Conversing once of the great importance of standing at God's bar, only in the Redeemer's atonement and righteousness, he dropt such strong and emphatic expressions, That did God refer it to him to pitch on any of his good works or most devout frames to stand the trial of his impartial judgment, he saw such glaring impurity and imperfection in the best of them, that he utterly disclaimed and fled from them, and utterly betook himself to the spotless and perfect righteousness of the Redeemer. The week before his death, conversing one night about some part of the Calvinist scheme, in opposition to the other schemes that were too freely given in by many, he found great difference betwixt them, as to their proper influences and supports under the near views of death; such a firm confidence and strong consolation did the soul derive from the transcendent merit of a Redeemer's death, to confirm him in the Divine favour and love, and the lively hopes of eternal life, and from the sovereign efficacy and establishing influences of his grace, to carry on the good work already begun, until it was crowned with perfection; this was his best defence against all temptations and challenges, and his foremost security against fears and terrors; whereas the other schemes held the soul in a woful suspense and uncertainty, and made its confidence to change and shift, as standing on the right turn of the will, and its proper improvement in virtuous goodness unto the end, even with the common assistance of Divine grace. But lively views and sweet experiences of the other plan of things bore up his soul, and gave him good hopes and strong consolation, and made him more than conqueror over all his spiritual foes, through Jesus that loved him. It deserves remarking, as an instance of God's special goodness to him, that when lowness of spirit was a disorder so frequent unto him during the most part of his life, he, in his last indisposition, had been quite relieved from it; the habitual spiritual turn of his mind, possessed his soul in a calm serenity and composure, and kept him clear of such dejectious and impressions of mind. His heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord, and established in perfect peace as staid on him, and having committed all his interests into his hand, for soul and body, for time and eternity, as his faithful God and Redeemer.

On that very night in which he was seized with the fever, he had been conversing with me on his favourite theme; and, upon the persons leaving him, he fell out into a divine rapture, for he says all at once, 'O what a light God has been pleased to throw on my dark mind, and on his own word to me! O how I see him in his word and ordinances, and in his promises and providences! O how I see himself and not another!' This happened about eleven on Thursday night, at which time no unusual uneasiness appeared about him. After twelve he was caught with the fever which conveyed the soul, whence it took its flight on Sabbath morning about eight o'clock, March 20, 1757, to the heavenly regions, there to celebrate an eternal Sabbath.

We are glad to have had it in our power to perpetuate, however imperfectly, the remembrance of one of the most enlightened and useful ministers of the Church of Scotland.

MISSIONARY LABOURS AMONG THE ARMENIANS, GREEKS, AND JEWS, IN THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.*

CONSIDERABLE efforts have been made by English and American missionaries to instruct the rayahs in Constantinople, as well as in other parts of the Ottoman empire, especially in Smyrna. Several schools have been established, in which, after learning to read and write, the children are taught the doctrines of Scripture, without any direct reference to the heterodoxies of their own creed. The inculcation of truth is found to be the surest safeguard against error; and though, in after years, some may love darkness rather than light, yet there is ground to hope that many will continue to hold the essentials of Christianity, learnt in childhood, without yielding to the heresies promulgated by their mother Church. But the anticipations of those who expect much to be effected in a very short time by mere human agency are not likely to be realized. A rapid transition from a state of extreme debasement to moral excellence is an anomaly in the history of man; and here, the peculiar character of the people opposes more than ordinary barriers to the introduction of truth. The object of every one is to conceal his transactions, his plans, and his feelings; to be "politic,"—to steer between extremes,—to keep well with all parties: and this spirit infects the converts to Protestantism in common with all their countrymen. Such as are convinced of the errors of their Church, and wish well to the missionary cause, are long, very long, before they will express boldly their opinions, or commit themselves by any overt act of participation; and even when they have done so, their continued adherence is by no means certain. Thus, the missionary's difficulties are increased, his patience tried, and his harvest deferred. Still, the work is progressing, the seed is being sown, and here and there a plant, springing up in the ungenial soil, bears fruit.

* This extract is taken from Elliot's Travels in Russia, Austria, and Turkey.

Of all the rayahs, the Armenians are in the most hopeful state. Among them a spirit of inquiry on religious subjects has been excited: many are dissatisfied with their own teachers, and, like Pilate, inquiring, "What is truth?" Some young men were pointed out to us who always carry their Bibles in their bosoms; and a peculiarly interesting and encouraging circumstance lately occurred here. An Armenian, of good family and unusual talent, was led to see the antisciptural nature of many of the doctrines in which he had been educated, and yielded his unqualified assent to the simple truths of the Word of God, as set before him by Protestant ministers. After much deliberation, he decided that he would not voluntarily leave his own Church, as by so doing he should diminish his sphere of usefulness; he therefore abstained from any formal act of separation, but continued to associate intimately with the American missionaries, and even to teach in their schools. The keen and jealous eye of his ecclesiastical superiors did not long overlook this advance of truth against error: the convert was accused by a priest of holding heterodox opinions, and was summoned to answer the charge before a council appointed by the Patriarch to inquire into the matter. In his defence he referred exclusively to the Sacred Scriptures; such evidence could not be gainsaid by men professing themselves Christians, and after an examination extended through several days, he was declared perfectly orthodox, while his accuser was denounced as an infidel! The Armenian convert having identified himself with the "Bible-men," (as the missionaries are designated,) his cause was theirs: with his theirs would have fallen, and with his it was confirmed and established, to the great dismay of the hostile party, who, in full assurance of victory, had prepared a list of eight hundred persons, to be arraigned on the same account, as soon as their first victim should be condemned. His acquittal, however, resulted in their confusion; which was rendered the more complete, by the episcopal president patting the accused on the shoulder, and saying, "I wish there were more of your way of thinking!" This occurrence interestingly exhibits the superiority of the Armenian priesthood to their Greek and Russian rivals, as regards their veneration for the Word of God,—a feature in their character which alone can account for the acquittal of the young convert, and which, at the same time, holds out a hopeful promise of self-renovation to the Church.

Of the Greeks, not less than seven hundred were, till lately, receiving education, through the agency of the English Church Missionary Society, in Smyrna and the neighbouring towns; and the schools were a source of light and instruction to the children, while the parents joyfully acknowledged the benefit they received. We witnessed their operations with exceeding interest, and heard both boys and girls read the Scriptures in their mother tongue, and answer the questions proposed to them, with an accuracy which reflected honour on the native teachers, and on the Rev. Mr Jetter, their unwearied superintendent. But this was not to last. The priests had long watched the missionaries with envy, and at length resolved to put a stop to their proceedings. They first demanded the dismissal of one of the masters, on the plea that he was a convert to Protestantism, who had shown himself very zealous for the reformed religion, and must therefore necessarily be anxious to shake the faith of the children in the dogmas of the Greek Church. Failing in this effort, they circulated a report that the English and Americans had sent missionaries to convert the Greeks to Protestantism; they fabricated the vilest calumnies against them, and at length they obtained from the Patriarch of Constantinople an order, which was read in all the churches of Asia Minor, denouncing every parent who should continue to send his children to be instructed under their superintendence. From that time the schools have been deserted; and an ignorant and superstitious clergy have succeeded in robbing their fellow-countrymen of the key of truth and knowledge. The fact is, that their own influence over the minds of the people can be preserved only by a systematic effort to shut out all intellectual and spiritual light; but the conflict between light and darkness is begun, and it remains to be seen how long the latter will prevail. The people are at this very time bitterly lamenting the loss they have sustained in the schools, and it is not improbable that the missionaries may be requested to reopen them.

But while the condition of the Christian rayahs is one which leaves the mind to fluctuate between hope and despair, that of the Jews is still less favourable. Among them a persecuting spirit prevails, and many who desire to be taught are afraid to hold intercourse with the missionaries. Not long since, a Hebrew, anxious to inquire into the truth of Christianity, was seen going to one of their houses. On leaving it, he was seized, imprisoned, and bastinadoed. Another, who, with his wife, was known to have sought instruction, was ejected from the city; the woman was poisoned, and their three children were violently taken from the father, to be brought up in Judaism. A third Israelite was lately converted under the ministry of an enlightened Roman Catholic, who continued for a short time to preach the Gospel faithfully, but was soon compelled to desist; and his proselyte was driven out of Constantinople.

While directing their attention principally to the rayahs, the indefatigable missionaries have not neglected their Mohammedan fellow-subjects. A school was established some years ago for Turkish youth, which continued in a flourishing condition till the jealousy of the imams was excited. They impeached the native master before the governor, and he was committed to prison; the boys were forbidden to attend, under a heavy penalty, the books were destroyed, and the room was stripped of forms and tables. Since that occurrence, the attempt to instruct the Turks has not been renewed; but each year is making inroads on their superstition and exclusiveness, and every obstacle that is thrown in the way of introducing the truth to the rayahs, tends to stimulate the efforts of the missionaries to place it before their rulers; who, though they still refuse to trust their children in the hands of the "giaours," are very willing to receive school-books and maps; while some will even accept, and read with interest, copies of our Sacred Scriptures.

Such is the state of morals and religion in the great metropolis of Turkey,—and such the picture which the whole empire presents. All, or very nearly all, is darkness; and the few and feeble rays which pierce the gloom serve only to make the "darkness visible," and to "discover sights of woe." The faith of the Saracen impostor, itself holding forth no inducement to moral or spiritual excellence, not only operates as a debasing principle upon its own disciples, but, with an unparalysed influence, blights every germ of virtue in those subjected to its control or example. Nevertheless, in spite of all, the Christian is encouraged by the Word of God to hope against hope, for the dawn of a day when Mohammedanism shall be superseded by the religion of the Bible; and when that religion itself, now exhibited in this country under forms so vitiated that it can hardly be recognized as Christianity, shall burst the veil which superstition and idolatry have thrown over it, and shall attest, by its fruits, the efficacy of divine truth on the heart of man.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JOHN JOHNSTON,

Minister of Roxburgh Church, Edinburgh.

"I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified."—1 Cor. ii. 2.

In whatever aspect we contemplate the character of St Paul, we meet with much that is at once striking and instructive. Whether we view his character as it is drawn by the pen of his historian, or as it is developed in his own writings, we see the operation of powers and sentiments which are not often vouchsafed to adorn the history of humanity. In the portion of his history which is transmitted to us in the Acts of the Apostles, we see the actings and the influence of the most heroic magnanimity and unwearied benevolence that ever graced and adorned a human spirit. But to have a full view of the character of this extraordinary man, we must turn to the epistles which he addressed to the Churches he had planted, and attend to the manner in which he appeals to those who were familiar with his sentiments and deportment. In these invaluable writings we see a mind raised above the efforts and applause of human genius and eloquence. Devoted to the honour and glory of the Saviour, and affected to his inmost soul with an ardent and glowing concern for the immortal interests of the children of men, he soared far above the vain and useless speculations that engrossed and agitated the philosophers of Greece, and the conducting of which had long been regarded as the highest employment of human intellect. It required not half the natural talents with which the apostle was gifted, to acquire proficiency in all the questions that occupied the wranglers of antiquity,—and less than his eloquence might have been sufficient to adorn them. But such employment was foreign to the lofty object which he had in view, and had no power to divert his thoughts from the glorious theme which engrossed and exercised them. Instead of seeking to contend for the palm of ingenuity and eloquence with their philosophers and sophists, he tells the Corinthians that a very different and far nobler theme had been chosen for their instruction and improvement, and with which he would allow no other subject to interfere. “When I came to you,” says he, “I came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God; for I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.” As the example of this apostle is a model, not only to the ministers of religion, but to all the followers of Christ, we shall find it useful and instructive to make this statement the subject of particular and serious consideration. Let us, then, direct our attention to the nature of that theme which the apostle preferred to every other, and to the grounds and reasons of this exclusive and determined preference.

I. We are, then, to direct our attention, in the first place, to the nature of that theme which the apostle preferred to every other. “I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.” From this expression we are not to conclude that the apostle designed to limit his own thoughts, and those of the people among whom he laboured, to the mere fact of the crucifixion of their Master. He indeed mentions, in an epistle to one of the Churches, that he had set forth Jesus Christ crucified before them; and there can be no doubt that, to awaken the gratitude and to confirm the faith of the converts, the agony and sorrow of the Redeemer were frequent themes with this zealous and devoted herald of the cross. The circumstances in which our Lord gave his life a ransom for his people were so awfully affecting, and the patience and generosity, the magnanimity and resignation, with which “he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost,” were so signally conspicuous, that the contemplation of them can never fail to kindle the warmest admiration and gratitude in every believing mind; and it was natural that the apostle should frequently dwell upon a theme so powerfully fitted to soften and subdue the heart. But the delineation of the circumstances of the crucifixion, and of the virtues that ennobled the holy Sufferer, is not the topic to which the apostle points in this memorable determination. While the fact of the crucifixion, and all the circumstances which threw a melancholy grandeur around it, were frequently set before the converts, as subjects of affecting meditation, it was the doctrine of the crucifixion, and the truths on which it is founded, and which are inseparably connected with it, which the apostle made his favourite and chosen theme. While the severity of the Saviour’s sufferings, and the patience and resignation with which he bore them, were set before the people to whom he carried the message of divine mercy, as grounds of admiration and gratitude, the great design with which Jesus surrendered himself to the agony and shame of the cross, and the glorious results of his sufferings and sorrows, were the subjects on which he delighted to expatiate, in which he found the highest and purest satisfaction to his own mind, and which he regarded as the surest and most efficacious means of improving and comforting his brethren.

