,
And shed o'er earth, and all her green domain,
A light and beauty never seen till then!

But not alone, in melancholy hours,
The spirit feels devotion's hallowed powers;
For oft, when sunshine beaming on our way,
Might tempt to vanity and sin astray,
"Tis bliss and safety, with adoring eye,
To lift the thoughts with grateful love on high,
And own, with meek and reverential mind,
His hand who gives whatever joy we find,
Whose grace and goodness only can disarm
Grief of its sting, joy of its fatal charm.
Oh blessing infinite! beyond compare!
Say, what were man if shut the gate of prayer!
"Tis prayer its glory o'er creation flings,
And speaks its Author to be King of kings;
"Tis prayer that gives to life a higher tone,
And points to brighter worlds when this is gone;
"Tis prayer that proves divine our nobler part,
And opens the deepest fountains of the heart;
Prayer is the wing by which we mount to heaven,
And taste on earth the bliss to angels given!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Simple Faith of an aged Greenlander.—About the year 1742, Mr Drachart, the Danish missionary in Greenland, baptized nine persons. Among these was an old man, who, when he heard that his two daughters were to be baptized, went to the missionary, and asked if he might not be baptized too. "It is true," said he, "I can say but little, and very probably I shall never learn so much as my children, for thou canst see that my hairs are quite grey, and that I am a very old man; but I believe with all my heart in Jesus Christ, and that all thou sayest of him is true." So moving a petition could not be refused, though the aged suppliant was unable to retain the usual questions and answers in his memory. He was much affected while the ordinance was performed, and moistened the place where he was baptized with his tears.

Martin Luther.—In the last will and testament of this eminent reformer occurs the following remarkable passage:—"Lord God, I thank thee, for that thou hast been pleased to make me a poor and indigent man upon earth. I have neither house, nor land, nor money, to leave behind me. Thou hast given me wife and children, whom I now restore to thee. Lord, nourish, teach, and preserve them, as thou hast me."

THE NECESSITY OF REPENTANCE.

BY THE REV. JOHN MACFARLANE,
Minister of Collessie.

An outline having been attempted in a former paper, of the essential qualities by which the grace of repentance is distinguished, we are now prepared to see how necessary it is to salvation; and what is the place which it occupies, in the process of renovation that is conducted in the heart of the redeemed sinner.

When it is said that repentance is indispensable to salvation, which it most assuredly is, it is not meant to be alleged, either, that it forms a claim to the divine favour, or that it is necessary as a prerequisite to our acceptance of the invitation which the Gospel equally addresses to all. Evangelical repentance is produced by God, and is as much the result of his divine operation, as any other of the graces of the Christian life which are subsequently introduced into the soul. If it is regarded with complacency, therefore, by the Great Source of spiritual influence, that complacency is manifested because it is the work of his own hands. Its existence is not the cause, but the effect of his grace.

And, it is no less evident, that true repentance being the fruit of faith,—a fruit, indeed, which grows simultaneously with the stem that produces it,—the call of the Gospel must have been obeyed, before such repentance could have been exercised. The possession of this grace is not a qualification to our acceptance, but is an evidence that we have accepted of that free salvation which is held forth, not to them that are penitent, but to them that are lost. Still, however, is repentance necessary to salvation, just as the existence of every part is essential to the production of the whole. It is necessary that a work be begun, before it can be finished; it is necessary in a journey that we take the first step, before we can take the second, or the third; it is necessary that we live before we can grow; and, by a necessity no less strict and inevitable, is it necessary that we repent before we can be saved. The declaration is authoritative as it is distinct, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

An important principle in the economy of grace, and one which it is of great use to understand and appreciate, here comes into view,—I mean the connection that subsists between the graces of the Christian life, and the accomplishment of the promises attached to them. Various dependencies and relations among things are familiar to us, as existing, whether in nature, or in human society. There is the connection between cause and effect, between merit and reward, between compact and its fulfilment. But that which subsists between Christian qualities, and the ultimate enjoyment of eternal life, differs, in some respect, from all of these. It is, if I may so express it, the relationship of adaptation. When any quality or state of mind is represented in Scripture as necessary to salvation, the reason is, that none except those who have obtained that quality or state of mind can enjoy the kind of salvation which the Bible reveals. When a promise is made by God to any grace of the Christian life which he enjoins, the fulfilment of that promise is the necessary consequence, no less than the reward of obedience; and the reason why none but they who have attained the quality shall realize the promise is, not that others are excluded by a mere act of the divine will, but that they are altogether incapable of receiving and enjoying its fulfilment.

An illustration of this great principle, which pervades the moral government of God towards our fallen race, may be found in the subject before us. Scripture breathes some of its sweetest promises into the ear of the penitent, and unfolds its brightest prospects to his view: "With him," saith "the High and Holy One," "I dwell, even with him that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." "He hath sent me," saith the Saviour in proclaiming the purpose of his mission, "to heal the broken-hearted, to set at liberty them that are bruised." In pronouncing his estimate of the sources of human happiness, he declares, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." And when the reclaimed and contrite wanderer shall have come home to his Father's house above, the gentle hand of Jesus "shall wipe away all tears from his eyes." Now, by whom can this peculiar blessedness be enjoyed? Does any one hope for the fulfilment of such promises without being truly penitent? He hopes for an impossibility. There is an absolute incongruity between his state of mind and the nature of the blessedness proposed. He hopes for that which, with reverence be it spoken, God himself cannot bestow. The heart cannot be healed which was never bruised. The tear that has not been shed cannot be wiped away.

It is very obvious, that the peculiar blessedness that consists in a sense of pardoning mercy and reconciling love, implies a previous consciousness and feeling of having offended the Great and Beneficent Power by whom that mercy and love are manifested to the soul. The penitent alone can receive pardon. Even in regard to a fellow-creature, if he has committed an offence against my feelings, my property, or my reputation, it is evident that he cannot receive forgiveness from me, or even give me credit for the exercise of a forgiving spirit, until he become conscious that he has offended. How sincerely soever I may forgive him, and whatever favours I may heap upon his head as expressive of my good-will, he cannot appreciate my disposition or conduct towards him. He receives my kindness as a matter of course, or misinterprets the sentiments on my part with which it is bestowed. Hence we are enjoined by Christ, "if thy brother repent, forgive him." Not that the inward exercise of a forgiving spirit is to be suspended upon the repentance of an offending brother, but his repentance is essential to his receiving the outward expression of that spirit, and to his return to the confidence which may have existed before. And so in reference to the heavenly Benefactor and Friend whom men have deserted and dishonoured by sin. The unconscious sinner can receive or enjoy no manifestation of pardoning mercy. He cannot participate in the blessedness of "the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." Nor can he know the nature of the feeling which is awakened in the bosom, by being forgiven much, and therefore loving much.

In order to see more fully how indispensable a broken and contrite heart is, to the enjoyment of the blessings included in the Gospel salvation, which is essentially salvation for the lost, it is only necessary to look for a moment at the moral condition and posture of the impenitent sinner. The first glance at his state shows us that he impugns the truth of the Eternal God; for upon no one subject are the statements of Scripture more distinct and emphatic, than upon the fact of human guilt, and the sad consequences it has entailed. As if to meet the natural obduracy of the heart, and to cut off from the possibility of escaping a conviction so unwelcome, it is taught in the form of assertion, that "there is none righteous, no not one." It is brought out in the shape of elaborate and conclusive argument, that "all the world have become guilty before God."

It is portrayed in awful characters of judgment, inflicted on prevailing wickedness; and it is brought before our eyes in the affecting spectacle of death, which hath passed upon all men, "for that all have sinned."

The solemn and authoritative voice of inspiration tells us, too, that sin has subjected to the condemnation of the divine law,—that the sentence has been pronounced against the transgressor,—that the sword of justice is suspended over his head,—that he cannot avoid, or avert its stroke,—that it inflicts a wound which no endurance can mitigate, no power or skill can heal,—that it pierces with everlasting death. But where is the impenitent sinner? How is he affected? He has heard all this,—he knows it all. Yet behold! he goes out and in,—he lies down and rises up,—he appears in the street and in the market-place,—business engrosses, or pleasure allures him,—he goes to the public assembly, and retires from the place of prayer, as careless and secure as if no such sentence had gone forth against him. Whatever may be his general acknowledgments, he feels, and thinks, and acts as if sin were so slight and inconsiderable an evil, as not to be of sufficient consequence to command his attention, to interfere with his occupation, to interrupt his happiness, or to disturb his repose. What is his whole temper and conduct, but an impeachment of the veracity of heaven? The daring enormity of his presumption subjects him to a charge, which, had it not been broadly alleged against him in Scripture, we should have shrunk from exhibiting against a fellow-mortal, saying, as he does by his conduct, that he has not sinned, "he maketh God a liar, and his word is not in him."

If we look again at the state of the impenitent transgressor, we see that he practically disowns the necessity of the Christian atonement. In the spectacle of the cross, Jehovah has erected an ever-during monument, inscribed with his own finger, and written in characters of expiatory blood, that "he will by no means clear the guilty." To the eye of the unhumiliated sinner, too, this imperishable monument of the divine justice and love stands forth in the holy record of God's dispensations. But how does it affect him? Alas! that sublime and magnificent object, which attracts the contemplation of angels, has no beauty or grandeur in his view. His perceptions and feelings concerning sin are such as to imply the impious charge of folly upon the greatest gift of infinite beneficence. The language of his conduct is, that Christ has died in vain.

Let us look just once more at the moral aspect of the unsubdued heart, and we observe that it wants the predisposition that can alone fit for mingling with the society of heaven. The host of the redeemed assembled there is mighty. Its number has been swelled by every successive generation. Every kindred, and nation, and people, and tongue, has furnished its contribution to the happy throng. They have come from, the east, and the west, and the north, and the south. They have belonged to every rank and gradation of human society. They have lived, some under one, some under another of the various dispensations of grace by which God has made known his character and purposes in this his world. They have come through numberless vicissitudes, and after many fluctuations of hope and fear, peace and perplexity, serenity and sorrow, they have landed on the celestial shores. But in whatever their circumstances were once different, in this they now agree, that they are the members of a ransomed family,—that they are redeemed “with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot.” This is the bond of their union, the source of their gratitude, the burden of their song. To the sacred anthem their hearts have been all attuned. There is no discordant note in the harmony of heaven. But does the impenitent heart feel any such emotion? Can the unsubdued mind understand or appreciate the song of the Lamb? Is it not to him a tasteless and unmeaning theme? And did he give utterance to the feeling the scene inspired, would it not be the expression of his senseless wonder, or of his bitter scorn?

The supposition, therefore, that the impenitent, while remaining so, can partake of any one blessing peculiar to the Gospel salvation, involves a moral impossibility. It were to suppose that a man may, at one and the same time, be saved, and yet be destitute of all the qualities which constitute salvation. It were to suppose, that while his continued obduracy impeaches the veracity of the God of truth, and that while his conduct is an open avowal, upon his part, that Christ has died in vain, he may be saved. It were to suppose that the Almighty King will subvert the principles of his government, and deny the truth of his nature, to justify rebellion, and to countenance delusion and sin.

Hence we observe the force and meaning of the humbling representations of human guilt and helplessness, which give a peculiar complexion and character to the Bible. Such representations are not made unnecessarily to disturb, or mortify, or alarm. They are not made merely because they are true. They are designed to lead us to repentance,—to induce that state of mind which is so necessary a part of salvation, that without it we must for ever remain destitute of the whole. If men do not, or will not, admit the light of Scripture truth to reveal to them their darkness, and to melt their hardened hearts; if, from the imagined possession of intellectual superiority or moral worth, they will evade the humbling discoveries made by the great “Searcher of the thoughts and intents of the heart;” if they will maintain a self-dependent and unsubdued spirit,—a spirit the most remote from that which, whether as creatures, or as sinful creatures, they should display, they must be left to prove that they have for ever shut themselves out from all the sources of the pure and exalted happiness of the redeemed.

And is not this consideration fitted powerfully to operate upon those, who have hitherto lived in a careless and a carnal state, that while the solemn and admonitory voice of God is now calling “upon all men everywhere to repent,” it is only calling upon them to seek, and to cultivate, that frame of mind which shall render them capable of enjoying the pure and heart-satisfying consolations which the Gospel brings, and which otherwise they can never share? “He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.”

JEANIE CHARTERS.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDSBOURGH,

In November 1836, it was our privilege often to visit on her death-bed Jeanie Charters, a sweet young girl, whom we had known from her infancy, and in whom, for special reasons, we were deeply interested. Had any person hinted an intention of publishing any thing respecting her, she would have been greatly surprised, and would probably have shrunk from the very idea of publicity. And yet, had it been suggested to her, that it might, in some degree, redound to the glory of God, and that though dead she might thus continue to speak to the young whom she left behind her the praises of that blessed Saviour whom she loved, we doubt not that her consent would have been granted; and she would, it is probable, the more readily have assented, because she had long been mute respecting the Lord's kindness to her. She was remarkably modest; and, in consequence of this modesty, she was remarkably silent. At the same time, her very silence spoke, as she was an attentive and evidently interested listener; and being gentle, and blameless, and harmless, and very anxious to oblige, she was with all her silence a general favourite.

One reason, perhaps, of her great quietness was, that from a very early period she was a delicate child. Alas! she was nursed in the lap of adversity! for when she was yet an infant, God saw fit, by a stroke of palsy, to bring her affectionate mother to the gates of death; and though he spared her for fourteen years, she was never restored to health. but needed, during that long period, the nursing care of her children, being almost incapable either of speaking or walking. Jeanie could not remember ever having seen her mother but as weary and heavy laden, and as one whom the hand of affliction had sorely scathed; and her affectionate mother had long been accustomed to regard her as likely to be bereaved in her tender years of a mother's care; and her heart, which had lost nothing of its kindness, was closely knit to the youngest and most helpless of her children. Either from natural constitution, or from the circumstances of her infancy and childhood, Jeanie, from an early age, seemed delicate and consumptive. Instead of increasing in vigour as she grew in years, when she was about fourteen years of age, though she had no formed complaint, she became so feeble, that she was unable for any great exertion. Change of air seemed for a time to have some favourable effect. She went to reside for some months with a kind sister in Glasgow, and returned much stouter than she had for some time been. The improvement, however, was but of short continuance. The debility returned, with this additional aggravation, that one of her knees became inflamed, and swollen and painful. As she had agreed so well with Glasgow before, by way of trial she was sent back to it; but she grew worse and worse, and the medical adviser recommended that she should without delay be sent back to the country. Had her affectionate mother been able for the charge, with all a mother's tenderness would she have undertaken it; but as she was totally unable to render her the services she needed, she was kindly received by Mr and Mrs G., her uncle and aunt, in Saltcoats. Her mother seemed to have a presentiment that she was taking a last farewell of her, and weeping, said, when she reluctantly parted with her, that she would never see her again. She had been, as we have said, a great favourite of her mother's, and deserved to be so from her gentleness, and affection, and steadiness.

When she came to her kind friends in Saltcoats, though every thing was done for her in point of affection and medical skill, she became worse and worse. We were all much interested in her as a sweet and pious girl, though she was so modest that she gave no utterance to her pious sentiments. Still, however, her religious principles were manifested by their fruits; by her gentleness, by her patience, by her unwillingness to give trouble, by her gratitude for any attention, and, when she had it in her power, by her great desire to oblige. They appeared also, by the punctuality with which morning and evening she read her Bible, and raised her prayers to the Lord. After she was confined, when the hour of her morning and evening devotions arrived, she came out of bed, and knelt down at the bed-side while she prayed, though it was evident that, owing to the inflammation in her knee, she could not do this without much pain. Her aunt observing the pain this occasioned, begged that she would no longer attempt to kneel; for though it was right, when she was in health, to bow her knees before the Lord her Maker, her prayers, in the name of Christ, would be equally acceptable though offered up in bed, when she could not, without pain and detriment, continue to kneel.

Though, from the feebleness of her frame, there was much reason to fear, there were some favourable symptoms that inspired hope. She was young, being about fifteen; her appetite was good; her cough was not very troublesome; and, instead of aggravating disease by fretful repinings, she bore her sufferings with unvarying meekness and patience. Never did the slightest complaint escape from her lips. There was a degree of hectic feverishness which, though wasting her away, made her think herself better than she was; and when we made any inquiry respecting her health, her constant answer, with a sweet smile, was, "rather better." Her friends, however, did not attempt to conceal from her the critical nature of her state. Her kind uncle, Mr G., (himself, alas! now numbered with the dead,) not only prayed with her, but put into her hands, in writing, suggestions to aid her in prayer for herself; and she seemed to be exercised in such a manner as was well-fitted to prepare her for the result, whether life or death. Her well-worn Bible, when we visited her, we found either in her hand, or lying on her pillow. Still, however, from her great modesty, when addressed on religious subjects, she said nothing in reply, though she listened with deep interest.

About a month, however, before her death, her disease assumed a much more serious aspect. A blood vessel burst, and she vomited blood to such an extent, that it was thought that she would have been choked, or that, from weakness, she could not have survived. The vomiting returned, at intervals, till about ten days before her death; and, from the time that it commenced, no hope was entertained by her friends of her recovery; and she seemed to be well aware herself, that she was approaching the swellings of Jordan. But the Lord, whom she had early sought, forsook her not when the shadows of the long evening began to gather, and when the billows of the dark unseen ocean of eternity were sounding in her ears. He fulfilled his promise who hath said, "Fear not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee by the right hand of my righteousness." She had to pass through the waters of affliction, but the Lord was her comforter; she had to walk through the fire of distress, but she was brought out unscathed. She was now in the last rugged stages of her journey; but it was only then, when the dark valley was about to be entered, and the gates of death were to hide her from our view, that she began to shine, and to shew us how well-fitted she was for the land of cloudless light. He who had chosen her as one of his own children, though he increased the hotness of the furnace, did it that the gold might be more purified, and that she might shew forth the praises of the Lord ere her brief journey came to a close. Then at last the tongue of the dumb was loosed. Whilst she meditated, the fire burned; and out of the abundance of the heart she spoke freely of what the Lord had done for her, and of the joy that he was shedding abroad in her soul. She seemed often to experience a kind of rapture in the prospect of being with Christ. Clasp her hands, and looking up to heaven, she would say, "O that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away, and be at rest in that happy land!" Her whole heart's desire was to be with Christ; and her earnest, earnest, often repeated prayer, was, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus."

She was greatly attached to her aunt and uncle before her illness; and much more had she cause to be so, after having experienced their affectionate care of her in the time of sore trouble. When she had been praying very fervently for her change, which she never spoke of under the name of death, but under the far more agreeable view of "the coming of Christ," her aunt said to her, "Will you not be sorry, Jannie, to leave us all?" "Oh!" was her reply, "it will be so short a time till we meet, that I need not be sorry." She seemed to anticipate, with delight, this joyful meeting, and said to her aunt, "O, I wonder if I will be permitted, when the hour of your departure arrives, to come back to accompany you to heaven!"

About a fortnight before her death, tidings arrived that her dear mother had had a fourth shock of palsy, and was not expected to live many days. These tidings, instead of being distressing, seemed rather joyful to her; and when, in a few days, intelligence of her death was brought, and she heard her sister, who had come to attend her, and with whom she would not part, giving way to lamentations in an adjoining room, and learned the cause of it, instead of joining in the lamentations, she said, "Oh I am glad that I am so soon to meet with my dear, dear mother again!" To that mother she had been affectionately attached. From her, notwithstanding all her infirmities, she had derived much spiritual advantage; and earnestly did she exhort her sister, and entreat her to exhort the other branches of the family, to walk in their dear mother's steps, that their latter end might be peace, and that they might all meet in a happier world never to be separated.

And here we cannot but remark how God blesses the endeavours of parents to train up their children in the way that they should go. Parents must own that it is their duty to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. If they neglect this, they are disobeying the commandment of the Almighty, who says to them, as he did to Israel of old, "These things I command you this day, you shall have in your heart, and shall teach them diligently to your children." If they have them in their own hearts, they will not, when the eternal welfare of their children is at stake, be able to keep silence. Their bowels will yearn, and their full hearts will overflow.

The parent of whom we speak was, to all appearance, placed in the most unfavourable circumstances for instructing her children. Few precepts could be given, not more, perhaps, than one word in a sentence could be understood. But she spoke to them by signs, and taught them by her example, and watered her efforts with her prayers. She not only read the Word of God herself, but she made them read it to her; thus at once gratifying herself and instructing them. Her daughter Jeanie's favourite chapters on her death-bed were those that she had most frequently read to her mother, and which that mother used to point out with delight, making us understand, by words and signs, that they were favourites of her beloved father's, from whose large New Testament they were read by her. Little aware often are parents how permanent may be the influence of their instructions, or of their good example. And if it afford consolation to pious parents on their death-bed, that they have endeavoured to be faithful in the discharge of their duty, and that their instructions may live in the remembrance of their children, when the place that now knows them shall know them no more, how agonizing must it be to wicked parents, at the hour of death, to reflect that the effect of their carelessness and wicked example dies not with them, but will continue to be felt by their posterity when their own bodies are rotting in the dust, and when their souls have entered on their eternal doom of woe.

But there was another person who had a blessed influence in the formation of her religious character, and that was her Sabbath school teacher. Often, often did she speak of the obligations she lay under to this good man. When we asked her during her last illness, when she began to feel deeply interested in religion, she said, from the time she began to attend Peter M—l's class in the Sabbath evening school. On making inquiry at him, as to what he had observed respecting her, he said, that from her great modesty, he could not give much information, except that she was always well prepared, and was, indeed, the best scholar he ever had; that she had a remarkably good memory, and could repeat much of the Scriptures, and a great number of the psalms, and paraphrases, and hymns. But this good man had taught her also to exercise her judgment, and had addressed himself to the affections of her heart; and he said that, when he spoke of the power and the mercy manifested in the miracles of Christ, and of the great love wherewith he loved us, he observed that she was generally in tears. She was greatly affected when she was about to take her last farewell of him; and a short time before her death, she desired one of her sisters to write to this good and pious man, to thank him for his kind instructions, and to say that she was soon going away from this world of pain and sorrow.

Blessed be God, Sabbath school teachers are now a numerous body throughout our land, forming a truly interesting band, who go early up to the vineyards to see if the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear. May the great Husbandman abundantly bless their pious labours of love! May instances, such as the present, encourage them to be zealous in the blessed work of winning souls to Christ, by convincing the judgment, and gaining for Him the affections of the tender heart, remembering that they who are wise shall shine as the light, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever!

Our young sufferer, who had profited so much by Sabbath evening instruction was now fast advancing to that land where there are no Sabbath evenings, but where there is a cloudless Sabbath-day, which never comes to a close. She longed for the joys of that eternal Sabbath. About a week before her death, wishing to hear what answer she would make, we said to her when she was longing for her change, "Once, we doubt not, Jeanie, you regarded death with fear; how comes it that you now look forward to it with so great delight?" Readily, but solemnly, she replied, "Because I believe in the Lord Jesus. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly! yet not my will but thine be done. Oh! do you think that he will come soon? Do you think that it will be this week?" We answered, that from her great weakness, we really thought that it would be that week. "Oh that it would be this night!" We said, "He that cometh will come, and will not tarry. He may seem to you to tarry, but whilst in pious longings you exclaim, 'Why tarry his chariot wheels! O Lord, how long!' it is well to pray also that patience may have its perfect work, and to bear in mind that good is the time of the Lord, and that it is only till that good time that he delayeth his coming." We added, that in her feeble state, when she had such love in her heart to Christ, and when she was so convinced that it was far better to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord, it was natural that she should be willing rather to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. Yet, as she loved Christ, we hoped that she was also willing to live a little longer, if it was for his glory; that it was an unspeakable blessing that she had been spared to proclaim his praise, and tell what great things he had done for her soul, and to make us all willing to part with her, from the conviction that to her to die was gain; that by shewing the power of faith to gladden the heart, when heart and flesh began to faint and fail, she was teaching us that death could be disarmed of its sting, and that the joy of the Lord can be our strength in going up through the dark valley; that if she had died even a month earlier, though we doubted not that she would have entered on the rest that remaineth for the people of God, we would have lost much of the benefit; for the work of faith with power would have been much less evident, and the shout of victory would have been more feebly raised.

Though not a murmur ever escaped from her lips, the nearer she came to the skirts of the wilderness, the more did she long for the joys of Emmanuel's country; and the more earnestly did she pray, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly;" often, however, adding, "Yet not my will but thine be done." One day she said to her aunt, "Oh, I fear that what you said will not be true." Her aunt did not remember what it was to which she alluded, and replied, "What will not be true?" "Oh, you said that you thought He would come this week, and the week is drawing near an end; do you think that it will be this week?" She answered, "that is in the Lord's hand. He can prolong your life; but you are so very weak that it may be this week." "Oh!" said she, "may that be true. O that it were this night; this night; this night!" Her aunt said to her, "Is it because you are in pain Jeanie, that you wish for death?" "Oh no," said she, "it is because I love Christ, and long to be with him. I would willingly be crucified to get to Christ."

We never saw a more beautiful illustration of the text, "perfect love casteth out fear." Faith in Christ had disarmed death; and love to Christ had banished fear, making her say, with delight, "My beloved is mine, and I am his: he is the chief among ten thousands and altogether lovely."

On the day of her mother's funeral her uncle and aunt were absent, and she longed for their return. A young friend to whom she was much attached, and the servant maid, read to her in their absence. She desired them to read 1 Cor. xv., which had been a favourite chapter of her mother's. She listened with attention, and repeated a considerable part of it, and closed with saying, "O death where is thy sting; O grave where is thy victory?" They sang a hymn, and she attempted to join with them, but was too feeble at the time for the effort. On being told, soon after, that Miss A. had come to see her, she said, "Miss A. is one of the Sabbath school teachers in Stevenston Church, and I would like to see her." She came in, and after some religious conversation, she said, "how much delighted I am when you speak to me of Jesus; there is nothing gives me so much pleasure." She then asked them to sing a hymn; and they sang the fifty-third Paraphrase; "Take comfort Christians when your friends in Jesus fall asleep," &c.; after which she tried to repeat the fifth hymn, "The hour of my departure's come," &c.

On Saturday morning she asked what day it was, and on being told, she seemed to plead for deliverance, saying, "Oh this night, this night." Night came, and she was in great distress, trying every posture, and finding none in which she could rest. Being very uneasy she needed often to be turned, and almost every time she was turned, she said, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." She had always enjoyed family prayer, and this evening was the only time that she thought that she was not strong enough to listen; but early next morning she caused them to awake Mr G., and wished him to join with her in prayer. Her uneasiness greatly increased and when the Sabbath began to dawn it was evident that her warfare was almost accomplished, and that "the day would bring her rest." Nor was it long delayed. When they were all standing round her, about eight o'clock, she looked at Mr G. with a peculiar gaze, and said, "Come Lord Jesus!" They looked on her for a little, thinking that she was still alive; but her eyes were fixed; "the silver cord was loosed;" her Lord had come, and without a struggle she had entered on the rest that remaineth for the people of God. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labours: and their works do follow them."

THE SERPENT.

BY THE REV. DAVID MITCHELL.

THE term serpent occupies a conspicuous place both in the book of nature and in the book of revelation. Whether we contemplate it in a literal or in a figurative point of view, it presents numerous associations to the mind, well calculated to engage and instruct. The Hebrew word nachash, translated serpent, has been used by some with great latitude, and employed as a general term for all animals that move swiftly in the sea or on land "with a wriggling kind of motion without the use of feet or fins." Serpents are amphibious, that is, capable of living either on land or in water. Linnæus has arranged them into six genera, and into two hundred and eighteen species, of which thirty-two are poisonous. They are to be found in many places of the world, and in some climates they form the great proportion of animated nature. It is related of some of the deserts of Africa, that they "are entirely barren, except where they are found to produce serpents; and in such quantities, that some extensive plains are almost entirely covered with them." Serpents are exceedingly varied in their dimensions; some are very small, others are of a prodigious size, and possess great strength. They have no limbs, but move along the ground on their bellies with amazing rapidity. They have numerous joints in their back-bones; a circumstance which facilitates their movements. Their jaws are surprisingly wide, formed on a muscular hinge. Their throats are capable of being so distended, as to receive bodies apparently much larger than themselves. Their eyes and ears are small. The latter are bright and sharp; but the organ of smell is not visible. The tongue is long and forked; and the animal is perpetually darting it out, which gives it a terrific appearance. The teeth are crooked and hollow, and the serpent can either allay or erect them at pleasure. Those species which are venomous contain their poison in a kind of bladder at the bottom of the upper jaw, from whence the fangs proceed, with which they no sooner inflict a wound than the poison enters, which is a tasteless substance inflaming the wound, yet may be swallowed without receiving any injury. The heart of the serpent lies near the head, and it often displays great cunning in shielding this part from danger. It casts the skin twice a year, which no sooner begins to become loose at the head, than the animal endeavours to rub it off between two hard substances. Though serpents are amphibious, we have good reason to conclude, that there are some which confine their residence to the watery deep. These Hydras are large and poisonous. We have an illustration of the truth of this in a melancholy event which took place in the Indian Ocean in 1807, when a young man, who was bit by a serpent, was immediately seized with giddiness and convulsions which soon terminated in death. It seems evident, from the book of Amos, that the sea serpent was present to the mind of the prophet when he announced the certainty of God's righteous retribution toward Israel, though some have given his language a different interpretation. When he described the position of Jehovah standing by the altar, proclaiming the vanity of attempting to evade the arm of vengeance, he said, "Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down; and though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them." Amos ix. 2, 3.

The viper belongs to a class of serpents of the most malignant description. It derives its name from being viviparous, that is, bringing forth its young alive, while all other kinds produce their young by eggs. It is called, in the Hebrew language, ephah, and is always alluded to in Scripture as a reptile of the most venomous and virulent kind. Dr Shaw describes it as being about a foot in length, and varying in colour, "according to the quality of the earth, land, or rocks, where it is found." This creature has been contemplated in all ages with aversion and horror, and not unfrequently referred to as a fit emblem of the malignant conduct of ungodly men. When the prophet Isaiah details the baneful transactions of the wicked, and gives a similitude of their conduct, he exclaims, "They hatch cockatrice eggs, and weave the spider's web: he that eateth their eggs dieth, and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper." Isaiah lix. 5. The cockatrice here doubtless means the viper; for it would be a perversion of the laws of nature to suppose, that an egg of one kind could, by any process, produce a living creature of another species; and the fact that the viper brings forth its young alive, can easily be reconciled to this statement, when we consider the peculiarities of this kind of serpent. The viper, as Dr Paxton informs us, "hatches its young from eggs formed in the mother like the roe of fishes, and if any of these were crushed, the young one would be immediately disintegrated, and prepared for mischief." When the Pharisees ascribed our Saviour's miracles to satanic influence, and declared that he cast out evil spirits by the power of the devils, he who knew the best similitudes of nature, compared these blasphemous revilers to the viper: "O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Mat. xii. 34. This reptile was held in the utmost detestation by the nations of antiquity. So exceedingly obnoxious was it to them, and so much dreaded, that they looked upon it as a horrid instrument of vengeance employed by a superior power to punish those who were guilty of flagrant crimes. When Paul was shipwrecked at Melite, (supposed to be Malta,) and had come ashore, he gathered a bundle of sticks, and put them on the fire which the barbarians had kindled, and "there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand. And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, no doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live. And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm. Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly; but, after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god." Acts xviii. 4-6.

The adder, frequently explained by naturalists under the name viper, is sometimes mentioned in the Word of God; but our translators appear to have applied the term rather to a class of serpents than to one kind, for we find Hebrew words which are of different signification, rendered adder. It seems evident, however, that whenever they used the term, it was to denote an animal of the most deadly and most destructive kind. When the Psalmist describes the unfeeling efficacy of God's protecting arm in shielding his people from danger, from the gins of the enemy, "from the noisome pestilence," and from "the destruction that wasteth at noon-day," he concludes the description of their victory and their triumph by saying, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet." Psalm xci. 13. It appears that some which belong to this class are proof against music, which has a powerful influence over many of the serpent tribes. Many of them are so deeply affected by the sound of music, that they lay aside their natural ferocity for the time, and become quite harmless; but the adder will not lend an ear to the pleasant sound, and, in order to make itself secure, it is said to lay the one ear upon the ground, and to put its tail upon the other, lest by any means it should be enticed. David, when describing the estrangement of the wicked, saith: "They go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; which will not listen to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." Psalm lviii. 3-5. One of the most wonderful features in the history of the serpent is its incantation, whereby it is rendered powerless and harmless by the touch of certain individuals, and makes no resistance against them, while it retains its usual malignancy to all other surrounding objects. This holds in an especial manner with the cerastes, or horned viper. Bruce, in giving an account of his travels in Egypt, says, "I will not hesitate to aver, that I have seen at Cairo (and this may be seen daily without trouble or expense) a man who came from above the catacombs, where the pits of the mummy birds are kept, who has taken a cerastes with his naked hand from a number of others lying at the bottom of a tub, has put it upon his bare head, covered it with the common red cap he wears, then taken it out, put it on his heart, and tied it about his neck like a necklace; after which, it has been applied to a hen, and bit it, which has died in a few minutes; and, to complete the experiment, the man has taken it by the neck, and, beginning at the tail, has eaten it, as one would do a carrot, or a stock of celery, without any seeming repugnance. However lively the snake may have been before, when he is seized by any of these barbarians, he seems as if taken with sickness and feebleness, frequently shuts his eyes, and never turns his mouth toward the arm of the person who holds him. On their being questioned how they are exempted from its attack, the gravest and most respectable among the Egyptians reply, that they were born so; while the lower sort talk of enchantments by words and by writing." The cerastes, when freed from its charms, adds cunning to malignancy. It conceals itself by the highway, lurks in the rut of the wheels, and treacherously seizes by the heels the horse that passes; the legs of the beast are immediately benumbed, it instantly comes down behind, the rider is suddenly thrown off his guard, falls backward, and becomes a prey to the destroyer. It seems to have been to this kind of animal that Jacob alluded when he said, "Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse heels, so that the rider shall fall backward." Gen. xlix. 17.

The dragon is often mentioned in the sacred writings, and commonly corresponds with the Hebrew words than, thanin, and thanin, but these have also been respectively rendered, by our translators, serpents, sea-monsters, and whales. What kind of animal is here meant, the learned are not agreed. They have exercised great ingenuity in their speculations on this point, and have come to very different conclusions. It would appear, from a careful investigation of the places where the word is used, that it is sometimes descriptive of a sea-monster, and at other times it refers to a living creature on land. Asaph speaks of it as an inhabitant of the floods; "Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength; Thou breakest the heads of the dragons in the waters." Psalm lxxiv. 13. Again, when the Prophet Ezekiel describes God's anger against the Egyptian king, he says, "Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of the waters," Ezek. xxix. 3. It is supposed to be the crocodile to which Pharaoh is here compared. The word dragon is also used as a figure of desolation, and applied to places at a distance from sea. "And I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste, for the dragons of the wilderness." Malachi i. 3.

Jerome says the dragons were called boas because they could swallow (boves) cattle, and lay waste whole provinces. The boa, doubtless, surpasses all other serpents in size, being sometimes about forty feet long, and four in circumference, and is also exceedingly voracious and destructive. It swallows substances of almost incredible bulk. A man has been found entire within it. Many have supposed that it was into the red dragon, or boa, that Satan entered when he deceived our first parents. Before this it appears to have moved along in an erect position, but, participating in the effects of the curse brought upon the world by transgression, it was afterwards doomed to go upon its belly, and lick the dust of the ground. To use the sublime conceptions of the poet with regard to this temptation,

"So spake the enemy of mankind, enclosed
In serpent, inmate bad; and toward Eve
Addressed his way; not with indented wave,
Prone on the ground, as since; but on his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that tower'd
Fold above fold, a surging mass; his head
Crested aloft, and carbuncle his eyes;
With burnished neck of verdant gold, erect Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass
Floated redundant."

The boa kills its victims with its tail, and it has been known, when enraged and rendered desperate, to break down the trees of the forest with the same weapon. This feature in its history will enable us to perceive the apposite language of John, in the book of Revelation, when he describes the symbolical dragon; "his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth." Rev. xii. 4.

The seraph, or fiery flying serpent, was experimentally known to the Israelites, at an early period of their history. The Hebrew word seraph signifies to burn, and was probably applied to this kind of serpent owing to the burning, intolerable, and deadly pain produced by its bite. The word, in the original, also signifies winged, which is in harmony with our translation of the sacred text. Serpents of this description, have been found in modern times. They have been seen on the Pyrenees, with cartilages proceeding from their sides, like the wings of bats, by which they glided swiftly along, and made great havock amongst the sheep. The Hebrews, when sojourning in the wilderness, were punished for their disobedience and rebellion against God, by the seraph, which wounded many of them, and caused death and wailing in their encampment. "The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died." Numb. xxi. 6.

The only other serpent which we shall notice is the cockatrice or basilisk, known to the Hebrews by the names taephuon and teiphoni, which signify to hiss, for which this creature is remarkable. The Latins, for the same reason, denominated it the hisser. The basilisk is described as being about three palms in length, of a reddish colour, and moves along its body half erect, having the head decorated with a crest. The wound which it makes is said to be incurable, and its breath so noxious as to prove fatal to those beasts which inhale it before they are bitten. The cockatrice was not a native of Canaan, but abounded in Egypt, and was known to the Israelites as an object of terror and dread. It was alluded to, in the days of antiquity, as a token of supreme authority. When we consider the pestiferous nature and habits of this serpent, and its dread-inspiring character, we are led to see the moral grandeur of the description given by Isaiah, of the period when the Gospel shall be proclaimed in every land, and the joyful sound shall be re-echoed from every clime; "The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isaiah xi. 8, 9.

From the preceding details, it will be seen that serpents fill a memorable place in animated nature; and if we attend to the history of the world, as given in the Word of Life, and as related by the children of men, we shall perceive that they have exercised a powerful influence over the transactions of the human race. They have been noticed in Scripture, and distinguished for their sagacity and cunning: "The serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord had made." Gen. iii. 1. When Jesus gave his disciples an example of prudence and circumspection, he directed their attention to the same object; his language was, "Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." Mat. x. 16. In oriental countries the serpent was the common symbol of power; it was emblazoned on the attire of the monarch, and surrounded his diadem. Superstitious veneration was paid to it as an ornament, and as a token of might and authority; and though it may not be so contemplated in modern times, it is still an object of wonder and imitation. The term is applied to the works of nature and the works of art—to the meandering stream and the wave line on the manufacturer's web.

The snake has also been looked upon as the origin of evil, and has been described as such in the mythology of the Indians. The valiant men of antiquity, who were giants in suppressing evil, have been represented as the conquerors of serpents, such as Apollo the destroyer of Python. These reptiles were adored by the heathen, and the heads of their priests surrounded with them, or with devices imitating their appearance; and "in the orgies of Bacchus Meenoles (or the mad) his worshippers were crowned with serpents, and yelled out Eve, Eve, even her by whom the transgression came." But to whatever extent serpents have been the subjects of superstitious veneration, and to whatever extent Satan may have succeeded in establishing his kingdom through their instrumentality, it is consoling to know that an invincible power is at work, counteracting his influence, frustrating his best laid schemes, dispelling his most fatal delusions, and preparing for a full and an eternal triumph over this fiendish enemy of man. Christ came into this world, in order that he might bruise the head of the serpent. Jesus became incarnate that he might destroy the works of the devil. And when he was upon earth, he cast a miraculous robe of protection around his disciples, so that serpents, the similitude of Satan, could not injure them: "Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you." Luke x. 19. God so admirably arranged things in the treatment of his ancient people in the desert, that the very bite of the serpent was rendered instrumental in giving them important instruction. When they were seized by the seraph in the wilderness, and cried to Moses for help, the Lord desired him to make a serpent of brass, and put it on a pole, that he who was wounded might look to it and be healed. This taught them the great power and loving-kindness of God, and led them to fix their hearts upon him as their shield and deliverer. This event also typified an infinitely more transcendent deliverance than freedom from any bodily pain, however agonizing. It typified the rescue of the soul from the subtle enemy and deceiver of mankind by Jesus Christ, a rescue from eternal pain, everlasting anguish, and never-ending woe; for "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii. 14, 15.

THE HAPPINESS OF DEPARTED SAINTS:

BY THE LATE REV. JOHN CAMPBELL, D.D.,

One of the Ministers of the Tolbooth Church, Edinburgh.

"And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me. Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."—REV. xiv. 13.

I INTEND not at present to enter into any critical explanation of the words of the text, nor to inquire concerning the period of sacred prophecy, to which they may be understood directly to refer. In the foregoing chapter a beast is described as rising out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, "and it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them." This probably alludes to the dreadful persecutions which should be carried on by the anti-christian Church of Rome, against the faithful disciples and witnesses of Jesus. In this chapter the scene is transferred to heaven, where the Lamb is represented as standing on Mount Zion, with all the sealed thousands of his saints, whom he hath redeemed from the earth. The prospect of joining at last that blessed company may well support and comfort his followers, under all the hardships which they may, at present, be called to endure for his name's sake; and even though brought to seal their testimony with their blood, their fate should rather excite our congratulation than regret. For John informs us that he heard a voice from heaven proclaiming the happiness of the martyrs and saints of God at death, and this rejoicing testimony he is commanded to record. "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them." Though these words may be understood as primarily referring to those who, having obtained the crown of martyrdom, are permitted, at death, to enter into heavenly rest, there appears no necessity for confining the application of the text exclusively to them. It is certain that, to every true believer death is great gain, and that to such "to depart, and to be with Christ, is far better" than to remain on earth. We may, therefore, justly view the words of the text as announcing, in general, the happy condition of departed saints, when the stroke of death removes them from this mortal life. Their bodies are consigned to the grave; their spirits ascend to heaven, and there "they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

I. Let us attend to the state and character of those who die in the Lord.

The general meaning of this expression is abundantly obvious. The Lord Jesus Christ is certainly the person alluded to in this passage; and those who die in the Lord are all true Christians who are savingly connected with him, and united to him as their living Head.

That you may enter more fully into the real import of this character, it is necessary to remind you that, by reason of our apostasy, the whole human race is estranged from God. That blessed relation and intercourse, which originally subsisted between God and man, is broken off; "we are become enemies to him in our minds, and by wicked works; and are alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in us."

In this wretched situation God might have justly left us to perish, without remedy and without hope. But, in the exceeding riches of his grace, provision was made for our recovery and salvation. In the council of peace, the Lord Jesus Christ was set up from everlasting as the only Mediator between God and man; and in the fulness of time, he came to do all that his love had prompted him to undertake. By fulfilling the righteousness of the law, and making atonement by the blood of his cross, complete satisfaction was made to offended justice, and a solid foundation laid for the salvation of perishing sinners.

In the everlasting Gospel the proclamations of grace are addressed to all who hear them, and the chief of sinners are invited to accept of mercy. But the actual participation of the blessings of salvation is limited to those, exclusively, who, receiving the record which God hath given concerning his Son, become united to him as their only Saviour. Hence, it becomes a deeply interesting inquiry, how is it that any of the sinful children of men are introduced to such a saving relation to the Son of God? This is accomplished by the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit. It is his blessed province to convince of sin by leading sinners to just views of the spirituality, extent, obligations, and sanctions of the law of God.

When the commandment comes with peace, the self-righteous confidence of the sinner is overthrown, and he perceives that he is dead in trespasses and sins. The Lord, the Spirit, farther reveals Christ to the awakened soul, in all the glory of his saving character, as a most necessary, suitable, and willing Saviour, "able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him."

All opposition, on the part of the sinner, is overcome. His unbelieving suspicions and jealousies are removed. By a sweet, yet powerful influence, his heart is drawn to Jesus. In a day of power he receives, with implicit credit, the Gospel testimony concerning him, and sets to his seal that God is true.

Such, then, is the commencement of this blessed union that subsists between Christ and the believing soul. "He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit." "Christ lives in him, and dwells in his heart by faith." A variety of striking similitudes are employed in Scripture, to represent the intimacy and permanence of this sacred union, as well as the reciprocal endeared communion to which it gives rise. But without entering on the consideration of these, I would just observe, that such is the situation in which death finds the true believer. As to him to live was Christ, so when he comes to die, he dies in the Lord. And in order, still farther, to illustrate this subject, it may not be improper to attend a little to the union of the dying saint to Jesus, in respect both of its reality and evidence.

1. The true believer really dies in Jesus.

This sacred union, which continued through life, is neither dissolved nor interrupted by death. With respect to his external condition, he may have passed through many vicissitudes. He may have experienced, too, a great variety of changes in the frame of his spirit. But none of these can affect his relation to his Saviour; for the love of Christ remains unchanged. He rests in his love to his people. "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

No hostile influence or power can possibly dissolve the sacred band that joins the Christian to his Lord. Neither the devices of Satan, the malignity of persecutors, the allurements of the world, the snares of life, or the terrors of death, shall be able to pluck any of his sheep out of their heavenly Shepherd's hand.

Death terminates every relation that subsists on earth. The nearest and dearest friends must now bid to each other a long farewell. The union between soul and body must be dissolved for a while. Before the soul takes its flight from the tabernacle of clay its powers of intelligence may be disturbed, and sensation itself apparently suspended. But the relation of the true believer to his Lord survives every other relation. It remains unimpaired by the harbingers of mortality, and unhurt by the agonies of dissolving nature. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

2. When mention is made of the believer's dying in the Lord, this naturally leads us to consider the evidence which is given us of his actual interest in this inestimable privilege.

And here it must be observed, that the surest evidence of an interest in Christ ariseth from the uniform tenor of a life devoted to God. This is a more decisive evidence of sincerity than the liveliest sense of joy upon a dying bed. And the testimony of a good conscience may afford a solid satisfaction to the believer himself, and to others around him, however languid his frame, and uncomfortable his feelings may then happen to be. "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." At the same time, when the believer apprehends approaching dissolution, it may be expected that he will study to exercise such a temper and behaviour, becoming his situation, as may tend to glorify God, to minister to his own comfort, and edify surrounding Christian friends

He will die in the faith of the Lord Jesus, holding fast the faithful word, declaring his unshaken faith, not only in the general truth of Christianity, but also in those peculiar doctrines of that Gospel revelation, on which all the hopes of sinners depend. Jesus Christ will be precious to his soul, and he will continue to regard his righteousness and sacrifice as that sure foundation which God hath laid in Zion, other than which, no man can safely lay.

It is also a pleasing evidence of the Christian's union to his Saviour, when he is enabled to maintain confidence toward God through our Lord Jesus Christ; not casting away his confidence, but holding fast the beginning of the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope, firm unto the end. How much does it adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour; how highly comfortable to himself, as well as satisfactory to other Christians, when the dying saint, amidst all the infirmities of dissolving nature, and all the diffidence of a tender conscience, is enabled to express good hope through grace, and a cheerful expectation of a happy immortality!

But he will die in the exercise of repentance toward God, as well as of faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ; conscious of innumerable failings and of aggravated transgressions, he will bewail and confess them with unaffected contrition, and far from expecting heaven as the reward of his own merit, he will be looking for the mercy of the Lord Jesus unto eternal life.

His faith will also work by love, and he will not fail to express the various sentiments of unfeigned charity to others, so far as his abilities and opportunities admit.

He will be especially desirous that patience may have its perfect work. Far from murmuring or repining under the hand of God, he will study, through grace, meekly to bear whatever burden his heavenly Father may impose, and unreservedly resign himself to his management and disposal. Instead of indulging anxious wishes of life or health, the supreme desire of his soul will be, that whether he lives, he may live unto the Lord; and whether he dies, he may die unto the Lord; that whether he live, therefore, or die, he may be the Lord's.

"Precious, in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints," yet a considerable variety may be observed in his dealings towards them, at the closing period of life. Some he is pleased to favour with more liberal communications of his grace, in consequence of which their hearts are filled with joy, and their lips express the language of triumph. Others again, whose spirits, so far from being elevated are rather depressed and languid, may be enabled to glorify the Lord by continuing to the end in the exercise of a steady faith, a solid hope, a constant patience, and unreserved resignation to his will. Such a frame may be less pleasant to the Christian himself, but, surely, it is no less decisive than the former of his connection with the Saviour. In some respects, indeed, it seems to have the preference, as it appears to have less dependence upon external causes, and affords the evidence of a stronger faith than when this divine principle is supported and enlivened by abundance of sensible joy. But whatever be the situation and feelings of the dying saint, his eternal interests are secure, and the Spirit of God delivers it with all solemnity as a certain and most comfortable truth, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them." This leads us now.

II. To consider the blessedness of those of the dead who die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit, from henceforth, that is, immediately from the time of their departure, and release from the flesh. They were formerly in heaviness, through manifold temptations; but now these are at an end for ever, and all to come is bliss.

It was the remark of a wise heathen, that no man deserves to be called happy before his death. But it is from Christianity we must learn the nature and excellence, as well as the certainty, of that felicity which good men after death are permitted to enjoy. They are neither doomed to the penance of purgatory, nor do they sink into insensibility, unconscious of existence through all the ages that intervene till the resurrection day; but their souls do immediately pass into glory, and are blessed with the spirits of the just made perfect. Their blessedness is described in the text, in two different views:—

1. They rest from their labours; that is, from all the toil and travail, fatigues and hardships, which they were obliged to undergo, whilst in this mortal state. They rest from all the labours of the Christian life; not that they ever felt or complained of those as burdensome: love sweetened all their toil. They had learned, by grace, to say, his commandments are not grievous; and had found, in their happy experience, that in keeping of them there is great reward. But the duties which they were called to discharge, were numerous and difficult. Unceasing watchfulness, and laborious exertion, on their part, were ever indispensably necessary. They were animated to constancy and perseverance, by the hope of final repose; and now the fatigues of duty are happily over.

The labour of love is at an end on earth; and the rest of heaven is sweet. Thus the labourer, who hath borne the heat and burden of the day, rejoiceth in the prospect of evening, which terminates his toils, and invites him to repose.

They rest from all the labours of the spiritual warfare. The life of the Christian on earth, is not merely a life of labour: it is also a life of conflict. He is called to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ; to take to himself the whole armour of God, and go forth to fight the battles of the Lord. The devices of Satan must be discovered and avoided, his fiery darts quenched, and his more furious attacks repelled.

The world, with all its blandishments and snares, must be overcome by faith. Innumerable internal corruptions, irregular appetites, and impetuous lusts, must be controlled and vanquished. This certainly is no easy task. Many a hard conflict is the believer obliged to maintain; nor are his exertions always crowned with success. His enemies sometimes prevail against him. The world and Satan may rejoice in a temporary victory; and the law in his members, warring against the law in his mind, bringeth him into captivity to the law of sin. So that he is often obliged to exclaim with the apostle, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" How much does the brave soldier rejoice, when the hardships and dangers of a tedious campaign are exchanged for the rewards of victory and the repose of peace? And such will be the triumph of every faithful soldier of the Captain of Salvation.

When death hath done his utmost, the Christian's warfare is accomplished; the victory is won; and he is more than a conqueror through Him that loved him. His joy is like the joy of men, when they divide the spoil. His complaints are exchanged for praises, and his groans for songs of everlasting triumph. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

They rest from all the troubles and sufferings of this mortal state. The word here termed labour, is also used to express uneasiness or trouble. Through much tribulation must the Christian enter the kingdom. Whilst he remains in this fleshly tabernacle, he groans, being burdened; but the kind hand of death delivers him from all his troubles. Heaven is the land of perfect and everlasting rest. In that blessed world, all those things which prove the occasion of so much disquietude to us here, are for ever unknown. The pains and languors of a diseased body; the anguish of a broken heart; perplexities respecting a provision in life, the persecution of the wicked, and the scoffs of the profane; the grief of witnessing the sufferings of those whom we most tenderly love, sufferings which we can neither remove nor alleviate; and the final pang of separation, when they are parted from us:—all these things are forgotten in heaven; for there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

2. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for their works do follow them; that is, the piety and goodness which distinguished their character here below. These often survive the saints of God even in this world. The remembrance of their virtues remains when they themselves are gone, and the memory of the just is blessed. But their good works also follow them to heaven. They do not go before them to establish a meritorious claim to the heavenly blessedness: for this the blood of martyrdom itself were insufficient. Those holy men, who have come out of great tribulation, and are now before the throne of God, have all washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

But whilst merit is excluded, there are several other important views in respect to which the good works of believers do follow them to heaven.

They accompany them thither, to prove their title to the remunerations of grace. They shew, that these are the persons for whom the kingdom was prepared before the foundation of the world.

The good works of the saints demonstrate also their meetness for the heavenly inheritance. Those gracious principles, dispositions, and habits, to which they are now formed by the Spirit of God, are nothing else than the elements of perfection, the prelibations of eternal life. They enable the holy soul to understand the nature of the heavenly state, and qualify it for the business and enjoyments of the upper world.

The good works of the saints serve to determine the degree of happiness and glory to which they shall be advanced. One star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead. In the heavenly world, all the saints of God are perfect and happy; but their perfection and happiness admit of degrees. And we are led to consider the progress they have made in holiness on earth, as the measure by which their happiness in the heavenly state is to be ascertained. I go not at present into a detail of the proof by which this assertion might be supported. Suffice it to say, that we cannot conceive a stronger motive to animate the Christian to be steadfast and immovable, abounding always in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as he knows that his labours shall not be in vain in the Lord.

Having considered the character and blessedness of those dead who die in the Lord, how much does it concern us all, my friends, to secure an interest in the Lord Jesus Christ as our Saviour, and to endeavour, through grace, to lead such a life as is connected with so blessed and so glorious an end? And when our pious friends are removed from us, instead of giving way to inordinate sorrow, should we not rather rejoice in their happiness, and congratulate them on the perfection and glory to which they are now advanced? "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

NO. IV.

"For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched-out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes?"—Deut. iv. 32—34.

II. THE second period of the history of Israel consists of the time that elapsed, from their deliverance out of Egypt, and their sojourning in the wilderness, until their obtaining possession of the promised land. This, though comparatively a short period of their history, consisting of little more than forty years, is yet a very memorable period, being distinguished by many signal interpositions of Providence towards that people, such as have not been manifested towards any other nation. Among them may be noticed, as meriting our serious attention, the solemn giving of the law from Mount Sinai; the establishing of the services of the tabernacle, with all the institutions of the ceremonial law; the conducting them through the wilderness by the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night; and, finally, the bringing them into the possession of the promised land. In each of these memorable events, there were very striking and peculiar manifestations of God's favour to the people of Israel, which may well arrest our attention, and call forth our admiration, and from which we may derive useful instruction.

Let us fix our attention, first, upon the giving of the law from Mount Sinai. Observe here, that, in the wise administration of the Lord their God, there was a preparation made for giving the law to the people of Israel: the great deliverance which God had wrought for them, in bringing them up out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage, with a strong and mighty hand, and with awful judgments upon their enemies, constituted part of their preparation for receiving the law. So long as they were groaning under the bondage of Egypt, they were not in favourable circumstances for observing the law of God. It would have been sacrificing the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes. So long as we remain under the degrading bondage of sin and Satan, we are in very unfavourable circumstances for keeping the commandments of our God. It is after being delivered from a degrading a bondage, and after being brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, that we are in favourable circumstances for yielding a hearty and willing obedience to his commandments. Love is the fulfilling of the law; and surely so signal a deliverance was well fitted to call forth the liveliest feelings of gratitude and love in their hearts, and to draw them to obedience by the cords of love and the bands of a man. This deliverance served farther to encourage them to obedience, by setting before their eyes, in a very impressive manner, what must be the end of a life of sin, in those tremendous judgments, that were sent down upon their enemies. They were thus taught, by what they had seen, as well as by what they had heard, that while it shall go well with the righteous, it shall go ill with the wicked; for they shall reap of the fruit of their own doings.

Their preparation for receiving the law was farther carried on by the strict charge that was given them to sanctify themselves, and to wash their clothes, and to put away every thing that would render them ceremonially unclean. This was evidently intended to impress deeply upon their minds a conviction of their defilement by sin, which disqualified them for near intercourse with the holy Lord God, and to impress upon their minds a conviction of the necessity of their being washed in the blood of the Lamb, that precious blood that cleanseth from all sin. Thus they were taught, that the God of Israel was the God of holiness; that he is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; that he will be sanctified in all them that approach unto him; and that they ought never to venture to draw near unto him in any other way than that of his own appointment, lest they should be consumed in his anger. And let us never forget, that we are sinful and polluted dust and ashes, and that we cannot venture to approach unto God in our own name and righteousness. In all that we have to do with God, we must come only in that new and living way of God's own appointment, through the Lord Jesus Christ. We are to do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks unto the Father through him.

Much preparation for receiving the law was further carried on, by all those manifestations of God's power and glory that were made immediately before the law was proclaimed, that were fitted to make a very deep impression on the minds of the Israelites. There were thunders and lightnings, there were columns of smoke and a flame of fire, there was the shaking of Mount Sinai, there was the voice of the trumpet waxing louder and louder. All was fitted to solemnize their minds with an impression of God's presence, and to convince them of their utter weakness, and worthlessness, and insufficiency, when standing before the Sovereign Lord of the universe. They were thus deeply convinced, that with God there is terrible majesty, that our God is a consuming fire. They had before them a demonstration of God's irresistible power. They must have been thus convinced, that he had power to enforce the obedience of his law by the most tremendous sanctions; that he was able to kill and to make alive, to save and to destroy; and that they might rest assured, that he would not suffer his holy law to be trampled upon with impunity; that while his faithful servants would attain a glorious reward, a terrible vengeance was awaiting the transgressors of his law. And good will it be for us all to have abiding impressions upon our minds of God's absolute sovereignty, of his adorable majesty, of his unspotted holiness, that we may have the fear of God continually before our eyes, that we may stand in awe of God, and sin not.

The Israelites being in these ways prepared, and their minds solemnized with a consciousness of God's presence, the law was proclaimed in their hearing, proceding directly from the mouth of God, by a voice from the excellent glory, and it was afterwards written by the finger of God on two tables of stone. The law thus given was a summary of the moral law, containing ten precepts; referring, first, to our duty, as it immediately has God for its object; secondly, as it refers to the duties we owe to one another. This law was in substance the same with that law originally written on the heart of man, and it is binding on all, and of unchangeable obligation. We have cause of great thankfulness that this law has been recorded in the Scriptures, to be to us the rule of life. Herein God hath shewn us what is good, and what he requireth of us, and we may join with the Psalmist in saying respecting it, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. The fear of the Lord is clean enduring for ever: the judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honey-comb. Moreover, by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward." And we have still farther ground of thanksgiving, that when this law was defaced, and in a great measure obliterated in us by sin, we have a promise given us in the Gospel, that in receiving Christ the unspeakable gift of God, who is the end of the law for righteousness to all who believe, we shall have this law again written upon the fleshly tables of our hearts by the Spirit of God; so that having the law of God in our hearts, we may walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. "This is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least to the greatest; for I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

I would only add farther, in reference to the giving of the law, that we are especially called to consider what effect was produced upon the people of Israel, from the awful and impressive display of God's glory that was made to pass before them on that solemn occasion. The effect was, that they were filled with reverence, and awe, and terror; and they said to Moses, "speak thou to us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die." And God, it appears, was well pleased with this saying of the people, for it proceeded from a deep impression upon their minds of God's unspotted holiness, and of their own sinfulness, that made it unseizable for them to come into God's immediate presence. They were thus made sensible of their need of a Mediator to transact between God and them, and thus one end of the giving the law was answered, viz.: that it might be a schoolmaster to lead them to Christ. Accordingly, in close connection with the request of the people, that God would not speak to them any more directly by a voice out of the midst of the fire, Moses informed them that a Mediator would be sent to them. "The Lord thy God will raise up a Prophet of thy brethren, like unto me: unto Him ye shall hearken, according to all that thou desiredst of the Lord thy God in Horeb, in the day of the assembly, saying: Let me not hear again the voice of the Lord my God, neither let me see the great fire any more, that I die not. And the Lord said unto me, They have well spoken that which they have spoken. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee. And I will put my words into His mouth, and He shall speak all the words that I command Him.

And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall not hearken to my words, which He shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."

Now, if we have attained to any suitable conceptions of God's unspotted holiness, that He hath an infinite love to holiness, and an infinite hatred of sin; and that it is his irreversible determination, that in his righteous administration, sin shall by no means pass unpunished on the part of God; and if we are brought to deep convictions of our guilt, and degradation, and alienation from God in heart and life, on our part, then we must be convinced that there can be no direct communication between the holy God and his sinful creatures; then, like the Israelites, we shall be convinced of our need of a Mediator, through whom God may communicate his will to us, and through whom we may present our prayers and supplications to God. And how thankful should we be, that when under a consciousness of guilt, we tremble at the thought of approaching unto God, lest we should be consumed in his anger, and are disposed, like Job, to wish that there were a day's-man betwixt us, who could lay his hand upon us both, we have the assurance that God hath appointed his own dear Son to bring us the good tidings of great joy, that God is in Him reconciling the world to himself, not imputing to them their trespasses, and that through Him a new and living way is opened up for our coming unto God with acceptance, and being restored to his favour. Christ coming in the name of the Lord mighty to save, may now be considered as addressing us in the language of Elihu to Job: "Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead; I also am formed out of the clay. Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee." And, having this new and living way of access unto God through the Lord Jesus Christ, shall we not gladly avail ourselves of it? "Seeing that we have a Great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not a high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all things tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us, therefore, come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need."

LOVE OF COUNTRY.

By CHARLES MOIR, ESQ.

THE love of country, considered as a ruling passion in the human breast, may be ranked only second, if it can be said to be second, to the tie of kindred. It is a principle in our natural constitution, wisely planned by the Giver of all good for the wisest and best of purposes. Without it, man would be a roving animal, bound to no particular spot, having no affection for the land of his nativity, no chain to bind him, by one of the closest of all ties, to that soil which his fathers tilled, and with the dust of which their bones may, for generations, have mingled.

Ranked as a virtue, and one of no mean standard, love of country is of incalculable benefit, viewed both as to man's moral advancement, and in regard to his temporal comfort. Stimulated by its inspiring influence, he watches with jealous eye every attempt at innovation on his vested rights of possession. His property in the soil must not be disturbed by foreign interference, without a strong and last attempt to preserve it free and unfettered as when, by birth, he entered on its possession. The laws and institutions of his country, framed by the wisdom of his ancestors, and secured to him, it may be, by many a severe struggle against the inroads of despotism, and the no less dangerous attacks of reckless innovation, are regarded with those feelings of reverence due to things tried by the experience of centuries. His whole heart, by the closest ties of affinity, is bound to the land of his nativity. Old recollections of infancy's hours of innocence; boyhood's thoughtless days, and manhood's busier and maturer prime, with all their sweet or melancholy reminiscences, are each and all of them links in that mysterious chain that rivets the heart of man to the soil on which his first footsteps tottered.

No advantage of climate; no temptation afforded by the changeless serenity of cloudless skies, and the profusion of a rich and teeming soil, can atone to the home-sick emigrant for even a partial banishment from the land of his birth. The ice-bound shores of Greenland, where the year is but a long winter, are as dear to its hardy race as are to the effeminate Persian the luxuriant gardens of the East. And the wild and untutored Indian, "the stoic of the woods, the man without a tear," would he exchange his green savannahs, and his trackless woods, for the splendid city, with its crowded marts, where civilization, hand in hand with every temporal comfort, dwells?

The love of country is so universal, that men regard with the keenest sensations of pleasure any spot, although it be a desert, provided it is their own. The Ethiopian imagines that God framed his sands and deserts, while angels only were employed in forming the rest of the globe. The Arabian tribe of Ousadelin conceive that the sun, moon, and stars rise only for them. The Maltese, insulated on a rock, call their island "The Flower of the World;" and the Caribbees look on their country as a paradise, and imagine that they alone are entitled to be called men. Who does not remember the eloquent reply of the American Indian, when an European advised him to emigrate to another district, "What!" said he, "shall we say to the bones of our fathers, Arise, and follow us to a foreign country!" When separation is a work of necessity, distance only renders more dear to us the land of our birth. In the Narrative of a Private Soldier, I think of the 71st, the author relates, with much simple pathos, the effect produced by a casual incident, where the chord was struck, whose vibrations responded to home. During the stillness of a night-watch on the Pyrenees, a comrade, to while away the long hours, began to whistle in a melancholy key the national air of "Lochaber no more;" "when," he says, "a whole flood of recollections rushed across my mind, and such a sincere longing to see my native land succeeded, that I could only find relief in a copious flood of tears." But with how much greater effect does the "Rans-de-vache" operate on the heart of the exile Swiss! It is said that the mere singing of that simple air is, in many cases, fitted to produce such a longing for home, that if not soon gratified, the poor emigrant from his native mountains too often falls a victim to the "maladie-dupais." This interesting trait in their national character is finely introduced by Rogers in the following passage:

"The Intrepid Swiss that guards a foreign shore, Condemned to climb his mountain cliffs no more;
If chance he hears the song so sweetly wild,
Which on those cliffs his infant years beguiled,
Melts at the long lost scenes that round him rise,
And sinks a martyr to repentant sighs."

All the great men of this and of past ages have, in their lives and writings, borne evidence to the strong tie of love of country. The poetry of our age teems with passages of great beauty, illustrative of the strength of this all-prevailing passion. Every one is familiar with the spirit-stirring lines of Scott,

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,—
This is my own, my native land!"

where every sentiment is imbued with the true spirit of patriotism. Cowper, the sweet poet of the Taak, although he looked at all times with a keen eye on the follies of his countrymen, and was a stern foe to, and severe exposé of, their vices, thus breaks out in the second book of that admirable poem:—

"England, with all thy faults, I love thee still—
My country! and, while yet a nook is left,
Where English minds and manners may be found,
Shall be constrained to love thee. Though thy climate
Be fickle, and thy year most part deform'd
With dripping rains, or wither'd by a frost,
I would not yet exchange thy sulch skies,
And fields without a flower, for warmer France
With all her vines: nor for Ausonia's groves
Of golden fruitage, and her myrtle bowers."

Nor are her dear bought and much valued privileges, whatever these may be, left untouched. Leyden, in his delightful poem, "Scenes of Infancy," thus sings of his country:—

"Land of my fathers!—though no mangrove here
O'er thy blue stream her flexile branches rear,
Nor scaly palm her fingered acies shoot,
Nor luscious guava wave her yellow fruit,
Nor golden apples glimmer from the tree:
Land of dark heaths and mountains! thou art free."

"Dear native valleys! may you long retain
The chartered freedom of the mountain swain!
Long 'mid your sounding glades, in union sweet,
May rural innocence and beauty meet!
And still be duly heard, at twilight calm,
From every cot, the peasant's chaunted psalm!"

Patriotism, whether in the field or the senate; in the advancement of learning or of arts, by which the intellectual character of a country is raised; is with all men an over-ruling passion. Did these peaceful pages allow me, how many splendid deeds, that stud, like bright stars, the horizon of history, could I lay before my readers; striking instances of self-devotion scarcely surpassed in the annals of martyrdom. Even in our own days, living examples of the great sacrifices that good men will make for their country, are not wanting. But instead, let us turn to the pages of Scripture, and there we will find recorded many beautiful instances. We read in 1st Kings, how Hadad, yet a little child, was brought by his father into Egypt, while Joab the captain of the host had gone down with all Israel to cut off every male in Edom. And Hadad grew up, and found great favour in the sight of Pharaoh, who gave him to wife "the sister of his own wife;" yet after these marks of kingly favour, in the beautiful simplicity of Scripture it is told,—"When Hadad heard in Egypt that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab, the captain of the host, was dead, Hadad said to Pharaoh, Let me depart, that I may go to mine own country. Then Pharaoh said unto him, But what hast thou lacked with me, that behold, thou seekest to go to thine own country? And he answered, Nothing: howbeit let me go in any wise." Thus when all danger was past, the love of country once more kindled within him with redoubled force, and the home-sick Hadad longed to return to the land of his birth.

Nehemiah is a fine instance of that true patriotism that burns in the breast of every good man. When he was told of the misery of Jerusalem; that her walls were broken down, and the Jews left of the captivity in great affliction, his heart was stirred for the suffering of his brethren, and he prayed earnestly to the Lord, as he was the king's cup-bearer, that he would grant him favour in his sight. "And it came to pass, in the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that wine was before him; and I (Nehemiah) took up the wine, and gave it unto the king. Now I had not been before time sad in his presence. Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart. Then I was very sore afraid, and said unto the king, Let the king live for ever; why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my father's sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire? Then the king said unto me, For what doest thou make request? So I prayed to the God of heaven. And I said unto the king, If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favour in thy sight, that thou wouldst send me unto Judah, unto the city of my father's sepulchres, that I may build it."

And in the Prophet Jeremiah we find the following fine passage: "Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him; but weep sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country." Who can doubt, then, after such passages as these, that such an affection is planted in our nature for a wise and beneficent purpose? The heartless man of the world, whose grovelling desires rise not beyond the mere accumulation of worldly riches, may hold in contempt those finer constituted natures that assimilate love of country with love of kindred; whose native soil is dear to them, because it holds the graves of their fathers; whose streams are sacred, because in their waters they were wont to bathe their infant limbs; and whose old familiar trees are hallowed in their remembrance, because, in days of other years, their leafy screen has shaded them from many a scorching summer sun; still it is such men who in the annals of every nation are found chronicled as her brightest benefactors.

The Father of all implanted love of country in the hearts of his children, that by its inspiring influence every social blessing, as well as every better gift might not be wanting among them; that by following out its impulse, men might bestir themselves to found civil and sacred institutions, by which alone the wisdom of a people is known, and their happiness enlarged and established. For if love of country be not found in us, we will never be careful that her name should be revered, not alone for the extent of her mercantile resources, but for "that knowledge that exalteth a nation." Let us, then, be thankful for such a wise provision in our nature; for the kindness of Him who placed an affection within us, the true application of which, while it extends the blessings and increases the comforts of thousands, doubly repays him who exercises it, in the satisfaction he necessarily feels in doing a good action, and the reward that awaits him, when his career on earth is closed, from the hand of a kind Father, to whose throne, through the merits of the Redeemer, the savour of a good deed riseth not up in vain.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Meekness.—Meekness may be regarded, with respect both to God and our brethren. Towards God—it is the silent submission of the soul to his Word, the understanding bowed to every divine truth, and the will to every divine precept, and both without murmuring or disputing. It is the silent submission of the soul to the providence of God. When the events of Providence are grievous and afflictive, displeasing to sense, and crossing our secular interests; meekness doth not only quiet us under them, but reconciles us to them, and enables us not only to bear, but to receive evil as well as good at the hand of the Lord; which is the excellent frame that Job argues himself into, Job ii. 10. It is to kiss the rod, and even to accept of the punishment of our iniquity; taking all in good part that God doth; not daring to strive with our Maker; no, nor desiring to prescribe to him, but dumb, and not opening the mouth, because God doeth it. How meek was Aaron under the severe dispensation which took away his sons, with a particular mark of the divine displeasure. "He held his peace." Lev. x. 8. God was satisfied, and, therefore, Aaron was satisfied, and had not a word to say against it. Whatsoever pleaseth God, must not displease us. The language of meekness is that of Eli, "It is the Lord;" and of David, "Here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him." Not only he may do what he will, subscribing to his sovereignty, for he giveth not account of any of his matters. Or he can do what he will, subscribing to his power, for who can stay his hand? Or he will do what he will, subscribing to his unchangeableness, "for he is in one mind, and who can turn him?" But let him do what he will, subscribing to his wisdom and goodness, as Hezekiah, (Isaiah xxxix 8.) "Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken." Let him do what he will, for he will do what is best; and, therefore, if God would refer the matter to me, saith the meek and quiet soul, being well assured that he knows what is good for me, better than I do myself, I would refer it to him again, "He shall choose our inheritance for us." Psalm xlvii. 4. Where the methods of providence are dark and intricate, and we are quite at a loss what God is about to do with us, "His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters, and his footsteps are not known, clouds and darkness are round about him," a meek and quiet spirit acquiesceth in an assurance that all things shall work together for good to us, though we cannot apprehend how or which way. It teacheth us to follow God with an implicit faith as Abraham did, when he went out not knowing whither he went, but knowing very well whom he followed, (Heb. xi. 8,) and quieting us with this, that though what he doth we know not now, yet we shall know hereafter. When poor Job was brought to that dismal plunge, that he could no way trace the footsteps of divine providence, but was almost lost in the labyrinth, (Job xxiii. 8, 9.) how quietly doth he sit down (ver. 10,) with this thought: "But he knows the way that I take, when he hath tried me I shall come forth as gold."—MATTHEW HENRY.

Come quickly.—One sign of the spiritual life of the Christian, while on earth, is his looking for, and hastening unto, the coming of the day of God, (1 Pet. iii. 12,) when the Son of man shall be seen descending in the clouds of heaven. And all things whatever, he knows, are moving towards his revelation. Does he see the seasons revolving, the planets silently rolling forward in their orbits? He knows that every successive winter and summer, every new moon or returning Sabbath-day, onward bring the appointed time. Does he listen to the commotions rising among the nations of the earth, as to the rustling of the leaves of a mighty forest, agitated by the awakening gale, or to the distant roar of the battle-thunder, shaking almost the very ground on which he treads? He knows that all is but in truth the noise of the chariot wheels of Him, who has ascended his car of judgment and of victory, and is on his way earthwards, and who will thus, ere long, appear again. Approach does he now? He does approach. "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come." As when the lark springs from among the tall ryegrass, and with tremulous note flutters upward, until almost lost to human sight,—and another and another rise in quick succession with shrill sounding song,—till the air is filled with the music of the wing-borne choir; so one saint, in the midst of thy vales, O Britain! when he hears of the gladsome tidings of the Saviour's advent, with rising expectation and desire cries out, "Come quickly!" and another saint, in arid Hindostan, whose ears the good news have also reached, exclaims, under the influence of the same feelings, "Come quickly!" and another saint, in sea-girt Tabete, rejoins, "Come quickly!" and the saints of God everywhere, catching the inviting words, take them up and say, "Come quickly!" and the sleeping dust of saints, long since departed, sends forth from their resting-places the same importuning request, "Come quickly!" and the whole creation, groaning and travelling in pain, joins in the call, "Come quickly!" and lo! the universal prayer is heard, and the response is, "Behold! I do come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be."—SOSTHENES. (On Union with Christ and abiding in Him.)

SACRED POETRY.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE AND TRIUMPH.

Who would not be a Christian? Who but now
 Would share the Christian's triumph and his hope!
 His triumph is begun. 'Tis his to hail,
 Amid the chaos of a world convulsed,
 A new creation rising. Mid the gloom
 Which wraps the low concerns of states and kings,
 He marks the morning star; sees the far East
 Blush with the purple dawn: he hears a trump,
 Louder than all the clarions and the clang
 Of horrid war, swelling, and swelling still,
 In lengthening notes, its all-awakening call—
 The trump of jubilee. Are there not signs,
 Thunders and voices, in the troubled air?
 Do ye not see, upon the mountain tops,
 Beacon to beacon answering? Who can tell
 But all the harsh and dissonant sounds, which long
 Have been—are still—disquieting the earth,
 Are but the tuning of the varying parts
 For the grand chorus, which shall usher in
 The hastening triumph of the Prince of Peace!
 Yes; his shall be the kingdoms. He shall come,
 Ye scoffers at his tarrying! Hear ye not,
 E'en now, the thunder of his wheels! Awake,
 Thou slumbering world! E'en now the symphonies
 Of that blest song are floating through the air—
 Peace, peace on earth, and glory be to God!