To have dwelt, indeed, on the mere fact of the crucifixion, apart from the design, and purpose, and results of that marvellous appointment of infinite wisdom, would not have served any use, but what could have been answered by the delineation of any other scene of tragical distress. It was not, therefore, merely to the scenes of unexampled suffering and distress in which the Saviour terminated his earthly ministry, that Paul declared his purpose of limiting his own attention, and that of his Corinthian brethren,—it was the doctrine of salvation through the submission of the Son of God to the death of the cross; the deliverance of the guilty from everlasting misery, by the submission of Jesus Christ to the indignities and cruelty of that accursed death; the satisfaction that was thereby made to the justice of the moral Ruler of the universe; the reconciliation that was thus effected betwixt the creature and the Creator; the gift of the Holy Spirit, that was thus purchased to regenerate our depraved nature, and to deliver us from the dominion of sin, and introduce us to “the glorious liberty of the sons of God,”—this was the theme on which the apostle chose chiefly to expatiate, from which he derived all his consolation and joy, and to which he directed his converts to turn, as the only source of pardon and peace to the fallen, guilty family of man.

From the strong and unlimited terms in which the apostle’s determination is expressed, we are not to infer that no other topic ever found admission into his discourses and epistles to the Churches.

Such an inference is contradicted by the epistles themselves. When we examine even the epistle which contains this explicit determination, we find him inculcating several other important truths. But his meaning plainly is, that salvation through the death of Christ Jesus on the cross was the subject on which he had chosen chiefly to dwell, and to the illustration of which every other topic was to be subordinate and subservient; and the history of St Paul's teaching corroborates this interpretation of our text. Salvation through the sufferings of the Son of God was indeed his chosen and delightful theme. Begin where he might, he ended here; how far soever he digressed, hither he always returned. The person, the offices, the love, the unchangeableness, of the Saviour, were the themes on which he dwelt with unfeigned joy. When he traces the connection of these subjects with the hopes, and privileges, and enjoyments of the believer, he seems to rise above mortality, and language seems to sink exhausted under the weight and majesty of his conceptions. "God reconciled in Christ, not imputing our trespasses unto us," was a subject so lofty and so interesting, that, touch when and how he might upon it, his whole soul becomes instantly absorbed in wonder and gratitude. It was a mystery so profound, yet so heavenly; so wise, yet so merciful; that he seemed as if he could never think of it with sufficient admiration, or preach it with sufficient zeal and fervour.

II. When we direct our attention to the connection of this doctrine with the dearest hopes and the highest improvement of the human mind, we shall not wonder at the decided preference which the apostle gave to this above every other subject, and shall perceive and feel the claims which it has to the most prominent place in our public teaching and in our private meditations. Its tendency to devote, and to improve, and to comfort the heart, throws an interest and grandeur around it which can be claimed for no subject to which the human mind can be invited. To a brief and general view of the moral and practical tendency of the fact, that Christ Jesus died upon the cross as a sacrifice of propitiation for the children of men, we, therefore, proceed, in the second place, to direct your attention. Any thing like a full and complete view of this part of our subject would extend this Discourse to unusual length. I turn our thoughts only to some of the more prominent and practical views of this truly interesting and attractive subject.

1. The tendency of the knowledge of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" to tranquillize the heart, under the consciousness of guilt and the fear of future wretchedness, renders it a theme of permanent necessity and importance to the children of men. That "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," is not merely the dictate of revelation—it is the experience of every human heart; and although, in many a lamentable instance, this consciousness may be charmed down amid the riot of intemperance, or blunted by the insinuations of scepticism, the dread of that future misery of which the reproaches of conscience and the appalling forerunners, casts a gloom on the path of human life, and poisons and corrodes the highest pleasures that humanity affords. I speak not at present of those fearful visitations of the moral tormentor which terminate in despair, but of those uneasy feelings and dismal forebodings which are the experience of every mind which has not been hardened into scepticism, or rendered insensible by the uninterrupted repetition of transgression. To minds of this kind, the consciousness of guilt occasions the most sad and mournful forebodings. In these moments of sadness and dejection, the counsel of friends more frequently proves distracting than comforting. They may surround him with the comforts of life, or lead him to the scenes of social enjoyment and relaxation; but he will meet them with a distempered relish, and retire from them dissatisfied and sad. The repentant sinner may be told of the general mercy of God, and he may be put in remembrance of the exuberant goodness of the Creator in the works of nature and the visible administration of Providence; but he will fear to confide in mercy of which he feels himself unworthy, or to repose on goodness which he has so often abused. But lead him to Calvary, and tell him that the benevolent Being who is bleeding on the cross is suffering in his cause, and working out his salvation,—only assure him that the life that has been offered there is an atonement for his sins, a satisfaction to the offended justice of Heaven,—show him the sufficiency and the freeness of the redemption that has been wrought out amid the agonies of crucifixion,—and light shall break in on his darkened soul, and he shall look up to God as his reconciled Father, and forward to heaven as his peaceful and everlasting home.

At first view, and to those who have not instituted any inquiries into the subject, it may seem strange and unaccountable that the Redeemer's sufferings in a distant land, and in a remote age, should be the means of raising those that believe and trust in Him to the hope of pardon and immortality. And we readily admit that it is indeed strange and inexplicable. But it is the will and appointment of Him whose ways are not as our ways, and whose thoughts are infinitely above ours. Jesus is set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood; and he is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. This is the testimony of the God of truth; and although we cannot trace with the finger of human science the connection between the cross of Christ and the redemption and peace of the human soul, any more than the Israelite could tell how his looking at the brazen serpent could heal his wound, it has been the experience of the penitent in every age to find, in the doctrine of "Christ crucified," repose and peace from all the anguish and distress which the consciousness of desert and the fearful looking for of judgment inspire. Looking to the cross on which the mighty oblation was offered, the believing penitent gathers comfort and strength, and in the humble gratitude of his spirit he can say, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." But the moral influence of the doctrine of the Cross would be exceedingly deficient, if, while it relieved the mental anguish of the penitent, by setting him free from the dread of Divine wrath, it presented no barrier against his relapse into transgression, and did not fence his virtues with some powerful and constraining principle of action. The knowledge of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" would be of little value, if, by pardoning the sinner, it left him at liberty to renew and pursue that career of folly and guilt which would plunge him again into the depths of remorse and wretchedness. But the doctrine of salvation, through "Jesus Christ and him crucified," does not leave the penitent in this state of moral peril and helplessness; for—

2. The power of the doctrine of the Cross to strengthen the mind for the resistance of temptation, is another consideration which determined Paul, as it will determine every minister who desires to be a follower of him, to give a marked and prominent preference to the knowledge of "Jesus Christ and him crucified." It presents such a view of the rectitude of the Divine character and government—of the hatred of the moral Ruler of the universe against sin—as cannot be admitted and believed without awakening a corresponding hatred and dread of that evil against which Eternal Justice hath given forth such a solemn and appalling testimony. In proportion as sin is lightly thought of, it will be easily and carelessly committed. Let it only be viewed as a deviation from the laws of propriety, a breaking in upon that order which the Author of nature has established in the moral constitution of man; and the sinner will soon reconcile himself to his conduct, and feel no deep compunction for his violation of the laws of propriety, or for disturbing the harmony and beauty of his moral nature. Tell him that sin will ruin his fortune, and impair his health; he will still go on flattering himself that he will stop his career in time, to retrieve the one and restore the other. Nay, you may tell him of a judgment to come, and of the interminable sorrows of a world of despair; but he will comfort himself with the hope of repentance ere the hour arrive, that summons him to his last account. Meanwhile, sin wears all her fascinations and her charms, and lures him onward in the paths of shame. But let him be convinced of the truth and reality of those facts which closed the terrestrial ministry of the Son of God—let him look with steadfast faith at Gethsemane and at Calvary—let him gaze on the bodily tortures, and hear the cruel mockings which the Holy Sufferer met and endured—tell him of those mysterious agonies which, in the garden, made his "soul exceeding sorrowful even unto death," and led him on the cross to cry out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—and he will cease to regard sin as a light or trivial evil—he will view it as the accursed cause of all that his Redeemer suffered, as that which infused bitterness into his cup of trembling, and sharpened those "arrows of the Almighty, the poison whereof drank up his spirit." Wherever these views of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" are entertained and felt, sin is viewed with abhorrence and dread, as that abominable thing which God hates, not only as that which disturbs the order, and tarnishes the beauty of man's moral nature, but as that which occasioned the sorrows, and sufferings, and death of the spotless and beloved Son of God. Under these impressions, the believing mind is fenced and guarded against temptation. He views sin as that which crucified the Lord of glory; and to surrender himself to the power of temptation and the dominion of sin, would be to crucify the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame; and although he cannot attain to unsinning purity in this world of trial, he possesses a principle of power sufficient to warn him in the hour of danger, and to draw him back to the way of peace.

3. But the influence of the knowledge of "Jesus Christ crucified" extends a little farther than to this merely negative goodness—this protection against the influence and the power of temptation,—it conducts and stimulates to positive goodness, and is the most powerful and effective motive to the culture of the things that are lovely, virtuous, and of good report. The grace which brings salvation not only teaches to deny ungodliness and worldly lust, but to "live soberly, righteously and godly in the world." Indeed, you cannot open the New Testament without perceiving the close and intimate connection in which the sacred penmen uniformly view the doctrine of Jesus Christ crucified with the improvement of the faithful in the graces of the divine life. Whatever be the virtues they recommend, or the duties they inculcate, their chief motives are drawn from the consideration of what Christ suffered in the cause of sinners. When we are exhorted to be charitable to the poor, we are reminded of him who, "though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." When we are called to lawfulness of mind and reciprocal kindness, we are reminded of him who "humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." When we are desired to respect the prejudices of weaker brethren, it is from the consideration that the Lord died for them. To guard us against a slavish obedience to men, we are told that we have been "bought with a price." Forgiveness of injuries is enforced by the gracious truth that God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us. We are commanded to glorify God in our bodies and spirits, for we have been bought with a price. We are counselled to pass the time of our sojourning here in fear, "inasmuch as we were not redeemed with such corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without spot and blemish." In one word, the Gospel, in almost every page, points our view to the cross and to the tomb, that we may be habitually reminded that Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord of the dead and of the living. In choosing, therefore, this topic for the instruction of his Corinthian converts, he selected an instrument of the highest moral efficiency—a weapon "mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds: casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

Such, my brethren, was the theme that the apostle fixed on for the conversion and instruction of those among whom he laboured, and such its tendency to comfort the penitent, to guard him against temptation, and to stimulate him to holy obedience. And where, in the wide compass of human principles and motives, could he have found a subject so directly and so powerfully fitted to produce, on human character, such a marvellous and salutary influence? Delineations of the fitness and beauty of virtue generally fall pointless and inefficient on the heart; and the deepest and most impassioned pictures of the turpitude of vice, and the irretrievable misery and anguish to which it conducts its votaries, frequently pass away, and are forgotten like the imaginary scenes of tragic woe. But the history of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" takes a deeper and more permanent hold of the heart, and has a transforming influence on the conduct. The stupendous fact that the Lord of glory became man, and was crucified in ignominy and torture on Calvary, to save the guilty family of man from everlasting misery, is such an affecting manifestation of the Divine wisdom and benevolence—presents the Deity in a character so venerable, yet withal so lovely—shows so solemnly the appalling evil of sin, yet holds out mercy so tenderly to the sinner—exhibits so marvellously the enormity of the creature's guilt, and the immensity of the Creator's love,—that the more frequently, and clearly, and simply it is stated, the more powerfully is it fitted to overthrow the empire of sin, and to bring the sinner back to God.

If, therefore, the teacher of religion is deeply solicitous for the moral improvement of those committed to his charge,—if he desires to see them emancipated from the slavery of sin, and introduced to the glorious liberty of the sons of God,—this will be the theme to which he will ever and anon recur, with which he will seek to elevate and comfort the penitent, by the powerful influence of which he will hope to convert "the sinner from the error of his way," and "to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." In speaking of the personal character and work of Christ, he will not satisfy himself with a mere statement of the truth, however profound and accurate; he will remember that it is a practical doctrine, and he will seek to trace, and to exhibit, and to inculcate its bearing on the conduct and habits of them who profess to receive and embrace it. And when he speaks of the moral conduct of man, and labours to inculcate the duties and virtues of the divine life, while he addresses every principle and feeling, every affection and hope that stirs in the heart of man, and influences his doings, his highest and most successful expostulations will be taken from the fact that Christ was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification; that he suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God.

And, my Christian brethren, while the doctrine of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" is the primary and leading theme of public instruction, let it be the chosen subject of your private meditation. The success of a public teacher in the exposition and application of this momentous truth will be comparatively small, if you are not prepared, by previous meditation and prayer upon it, to receive "the ingrafted Word, which is able to save your souls." If you would derive full advantage from the public preaching of the doctrine of the cross, you will make it the theme of your retired and hallowed thoughts; and looking often to Gethsemane and to Calvary, it will be your daily prayer that the love which was manifested there may constrain you to live, not to yourselves, but to him who died for you and rose again. Leave it to others to weary and exhaust their zeal on the externals of religion, and to waste their strength in arranging matters of outward form which are not destined to outlive this scene of ignorance and strife; but, oh, be it your nobler employment, your higher aim and prayer, that "you may know Christ, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death, and may at last attain to the resurrection of the dead." Amen.

CHRIST OUR GUARDIAN.