SEPARATION OF FRIENDS.

FRIEND after friend departs;
 Who hath not lost a friend?
 There is no union here 'of hearts,
 That finds not here an end!
 Were this frail world our final rest,
 Living or dying none were blest.
 Beyond the flight of time,—
 Beyond the reign of death,—
 There surely is some blessed clime
 Where life is not a breath;
 Nor life's affections transient fire,
 Whose sparks fly upwards and expire.
 There is a world above
 Where parting is unknown;
 A long eternity of love,
 Form'd for the good alone:
 And faith beholds the dying here
 Translated to that glorious sphere!
 Thus star by star declines,
 Till all are past away:
 As morning high and higher shines
 To pure and perfect day:
 Nor sink those stars in empty night,
 But hide themselves in heaven's own light.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Unceasing Benevolence.—The following anecdote of the late Dr Walker, well known as the director of the London Jennerian and Vaccine Institutions, is extracted from the memoir of him, by his friend and successor, Dr Epps. "While our troops were using the weapons of destruction, Dr Walker was busily employed in saving life. His work of vaccination being completed, he attended the sick of the British navy, and of the Turkish army. The sense of weariness while engaged in these works of mercy, he seems hardly to have known; being assisted by his friend, general Sir John Doyle, in prosecuting these labours of goodness. The following extract of a letter from that worthy officer speaks volumes. "The general can never forget the impression made upon him by the extraordinary situation in which he first made an acquaintance with that amiable and benevolent individual, Dr Walker. The day after the action, near Alexandria, where the brave Abercrombie fell, the general was riding over the field of battle, attended by two orderly dragoons, to see if there were any wounded, French or English, who had escaped notice the evening before; when, on turning round a wall near the sea-side, he was struck with an appalling sight of more than a hundred French soldiers, with their officers, huddled together, desperately wounded by grape and cannon shot from an English brig of war. From being collected in the recess of the wall, they had escaped notice on the previous day of search, and were exposed to the night air, and with undressed wounds. Here the general saw a man, evidently English, in the garb of a quaker, actively employed in the heavenly task of giving his humane assistance to those poor brave sufferers; giving water to some, dressing the wounds of others, and affording consolation to all. Upon inquiry, he found the benevolent individual to be Dr John Walker, who was himself almost exhausted, having been thus nobly employed from day-break, without any assistance."

Beautiful exposition by a Greenlander.—The correct scriptural information possessed by the converted heathen is truly delightful. From many beautiful specimens of the views given us of the pious Greenlander, we select the following:—Daniel, with some other of his countrymen, being present when one of the European brethren had cast a pewter spoon, remarked upon the process of polishing, "Now I can well conceive how our Saviour acts in the circumcision of our hearts, and how he proceeds even to the end, with our purification, when we surrender our hearts to him. He must first cut away all the coarse stuff that is good for nought; and yet he afterwards finds much still to rub off. This causes him much trouble, and us pain too. But behold, just as the brother pours on the burnishing water, to do it the easier, and to make the spoon the smoother and brighter, so our Saviour sprinkles us with his own blood, makes our purification agreeable, and never leaves us till we are pleasant in his sight."

Rev. John Newton.—The late Rev. John Newton used to improve every occurrence which he could with propriety introduce into the pulpit. One night he found a bill put up at St Mary, Woolnoth's, upon which he largely commented in his sermon. The bill was to this effect:—"A young man, having come to the possession of a very considerable fortune, desires the prayers of the congregation, that he may be preserved from the snares to which it exposes him." "Now, if the man," said Mr N., "had lost a fortune, the world would not have wondered to see him put up a bill; but this man has been better taught."

THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

PART II.

BY THE REV. W. B. NIVISON,

in Amsterdam.*

IN pursuing our remarks on the agony in the garden, a second circumstance deserving of our attention, is the singular behaviour of our Lord on this interesting occasion. He prayed, as we have seen, three times to his Father, that the cup of suffering might pass from him, if it were consistent with the divine will. Our great High Priest was fully apprised of the nature and extent of his future sufferings, before he undertook the work of our redemption; and as his mission was entirely voluntary, we are not so to understand this prayer, as if it were expressive of a reluctance on his part, to finish the benevolent undertaking on which he had so graciously entered. The vicarious mediation of the Saviour was dictated by his own gracious will, and executed by his own free agency. A forced death could neither have made any addition to his glory, nor brought any advantage to us. But how, let me ask, could his sacrifice have been other than voluntary? It was evidently impossible for any force, however great, to wrest life from Him, whose power was omnipotent; and the expiatory efficacy of his sufferings and death must have been weakened or destroyed, if he had been ordained to suffer and to die against his will. But on so important a point we are not left to the guidance of our own reasoning, however certain and conclusive it may appear; for, in his beautiful parable of the "Faithful Shepherd," our Lord describes the voluntary nature of his passion in the clearest and simplest language: "I am the Good Shepherd," he observes, "and know my sheep, and am known of mine. As the Father knoweth me, even so I know the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep. Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again."

VOL. II.

The anxiety or earnestness expressed in his prayers about the removal of his sufferings cannot, therefore, be supposed to arise from any unwillingness felt by him to continue the work of propitiation; for all its difficulties—in all their extent, and in all their duration—were clearly foreseen and cheerfully undertaken. Nor can it be wholly or even chiefly ascribed to the weakness or fears of humanity, for it was supported, as we have seen, by the union of the divine nature and the extraordinary presence of an angel. His manhood, indeed, may easily be believed to have been ready to yield, for his mental pain, if not marked by a difference of kind, was, beyond all question, much greater in degree, than any to which mere humanity can ever be subject. But, nevertheless, the trembling fear or anxious restlessness arising from the "infirmity of the flesh," was not, and could not be, the prevailing cause of the urgent and affecting manner, in which he repeated the same request three times to his Father. We can neither feel nor explain the peculiar suitability or propriety of our Lord's prayer on this remarkable occasion, if we do not keep steadily in our view the double or two-fold nature of the work of our redemption. The Redeemer descended into this world to purchase salvation for our fallen race; and this divine plan of benevolence he could not have executed without magnifying and making honourable the law, whose precepts we had dared to violate, and whose penalties we were bound to endure. When we peruse the scriptural accounts of his unparalleled sufferings in the garden and on the cross, we are inclined rather to yield to the tenderness of compassion, than to bear in mind, that while he is removing the curse of the law, he is, at the same time, subjecting himself to its authority, and working out for us that perfect righteousness without which we cannot be justified. The love of the Supreme Being, we all know, is the most important part of the moral law: it has been styled the first and great commandment; and this fundamental principle includes, as its most essential requisites, obedience to the divine precepts, and submission to the divine decrees. In every day of his life upon the earth, whether in prosperity or in adversity, whether in joy or in grief, our "elder Brother" ever expressed a profound respect for the majesty of heaven, and ever displayed that devout and virtuous resignation which would distinguish a creature possessed of our nature in a condition of perfect innocence. He acquiesced, with the most patient cheerfulness, in all the trials of our Mediator; and though, as God, he could clearly foresee and easily overcome them all, yet, as man, he felt it to be his duty, if not to decline, at least not to court them; and to pray either that they might be taken away from him, or that he might bear them with fortitude. If he had not prayed to his Father, during his agony in the garden, or during his passion on the cross, he would have failed in one of the duties of piety; and if he had not expressed, in his prayers, a wish, nay, a strong wish, for his sufferings to be alleviated or removed, he might have displayed, indeed, the greatness of the Deity, but he would have risen, at the same time, above the littleness of humanity. He might have shone in the infinite excellence of a God, but he would have failed in exemplifying the finite excellence of a man. His conduct, however, was perfect in itself, and suitable to his nature. While he manifested his divine power by the capacity of his endurance, he proved his human obedience by the character of his resignation. Hence, in the beginning of his agony in the garden, he poured forth his feelings in the pathetic words of human anxiety, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me;" and hence, too, at the ninth hour, when he was still hanging on the cross, he cried out, in the broken accents of human despair, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The last circumstance, of which it may be necessary to take a more special notice, is the conduct of the three apostles on this memorable occasion, as it is impartially described by the three first evangelists. If Peter, James, and John, had walked along with Jesus to the Mount of Olives, with the feelings of an ordinary day, we should have expected them to attend, with the most devout interest, to all the words and actions of a being whom they were accustomed to revere and obey. When they were invited by him to come down from the Mount, the fact of their being again selected from the twelve could hardly fail to suggest to their remembrance the august scene of the transfiguration, and prepare them for expecting the recurrence of some great and interesting event. With such a prospect before them, it was natural for them to be cheerful in spirit and animated with hope. But, alas! their condition at those two periods was widely different. At the time of the transfiguration their minds were enlivened with joy, but now they were depressed with sorrow. This saddening change was mainly produced by the altered behaviour of our Lord himself. For some time previous to his agony, he had been making some obscure allusions to the decease which he would accomplish at Jerusalem. With compassionate tenderness he had begun gently to insinuate to them that it was expedient for him to go away and leave them. He allowed them, for some time, to meditate in secret on what he had thus darkly hinted to them. And when they were gradually prepared for hearing the whole truth, he told them, more plainly, that he was destined to suffer many indignities, and, at last, to undergo a violent death.

The impression produced by such discoveries partook of the mixed nature of grief and fear. They could not bear the idea of losing a friend, whose omnipotent power was the safe-guard of their life,—whose directing wisdom was the security of their virtue, and whose tender benevolence was the foundation of their happiness. They had left all and followed him; and if he should leave them alone and unprotected, they must expect to find the world a wilderness, and its inhabitants their enemies. At the supper of the passover these gloomy ideas were not worn away from their minds by the festivities of the Jewish holiday; on the contrary they were more deeply imprinted on them by the institution of a more solemn and significant service. The symbols of the Christian sacrament, which was then appointed, gave a present and a living form to the future events on the Mount of Calvary, and dissipated every remaining doubt, with respect to the truth of his mournful predictions. The prophecy, too, that "one of them would betray him, another deny him, and all forsake him," inspired so many various sentiments of shame, surprise, and unbelief, as helped to deepen their grief and heighten their alarm. On all these accounts we need not wonder that when they accompanied their Master to the garden of Gethsemane, all nature appeared to them to be veiled in a robe of the deepest mourning. The darkness or gloom that brooded only over their own souls, was made by the power of association to spread itself over every near and every distant object, and to eclipse the beauty of one of the fairest landscapes of the material universe. But while they were thus wearied and disturbed by distresses both ideal and real, sleep, the guardian of health and the softener of care, came to their relief. They soon forgot their Master and themselves in its sweet and unconscious slumbers. They saw not all the dropping blood of his agony. They heard not all the sad accents of his prayers. They felt not with him through the whole depth of his sorrows. But, surely, when we reflect upon their fatigue and wretchedness, we may look upon their sleeping forms with an eye of pity, and go along with our Saviour in the considerate apology which he made for their seeming unkindness, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."

I shall conclude the whole of this interesting discussion with a few reflections naturally arising from the subject.

How inconceivably bitter, how dreadfully intense must have been our Lord's spiritual conflict in the garden of Gethsemane! Surely none but a divine person could have entered the wine-press of the Father's wrath, and borne up under the pressure of such unutterable woe. Surely nothing less than a love that was infinite could have prompted a Being, infinitely exalted in rank, and absolutely perfect in character, to pass through a fiery trial, so indescribably severe, and for the sake of creatures so low and worthless. Oh! let us never forget the awful scene of the Redeemer's agony. Let it often engage all the attention of our reason; let it often awaken all the tenderness of our heart. And let us not only contemplate it with interest and compassion, but with reverence and fear. When we reflect upon the greatness of that misery which not only the body, but the soul, is capable of enduring, which every sinner who continues finally impenitent must endure, and which would have been our certain inevitable portion if our great Surety had not endured it in our room, let us be impressed with a strong and lively belief of the odious nature and mischievous operation of sin; and let us manifest our deeply grateful sense of all that the Redeemer has done and suffered for us, by hating and avoiding it in all its degrees, and under all its forms. Let us watch and pray without ceasing, lest, in an unguarded moment, we fall into temptation, and dishonour our Christian name by some sinful compliance or by immoral conduct. In an especial manner let us beware of slumbering on in a course of vicious indulgence, and deluding our souls with unwarranted hopes of the divine mercy; for it clearly appears, from the striking and impressive event of our Lord's agony, that the divine justice will compel the strict fulfilment of every tittle of the law, both in its letter and in its spirit, both in its precepts and in its sanctions. Happy are they who derive instruction from the warning lessons of Scripture, and are taught by them to forsake every unrighteous practice, to implore the renewing influence of the Holy Spirit, and to aim, with unceasing diligence, after the moral perfection of the Christian character.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF GERHARD TERSTEEGEN.

GERHARD TERSTEEGEN was born on the 25th November, 1697, in the chief town of the principality of Moers. He was the youngest of eight children, and his father having died shortly after his birth, the whole care and responsibility of his education devolved upon his mother. In early life he made rapid progress in his studies, particularly in the acquisition of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages; but as the circumstances of the family could not admit of his entering upon a learned profession, he was bound apprentice, in his fifteenth year, to his brother-in-law, a merchant in Mülheim, on the Rhur. It was in the course of his apprenticeship that Gerhard's mind was first impressed with the importance of religion, and chiefly, it is supposed, from the intimate intercourse which he enjoyed with a pious tradesman, who lost no opportunity of turning his thoughts to the vital truths of Christianity. A sudden illness, too, with which he was seized, had a powerful effect in leading him to think of the necessity of "seeking the Lord while he was yet to be found;" and the kindness of the Almighty in again restoring him to health impressed him with the obligation under which he lay to live to the glory of that God who had so graciously prolonged his days.

The bustle and engrossing occupations of a mercantile life Gerhard felt to be a great obstruction to his spiritual progress, and at the close of his apprenticeship he resolved to make choice of a more retired employment. For a short time he tried the occupation of a weaver, but finding that the trade was injurious to his delicate constitution, he subsequently chose the art of ribbon making. In the pursuit of this humble calling the good man spent a great part of his life at Mülheim. He was poor, often distressingly poor, but still he denied himself, that he might contribute to those around him who were in still poorer circumstances than he was. His apparel was coarse, his food was scanty. In the first years of his seclusion he took only one meal a day. Such abstemiousness was highly culpable, but when we think of the laudable motives by which the poor man was actuated, we cannot fail to acknowledge that, in this respect,

"Even his failings leaned to virtue's side."

In the dusk of the evening, when the labours of the day had come to a close, honest Gerhard might be seen wending his way to the house of some poor sick neighbour, and with the kindly feeling and tender sympathy of a Christian friend and brother, administering to his relief a portion of his earnings. So far, indeed, did he go in his liberality to the poor, that on the division of his father's property the legatees apportioned him a house to prevent him from giving all away. The restraint, however, proved ineffectual, for having received the value of the property, in instalments, from his brother, he distributed a great portion of it likewise to the poor. This only incensed his relatives the more against him, and led them to decry him as a man of weak and deranged intellect. There can be little doubt that his generosity was, in many cases, far from being tempered by prudence, so that he was often reduced to a state of painful destitution. In such cases he felt the utmost confidence in the goodness of the Almighty. Nor was he disappointed. Not only were his wants supplied, but a spirit of peace and contentment reigned in his bosom. It pleased the Lord, however, to withdraw from him for a time the light of his gracious countenance. And when God hid his face, poor Tersteegen was troubled. A season of spiritual darkness and perplexity ensued, which continued for the long period of five years. The cloud, at length, disappeared, and the day-spring from on high again visited him.

For a number of years, Tersteegen had led the life of a recluse. He had spent his time in solitude, plying his humble trade, unnoticed and unknown. Now, however, in 1725, he was prevailed upon to receive into his lodgings a young man of the name of Sommer, who was desirous of being taught the art of ribbon making. In the society of this amiable and excellent companion, he laid aside much of that austerity in his mode of living which had exposed him, not perhaps without some reason, to ridicule and reproach. He and his young associate lived together in the utmost harmony for three years, active in the duties of their calling, and spending two hours at least every day in private prayer. Thus sanctified by frequent communion with God, the labour of these two pious tradesmen was blessed, and with worldly prosperity was combined high spiritual enjoyment. It is when religion thus enters into, and mingles with, the every-day business of life, that her hallowed influences are most certainly and most substantially enjoyed.

The unsocial spirit which Tersteegen had so long manifested, now gradually disappeared, and he felt it to be his duty to take a lively interest in the promotion of religion in Mülheim and its neighbourhood. To this he was the more effectually roused in consequence of a general awakening which took place in the town. Many were led to inquire earnestly what they should do to be saved. Prayer meetings were formed in different districts, and the utmost activity was manifested by all classes on the subject of religion. On this occasion, Tersteegen exerted himself to the utmost. He attended the prayer meetings, and addressed those present at them with peculiar energy and unction. Numbers applied to him personally, as well as by letter, for advice in regard to the concerns of their souls.

Thus busily engaged in a manner so congenial to his now subdued and sanctified spirit, he found it necessary to relinquish his trade. Unwilling to entangle himself with the cares and concerns of the world, he had hitherto refused many generous offers which had been made to him. A merchant once called upon him, and expressing his high regard for him, offered him an annuity for life; a pious lady, who had never seen him, appointed him, in her will, executor to her property, amounting to forty thousand florins, on condition that he would take from it whatever he needed; a Dutch gentleman offered him a bond for ten thousand florins, and begged his acceptance of it with tears. All these, and other similar offers he declined, determined to support himself by the labour of his own hands. At that period of Tersteegen's history, however, at which we have now arrived, he had become, from bodily weakness, incapable of manual labour, and was compelled, therefore, to avail himself of the kindness and generosity of his friends.

Finding himself now released from his laborious trade, Tersteegen spent much of his time in the translation and the composition of several valuable works, which soon spread his fame over various parts of Europe. Christians resorted to him from all quarters for advice and direction; and, from this circumstance, his house received the name of the Pilgrim's Cottage, which it bears to this day. Wherever he went, the people flocked in crowds to hear from his lips the glad tidings of salvation through a crucified Redeemer.

About the year 1756, when Tersteegen's popularity was at its height, his health began to yield, in consequence of the sustained exertions which were required of him, and he was under the necessity of discontinuing public labours for a time. After a short interval, however, he so far recovered as to resume, partially at least, his exertions in the cause of his Lord and Master. But throughout the rest of his life he was never entirely free from ailments of one kind or another. These proved a salutary trial of the good man's faith and patience, and served more completely to wean him from this vain and fleeting scene.

At length the hour of his departure approached, and he died as he had lived, a triumphant follower of Jesus. The account of his latter days is thus given by Mr Jackson, to whose interesting narrative of his life and character we are indebted for the materials of the present brief sketch:

"His last illness appears to have been a kind of dropsy, which showed itself towards the end of March, 1769, and occasioned him much pain and shortness of breath. On the 30th of March, he was outwardly very weak, but inwardly overflowing with love, and resigned to the will and good pleasure of God. On the 31st, at one, P. M., he had a severe attack, which brought on convulsions in the limbs. From this time, he appeared to die gradually. He passed the following night, in an easy chair, in great pain, particularly on account of his shortness of breath; yet, when some of his dear friends, perceiving the indications of his approaching end, took leave of him for eternity, he spoke to each of them, according to their peculiar circumstances, in a manner so edifying, affecting, and consoling, that all were deeply moved, even to tears. He himself remained inwardly firm, and entirely resigned to God, and his most holy will. Amongst these friends and acquaintances, was also the Rev. Mr E****, who requested of the dying saint a blessing, upon which, he smilingly lifted up his hands, and said, 'Jesus Christ, our Great High Priest, who sitteth at the right hand of his heavenly Father, lift up his hands from his sanctuary, and bless you with love and peace in your heart, and give you grace and wisdom in your ministry!' The preacher shortly afterwards followed Tersteegen into the eternal world. To another individual, who took leave of him, he said, 'O sister, the way is a good way; follow the Lamb with cheerfulness, whithersoever he leadeth you.' And to a third he spoke as follows:—'I commend you through grace, to the love of Jesus! Let the present moment likewise serve to induce you to surrender yourself entirely to our dearest Saviour, and to entreat grace from him, like the woman of Cana. This grace must be solicited, without regard to temporal things, which are of less value than is generally supposed; and what a happiness will it be for us, when obliged to part with them, to have a gracious God in Christ!' He spoke in this manner, to all who were present, with much energy, affection, and divine unction.

"From the 1st to the 3d of April, he was obliged, on account of his asthma, to sit forty-seven hours together, in his arm chair, sometimes leaning backwards for a few minutes on the chair, and then again forwards, on a cushion, which lay on the table. He passed these forty-seven hours in great agony, yet was never heard to complain, except after having slept a few minutes, and waking again, he generally said, 'O God! O Jesus! O sweet Jesus!'

"In all his extremely painful sufferings, there was not even the smallest expression of impatience visible on his countenance. This extraordinary patience and entire resignation to the divine will and pleasure, was most consoling to the bystanders, as also his filial confidence in God, whose will it was thus to perfect him through sufferings, and assimilate him with the Captain of his salvation. Without this consolation, it would have been impossible for them, as they themselves affirm, to have borne the sight of such acute sufferings, in one they so much loved. Towards noon, on the 21st of April, it was evident his dissolution was approaching; the fits of sleep became more powerful, and his wakings shorter. It was necessary to remind him constantly of what he had to take. At six and seven, he slept almost continually, and at nine, it was nearly impossible to awake him, to take what had been prescribed for him. His sleep became more and more profound, and at midnight he could be awakened no more. Thus he continued to sleep till two in the morning, when he breathed out his soul into the arms of his God and Saviour, on the 3d of April, 1789."

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." And when, as is often the case, a life of extensive usefulness terminates in a death of happiness and peace, it reminds us of the glorious orb of day, when, after having risen as a strong man to run his race, and shed a flood of brilliancy and glory over the whole face of nature, he sinks in the western sky with a calmness and gentle stillness at once beautiful and sublime.

SKETCHES OF THE PARISH.

By THE PASTOR OF THE PARISH OF E—K.

No. III. PART II.

[From an Address delivered on the beginning of January 1833.]

"This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you."—Exodus xii. 2.—"One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh."—LUCAS. i. 4.

1. One generation passeth away.

OUT of eighty families consisting of five hundred and ten souls, seven have been discharged from the warfare of human life. One, if he might be counted of our number, just breathed and died and was carried to the grave. A child, whose life and few suffering days resembled a glimmering taper rising and sinking in the socket, and raising and sinking the hopes of his parents, was called away by death after three months daily expectation of its approach—his days were few! but were not these few days numbered?

The next of our number was most unexpectedly hurried to the bar of judgment. At night he retired to rest nearly in his usual health; but the sober grey light of the Sabbath morn, when it crept through his dull dim window, found him a corpse. He had been poor and lonely, but independent! and at death he had none, neither needed he one, to sit by his bed to observe the last struggles of departing nature. He had advanced far in human life—but of his Christian life we knew but little. We would in charity hope, however, that as his Bible was found open on the morning after his death, and near his bed, that he was not a stranger to that blessed book, or at the throne of prayer; though we must say, if we were required to speak the whole truth, that he was a stranger here... The father of a family who had long lingered on the bed of affliction was next called upon to lay down the weapons of his warfare. Oh! I remember some of the happy moments I have had at that bedside! and some of the comfortable words uttered by the lips of the dying man as he lay on it; and some of the prayers he presented for us who stately meet together in this little sanctuary! Yes! He prayed that our labours in the Lord might be blessed abundantly,—that on the last day—that great day of reckoning, we might all meet together at the right hand of our Judge; and that we might all hear together his approving sentence pronounced over us,—“well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord.”

The next was an aged female worn out with infirmity and frailty, who seemed to be dying, and to die daily for many months. The whole scene of her affliction rises with her to my memory as a picture of patience, submission, and resignation; and her words, borrowed from the patriarch, as she used often to express them in my hearing, still linger in my ear; “all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.”

The last among us who paid the last debt of nature was an aged Christian. He was not of us as a Church, but he appeared to be for us as a sincere follower of our Redeemer and common Lord. The recollection of him rises to my mind with affectionate regret, and his labours of love in the Christian cause will not soon be forgotten. Thus one generation passeth away...but,

2. Another generation cometh.

In the course of the same bygone year four families have been united to us and to one another by the tie of marriage. Our prayer to our God for them is, that he who has made them one in family and one in interest, may make and continue them one in heart and one in Christ.

Ten infants have also during the past year been born among us, and entered with us into the Church of our Redeemer; and one-half of that number still breathe the same breath of air with us, but have not yet been dedicated to God in baptism: our sincere and fervent prayer for these infants is, “that they may be of those little children of whom is the kingdom of heaven.” Thus you see how, among us, in the short span of a year, “one generation passeth away and another generation cometh”..... There are still among us a few of the direct descendants of an old generation whose portraits have been sketched and given to the world. These portraits ye yourselves acknowledge to have been taken faithfully,—and taken by one whose memory you revere,—whose writings you hold next to your Bible, and whose memoirs form one of the principal books of your little domestic library. This has induced us to look and to try whether there may be still found any similarity between the parents and their offspring, and to say, in brevity, wherein the similarity consists. Now after an observation and experience of several years among you, we are prepared to affirm both to your “praise and blame,” that you shew yourselves to be the children of your fathers,—“for the works of your fathers ye do.” On some of the very same spots mentioned nearly a hundred years back you will find the very same kind of people—with the very same dispositions and tempers—with the very same notions and opinions—engaged in nearly the same kind of works and workings, with those of the old generation who have long since “rested from their labours and their works have followed them.” But of the few who still survive there is but little promise of long continuance! and some of the aged of the same few who have no children to leave behind them, are looking back into the bygone years with a kind of melancholy regret, and saying, “Our fathers where are they?” Oh, when a few years have come,—we shall go the way whence we shall not return; for the “preacher” hath spoken this truth to our melancholy experience: “One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever.”

Now, should a stranger ask of us how your life is kept awake amid your drowsy solitudes where the peace, and the calm, and the monotony of things seem only to court you to sink into slumber, we would answer for you that you have your incitements—your excitements—and your devotional soothings, with a thousand little personal, family, and popular incidents blending with your worldly occupation, which serve not only to keep your life awake, but to rouse its energies and to keep you ever vigorously active. A few of these incidents we shall do little more than point at.

1. Incitement.—The day of the examination of the youth in this place is now beginning to be looked forward to by many of you as to the day of an annually returning “treat.” We have been pleased with your looks of veneration, softened, yet animated with parental affection, when, collected together, we have listened to your children reading the Bible under the direction of their able, diligent, and faithful teacher, and have marked the simple and affectionate manner in which they are led by him into an accurate knowledge of its sacred contents. We have been much gratified, too, to see, even sometimes, something like the look of emulation among the parents, as well as among the children, when the stores of useful knowledge were in the act of drawing off in the exciting form of catechetical trial. We have been both amused and delighted with the excursions of the little travellers on the map; with their knowledge of the world in general, and with the history of their own country in particular. We have been most agreeably surprised, too, to hear them sometimes express their knowledge of the metals and minerals which lie dark and deep in the earth's cold bosom; and of the vegetable, animal, and rational kingdoms which have their life and sway on its more kindly surface. But we have observed that their computations, by numbers, quick as thought, have caused some of you, as by involuntary motion, to start to your feet and to say, "it was not so in the days of our fathers:" we are told there was a time in their history when there were only three Bibles to be seen in the house of God, and the sacred contents of the blessed book few of them could spell so as to take up its all-important meaning; "but one generation passeth away and another generation cometh."

You are then, my Christian friends, a highly favoured people. You have had the Old and New Testaments in your possession all your days. You have been taught to read them from your early years. "And thus saith the Lord, thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." "Train up your child then in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it." And, "children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right." "Honour thy father and thy mother: it is the first commandment with promise."

2. Excitement.—When you have cast a stone into the centre of the calm unruffled pool you have seen a circle form, and enlarge, and enlarge, till it reached the brink—the grassy brink on which you had your footing. Within the circumference of such a circle you may see some of the agitations and fleeting movements of the by-past year, for even these agitations and movements have had some of their references to you. Yes! the year past has been eventful, and it will be long remembered in the annals of our country. The pestilence entered with it into our land; and mourning and lamentations were mingled with the first greetings and joy of the season. But, blessed be our God, his own word was made our confidence, and we humbly trust, that while it is expressive of our past experience, it speaks still the living language of the present gratitude of our heart: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor the destruction that wasteth at noon-day. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold..... Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the most High, thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." Psalm xci. 1-10. You have seen the outmost rim of the circle, before its setting again into the smooth of the unruffled pool, raising sometimes a little muddly turbulence in the shallow at the extreme edge of the water; and in this you have seen, and may see indeed, with the eyes of your observation and reflection, all the little excitements you have had within the circle of the last twelve months, with their effects, their subsiding, and their preparations for a calm. There have been changes in states and kingdoms, as well as among individuals. We mention not this, my friends, to excite any new emotion, or to call up any old one, or even to ruffle in the least the calm of the mind, occupied in the peaceful exercise of devotion; but we do so for the purpose of rousing, as by a watch-cry, the attention which seems to begin to be drowsy, till we say, that the kingdom about which we discourse is the kingdom of heaven; and that its interests and yours, as connected with it, shall ever be the theme of our discourses and the ultimate end for which we labour,—convinced as we are, in our own mind, that the faithful subjects of the kingdom of God, on earth, will be the best, the very best subjects of every, and of all of the kingdoms of this world. Let us only further mention, and press on you here: that you are pledged to the Prince of Peace,—that you have vowed to be faithful to the Captain of your salvation; that you have declared before God, and men, and the elect angels, that you are for him and not for another; that you will follow him through good and through bad report cheerfully, constantly, and continually; and that while you are most willing to be subject and obedient to all his laws, you imitate him in all his imitable perfections; for "he has left us an example that we should follow his steps." 1 Peter ii. 21.

3. Devotion.—While you have had your gentle excitements, and your stronger excitements, you have also had your times, your places, and your occasions of sincere, peaceful, and devotional soothing. Every evening and morning, we fondly hope, bears witness to this, in the private offering of many of you—oh, that we could say of all of you, in the holy exercises of reading, meditation, and prayer. The habitations of a few—oh, that we could say of all of you, seem consecrated as places of worship to our God; for we have frequently, while passing in the evening, heard the song of praise, and we have sometimes retarded our steps to listen for a moment to the low, solemn tones of the father's prayer. And, we earnestly hope, that the holy day is experienced to be, and spent by you throughout, "as the Sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings." The house of the Lord is, on that day, thrown open to you, and you sing, or may sing, in heart as you enter, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates: and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." The house of the Lord! and how different this house from that in which your fathers worshipped! of this you may say, in the pious language of a devoted worshipper, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" while of that your fathers complained, "that by much slothfulness, the building decayed; and that, through idleness of the hands, the house dropped through." The ordinances of religion are now dispensed to you. Oh, how different these days from those in which your fathers lived! when for four long years the voice of no spiritual watchman was lifted up in this place, and when those very fathers solicited again and again every proprietor of the soil "to do his utmost," that they might be supplied with the bread of life, and have it dispensed to them by "a stated Gospel minister."† You have the Word of God in your hands, and you have been taught to read it from your early years, and each of you now brings it up with him, "in its neat and elegant binding," as a faithful companion and guardian, into the courts of the house of his God. Oh, how different from the times of your fathers, when there were to be seen only three Bibles within this holy place! one, from which the minister of the Word took the text of the day; another, the property of an individual known, I believe, still to some of you by the words of his name; but the third belonged to one whose name and place of residence are now both alike unknown! "But one generation passeth away and another generation cometh." We may now, without interruption, worship God according to our conscience, without any to make us afraid. "The silver trumpet of the Gospel is sounded among our green hills," and one of the loudest and clearest notes we (with heart and soul) wish it to sound is, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price." "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." The day of the celebration of our New Testament passover shines on us, in particular, as one of the days most like that which shall rise on the redeemed, a day wholly without clouds. "Do this in remembrance of me." "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." "I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments."

* The complaint of the minister is, "that it was with the greatest difficulty he could obtaine heather, thorn, and disto to keep the kirk and manse in repairs."—Parish Record.

There is a principle which we might, perhaps, have spoken of as "the first" for being a stimulant to many of your energies, viz., "the principle of curiosity," but we shall now take it "the last," and, with a few remarks from its suggestions on the present occasion, we shall draw the subject of this address to a close.

1. What are the appearances now among us as a highly favoured people, and what hopes may we entertain of ourselves, in general, from such appearances? "The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." We wish and pray, however, my friends, and therefore we fondly hope and trust, from external appearances in general, that a good work may be carrying on in and among us. Nearly one hundred and fifty communicants, at our last sacred solemnity, sat down at the table of their Lord, being one-fourth more than the number that joined with us here but a few years back, and this we would take as a favourable token that "you have joined yourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." You have heard of the spiritual wants and the spiritual desires of an old generation in this place; you have also heard of the many good days of the Gospel which once shone on their posterity—your fathers; and you have often listened, with surprise and admiration, to the accounts given of, and about, the numbers that once met here "for the breaking of bread and prayer." Let these, all these remembrances excite you more and more to works of holiness and labours of love; and, in the words of scriptural caution, "Remember how you have received and heard; and hold fast and repent."

2. But what is to be said to "the some of us" who seem to be solely under the power and guidance of this "volatile principle,"—of those who are excited and taken up with every thing but the "one thing needful," and of those who, "Nabal-like," have no holy desires, but have hearts without life, and cold as a stone? There are a few of you whose face we seldom see in this place. On the Sacramental Sabbath

* In July 1710, when the Sacrament of the Supper was dispensed here, the number of communicants was fifty-seven, and when dispensed in June 1731, the number was seven hundred and seventy-seven!

some of you occasionally present yourselves among the children of God. Now, is it genuine religion, or "va-grant curiosity" that brings you up on that day? On an occasion like the present, some of you come, too, among the people of the Lord; and as we see some of you now in our assembly, we would, in the most tender sympathy for your immortal souls, ask you, what is it that has brought you up hither this day? It is to hear the word of truth. Hear it then—hear it all ye who are far from righteousness—nay, read it with us in the solemn charge and important message of the holy prophet, "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul." "How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and scorners delight in scorning, and fools hate knowledge? Turn you at my reproof," saith divine wisdom; "and behold, I will pour out my Spirit upon you, I will make known my words unto you." But if you have no pleasure in the holy exercises of devotion in God's house, among God's children, on God's day, could you have any happiness, think you, in "that house of many mansions, eternal in the heavens?" There are a few who seem to be excited with everything, but have little settled solidity about "the one thing needful." Now, to you we would say, in the words of inspired admonition, "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." There are some—O! let every one of us fear lest he be of the number—there are some who are cold-hearted, and who live carelessly; you may live thoughtless, but thoughtless you cannot die. We entreat you, then, by Him who died for us, by Him who, at this moment, stands amongst us, who sees how every word is received, and marks the moving of every heart. "He that hath ears to hear let him hear," he that hath a heart to feel let him feel, and ye that have words to make answer, reply now to the question we put, "How shall ye—how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" You may tell us, indeed, that you do not intend to neglect this salvation, but that you only for a time delay the acceptance of it. We may tell you then, in our turn, that "now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." If ye do not make the now (God's time) your time, he may say to you in these irreversible words, "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish come upon you: Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me." O let us all only farther think of the shortness of our time, and of the uncertainty of our days for the all-important work of eternity! We are here to-day and away to-morrow. In a short time the place that now knows us, shall know us no more for ever. Had we a set time with death, how few, to look back, would the dark, past years appear, though the greatest number that ever summed the life of man, when the hour appointed approached! But this is not the case. The command is, to-day—"to-day if ye will hear my voice, harden not your hearts." Where is to-morrow? It is not promised. Where are the years past? Where is yesterday? Where are the moments that have elapsed since we met together? They are no longer ours. Yes, still they are! they are our messengers to the throne of the Eternal, bearing with them our deeds of charity, and the secret lurkings of our blackest guilt! Be not deceived; the passing moment of a breathing thought is only ours, the next we may be called to answer for actions buried to us, but living with God in the years of obscurity. Where, then, will be—where is the day of salvation? It is over; mercy is gone—clean gone for ever. Where, O where is the hour of repentance? It is past. No, no, it is begun, and it is to last while the horrors of despair, augmented by the terrors of the Lord, trembling through the soul from the keen glance of conscience on the past, and while the incomprehensible day of eternity, tormented by the present, shall endure! "We pray you then now, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." "We preach Christ crucified." "It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." Whatever may have been your former life or character, we invite and entreat you now, to accept of him and of his salvation, freely and fully, as offered to you in the Gospel. "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come." Come, O come! and if you truly accept of him, we can assure you, in the words of the text, "this month shall be unto you the beginning of months; it shall be the first month of the year to you."

3. Now, what is to be said to those who are entertaining hope—some good hope of eternal life? "It is written, the just shall live by faith." Now, as natural life is made manifest to us through breathing, moving, acting, so will spiritual life be manifested through the breathing of prayer and praise, and through all the motions and actings of the new man in Christ Jesus. But, Christians, shew particularly that you live by faith in all the common attitudes of life in which you may be placed. Stand by faith (2 Cor. i. 24.) in the bright day of prosperity, and let the firmness of your character appear before all, as sketched and coloured by the following animated and animating words:—"Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident; one thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." Stand in the dark night of adversity, "and having done all to stand," "hold fast the profession of your faith without wavering,"—"then may the winds blow, the rains descend, and the floods come," you are "securely safe," for you stand, and you stand firmly upon the rock of ages. "Walk" by faith, (2 Cor. v. 7.) for you walk by faith, and not by sight. Walk, then, by faith, in that path which leadeth unto life, with the progressive and persevering steps of "righteousness and true holiness." The way, indeed, may seem, nay, may be narrow and steep,—it may be strewn with thorns and covered with snares,—it may be beset with enemies both numerous, subtle, and powerful, but fear not, it will become easier and more easy the nearer you approach your Father's house. The armies of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, have passed along it. If you look up as you proceed, you will see "a great cloud" of witnesses before you; and if you look higher and higher,—for there is no bright cloud without some dark speck,—if you look higher and higher, even to the highest, you will perceive Him to be "the Sun of Righteousness," and you will see him enlightening the path behind him for you, "for he has left us his example that we should follow his steps." Go forward, then;—heaven is before you; a crown of glory is laid up for you; a throne awaits you; and hosts of holy angels beckon you to your Father's kingdom. "Work" the works of faith in love.—(Gal. v. 6.) "Now, this is the work of God, that ye believe in Him whom he hath sent." And this work is the great work, the good work, and the gracious work for the accomplishment of which you have been sent into life: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; this is the first and the great commandment, and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."..... "Yea, whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." "In Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith that worketh by love." "Fight" the good fight of faith. (1 Tim. vi. 12.) Your enemies are numerous within you, without you, and all around you, but fear not, more are they that are for you than all that can be against you. Follow the Captain of your salvation, and through him, and by him, you shall be more than conquerors. You have, besides, the whole armour of God. (Eph. vi. 11-17.) Put on, then, the helmet of salvation, and the breast-plate of righteousness; take the shield of faith, and the sword of the Spirit; be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace, and have your loins girt about with truth; and thus armed, go forward conquering and to conquer. Yes, you may rejoice, for here is the prize—"a crown of glory"—"a sceptre of eternal sway"—"a throne which endureth for ever and ever"—"the palm of victory"—"eternal life"—"O! it is a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory."—but, Die in the faith, (Heb. xi. 13.) for all who live by faith, must die in the faith, in order that they may receive the end of their faith, "even the salvation of their souls." "But the voice said, cry,"—"Be thou faithful—be thou faithful unto death,—be thou faithful unto death, AND I WILL GIVE THEE A CROWN OF LIFE."

THE DUTY AND THE PRIVILEGE OF PRAYER: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MINTY, Minister of Kinnethmont.

"As for me, I will call upon God; and the Lord shall save me. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud: and he shall hear my voice."
—PSALM lv. 16, 17.

It will appear to every one who attentively peruses the writings of David, that there was no feature in his conduct so striking, as that of his fervent and frequent appeals to the throne of divine grace. In the Psalms, in particular, most of which were composed by him, there is scarcely a page in which we do not find expressions, either indicative of his confidence in God, or of his gratitude for mercies received, or of humble acknowledgment of his sins, and ardent desire to be restored to the divine favour, or of dependence upon the arm of the Almighty for deliverance from his temporal and spiritual enemies,—in short, of those views and feelings which become a weak, a fallen, and a dependent creature. This, too, was more remarkable in the case of David, from his being surrounded with the grandeur, magnificence, and riches of the world, a circumstance which has a natural tendency to lead to forgetfulness of God, and a neglect of the sacred duties of religion; but, though king of Israel, he felt that he was the subject of the King of kings and Lord of lords; that he was indebted to him for every blessing, and comfort, and privilege he enjoyed; that when afflicted, God only could deliver him out of his affliction, or stay the arm of those who rebelled or fought against him; and, therefore, whether in prosperity or adversity, in health or in sickness, in a state of spiritual depression because of his iniquities, or from a feeling of experiencing the light of God's reconciled countenance, he humbly drew near in prayer to that Almighty Being from whom alone, he felt convinced, cometh down every good and perfect gift. "As for me," says he, "I will call upon God; and the Lord shall save me. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice." It would appear, from the context, that these words were dictated under peculiarly trying circumstances,—at the time when David was driven from Jerusalem by the rebellion of Absalom and others against him. In this situation the Psalmist, in a moment of strong excitement, expresses a wish that he had wings like a dove, for then would he fly away and be at rest, and far from the distractions of his rebellious subjects, he would enjoy, in holy solitude, that repose which, in his present situation, he was unable to obtain; but finding, on reflection, that this wish was in vain, he in prayer lays his case before his God, and there is reason to infer, from what is recorded in the subsequent part of the psalm, that his prayer was not offered up in vain, that the rebellion was suppressed, and that he was delivered from the hands of his enemies; and having thus experienced the good effects resulting from an implicit trust and confidence in God, he exhorts others to cast their burden upon the Lord, and he would sustain them, nay, that he would never suffer the righteous to be moved.

I. Prayer is both a duty and a privilege.

And, first, as to prayer being a duty, even reason, unaided by revelation, may give us, at least, some faint conception of this. For when we survey the works of nature, are we not led to conclude that these works must have proceeded from some being or beings infinitely superior to ourselves? The power and the ingenuity of man can effect nothing in any way comparable to what we behold in the earth below, or the canopy of heaven above us. Nor is this all. Reason not only points out to us some infinitely superior being or beings to man, as the creator or creators of the universe, but also leads us to infer that this same being or beings preserves and governs all things; and hence, that it becomes man, who feels himself a weak and dependent creature, to pay some homage to that being or beings by whom the world was created, and by whom it is preserved and governed. True it is, that reason, unaided by revelation, may lead to very erroneous ideas regarding the nature of the being or beings to whom religious homage is to be paid, and the manner in which his or their wrath may be appeased, and his or their favour obtained, but this does not affect the principle of reason pointing out some religious homage as a duty, although the precise manner thereof may appear different to differently constituted and enlightened minds. But if reason points out this as a duty becoming and proper, revelation confirms it with all the force of a command, at the same time describing the Being to whom our religious homage ought to be paid: "I exhort, therefore," saith the inspired apostle in writing to Timothy, "that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men;" "I will therefore that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting." "Pray without ceasing," saith the same apostle. "In everything give thanks, for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you." "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication, let your requests be made known unto God." Examples might be easily multiplied from Scripture, to show that prayer is a commanded duty, a duty which holy men in all ages have cheerfully and readily obeyed. But does it become any to regard prayer merely as a duty, an homage which is justly due by the creature to his Creator? No. Every one who considers the nature of that Being to whom he draws near in prayer, will consider it also in the light of a privilege. This is the more necessary to be kept in view, because there are many, it is to be feared, who imagine that when they humble themselves in prayer before God, they, as it were, confer some favour upon him, forgetting that one chief object of prayer is to be instrumental in obtaining some favour or favours for themselves. God requires not the homage of his creatures to increase his glory; the prayers and the praises of angels, far less those of a weak and fallen creature like man, can add nothing to the honour and glory of Him whom the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain. "I will take no bullock out of thy house," saith the Almighty by the mouth of the Psalmist, "nor he-goats out of thy folds; for every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountains; and the wild beasts of the field are mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof." Let man only consider what he is in himself, and the relation in which he stands to God, and he can scarcely fail to consider the invitation, to come boldly to a throne of grace, where mercy may be obtained, and grace found to help in every time of need, more as a privilege than a duty, more as a favour conferred upon himself, than by embracing the invitation, that he confers any honour or favour upon God.

II. In regard to the effects often resulting from the exercise of prayer, we may begin by mentioning a few as they are recorded in the Scriptures of divine truth. When Darius, at the instigation of his idolatrous subjects, ordered the prophet Daniel to be cast into the den of lions, because Daniel was found praying and making supplications before his God, God sent his angel and shut the lions' mouths, so that they did not hurt him. "Jesus answered and said unto his disciples, Verily, I say unto you, if ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree, but also, if ye shall say unto this mountain, be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done. And all things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." "Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms. Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit." (James v. 13-18.) And from these examples from Scripture in regard to the efficacy of prayer, we would appeal to the experience of those who make it their habitual practice frequently to pray unto God. When borne down with sickness and disease, hath not God, in answer to the devout breathings of their hearts, granted them a feeling of patience and resignation which is denied to such as live without any acknowledgment of their continual dependence upon God? When exposed to the temptations and trials inseparable from their condition in this world, have they not, by humbling themselves before a throne of grace, often experienced such divine support, as has enabled them to resist the one, and to bear up with Christian fortitude under the other? When depressed, under a view of the evil of sin in general, and their own sins in particular, have they not, by pleading for mercy in and through the blessed mediation of a Saviour, felt their fears, in some degree, removed, and their minds inspired with the hope of meeting in God a reconciled Father?

But in speaking of the effect of prayer, we must not confine its efficacy to the individual who engages in it—the prayers and supplications of the devout worshipper have often a much more extensive influence. Is he a parent at the head of a family, and exercises himself in prayer to God for them, as well as for himself? the gracious Hearer and Answerer of Prayer seldom grants his request in behalf of the one, while he withholds it from the other; but while he directs the parent, by the influence of the Spirit, to that discipline and that instruction which is suited to the tender years of his children, he accompanies all with his blessing, causing the instruction communicated under the sought direction and guidance of the Spirit, to make a lasting impression upon their minds. Yes, although there are some unfortunate examples to the contrary, yet, generally speaking, it rarely happens that prayerful parents have godless children; for such as, in their tender years, have witnessed their parents humbling themselves frequently before God, acknowledging their wants, their weakness, and need of continued dependence upon him, and, moreover, supplicating his mercy, his blessing, and his grace, such have maintained through life upon their minds that fear of the Lord which is said to be the beginning of wisdom, and frequently availed themselves of the privilege of drawing near unto a throne of grace, where they might obtain mercy, and find grace to help them in every time of need. Nor is prayer, by what we mean family prayer, less beneficial when engaged in by masters in the presence of their servants. In families, where this is uniformly practiced, is there not an order and a regularity manifest? A desire, on the part of servants, to obey their "masters in the flesh with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart, as unto Christ, which is utterly unknown in those families where no public acknowledgment of God is made? It must be admitted, this is not invariably the effect of family prayer—there are, it is well known, exceptions to the contrary; and hence the impious take occasion, from these exceptions, to sneer and to blaspheme at the very idea of worshipping God at all at the family altar. But, instead of being thereby discouraged, every serious-minded master will be more earnest in his supplications to God for restraining and sanctifying grace in behalf of all such; and continues to persevere in an exercise, a duty, a privilege, from which he himself has often derived both temporal and spiritual advantages; and to the good effect of which many of his domestics have at least borne a willing testimony.

Where is it that the name of God is most frequently taken in vain? Where do cursing and swearing, and profanity of all kinds, most commonly abound? Is it where God's name is daily hallowed in the family in prayer? Where Christ is owned as the only Saviour of sinners? And, where the enlightening and sanctifying influence of the Spirit is earnestly sought for? Or, is it where no visible acknowledgment is made of God as the creator, the preserver, and governor of the universe, and where the Gospel of salvation by Jesus Christ is, as it were, the words of a sealed book? Let common sense candidly answer these questions, and doubtless it will be found, that though a prayerless family may not always be a godly family, yet a prayerless one is almost universally a godless one.

III. We may refer to the time when prayer ought to be offered up.

David declares, that in the evening, morning, and at noon, he would pray and cry unto the Lord. Now, the morning, evening, and noon, were the times set apart for prayer in the Jewish church; and it is not unlikely the Psalmist had this in view, when he so solemnly declares that at each of these periods of the day he would draw near unto God in prayer. We find also the prophet Daniel praying unto God the same number of times, and very probably at the same periods of the day respectively: for at the 6th chapter and 13th verse of the book of Daniel, it is written, "Then answered they," (that is, the men who wished to destroy Daniel,) "and said before the king, that Daniel, which is of the captivity of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree which thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a-day." We have here pointed out to us, the frequency with which these holy men, David and Daniel, felt it to be both their duty and interest to pray unto God. In other parts of Scripture we meet with the expressions, "pray without ceasing," "continue instant in prayer," "watch and pray always," and the like. We read of Christ himself often engaging in prayer, and instructing his disciples how they ought to pray, so that inability to clothe their ideas in suitable language might neither be urged as an excuse by them or others, for refraining from prayer. Surely, then, with all these examples, and all these commands before us, there can be no doubt but that it is the duty of every one daily to draw near unto God in prayer. And yet, how many are there, who have perhaps been taught during the years of childhood by their parents, or others, to pray unto God, who, when they grew up, have no longer paid any regard to it! And why? One reason, probably, is, that although their parents may have taught them to pray, yet as they never saw their parents engaged in prayer themselves, they thence were led to infer, that it was merely an exercise suited to their childish years, and might with safety and propriety be abandoned, when they came to put away childish things. Oh that parents would only learn from this, the necessity of accompanying, with the force of their own example, the precepts they inculcate upon their families! This would both render the precepts they inculcate more effective upon the minds of their children, and in many cases continue with them when they came to riper years.

Again, there are others who have not entirely abandoned the exercise of prayer with their childhood; at the same time they have only recourse to it in the season of affliction, or when threatened with some severe calamity. Now, as one great object of prayer is to express our gratitude to God for his mercies, as well as a sense of our continued dependence upon him for life, health, and all things; it is quite obvious that such persons as the above can be actuated by no such feelings. It is fear, and not love, which induces them to pray; and although there may be some examples of serious and lasting religious impressions being made upon the mind under the impulse of fear, yet, in too many cases, the cause being removed which led them to cry unto God, they think no more of him, his power, his wisdom, his goodness, and other attributes, till some fresh calamity remind them of their wants and weakness; and then they are again ready to exclaim, "O Lord, save us!" "Merciful God, deliver us!" and the like. How far the riches of divine grace may be extended even to such individuals, it is not for man to take upon him to predict; but it is evident they little think of the relation in which they stand to God; their continued need of the strengthening aid of his Spirit; their receiving from him every comfort, and blessing, and privilege they enjoy; their lost and perishing condition, unless renewed by grace, and saved by Christ; otherwise they would feel it both their duty and their interest daily to acknowledge God's mercies, and daily to seek God's favour.

Again: There are some who advance a step farther than the preceding. They not only engage in prayer during the season of affliction, or when threatened with some severe calamity, but they devote the Lord's day principally to religious exercises; such as reading God's Word, and hearing it read and explained, accompanied with prayer and praise. Such conduct is worthy of all commendation: it is spending the day of sacred rest in the way in which it was originally designed by God it should be spent, and cannot fail, when accompanied with the divine blessing, to be productive of the most beneficial effects upon the lives and conversations of individuals and families; as nothing tends more powerfully to preserve mankind from falling into flagrant sins, as well as to excite pious and devout affections, than a reverential and becoming observance of the Sabbath. We are justified in making this observation, from the circumstance that many, who have been guilty of heinous transgressions of God's law, have candidly admitted, that they were first led into the paths of folly and of sin, by spending the Lord's day in idleness, or in loose and unholy conversation, and that since that period their progress hath been rapid towards the gates of death and of hell. But while the devoting the Lord's day to religious exercises in the family and closet is highly commendable, inasmuch as it is agreeable to the intention of Him who sanctified it to be a holy Sabbath to himself, we are not to infer, that while He intended that day to be devoted chiefly to his worship and service, these were to be entirely omitted during the succeeding six. We have already seen, by various quotations from holy writ, that God's name is to be hallowed—that God's mercies are to be gratefully acknowledged—that God's protection and favour are to be sought on other days as well as on the Sabbath—and hence it were wise, if they who already make a public acknowledgment of God in their families one day in seven, would extend this acknowledgment to the remaining six. For thus only can they be said to imitate the example of holy men in all ages, or derive those blessed results to which such men have often borne testimony as the effect of their daily approaches unto God in prayer—thus only can they hope that the enemy of souls will have daily less and less influence upon the minds of men, and the true members of Christ's Church and kingdom daily increase when professing Christians become a more habitually prayerful people. In fine, thus only need they expect the speedy fulfilment of that prophecy in Isaiah, the conclusion of which is, "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

FORMATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF COAL.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

THE wisdom and benevolence of God are imprinted, in legible characters, on every part of his works, which, in the minutest as well as in the greatest, in the inanimate no less than in the living departments of nature, exhibit the clearest proofs of matchless skill and contrivance. Nothing appears to have been made without some purpose or end to be served by it. The smallest atom of matter, the most irregular and shapeless mountain mass, the meanest reptile, every flower of the field, the lily of the valley, and the humblest shrub, no less than the lofty cedars of Lebanon, suggest to every reflecting mind a lesson of devotion; and every thing around us, earth, rocks, plants, trees, lakes, rivers, and seas, are all adapted, in the general scheme of things, to the production of good. We speak, indeed, of instruments and second causes in the administration of nature, but by these we mean agencies employed by God, for the accomplishment of his designs. The laws of nature signify nothing more than the order in which events succeed one another. They have no power but what God has communicated to them, and they subserve no ends but such as he foresaw they were intended to bring about. Thus, if we suppose a chain depending from heaven to earth, God, "who dwelleth on high," stands above it and asserts his supremacy as the prime agent of every change, the origin of every movement, the source of every blessing, the sole provider for the wants and comfortable accommodation of all his creatures. "As he hath thought, so shall it come to pass; and as he hath purposed, so shall it stand; and what his soul desireth, even that he doth."

The department of nature which forms the subject of this paper illustrates, in the most striking and beautiful manner, the truth of these observations. Whether we consider the origin, the position, the situation, or the uses of coal, our admiration must be equally excited; and if any doubt could be entertained as to the manifestations of wisdom and design in the arrangement and distribution of the rocky strata of the earth, it will be completely dispelled by the views which are here suggested of the divine superintendence, in every thing connected with the history of this inestimable mineral treasure.

Composition.—The material of which coal consists is now universally admitted to be of vegetable origin. A woody fibrous structure may easily be detected by the eye in many portions of it, while the microscope has brought to light, in the most compact specimens, the delicate cellular texture, by which all plants are more or less distinguished. In the strata with which coal is invariably associated, plants abound in the greatest profusion, so that little doubt can be entertained of the existence of the material, in sufficient quantity, of which it is composed. Chemically considered, its vegetable origin is equally well established. Carbon constitutes its principal ingredient, the quality which enters most abundantly into the composition of vegetables. The most probable theory of its formation is, that vegetable matter, carried to the sea or extensive lakes, has undergone a process of decomposition, by which, while some of its principles may have escaped or been evolved in new combinations, its carbon, with a portion of hydrogen, has remained; and this, mixed with more or less earthy matter, deposited at the same time by the action of rivers, has, in its soft state, been consolidated by the force of aggregation simply, or by compression from the superincumbent strata, and thereby has formed coal. Dr Maculloch has almost detected nature in the act of producing this curious mineral. He has observed the trees of some of the ancient Scottish forests in a state of transition towards coal, where the wood, by long immersion in water, becomes first brown and then black, and at last the ligneous fibre, by slow decomposition, is converted into a jetty mould, in which carbon predominates. It is obvious that this process will be different under different circumstances, and that the result will vary according to the rapidity, the greater or less extent to which it is carried. The quantity of earthy matter that is carried along and mixes with the vegetables will, also, greatly influence the character of the deposit; and, hence, it is from these and other causes, that we have not only several kinds of coal, but considerable difference in the quality of the same bed. The stone, or splint-coal is peculiar to Scotland, as caking-coal to England, in which there is a greater proportion of bitumen than in the former. Parrot, or cannel-coal, which is of a very close and compact texture, and burns with a pure bright flame, is common to both countries, and but sparingly distributed in either.

The vegetable matter, of which coal is thus formed, must have subserved, in other ages, many important purposes in nature. The residue, which still subsists in this new substance, clearly shows how abundantly the surface of the earth was then enriched with plants and trees, thereby affording shelter and food to countless millions of living creatures, whose remains are still preserved in the rocky strata. Their wants supplied, the remainder has been treasured up, and now ministered to the comfort of new races of beings. How many ages have elapsed since that period, it is impossible to determine, but certain it is that, by Him who does nothing in vain, the treasure was intended for man, as no other creature, on the face of the earth, is capable of itself deriving the least benefit from it. He alone digs into the earth, and has skill to convert its solid materials to purposes of utility. When God laid the foundations of the earth, he foresaw the purposes to which its inward stores were to be applied, and, while other creatures were made happy among the flowers and herbage which rose so luxuriantly around them, "his delights" were even then with the children of men, whom he was to create in his own image, and who were to have more wisdom than the beasts of the field. Milton has finely imagined a tradition in heaven, long subsisting, concerning the creation of a new world, and of man, for whose habitation it was intended.

"Space may produce new worlds, whereof to rise,
There went a fame in heav'n, that He ere long Intended to create, and therein plant
A generation, whom his choice regard
Should favour equal to the sons of heav'n;
The happy seat
Of some new race, called man.

And certainly nothing could shew more the dignity of the new race, or the interest taken in them by their Creator, than this tradition which ran of them before their existence. But geology, more to be relied on than poetry, furnishes demonstrative evidence of the antecedent designs and purposes of the Most High, in actually fitting up "the happy seat," and storing it beforehand with materials for the comfortable subsistence of him who was to inhabit it.

Under what circumstances formed.—We need not enter into any geological speculations respecting the period when the plants and vegetables, of which coal is composed, flourished upon the earth. We learn from the book of Genesis, that they constituted the first living substance in the order of the works of creation, being the work of the third day; and in this we are furnished with a striking proof of the wisdom and beneficence of God. A greater extent of soil was required for the growth of these vegetables, than man would have been willing to leave unreclaimed for his own immediate wants in an advanced period of society; nor, indeed, could he have existed, with any comfort, in the midst of a vegetation so rank and luxuriant as then covered the earth. The atmosphere now contains only about one one-thousandth part of carbonic acid, whereas, during the period referred to, it is conjectured to have been in the proportion of three to five per cent. It is well known how destructive of animal life this gas is, while on the contrary, it is as highly favourable to the production and growth of vegetables. "It would be hardly credited," says Lindley, in his Fossil Flora of Great Britain, "by persons unacquainted with the evidence upon which such facts repose, that in the most dreary and desolate regions of the present day, there once flourished groves of tropical plants of conifers, of bananas, tree fern, huge cacti, and palms; that the marshes were filled with rushlike plants fifteen or twenty feet high, and the coverts with ferns like the undergrowth of a West India island." Accordingly, during this period, no fossil remains are found of any of the warm-blooded animals; they only occur in the higher strata, where the atmosphere seems to have been more adapted for their respiratory organs; and, last of all, man was created, after the constituents of the air were adjusted to their present proportions, and all the noxious qualities expelled, or greatly reduced.

A vegetation, such as this, could only have been produced under a high temperature, arising chiefly, as has been formerly stated, from the radiation of internal heat. In proof of which, we find the same species of plants, of equally large dimensions, imbedded in the rocks, and forming coal strata, in every region of the globe; a fact utterly inconsistent with the mere distribution of heat by the solar ray, and equally at variance with the present known habits of plants and vegetables of every kind. It is also clear, that, upon the periodical decay of the vegetable matter, the greater proportion of it would speedily be wasted, and consumed by the action of the same excess of heat and moisture which occasioned its abundance, unless means were provided to protect it from their influence.

Here, again, let us admire the wise contrivances of the Divine Architect, who had already provided so many lakes or inland seas for the accumulation of the vegetables which the earth so abundantly yielded. Every coal-field presents the appearance of a basin, some of smaller, others of greater dimensions, but so manifest in every case wherever the mineral is found, as clearly to shew that the materials of which it is composed were carried down by the rivers, from the higher grounds on which they grew, to the hollow places of the earth, where, under the surface of the primeval waters, they were successively deposited, and enabled to retain those qualities, which are essential to the production of a combustible substance. No problem in geology, perhaps, is of greater interest than that by which we endeavour to ascertain the state of the globe respecting the distribution of land and water, at the period of the coal formation; or when we try to restore, in imagination, the probable extent of the older formations that might then have existed as dry land, in the hollows of which so many lakes were situated, and whose lowest depths are again elevated or laid bare, for the working of the valuable treasure which they contain. How different the condition of Great Britain at that early period, both in respect to extent and appearance! Lakes or estuaries, where high table-land now exists; and extensive ridges of land, now buried beneath the waves, clothed with a luxuriant tropical vegetation, and sufficiently elevated to have given rise to the rivers and torrents, by whose agency the periodical accumulation of vegetable matter and other detritus was transported to those places in which the coal was formed! "The waters stood above the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them. The mountains saw thee, and they trembled; the overflowing of the waters passed by; the deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high."

These words of Scripture have been understood to refer to the upheavings and disturbed condition of things which occurred at the deluge, when "the fountains of the deep were broken up." It has also been conjectured, that during this period, the continuance of which was upwards of a year, the vegetable matter was collected which was required for the formation of coal. "All these facts," says Fairholme, in his excellent treatise on the Geology of Scripture, "tend, in the strongest manner, to confirm the opinions I have expressed: That the coal-beds were formed at the period of the deluge, by successive deposits of great vegetable masses, which must have been matted together, and floating on the waters at that eventful time; and that the contents of all the basins of geologists, whether containing coal or not, must have also become deposited at the same period; the whole of these moist formations being stratified according to the common laws in constant action in the ocean; and, on the depression of the waters into their new bed, becoming, in many places, deranged by depression, and subsequently hardened into the stony masses now exhibited to our admiring view." With much deference to so competent an authority, I would venture to doubt, whether our coal beds could have been formed during the agitations which such an event as the deluge must have occasioned in the waters of the ocean. These beds are almost entirely free from foreign mixture; neither rolled blocks nor gravelly matter of any kind are found in them, the absence of which can scarcely be accounted for upon the diluvian hypothesis. There is certainly no term, in the Hebrew text of the first six chapters of the Pentateuch, which corresponds to the name of the fossil under consideration; but this by no means disproves the existence of coal during the period embraced in the narrative, nor does it amount to a proof that its uses were then unknown. There is evidence that the metals were employed in the arts,—brass and iron, from the earliest period; the one a compound, and the other a simple substance; and, while it is difficult to conceive how the smelting operations could have been effected without the assistance of coal, it is a singular fact, that coal and ironstone are almost uniformly associated in the bowels of the earth. It is owing to this arrangement among the mineral strata more perhaps than to any thing else under Divine Providence, that Great Britain has become so pre-eminent, among the nations, for commercial power and enterprize. Her coal and iron works are, in fact, the foundations of her strength, existing, as these substances do, in comparatively greater abundance within this island, than in any other quarter of the world; while, from their proximity to one another, the means of excavating both are proportionally increased. As they are associated, we therefore regard them as contemporaneous deposits; and as the one had an existence antecedent to the changes produced on the earth's surface by the deluge, so we inter the other to have been a primitive formation prepared, from "the beginning," for the use of man.

ON TRUST IN GOD.

BY THOMAS BROWN, Esq.,

Author of the "Reminiscences of an Old Traveller."

ALL the rational happiness we enjoy in life is founded upon one great leading principle—Trust in God. It proceeds from a consciousness of his resistless power.

endless goodness, and ever renewed mercies. Without this feeling in the human breast, life would be misery, existence insupportable. All our attempts to render ourselves independent of divine aid and succour we know to be vain and fruitless.

When we look abroad and view the beauties of creation, the wonders of nature, the regularity of the planetary system, the never ceasing return of the seasons bringing forth the fruits of the earth, and supplying the wants of man and beast, how is it possible to be without confidence in that great and merciful Being, at once the Creator and Preserver of this mighty system? Wherever we contemplate the stupendous plan of Providence, we see manifestations of a power infinitely wise and good, ever working towards an end, and producing effects the result of a design, beyond the limited faculties of man to conceive or to comprehend. When we cast our eyes around and see every living thing, from the infinitely great to the infinitely small, enjoying the pleasures of existence, they afford us irresistible evidence of the goodness of the great Creator. Man, at last, was brought into existence to be, as it were, the lord of this lower world, and notwithstanding his disobedience and apostasy to his Maker, is continued, from age to age, a living monument of the mercy of God. What a source of consolation and of hope to the weary pilgrim, verging towards the confines of another world; preserved by an unseen hand in the infancy and helplessness of life; supported and protected, at a more advanced period, through the perils and cares of his probationary state; and, lastly, while his tottering frame is sinking on the borders of eternity, and about to return to those elements of which it is composed, this wonderful structure of man stands pre-eminent among the works of God, as a manifestation at once of his power, goodness, and mercy.

How is it possible, then, that a being, thus favoured by Providence, should pass through life without daily reflecting on these wonderful mercies, and without prostrating himself before the throne of grace, under the deepest sense of his own unworthiness, and of the transcendent goodness of the great Creator? How can man reconcile it to his reason to live a single day without reflecting on his weakness and dependence, and without carrying his thoughts to the contemplation of that ineffable goodness which supports his frail frame, and never ceases to supply all his returning wants? Oh! that he would awake from his lethargy, and dwell for ever on the mercies of God! Now is the appointed time; now is the moment for reflection. Let us, therefore, ever have confidence in God, and as we proceed to the end of our earthly course, let us go on our way rejoicing; celebrating his praises with grateful hearts, and trusting to the God of our Salvation.

Our self-love prevents us from acknowledging, openly and candidly, that our want of success has been owing to baneful habits of indolence, to unwarrantable indulgences in the outset of life, when activity and exertion are most required. We lose sight of the wisdom of the Scriptures, which teaches us that we "must bear the yoke in our youth," and we set at defiance the example of parents and the voice of experience, in every age; all which demonstrate, beyond the possibility of doubt, that without moral and physical exertion the great powers of the human mind must inevitably dwindle and decay, and the faculties of man, in his progress through life, become of no use to him. There are men who do not seem to be aware that by their idleness and indolence they are, in fact, counteracting, as far as they can, the plans of Providence, proceeding in a course, not only hurtful to themselves, but in opposition to the dictates of nature. Do we not see the whole brute creation in a constant state of activity, thus answering the end for which they were created; and is it for man, so highly gifted by his Creator, to slumber away his existence in dull and vapid indolence? At the great day, when every man's works will be weighed in a balance, when he will have to give an account of his stewardship to the mighty Judge of all, is he prepared to say, I have improved the "talents" with which I have been blessed, or can he only answer, I have given way to habits of ease and indolence, have been of no use either to myself or others, and have left a melancholy example upon earth of a mind devoted to no purposes of utility whatever? Such characters, alas, are too often met with, and, like weeds in the vegetable kingdom, encumber the ground and obstruct the course of vegetation; like those weeds, also, they will be collected together, and thrown into the fire.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Then said one unto him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate.—The Church is compared to a city, and a city is great compared to a village,—but what is it in respect to the earth? Are there few that shall be saved? No; there are many. "So a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations and languages, stood before the throne." Are there many that shall be saved? No; few: "many are called, but few are chosen." Christ's is "a little flock." The best courses have the fewest followers. God's reserve is "a very small remnant"—a tenth. "In it shall be a tenth"—many leaves, the sap is but a tythe, as the shaking of an olive tree, two or three berries on the top of the uppermost bough; four or five on the outmost fruitful branches. They are compared to "the gleanings of the grapes after the vintage." It was the Church's complaint, "woe is me, for I am as the gleanings." This was God's collection. "I will take you, one of a city, and two of a family."—God is a shepherd, that saves some from the lion, "taking out of his mouth two legs, or the piece of an ear," he rescues a few from the universal apostasy. Of the six hundred thousand that came out of Egypt, but two entered into Canaan, Caleb and Joshua. Even the best is but "a brand snatched out of the fire." "All flesh had corrupted their way,"—only Noah escaped. Not one righteous in Sodom but Lot. Four hundred and fifty prophets for Baal, but one for the Lord,—four hundred flatterers for Ahab, one Micaiah for the truth. "Behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and wonders in Israel,"—so few and rare, that they are gazed on for monsters. When they sat in counsel against Christ, none spake for him but Nicodemus. Paul answered before Nero,—"No man stood with me, but all men forsook me." When Pilate asked what shall be done with Jesus, all cried "crucify him." There was a general shout for Diana two hours together—"Great is Diana of the Ephesians." All, "both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, received the mark of the beast in their foreheads." The children of Israel are like to "little flocks of kids;" but the wicked, like the Syrians, fill the country. But those few innocents speed the best. "Though the number of Israel be as the sand, a remnant shall be saved." If we should divide the world into thirty parts, scarce five of them are Christian. Of these five the pope challengeth at least the half. For he says, I have one church in Italy, one in Germany, one in Spain, one in France, one in England. One in England! now the Lord one day convince him, and grant he may have none in England! Now it is a quarrel betwixt us and Antichrist, whether they or we belong to this city—we cannot agree about it. One day it will be a quarrel betwixt Antichrist and the devil, and they shall agree about it. Now, subdivide all these five parts of the world, whether theirs or ours, and scarce one is truly sincere. Hypocrisy hath one part; heresy hath another part: profaneness another part: lukewarmness a fourth: God hath least that owns all. O the small number sealed up by the spirit of the living God! Let this teach every one to suspect himself. When Christ said "one of you shall betray me," they presently all cry "Master, is it I?" When he was asked whether only few should be saved? he tells them neither of many nor few; but charged them to look to themselves, that they might be of the number. "Strive ye to enter in at the strait gate."—ADAMS.

"I was dead."—To every Christian, the words of our Lord,—"I was dead," will suggest reflections that should serve to fortify the mind against the fear of dissolution; or, at all events, to rebuke and mitigate the aversion with which it is usually contemplated.—Did the Redeemer die,—a Being who claims to himself the dignity of "the Living One,"—a Being not only of infinite dignity, but of spotless purity, and who, from the beginning to the end of his existence on earth, was the object of God's supreme complacency and approbation? And shall we complain that death is allotted as our portion also? we, who, as created beings, are insignificant,—by inheritance, mortal,—by actual guilt, polluted and debased? To us, death comes as wages earned by guilt; but even were it otherwise,—did death come to us as an accident of our being, how should we complain of the hardness of our lot, when Christ himself declares, "I was dead?" Did the Redeemer die,—he in whose sympathy and care we are commanded to confide, and to whom we are taught to look, in every hour of danger or distress, for needful succour and consolation? And is it no encouragement to reflect, that he, into whose hands we commit our case, when in the extremity of mortal agony, and when vain is the help of man, has himself drunk the cup before us and felt its bitterness,—that every inch of that dark valley was trod by him, and that, from his own experience, he knows what strength and succour we need in that dreadful hour?—Did the Redeemer die,—as the surety and representative of sinners: was his death a solemn expiation of our guilt, and an adequate satisfaction to God for the penalty which we had incurred? Is there no reason then to suppose, that dying, as he did, in the room, and on behalf of the guilty, death met him in a more formidable shape, and put into his hands a bitterer cup than can now fall to the lot of any of his people; and that their dissolution will be greatly less terrible than it would have been by reason of his enduring in their room the heaviest part of it? For what is it that mainly embitters death, and surrounds it, even when viewed at a distance, with innumerable terrors? Not surely the mere pain with which it is accompanied,—for equal, or greater, pain we have often endured; not the mere dissolution of the tie betwixt soul and body,—for if that were all, however our sensitive nature might shrink from the shock, our rational nature might enable us to regard it with composure; not the mere separation from the society and business of the present world,—for that, however it may awaken a feeling of melancholy regret, can hardly account for the forebodings and terrors of which every mind is more or less conscious when it contemplates death. No; it is something more than the mere pain of dying, or the mere dissolving of the elements of our being, or the mere separation from this world, that embitters the cup of death. "The sting of death is sin,"—the same sin which gave us over as a prey to death, makes us also slaves to the fear of death; for, by the unvarying law of conscience, sin and fear are bound up together, and it is a conscience burdened with guilt, and apprehensive of punishment, which, in our case, arrays death with terrors unknown to the inferior and irresponsible creation. But Christ died to expiate and cancel the guilt of his people; he has also endured, and by enduring, has taken away the penalty of their transgression; death remains, but its sting is taken away; so that we may "thank God, who hath given the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord," and may exclaim with the apostle, "Oh! death, where is now thy sting,—Oh! grave, where is thy victory?"—REV. JAMES BUCHANAN. (Comfort in Affliction.)

Know you why you came into the world?—I am sure, and you are as sure, not to eat and drink, and pass away your time in earthly business; but to get the work of your salvation well wrought and finished before death assault you. It is most uncertain, and steals upon men "as a thief in the night," when they are secure, never dreaming of such a great change; though truly my gracious Lord lets me see death still approaching nearer and nearer, that I may draw ever nearer and nearer him who is life. O! it concerns you to try whether you shall be a base miscreant, crawling in the bottomless pit with unspeakable torments in the midst of wicked men and devils, blaspheming Jehovah and the Lamb to eternity; or, a glorious saint, conformed unto the image of the Son of the eternal God, loving and praising, adoring him that sitteth on the throne, and the Lamb, for ever and ever. Consider what I say; the business is so weighty, so exceeding weighty, that time, with all its weal and woe, is to be overlooked, in comparison of this absolutely and only necessary thing; I tell you, there is an absolute necessity that you be holy; (let not the poor name affright you; for holiness is the sweetest and meet easy thing in the world to them that are holy;) for, "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." And salvation must be nearer your heart by many degrees, than all other concerns, though they were ten thousand worlds. You must know the bargain of the new covenant, and close heartily with it in all its fulness, without the least reservation. Upon it, I recommend unto you Mr Guthrie's "Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ," and desire you to read it, till you become such an one as he describes. Believe it, "Godliness is profitable for all things; having the promise of this life and that which is to come." Though it may seem troublesome in the beginning, and though Christ's sweet and easy yoke may seem an hard wreath; yet, believe me, there is nothing in the world but it, which can give rest and full satisfaction to the soul. All things here are unsatisfying, though you had all that you can desire of them. O this is a vain world! Those who are near eternity will say so. O the vast difference betwixt time and eternity! I assure you, if you had all that your heart could wish or desire of the pomp, treasures, and pleasures of time, you would find no contentment in them. And when you shall be in such a condition as I am in, when pale death shall be staring you in the face, then all the glory of time will be in your eyes nothing but a withered flower. But alas! we are drunk with this world; and we never know well what we are doing, till death make us sober. I must say again and again, O the difference betwixt time and eternity! They that get heaven can get no more; for alas! what are all additions of time? What is a few days' eating, and drinking, and trifling? Yea, what are all the exercises of time compared with the exercises of glory? We place too much of our happiness in this side of time; and therefore death is a great disappointment. But we should be indifferent to all things in time, and have our eyes ever fixed upon the thoughts of eternity. Then it is not at all to be regarded in what time of man's life he die, if he die in the Lord. Yea, it is an invaluable blessing for the poor prisoner, or weary pilgrim, to have all his toilings by his hand, and to win to his native soil.—WELLWOOD. (Letter to his Brother.)