THROUGH the day thy love has spared us,

Now we lay us down to rest:

Through the silent watches guard us;

Let no foe our peace molest:

Jesus, now our guardian be:

Sweet it is to trust in Thee.

Pilgrims here on earth, and strangers,

Dwelling in the midst of foes;

Us and ours preserve from dangers:

In thine arms may we repose:

And, when life's short day is past,

Rest with Thee in heaven at last.

KELLY.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A call to repentance.—I know not who of you have your names written in the book of life, nor can I tell if this be known to the angels which are in heaven. While in the land of living men, you are under the power and application of a remedy, which, if taken as the Gospel prescribes, will renovate the soul, and altogether prepare it for the vigour of immortality. Wonder not, then, with this principle of uncertainty in such full operation, ministers should feel for you; or angels should feel for you; or all the sensibilities of heaven should be awake upon the symptoms of your grace and reformation; or the eyes of those who stand upon the high eminences of the celestial world, should be so earnestly fixed on the every footstep and new evolution of your moral history. Such a consideration as this should do something more than silence the infidel objection: it should give a practical effect to the call of repentance. How will it go to aggravate the whole guilt of our impenitency, should we stand out against the power and the tenderness of these manifold applications,—the voice of a beseeching God upon us,—the word of salvation at our very door,—the free offer of strength and of acceptance sounded in our hearing,—the Spirit in readiness with his agency to meet our every desire, and our every inquiry,—angels beckoning us to their company,—and the very first movements of our awakened conscience, drawing upon us all their regards, and all their earnestness.—REV. DR. CHALMERS.

Penal evil the necessary consequence of moral evil.—How astonishing is the quantity of misery in the world! How many thousands are rending the air with the cry of pain and wretchedness! Strange that ever there should be so much, that there should be any suffering in the creation of a good God! Doubtless there is a cause for it; and if Moses had not told us what it is, we should be for ever in the dark. "O Adam what hast thou done!" O man, what art thou always doing! O Jesus, what hast thou not done to relieve guilt and pain; to sweeten adversity; to restore happiness in some degree to the earth, and insure it in eternity!—ADAM.

Faith in the Redeemer.—Let me charge you, O prisoners of hope, to look out by faith to that speedy and swift salvation of God which is coming to you. That is a broad river which faith may not look over; it is a mighty and a broad sea, whose farthest banks and shores cannot be beheld by those of a lively hope. Look over the water; your anchor is fixed within the veil, "whither the forerunner, Christ, is entered for you." Oh, but we have short and narrow, and creeping thoughts of Jesus, and do but shape Christ in our conceptions, according to some created portraiture! Lend us your help, O ye glorified indwellers of earth and heaven, sea and air, that we may set on high the praises of our Lord; let all creature beauty blush before his uncreated beauty! let all created strength stand amazed before the strength of the Lord of hosts! let all created love be ashamed before the unparalleled love of heaven! O angel of wisdom, hide thyself before our Lord, whose understanding passeth finding out! Sun, in thy shining beauty, veil thyself in darkness before the brightness of thy Master and Maker! Who can add glory, by doing or suffering, to our never-enough admired and praised Lord! Keep your love to Christ, lay up your faith in Heaven's keeping, and follow the Chief of the house of martyrs, that witnessed a good confession before Pontius Pilate: let faith live, and breathe, and lay hold on the sure salvation of God, when clouds and darkness are about you. Take heed of unbelieving hearts; beware of, "Doth his promise fail for evermore?" for it was a man and not God that said it, and who dreamed that a promise of God could fail? O sweet and strong word of faith, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him!" The eyes of faith can see through the clouds, and read God's thoughts of love and peace. Hold fast Christ in the dark; surely ye shall see the salvation of God.—REV. S. RUTHERFORD.

"The carnal mind is enmity against God."—Viewing man irrespective of the grace of God,—the glutton at his table—the drunkard at his tavern—the thief in his dishonesty—the philosopher in his study—the merchant in his counting-house—the statesman in his politics—the labourer in the field—the preacher in the pulpit—the legalist in his righteousness—the hypocrite in his prayers, and in his charities,—are all under the same principle; the language of their hearts to God is, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have if we pray unto him?" Job xxi. 14, 15. There is something eminently and awfully defective in the best works of man. "God is not in all his thoughts,"—he is a withered branch, separated from the parent tree: more than this, he is a brand burning in the fire, even on this side eternal torment; for where sin is, there is hell in embryo.—HOWELS.

Timely warning.—If you could be made to apprehend the importance and value of religion, that, after so constant and systematic a rejection of the sovereign good, you should not here find "a great gulph fixed between it and you,"—on your side of that tremendous chasm, there is still religion accessible to you, in all its blessings of deliverance, peace, and security for hereafter. You are still on the favoured ground, where you are invited by the God of mercy,—a Redeemer with his atoning sacrifice,—a Divine Spirit with all powers and operations of assistance, to enter yet at last into the possession of that which will be a glorious portion, when all you have been striving with the world to gain, will vanish in dust and smoke. But be warned again that the time is passing, and a very short persistence in your folly may make it too late.—REV. J. FOSTER.

A PROPOSED UNION FOR PRAYER.

To the Children of God scattered abroad throughout the world, the following Memorial is submitted, with earnest desires that grace and peace may be multiplied to them all through the knowledge of God our Saviour.

Seeing that it is a fundamental truth, that believers are one with Christ, and in him with one another, He being the Head and they the members, 1 Cor. xii. 12; Eph. iv. 25; seeing that through him they are all possessed of the self-same Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 13; and that by this one Spirit they have access to the Father, Eph. ii. 18; it must needs follow, that as there is thus a community of privilege established among Christians, so there ought to be a community of feeling and of aim in the exercise of the privilege.

The great design of God in constituting the Church, and calling a people unto himself out of the world, is the glorifying of his own name, Isa. xlii. 21. This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise. Hence the comprehensive doxology of the apostle, Eph. iii. 20, 21, which should find a ready response in the heart of every Christian, Unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us: unto him be glory in the Church, by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

There are three leading ways in which the saints are made use of for glorifying God. 1. As being in themselves subjects of grace. 2. As being specimens of grace to others, whether angels or men. 3. As being channels or instruments whereby grace actually flows out to their fellow-men. Eph. i. 12; 1 Tim. i. 16; Eph. iii. 10; Psal. lxxxvii. 7.

In respect of their active agency, they are appointed in and under Christ to deal with men on behalf of God, and to deal with God on behalf of men. Acts i. 8; 1 Tim. ii. 1. It is to the latter of these functions that the attention of the people of God is now called,—an office the most honourable that can be conceived, that of being the Lord's remembrancers, Isa. lxxii. 6, (margin). Yet honourable as it is, it is to be feared that the duty to which it points is by many greatly neglected; for while there are some who, like Daniel, may be denominated "men of desires," Dan. x. 11, (margin,) there are multitudes of whom it may almost literally be said, "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name," John xvi. 24. It is with the view of stirring up, concentrating, and directing the spirit of prayer, that this Memorial is humbly presented.

It has occurred to some Christians in Glasgow, that this object might be greatly promoted were a certain period allotted, (say the space of about a week,) during which a portion of time should be set apart every morning and evening, by all who in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours, to be spent in prayer, for those objects where-with his glory stands especially associated, and which should therefore be dear to the hearts of his people.

Concerts for prayer have already been tried on a limited scale: and their success should be an encouragement to make a more comprehensive effort in this way for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

The three leading petitions of the Lord's Prayer,—Hallowed be thy name,—thy kingdom come,—thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven,—as they are exceedingly large in their import, so they ought to constitute the model and the substance of the prayers presented by the people of God in concert.

It is impossible to give, in an address of this kind, any thing beyond a few hints, in regard to the subjects with which the glory of Jehovah's name may be considered as more especially connected. The following outline is submitted, leaving it to God's people, by the help of the Word, and the promised Spirit of grace, to fill it up and enlarge it:—

I. The people of God, when engaging in any work of a public kind, require to be on their guard lest their case resemble that described, Song i. 6, "They have made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept." Earnest prayer should therefore be made by each believer for himself, that he may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, 2 Pet. iii. 18.

II. Each believer should pray for all other believers now on the earth, that they in like manner may be epistles of Christ, 2 Cor. iii. 3; adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things, Tit. ii. 10; and letting their light so shine before men, that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father in heaven, Matt. v. 16. This is a point of unspeakable importance, for Christians are the salt of the earth, Matt. v. 13—the light of the world, Matt. v. 14. It is also a delightful exercise, giving scope to the finest feelings of the renewed heart, as may be seen everywhere in Paul's epistles. See Eph. iii. 14–19; Philem. 3–7; 1 Thess. iii. 9–13; Col. i. 9–12, &c. It is, moreover, a commanded duty, Eph. vi. 18, and therefore may on no account be neglected. Nor is it needful that we should know, in every instance, who and where the people of God are; for whether we know them or not, the Lord knoweth them that are his, 2 Tim. ii. 19. Paul tells us that he had great conflict, even for them at Colosse and Laodicea, that had not seen his face in the flesh, Col. ii. 1. This, we again repeat, is a matter of primary and inexpressible importance in connection with the manifestation of the Redeemer's glory. Wherefore we ought never to cease to make the prayer of the apostle our own in regard to one another, 2 Thess. i. 11, 12, "We pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power; that the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ."

III. Christians should pray for those with whom they stand immediately connected, their families and kindred, that the Spirit of the Lord may be poured forth upon them, that so those who are unconverted among them may be converted, and those who are already in Christ may be confirmed. Domestic worship, instruction, and government, being an ordinance of God, his people ought to unite in prayer, that it may every where be observed and blessed as a special means of maintaining, extending, and perpetuating the influence of true religion. Eph. vi. 1–4; Gen. xviii. 17–19, and vii. 1; comp. Heb. xi. 7, Ps. cxlv. 4. That is a most remarkable prediction with which the Old Testament closes,—that the heart of the fathers shall be turned to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest, saith God, I come and smite the earth with a curse; a passage which, although uttered in the form of prophecy, may yet be converted, at the throne of grace, into a promise.

IV. Christians wherever they are, being each members of the commonwealth, or national family, they ought to pray for those to whom they thus stand related. "I exhort," says the apostle, "that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men: for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour." 1 Tim. ii. 1–5. It is very remarkable on this head to observe, that even when Judah was carried captive to Babylon, they were commanded, Jer. xxix. 7, to seek the peace of the city whither they were carried captive, and to pray to the Lord for it. Civil government is an ordinance of God, and it to be honoured as such. Rom. xiii. 1–7. And seeing it is expressly predicted that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, Rev. xi. 15; and that civil rulers shall favour Zion, Isa. xlix. 23, lx. 10; and that the glorious Redeemer takes to himself the title of King of kings, Rev. xix. 16, as well as King of the Church, Ps. ii. 6,—it must be the sacred duty of all who are concerned for the manifestation of the Divine glory in this apostate world, to pray that the divinely appointed ordinance of civil government may be every where sanctified to the highest and best ends (comp. Zech. xiv. 9, 20); and that by the public maintenance of the law of God, and the respect rendered to the Gospel of his grace, the great Jehovah may be openly acknowledged and honoured as "King of nations." Jer. x. 7.

V. Christians, being members of the visible Church, should unite in praying for its purity, unity, and increase. It should be their earnest and united desire at the throne of grace, that every thing tending to mar the beauty, obstruct the usefulness, or create and perpetuate the disunion of the Church, may be removed. They should invite the glorious Master to come himself into his own house, as he did into the temple at Jerusalem, and purge it of whatsoever is offensive to him, John ii. 14-16. They should desire that He might sit as a refiner and purifier of silver—purifying the sons of Levi, and purging them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness, Mal. iii. 3; and that they may know how to separate betwixt the precious and the vile. It should be the prayer of all, that every thing pertaining to the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church, may be brought into the nearest accordance with the Word of God. Many Christians, indeed, may be at a loss to say what is the precise scriptural model in all these respects; but they can never go wrong in praying that the mind of God may be so discovered, as that, throughout the whole Church, “the form of the house and the fashion thereof, and the goings-out thereof, and the comings-in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof,” may be both distinctly known and carefully observed. Ezek. xl. 11. Questions of Church government have often been a subject of controversy, and sometimes a cause of persecution, among Christians. Would it not be worth while to try the effect of united prayer in leading to unanimity in regard to them?

The union of the people of God, in the truth and in love, is a grand means of manifesting the Redeemer's glory (John xvii. 23), and therefore ought to be highly prized and diligently sought by them. The great Intercessor himself has, in the above passage, set us an example of praying for that object, which his people are bound carefully to follow. Nor should they be less earnest in praying for the increase than for the purity and unity of the Church. It should be their urgent plea at the throne of grace, that the Lord may add daily to the Church universal such as shall be saved, Acts ii. 47; and that the several Churches of Christ through the world, walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, may be multiplied, Acts ix. 31. For this end, the promises should be pleaded (too numerous to be here inserted), that the Spirit may be poured out through Jesus Christ, to render the ordinances of the Gospel effectual, not only for the edification of believers, but for the conversion of sinners. Yea, we should stir up ourselves and one another to such a pitch of earnestness in this matter, that, like Jacob wrestling with the Angel of the Covenant, we shall refuse to let him go, except he bless us, Gen. xxxii. 26; and should determine, seeing we have a warrant for it, Mal. iii. 10, that we shall put the matter to a proof, whether the Lord will not indeed open the windows of heaven, and pour out upon us a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it.