SACRED POETRY.

KEDRON.

THOU soft-flowing Kedron! by thy limpid stream
Our Saviour, at night, when the moon's silver beam Shone bright on thy waters, would oftentimes stray,
And lose in their murmurs the toils of the day:
Come, saints, and adore him, come, bow at his feet;
Oh! give him the glory, the praise that is meet!
Let joyful hosannas unceasing arise,
And join the full chorus that gladdens the skies!

How damp were the vapours that fell on his head!
How hard was his pillow! how humble his bed!
The angels beholding, amazed at the sight,
Attended their Master with solemn delight:
Come, saints, and adore him, come bow at his feet;
Oh! give him the glory, the praise that is meet!
Let joyful hosannas unceasing arise,
And join the full chorus that gladdens the skies!

Oh, garden of Olivet! dear, honour'd spot!
The fame of thy wonders shall ne'er be forgot!
The theme most transporting to seraphs above,
The triumph of sorrow, the triumph of love!
Come, saints, and adore him, come, bow at his feet:
Oh! give him the glory, the praise that is meet!
Let joyful hosannas unceasing arise,
And join the full chorus that gladdens the skies!

THE POOL OF BETHESDA.

AROUND Bethesda's healing wave,
Waiting to hear the rustling wing
Which spoke the angel nigh, who gave
Its virtues to that holy spring;
With earnest, fix'd solicitude,
Were seen th' afflicted multitude.

Among them there was one, whose eye
Had often seen the waters stir'd;
Whose heart had often heav'd the sigh,
The bitter sigh, of hope deferr'd;
Beholding, while he suffer'd on,
The healing virtue giv'n—and gone.

No power had he; no friendly aid
To him its timely succour brought;
But, while his coming he delay'd,
Another won the boon he sought;—
Until the Saviour's love was shown,
Which heal'd him by a word alone!

Had they who watch'd and waited there,
Been conscious who was passing by,
With what unceasing anxious care
Would they have sought his pitying eye;
And crav'd, with fervency of soul,
His sovereign power to make them whole.

But habit and tradition sway'd
Their minds to trust to sense alone;
They only sought the angel's aid,
While in their presence stood, unknown,
A greater, mightier far, than he,
With power from ev'ry pain to free.

Bethesda's pool has lost its power!
No angel, by his glad descent,
Dispenses that diviner dower
Which with its healing waters went:
But He, whose word surpassed its wave,
Is still omnipotent to save.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Extensive Charity.—Perhaps there never was a more charitable man than John Wesley. His liberality knew no bounds but an empty pocket. He gave away, not merely a certain part of his income, but all that he had; his own wants being provided for, he devoted all the rest to the necessities of others. He entered upon this good work at a very early period. We are told that when he had thirty pounds a-year, he lived on twenty-eight, and gave away forty shillings. The next year, receiving sixty pounds, he still lived on twenty-eight, and gave two and thirty. The third year he received ninety pounds, and gave away sixty-two. The fourth year he received one hundred and twenty pounds. Still he lived on twenty-eight, and gave to the poor ninety-two. During the rest of his life he lived economically; and in the course of fifty years, it has been supposed, he gave away more than thirty thousand pounds.

An attempt to Purchase Heaven.—The late Rev. C. J. Latrobe visited a certain nobleman in Ireland, who devoted considerable sums to charitable purposes; and among other benevolent acts had erected an elegant church at his own expense. The nobleman, with great pleasure, showed Mr L. his estate, pointed him to the church, and said, "Now, Sir, don't you think that will merit heaven?" Mr Latrobe paused for a moment, and said, "Pray, my lord, what may your estate be worth a-year?" "I imagine," said the nobleman, "about thirteen or fourteen thousand pounds." "And do you think, my lord," answered the minister, "that God would sell heaven, even for thirteen or fourteen thousand pounds?" Painful, indeed, is the thought that any one, with the Bible in his hand, should be ignorant of the way of salvation by Christ Jesus; and very awful is it that persons should be found rejecting his atonement to rely on their own merits for the happiness of heaven! Trust in the Son of God is the only way in which we can be saved.

Pride.—The eminently great and good Howard, the philanthropist, neither wanted courage nor talent to administer reproof where he thought it was needed. A German count, governor of Upper Austria, with his countess, called one day on the man who had excited so large a share of the public attention. The count asked him the state of the prisons within his department. Mr Howard replied, "The worst in all Germany;" and advised that the countess should visit the female prisoners. "I!" said she, haughtily, "I go into prisons!" and rapidly hastened down stairs in great anger. Howard, indignant at her proud and unfeeling disposition, loudly called after her, "Madam, remember that you are a woman yourself, and you must soon, like the most miserable female prisoner in a dungeon, inhabit but a small space of that earth from which you equally originated."

ON BAPTISM.

BY THE REV. HUGH RALPH, LL.D.,
Minister of the Scotch Church, Oldham Street, Liverpool.

WE can conceive of a parent, who duly estimates the importance of being interested in the blessings of the Gospel, looking with some anxiety into the charter which conveys them to himself, to see whether there be any provision of a similar nature for his children, in so far as, in their circumstances, these blessings can be made available to them. He loves these children as a part of himself. He eagerly arranges their condition in the world—would have them embark prosperously—trembles at the perils to which the comforts he may leave them may be exposed—and solicitously seeks to promote their worldly interests in every way in his power. He knows, however, that they must go down to the grave as he is about to go, and he would part from them with the hope of meeting again in circumstances where there is no alloy from present trouble or the prospect of separation.

And while thus anxious that his children and he should be one in spiritual privileges, he finds in the constitution of society on earth, much to encourage him that this will be the case. They inherit, whether they will or not, his fallen nature, his sickly frame, his peculiar propensities, his abilities, and his image. Until an age at which they are capable of acting for themselves, and become responsible for their conduct, they make a portion of his household; and, as it were, refer all demands on them, whether of an ordinary or moral kind, to him, who answers for their delinquencies and debts. This arrangement, he perceives, is not artificial. It arises out of the very nature of things. He looks upon it as emanating from the Almighty. And so regarding it, he naturally concludes it probable there will be a similar arrangement with reference to higher blessings, and, therefore, he comes to the Word of God actually with an expectation that, in some way or other, the covenant of grace will have provisions for his offspring as well as himself.

All this, we say, is quite natural; and, we believe, had there not been a single sentence in the Scriptures to encourage the belief that children might be part of the visible Church as well as adults, we should have had thousands of professing Christians who would have reasoned on the probability of it, or wondered how a constitution should obtain in temporal, which did not obtain in spiritual things,—a constitution so completely in accordance with nature's first and undying and, in this case, pure motions.

Now, what every Christian parent desires, and, from the very constitution of man, expects, he finds in the Word of God. There is apparent here, as there is apparent around us, a regard to the peculiar relation in which children stand to parents. They, too, are included in the terms of a covenant that guarantees spiritual blessings, and we perceive, in the arrangements of grace, nature's emotions listened to, and a parent's yearnings receiving the most complete satisfaction in promises that open out their large and rich treasures even on children.

But how can this be? The circumstances of children, with reference to temporal blessings, are very different from those with reference to spiritual blessings. The latter become ours, not by inheritance, but by a personal act on our part; and how, therefore, can individuals, who seem to be incapable of spiritual functions, become partakers of them?

Now, we are not going to enter into the question, how far infants may be capable of putting forth acts which are of a spiritual kind, as we can never arrive at any conclusion sufficiently well founded to allow of reasoning from it, though we conceive it were difficult to prove the negative on this point; and besides, the proof would come with an ill grace from those who, though they would deny infants an external rite, nevertheless, are not prepared to maintain they may not receive the blessings it represents.

We assume rather the popular belief on this point to be the true one, which is, that infants may be among the number of those who are interested in the blood of Christ, though the mode be not defined; and leaving the question, in what cases regeneration may take place, quite undecided, and indeed every metaphysical point on this dark subject, all we argue for is, the comfortable truth that, in so far as their circumstances admit of it, they are considered one with the parent in the covenant of grace.

Whether they be capable of spiritual acts, or whether, to the exclusion of a personal faith, that of their parents stands, in some sense, for theirs, or in whatever sense we view similar questions, thus much we know, they are incapable of that profession of faith which seems to be necessary to the completion of discipleship. Without, therefore, entering into questions of no profit, they are in such circumstances, as to require some peculiar administration to recognize their interest in the covenant of grace. Under these circumstances, a provision is made in the well known ordinance of baptism, which precisely meets that incapable condition of the will, in which the infant is. That ordinance is a pledge of spiritual blessings, indeed, and even where regeneration is not united with it, from whatever cause, places the subject of it in a condition of solemn obligation, in which he was not before. But, however this may be, it beautifully supplies that sort of profession which, in the incapable condition of the infant, we should expect. He cannot himself make a profession of faith in Christ. His parent makes it for him, and yet, in doing so, he observes a rite that all but indicates the personal profession of the child. He who stands at the door of the Church, as it were, to see that none but qualified members enter, requires a profession of faith on the part of the parent, and on this being obtained, puts water on the child, which element is an emblem of whatever is in a believer's creed, and which action goes to declare the child a member of the Church. So that every Christian parent who has come under the baptismal obligations for his infant, if reflecting seriously on the act, as surely he will do, feels, in the observance of it, he has just done all, under the circumstances, possible, to place his infant in the same condition with himself, as to spiritual privileges. On remembering that his child is baptized, he feels as great a relief to the anxieties of nature as, from the condition of the infant, he can feel. And though baptism be not essential to salvation, any more than a sign can be equal to the thing signified, and though we should have some doubts as to the salvation of all dying in infancy, he is well entitled, should he lose his infant, to take comfort from the thought, that he did, by the observance of this ordinance, place him, as it were, in the arms of the Redeemer, with a faith the more lively from his deep interest in the object for which it was professed.

At the moment, then, of giving up his child in baptism, the Christian parent obtains the fulfilment of the strong desire he entertains for its spiritual welfare, and the truth of that expectation which the constitution of society here justifies, in so far as the condition of the case will allow. Thus accordant is the voice of grace with the necessities and pleadings of nature. Thus in harmony is one part of God's arrangements with another.

But though for the present time, and with a view to events occurring at present, the Christian parent be thus comfortable, in reference to the highest interests of his child, he will soon be painfully convinced, should he not have already abstractly concluded, that regeneration is not necessarily united to baptism, that there are such persons as baptized infidels,—that a baptized child will sometimes spend a youth of folly, and only be wise in old age, and sometimes never be wise at all; and that even the children of eminent believers may be lamentably inferior in character and conduct to their parents. However comforted, therefore, for present purposes, in giving up his child in baptism, he requires that his dedication should involve certain provisions for the future, in order that it may give full and permanent relief to the yearnings of his spirit.

Now, still farther to illustrate how grace is in harmony with the constitution of nature, and to complete the evidence necessary to establish the position, that the lawful desire and expectation of a Christian parent is as fully answered as, under the circumstances, it can be, we observe, that the advantages of the ordinance of baptism are prospective as well as immediate, and that it contains within itself obligations that go as far as they can to secure that inward faith and repentance which are necessary to acceptableness with God.

The meaning and obligations of baptism, indeed, are but little attended to, and by too many is it observed merely in obedience to custom, and to secure earthly advantages. The abuse of it, however, is not the interpretation of its nature, and we recur to that interpretation in its full meaning, as the only evidence how far it has the high character we have assumed belongs to it.

We speak not, at present, of the reasonableness in concluding that whenever a child is dedicated to God with becoming faith, a blessing accompanies. He commands no duty to which he does not annex a privilege, and it may be a question whether, when the latter does not follow, the duty has been performed. He will not falsify his own words, uttered with reference to the admission of infants into the visible Church, at a period at which another rite was observed, and the sentiment contained in which is often repeated throughout the Scriptures, new as well as old, "I will be a God to thy seed."

But laying aside this point, which is less cognizable by us, is there not a moral force in this ordinance applying both to children and parents, which, as much as can be, entitles it to be viewed as satisfying all that parental affection dictates?

A baptized infant: What meaning is there in that simple and common expression? Born of sinful parents, he has a nature prone to evil, which shews itself so soon as circumstances will allow. United to the first, he requires a union with the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, that he may have his guilt removed, and his corrupt nature sanctified. He is now in every way, but by a personal profession, which cannot be acknowledged to belong to the Redeemer. The seal confirming the deed of conveyance is stamped on him, and around it are the words, "I am the Lord's."

It is true, the parent makes the profession of faith; and true also, the child may break and trample on the seal, and shew, that though he was within the visible, he never was within the invisible Church. During his nonage, however, his parent is bound to do his duty towards him, and place him where he ought to be, whether he will or not. And seeing he ought to be there, his after-misconduct does not affect the duty.

Even under such circumstances as these, irreligion manifested is, in some sense, apostasy, or a leaving a favoured condition. And should the baptized youth reflect, he will perceive the obligations of early dedication calling on him to exercise personally faith, and repentance, and duty. He will argue he has no choice in the matter, as it were. He will say, my parents, as an authority I dare not gainsay, gave me up to the Redeemer. I have not been living as his disciple. Vows are on me. I dare not draw back, but must exemplify what has been engaged for me. Thus will he reason, and secretly, while compelled to adopt such reasoning, he feels an inward constraint, which his conscience cannot easily put off, and which parents may take advantage of in those softer moods of the soul when a full view of its obligations smites it low, and renders it tender of impression. In short, the force of previous obligation involving the regard due to a parent's superior judgment and fond affection, and the apprehension of a doom of apostasy, strictly speaking, comes in aid of other motives, and is peculiarly fitted, under God, to awaken a desire and efforts to bring out the meaning of baptism in a renewed heart and life, without which it is valueless to its subject.

But along with this, there is a motive operating on the parent. He gave up the infant to God. In so doing, however, he intimated, that he was to follow up that dedication by religious instruction. This alone will give expression to the surrender. His child's powers unfold. He must treat him as a rational being. He now, therefore, reminds him of the obligations undergone at a time when unable to express them. He makes him acquainted with the nature of the vows, unfolds the Christian religion to him, exemplifies its precepts, and prays with and for him. And, as if to shew how completely means such as these are fitted to fulfil all a Christian parent desires for his child, a blessing is promised on them: Train up a child in the way in which he should go, that when he is old he may not depart from it. The dedication, as made by the parent, is no fanatical charm which operates without his exertion. The subject is a rational and moral one. Impression is made by rational means. And these causes act as the result of a dedication to God, formed in nonage, brought into action in mature age, the fulfilment of that first of promises in the eye of a Christian parent, "I will be a God to thy seed."

Children, indeed, have been found, who, in apparently most favourable circumstances, have grown up without God and without hope. The induction, however, has not yet been sufficiently carefully made to warrant a conclusion on this point. They are evidently exceptions to the general rule. And we are unable to say positively, that the means were just those that should have been used.

On the whole, therefore, we feel we are warranted in the conclusion, that there is provision in the covenant of grace for the admission of infants, which a Christian parent so much desires, and which all around him leads him to expect. He finds that desire fulfilled, and expectation answered, while his children are in nonage, in his giving them to God by baptism, and in the result of the obligation in awakening the subjects of it to the necessity of personally believing and repenting, and in arousing the parents to take care that these duties are exercised by the child.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
THE REV. HENRY ERSKINE, A. M.,
FORMERLY MINISTER OF CHIRNSIDE.

THIS excellent individual, who is well known as the father of Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine, was born in 1624 at Dryburgh, on the banks of the Tweed. He was one of the youngest of a family consisting of thirty-three children. Notwithstanding the vast expense incurred in rearing such a numerous flock of brothers and sisters, Henry's education was conducted with the utmost care, and after acquiring the elementary branches, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh, where he prosecuted his studies with great success, and obtained the degree of Master of Arts. Having given early proofs of piety, his parents were anxious that, if it accorded with his tastes, he should commence the study of theology. To that interesting and vitally important branch of knowledge, accordingly, he directed the whole energies of his naturally vigorous mind, and after a conscientious examination of the various controverted points which at that period engaged the public attention, he avowed his attachment to the doctrines set forth in the Scots Confession and the Westminster Confession of Faith, and to the Presbyterian forms of discipline, worship, and government.

Shortly after Mr Erskine had been licensed in connection with the Presbyterians, he received a call to preside over a congregation of that body at Cornhill, a village in the parish of Norham in Northumberland. It is uncertain in what year his ordination at Cornhill took place. His son Ebenezer dates it three years only before his ejection, or in 1659, but according to the statements of Wodrow, it would appear to have been in 1649. His ministry in this place was remarkably successful. The people became warmly attached to him, and profited much by his instructions. His loss, therefore, was deeply felt, when, by the act of uniformity, August 24, 1662, he, in common with two thousand faithful ministers in England, was ejected.

During his incumbency at Cornhill, Mr Erskine, according to his son Ebenezer, received no salary, and he was advised, after his removal from the place, to apply by petition to the king for "warrant to uplift it." For this purpose he repaired to London, but his suit was denied, unless he would conform to the Established Church. Having conscientious scruples, however, he resolutely resisted this and many other allurements held out to him with the view of persuading him to withdraw his adherence to the principles of non-conformity. While on his way to the metropolis, the ship in which he sailed was obliged, by stress of weather, to put into Harwich, where he had an opportunity of preaching the Gospel, and of enjoying delightful intercourse in private with the religious people of the town. It was a curious circumstance, and, in the providence of God, productive of much spiritual benefit to many, that the ship in which he sailed from London bound for Leith, was also driven into Harwich, and detained there for six weeks. Thus was he again permitted to minister the bread of life to his former friends, who gladly welcomed him, and relieved him from the pecuniary difficulties with which he felt himself embarrassed, in consequence of the king's refusal to grant his petition. So highly did the pious people in Harwich appreciate his services, that they earnestly urged him to return and settle among them as their pastor. This offer, however, he respectfully declined, chiefly by the instigation of Mrs Erskine, who was unwilling to take up her residence at such a distance from her friends and her native country.

Mr Erskine being now debarred from the exercise of his ministerial office among his people at Cornhill, removed with his family to Dryburgh, where he resided on his brother's estate for nearly eighteen years. An event which took place shortly after Mr Erskine had taken up his residence at Dryburgh, may be mentioned as an instance of God's special providence and care over his persecuted servant. It is here recorded on the testimony of a MS.* in the Advocates' Library, to which Mr Frazer seems to have been indebted, for the materials of his life of Mr Erskine:—

"At one time, in particular, their small store was entirely exhausted. When they had supped in the evening, and the supper was a light one, there remained neither bread, meal, flesh, nor money, in the house. The children, awaking early in the morning, cried for bread. The good man must have felt exceedingly for them; not having a morsel to give, and not knowing where he was to find a breakfast, either for the parents or the children. But his faith did not fail, and his mental tranquillity remained undisturbed. With his usual cheerfulness, he did what he could to entertain the children, and to encourage the sorrowing mother and himself to depend on that gracious Providence, which feeds the young ravens, when they cry for food. It is even stated that he took a musical instrument, the cithren or guitar, with which he sometimes recreated himself, and began to divert them with a tune. As Mr Veitch expresses it, he played and wept alternately; he being in one apartment and they in another. While he was thus engaged, they heard the sound of a horse's foot, coming along by the side of the house, and immediately a country-fellow knocked hard at the door, and called for some one to help him off with his load. Being asked whence he had come, and what was his errand, he informed them that he came from the Lady Reburn with some provisions for Mr Erskine. They told him he must be mistaken; and that it was more likely to be for Mr Erskine of Shielfield, in the same place. He replied, No: he knew what he said, and he was not such a sot as they took him to be; he was sent to Mr Henry Erskine. "Come," he concluded, "help me off with my load, or else I will throw it down at the door." They therefore took it from him, and brought it into the house; and having opened the sack, they found it well filled with meal, cheese, and such for the relief of the family. Thus he experienced the accomplishment of the promise, "Bread shall be given him, his water shall be sure;" and was mightily encouraged to rely on his heavenly benefactor, in all future straits of a similar description.

While here, he preached generally in his own house, and sometimes in the fields, prosecuting his Master's work as far as he was permitted. Nor did he neglect the precious opportunities for study which his retirement afforded, but made great progress in his acquaintance with the various branches of theology. While thus pursuing his studies, he remained unmolested for some time. At length, however, on Sabbath the 23d of April 1682, Adam Urquhart of Meldrum, with a band of soldiers, forced his way into the house of Mr Erskine, seized him, and conveyed him to prison at Melrose. Next day he was released on bail. But in the course of a few weeks, Meldrum having returned from the west of Scotland, carried Mr Erskine to Jedburgh, where again he found bail for his appearance at Edinburgh on the 12th of May. Though labouring under a severe indisposition, he was compelled to undertake the journey that he might fulfil his engagement. On his appearance before a committee of the Privy Council, Sir George M'Kenzie, the King's Advocate, asked him if he was willing to give bond to preach no more at conventicles. His reply was characteristic of the intrepid ambassador of a heavenly King,—“My Lord, I have my commission from Christ, and though I were within an hour of my death, I durst not lay it down at the feet of any mortal man.” The Advocate having reported the matter to the Council, his case was delayed till the 6th of June.

On the day appointed he was summoned before the council, and a libel being read, charging him with preaching at conventicles, and with disorderly baptizing and marrying, Chancellor Haddow Gordon asked him what he had to say to the libel. He answered that he denied the whole, adding that it was well known to all who lived about him that from September 1681 to February 1682, the Lord's hand was laid so heavily upon him that he was disabled from bowing the knee before God in his family, or even from craving God's blessing at his meals, and that since that time he had been incapacitated for the discharge of his ministerial work. The Chancellor then inquired whether he would depone that he had not preached, baptized, or married, from September till June, but he replied that he was not free to give his oath for the whole of that time.

In the course of his trial nothing was proven against him, but, with the utmost injustice, sentence was pronounced, ordaining him to pay a fine of five thousand merks, to go to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh that night, and be conveyed from thence to the Bass, and to remain there until the fine was paid, and a bond was given that he should preach no more. To prevent, if possible, his going to the Bass, he gave in a petition that afternoon to the council, desiring that the sentence might be commuted, and liberty granted him to leave Scotland, and promising to find security that he would actually do so. Through the interest of friends that favour was granted, and, accordingly, on the 14th of June, Mr Erskine's nephew, John Brown of Park, bound himself in a bond of five thousand merks, that his uncle should, within fourteen days, quit the country, never to return without liberty granted. That same day, therefore, he was released from prison.

Having prepared himself for his journey, and taken farewell of his friends, of his wife and children, he set out, like Abraham of old, "not knowing whither he went." He first directed his steps towards the north of England, and, at length settled at Parkridge, about ten miles from Carlisle. Here he remained, along with his wife and family, for more than two years. Towards the close of 1684, or the beginning of 1685, he accepted a kind invitation, from Mr Gray of Preston, to reside at Monilaws, a village about two miles from Cornhill. He had not been there many months, however, before he was dragged from his peaceful retirement and carried to Wooler. Next day they brought him to Colonel Struthers at Fowberrie, who told him that, in compliance with an order from the king, he must go to Sir John Fenwick at Newcastle. That night he was sent back to Wooler, where he had the happiness to meet with the Rev. Luke Ogle, who had been ejected from Berwick. On Saturday, July 4th, they were conveyed on horseback, under a guard of nine soldiers, to Eglingham, to the house of a justice of peace. Here they remained till Monday the 6th, when, although both Mr Erskine and Mr Ogle were seized with a sudden and severe illness, they were rudely and cruelly hurried away to Newcastle. On reaching the town Sir John Fenwick ordered them to prison, and took from them their horses, which he never afterwards restored.

* This MS., which we have carefully consulted in preparing this brief Sketch, may be found among the Wodrow Manuscripts: MSS. lxxv. Rob. lli. 4. 17. No. 14. It bears the title, "Abbreviat of the Life and Sufferings of Mr Henry Erskine, by his Son." The MS. which succeeds it in the Volume, No. 16, contains the above and other remarkable providences in the life of Mr Erskine, by his contemporary Mr Veitch.

In prison Mr Erskine's sickness increased to such an extent, that the prisoners entreated the jailor to give him liberty for a few days. This request being granted, he was received into the house of a Mrs Mann, who treated him with the utmost kindness and attention, while she refused to accept of the slightest remuneration. After having spent fourteen days under the roof of this excellent Christian woman, he voluntarily returned to prison, but on the 22d of July, he and Mr Ogle were set at liberty in terms of the act of indemnity. On leaving the prison a contribution was kindly made among his fellow-prisoners to defray the expenses of his journey home.

On his return to the bosom of his family, Mr Erskine continued to preach the Gospel at Monilaws for two years longer. At length, after the proclamation of King James, granting indulgence to the Presbyterians, he was invited by a number of pious people belonging to that persuasion in Whitsom and its neighbourhood to become their pastor. He accepted, and on September 1, 1687, he removed with his family to Rivelaw, where his people erected a meeting-house. Here he continued to labour with great fidelity and acceptance till the Revolution in 1688. It was while exercising his ministry at Whitsom, that he was honoured in being the instrument of the conversion of the celebrated Thomas Boston of Ettrick.

Shortly after the Revolution, Mr Erskine received a call to the parish of Chirnside, where he officiated faithfully and zealously during the remainder of his life. His ministry in this parish was limited to a few years, but even this period, brief though it was, sufficed to show, that he was "a workman who needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." He laboured both publicly and privately as one who knew that he must ere long render an account.

His last illness, which was a fever, terminated his life in a fortnight. Anticipating the approach of death, he caused his family to be brought, and those of them who were within reach having obeyed the summons, he exhorted them, as a dying man, to choose "the good part," assuring them that as he had never repented, so he did not then in his dying hour repent, of the sufferings he had endured in the cause of truth and righteousness. "I know," he said, "that I am going to heaven, and if you follow my footsteps, you and I shall have a happy meeting there ere long." Having, like the dying patriarch, pronounced upon them his parting blessing, he commended his wife and family to the care of his God and Father, and closed his eyes in death on the 10th of August 1696, in the seventy-second year of his age. He left behind him several children, two of whom, Ebenezer and Ralph, were long faithful and devoted ministers, the one at Portmoak and the other at Dunfermline. Many years, however, after the decease of their father, both of them became famous as leaders of the Secession which took place about a hundred years ago from the Church of Scotland.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

BY AN AMERICAN.

COMMUNICATED BY D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. IV.

In the preceding papers I have given an account of the causes which have operated, with more or less efficiency, to introduce and promote the doctrines of Unitarianism and of universal salvation in New England. It only remains that I should trace, as briefly as possible, the progress of these heresies, and take a summary view of the present state of religion in the whole country.

It was not till more than one hundred years after the first colonies were planted in New England that any considerable departures from the orthodox faith of the congregational churches appeared. About the year 1740 or 1745, it began to be suspected that some of the clergy of Boston had become Arminian. But I do not think that there is any evidence which could establish the fact that any minister, besides the Rev. Dr Chauncy, had adopted these sentiments at that period, though it is more than probable that several had become not only Arminian, but also semi-Pelagian, before the death of Dr Chauncy, which occurred in 1787. It will be remembered that it has already been stated that that distinguished man was a great opponent of the Rev. Mr Whitefield, and of the revival which occurred in 1740-1745. He became not only an Arminian of the lowest stamp before his death, but also a believer and a strenuous advocate of the doctrine of universal salvation.

The Rev. Dr Freeman, pastor of the Episcopal church called King's Chapel, avowed the doctrines of Unitarianism before 1790. At that time, or soon afterwards, there is reason to believe that the greater part of the congregational ministers of Boston became affected by this heresy. But there was no avowal of it, on their part, until a much later day. Meanwhile, by the circulation of the writings of Priestly, Belsham, and Lindsey, and other distinguished English Unitarian authors, the heresy became more widely diffused. About the year 1804, the Rev. Mr Sherman, in Connecticut, and in 1810, the Rev. Mr Abbot, in the same State, avowed Unitarianism. About the same time, the Rev. Messrs Noah and Thomas Worcester, of New Hampshire, avowed a sort of Arianism. But a full development of the progress which heresy had made did not take place until several years afterwards. This occurred in 1815, and was occasioned by the republication, in Boston, of a chapter contained in Belsham's Life of Lindsey, in which an account was given of Mr Lindsey's correspondence with certain congregational ministers and laymen of Boston, who, in their correspondence, avowed their Unitarian sentiments, and informed their English correspondent of the progress which these doctrines had secretly made among the ministers of Boston and its vicinity.

The publication of these letters made much noise. There was no longer room for concealment of their sentiments. Accordingly, several of the ministers of Boston did not hesitate longer to declare them. Then began a controversy between some of the leading ministers in that city and its vicinity, including the Rev. Drs Worcester, Woods, and Professor Stuart, on the side of evangelical truth, and the Rev. Drs Ware and Chap-follows, that mankind were fully aware of the path along which they were travelling, understood its nature, and foresaw its consequences. Indeed the very reverse was the truth. But while the apparently natural course of events bore towards the crisis, without the intention, or even the consciousness of the agents, the voice of prophecy from time to time foretold the approaching catastrophe, and kept alive its expectation. And this agreement between events and predictions,—this unanimity in the expectations of Gentiles and of Jews,—pointed out and proved the harmony subsisting between the foreknowledge and the ruling providence of God. It proved the exact identity between what is called the natural course of events, and the wise pre-arrangements of Providence; and the inability of man to discover, comprehend, or control either. If it had even been possible for some mind of profound political and moral sagacity to have foreseen the ruin of all existing institutions and creeds, because of the prevalence of that destroying principle, sin, there is no reason to imagine that such a mind could have conceived the idea of the glorious recovery of man by the infusion of a new principle of life and holiness. Hence it was that all misunderstood the language of prophecy, and entertained mistaken notions respecting the character and condition of "Him that was to come;" so that when He came into that world which was made by Him, it "knew Him not," and his own people "received him not."

THE AWFUL DANGER OF RESISTING THE SPIRIT:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ANDREW BULLOCK, A.M.,
Minister of Tulliallan.

"The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar."—GEN. xix. 23.

GOD, the Judge of all the earth, does in all things act rightly. While the face of the Lord is against those that do evil to cut off their remembrance from the earth, he redeemeth the soul of his servants, and proves a shield and a buckler to all those that fear his name. This truth is strikingly illustrated in the narrative of which our text forms a part. The angels who were sent from heaven to destroy Sodom, were also commissioned to save Lot; and this commission was to be executed first. "Haste thee," said the heavenly messengers to the patriarch, "haste thee, escape to Zoar, for we cannot do any thing till thou be come thither." The Lord knoweth them that are his, and while he knoweth how to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment, to be punished, he also knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation. Our text informs us, that "the sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar." We must not consider these words as merely informing us of the particular time when Lot reached a place of safety. The knowledge of such an event is not in the least degree instructive, and can scarcely be called interesting. We should have lost but little though it had never been mentioned. And yet this is all the information which, at first sight, the verse seems to convey. We should, however, remember that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and, therefore, is not merely intelligible, but is, moreover, profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness. If we carefully examine the words, as in connection with the context, we shall obtain much instruction, and that also deeply interesting.

I. I observe, that these words teach us this momentous truth,—that when men have long persisted in sin, and despised the forbearance of God, the warnings of his providence, and the suggestions of his Spirit,—have filled up the measure of their iniquity,—then God may withdraw the influences of his Spirit, sooner or later, and deliver them up to a reprobate mind, without giving any intimation of the awful judgment of heaven which is about to overwhelm them. Such was the guilt, and such the doom, of the inhabitants of the cities of the plain. Their guilt will appear to be great, and their doom to be just, if we consider their wickedness, in reference to the circumstances of their case, the age in which they lived, the temporal comforts bestowed on them, and even the religious advantages they enjoyed. The deluge was then a recent event; its desolate effects were probably still visible in many places; eye-witnesses of its ravages, or, at least, if we consider the period to which human life was then extended, numbers who had heard of them from eye-witnesses, were still to be met with, and yet the solemn and affecting lessons which had been taught by such an awful visitation, were either forgotten or disregarded. Both judgments and blessings seem to have proved alike ineffectual with these men. The infliction of wrath, which had swept away at once a world of transgressors, could not deter them from sin; nor had the uncommon natural advantages of their situation been sufficient to inspire them with sentiments of gratitude to the Giver of their mercies. The amazing fertility of their soil, the fulness of bread with which it supplied them, served only to beget idleness, pride, impurity, and, as we learn from Ezekiel, unfeeling conduct toward the poor and needy. Abraham, too, lived not far off, and the good works and piety of the father of the faithful would so unquestionably shine around him that the men of the plain must have seen the light, and might have been led by it to glorify Him who was the God of Abraham. Nay, few as were the worshippers of the true God, in that dark age, there was dwelling with them one who feared the name, and walked in the ways, of the Lord. Lot sojourned, for a considerable time, within the walls of one of their cities, and this circumstance, which was so unfavourable to the personal religion of that good man, was a singular privilege and benefit to them. Not only were they safe as long as he was with them, but they also enjoyed the advantages of his godly example, his salutary exhortations, and his faithful reproofs. "That just man," we are informed from the Word of God, "dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing their unlawful deeds, vexed his righteous soul from day to day," and, unquestionably, his grief of soul at the abominable conversation of these wicked men, would constrain him, from day to day, to lift up his voice in reprobation of their sinful conduct, in warning them of the awful consequences by which it must be followed, in exhorting them to break off their crimes by repentance, to cease to do evil and learn to do well. Neither his example, however, nor his admonitions were attended with any effects, or able to impress them with a sense of their guilt and danger. They were all without exception wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly. It was now time for the Lord to work; since his law was made void, and his fear cast off, it was time to show that verily there was a God in heaven who hated sin,—that verily there was a God that judged in the earth, who had power to punish sinners. Besides, it was necessary that God should not only testify his displeasure against sin, but should also show himself strong in the protection of righteousness, and interpose in behalf of his Church, which, as then existing in the family of Abraham, in the near neighbourhood of these ungodly men, was in danger of being either overwhelmed by their violence, or corrupted by the contagion of their example. Angels were accordingly dispatched from heaven to destroy these cities. But, previously to the infliction of vengeance, Lot was directed solemnly to warn his sons-in-law,—a warning which could not but be known to the other inhabitants of the place,—that destruction was at hand. This warning, like others which had preceded it, was unheeded and despised, and it was never repeated. Lot, early in the morning, under the guidance of the angels, withdrew from the city, and he went in silence. He did not raise his voice in the streets, as he passed along, to sound a final alarm in the ears of his friends, to tell them that though the moment of their ruin was rapidly advancing, deliverance was still possible, and escape yet in their power; he did not shake the dust of their city off his feet as a parting testimony against them, in the hope that a warning uttered in such circumstances, with his loins girt, his shoes on his feet, his staff in his hand, and he and his family actually departing, conducted by the two mysterious strangers, must carry home conviction to those whom other intimations had failed to impress. No. The iniquity of these sinners had now reached its height. The last warning was already given, and the wrath of Omnipotence was about to be revealed. And not only had Lot given his last warning, but no farther warning was to be given by any other person, no additional intimation of impending ruin was to be vouchsafed from any quarter whatever. Nature pursued its wonted course, in the wonted manner. The evening set in, the night passed away, and the morning came as usual. Lot left the city early, and we are told in our text that the sun was risen when he entered Zoar. Yes, the sun arose, and the morning which ushered in destruction to the place dawned as it had done on other mornings before, unattended by a single circumstance which was uncommon or alarming. Now, let us remember that God may act in a similar manner to us, if we still continue to despise the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God is meant to lead us to repentance. If such has been our conduct and character, not only may he, and that most justly, cast us away from his presence, and take his Holy Spirit from us, and leave us in a state of judicial hardness, with the curse hanging over our heads; but he may do so in an hour when we think not, without apprising us of his purpose, without addressing to us any intimation of the danger to which we lie exposed. And we must not imagine that nothing but a lengthened course of open and aggravated sin can thus render us the objects of his signal but righteous displeasure. The offensiveness of our conduct in the sight of God does not consist in the number and greatness of our sins, considered solely in themselves, but in their number and greatness, considered in relation to the means of grace, the spiritual advantages which we have enjoyed, and the facilities afforded us of forsaking sin and cultivating holiness, and the effects which, in consequence, have been produced on our actions and our life.

It is very possible that there may be some here present, who are not chargeable with the commission of any presumptuous flagrant sins, and who have maintained a fair and irreproachable character in the opinion of the world, who are yet more offensive in the sight of God than others who have committed the very sins from which they have abstained. And why? because the individuals to whom I am alluding may have never been exposed to as strong temptation, because they may have possessed superior moral and religious advantages, and because, notwithstanding these advantages, they have made no progress in the knowledge of divine truth, and in the practice of that holiness, without which they shall never see God. They who have richly enjoyed the means of grace, and with whom the Spirit of God has long, and frequently, and earnestly, striven to convince them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, should lay it to heart that this striving is not to continue always. "For as the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God, so that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned." God may punish us for our impenitence by placing us at a distance from the means of grace, and by removing us from the society of those pious friends, whose counsels, if they were not effectual in exciting us to struggle for an entrance at the strait gate, were sufficient to deter us from running, with the eagerness of others, along the broad road that leadeth to destruction. Or, as more generally is the case, he may allow all things apparently to remain as they were,—he may continue to us the example and the exhortations of pious friends, opportunities of reading the Word, and of attending on the preaching of the Gospel, and a full and regular enjoyment of the outward means of grace, and he may, at the same time, allow our souls to remain unaffected and unimproved by them all. He may, in the one case, never awaken us to a sense of the privileges which we have lost, and, in the other case, never bring us to perceive that we are reaping no benefit from their continued advantages,—that the Bible is to us a sealed book,—the preaching of the Word an unknown sound, and prayer is a lifeless form. The kingdom of heaven, we are told, cometh not with observation; aye, my friends, and it is also true that it goeth away without observation. When our Lord, in the Gospel, healed the child that was possessed of a devil, the foul spirit cried and rent him sore, and left him as dead, before coming out of him. But it is not so with the Holy Spirit; that great agent in enlightening, and reproving, and warning men, may finally and for ever withdraw from the sinner, who has long disregarded, and grieved, and resisted, and despised him, unattended by tumult or by pain, without giving the man any violent, or distinct, or even perceptible notice, of his departure. As he resembles the dove in the winged mildness with which he descends and acts upon the human heart, may he not also, my friends, resemble the dove in the gentleness and silence in which he gradually departs from the sinner by whom he has been unkindly received or injuriously treated?

It is surely an alarming consideration, that a man may have heard the last sermon by which his conscience shall be touched, and received the last warning which the Spirit shall give him, and have the wrath of God hanging over his guilty head, and be as a vessel fitted to receive that wrath, and yet be perfectly unconscious of his awful condition. God, in righteous judgment, withholds from him every intimation of his swiftly advancing destruction, and no suspicion ever arises in his own breast, by which he might be led to implore mercy, or to seek for shelter.

II. I observe, that not only may God give to sinners no intimation of their approaching ruin, after they have offended him, and long grieved and despised his Holy Spirit, but farther, that this interval between the last warning and utter destruction, is often to wicked men the period of their profoundest security, and during which they are least apprehensive of danger. This was the case with the inhabitants of the city in which Lot dwelt. Never were men more safe in their own estimation than were they in the hours which immediately preceded their ruin. Not one individual formed a plan, or made an effort, or expressed a wish to escape, because none ever entertained the slightest apprehension of danger. When Lot went and spoke to his sons-in-law, saying, "Up, get you out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city," the friendly intimation was made light of, and treated with contempt, and an air of ridicule; the good old man "seemed as one that mocked to his sons-in-law." Many a bargain would they and their fellow-citizens that day conclude, many a purchase would they make, many a scheme both of lawful industry and unlawful pleasure, would they plan, while they said in their hearts, "to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." Or, if the consciences of any of them should be visited with alarm, if their hearts should misgive when they awoke in the night, and reflected on their crimes, or pondered on the solemn words of the patriarch, and the possibility of his prediction being fulfilled, their uneasy apprehensions would vanish away with the cheerful return of the morning light. That morning, which was the last that they were to behold, was not ushered in by earthquakes, or tempest, or whirlwind, fit forerunners of what was to come; the sky did not lour, the early dawn was not overcast with clouds of portentous gloom. At the approach of that great and terrible day, the sun was not darkened, nor the moon turned into blood; "the sun," we are told, "was risen upon the earth, when Lot entered into Zoar." Not only had the great luminary of heaven ascended above the horizon, at the expected time and place, and changed night into day; not only was he risen, as on other mornings, but he was risen upon the earth, so that he could be distinctly seen and felt, both enlightening the earth with his rays, and warming the surface of the ground with his heat. From the expression employed, it appears that the morning was one of more than usual serenity and splendour. How gay must have been the spectacle of such a morning, in such a climate, and on such a soil! for all the plain was well watered everywhere, even as the garden of the Lord. How charming to survey the rich mantle of many colours with which nature had clad the region, and to contemplate the various forms of animal life which browsed in the fields, or moved through the air, and filled it with their music! How delightful to the eyes even of these ungodly men, to look upon the morning sun gilding, with his beams, so beautiful a prospect! How interesting to Lot must have been the sight of four cities in the midst of the landscape! How solemn for him to reflect, that every step he took in his road to Zoar, was bringing him the nearer to a place of safety, as it was accelerating the destruction which was to overwhelm their guilty population, and was lessening the number which separated them from the wrath of heaven! Ah! how ill fitted was such a calm and peaceful scene, to introduce the one which was next! How ill did such a morning harmonize with the long, and black, and dark night with which it was to be followed! One should have thought that the season of midnight, when silent gloom overspreads the earth, and deep sleep falleth on man, would have been the hour in which destruction was to come. Who would have dreaded its approach, in the brightness of early morning, the very hour and emblem of security, and cheerfulness, and joy? But at that very time, when there was nothing whatever in the heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the surrounding air, to give the men of the place the slightest intimation of the coming event, when the very possibility of it was not even in their most distant thoughts, when the shades of the night had been dispelled by the dawn, when the inhabitants had shaken off the heaviness of slumber, and were beginning to experience that truly the light is sweet, and to feel how pleasant a thing it is to behold the sun,—in these very circumstances, when they were in a state of most profound security, destruction came as a whirlwind, and fear as desolation. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the sun is veiled, day gives place to night, the cities of the plain are covered with a sulphurous canopy. The smoke of the country goes up as the smoke of a furnace. Jehovah, who had long borne with the great wickedness of these ungodly men, at last arose, and his enemies were scattered. As wax melteth before the fire, so did they perish at his presence. They were cast down into destruction, they were brought into desolation as in a moment, they were utterly consumed with terrors. Such was the awful end of these men. The hour of their greatest self-confidence, the hour when their security seemed least likely to be disturbed, was the hour of their destruction. And this is not a singular or a solitary case. The Scriptures abound in examples of other ungodly men having been cut off when the day of vengeance was wholly unlooked for, and they wholly unprepared to meet their God. When impious Belshazzar, with his thousand lords, his princes, his wives, and his concubines, were polluting and profaning the vessels dedicated to the worship of God, and praising the gods of gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, and wood, and stone, in that same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall, and in that same night was Belshazzar slain. As the rich man in the parable was surveying, with delight, the addition which a season of plenty had made to his wealth, and drinking in fancy of that cup of worldly pleasure which many years should not exhaust, God said, but said in accents which did not reach his ear, nor alarm his heart, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." The days of Noah, too, were like the days of Lot. In the days of Noah, they did eat, they drank, they married wives, and were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man cometh. It is altogether unnecessary for me to multiply either examples or authorities of Scripture, that the ungodly man knoweth not his time: he knoweth neither when the day of mercy ends, nor when the day of reprobation begins; but as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare, so are the wicked snared in an evil time when it falleth suddenly upon them. Ye yourselves, my brethren, know perfectly, that to many the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night, and that often when men have their hearts entangled with worldly cares, and intoxicated with worldly pleasures, and are saying to themselves peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they do not escape. How painful is the thought, that there are men in the world, whom neither threatening and wrath, nor, it may be, repeated inflictions of judgments, neither unnumbered temporal mercies, nor the most plentiful abundance of means of grace, have been effectual in leading to forsake sin, and to turn to righteousness; who have long rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and despised the riches of his grace, have at last filled up the measure of their iniquity, and cut themselves off from the mercy of the Lord, rendered themselves objects of his fierce indignation, and the heirs of his endless wrath; and who, while they are in such a sad and awful state, with the sentence of their condemnation unalterably pronounced, yea speedily to be executed, are flattering their souls with dreams of most profound security, and not merely putting the evil day far from them, but never once thinking of the possibility of its approach! Is it not solemn to reflect, that in every congregation there are individuals, who, though they have enjoyed many and great religious advantages from earliest infancy, have permanently profited from none, but have been, like the sands which are warmed by the sun, fanned with every breeze, and moistened with every shower, but on which nothing grows; who have had the Scriptures almost daily in their hands, but could never find in them the words of eternal life, nor learn from them the knowledge that maketh wise unto salvation; who have had the truths of the Gospel preached in their hearing every Sabbath-day, and its doctrines and phraseology familiar in their mouths as household words, but whose understandings have never been effectually convinced of the infinite importance of the plan of redemption which the Gospel unfolds, nor their lives regulated by its precepts, nor their hearts purified by its hopes; the sum total of whose Christianity amounts to a few hours of serious meditation previously to their first encompassing the table of the Lord, some confessions of guilt, and some vows to love and serve God made in sickness, but forgotten in health; an abstaining from such gross sins as might alarm their conscience, or injure their character or worldly interests; who have nothing but the outward form of godliness, and yet are as satisfied and solaced with having the form, as the genuine Christian is with feeling the power and exhibiting the reality? How affecting is the thought, that a mere professor of religion may be regarding himself with sentiments of fondest complacency, and thinking himself perfectly secure as to his character here, and his state hereafter, while God is accounting him as an unprofitable servant, and a false disciple, and when not only have the awful words concerning him been pronounced, "Cut him down, why cumbereth he the ground," but the very period of added grace, with its renewed opportunities, warnings, and invitations, is about to expire, and the hour almost come when long-suffering patience shall no more be exercised, and even mercy itself shall cease to interpose! How deeply then, my friends, does it concern us, to examine the foundation on which our tranquillity of mind rests! How momentous an object is it, and how essentially connected with our eternal interests, to ascertain whether the peace we enjoy be such as arises from a cordial acceptance of Christ as our Redeemer, a cheerful and unreserved obedience to his commands, and a firm belief in his power to save us from wrath, and to bring us to glory, or from our conscience having become seared by the practice of sin, and ourselves having been delivered up to a state of judicial hardness of heart! When a man, after having once been the subject of serious impressions, has long neglected to improve the means of grace, and despised the goodness of God, and resisted the operations of his Holy Spirit, he finds himself in a state of calmness and ease unexperienced before.

What is such tranquillity in its real nature, and in the end to which it conducts, but the hope of the hypocrite which shall soon be cut off; and to what can it be more fitly compared than to the treacherous calm which ushers in and which aggravates the desolations of the earthquake or the storm? As it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded, but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, the same moment that he entered into Zoar, and while the rising sun was shining on their dwellings, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. In like manner, the time when ungodly sinners, and, may I not add, when lukewarm Christians, are indulging in dreams of profoundest security, may be the very time of their utter and their endless ruin. They may be looking back on past difficulties and past dangers; they may be in perfect health and flourishing in affluence, and be exultingly contrasting their present state of outward comfort and happiness with their former trials and distresses, and tasting all the blessings of an overflowing cup; they may be laying their wisest, and most judicious, and most extensive schemes of worldly ambition, in the very hour, and at the very moment when the often threatened and long suspended vengeance of an angry God bursts upon their head. "In such an hour as they think not, the Son of man cometh." Be ye not, then, my friends, in darkness, that that day may not overtake you as a thief. Ye are all, at least ye all profess to be, the children of light, and the children of the day. Therefore do not sleep as do others, but watch and be sober.

THE DEATH OF MRS SCHOOFF, OF POONA.

[THE following interesting account of the death of a devoted Christian female is given by the Rev. J. Mitchell, one of the General Assembly's Missionaries, in the "Oriental Christian Spectator," for October 1836.]

I may be allowed to say, that the General Assembly's mission here has met with a severe loss. Mrs Schooff was an able, a devoted, and a gratuitous labourer. The poor Hindu girls and women have also lost a kind and affectionate teacher. Having been familiar, from her youth, with one of the native languages, she had facilities for labour, which are seldom to be found in ladies who come to this country considerably advanced in life. She was ready, according to her ability, to every good work: besides taking a close and daily charge of the female schools of this mission, and attending to a class in the English Sabbath schools, she had made arrangements for commencing a boarding establishment for destitute girls and others, who would be under her care night and day. Houses for beginning operations had indeed been built, and some girls and women had been engaged. But lo! in the midst of these plans of usefulness, she is cut down by a short illness of fifteen days; her labours are brought to an end, and she is received to her reward. Whilst we wonder at these dispensations, we submit, knowing that in very faithfulness God doth afflict us, that where we cannot trace we must trust him, and cast the work which he has committed to us still upon his care, assured that though one and all of us should die, it will, in his own time, advance to the completion. Though our faith is tried, it is not extirpated; we still hang upon God's Word. He will give us those fellow-labourers, and that success, which will redound to his own glory.

Mrs Schooff did not confine her labours to the schools; she also gave herself diligently to the study of the Maráthi language, and to the composition of books in that language. A tract, a translation by her, has been accepted by the Bombay Book and Tract Society, and she has left, in a state of considerable forwardness, an original work of much larger size, containing biographical notices of the principal characters mentioned in the New Testament. Other works, to be immediately set about, she had planned. In one of those, which required some picturing, she was to have had the aid of a valuable female friend at the station.

I pray that this short statement of her doings and intentions may be the means of rousing to the work of evangelizing the heathen many of our female friends, who, I am certain, have talents for the work, and could also, with a little management, command sufficient time. Mrs Schooff is not the only instance of a lady, not necessarily connected with a mission, devoting herself expressly to the work of God. I may mention one, dear to her, alas! gone to her rest, and from whose fire she imbibed no inconsiderable portion of her missionary flame, Mrs Candy. I could also mention a dear friend still with us; but I would not intrude on labours which court not public observation, which will be fully rewarded at the resurrection of the just, yea, which are even now, however obscure, their own reward.

"From near the commencement of that illness she seemed to think that death was in the cup: and she even then expressed to me a readiness, yea, even a wish, to depart and be with Jesus. She seemed to give herself much to prayer and religious meditation, and was always delighted when I could command leisure to pray with her, and read the Scriptures to her, which she could not well do herself from the position in which she found it necessary to lie. She would then often request me to pray for something particular, as for much of the light of the Lord's countenance, that Jesus might be near her, that she might have patience under her sufferings, that she might not be much racked with pain. In reading to her the Scriptures, she would often stop me, and say, 'Read that again, it is so sweet,' or 'I do not fully understand it,' showing how much her mind was exercised on the various subjects which were presented. Once, when we had been conversing about the value and excellency of Jesus, she said, 'O! the sound of his name is very sweet to me: introduce it as much as you can into your reading, if possible, in every verse.' I was then reading to her out of a collection of promises, so that I had little difficulty in complying with her request.

"During the whole of her illness, she was always ready to speak comfort to those around her; to her sorrowing mother especially she used to say, 'Do not weep for me; there is no occasion here for tears.' I observed only one cloud come over her mind; it was about the middle of the period of her affliction. I was, as usual, reading to her, when I came to a promise addressed to the 'righteous,' such as, 'the righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath pure hands shall wax stronger and stronger,' she interrupted me, and said, 'So you think I can appropriate these words to myself?' Then continuing further to disclose the state of her mind, she said that she was not righteous; that she had been thinking of her past life; that she saw it to be filled with sin; that it appeared very unprofitable; that even her best actions were unworthy, as she feared that wrong motives had often prompted her to do what she had done; that there was much more regard to man in them than there ought to have been. I knew that it would be quite in vain, as is always the case in these circumstances, to speak to her about the evidences of her sincerity and piety. I immediately admitted that all she had stated might be true, that we are all sinners, that even the best Christians come short of the glory of God daily; but that whilst these things should humble us, they should not make us miserable, or keep us from coming to Jesus for pardon and for grace. In order to quiet her mind, I repeated several passages of Scripture, and among them occurred these words, 'The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin.' This had the desired effect, and she said, 'Yes, yes, these are precious words! I will take hold of them, and rest upon them.' And she farther added with Job, 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.' The first of these passages was afterwards often in her mouth. 'The blood of Jesus,' was an expression occurring in almost everything she said.

"From this time till her death, which was six or seven days after, she had an uninterrupted season of joy and comfort, although she experienced no great ecstasies. The above conversation took place in the evening; and when I went to her next morning, she said that she was happy, that she had been thinking a great deal during the night, that she was now sure that her sins were pardoned, and that she was a child of God. I conceive that this exercise, about the evil of sin, is just as striking a proof of her piety, as the greatest raptures would have been. It shows how deeply she was impressed with a sense of her vileness and unworthiness, and how tenderly she was alive to the glory of God, and the desirableness of complete purity. It was, as it were, a finishing stroke in her preparation for heaven. Her exercise thus led her to feel still more deeply the value of the dear Redeemer, and went to prepare her for praising Him 'who has loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood,' and for ascribing to him glory for ever and ever. Amen.

"I think it was on the same morning, when conversing with her concerning the love of Jesus, and repeating such passages of Scripture and portions of hymns as I thought suitable to the occasion, that she herself began to repeat, as expressive of her present feelings, the fifty-fourth paraphrase of our collection:

'I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Nor to defend his cause.'

Here her voice failed her, and she requested me to repeat the whole of it for her, which I did—

'Maintain the glory of his cross,
And honour all his laws.
Jesus my Lord! I know his name,
His name is all my boast;
Nor will he put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost.
I know that safe with him remains,
Protected by his power,
What I've committed to his trust,
Till the decisive hour.'

Then will he own his servant's name
Before his Father's face,
And in the new Jerusalem
Appoint my soul a place.'

She also manifested great comfort in the hymn—

'All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall:
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all!'

About this time, she gave me some directions concerning the disposal of her worldly matters with the greatest composure.

"It was now that her medical attendants had some better hopes of her case than previously; but instead of being delighted with the prospect of recovery, at which those around her were anxious to grasp, she manifested no desire for it. She even said that she would rather not, as it referred to herself, recover, though she would submit to the will of the Lord, if it would be for his glory. Thus, when by her still continuing to sink, hope was again extinguished in the minds of her attendants, she was not in the least moved by it. The nearer death approached, the more desirous was she to be gone. On the afternoon of Sabbath last, the 15th instant, the day previous to her dissolution, she was heard to say, 'Come quickly, Lord Jesus!' and addressing me, she said, 'O how is He so late of coming!' Perhaps, bodily pain might have some effect in producing this particular anxiety to depart, as she once, referring to her distress, said, when I was about to pray with her, 'Beseech him not to tear me.' I believe this was the only time I heard her complain of her distress, and it seemed not to be from any impatient feeling, but rather from a desire that she might have her mind at ease and collected.

"The same evening, as she could not sleep, I was sitting by her; it was perhaps about eleven o'clock P. M., and she seemed to be in a very heavenly frame of mind. I was silent, and everything in the house was hushed, when, with her hands clasped together, and her eye uplifted towards heaven, she exclaimed, 'Glorious Jesus!' Then, after a little pause, 'I do not wish to remain;' and then, after another pause, 'Come quickly, dear Jesus!' Then again, 'Thou art hiding.' Now she was silent, and in a little while uttered another exclamation, 'Thou art obedient!' Then, after a pause, 'My sweet baby is there!' I did not interrupt her during this vision, as it seemed to be of heaven; but when she appeared sunk back again to earth, I rose, and placed my hand on one of hers, which was quite cold, when she held up both of them, and said, 'These are tokens of the promised rest,' I suppose in reference to their being now cold and benumbed, and so indicating her approaching end.

"Soon after this, as if having had an angel from heaven strengthening her, she cast her arm round the neck of the nurse, who was attending near her, and addressing her in the most affectionate accents, told her of the great value of the soul, entreated her to think of it, and to flee to the blood of Christ for refuge. As she knew that the woman was a Roman Catholic, she exhorted her to renounce all dependence on the Pope, saying, 'He cannot save you. He is not God; he is a mere man like yourself. He is not even man, he is Satan.' Having thus addressed her in a most serious and inimitable manner, both for language and feeling, and having got a promise from the woman to think of what she had said, she laid her hand on her breast, and said, in a most heavenly way, which made me feel it good to be there, 'I cannot tell you how precious Jesus is to me. I would not change my present feelings for the promise of ages of the greatest worldly happiness.' She then called her ayah, and addressed her in Hindustani. There was something indescribably touching in hearing the accents of tenderness, entreaty, and piety clothed in this tongue,

She began by telling her that she was dying, and going to God; and then beseeched her to renounce Muhammad, and to believe in Jesus, as the only Saviour of the guilty, and then to come with her to glory. The poor woman was deeply affected, and cried much all the time of this most moving address.

"She next called an old male servant, who had been with her about twelve years as a tailor, and for whom she had much affection, and addressing him in the same language, and in the same strain, she exhorted him to flee to the blood of sprinkling, to renounce Muhammad, as no prophet, and said that she prayed for his salvation. This man was also deeply affected, and promised to think of what she had said.

"Her mother, hearing some commotion in the room, came in, and entreated her to spare herself; she then addressed her in something of these terms, 'O my dear mother! I may yet comfort you, but I thought this such a nice opportunity to testify to these poor souls.'—The ruling passion strong in death.

"I did not attempt to hinder her from thus addressing the servants. I could not; I literally stood still to see the salvation of God. It was a season the like of which I have only once before witnessed, and may not soon be so highly favoured again. It is impossible to convey an idea of the heavenliness of it to any one who was not present. Such language, and tenderness of feeling, put me much in mind of Him who spake as never man spake. O! such preaching, could it be attained to, thought I, how powerful must it prove!

"After this she fell into a sleep, which lasted till about four o'clock on Monday morning. As I then approached her bedside, she told me to speak of Jesus to her; that she felt disappointed that she was still here; that she thought Jesus had promised to take her to himself before this time; that, however, during the night she had enjoyed unspeakable pleasure in a vision of the glory of God, which was indescribable; that, in consequence, she thought she now loved God even more than the Saviour himself. I said to her, 'My dear Mrs Schooff, you know Jesus is God.' She answered, 'I know that; I was only referring to former things.' I suppose she here alluded to her former perceptions of the Saviour's glory, as eclipsed by what she had now seen. I asked her if she had seen any one besides God. She replied, 'O yes! I saw the angels.' How many of them? 'I could not number them; there was a host.' What else did you see? 'My own dear child, and my sister's child, and my beloved Mrs Candy.' I then mentioned to her the names of some departed saints, and asked if she had not recognized any of them. She said, 'No; I was not very intimate with them.' This, though doubtless a mere dream, seemed to have a very comforting effect on her spirits, and was, no doubt, allowed for that very purpose; and it showed with what her mind was fully occupied.

"From this time till about three o'clock p.m., she continued to sink fast, but spoke now and then in a very comforting manner, and attended to what was spoken and read to her. I think that it was during this period that, after having said something of Jesus, and feeling her inability to proceed, she said to me, 'Be you my mouth to speak his praise.' About this time also she sent some messages to her relations and friends, but feeling it difficult, she said, 'Exhort them all to believe in the Saviour, and give them my love and blessing.'

"She now mentioned to me that, after she was dead, she wished me to call together the girls of her Marathi school, and charge them in her name to renounce idolatry, and believe in the Redeemer. She added, 'Tell them that this is the word of God. Tell Rumi,' a Hindu woman who has for some time been under her instruction in the school, and has at times shewn much feeling on the subject of religion, 'not to delay longer, but instantly to receive the grace of the Saviour.' A similar message she left to her pandit, in whose spiritual well-being she had much interested herself, and who had also given her some hope that her labour had not been in vain. The servants of the house she also wished me particularly to address. To all this I promised to attend, and was enabled to do so on the day of her funeral, when several of those present seemed much affected. The interests of the school now mentioned, for which, during the last year and a half, she had laboured most assiduously, seemed to dwell much on her mind. She expressed particular satisfaction when she was assured that everything would be done to secure its efficiency, and to carry it on in the way in which she left it. When her mother once spoke to her on the subject, she said, 'May God bless you, my dear mother, you have greatly comforted me.'

"To her class in the Sabbath school, she left a message with a lady, a worker together with her in this labour of love. She wished them to be particularly exhorted to attend to religion in the days of their youth.

"After the hour above-mentioned, she seemed to have lost, in a great measure, the power of communication, though she was evidently quite sensible, and heard whatever was read beside her, and also united in the prayers which were put up in her behalf. On one occasion, after we had been kneeling around her bed in supplication, she opened her eyes and looked upon us all as if she wanted to say something. I asked her if she was happy, when she very audibly answered, 'I am happy.' And when I added, 'Are you trusting on the Lord Jesus?' she nodded assent. She afterwards brought my ear near to her mouth to make me hear something she wished to say, but we could only guess at what was the import of her communication. From this till she died, I think the only articulate sentence she uttered was another, 'I am happy,' in answer to a question proposed to her. Just about nine o'clock on Monday evening she called out for the nurse, and raising herself up a little, was caught in the arms of those who had rushed to her couch, and having placed her head on the shoulder of the nurse, was dead in a few moments. Her spirit winged its way to the mansions which Jesus has prepared for those who love him,—took its station before the throne of her Saviour and her God. Then all her most warmly cherished hopes were fully realized.

'And there she now doth stand,
With angel harp and voice,
Amid the holy saintly band,
Who do in Christ rejoice.
Her joy shall never pass away,
Her crown of gold shall ne'er decay.'"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Prayer, the Christian's delight.—Whatever is the believer's lot, wherever the bounds of his habitation are appointed, and whatever are the outward circumstances of his condition, it is his great aim to maintain a prayerful spirit. At times, he enters into his closet, and shuts the door, and prays to his Father who is in secret, and his Father, who seeth in secret, rewards him openly. (Mat. vi. 6.) At times, he goes with the multitude to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that keep holy day, and he pours out his soul to him, saying, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance. O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hammonites, from the hill Mizar." (Ps. xlii. 5, 6.) At other times, the place of his devotion is by the river side, where prayer may have been wont to be made, (Acts xvi. 13); or, like that of St. Peter, upon the house-top at the sixth hour. (Acts x. 30.) Sometimes, like St. Paul and his friends, it is on the sea shore that he kneels down and prays, (Acts xxi. 5;) and, upon other occasions, in obedience to apostolic precept, it is with the sick that he pours forth the prayer of faith. (James v. 15.) At evening, and morning, and noon, does he pray and cry aloud. (Ps. lv. 17.) In a word, the believer ever carries about with him his prayerful spirit; he cannot be without it,—it is the link between his soul and heaven. As the ivy bush, by its fibres, climbs up and surmounts the lofty wall, or the towering tree, so is prayer, that living tendrill, put forth from the spirit of the believer, by which it climbs up and ascends even to the heaven of heavens; by which it connects itself with celestial objects, and lays hold of Him who, although gone into heaven, is not beyond the reach of that mighty arm of his own preparation. Thus it is that the believer, by prayer, lays hold of, and abides in, Christ. Although a sojourner in the world below, his affections are set on things above; he is, so to speak, half on earth, half in heaven; yea, much more than the half of him is in heaven; and such is the firm hold which, by the arm of prayer, he keeps of his Lord, that his language is that of the wrestling patriarch at Peniel, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." (Gen. xxxii. 26.)—SOSTHENES. (On Union with Christ and abiding in Him.)

Preparation necessary.—God looketh for great entertainment in our hearts, and at our hands; and, therefore, we should prepare for him: God welcomes you unto his table, and you must welcome God into your hearts, and both require preparation. When you expect some nobleman to come into your house, what preparation do you make for him? Your house is cleansed—your best furniture brought forth—and all your servants ready to attend him. When you come unto a sacrament, the Great God is to come into your heart; therefore, set open the everlasting gates of your soul, that the King of Glory may enter in; and let every room in your heart be washed and cleansed, and hung with the tapestry and embroidery of the Spirit; and let all the faculties of your soul, and graces in your heart, be ready to attend him. Let love receive him, let faith eye him, and your soul have converse and commune with him.—DOOLITTLE.

Paradise.—Heaven is the proper place where all excellency dwells. Should we not then dwell mentally there? As the fields are most pleasant, fertile, and beautiful, which lie nearest the perpendicular rays of the sun, so the more nearly we approach the Sun of Righteousness, the more vigorous and lively shall our condition be: how shall we bloom and flourish like a tree planted by the rivers of waters! Oh! how beautiful shall we become in the eyes of God, angels, and saints! Worldlings, you dwell in a cold climate; can any thing befall you except withering and decay? Come hither, this is the sunny side of the world; were ye here, ye could not but cry out,—“The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage.”—WELLWOOD.

Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord.—In speaking of the characteristics of true religion, I confess I am sometimes afraid of fixing the criterion of a work of grace too high, lest the mourners in Zion should be discouraged; because I find it is the will of God that such should not be discouraged, but comforted; and because it appears that the scriptural marks have respect rather to desires, if real, than to attainments, or at least to those attainments which are often possessed by persons who are kept very short of sensible comforts. (Mat. v. 3-9; Luke xviii. 12, 13; 1 Peter ii. 7.) There is an error in any one supposing that a person should date his conversion and his commencing a believer from the time of his receiving the Gospel truths with that clearness and power as to produce in him an abiding assurance. The apostle, in Eph. i. 13, makes a plain distinction between believing and being sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise. By the experience and observation of many years, I have been more and more persuaded that, to represent assurance as being necessarily of the essence of faith, is not agreeable to the Scripture, which, in many places, either expressly asserts, or strongly intimates the contrary. (John i. 50, and xx. 29; Rom. x. 9; 1 John v. 1.) Whoever is not a believer, must be an unbeliever,—there can be no medium. Either, then, there are many believers who have no assurance, or else there are many unbelievers who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, who hate sin, are poor in spirit, and adorn the doctrine of the Gospel by their temper and conversation; and I doubt not but those who now have assurance, had, before they attained it, a something which wrought by love, and overcame the world. I know no principle capable of these effects but faith, which, though it be at first but like a grain of mustard seed, is yet the seed of God, and though it be faint, it is genuine, as the dawning light is of the same nature with that which flows from the noon-day sun. I allow that, while faith is weak, there may be little solid comfort, if, by that expression, abiding comfort be meant. Faith gives safety and spiritual life; abiding peace and establishment follow the sealing of the Spirit. But though an infant has not the strength, activity, and understanding which he will attain when he arrives at the age of manhood, he is as fully possessed of a principle of life, while he is an infant, as at any time afterwards. To represent assurance in any light as if it were unattainable, or to speak of it as a thing which is not most constantly and earnestly to be desired and sought after, is equally erroneous with asserting that there can be no genuine faith without it. Assurance is a blessed privilege vouchsafed to those who walk very closely with God, and is connected with the “faith which groweth exceedingly.” So far from resting satisfied without it, therefore, every real Christian ought to strive after its possession. This he will do, not, however, as if it were a separate or disjointed object of pursuit; but, by cultivating an increasing intimacy with the things of God, a deeper and more habitual impression of the inestimable value of his favour, and of the interest which he personally has in all the great objects of the heavenly world, he will reach a state of mind that, in fact, and almost insensibly, will realize the very end he has in view.—J. NEWTON.

Union with Christ a high privilege.—Among men it is universally esteemed an honourable distinction to be related by blood to some ancient family, whose founder signalized himself above his compeers in the history of his country, and, in an age far remote, won for himself an imperishable name. But what are all family distinctions on earth, what is alliance with the most ancient and noble blood among the sons of men, compared with the lofty dignity, the high privilege, of being of the very same humanity with Him who existed before Abraham, yea, before Adam, yea, before the world, whose name is the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace! Let others boast of their pedigree, of their heraldic distinctions, of their descent, if they will, from the most ancient of all the families of the earth; let them run up the genealogy of their forefathers, if they please, even to mighty Nimrod, but let the Christian consider it a higher honour far, that he is of the very same flesh with Him who is, and who was appointed to be, the Heir of all things.—SOSTHENES. ## SACRED POETRY.

"GOD IS LOVE."

[From the Select Remains of the late Rev. Thomas R. Taylor.]

ALL I feel, and hear, and see,
God of love! is full of thee.

Earth, with her ten thousand flowers,
Air, with all its beams and showers,
Ocean's infinite expanse,
Heaven's resplendent countenance,—
All around, and all above,
Hath this record,—“God is love!”

Sounds among the vales and hills,
In the woods, and by the rills,
Of the breeze, and of the bird,
By the gentle summer stirr'd,—
All these songs, beneath, above,
Have one burden,—“God is love!”

All the hopes and fears that start
From the fountain of the heart;
All the quiet bliss that lies
In our human sympathies,—
These are voices from above
Sweetly whispering,—“God is love!”

All I feel, and hear, and see,
God of love! is full of thee.

HUMAN LIFE.

WHAT is life?—'tis all a vapour;

Soon it vanishes away;

Life is like a dying taper;

Oh, my soul, why wish to stay?

Why not spread thy wings and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy?

See that glory, how resplendent!

Brighter far than fancy paints,
There, in majesty transcendent!

Jesus reigns, the king of saints,
Spread thy wings, my soul, and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy.

Joyful crowds his throne surrounding,

Sing with rapture of his love,
Through the heavens his praises sounding
Filling all the courts above.

Spread thy wings, my soul, and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy.

Go and share his people's glory;

Midst the ransomed crowd appear;

Thine a joyful wondrous story:

One that angels love to hear.
Spread thy wings, my soul, and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The prayer of a Choctaw Indian.—Mr Williams, a missionary to the Choctaw Indians, gives the following prayer, as offered by an Indian who had been sleeping at his house:—“O my Father! O Jehovah! this morning thou hast lent us; yesterday was thy day, not ours; but it is past, and ours has returned. On thy beloved day I was in thy beloved house, and heard thy Word. I slept here last night, and this morning I am here, in the midst of thy messengers, kneeling down here to make supplication unto thee. O my Father! hear me, pity me, help me. I am a poor ignorant red man, and know nothing. I have broken thy law, and profaned thy Sabbaths very much. I am a poor lost man. O Jehovah! pity me. O my Father! thou, of thine own mind, in love to souls, didst give up thine only Son Jesus Christ, to die for lost sinners. Jesus surely is the Saviour of such. O Jehovah! thou hast pitied us, thy poor red children, so that thou hast sent us thy Word, by thy servants that are in the midst of us. We praise thee, O Jehovah, my Father above! When I hear of Jesus suffering and dying for poor sinners, it gives me sorrow of heart. O Jesus! thy blood was spilt, and thou in agony didst die for sinners. With thine own blood thou hast bought my soul. Thy blood can cleanse from sin; nothing else can. O that thou wouldst pity me, and wash my filthy heart with thy precious blood. Do not cast off one of us. Do pity us, we are helpless. If we say we will cleanse our own hearts, and try to do it, we cannot. O Jesus! thy blood alone is our hope, we will trust in thee for salvation. We want to be thy good and faithful children; but if thou do not help us continually, we can never get to heaven. O Jesus! take hold of us, and hold us fast, and never let go thy hold of us, till thou hast carried us far beyond the skies, to thine own blessed abode; and we much desire that thou wouldst come quickly, and take us there. Do hear this short supplication for Jesus' sake, O Jehovah, my Father above! This is all. Amen.” Mr Williams states, that the pathos with which this was uttered was truly affecting, and that it produced powerful feelings when he looked at this son of the forest, who had never heard the Gospel till within two months of the time when he thus pleaded the efficacy of the atonement of Christ. Who but the Holy Spirit could have thus taught him, and made him excel thousands who for many years have known superior privileges? How highly elevated was this poor Indian, in the sight of God, above many of the noble of the earth!

Testimony of a Jew, to Jesus Christ as the Messiah.—Josephus the Jew, although he continued to be a Jew, did frequently commend the Christians; and in the eighteenth book of his Antiquities, writes down an eminent testimony concerning our Lord Jesus Christ:—“There was about this time,” he says, A. D. 33, “Jesus, a wise man, if at least it [can] be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works,—a teacher of such men as willingly hear truth. He also drew over to him many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles:—he was Christ. And when Pilate, at the accusation of the principal men of our nation, had decreed that he should be crucified, those that had loved him from the beginning, did not forsake him; for he appeared to them the third day alive again, according to what the divinely inspired prophets had foretold, that these and innumerable other miracles should come to pass about him. Moreover, both the name and sect of Christians, who were named from him, continue in being unto this day.”

ON THE PECULIAR STRUCTURE OF THE LORD'S PRAYER.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

THERE is a marked difference between the sentiments of those who pray merely from the dictates of nature, or from the urgency of their circumstances, and those who are guided by the light of God's Word, into the proper knowledge and spirit of devotion. The former are occupied too exclusively with selfish considerations when they approach the throne of grace. It is only at those periods when danger, or difficulty, or some unwonted circumstances of doubt or depression overtake them, that many of them have recourse to the attitude of devotion; and even where the practice is regularly maintained, and the spirit of it is enlightened and cherished by pious feeling and Christian knowledge, it too frequently happens that it is the expression of private wishes and of private wants that forms the burden of the soul's communion with God. But, surely, nothing can be more obvious than that to approach the great Object of prayer, and to supplicate his blessing under the predominant influence of feelings such as these, is to look to him not as an object worthy of general esteem and unbounded admiration,—is to address him not even as the impartial hearer of prayer, and the beneficent Father whose arms are open to all his creatures, but as a being whose ear they are desirous to arrest, and whose favour they wish to appropriate to themselves. With a spirit of this kind, they may rise from their knees, and come back into the world, from intercourse with their God, without ever having their piety elevated by the contemplation of the divine perfections, or their benevolence expanded by the devotional exercise in which they have been engaged. And thus all the moral advantages, of which, when rightly performed, it is the prolific source, and that pious and spiritual temper, which it is so eminently instrumental in cherishing, will be entirely frustrated in their experience, from their assuming the attitude and the language of supplication, while unaccompanied with the spirit, which alone can waft them to the throne of heaven, and insure them success with the Hearer of prayer. It seems to have been with an express design to obviate this natural tendency to selfishness in the heart that our Lord arranged the different topics of that admirable prayer which he taught his disciples. The first part of the petitions which he enjoins us to make is all directed towards God, and to those principles of his moral government by which he is advancing and establishing the happiness and the prospects of man. It proceeds upon the same principle which he elsewhere enjoins his followers to adopt, to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," in the confident assurance that all necessary things shall be added unto them. And, accordingly, ere they are allowed to present a single petition in their own behalf, or expressive of their own wants and desires, they are to direct their contemplations to the things pertaining to the character and the kingdom of God,—to have their minds occupied, and elevated, and warmed with all the views which nature, and providence, and revelation afford of the will and the government of the divine Being to whom they address themselves. And who is there, who has any knowledge of the principles of the Gospel, or any experience of the power of religion on the heart, that does not perceive that to commence their supplications with this expression of devout admiration,—to cherish the remembrance of the filial relation in which they stand to God, and all the sentiments of esteem and confidence, of which that relation is the natural ally,—to have a primary and predominant desire after submission to the divine will, and the establishment of the divine honour, is not more accordant with the duty than with the disposition of every genuine child of God. It is, no doubt, true that there are seasons when, under the pressure of unusual difficulties, or a strong sense of inherent weakness, they may be irresistibly prompted to ask aid from above, and that their petitions may then have a special, nay, an exclusive reference to deliverance from the impending temptation, or to the reception of some needful and longed for blessing; as when Daniel prayed that he might be secured against the vindictive designs of the Assyrian courtiers, or Paul besought the Lord thrice for the removal of that severe trial to which he was subjected, or our Lord himself prayed, with all the vehemence of desire, that the hour of his approaching sufferings might be averted.