Closely connected with this subject, is the raising up of qualified men for the work of the ministry. United prayer should be made by the people of God, that, as the fruit of Christ's death and resurrection, this important gift may be bestowed upon the Church, so as that the benefit of a Gospel ministry may be experienced to the full extent designed, both by the more abundant effusion of the Holy Spirit on those already in the ministry, and the increase every where of faithful and devoted labourers in the Lord's vineyard. See Eph. iv. 7-16. As this invaluable gift has been purchased, so it is also promised to be bestowed, Jer. lii. 15; and as it is promised, so prayer is commanded to be made for it, Matt. ix. 38.

There should also be earnest and united prayer on behalf of those who are now engaged, according to the will of God, in preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ, whether among Jews or heathens, that they may be comforted amidst all their trials and privations; upheld amidst all their difficulties; and honoured to spread abroad the savour of Christ's name; and that their numbers may be speedily so greatly multiplied, as to correspond, in some degree, with the breadth of that commission (Mark xvi. 15), Go ye unto all the world; and preach the Gospel to every creature.

VI. Special prayer should be made by all Christians for the conversion of God's ancient people, as the most remarkable event which is to take place until the coming of Christ. It is to be life from the dead to the rest of the world, Rom. xi. 15. It will be a season of extraordinary manifestation of the Divine glory, Ps. cii. 16; of the richest outpouring of the Divine Spirit, compare Rom. xi. 26, Isa. lix. 20, 21, Ezek. xxxix. 29; of unparalleled light, Isa. xxx. 26; of deepest mourning for sin, personal, domestic, and national, Zech. xii. 10-14; yet of holy, spiritual rejoicing and thanksgiving of the most elevated kind, Isa. xii. compared with xi. 11. The whole circumstances connected with the restoration of Israel will be such as to arrest the attention of the unconverted nations, Ezek. xxxvi. 36, xxxvii. 28, and thereby to magnify the word of God in the eyes of mankind.

The promises relative to this great event are so explicit as to afford the most solid ground and the utmost encouragement to prayer. Thus, it is written, Rom. xi. 26, “all Israel shall be saved.” Again, Hos. iii. 4, 5, “the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, &c. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days.” Again it is expressly promised, 2 Cor. iii. 16, 17, that the veil which conceals Christ from them shall be taken away by the Lord the Spirit—a promise corresponding with Zech. xii. 10. It is earnestly to be desired that all Christians throughout the world were stirred up to plead these and the like promises. It seems to be a leading design why mercy is bestowed on the Gentiles, that through them mercy may be extended to the Jews, Rom. xi. 31. And as faith cometh by hearing, Rom. x. 17, there ought, in a very particular manner, to be united prayer among Gentile Christians, that men may be raised up and sent forth by the Churches, who, like Ezekiel, shall prophesy to the dry bones that they may live, Ezek. xxxvii. 4, 11, 12.

VII. Along with Israel, prayer should be made for the outpouring of the Spirit on all flesh, Joel ii. 28, 29—for the destruction of Antichrist, 2 Thess. ii. 8; Rev. xix. 1-6—for the utter abolition of idolatry, Zech.

xiii. 2; Isa. ii. 18—for the universal overthrow of Satan's kingdom, Rev. xx. 1-3—and the universal diffusion of the Gospel and its blessings, Numb. xiv. 21; Isa. lx. 3-7; Psal. lxxii. 17-19.

VIII. Stretching beyond all these great events connected with the glory of the latter day, believers should look forward to the kingdom of glory itself, and pray for the coming of that day when Christ shall be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel; and when he shall be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. i. 7-10—as it will be then, and not till then, that the Divine character and government shall be fully vindicated, Jude, 14, 15, the Redeemer's enemies subdued, 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26, the number of the elect completed, and their bodies, as well as souls, redeemed and glorified with himself, Rom. viii. 23; Phil. iii. 20, 21. Hence we are commanded, 2 Pet. iii. 12, to be looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God. Hence it is the closing prayer of the Church, Rev. xxii. 20, "Even so come, Lord Jesus"—and hence it shall often be the prayer of believers, individually and collectively, "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of spices," Song viii. 14.

Although these several subjects of prayer have been set down in a particular order, it is not of course intended that that order should in every case, and at all times, be observed by those who may join in the proposed concert. That must be left to the determination of individuals, and the drawings of the Spirit of Grace, who bloweth as he listeth. Nevertheless it may be stated, that it will generally be found of great advantage to follow a distinct order in continued supplication for a variety of objects—either proceeding from the lesser to the greater—from the nearer to the more remote—the circle thus always enlarging; or beginning with that whose circumference is most ample, and descending to matters subordinate to it and to each other. Thus it will often be found the best way to begin with the highest subject which the people of God have before them—the coming of Christ himself; and after dwelling thereon in meditation and prayer, to take up others which, glorious though they be, are after all subordinate in importance—the fulness of the Gentiles—the calling of the Jews—and so on in the inverse order to that which has been above stated, till each one terminate in his own individual case. And it is believed, both from the structure of the Lord's prayer, and from Christian experience, that when the soul is in the best case, this order will be found the most natural and the best fitted to sustain it in a frame of enlargement. It also seems proper to state, that in connection with all the subjects of intercession which have been mentioned, confession of sin and giving of thanks should be intermixed. And the people of God will bear to be reminded, that although a given period be here specified for united prayer in regard to the subjects mentioned, yet they are all such as to call for the habitual remembrance of them on their part at the throne of grace.

It only remains, in conclusion, to state, that a number of Christians in Scotland having agreed to observe (if the Lord will) the space of time between the 2d and 11th October 1841, inclusive, for united prayer for the above and kindred objects; and many more being understood to be friendly to such a design, and willing to fall in with it, both in Scotland, England, and Ireland, it is earnestly hoped that Christians generally throughout the world will cordially co-operate.

If, when the primitive Church assembled with one accord in one place at Jerusalem, the Holy Spirit was remarkably poured out in answer to their united prayers, Acts ii. 1, 2, what might we not expect if all Christians throughout the world were to agree together as concerning what they should ask, Matt. xviii. 19. If in answer to the prayers of the one hundred and twenty disciples, Acts i. 15, the Pentecostal first-fruits were given, might we not hope that a full harvest would be reaped when thousands or tens of thousands came in one body to the throne of grace—all guided by the same Spirit of adoption—all pleading the finished work of Immanuel, and praying that He, the adorable Redeemer, might see of the travail of His soul, and be fully satisfied, Isa. liiii. 11.

PLAN OF THE PROPOSED UNION FOR PRAYER.

1. During the time specified in the accompanying addresses, that is, for ten days from Saturday the 2d, to Monday the 11th October, 1841, inclusive, it is understood and agreed that the hour betwixt eight and nine in the morning, and eight and nine in the evening, or as near that as possible, shall each day be given to prayer for the objects mentioned in the address. On Saturday the 2d October, it is strongly recommended that fasting should be conjoined with prayer, and as much of the day as circumstances will admit given to religious exercises; and that Monday the 11th, being the last of the ten days, should be observed, as far as may be, as a day of thanksgiving. In reference to duties of this kind, let the gracious encouragement, applicable to them as well as to deeds of charity, be remembered—that a man is accepted according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not, 2 Cor. viii. 12.

2. It is very earnestly desired that where ministers approve of the proposed concert, they would, some time previously, direct the minds of their people to the subject, and that they would meet at least once on a week day during the proposed period, along with their congregations, for the purpose of praying together for the various objects mentioned.

3. Heads of families should also bring these objects before their households, and make them in an especial manner matter of prayer in their family exercises during the specified time.

4. Thereafter, Christians everywhere are requested to remember, that the hour betwixt eight and nine every Sabbath morning is already observed by many in Scotland and England, as a season of united prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and are respectfully invited to join therein.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 13, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junr. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—The Starving Family; an Irish Scene, . . . . . Page 635 2.—On the Being and Perfections of God. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D. Part I., . . . . . 629 3.—Biographical Sketch. Mrs W. W. Duncan. By the Editor. Part I., . . . . . 630 4.—A Discourse. By the Rev. John Watson, . . . . . 633	5.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Bayly, Dr Chalmers, Dr H. Hunter, Rev. E. Bickersteth, and Pascal, . . . . . Page 636 6.—Sacred Poetry. "No more Sea." By the Rev. John Longmuir, A.M., . . . . . 637 7.—Sketches of celebrated Field-preachers in the days of the Covenants, . . . . . 638
---	---

THE STARVING FAMILY; AN IRISH SCENE.

It has often occurred to us, that the position of a country minister is peculiarly favourable for the acquisition of much valuable information in regard both to men and manners. In his occasional visits among all classes of his parishioners, he has an opportunity of noting many interesting and varied incidents of strange, eventful history. An impression of this kind has given rise to the tastefully written volume from which the following extract is selected,—“Pastoral Annals,” by a faithful and pious minister of the Episcopal Church in Ireland:*

At the period when I took possession of my new residence, the results of the late disastrous season were beginning to develop themselves in varied forms of horror. Who that remembers the summer of the year 1817, will say that the scenes of distress and suffering which marked its progress have yet been effaced from his mind? The unparalleled inclemency of the weather during many months, had produced sickness and famine among the lower orders, beyond all former example. In particular, the deficiency of peat fuel had been so extensive, that the supply of the peasantry fell short by fully three-fourths of the quantity which in common years had been thought essential to their health and comfort. The oat crop had been scanty and defective; and the potatoes, the staple food of the most indigent, were had in quality, unwholesome, and totally insufficient for the wants of the population. The inevitable consequences, or concomitants, of this combination of calamities, were famine and disease; the latter being greatly aggravated by the close unventilated cabins in which the poor live. The labouring man, ill clad, ill housed, ill fed, returning to his wretched hovel, weary, hungry, and dripping from the cold rains, found neither food to nourish, nor fire to warm him. Sometimes he crept into a cheerless bed, and sought to forget in sleep the miseries of his situation; more frequently he sat before the delusive phantom of the once bright hearth, chilled, and musing, till sickness fastened upon his frame, and death itself sowed its not unwelcome seed. The twin scourges, famine and pestilence, began to afflict our peasantry about the latter end of March, and continued to grow in fearful intensity till August. About the former period, typhus fever manifested itself very generally, and was of an extremely malignant character. At first it was confined almost exclusively to the lower orders; but anon it soared amidst the clergy, gentry, and nobles of the land. The people, unused to such a plague, and therefore ignorant of its infectious nature, took no precautions to prevent the spread of contagion, and fell victims to its ravages in great numbers. Presently their fears became so extravagant, that they ran into the opposite extreme, shunning the houses of their dearest friends and nearest relatives, with whom they had at first associated too incautiously.—The national character seemed in abeyance, such was the panic which the desolating pestilence inspired. I have known many instances of whole families abandoned to all the horrors of the disease, no one venturing into the dwellings wherein they lay, until I had alternately bribed, or shamed, their kindred to discharge the duties of consanguinity and Christian love.

Happily the Lord raised up a few individuals in every parish, who, either through benevolent sympathy or constitutional fearlessness, offered their aid to the sick at this trying juncture. Taking advantage of this supply, we were generally enabled to relieve the very distressed in their utmost need. Still some melancholy occurrences marked the prevailing terror in characters not to be effaced. I suspend the narrative to which these observations are preliminary, to relate one of them.

Returning from an absence of three days, I learned that a family, composed of four persons, whom I had left in the last stage of typhus fever, had all died (as was supposed) the morning after my departure.—They had no very near relatives around them, being recent settlers; and of their neighbours, not one had the hardihood or the kindness to enter the abode of death. The bodies had lain unattended to during the two days already mentioned; and it was only early on the third that I became acquainted with the circumstance, so strange in a civilized country. My first step on going to the spot, was to cause holes to be made in the walls of the mud cabin, at the opposite ends, to admit a free current of air. This done, and the door having been open for some days, I led the way into the house. The dead bodies lay, a father and son, in one bed; two grown up girls, his daughters, in another—a melancholy sight. They had all perished, if the people spoke the truth, within a few hours of each other. It was probably as asserted; for though the house had been little visited, yet one of their neighbours, an old woman, who subsequently undertook the charge of washing, and dressing in funeral attire, these poor victims of the destroyer, had brought them some jugs of cold water, for which alone they expressed the smallest desire, and by this means ascertained pretty accurately the period of their decease. I was afterwards obliged to assist personally in the manual labour of carrying them out of doors to their coffins, having at one time serious apprehensions that the old woman would have been my sole fellow-porter. The four were consigned to one grave.

* Published by R. B. Seeley and W. Burnside; and sold by L. & G. Seeley, Fleet Street, London.—1840.

It was while those scenes were enacting, that, on a beautiful evening in July, I had walked to visit a family living about a mile distant from my residence, every one of whom, eight in number, had been attacked by the scourge of the time—typhus fever. Three of them had passed into "the land where all things are forgotten." The remaining five were in various stages of convalescence, but still avoided by the great majority of their neighbours, and so feeble, as to be entirely incapable of providing for their livelihood. As I proceeded slowly through the picturesque lanes which led to their humble habitation, I met several of the rustic population, whose pale and emaciated countenances betokened, in lines not to be mistaken, the silent ravages of famine and disease. Some were anxiously surveying the early potatoe crop, as if they hoped, by looking on it, to accelerate the growth. All seemed weak and dispirited, and replied to the language of kindness or friendship with which I addressed them, in tones of profound melancholy. My own mind caught the contagious sadness of the hour; so that when I reached the object of my excursion, I felt a species of inert dependancy quite foreign to my general habit.