But it is no less true, that all these were the petitions of persons whose hearts were deeply pervaded by a devout admiration of, and unfaltering trust in, the divine character and purposes, as the immovable rock on which their petitions were based, and from which they ascended; and that all the people of God, when they address him in faith, and act in harmony with the character they profess, will prefer and exalt the honour of their Father in heaven above every interest of their own, whether temporal or spiritual. It is no less true, that just as a man will embrace every opportunity of dilating on the estimable qualities of a friend whom he loves, and deem no time unseasonable or labour irksome, by which he may inspire the same sentiments of friendship and love in the breasts of his hearers; just as a grateful man will recur to the deeds of some generous benefactor, whose name will be ever on his lips, and in whose praises he feels increasing delight to expatiate; just as a son will hail every occasion of testifying his respectful submission to an earthly parent; and as nothing will be more grateful to his feelings, or win its way more effectually to his heart, than any testimony from the lips of another that may bring an accession of respectability and honour to the object of his reverential regard; so, in the same spirit, but in a far more eminent degree, with every mind, in which devotion is the prevailing character, and which is enlightened with the spiritual knowledge of the great object of worship—it will be the chief object of its endeavours to exalt the honour of their Father in heaven; to desire that his name may be glorified, whatever be the issue of their present petitions, or whatever the complexion of their future condition; to make a regard to him, and to the manifestation of his great perfections, take the precedence of every inferior and more private consideration; to harbour no wish either for temporal comfort, or for everlasting happiness, but what is strictly, and above all, accordant with the honour of his name, with the establishment of his kingdom, and with the entire fulfilment of his will. We may appeal to the experience of every Christian reader, whether in those sacred moments, when you enjoy the privilege of addressing yourselves to the Hearer of prayer, and feel yourselves raised to the height of devotional sentiment, when your hearts are most deeply penetrated with a sense of the presence in which you stand, and the holiness of Him to whom you approach, whether these are not the sentiments to which you first give utterance, and whether this is not the channel in which your heart is most ready to flow? Is it not God who is then most prominently present to your thoughts? Is it not the brightness of his glory, the perfection of his character, the rectitude of his government, the unvarying beneficence of his procedure, which then fills the sphere of your devout contemplation, and which makes you adopt the language of the Psalmist of old, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." And is it not after having insensibly adopted the arrangement of our Lord in this admirable prayer, and given vent to all the feelings of piety, and admiration, and trust, with which the contemplation of the divine character is fitted to inspire you, and prayed that the name of our Father in heaven may be hallowed, and sanctified, and adored in the world; that his kingdom may come, and his will may be done on earth as it is in heaven; that then, and not till then, you proceed to the enumeration of your private wants?

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
MARY M. ELLIS,

WIFE OF THE REV. WILLIAM ELLIS, MISSIONARY TO
THE SOUTH SEAS.

Mrs ELLIS was born in St. Mary's Hill, London, on the 16th of October 1793. Before she was three months old she was deprived of her father, and thus thrown exclusively upon the care of her widowed mother, whose exertions for the promotion of her intellectual improvement, and above all of her spiritual welfare, were unremitting. As even in childhood, she exhibited indications of a ready and retentive memory, no pains were spared to store it with passages of Scripture, and a judicious selection of hymns. Scarcely, however, had the faculties of the child begun to expand, when, in her eighth year, she was subjected to the loss of her truly excellent and affectionate mother. Short, indeed, was the period during which she had enjoyed the high advantage of maternal instruction, but, by the blessing of the Spirit of God, her mind had been early impressed with the importance of religion; and the last words her mother addressed to her were indelibly engraven on her memory; "Mary, don't weep for me, I am going to glory; we shall not be long separated; we shall meet again soon."

Thus, at a tender age, was this interesting child called to endure trials the most painful and heart-rending. She was now an orphan, cast upon the bounty of a gracious Providence, and she was soon enabled to adopt the language of the Psalmist as her own; "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." She was taken under the care of a Christian lady, who kept a boarding-school, and who, by her unwearied kindness, endeavoured, in every possible way, to supply the place of a parent.

She now attended divine service steadily at Silver Street Chapel, situated in the neighbourhood of her residence; and although she always considered throughout life that her first religious impressions were derived from the instructions of her mother, she was accustomed to date her first decided determination to be on the Lord's side, from a sermon preached to the young, on Whit-Monday, in the year 1804, by her pastor Mr Jones, from these words, "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me." From this period she was regular in her observance of secret prayer, to which she had hitherto been a stranger.

Anxious to acquire more knowledge of divine things she joined a Sabbath school connected with the chapel, which proved of remarkable advantage to her. She made rapid progress in her acquaintance with the Bible. It was her companion by day, and at night she slept with it under her pillow, ready whenever she awoke to apply herself anew to its sacred contents. It was also a favourite employment with her to commit hymns to memory, which she was often accustomed to repeat in her after years.

The kind Christian friend who had taken the charge of the orphan girl, removed to a pleasant village at a short distance from London, and she soon became a teacher in the school in which she had been a pupil. At this time, however, her piety began to decline in its warmth and vitality. In this state of mind, and in consequence of temporary illness, she left the house of her friend and became an inmate in the house of a relative, where she was denied the religious opportunities she had hitherto enjoyed. The consequences were very injurious to her spiritual interests. She became giddy, and thoughtless, and comparatively regardless of religion. This melancholy state of matters was not permitted to continue long. The Almighty mercifully interposed, and rescued her soul from apparent destruction. In the year 1812, her only brother, two years older than herself, commenced business on his own account in London, and requested her to become the companion of his home, and take charge of its domestic arrangements. She readily accepted the invitation, not, however, without some painful convictions of conscience in reflecting on her spiritual declension. On the evening of the day on which she entered her brother's dwelling, he reminded her of the Lord's kindness in ministering to their wants, and raising up friends to them when, as orphans, they had been thrown upon the world. He expressed to her, at the same time, his determination to sanctify the Lord in his dwelling, by rearing an altar to his worship, as the God of families as well as of individuals. He then read a chapter from the sacred Scriptures, and he and his sister knelt together at the divine footstool, pouring forth the language of fervent prayer and grateful praise. Affected by the striking contrast between her brother's frame of mind and her own, she was seized with strong convictions of the sinfulness of her conduct in yielding so readily to the fascinations of the world, and losing sight of her Christian profession. For a time she was gloomy and desponding, and was even tempted to suppose that she had committed the unpardonable sin. At length it pleased the Lord to dispel the cloud which obscured her prospects and her hopes. The light of the divine countenance again shone upon her soul, and she became a habitual partaker of that peace which passeth all understanding.

Thus revived and quickened by the blessed operations of the Spirit, she joined in fellowship with the Church assembling in Silver Street Chapel. About the same time she became a teacher in that Sabbath school where she had formerly distinguished herself as a diligent and successful scholar. She engaged, also, as much as her domestic avocations would allow, in works of benevolence. The missionary cause, in particular, attracted much of her attention, and besides eagerly perusing the intelligence received, from time to time, in regard to the progress of the Gospel in heathen lands, she took a peculiar interest in diffusing it among her friends and acquaintances.

At this period of her life, it pleased the Almighty to visit her with an alarming illness, which brought her to the verge of the grave, but even in the utmost severity of her disease she felt entire confidence in the grace and goodness of her redeeming God. Her friends, to whom she had peculiarly endeared herself by the gentleness and kindness of her nature, were urgent in prayer for her recovery. Their prayers were heard, and she was mercifully raised up from the bed of sickness, and apparent death, with resolutions more ardent than ever, to follow in the footsteps of her divine Redeemer. The cause of missions now became the frequent theme of her meditations, and although she was dissuaded, by her friends, from dedicating herself to the work as a solitary female, an opportunity soon occurred, in the course of Providence, of testing the sincerity of her desires to engage in the self-denying employment. She became acquainted with Mr Ellis, who was then preparing to enter the missionary field, and consented to join him in the same benevolent enterprise. They were married accordingly, on the 9th November 1815.

To a mind so tenderly sensitive as that of Mrs Ellis, it must have been peculiarly painful to bid adieu, perhaps for ever, to her country and her friends. Supported, however, by a power greater than her own, she set sail on the 28d of January 1816, for the South Sea Islands, in company with her husband, and Mr and Mrs Threlkeld. The ship in which they embarked was employed in conveying convicts to New South Wales, and some apprehensions were entertained lest their passage should, on that account, be uncomfortable. But the liveliness of Mrs Ellis's faith, and her anxiety to be engaged in the work of the Redeemer, are finely exhibited in a letter which she wrote to her pastor, Mr Jones, before setting out on the voyage.

"Did we not believe that an over-ruling Providence orders all things for the best, we might be inclined to murmur at being sent out in a transport vessel, (for we find that the convicts are a desperately wicked company, they have made several disturbances already, and threaten mutiny on the voyage,) but we know that we are in the hands of God, and that he has the hearts of all at his disposal, and renders all things subservient to his own glory; therefore we cheerfully go forth, assured that if the Lord has any thing for us to do among the heathen, we are safe until our work is done. We rejoice that our minds are kept stayed on God; and we can say with our dear missionary sister, 'Onward, in the strength of the Lord, is our motto.' Indeed, the hope of being useful among the convicts animates us, and reconciles us to the prospect of danger; but why do I talk of being exposed to danger? if our Saviour be at the helm, we need fear no evil, rather let us say—

'Christ is our pilot wise,
Our compass is his Word;
Our soul each storm defies,
While we have such a Lord:
We trust his faithfulness and power,
To help in every trying hour.'

But we are aware that we need great grace, to enable us to walk wisely, and as becometh the Gospel of Christ; that we are only safe while kept by the mighty power of God; and that if left but for one moment, we fall into sin. I hope we shall be constantly looking to Jesus: may we be found in him, when we shall meet you again, not in this sinful world,—not in these mortal bodies, which clog our devotions, and chain our spirits down to earth when they would fain soar to heaven, but at the right hand of our heavenly Father, in a world where sin and sorrow can never enter, clothed upon with immortality, in a body like our dear Saviour's, and shall join with all the ransomed to sing his praises for ever. Surely we can say, if we had a thousand souls and bodies, we would devote them all to the service of Him who hath done so much for us."

The cold was severe when the vessel sailed, but after crossing the Bay of Biscay, the weather became comparatively mild, and in three weeks from the date of their leaving England, they came in sight of the island of Madeira, at which the ship merely touched. In the course of a few weeks longer they reached Rio Janeiro where the passengers were landed for a short time. While on shore Mrs Ellis was seized with a very severe illness which threatened to prove fatal, but by the blessing of God, she was so far restored, in a few days, as to embark with the other passengers, in the same ship in which she had sailed from England, and which proceeded, without farther delay, to New South Wales. After remaining a short time in that colony, the mission family secured a passage in a ship bound for Tahiti, and on the 10th of February 1817, little more than a year from the time when she had left her native land, Mrs Ellis saw the place which had been the subject of many prayers, and was about to become the scene of her future exertions. On their arrival in Eimeo they were cordially welcomed by the Missionaries resident there, as well as by a number of Christian natives.

The circumstances in which Mr and Mrs Ellis entered on their missionary work were in the highest degree encouraging. Idolatry had been extirpated scarcely more than twelve months before, and the Christian religion was now universally prevalent in the islands. The people were eagerly desirous of being instructed, and the arrival of a fresh reinforcement of Christian teachers, therefore, was hailed as an event of the deepest interest. In such circumstances Mrs Ellis felt it to be the highest honour to be called to impart that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation.

In the course of a few weeks after their arrival, it was arranged that, along with two other Missionaries and their families, Mr and Mrs Ellis should occupy a new station at Afareaitu. Thither, accordingly, they removed, and though subjected to difficulties of no ordinary kind, Mrs Ellis endured them with the utmost readiness; such was her singleness of heart in her Master's cause. Overlooking the mere temporary inconveniences to which she was exposed from the rude habits of the natives, she engaged in the work of a Missionary with the utmost ardour and enthusiasm. She began to study the language with the view of instructing the natives, and, in the meantime, she spent a considerable part of her time in teaching some of the native females to sew. During the spring and early part of the summer of 1818, both she and her affectionate partner suffered much from the severe and dangerous illness of their infant son. As medical assistance could not be procured nearer than at Papetoai, on the opposite side of the island, often did they travel to that station with great fatigue and danger. As a description of one of these journeys we may make the following beautiful and touching quotation from the Polynesian Researches, by Mr Ellis:—

"Returning from one of them, night overtook us many miles before we reached our home; we travelled part of the way in a single canoe, but for several miles, where there was no passage between the reef and the shore, and the fragile bark was exposed without shelter to the long heavy billows of the Pacific, we proceeded along the beach, while the natives rowed the canoe upon the open sea. Two native female attendants alternately carried the child, while Mrs Ellis and I walked on the shore, occasionally climbing over the rocks, or sinking up to our ankles in fragments of coral or sand; wearied with our walk, we were obliged to rest before we reached the place where we expected to embark again. Mrs Ellis, unable to walk any further, sat down upon a rock of coral and gave our infant the breast, while I hailed the natives, and directed them to bring the canoe over the reef, and take us on board. Happily for us, the evening was fair, the moon shone brightly, and her mild beams silencing the foliage of the shrubs that grew near the shore, and playing on the rippled and undulating wave of the ocean, added a charm to the singularity of the prospect, and alleviated the loneliness of our situation. The scene was unusually impressive. I remember distinctly my feelings, as I stood wearied with my walk, leaning on a light staff by the side of a rock, on which Mrs Ellis, with our infant, was sitting, and behind which our female attendants stood. On one side, the mountains of the interior, having their outline edged, as it were, with silver, from the rays of the moon, rose in lofty magnificence, while the indistinct form and diversified verdure of the shrubs and trees, increased the effect of the whole. On the other hand, was the illimitable sea, rolling in solemn majesty its waves over the rocks which defended the spot on which we stood. The most profound silence pervaded the whole scene, and we might have fancied that we were the only beings in existence, for no sound was heard, excepting the gentle rustling of the leaves of the cocoa-nut tree, as the light breeze from the mountain swept through them; or the loud hollow roar of the surf, and the rolling of the foaming wave, as it broke over the distant reef, and the splashing of the paddles of our canoe as it approached the shore. It was impossible, at such a season, to behold this scene, exhibiting impressively the grandeur of creation and the insignificance of man, without experiencing emotions of admiring wonder and elevated devotion, and exclaiming with the Psalmist, 'When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained; what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him?'"

The chief object for which the station at Afareaitu was temporarily occupied having been accomplished, Mr and Mrs Ellis set out with several other mission families, in June 1818, for the Society or Leeward Islands, where it was expected their settlement would be more permanent. On arriving at Huahine, the most easterly island of the cluster, they were received by the natives with the warmest demonstrations of joy. The residence which was set apart for them was sufficiently large, but unfortunately damp, and their child who had been so ill at Eimeo, had scarcely recovered from his sickness, when, through the carelessness of the native nurse, he fractured his arm. The other child also was an object of great solicitude; and on one occasion, Mrs Ellis herself, with her infant at the breast, very narrowly escaped a watery grave, the canoe in which she was sitting having been upset, and all on board plunged into the sea.

In the course of the summer of 1819, a more comfortable residence was provided for Mrs Ellis and her family. As her knowledge of the language increased, numbers of the natives thronged the house to converse with her on religious topics; and, besides inculcating upon the native females habits of industry and neatness, she embraced every opportunity of calling their attention to their immortal interests. To the superintendence of the schools, also, she paid peculiar attention, and in every department of the missionary work in which she felt she could be useful, she zealously and actively engaged.

By the blessing of God, on the labours of the Missionaries, many of the natives were led to inquire into the truth of Christianity; and, at length, on the 5th of May 1820, a Christian Church was formed at Huahine, consisting of fifteen members. Of these, several were females, and Mrs Ellis viewed them with peculiar interest, as sisters in Christ, and fellow-heirs of glory. She commenced a meeting for prayer and spiritual instruction, intended for those females who wished to unite in Christian fellowship, and she had much reason to be thankful to the Great Head of the Church, for the measure of success which attended her efforts. Along with Mrs Barff, a sister Missionary, she made it a regular practice to visit the sick, and on these occasions she was always welcome, and by her tender sympathy and kindness, she won upon the hearts of the natives, so as to lead them to listen with the utmost attention to her faithful and affectionate counsels.

On the 24th of February, Mr Ellis, in company with a deputation from the London Missionary Society, then at the Islands, embarked for the Sandwich Islands, leaving his wife and family at Huahine. Speaking of their departure, and of the wives of the native Missionaries by whom they were accompanied, Mrs Ellis thus writes in a letter to a friend:—

“Sister Barff and I continue our meeting with the females. We often find it a season of refreshing to our own souls, and do hope it is beneficial to the dear natives. We had a very affecting meeting with them at the parting of our two dear sister (native) Missionaries. Many of them could not speak for tears; indeed, there was not a dry eye in the room. ‘We grieve to part with our dear sisters,’ said they; ‘we shall never again see their faces at our meetings for conversation, at our meetings for prayer, at our meetings for public worship. We have been used to listen to them with delight, when they have exhorted us with affection, and prayed with and for us; but now we shall hear their voices no more. But we will not keep them back; the work is God’s; and if teachers had not been sent to us, we should now have been dwelling in darkness and the shadow of death;—we should now have been killing one another, murdering our dear babes, and sinking into hell; but God had compassion on us; he has sent his good Word to us, and caused our hearts to believe that Jesus Christ alone is the Saviour of sinners, and to desire him for our Saviour: and shall we not be willing that others may know this good Word and Saviour also? Yes, Go sisters! and we will not cease to pray that Jehovah may bless you, and that all the world may know the only true God, and Jesus Christ the Saviour of sinners.’ This, and much more to the same purport, was the language of their lips, and, we believe, the language also of their hearts. They prayed very fervently for them, and we hope their prayers will be answered. It reminded us much of those delightful meetings we had in our native land on the eve of our own departure.”

At the urgent request of Mrs Orsmond, who was the only European female in Borabora, Mrs Ellis proceeded to assist her in the duties of that station. In returning, however, to Huahine, she was exposed to the greatest inconvenience and even danger. Though the weather was mild when the boat in which she embarked left Borabora, it soon after changed, and a storm having arisen, the boatmen found it impossible to reach Huahine, and were compelled to return to Raiatea. After remaining a week there, detained by contrary winds, Mrs Ellis was anxious to proceed homewards, more especially as the time arranged for Mr Ellis’s return was almost arrived. They set out, accordingly, but the boatmen, with all their exertions, were unable, after toiling for a day and a night, to remove further than a short distance from the shore of Raiatea. Mrs Ellis was, accordingly, landed at Utumaoro in that island.

“The want of proper nourishment, and excessive fatigue, were accompanied by so much indisposition, that when the boat reached the shore, Mrs Ellis was obliged to be carried from it to the nearest native hut; this appeared unoccupied, but, on looking round from the mat on which she had been laid, a solitary female was perceived kneeling beside a scarcely breathless corpse, and offering, apparently in great distress, and with frequent sobs and cries, her prayer to Him who seeth in secret, and is a very present help in trouble. As soon as her first paroxysms of grief had somewhat subsided, this Christian female came, and tenderly sympathised with her guest; told her the other inhabitants of the neighbourhood had gone to the missionary meetings, but that she had remained to attend on her afflicted husband, who had expired as the boat approached the shore. Weak and faint as she was, Mrs Ellis endeavoured to direct her mind to the only source of effectual support; and from the observations that were made, there was reason to hope that the widow was not a stranger to the comforts and hopes of the Gospel.”

During the whole of the day and the succeeding night, Mrs Ellis was unable to leave the mat on which she had been laid, but in the morning, as she was anxious to reach home, she and her children were carried on board, and after spending another day and night in the deep, they reached Huahine in safety.

Mrs Ellis’s health was for some time in a weak state from the effects of this voyage, but by the kind attentions of Mr and Mrs Barff, she at length recovered. The protracted absence of her husband, however, was a source of great mental anxiety to her, and more especially as there was reason to suspect that the ship in which he sailed had been seized and plundered by pirates. In this state of painful suspense, the utmost attention and kindness was shewn her by the natives. To this gratifying trait of humanity in a recently barbarous people, Mr Ellis thus adverts:—

“The chiefs and people of the settlement had always shewn the warmest attachment to the Missionaries, but their kindness to Mrs Ellis, during the protracted absence of her husband, was as grateful to her as it was honourable to themselves. They used to designate her their little lonely widow, and seemed anxious to testify their solicitude to alleviate the distress which they knew she must feel. Whenever they were successful in fishing, they always sent her a part of what they had taken; and if the weather was stormy and the sea rough, they used to say, that their anxiety on her account prevented their sleeping; and frequently, in seasons of tempestuous weather, one or two of the chief women of the island would sleep in the house with her, to mitigate the distress which her solicitude at such seasons might occasion. When a pious and valuable female servant, who married, left her, the chiefs went and persuaded another truly pious and attentive native to go and live with her; and by these, and numberless attentions, truly acceptable at the time, manifested a vigilance of benevolence and a strength of affection scarcely to be expected in persons among whom the feelings and offices of Christian sympathy and friendship were of such recent growth."

When he left Huahine, Mr Ellis expected to be absent only three months, but from various circumstances, he was detained for eight months, and it was no small relief, therefore, to the agonized feelings of his wife and family, when his arrival was announced. In the course of this visit to the Sandwich Islands it had been arranged by the deputation from the Parent Society, at the urgent request of the American Missionaries, that Mr and Mrs Ellis should quit their present station and remove to the Sandwich Islands. The same vessel, accordingly, which brought Mr Ellis to Huahine, conveyed an invitation to that effect. To leave a people among whom they were so much respected and loved, was no ordinary trial; but as the invitation offered a prospect of greater usefulness, they came to the resolution, however reluctantly, of complying.

ON THE FORMATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF COAL.

By the Rev. JOHN ANDERSON,

Minister of Newburgh.

THE perfect adaptation of the earth to the nature and accommodation of the various orders of creatures, which live in it, is manifest to the most careless observer. Plants derive their nourishment from the soil in which they grow, and, by an organization the most skilful, are enabled, every one after its kind, to extend and perpetuate the species. Animals subsist on the materials which the earth thus annually and abundantly supplies to them, at once finding exercise and enjoyment in searching for the food which the instinct of each leads it to select. Man, so superior to them all in beauty, structure, and intelligence, has more wants to supply, and is exposed to inconveniences from which they are almost entirely exempted. His food requires, in many instances, artificial preparation, to enable him to sustain his health, or to restore it when lost; and, in consequence of his extreme sensitiveness to the influence of climate, he seeks for shelter and warmth to protect him against the inclemency of the season. The materials for the accomplishment of both purposes, he finds prepared for him in the bowels of the earth, hid for ages beneath his feet, and by his skill and ingenuity, it is drawn forth as his necessities or his pleasures may demand. We have already considered the qualities and composition of this useful deposit, formed, as it were, out of the very waste and prodigality of nature; and who does not see in this a wonderful instance of the goodness and wisdom of Him who does nothing in vain, and who, in framing the world, designed every part of it for use? The circumstances under which it has been formed we have also adverted to, leading us back to a period when the surface of the globe, as to the relative position of land, rivers, lakes, estuaries, and sea, in the economy of nature, must have been materially different from what it now is.

We shall in this paper attend to some of those other contrivances by which the coal has been so wonderfully preserved, and at the same time rendered so easily accessible to man. Nothing appears, at first sight, so confused and irregular, as the condition of the earth's crust immediately beneath the soil. That confusion and irregularity have, apparently, only been increased by the many convulsions by which, at successive periods, it has been shaken to its centre. But when we look a little closer, we find a divine purpose in the quality of the materials, as well as in their arrangement; and, in those disturbing forces to which they have been exposed, we discern the clearest proofs of an overruling intelligence continuing, throughout all ages, to superintend and control their various operations.

1. Consider the situation of the coal metals. They do not lie exposed upon the surface, but are generally found at a considerable depth in the earth; and how many are apt to complain of this, thinking that, if a different arrangement had prevailed, much needless labour and expense would have been prevented? To this suffice it to reply, that the constituent elements of coal are such, that, by exposure on the surface, the mineral would, in a comparatively short period of time, have run to waste and decay. Even a thick covering of earthy mould would not have been sufficient to protect it, as is manifested in the case of those out-crops which, from having been long exposed to the action of the weather, have become so deteriorated in quality, as to be utterly useless. God, therefore, purposely "hid the treasure in the earth," and so inclosed it, that the floods could not wash it away.

2. Attend, in the next place, to the nature and character of the rocks by which it is protected, and along with which the coal is invariably associated. These consist of sandstone, shale, and clay ironstone, which uniformly occupy the same basins with the coal, and alternate with it sometimes to the number of a hundred beds. Such a series of well characterized rocks, not only act as a guide by which to point out the localities of the valuable mineral, but they serve the double purpose of facilitating the excavation of it, by affording at once a safe roofing to the mine, and an easy passage for the drainage of the water which accumulates in the pits. No other class of rocks would have been so suitable. Our mountain masses of granite, and other primitive rocks, would have been wholly unfit; no borings could have been effected to any extent; the operations underneath would have been equally difficult, if not altogether impossible; and through such hard, compact substances, the drainage must have been impracticable.

3. But, perhaps, a still more remarkable indication of design arises from the elevated and inclined position into which the coal-strata have been thrown. Had they remained in the position which they originally occupied, in the lakes and estuaries in which they were deposited, and covered with the vast accumulations which have subsequently taken place, their depth would have been utterly beyond the industry of man to have reached. But the waters have disappeared, having accomplished the purpose for which they were intended, and the rocks formed beneath them have lifted up their heads; not uniformly, however, and in one continuous unbroken mass, but divided into smaller sections, and inclined in every possible direction. The wisdom of this will appear from two considerations. From their inclined position the various beds of coal are worked with greater facility than if they had been horizontal; a level is produced for the drainage of the water; and the edges of the coal, by being turned up, are brought nearer the surface. But these advantages are every one of them increased, almost incalculably, by the division of the coal-field into limited sections; by this means, less water is allowed to accumulate than if the bed had been indefinitely extended, and its lower extremities are likewise prevented from being plunged to a depth that would be inaccessible. Nothing, in short, can more unequivocally prove contrivance and design than the disruptions and elevations which mark the course of the coal-metals, by which the originally continuous stratum, over the length and breadth of many miles, is broken up, and its several portions arranged in a series of successive tables or steps of a stair, rising one behind another, and all gradually upheaved towards the surface, from the lowest points of depression.

4. The contrivances, however, are yet more complicated by which the Author of nature has rendered this valuable mineral subservient to man's use. Every coal-field is furnished with a system of checks, in the shape of faults or dykes, against floodings, fire-blaze, and other accidents that may occur in the operations of mining. These faults or dykes consist usually of clay, the detritus of the associated rocks, or of more compact whinstone, with which the fractures, produced at the period of the elevation and disruption of the coal-beds, have been filled up, and which serve to insulate, or contract to more workable dimensions, the various sections into which the seams of coal are divided. They present the appearance of a vertical wall, cutting the strata at right angles, and, though often occasioning much inconvenience and disappointment in stopping the progress of the work, yet, as every experienced collier well knows, forming, upon the whole, his greatest safeguard, and essential to his operations. Besides damming up the water and preventing one pit from being flooded by another, these faults, by interrupting the continuity of the various seams of coal, and causing their truncated edges to abut against the inflammable material, afford a preservative against the destructive ravages of fire to which particular seams are frequently exposed, and which would otherwise continue to burn until the consumption of the entire field was effected.

5. But, in order fully to appreciate the importance of all this machinery, consider the original extent of a single coal-basin. In Scotland this valuable mineral is chiefly confined to that extensive district which forms the great valley of the Lowlands, and which separates the primitive rocks of the Grampians, as its northern boundary, from the transition chain of the Lammermuirs, which may be geologically considered as its southern limit. The coal metals do not, indeed, occupy the whole of this space. But a line drawn from the mouth of the Tay, passing through Stirling and the northern extremity of the isle of Arran, and another, nearly parallel to it, from St Abb's Head on the east coast, to Girvan on the west, will include between them the whole of the coal-fields of Scotland, with the exception of the insulated coal-basins on the Nith and the Esk in Dumfries-shire, and the more limited patches that have been worked in Roxburghshire, and on the coast of Berwickshire. Now, even admitting a considerable inclination from all sides of the basin towards the common centre, yet how difficult must have been the operations, or rather how comparatively useless almost, in extracting the coal, lying, as the seams originally did, nearly horizontal, throughout the length and breadth of this extensive area? Mark, then, the wisdom and beneficence of God in elevating the whole to a higher position, dividing it into various convenient sections, giving a greater inclination to the beds, and introducing faults, for the more convenient working and preservation of the whole. Behold, too, the simplicity of the agency by which these results are effected. "The Lord cometh forth out of his place; he putteth his hand forth upon the rock; he looketh on the earth, and it trembleth; he toucheth the hills and they smoke; the mountains are molten under him; and the valleys are cleft; before him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at his feet." No words could more beautifully or precisely describe the origin of those whinstone rocks which exist in every coal-field, and are so curiously injected among the strata, and by which, in the opinion of all geologists, they have been elevated, upheaved, and tossed into the various positions which they now occupy.

Such are a few of the facts connected with the arrangement and distribution of the coal metals, in whatever quarter of the globe they are found. Is it possible to resist the conclusion, that in such a disposition of things there are the clearest indications of contrivance and design? The dance of atoms, imagined by the philosopher of antiquity, could never have terminated in the perfect order and harmony of the heavenly bodies, by which innumerable systems of worlds are maintained, each hung upon nothing, and duly preserved all of them in their respective spheres. Equally impossible is it to contemplate a disposition of things so adapted, and indeed so indispensable for availing ourselves of the mineral treasures of the earth—essential to our wants, and ministering so directly to our social comfort and improvement—and yet to refer the whole to the blind operation of fortuitous causes. Could any of us look back, and observe the various methods employed by Providence for our preservation here and salvation hereafter, from our infant days to the last period of life, it would give us infinite pleasure, and the retrospect would end in admiration of the divine wisdom, and gratitude for the divine goodness. Could we, in the same manner, trace back the ways of God, and the method of his dispensations from the creation to the consummation of all things—surveying, as we would, a system of wise and benevolent contrivances, prospectively subsidiary to the wants and comforts of the future inhabitants of the globe, and to the advancement and completion of which, the various revolutions and convulsions that have affected the surface of our planet have been made subservient—we should still rise higher in pious gratitude and holy adoration, as more wisdom would appear in a more extensive plan, and more goodness in the multiplicity of means devised for its accomplishment. Is not such a review of God's doings actually, in some measure, in these geological speculations presented to us? Impossible, indeed, it ever will be for the human mind to embrace all the mysteries of creation; but thus admitted to the mighty wonders of the interior, we are almost enabled to trace the history of the moving atoms from their chaotic disorder into their arrangement in the visible universe, to see dead matter assuming the forms of life and animation, clothing the earth for a season with luxuriance and beauty,—buried for ages under the solid rock,—and again out of coldness and death affording light, and warmth, and power to the successive generations of men.

While we are thankful, then, for this domestic article, of every day use, and from which so many sources of comfort and pleasure arise, let us regard the arrangements by which the mineral has been so effectually preserved and brought within our reach, as so many proofs of the wisdom and goodness of Deity. The coal deposit forms one of the most singular and best defined sections of the interior of the earth with which geology has made us acquainted. It is one and entire, unlike anything which has preceded, or anything that has occurred since the era of its formation. A practical question, therefore, will here naturally suggest itself,—is coal still forming? In answer to such a question, it is not easy to say what is going on in the depths of the ocean, and it is difficult to determine what changes may yet be effected upon our peat mosses, which approach nearest in character to, and possess most of the requisites for, the formation of coal. But still, there can be no doubt, there does not at present exist the same condition of things which did formerly, to assist either in the production and accumulation of the vegetable material, or to facilitate the conversion of it into this substance. And if there did, of what avail would it be to man, who would inevitably be swept off the earth in the elevation of the strata from the depths of ocean in which they were deposited? Geology reveals the undoubted fact, that our planet has been subjected to many and most extensive changes before it was reduced to its present condition. These, from the beginning, have been all rendered subservient to the comfort of man. The next, upon the same scale of magnitude, would inevitably prove the destruction of his race. Now, then, as announced both by the Word and the works of God, is the day of man's salvation—the allotted and final season of his improvement—till the new heavens and the new earth will receive the righteous as their everlasting habitations.

THE NATURE AND ORIGIN OF TRUE RELIGION IN THE SOUL :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DANIEL CAMERON.

Minister of Bridgewater Parish, Glasgow.

"I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it; that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them."—JOHN xvii. 26.

THE Lord's prayer is a specimen of the prayers sinners should present to God for themselves, and this intercessory prayer of Christ is a specimen of the prayers which he presents to God for them. It embraces many precious and consolatory truths, on which at present we cannot enlarge. Having, in the course of it, prayed first for his immediate disciples, and then for all who should believe on him through their word, that they might be sanctified and preserved from the evil that is in the world, he then prays for their final glorification: "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." This request Christ supports by several considerations, such as the righteousness or justice of his Father, his foreknowledge of the Father's purposes and will, which enabled him to know what was proper to ask, and what his Father was willing to grant, and the knowledge which his people had of him, his person, work, and intercession, and his mission from the Father for the fulfilment of his will. Then, in our text, the Redeemer affirms, that he had executed his mission, by declaring the Father's name unto sinners, and by effecting in them the grand end of his mission,—the implantation in them of the love of God, and their union to himself. This text presents us with a brief statement of the nature and the origin of true religion in the soul, to both of which points we shall briefly direct your attention.

I. We shall briefly illustrate from our text, the nature of true religion in the soul. Now it is here said to consist of the love of God in them, and of the inhabitation of Christ in them.

1. True religion consists of the love with which the Father loved Christ, being in the soul. The phrase of the text is so peculiar, that some attention is necessary to discover its meaning. The words seem to intimate, that Christ prayed that the very love with which God loved him might reign in his people; but this is impossible, for the love of God is infinite, uncreated, and immutable, which cannot be affirmed of the love of any creature. The words seem also to teach, that Christ prayed that God, his Father, might love his saints with all the very love with which he loved Christ himself. Now, although Christ might present such a request to his Father on behalf of his people—although he might pray that the very kind of love, for its light and consolation, which the Father manifested to him in unbounded fulness, might be cherished towards his saints in its necessary degree—and although such is essential as a foundation of love to God in the sinner, yet neither does this seem to be all the meaning of our Saviour's words. He prays for his people, not so much that God may love them with a special and distinguishing affection, but that this love of God may be vouchsafed to them, and may operate in them as it operated in him. In short, our Saviour's words comprehend two leading ideas, both of which are necessary to be realized, in order to the production of true religion in the soul of man: 1st, He prays, that God would favour his people with inward manifestations of that particular love wherewith he loves his beloved Son; and, 2dly, He seeks this, in order that this love of God in them may operate upon their hearts for the production of all those loving affections and heavenly principles which so fully and perfectly abounded in himself. On the first of these ideas we shall not at present dwell, as it will fall to be considered under the second head of our discourse; but let me direct your contemplations to the other, that true religion in the soul consists in the exercise of those holy and loving affections which operated in the bosom of Christ towards his heavenly Father; for he prays in our text, "that the love wherewith God loved him might be in his people." Now I find four things that distinguished the love of Christ to his Father, and which always, in some measure, distinguishes it in the believing soul. 1st, His was an exclusive love. He loved God his Father "with all his soul, with all his heart, with all his strength, and with all his mind," and thus kept the first and greatest commandment. Never was the claim of God to the creature's deepest affections so thoroughly acknowledged and acquiesced in by any saint or any angel as it was by Christ; and never did God sit on the throne of any heart so secure of its homage, and so honoured in the alacrity of its obedience, as he sat on the throne of his own Son's affections. No creature, however lovely, did for a moment become an idol, and no sin, however fascinating, did for a moment diminish the intensity of his love. His eye was as open as any man's to the glorious landscapes of the firmament above, and of the earth around, which make so many the ardent worshippers of nature, rather than of nature's God. And his eye also gazed on the forms of human beauty that passed before him; and his mind could balance, with the justest exactitude, the full amount of happiness which every creature yields in the possession; but nothing, nothing was ever sufficiently attractive to draw off his love from God to itself. And, 2dly, Christ's love to God was an active and operative affection. It did not slumber in dreaming inactivity within the recesses of his bosom, like that of many now, who seem to love God with an idle sentimentality, that is too effeminate to glorify him with active and laborious services in his cause. But Christ's love to his Father was so lively and energetic, that he tells us, "it was his very meat and drink to do his will, and to finish his work." So that if you read his life with attention, you will find that many of his discourses were preached, and many of his miracles were wrought, and many of his journeys were travelled amid hunger, and fatigue, and storms, which would have made even an angel drop his wings, and pause in his flight on his errand of mercy. But the Saviour's love was so active, that he would rather at any time glorify his Father, and execute his will, than waste his hours in even necessary refreshment and repose. And, 3dly, Christ's was a patient and persevering love. The fulfilment of his work was connected with many difficulties and discouragements, but these had no effect in diminishing the strength of his love to God, or in suspending its exercises towards him; he still continued amid them all to love him with all his heart, although too, they were such as were peculiarly fitted to exhaust his patience, and to weary out his constancy. What trials, for example, were more calculated to discourage and weaken his devoted attachment to his Father, than the bitter revilings which he endured from men for the heavenliness of his discourses and works—for the testimony that he bore, in their hearing, to the character and glory of his Father? What temptations could have been more skilfully adapted for withdrawing his affections from God, than those with which Satan assailed him in the wilderness and on the cross? How cunningly, at one time, did the tempter endeavour to represent his Father's deportment towards him arising from hatred and alienation, and how fiercely at other times, did he assault him with his most potent and fiery darts, in order to awaken in his bosom jealous misgivings of his Father's kindness, and drown in them his affection for him? And above all, was it not an amazing trial of his love to be deserted by his Father, yea, and for a time to be visited with the inflictions of his wrath? If any thing is fitted to exhaust our love, it is great and oppressive suffering inflicted on us by those whom we love, yet these the Redeemer endured in an unspeakable degree, and his love for God still triumphed in undiminished ardour and activity. When his Father seemed to frown upon him with the greatest wrath; when the sword of his justice was entering his soul, and pouring it out in sighs, and groans, and streams of blood, an offering for sin, even then when all other creatures, in similar circumstances, would shrink from glorifying God, and would feel their love for him confused and suspended, even then did Christ manifest for his Father and his glory the most patient and persevering love. He neither shrunk with trembling from the anticipation of them, nor did he hasten their termination when he was experiencing their utmost bitterness and oppression, but with a love for God, who saw them to be necessary for the glorification of his perfections, with a love that was patient and unquenchable, and that stood forth in his soul with unconquerable energy, in the face of every dispiriting circumstance did Christ endure the cross, and despite the shame, and sustain a burden of guilt and woe that would have sunk into ruin irrecoverable a universe itself. Now this exclusive, active, patient, and persevering love of Christ towards his Father, is the love which he prays may be in each of his people, and which is found in each in a greater or less degree. Without it, brethren, it is self-deception to imagine that true religion exists in your souls. For as the very essence of all right religion is the love of God in the heart, and as Christ is exhibited as the image to which all must be conformed, so his love to God is the exemplar of the love which all must experience before they can pretend to the possession of real inward religion. We do not affirm that our love must necessarily be as perfect as Christ's, and that without this we are destitute of religion in the heart, but we affirm that we must have a measure of conformity to his. Like his, it must be so exclusive as to give to God an habitual supremacy in the affections, and as to triumph over the domination of corruption and the entralling fascination of idols. Like his, it must be so active as to manifest itself in a career of religious well-doing and zeal for the promotion of the glory of God. And like his, our love to God must be patient and persevering. It is not enough that we love him when the sunshine of his favour illuminates our way,—when he makes our very enemies to be at peace with us, and when all around us, in short, wears such a smiling aspect that it would manifest the most monstrous ingratitude and baseness not to love him; but we must persevere in loving him when the manifestations of his love to us are withdrawn, and when lowering clouds encompass his throne,—when reason would argue that he has thrown us out of his protection and regard,—when devils mock our faith in him with their atheistical insinuations,—and when a malignant world seems moved with the horrid purpose either of annihilating with its persecutions our love to him, or of pouring out our lives on the altar of martyrdom, a sacrifice to its hate. In tribulations like these we must love God exclusively, actively, patiently, and perseveringly, if we would vindicate our claim to the possession of that religion which both sanctifies and saves the soul.

Then it is that the Redeemer's prayer, in the text, obtains its manifest fulfilment, "that the love wherewith God the Father loved him may be in us," for such was his love to God.

2. True religion in the soul also consists in the indwelling of Christ in it, or in the soul's union to him. "I have," saith he, "declared thy name unto them, that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them," "and I in them." The indwelling of Christ in the soul is a doctrine most frequently taught in the Word of God. Thus saith Christ, "At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you." Again, "Abide in me and I in you." Again, saith Paul, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." And once more, "Christ in you the hope of glory." The phraseology of our text, therefore, is not strange or rare, but such as appears to be common with the sacred writers. The mysteriousness of the truth which it involves has led some into enthusiastic sentiments regarding the nature of the indwelling of Christ in the soul, and has driven others into the very opposite extreme of the coldest hearted and most undevout rationalism in experimental religion. We sympathise with neither of these erroneous religionists, while we maintain the truth evidently unfolded in these passages of Scripture. At present we shall just endeavour, briefly, to state what appears to be the meaning of this very peculiar phraseology. Now, it cannot mean that Christ, as beheld in heaven, dwells in human form in the souls of believers, for such an idea is, on many grounds, contradictory to reason, and the Scriptures themselves. Neither can such words mean that there is any pictorial image or resemblance of Christ delineated in the imagination, for none of its own combinations, nor of the images impressed on it by any agent, could at all warrant us to say that Christ thereby dwelt in the soul. But the meaning of such words is more clearly signified in the following passages: In the epistle to the Ephesians, the apostle prays, "that Christ may dwell in their hearts by faith." Again, saith Christ, "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." And again, saith Paul, "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now, if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his. And if Christ be in you the body is dead because of sin." Now these and similar passages teach that the indwelling of Christ in the soul, is the same as the indwelling of his Spirit in it, and its apprehension of him by faith, for by both these ways the soul obtains such vivid and life-inspiring perceptions of Christ, as justly warrant us to say that Christ is dwelling in it. Thus the indwelling of the Spirit is called the indwelling of Christ, because he is there to impart sanctifying views of Christ, to attach the soul to Christ, and to form and maintain between the two the grand connecting link of a union that is everlasting. Accordingly he is called the Spirit of Christ, and is said to take of the things that are Christ's and to shew them to the soul. In short, he is Christ's most glorious agent and plenipotentiary, operating in the soul, in his name, by his authority, and for his glory, so that, according to language which is easily understood, and sometimes employed of earthly ambassadors, his presence and indwelling is denominated the indwelling of Christ himself. But in one of the passages already quoted, the apostle prays that "Christ may dwell in the hearts of the Ephesians by faith," and this throws additional light on the truth under consideration. Now if you apply to this question the apostle's definition of faith, that "it is the evidence of things not seen," the truth inquired into will be made somewhat apparent. The term "evidence," as you all understand, signifies any fact or statement by which a thing may be proved or confuted. As faith, then, is the evidence or proof of things not seen, Christ's indwelling in the soul by faith, means, that although Christ's existence and divine glory are not the subjects of our bodily vision, because the highest heavens veil him from our view, still faith works in the soul all that unquestionable certainty about his existence, and glory, and mediation, which would be produced if we beheld them with our eyes, and heard his voices with our ears. Faith, as it were, draws aside the veil of the starry firmament that limits our view, and swallows up the immense and immeasurable spaces that separate us from his immediate presence. Faith flies up to heaven on wings swifter than the morning beams, and, as it were, brings Christ down from its heights and places him in all the radiation of his celestial elevation, not before the fleshly eye, but better still, within the very centre of the soul, and in the throne of the heart. And because faith is such a potent principle as this in its actings on Christ, he is justly said to dwell in the soul by faith. Now this indwelling of Christ, by his Spirit and by faith, is as essential to the very existence of saving religion in the soul, as love to God itself. As he is the only mediator and righteousness of the sinner, by whose interposition wrath is averted from him, and quickening grace is poured into his soul, so these blessings are only realised by his indwelling in us, and our union to him. If the spirit of Christ is not in us we continue dead in our sins, and unable to love God or perform an acceptable duty. For he is the fountain from which the rivers of living waters swell up in the believer's heart, and the sole parent of all that spiritual life which ever animates our duties, and makes them acceptable sacrifices with God.

II. The origin of true religion in the soul of man. It originates, according to our text, in Christ declaring unto the soul the name of the Father; "I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it, that the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them."

The name of God in the Scriptures is always descriptive of his character and perfections, for there can be no name, which denotes excellence, applied to God, which is not to be found in him in an infinite degree. In fact, it is by the names and titles, as well as by the works, which are ascribed to God in the Word, that we obtain light on the great topics of his existence, and spirituality, and other glories that shine forth in him. Among men names are either arbitrary and unmeaning, or fictitious and inapplicable, but the names of God are the mediums through which the hidden glories of his nature and character are manifested to the world. When Christ, therefore, says, in our text, that he had declared the name of his Father to his disciples, and that he would still declare it, he means that he has manifested to them the Father's character, and perfections, and will. He means that he had surrounded with light, and made his disciples see it, the character of his Father, and his gracious will, which had been buried for ages beneath a mass of Jewish fables and traditions, and a most revolting pile of pagan mythologies and creature idolatry. The apostle tells us that this was the grand end of his incarnation; "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." And again, saith Christ, "I have not spoken of myself, but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment what I should say, and what I should speak." And as his life and death form a bright exposition of this commandment, those who know it, know that it was from first to last a bringing forth, into the most glorious light, by means of discourses, and miracles, and obedience, and sufferings, the very character of his Father, and his purposes of grace towards sinners of mankind. As this character, or name of God, is comprehensively, and yet briefly, explained by God himself, in his answer to the prayer of Moses, "Shew me thy glory," we shall set it before you with one or two observations, "The Lord descended in the cloud, and proclaimed the name of the Lord; and the Lord passed by before him and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation." The name which God appropriates to himself in this passage is that of Jehovah, for so the term, Lord, should be translated; and all that follows it is an explanation of the divine glories which it comprehends. Thus God is called Jehovah, and this title means the strong or mighty God, translated, in our version, the Lord God; the merciful God; the gracious God; the long-suffering God; the God of abundant goodness; the God of vast and pardoning mercy; and the God of unbending and retributive justice. There are three things chiefly in this name of God that merit attention, 1st, Jehovah is the mighty or strong God, able to bless us, and able also to make us miserable if he pleases. 2d, He is the good God, and therefore full of mercy, and grace, and long-suffering towards sinners. And 3dly, He is the just God, true both to his promises and threatenings, who will not condemn an innocent creature, nor clear the guilty with impunity. Such, then, is the name of God, or rather such is God himself, whom Christ declared unto his disciples, and whom he is still declaring and making known in the souls of men.

The manner in which Christ declares his Father's name unto sinners, should be known, in order to perceive how the declaration of it originates in them true religion, or, according to our text, the love of God and the indwelling of Christ. Now, he does this in an external and in an internal manner. Externally, by all the ordinances of his appointment. The reading of the Word, the preaching of it, prayer, sacraments, and other ordinances, are all instituted to declare the name of the Father unto sinners; and it was in all these ways that Christ declared it unto the Jews during the days of his humiliation. Yet, such an external proclamation of the Father in the ears of sinners, is not of itself effectual for the production of true religion in their souls; for with it, all the Jewish people crucified Christ, and preferred Barabba, a murderer, before him; and thousands still with the same privilege all remain in unbelief and spiritual deadness of soul. Accordingly, an internal declaration of the Father's name is necessary, and it is to this kind that our Lord particularly alludes in the words of our text. Now, this internal manifestation of the Father's name is made not to the fancy by any pictorial representation. For as no man hath seen God at any time, so no mental or visible similitude can be drawn of him; but the Father's name is declared in us, (to employ the language of St. Paul,) by a supernatural manifestation of the truth to the conscience. Those attributes of the divine character that are comprehended in the name Jehovah, are severally taken up by Christ, and impressed on the understanding and conscience with dazzling light and awakening power. For example, the greatness of God may be impressed on his conscience, or the justice of God may be revealed in its fiery glory, whereby the sinner is roused out of all his dreams and delusions, brought to see himself on the brink of eternal misery, and unable to rescue himself from the grasp of God, who is great and mighty; or, the mercy of God may be revealed in the sight of the sinner's agitated conscience and excited fears;—mercy clothed in her divinest robes—mercy speaking in accents of the most subduing tenderness, and just as he trampled to the deepest recesses of his nature when he heard the voice of Christ in him proclaiming his Father's majesty and justice, so now, at the proclamation of his mercy, the tumults of his bosom are allayed, and his heart exults with joy.

Such, then, is the way in which Christ declares his Father's name in the soul, and it is easy to see, from what has been said, how true inward religion is thereby originated. The inward manifestation of the might and majesty of God alarms the sinner ner, and shews him his utter nothingness and insignificance. The manifestation of his retributive justice fastens the conviction of guilt on his conscience, and fills him with a painful consciousness of his just obnoxiousness to wrath. And the welcome discovery of the divine mercy, like the rising of the sun on the gloomy world below, sheds through his soul the beams of refreshing hope, and awakens in his heart the emotions of gratitude and love. And as these several manifestations of the Father's name are made by Christ himself, or by the Spirit pointing the soul to Christ, in whose person and work the attributes of the Godhead shine forth in their most splendid and harmonious manifestations; as the justice of the Father, in fact, points at once to the sacrifice of Christ as the most emphatic demonstration of its inflexible hatred of sin, and as mercy also points to his sacrifice as the only basis of forgiveness and salvation, so the soul is at once attracted to Christ in the exercise of faith, and thus the love wherewith God loves his Son enters into the heart, and Christ himself, in the realizations of faith, also enters in as the sinner's willingly acknowledged Saviour and rightful Lord.

In conclusion. 1st, Let me apply this subject, by asking you, whether you are the subjects of that inward vital religion which we have briefly illustrated? Have you felt in you the love wherewith God the Father loves Christ? Not the universal and common regard with which God loves the works of his hands throughout the universe—that benevolence which encompasses the evil as well as the good, and which crowns their life with innumerable mercies? For, you may largely enjoy the bounties of Providence, and yet be strangers to that tender and distinguishing love with which God loves Christ, and refreshes the souls of his people. Does the love of God toward you operate in the way that it did in Christ? Does it produce in you a corresponding affection, so that you are led to love God with an exclusive, an active, a patient, and persevering love, even as Christ did in the days of his humiliation? Oh! brethren, imagine not that vital religion is in you, if you can love God and earthly idols, and sinful practices too,—if it permits you to spend your life in a dreamy and idle sentimentality, without awakening you to energetic services in his cause; and if it cannot endure trials and sufferings for his sake,—if it exists and flourishes only in the hour of sunshine, when the sky is clear, and the stormy elements are sleeping in tranquillity. But I would also ask you, whether Christ is dwelling in you? For we have shewn, that the indwelling of Christ is one of the great elements of inward vital religion. Do you feel the principles, and affections, and corruptions of your heart governed by the Spirit of Christ? Have you any measure of his temper and dispositions? Have you faith to realize an impressive glory and attractiveness in an invisible Saviour? And does this faith incline you towards him—make you rejoice supremely in him, and long incessantly for him? In such things consists the indwelling of Christ in the soul, so that the man who is a stranger to the presence and felt workings of these things, is destitute of any inward saving religion.

2d, As this text teaches how true religion is originated in the soul, so we would, in conclusion, give one or two directions to inquiring sinners. 1st, Make a diligent use of all the means whereby you may acquire a knowledge of the Father's name. Study the Scriptures in which this knowledge is recorded. Be frequent and fervent in private prayer, and be a regular worshipper in the sanctuary. If you are neglecting any of these from slothfulness or dislike of them, or disbelief of their utility, we assure you that you can have no proper hope that the Spirit of God will ever implant a principle of vital religion in your soul; and, 2dly, In all your religious duties never take away the eye of your soul from Christ, for as it is, He who declares the Father's name in the soul, so it is with Him you must principally deal in all your religious exercises and duties. Are you praying for forgiveness, or illumination, or a new heart? How can you expect to succeed in your petitions, if you are not clasping the Redeemer to your inmost soul, since his blood only can wash away your guilt—since he only is the light of life—and, since he only has those mighty resources of grace which you need for your regeneration. Are you reading the Word? Remember it is the revelation of Christ, and trace every sentence—every sentiment—every syllable, up to His lips as the Author of it all. Are you listening to a sermon? Oh! do you not hear the majestic voice of Christ in it, speaking with an authority that is divine—with a power over your conscience that is irresistible—and with a tenderness that melts you into contrition and love? Thus fix your eye firmly and steadily on Christ in all your intercourse and dealing with God, and you will eventually feel that the love wherewith God loves Christ is in you, and that Christ himself is in you.

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

Minister of Cramond.

No. V.

“And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know, that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live.”—DEUT. viii. 2, 3.

In reviewing the second period of the history of Israel, the first remarkable dispensation of Providence noticed, was the solemn giving of the law at Mount Sinai. To this your attention was directed in a former Number. A second remarkable dispensation, in this period, was the erection of the tabernacle, and the establishment of all the institutions of the ceremonial law. There was something much out of the ordinary course in many of these institutions, and something apparently so unmeaning to a careless observer, that some have been unwilling to suppose that they were of divine appointment, and have supposed that Moses had borrowed them from heathen forms of worship. But to those who believe the Scriptures to be the word of God, nothing can be more plain than this, that these institutions were not the invention of Moses, but that in every thing connected with them he acted by express commandment from God, and was not permitted, even to the extent of one pin in the tabernacle, to act according to his own discretion, but was to execute every thing in strict accordance with the divine commandment. And hence we may learn, that in every thing relating to the worship and service of God, we should adhere strictly to the rule of God's word. God is much displeased when men set up their own foolish devices in opposition to the unerring rule of his word, in what respects his worship: "Howbeit, in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." God will not accept of such services, but will say of them, "Who hath required this service at your hands?"

But whatever may be thought of these ceremonial institutions by a careless observer, they, who do carefully consider them, and the ends for which they were appointed, will discover evidences of divine wisdom in their contrivance, and their nice adaptations to the ends of their appointment. This will be apparent, by considering some of the purposes to which they were subservient.

1st, They were evidently intended to constitute an obvious line of demarcation between the nation of Israel and other nations. The very nature of these institutions rendered it impossible for the Israelites to have much intercourse with other nations, and still to observe them. Now the act of choosing this one nation from among the nations, went upon the supposition of their being kept separate; and here we see one of the chief ways by which that separation was preserved. Whenever they did therefore associate with the nations, it was at the expense of violating their ceremonial institutions. And the effect of such association with the nations was the corruption or abandonment of their own institutions, and the adoption, in their room, of all the abominations of the heathen worship.

2d, These institutions were intended to impress deeply upon their minds a sense of their guilt and defilement in the sight of God, and of God's unspotted holiness; his infinite love to holiness, and his infinite hatred of all sin; and they were admirably adapted for such ends. For all their sprinklings, and purifyings, and washings, and all the distinctions that were made between what was clean and what was unclean, were constantly impressing on their minds, on the one hand, the spotless purity of God, and on the other their own defilement because of sin. Thus they were taught, that God was the Holy One, that he will be sanctified of them that draw near to him, and that holiness becometh his house for ever.

3d, By all the sacrifices, which constituted so prominent a part of the ceremonial institutions of the law, they were taught, that, as sinful creatures, they were exposed to the curse, and thereby liable to death; for the wages of sin is death: and that, therefore, without the shedding of blood, there could be no remission of sin. And, as it must have been evident that the blood of bulls and of goats could not take away sin, they were taught that these sacrifices, on which they laid their hands, confessing their sins, were only types of an all-perfect sacrifice, that was in due time to be offered up. And thus we see the great end of all the institutions of the ceremonial law. They were all shadows of good things to come. They were all intended to typify Christ, and the good things of the Gospel. This might be shewn in a great number of instances: In the construction of the tabernacle; in the office and dress of the high priest; in the sacrifices that were offered up; in the sprinkling of their blood; in their solemn festivals, as in the feast of the passover, in the great day of atonement and in the feast of tabernacles. On these it is not intended to enlarge. But, in proof of what has been stated, as the great end of these ceremonial institutions, the reader may be referred to the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, which will be found the key to open up the mystery of the Jewish economy. Let any one read that Epistle, comparing the institutions of Moses with what the Apostle has so particularly stated respecting their typical reference to Christ, and the good things of the Gospel, and he must at once come to the conclusion, that this was the great end of their appointment; and there is a glorious display of the divine wisdom, in their being so peculiarly adapted for answering that great end.

The next remarkable dispensation during this period, is their sojourning in the wilderness for forty years. Here observe, that the hardships, and trials, and judgments that came upon them, during that period, were of their own procuring. They were the fruits of their own evil doings. They refused to enter into the promised land when they were assured that it was a good land, and that the Lord would subdue all their enemies before them, and put them in peaceful possession of the land. And because they did not believe the word of God, and despised that good land, God swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest, and that they should spend the remainder of their days in the wilderness, and leave their carcases there. And so it happened that, on the summing up of the people, before their entering into the land of Canaan, it was found, that none of those who had come to manhood, when they left Egypt, were then alive, save Caleb and Joshua; because they had given a true report of the promised land, and had encouraged the people to go, and to take possession of it as their inheritance. And here is represented to us, in an impressive manner, the unbelief, the folly, and infatuation of sinners. They will not believe the declarations of the God of truth, respecting the rich provision that is made in the Gospel for supplying all their need, and respecting that heavenly inheritance which he hath provided, and which he will bestow upon all who believe. They prefer the flesh-pots of Egypt to the heavenly manna; and, in the righteous judgment of God, they are left to their own choice. They wander in the wilderness; they live without God; they die without hope; they are not able to enter into the promised rest, because of unbelief.

But there is another view to be taken of this sojourning of Israel in the wilderness. Notwithstanding all their rebellions, and provocations, and backslidings, the Lord still continued to watch over them and to care for them. The pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, the symbol of God's presence, the guide of their steps, and the shield of their protection, was with them. They had the manna for their daily bread, and the water from the smitten rock to quench their thirst; and their clothing waxed not old, nor their shoes upon their feet, during all their forty years' journeying. And there was, moreover, a training up of the young generation among them, amidst all the trials of the wilderness, to be a people for the Lord, and to enter in and take possession of the good land which their fathers had despised. And in all this there is presented to us a striking emblem of the unceasing care and love which is continually exercised towards the people of God, in conducting them through the wilderness, in giving them a supply of their temporal and spiritual wants, in defending them from dangers, in subduing their enemies, and in finally putting them in possession of the promised inheritance. There is a beautiful allusion to this in Psalm cvii.: "Q give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy; and gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south. They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted within them. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation."

The only other remarkable dispensation during this period of the history of Israel to be noticed, is their being put into possession of the promised land. And now, these things merit our attention. 1. As a prelude to their conquest over all their enemies in the land of Canaan, two signal victories were gained by them over two formidable kingdoms on this side of Jordan, over Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan. Thus the Lord began to shew them what he intended to accomplish on their behalf. These two signal victories, which the Lord had wrought for them, they were taught to look upon as a pledge that, in like manner, God would subdue all their enemies before them in the land of Canaan. Thus were they encouraged and strengthened for the combat, with the assurance that the Lord was on their side, and that they might set all their enemies at defiance. And, on the other hand, the report of these signal victories, and the wonders which God had done in behalf of the people of Israel, would strike terror and dismay into the hearts of their enemies. And that this was actually the case with the inhabitants of Canaan, we learn from the testimony of Rahab, (Josh. ii. 9-11,) "And she said unto the men, I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. For we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man because of you; for the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath." 2. Moses being now advanced in life, and not being permitted to accompany them over Jordan, a new leader was appointed to them, Joshua, a man of valour, of firmness and decision, and every way qualified for the charge committed to him. He was one whom the Lord had appointed, and whom the Lord had assured that he would not fail him nor forsake him. Under him, therefore, they might march on in confidence, and be assured of victory. 3. Their entering into the land of Canaan was by a miraculous interposition of God's providence, in dividing the waters of Jordan, and at a time, too, when Jordan had swollen, and overflowed its banks, that they might pass over on dry ground. There was here a trial of their faith to pass over, while the course of the waters was miraculously suspended. But in having experienced so signal an interposition in their behalf, they had an additional pledge given them of God's faithfulness to fulfil all that he had promised, of their conquest over their enemies in the land of Canaan. 4. This, accordingly, was the next step in their progress, that by an uninterrupted course of victory in many battles, in which the hand of the Lord was evidently stretched forth in their behalf, they got possession of the promised land, and their enemies were made to flee before them. Thus they obtained houses and cities which they had not built, vineyards and oliveyards which they had not planted, and abundance of cattle and other spoils.

1. Let us, in the whole of this wonderful procedure of God, be led to a high admiration of his power, his faithfulness, and his love manifested to the people of Israel. How desirable is it to be under the care of God, the Shepherd of Israel! Happy is the people who is in such a case; yes, happy is that people whose God is the Lord!

2. In the Israelites obtaining possession of the land of Canaan for the first time, there is a type of their obtaining possession of it again under the reign of Messiah, of whom Joshua was a type, when their enemies shall be completely subdued, and when all the promises which God hath made to his people Israel shall be completely fulfilled. Then shall he establish and make Jerusalem a praise on the earth.

3. In Joshua's conducting the people of Israel safely through the swellings of Jordan, and bringing them into the promised land, there is typically represented to us Christ's gracious care of his people, in upholding them in the trying hour of death, and bringing them into the possession of the heavenly inheritance.

A LETTER ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG MINISTER IN ENTERING ON HIS OFFICE.

BY THE REV. S. SIMPSON,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Usher's Quay, Dublin.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—You are now engaged in the difficult, yet honourable, service of the Gospel ministry. You may justly cry out,—“Who is sufficient for these things?” This is a work indeed. What piety, what prudence, what zeal, what courage, what faithfulness, and what holy watchfulness is necessary to the right discharge of so great an office! The work is great, our strength is small; yea, of ourselves we have no strength; but all our sufficiency is of God; to Him, therefore, must we go for it. Here is our comfort and our hope, “It hath pleased the Father that in Christ all fulness should dwell;” fulness of merit and righteousness, of strength and grace. God himself hath said that if any lack wisdom, they should ask it of Him who giveth to all men liberally;” and He hath expressly added, “It shall be given.” Therefore, let us make an application to Him; let us come with holy “boldness to the throne of grace,” deeply impressed with a sense of our weakness and folly; and thus let us ask wisdom, and we need not fear being disappointed, but shall “out of his fulness receive, and grace for grace.”

I trust that you have really been converted,—that the pure water of life has been communicated to your soul which will spring up to eternal happiness. But still watch over the frame of your mind continually; see to it, that you are a Christian. How many are occupied in publishing the pure word of God, who never felt, and handled, and tasted the word of life! Let it be a matter of serious and frequent examination—close, heartfelt examination, whether the truth be in you,—whether you be habitually living under its influence,—whether you be “growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,” whether you be a thriving, healthful, growing, spiritual, consecrated Christian. Live near to God; be frequently in your closet; pour out your heart before the Father of spirits; hold communion with the God of heaven: it is thus that strength will be supplied to you to discharge your ministry well. Satan cares but little about a minister who altogether neglects his closet, and disregards the personal exercises of religion. It is in secret communion with God that strength is obtained for the discharge of ministerial duties; and he that is much with God in private will come forth before his people in the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ.

With respect to your present situation, I dare say you often feel much anxiety, and perhaps, at times, some depression of spirits, lest your labours should be ineffectual to answer the important object proposed. It is, however, a considerable relief to the mind when we know that we are in the path of duty, and performing the will of Providence; and submission to the divine determination respecting the success or the failure of our effects, and the time that we may be called to labour without effect, is a disposition, the possession of which is invariably connected with tranquillity of mind. Perhaps you may be called to spend your time and strength for years without seeing any good resulting from it: it may be, that, after all, you will leave the scene of action before any effectual attack has been made on the enemy's forces: you may be designed only to prepare the way for others, to sow the seed of which they will reap the harvest—to lead the army close up to the opposing host, and then, called to a higher scene, to survey from your elevated and happy station, the contest and the victory. But, however this may be, if, in your ministrations, you faithfully hold forth the word of life, and strive with all your might, according to your opportunity, to stop the progress of error and vice, you will not lose your reward.

Success is desirable. Who loves to toil in vain? Who loves to plant, and water, and see no increase? And, in general, God blesses his servants with some considerable degree of usefulness. But a useful ministry is not necessary to a valid one. Our Saviour himself preached with very little effect, and said, "I have laboured in vain; I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain." "Yet," he adds, "yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work with my God." And so may every minister say, under discouraging appearances. We serve a good Master: he does not make us answerable for success; he knows infinitely better than we do, that conversion is his own prerogative, and does not depend upon us. Duty only is ours; and, even with regard to this, he allows us to depend upon him for ability to discharge it; and, in estimating our services, he admits into the account, not only all we do, but all we try to do, and wish to do, but in which we are hindered; and says, "It was well that it was in thy heart." The language of promise is, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." We go further; we are persuaded that there are many cases in which ministers are dearer to God in their disappointments, than in their successes. It is pleasant to labour when we succeed; and there is always some danger, lest pride should mix with our pleasure, and, while we acknowledge God to be the author, we should feel some little importance at least, in being the instruments. The trial of principle is, to labour without success. To bear the burden and heat of the day without murmuring; to abide at our post under every temptation to leave it; to say, "If He is pleased to use me, I shall deem it an honour; but if He refuse me, I have no reason to complain; He has a right to choose his own instruments; to be willing to lay a foundation upon which another is to build; or to set, as another rises, and without envy or regret, to say, 'He must increase, and I must decrease.'" Here is the true spirit of a servant—here is real greatness in the sight of the Lord—and such magnanimity shall not lose its reward.

But, my dear brother, though our discouragements are numerous, our supports are great. We have the promises of our Lord, the examples of the saints, the certainty of a happy termination; the faithfulness and omnipotence of Jehovah are engaged on our side; our cause is the cause of truth, and must finally prevail; our office and employment are the most honourable in the world; and, if we are found faithful, we shall "shine as the stars for ever and ever." Having, therefore, such a ministry, such prospects, let us not faint. The recollection of past mercy and grace afforded in times of great perplexity, will lead us to say, "Hitherto the Lord hath helped us;" and will induce us to hope, that He who has hitherto delivered, will yet deliver.

I find, that exalted views of the importance and responsibility of the ministerial office have a very beneficial effect upon my mind; they tend to produce solemnity and seriousness, and to stimulate to greater and uniform activity. Indeed, who can be idle and trifling with such a momentous charge? O that we may be so kept by the power, and so directed by the grace of our God, as ever to keep his glory in view, and rejoice in the happy prospect of doing good to immortal souls! Whatever others do, let it be our aim to study hard, pray hard, and labour hard for the good of our fellow-creatures. I think we shall not have to complain on our dying day, that we have done too much for Him who hath done so much for us; but, in all probability, we shall have to regret that we have done so little.

Let us not be discouraged if we meet with difficulties in the way. They will be all needful, and will not make us preach the worse, but the better. If our hearts be but in the work, we may hope we shall have comfort in it also; for, as Baxter, in his "Reformed Pastor," well observes, "God seldom blesses any man's work so much as his, whose heart is set upon the success of it." That we may be made faithful, laborious, and active ministers of the New Testament, and be preserved from every snare, my earnest prayer is. I remain your's sincerely in the Gospel.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Prayer, the Believer's support in Death.—Is the believer the victim of disease, and is he immured in a sick-chamber, stretched on a bed of pain, full of tossings to and fro till the dawning of the day, hark! what are these whispers?—they are expressions, soft but broken,—sent forth from his suffering spirit, to Him, whose comforts, amidst the multitude of his thoughts within him, delight his soul—expressions of undiminished hope, and confidence, and blessing; for, draw aside that curtain, and say, as you behold his disease-worn person, say, if you ever saw more meekness of eye, more placidity of countenance, a face combining in it a greater assemblage of contrarieties, exhibiting a more beautiful picture of the triumph of grace over nature, of prayer over trial, of pain of body subdued by peace in believing, and of the damps of death itself, dried up by the light of life? Oh! it is not the softness of the couch on which he languishes, it is not the solacing sympathies of the friend who sits beside it; it is not the reflective survey of his past life, it is not the hope of fresh coming strength that occasion this composure: No, it is the effectual fervent prayer which availeth much; it is the answer given to that prayer by him who hath heard it, the peace of God which passeth all understanding, keeping his heart and mind in Christ Jesus, sent unto his soul from the excellent glory.—SOSTHENES. (On Union with Christ and abiding in Him.)

The Guilt and Evils of Covetousness.—Covetousness instigated Judas to betray the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, for thirty pieces of silver. It induced Ananias and Sapphira to tempt the Holy Ghost, to "lie, not unto men, but unto God." It has even assumed the sacred office, trod the courts of the Lord, brought in damnable heresies, and with feigned words has made merchandise of men. It converted the Jewish temple into a den of thieves; and among the articles of merchandise, in the mystical Babylon, were seen "the souls of men."—HARRIS. (Mammon.)

SACRED POETRY.

ON LEAVING SCOTLAND FOR A FOREIGN SHORE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MACLURE,

Nassau, New Providence.

My native land ! I bid thee hail ! ere yet the mighty sea
Rolls on its broad blue waves between my fatherland and me ;
I ever loved thy lochs' dark gloom,—thy mountains' "cloud-capped"
brow,
But never loved them with a love so deep and pure as now.

I loved thee when, with lightsome heart, in youth's sweet sunny days,
I sported on thy primrose banks, or climbed thy heathery braes :
Or wondering watched the foamy wave that swept the unfathomed sea,
But dream't not that it e'er would part my own loved land and me.

Land of my birth ! a thousand looks concentrated into one,— Heart-beaming looks, I fain would now, o'er thy loved features run ;
And gaze once more on hill and dale,—on glen and tangled brake,—
On daisied field, and silvery stream,—on rock and mountain lake.

But dearer far than aught of these,—than fairest scene of earth,
Are friends and kindred of my heart, my home, my native hearth,—
The home that nursed my infant head, and soothed my infant cares,
The hearth that woke my first-born hopes, and heard my earliest prayers.

Land of my fathers' faith ! how sweet thy humble village spires,
Where pure religion wakes her harp, and fans her sacred fires ;
Oh ! there to many a lowly heart the soul-felt truth is given,
"This is indeed the house of God, and this the gate of heaven !"

Land of the martyrs' hallowed deeds ! where many a lonely dell,
Reveals the humble grassy mound, where once the sainted fell ;
Fell, but to rise on angel's wing to heaven's seraphic throng,
And with their streaming life to waft life's purest stream along.

Favoured of heaven, my native land ! thou seem'st the golden source Whence Truth to many a heathen shore shall speed her glorious course ;
Till light shall break on distant tribes, and great Messiah reign
From rock-bound Greenland's icy strand to India's sultry plain.

Away, to haste that promised time, to distant isles I go,
Where earth reveals a fairer fruit, and sky a brighter glow ;
Oh ! soon with fruit,—with ray divine, good Lord, the nations bless,
The fruits of holiness be theirs,—the Sum of Righteousness.

THY KINGDOM COME.

HAIL to the Prince who in triumph advances,
Honoured and blest be his Gospel divine :
Soon may the glorious sound ring from earth's utmost bound,
Alleluia Hosannah, the Lord God doth reign.

May his heralds of peace with all grace be adorned,
Who carry glad tidings to nations afar :
And soon may the banner of Christ be unfurld
On plains where huge Juggernaut sits on his car.

Hail, hail to the prospect, when tribes of wild Indians
Shall flock to his standard, to worship his name :
When nations and people of all tongues assembled,
Shall shout forth the praises of God and the Lamb.

Then the days shall be happy beyond all that has been,
When God's Word shall reach unto earth's utmost line ;
And the heroes who bore it, though loosed from the body,
Like stars in their orbits of glory shall shine.

MRS ISAAC.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Confidence in God's Providence.—A gentleman was once talking to Thomas Mann, a pious waterman on the river Thames, and having ascertained that he never laboured on the Sabbath, and was dependent on his labour for a living, he said, "Well, as your gains have been so small, you could not lay much up. Have you not been anxious, as you have proceeded in life, lest, from the very nature of your employment, exposed as it is to danger and to all weathers, you should be laid up by illness, and have nothing to support you?" "No, Sir ; I have always believed in God's Providence. I think I am just fitted for the situation which he has appointed to me, and that what he has fixed is best. I am, therefore, satisfied and thankful. I endeavour to do the duty which daily falls to me, and to be careful of my earnings: I have always had enough, and I have no fear about years to come." "Yet, my friend," said the gentleman, "if illness were to come, and you had not a provision made for the supply of your need in helpless age, ought not this to give you some uneasiness?" "No, Sir, that is not my business. Future years are not my business. That belongs to God, and I am sure that, doing my duty in his fear now, and being careful in what he intrusts to me, he will supply my need in future in that way which he shall think best." The gentleman then said, "We have heard, that teaching the poor to read has a tendency to make them discontented with the station in which Providence has placed them. Do you think so?" "No, Sir; quite the contrary. All that I have read in the Bible teaches me to be content with the dispensations of Providence, to be industrious and careful. A Christian cannot be an idle or an ungrateful man."

The Origin of the Moravian Mission.—At a missionary meeting in London, in May 1831, James Montgomery, Esq. of Sheffield, stated, that nearly one hundred years ago, the first missionary fund was formed among the Moravians, or United Brethren. Its amount was indeed small; for when the first two persons offered themselves to go to the West Indies, their patron went with them through the forest of Lusatia, and when they had come to the verge, he comforted their minds, knelt down with them, and commended them to God, and to the word of his grace. When they rose, he said, "Brethren, how much money have you?" They opened their purses, and shewed three dollars; thirteen shillings and sixpence if they were Spanish, or if they were German only ten shillings and sixpence. He gave them two ducats, eighteen shillings, more: so that with about thirty shillings these men went forth to preach the Gospel. Such was then the amount of the missionary funds of these good people. The thirty shillings thus lent to the Lord, and vested in his service at St. Thomas's, has been so accumulated by providential circumstances, that now the missionary station there, not only supports its own expenses, but has at times realized as much as three hundred pounds surplus funds.

Vain-Glory.—John Fox, the author of the "Book of Martyrs," was once met by a woman who showed him a book she was carrying, and said, "See you not that I am going to a sermon?" The good man replied, "If you will be ruled by me, go home, for you will do little good to-day at Church." "When then," asked she, "would you counsel me to go?" His reply was, "When you tell no one beforehand."