In this frame of mind I commenced my instructions at the door of the cottage of the sick family, who sat or stood around me. We had scarcely begun our devotions, when they were disturbed by the approach of a female, followed by three children between the ages of eight and four; she herself appeared somewhat under thirty, and was remarkably handsome. Without regarding my occupation, she hastily, and with a wild vigour of importunity, asked alms; the children lifting up their voices in concert, and seemingly bent on forcing their way into the house. Whether the interruption offended me, or that the eager stare and inexplicable smile of this very comely young woman inspired me with opinions prejudicial to her character, I could not accurately define to myself; but certain it is, that her presence disturbed the train of thought I most desired to cherish; and I therefore ordered her to withdraw, with some rather severe remarks upon the intrusion she had been guilty of. She retired without uttering a word of remonstrance or apology, merely repeating the strange smile which had so struck me when she first solicited charity. She was not yet out of sight, when the stings of conscience began to work painfully within me. I ceased to pray, and asked my sick friends if they thought the woman was an impostor. They answered with one consent, that they were firmly persuaded of the contrary; that they thought she appeared in a state of faintness from absolute starvation—was no practised beggar or vagrant, and a stranger they had never seen before. It was besides evident, though they did not say so, that they disapproved of my conduct in dismissing my afflicted sister so abruptly. I therefore bid an instant goodnight to the cottagers, and followed the poor wanderer. The winding nature of the path, enclosed on either side by a high hedge of hawthorn, enabled me to pursue my way unperceived; and from the same cause, the little band of mendicants was concealed from my view. I knew, however, that I was on the track they had taken, and proceeded confidently for about four hundred yards without coming in sight of the object of my chase. At that moment a sudden exclamation of distress struck upon my ear. The shriek—oh! how loud and shrill it sounded!—was undoubtedly from the mother; and the mingled wail of young sorrow revealed the companions of her disaster. I hastened to the spot, fearing that they might be attacked by some dog, of which many in a half-famished state prowled through the country in quest of food. Arriving quickly at a low stile, which led from the lane by a field path to a group of cabins, a scene presented itself so surpassingly affecting, that, as God's will ordained that my eyes should behold it, so I pray that His grace may preserve it for ever uneffaced, undimmed, unchanged, in my heart. In the field, at a few paces beyond the stile I have spoken of, knelt and prayed, with streaming eyes and uplifted hands, the young mother. And thus she spoke:—"Father of the fatherless, and God of the widow!"—these were her very words—"hast Thou brought me so far through misery and temptation, to forsake me now?" I might perhaps have heard more, but I could not refrain from pressing forward, and asking the cause of her new distress. She made no reply; but smiling as before, showed me her empty apron, and pointed to her children. The occasion of her grief was now apparent. It seemed that she had fallen, from pure weakness, in stepping over the stile. The produce of the alms-seeking of a long summer day, consisting of about a dozen of potatoes, was scattered on the grass. A flock of geese, scarcely less hungry than herself, promptly seized the poor provision, and fled away. The children engaged in a fruitless pursuit—the mother, addressed a not unheeded prayer to the footstool of the Divine throne.

Such was the sight then presented to my eyes;—such it still remains, ever abiding in my recollection. More than twenty years have elapsed since the incident occurred. I have related it to many friends; I have thought on it with a frequency that would have rendered any other subject faded and irksome; but yet I am firmly persuaded that this one scene—one amidst the varied multiplicity of life's chequerings—is destined of God never to be obliterated from my memory—never to diminish in freshness or in force. It seems traced as by an iron pen upon the tablets of my very soul, to remain while life and faculties shall endure.

I questioned the poor woman, whom I made sit down on the grass beside me, as to where she had come from, whither she was going, and her name. She told me that "she was an inhabitant of a remote part of the county of —; that she had gone over with her husband and children, about three months before, to Workington, in the hope that the former would find employment in the coal-pits, where he had on previous occasions laboured. She was herself well skilled in needle-work, and a tolerable laundress; and they calculated, between their joint earnings, to bring up their family in comfort and decency. But God, she said—and profound was her anguish as she pronounced the sentence—God, in his unsearchable counsels, had decreed otherwise. My dear kind husband, too good for a sinner like me, was carried off by fever in less than a month after we landed in England. We had already begun to thrive. My dear departed John, on the day he sickened, brought home to this little boy a child's whistle—this, Sir, which you see (for the children had grouped around us)—saying, Here, namesake, I have laid out twopence of my earnings to amuse you; but you must not play on it till to-morrow, for my head is like to split asunder from pain. Alas! alas! that morrow came, and dear, dear John, was in a raging fever!—six days more, and he was a corpse! If any thing could have mitigated my affliction for such a loss—if any balm would have allayed the inexpressible pain of my heart—I might have drawn comfort from the truly religious manner in which he closed a life wherein the love of God and neighbour had shone bright and glorious. He was attended by a clergyman of our own Church; a pious feeling gentleman, who performed all his offices with true Christian charity, and only ceased to speak the words of consolation and precept to myself, when the vessel was unmoored in which I left England. But what consolation, what reflections, could recompense me for the privation I had experienced? My husband, my dear, dear husband, was gone! Oh, what could supply his place? Not surely empty words of sympathy?—and yet why should I call them empty, though they had been no more than mere words, for they flowed from full hearts; full, indeed, they were of every human virtue. They came from the family of the clergyman who visited me in my affliction, and behaved towards me with a tender regard which I can never, never forget. God also raised up some other benevolent ladies, who frequently came to see me. They all wished me to remain at Workington, promising me needle-work and embroidery, and after a short time the superintendence of a school likely soon to become vacant; for miserable as I must appear to you, I received an excellent education—(her language fully bespoke it)—and was accustomed to teaching. Advantages were also offered to my children, sufficient to have decided any one but me to accept them. But strange to say, I determined from the first moment after the stunning effects of my dear partner's death had subsided, to return to Ireland. It seemed to my poor weakened brain, as if every enjoyment I should have at Workington would be an offence against his memory and love. I knew I was very wrong—and bitterly, most bitterly, do I lament my folly; but I could not help it; a power superior to my own will seemed to govern me. By day I thought, by night I dreamed. My dead husband was continually before my eyes, warning me that ill boded my stay. The impression, far from losing its force, gained strength daily. At length it became intolerable, and in infatuated defiance of reason, kindness, prudence, duty, and affectionate remonstrance, I set sail with these orphans, and another, who I trust is now an angel in heaven. The ladies were greatly displeased with me; still they gave me some money, and also clothes for these children, and with much excellent advice wished me farewell. I came in a coal vessel, and had a tedious passage to Belfast. While there, the Lord laid his hand on me once more. First, my little baby, an infant of four months old, died of convulsions, without scarcely any previous illness, the day after we landed. I waited one other day to see the little innocent decently interred, intending to set out on the morning after; but even while I stood beside the grave of my child, I was seized with shivering fits, and before night became so unwell, that the people of the house where I lodged, alarmed by the appearance, insisted on removing me to the hospital. They abandoned this intention only on learning that that receptacle already overflowed, and could admit no more patients. Still, on finding the necessity they were under, they treated me and my children with all possible tenderness. Next day the fever showed itself in its plain character. In this dreadful disease I lay for three long weeks, during a part of which I was either insensible or delirious; and when I became convalescent, I was greatly annoyed by the return of hysteric attacks, which a fright I met with at the birth of my poor baby had occasioned. As soon as I was able, and much sooner than it was prudent for me to travel, I commenced my journey with these poor children. Though I had practised all economy, and experienced much consideration at Belfast, my resources in money, and what arose from the sale of my clothes, were totally exhausted. I left a town wherein I had suffered so much affliction, with tenpence only in my pocket, and with seventy long miles to accomplish before I should reach the end of my journey,—namely, the residence of my mother—a woman far advanced in years, and labouring under many infirmities. Weak as I still find myself, and with these poor children to drag along with me, we have been unable to get forward in the direct line of our journey more than about five miles each day, and perhaps may walk nearly two more through fields and lanes seeking support and shelter for the night; which latter, the dwellers by the wayside have uniformly refused, and those in more retired situations only grant in their out-houses, such is the prevailing fear that wanderers like us may carry infection. This is the sixth day since we began our pilgrimage; to-morrow, as your Reverence knows, will be the Sabbath. Neither I nor my children have tasted a morsel of food since this time yesterday; and although we have not been refused by any poor body—My fair autobiographer laid no emphasis upon the words, but my own conscience pointed them. The blood rushed into my cheeks like a fiery flood of lava; they seemed to swell as if the skin must burst; and eyes and forehead were equally burning. “Although,” she said, “we have not been refused by any poor body, yet they often gave us only one potato, and that sometimes a small one. With such store, collected during the day, we purchased a night’s lodging, and supported nature as we best might. This day has been the most unsuccessful of all, while a double need was before me. You, Sir, have seen what has happened to my little provision for the morrow.”

She ceased, completely worn out, but evidently aware that her history had interested me, and that some attention was reserved for her for one night at least. I need not add, that her expectations were justified by the event. I lodged the wanderers in a cottage about a hundred paces distant from my own house. It was requisite to observe considerable caution in administering food to the entire party. Even the mother herself, when relieved from the burthen of care which oppressed her, seemed to forget the prudence which her delicate state of health demanded, and would have devoured, rather than eaten, whatever was set before her as ravenously as the most famished of her children. I attributed this greediness to the hysterical affection under which she laboured, and which I now perceived had caused the wild smile that had wellnigh hardened my heart against all pity for her distress.

On further acquaintance, I discovered that she had been brought up partly by religious parents, but more importantly as it affected her ideas and manners, in the house of a very worthy gentleman’s family, chiefly in the capacity of a sempstress. Rather with their consent than approbation, she married the miner, who established himself in a small farm under his wife’s patrons. For some years they lived prosperously enough; but at length misfortunes overtook them; and after struggling with adversity as long as he could, he took the step with which the reader of this story is made already acquainted.

The three children came uninvited on the following day to my Sabbath-school. They were all more or less instructed in the Catechism of the Church of England, and habituated, as they assured me, to morning and evening devotion. They were, indeed, interesting manifestations of the value of maternal care and piety. Their mother and they attended Divine service, being somewhat improved in their apparel by the extempore contributions of my wife, whose wardrobe furnished a motley raiment to the seminudes. In apparent interest in the work of prayer, and in the word preached, nothing could surpass this poor creature’s demeanour. The subject of my discourse bore occasional reference to the distress of the period, and therefore necessarily to the long separations of death. Many a fast-flowing tear fell from her wan cheek as the sad topic was discussed. Alas! they flowed or fell not without cause. Behind her was the memory of lost happiness—before, a dark and melancholy future. Yet, I believe, she rested her hopes where true joys are to be found, and, I trust, did there find a blessed substitute for those transitory pleasures she was no longer to experience here.

Monday morning came, and she insisted on resuming her journey. We did what we could to dissuade her; but in vain—she would go. I was half-vexed at this obstinacy, and expostulated with her without effect. Her principal reasons, or I should rather say answers, were sobs. But she was not insensible to our kindness. If there be in gratitude a mixture of inexplicable pain—and I believe it so to be—even in that pleasurable sentiment my poor friend felt it to the full. Perhaps it was the strife of contending recollections that worked so powerfully in her mind, and gave to her first efforts at acknowledgment an insurmountable hesitation; perhaps, indeed, the still lingering hysteria impeded her expressions, for she remained silent during many minutes of our leave taking. The spirit and the heart seemed in prayer, as her weeping bore witness. At length the tongue found utterance, and with much composure she thanked us for all the benevolence we had bestowed upon her, in terms of deep sensibility which I shall never forget. She asked my blessing on herself and her children, and returned it by an ardent supplication in my behalf, for which they all knelt. The parting has been, I trust, not without instruction to myself; it certainly ought to have profited me, for it was entirely of a Christian character. On leaving, she gave me the address of the respectable family with whom she had lived in early life, requesting that I would inquire from them concerning the truth of her story. Of that I had no doubt; but after herself I might with much reason have sought some intelligence. I intended to have done so, but neglected it; other incidents intervened, particularly at that calamitous period—other cares engrossed my attention, and my poor guest of two nights was overlooked in the "mêlée." Time has slipped away, and I have failed to fulfil an intention which, at the moment when I formed it, was very near my heart.

I trust and hope, that the trials of her who was the object of it may have been sanctified to her immortal good; and I pray that no impatience may ever again cause me to "turn my face from any poor man."

ON THE BEING AND PERFECTIONS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

PART I.

IN the Shorter Catechism it is taken as granted, that there is a God, and that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the Word of God; and we do not here introduce any summary of evidence, or exposition of the ordinary arguments in proof of those first principles, but proceed at once to place before our readers the plain import of the statements presented in the Catechism of what the Scriptures principally teach. These statements, as formerly noticed, are arranged under two great divisions or heads; viz., what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man.

I. What man is to believe concerning God.

As it is our chief end to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever, it is very obvious, that he is the great object to whom the thoughts of our minds should be directed, and about whom the affections of our hearts should be exercised. This forms the essence of all that is usually called religion, or, in the more appropriate and expressive language of Scripture, of all godliness; viz., how we ought to think, and feel, and act, in regard to God. The first step then plainly is to learn something about God, about what he is in himself, and what he is in relation to his creatures. "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace; thereby good shall come unto thee." "This is life eternal, that they may know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." How unspeakably important then the question, "What is God?" and how full of instruction the answer here given, "God is a spirit; infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth."