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE,

AN EVIDENCE OF THE TRUTH OF THE CHRISTIAN REVELATION.

By JAMES GLASSFORD, ESQ., ADVOCATE.

THE value of what is called the inductive or experimental method of inquiry, in the various departments of science, and the superiority of this instrument for the discovery of truth and the enlargement of knowledge, when compared with those methods which are theoretical, is well understood by philosophers, and generally allowed in the present day. By reasoning from that which is particular to that which is more general, from what is nearest, and therefore, most obvious, to what is less apparent, because more remote, the truth is in many subjects ascertained even by persons of ordinary mental powers, with greater precision and a firmer conviction, than by those who pursue the opposite process, whatever talent may be exercised in conducting the inquiry. And the advantages of the method referred to have been fully verified, not only by the progress of discovery to which it has led in physical science, or the field of external nature, but also by the improvement of logic, or the art of reasoning, itself. But what is thus good in philosophy or human knowledge will be found equally so in that which is religious and divine, although it is not sufficiently considered in the latter case.

The truths of Scripture, and above all the sublime doctrines and pure precepts of the Gospel, are denied or disputed by the world; for "the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God." 1 Cor. ii. 14. Now, there are two general methods by which, in the use of those faculties with which man has been endowed by his Creator, the revealed truths of Christianity may be acknowledged, and come with conviction to his mind; for we do not at present consider the direct and immediate influence of the Spirit of God to produce that belief, but rather the means through which he operates upon the understanding and the heart, as instruments for that purpose. One of these means, as distinguished from the other, is of an outward nature, and consists chiefly in the evidence of testimony, although we include under it here all those proofs by which the books of Scripture are attested to be a genuine and authentic record. And this evidence, when received by the understanding, is in itself conclusive of the question as to the authority of what they contain and enjoin. For if God has spoken, and the Bible is the revelation of his word and will, man's duty to believe and obey is a necessary and undisputed consequence. The examination of the ground and warrant of Christian faith, through the medium of this external evidence, has been conducted by writers of every class, and in every age, since the introduction of Christianity, with a minuteness and jealousy of search to which no other question or any other inquiry has ever been subjected. And the evidences upon which the authenticity of the Scripture record rests, and by which it is established, have been adduced and exhibited with an accumulation and force which no argument would be able to withstand, if unassisted by the natural prejudice and blindness of the unrenewed heart.

But reference is more especially made at present to the other medium of evidence above alluded to, and in contradistinction to this external proof; namely, that which is personal to the individual inquirer—or the evidence of experience. And here we confine our attention chiefly to those motives and inducements which recommend this method of investigating the truth of the Gospel as a message from God to man. Let him, then, who hesitates in his belief of its doctrines, whose intellect and reason is still suggesting doubts regarding its external evidence,—whose natural reluctance or philosophical habits of thought would call in question the proofs by which that revelation is attested,—or who is entangled and perplexed by the objections of the sceptic, or cavils of the infidel, have recourse to this experimental process, and try the truth of Christian doctrine by obedience to Christian precept. This is a method of inquiry which the divine Author of our faith himself permits and authorises, in these words: "My doctrine is not mine," not mine only, or in the character in which the unbelieving Jews regarded him, "but His that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself." Christ was thus graciously pleased that the truth of what he taught, and the reality of his divine mission, should be tried by this test; and thus plainly declares that by an experimental knowledge of his doctrine, and its effect and influence, its reality, as a message from God, would be manifested and confirmed. Trial of the Christian life is thus appealed to, as affording, even of itself, a satisfactory evidence of Christian truth and doctrine.

This evidence, indeed, on account of its more private and personal application, does not admit of being imparted in all its force to others. Upon them it can only be reflected as from a mirror; for it consists in the state of mind and disposition of the individual. Nor can the modes of its operation be fully understood, except by those who actually make the experiment. It is true, that the influence and results to be expected are plainly intimated by the Scriptures themselves. In the keeping of the law "is a great reward;" even a present recompense in the act. The joy of the Christian is said to be "unspeakable and full of glory;" his peace to "pass all understanding;" his hope, and joy, and peace, "to abound;" with many other declarations of the same encouraging import. And the testimony of all who have made the trial, has avouched and sealed their truth. But we are now considering the fruits of a Christian life, rather as connected with the question of evidence to the Christian system, than on account of their intrinsic excellence; and referring to them as a proper ground of belief to the reasonable mind. And with this view it is only necessary farther to notice, very shortly, some of the considerations and inducements which plainly recommend this experimental proof of the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel.

First, It is a test of truth open and accessible to all; to the high and low, the rich and poor, the learned and unlearned. This universal adaptation, which is of so much value in every other case, gives a peculiar advantage here also; for, while it speaks not less to the most enlarged and powerful intellect, it brings the question and its answer equally within the reach of others, who are not accustomed to follow a train of reasoning, or enter into a comparison of extended proofs. Secondly, It requires no previous study, or instruction, no reading and collection of the testimony of other men, no machinery or apparatus to conduct the experiment. The materials for investigation are few and simple, and are alike in the power and possession of all. Thirdly, It is a kind of evidence which has its effect and result at once, and from the beginning. It is brought inwardly home to the individual, and therefore immediately apprehended; free from suspicion, and liable to no mistake. For, though the evidence will acquire greater force and clearness the longer that the experiment is continued, and the more frequently that it is repeated, still it throws its light upon the question at issue even from the first hour. Fourthly, It is a safe experiment; one which cannot, in any case, be productive of injury, or attended with danger, or followed by evil consequence. For, even on the extreme supposition that it should not produce that full conviction of the truth which, according to the experience of all who have engaged in it, may certainly be expected, there is no ground to suppose that it ever can be an occasion of suffering or of loss. On the contrary, while thousands have regretted, and in the end bitterly lamented not making the trial, in a question of so great moment, it is allowed that there is no instance upon record of a single individual who, having made it, has afterwards repented of his deed. Fifthly, It is in all respects a fit and satisfactory test, suited to the case; for the question to be resolved is not of a physical or logical nature, but a moral question; and the evidence offered is therefore, with strict propriety, a moral evidence. The Gospel assumes, that it will produce in those who receive it, and yield obedience to it, a certain state of mind, and certain dispositions and affections, excellent in their nature, but peculiar to its influence, and that these will follow as its infallible results; and the point to be ascertained is, whether, upon a fair trial of obedience to the Gospel precepts, these effects will be found actually to flow from it or not. In order to answer that question, Christ has said to his disciples, try my doctrine in this way, and judge accordingly for yourselves; if any man will do the will of God, he shall know whether the doctrine which I teach comes from God. The Saviour vouched his divine mission chiefly by two kinds of evidence, in confirmation of that afforded by the fulfilment of the Old Testament prophecies concerning himself. One was the evidence of miracles which he wrought, and which was directly addressed to the outward sense of those who witnessed them. The other was the evidence afforded, more indirectly, but not less powerfully, by the excellence and divine character of the doctrine which he taught, and particularly by the fruits of peace which the reception of it produces. Both these characters of the Messiah's kingdom had been specially and distinctly foretold, and in both the prophecies were fulfilled at his coming. The sensible evidence of miracles, though handed down by testimony, and confirmed by collateral and concurrent proofs, has, in its direct and manifest exhibition, ceased. But the other or moral evidence, both in its outward and general, and above all in its personal and inward application, remains in its full power, and possessed of all its efficacy; being now equally, as at first, accessible to every one. Lastly, This evidence does not contradict, or exclude, or interfere with any other kind of proof, but partakes of the nature of all the rest, and is concurrent with them. It is an appeal to sense, to that inward feeling and apprehension, the force of which is admitted in all other cases. It is an appeal to the judgment and reason, and in a case, too, where the conclusion is not remote from the premises, or difficult to perceive, but near and obvious. It is an appeal to testimony; for it submits the question not to the witness of others alone, but to that of the inquirer himself. It is an evidence also in perfect consistency with every declaration and precept of the Gospel, and detracts from none of the methods prescribed in Scripture for attaining knowledge of divine truth, whether by the influence of the Holy Spirit, or the instrumentality and efficacy of prayer. On the contrary, it accords with these, and corroborates them, being a channel of the former, and working together with the latter.

Can it be doubted, from these and other considerations, that if the case was one where the discovery of truth was the sole object, one which did not compromise the wishes and desires of the inquirer, where the partial judgment was not already enlisted on one side of the question, the appeal referred to would be considered fair by every reasonable mind, and the test be resorted to with the same readiness which is shown in the experimental researches of the naturalist and the man of science? And is it not also plain that they who refuse to make proof, in this allowed way, of a matter, the truth of which they desire to ascertain, but with the evidence of which they are not yet satisfied, are confessing themselves to be under the power and constraint of a prejudice which, in every other subject of inquiry, they would consider most unphilosophical, and would unequivocally and without hesitation condemn?

In closing these remarks, it may be observed that, for rightly conducting this inquiry, and applying this experimental test, there is one condition indispensable to success, and which is common to every other investigation, physical or moral, applying not less to all the researches in science and philosophy, than to those respecting the evidences of Christianity; namely, that it should be fairly made, with scrupulous honesty and watchful care; not partially but fully, not with a desire to suppress or evade the conclusion, but with a desire to ascertain the truth.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF
MARY M. ELLIS,

WIFE OF THE REV. WILLIAM ELLIS, MISSIONARY TO

WHEN it was known at Huahine that Mr and Mrs Ellis had complied with the invitation sent from the Sandwich Islands, a general feeling of deep regret was felt among the natives. Mrs Ellis had endeared herself to the females by the warm interest which she took in their improvement, both temporal and spiritual; and the harmony which had uniformly subsisted between her and Mrs Barff, her sister missionary, rendered the separation peculiarly painful. But obedient to the call of duty, Mrs Ellis prepared for her voyage. At length, on the 31st December 1823, accompanied by her four children, she embarked with her husband on board the Active for the Sandwich Islands. The native women who had been under her care, and had enjoyed the privilege of her kind instructions, flocked to the shore to witness the departure of one whom they had ever regarded with veneration and esteem.

One woman, in particular, was very deeply affected, and anxious to get a last look of her instructress and friend, she went out on the rocks at the edge of the harbour, and stood waiting till the vessel had put out to open sea, when she waved her hand, and with a heart heaving with anguish, sighed farewell.

After a safe and tolerably pleasant voyage, Mr and Mrs Ellis reached Oahu on the 5th of February 1823, where they were greeted with a cordial welcome by the chief natives of the settlement, as well as by the American Missionaries, whom they had come to assist. The feelings of Mrs Ellis, in entering on this new sphere of operation, may be learned from her remarks in the following extract of a letter which she wrote, immediately after landing, to one of her former associates in Huahine:—

“We were welcomed with the greatest cordiality by the Missionaries, the king, and principal chiefs, and we were happy to find things greatly improved since Mr Ellis was here; though there is plenty of room for amendment still, but the people give the hearing ear, and seem willing to receive instruction. Let us hope and pray that the Spirit's influence may be showered down in rich abundance, and that the words spoken may profit those who hear. The climate is delightfully cold, and I think would agree well with you; I have wished you here ever since I came: I could not have supposed that three or four degrees of latitude would have made such a difference in climate. I was quite delighted with the view of the snow-topped mountains of Hawaii, but felt glad to be at a respectful distance from them. It certainly is a most beautiful sight to behold the sun rise on them, and worth coming from Raiatea for. We are at present with the Missionaries, but the king has promised to put us up a native house, to live in till we get our own built. You will have a nice opportunity of coming by Captain Charlton, who intends to return, and by that time I hope we shall have a comfortable place for you. I do not like these people so well as those of the Society Isles, but perhaps I may like them better when I know more of them. There is a great work to be done here, and plenty of room for many more labourers. I trust the Lord will send more faithful men into this part of his vineyard, and cause a great shaking among these dry bones.”

In the month of April following the mission received a considerable accession to its strength and efficiency by the arrival of a reinforcement of Missionaries from America. The condition of the Sandwich Islands was, at this time, in a state the most favourable for the diffusion of a knowledge of the Gospel among the people. Idolatry had been, to a certain extent, renounced, and several of the chief men had declared themselves decidedly in favour of Christianity. In these favourable circumstances, Mr and Mrs Ellis directed their efforts to the acquisition of the Hawaiian dialect of the Polynesian language, that they might be prepared to enter on their work as speedily as possible.

The prepossession which many of the chief natives entertained in favour of religion, was very encouraging to the Missionaries. The females more especially connected with the royal family were most earnest in their application for instruction, and Mrs Ellis, as soon as she was able to converse in the language, became their favourite teacher. Scarcely a day passed in which some of them did not visit her for the purpose of learning the truths of Christianity.

Such seasons of delightful employment were peculiarily gratifying to the pious and devoted mind of the subject of this sketch. By frequent attacks, however, of severe sickness and pain, her pleasure was to some extent alloyed. Her health and strength had been declining ever since the painful and protracted absence from her husband, to which we have already adverted, and her weakness seemed to be every day on the increase. It was thought advisable that she should accompany her husband on a visit to Maui, where Keopuolani, the mother of the king, who had been for some time a most consistent Christian, was dangerously ill. Immediately after their arrival, the queen-mother was baptized by Mr Ellis, and died on the following day, firmly trusting in the merits of her Redeemer. In the arrangements of the funeral Mrs Ellis took a part; and such was the improvement which had taken place in her health, in consequence of this visit to Maui, that she was able to lend assistance in the labours of the Missionaries at that station. On her return along with her husband to Oahu, the most favourable hopes were entertained of her recovery. These hopes, however, were speedily disappointed by a fresh attack of illness.

A voyage to England was strongly recommended, as affording, under Providence, the most probable means of restoration to health. With such prospects of extensive usefulness opening everywhere around her, she was very unwilling to quit the station in which Providence had placed her. A partial recovery therefore for a time decided her on postponing the voyage to England, and in the middle of May 1824, she consented to make a short voyage for her health to some of the other islands of the group. The first island which she visited was Maui, where she had a short time before met with so much kindness. Here her health considerably improved, and she proceeded to Kairua in Hawaii, and after an absence of about six weeks in all, she returned to Oahu decidedly benefited by the voyage. The prospects of the mission were evidently becoming brighter, and as her strength increased, she passed much time in conversation with the chief native females, who resorted to her for instruction.

Hitherto she had resided chiefly in a native hut, consisting of a light frame of poles and slender sticks, to which a long coarse sort of grass was fastened with strings of tenacious roots, and braided grass. During her absence at Hawaii, however, a small stone house had been erected, of which she took possession in the month of July. It was fondly hoped that the additional comfort which this building afforded would tend to hasten her recovery, but towards the end of the month, her sickness and pain returned with other distressing symptoms. The severity of this attack was considerably aggravated by the tumult which arose in the island, in consequence of an insurrection which had broken out at Tauai, the next island to the west of Oahu; and although the excitement thus occasioned speedily subsided, her strength seemed daily to diminish. All hope of recovery, in her present situation, being thus at an end, she and her husband consented to avail themselves of the kind offer made to them by the captain of an American whaler, which touched at the island, to take a passage to the United States, whence they might proceed to England. The Christian natives, especially the females, regretted the loss of a friend and teacher so highly esteemed as Mrs Ellis, but they earnestly hoped and prayed that her health would be benefited by the voyage, and that, by the kindness of Providence, she would be speedily restored to them.

To be removed from a sphere of usefulness so extensive and so encouraging, was to Mrs Ellis a very trying dispensation, and more especially when she saw around her couch, before she was conveyed to the ship, the chief women dissolved in tears. The Christian converts seemed to vie with one another in acts of kindness and attention; and as the vessel left the shore, the prayers of multitudes ascended to heaven in behalf of one whose glory it had been, even amid much bodily weakness, to promote the great cause to which she had devoted her life. In little more than a month after they left Oahu, the vessel reached Huahine—a place endeared to Mrs Ellis by many fond recollections. A short account of this visit to the island is thus given by her husband, in the interesting memorial which he has published of her life and character:—

“It was the Sabbath, and, excepting a sort of native pilot, no individual came on board; but when the pilot returned, and the tidings of their arrival reached the settlement, the people could not refrain from crowding to the landing-place, to express their mingled feelings of joy at seeing their former teacher, and of sorrow at the report of her illness. The captain increased his stock of provisions, and prepared for the long passage before him, and the passengers enjoyed the delightful privilege of intercourse with the beloved people among whom the happiest years of their lives had been passed, and their affectionate brethren and sisters their teachers. The natives seemed anxious to give every possible expression of their sympathy and affection, by bringing some little token of their regard. The little children, in the Sunday school, also brought their present of arrow-root, sugar-cane, fruit, and fowls, for the children, their former companions, and, as they had hoped, their future teachers. Their fond mother was affected unto tears when she heard of it. While the ship remained in harbour, the people held one of their social entertainments, at which about fourteen hundred were present. At their earnest request, Mrs Ellis was carried to the place of meeting on a couch, and reclined during the repast by the side of the queen and the young princess, who had been her ward, and still called her guardian or mother. It was a source of great pleasure to her to meet the dear people of Huahine once more, and, as she passed through their neat settlement, to observe the signs of improvement, which had greatly increased since she left them; but she experienced higher enjoyment in joining with her beloved companions in the worship of the Father of Mercies.”

After leaving Huahine, they touched at Ruruta and Raivava'i; and as they pursued their way to the south, Mrs Ellis's health considerably improved by the increased coolness of the atmosphere, and there was every appearance of gradually returning strength, had not an accident, which occurred to her youngest child, in consequence of falling down the stairs leading from the deck to the cabin, caused a recurrence of her disease with all its wonted severity. The distressing symptoms, however, disappeared as they proceeded on their voyage; and at length, with recruited health and spirits, she reached the port of New Bedford, in Massachusetts, in the beginning of March 1825.

As soon after landing as Mrs Ellis was in a fit state to travel, she set out for Boston, where she and her family were treated with the utmost kindness and hospitality. All that Christian sympathy could bestow, was readily afforded, and the best medical aid was promptly procured. But amid all these means of alleviation, her sufferings were frequently so great, as to threaten a speedy termination to her valuable life. It pleased the Lord, however, to raise her up more than once from the very gates of death; and, by the divine goodness, she so far rallied as to be able to remove a few miles from Boston, where she made rapid progress towards recovery; and in a short time she set out for New York, with the view of embarking for England. During the whole of the voyage across the Atlantic, Mrs Ellis was confined to bed; but on reaching her native land, after the fatigue connected with landing had passed away, and the excitement of meeting with relatives and friends, after ten years absence, had subsided, symptoms of progressive amendment began to appear. This, however, was only a transient gleam, which was quickly obscured, and followed by a gloom deep and distressing. Her disease returned with increased violence; and to her bodily sufferings was added the feeling of painful disappointment, arising from the thought that the hopes of recovery which she had entertained from a return to her native country were blasted. In this state of bodily weakness and mental depression she continued through the winter of 1825 and the spring of 1826; and in her diary of the 6th June she thus writes, expressing her feelings of resignation and holy submission to the divine will:—

“ Still, dear Lord, thou seest best to visit this feeble body with pain and languishing; ‘wearisome nights are appointed unto me,’ and distressing have been the seasons of pain thou hast called me to bear these last two months—seasons which sometimes induce the thought, ‘Why are his chariot-wheels so long in coming?’ Yet thou knowest I would not be impatient. All the days of my appointed time will I wait, until my change come; and bless thee for the peace and consolation thou constantly affordest.

“ Cast down, but not destroyed, I bless the hand,
My Father’s hand, which strengthens while it strikes;
And should the furnace rage with seven-fold heat,
My Father’s even there! Mighty the waves,
But mightier He above, who calms the storm,
Dark and mysterious the pilgrim’s way,
But, lo! the Sun of Righteousness shines forth,
And cheers my soul with healing on his beams.
I know the voice that called me from the world,
And in the chambers of affliction taught
Eternal truths on which I love to dwell.
The school of suffering is the school of light,
’Tis here I learn to trample on the world,
And justly estimate all earthly good:
’Tis here each hour informs me I must die,
While here thy Word assures me I shall live—
Live when this world’s enwrap in flaming fire,
And all its transient glories pass away.”

That she might have the benefit of a change of air, she was removed to an elevated and airy part of Islington, and seemed for a time to gain strength. But in the beginning of October her sufferings became more severe than ever, and it was found necessary to call in additional medical assistance. The means employed to relieve her were quite ineffectual, and to all human appearance she could not long survive. Some of her remarks, during this illness, as recorded by Mr Ellis, it may be useful to extract:—

“ About one o’clock on the morning of the 25th of November, she inquired the hour; when informed that it was one o’clock, she observed, ‘I thought it had not been so late,—I have been so employed this last hour, that I cannot tell how the time has gone, or what I feel; such joy, such joy, I cannot describe it.’ On its being observed to her, ‘You now know the faithfulness of God to his promises, in upholding you amidst deep waters,’ she replied, ‘Yes, I can now truly say, ‘In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul;’ adding, with great emphasis, ‘I would not exchange places with any body—not with any body.’

“ On the following day Mrs Ellis suffered great pain from six to eight o’clock in the morning; but during the short intervals between the paroxysms of pain, she said her mind was delightfully calm; and after reviving, as the pain subsided, she remarked to a friend who expressed sympathy in her suffering, ‘It is not the worm-wood and the gall.’ On its being observed by Mrs Townley, who was with her at the time, that she had many friends who sympathized with, and prayed for her, she replied, ‘I desire to be perfectly resigned,—I hope they do not keep me out of heaven.’ She spoke much of her anticipations of heaven; and when asked, if, in the near approach of the eternal world, she had more distinct views or impressions of the heavenly state than in former life; she answered, ‘It has occupied many of my thoughts, and, though I have no doubt of its perfection and blessedness, I have no distinct view of the nature of existence after death; but I am not anxious about it; I am waiting for the coming of my Lord. In one half hour in heaven, more will be known than by years of conjecture here.’ One present remarked, ‘There will be no half hours in heaven;’ to which she answered with animation, ‘No, all will be one eternal now. I am happy,’ she continued, ‘that God has condescended to employ me on earth: I do not regret having engaged in communicating the Gospel to the heathen; had I to spend again the early periods of life, I would make the same choice. I do not regret having lost my health in it, and have never thought that, had I remained in England, I should have lived longer. I dare say Mr Smith, of Demerara, did not regret dying in prison for the cause of Christ.

“ On the 2d of December, Mrs Ellis, having somewhat less pain than during the preceding day, though faint and weak, appeared to find relief and satisfaction in efforts, though they were exceedingly feeble, to speak of the goodness and mercy of God. ‘My mind,’ she remarked, ‘is tranquil;—I have no wish either to live or die, but to continue confiding in my Father, and to know no will but his. I never before felt so much under the influence of the love of God absorbing every faculty of thought. Well might the Apostle Paul speak so frequently of it.’ On the language of the Apostle Paul, in the third chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, (where he speaks of the breadth and length, and depth and height, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge,) being repeated, she remarked, ‘My views of the love of God have been vastly enlarged during my affliction. How amazing that we should be the objects of such love! I have learned much of its heights and depths, and lengths and breadths; but one half hour out of the body will unfold more than can be learned in this world. There I shall know all I desired,—shall see Jesus,—shall be like him,—and shall be for ever with my Lord.’ She then spoke of the goodness of God in giving her such patience and peace, and exclaimed, ‘Well might the apostle call it ‘the peace of God.’ She then spoke of the future, and repeated some verses of the fifty-second hymn, second part of Dr Watts’ collection.

“ There is a green and flow’ry mount.”

“ Fatigued and exhausted, she asked for a little water, and on its being given her, and remarked that she would soon, perhaps, drink of the river of the fountain of life; she exclaimed, ‘Yes, it will be a sea of love’

“ Without a bottom or a shore;”

and repeated part of the hymn in which the words occur, but observed, in reference to the influence of the subject, 'these prospects are not suited to my present feelings; they make me desire to be gone. I need something to reconcile me to stay till God's time comes. My pains of body continue much the same; but I am as happy in mind as I think it is possible to be in this world; indeed, it would be sinful to wish to be happier than I am.' Part of the hymn beginning—

"Jesus, the vision of thy face Hath overpowering charms."

being recited, she repeated the whole, observing, she had always felt delight in the sentiments expressed, and thought she could adopt the language as her own, repeating again,

"Death cannot make my soul afraid,
If God be with me there;
Soft is the passage through the shade,
And all the prospect fair."

"I feel," she continued, 'more like an inhabitant of the celestial world, than of earth.' Afterwards she observed, 'I feel that I am sinking: I desire rather to be kept tranquil and resigned, than to have rapturous joys. I cannot think much, but am happy in the thoughts of the love of God. I sometimes fear terrors when the symptoms of death appear present, but I am happy.' She then repeated part of the hymn beginning,

"Jesus is all my hope.
His name is all my trust."

During the month of April 1827, her disease, contrary to all expectation, began to assume a favourable appearance, and before the beginning of June she was able to set out on a visit to some of her friends in Lincolnshire. This journey was productive of great advantage to her health, which, in a short time, was so far restored that she was able to take occasional exercise in the open air, and even to attend public worship, a privilege which she had not enjoyed for four years. She now began to entertain the hope of yet being able to resume her labours in the missionary field, and it was arranged that if she continued to improve she might be able to leave England in the ensuing summer. In the meantime she took leave of her friends in Lincoln and proceeded to Sheffield, where she spent six weeks very pleasantly in the society of some Christian friends.

In the middle of December she proceeded to Nailsworth, in Gloucestershire, for the purpose of passing the winter under the mild climate of that part of the country. Here her health seemed daily to improve, but towards the end of January 1828, some unfavourable symptoms again appeared. Recourse was had to the same treatment which had proved so beneficial at Lincoln. On this occasion, however, it proved unavailing, the disease rapidly gained ground, and the poor sufferer was again reduced to a state of extreme weakness, in which she continued till the month of June, when she recovered so far as to enable her to be removed to a pleasantly situated cottage in the neighbourhood. In this residence her health underwent some improvement, interrupted, however, by occasional relapses, which became more frequent as the winter advanced, when she again returned to the village of Nailsworth.

Early in the spring of 1829 Mrs Ellis was seized with a severe attack of her disease, which assailed her shattered frame with apparently greater violence than before. But in the following summer she once more revived, and having been removed to a more eligible residence, she became every day perceptibly better. Under the emotions of hallowed joy, which her progressive recovery now excited, she thus wrote to a beloved friend in London, in a letter, dated, Newmarket, August 19, 1829:—

"You will see from the date of this, that we have removed from Nailsworth. From what I suffered nearly the whole time that I resided in the town, which, you know, is situated in a valley, and the great improvement in my health since my removal, I am induced to think that Nailsworth was not suited to my constitution, and that it was a wise arrangement in Providence that obliged me to remove thence. O that I may be duly grateful to Him who numbereth the very hairs on our head, and without whose knowledge even a sparrow falleth not to the ground. Behind our house we have a beautiful grove, in a shady and elevated part of which I have had a seat made, on which I am able to recline most days, when the weather is fine, beholding, with a pleasure which those only know whose views have been for many months circumscribed by the walls of a sick-chamber, the delightful scenery of our little sequestered valley, and enjoying the benign influence of the pure and refreshing breeze. The scenery is truly charming; and I frequently wish I had you, my dear friend, to feel with me how inviting, how soothing, is nature's tranquil loveliness to those who can exclaim, with Cowper, and all who look above the face of nature to Him who spreadeth forth all its profusion of variety and beauty for his own glory, and for the happiness of man, sinful man—

"He looks abroad into the varied field
Of nature, and though poor, perhaps, compares
With those whose mansions glitter in his sight,
Calls the delightful scenery all his own.
His are the mountains, and the valleys his,
And the resplendent rivers his, to enjoy
With a propriety that none can feel,
But who, with filial confidence inspired,
Can lift an unpresumptive eye,
And smiling say—My Father made them all!
Are they not his by a peculiar right,
And by an emphasis of interest his,
Whose eyes they fill with tears of holy joy,
Whose heart with praise, and whose exalted mind
With worthy thoughts of that unwearied love,
That planned, and built, and still upholds a world
So clothed with beauty for rebellious man!"

"But whither am I wandering? Cowper, you know, is my favourite poet, and, when I begin quoting from him, I find it difficult to close. What will you say, my dear friend, when I tell you I purpose, God willing, going to the house of God next Sabbath, with my dear partner, and the multitude who keep holy day: join me at the same throne of grace; O let us supplicate blessings on each other's heads."

In the commencement of 1830, Mrs Ellis's mind was greatly relieved from the anxiety which she naturally felt about her children, by the kind offer of two excellent ladies in Dublin to receive her eldest daughter as an inmate of their dwelling, and to superintend her education. An offer of a similar kind was made by another lady in the same town to take charge of the youngest. These proposals were gratefully accepted, and the two children removed to the metropolis of Ireland, where they remained, the eldest for two, and the youngest for three years. Thus relieved of one great cause of her solicitude, Mrs Ellis's health gradually improved, and in the middle of April she removed to London, where she was cordially welcomed by her friends and relatives on her return, after an absence of three years. Shortly after her arrival in the metropolis, a visit to the sea-side was recommended, and she set out, accordingly, for Brighton. Here the most alarming symptoms again appeared, and for some time her friends entertained the most fearful apprehensions as to the result. The means employed, however, to alleviate her sufferings were, by the divine blessing, to a certain extent, successful, and hopes were cherished that she might yet be raised from her bed of sickness, restlessness, and pain. Vain were all such expectations; the disease recurred with unabated violence, and for some months her life was regarded as in a very precarious state. But it was not the will of God that she should yet enter into rest. She once more rallied, and in December 1831 she was conveyed to London, where Mr Ellis had received a permanent employment. In the metropolis her health continued, during more than two years, in the same unsatisfactory state as at Brighton, alternating between apparent improvement and augmented suffering.

During the whole course of her illness, the temporal comfort and spiritual improvement of her children dwelt much upon her mind, and it was a peculiar source of delight when, in 1834, the whole were collected under one roof. Though still confined to bed, and evidently becoming daily weaker and weaker, she spent much of her time in conversing with her family on the things that pertained to their everlasting peace. This high privilege they were not long permitted to enjoy, for although, in the opening of the year 1835, no perceptible change to the worse had taken place, this affectionate mother, this eminent Christian, was suddenly summoned, on the 11th of January of that year, from this world, which had been to her, in all its emphatic meaning, a vale of tears, and called to enter into the joy of her Lord. "Help, Lord; for the godly ceaseth; and for the faithful fall from among the children of men."

EXPERIENCE OF THE HEATHEN.

BY THE REV. J. A. WALLACE,

No. VI.

THE ABORIGINES OF BORNEO.

"THERE is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God; they are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one: their throat is an open sepulchre: with their tongues they have used deceit: the poison of asps is under their lips: their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood: destruction and misery are in their ways: the way of peace have they not known: and there is no fear of God before their eyes."

Such is the description which is given in the Word of God of the depravity of human nature—a description which is no less true than appalling: for in the Bible there are no high coloured statements—no extravagant exaggeration of facts. Yet there are multitudes who cannot understand how this description should admit of application to human nature in general. For when they look around them, what do they find to be the actual aspect of society? Instead of the blasphemy, and bitterness, and bloodshed, that are presented in the picture of the inspired apostle, they discover a vast deal of personal comfort, and domestic blessedness, and commercial prosperity, and social order. And such being the fact, they are apt to conclude, that there must be a mistake in the statements of the Bible—that though human nature may be sadly changed, and even greatly corrupted, it is by no means so bad as has been actually alleged—nay, that there is even something like a contradiction between the broad and sweeping statements of Scripture on the one hand, and the avowed manifestations of human depravity on the other. Plausible, however, as such a conclusion may seem to be, it is certainly far from being well founded. For what is the real state of the case? Such men forget altogether, that they are looking, not to the natural, but to an artificial state of society—that they are contemplating human nature, not as it is in itself, but as it has been modified, or corrected, or improved, by the agency of rational and undefiled religion. It is this which has extended its purifying and transforming influence over the whole movements of society in the land in which it is our privilege to dwell, and which makes human nature appear to us so different from what the Bible represents it to be. But, if we go to the lands where the influence of Christianity is unfelt, and where the passions of human nature are consequently permitted to develop themselves without resistance or control, the result then is as different as it is deplorable. The worst features in the picture of human depravity are in that case completely realized; the bonds by which the inhabitants of Christian lands are knit together, for their mutual advantage, are there rent utterly asunder; and men's passions raging against each other with a ferocity, unbridled and unrestrained, seem as if they would bring the whole fabric of society into utter ruins.

Of this we have a striking illustration in the account which is given in Abel's Residence in China, of the Dyaks, or aborigines of Borneo.

"With respect to the present state of the Dyaks, it would be difficult, nay, impossible, to find their equals in all that disgraces and degrades human nature. Others are far below them in mental and bodily enervation, but we read of none so debased in the scale of depravity. In unprovoked, unrestrained barbarity, they exceed the American Indian, the Charib, and the New Zealander. How much they need the blessings of Christianity, may be gathered from their present mode of life. War is their business, murder their pastime, and the trophies of cruelty their proudest distinction. Nothing is too high for their daring, nothing too low for their despicable cruelty. All who belong not to their confederacy are reputed enemies, whose heads they endeavour to secure, at any hazard, and by any means. The unfair and savage manner in which they prosecute their warlike expeditions, or rather their expeditions in search of human heads, is abhorrent beyond all parallel. Insulated huts, defenceless campings, unwary fishermen, wretched stragglers, old and young of either sex, are alike their prey. The men and elder women are inevitably murdered; the young women and children they seize for slaves. In an expedition of Selgie, one of the most powerful chiefs, which lasted for three months, they took seven hundred heads. Such is the importance attached to a warrior who possesses many heads, that he takes his place in the presence of the Rajah with the air of exalted worth; while those who are destitute of these distinguishing trophies, are glad to creep into any corner to escape notice.

"Human heads grace the occurrence of every important event. They are employed to celebrate a Dyak's birth, and to consecrate his marriage; to mitigate his diseases, and to appease his spirit after death. Marriage is always referred to the Rajah, who calls before him the young man and the father of the girl. If the latter can produce ten heads, the former must show half the number, in the expectation that when his age equals that of the other, the emblems of their bravery will be alike. If the young man is unable to produce the requisite number, he summons a few friends, and sallies forth in search of the deficiency, well aware that if he do not succeed his lasting disgrace will be the consequence. Every head is submitted to a close examination, and none but those of recent victims are admissible. A part of the ceremony consists in both parties taking a head in each hand, and dancing round each other, with the most extravagant gestures, amidst the applauses of the Rajah and people. Upon the death of a chief, the mound in which the body is deposited must be studded with fresh heads, as the most acceptable offering to the deceased. No warrior can presume to make a visit of condolence to the family, without bringing at least one head for the occasion. During the first year or two, these heads are occasionally changed. All kinds of sickness are supposed to be under the influence of malignant spirits, whom nothing can so well propitiate as human heads.

"What mournful ravages must a custom so prevalent and desolating spread throughout this vast island! What numbers of victims are annually required for such numberless purposes! What can prevent a total and speedy extermination of all these ignorant, ill-fated tribes, if Christian charity slumber much longer over their appeals for mercy? In their amusements, and sometimes even in their domestic economy, the same reckless disregard for human life is evinced. They are extravagantly fond of cock-fighting, and stake almost every thing they can command upon the game. If the sum be lost, and not paid within twenty-four hours, the winner has a legal right to dispatch his debtor, and he generally does it. Upon an expedition, if the Rajah's appetite craves fresh meat, and an inferior animal is not at hand, one of his train is butchered, and served up as a substitute. When the men of wealth bury their treasure, which is a common custom, they uniformly destroy the slaves who assisted them, that the secret of the depository may be confined to themselves.

"It is difficult to determine what religious notions the Dyaks entertain. They have no apparent dread of dying. Their great fear is the loss of these human heads, and this they deprecate more than the majority in Christian lands do the loss of their souls. Yet that there are evidently some glimmerings of a future state in their darkened minds, may be gathered from their burial rites, and from other circumstances which are grounded upon a belief in the continued existence of the spirit."

This, surely, is a horrible picture! Men made in the image of God, glutting themselves with blood—marking even their seasons of festivity with the reckless butchery of their fellow-creatures—and ranking murder in its naked hideousness amongst the proudest and most honourable of their distinctions! It truly shows what human nature is when left to itself—what strange delusions it can follow—what atrocious wickedness it can perpetrate—and with what marvellous ingenuity it can turn this bright and beautiful world into the horrid vestibule of hell. Yet it teaches an important lesson to ourselves, and may prompt us to set a higher value on our privileges. Here we have a people left in a state of nature, free apparently from every thing like restraint, and giving full development to the principles inherent in their nature, but so far from realizing in their experience the splendid fictions of the poet and the infidel, when they speak of a state of nature as distinguished by all the charms of innocence, and simplicity, and peace, we discover, on the contrary, nothing that is more obvious than their likeness, literally, and in every feature, to the picture which is drawn by an apostle: "They are without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, despiteful, proud, boasters, disobedient to parents, inventors of evil things."

But how different is it with ourselves? We dwell in a peaceful neighbourhood, but seldom disturbed by the perpetration of deeds of bloodshed and of villainy, where we can lie down in safety, and rise again in peace, alive to all the endearments of social and domestic intercourse, secure in the possession of our rights, as members of society, and even sitting under our vine and under our fig-tree, worshipping God according to the dictates of our consciences, and having none to make us afraid.

Whence these invaluable privileges? What maketh us to differ from the most brutal and blood-thirsty savages of other lands? How comes it to pass that the mere mention of the deeds in which they are disposed to glory, is fitted to send the thrill of horror and of righteous indignation through our spirits? It is not because we have been differently constituted, or have deserved better things, than they, at the hands of God, but because we have been differently situated, and are greater debtors to the riches of his sovereign grace. In our own hearts naturally there are the principles of the worst corruptions that have ever been exhibited by the most reprobate of the children of men. We need only to be left to ourselves to give expression at any time to the fiercest and foulest passions which it is possible for human nature to display, and if our depravity at the present moment does not manifest itself in the most obnoxious form, or proceed to the utmost possible extent, it is owing to no virtue inherent in ourselves, but to the restraints of the word, and providence, and grace, of Almighty God.

It is Christianity, in short, to which we are indebted for the highest of our privileges, and which is so happily blended with all our laws, and usages, and institutions, and modes of worship, that it is scarcely possible for any man to live within the borders of our land, without sharing, to some extent, in the blessings it is fitted to diffuse. Yet let no man satisfy himself with advantages that are merely external, or think for a moment, that because his outward conduct may be somewhat ameliorated by the artificial refinements of society, his wellbeing for eternity is completely and permanently secured. Something besides this is indispensable. The evil and accursed thing which God abhorreth must be more than fettered or restrained; it must be totally eradicated from his nature. And till this radical and essential change is effected, through the regenerating power of God's Holy Spirit, he has still the elements of hell within him, covered up, it may be, for a season, from the observation of his fellow-men, and apparently inert, but yet possessing the power to burst forth into fierce and hideous manifestation. Even in the present world and in spite of barriers which seem at first sight to be impregnable, these elements are invested with such mighty energies that they can blot out the very semblance of every right and estimable feeling from the nature of moral and intellectual beings, and transform them into vessels of wrath that are earthly, sensual, devilish, abominable, and unto every good work reprobate. And if such are sometimes the appearances of depravity on earth, and in the case of beings who are now weakened by the frailties of disease, and limited to the brief span of this mortal life, oh! who can tell what supernatural forms it may assume,—what rapid and tremendous advances it may make, when the restraints are lifted off, and the barriers are broken down: when the soul is endued with the vitality of an everlasting life, and the range of an interminable eternity is before it for the execution of its deep-laid plans, and the wild revelry of its most malignant passions, and the continuous working out of the dark, unsearchable, and unfathomable mysteries of iniquity that are within it.

Oh! let these solemn considerations be duly pondered by every man who reads them. And instead of trifling any longer with an evil so hateful in its principle, and so tremendous in its results, let him feel the instant and imperative necessity of betaking himself to the Saviour, not merely for the mercy whereby his sins shall be forgiven, but for the Spirit whereby his nature shall be changed. In this way he shall not only escape from the wickedness, which, whilst it is so obnoxious here, is fitted hereafter to plunge the soul in dark and bottomless perdition, but he will feel a deeper interest in those wretched men who are yet aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers to the covenant of promise, and experience an anxiety which he knew not before, for the universal diffusion of that godliness, whereof they stand so greatly in need, and which is truly profitable, not only for the life that now is, but for that which is to come.

THE DANGER OF TRUSTING TO THE FUTURE: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNS,

“Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.”—PROV. xxvii. 1.

I. IN this passage it is very plainly insinuated that we are too apt to boast of to-morrow. The young hope to live to old age; the middle-aged, having passed the most critical stages of infancy and childhood, reckon, with too much security, on grey hairs, and a green old age, amidst children and grand-children; while the old look around them for examples, a few of which they can glean, of extreme age, or even resort to the calendar and to history for such examples as cannot be furnished by their own times, and hope they themselves shall add to the number of extraordinary cases of longevity. At any rate, the old are apt to reckon just as much as the young upon a “to-morrow,” and this is the same, as to its practical effect, as if they presumed at once upon a term of years, and when the morrow comes, there is always another to-morrow expected. This is the deception and error which the many fall into; the wiser few, and very few, say, with one of the worthies of a former day, “I have not had a to-morrow for many years past.” This was the Apostle Paul’s exercise, “I die daily.” The truly wise, at all events, though they think of to-morrow, and plan accordingly, yet do not reckon so as to neglect present duty; they know, and they remember that the arrival of to-morrow is most uncertain, and that at all events they have sufficient employment for this day and for to-morrow also, and that for the wise and suitable expenditure and use of both they will be accountable. Not so, however, the careless bulk of mankind. In regard, indeed, to the things of this world, they are convinced of the folly of neglecting a present opportunity of advantageous trading, in the hope that to-morrow they may do equally well, and, perchance, still better, and so carry on their amusement to the neglect of business. If they have common sense, and worldly wisdom in any degree, they will avail themselves of the market while it is to be had; but, alas! they reason with far less wisdom, nay, with excessive folly, in regard to spiritual things; “We shall attend to them afterwards; we are yet young; or we are busy, or indisposed for it. Give us a little time, to-morrow will do better than just now.”

Boasting of to-morrow likewise appears in framing worldly schemes of future ease and aggrandisement. He who proposes it as his object to make up a sum at all hazards, that he may, by a certain time, execute a plan of a great mansion, suited to the fortune which he resolves to amass, and then to enjoy himself with the goods laid up for many years, surely boasts of to-morrow, most presumptuously. See where the evil lies; not in thinking of to-morrow, in the way of making wise and prudent preparation, always taking along with us, “If the Lord will;” but the evil is that boasting of to-morrow which takes away the heart,—which involves in sinful, at any rate, in worldly and presumptuous plans, in reference to some future period, or that kind of reference to to-morrow, which is a substitute for attention, immediate and serious, to our most important, even our eternal interests. Daily experience and observation prove that there is much of this kind of boasting of to-morrow. It is one of the fatal diseases of our nature, and one of the most successfully operated upon by the great adversary, to postpone to a future day the most important and most pressing of all duties,—to-morrow, when it does come, always giving place to another to-morrow, till the resolution is at once broken off by sudden death, and insensibly melts away in a “sleep which knows no waking.” This leads us to remark,

II. That it is foolish to boast of to-morrow. Need I say, do any of you pretend to look into futurity? Are there any star-gazers, or monthly prognosticators, or hearkeners to fortune-tellers? “After these things do the Gentiles seek.” It is foolish, sinful, heathenish, to attempt in any way to divine your future fate, or the length of your days. But these things you all probably disclaim. What then have you to plead in excuse for your favourite to-morrow? We are ready to hear you; what have you to say? "We are young." Granted; but the young droop oftentimes. The green leaf often is seen falling, nipped by frost, or shaken by the wind. How often are the young carried by the old to the grave! The young and strong have very recently been called hence by disease or accident, the majority were young. You say you are strong; but fever or inflammation make strength only add fuel to the flame. "But we have stood already many trials of our constitution, and many attacks, and are yet vigorous." The last, however, will come, and the very next may be fatal. But, "we are a long-lived race. Father and mother, yea grandfather, and many relatives, lived to a great age." You forget the exceptions; moreover, if two generations have been long-lived, it is fully as probable that the third will be the reverse; for such is generally the course of events. Longevity at all is rare: then longevity in two in succession is rare; but a third would be very extraordinary, and therefore not to be counted on. "But we have somehow this persuasion, that we shall live long, and at any rate we will not indulge in gloomy presage of an early tomb." This is very delusion—it is foolish—you can give no reason for it—you may soon, very soon, find you were deceiving yourselves. Besides the large list of diseases, accidents are also numerous, and to these your very vigour and activity expose you. "But we will take care; the sea is dangerous, we will go by land." There, as well as on sea, these are dangers, which you cannot always avoid. "We will remain very much at home." You are just as liable there as abroad. "We will take great care." Right; but even the excess of care is often fatal. "Granted; then are we to be always thinking about dying, and living in fear—feeling our pulse, measuring our steps, and weighing every meal by scruples, and examining every slight symptom in our frame and countenance?" No; the folly we are blaming is just the folly of forgetting God, our own souls, our duties, our prospects, our hopes, by the delusive idea that we will in future mind the things which belong to our peace, which futurity is all in the mist, and is uncertain. In fact, the most certain thing in the whole matter is, that if you see the future day contemplated, it will find you just so much the more alienated from any thing good, or the other issue will be that you never see that future day at all. I proceed to observe,

III. That there is much danger in indulging this disposition. A few of these dangers may be stated: 1st, It fosters irreligion and atheism. The Apostle James rebukes this presumption and infidelity, which appears in the purpose to go "into a certain city, there to continue a year, to buy and sell, and get gain; whereas you know not what shall be on the morrow: for what is your life? It is even a vapour, which appeareth for a little, and then vanisheth away." You should say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that." Leaving out of calculation your own weak and dependent state, the uncertainty of time, and your ignorance of futurity, you form your plans without any reference to the divine Disposer. You erect many high towering schemes, which savour at once of impiety and folly. Were a sense of Deity present with you, and the solemn consideration connected with his presence and your accountableness, you could not reason as you do, and act in the manner we have been reprehending. It is the putting far away the evil day, as it is accounted, and the presumption that to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant,—that is, still more overflowing in the gratifications of sense, which accounts for the madness which is in the heart of sinners, fully set in them to do evil. This leads, 2dly, To observe, that the boasting of to-morrow is found to foster some of the worst passions of the human heart. The ambitious reason thus: A few steps more, and I shall rise to the very top of my profession, or of my rank in society, and that in the regular course of events, which supposes the removal of others by the stroke of mortality, as the means of elevation. The man of pleasure reasons as the rich fool in the Gospel: "Soul, take thine ease; thou hast goods laid up for many years, eat, drink, and be merry." The covetous man adds heap to heap, with desires more and more insatiable, forgetful of his latter end, and of that country to which he goes, where his wealth will be of no benefit. A due consideration of this might, by the divine blessing, cut up by the roots this grovelling and idolatrous propensity, and give the soul a heavenward direction. A day may bring forth many most unexpected events, casting a dark cloud over the most flattering prospects. Death may come like a wintry blast, and scatter in the dust the fairest blossoms of hope. Boast not of to-morrow, thou ambitious aspirer after promotion and high title, thou lover of pleasure, thou worshipper of mammon. You may, before to-morrow's sun arise, be convinced too late of your folly and madness. This present day improved, may be the happy means of arresting the evil which the presumption of to-morrow tends so much to foster; for it is the presence of the tempting object, and the supposed distance of the day of reckoning, which together have so powerful a tendency to give the victory to sense and passion over reason and faith. But by faith every believer, like Moses, will prefer the recompense of reward to the pleasures of sin, perceived to be only for a season, and that not even sure for a day, whereas the flattery of a "to-morrow" gives the present lure tenfold power of attraction. But this your way is your folly. "O that you were wise!" 3dly, The boast of to-morrow is most prejudicial to spiritual and eternal concerns. In the noted case of Felix, and, alas! in a thousand cases similar, this has proved ruinous. It is the most successful of all Satan's devices, and the easiest mode of compassing his designs. "Say a very little," is one of the most successful stratagems among the lovers of pleasure to delude others in the tavern; and so in all other scenes of temptation. Few, comparatively, are so hardened as to deny sternly the obligation on reasonable creatures to acquaint themselves with God, and to love and serve him; but they are easily persuaded to postpone a little, to think that to-morrow will do, to-morrow will be soon enough, and, when this arrives, it is just the same again, till that evening comes, succeeded by no to-morrow, but by vast, boundless eternity! Here is the serious consideration. Here is the fatal effect. It is not merely the breaking up of schemes long cherished, and arrestment of the career of worldly success, the leaving a useless heap of laborious amassing, but the summoning of an immortal creature unprepared into the presence of God, the unexpected close of the day of grace, the sealing for ever the condition of an immortal being; it is the shutting of the door of mercy, to open no more; it is the sentence which follows immediately on the departure of the soul from the body, fixing its condition for ever,—it is this which marks most strikingly the folly and danger of trusting to a future day.

And, now, to all of you, my dear friends, I would address the words of the text,—“Boast not thyself of to-morrow.”

One moment, that in which the breath departs, extinguishes a thousand brilliant prospects, reduces to nothing the highest and most plausible expectations, and stains the pride of earthly glory. O what an important crisis is that which seals up every thing and stamps irreversibly the condition of every human being! How impartially, too, does death make his approach to the palace and to the cottage; silently, but irresistibly, to the lofty bed of state, as well as to the low and abject couch of the poor. How vain human aid, and all that wealth and power can summon to attendance; skill is defeated,—assiduity vain. Medicine fails; every effort to stay the departing spirit is vain; vitality, health, strength, beauty of form, are all vain! This applies, in the ordinary train of events, at all times and every where. But there are some more awful illustrations still of life's uncertainty, in the inundation, the earthquake, the thunder-storm, the conflagration, the shipwreck, the pestilence! Thus both the more ordinary, and the unusual, and more striking occurrences of events in this world of constant change and of occasional strange visitations, as well as of unexpected calamity, which no foresight or power can prevent, all powerfully enforce the lesson, “Boast not of to-morrow.” O! be on your guard against that deluding thief of time and of the soul, “to-morrow.” Beware of it. To-day is the date of wise men, to-morrow the cheat of fools. Yes, brethren, and even to-day is late enough. It is a true saying of a poet of your own, that the truly wise were wise yesterday, for to-day part of our exercise must be regret and sorrow that we were not wise before now. The past of life is more than sufficient to have wrought the will of the flesh. To the sinner the loud trumpet sounds, “Awake ye dead in trespasses and sins, and come to Christ for life, for the next summons will be to judgment. Prepare to meet God there; and O! how shall you abide the day of his coming! Ye foolish virgins, go get oil for your lamps without delay, lest the cry be heard, the bridegroom cometh, and the door may be shut.”

O! my dear friends and people of my charge, it is time, more than time, that you awake out of sleep and seek his face, for, in a moment unexpected, the message may arrive, announcing to you that you must come away, leaving your house, your farm, and your merchandise, your labour of hand or of mind, and all this world's affairs, bidding farewell to time, and beginning your eternal unchanging course. O! there is nothing worth speaking of or justifying anxiety, but this one thing, “Am I in Christ? Have I begun to live to God?” Make your escape then, as the bird out of the snare of the fowler. It is life or death that is at stake,—the soul's gain or loss for ever, that is in question. To find the door of heaven shut and barred against you for ever, will be indeed an irretrievable and overwhelming evil. But, seeing you can make no covenant with death to spare you so long, make one with life, by agreeing immediately with the God of salvation. “Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel!”

Ye saints, who are, like the five wise virgins, slumbering, arise, trim your vessels, and let your oil be clear, and your lamps burning. To you the call is, “Awake out of sleep, for salvation is near, and the night of darkness is wearing away; the day of glory is ready to dawn or to burst forth. Cast off all unprofitable works of darkness, and put on the whole armour of light, and walk in a manner becoming your holy and high calling, and, as in the day, not in chambering and wantonness, in strife and envying. Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.”

THE EARLY PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRANCE.

No. VI.

BY THE REV. JOHN G. LORIMER,
Minister of St. David's Parish, Glasgow.

IN my last paper, I directed the reader's attention to the love which the Protestant Church of France shewed for the Word of God, and the exertions she used to disseminate it among her people in the ninety years which elapsed between the granting and the revocation of the edict of Nantes; in other words, between 1596 and 1685. I have now to call his attention to the zeal which she discovered for a sound and thorough education during the same period.

From the general diffusion of knowledge at the present day, the progress of art and science, and the improved modes of education which have lately been introduced, we are apt to imagine that the present is the only age in which the claims of knowledge are understood, and to look with disparagement upon the attainments of all former periods; but such an impression is unjust and erroneous. Of course, from the very nature of the case, the past cannot compete with the present in the diffusion of the same kind of knowledge; but it cannot be doubted, that the early Protestant and Presbyterian Churches showed as enlightened an appreciation of the value of knowledge, and, according to their circumstances, made as great sacrifices to spread it abroad, as any of its friends in modern times. Every sensible and pious man, in whatever age he lives, must wish the Scriptures of truth to be universally known; and he can scarcely do so without valuing the other works of God, and wishing a knowledge of them to be widely diffused. All God's works are connected together, and reflect mutual light and fresh illustrations on each other. The reason why general knowledge was not so widely communicated in former as in present times, is not that Christian men were indifferent about it, but that it did not exist. Had it been accessible, such was the estimation in which it was held, it would have been diffused; but no science can be propagated till it is established and ascertained. In defect of knowledge as to existing things, our ancestors betook themselves and their children to the knowledge of the past, and dealt in the study of antiquity to a degree in which they far surpass the men of modern days. This shows that they were not careless about, and far less hostile to the claims of knowledge; and, in all fairness, such considerations should be attended to in making a comparative estimate of the love of knowledge in former and present times. True religion almost necessarily drawing along with it the study and dissemination of the Word of God, must ever supply at once the most powerful stimulus to the general acquisition of elementary education, and the best incentive to the attainment of those higher branches of knowledge which are essential to the defence and elucidation of divine truth. We need not wonder, therefore, to find, that the Protestant Church of France, which in her early days was remarkably influenced by the spirit of true religion, should have laboured to bestow a scriptural education upon all her youth, and a high professional education in addition upon all who were destined to minister at her altars. Thus did she approve herself the friend of the best knowledge, and the best interests of man.

I have already referred to the indications which she gave of this spirit from the very beginning of her existence, from the middle of the sixteenth century down to the establishment of the edict of Nantes, in various decrees and canons, by which she provided that the Churches should take care schools be erected, and the youth instructed; and also that money be raised, by influential members of the Church, and by Presbyteries and Synods, for maintaining young men of piety and promising parts at the university, preparatory to their coming forth as ministers of the Gospel. I shall not recur to these measures, but shall shortly advert to their maintenance and enlargement, in the later period of which I now write; that is, during the seventeenth century.

Though the Church of France was now considerably reduced in strength, and was exposed to perpetual and harassing interference from the Church of Rome, still such was her love of literature, and philosophy, and theological science, that she could boast of not less than five universities, those of Montauban, Saumur, Nismes, Montpellier, and Sedan. Nor was this all: dissatisfied with the acquisitions which were made in the learned languages at the elementary and private schools, she, in 1607, used means, and successfully, for raising a college or grammar school in each of the thirteen provinces into which the Protestant Church was divided, where young men might be trained preparatory to entering on their university course, and by which they might be better enabled to profit by that course. The universities and bursars were originally supported by the subscriptions of individuals and Churches, and the fifth part of the money contributed for the poor; but this proving inadequate and precarious, it was made one of the provisions of the edict of Nantes, that the Government should contribute an annual sum to the Church of one hundred and thirty-five thousand livres: of this, the universities received between twelve and thirteen thousand livres, and each of the provincial colleges one hundred crowns. Even with this assistance, individuals, and Churches, and Synods, were called upon for free contributions. Owing to the necessities of the State, and the hostile influence of the Church of Rome, the royal grant was repeatedly, and for years, discontinued. In these circumstances, the Protestant Church had no resource but to apply to her friends. In 1631, the Synod of Charenton complains, that the colleges and universities had not received any assistance from his Majesty's bounty for a long time; and, in the dread of being plunged "at last into total ruin," ordained, that the fifth denier of all alms received in all the Churches, should be set aside, out of which a sum might be raised for their maintenance, "by way of advance and loan only until the monies granted us by his Majesty being received, restitution be made of those borrowed sums to the comfort and benefit of the poor." A sort of assessment for these purposes was fixed upon the Churches in each of the 13 provinces, and some of the provinces were required to contribute from twelve to eighteen hundred livres. Such were the difficulties with which the Protestant Church had to struggle about this period, from the wants of many of the Churches, and her own "deep poverty," that she was obliged, very reluctantly, to abandon the professorships of the Greek language in the universities, and to trust to increased diligence in the grammar schools for making up the deficiency. These things all shew the warm and enlightened zeal of the Protestant Church in behalf of learning, and a superior education. She submitted to sacrifices. How many would have been hopelessly discouraged by half the difficulties! The following deliverance of the Synod of Alanson in 1637, now two hundred years ago, proves at once the piety of the Church, and her anxiety to maintain the interests of literature and theology:—

"The National Synod doth exhort all the Churches, all lords, gentlemen, and all persons in particular, to prefer the service of God, the glory of his holy name, and the re-established order of his house, before all other human considerations whatsoever; and every one of them, according to their abilities, to consecrate unto his Divine Majesty their free-will offerings, and to levy among themselves those charges necessary for the subsistence of our universities and colleges, and to use and exercise therein their Christian charity and piety, in supporting those which are more feeble." Church courts are called upon in the same way; and the object is stated, "that all professors and regents who serve in the said universities and colleges, may annually receive their appointed salaries, and so discharge the duties of their place and calling with cheerfulness."

Many have the idea that the Reformers were a class of rude, ignorant enthusiasts, who had no value for knowledge, but rather despised it. Let such a testimony as the above, silence so unwarrantable imputations.

But the anxiety of the Protestant Church of France for a high and enlarged style of theological education will be more apparent, if we advert to the number of the professors employed, and the branches which they taught. In the University of Montauban there were two professors of divinity, two professors of philosophy, one professor of Greek, and one professor of Hebrew. In the University of Saumur there was the same number of professors teaching the same branches, and five regents in addition. At Nismes and Montpellier there were two professors of theology, and two of Hebrew; and at Sedan, one of divinity, one of Greek, and one of Hebrew. In all, there were not fewer than seven professors of theology, five of Hebrew, four of philosophy, and three of Greek, for the now comparatively limited Church of France. Does this not shew a true love of learning? We shall look in vain in our British universities, whether in the northern or southern division of the island, for the same proportion of professors.

In the general laws for the universities of the Reformed Churches of France, in 1620, we have the following interesting resolution:—"We shall need two professors, at least, in divinity, one of whom shall expound the holy Scriptures, without expatiating into commonplaces. The other shall read commonplaces. If God so bless us with ability, we shall have a third, and then one of them shall expound the Old Testament, and the other the New, and the third shall handle commonplaces, which he shall have finished in three years' time, with that brevity and solidity as becomes a scholar."

With regard, again, to the work of the professors, every one of them was required to read four lectures a-week, and to exercise the students weekly in certain themes, both in Latin and in French. For the greater benefit, too, of the students, the general heads of the lectures were dictated to them. And such was the care for religious instruction, that the tutors and the regents, in the literary and philosophical classes, were required to read to their scholars a section of the Greater Catechism, either in French, Latin, or Greek, according to their capacities, "and to cause them to get it by heart, and to give them a plain and familiar exposition of it." In 1631 metaphysics, which had not been publicly taught in the universities, was added to the course, and every professor of philosophy was called upon to instruct his students in this branch of knowledge; and the Protestant Church was the more anxious upon this head, that the Romish Church had, by false metaphysical principles, depraved theology, and brought a great prejudice upon divine truth. It was appointed, too, that the first elements of logic should be taught in the first classes, that the young men might be prepared for higher learning. At the same time, the professors of philosophy were warned not in the least "to invade the profession of theology, but to contain themselves within their own bounds, without roving abroad on the handling of unprofitable questions." The Protestant Church, well aware what metaphysical questions had been started and pursued by the Romish Churchmen, and that serious injury had thus accrued to the cause of religion, were justly jealous upon this head; hence professors of philosophy, in handling physical and metaphysical questions connected with divinity, are exhorted to take care that they do so in such a manner as not, in the least, to injure the principles of true religion, nor "infuse any scruples contrary to piety into the tender minds of our youth." Curious and unprofitable questions are to be avoided; they are not to enlarge on the confutation of unknown heresies, farther than is necessary for the right interpretation of the Scriptures, and in all their expositions, they are to preserve that gravity and simplicity of style "which shineth forth so conspicuously in the writings of those famous divines whom the Lord raised up to kindle, in the last century, the flambeau of the Gospel, in these and the neighbouring nations." No intelligent man can read these counsels without being struck with the strong sense and enlightened piety which they discover.

The mode of appointing the professors was equally wise. The provincial synods within whose bounds the university was situated, had the filling up of the chairs. Candidates for those of divinity were required to prove their qualifications by public lectures on some special text out of the original Hebrew and Greek texts, given to them for that purpose, and by disputation, in one or two days following, as may be most advisable." And, after the appointment had taken place, the eye of the Church did not cease to watch. On the contrary, the provinces bordering on the universities, are entreated "to oversee and visit them, and certify the approaching synod of the duties or defaults of their respective regents and professors." In a long chapter on the universities in 1659, it is expressly ordained by the Synod of Loudun, that some pastors shall be deputed every year to inspect and visit the universities, and to notice what progress is made by the young men, in philosophy and divinity, "and by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ and this assembly, to redress whatsoever disorders shall be particularly notified or observed by them." In furtherance of this object, two pastors and two elders were appointed as visitors for each university, and they were commissioned forthwith to proceed upon their important errand.

Thus did the Church exercise an active superintendence over the universities, and most anxious was she for well qualified professors. So early as 1601 we read, "And the colloquy of Quercy is charged to take special care that Montauban be furnished with most able professors, who may reputably and conscientiously perform their duty; as also the other colloquies are to put to their helping hand, that the like be done for their universities." And then every encouragement was to be given to the professors. That they might not be needlessly anxious about their maintenance, in these unsettled times, it is expressly provided that, at least for a season, they shall be paid a year in advance. And to secure a fair attendance on their lectures, every province was bound to maintain a certain number of scholars at the universities; and the young men were not eligible to the ministry, without producing good and sufficient testimonials of their learning and godliness, signed by the professors of those universities where they studied. What could wise and faithful men have done more to promote the united interests of learning and religion? And when it is remembered that all this was carried forward at a period when the Protestant Church of France was poor, and every now and then persecuted, what better proof can we have of the power of that true religion which still reigned in the hearts of her ministers, and elders, and people?

It is not necessary to dwell upon the parallel history of the Church of Scotland, in the same acquisitions. It is well known that, previous to the establishment of the Protestant Church of Scotland, the ignorance in every branch of knowledge was extreme. Tytler, in his history of this country, states, that in the one hundred and thirty years, which stretched between Alexander III. and David II., it would be difficult to find a Scottish Baron who could sign his own name. And as to higher literature, it is well known that one of the early Reformers was the first to introduce the study of the Greek language into this country, a few years before the Reformation; and that the Hebrew language was unknown for some years after the establishment of the Protestant Church, and that though Scotland could boast of three universities! It is also equally well known that from the first hour of her birth, the Church of Scotland has been the warm and unwearied promoter of knowledge among all classes of the people, and has required a superior education for her ministers. The first book of discipline, drawn up in 1560, set forth the necessity and obligation of "the virtuous education, and the godly upbringing, of the youth of this realm;" and means were instituted for the purpose. The scheme which the Reformers sketched contemplated a school in every parish; a grammar school in every "notable town;" an increased number of universities; and the efficient use of those already in existence; and, though from many causes, some of them similar to the adverse influences which retarded the Protestant Church of France, the noble designs of the Church of Scotland were not carried into full effect, yet much was accomplished, so that, in point of knowledge and improvement, the face of the country assumed a new aspect. It was uniformly found that when the Church was strong, and just according to her strength, successful means were undertaken for the education and elevation of the people. Limiting our view to the parallel period in the Church of France, it is ascertained from the report of a visitation of schools, in 1611 and 1613, in the district of St. Andrews, that schools were, at so early a period, planted in about two-thirds of the parishes. There can be little doubt that this held true of the country generally. The eminent Alexander Henderson, in 1630, liberally endowed a school in the Parish of Leuchars, of which he was then minister, and another at Creich. Mr Gabriel Semple set apart two thousand merks for the same purpose, in the Parish of Kirkpatrick-Durham. Kirk-sessions defrayed the educational expenses of the poor, out of the parish funds, and sometimes made it a condition of parents receiving relief, that they should send their children to school. And the education was not slender. In 1645, it was resolved, by the General Assembly, that no schoolmaster should be appointed to burgh or considerable parish schools, unless he were found skilful not only in writing Latin prose, but Latin verse. In a parish so small as Ormiston, money was expended by the session at that period, in purchasing Greek Lexicons for the use of the school, and other expensive books. With regard, again, to the higher profession of the ministry, the requirements were proportionally high. According to the first book of discipline, a young man must have studied till the age of twenty-four, before he was accounted fully qualified for public service.

In 1641, the General Assembly used her best exertions that "a sufficient maintenance be provided for a competent number of professors, teachers, and bursars, in all faculties, and especially in divinity, and for upholding, repairing, and enlarging the fabric of the colleges,—furnishing libraries, and such like good uses, in every university and college." It is earnestly recommended that only the ablest men should be appointed to professorial chairs. And in 1645, it is enacted that at the time of the General Assembly, commissioners from the different universities of the kingdom shall meet and consult together for the advancement of piety, learning, and good order, in the schools and universities. It is scarcely necessary to mention, that while so earnest in promoting the interests of literature and knowledge, the Church never, for a moment, lost sight of the paramount claims of true religion, but, on the contrary, made every thing else subservient to them. It is a striking illustration of this, that professors of languages and philosophy were required, along with their respective sciences, to ground their students in the first principles of Christianity. The Confession of Faith was translated into Latin, that it might be used as a text-book by the young men at College. By an act of the General Assembly, at a later date, 1705, it was strongly "recommended to masters in universities, and all other instructors of youth, that they be careful to instruct their scholars in the principles of the Christian reformed religion, according to the Scriptures." It is well known what efforts were used to create and wisely administer bursaries; and what was their great end, but to assist and encourage young men in studying at the universities? Here, too, religion was the reigning object. Who were the bursars? They were youths intended for the ministry, especially in Gaelic parishes. Such was the anxiety of the Church to obtain a sufficient number for this work, that she ordered a contribution of forty shillings Scots. from every congregation, yearly, to raise the necessary funds; and in 1648 there were not fewer than forty Highland youths, approved by the Synod of Argyle, in the course of training for the ministry. At the same time, were it not unduly protracting this paper, it were easy to shew that in the matter of university visitation there is also a parallel between the Protestant Church of France and the Protestant Church of Scotland, but enough has been adduced to shew that both were, even in the earliest times, the warm friends of enlarged knowledge and enlightened education, and enough has been brought forward to rebuke the silly and unfounded notion that religious men care nothing about the culture of mind, and are the enemies of knowledge. It will be difficult, indeed, for those who are so fond of arrogating to themselves, exclusively, the title of the friends of knowledge, at present day, to give evidence of such generosity, self-denial, and sincerity, in the cause, as the friends of religion, and the Protestant Presbyterian Churches, have manifested all along.

WILD FLOWERS.

By CHARLES MOIR, Esq.

Who does not love wild flowers? Those gentle children of the sunshine and the shower—those sweet gifts, fresh from the hand of the Deity, rendering more beautiful the face of a world already rich with his bounty. How many pious and grateful feelings are their presence calculated to call up in the meditative mind! Their fragile beauty is an emblem of man,—“he cometh forth as a flower of the field, and is cut down.” They perish, and their leaves are scattered by the wind of heaven; but the seeds they generate are borne along by the same breeze that witnesses their destruction, and while some may perish, others are carried into fertile places, so that when summer again gladdens the earth, their reappearance is secure. Even so with man; he dies, and returns to the dust from whence he came; but the good seed he has sown in this world, is brought to perfection in another and a more congenial clime, when out of the sleep of death he wakes to immortality. They are an emblem of love; for they speak to man of the unfailing goodness of Him who strews his path with beauty, that his faith may not grow cold, nor his gratitude to his gracious Benefactor suffer diminution.

When lusty summer is at its prime, and beneath every hedge-row the wild flowers are blooming—when every green bank is studded with variegated daisies, and yellow butter-cups are peeping out here and there among the fresh grass, nature's verdant carpet, so that, at every step, he treads upon flowers, no one can walk abroad without feelings of a pure and holy kind being excited within him. From these simple evidences of an unceasing benevolence, our thoughts naturally revert to the Giver of all good. The pleasure they inspire, unlike that derived from the grosser objects of sense, is indulged without purchasing it at the expense of painful after-reflection. On the contrary, the only reminiscences they leave behind, are such as are due to things hallowed as the gifts of love—the free-will offerings of Him, whose bounty clothes the earth with beauty.

To youth brought up in the country, wild flowers are ever great favourites. With the sight of them are associated many delightful remembrances. They are the companions of their infancy; the eye of childhood is riveted by their beauty, and the hand is eagerly stretched out for the gaudy favourite so soon destined to wither in their grasp. As time moves on, and youth are left to their own guidance, the long summer days are spent in wandering by the green fields, or lingering in the shady places, culling their simple favourites, and binding them into nosegays, or mayhap scattering them about in their playful innocence. The affection for wild flowers grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength. They are associated in their hearts with the song of birds, with trees and streams, and every thing fair in nature. They cannot separate them, and a partial estrangement only makes the lover of nature more ardent in his affection when he returns to the objects of his early love. This feeling has been so graphically described by a modern poet, that I cannot refrain from quoting it:—

"To him who sojourns 'mid the busy crowd
Of cities, where contention's jar is heard
For ever dissonant; whose pathway lies
'Mid tumult, yet whose youth hath pass'd away,—
His earlier, happier years,—in privacy,
Sequester'd from the rude shocks of the world,
'Mid hills, and dales, and woods, and quiet lawns,
And streamy glens, and pastoral dells; to him
Who, every eve, listeth the blackbird's song,
And, every morn, beheld the speckled lark
Ascend to greet the sun; to him one hour
Like this, so pregnant with deep seated thought,
'Thought kindled at the shrine of earlier years,
Long quenched, is more delightful than the mirth
Of smiling faces 'mid the perfumed vaults
Of echoing halls majestic, where the pride
Of art ambition'd forth, extinguishes
The glow of nature in the human heart."

Man, although pent up all his life in towns, still shows his love for flowers, in the attempts he makes to have them about his home. And as I pass the windows of many of the poorer classes in the crowded streets of our own city, and witness the humble attempts of the sickly artizan, toiling amid its heat and noise, to cheer his dwelling with some remembrance of the beautiful attendants of summer, I am often grieved to think what sacrifices man is forced to make that his daily sustenance may be obtained. Such appearances mark—but how affectingly!—that the love of nature is inherent in man, and flowers may be said to be the poetry of nature. They present to us emblems of purity, grace, and beauty. Links in the mysterious chain, binding, by still closer ties, the heart of man to

"The good God, who loves and cares for all."

The ancient Greeks were ardent admirers of flowers; their love for them was boundless. They scattered them in the porticoes of their temples, they strewed them in the conqueror's path, and on all occasions of rejoicing they were profuse in their use of them. In the East, they are still made the language of sentiment; and until lately, in many of the rural villages of England, they were used, made up into garlands for the bridal day, or, on mournful occasions, to be strewed in the coffins of the dead.

"Bring me flowers all young and sweet,
That I may strew the winding-sheet
Where calm thou sleepest, baby fair,
With roseless cheek, and auburn hair!
Bring me the rosemary, whose breath
Perfumed the wild and desert heath;
The lily of the vale, which, too,
In silence and in beauty grew.
Bring cypress from some sunless spot,
Bring me the blue forget-me-not,
That I may strew them o'er thy bier,
With long drawn sigh, and gushing tear."

In Scripture, wild flowers are everywhere to be met with, quoted as incentives to faith, love, and duty. Our blessed Saviour himself did not disdain to use them as emblematic of the entire dependence of man on the goodness of God: "And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet, I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith."

The Song of Solomon is full of passages alluding to flowers: "Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land." And again, "Let us fill ourselves with costly wine, and ointments, and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds, before they are withered." But to multiply quotations from Scripture, where they are introduced either casually, or as conveying lessons of higher import, would be endless.

With the poets, wild flowers have ever been a favourite theme. The works of our bards of past and modern times are profuse in allusions to them. Old Barbour, in describing the "softness of the sweet seasoune" of May, speaks of the time, when "Fields strowed are with flowers,

Well savouring of seir colours,
And all things waxeth bythe and gay."

They cannot fail to be favourites with the poets; for they are gentle creatures, brought forth with no other ostensible use but to give pleasure to the heart of man, and invest, with a still higher beauty, his temporal dwelling-place. Scattered far and wide over the hills, and in the depths of the dark woods; in the green valleys, and by the margin of the brooks that run like threads of silver through the smiling meadows, their presence calls up many glad and joyous thoughts, and it may be, at times, some allied to soberer meditation.

"Thoughts, that have long been veiled in sleep;
Hopes, that allure but to depart;
And recollections, buried deep Within the shut and silent heart."

Every one must recollect the beautiful incident related by Mungo Park, when, amid the torrid wastes of Africa, heartless despondency seized upon him, the sight of a little wild flower, blooming amid the cheerless sterility around, roused him once more to action, by the cheering reflection, that He who brought forth and sustained the tender plant amid such a waste, would likewise bear up and successfully carry him through all the trials that yet awaited him.

A fine characteristic of wild plants, is the tenacity with which they attempt to throw a mantle of beauty even over the ravages of time. What more picturesque object in nature, than the wild ivy trailing its lithe tendrils over the mouldering walls of our venerated abbeys and old castles! Here, too, will sometimes be found, the honeysuckle, like a shred of network, trellising the ruined walls, and shedding abroad its luscious fragrance; the wild bramble, with its succulent berries, clustering at its foot; and far up, beyond our reach, in some neglected loop-hole, a bunch of wall-flower, lighting, with its golden tresses, this "lonely mansion of the dead." Such a beautiful provision of nature, calling, as it were, life out of death, has often suggested the analogy that exists between it and the hope that gilds the departing hour of the Christian, when he reflects that the dark night of the grave is to be succeeded by the daylight of another scene of more than earthly beauty. Even simple wild flowers may thus call up thoughts of high import to man. But, viewed in their true sense as emanations of a love that never faileth; as sent to minister to the pleasure of man, to gladden his abode, and make his heart joyous, how dear should they be to us, for the sake of Him who freely bestowed them! And when we look on their beauty, and wonder; let us think of His creative power, and of the protecting care he bestows even on the humblest of his creatures.

"Thou art, O God! the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see:
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from Thee;
Where'er we turn, Thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are Thine.
"When youthful spring around us breathes,
Thy spirit warms her fragrant sigh,
And every flower that summer weathes,
Is born beneath that kindly eye:
Where'er we turn, Thy glories shine,
For all things fair and bright are Thine."

* The poem is descriptive of a summer evening in the country.

SACRED POETRY.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SEASONS.