God is here spoken of both as to his being and his perfections; or, in other words, as to his nature and character. Of the essential nature of God, strictly speaking, we can know nothing, and can form no conception. That is a subject far beyond the reach of our limited faculties. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" "His greatness is unsearchable." "Behold

God is great and we know him not." But though we cannot apprehend the essence of God's being, we may understand the kind of being which he possesses, and this "the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, hath declared unto us." "God is a Spirit."

A spirit is an invisible being, that understands and wills, but that is without material substance or bodily parts. "A spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." "No man hath seen God at any time." How far intelligent beings that are invisible, and not perceivable by any of our senses, and so called spiritual, may, nevertheless, be connected with some form and modification of matter, we cannot know, but God is altogether spiritual and immaterial in his nature. "The King eternal, immortal, and invisible." Bodily parts and senses, such as eyes, ears, hands, wings, voice, face, &c., are, indeed, on various occasions, ascribed to God in his Word; but it is obvious, that he thus speaks of himself in condescension to our weakness, and in order to convey to us more familiarly an idea of his perfections. Eyes signify his knowledge; hands, his power; face, his favour or frown; ears, his readiness to hear our prayers, or his ability to detect our most secret communings.

Very little, however, is said in Scripture of God's nature or manner of being, as that is a subject so far above our comprehension; but it is rather his character, or manifestation of his will to us, that is revealed for our contemplation. This character of God is expressed by such attributes, as we may be able to discern in other beings, and may ourselves be capable, in some measure, of possessing; and so may be enabled to form some conception of the blessed God, by ascribing these attributes to him in the highest possible degree, even in absolute purity and perfection. These attributes or perfections of God must be separately spoken of or explained, but they cannot be conceived as any thing distinct from his peculiar being, or imagined ever to exist as separate from one another. These excellencies, as here enumerated, are "wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth;" and these, as capable, in some measure, of being possessed by his creatures, are sometimes called his imitable or communicable perfections.

The wisdom of God is that attribute of his nature, by which he perfectly and instantly knows all things that exist, or that can be brought into being; and by which he orders or disposes all things that do exist, in the best possible manner and for the best possible ends. "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning to the end of the world." "His understanding is infinite." "The only wise God." The Divine wisdom is eminently displayed in the wonderful variety, and beautiful order, and perfect suitableness of all things in creation.—"O Lord how manifold are thy works, in wisdom hast thou made them all;" in directing all the events that take place in the world so as to accomplish his purposes, and in doing this often by means and in ways which appear in themselves most unlikely to answer such ends, and which may have been designed by their agents to produce the very opposite effects.—"The foolishness of God is wiser than men; he taketh the wise in their own craftiness."

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God;"—and especially in the amazing plan of man's redemption, throughout its whole origin, progress, and accomplishment,—“The wisdom of God is a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, that God ordained, before the world, unto our glory; to the intent that unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God.”

The power of God is that attribute of his nature, by which he can do all things that he pleases, or that he can will to do; that is, all things that do not imply imperfection or involve a contradiction. “I know that thou canst do every thing.” “With God all things are possible.” The divine power is displayed in the stupendous works of creation, which he called into existence by a word, and which he upholds by his will; in the energy which he imparts to the various agents of nature; in his overcoming all opposition to his will on the part of any creature, or combination of circumstances. “There is nothing too hard for thee.” “I will work, and who shall let it?” “Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he, in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and in all deep places.”

The holiness of God is that attribute of his nature, by which he delights in all that is pure, and is opposed to all that is evil. “Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty.” “Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity.” But the holiness of God may be understood as expressing the harmony of his moral perfections, rather than as denoting a separate attribute; and as thus presenting the peculiar glory of his nature. “Who is like unto thee, glorious in holiness?” “Thou only art holy.” “I have sworn by my holiness.” The divine holiness appears in all that relates to himself being called holy, such as his name, his dwelling, his word, his law; in all creatures capable of this excellence having been originally made holy, and required to be holy, such as men and angels; in all that he does, in the government of the world, to put away sin and promote holiness; and especially, in the display of his holiness by the sufferings of the divine Saviour as an atonement for sin. “The Lord is holy in all his works.” “The law is holy.” “God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness.”

The justice of God is that attribute of his nature, by which he always wills and does what is just and right, as a lawgiver, as a ruler, as a judge. “Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne.” “The Lord is righteous in all his ways.” “The divine justice is manifested in the rectitude of God's law, and the impartiality of his dealings; in his declarations of a full and final retribution, to every one his due, whether of punishment or reward.” “The testimonies that thou hast commanded are righteous.” “Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments.” “There is no respect of persons with God.” “He shall judge the world in righteousness; he shall minister judgment to the people with uprightness.” “Who will render to every man according to his deeds.”

The goodness of God is that attribute of his nature, by which he is inclined to impart happiness to his creatures in their several circumstances, and which is expressed by various names, according to these circumstances. It thus includes his bounty or kindness in supplying their wants; his patience or long-suffering, in bearing with them as transgressors; his mercy and love, in providing for the pardon of their sins, and their restoration to his favour. “Thou art good, and doest good.” “The Lord is good to all, and his tendermercies are over all his works.” “Long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish.” “The Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness.” “God is love.” The divine goodness is manifested in the multitude of creatures which he hath called into existence, capable of such various enjoyments; in his care for their preservation, and the provision made for their wants; in the capacities, especially, which he hath imparted to the human race, for enjoying the highest blessedness; and in the innumerable benefits which he bestows upon them all, even upon the evil and the good; and particularly, in the gift of a divine Saviour, to bring them to eternal felicity. “The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord.” “O Lord, thou preservest man and beast.” “Many, O Lord, my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to usward; they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee.” “In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.”

The truth of God, is that attribute of his nature by which he declares always what is true in itself, in opposition to what is false, and adheres faithfully to all that he hath promised or proclaimed his purpose to do. “A God of truth, and without iniquity.” “God, who cannot lie, which keepeth truth for ever.” “Thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth.” The divine truth or faithfulness is manifested in the revelation of his will, as “the truth,” “his truth,” “the word of truth,” and in all that he hath done in accomplishing what that Word has made known, in the way of prediction, precept, promise, warning, or threatening; but which cannot be fully displayed till the final fulfilment of his purposes at the end of the world. “Know, therefore, that the Lord thy God he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy.” “God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent; hath he said, and shall he not do it? hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?” “Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.” “Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.” “All the promises of God in him are Yea, and in him, Amen, to the glory of God by us.”

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MRS W. W. DUNCAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THE amiable and excellent young lady whose brief and beautiful career we are about to sketch, was born in the spring of 1814. Her father, the late Rev. Robert Lundie of Kelso, was a man of high talents, refined taste, and devoted piety. To all his children he was enthusiastically attached, but if any one of them shared more of the warmth of his generous affection than the others, it was his daughter Mary. Of kindred genius and taste, she resembled him in many of the most attractive features of his character; and between the parent and the child, therefore, there sprung up a sympathy of feeling and of sentiment which peculiarly endeared them to each other. To her latest hour, Mary was wont to cherish the memory of her father, as one of the brightest and tenderest of her recollections. There was a charm about all that she remembered he had ever said or done, and in her correspondence we find so frequent references to the happy days she had spent under the parental roof, as to show that, on the part of both father and mother, her training, and indeed that of the whole family, had been such as to render home to the children the sweetest and the most attractive place on the earth. Without harshness or unnecessary restraint their tender hearts were early imbued with pious feelings and benevolent affections. The earliest lipings of their infant years were those of prayer, to Him whose recorded promise it is, "They that seek me early shall find me;" and accordingly we find the nurse who had assisted in rearing the happy family, thus referring to Mary's childhood. "How very exact she was in her prayers, when only a babe! She was as soon at her Lord's work as any of the worthies that I ever read of; and I often fancy I see their pretty white heads kneeling before they went to bed,—the one that could not speak following the example of the others." When her education was commenced, Mary made rapid progress, and she early displayed a taste for reading. The strength of her imagination, however, was such, that the utmost care required to be exercised in regulating her habits of mind. Novels and romances were carefully excluded, and her attention was directed to lively histories from real life, to narratives drawn from Scripture, or such other works within her comprehension as were at once fitted to amuse, to interest and to instruct. The mode of conveying religious knowledge to her mind was singularly judicious. In proof of this, we may quote the description which Mary's enlightened and pious biographer gives of the Sabbath evening occupations of the family.

"After reciting the questions which had been acquired before morning hours of public worship, Watts' infant catechism being the first, the children repeated, in turn, what verse of a hymn they could, and all sung it together; and still the dying cadences of those young, but well tuned voices, hang on memory's ear, and still the happy countenance of that one whose privilege it was to select the hymn is seen by the mind's eye. Then, in turn, they repeated any text they knew, and questioned each other on its meaning, as had been done to them when first they learned it; and, when all this was accomplished, they considered themselves entitled to ask for a 'Sunday story.' After being indulged in this, the story formed subject of inquiry and discussion, and Scripture proof wherein the actors in the story did wrong or right. The stories were not from Scripture history generally, but anecdotes picked up every where. All this having taken place before the system of infant school teaching was introduced, seemed to some impracticable in a company of babes; but sufficient evidence is now happily furnished in every town, that the infant mind is capable of acquiring, retaining, and applying a great variety of knowledge. Already did little Mary begin to exercise an influence in her circle, for, if the leader of the band was withdrawn for a time, she was always found repeating an old 'Sunday story' that she remembered, or inducing the rest to sing, or say their texts to her. These exercises, in some part of which prayer was introduced, would occupy us all for two hours without a shade of weariness, and seem to dispel the difficulty which many pious parents express of keeping their children suitably employed on the Lord's Day. They were not kept from weariness by allowing them to return to the nursery to their toys, for a regular occupation of Saturday night was to put all these away, and, except a picture Bible, they had not, or ever sought for, a Sabbath amusement."

Though constitutionally possessed of amiable dispositions and feelings, Miss Lundie does not appear to have been impressed with the importance of Divine things until her seventh year, when, on recovering from a severe attack of fever, she began to reflect on the necessity of attending to those things which belonged to her eternal peace. Her feelings at this time were not communicated to her parents; but when, in her thirteenth year, she sought to make a public avowal of her adherence to the Redeemer, she unbowed her thoughts to them, with a freedom and unpretending modesty which refreshed and gladdened their hearts. At this early period, she appears to have occasionally given vent to her feelings in poetic effusions. The following lines are no discreditable evidence of her juvenile powers in the art of versification:—

"How sweet are those delightful dreams,
That charm in youth's first days of bloom!
And sweet those radiant sunshine gleams,
That wander through surrounding gloom.

"And bright are fancy's fairy bowers,
And sweet the flowers that round the fings:
When in gay youth's romantic hours,
She shows all fair and lovely things.

"But ah! there is a land above,
Whose pleasures never fade away!
A holy land of bliss and love,
Where night is lost in endless day.

"And in the blaze of that blest day,
All earthly bowers we deemed so bright,
Must fade, as when the sun's first ray
Dispels the darkness of the night.

"Why should my soul so fondly cling
To joys that bless my pilgrimage?
The joys of heaven I ought to sing,—
Its raptures all my love engage.

"Why should my spirit fear to die?
What though the river may be deep?
When past, I never more shall sigh,—
My eyes shall then forget to weep.

"Oh! for faith's bright and eagle eye,
To pierce beyond this vale of tears,
To regions blest above the sky,
To worlds unknown by lapse of years.

"Then should the toys that tempt me now,
From my enraptured bosom fly;
In faith and grace my soul should grow,
Till death be lost in victory."

The illness and death of a younger sister made a deep impression on Miss Lundie's mind. She was observed from that time to evince a sedateness and sobriety of character which never left her. While preparing for her first approach to the Lord's Table, she spent some time in the family of the Rev. John Hunter, then of Swinton, now of Edinburgh. There she seems to have had her heart drawn closer to her redeeming God and Saviour; and, on her return home, her parents were cheered to find that it was now her supreme desire to be a child of God and an heir of glory. She rapidly advanced in all those branches of education to which the attention of females in this country is usually directed; but in the perusal of the Sacred Volume, and in the exalted and purifying exercise of secret prayer, she felt a peculiar delight. Her surviving parent, to whom we are indebted for the tasteful and elegantly written Memoir of her daughter, informs us of the mode in which the family were trained to habits of fluency and readiness in extemporaneous prayer:—

“In the selection of texts to be learned as one of the early nursery exercises, there had been a view from the first to such as could be most usefully employed in prayer; and as soon as the mind was strengthened sufficiently to apply them, the children were used to compose prayers by the combination of one, two, or three of these texts in the form of petitions; so that prayers were dictated by those who could not yet write, and written in all the initiatory stages of penmanship. Except the Lord's prayer, they were scarcely taught any thing approaching to a form, from the conviction, that the habit of exerting the mind to discover its own wants, and to employ the continually increasing store of Scripture in seeking for their supply, was a likely way to ward off heedlessness and formality in this holy exercise. After being exercised in this manner for a while, they were gradually brought to pray in turn on some part of the Sabbath day, and they who devised the little plan, have reason to praise Him who giveth the increase, for he shed on it the dew of his blessing. The want of this species of training, forms in many an impediment to social usefulness for life; they pray with the spirit, but for want of practice they are constrained to be silent when it would be for edification that they should speak; and, while it is readily conceded that fluency does not necessarily insure spiritual prayer, it must also be admitted that spiritual prayer without utterance, is not capable of being helpful and consolatory to others.”