BY THE REV. W. M. HETHERINGTON, A.M.,
Minister of Torphichen.

Oh! beautiful is God's green earth!
When in the gentle Spring
Its flowery beauties leap to birth,
And wild-wood echoes ring.
Instructive with melodious joy,
Glad Nature's anthem pure and high,
To Him whose goodness gave them birth:—
Oh! beautiful is God's green earth!

Oh! beautiful is God's bright earth!
In Summer's golden prime,
When tides of light and life roll forth
Round every kindling clime;
Till the full bloom of gracious love,
O'er earth below and heaven above,
Beams in majestic splendour forth:—
Oh! beautiful is God's bright earth!

Oh! beautiful is God's rich earth!
'Neath Autumn's gorgeous skies,
When the deep robe of ripened worth
O'er Nature's bosom lies;
Benignant dignity and grace
Adorning her maternal face
With heavenly smiles of conscious worth:—
Oh! beautiful is God's rich earth!

Oh! beautiful is God's grand earth!
When Winter's mighty spell
Bids tempests in their savage mirth
O'er land and ocean yell;
Locks up pool, lake, and stream, or throws
O'er hill and dale soft veiling snows;
Pours through each vein health's glowing mirth:—
Oh! beautiful is God's grand earth!

Oh! beautiful is God's green earth!
The changing Seasons all,
But give its varied glories birth,
And on man's spirit call
For grateful praise: O God above,
While life is mine still shall I love
Thy works, still shew their beauties forth,
Still praise Thee in thine own green earth!

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Conversion of a Seaman, or the Blessed Influence of a Floating Chapel.—The following interesting statement was made by the Rev. Dr Muir of St. Stephen's Parish, Edinburgh, in a Sermon lately preached in behalf of the "Edinburgh and Leith Seaman's Friend Society:"—"In the course of ministerial duty, I was called to visit, on his death-bed, a fine youth, who, after several voyages and perilous escapes, was laid down in consumption. It was a considerable time before that he had been seized with this disorder; and there was, also, little doubt that harsh treatment, during one of his voyages, had aggravated the malady and confirmed it. On his way home he had been carried to an English sea-port, where the opportunity was given him of attending the floating chapel; and, situated as he was, he could not have been able to attend divine worship, had not such a provision been made for seamen. And I state these particulars that you may the better learn the frame of his mind, as I inform you, that, amidst all his last sufferings, (which were peculiarly trying,) his gratitude for having had that opportunity of hearing the Gospel, was unbounded. He frequently recurred to it.

He spoke of it with satisfaction. He often mentioned it with tears of delight. He said that he saw the hand of God in bringing him, by chastenings, to a place where he was told of the love of God to lost sinners. He said that the Bethel-ship had been the house of the Lord to him,—as a refuge,—as an ark to him. And well I remember the emphasis with which he said, 'O! the sound of those psalms and hymns, and the words of those prayers, and the texts of the Bible. They came on my heart, after the long voyage in which there was no Sabbath, and no God to me,—they did come on my heart as voices and messengers from heaven. I was then made thoroughly to know the Gospel-salvation, and I found the very Saviour whom my sick and weary soul needed.' And, let me add, that he blessed the Saviour to the last; that he died committing his soul in peace to the Saviour; that even when near his latter end he still connected his eternal hopes with the privileges he had received at the seaman's chapel; and that his afflicted mother, while she could not but weep at the loss of her sailor boy, was enabled to rejoice in tribulation for the glorious rest on which his soul had entered; and blessed God for the Bethel-ship, where her son had first experienced the preciousness of the Saviour."

The Minister's Prayer Book.—The pastor of an Independent Congregation in America, after many years' labour among his people, was supposed by some of them to have declined much in his vigour and usefulness; in consequence of which two of his deacons waited on him, and told their complaint. The minister received them kindly, and assured them that he was equally sensible of his languor and little success, and that the cause had given him very great uneasiness. The deacons wished that he would mention what he thought was the cause. Without any hesitation the minister replied, "The loss of my prayer book." "Your prayer book!" said the senior deacon, with surprise; "I never knew you used one." "Yes," replied the minister, "I have enjoyed the benefit of one for many years, till lately; and I attribute my want of success to the loss of it. The prayers of my people were my prayer book, and it has occasioned great grief to me that they have laid it aside. Now, brethren, if you will return to my people, and procure the use of my prayer book again, I doubt not that I shall preach much better, and that you will hear more profitably." The deacons, conscious of their neglect, thanked the minister for the reproof, and wished him a good morning.

Inattention.—When Bishop Aylmer observed his congregation inattentive, he used to repeat some verses of the Hebrew Bible, at which the people naturally stared with astonishment. He then addressed them on the folly of eagerly listening to what they did not understand, while they neglected instructions which were readily comprehended.

THE WORD OF GOD

THE BEST MEANS OF TRAINING THE YOUNG TO BE PIOUS, USEFUL, AND HAPPY.

BY THE LATE REV. ANDREW HUNTER, D.D.,

One of the Ministers of the Tron Church, and Professor of Theology in the University of Edinburgh.

To a man who loves his country, or is interested both in the present and everlasting welfare of his fellow-creatures, no object can be more worthy of serious attention than the best means of educating youth, or preparing them for serving God and their generation faithfully. When a due attention is paid to their principles and conduct, to the exciting in them an early abhorrence of vice of every kind, a reverence of God, and regard to his institutions and laws, such exertions for their benefit seldom fail of producing happy effects. The Father of lights has appointed this discipline, and usually crowns it with his blessing. "Train up a child in the way in which he should walk, and when he is old he will not depart from it." By these means is the State furnished, from time to time, with enlightened, upright, active, and useful citizens in different departments; the Church with pious and exemplary members, and heaven, itself, with those who shall be the everlasting monuments of rich grace.

The proposition which I mean at present to illustrate is, that a due attention to the Word of God is the best means of promoting the purity, the usefulness, and the happiness of a young and rising generation.

I. The Word of God tends to promote their purity. By purity, I mean every branch of holiness or conformity to the moral law. I shall select a few of the most important virtues for illustrating this part of the subject. Piety, or the love of God, is the first commandment, and upon it all the other moral duties depend. How adapted are the Scriptures of truth to inspire us with a just sense of the perfections of God, and the obligations to love, worship, and obey him! There we have the clearest information that there is only one God, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the universe; that his presence is in every place, and that his watchful care is exerted over all his creatures; that he is possessed of every natural and moral excellence in the highest degree, of unlimited and infallible wisdom, almighty power, immaculate purity, unchangeable truth and faithfulness, and the most diffusive goodness; that these, and all his attributes, are exerted in harmony with one another, and in such a way as is most conducive to the general interests of his government; that he is the constant witness and the supreme Judge of all his intelligent creatures. The Scriptures point him out as the only object of our religious worship, and as entitled to our highest love and obedience. They lay open a way of access to the Supreme Being for guilty creatures through a Mediator, and assure us that every sincere worshipper shall be accepted, that God will pardon those sins which are confessed with humility, and bestow those blessings which are supplicated with earnestness. They warn us that God will not hold them guiltless who take his name in vain; that the profane swearer, the Sabbath breaker, those who neglect the worship of God, or who perform it insincerely, shall be the objects of punishment, and even those who, though they pay some attention to religious duties, yet withhold from God the chief affections of their hearts, and the obedience of their lives, cannot be accounted true worshippers or subjects of God's kingdom. Now, if these scriptural views of the character and government of God are impressed early upon young minds, how powerful must be their influence? Must they not be effectual preservatives from cursing and swearing, from the profanation of the Sabbath, and the disregard of religious institutions? Must they not cherish in their breasts reverence of God, gratitude for his benefits, delight in the duties of devotion, and an ardour to comply with every part of God's will? Shall not those young persons, who take heed to God's Word, be afraid of offending, and be eager to please Him whom they consider not only as their righteous Lord, but as their greatest benefactor, to whom they are indebted for all their enjoyments and hopes? Those who give way to profanity and vice are usually such as have not enjoyed the advantages of a religious education, or have disregarded the means of their spiritual improvement.

Again, sobriety is another virtue which those young persons will steadily practise, who carefully study God's Word. There they find intemperance strictly prohibited, under the most awful sanctions, as a gross abuse of the gifts of Providence,—as detrimental to health, to industry, and worldly prosperity,—as depriving men of the due use of their intellectual powers,—as the source of strife and confusion,—as highly offensive to a holy God, and as the object of his awful denunciations of punishment. There they learn that the impenitent drunkard shall be excluded for ever from the kingdom of God, and consigned to the abodes of misery. Conscience confirms these declarations of Scripture, and urges them to habitual watchfulness against temptations to intemperance. I speak of those who really peruse God's Word, for upon others all the divine precepts and threatenings make no more impression than if they were not true, or had never been enunciated. A pious youth will be filled with abhorrence of every departure from sobriety; he will shun the company of the drunkard, and every enticement to excess, not only as disqualifying him for usefulness, but as highly injurious to the honour of the Christian profession, and as grieving the Holy Spirit of God, by whom believers are sealed unto the day of redemption.

II. A serious and practical attention to the Word of God is the most effectual mean of rendering young persons useful members of society. In it there are the strictest prohibitions of all those vices that are subversive of the safety and happiness of our fellow-creatures. Lying, fraud, and dishonesty of every kind, are forbidden under the severest sanctions. Every man is enjoined to speak truth to his neighbour, and lying lips are declared to be an abomination to the Lord. Justice and inviolable integrity, in all transactions, are required, as fundamental virtues in the character of a good man or heir of heaven. No apology is admitted for deviating from them in the intercourse of life. The man who shall abide in God's tabernacle, and stand in his holy hill, is "he who walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour; he that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not. He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved." Not only are fraud and oppression prohibited, but evil-speaking, and strife and revenge, and even all those evil dispositions which lead to the transgression of social duty; as hatred, malice, envy, rash judging of others, and covetousness. We are exhorted to put on bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, forbearing and forgiving one another in love, and perfecting the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace. That charity or spirit of love, by which Christians are to be animated, is represented as the end of the commandment, and bond of perfectness. "It suffereth long, and is kind; it envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth. Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

Again, how explicit and peremptory are the precepts in the Bible that respect the private relations of life, and how admirably calculated to promote the happiness of those with whom we are connected! Not only are these duties enjoined in the fifth commandment, but the various duties of these relations are delineated and arranged, by the strongest motives, in many passages of Scripture. Husbands are enjoined to love their wives even as their own bodies, and as Christ loved the Church—to give honour unto the wife as the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life. Wives are commanded to submit themselves to their own husbands as unto the Lord, and even those connected with unbelieving husbands were not exempted from obedience in all things lawful, that if any did not obey the Word they might also, without the Word, be won by the conversation of their wives, whilst they beheld their chaste conversation coupled with fear, and saw them adorned with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. Parents are enjoined to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; to command their children and household after them to keep the way of the Lord, and to do judgment and justice. They are to conciliate their affections by kindness, while they maintain due authority and discipline. They are to walk within their houses with perfect hearts, and recommend religion and its duties, not only by assiduous instruction, but by a pious and exemplary deportment. They are not only to provide for their bodies, but exert their best endeavours for promoting their eternal interests. Children are strictly enjoined to obey their parents in the Lord, for this is right. "Honour thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest live long in the earth." "A wise son heareth his father's instructions; but a scorner heareth not rebuke." "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." No less excellent are the precepts in the Word of God as to masters and servants. Masters are exhorted to do that which is just and equal to their servants, forbearing threatening or undue severity, knowing that they also have a Master in heaven, and that there is no respect of persons with Him. Servants are enjoined to be "obedient to them that are their masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart as unto Christ; not with eye-service as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." Christian servants are to be subject with all fear, not only to good and gentle masters, but also to the froward. For this is thankworthy, if a man, for conscience towards God, endure grief, suffering wrongfully. The young are exhorted to flee youthful lusts; to remember their Creator in the days of their youth; to submit themselves to the elder, or those who are more advanced in age and experience, and to be clothed with humility.

These are some of the admirable precepts of Scripture as to relative duties. It is obvious that if these precepts are observed, they must have the most friendly influence on the state of society. Nations or communities are made up of families, and on domestic discipline, and attention to domestic duties, does the prosperous state of a nation or Church depend. I would only further observe on this branch of the subject, that the belief of the Gospel is highly conducive to industry and active exertions to be useful in our different stations. To be diligent in business is required, as well as to be fervent in spirit; and those who provide not for their own families, are declared to be worse than heathens. We are exhorted to labour or assiduity in some lawful employment, not only for the sustenance of ourselves and family, but for the public benefit, and that we may have to give to him that needeth.

III. Attention to God's Word is the only sure and effectual method of securing our own happiness. Even in this life, the youth who is actuated by religious principles, has much higher sources of satisfaction, than those who are either profane and dissipated, or who do not feel the power of religion. Persuaded that all events are under the direction of a wise and good Providence, he is contented with his lot, whether prosperous or adverse, and finds that the little which a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked. Under the various afflictions of life, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, he hath hope. He views the hand of a reconciled Father in them, and is persuaded that these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. He contemplates with joy the unchangeable love of God in Jesus Christ, and believes that as God has not spared his own Son, he will with him also freely give him all things that are conducive to his welfare. "Great peace have they who love God's law, and nothing shall offend them." "Wisdom's ways are to them ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Even in tribulation they find that, as their day is, so is their strength, and that when afflictions abound, divine consolations do much more abound. Many of them have known what it is to rejoice in tribulation, and to be filled in the hours of distress with peace and joy in believing. Death itself is stripped of its terrors, and they can view it with serenity and satisfaction as a messenger of peace, sent to release them from the imperfections and sorrows of a present life, and to introduce them into a state of perfect purity and joy. At that critical season, how superior is the condition of those who have feared God from their youth, above that of the ungodly and disobedient? The latter cannot look back on past life without remorse and self-displeasure, and they cannot look forward to a future life without the painful anticipation of endless misery. Though sometimes from the force of disease, or from a seared conscience, they have had no bands in their death, yet often they have been racked with anguish and with fear. But whatever may be their present feelings, we are sure that at death they shall reap the bitter fruits of all their sins. "The wicked shall go into everlasting punishment." No language can describe—no heart can conceive the extent of the misery which awaits them. But the "righteous hath hope in his death." He is begotten to the lively hope of an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. To him death need have no terrors; for he knows that his sins are pardoned through the blood of Christ, and that his Redeemer has gone to prepare mansions of bliss for his reception. When he awakes from the sleep of death, he shall behold the face of Christ in righteousness, and be for ever with the Lord. If he die in the Lord, however young in years, he shall immediately attain to maturity in knowledge, and to perfection in holiness and joy. Discoveries the most sublime, and pleasures the most refined and exalted, shall be communicated to his soul, when he joins the spirits of the just made perfect.

JEJANA, OR THE CONVERTED HOTTENTOT.

[From the South African Christian Recorder for October 1836.]

On the Downs, in the District of Stellenbosch, in the midst of deep sands and thick brushwood, stands a neat though humble dwelling, with a well cultivated garden of considerable extent; and though all around is wild and waste, it is very pleasant to look upon, because the toil that made it fruitful has not been wrung from the sinews of the slave; for here, the independent peasant holds the sway, and smiling plenty crowns the efforts of the industrious poor.

A widow is the owner of the Erf, and, with the assistance of her orphan children, its cultivator too; but this is not her best inheritance; the blessing of God, which maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow thereto, has made this widow's heart to sing for joy, and no one can sit long beneath her lowly roof, without acknowledging that the cottage, when illuminated by the beams of the Sun of Righteousness, can bestow more true happiness, than all the splendour of a palace, where God is not. The Gospel of Jesus is the only remedy for the degeneracy of man; and the transcendent goodness of Jehovah is conspicuous in adapting it to men of every language, of every hue, and of every degree of guilt, wretchedness, and woe; and yet, there are those who reject its all-sufficiency, and turn aside from the demonstrations of its power when exhibited by the barbarous Caffre, the ignorant Hottentot and degraded slave. But not so the Christian. He rejoices in the potency of that divine principle, that can make the meanest of his fellow-creatures happy, and loves his religion the more, for bringing home to the osom of these degraded ones, those principles that not only can make them virtuous and happy here, but also opens to them the portals of a glorious immortality. To the Christian, therefore, the story of Jejana will not be without interest; and if it should please God to make it the means of bringing back one wanderer to his fold, or of strengthening one weak believer in the faith and love of Jesus, the purpose for which it is published will be fully answered

Jejana was born at Bruintjes Hoogte, in the district of Somerset. Her mother was a Hottentot, and dying when her child was very young, gave her to the care of a young farmer in that neighbourhood, with the cattle and sheep she called her own. The young orphan was brought up in the family as a slave, and made herself so useful, that the parents of the young man, when they removed from Bruintjes Hoogte, purchased her of their son, (who had been left her guardian,) for a team of oxen, and a female slave. The farmer's route being through Tulbagh, he spent the Sabbath there, to have a child baptized, and poor Jejana, who till now had never heard the sound of the "church-going bell, nor smiled when a Sabbath appeared," was permitted on this occasion to tread the courts of her God. All around was new, and attracted her attention; but when the minister (Rev. Michael Vos) rose, her eager gaze was fixed upon him. The text was taken from the Revelation iii. 15, "I know thy works." Jejana listened with profound attention to the minister, as he portrayed the sinner's evil doings, and conscious that her own wicked ways were brought to light, she, in her ignorance, thought the preacher was God: and the affrighted girl tried to hide herself behind one of the pillars of the Church, for she imagined he looked at her in particular, and pointed her out. She left the Church, but the deep and sorrowful emotions which had there taken possession of her soul still remained. The minister invited the farmer and his wife to his house; and as the dejected girl stood behind her mistress' chair, he fixed his eyes upon her, and asked her if she had been in Church that day? "Yes, Sir," said the afflicted girl. "Did you understand?" "No, Sir." "Do you know that there is a God?" "I have often used his name in oaths and curses, but I know nothing about him, Sir; tell me where he is, and what he is?" "God is a spirit; he is everywhere," replied the minister, "and hears all you say, and sees all you do." "Do you know you have a soul?" "No, Sir." "Yes, that within you which feels glad and sorry, is your soul, and when you die, it must be happy for ever with God, or be sent to everlasting fire in hell." "O, Sir, what shall I do, for I have never done any thing but evil in my life?" Here the conversation was interrupted, Jejana was obliged to go with her master and mistress, and saw the kind pastor no more; though, doubtless, his prayers followed the unhappy girl. She pursued her journey, but the arrows of the Almighty were within her soul, the poison whereof drank up her spirit: the terrors of God set themselves in array against her. By day and by night the hand of the Lord was heavy upon her; she tried to keep from sleep, for she expected to awake in hell. Alas! she knew not that there was balm in Gilead, and a kind Physician there; but at length she obtained some little help from an old Hottentot named David, who came to her mistress' house on business. Having said that he had been in Church, she earnestly inquired what he had heard there, and opened the state of her heart to him; he seemed, however, to have had but little knowledge of the way of salvation, for he only told her to pray to God to teach her and help her. To her inquiry how she should pray, and what she should pray for, he told her to go and kneel down, and look unto God in heaven, and say, "O God, help me! O God, teach me!" and so eager was the poor girl to practise the old man's lesson, that she put down the meat her mistress had given her to dress, and ran away to the bush to pour out her soul in David's words,— "O God, teach me! O God, help me!" adding, "for David says, thou wilt."

The Bible was read in this family, but the bread of life they did not deem fit food for slaves; yet so eager was this poor girl to partake of the crumbs that fell from her Master's table, that whenever he did read the Holy Oracles, she chose that time to go in to wash his feet: this, however, was soon perceived by her mistress' ever watchful eye, and forbidden: then she would softly creep near the door, or put her ear to the crevice, hoping to catch the joyful sound; but this was thought an offence, and threatened to be punished, if she did not desist. Once, when her mistress was reading a chapter, in the hall where Jejana was churning, hoping to catch some of the words, she stopped the churn, and "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you," caught her ear. Regardless of her mistress' anger, and of every thing but her soul's deep malady, she asked, whose words they were? "They are not for you," was the answer of her unfeeling mistress, who deemed it an unpardonable offence for her slave to believe she had a soul. She was now treated with unusual rigour; but this only gave emphasis to her prayer, and, "O God, teach me! O God, help me! for David says, thou wilt," arose with increased fervour, and Jejana waited in confident expectation of the aid she sought from on high. It was suggested to her mind, that she should ask to go and seek instruction in religion. She deemed the new thought a voice from heaven, and instantly obeyed its mandate, but without success; for her mistress' heart, like Pharaoh's, was hardened, and she would not let her go. The same idea was again powerfully impressed upon her mind, and she dared not disobey, much as she dreaded her mistress' displeasure; with imploring looks, therefore, she again renewed her supplications. "Are you mad, Jejana," said her mistress, "you used to be obedient, why are you so altered?" "O dear mistress, I want to go and learn about God; for if I stay here, I shall die." "Die, then," was her mistress' reply; "for what are you better than a beast?" "O mistress, I have a soul, the preacher told me so, and I feel that if I stay here without God, I shall die and go to hell." "If you ask again, you shall be beaten from head to foot."

Jejana could say no more, out to her little sanctuary in the bush she went, and there, under the broad canopy of heaven, sent up her vehement cry, "O God, help me! O God, teach me! for David says, thou wilt." And He who heareth prayer, and will not despise, heard her cry, and with His own arm brought deliverance; and now she thought a voice from heaven said, "Go out from this place, and I will go with you;" and, like Abraham, she obeyed, not knowing whither she went. But a waggon soon overtook her, and the driver permitting her to ride, brought her on Saturday evening to the village of Stellenbosch, where she awaited with great anxiety the dawn of that Sabbath which was to bring to her soul life and salvation. The minister's text was taken from John vi. 37, "Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." He exhibited Jesus crucified for sinners, and willing to save to the uttermost all that come unto Him. The word was applied with power to the heart of this poor humble penitent, and she returned with joy and gladness. But the fugitive was soon missed and pursued. On the following day her master arrived, and took her before the landdrost, to be punished for her crime; but the girl's striking and affecting account of herself interested her judge, and induced him to converse with the criminal more than is usual. Here, as well as in every other part of this remarkable history, the hand of Divine Providence was strikingly manifested; the truth was all elicited, the landdrost discovered that she had been most unjustly enslaved, and pronounced her free. The master was obliged to loose his victim, and his rage for a time knew no bounds; at length he condescended to entreat her to return, promising to restore all her cattle left her by her mother, but she could not live where God was not known, and having received a double blessing, freedom from sin and Satan, as well as from the cruel bonds that had made her the slave of man, her cup of joy was full, she wished no more, and she determined to remain in the place where God had met and blessed her.

Under the preaching of the good Missionary, and the teaching of the Holy Spirit, she grew in the faith and love of Jesus, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of her God for twelve years; and then, alas! unmindful of the divine injunctions, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation," her heart began to decline from his testimonies. The first temptation to which she yielded was a dance. On that night, she could not look up with her wonted confidence to her heavenly Father; the form of prayer, indeed, remained, but the Spirit had departed, not soon to return. The first step in the slippery path of sin was but preparatory to another, and another still more fatal, till she made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. For four years she followed with the multitude to do evil, but the eye of the compassionate Redeemer followed the poor wanderer, and, in the multitude of his tender mercies, brought her back to his fold; and though he did not utterly remove his loving-kindness, he visited her transgressions with a rod, and her iniquities with stripes. Jejana was now a wife, and the mother of two little ones. The eldest was removed suddenly, the other appeared on the borders of the grave, and herself laid on the bed of sickness. Now, in her affliction, she remembered Him, who had been her hope and help in happier days, and in an agony of soul she cried, "O God, spare my child, for it is innocent, and strike its guilty mother."

The child was spared, and her own health restored, but no ray of light broke in upon her benighted soul; she became a prey to the most fearful temptation, the great enemy of souls persuaded her she had committed the unpardonable sin, and for four months she lingered on the borders of despair, not so much as daring to lift up her eyes to heaven. As she sat one day bemoaning her lost condition, the Holy Spirit brought to her mind the words of the prophet, "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely; for mine anger is turned away from them;" and she again found peace at the cross of that Saviour whom she had forsaken. On this memorable day, as Jejana was standing at her door, with the tears of mingled joy and grief upon her cheek, a man came up, and, with a dejected countenance, begged a cup of water. On complying she observed that it was troubled, and unfit to drink, "Not so troubled as my soul," he replied. "Is your soul distressed," said she, "go to the Saviour; I found him this morning, and he is as ready to pardon, and save, and bless you." It was a word in season to his sorrowful spirit; he sought, and obtained at the cross of the Son of God, the relief he needed. Warned and instructed by her fall, Jejana became more humble, watchful, and prayerful, and till this time, a period of more than forty years, has walked humbly with her God. Having lived with her husband in service, her life had passed in even tenor, without experiencing that anxious care in rearing an infant family, which the labouring class so often experience. It is the lot of all, however, to feel that man is born to trouble, and many a cloud of sorrow now arose to dim the path of this poor pilgrim; but strong in faith, and earnest in prayer, she was sustained by the arm of Omnipotence, and could rejoice even in tribulation.

David, her husband, was obliged to leave his home to join the army General Janssen had raised in defence of the Cape, and Jejana following his footsteps, was exposed to many trying vicissitudes. At length the troops being disbanded, she and her husband returned to their former occupation; her health, however, soon declined, and she had notice to seek another home, an event which nued them with sorrow, though God meant it for good. One bright morning, having committed themselves and their little ones to the care and guidance of heaven, they went forth to seek employment, and a place where they might lay their heads. By the kindness of Providence they found upon the Downs an empty cottage, and having obtained permission to dwell there, they were soon settled in their new abode; and though now more than fourteen miles from the house of God, Jejana's seat was seldom vacant, for she loved his dwelling-place.

David, her husband, maintained his family by working for the farmers around, and cutting reeds; but as his employment was somewhat uncertain, they were occasionally brought very low, and yet He who taketh care of sparrows, and feedeth the meanest insect he has made, appeared for them in every time of need, and Jejana can bring her attestation to the faithfulness of Him who has declared, that those who seek first the kingdom of God, shall want no good thing. Once, when she knew not how to supply the next meal for her children, she went to a farmer in the neighbourhood; his mother arrived, and seeing Jejana going away, she begged the servant to call her, asked her if she feared God, and said, "God has sent you this (giving her a sealed packet) to buy bread for you and your little ones; I dreamt of you and your distress last night, and God has sent me to relieve you."

Another instance of God's watchful care over his children succeeded this.—David and Jejana had lived three years in this mud hovel, and they loved their humble dwelling, for they had many proofs that God was there to bless and keep them, but now it was given away, and whither should they go? Jejana sighed deeply as she saw the surveyor (Mr Melville) appear, accompanied by the person to whom the land had been given, and as she stood with tearful eyes to watch their progress, the farmer noticed her sorrow, and begged her to be comforted, for he would never turn her out. With an expression of pious resignation she thanked him, but said "my trust is not in an arm of flesh, but in God." The words, and the manner in which they were uttered, arrested the attention of the benevolent surveyor, for he was a man of God, and loved his fellow-creatures, one of the noble few who would barter all selfish interest for the delight of doing good, and deem the exchange the greatest luxury of life. He went to Jejana's cottage, heard her story, and left her with a promise soon to return; he did so, and gladdened this poor family, by informing them of his success in their behalf; the Erf upon which they now lived, was measured and secured to them.

Prosperity now smiled upon them; Jejana's children were of an age to be useful, and as they had been trained in virtuous and industrious habits, were of great value to their parents; a hut was soon erected, and a garden planted; the sterility of the soil for many a long year disappointed their hopes, though it at length yielded, to patient and persevering labour, abundant returns; an ox was added to their store, and then another, till they called a span their own; and then the reeds, and the produce of their garden could be taken to the best market, and their little wealth increased, till their present substantial and comfortable dwelling was erected, and God has blessed their wealth; her house has long been the house of prayer to all around, and there the Missionary loves to meet the little flock, for it has often proved to him the gate of heaven.

Jejana cannot read, but her knowledge of the Word of God might shame many a lettered Christian,—it is written on her heart, and is as a fountain of living waters perpetually rising up, to refresh her own soul, and the souls of those who approach her; but though destitute of the key of knowledge herself, she has not only taken care that her family (all daughters) should possess that invaluable blessing, but has taught them to use it aright. After the hard labour of the day, those excellent young women devote the evening to the instruction of their poor neighbours; nor do they ever separate, till their pious mother has directed them to the widow's God, and drawn them around the mercy-seat to implore for them the blessing of salvation. Jejana's heart is full of those kind and gentle charities that Christianity inspires; her love to God her Saviour, and zeal for his glory, will never suffer her to let open impiety pass without severe rebuke; and the following instance is recorded to show that such a practice may prove as beneficial to the sinner, as it is consistent in the Christian:

Once, while Jejana was keeping the oxen in the Downs, during a dreadful thunderstorm, two English gentlemen rode up, and with oaths and curses demanded to be shewn the road, which they had lost. Jejana, sharply rebuking them, advised them to take shelter till the storm was over; but in language still more awful they defied the storm, and Him that rode thereon. She bade them go, but said, the God whom they blasphemed would stop them in their mad career. They left her with horrid imprecations, but one of them was struck down by the lightning, and carried into a house as dead; he, however, recovered, and years after sought her out to thank her for her reproof, which he declared had reached his heart, and had been the means of bringing him to the Saviour's feet.

Jejana still lives a monument of what divine grace can effect for a Hottentot; a mother in Israel, warning and exhorting the ungodly, comforting and encouraging the penitent, visiting the beds of the sick and dying. Time has shed its snows on her honoured head, and her frail tenement must soon descend to the house appointed for all living, but with faith and patience she awaits the summons that is to bid her rise to the bright regions of purity and peace, there to join in the song of the blessed: "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen."

Reader! the first sermon the subject of the preceding narrative ever heard reached her heart, and produced results that will extend to all eternity. How solemn is the thought, that the light of thousands around us has gone out in utter darkness, who might have believed and been saved, had Christians in this country been worthy of the holy name by which they are called! Surely this affecting thought ought to arouse all our energies to assist in circulating the joyful sound amidst Africa's degraded, unhappy children.

Christianity never intended that its sons and daughters should sit down in their selfishness, and draw around them this world's comforts and refinements, content with now and then giving a little of their substance to the poor. No; it demands the same mind that was in Christ, and a consecration of time, talents, energies, and substance to God, who has made it our highest happiness, as well as duty, to become fellow-workers with him.

The ambition, then, of hoarding up treasure, and adding field to field, cannot be the ambition of a Christian. No; his takes a nobler sight, and seeks for glory, and honour, and immortality, not for himself alone, but for the commonwealth of Israel.

ORGANIC REMAINS.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

THE mineral strata of the earth are not only, as we have stated in a former paper, arranged according to a fixed order of superposition, but they are also resolvable into several distinct groups, according to characters peculiar to each. One essential character, by which rocks may be distinguished, necessarily arises out of the mineral materials which enter into their composition; some, again, possess a more compact and crystalline texture than others; and not a few can be recognised by their colour, laminated structure, and other external appearances. The more ancient rocks, geologically termed primitive, are the hardest and most crystalline of any; and generally, as we descend to the more recent formations, we find more of a mechanical structure prevailing amongst them, and less induration in their component particles. But there are other tests more definite and precise than any of these, and without which geology would have been divested of much of the charm and interest which attach to it as a science. Placed in circumstances of juxtaposition, one rock might easily have been distinguished from another; but when seas and continents intervened, or even when separated, as they often are, by considerable intervals in the same country, it would have been difficult to pronounce upon the identity of any series of rocks. Besides, there would have been very little interesting in such knowledge, even if attained with any degree of accuracy, as nothing farther could have been intimated than the fact, that differences did exist among the rocky strata of the earth; but how these were produced—what was the state and condition of the earth at the period of their formation—could not have been ascertained, nor even so much as conjectured. Now, in the organic remains which lie entombed in the interior of the earth, we have a more accurate test to enable us to decide upon these points, by which the contemporary origin of different groups can often be established, even where all identity of mineralogical character is wanting, and where no light can be derived from the order of superposition.

We are here led to the consideration of one of the most singular and interesting pages in the whole volume of nature. Job speaks of "the stones of darkness and the shadow of death;" and here certainly we have displayed before us the repositories of the dead, not in their usually appalling spectacle of corruption and decay, but in well arranged specimens of the various orders of creation—types of every form of vegetable and animal life, at once fresh and beautiful to contemplate.

When a plant or an animal dies, the inanimate substance usually lies upon the surface of the ground until the several parts are disunited, or decomposed into their simple elements. The plant withers, the animal corrupts, and is disorganized; and speedily both are reduced to dust, and form henceforth part of the soil which nourished and sustained them. Such is the usual fate, sooner or later, of all that lives and breathes upon the earth. But when we penetrate into the rocky crust, we find that this has not always been the case. Forming part of the real solid stone, both plants and animals are found, with all their organization and structure as perfect and entire, as the moment at which they ceased to live. The root, the stem, the leaves, nay, sometimes the flower and fruit of the most tender plant, which could not stand erect in the breeze, are there, spread out on the surface of the rock with all the care and delicacy of the most skilful herbalist, and sustaining the weight and pressure of many thousands of feet of solid rock. Animal forms are equally well preserved, some of them being so minute as to require the aid of the microscope to detect them, and others of the gigantic dimensions of seventy or eighty feet in length. Sometimes single bones are found, particularly the teeth and such portions as are least liable to decomposition; but frequently the entire skeleton is obtained, with no alteration in its parts except what has been occasioned by their compression into a flattened ed body. Nevertheless, so perfect is the organization of these fossil remains, as to admit of being classified with the accuracy and precision of living substances. The botanist can arrange his specimens, taken out of the rock, into orders, genera, and even species, and the zoologist can tell of the curious relics before him, which of them roamed through "the vasty deep," and which gambolled in the marshy lake, which browsed upon the mountains, and which rejoiced to soar into the air. Trees are found erect in their original position, shells as they adhered to the living rock, the fins and scales of fishes as fresh and regularly disposed as when they sported amidst the primeval waters. The pencil, fit short, could not more beautifully delineate, nor the plate more accurately give the impression of these curious relics, than the state in which they have been preserved, through so many ages, on the rough stony tablets of nature.

Another circumstance, which cannot fail to excite attention in considering the history of organic remains, is the matter or substance of which they consist. They are termed petrifications, which is compounded of two words signifying to be made stones, because they are actually converted into a mineral substance, the quality of which is determined by that of the rock in which they are contained. In some instances, the animal or vegetable matter has been entirely dissolved or removed, and the mineral matter of the rock so nicely substituted, as to assume the perfect form of the internal structure, even to the minutest vessel or fibre, of the plant or animal. Sometimes the process of petrification has been carried no farther than the infiltration of the stony matter into the pores of the organized body. In other cases, again, the animal or vegetable substance has been wholly preserved, and the plant or animal has undergone no other change than the removal of such parts as are the most liable to dissolution and decay. The process of petrification is usually the most perfect among the older strata, while among the more recent, and generally throughout all the tertiary group, the contained relics have sustained little alteration. This principle, however, is so far from holding universally, that among the old red sandstone and other secondary strata, remains are found where no substitution has taken place; where, for example, fish scales occur in the greatest abundance, possessing still their pearly lustre, and the other qualities by which they are characterised. Thus wonderful are the processes of nature, minute and diversified beyond the ingenuity of man to trace them, either in the living or dead substance! And lo! these are but parts of His ways by whom "dead things are formed from under the waters, and all the inhabitants thereof."

Another remarkable peculiarity connected with these vegetable and animal remains, so perfectly and curiously preserved, is the manner and order of their distribution. They are not found indiscriminately huddled together in all rocks, whatever be their position and relation to one another. On the contrary, particular classes are confined to particular groups of the rocky strata; and so completely is this the case, that, in no two of the great divisions according to which the mineral masses of the earth are arranged, do we find the same species occurring, of either plants or animals. Every group possesses its own peculiar organic remains nearly as distinct and entire, as any two countries, situated in the remotest extremes of latitude or climate from each other, are at present distinguished by their vegetable and animal productions.

1. The primitive rocks, consisting of gneiss, schist, mica slate, &c., are destitute of fossil remains, because, as the term is meant to intimate, they are supposed to have been deposited before the existence of either vegetable or animal life; there are no portions of other rocks imbedded in them, nor any traces of a derivative origin: granite, and the several varieties of trap or whinstone, are of volcanic origin; and hence such organised forms, if they ever were included in the materials of which they are composed, must have been wholly obliterated by the action of the heat to which they were subjected.

2. The group which succeeds begins, for the first time, to exhibit organic remains, sparingly in the lower members, which consist of clay-slate, and grey sandstone, but gradually increasing through the ascending series, till in the mountain limestone they are found in the greatest abundance, which consist chiefly of shells and corals. The old red sandstone contains one remarkable species of fossil; the scales, and lately an entire impression, has been found of an amphibious reptile, which has not been described by any of the learned; also the outline, covered with scales, of some unknown fishes; these occur principally in the beds which occupy the lower basin of the Tay and the valley of Stratheden. Impressions of aquatic plants are likewise found in some of the members of this group. In the mountain limestone the testaceous and zoophyte orders occur in the greatest abundance; also orthoceratites, which belong to the cephalopod tribe, deemed the lowest in the animal scale, from the simplicity of their structure, are found in great profusion along with fragments of entrochi and encrinites.

3. Above all these lies the coal formation, consisting of alternate strata of coal, sandstone, shale, and ironstone, repeated in many instances a hundred times, and every one of which is replete with organic remains. The vegetable relics are allied to the fern and palm tribes, which occur in the greatest profusion in the shale deposit, in the finest state of preservation, and of gigantic dimensions. The sandstone contains the roots, trunks, and branches of trees; a specimen was obtained some years ago at Gosforth, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which measured seventy-two feet in length, four feet in diameter at its lower extremity, and tapering gradually to about eighteen inches at the top; another instance lately occurred in the sandstone quarry of Craigleith, near Edinburgh, where a trunk was obtained forty-seven feet long, and five feet at its greatest diameter; this tree lay in an inclined position, with upwards of a hundred feet of solid rock above it, and exhibiting all its original roundness and most perfect woody structure. In some of the sandstone quarries throughout Fife, specimens of fossil trees, and in a perfect state of preservation, are frequently met with. The coal itself is composed entirely of the remains of vegetables, but, in consequence of the great change which they have designedly undergone for the most beneficent purposes, few traces of the vegetable structure can be detected, while yet the combustible qualities are all preserved.

4. Nature would here seem to have exhausted, for a time, her productive powers, for in the series of beds which succeeds the era of the coal formation, and which are estimated at the immense thickness of two thousand one hundred feet, few organic remains of any kind occur. The salt mines, not only of Cheshire, but of Poland, Spain, and Italy, are all situated in this group, and the scarcity of animals and vegetables is generally attributed, among the learned, to the prevalence during this period of magnesia and salt in excess. In the Sacred Scriptures, salt is repeatedly mentioned as an emblem of barrenness. The oolite group—which follows next in the order of superposition, and which derives its name from two Greek words signifying egg and stone, because it contains a limestone composed of small round grains like the eggs in the roe of a fish—is again remarkable, not only for an excessive abundance of both vegetable and animal relics, but for the gigantic size and singular characters of the animals which prevailed during that period. These consist of a tribe of monsters more allied to what we read of in fable, than any thing which occurs in natural history, and realize to the imagination the fabulous accounts of gorgons and flying dragons. One of them, the ichthyosaurus, a word compounded of two Greek terms signifying fish and reptile, was discovered in the Lias limestone of Dorsetshire, having the snout of a dolphin, the teeth of a crocodile, the head and breast of a lizard, and the other parts similar to those of a fish: the jaws measured eight feet in length, containing each sixty sharp conical teeth; and so enormous had the eyes been, that the oval hollows in the skull which had claimed their possession, measured fourteen and a-half inches in diameter! Upon a scale of corresponding dimensions were the vegetable tribes which then flourished. Stems of palms and other plants are found in the Stonesfield slate, measuring forty feet in height, thus at once affording shelter and food commensurate to the habits and the wants of the remarkable animals which haunted the bays and waters of the primitive lands.

5. The chalk, in like manner, is distinguished by its own peculiar remains. And in the tertiary group above the chalk, we are introduced, for the first time, to the remains of quadrupeds and birds; no bone of either has been found in any one of the preceding deposits; here also plants occur entirely different from those which prevailed beneath, and which, as well as the animal remains, approach more to the character and dimensions of the existing races. It is in this class of rocks, that the huge skeletons of the mastodon and megatherium occur, the latter of which has been described as a huge sloth, having a skeleton thirteen feet long and nine feet high. The capital of France is built upon a deposit of this kind, which Cuvier shewed to be a vast sepulchre of once animated creatures; and in our own country, the site on which London stands yields, in the greatest abundance, the remains of the crocodile, tortoise, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, hyenas, tigers, &c., inhabitants now, all of them, of tropical climates. Some of these remains are found in the rocky strata, others in collections of loose gravelly soil, called diluvium, and many of them in the fissures and caves of rocks, of which there are some remarkable examples in Yorkshire.

But the strata of the earth are not more remarkable for what they contain than for what they do not. In this enumeration of organic remains, there is no mention made of any human bones, and the reason is, that none have been found. Amidst all the preceding deposits, where plants and animals of every kind occur, of all sizes, and in countless millions, nothing belonging to man—no portion of his body and no relic or implement of his art—have ever been met with. A human skeleton, indeed, and some fragments of the body have been found incased in agglutinated gravelly matter, and in the deposits formed by petrifying springs; but there is demonstrative evidence, in all these cases, that the formations are of modern origin, and have succeeded even the most recent tertiary strata. Are human bones more liable to decay than those of other animals? No chemist or anatomist has ventured to assert this; and the irresistible conclusion, therefore, is, that the creation of man was subsequent to that of the plants and animals whose remains we have been contemplating. How remarkable the coincidence with the Scripture account, where after the creation, first of plants, next of the inhabitants of the deep, then of birds and quadrupeds of the earth, man, in the image of his Maker, was, last of all, brought upon the scene! We are thus led to infer, both from the arrangement of the strata, and the successive creations of living substances over the whole surface of the earth, that the globe was gradually adapted by a predetermined order of things to the nature and habits of that more perfect creature, to whom was to be given "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth." Man has subdued the earth unto himself, he has obtained "dominion" over every portion of it, and, like the mineral strata beneath his feet, he is independent of climate or of country; but still there is no trace of himself or of any of his productions in any spot of the interior; and hence, it may be affirmed, that the very stones of his earthly habitation proclaim the truth of God's Word respecting the creation of the world. On the other hand, may it not be as truly affirmed of them, as of the planets which move so harmoniously above,—

"The hand that made us is divine."

Having thus considered the state of preservation in which organic remains are found, the changes which they have undergone as petrifications, and the manner of their distribution among the rocky masses of the earth, let us attend to a few of the many interesting conclusions which they serve to establish respecting the history of the planet which we inhabit. This will form the subject of the next paper.

THE BELIEVER'S WEDDING-GARMENT: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN PATERSON, D.D.,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Bishopwearmouth.

"And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding-garment: and he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding-garment? And he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—MATT. xxii. 11-13.

THE outward or visible Church, as it now exists in the world, is necessarily made up of persons whose real characters are extremely different in the sight of God. There are many tares amongst the wheat. Amongst the multitudes who are called, who profess to accept the call, and actually take to themselves the highest external privileges of the Gospel, there are many who do not really yield up their hearts and lives unto God, and who are only spared till the day of reckoning come, when they shall be finally judged and cast away. Thus two distinct classes are found, as essentially different in their principles and spiritual condition as it is possible to conceive. In the one class there are those who are called, and chosen, and faithful; and in the other, there are the many who are yet in their sins, unbelieving and unsanctified, and consequently exposed to the wrath which is to come. But these two are so mixed up and blended together, that we cannot possibly trace the line of distinction that runs between them. If we presume to try it, we are baffled at the very outset. For, even amongst the truly sincere, there are great varieties of character, and great differences of attainment, from the man in whom the fruits of the Spirit are hardly as yet perceptible, up through all those that are faithfully striving against many evil habits and propensities, to the man who is peacefully resting, or triumphantly rejoicing, in the Lord. And again, amongst those of the other class, there are similar diversities to be found; and, not unfrequently, such eminent gifts and fair appearances, as serve to gain for them the highest esteem and admiration of their fellow-men. . So that the whole, when taken together, forms a large body, over whom we are glad to cherish the most pleasing hopes; whilst, at the same time, we cannot but rejoice with trembling, being exceedingly concerned for such as we have reason to fear are ripening only for destruction.

Nor is it difficult to account for this diversity of character and condition amongst those who profess to believe. Our commission is to preach the Gospel to every creature. In proclaiming the glad tidings of pardon, and peace, and eternal life, there is to be no respect of persons. To the rich and to the poor, to them that are amiable and virtuous in their habits, and to them that are openly profane and wicked, to persons of every character and of all descriptions, is the general invitation addressed. We despise not even the most profligate, not even the individual who is wallowing in the lowest sink of depravity, and has nothing but filthy rags to exhibit, and sins the most numerous and disgusting to confess. Whomsoever we meet with on the highway, we are to bid to the wedding; and we are to set before them every inducement, plying them with every motive or argument within our reach, that, by the urgency of our pleading, we may compel them to come in, and may gather together all, as many as we can find, whether good or bad. Such is the extent of our commission—such is the freeness of the invitation, the imperative nature of the summons which we bring. No wonder, therefore, that a mixed multitude should be found to congregate together—no wonder that many should be affected, and persuaded, and drawn together into the banqueting-house, who are not really “renewed in the spirit of their minds,” and not really converted from the love and the hidden practice of sin. And, whilst a feeling of charity, a feeling by which we are strongly disposed to think no evil, and always to entertain the most favourable views of individual character, prompts us to hope well of all who seem to be in earnest, and to grant even the highest privileges to those who make a fair and credible profession, no wonder that some who are most unworthy should escape our notice, and be found mingling with the faithful.

But although it be not in us to distinguish between the one class and the other, yet the great Jehovah, whose eyes are in every place beholding the evil and the good, most clearly marks the difference, and cannot be deceived. He knows the real state and condition of every soul; he looks intently upon the heart; he tries the reins; and the very principles and motives, desires and affections, which determine the prevailing quality and the spiritual state, yea, the very spirit of the man, is fully and constantly in his view. Nor is it possible for Him, amid the vast multitudes who are so freely invited and so kindly dealt with, to overlook, or to excuse, even a single individual, whatever his outward circumstances may be, whose heart is not rightly affected, who is not sincerely honest in his devotion, and does not, from a principle of gratitude and love, and in humble submission to divine authority, yield a sincere and unreserved obedience. On every such person he will assuredly fix his eye; and, detecting the pride of his heart, and the hollowness of his profession, he will deal with him as with an intrusive enemy. He will, perhaps, in the course of providence, throw him out of the Church: he will, at all events, mark down the abuse of privileges to his account; and, if no radical change of state and of character be accomplished upon him before the event of death, so far from receiving him into the abodes of bliss, he will order him to be bound hand and foot, and cast out, for ever, from his presence, into that outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

This, you perceive, is plainly suggested by the text. We have here the rich privileges and enjoyments, provided for believers in Christ, set forth under the semblance of a marriage feast. Persons of all ranks and characters were kindly invited; and, of course, required to put on raiment suited to the occasion. But one individual, amongst those who accepted the call, was self-willed: he took his own way, and did not appear in the wedding-garment; expecting, no doubt, to pass amongst others, and to enjoy the feast as he was. But the Master had no sooner come in than he singled him out, and challenged him openly for his offence. The man was abashed and speechless: his joyful prospects were instantly overcast, and his conscience smote him with remorse; for, alas! repentance was too late; and the sovereign Prince, whose kindness and liberality he had abused, sternly ordered him to be seized and thrust away into outer darkness, under circumstances of unspeakable woe.

Now, if the wedding feast, as it doubtless is, be meant to represent to us the joys of salvation, in connection with the peculiar and spiritual blessings of the Gospel—those blessings which it holds out to the true Christian, and which none but he is fitted to enjoy, or to improve aright, the garment suited to the occasion must, beyond all dispute, be the meetness or qualification, which is required on the part of those that would worthily and profitably partake of them. Are we then possessed of this qualification,—this indispensable meetness for the enjoyment of God’s special favour? The question is one of extreme importance; and to help us in solving it aright, I shall now endeavour to explain what is meant by the wedding-garment; or, in other words, to describe the state and character of those who, as welcome guests, do really enjoy the blessings to which we are called by the Gospel.

Wherefore, bear in mind that the thing I attempt to shew is, not merely the way of a sinner’s justification before God, or the ground of his acceptance into favour, but the meetness necessary for the positive personal enjoyment of the blea-sings freely provided and offered to our use. This being clearly understood, I remark, in general, that faith in Christ, having respect to the truth as it is in Him, and serving to furnish the mind with right and holy principles, together with an increasing disposition to think, to feel, and to act, in the habitual course and conduct of life, according to the divine principles imbibed, does plainly constitute the state which is acceptable, and which, under the continued influence of the Holy Spirit, will ripen into a perfect meetness for heaven; and this obviously implies, both the righteousness of Christ imputed and received, and also the principles of righteousness implanted and cherished in ourselves.

I. Observe, then, in the first place, that the wedding-garment implies the righteousness of Christ—that righteousness which is imputed to his people, and received by faith alone. The Gospel method of salvation does not require that we should actually have attained to holiness when we come to Christ, and to the means of grace he has appointed. Such a requirement, it is obvious, would amount to an utter and eternal prohibition; since we cannot be holy or sanctified, in any degree, till we are already in him, and made partakers of his Spirit. We are, therefore, on the contrary, invited to come, all poor, and worthless, and blind, and naked, as we are; and, being deeply conscious of our state, we are thankfully to accept the pardon, and the terms of reconciliation and favour, which the Lord himself hath procured, and which are freely granted to us for his sake. In plain terms, having come to the Saviour, and to the assembly of his saints, with a true sense and a sincere and sorrowful acknowledgment of our personal guilt, we are to believe, on the simple testimony of his Word, that our persons and services, which we now devote in obedience to his will, shall find acceptance, solely on account of what he hath done and suffered in our stead. And these feelings, and this belief, ministering to sincere humility, on the one hand, and to the sweetest encouragement, on the other, at once, to the mortifying of the corrupt principle, and to the invigorating of those desires, and affections, and holy resolutions, which tend to the perfecting of holiness, must remain, as a garment on the soul, in all the exercises we perform, and amidst all the privileges we enjoy. Whatever we do, and whatever be the attainments we reach, we must still look for acceptance, not on account of our own worth, but on account of the righteousness of Christ, for whose sake it is that our sins and shortcomings are forgiven. This is the state of mind which is well pleasing unto God; and it is the only state in which we can either experience the manifestations of divine love, or realize that growth in grace, which all the privileges of the Gospel are designed to promote.

Nor could we easily find a better illustration of this doctrine, than the case mentioned in the text. The intruder at the marriage-feast was not rejected merely because he was poor, or because he had no suitable raiment of his own to put on. Had these been the only charges against him he would not have been so self-condemned and "speechless;" he would have pled that, being poor, he could not help his appearance; or that, being pressed in from the "streets and lanes of the city," he had neither time nor opportunity to change his apparel. But no such pleas were thought of, because no such charges were made. The charge against him was distinctly this, that he was "without the wedding-garment,"—that garment which the Master of the feast had himself provided, and had in readiness for all his guests; which, moreover, had been freely and expressly offered to his acceptance, and which he had either proudly refused, or carelessly neglected to wear. For, in order to understand the force of the accusation, you must bear in mind that, in ancient times, it was customary on such occasions for the host, or entertainer, to furnish a suitable garment for every individual invited. Thus, when Joseph entertained his brethren at the court of Pharaoh, "to all of them he gave each man changes of raiment, and to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver and five changes of raiment." Also at Samson's marriage-feast, we are told that "he promised thirty changes of raiment," to those who should, within the given time, explain the riddle he had put forth. It was, indeed, a custom that almost universally obtained; and it shews us clearly what the crime was of the individual in question. He was not rebuked and punished for at once accepting the invitation, or for instantly coming as he was; however unclean, and ragged, and utterly unfit for the place to which he was called. It was right and proper thus to come. But, as there were at the very entrance, both water to wash and raiment to put on, most justly was he punished for the state in which he was found, having either neglected or despised their use. Nor did it mend the matter though he thought himself clean, and preferred his own clothing to the proper and distinguishing garb of the Master whose guest he became. In any view his conduct was insulting and insufferable; betraying either a proud and self-sufficient mind, or a careless and slovenly disposition, wholly unfitting him for the society into which he had come, and shewing him altogether unworthy of the place he had presumed to occupy.

And thus precisely it is with regard to Christ, and those who stand in need of the blessings he hath procured for our enjoyment. Being reached by the Gospel message, they are invited, without the least distinction of rank or of character; they are all invited and all commanded to come to him as they are, and for all that will come, there is provided, on his part, an all-sufficient righteousness, which it is both their duty and their privilege to accept, and, as it were, to put on, it being in virtue of this, and of this only, that any one can be justified or accounted worthy in the sight of God. The man, therefore, in whom the Lord delights,—whom he will kindly admit to the joys of communion with himself, and nourish with the fatness of his house, is the man who not only hearkens to his Word, and treasures up its principles within him, to the gradual dispossessing of all others, but who also habitually appears before him under a deep sense of his own unworthiness, feeling and confessing that he has done nothing and can do nothing to deserve the smallest favour at his hands; whilst, at the same time, he rejoices, through faith, in the efficacy of the great atonement, and in the most perfect obedience that has been yielded in his stead. He is one who indulges not a thought of his being so kindly dealt with from a regard to any thing in himself, and who goes to the performance of every duty, and to the enjoyment of every blessing with an abiding conviction that he is accepted only in the Beloved, and yet with a confident hope in the divine mercy. Hence the reason why we are exhorted to “put on the Lord Jesus Christ,” even as we would a garment or covering for the body. And hence the reason why St Paul, with all his high and excellent attainments, was so anxious to be “found in Him, not having his own righteousness, but the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all, and upon all them that believe.”

II. But observe, further, in the second place, that the wedding-garment implies also those righteous principles and dispositions, leading to holiness, in all manner of life and conversation, which the true believer has, in consequence of his relation to Christ and through obedience to his Word. These, in addition to what I have mentioned, are indispensable, not indeed as a title or recommendation to favour, but as a qualification for the enjoyment of the favour and privileges to which we are freely admitted; and they are what will never be found wanting in the character of one who is living wholly by faith in the Son of God. These, in truth, are not only the requisite tests of our sincerity, sustaining hope and yielding encouragement to persevere, but are, in the strictest sense, indispensable, both to the right use of Gospel privileges, and to the very end for which these privileges are given. Our faith, whatever it may seem to be, is not genuine, and has done nothing either for our personal sanctification, or for maintaining the glory and honour of the Redeemer's cause, unless through it we have come to experience that great spiritual change which implies a new life, and is evidenced by an increasing desire or disposition not only to think and feel, but also to live and act according to the principles and precepts of the divine will, so far as they are known, or can yet further be discovered. These fruits of a saving faith in Christ enter essentially and invariably into the character and the happy experience of all his accepted worshippers. Hence, in order to be qualified for their company, and for the enjoyments to be found at the marriage-supper of the Lamb, we must needs have undergone this great change, and be clothed “in fine linen, clean and white,” which, as the apostle says, is “the righteousness of saints.” We are, therefore, expressly commanded to “put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and to put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness.” The Lord will not have his ordinances polluted, nor his rich and abundant mercies abused. He will not tolerate the individual who comes with a fair profession; sits as his people sit; and talks of trusting in his mercy, of waiting for his salvation, and of having fellowship with him in the Spirit, and yet all the while wilfully allows his vain thoughts, his evil tempers, his unholy purposes, and his sinful ungodly habits to prevail, and thus not only derives no benefit himself, but causes the way of truth to be evil spoken of. On the contrary, he strictly requires that we “put away the old leaven of malice and wickedness, and keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth;” and, moreover, that we also “put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, and long-suffering.” “Above all things,” saith Peter, “put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness. Be clothed with humility; a meek and a quiet spirit is an ornament of great price.” And all this is enforced by the words of the Psalmist, “If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me.” Besides, we know that “the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination unto him,” and that all who believe must adorn the doctrines of God our Saviour in all things.

Such, then, is the wedding-garment with which every one that would enjoy the Saviour's presence is bound to be adorned. It is “a frame of heart, and a course of life agreeable to the Gospel.” And this distinctly shews what our duty is in reference to Christ. It is this: Having, with faith in himself as a divine Saviour, hearkened to his Word, proclaiming pardon, peace, and eternal life,—having felt and acknowledged his goodness to us sinners, resolved to embrace this great salvation, and to rest all our hopes and expectations on Him alone,—and testifying to the world, by our profession, that such is indeed the choice we have made, we must constantly cherish the new convictions, desires, and purposes, that have arisen within us,—we must be careful to depart from all iniquity, and must endeavour to grow in a thorough conformity to his image, and to walk with him from henceforth in newness of life. This we must do. For the very existence of a self-righteous spirit, and all indulgence of evil tempers, of unholy passions, or of selfish and wicked pursuits, are wholly inconsistent with the righteousness of Christ, must unquestionably grieve his Holy Spirit, and destroy every reasonable hope of communion and fellowship with him, and cannot but be viewed as a grievous insult to his name, and to the efficacy of the means he has appointed. It is, therefore, most clearly our duty, according to the will of God, and whether we regard the hopes of our own salvation, or the honour and extension of the Church on earth, it is matter of strict and obvious necessity that we put on Christ, and walk habitually in the robes of purity and virtue, keeping our garments unspotted from the world.

On the whole, therefore, it is plain that, in order to be welcome and accepted guests at that glorious—that spiritual feast, to which we are called by the Gospel, we must put on the righteousness of Christ, for this is absolutely necessary to our justification before God; further, that, in order to mortify the pride or selfishness, which is the very root of all our corruption, we must constantly feel and acknowledge that, in the midst of all our attainments, it is Christ alone who procures for us the favour and acceptance we enjoy; and, moreover, that we must also cultivate the fruits of “this grace wherein we stand;” giving full scope to all the righteous desires, affections, and purposes of a renewed mind, and maintaining a strict and conscientious obedience to the divine will. In short, faith and righteousness, humility and virtue, existing together, and in their proper relation, constitute the indispensable qualification required, even that meetness in the sight of God which we must needs have for the right reception and improvement of his gracious benefits here, and for the full enjoyment of his presence hereafter.

And let no individual amongst all those who profess to believe, think to find an excuse for the want of these attainments. It is entirely his own fault if he be not stripped of his rags, renewed in the spirit of his mind, and adorned with the virtues and graces of the Christian character. If he is destitute of “righteousness and strength,” it is because he will not have them, because he is without faith, and not submissive to his God, being, in truth, insincere in his profession. And although, in the meantime, he may venture to plead his own inability as an excuse, and so contrive to maintain some degree of composure, in the midst of much wilful depravity, yet the Saviour at length, when he comes to inspect his guests, will at once detect the fallacy of his plea, will open the book which shews that nothing whatever was required of him in his own strength, and will make the all-sufficiency of his grace—that grace which is revealed in the Gospel—so irresistibly evident, that the conscious criminal, like the intruder mentioned in the text, shall be overwhelmed and “speechless.”

Let us, therefore, apply the subject carefully to our own case. As Christians, we profess to have accepted the invitation of our Lord, to have thrown the burden of our salvation upon him, as our prophet, priest, and king, and, in the special ordinances of the Gospel, to have communion and fellowship with him here, in the humble, hopeful anticipation of a richer and purer enjoyment hereafter. But is there that sincerity in our profession, and is it adorned by those substantial fruits of righteousness which are so essentially requisite? Have we indeed put on Christ? Do we feel that we are really stripped of all self-dependence and self-righteousness in the sight of God?

Are we living wholly by faith on the Lord Jesus, and trusting entirely, as the foundation of all our hopes, to what he hath done and suffered in our stead? And, in consequence of this, shewing that we are indeed sincere in the faith, are we renewed in the spirit of our minds, growing in conformity to the divine image, and ever careful to maintain good works? Is this our real and unaffected character? After strict and impartial examination, held under the light of revealed truth, have we reason to believe that it is so? Each one must be the judge in his own case. They who urge the inquiry, and explain the principles and the test to be employed, cannot look into the hearts of others, are therefore easily deceived, and may not presume to decide. But the great King, whose eye is ever upon all his guests, can never be deceived. Specious as the garb may be which any man hath prepared for himself, and however close the imitation, the Lord will easily distinguish it from that which is his own; and he will not suffer either the deep designing hypocrite, the stiff or careless formalist, or the self-righteous pharisee, to escape. How much, then, does it become us to guard against all deception in a matter so momentous as this! Wherefore, let every one examine himself most carefully, and see how it stands with himself; and let us earnestly pray that the Lord would send forth his light and his truth to direct us in this important exercise; and not only so, but that he would also dispose us, by his Holy Spirit, to submit to the righteousness of Christ, to embrace the pure principles of his Word, and be in all things conformed to his example; knowing, as we do, that although he may still be willing to grant us the wedding-garment, yet, if we persist in our thoughtlessness and folly, the time will assuredly come when he will break forth in just indignation against us, bind us hand and foot, and cast us out for ever from his presence.

But still, whatever their present discoveries may be, let none despair of mercy at the hands of a reconciled God. Their past sins, however aggravated, are no insuperable barrier in the way. The blood of Christ cleanses from all sin; and all that pertains to life and godliness is fully purchased and freely offered in the Gospel. From the poorest and vilest sinner, who believes and repents, the highest blessing shall not be withheld. Let them only consent to forsake their evil thoughts and their unrighteous ways, to strip off their errors, their pride, and their self-sufficiency, and put on Christ as all their salvation and all their desire; let them only consent to put away all ungodliness and sin, and, in the strength of divine grace, to persist in the practice of virtue according to the requirements of the Gospel, and, on the part of God, they shall find the smiles of a joyful welcome,—a free admission to all the privileges of communion and fellowship now, and, at length, an entrance ministered abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

To which glorious inheritance may God, of his infinite mercy, be pleased to bring us all, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SKETCHES OF THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUTRHEAD, D. D.,
Minister of Cramond.

No. VI.

PSALM lxxviii. 54-72.

III. The third period of the history of Israel includes the time from their establishment in the promised land until their being led captive to Babylon. In the portion of Scripture above referred to, there is contained a specimen of some of the remarkable occurrences of this long period. There was at times a revival of the Lord's work among them. But the general character of this period was that of forgetfulness of God, abuse of his mercies, and a proneness to turn aside into heathen idolatry. When the Lord visited them with chastisement for their transgressions, they repented, and cried unto the Lord for deliverance. And the Lord heard them, and graciously interposed; but soon they forgot his mercies, and, by their backslidings and provocations, again brought down upon themselves the judgments of God. Thus it is recorded of them in Psalm cvi.: "Many times did he deliver them; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity. Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry: and he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies. He made them also to be pitied of all those who carried them captive.

During this period, however, as during the two preceding periods, the great ends, for which the nation of Israel was taken out from among the nations, were answered. The knowledge of the one true and living God, and the worship due to him, were preserved in Israel, when all the other nations had corrupted their ways, and had turned aside from the worship of the true God to the service of vain idols. The land of Israel was the only lucid spot, when darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people. And doubtless not a few of the other nations, from residing among them, or having occasional intercourse with them, derived advantage from the light of divine truth that shone in Israel. They were thus brought to know, that God was the Lord, and that among all the gods of the nations, there were none like to the mighty God of Jacob. And in the arrangements of God's providence towards the people of Israel, there was represented a type of the dispensations of God's providence towards the spiritual Israel, his elect Church gathered out of all nations. Among them, too, during this period, were deposited, and carefully preserved, the lively oracles of God. And by means of the prophecies and types contained in them, there were held forth to them continually intimations of the coming of the Saviour; and thus preparation was made for his appearance upon earth in the fulness of time.

But it may be useful to notice more particularly some of the remarkable dispensations belonging to this long period, that we may know what instruction we may learn from this portion of their history; for it has been recorded for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

The time immediately after their establishment in the promised land, and during all the time of Joshua, and during the time of the elders who survived Joshua, and who had seen all the wonderful works of the Lord, in bringing them into the land, and subduing all their enemies, and enriching them with their spoils, appears to have been a time of great favour to the Israelites, wherein they were more stedfast to God's covenant, more careful to abstain from idolatry, and manifesting greater thankfulness to God for his mercies than was generally the case in other periods of their history. And this was according to what the Lord had foretold respecting that generation. For when the people of Israel, discouraged by what the spies who were sent to search the land, had reported, that there were giants in the land, and cities strongly fortified, and walled up to heaven, refused to go into the land, and preferred returning into Egypt, and murmured against God, for bringing them into the wilderness, where their children would become a prey; God declared to them, in anger, that they should not enter into the good land which they despised; but that their children, who, they said, would become a prey, should enter therein. They were accordingly taken under God's special care; they survived all the toils, fatigues, and dangers of the wilderness; and, under the conduct of Joshua, the captain of the Lord's hosts, they obtained possession of the promised land. And, from what is recorded of them in the book of Joshua, they appear to have been very attentive to his instructions, and to have exercised a firm reliance on the promises of God's Word, and to have faithfully kept his statutes and commandments. As a testimony of God's favour to them, we are told, that the Lord gave to Israel all the land that he swore to give unto their fathers, and they possessed it, and dwelt there. And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that he swore to their fathers; and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them. The Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand. There failed not any good thing, which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel: all came to pass.

Their zeal for the glory of God, and for the preserving of the purity of his worship, was manifested in a striking manner, by an occurrence that took place, after the armed men of the two tribes and a-half, who had assisted their brethren in subduing their enemies, had left them to return to their own possessions, on the other side of Jordan. The ten tribes of Israel having learned that their brethren of the two tribes and a-half had built an altar over against Jordan, on the border of their possessions, were afraid that it was erected for idolatrous worship, and resolved at once, with one accord, to take up arms, to avenge so daring an act of rebellion against the Lord. But, before coming to an open rupture with their brethren, they sent an honourable deputation, consisting of the son of the high priest and ten princes of their tribes, to remonstrate with them concerning the atrocious nature of the sin of idolatry, and to warn them of the wrath that would come upon them from the Lord, in consequence of their being chargeable with so aggravated a transgression. It turned out, however, that they were mistaken as to the purpose for which the altar in question had been erected. Their brethren had not intended to forsake the worship of the God of their fathers: but the building was erected for an opposite purpose, to be a witness to the generations to come, that though separated from their brethren by the Jordan, they had still part with them in the worship of the same one living and true God. Thus the matter was amicably adjusted, and both parties united in giving thanks to God, that they had been prevented from rashly engaging in a quarrel, without previously inquiring into all the circumstances of the case. The whole history of this affair bears a decided testimony to this, that the whole congregation of Israel were, at that time, distinguished by a commendable zeal for the purity of the worship of God, and by a dread of offending him, by taking part in the idolatrous worship of the other nations.

The same thing is made manifest, from that solemn and affecting interview which Joshua had with the people of Israel shortly before his death. After putting them in mind of all that the Lord had done for them, and exhorting them to fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and truth, and to put away the gods which their fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt, and to serve the Lord, he makes this forcible appeal to them, "If it seem evil to you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods that your fathers served, that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." In answer to this appeal, the people declared, with one accord, "God forbid that we should forsake the Lord, to serve other gods. For the Lord our God, he it is that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and who did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed: and the Lord drove out from before us all the people, even the Amorites that dwelt in the land; therefore will we also serve the Lord, for he is our God." This they repeatedly declared to Joshua. And Joshua made a covenant with them that day, and set up a large stone, and said, "Behold, this stone shall be a witness to us; for it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us; it shall be a witness to you, lest ye deny the Lord." And that the people of Israel, in general, acted sincerely on this solemn occasion, is testified by the historian, when it is recorded, "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and who had known all the works of the Lord that he had done for Israel." It is to this generation, too, that there is reference made in Jeremiah, when it is said, "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown. Israel was holiness to the Lord, the first-fruits of his increase." Such a description does not apply to those who were grown up, when they came out of Egypt; for they were generally a stiff-necked generation, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness. It must refer to the young generation among them, who, under Joshua, came into the possession of the promised land.

The consideration of this first portion of the third period of the history of Israel, including the days of Joshua, and of the elders who survived him, may suggest to us the following instructions:—

1. We are called to contemplate the faithfulness of God in fulfilling his promises to his people. God promised to Joshua and the people of Israel that he would give them possession of the land of Canaan, and that he would subdue all their enemies, and that he would enrich them with their spoils. They believed the promises of God; they went forth relying on God's faithfulness to fulfil them. And they found that, according to their faith, so it was to them; and that not one thing of all that God promised failed of being accomplished. What an encouragement is thus held forth to us to place unshaken confidence in God's unchangeable faithfulness! Did we only believe what God hath promised us in Christ, we should, in like manner, experience the Lord's faithfulness, and that in Christ all his promises are yea and amen for ever. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is staid upon thee, because he trusteth in thee. Trust ye in the Lord for ever; for with the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength."

2. In this rest from the assaults of all their enemies, which the people of Israel enjoyed for a short time, under Joshua, there was a type of another rest which the same people of Israel shall enjoy in the same land, when they shall obtain a complete and final victory over all their enemies, under the great Captain of the Lord's hosts, the Captain of salvation, of whom Joshua was a type. Then they shall rest for ever from the assaults of all their enemies. Then, as was foretold, all their enemies shall be found liars to them; and they shall tread upon their high places. Then eminently shall Israel be holiness to the Lord; for they shall be all righteous. Holiness to the Lord shall be inscribed on their foreheads. And the name of the city from that time forward shall be, The Lord is there.

3. This time of rest to Israel in the land of Canaan may lead our thoughts forward to the everlasting rest of all the true Israel of God in the kingdom of their Father. There they shall rest for ever from all sin, from all temptation, from all assaults of enemies, from all pain, and from all sorrow. They shall obtain joy and gladness, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. There God shall for ever rest in his love to them. There they shall rest for ever in the full enjoyment of his everlasting and unchangeable love.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHOOL AT CALCUTTA; SIXTH ANNUAL EXAMINATION.*

THE examination, which had as usual excited a great deal of interest, attracted a larger and more respectable concourse of visitors than I remember to have observed on any former occasion. It was conducted by Messrs Mackay and Ewart, and by the Reverend Mr Charles, senior chaplain of St. Andrew's Church, who, as moderator of the presbytery of Calcutta, presided on the occasion.

The range of studies in which the pupils were declared capable of being examined, was more than usual varied and extensive; and it is enough to say, that the manner in which they acquitted themselves, throughout the prolonged and sifting process of examination to which they were subjected, was worthy of the brilliant appearances made by them in former years; and fully justified the many high encomiums which have been pronounced on the Assembly's school, and the system of tuition pursued in it. It is due to all parties to say, that there was not the slightest appearance of previous concert or preparation; every thing was conducted with the greatest fairness and impartiality; and the increase of reputation achieved has been fairly won.

The examination of the elementary classes, which was soon got through, commenced a little after nine o'clock; and after them two classes of the seminary at Takee, which is carried on under the superintendance of the Assembly's Missionaries, though supported chiefly by the Roy Chowdry Baboos, were called in succession.

The third class of the Assembly's school was next brought forward, and with this the most interesting part of the examination commenced. This is the first class of such high standing, that has been trained wholly in the school, and never has attended any other; and certainly it is only justice to say, that the progress already made by the lads who compose it, places in the clearest light the excellence of the system under which they have been taught; and that, if they advance at a proportionate rate during the remaining years of their course of study, they will in all likelihood rise to higher attainments than have yet been reached by any seminary in India. The taste, accuracy, and comparative freedom from peculiarity of accent, with which they read a portion of Marshman's Brief Survey, selected by Miss Eden, have, I am sure, been rarely equalled in this country; and the ease and correctness, with which they gave in good English the meaning of the words that occurred in it, excited the astonishment and called for the applause of all around me. I will just add, that the manner in which, in answer to Mr Ewart's questions, they traced the course of the great Gulph stream on the terrestrial globe, and accounted for the change of its direction at different places, was one of the most interesting exhibitions of the kind I ever experienced.

The first and second classes were next examined in succession; and though there was not any thing like time to do justice to their attainments in general knowledge and in the evidences and theory of Christianity, the readiness, accuracy, command of English expression, intelligence and reach of thought which they displayed on these subjects, were truly astonishing, and far exceeded what, only a few years ago, it would have been deemed Quixotic to predict as attainable. The manner, if I may descend to particulars, in which the lads in the highest class stood a very severe examination on the whole of Mylne's excellent treatise on astronomy, in which both Mr Mackay and Mr Charles took part, was acknowledged on all sides, to be a most masterly exhibition, and such as very few even of the well educated Europeans present could have approached.

In short, the whole scene was in the highest degree interesting; a splendid proof of success during the past, and full of promise for the future; and must have been as gratifying to the feelings, as it was creditable to the talents and exertions of the faithful and devoted persons who represent the General Assembly's Mission on this side of India.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Choice sayings.—While the chosen servants of God speak his words to the faint heart, the Lord putteth forth a power to enable them to do all that wherefore they are spoken.—While the soul is sore troubled, there is danger in delay. A bruised spirit is like a bone out of joint; the longer it be let alone, the farther it is set.—With one cross, God can work two cures: first, a correction for bypast corruption, and after, a direction for time to come.—Hath not God made death like a chariot to wearied man, to carry him to his everlasting rest?—If a lord shall give to one of his servants some cottage-house of clay, and some little piece of ground for colewort or cabbage, to live upon, saying, this will I give thee for thy lifetime. But, if afterwards, this lord should say, fetch me my good servant out of his clattie cottage, and bring him to my palace, that he may eat at mine own table for ever. Tell me, if by the change, that servant hath lost? Would that servant, think you, say, ay lord, I will not come to thy table, for thou hast promised me this cottage-house for my lifetime. What lord in the land was ever troubled with such an answer? Who, for all that he can beg on earth, desires to live out of heaven for one hour?—God is so bound up unto mercy, that while he scourgeth sinners for their faults, he is said to bring to pass his strange work and strange act.—There is both gall and guile in earthly mindedness.—Satan can forge temptations, like glass, of whatever colour he pleaseth, through which things seem to be of the colour of his temptations.—God was more offended at Cain for despairing of his mercy, than for killing his brother. Judas kindled more of God's wrath for the desperate hanging of himself, than for the betraying of his Lord that was hanged by his treason. He who offered his mouth to receive a kiss from that traitor, had never refused him mercy, if he had sought it with a repenting heart.—ZACHARY BOYD. (Last Battle of the Soul.)

Now is the Door of Mercy open.—How soon may the wrath of God, which is both threatened and justly merited, seize upon the unconverted! How suddenly may it destroy them beyond all possibility of remedy! God is angry with the wicked every day, and as they grow more wicked, God becomes more angry. If they turn not, God hath whet his sword, he hath bent his bow, and made it ready. To signify the patience of God, and his unwillingness to destroy, the slaughtering weapons are represented as lying by him unprepared. His sword is not whetted—his bow is unbent; but if sinners refuse to turn, the sword, yes, the sword and the bow too, may quickly be made ready; and God may come to that peremptory resolution:—(Is. i. 24.) "Ah! I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies." You see, then, that turning is in the highest degree necessary, for you must turn or die. If a city were on fire, and there were but one gate at which there might be an egress, to fly from the fury of the flames, oh! what stocking would there be to that gate. If sinners had but any sense and knowledge, they would turn to God by thousands and by millions, since conversion is the only door through which they may escape the vengeance of eternal fire. Those obstinate wretches that will not turn in time, God will make them burn in hell for evermore.—An Old Author.

The Soul.—Our inquiries about the nature of the soul, must be bound over at last to religion, for otherwise they still lie open to many errors. For since the substance of the soul was not deduced from the mass of heaven and earth, but immediately from God, how can the knowledge of the reasonable soul be derived from philosophy? It must be drawn from the same inspiration from whence its substance first flowed.—BACON.

Conversion.—O, reader, conversion is another kind of work than most are aware of: it is not a small matter to bring an earthly mind to heaven, and to shew man the amiable excellencies of God, till he be taken up with such love to him that never can be quenched; to break the heart for sin, and make him flee for refuge unto Christ, and thankfully embrace him as the life of his soul; to have the very drift and bent of the heart and life changed, so that a man renounces that which he took for his happiness, and places his felicity where he never did before, and lives not to the same end, and pursues not the same design in the world as formerly he did. In a word, he that is in Christ, is a new creature: old things are passed away, behold all things are become new. 2 Cor. v. 17. He has a new understanding, and new will and resolution, new sorrows, and desires, and love, and delight; new thoughts, new speeches, new company, if possible, and new conversation. Sin, that was before a jesting matter with him, is now so odious and terrible to him, that he flees from it as from death. The world, that was so lovely in his eyes, now appears but as vanity and vexation. God, that was before neglected, is now the only happiness of his soul: before he was forgotten, and every lust preferred to him; but he now occupies the heart, and all things must give place to him, and the heart is grieved when he hides his face. Christ, who was wont to be slightly thought of, is now his only hope and refuge, and he lives upon him as his daily bread; he cannot pray without him, nor rejoice without him; nor think, nor speak, nor live without him. Heaven itself, that before was looked upon but as a tolerable reserve which he hoped might serve his turn better than hell, when he could not stay any longer in the world, is now taken for his home, the place of his only hope and rest, where he shall see, and love, and praise that God who has his heart already.—BAXTER.

A Christian's duty.—The first duty of a Christian which must be inviolably kept, is to think of God, in full agreement with the revelation he hath given of himself; to meditate on this with diligence, humility, and prayer, not daring to indulge fallacious reasonings, lest forming an imaginary God, he worship the creature of his own brain.—YENN.

SACRED POETRY.

LINES.

BY JAMES GLASSFORD, Esq., ADVOCATE,
Author of "Lyrical Translations from the Italian Poets."

"If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God."—JOHN vii. 17.

How oft, while led in reason's maze,
 We find perplexing doubts increase,
 And, having tried a thousand ways,
 Discover none that leads to peace!

By intellectual force alone
 Hope not to give thy spirit rest;
 The Gospel by its fruit is known,—
 A simpler and a surer test.

To one polluted fount we owe
 Alike our ignorance and grief;
 Sin is the parent of our woe,
 And sin the strength of unbelief.

Say, wouldst thou purge thy mental sight,
 Trust not the powers of erring man;
 Seek rather to the Source of light,
 And venture on the Saviour's plan.

He that will do the will of God,
 And prove his law, and fear his name,
 On him the blessing is bestowed
 To know the doctrine whence it came.

Experience thus, like sunbeam clear,
 Assures him of the truth divine:
 The Word is plain, the proof is near;
 Dispose thy heart, and make it thine.

MISCELLANEOUS.

James Saunders.—The Rev. T. T. Biddulph, of St. James' Church, Bristol, mentioned from the pulpit, about 1818, that a boy, some years before, behaved so ill in the St. James' Sunday-school, that neither kindness nor severity appeared to have any effect upon him. At length the teachers were very reluctantly obliged to expel him. For several years they heard nothing of him, and had almost forgotten the circumstance. Lately, as a clergyman (who was then a teacher in the school) was sitting in his study, in a distant country village, a sailor knocked at the door. On being admitted, he said to the clergyman, "I suppose you have forgotten me, sir?" "Yes," said the Rev. Henry Poole, "I have, if I ever knew you." "Do you remember a wicked boy named James Saunders?" "Oh, yes!" said he, "I have cause to remember him; he gave me much trouble and anxiety. What do you know of him?" "I am the lad!" "You are grown so, and so much altered, I could not have believed it. Well, James, what account can you give of yourself?" "A very sorry one, sir: when I was expelled the school, I left the city, and wandered I scarcely knew or cared where. At length I found myself at the sea-side. Weary of living by lying and stealing, I got on ship-board; and after sailing in various parts of the world, I was shipwrecked in a hurricane in the Bay of Honduras. After swimming till my strength failed me, I gave myself up for lost. In the middle of a dark night I came to my senses, and found myself on a rock half covered with water. I looked around and called out for my shipmates, and found that two of them were circumstanced like myself, every moment expecting a watery grave. For the first time since I left the school, you, sir, darted into my mind. I thought of your kindness, of my base ingratitude, and of some of the sacred truths you took so much pains to fix in my memory; particularly that passage in Numbers xxiii. 9. 'From the top of the rocks I see him.' In my extremity I looked to the Saviour of whom I had heard so much, but whom I had so long slighted and despised. I knelt down, up to my waist in water, and cried mightily that God would be the rock of my heart and my portion for ever. I found your words true, 'That praying breath was never spent in vain.' On the day breaking, we discovered some pieces of wreck, on which we ultimately succeeded in reaching the shore. Then many precious truths you had taught me from the Bible came fresh into my memory; though I had almost forgotten during my career of iniquity, even that there was such a book. I thought, Sir, you would be glad to find that all your care and anxiety on my behalf was not lost: I therefore walked from my ship, to thank you in the best manner I can, for your former kindness to me." Knowing the cunning adroitness of the lad, Mr Poole was half inclined to discredit him. He inquired the name of his captain, to whom he wrote, and ascertained, that since this young man had sailed with him, his conduct had been so correct and exemplary, that whenever he knew James Saunders was on deck he made himself perfectly easy, knowing that the duties of the ship would be faithfully attended to. Many months afterwards, Mr Poole received a letter from the captain, saying that poor James Saunders, in a distant part of the world, was seized with a fever; that during its progress he sent for the sailors, read to them while he was able out of the Bible, exhorted them to cleave to the Rock of Ages that never moves, to take example by him, though one of the vilest of sinners who had found mercy and grace to help in every time of need; and commended them all to Jesus, he fell asleep in Him without a struggle—a monument of saving grace and redeeming love.

Conscientiousness in Christian Chiefs at Tahiti.—Since the introduction of Christianity into the islands of Tahiti, many interesting proofs have been given by the natives of conscientious principles. Formerly, thieving was considered no crime; but such has been the effect of Christian instruction, that now the very reverse is exemplified. Mr Ellis mentions the following circumstance, which happened shortly before his arrival there:—Two Christian chiefs, Tati and Ahuriro, were walking together by the water-side, when they came to a place where a fisherman had been employed in making or sharpening hooks, and had left a large fish (a valuable article in Tahiti,) lying on the ground. The chiefs picked it up; and, as they were proceeding, one said to the other, "This is not ours. Is not our taking it a species of theft?" "Perhaps it is," replied the other; "yet, as the owner is not here, I do not know who has a greater right to it than ourselves." "It is not ours," said the former, "and we had better give it away." After further conversation, they agreed to give it to the first person they met, which they did, telling him they had found it, and requested that if he heard who had lost such a thing, he would restore it.

THE VALUE OF THE BIBLE, AND THE NECESSITY OF A FREQUENT AND SERIOUS
PERUSAL OF ITS CONTENTS.

BY THE REV. HENRY DUNCAN, D.D.,
Minister of Ruthwell.

THAT knowledge is good, will readily be granted by every liberal and enlightened Christian; but that a partial knowledge is frequently more distressing in its consequences than ignorance itself, fatal experience has rendered too manifest to be contradicted. Now, it is under this partial knowledge that the present age is deeply suffering. Men have burst through the darkness in which they were so long bound by superstition and priestcraft, and have impetuously and rashly rushed into a light too dazzling for their unprepared eyes. The revealed Word of God, which, under Popish domination, was abused as the instrument of their slavery, they have either cast altogether away from them, or regarded with indifference or distrust; and instead of opening with reverence and eager desire that holy book, on which an apostate Church, in its conscious corruption and worldly-minded jealousy, had set its impious seal, they have slighted the best gift which their Protestant profession has conferred on them, choosing rather to seek for instruction and learning from every other source, than from the fountain of all sacred truth. It is not a love of truth, but a love of this partial and unsanctified knowledge, which gives so fearful an aspect to the character of the age in which we live. A real believer cannot but regard the Bible as that one book with which it is his duty and his high privilege to begin and carry on, and end all his studies—which he must make his meditation by day and by night—from which he must derive all his most cherished principles—and by which he must mould all his information.

And what is the Bible that it should be thus studied, thus revered, and thus obeyed? It might suffice to answer in one word, that it contains the revealed will of God; for the truths, whatever they may be, which the Creator has broken the silence of nature to disclose, must be of paramount importance for his creatures to know, and to believe; and the duties which his own mouth has commanded, they are bound at all hazards to fulfil. But look at the nature of that revelation, and it will at once approve itself to your minds, as, in its own nature, worthy of God to give, and unspeakably valuable for man to receive. We live in a world of moral darkness, where weakness, and folly, and wickedness, infect and pollute the most exalted of the Creator's works, where sorrow and suffering prevail, and where disease and death are the common lot of all that breathe. How are these appalling facts to be reconciled to a belief of the infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness of the Eternal? Reason finds it impossible; but when we turn to the inspired Word the difficulty is solved. We are there referred to an awful and mysterious transaction, by which man, created upright, happy, and immortal, cast from him the image of God, and with his own guilty hands brought woe and death into a blessed world. Such is the scriptural account of the origin of evil. But Scripture does not stop here. From the same divine source we learn that the fall of man is only part of a stupendous scheme, by which temporary evil is converted into eternal good; that when man sinned he was not abandoned by his Creator; that, on the contrary, his very degradation is overruled by an unseen but Almighty hand, for purposes connected with his future dignity; that he is to rise more vigorous and noble from his fall, and through sin and sorrow, pain and death, is to be divinely led, till he work his arduous way to a higher and more happy station among living beings. This is the revealed promise to all who will accept of it; and the means are also revealed by which that astonishing promise is accomplished, by which "God is made just while he is the justifier of the ungodly." The sacred volume assures us that the Eternal Son of God came into the world to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself; that he lived, suffered, and died, to accomplish the salvation of the guilty, and to purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; that he rose again from the dead, the first-fruits of them that sleep; and that he now reigns in heaven, our elder brother, our intercessor, and our judge.

What a sublime and wonderful view is this of the character of God, of the office of the Saviour, and of the nature and destiny of man! If it be indeed true, and who but a professed infidel can deny it, of what infinite importance is it that it should be known! But were it not for the oracles of revealed truth, what would become of all this amazing history of divine grace? Deprive us of the Bible, and whether we contemplate our Creator or ourselves, all is darkness, and doubt, and dismay. Without the discoveries of the Gospel, we would dwindle into the insignificant and helpless creatures of a day; and all our high motives and aspirations would come to an end; and our most rational employment would be to crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered,—to eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die; and hope would be a shadow, and happiness a name, and life itself an empty pageant, for man would be without a Saviour, and the world without a God!

To prefer any kind of instruction, therefore, to the instruction contained in the Sacred Scripture, is an act of impiety; and should this be the spirit and tendency of the age in which we live, it is an impious age. It is one of the most fearful charges brought against the Romish hierarchy, that they withhold the Bible from their deluded votaries; and, on the other hand, it is the peculiar glory of Protestants to have snatched this inestimable treasure from the interested grasp of that apostate Church, and to have nobly vindicated their unalienable right to search the sacred record for themselves. But what avails it that our forefathers burst the double fetters imposed on their souls by superstition and priestcraft, and, sustained by faith, bore their undaunted testimony before princes and councils,—in the pulpit, in the closet, and at the criminal bar,—what avails it that they resisted, even to death, in the battlefield, on the rack, on the scaffold, and at the stake, and, through fire and blood, carried off the hallowed prize, that it might become a lamp to their own path, and might be transmitted as their best legacy to their children and their children's children—what, I say, avails this to us, if, after all, we neglect or carelessly peruse this book of books, so faithfully contended for, so bravely won, so piously cherished? Was it to adorn a shelf or a table that our fathers bestowed on us the volume of inspiration, translated into our own language, unshackled by human authority, and uncontaminated by human glosses and traditions? Was it to be spoken of and gloried in merely—to be an object of pride and a shibboleth of party—that this sacred deposit was placed in our hands? Who will venture to avow it in words, though so many practically reveal that no higher motive lurks at the bottom of their hearts?

If there be any worth in our Protestant profession, it is that it unseals the inspired record, and places it freely and liberally in our hands—a record of infinite value—but only valuable to us when we peruse it assiduously and devoutly, receiving its doctrines with faith and love, and laying its precepts up in our hearts, that we may practise them in our lives. When it lies in your chamber a silent and unheeded monitor, the unimproved talent becomes a curse to you instead of a blessing, and when, neglecting this fountain of all-important knowledge, you seek for the cultivation of your minds only from other sources, then a judicial blindness falls upon you, and the light that is in you is converted into darkness. Such, I grieve to think, is the prevailing iniquity of the present day; and most earnestly do I pray that you may be preserved at once from this awful defection, and from its inevitable consequences.

The truth of all this will be still more apparent, when it is remembered that if instruction in human knowledge be unaccompanied with the higher and more important teaching derived from revelation, a most unhappy effect is produced on the young and pliant mind. A child is naturally prone to take his views from the things and the persons around him. What daily presents itself to his eyes and ears is that which forms his character; and thus it is that, without direct religious instruction, all the information he acquires, ample though in other respects it may be, profits him nothing for eternity, but only binds him closer to the things of earth; he grows up a mere flutterer in the passing sunshine, or a sordid worldly drudge, whose thoughts and affections, whose schemes and prospects, are all connected with his present condition, who looks not beyond the grave, who practically knows nothing of a Saviour, and who, in the general tenor of his conduct, scarcely acknowledges the hand of an overruling Providence, or even the very existence of a God.

There cannot, surely, be a more delightful spectacle, than that of a young Christian eager to increase his knowledge, that, by the cultivation of his mind, he may better learn the purposes for which he was sent into this world, and more faithfully pursue them; nor does learning ever appear in so useful and exalted a light, as when it is employed in preparation for eternity. To the Christian scholar every new instruction he acquires, furnishes a new opportunity, of which he does not fail to avail himself, of perceiving and of acknowledging the perfections of the great Creator. When he reads the history of man, he there observes at once the most appalling proofs of the depravity of his species, and the most wonderful and cheering displays of an over-ruling Providence, so holy and righteous, yet so full of grace and long-suffering mercy; when he inquires into the appearances of nature, whether he looks at the structure of the world in which he lives, or examines the thousand forms of trees, and plants, and flowers, which deck its surface, or the not less various and amazing properties of the living creatures, for whose use the things without life were made,—it is the hand of God that he sees and adores in them all; when he extends his view beyond the narrow span of this lower world, and casts his bewildered glance on the immensity of the universe, compared with which the earth he treads upon is but an atom, and he himself as nothing,—whether he attempts to comprehend the simple but stupendous laws by which all things are sustained and regulated, or to trace the effects of these laws in actual operation among innumerable worlds,—wherever he turns, it is still the power, the wisdom, and the goodness of the Eternal, with which, in his gifted eye, all nature appears bright, and to which he pays the tribute of an amazed but overflowing heart. When, from the height of these speculations, he descends to the comparatively insignificant concerns of the contracted sphere in which he moves and converses, or regards the little world within himself, God is there also; and the same Almighty hand which “wheels the rolling spheres,” he sees equally employed in regulating the petty affairs of a kingdom, a parish, and a family,—the same Infinite Mind which surveys and governs innumerable worlds, his faith discovers equally in the lowly cottage, shedding peace on the heart of the awakened sinner,—smoothing the pillow of sickness,—nay, counting the beatings of an infant’s heart, and numbering the hairs of its head.

The enlargement of mind which education gives when thus directed to its proper object, is a source of the purest pleasure, and of the most exalted devotion. But amid all the advantages arising from a religious education founded on the Bible, where now is that regard for the inspired volume, which caused our forefathers to carry it in their bosoms, and defend it with their lives? Where is that sacred feeling which the sun witnessed every evening as he went down—when the whole land was vocal with the praises of the Most High—and when the solemn anthem of the palace was echoed back, in not less hallowed strains, from every lowly cottage? Where is that reverence for the Christian Sabbath, which spread a holy stillness over our houses, our streets, and our highways; which was felt wherever Christian influence extended; which not only caused the beasts of burden to partake in the hallowed rest, but rendered the very wild animals of the forest more tame and more secure? Is there not on every side an ominous listlessness and indifference with regard to divine things? Does not the labourer ply his spade, and the farmer his plough, and the tradesman his shuttle or his plane, without once suffering a thought of God to break in on the worldliness of his schemes, or to exalt the lowness of his labours? What proof is to be found that the higher walks of life are dignified with purer sentiments, or adorned with more Christian conduct? From the evening fireside, alike of the wealthy and the poor, the edification of pious conversation has long been banished. How few now are the family altars, round which parent and child, master and servant, assemble to mingle their hearts in gratitude for common blessings, or in humble supplication for the supply of common wants! How seldom is now heard a father’s voice tenderly instructing his beloved children in divine things; or a lisping tongue reverently whispering the Saviour’s name, and conning the history of redeeming love! How rarely are seen a mother’s tears of affection and thankfulness, as the minds of her children open to clearer views of God and duty, and give stronger evidence of heavenward desires! We have still, indeed, the admirable institution of parochial schools, which the wisdom and piety of our ancestors were careful to endow, that the very poorest of our people might early learn to peruse the Word of God; but in how many instances have these seminaries of religion been converted into mere places of instruction in human learning, where the Bible and the Catechism have been either entirely discarded, or treated as matters of inferior importance; and, even in instances where the original object and spirit of our schools have been preserved, and where other schools of religious instruction are open on the Sabbath, how much of their efficiency, as a great instrument for imbuing the minds of our youth with Christian principles, has been lost by the utter neglect of parents at home! It is at the family hearth that piety and duty are best taught; and if children find not such instructions there, the mere exercises of memory and judgment in matters of religion, to which public education is chiefly confined, can scarcely be expected to avail them much. If, instead of such instructions, they are accustomed under their parents’ roof to hear and to see little but what tends to fill their minds with worldly views, or, it may even be, with positive wickedness, it cannot be matter of surprise, that they should grow up, amidst the abundance of Christian institutions, as fatal experience teaches us they but too generally do, ignorant, regardless, and profligate.*

THE CONTRAST;

OR, THE RESPECTIVE MERITS OF DEISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

No. I.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

IN no age has Christianity been without her secret or avowed enemies; and the present, so far from being an exception, differs from its predecessors only in this respect, that while, at former times, those who impugned the divine origin and authority of the Christian faith, were modest and cautious in the expression of their doubts, and were found chiefly in the garb of learning and philosophy, revelation now meets with assailants, who assume the hostile attitude without a blush, and that, too, among classes of men whose “sober wishes” were heretofore “untaught to stray” beyond the path of their simple and religious forefathers. A spirit of adventurous inquiry has extended itself to the extreme limits of society, and called loudly for science to stoop from the lofty elevation of her academic chair to the level of the popular mind; and while this desire for universal knowledge has, in many instances, received a useful direction, and been followed with the happiest results, it is a matter of deep regret that the maxim of the poet, “drink deep, or taste not,” has verified its dangerous influence in the minds of many, who, flushed with their new introduction into the various processes and laws of nature, have sought to subject all other departments of knowledge to the same test of experiment, and, in the failure of their attempts, have hastily settled down into doubt and disbelief. Volume after volume has been written to meet the circumstances of such persons, and to correct the errors into which they have fallen; but, "as people in general," to use the words of Bishop Horne, "for one reason or other, like short objections better than long answers," it is probable that these refutations of the deistical heresy may never have found their way into the hands of the very individuals for whose benefit they were designed. In these circumstances, it is thought that no unimportant service will be rendered to the cause of truth, and the best interests of men, by exhibiting, in a small compass, a history of the doctrines and schemes of modern infidelity, and placing these in juxtaposition with the spirit and precepts of that religion, against which they have urged their bold and boastful pretensions; and as the meaner retailers of this moral poison, in the form of cheap and anonymous pamphlets, may be liable to challenge as improper authority, may be accused of ignorance or misrepresentation of the principles they recommend and circulate, and be alleged to bear nearly the same relation to their superiors that itinerant hucksters of others' wares do to the wholesale and independent merchant, this comparison between the principles, the moral conduct, and the death-bed experience respectively of the disciples of deism and Christianity, shall be confined to an examination of the lives and writings of those only whom the world has long been accustomed to name, and to think of as the champions of infidelity.

* From a Series of Letters printed and circulated among the Parishioners of Ruthwell, but never published.

To begin, then, with the speculative principles of infidels, the following summary, abridged from the useful work of Leland, may be given, as comprehending the most important of them. As the being of a God is a fact which commends itself directly to the unprejudiced understanding of every rational creature, and of the truth of which it has been emphatically said, that none but "a fool" can doubt, so there has been no point which has more exercised the speculations of infidels, and on which their perverted minds have entertained more false and discordant views. Hobbes taught that God exists, but he contradicted this expression of his faith by maintaining that whatever is not matter is nothing: Blount, that there is an infinite and eternal God, and yet, at another time, asserted that there are two eternal, independent Beings: Bolingbroke, that it is more natural to believe many gods than one God. Voltaire at first believed in a finite God, but at last doubted or denied the existence of any. Tindal expressed a similar doubt. Toland believed the world itself to be God. Hume was led at one time, by his metaphysical system, to deny the existence of God, on his favourite principle, that there are no solid arguments to prove that the world proceeds from a cause; at another time he allows that there is a God, the idea of whom, however, is entirely the invention of men's own minds; for, according to him, "savages being conscious of nothing but disorder and sensual impulse within, cannot be conscious of any thing better without them, and thus to society and education we owe entirely the knowledge of a benevolent," that is, in Hume's phraseology, "a complaisant and well-bred deity." Against this absurd opinion the pointed sarcasm of Young was directed:

"God is for ever in a smiling mood.
He's like themselves; or how could he be good?
And they blaspheme, who blacker schemes suppose;
Devoutly thus Jehovah they depose,
The pure! the just! and set up in his stead
A deity, that's perfectly well-bred."

Universal Passion.

* It is pleasing to remember that the Church of Scotland denounced the sceptical principles of this philosopher, as became a guardian of the interests of pure and undefiled religion. When Mr Hume started as a candidate for the chair of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, about the year 1754, the friends of religion took the alarm, and the General Assembly passed a sentence of solemn condemnation of his principles, as hostile at once to Christianity and public morals.

Voltaire was at first a decided believer in the existence of God, although in one of his lighter works (Zadig) he speaks of the moral government of God in terms of the most offensive and insolent levity. And so little tendency had his speculations to produce an increased veneration for the Author of all things, that neither his reproaches nor his authority were sufficient to prevent some of the most illustrious of his disciples from pushing his principles to the direct disavowal of a first cause. D'Alembert laboured pretty generally under the imputation of being an atheist. Both Diderot and Condorcet were atheists; the former in one of his letters says, "Poor Voltaire is raving now: to other day he avowed his belief in a God." La Harpe says that, afterwards, these philosophers were willing to allow that the presumption was in favour of a Deity!

With regard to the creating, preserving, and governing providence of God, deists are as divided in opinion. Blount held, that the world was not created, but was eternal: Chubb, that God does not interpose in the affairs of this world at all, and has nothing to do with the good or evil done by men: Bolingbroke, in one part of his writings, asserts, that God having formed the machine of the world, and set all things belonging to it in motion, takes no farther care of it than a mechanic does of the clock he has wound up; but in another part, as if doubtful of this first view, declares, that Providence regards his creatures not individually, but collectively. So that, according to his notion, Providence will take more care of a family of twelve than a family of two; and of the empire of Russia or China, than the small kingdom of Holland or of Belgium! Hume denied the doctrine of Providence altogether, saying, that there is no foundation for such a notion, and it is absurd to believe it. And most of the infidels who have not espoused the universal scepticism of Hume, have supposed that God resides in a state of absolute seclusion, engrossed with his own pleasure, and feeling no concern about the creatures he has made.

In reference to the character of God, Bolingbroke taught, that all we can know of it is, that power and wisdom belong to it, and that the doctrine of moral attributes is a mere supposition of men. Hume said, that it is unreasonable to believe God to be wise and good—that what we call perfections, in God may be defects—and consequently, as is well remarked by an able divine, on the principle of Hume, injustice, folly, malice, and falsehood, may be excellences in the divine character!

On the subject of the worship of God, Hobbes taught, that all religion is ridiculous. Blount, in one part of his writings, says, that God ought to be worshipped with prayer and praise; but in another, objects to prayer as a duty: Chubb, that all religions are alike, and that it is of no consequence what religion a man embraces: Shaftesbury, that there is no higher warrant for the authority of religion than the will of the magistrate. Byron denied the duty and efficacy of prayer; and, on another occasion declared, that one mode of worship soon yields to another, and that no religion has lasted more than two thousand years.† And in short, Hume, and all other infidels, by denying the existence or the attributes of God, preclude the very possibility of worship being paid to him. ‡

* Letter to Rev. Mr Sheppard, who transmitted the copy of a prayer which had been offered up by his wife for his Lordship's conversion.

† Captain Medwyn's Conversations of Byron.

‡ How little Hume was animated by the true spirit of philosophy in his malignant opposition to religion, may be judged of by the candid acknowledgment of Professor Dugald Stewart: "His aim was not to interrogate nature with a view to the discovery of truth, but by a cross-examination of nature to involve her in such contradictions as might set aside the whole of her evidence as good for nothing."—Philos. Essays.

In treating of man, the notions entertained by infidels are equally low, contradictory, and absurd, with those on the being and character of God. Blount, Chubb, and Collins declare, that man is a mere machine, and that the soul is material and mortal. Hume agreed with them; but he sometimes says, that the soul is not the same this moment that it was the last; at other times, that it is not one thing, but many things; and at other times, that it is nothing at all! Bolingbroke said, that thoughts are nothing but the inner matter of the body in motion; that there is no conscience in man except artificially; that man is only a superior animal; lives only in the present world, and that the soul grows in proportion to the body.*

When speaking of morality, Lord Herbert taught, that men are not to be hastily condemned, who are led to sin by bodily constitution; and that the indulgence of lust is no more to be blamed than the thirst occasioned by the dropsy, or the sleepiness produced by lethargy. Hobbes affirmed that every man's judgment was the standard of right and wrong; that every man had a right to all things, and may lawfully take them if he can. Shaftesbury, in one place, says, that virtue and piety are so connected, that they must be inseparable companions; but, in another place, he maintains, that men may be virtuous, although they have no regard to God at all: Tindal, that the goodness or wickedness of all actions is wholly measured by their tendency; that every man is a judge of this tendency, according to circumstances; and that no rule can be given, for circumstances are constantly changing: Bolingbroke, that man's chief end was to gratify the appetites and inclinations of the flesh: Hume, that to want honesty, to want understanding, and to want a leg, were all equally vices; that self-denial and humility are not virtues, but useless and mischievous, stupefying the understanding, souring the temper, and hardening the heart; that pride, eloquence, a good flow of thought and of language, health, tapering legs, and broad shoulders, were virtues the most eminent, and the most to be desired; that suicide is lawful and commendable, as it can be no greater crime to turn a few ounces of blood from their natural channel, than to divert the Nile or the Danube from its course; † that adultery is no evil; that were it more general, it would cease to be scandalous; and that when not discovered, it is no crime at all. Voltaire and his associates advocated the unlimited gratification of the sensual passions and appetites. And Rousseau teaches, in his Emile, that one has only to consult one's self concerning good actions—whatever he feels to be good is good—whatever he feels to be wrong is wrong. In fine, with regard to a future state, Shaftesbury taught, that the belief of a future state of rewards and punishments is hurtful to virtue: Chubb, that men will not be judged for their impiety to God, or their injuries and unkindness to each other, but only for their injuries to the public; that even this is unnecessary and useless; and that the belief of a future state is of no advantage to men or society: Hume, that no reward or punishment can be rationally expected beyond what is already known by experience and observation; and that, as the soul, according to him, is perpetually changing, like all things else in the world, the crimes committed by men at one time cannot be imputed to them at another: ‡ Bolingbroke, that God punishes none for their crimes except through the magistrate, and there is no such thing as future responsibility.

* Of course, according to this notion, the biggest man must always have the largest soul, and Pope, of whom his Lordship was a great admirer, being a little man, must have had little or no mind at all!

† On the same principle, it is no crime for one man to murder another, as it is only turning a few ounces of blood from its natural channel.

‡ On this principle, no criminal could ever be tried or brought to punishment.

Diderot used to ridicule the idea of men surviving in another world; and it was a favourite saying of his, "that there was no difference between him and his dog, except habit." Byron, who denied the existence of a future state, expressed that denial in a passage of the MS. of "Childe Harold;" but afterwards, on the urgent remonstrance of a friend, the poet softened it down into the expression of a doubt; and so it stands,

Yet if, as holiest men have deemed there be,
A land of souls beyond that sable shore,
To shame the doctrine of the Sadducee.

II. Canto VIII.

In his other writings, Byron has brought forward his sceptical notions on this and other subjects of religion with such undisguised publicity, that some future Leland may probably assign to his Lordship a prominent place in his view of "Deistical Writers." The following may be given as a few examples:—

Invocation to Sappho.

Dark Sappho! could not verse immortal save
That breast imbued with such immortal fire?
Could she not live, who life eternal gave,
If life eternal may await the lyre,
That only heaven, to which earth's children may aspire?

Even gods must yield—religions take their turn:
'Twas Jove's—'tis Mahomet's; and other creeds
Will rise with other years—till man shall learn Vainly his incense burns—his victim bleeds—
Poor child of doubt and death, whose hope is built on reeds!

The plain meaning of the passage is, that all religion is a gross delusion.

Pursue what chance or fate proclaimeth best,
Peace waits us on the shores of Acheron.

Even where there was no immediate prospect of death, Lord Byron has borne his testimony to the unmingled misery of licentiousness and unbelief, and it is impossible to think, without a feeling of horror, of the sullen despair of the mind from which the following lines emanated:—

Though gay companions o'er the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasure fills the maddening soul,
The heart, the heart, is lonely still.

Aye, but to die, and go, alas!
Where all have gone and all must go;
To be the nothing that I was,
Ere born to life and living wo.

Count o'er the joys thine hours have seen—
Count o'er thy days from anguish free;
And know whatever thou hast been
'Tis something better not to be.

No, for myself, so dark thy fate,
Through every turn of life hath been;
Man and the world so much I hate,
I care not when I quit the scene.

To conclude this summary view of the opinions of the most celebrated infidels. Volney and Dupuis in France, and Sir William Drummond in our own country, have got rid of all religion by endeavouring to shew that the systems of Moses, Confucius, Zoroaster, Brahma, and Jesus, are all modifications of the same thing, and that all the doctrines of the Bible, on the origin of the world, and the nature of God, are nothing more than the allegorical representation of facts in the history of astronomy!

With the opinions of infidels, however, the statements of divine revelation stand in striking contrast. They are so clear, unambiguous, and decisive in their tone—so accordant with all that nature and providence proclaim of the being and the perfections of God, and that reason and conscience teach us of our present relations to Him, and of our future accountability in another state of existence—and in all of them there is such a beautiful harmony observable, a harmony the more wonderful that they were made by different men in different countries and ages of the world, who had no knowledge nor communication with each other, and who could consequently form no concerted plan to impose on the credulity of mankind, that it is impossible for any reflecting and unprejudiced understanding to resist the conviction, that they proceeded from men under the immediate and unerring inspiration of a divine Teacher, and that they alone contain the truths by which mankind are to be guided, and comforted, and saved.

It has been our main object, in the preceding paper, to present our readers with a specimen of the leading principles held and inculcated by the greatest masters and patrons of modern infidelity,—principles which they state sometimes with a tone of petulant dogmatism, and at others insinuate with so much fear, and doubt, and obscurity, and self-contradiction, that it is often next to impossible to extract any thing like a clear, intelligible idea of what they wish the world to receive as their scheme of faith and morality. Indeed there is scarcely a single principle, as to the foundation and truth of which, any two of them perfectly agree; and whoever submits to the trouble, and, we may add, to the pain of wading through the mass of their extravagant and discordant opinions, will be convinced that infidelity, in the hands of all who successively embrace it, assumes such a wonderful diversity of characters,—has been founded on so many different and even opposite principles, and has sanctioned so many different and even impracticable things, that it can be compared to nothing so well as the Hydra of antiquity, “that fabled monster of a hundred heads;” and that it can be viewed as one grand system only in this respect, that among all the varieties of error which it contains, there is manifested the uniform tendency to outrage the best and most sacred feelings that are deeply and originally seated in our frame,—to debase the rational nature of man, and extinguish the lights of truth and hope, without leaving any substitute in their place. This seems the consummation so devoutly wished by all infidels; and when we consider that principles of such a character have been seriously formed and elaborately defended by men, some of whom were eminent for their natural and acquired endowments, we are led to sigh over the weakness and degradation of the human mind, even when exhibited in its greatest strength,—to acknowledge that unaided reason, when she pushes her inquiries beyond her legitimate province, serves only to conduct to a land of shadows and darkness,—and to stand appalled at the criminal and heartless efforts of those who, from pride of understanding, would rob poor, fallen, desponding humanity of the last refuge of the wretched,—the sympathies of an Almighty Father,—the hope of a holier and happier world.

Oh! star-eyed science! hast thou wandered there
To waft us home the message of despair?
Ah me! the laurelled wreath that murder rears,
Blood-nursed, and watered by the widow's tears,
Seems not so foul, so tainted, and so dread,
As waves the night-shade round the sceptic head.

FIRST ANNUAL EXAMINATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S ENGLISH SCHOOL IN BOMBAY.*

BEFORE commencing the examination, the Rev. Dr Wilson addressed the chairman, and his countrymen present, in substance, as follows:—“Before we proceed to the business of the day, I may remind you, that this institution is yet in its infancy; and that it is more that it may profit by your encouragement and countenance, than that you may be gratified by its actual results, that I have taken the liberty of inviting your attendance on this occasion. Most of the pupils are but entering on the study of English, a circumstance which is to be attributed to our entering in general as scholars only the youngest and most promising of the many persons who have offered themselves for admission, from our desire to retain them for a length of time sufficient for their instruction in the various branches of literature, science, and religion, which we propose to teach. In the outset, I laboured under great difficulties in procuring properly qualified persons to act as teachers and monitors of the different classes, and obtaining a sufficient supply of unobjectionable books and necessary apparatus. These difficulties have been partly, and they will, in a short time, be entirely removed. The institution happily enjoys the best patronage and direction within our native land, the efficiency of which, as you are aware, has been tried with signal success on the other side of India; and due support of every kind, I have been assured, will not be wanting. What you will principally have to notice at present, are, the system of education pursued, the zeal of the scholars, and the readiness of the natives to receive instruction in those great truths, to which we owe all our social blessings, our elevation among the nations of the earth, our sovereignty in this great country, and, above all, the hope which is dearest to our hearts, that throughout the endless ages of eternity, “we shall reign as kings and priests unto God.” I trust that the time is not far distant, when, through the grace of God, the knowledge here communicated, will, both as it respects this world and that which is to come, be blessed to its recipients, and through them to many of their countrymen, to advance whose interests Divine Providence has placed us under the most sacred, and now increasingly felt obligations. This hope, dwelling within us all, is an ample warrant for your valued countenance of the institution, for my connection with it as a Missionary, and for my humbly resolving, in accordance with the views of the venerable body whose agent I am honoured to be, and with principles which I had formed before I set a foot on these shores, to devote to it a large share of my attention, without neglecting other important duties which harmonize with its objects, and the discharge of which will most essentially contribute to its success, if, through the blessing of God, which present appearances encourage us to expect, they prove instrumental in bringing any portion of the natives, with their children, within the pale of the Church.”

Ten Marathi boys of the seventh class, selected from the Marathi schools of the mission with the view of being educated as teachers for them, read the seventh chapter of Mark in their native tongue, and answered with the greatest readiness any questions asked them respecting the Gospel history and the doctrines of Christianity. Dr Wilson mentioned, that they had mastered the English alphabet in a single day; and in one month had begun to read and translate little sentences from the English Instructor, No. 1, with considerable ease, as was shewn when they were joined by their companions. The classes were then called up in the order mentioned in the precis; and the result of the examination was highly encouraging. The natives appear to have been particularly gratified by what they witnessed. “All who were present,” it is said in an editorial article of a Gujarathi newspaper, “were fully satisfied that no such progress as that made by the boys of this school within the eleven months of its existence has ever been exhibited in any institution in this place. In reading, arithmetic, chronology, geography, translations, the knowledge of man, and other objects of natural history, the Christian Shashtra, (i. e., the Bible,) and other kinds of learning, many of them have attained a degree of proficiency, which all acknowledged reflected the greatest honour on the teachers and their head. At the conclusion of the examination, the Honourable Mr Farish expressed his sense of the advantages which the natives have derived, and will derive, from the school, and expressed his great gratification at the exertions and excellent qualifications of the tutors and their superintendent. The Rev. Mr Laurie then delivered an eloquent speech."

Mr Laurie's remarks were to the following effect:—

"I have a sincere pleasure in expressing my heartfelt approbation of the proceedings of this day. I feel that it is unnecessary to say much, perhaps to say any thing; for what we have witnessed may safely be left to win its way, as I am persuaded it has already won its way to the heart of every one present. Still, I cannot be a silent spectator at the first examination of this school, belonging to the mission with which, under a different name, and under different auspices, I have so long been connected, and now the mission of our venerable Church.

"You have been told, that the school is only in its infancy. I believe that not twelve months have elapsed since it was established. It is therefore the day of small things, from which much could not have been expected, but from which, I conceive, a great deal has in reality been gained. When I look at the large number of the pupils—at the variety of the exercises, elementary though they almost all are, in which they are engaged—at the spirit of emulation which seems generally to have been excited, and at the progress of many of the boys especially in an acquaintance with the Bible, its doctrines, and its great facts, and in correct reading, and in understanding what they read; I am assured that I speak the sentiments of every spectator when I say, that the examination has offered good testimony to diligence and capacity on the part of the pupils, and to the zeal, the fidelity, and fitness of their teachers.

"Beautiful and gratifying it always is, to see so many of the young brought together to receive the blessing of education, but I cannot help thinking it peculiarly beautiful here. We have here upwards of two hundred children, of almost every caste and denomination in this great country, receiving that blessing at the hands of foreign masters, and in a language foreign to them all. We all know something of the difficulty of acquiring such a knowledge of a foreign tongue as may enable us to read it, and, above all, to speak it, and to think in it; yet that difficulty has, in some degree, been surmounted by many of those boys, for they both read in our language, and understand what they read. And, be it observed, that they are taught to read not books of human learning only, but the Book of infinite wisdom—the blessed volume which we value as alone unfolding to ignorant and ruined men the true way to peace with God and eternal salvation. On this point I do not, for obvious reasons, mean to dwell, but it is one which, as a Christian minister, I cannot omit to notice, and it is a feature in the character of this institution, which, would to God, were visible in that of every seminary in this land.

"I have said that this school is in its infancy. It is so not only in respect of age, but of the branches of knowledge which are being taught in it. But, from what has been stated to me by my friend Dr Wilson, who founded the school, and who diligently superintends it, I know it to be his intention to carry forward the pupils to the higher departments of European literature and science, and of Christian theology. An experiment of this sort has already been made in Eastern India, in connection with this mission, and with splendid success. And if success has followed the experiment in Calcutta, why may it not be the result here also? The capacity of the pupils here cannot be deemed inferior. The blessing of God, which we are warranted to supplicate in such a case, is every where alike influential; and when I turn to the masters of the school, whose fitness has, in so far, been satisfactorily evinced, and especially to my reverend friend, whose talents are so well known, I see every reason to look forward to results from this institution the most satisfactory. On the foundation which is here laid, I trust a superstructure of solid learning may yet be reared. And though we may not live to see the day, I hope in God the day will come, when, from this seminary, native youths will go forth, imbued not only with the knowledge which is useful, and confers distinction in this life, but with that better learning which has a reference to the future—and able and willing to impart to others the blessing which they have themselves received.

"But I cannot withhold the remark, that, in order to this, a combination of means and effort is necessary—on the part of the pupils, of the masters, and of the community at large.

"To you, my young friends, pupils in this institution, permit me to offer an advice, and an encouragement. You have begun well. The exhibition of this day has done credit to many of you. But, I beseech you, do not stop here. Do not rest satisfied with present attainments in knowledge. Aspire to the highest. Rest assured, the further you advance, the more will it be prized for its own sake. Knowledge, it has been said, is power. So it is in the conviction and confession of those who possess it. And what knowledge has done for others, it will do for you. When united with goodness, it is a distinction the most enviable; and if it renders others useful and distinguished, so will it render you. But, if you desire the attainment, you must be diligent. You must be attentive, and regular in your attendance at school. You must be patient and persevering in the preparation of school exercises, and docile and obedient to your teachers. What they do is for your benefit; and as you would strengthen their hands, and encourage their hearts, I repeat the admonition, be diligent and submissive to all that they enjoin.

"To the masters of the school I offer the language not of admonition, for that I am persuaded they need not, but of encouragement and kindness. I can, in some degree, appreciate the difficulties of your situation. Every parent and guardian of youth, who feels and is so ready to avow the difficulty of managing their families, can appreciate it. But what is a small family in comparison of a combination like that now before us? We have here upwards of two hundred children, each one exhibiting some shade of difference in temper and in talent from every other; and here, if anywhere, the exercise of patience, and a command of temper, is surely necessary. But be not discouraged. Yours are labours of love for the present and future well-being of the young. This is, in itself, a strengthening conviction, and a high reward. And He, who has inspired the inclination to do good, will lend the ability necessary to its accomplishment.

"And upon the public at large a duty rests, in connection with this and kindred institutions. I think I can safely appeal to every native parent, and be assured he will not be backward in aiding the dissemination of knowledge in the country which must be dear to him. To Christians, however, I have undoubted right to appeal. They are designed and commanded to be the light of the world. Let us obey the command as we may have power. And the humblest and poorest has the power. If he have not money to bestow, he has his good example to set before others; he has his good word to offer in the society in which he moves; and he has a throne of grace which he may approach in prayer for that blessing from on high, without which every human effort will fall fruitless to the earth. May the blessing of the Almighty rest upon this school, and upon every school and Christian institution in this great country! And may God hasten the day, when the means that are used will realize all their success, and when knowledge, and especially that better know-nal world, shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the channel of the great deep!"

MERCY ON THE JUDGMENT-DAY:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DAVID DAVIDSON,
Minister of Broughty-Ferry.

"The Lord grant unto him, that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day."—2 TIM. i. 18.

WITHOUT insisting on the Christian mode of requiting a benefactor's kindness, or the expression of gratitude by the offering of intercession, of which an example is furnished by the text, I propose merely directing your attention to the important season and important blessing of which the apostle speaks.

I. Attend to the important season. He says, "The Lord grant unto him, that he may find mercy of the Lord, in that day:" and what meaneth the strange expression, "that day?" It is one which the apostle frequently uses. Thus, in a preceding verse, he speaks of Christ "being able to keep that which he committed unto him unto that day:" and in another part of this epistle, of "the crown of righteousness, which the Lord the Righteous Judge would give him at that day." And though the phrase does not by itself point out any specific period of time, there can be no doubt from the connection in which it occurs, as to the epoch the apostle refers to. The day is that, which is elsewhere called "the last day," because then the end of this world's history, as a place of trial at least, will be come, and time, which had been measured by days, will be merged in an immeasurable eternity: which is called also "the great day," because then scenes unparalleled before in grandeur will be unfolded, and affairs that have never been surpassed in magnitude will be transacted,—such scenes and affairs as will throw into the shade the most splendid spectacles and momentous transactions of time, and tower towards the infinite in sublimity and importance: which is called besides, "the day of the Lord," because then our Lord is to be revealed from heaven the second time, for the completion of the plan which led to his former manifestation, and to come down through the rent sky on our arrested world, with all the august insignia of its Judge: which is called moreover, "the day of judgment," because then all the myriads that have lived shall be gathered before the great white throne, an irreversible sentence pronounced on the characters they have borne, and their eternal destinies to weal or to woe determined and declared. It is the day on which, according to the descriptions of the sacred writers, "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and all that is therein, shall be burnt up:"—the day, on which "the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and be with all the holy angels, and sit upon the throne of his glory:"—the day, on which "all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation:"—the day, on which "we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, to give an account of the deeds done in the body," and hear addressed to us, either the rejoicing call, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," or, the heart-withering denunciation, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

And may not the day, which shall be thus signalized, be appropriately designated, as it is in the text? May it not justly be spoken of, as if it eclipsed all other days, and rendered them unworthy of thought or mention? Ah! we oft forget its coming, and think lightly of its solemnities. But, it was otherwise with the holy apostle. Endowed as he was pre-eminently with the faith, which is the evidence of things not seen, he had its mighty and magnificent realities continually before his eyes;—he seemed already to see on the distant horizon the faint light of its dawning;—he was living in daily and diligent preparation for it; and to the insuring for himself and his brethren, of mercy from the Lord when it should actually arrive, were directed his unwearied labours and unceasing prayers. How naturally, then, and how suitably, and how strikingly does he, in referring to it, call it "that day," as the day most pregnant with great events—the day most familiar to his meditations.

And, O brethren! what day so worthy to engross our thoughts?—what day so fitted to monopolize our regards?—what day so fully fraught with potent and resistless claims on our most intense contemplation and most anxious solicitude? Think, then, of that day. Look forward, I beseech you, to that day. And, Oh! let not any of the engagements of these passing and insignificant days, prevent you from preparing for the arrival of that great and terrible day of the Lord.

II. But the apostle speaks of an important blessing, as well as an important season, and to that, also, turn your attention. "The Lord grant unto him," he says of Onesiphorus, "that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day,"—"mercy of the Lord in that day,"—that is the blessing; and what does it comprehend? Mercy stands contrasted with justice, and is but another name for free and undeserved favour, or the manifestation of kindness to such as are utterly destitute of merit. It is exercised by a judge, when he pardons one who has been convicted and condemned; and it is exercised by the Supreme Judge of all, when he delivers from punishment, and receives as righteous, those who have sinned against him. A man finds mercy, therefore, when his sins are forgiven, and his person accepted.

And since this is the beginning of salvation ; since justification is the harbinger of every other blessing ; since all things that are good in time and in eternity shall assuredly follow in the train of forgiveness and acceptance,—for a man to find mercy even now, amid the trials, and changes, and imperfections of this present life, is to be truly blessed. It is to have guaranteed to him all that is included in eternal life,—that gift of God,—that munificent donation of infinite mercy. Nor will the largess be diminished, or the security invalidated, on the day of judgment. He who finds mercy then, is insured, beyond the possibility of hinderance or want, in all that he wishes, in all that he needs, in all that he can receive. To find mercy on that day, is to escape the tremendous condemnation which sin entails,—it is to be owned, and approved, and rewarded by the judge,—it is to receive the tokens of his love and the meed of his applause,—it is to be pronounced the children of God, and the heirs of heaven,—it is to be exalted to the enjoyment of all that rich and unfading inheritance of blessings, which grace, divine and exhaustless, has prepared. And, oh, how blessed those who are treated thus ; how ineffably beatific to find the Saviour in the judge,—to receive a look of compassion and a word of kindness when standing before the great tribunal,—to be assured of the favour of God, at that solemn moment when the sentence of doom is to be proclaimed,—to be distinguished and separated as the objects of redeeming love, when He who sits upon the throne is apportioning to each individual of the innumerable host congregated in awful expectation around him, his destiny of curse, or of blessing, in the ages of eternity. Oh, to find mercy on that day is to be made happy for ever,—it is to be unalterably safe, and completely blessed, and everlastingly glorious ; and can its importance, then, be set forth in the language of man, or can finite mind conceive it ?

That it was of surpassing worth in the apostle's estimation, is evident from the circumstances in which he offers the prayer. He had experienced, during his imprisonment, rare and disinterested kindness from Onesiphorus ; his heart was overflowing with gratitude to his generous benefactor, and it was undoubtedly his most fervent desire that he should be abundantly rewarded. What, then, does he seek for him in prayer ? Not those things which men are wont most highly to esteem, and most eagerly to pant for ; not the enjoyment of earthly prosperity, in any of its fascinating forms. No, but fixing his eye on that great day, when the things of time shall be wrapt in devouring flame, and the things of eternity brought forth to view, as the only and enduring realities, he seeks for him mercy of the Lord then. And who sees not, therefore, that he accounted the objects of human ambition, trifling and contemptible in comparison with this ; that in his mind, enlightened and guided by inspiration, this surpassed every one of them, and infinitely transcended them all in worth and preciousness ?

There are many considerations besides, which go to illustrate the high importance and exceeding desirableness of mercy on that day ; and one of these is, that it will then be felt to be peculiarly needful. Mercy, indeed, is needed at all times. As all have sinned greatly against heaven and in God's sight, every one needs it in every action and circumstance, and throughout every period of his life. But if there be a time when it can seem more necessary than at another, it is "that day." Emphatically is this taught by the apostle in the prayer of the text. Even when he is commending Onesiphorus, as one among a thousand ; even when inclined to make the most favourable estimate of his character, and extol him the most for his generous friendship, he still speaks of him, as if he would need mercy then ; and what a striking attestation is there here to the truth that mercy will then be felt to be the one great and pressing necessity of all ! And who can doubt it ? Men may now imagine they are righteous, may muse complacently on their own merits, may indulge the presumptuous fancy that they have a claim on the favour of God, and the rewards of heaven, but on the last day that delusion will be gone. No one will venture, when the judgment is set and the books are opened, to seek for justice as all he needs. Oh no ! then, at least, it will be universally and urgently felt that mercy is needed, and that nothing can be the portion assigned but tribulation and anguish, if mercy be withheld.

Another consideration, tending to enhance the value of the blessing, is that it will not be shared in by all. This is obviously implied in the apostle's intercessory petition. In seeking mercy for his benefactor, he testifies his assurance that there were some, that there were many, who would not find mercy on that day, for why else should he so earnestly have solicited it for him ? And we are elsewhere assured that some "shall have judgment without mercy," and shall bear not the love but "the wrath of the Lamb." It is hard, indeed, to believe that any of our brethren or ourselves should experience no mercy in the presence of the Judge ; and we can scarcely tolerate the bare idea of one standing before his bar, and there receiving no smile, and finding no grace. Yet it cannot be doubted that this shall be the fate of multitudes, and that as to all who are unbelieving and ungodly, "he who made them will not have mercy upon them, and he who formed them will show them no favour." And will not their fate enhance the value of mercy ? Will not this seem peculiarly precious to those who enjoy it, when they see others excluded from its riches and debarred from its blessings ? If the mariner who is saved from the wreck, when all his shipmates are lost, estimates his preservation more highly than he who has returned to the desired haven with them all in safety, must it not seem a glorious benefit to appear as "vessels of mercy prepared unto glory," when many fellow-sinners are found to be "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction ?"

Another consideration still, which may well exalt the blessing in our eyes, is, that if mercy be not found then, it will never be found. It is even unsafe to neglect, for one moment, the seeking of mercy, yet mercy may be obtained by those who long neglect it. Though one opportunity pass away unimproved, it may be found the next, and after the lapse of a thousand opportunities it may still be found. Although many Sabbaths should pass by and leave the soul without it, there is still a possibility, at least, of its being found before the last Sabbath's sun has set. But after the judgment of the great day begins, there will be no space for repentance, no room for prayer. If no mercy be found on that day, there can be no hope or prospect of obtaining mercy throughout all eternity. To that blessing, those who meet not with it before the judgment-seat, must bid an eternal farewell. And with what value does that consideration invest it!

And yet another circumstance which magnifies the value of the blessing, is, that the condition of those by whom mercy shall not then be found, will be pre-eminently wretched. Not to find mercy on that day is to be undone, altogether and eternally undone. It is to be cut off from the favour of the only Being that can save; it is to be sentenced to excessive and everlasting woe; it is to be consigned to the prison-house of misery and despair, where "the mercy of God is clean gone for ever," and where "he hath forgotten to be gracious." And who can calculate the preciousness of deliverance from such a fate as this?

Imagine, my brethren,—and when you do so, you are but overlooking a narrow and ever narrowing interval, and thinking of what shall soon be realized in greater awfulness than you can conceive,—imagine that the day of the Lord is actually come; that the omniscient Judge has descended in his chariot of glory, and with his retinue of angels; that you have been awakened from the sleep of the grave by the blast of that trumpet, which once, as it waxed louder and louder, made Mount Sinai to shake and the hosts of Israel to tremble; that you have been summoned, by a resistless mandate, before the throne of Him, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, and his voice as the sound of many waters; and that the solemn epoch, so often spoken of, but so feebly anticipated, has actually arrived, when the sentence is to be uttered that shall seal your fate for ever: What think you of mercy now? Can you do without it? does it seem to you a trifle? is it unworthy of your thoughts? would you prefer before it the sweetest of this world's pleasures, the brightest of this world's honours, the richest of this world's empires? Ah! it cannot be. Does not every thing seem less than nothing and vanity, in comparison of mercy? Would not mercy seem cheaply purchased by the whole world, if mercy could be bought, and you had such a price to tender? Is not mercy, in your estimation, the sum and substance of all that is precious? Were the Judge to say, that for you there is no mercy—what anguish would seize you —what lamentations escape from you—what an aspect of horror and despair would you assume, and how profoundly and irretrievably wretched would your destiny seem! And, on the other hand, were He to declare that you should receive mercy, were you to see it in his eye, and hear it in his voice—what ecstasy would fill your hearts, and what anthems flow from your tongues! How would your countenances brighten with the smile of heaven's blessedness, and on what a glorious career of honourable service and enraptured enjoyment would you seem to enter! But you cannot, as yet, weigh against each other, the feelings of these opposite conditions: you cannot conceive what it is to be driven to the left hand, or drawn to the right hand of the Son of man: and yet surely you know enough, to feel that nothing is equal in importance to finding mercy of the Lord in that day.

And will you not then take up this petition for yourselves? Will you not fall down before the mercy-seat, and cry, "The Lord grant unto me, that I may find mercy of the Lord, in that day?" I commend to you that prayer, brethren. It doth suit you well, whatsoever your character. It will suit you every day of your lives: it will suit you on your dying day. O be persuaded to offer it in your own behalf!

Of these three things only let me remind you: 1. If mercy is to be found at last, it must be sought now. To seek it for the first time, after the day of judgment has dawned, will be utterly useless. On it, even a cry for the rocks and mountains to fall and cover, would be unheard; a prayer even for a drop of water would be unanswered. The day of grace will then have closed, and left not even the glimmering of twilight to cheer the sinner's bewildered spirit: the opportunity of coming boldly to the throne of grace to obtain mercy, will then be withdrawn for ever: and for those who have trifled with offered mercy, there can remain nothing, but that fiery indignation, which shall consume the adversaries. It is now, therefore, that you must seek the blessing: now that you must smite upon your breasts and cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" O beware then of losing the golden opportunity. On this day of salvation, let the earnest prayer ascend to the Father of Mercies.

2. Again, if mercy is to be found at all, it must be sought through the mediation of Christ. Justice is an essential attribute of the divine character; and justice pronounces sentence of condemnation upon all. Without respect to a Mediator, therefore, there seems no room or possibility for the exercise of mercy; and it would be presumptuous and preposterous to expect it. But a scheme has been contrived in the councils of heaven for harmonizing the exercise of mercy with the claims of justice; and in the Scriptures of truth are we assured, that a plenary expiation for sin having been made by Emanuel's agony, there is forgiveness with God, and plentiful redemption, and abundant mercy. It is through Jesus, then, that you must look for the blessing: it is his merit, that you must make your only plea. Let your hope, therefore, be based on the sacrifice of the cross; and when you seek for mercy, see that you seek it in the name of the Lamb that was slain.

3. And, in fine, if mercy is to be found of the Lord, it must be sought in his service. Salvation indeed is not of works, but of grace; not of merit, but of mercy. But, at the same time, mercy cannot be obtained at last, unless a character be acquired and maintained, conformable to the obligations imposed, and the end contemplated in the exercise of the grace of God. "Blessed," it is said, "are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy:" and, on the other hand, "they shall have judgment without mercy, who have shewed no mercy." On the same principle, also, may the very same thing be averred of every Christian grace; for it were a sullying of the divine administration, a subversion of the throne of government and judgment, to extend mercy to those who continue in sin because grace abounds, and turn the grace of God into licentiousness. Sin, then, must be abandoned, as the crucifier of the Lord of glory; and holiness must be eagerly pursued, in gratitude for redeeming love. Wherefore, "let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God for he will abundantly pardon." And, "ye beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, unto eternal life."

THE WORLD.

PART. II.—ADJUSTMENT.

BY THE REV. JAMES ESDAILE,

Minister of the East Church, Perth.

THERE is neither evil nor defect in the visible constitution of nature; for wherever we discern an apparent defect, we shall discover a countervailing advantage; and seeming irregularities are presented to our view, as if it were for the sole purpose of compelling us to recognise the contrivances of divine wisdom for the happiness and improvement of man. Darkness is not an evil; it affords repose to men and animals, and to the earth itself, which would be burnt up by constant heat, and exhausted by perpetual culture. Sleep is not a defect, nor a loss of time; it brings man to a conformity with the course of nature, and they are very idly employed who seek to abridge the period which God has assigned to rest, and to the renovation of the bodily frame; people are seldom more harmlessly employed than when they are asleep. Hunger and thirst are not evils; the removal of them is an essential constituent of human enjoyment. Will any all the death of animals an evil, when it makes room for healthy and vigorous successors to have their turn of enjoyment, and contribute to the general good? Even that law which has destined so many millions to be devoured by others is only the means of multiplying existence, and augmenting the sum of animal enjoyment. The rugged mountain, piercing the clouds, and inaccessible to the foot of man, is not useless in nature; it prepares the treasures of the snow, it directs the current of the winds, it sends forth springs and rivers to refresh the earth; and, without mountains, the earth would have the appearance of a monotonous plain; and, if diversified by water-courses, they would only be briny canals, totally unfit for the purposes of animal life. But is "the multitudinous sea" a defect or deformity in creation? No; it is the most magnificent object in nature, and also the most useful; it collects all the waters that flow upon the earth, and circulates back the vital fluid in the form of mists and vapours, to be elaborated into rain and dew, to refresh the face of nature, and to secure the existence and comfort of every thing that lives. And when the time shall come, predicted by geologists, when the lofty mountains shall be levelled with the plains by the attrition of the elements, and the other agents of whose energy they speak so much, they may draw the curtain on the scene of nature, for animal and vegetable life must be at an end. The hills were made to rise, and the valleys to subside, and the waters to descend, before the earth was fit for the reception of animal life; and when this state of things is done away, the earth will be ready for one of those new transformations of which our philosophers have fancied so many, but of which we yet desiderate the proof.

But leaving these speculations, we may safely affirm that the system of nature, even in its wildest and most untoward aspects, presents the most unbounded resources of divine power and wisdom. It is not by mistake, or accident, that the frozen north is bound in chains of everlasting ice; it serves to regulate the temperature of the globe, and affords shelter to the polar bear, the whale, and the walrus. It is not by accident that torrid, barren plains extend far and wide in certain regions, presenting nothing but a sea of sand to the eye of the weary traveller. They were intended from the beginning, as the patient camel, "the ship of the desert," seems to have been created expressly for the purpose of traversing them; for the form of the hoof, and the structure of the stomach, which would be useless and inconvenient in any other circumstances, are peculiarly adapted to the situations where the services of this useful animal are required. Nothing can be more correct than the words of the poet when applied to this subject:

"All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou canst not see,
All discord, harmony not understood,
All partial evil, universal good;
And spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear, what-ever is, is right."

Yes, right to a tittle, so far as external nature is concerned; but the maxim is a miserable delusion when extended, as the Author intended it should be, to the moral condition of man. Will they who adopt this opinion (and it has been publicly advocated, and a book has been written to prove that private vices are public benefits,) have the goodness to inform us what benefit the world has ever derived from sin? Individuals may indeed be instructed by contemplating the desolations which sin has wrought upon the earth; for in the destruction of sinful nations we see the judgments of God visibly executed against iniquity; a most useful lesson this, and not to be taught with such effect by any other means. An individual sinner may escape punishment in the present world; and, when this happens, men are apt to become sceptical as to the existence of an over-ruling Providence, and nothing but the idea of a judgment to come can remove the doubt. Nations, on the other hand, having no posthumous existence, always have their punishment or reward in the present world; and no extent of power, or of territorial possessions, has ever been able to shelter a profligate and effeminate people from the visible judgments of heaven. From such facts as these we may perceive that sin is a plague-spot stamped on human of its ravages wherever the foot of man has been known to stray. We thus read the destructive consequences of sin, not only in the Word of God, but in the durable or decaying monuments raised by the hand of man as trophies of his glory; and now preserved by divine wisdom, in their shattered remains, as permanent memorials of the profligacy of those nations whose power and resources have been dissipated by sin. On this state of things it would be idle to speculate; it has been permitted by the wisdom of God, and therefore we may be sure that it is not inconsistent with the perfections of his nature: and as in the natural world, we discern the contrivances of divine wisdom, chiefly in those remedial resources which the Author of nature has devised, to counteract evident tendencies to defeat an intended end; such provisions, for instance, as we see in the antagonist forces which regulate the motions of the heavenly bodies, and in the opposing muscles necessary to animal motion, and particularly manifested in the human frame; so, in the moral constitution of the world, which appears to be in a state of complete derangement, we might naturally be led to wish for, and perhaps to expect, a remedy; yet that remedy must be of an extraordinary kind, and as far beyond the powers of man to conceive as it would have been for him to contrive the laws of nature.

Here, then, is a monstrous deformity without a single countervailing advantage. Poets and philosophers have fancied a remedy in the dogged resolution of the mind which may triumph over pain and misery. Virgil makes one of his heroes say, "Desperation is the only safety of the vanquished;" Milton makes one of his devils say, "Our only hope is flat despair;" Archbishop King asserts the omnipotence of the human will, and tells us that "things are not chosen because they are good, but become good because they are chosen," a maxim which goes as far as the most extravagant pretensions of the stoics. But man, when untutored by religious knowledge, and unimbued with any maxims of philosophy, cuts the knot at once, by explaining away the enormity of sin, and looking with complacency on the havoc it has wrought; considering war as a pastime, the world as a hunting field, and man as the destined prey of the most subtle, or the most daring. Poetry and heathen philosophy scarcely afford us any other lesson. Homer at once "cries havoc, and lets slip the dogs of war." He commences his great poem by invoking the muse to assist him in celebrating the indomitable rage, and implacable resentment of as untameable a savage as ever wore the shape of humanity; and he sticks to his text to the last, changing occasionally the actors on the scene, but ever gloating over unmitigated slaughter, celebrating no virtue but courage, and the wisdom which guides to conquest, and stigmatizing no sin but cowardice, and the weakness which shrinks from blood.

We learn a different lesson from a work of much higher antiquity, and much higher authority, than that of the father and prince of poets, where we are informed that the first who shed the blood of man was branded with insupportable ignominy, and where glorious war, as our great poet calls it, is uniformly announced as the most terrible scourge that can afflict a nation. How can it be otherwise, when war is a temporary suspension of the charities of life, and of the laws of justice and humanity, by which God has ordained that the world should be governed, the violation of which, for any length of time, would lead to the utter extermination of human society? But the question is, where is an antidote to be found for that sin, which sets on fire the course of nature, which arms the hand of man against his brother, and prompts him to act in perpetual opposition to the known law and will of God? As we find a provision made to rectify every other apparent irregularity or defect, we might be led to conclude, that a remedy might also be found for this; and it is evident that all mankind have entertained this idea, and have not been backward in devising means to accomplish the desired end. The heinousness of sin has always pressed upon their consciences; and the history of superstition, the only form in which religion can appear where there is no revelation, presents endless varieties of schemes and expedients to escape from the consequences of sin. I need not stop to demonstrate the futility and inefficacy of all these attempts to find a substitute for that obedience which the law of God requires, or to devise a satisfaction for acknowledged guilt: reason, though unsanctified by grace, and unenlightened by revelation, perceives the absurdity of all such attempts; and nothing would appear more revolting to its convictions than to be told, that the blood of an innocent animal would make atonement for the guilt of a conscious sinner.

Let us consider, then, how the matter stands. We have seen sin reigning throughout all generations, from the first human pair down to the present day; transmitted from father to son in a line of unbroken succession, polluting the stream of time, and leaving vestiges of its ravages wherever the foot of man has been known to stray. We thus read the destructive consequences of sin, not only in the Word of God, but in the durable or decaying monuments raised by the hand of man as trophies of his glory; and now preserved by divine wisdom, in their shattered remains, as permanent memorials of the profligacy of those nations whose power and resources have been dissipated by sin. On this state of things it would be idle to speculate; it has been permitted by the wisdom of God, and therefore we may be sure that it is not inconsistent with the perfections of his nature: and as in the natural world, we discern the contrivances of divine wisdom, chiefly in those remedial resources which the Author of nature has devised, to counteract evident tendencies to defeat an intended end; such provisions, for instance, as we see in the antagonist forces which regulate the motions of the heavenly bodies, and in the opposing muscles necessary to animal motion, and particularly manifested in the human frame; so, in the moral constitution of the world, which appears to be in a state of complete derangement, we might naturally be led to wish for, and perhaps to expect, a remedy; yet that remedy must be of an extraordinary kind, and as far beyond the powers of man to conceive as it would have been for him to contrive the laws of nature.

If, therefore, we shall find reason to conclude, that the perfections of the divine nature are more illustriously displayed by the redemption through Christ than they could have been, if man had never sinned; and if man is raised to the hopes of higher dignity and honor through his union with the second Adam, than if he had never suffered by his connection with the first—then, whatever reason we may have to lament the consequences of human depravity, we shall see still greater reason to magnify the riches of the grace of God.

If any one, then, should be disposed to say, "Why was not the guilty race cut off; why were men permitted to multiply crimes and propagate misery, till the earth groaned with the burden of sin, inasmuch as 'it repented God that he had made man, and grieved him at his heart?'" In answer to this we can only say, that to have acted on the principle which such queries suggest, would have been to show the impotence of anger, the irritation of disappointment, and the total absence of mercy; it would be like the policy of the unfeeling and bungling physician, who would rather kill the patient whom he cannot cure, than allow him to live as a monument of his want of skill. But God permitted the utmost possible derangement to take place in the moral constitution of man, that his intellect and his power, his wisdom and his grace, might be made apparent in defeating the efforts of the adversary, and in making the discordant elements, which he had introduced into human nature, the means of proclaiming the sovereignty of divine mercy. The Most High has left no room for triumph to the author of evil; his empire is limited, and it will be short-lived: for the time is approaching, when the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth, when every one who is born shall be an heir of glory, and multitudes which no man can number shall come from all quarters of the earth to sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.

Let the impenitent sinner, and the self-sufficient unbeliever, then, mourn over the miseries of human nature; let them arraign the wisdom and the justice of the great Creator, for having permitted sin and misery to enter into this world; let them brood, in gloomy discontent, over the calamities that flesh is heir to; they deserve no better portion, for their misery is of their own creating; but let the humble Christian exclaim, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ!" He too sees, that there is much sin and misery in the world; but he does not that account murmur, or repine, or charge God foolishly: he sees, that the miseries of life are not only the punishments, but the preventives of sin, and he recognises them as chastisements in a Father's hand, to reclaim his erring children: he sees, that there is nothing wrong in this world but sin; and whilst he laments its devastations, he perceives, at the same time, that this greatest of all evils has been the chief means of magnifying the divine glory in rescuing the victims of sin.

Whilst, therefore, "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth forth his handy-work," yet this paltry spot of earth has been the theatre on which the glory of his perfections has been particularly manifested, and that with a degree of splendour and power which commands the reverential admiration of men and of angels; and which, in the minds of the apostles, and first converts to Christianity, seemed to absorb all their feelings. The Old Testament saints, who lived under very lively impressions of the divine presence, celebrate, in the loftiest strains of poetic imagery, the wisdom and the power of God, as displayed in the works of creation and providence: and they show what a rich and varied banquet the pious mind may receive from the contemplation of the visible works of God. But it is worthy of remark, that these subjects of contemplation are never once touched on by the writers of the New Testament. So completely were their minds engrossed by the marvellous revelation of goodness and grace made known in the Gospel, that they found no room in their hearts for any other subject of meditation, and no time to spend on any other manifestations of divine goodness: all and each of them seemed to adopt the language of the apostle when he said, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ!" Instead of expatiating, like David, on the beauty and order of the visible world, as proclaiming the wisdom and goodness of God; or of illustrating, like Solomon, the facts of natural history; for that wise king was also a very learned man, "and he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." 1 Kings iv. 33. Instead of thus employing his faculties, the apostle declared, that he was determined "to know nothing but Christ crucified;" and he assigns a good and sufficient reason for this preference, viz., because "in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." And who that views the matter aright, can come to any other conclusion? We are not required to be insensible to the wisdom and power of God as manifested in the visible creation: we may see him in all his works, and may recognise him as the kind and bountiful Parent of the universe; but when we see him in Christ, we see him accomplishing the great purpose for which the world was made, subduing the power of the devil, and raising man from the depths of despair, perhaps, to higher dignity and honour than he ever could have aspired to, though he had retained unsullied his original innocence.

And what but "the wisdom of God, and the power of God," concentrated in Christ, could have achieved such a victory? Sin is the great disorganizing principle in human nature, and nothing is so difficult to be overcome. When the body is disordered, there is a rectifying power of nature which often sets it to rights without the aid of a physician: but there is no remedial nature for the spiritual maladies of the soul; they have always a tendency to advance from bad to worse, till they become incurable by any power of man; a lepraved will is a thousand times more hopeless and unmanageable than a diseased body, for evil has become the object of its choice, and it obstinately rejects all assistance, and nothing but the power and grace of the Saviour could effect its emancipation.

This, we may safely say, was the greatest work which God himself has accomplished. There was no resistance to his will when he called the material universe into existence by the word of his power; but he gave to man the power of resisting his will; this was a privilege and an honour, inasmuch as it was the pledge and proof of freedom; this privilege he abused, and incurred the sentence of death announced as the wages of sin. He was now in the position of a rebel, and, suffering the punishment of a rebel, he had the dislike and the distrust of one. How were these feelings to be removed, and love and confidence reinstated in the human heart? It could not be by the manifestation of justice and power; that might have annihilated the guilty race, it could not have effected a religious reformation; no, love only can beget love,—benefits alone can remove aversion,—goodness alone can produce esteem, and by these principles God assailed the obduracy of the human heart, and subdued it by the demonstrations of his tender mercy, whilst He, by whom the world was made, demonstrated his power to rectify the evil which had been introduced, and to redeem mankind, through whom he had resolved that his name should be glorified, from the thralldom and condemnation of sin.

It is not men and this world alone that are effected by this dispensation. "The angels desire to look into these things," and they received important information respecting the ways of God, from witnessing the marvellous love of Christ. Before that manifestation, they had only witnessed the inflexible justice of God in the punishment of their fallen brethren, but they had not seen an instance of free pardon extended to ungrateful rebels; they had seen the fallen angels punished, and they had seen the best of fallen men enduring the punishment of death as the penalty of sin. But in the Gospel dispensation they saw how sin and death were to be abolished; they saw "life and immortality brought to light," and offered to penitent sinners, who received an earnest and pledge of their resurrection and immortality, in the death and resurrection of Christ, their spiritual head.

I say, then, that the Christian dispensation was intended for the redemption of men, and the instruction of angels, and the manifestation of the combined attributes of justice and mercy, a union which would otherwise have been incomprehensible both to men and angels. Eph. iii. 8-10. We may go farther still, and may assert that not only this, but all worlds were made by Christ, and for Christ. Col. i. 16. We do not know the state of other systems, and other worlds, nor the kind of administration that prevails under the government of the Son of Man, but we see how intimately he is connected with our world. He is "God with us," the proper object of our religious homage and adoration; nay, he is God with all created beings who can acknowledge God, and it is only through him that we can worship the Father. The human mind can form no right conception of the Eternal Spirit; the subject is so vast that we cannot bring it home to the mind with any realizing effect. When we think of God as "infinite, eternal, and invisible," without human passions, and human affections, everywhere present but nowhere seen, we are overwhelmed with the conception, and unable to discern the relation in which we stand to such a Being, as there are no steps or degrees by which it can be measured. But we can "worship him in spirit and in truth," when we see the light of his glory in the face of Christ Jesus, for, in him we see "God manifest in the flesh," possessing all our sympathies and all our feelings, but without sin, and displaying all the holy and endearing attributes which adorn the Godhead, in a shape, so to speak, which we can admire, and which we can attempt to imitate.

Here, then, is the antidote provided by the wisdom of God to counteract the only irregularity which was permitted to creep into his works; and as our admiration of beauty, harmony, and order, is increased by contrasting these qualities with deformity, discord, and confusion, so our perception of the beauties of holiness, mercy, and truth, is strengthened, in the highest degree, by comparing them with their opposites—profligacy, cruelty, and falsehood; and the anxious and inquiring mind never can find repose, till it can embrace, with cordial acceptance, the message of “grace, mercy, and peace,” proclaimed to mankind by the heralds of the Gospel. What is called natural theology may amuse the fancy, but has little tendency to improve the heart; it speaks to the imagination, and rests on a few perceived or supposed analogies, and may be successful in rebutting the arguments of unbelief, but can have no influence in conveying the assurance of faith, or the confidence of hope to the troubled mind. Christianity cannot be elucidated by any thing in the natural world; the evil which it is intended to remove exists only in the human soul, and cannot be illustrated by any natural analogy. Sin is, indeed, appropriately called the disease of the soul, and, so far as the infection is concerned, the analogy holds good; but not so in regard to the cure, for every known disease may heal of itself; but sin never will, it is strengthened by delay, and increased by palliatives; for the insensibility they produce is the confirmed palsy of the soul. There is no natural remedy for sin, the only real evil in this world; but what the law could not do because it was weak, and what man would not have done, if he could, because he was sinful, God has accomplished by the doctrine and the death of his Son; and the derangement in the moral government of the world, which has always been the stronghold of unbelief, has been made, by the Gospel, to shed light and lustre on all the divine perfections, and to display manifestations of wisdom, power, and goodness, which neither men nor angels could have conceived, had sin and misery been unknown.

THE CICADA SEPTEDECIM.

[From “The Rambler in North America.” By Charles Joseph Latrobe. London, 1835.]

THERE are few among the insect tribes of Europe capable of producing sounds of any volume. The hum of bees and wasps, the buzzing of innumerable small flies, the piping of the gnat, the chirp of the grasshopper, the cry of the cricket, the tick of the death-watch, are the greater number of those an Englishman would enumerate. In southern Europe sounds are added sharper, louder, and more incessant; and I remember having been both amused and astonished, by the effect produced by the mole-crickets of France and the Jura, and yet more by the cicada of Italy, as, sitting among the thick foliage of the Roman pine, they would fill the ear of the panting traveller for minutes before he reached the place of their luxurious enjoyment.