Miss Lundie's education, until her fifteenth year, was conducted under the parental roof, and then, not without much reluctance and painful anxiety, it was resolved to send her to a boarding-school, for the purpose of perfecting her acquaintance with some of the higher branches of female education. After some inquiry, she was placed in a seminary for young ladies in London. Accustomed to all the comforts and advantages of home, it was some time before she could be reconciled to the change, and, more especially, as her sensitive nature was subjected to various petty annoyances on the part of the other scholars. Her whole deportment, however, was so obviously regulated by the highest and the purest principles, that she gradually acquired the regard, and even the respect, of all connected with the establishment. At the end of the educational year, she received the premium for general Christian and lady-like behaviour, by a great majority of marks. The lady who presided over the seminary having been married, the establishment was broken up, and Miss Lundie was removed to another boarding-school, under the care of Mrs Gordon, in Euston Square, London. Here she was remarkably comfortable and happy, and she made rapid progress in both secular and religious knowledge. It is gratifying to find one of the Misses Gordon thus expressing herself concerning their pupil, after she had finished the first half-year under their roof:—“It is a pleasing reflection, that any of our dear girls are fellow-pilgrims in the path of glory; and I may, indeed, congratulate you on having your eldest child a follower of the blessed Saviour, as the influence over the younger ones may be great. We will feel the loss of Miss Lundie's steady example much, as the sight of a school companion reading her Bible, and walking in the commands of God, has more effect, I think, than the precepts or example of teachers.”

Miss Lundie had just completed her seventeenth year when she left London, and returned to Kelso. Instead of being vauntingly puffed up with the acquisitions she had made at school, she was anxiously afraid lest her parents should feel disappointed with the small extent of her knowledge. Desirous to turn her accomplishments to some advantage, she set herself to instruct the junior branches of the family. She took her place also as a teacher in the Sabbath-school, and occasionally visited sick females in the parish, thus doing good as widely as she found opportunity. It was her delight to weep with those that weep, as well as to rejoice with those that rejoice. Her sympathies were both extensive and refined; and while she entered warmly into the feelings of others, her own heart was destined, ere she had been a year at home, to experience one of the sorest bereavements—the sudden loss of a revered and affectionate parent. Miss Lundie had been a week absent from the paternal roof, on a visit to some friends in Edinburgh, when suddenly the melancholy tidings reached her that her father was no more. The stroke was awfully severe, and her heart was bowed down under the painful calamity. But, by Divine grace, she was wonderfully upheld, and in a short time she was enabled, with calm resignation, to say, “God is now my only Father.” The picture which her near relative, the Rev. Henry Grey, draws of her behaviour under the sad dispensation, is beautiful and deeply pathetic:—

“Happy she, who, in that dark hour, had still a Father,—one with whom she held solemn communings, and who will never die. Her sympathizing and weeping friends would have hung round and watched her in that long pang of woe, but she entreated to be left alone; and when, after an interval, their solicitude brought them back, they found her still on her knees, with her arms extended on the bed. Her eyes were streaming, but her heart was deriving strength and consolation, even under that crushing blow, from Him who ‘hath comforted his people, and will have mercy on his afflicted;’ yea, ‘a mother may forget, yet will not He forget’ those who trust in him. Tranquillized and sustained by this divine strength, she returned to the house of mourning; and it was remarked by those who were spectators of that sorrowful return, that no loud cry, or unseemly wailing, attended the meeting of the bereaved ones; and that Mary's bearing was that of one long tutored in the school of discipline. She was deeply afflicted, but she held her peace. As a meek fellow-sufferer, she applied herself at once to sustain as a daughter, and to soothe as a sister; and except when the flood swelled so high that it would not be restrained, and she fled to solitude, to cast her care on Him who cared for her, she was the steadfast, considerate, and self-denying friend of all her sorrowing circle.”

Her own letters on the melancholy occasion betray a heart “wounded, but not in despair; cast down, but not destroyed.” To a correspondent near London she thus wrote:—

"MY VERY DEAR FRIEND,—The kind expression of your sympathy has been soothing to me at this season of trial. You have been so lately tried with affliction, that you know well how to speak to those who are passing through the deep waters. We have, indeed, cause to rejoice, while we mourn. He who has been taken from us, has been removed from a world where a spirit so tender as his suffered much, to the presence of God, where he is united to the family of the blessed, and he shall never more grieve for the sins and the sufferings of his fellow-men. None but those who knew him, can form an idea of what he did, and what he felt for others. We have found large packets of papers, relating to slaves, chimney-sweeps, widows and orphans, and to many who never knew who it was who was so actively engaged to do them good. It is very pleasing to remember these things, and then to think that he is now an inhabitant of a land where it shall no more be said, "I am sick;" that he who spent so much of his life in endeavouring to make others happy, is now effectually removed from woe. Yet I would not appear to praise my beloved father. He was too deeply conscious of his own unworthiness, to have hope of eternal life in any other way than by Jesus; and his hope, built on this foundation, was strong. But, my dear friend, had you known him whose loss we mourn, you would enter deeply into the feeling that he is sheltered. This was a predominant feeling for the first week. . . . This is the season in which my dear papa was peculiarly glad; and the sunshine and spring flowers he took such delight in, are all here still, though he is gone. We checked ourselves in feeling sad, that his favourite trees are covered with blossom, and he does not see them. Ah! we walk far too much by sight. Had we the eye of faith, we should never forget that he is in a region far more beautiful than this. He has reached a land which is adorned with 'the beauty of holiness.' Could we realize the fulness of joy of which he is a partaker, I think our sorrow, now mixed with thankfulness, would be lost in it. But He who sent this affliction, designs that we should feel it; and it is our prayer that we may walk more closely with Him than before; and, trusting more simply in Jesus, cherish a constant hope of being reunited to all whom we love 'in the Lord,'—and more than all, of dwelling with the great Shepherd, whose voice we have heard.

"All you say of the blessedness of considering heaven as our home, meets a deep response in my heart. Let us, my dear friend, walk as 'children of the light,' waiting with humble trust for the full disclosure of that light. If our best affections are garnered up in heaven, the summons to leave this earth will not be unwelcome. But I fear to deceive myself into tranquillity, while I have unmortified sin in my heart. Pray for me, my dear friend. I think I never knew before that my heart was so unclean. It was indeed a trial to me to be from home when my dear papa was called away, though even this was for good. But when I hear others speak of his words and his actions, so full of love for the souls of men, during the last precious week, I cannot but grieve that I too did not enjoy the privilege of being with him."

One of the most deeply affecting events in the history of a minister's family is that of their leaving the manse. Their ties to the parish and the parishioners are snapt asunder, and they must bid a long farewell to the peaceful enjoyments of the manse, the scene of their happiest hours. Miss Lundie felt this in all its force. The family had resolved to take up their residence in Edinburgh; and, in leaving Kelso, the amiable subject of our present Sketch felt that she was parting with objects and scenes which had been hitherto bound up with all the fond associations of an endeared and happy home. The last Sabbath she spent in Kelso, she paid a farewell visit to a young woman who was evidently lingering very near the brink of a shoreless, but happy eternity. Her own beautiful language can alone paint the affecting scene:—

"It was on a Sabbath evening that I took leave of my declining friend. I found her seated in a large chair, supported by pillows, and looking as if all her strength was gone, yet so happy, that I could compare her to nothing but a feeble and confiding child, who entrusts himself without fear to a parent, whose love he has never thought of doubting. Her smile of welcome was more sad than usual, for she knew that we should meet no more on earth. She spoke of the quiet spot in the church-yard that would soon cover all that remained of her; and of the hope full of immortality that kept her heart from sinking. She pointed me, too, to the gathering-place of the Church of the Redeemer, which was opening to receive her, and to the short and quickly traversed space that might divide me from it. One of the last rays of the evening sun darted into the room, and seemed to afford an earnest of that blessed meeting. Our sorrow was mingled with lively hope, and we were glad that the sacred day was that on which we must part, till the dawning of a Sabbath without end. She expressed a desire that, as we had often united in prayer, we should continue to maintain this valued fellowship, by praying for each other at a stated hour of each day that was added to her life. This agreement she never forgot. Some one entered the room, and I bid my sister in Jesus farewell, and saw her no more."

THE BRIEF DURATION OF HUMAN LIFE :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN WATSON,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Belford, Northumberland.

"Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth."
PSALM xxxix. 5.

THIS is a truth which the Psalmist desired to remember. The same idea runs throughout this, the preceding, and the following verse. It is the first to which he gave utterance, after some moments of mental abstraction. Musing a while in meditative silence, till his heart within him glowed with the fervour of his thoughts, he at length gave expression to his emotions in these words,—
"Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days." We may learn the purport of this petition from what he has elsewhere said, "Teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

The shortness of life is a subject of frequent occurrence in Scripture. Life is short in a comparative point of view, and short in respect of the great and important work which we have to perform in it, namely, the improvement of our spiritual being, by the reception and cultivation of the principles of true religion, and by the habitual exercise of the virtues and graces of the Christian character, so as that we be fitted for passing into the society of the blessed, in the pure regions of immortality.

I. Let us, in the first place, consider the shortness of human life, in respect of the great work which it is given us to perform.—Man, in his best estate here below, is still in an improvable condition. There is no perfection on this side the grave. The man of the loftiest attainments in virtue is but elevated to a position whence he has a more enlarged discovery than others of the miserableness and defects of his present standing. The attainments of man in virtue and in piety, affect him in a manner similar to what is produced by the other acquirements of life,—the more that there is gained, the more is there that presents itself to be desired. The Christian, in his best estate, is “pressing towards the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.” To the end, he is panting in the race; and were his days yet prolonged, he should still enter the gate of heaven striving in an agony. He ever feels clogged in his career, and is ever laying aside those weights which retard him in his motion. The most aged and advanced Christian never finds that his exertions and his attainments have outstripped his years; and that these lagging behind, he has nought to do but to abide their revolution to an end, and wait with patience till his change come. Who ever left this scene of things,—we speak not of them as of “quitting the precincts of the cheerful day,” but even as longing for the bursting forth of that brighter day which they anticipated,—who ever, even in these happy circumstances, left this scene “without casting some longing, lingering look behind,”—not for the pleasures which were to be abandoned,—not because of those ties about to be unloosed, which had long united them to others in the sympathetic endearments of love and friendship,—not for these alone, but for those causes the remembrance of which heget a virtuous regret, whose dire effects had not even then been effaced; for that remissness which had checked their progress in holy and righteous acquirements; and for that inconsiderateness and want of watchful activity, which suffered so many encroachments to be made on the order of dutiful procedure? However long any one may have lived, and however well applied his energies may have been, still certain stains of pollution, which were received and were not speedily wiped away, but suffered to settle down, have given a colouring and complexion to the soul; the principles of inbred evil have not been completely eradicated, nor has all that diligence been bestowed which might have been given, to the adorning of the mind with every grace of the Christian character, in its brightest splendour and most lovely proportion. The Christian enters heaven, indeed, amidst shouts of triumph, but these are not so loud, nor so prolonged, as they might have been; he receives the palm of victory, and the crown of glory which fadeth not away, but this is not set with so many nor so brilliant gems as might have irradiated his immortal brow.

Those, then, greatly err, who consider not that every moment of time is valuable in reference to eternity,—who consider themselves already perfect, or that any portion of time may be separated from what is devoted to God and duty, and appro-riated for our own gratification, according to our own pleasure. It is so much taken from that which, however sufficient, yet is never found to have done the work which is given to be done. The thoughts of the dying Christian on this subject are very different from the sentiments of those self-approving professors of the Christian faith, who think that they have far outstripped their associates, and, looking round, see little left for them to do,—whose defects excite no regret, but whose attainments afford them materials for self-gratulation. The most enlightened and the holiest of men, on the concluding review of life, see much that might have been better; they feel, that if life's mazes were to be threaded by them anew, they would observe a very different procedure; and they acknowledge, that however happy they may find themselves to be, on bidding farewell to time, their departure should have been still more auspicious.

The reason why men perceive not how much better they might act, and feel not the difficulty of the truly Christian and pious life, is, that they make no great efforts to oppose the current of their natural propensities; but, while attempting to cross over to the further side, they at the same time glide down the stream, and perceive not the strength of that torrent which carries them along in its unresisted course. Let them try to stem its fury, and cross directly,—then will they find that it requires their utmost efforts to make head against the overpowering wave, and that, on every relaxation of their energy, they are borne down the current. But they live as nature, interest, or habit may constrain; and while their circumstances present no great temptation to the more heinous violations of the Divine precepts or natural law, they remain ignorant of that great alienation of heart from the purity of the Divine character, which is their inherent property. So, while the gifted and zealous Apostle of the Gentiles, deeply aware of the difficulties of the fight of faith which he was called to maintain, exclaimed, “O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?” Yet they have no corruption to deplore—their peace is undisturbed—they slumber in security; but it is a deceptive peace, and their sleep betokens the stillness of death.

As it is with the attainments of piety, so is it with those of knowledge. The longest life is found too short to compass the knowledge of what God has revealed to us in his Word. The thoughtful and well-exercised mind is regaled to the last with new discoveries of the Divine will. The Scriptures, if properly studied, are eminently fitted to abase the pride of the human intellect. In them, as in the other works of their great Author, there are mysteries connected with every subject of revelation, which the most profound mind cannot fully fathom; yet some are contented with so superficial a survey, that their curiosity is soon gratified, and they select from the whole, and comprise within a small compass, all that, in their estimation, is either interesting or useful. As the wisest, however, of the Grecian sages, after long and mature study of the system of nature, confessed that he really knew nothing, and that every successive research tended only to show him more clearly the limited character of his apprehension of any one subject; so is the most instructed Christian forced to make a similar acknowledgment, in regard to the sublimer mysteries of his faith. It is not for him, then, but to feel the shortness of human life, as a period in which to be thoroughly furnished for every good word and for every good work.