But what are these scattered and solitary sounds, to the din which fills the ear at certain times and seasons from the insect tribes in the transatlantic forest or swamp? The main agents in its production are, nevertheless, members of the same families of gryllus and cicada. The latter consists of many species, and affords some of the most laborious and successful musicians among the insect tribes. Every traveller has dilated upon the singular effect produced by one of them called the Catydid, as, sitting in little coteries among the trees, they fill the ear of night with their sharp and incessant wrangling; and my notice regards at present one of the same family.

When we returned from Mexico to the United States, in the summer of last year, 1834, among many points of interest, political, domestic, and foreign, which our re-entrance into the high road of civilization brought to our ears, was the fact that this was the “locust year.”

The observation of a past century had shown the inhabitants of Pennsylvania and Maryland, that every seventeenth year they were visited by a countless horde of insects of the cicada tribe, hence called Septendecim, distinct in aspect and habits from those whose annual appearance and mode of life were understood. Though of a different tribe, and with perfectly different habits from the locust of the East, (gryllus migratorius) the fact of its occasional appearance, as though by magic, in such vast swarms, had caused it to be familiarly alluded to by that name. Its last appearance had been in 1817, and its re-appearance was thus confidently predicted for the third or fourth week in May this year.

Nature, true to her impulses, and the laws by which she is so mysteriously governed, did not fail to fulfil the prediction. On the 24th of May and following day, the whole surface of the country in and about the city of Philadelphia suddenly teemed with this singular insect. The subject interested me, and as during these days I had every opportunity of being daily, I may say hourly, attentive to the phenomena connected with it, both here and in Maryland, I send you the result of my observations.

The first day of their appearance their numbers were comparatively few,—the second they came by myriads; and yet a day or two might pass before they reached their full number. I happened to be abroad the bright sunny morning which might be called the day of their birth. At early morning, the insect, in the pupa state, may be observed issuing from the earth in every direction, by the help of a set of strongly barbed claws on the fore legs. Its colour is then of a uniform dull brown, and it strongly resembles the perfect insect in form, excepting the absence of wings, ornament, and antennæ. The first impulse of the imperfect insect, on detaching itself from its grave, is to ascend a few inches, or even feet, up the trunks of trees, at the foot of which their holes appear in the greatest number, or upon the rail fences, which are soon thickly sprinkled with them. In these positions they straightway fix themselves firmly by their barbed claws. Half an hour's observation will then show you the next change which is to be undergone. A split takes place upon the shell, down from the back of the head to the commencement of the rings of the abdomen, and the labour of self-extrication follows. With many a throe and many a strain, you see the tail and hind legs appear through the rent, then the wings extricate themselves painfully from a little case in the outer shell, in which they lie exquisitely folded up, but do not yet unfurl themselves; and lastly, the head, with its antennæ, disengages itself, and you behold before you the new-born insect freed from its prison. The slough is not disengaged, but remains firmly fixed in the fibres of the wood; and the insect, languidly crawling a few inches, remains as it were in a dose of wonder and astonishment. It is rather under an inch in length, and appears humid and tender; the colours are dull, the eye glazed, the legs feeble, and the wings for a while after they are opened, appear crumpled and unelastic. All this passes before the sun has gained his full strength. As the day advances, the colours of the insect become more lively; the wings attain their full stretch, and the body dries and is braced up for its future little life of activity and enjoyment.

Between ten and eleven, the newly-risen tribes begin to tune their instruments; you become conscious of a sound, filling the air far and wide, different from the ordinary ones which may meet your ear. A low distinct hum salutes you, turn where you will. It may be compared to the simmering of an enormous cal-iron—it swells, imperceptibly changes its character, and becomes fuller and sharper—thousands seem to join in, and by an hour after mid-day, the whole country far and wide rings with the unwonted sound. The insects are now seen lodged in or flying about the foliage above; a few hours having been thus sufficient to give them full strength and activity, and bring them into full voice.

Well may the schoolboy and the young curly-headed negro rejoice at the sound, for their hands will never want a plaything for many days to come. Well may the birds of the forest rejoice, for this is the season of plenty for them; the pigs and poultry, too, they fatten on the innumerable swarms which before many days will cover the ground in the decline of their strength.

The pretty insect, for it is truly such, with its dark body, red eyes, and its glassy wings interlaced by bright yellow fibres, enjoys but a little week; and that merry harping which pervades creation from sunrise to sundown, for the time of its continuance is but of some six days' duration. Its character would be almost impossible to describe, though it rings in my ears every time I think of the insect. Like all those of its tribe, the sound produced is not a voice, but a strong vibration of musical chords produced by the action of internal muscles upon a species of lyre, or elastic membrane, covered with network, and situated under the wings, the action of which I have often witnessed. The female insect may utter a faint sound, but how I do not know—it is the male who is endowed with the powerful means of instrumentation which I have described. Though the sound is generally even and continuous as long as the insect is uninterrupted, yet there is a droll variety observable at times; but what it expresses, whether peculiar satisfaction or jealousy, or what other passion, I cannot divine. It has been well described by the word Pha—ro! the first syllable being long and sustained, and connected with the second, which is pitched nearly an octave lower, by a drawing smorzando descent.

During the whole period of their existence, the closest attention does not detect their eating anything; and with the exception of the trifling injury received by the trees consequent upon the process observed by the female in laying her eggs—which I will describe immediately—they are perfectly innoxious. The end to which they seem to be sent to the upper day is purely confined to the propagation of their species. A few days after their first appearance, the female begins to lay her eggs. She is furnished with an ovipositor, situated in a sheath on the abdomen, composed of two serrated hard parallel spines, which she has the power of working with an alternate perpendicular motion. When her time comes, she selects of the outermost twigs of the forest trees or shrubs, and sets to work, and makes a series of longitudinal jagged incisions in the tender bark and wood. In each of these she lays a row of tiny eggs, and then goes to work again. Having deposited to her heart's content, she crawls up the twig a few inches yet further from the termination, and placing herself in a fitting position, makes two or three perpendicular cuts into the very pith. Her duty is now terminated. Both male and female become weak; the former ceases to be tuneful; the charm of their existence is at an end; they pine away, become blind, fall to the ground by myriads, and in ten or fifteen days after their first appearance, they all perish. Not so, however, their seed. The perforated twigs die, the first wind breaks them from the tree, and scatters them upon the ground. The eggs give birth to a number of small grubs, which are thus enabled to attain the mould without injury; and in it they disappear, digging their way down into the bosom of the earth. Year goes after year—summer after summer, the sun shines in vain to them—they "hide their time!"

The reconnection of their existence begins to fade; a generation passes away; the surface of the country is altered—lands are reclaimed from the forest—streets are laid out and trampled on for years—houses are built, and pavements hide the soil.

Still though man may almost forget their existence, God does not. What their life is in the long interval none can divine. Traces of them have been found in digging wells and foundations, eight and ten feet under the surface. When seventeen years have gone by, the memory of them returns, and they are expected. A cold wet spring may retard their appearance, but never since the attention of man has been directed to them, have they failed—but at the appointed time, by one common impulse, they rise from the earth, piercing their way through the matted sod, through the hard trampled clay of the pathways, through the gravel, between the joints of the stones and pavements, and into the very cellars of the houses—like their predecessors, to be a marvel in the land, to sing their blithe song of love and enjoyment under the bright sun, and amidst the verdant landscape; like them, to fulfil the brief duties of their species, and close their mysterious existence by death. We are still children in the small measure of our knowledge and comprehension with regard to the phenomena of the natural world.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

What are your motives to Liberality?—You have given, you say, to the cause of Christian philanthropy. But, it may be inquired, when have you given? Has it been only when your sensibility has taken you by surprise? or when a powerful appeal has urged you to the duty? or when the example, or the presence, of others, has left you no alternative? or when the prospect of being published as a donor, tempted your ostentation? or when importunity annoyed you? or when under the passing influence of a fit generosity? We would not too curiously analyse the composition of any apparent virtue; nor would we have you to suspend the practice of charity till you can be perfectly certain that your motives are unmixed. But we would affectionately remind you that if you have given to God at such times only, it proves to a demonstration that you are covetous at all other times. Your covetousness is a habit—your benevolence only an act; or, rather, it is only the momentary suspension of your prevailing habit; and, as the circumstance that a man enjoys lucid intervals does not exempt him from being classed among the insane, so your accidental and occasional charities still leave you in the ranks of the covetous.—Rev. J. HARRIS. (Mammon.)

Christ looked on Peter.—My brethren, how expressive was that look! How eloquent were these eyes! Never was discourse so energetic. Never did orator express himself with so much force. Jesus looked on Peter! It was the man of griefs complaining of a new burden added to that under the pressure of which he already groaned. It was the compassionate Saviour pitying a soul about to destroy itself. It was the apostle of our salvation preaching in bonds. It was the subduer of the heart, the omnipotent God, repressing the efforts of the devil and depriving him of his prey.—SAURIN. (Sermons.)

Price paid for the Salvation of Man.—We have been bought with agony and bloody sweat; with tears and groans; with writhings of the body, and woundings of the spirit; with the torture of the cross, and the life of God; amidst darkness and fearful signs, and the rending of the rocks, and the bursting of the tombs. All that the frame and the spirit of man could endure, was suffered for us; and all that the love and mercy of God could give was lavished upon our salvation.—Wolfe's Remains.

THERE IS A WORLD TO COME.

BY CAPTAIN HAMILTON DUNDAS.

OH! is it joy we feel, or pain,
When, after many a year,
We pause, and turn our thoughts again
On things that once were dear?

Each back-reverted glance revives
Some happy moment of our lives,
Or sets before our view
Some scene in which we bore a part,
Some early feeling of the heart,
When every wish was new.

And Oh! though time's rude hand may nip
Each pleasure of the soul;
Although the draught no more we sip,
The sweets still linger on the lip,
If nectar filled the bowl.

Yet still; each object may awake
A throb of anguish keen;
Some cherished fond illusion break;
Some solace from the spirit take;
A melancholy contrast make
With what we once have been.

Thus we may reckon every stage,
Through life we've journey'd o'er,
As on the way from youth to age,
We hasten more and more;
And while we read, on memory's page,
The pangs no pity could assuage,
Or joys unfelt before;
Then rises somehow in our heart,—
Though fain we would allay the smart,—
A pain with which we're loath to part,
Deep ranking in its core.

We look around. The fields are green,
We loved to sport among;
Though clouds and storms have passed between,
Unchanged the soft blue sky I ween,
The river, bright in silver sheen,
Unchanged still flows along;
Still sweetly from the sheltering boughs,—
Soft as a lover's whispered vows,—
The linnet pours her song.

And I alone am changed indeed!
The minutes as they fly,
Still hasten, with resistless speed,
The hour when I shall die.
Yes! such at last must be my lot
To die, forgetting and forgot.
The breeze shall gently wave
The flowers that from my dust shall spring,—
The sun shall shine,—the bird shall sing,— Youth's happy hours their flight shall wing,—
New summers shall their garlands fling,
Unchanging o'er my grave!

Yet Oh! when in my saddest vein,
I ponder thus alone,
And, with the waywardness of pain,
Weep over what is gone,
Methinks I see a beacon bright,
Gilding, with mild and heavenly light,
The darkness of my gloom.
Brighter and brighter shines the ray
That lights me on my lonely way,
While some kind spirit seems to say,—
“There is a world to come.”

The benefit of Sabbath School Teaching.—At the annual meeting of the Sunday School Union, in 1824, the Rev. Jacob Stanley said he would relate a fact respecting a Sunday scholar. Some years ago, there was a widow in Staffordshire, whose son attended the Sunday school, but he did not at first regard the religious instructions he had received. He became wild and profligate; he enlisted as a soldier, and was several years on the continent. Another young man, from the same town, was proceeding to join his regiment, and called on the poor widow to ask her if she had any thing to send to her son. She said she was very poor, she had no money to send, and, if she had, it might do him no good, but that she could send him a Bible; and she added, “Give my love to him, and tell him that it is my earnest wish that he would read this book; and, beginning at Matthew, that he would read one chapter every day.” The young man took the Bible, and when he joined the regiment, he found out his townsman, who asked him, “Well, have you seen the old woman, and how is she?” “She is well, has sent you this present, a Bible; and she desired me to say that it was her request, and perhaps her last request, that you would read a chapter in it every day.” “Well,” replied he, “I will comply with her request, on condition that you will join with me in reading this chapter.” The engagement was made, and they read to the third chapter of John, with which they were much struck; they requested and obtained an explanation of it from a pious sergeant; the Holy Spirit applied the subject to their minds, both of them became the subject of godly sorrow, and attained that peace which passeth all understanding. Soon after they were called into an engagement, the son of the widow was wounded, and carried into the rear by his comrade. When the battle was over, he went to look for his wounded comrade, he found him with that Bible open which had been the means of his conversion; it was covered with his blood, his spirit had fled. He took up the Bible, and on his return waited on the widowed mother, and presented her with it. Now of what use would the Bible have been to this young man had he not been taught, by means of the Sabbath school, to read it?

Mr Windham.—In Mr Amyot's “Account of the Life of the late Mr Windham,” prefixed to the edition of that gentleman's speeches in Parliament, is the following anecdote:—Nothing, says Mr Amyot, so highly offended him, as any careless or irreverent use of the name of the Creator. I remember, that on reading a letter addressed to him, in which the words, “My God!” had been made use of on a light occasion, he hastily snatched a pen, and before he would finish the letter, blotted out the misplaced exclamation.

RELIGION THE GREAT GOOD OF MAN.

BY THE LATE REV. HENRY LUNDIE,

Minister of Trinity College Church, Edinburgh.

In general, religion teaches a man both how to pursue, and how to use, the external comforts of life with the greatest advantage to himself. When the fear of God, and a regard to his commands, rule in the heart, and are the measure by which one takes his estimate of worldly things; when those great principles teach him moderation in his desires, and sobriety in his enjoyments, they lay the strongest foundation for his temporal felicity. For, besides that they are the best and surest means, upon the whole, of making him successful in any enterprise, they raise him greatly above all the trouble and disquiet of disappointments, and enable him to possess whatever he obtains with the truest taste and relish; since to enjoy within the bounds of sobriety, is certainly to seek out all that is good in earthly things.

Further, when the external comforts of life fail, religion only can enable a man effectually to possess his own soul. The strength of reason, alone, will do much to support many men in any circumstances of distress. Some will endure wonderfully, from a natural hardness of temper, and others, again, are blessed with a natural cheerfulness of spirit, which almost nothing can subdue. But religion improves and perfects every laudable principle upon which a man can suffer with any tolerable ease or decency. It is many times necessary to aid and support the strongest reason, to encourage the stoutest heart, and to give life to the countenance of those who are naturally of the most cheerful spirit. For the reason, and courage, and spirit of a man, will often yield, and may be overcome, and happy is the man whose natural dispositions are fortified by religious motives, in all cases. The treasure of his happiness is lodged in a heart impregnable by outward calamities.

I. Religion secures the peace of a man's own mind in all events. No man's conscience ever stared him in the face, or accused and condemned him, because he feared God and kept his commandments. No, not though by that very thing he had suffered, or was certainly to suffer, in his worldly interests. On the contrary, the soul of a man is then serene, and possesses itself in peace and tranquillity, whatever the temporal consequence of his piety towards God, and his obedience to him, may be. The wise man, speaking of religion under the name of wisdom, hath said, "All her paths are peace." Prov. iii. 17. In like manner, the prophet hath declared, "The work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever." Is. xxxii. 17. At any rate, would he say, religion shall be peace, in the very act; and a reflection upon it, shall, at all times, quiet the soul, and fill it with everlasting comfort and good hope.

Nor can it well be otherwise. Religion silences the storms of passion in the soul. It reduces everything there into order and harmony. All things are as they should be where it prevails,—easy, regular, and free. Reason, which should always bear sway in the soul of man, is exalted to rule with sovereign command; for religion is, itself, the highest reason. The inferior faculties, and the sensual appetites, are taught to submit and obey; and when that is the case, a man's own conscience acquits him, and approves of him; and this is a source of everlasting peace to him. "If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God." 1 John iii. 21.

Religion puts the soul in such a state as a body politic is in, when all its members keep within their proper spheres and do the duties of their several stations: it hath peace and concord in itself, though tumult and disorder should reign around it. Or, the state of a soul, under the influence and power of religion, may be compared to the natural body in a state of full health and vigour: it feels little from the change of seasons; clouds or sunshine, storm or calm, fair or foul weather, are much the same to it. "Great peace have they which love thy law; and nothing shall offend them." Ps. cxix. 165. "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." Phil. iv. 7. But the wicked are not so; for the opposite reasons, which must now be obvious, they are, as the prophet hath well expressed their condition, "like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt," Is. lvii. 20; and, therefore, the prophet adds, with no less truth than solemnity, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Ver. 21.

II. Religion is a fountain of pleasure to the soul in every circumstance of life. The region of peace is also the seat of pleasure; and religion, which blesses the soul so abundantly with peace, makes it likewise, at the same time, and from the same causes, to overflow with pleasure. "All her paths are peace;" and therefore it is, that, as Solomon observes, "her ways are ways of pleasantness." Prov. iii. 17. "I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies, as much as in all riches," saith the holy Psalmist. Ps. cxix. 14. Whoever has felt the stings of guilt and remorse, may easily conceive something of the joys of a heart at peace with itself. "A stranger doth not intermeddle with this joy," Prov. xiv. 10; and outward accidents cannot rob a man of it. It is like a pure perennial spring, that is never dried up by the heats of summer, nor disturbed by the winter storms. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmities when it is so supported.

Therefore, said our Saviour to his disciples, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven." Matt. v. 11, 12. So, also, the Apostle Peter speaks, "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you." 1 Pet. iv. 12—14. Upon these words, the Apostle Paul writes, "We glory in tribulations also." Rom. v. 3. Farther, "I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulations." 2 Cor. vii. 4. And upon the same grounds, he gives this exhortation, "Rejoice evermore." 1 Thes. v. 16.

III. Religion is the only thing that can secure to a man the enjoyment of God. In some sense, men are capable of enjoying God in this world. They are capable of enjoying the smiles of his countenance and the fruits of his favour, of holding a blessed intercourse and correspondence with him, and deriving from him the rich and unspeakable communications of his grace. Besides, they are capable of the hope of a full and immediate enjoyment of God hereafter; and he who hopes, may already be said to enjoy in part. This it is which sweetens all the toils of life, and powerfully supports a man in every step of his weary pilgrimage on earth; and without all controversy, it is religion alone, or the fearing God and the keeping of his commands, that can put any man in a capacity of enjoying God in this sense. "This," saith the Apostle John, "is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." 1 John i. 5, 6. So also the Apostle Paul, "What fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" 2 Cor. vi. 14. To the same purpose the Psalmist, "Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee. The foolish shall not stand in thy sight; thou hatest all workers of iniquity." Ps. v. 4, 5. Whereas, "the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright." Ps. xi. 7. Again, "Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice; let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them; let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee. For thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield." Ps. v. 11, 12. Once more, "The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles." Ps. xxxiv. 17. To them it is said by our blessed Saviour, "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Luke xi. 9. And, "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" Ver. 13. Finally, great and glorious is "the hope which is laid up for you in heaven." Col. i. 5. "Christ in you, the hope of glory." Ver. 27. In a word, religion assimilates the soul to God. The fear of God and the keeping of his commands, is that which forms men to a resemblance of him. This is the effect of prayer and devotion, of faith, and love, and hope, and every branch of religious or Christian duty; and men are only capable of enjoying God, in any sense, in so far as they are like to him.

This is the great eternal reason, for which religion is so absolutely necessary to the enjoyment of God in heaven, as we are everywhere in Holy Scripture taught to believe it is. The full and immediate enjoyment of God is reserved for the heavenly state; and to enjoy him in that state, is the consummation of the Christian's hope and happiness. Nothing is wanting to complete the felicity of the saints in heaven. "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." 1 Cor. xiii. 12. O the fulness of joy that is in the unveiled presence of God! O the pleasures that are at his right hand for evermore! Crowns and kingdoms, and all the most envied glories of this lower world, are nothing when compared with the happiness of enjoying God in heaven; of being ever with the Lord, and seeing him as he is; "of following the Lamb wheresoever he goeth," Rev. xiv. 4; "of dwelling in the New Jerusalem, where the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the only temple; and where there is no need either of the sun, or of the moon to shine, for the glory of God Happy the nations of which are saved, who shall walk in the light of it!" Rev. xxi. 22-24. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor can it enter into the heart of man to conceive, the riches and greatness of this felicity! Certainly, a man cannot have half the contempt for the play-things of a child, that a soul in heaven, blessed with the enjoyment of God, must have for all the territory, and power, and treasure of this lower world.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF PHILIP MELVILL, ESQUIRE,

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF PENDENNIS IN CORNWALL.

THE subject of the following Sketch was born at Dunbar on the 7th of April 1762. His father, who was collector of customs in that town, knew from personal experience the exalted enjoyments of the true Christian, and aided, therefore, by his wife, who was also a woman of sincere piety, he sought to train up his children in the fear of the Lord. Philip was the fourth and youngest son, and being naturally of a mild and gentle disposition, he was the favourite of his mother. Frequently would she take him along with her in her solitary walks through the woods and fields which surrounded their delightful country-seat, about five miles from Dunbar, and directing his youthful mind to the wonders of creation, she taught him to think of that Almighty Being by whom they were at first brought into being.

The instructions which on such occasions he received, enforced, as they were, with all the tenderness and affection of a mother's fondness, made an indelible impression upon young Melvill's heart. Many years afterwards, when it might have been supposed the lapse of years would have effaced from his memory all recollection of the events of his early days, we find him exclaiming, with the utmost enthusiasm, "Dear, dear mother, how soothing and delightful is the very name! how much more the remembrance of thy kind offices of love and of all the sweets of thy society,—the frequent walk by thy dear side along the flowery path,—the benign expression of thy countenance;—the instruction which flowed from thy lips, gentle and insinuating as the dew,—thy pious concern to raise my childish thoughts from nature up to nature's God—thy faithful and earnest expostulations when my sinful heart led me astray!"

Thus early imbued with the principles of religion, he took his place at the communion-table before he had completed his sixteenth year; and having solemnly dedicated himself to God, he felt that he was now bound by the strongest of all obligations to live "soberly, and righteously, and godly in the world." The time was fast approaching when it was necessary that he should choose a profession. Young Melvill, attracted by the glitter and the gaudy show of a military life, hastily resolved to be a soldier, and his father, not deeming it his duty to oppose his son's inclinations, soon procured for him a commission in the 73d regiment, then under the command of Lord Macleod. The condition on which this commission was obtained was, that the young officer should raise a certain number of men. This, accordingly, he succeeded in effecting by the assistance of some of his relations in the north of Scotland whom he visited for that purpose. On his return from this northern excursion young Melvill spent a few weeks under his father's roof before joining his regiment, which was destined for foreign service. This was to the whole family a time of much anxiety, and the parents eagerly embraced every opportunity of which they regarded as suitable to the occasion. At length the parting day arrived. His father, with outstretched hand and fervent prayer, commended him to the care of the Almighty, and they parted never more to meet in this world. His mother accompanied him as far as Haddington, eleven miles from Dunbar. Here they knelt down together, and with strong crying and tears she committed her darling son to the keeping of Him who had hitherto proved himself so remarkably her own God. Rising from her knees the good woman embraced her son and gave vent to her feelings in these words: "My Philip, what a mercy it is that we know not what is to come; wisely and graciously hath the Lord concealed from us the sorrows that await us; we should otherwise be unnerved and unfitted for the duties of life."

Having received his mother's parting blessing, the young man set out for Elgin where his regiment was quartered. Here he found himself suddenly involved in all the gaiety of a military life; but by the merciful interposition of that God to whose protection he had been committed, Mr Melvill was graciously preserved in the midst of temptation. An experienced officer in the regiment was led to take an interest in him, and by the fatherly advice and excellent example of this individual, the young soldier was persuaded to avoid the company of ungodly associates, and to prosecute his studies with a view to promotion.

In a short time the regiment, consisting of a thousand men, being considered fit for service in the field, they marched from Elgin to Fort George in May 1778, whence they were conveyed in transports to embark for the East Indies. On their arrival at Portsmouth, however, they were too late for the East India fleet of that season, and they were ordered to Guernsey. There they were quartered till the following December, when they removed to Petersfield, where they remained till their final embarkation for India in March 1779.

When the regiment were about to embark, a mutiny broke out in one of the companies, from the prevalence among them of an absurd report that they were sold by government to the East India Company. By the prudence and firmness, however, of the superior officers, particularly of Lord Macleod, the mutiny was soon quelled, and the regiment quietly embarked on board the vessels appointed to receive them. During the voyage, Lieutenant Melvill was seized with a fever which broke out among the troops, and for some time his life was despaired of; but at length, by the kindness of Providence, he recovered. The passage was tedious, extending to ten months; and it was with no small joy, therefore, that on the 8th of January 1780, they found the fleet safely anchored in Madras Roads.

At the time when Lieutenant Melvill arrived in India, matters were in a very critical state. The British power in that country appeared to be tottering; and Hyder Ali, with his son Tippoo Sahib, had brought an immense army into the field, resolved to wrest from the English a territory which he considered they had unjustly won. With the view of opposing these powerful princes, large reinforcements of soldiers were from time to time despatched from the shores of Britain; and it was with the same design, that Lieutenant Melvill had, along with his regiment, been ordered to the East. No sooner had he set foot in India, than his services in the field were required; and in the first engagement with Hyder Ali's army, he received a severe wound, which, had it not been for the peculiar arrangements of Providence, would have proved fatal. The circumstances are thus stated in his published life:—

"By this wound the bone of his left arm was shattered. A few instants after, as he was turning round to give the word of command, a ball passed through the same arm and part of his left breast. Had he been standing in this particular position, at the very instant of receiving the wound, it must, from the direction the ball took, have proved fatal. The enemy's cavalry having penetrated into our ranks, after the surrender, in the confusion and carnage which ensued, the muscles of his right arm were cut in two by a sabre, and he was dashed unmercifully on the ground. After this, he was dragged by the heels for a considerable space, his head striking against the stones, and his disjointed arms trailing over the ground; he was then stripped of all his clothes, including even his shirt; and while lying on the ground, naked, helpless, and writhing in dreadful agony, a barbarian horseman, with wanton cruelty, pierced his back with a spear. In this miserable situation, he lay two days and two nights, exposed to the intense heat of a burning sun by day, to the danger of being torn to pieces by beasts of prey, and, what was more dreadful than any or all circumstances of suffering united, to the intolerable pangs of burning thirst, without the smallest means of mitigation. After having endured the most indescribable sufferings, under which he would, in all human probability, have perished, had it not been for the humane and generous attentions of a fellow-sufferer, (Lieutenant Forbes,) he was at last, on the morning of the third day, picked off the field by some of the enemy, who, merely for the sake of the reward of ten rupees offered for bringing in a European alive, carried him, in the most cruel and insulting manner, into their camp."

After remaining several days in the enemy's camp in this miserable state, Lieutenant Melvill was conveyed to Arnee, and afterwards to Bangalore, where, along with several of his brother officers, he was thrown into prison, and treated with the most savage cruelty and severity. Though his body was racked with pain and enfeebled by sickness, all medicine was denied him. For nearly four years, this barbarous treatment was the unhappy doom of our young soldier. His couch, to use his own words, "was the ground spread with a scanty allowance of straw; the same wretched covering which shielded the limbs from nakedness by day, served also to enwrap them by night. The sweepings of the granary were given him for food in any dirty utensil or broken earthen pot."

For a long time, Lieutenant Melvill and his companions almost despaired of deliverance from the horrors of their confinement. Peace, however, having been concluded, the prison-doors were thrown open, and the poor emaciated inmates once more saw the light of day. In an ecstasy of joy, they embraced one another, and marched from their narrow cells with hearts filled with the liveliest emotions of gratitude to God as they gazed on the glorious canopy of heaven, which had been so long hid from their view. All around them appeared beautiful, because all was new, and therefore interesting. Advancing by easy marches, the prisoners at length entered the frontier town of Vellore on the 25th of April 1784.

Lieutenant Melvill, who was now advanced to the rank of Captain, was disabled from service both by his wounds and the general state of his health. Instead, however, of returning to England, he spent some time with a brother who was resident in Bengal. It was a joyful, yet a melancholy meeting; for, in addition to all the complicated sufferings through which the Captain had passed since they last met, news had recently reached India of his father's death—an event which, to the brothers, was a source of heart-felt sorrow.

Early in the year 1786, Captain Melvill returned to his native land. On entering the Channel, he became so impatient to tread once more on British ground, that he went ashore at Falmouth. The view of Penennis Castle particularly attracted his notice as he approached the harbour, and he secretly thought, if he should ever be permitted to choose his residence, he would prefer that place to any other. Little did he then know, that in the mysterious providence of God, the time would yet come when his wish should be fulfilled.

From Falmouth he proceeded to London, and remaining there only a very short time, he hastened northward to revisit the place of his birth. But how painful the change which presented itself to his reflecting mind! Seven short years had passed since he left his father's house; and already both father and mother were buried in the dust, or rather were now inhabitants of that brighter and better world where change is unknown. The family seat, where he had spent many a happy day, was now occupied by strangers. Everything bore the impress of change,—and was there no change in himself? Yes, he too was changed. He had gone forth from beneath his father's roof a comely youth, in the bloom of health and vigour; now he returns maimed, disabled, shattered,—a mere wreck of what he once was! At the outset of his career his heart beat high with the hope of military renown; now, at the early age of twenty-four, he returns so utterly disabled by his numerous scars, as to be unfit for service, and all hope of promotion, therefore, at least by his exertions in the field, is gone! In these circumstances, Captain Melvill looked upon the scene of his early days with feelings of the deepest sorrow, and although, in the society and kind hospitality of a brother and sister, who still resided in Dunbar, his griefs were somewhat alleviated, he could but ill conceal the emotions which struggled in his breast.

It was necessary, however, that he should endeavour, without delay, to lay aside vain regrets, and to procure from Government that assistance which his disabled condition so much required. He was no longer fit for active service, and he could only hope, therefore, for such slight promotion as is given to an invalid. Hastening to London, he made known his case by memorial at the War Office, and such was the unexpected interest which the then Secretary at War took in this meritorious young officer, that he procured him, in a few days, the command of an invalid company at Guernsey. This was precisely such a situation as Captain Melvill wished, and he entered upon its duties with the utmost cordiality and zeal. The society in the island was remarkably pleasant, and though vital religion was at rather a low ebb, there were some families distinguished for their sincere and devoted piety. In one of these, the family of Peter Dobre, Esq. of Beauregard, Captain Melvill became a frequent visitor, and in the course of a few months, married the youngest daughter. For some time before his marriage, the impressions of his youth had returned upon him with resistless force, and he began to be much more frequent and earnest in secret prayer. Not that he had ever ceased to feel, amid all the bustle and turmoil of a military life, the importance of religion. Now, however, he resolved, in the strength of divine grace, to lead a life of intimate and endearing communion with his God. The sincere aspirations of his heart were those of Cowper, expressed in his beautiful hymn—

"O! for a closer walk with God,
A calm and heavenly frame,
A light to guide me on the road
That leads but to the Lamb."

The change in his mode of life was quite apparent to all who knew him, and while it surprised some, it displeased others. The course, however, which he now began, he was enabled to carry forward, and, amid all opposition, he persevered in maintaining a most exemplary consistency of character and conduct. The happiness which he enjoyed at this period of his history was greater than is usually allotted to mortals on this side the grave. In worldly circumstances he was easy, his military duty was moderate, and if his prospects of promotion in the service were limited, his ambition was also limited, for he had learned to "set his affections on things above, not on things of the earth." And his happiness was in no slight degree enhanced by the high privilege which he enjoyed in having a partner who was like-minded with himself, so that they could walk together as "heirs of the grace of life." In this happy situation he lived peaceful and contented, in the enjoyment of many temporal comforts, and rich in the possession of that "peace which passeth all understanding." In every good work he was zealous and active. He established a family altar in his house; he watched over the moral conduct no less than the military discipline of his company; he provided a school for the soldiers' children at Castle Cornet, supplied them with books, and by his frequent presence in the school, he stimulated the scholars to diligence and regularity of attendance. Every Sabbath evening the children repaired to his house for religious instruction, and on these occasions he used every possible means to impress their tender minds with a relish for the lessons of the Bible. In the company of the pious he now spent his happiest hours, and he seemed to feel it a high privilege to devote his time, his substance, his every talent, to the service of God.

After spending five years in this tranquil, happy state, the French revolution having broken out, and the country being, in consequence, involved in the miseries of war, Captain Melvill found his military duties so much increased, as seriously to affect his already debilitated constitution. He accordingly applied for a removal from his present situation, and was transferred to a company at Portsmouth. Soon after leaving Guernsey and landing in England, he took a house a few miles from Southampton, on the Portsmouth road. Having settled his family there, he went to Portsmouth to inspect his company. On returning home, he was seized with a severe illness, which brought on great weakness. Finding his health quite inadequate for active duty, he applied to the Commander-in-chief to be placed on the retired list, which was granted. He then removed with his family to the county of Devon, and settled at Topsham. Here he spent much of his time in the education of his children; and it was while in this place that he first had an opportunity of perusing Cowper's Poems,—a book which ever after continued a favourite work with him. He read it with great delight, and took every occasion of recommending it to others.

Having recovered his health by a summer's residence at Topsham, he was desirous of again engaging in active duty, and accordingly he exchanged his full pay as a retired captain, for the command of an invalid company stationed at Pendennis Castle in Cornwall. On removing to his new situation, however, he found that a post of considerable difficulty had been assigned him. The captain with whom he had exchanged had been frequently absent, and the soldiers, in consequence, had for some time been unaccustomed to the strict rules of military discipline; and besides the annoyance arising from this circumstance, Captain Melvill's authority was disputed by the commanding officer of a regiment of militia, then on duty at Pendennis. To put an end to all doubt upon this latter point, he resolved to endeavour to obtain the office of lieutenant-governor of the castle. The officer who held that situation was then in Hampshire, and upon application being made to him, he agreed to resign in favour of Captain Melvill. Having procured the office, he was not long in restoring discipline and good order among his troops, and in securing the respect and esteem of all under his command. He was anxious to prevent his soldiers from falling into habits of idleness, and accordingly he gave all who chose a piece of ground to cultivate, and supplied them with tools. He encouraged them in building cottages for their families, and when they were completed, he furnished each cottage with a Bible and religious tracts.

While thus employed in ministering to the temporal comfort and spiritual improvement of all who were intrusted to his care, he himself was growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Being a child of God, he was not exempt from suffering. Two of his children were brought, by a dangerous sickness, to the gates of death; and his second son, a boy of great promise, was cut off by consumption after an illness of four months.

In the spring of 1804, Captain Melvill's health began to decline; and having obtained leave of absence, he proceeded to Bath for the benefit of the waters. Not deriving much benefit there, he removed to Bristol, where he was joined by his family, and spent a twelvemonth very happily, enjoying the society of a few pious friends, with whom he was accustomed to meet for prayer, reading the Scriptures, and religious conversation. In the summer of the following year, his health being much improved, he returned to Pendennis, where, though still retained as lieutenant-governor, he was placed on the list of captains retired on full pay. He had now more time at his command, and he diligently employed himself in works of piety and benevolence. Besides the regular service in the garrison, which he had established, the Church service and a sermon were read in his own family every Sabbath evening, and as many of the soldiers as chose to attend found a ready welcome.

In November 1806 he was seized with a violent inflammation in the chest, which for some time threatened to prove fatal. It pleased God, however, to restore him again to health, and thus to disappoint the fears of his affectionate family and friends. His constitution from this time was evidently somewhat enfeebled; and, in consequence of occasional attacks of illness, he found it necessary to spend a great part of his time at Penryn. An event soon after occurred which it might have been thought would have produced a permanent impression upon his already weakened frame. It is thus noticed in the Memoir already referred to:—"One Saturday in August 1808, he had despatched letters to his eldest son, who, having attained the rank of first lieutenant in the Royal Artillery, had gone to Madeira with the expedition under the command of General Beresford. The day after despatching his letters, being Sunday, the lieutenant-governor was attending divine service at the parish church, as usual, when he received a message from Mrs Melvill to come home. He was of course somewhat surprised, perhaps a little alarmed at being sent for before divine service was finished, and he hastened home as quickly as possible. How was his heart torn with anguish to hear that his first-born, the child of many prayers, and great promise, the delight of his friends, and the hope of his parents, had perished beneath the briny wave! On the 11th of July, accompanied by a brother officer and his own servant, he had gone out from Madeira in a pleasure-boat. On returning to the shore the boat upset, and Lieutenant Melvill sunk into the mighty waters to rise no more. The effect of this intelligence upon the lieutenant-governor can more easily be conceived than described. His fairest hopes were blasted as in a moment. For a time sighs choked the power of utterance; but at length the first paroxysm of paternal grief beginning to abate, he lifted up his eyes, streaming with tears, towards heaven, and exclaimed, 'God is love,' 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord.'"

Painful as this dispensation was, Lieutenant-Governor Melvill was powerfully supported under it; and it was remarked, that his health, instead of being affected by a trial so severe, was at that period better than it had been since his return from India. As the duty of lieutenant-governor did not require his constant attendance at Pendernis, he removed, in the end of the year 1810, to London, and took a house at Islington. To his benevolent and active mind, the metropolis opened up an ample field for exertion. In Bible and Missionary Societies, but particularly the Naval and Military Bible Society, he took a lively interest, and endeavoured, by every means in his power, to promote their success.

Some business at Pendernis requiring his presence, he left his family to proceed thither on the 20th of August 1811. He arrived safely at Falmouth, and in rather better health than when he set out on his journey. This, however, was but of short duration. In the course of a few weeks, and before he had completed his arrangements for returning home, he was seized with a nervous fever, which soon degenerated into a typhus or putrid fever. The symptoms assumed a very dangerous character, and the surgeon thought it prudent to write Mrs Melvill, stating, in the gentlest terms, the illness of her husband. The whole family were alarmed by the intelligence; but every succeeding day brought more favourable accounts, until at length a letter was received from the lieutenant-governor himself, announcing his recovery. But, alas! these bright hopes were soon blasted. On the 16th of October letters arrived from the surgeon and a friend, conveying the melancholy tidings that he had been attacked by a disease of another kind, which had called for the performance of an operation, the consequences of which could not be ascertained. In these circumstances, Mrs Melvill deemed it her duty to proceed, without delay, to Falmouth, where she continued to the last to watch by his dying couch. He gradually sunk; but during the few remaining days of his life, he evinced the resignation of a sincere follower of Jesus. The following account, from the pen of his pious and affectionate partner, will be read with interest:—

"In the morning, observing my tears, he said,—'God will protect the widow and the orphan.' He frequently laid his hand upon his breast, and said he felt a very unpleasant sensation. I asked him if his mind was comfortable? He replied,—'Yes, quite comfortable; the Lord is my refuge.' I began to quote the third verse of the twenty-sixth chapter of Isaiah. He took up the words and said,—'Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee.' I said, 'You experience this now?' He replied, 'I do.' Soon after, the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah was read. He listened with visible pleasure, and said, when it was finished, 'O that is a delightful chapter!—it deserves to be written in letters of gold.' He then desired the seventh verse of the seventeenth chapter of Jeremiah to be referred to,—'Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is.' He added, 'But cursed is the man that trusteth in man.' We remarked that his hands were cold. He said, 'If I have cold hands, I have a warm heart.' Yes, truly! his heart was full of divine love.

"Every moment now seemed almost the last; and, eager as I was to hear his voice as long as possible, I spoke to him whenever I could, endeavouring, as the Lord enabled me, to hold those great and invaluable promises to his mind. Every word he said was particularly noticed,—for it seemed the last,—and they were all noted down the day after his decease.

"Either pain or great oppression caused him now and then to cry out. I said, 'Christ is with you!' He eagerly answered, 'O yes! that he is; he is my very present help; he is my Shepherd,—I will fear no evil.' Christ was precious to his soul; to those that believe, He is precious; Christ was to him 'like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.' He repeated the tenth verse of the fifty-fourth chapter of Isaiah,—'For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee.' He asked me if I did not remember a farewell sermon preached by Dr Hawker from that text? He then again repeated the verse with delight. I began the hymn, 'Jesus, I love thy charming name,' he proceeded, and went through the whole of this, his favourite hymn, with great emphasis. Hearing us say, 'In my father's house are many mansions;' 'Yes,' he subjoined, 'if it were not so, I would have told you.' 'Christ,' he said, 'is the good shepherd; he knows his sheep, and they know him; none shall ever pluck them out of his hand.' 'I am of his fold.' He quoted also the thirteenth verse of the forty-first chapter of Isaiah,—'For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, fear not, I will help thee; and this passage, 'Though an host should encamp against me, mine heart shall not fear;' also, 'When my heart and my strength fail, the Lord is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever.' Addressing himself to me, in a very particular manner, he said, 'In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths.' He remarked, that all our sufferings are nothing to what our Lord suffered, and not worthy to be compared with that eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed, concerning which it is said, 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' Expressing his trust in God's watchful care over him, he said, 'The angels of the Lord encamp round those that fear him;' 'For he shall give his angels charge concerning them.' I said, 'Jesus is the friend of sinners.' He eagerly took up the words, and said, 'The friend of sinners, able to save to the uttermost, and casteth out none who come unto God by him.' He says, 'Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart. Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and take my yoke upon you, and you shall find rest for your souls.' He also quoted that sublime passage,—'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and particularly dwelt upon the twenty-seventh verse, 'whom I shall see FOR MYSELF, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another.' He added, 'I can say,' with St. Paul, 'I know in whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him.' 'All power is given unto him, both in heaven and earth; therefore the believer can always triumph in Christ Jesus, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' I remarked, that we had not an High Priest who could not be touched with a sense of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.' He heard me with pleasure. I then observed, that 'we were not sufficient of ourselves.' He exclaimed, 'O, no! none but Christ! none but Christ!'

"These, I believe, were nearly his last words. Just then a thought struck me, that as he had held out so long, there was still ground for hope. I left my place on the bed, and, going into the next room, I communicated my thoughts to the nurse. She was of the same opinion, and mentioned an instance of one who had been rescued from death by the aid of restoratives. Though I knew the cases were widely different, I could not part with the flattering suggestion of my mind. I returned, and offered my dear husband a cordial. He, with difficulty, swallowed a spoonful, but declined the next. I took his hands into mine. The pulse had been scarcely perceptible for the last hour. The nurse came in, and said the physician was below. After hesitating for a moment to admit him, I said, 'Let him come in.' Just as he entered the room, at that instant the dearest, best of men, turned his head to one side, and, after two or three breathings, without the least struggle, resigned his precious soul into the bosom of his adored Redeemer. Solemn, solemn scene! May it never be effaced from my heart!"

Yes! the death-bed of a Christian is a solemn, but it is also a soul-elevating scene. He dies, but death is to him a messenger of peace, sent from on high to convey his soul to a holier and happier abode. When a Christian departs,—when he shuts his eyes upon the dim and flickering objects of time, there burst upon his view the glories of eternity. How sudden, how transporting the change!

THE BENIGHTED PILGRIMS.

No. I.

BY THE REV. LACHLAN MACLEAN,

Chaplain to the Lunatic and Blind Asylums, Edinburgh.

"To the poor the Gospel is preached," formed the affecting conclusion of the Redeemer's answer to the message of the imprisoned Baptist. Other glorious facts were stated, but the Saviour's interest in the heirs of wretchedness was brought forward as the last and strongest proof of his divine character; it was also adduced as a circumstance calculated, above all others, both to manifest the condescension of the Son of God, and to visit with comfort those who were the objects of that kind attention. Nor is it merely on this solitary occasion that such a statement was made; it is the distinguishing, the all-pervading character of the Gospel of peace, that it is addressed to the poor in spirit, the destitute, the grieved, the broken-hearted children of men. To exclude, then, from the exercises of religion, such as can, in the slightest degree, comprehend the importance of these duties, merely because they are afflicted, would be to withstand the gracious purposes of Him who invited the weary and heavy laden to draw near to him, that they might find rest to their souls. The weary and heavy laden form, alas! a numerous family, but in that suffering family, it may be safely stated, the insane are pre-eminent in wretchedness. Yet, although such is the case, these poor mourners, until lately, were left in solitary sadness to brood over broken ties and withered hopes; their fellow-men did not trouble to convince them that they were still the objects of Christian solicitude,—still dear to Him who forgets not his creatures, though grovelling in the dust of misery. The ominous word "unclean," in ancient times, left to the cheerless outcast from his brethren an uninterrupted path; no eye recognised, no voice welcomed the unhappy pilgrim. So was it with insanity; its existence, under any modification, where restraint was necessary, was deemed sufficient to warrant the offers of mercy being directed to some other quarter, sufficient to exclude the dark, the troubled mind from Gospel consolation, at the very time when such consolation was most of all required. This proceeded, however, not from any indifference to the condition of the insane, but from a mistaken idea as to their capacity for receiving instruction. Because the case of some was hopeless, it was rashly concluded that all afflicted with insanity, in any form, were incapable of appreciating the advantages of religious worship, or joining with respect in religious duties. Little were those who entertained such an opinion aware of the real condition of many of the inmates of an Asylum. Father, mother, wife, the first-born, the beginning of strength, the youngest, the child of old age, may fall upon the ear as unmeaning words, and in vain appeal to the desolate heart for a place in its affection; yet the heart that is thus dead to the world and its dearest ties, may be tremblingly alive to the interests of an eternal world; the heart in which the fire of insanity has seared every cord of earthly sympathy, may yet retain, in undying strength, the cords that bind it to its heavenly Father.

Frailest man may behold no channel through which he can direct the streams of consolation to the wounded spirit, but the day of man's weakness is the day of God's power; he can bestow upon his afflicted ones comfort of which the world is ignorant, and open, even in the waste and howling wilderness of insanity, streams of uncreated goodness.

Let the Christian, then, persevere, and look to Him for a blessing who has under his control the warring elements of the mind as well as those of the material world; let him remember that although the seed may be sown in the season of tears, joyful, nay triumphant, may be the time of harvest. It need scarcely be observed, however, that in an Asylum some are to be found to whom, in general, it would be in vain to carry the message of peace, for whom prayer and supplication ought, no doubt, unceasingly to be made, but with whom the Christian teacher can seldom join in the services of the sanctuary. To this class belongs the frenzied, the ever excited lunatic. He lives in a visionary world of his own. The fancied elevation of rank which he has attained, or the storm and tempest in which he continually moves, engross his every thought; unconscious of his wretchedness he demands no sympathy, and expects neither consolation nor instruction; his brethren pity him, but their pity is rewarded with contempt. Such cases are too frequently hopeless; the light of reason either returns not at all to point out to the sufferer the sadness of his condition, or, if its blessed ray once more appears, it is, perhaps, only to gild the last hours, and soothe the last struggles, of the benighted wanderer.

In an Asylum, also, we meet with those whom insanity has reduced to all the helplessness of infancy, without its cheering promise of future excellence; the living sepulchres of a buried intellect; wrecks of humanity, having little more than the mere form of man, to prove that they, too, partake of immortality. To them the past is as a forgotten dream, the future lives not in anticipation, and even the present is only acknowledged, in so far as it ministers to their limited feelings of sense or appetite. The mind, oppressed by the contemplation of so melancholy a scene, clings for relief to the reflection, that if dethroned reason has left the poor sufferers ignorant of the joys and consolations, it has also saved them from being conscious of the miseries and cares of life; they feel not their wretchedness, for they are scarce aware of their existence.

To neither of these classes of sufferers, in general, we admit, can the cheering prospects and promises of the Gospel be advantageously pointed out. Still, at times, among the former, in milder cases, or when, from favourable circumstances, they are visited by calmer intervals, and even among the latter, exceptions have occurred, thus manifesting the power of the Most High to accomplish that which frail man would pronounce impossible. But there are others, varying in number of course, according to circumstances, (in the two Institutions with which the writer is connected, amounting to, at least, one-half of the patients,) to whom Gospel privileges are dear, and to whom, it is believed, subsequent statements will prove that these privileges have not been extended in vain. These are the partially or occasionally insane. Repeatedly individuals of the latter class have addressed the writer in the most affecting terms, deploring the wretchedness of their condition, and apologizing for what, they imagined, he might have seen or heard when the lamp of reason was obscured by midnight darkness. The poor sufferers remembered not what had occurred,—memory, dead for a time, retained no traces of the wild, the maddening tumult. Still they were conscious, from exhaustion and other circumstances, that they had been visited by a paroxysm; for deliverance from it, and the blessing of being once more permitted to worship with their brethren, they expressed themselves deeply grateful, but comfort for the future was what the imploring eye and supplicating voice above all demanded. And where can such sufferers be directed for comfort but to a pitying Saviour,—where confidently assured of unbroken repose but in his unsuffering kingdom?

The condition of such persons, during the intervals of sanity, is infinitely more distressing than can be conceived by those holding no intercourse with them. They have waked from a forgotten dream of horror, but, alas! they cannot shake off their overwhelming load of sadness with the morning light, for that fearful dream will again return; they have escaped from the wild conflict of a tempestuous sea, but theirs is no secure haven; they stand, without the power to move, trembling, lest every wave should plunge them once more into the boiling surge, where all will be forgotten amidst the deadly struggle.

The remark of a patient, when alluding to the day of darkness, could the writer but describe the look and manner of the speaker, would more powerfully affect the feeling heart than any language he can use; "Alas, Sir, it will again return." The remark was brief, but it was fearfully comprehensive. And what comfort could man, independent of revelation, offer under such circumstances? The cold maxims of worldly prudence might be eloquently urged, and every argument might be used to convince the sufferer of the propriety of yielding, with a good grace, to that from which he could not escape. Still such treatment, though it might produce either stoical apathy or despairing sullenness, (from both of which it is the object of every endeavour to save the unhappy patient,) could never beget either the Christian's blessed hope, or the Christian's filial resignation.

But when consolation is drawn from the mourner's Gospel, when its glorious promises are dwelt upon, and, above all, when the distresses of a pitying Saviour,—the storms that beat with ceaseless fury upon the only guiltless human form,—are pointed out, then, while the writer has witnessed the folded hands, and heard, with the acknowledgment of guilt, the words of a subdued yet loving heart, "Thy will be done," he has almost wished that one who denied the Lord that bought him had been present, that with triumph he might have asked him, "Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no Physician there?" After what has been stated, it need hardly be remarked that the partially insane are, in general, quite competent to join in religious exercises; indeed, such exercises, by engaging their thoughts in sound and profitable inquiries, must of necessity either afford, at least, temporary relief, or by banishing for a time from their remembrance the dominant feeling, tend to shake, if not to dissipate, the hallucinations of fancy. The approach of insanity is frequently first marked by the sufferer's thoughts and words being exclusively directed to one particular object; every thing is indifferent, unless having an actual or imaginary reference to the all-engrossing pursuit. This undivided attention to one subject frequently marks, as has been stated, the commencement of insanity; the same peculiar bias accompanies, or to speak more correctly, determines the continuance of the disease. If, then, we can for a short time cause the maniac to forget the object of delight or terror that ever meets the mind's eye, a victory has been gained; for during this period of a new mental engagement, reason has resumed its sway; the disease has been indirectly attacked,—the only way in which the patient can be thrown off his guard, for direct argument in such cases seldom fails to awaken every prejudice, and to bring into the field every angry feeling. Having once experienced the happiness arising from a new line of thought, into which he was unconsciously led, the maniac yields more readily to each attempt that is made to draw him away from his wild reveries, until at last he willingly aids the kind intentions of others, by using every effort to break the fatal spell that binds him to some unearthly vision. In these last remarks, the advantage of weaning the mind from the wedded object of every thought has been alone considered, without referring to the peculiar fitness of Gospel truths, under the divine blessing, for accomplishing a purpose so important to the insane. Yet, even in that abstract view of the question, it is evident, from reason and experience, that the principle laid down is just, and that the conclusion drawn from it is legitimate. When both these are tried by the effects of preaching to the insane, their correctness will appear still more evident.

The inmates of an Asylum have thus been divided into four classes. It is not, however, meant, that all of one class strictly resemble each other; the general outline is the same, but when we examine it minutely, the insanity of one individual, like the human countenance, is found to differ in detail from that of all others. But this distinction of features, if we may so speak, is alluded to merely to avoid misconception; for however diversified the particular characters of insanity may be, yet where reason, even to a limited extent, remains, the sufferer will be found more or less fitted to receive religious instruction; and let his case be what it may, if able to comprehend their nature, Gospel truths will meet his circumstances. From what has been stated, it must, we apprehend, be self-evident, that what the unhappy lunatics most of all require is to be soothed and comforted. In our next paper we shall consider the nature of the religious exercises in which the insane are now called to engage, and how far these are calculated to produce such effects.

THE WEEPING SAVIOUR AN ENCOURAGEMENT TO WEEPING CHRISTIANS:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. G. B. BRAND,

Minister of St. Andrew's Church, Dunfermline.

"Jesus wept."—JOHN xi. 35.

THIS is a most affecting fact in the history of our blessed Saviour, and presents us with a peculiarly amiable and interesting view of his character. The sisters, Martha and Mary, on whose account he had come to Bethany, were placed in circumstances of painful bereavement. They had lost an affectionate and beloved brother, and they keenly felt their loss. His death had plunged them into the deepest sorrow, and it could not be otherwise. The suddenness with which, as appears from the narrative, he had been taken from them; the remembrance of his worth and excellence; the recollection of the happiness they had enjoyed in his society, and in the mutual endearments of virtuous friendship; and the hope they had entertained of his sharing with them, and enhancing, by his presence, their joys in prosperity, and lightening their burden of sorrow in the season of adversity,—a hope which was now cruelly disappointed,—would all seem to aggravate and increase the amount and bitterness of their grief. But in this hour of trial and of suffering they were not left unaided and alone. The "Friend that sticketh closer than a brother," and knew what they suffered, was present, and felt for, and sympathised with them. And, oh! how soothing the thought that this friend is present to every suffering Chris-nian ; although not, as in this instance, perceptible to the bodily eye, he is nevertheless, by his Spirit, and in his Word and ordinances, present in their every season of distress, and what he did to Martha and Mary he does to all and every one of his people. The tears which he had shed shewed how deeply he was interested, and indicated the sympathy, and compassion, and pity, which possessed his soul. Often had he signally exercised his divine power in deeds of beneficence, and often had these excited, amidst all the meanness of his outward condition, the feelings of admiration and love. They had displayed the Son of God, and impressed with wonder and astonishment the minds of those who beheld them. But never, if we except his own passion, when he poured out his soul unto death an offering for sin, and the circumstances more immediately connected with this unparalleled display of mercy and love, was he exhibited in a more interesting and engaging light than on the present occasion. Here, laying aside all the dazzling glories of his character, with a tenderness and pity becoming the Son of Man, and with a sympathy and compassion which marked him out as the friend of the human race, he mingled his tears at the grave of Lazarus with the mourning sisters and their weeping companions. "Jesus wept." This, my friends, is a scene at which almost no heart can remain unaffected and unmoved, and which no mind that has the least pretensions to Christian principle or feeling can contemplate without the liveliest feelings of interest, and admiration, and love. But, besides exhibiting the character of the Saviour in the most amiable and interesting aspect, it is fraught with instruction, and to direct your attention to some of the lessons which it inculcates, is the object which I have in view in the following discourse ; and may the Holy Spirit of God dispose and enable us to attend to, and improve them, for his glory and our good.

I. Then, I observe, that as Jesus wept at the grave of his friend, it is perfectly innocent, and lawful, and proper, that we weep at the death of our friends.

Death, whether we consider it as it respects those who are taken away, or those who are left, is an event of all others the most interesting and solemn, and which it is impossible to contemplate but with feelings of the deepest emotion. As it respects those who are taken away, it is awfully affecting. It for ever closes their connection with this sublunary scene, and all its enjoyments and pursuits ; it dissolves all the tender and endearing relations in which they stood to their fellow-men, and it removes them for ever, as to this world, from the society and embrace of those to whom they were united by the strongest ties of friendship and of love. But this is not all : it for ever puts a period to all their opportunities of grace and salvation ; it terminates all their preparations, and, if we may use the expression, it makes up their account for eternity ; and, without the least change in their moral condition, it introduces them to the presence and tribunal of God. In a word, it unalterably fixes their eternal state, whether of weal or woe ; for "as the tree falls so it must for ever lie : " there is no repentance after death ; all is fixed and immoveable beyond the grave. And, as it respects those who are left, oh ! how painful are the effects, and how numerous and affecting are the changes which it produces ! It is the tearing asunder of the finest feelings of the human heart ; it is the cruel disappointment of the hopes which, of all others, we have most fondly cherished ; it cuts off at once, and for ever, one of the sources of our most delightful and satisfying enjoyments. It separates from our society those who had long participated our joys and sorrows ; who were endeared to us alike by every fond recollection of the past, and every pleasing prospect and anticipation of the future. In a word, it makes a blank in our hearts, and in all we have been accustomed to look to for happiness, which at the time nothing that this world can afford can fill up, and of which the very thought is distressing. And, oh ! how painful and severely felt the changes which it makes in our friendly or domestic circles ! Go where we will, at every turn we miss our departed friends : at the family board, and the family devotions, and in the house of God, we see their places empty. Almost unconsciously, where we were wont, we expect and look for them, but we no longer meet them ; no longer does their eye, kindling with affection, meet ours, and no longer does their voice, breathing forth the accents of tenderness and love, sound in our ears. They have disappeared from the place of living men, never to return ; and every day, and every hour, circumstances are occurring to recall them to our remembrance, and make us feel the loss we have sustained.

In these circumstances, we would not be men, did we not weep. Oh yes ! when an affectionate and beloved father or mother, or husband or wife, or child, or friend or brother, is snatched away from us by the ruthless hand of death, hard would be the heart which did not grieve, and arid indeed would be the eye which did not weep. Our first parents, although there is no express record, we can have no doubt, from the language of Eve at the birth of Seth, wept and mourned for the pious Abel : Abraham mourned the death of the venerable and beloved Sarah : Jacob wept for his beloved Rachel, and for Joseph when he thought him dead : David wept for Absalom, though his death was the consequence of his own base and unnatural treachery : The devout men who carried Stephen to his burial, made great lamentation over him ; and our Lord wept at the grave of Lazarus. And when we are called to suffer the bereavement of those whom we have tenderly loved ; when the desire of our eyes has been cut off with a stroke ; or when our children, the objects of our fondest affection, and solicitude, and hope, are removed into darkness, or when the friend and brother of our soul, with whom we had often taken sweet counsel, and walked together to the house of God, is cut down by our side, if we have the feelings of humanity, our hearts cannot but grieve, and if we have tears we cannot but weep; and to do so is not forbidden. Oh no! When we are bereaved of those who were near and dear to us, we may grieve, and grieve deeply, and our tears, although profusely, may innocently flow. "Jesus wept," and therefore we may weep. But at the same time, while it is perfectly innocent, and allowable, and proper to weep and mourn, when our friends are taken away from us, we must never forget that there is a bound to our grief and our tears beyond which we cannot pass with impunity. To attempt to fix, in any particular case, the amount of grief to be indulged, or of tears to be shed, would betray alike the grossest ignorance and presumption, for this depends much on the constitutional temperament of mourners, and on circumstances over which we have no control. But whenever our grief and our tears proceed to such an extreme as to indicate a want of confidence in the faithfulness and government of God, or infer a reflection on his divine sovereignty and justice, or to unfit us for the duties and business of life, our mourning not only loses the character of innocence, but it becomes improper and sinful. God's faithfulness endures unto all generations, and however dark and mysterious his providential procedure towards us, his work is perfect, and all his ways are just and right. Our friends, and all the blessings we enjoy, are his gifts, all of which we receive on the very condition, that he has a right to take them away at his pleasure; and, therefore, when he resumes them, he does us no injustice, he only takes but what he gave, and what we knew, all the time we enjoyed it, was his property and at his disposal; and hence to give way to immoderate grief under any of God's bereaving providences, would be to act at once an inconsiderate and ungrateful part. Neither are we to allow our grief to unfit us for the proper discharge of duty. Of this, our Lord has here given us an instance. Though he wept at the grave of Lazarus, he did not allow his doing so to make him neglect the work for which he had come to Bethany, namely, to manifest his divine power for his own and his Father's glory, in raising up Lazarus from the dead. In a word, we must never forget, that while we feel as men, we must act as Christians. Nature demands, and religion, so far from condemning, sanctions our weeping at the death of our friends, but it, at the same time, sets bounds to our grief, and furnishes us with the most satisfying reasons why we should not transgress them. It teaches us not to sorrow as those who have no hope. It reminds us that nothing here below is certain and permanent. It calls on us to look not at the things which are seen and temporal, but at those which are unseen and eternal, and it has opened up to our view another and a better world, to disengage our affections from this, and to support us under all its troubles. Let us ever remember, that the present is a state of trial and discipline, and therefore when we are called to bereavements let us have recourse to those principles which the Gospel inculcates and recommends, and to those hopes which it teaches and encourages us to entertain. Let us never lose sight of that better country, that glorious rest which remains for the righteous, and when our hearts are pierced through with many sorrows, let us raise our thoughts to heaven; let us look forward to that perfect state, where all the former things shall have passed away, where God shall wipe away the tears from every eye, and where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. But we observe,

II. That the fact here recorded of our Lord's weeping at the grave of Lazarus teaches us, that in order to our improving and obtaining the sanctified use of the trial, we ought to weep when we are called to the painful and afflicting bereavement of friends. There is no fact more clearly inculcated in the Word of God, than that all the afflictions which he sends us, whatever be their character, are intended for our benefit. Even in the case of the unregenerate, the calamities which befall them are intended, on the part of God, to rouse them to serious religious consideration, and it is their fault, and an aggravation of their guilt, that they do not improve them for this purpose. But with regard to his own people, we can have no doubt that all the trials and bereavements to which they are subjected, are intended for, and will ultimately and effectually promote their best, their spiritual and everlasting interest, for he does not afflict them willingly, and it is not for his pleasure, but for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness. The furnace of affliction, is an instrument which he often and successfully employs, both for reclaiming to himself the objects of his grace, and for quickening and animating the diligence and spirituality of his people. Numerous and affecting instances are recorded in the sacred volume of afflictions having been the means of leading to God. Manasseh, after he had long forgotten, and acted contrary to the instruction and example of his pious father, "when he was in affliction, besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers." The woman of Canaan never thought of coming to Christ until her daughter was grievously vexed with a devil. The nobleman and the Jewish ruler never thought of applying to Him, who is the great physician both of soul and body, till the only son of the one, and the only daughter of the other, were at the point of death. And the prodigal son, though he knew all the time of the abundance and plenty which abounded in his father's house, never thought of returning to it, till he was sunk to the very depths of poverty,—till he was forced to fare with the swine which he fed. In like manner, in all ages, the furnace of affliction has been instrumental in accomplishing God's gracious purposes towards his chosen. Often he has brought them into the wilderness—that is into circumstances of trial and suffering—that he might speak comfortably to them, that he might open up to them the rich and inexhaustible treasures of his grace, and fill their souls with joy and gladness. But this, unless we feel, unless our hearts are suitably affected with our afflictions, can never be expected. They are sent to us that we may feel them, and if we are hardened and insensible under them, the end which God has in view in them, can never, in our experience, be accomplished; we can never make a proper improvement, or obtain a sanctified use of them. When God, therefore, visits us with painful bereavements, our hearts must be affected, and as our tears are the natural expression of our grief, we must weep and mourn under them, else we have reason to fear we will lose the benefit they are intended to produce.

The fact recorded in our text, of our Lord's weeping at the grave of Lazarus, not only affords an example, which renders perfectly innocent, and allowable, and proper, our weeping at the death of those whom we have loved; but it has something of the nature, and carries in it the authority of an obligation. As "Jesus wept," not only may we weep, but as he wept, we must weep; if we would improve and be really benefited by our bereavements, we must be suitably affected with them; in other words, we must be brought into such a frame, as to see more clearly the vanity and emptiness of the world, and to think less of its enjoyments as a chief good; to seek as the one thing needful, the better portion than any which it can give; to think more frequently and affectionately about heaven, and to be more diligent, and active, and persevering in our preparation for its enjoyment. It is thus that we will be able to say of our bereavements, however much they may now fill our hearts with grief and our eyes with tears, "It has been good for us that we have been afflicted," and to acknowledge the mercy and faithfulness of God in having called us to them.

Thus I have endeavoured, as I proposed, to direct your attention to some of the lessons of instruction inculcated by the affecting fact recorded in our text. And I shall now conclude with a short improvement and application of the subject.

Has God, in his righteous providence, seen meet to place any of us in the circumstances here referred to? Has he taken away from us those who were near and dear to us, to whom we had been long and fondly attached, and whom we had affectionately associated with all our enjoyments, and prospects, and hopes? Let us attend to, and improve, the lessons which the affecting fact of our Lord's weeping at the grave of Lazarus teaches us. Let us not restrain our tears, as if this manifestation of our grief were culpable or forbidden. No, my friends, let us allow them to flow freely, for if even Jesus wept, may not we weep, may not we, after his example, grieve and mourn over the loss which we have sustained? It is innocent, it is lawful, it is proper we should do so; but while we yield to the feelings of humanity, let us maintain and exhibit the character and consistency of Christians; let us guard against giving way to, or indulging, such an extreme of sorrow, as would reflect on our Christian character, or throw the least suspicion on our possessing, and being under, the influence and government of Christian principles. Let us never forget that God has a sovereign right to do with us and ours as he sees best, and that whatever be the circumstances in which he is pleased to place us, it is our duty, and our wisdom, and our interest, to be resigned and submissive to his divine will. If we really belong to him, he has afflicted us not willingly, in the bereavement with which he has visited us, but necessarily,—not in wrath or in anger, but in love; and there is a time coming, either here or hereafter, when we shall see, to our soul's satisfaction, that the judgments of the Lord are right, and that in faithfulness and mercy he has thus afflicted us.

But again, has God seen meet to place us in circumstances of bereavement and distress? It is not only perfectly innocent, and allowable, and proper, but it is necessary we should weep and mourn for our departed friends; for unless we feel we will never improve our afflictions. God intends them for our good, to make us wiser, and holier, and better, more concerned about his glory and the salvation of our precious souls, more careful in the improvement of time, and more thoughtful about, and more diligent and active in, preparing for our own latter end; and it will be our own fault if they are not productive, in our experience, of these blessed effects. And one of the most effectual means for this purpose, is to cherish and live under the influence of the impressions we have received, and the feelings which have been excited in our hearts in the furnace of affliction. Let us not, therefore, hastily dry up our tears, nor allow the cares and business of the world to obliterate these impressions and these feelings from our minds. Let us often recall to our remembrance how we felt, and what we thought, and what we resolved, when we were smarting under the immediate pressure of our bereavements, when we were standing around the death-bed, or at the grave's mouth, of those whose removal we have now to deplore; and the more we do this, the more we are likely to obtain the sanctified use of our affliction, and the more we will feel encouraged to entertain and cherish the hope, that when we have finished our work on earth, we shall again meet our dear departed friends in Christ, to part no more, and to be for ever happy with them in the presence of our God and Saviour.

THE ADMISSION OF TWO ABYSSINIAN YOUTHS
INTO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S MISSION SCHOOL, AT BOMBAY.

THE past history of the Christian Church has afforded many proofs of the power of the Almighty, in accomplishing his purposes by means which, at first sight, appear utterly disproportioned to the end to be attained. In the first promulgation of the Gospel, by the apparently inadequate instrumentality of twelve illiterate fishermen, we see a remarkable instance of the weak things of the world being made to confound things which are mighty. This mode of acting is essentially different from what meets our eye in the operations of man. He prosecutes his designs by means which he considers fitted in themselves to the magnitude and importance of the end. And in this he acts wisely; for it were presumptuous in a worm of the dust to arrogate to himself a power to do more than this. But the workings of Omnipotence are a series of miracles, transcending the ability or the wisdom of man; and more especially in those events which are connected with the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, the peculiar working of a divine energy is more frequently and more obviously apparent. The conversion of one sinner from the slavery of Satan to the freedom of Christ is a miracle,—a miracle of grace, a miracle of wisdom, a miracle of mercy, a miracle of power. But when, from individual conversion, we pass to the conversion of multitudes, as on the day of Pentecost, the miraculous nature of the event obtrudes itself more conspicuously upon our notice. And although it were easy, from the records of the past, to adduce numerous instances of the conversion of multitudes even since the inspired volume was closed, we are by no means warranted to calculate in any given case on a repetition of such events. The very fact, however, that out of the operation of apparently trivial means have arisen such stupendous results, is a loud call to us not to "despise the day of small things." The cloud may be no larger at first than a man's hand, and yet, in the inscrutable providence of the Almighty, it may gather as it rolls onward, until it cover the whole heaven.

While, therefore, the impress of Divinity is so legibly stamped upon the past history of the Church's progress, we must watch with diligence the workings of God, and labour with assiduity, each individual in his own sphere, ignorant, as we are, whether the Lord shall prosper this or that. The great Disposer of all events gives no account of any of his matters; and seeing He hath not revealed to us in detail the mode of his working in the moral universe, no event, because of its minuteness, and apparent inefficiency, must be regarded by us, as, on that account, unimportant; rather let us labour in faith, believing that if God works by this, or any other instrumentality, however feeble, no power in heaven or earth can hinder it. These reflections have been suggested by a circumstance mentioned by the Rev. Dr Wilson of Bombay, in a letter dated 28th April last, and addressed to the Convener of the General Assembly's India Mission Committee. It is as follows:—

"I lately admitted into the seminary several pupils, in whom I feel a particular interest. Two of them are Abyssinians, Gabru and Maracha, the sons of Michael Warké, who was lately military commander of three towns in Habesh. They and their father are living with me in my own house. They were induced to leave their native country for their education, by the Rev. Jos. Wolff, and the Rev. Mr Isenberg, who furnished them with the following notes of introduction:—

"Adowah, in Abyssinia, Aug. 11, 1836. My dear Wilson,—The bearer of this is Michael Warké, born in Abyssinia, who comes to Bombay with two children. You will essentially forward the good cause in Abyssinia, by taking these two children under education in your own school, and do for Warké all in your power to assist him during his stay in Bombay. He has always shewn himself friendly to the Missionaries here; and has also been useful to me. Pray take great care of his children. Yours truly and affectionately, JOSEPH WOLFF.

"P. S. Brother Isenberg, in whose house I live, and who is Missionary to the Church Missionary Society, adds a few words to mine."

"My dear Sir,—As it may be expected that the Missionary of Abyssinia should take a lively interest in every thing which probably may, at some future time, forward, in any degree, the progress of the Gospel in this country, I cannot but confirm what Brother Wolff has written, to request your kind assistance to Mr Warké, and his two boys, Gabru and Maracha, and particularly to beg you to pay every attention possible to the education of the youths; as, from them, if the Lord pleases to renew their minds to true Christianity, we may expect essential usefulness to our cause. As to their claims for recommendation, I do not like to say more than that Mr Warké, as Mr Wolff has mentioned already, has rendered us assistance in several cases, and is not so prejudiced against our cause as most other Abyssinians. If the Lord pleases to bless the means of grace which he will find access to in India, he may return to Habesh a true Christian; and be of great assistance to his own country, and to those who visit it. I am, Sir, yours, in the bonds of the Gospel, CHARLES WILLIAM ISENBERG."

"The boys, who are seventeen and twelve years of age, read Ethiopic and Tigré with great fluency. Mr Wolff, (who ultimately accompanied them to Bombay, and who sailed the other day for America, with the view of entering Africa by Liberia,) left with me an Amharic and English vocabulary, made by himself, which aids me in holding communication with them. They will soon, I hope, be able to speak English. I trust that they are not the only Christians, connected with the Asiatic Churches exterior to India, who will be placed under our care.

"You, and the Assembly's committee, will be delighted to hear, that I expect, in a few days, to admit several native adults, and children, into the Church, by baptism. You shall be duly informed of the interesting service which we anticipate."

The admission into the General Assembly's seminary at Bombay, of two Abyssinian youths, may, on a superficial view of the subject, be considered as a matter of little or no importance. Were we to view the fact simply in itself and without any connection with the scheme of divine Providence, it might, perhaps, be regarded as scarcely worth recording. But when, in accordance with our prefatory observations, we regard this as one of a chain of events, arranged by a God of infinite wisdom and resistless power, we cannot refrain from hazarding the suggestion that it is possible these youths may be, as it were, "the first-fruits" of Abyssinia "unto Christ." We are aware that much has been done and is still doing for that interesting country. But here is an event, obviously out of the ordinary course, and we feel that, in connection with God's doings in the days that are past, it may well give rise to serious reflection as to its possible consequences. And while in temporal affairs the bare possibility of an event happening is sufficient to quicken our energies, how much more in spiritual matters when, however encouraging it may be occasionally to contemplate the possible consequences of any act of duty, there is superadded to such encouragement the stimulus arising from the express command of God: "In the morning sow thy seed; in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not which shall prosper, whether this or that."

ORGANIC REMAINS.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,
Minister of Newburgh.

WHEN we take into our hands a piece of sandstone, limestone, or chalk, we discover marks or stains upon it, which we at once perceive to differ considerably in colour, figure, and texture, from the stony mass itself. A minute inspection immediately leads us to the conclusion that we have before us the impression of some organized substance, the leaf or branch of a tree, a shell, the form and outline of a once living animal. Such, undoubtedly, is the fact. The figure is too precisely and accurately delineated to be regarded as a mere lusus nature, or the result of accident and chance in the original arrangement of the particles of which the rock is composed. These are actually the remains of vegetables, fishes, reptiles, birds, and quadrupeds, which lived and died upon the surface of the earth, and which, by the wonderful revolutions of nature, now form a component part of the hard, rocky strata around us, subservient in the coal and limestone to purposes of the highest utility. Geologists and naturalists have carefully collected these fossils, and such is their state of preservation, that they have been enabled to classify them, to assign both generic and specific names to them. They thus form a kind of alphabet by which we are permitted to read the doings of the great Architect of nature, to discover some of the changes to which his works have been subjected, and to number the infinite variety of types and forms into which he has infused life, and communicated the means of enjoyment.

Having already considered the condition in which petrifications are found, their state of preservation, and their arrangement and distribution among the rocks of which the earth's crust is composed, we will now attend to a few of the many interesting conclusions which they serve to establish respecting the history of the planet which we inhabit.

1. There is evidence that the arrangement of plants and animals is precisely in the order in which their creation is set forth in Genesis. The works and the Word of God here completely harmonize. Vegetables were first created, and, accordingly, in the rocks which are the most remote from the surface, impressions of plants are almost exclusively met with; shells, and the other inhabitants of the deep, next occur; and, as might naturally be expected, these are, of all living substances, the most universally diffused over the surface of the earth. The seeds of vegetables are easily transported by the winds, and the element in which the finny tribes are produced surrounds the globe. Quadrupeds and the larger animals are less migratory in their habits, are more influenced by local causes, and their remains, in consequence, are only to be found in particular districts. Geologists have not been so careful always in their speculations to attend to this fact as they should have been, and the consequence is, that we have so many vague theories respecting the sudden and simultaneous destruction of animal life over the entire surface of the earth, while local influences have not been sufficiently attended to. Hence, too, the errors into which many have fallen, in judging of the time which has elapsed between the successive catastrophes by which the destruction of so many tribes, both of vegetable and animal life, has been occasioned.