To some, the duration of mortal existence has proved too short for the attainment of any substantial good. They were cut off in the midst of resolutions of amendment. While they were beginning to think seriously of what should never have been delayed, on account of their presuming on the term of life being extended, death found them ere the work of salvation was accomplished. Had their life been prolonged, their good resolutions might have been carried into effect, and the blessing of life been secured. For this, life was amply sufficient; but, as Seneca has it, "We complain of its shortness, because of the waste of it which is made."

II. In the second place, life is short in a comparative point of view; and it is in reference to the consideration of the subject in this light, that the comparison in our text of life to an hand-breadth is peculiarly appropriate. To the child in the dawn of life, when reason begins to expand, and thought to measure out the prospect of happy days spread before it, through all the stages of its earthly career, the anticipated term of years appear so vast, as to fill its imagination with wonder, and rack its powers of comprehension. The several stages of advancement in stature and in wisdom are to it a matter of curious speculation, and it thinks that, when it shall have reached the advanced age of some elder relative, it will have lived long enough, and be even tired of this world. But, with the progress of years, the allotted term of human life ever appears to shorten. The duration of each successive year seems less than that of the foregoing, because it is a less proportionable item added to the amount of the whole bygone life, as well as that the incidents of a novel and impressive kind, which mark the progress of time, become fewer. So, when middle age is reached, life then appears short indeed; for past existence is as a tale which has been told. Comparatively few incidents of it are recollected; we survey it all with an instantaneous glance; nothing remains of it; it is without substance and void; and though time anticipated appears longer than a like duration on review, we cannot avoid connecting with our reflections on the past the belief that the remaining period of life, however long it may appear in prospect, must in reality be as short as that which is gone. When, again, man approaches the termination of his course, yet thinks of past life but as a watch in the night—as a sleep—as a dream; and when, at his longest calculation, he can reckon only on the addition of a sixth part more to it, or a tenth part, or less—why then, it is but such a proportion to be added to a dream.

But when the Psalmist said, "Thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth," he must have thought of the Eternal of ages, whom he addressed, with whom "a thousand years are as one day," and compared with whose immeasurable duration our existence here may well be likened to an hand-breadth. But there is an eternal duration, with which we ourselves are connected, which the Psalmist must likewise have had in recollection when he uttered the words of our text. Some such comparison is necessary to justify and account for the expression, "an hand-breadth," which is used. "Lord, thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth." "Our days," is a phrase employed in Scripture to denote the term of our existence here, which is measured by the revolution of days, contrasted with our future being, when time shall be no longer. The Psalmist thought of the great, the boundless eternity which lay before him; of that never-ending succession of ages through which he should live, increasing in knowledge and in happiness; and turning his eye to the comparatively puny, limited, and circumscribed being which he now enjoyed, yet considering the vast result that hung upon it, he exclaimed, "Thou hast made my days as an hand-breadth." Such language is appropriate to human life. It is pointed and energetic; but would not apply well to the inferior animals, not even to those ephemeral insects which flutter their brief existence in the sunbeam, and which are brushed away in the evening breeze, unless they were brought directly into comparison with some nobler being; for we think not of their existence as extending beyond the present limits. But the language, "my days are as an hand-breadth," when used by man, is full and expressive, though standing in connection with no other words, and though leading us to no idea beyond himself. In his own duration—in his future existence, contrasted with his present being—he presents the needed comparison.

Moral truths are often represented by expressing ideas of sensible objects. So here the measure of space is employed to denote the duration of time. There are several figures used in Scripture to express our perception of time's rapid course. It is compared to the flight of an eagle towards heaven,—to the passing of the shadow along the mountain's side, when the sun's beams are intercepted by the flying cloud,—to the life of a flower,—to the duration of a day to a sleep. Each of these has an appropriate fitness of its own, and contains some peculiarity of idea. The comparison of life to an hand-breadth is very appropriate and expressive, and has an advantage over the other comparisons, in that it directly suggests the thought of immeasurable space with which that hand-breadth is compared.

A hand-breadth is a short measure, comprehended at once by the eye. As a hand-breadth is to all space, so is our existence here to eternity. The figure employed gives by contrast a magnificent idea of the duration of that being on which we have entered. For what is an hand-breadth amongst the smallest of measures, in comparison of those greater ones by which we are accustomed to reckon distances? There are many hand-breadths in a mile, many miles in the journey of a day, and it requires many days to travel over an extensive country. There are many large countries contained in a continent, but even the extent of a continent is only an item in the circumference of the globe. What then is a hand-breadth, in comparison of this mighty sphere on which we tread? But when we shall have lived, in eternity, a duration, as much surpassing the limits of our present life, as does the circumference of our earth the measurement of an hand-breadth, we shall be only entering on that future existence for which we are destined. For the circumference of the globe is but a small measurement of space, even within the limits of known creation. There are objects perceptible by our naked eye in a starry night, so remotely distant, that a body moving with that velocity which would carry it round our world in a day, could have but made an advance towards us comparatively inconsiderable, though it had commenced its career with the first morning of creation, and continued moving onward till the present hour. There is here offered an idea of distance, greater far than the mind can comprehend. Each hand-breadth in it represents the duration of a life. Yet when we shall have lived a duration, as much surpassing the time of our existence in this world, as that inconceivable distance exceeds the space of an hand-breadth, we shall, after all, be but beginning to exist. The truth is, we have entered on a never-ending being. We have received a place among the things which have foundation. Our immortal souls exist in God, who has imparted to them, in reference to futurity, an attribute of himself—Eternity.

Now, what is the improvement to be made of the consideration of that hand-breadth of existence, which is allotted us here, as compared with that duration which is represented by immeasurable space, or, in other words, of the shortness of life viewed in the light of Christianity? The subject, surely, clearly points out to us the impropriety of setting the affections on earthly things; the extreme folly of sacrificing our whole being and our eternal interests to present gratification, instead of seeking to render our present being subservient to our future state. We would reckon it very unbecoming in any person labouring under a consumptive disease, and assured that his life must terminate ere a year revolve, to perplex himself with the affairs of business, and be eager in the acquisition of wealth. But what justification of a worldly temper would the assurance of any term of years afford? That period in our being is coming, yes, and speaking comparatively, is at no remote distance, when the difference betwixt a long and a short life will be absolutely as nothing, and when the circumstance of having enjoyed much or little happiness on earth will scarcely form a perceptible difference, in the aggregate amount of that felicity which shall have been received.

When we think, too, that every moment of our time, according to the manner in which it is occupied, contributes its share to the formation of the character, and that on this our degree of future glory, and the exaltation of our being depend, no momentary slumber or remissness can be regarded as trivial, whose consequences will last throughout eternal ages. In this view it appears, that the smallest act of duty, or the least dereliction of principle, must have a greater influence on our happiness, than the securing, or the forfeiting of the most splendid worldly fortune could produce; even on the supposition that nought in it is delusive, that happiness dwells where there is the appearance of hilarity, and that squalid poverty has no solace. It is in this light that we discern duty, though accompanied with the most extreme sufferings and privations, to be true gain; and vice, though accompanied with every desired success, to be entire loss. That is true wisdom, to mind those things which make for our eternal peace; and "this is life eternal, to know God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent."

In addition to the incentive, to apply our minds to heavenly wisdom, which is presented by the consideration of the shortness of life, and of the immeasurable extent of our future being, the text suggests another, namely, the uncertainty of our continuance here. There is no prescribed term of human life, which is signified by the employment of an uncertain measure, a hand-breadth, to denote its duration. The aged and the infirm must lay their account with going, in a very short time, the way of all the earth. But the youngest and most vigorous can assure themselves of no longer stay. We are all liable, every moment, to be summoned to our eternal account. And what extreme folly, to suffer our eternal destinies to hang on the fragile thread of life, apt to be snapped asunder by a thousand unforeseen accidents, without seeking a security for an auspicious result!

The child of man goeth forth from home with bounded step and heart elated, pleased with the reminiscence of the past, and with sportive joy anticipating the coming scene. His path unconscious conducts him to his end. With heedless movements he proceeds along the slippery verge. Sudden he sinks. The shades of darkness pass over his soul. His eyes are closed in death. Happy! if they reopen on the face of his Redeemer and his God. Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

How to begin the day.—As soon as ever thou awakest in the morning, keep the door of thy heart fast shut, that no earthly thought may enter, before that God come in first; and let him, before all others, have the first place therein. So all evil thoughts, either will not dare to come in, or shall the easier be kept out; and the heart will more savour of piety and godliness all the day after. But if thy heart be not at thy first awaking filled with some meditations of God and his Word, and dressed like the lamp in the Tabernacle, every morning and evening, with the oil olive of God's Word, and perfumed with the sweet incense of prayer, Satan will attempt to fill it with worldly cares or fleshly desires, so that it will grow unfit for the service of God all the day after. Begin, therefore, every day's work with God's Word and prayer. Meditate how Almighty God can, in the resurrection, as easily raise up thy body out of the grave, from the sleep of death, as he hath this morning wakened thee in thy bed, out of the sleep of nature. At the dawning of which resurrection day Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints, and every one of the bodies of the thousands of his saints, being fashioned like unto his glorious body, shall shine as bright as the sun. All the angels shining, likewise, in their glory, the body of Christ surpassing them all in splendour and glory. If the rising of one sun make the morning sky so glorious, what a bright, shining, and glorious morning will that be, when so many thousand thousands of bodies far brighter than the sun shall appear and accompany Christ as his glorious train? Let not any transitory profit, pleasure, or vain-glory of this day cause thee to lose thy part and portion of the eternal bliss and glory of that day which is properly termed the Resurrection of the just, but endeavour thou, with the eyes of faith, to foresee the glorious light of that day.—BAYLY. (Practices of Piety.)

The heaven of the Bible.—Let us but love the righteousness which he loves, and hate the iniquity which he hateth, and this of itself would soften and attune the mechanism of our moral nature, that in all the movements of it there should be joy. It is not sufficiently adverted to, that the happiness of heaven lies simply and essentially in the well-going machinery of a well-conditioned soul; and that according to its measure, it is the same in kind with the happiness of God, who liveth for ever in bliss ineffable, because he is unchangeable in being good, and upright and holy. There may be audible music in heaven; but its chief delight will be in the music of well-poised affections, and of principles in full and consenting harmony with the laws of eternal rectitude. There may be visions of loveliness there; but it will be the loveliness of virtue, as seen directly in God, and as reflected back again in family likeness from all his children. It will be this that shall give its purest and sweetest transports to the soul. In a word, the main reward of Paradise is spiritual joy; and that, springing at once from the love and the possession of spiritual excellence. It is such a joy as sin extinguishes on the moment of its entering the soul; and such a joy as is again restored to the soul, and that immediately on its being restored to righteousness.—REV. DR CHALMERS.

Imitate Christ.—Let Christians, whenever they are tempted to be proud, or to act contrary to the example of the Lord Jesus, suppose him once more addressing them, individually, in such terms as these: "How ill does pride or haughtiness become thee, O my disciple! when thy master was meek and lowly, and so much debased himself! Was he so poor? Blush, then, to think that thou art ashamed of poverty, or so anxious to avoid it. Did I condescend to wash the feet of my apostles? and can you reckon the meanest office of charity, self-denial, or condescension, beneath you? Did I affect state or grandeur, and can you be vain of costly furniture or apparel? When you hear me, in my word, ascribing all the glory to God, will you seek and delight in the applause of mortals? If I pleased not myself, do you deserve the name of my disciple, when seeking to please yourself? Did the most outrageous insults and injustices only excite my pity, and not provoke me to anger; and shall disrespect, affronts, or even injuries, blow up my servant to sinful passion, resentment, and revenge? Did I drink off my cup of unmingled bitterness without repining; and shall a small drop of gall, in affliction or disappointment, cause thee to murmur or complain? Why, O why, has the example of your Master so little influence upon your temper and conduct? Remember me, and be humble, patient, and mortified to self and the world.—DR H. HUNTER.

The Spirit of Prayer.—It is our want of faith and love that makes our prayers a task and a burden. How often God invites us to pray! How much he promises, in order to encourage us to come to him with a holy boldness and confidence, freely and unreservedly! We need not fear to ask, when God himself commands to do so. Ardent love to God, is indeed the true spring of genuine prayer. Where this is, all other graces will follow. "Love (says one) renders prayer delightful to ourselves, and acceptable to our Maker. It makes us willing to ask, and willing to receive."—REV. E. BICKERSTETH.

The excellence of Christ.—Jesus Christ is a God to whom we approach without pride, and before whom we are humbled without despair. Both Testaments refer to Jesus Christ: the former as its hope, the latter as its example, and both as their centre. The prophets had the gift of foretelling, but were never foretold themselves; the saints which followed were foretold, but had not the power of foretelling. Jesus Christ both prophesied and was prophesied of. Jesus Christ for all mankind, Moses for a single nation. The Jews were blessed in Abraham: "I will bless them that bless thee;" but all nations are blessed in Abraham's seed: "A light to lighten the Gentiles." "He has not done so to any nation," says David, speaking of the law. He has done so to all nations, may we say, speaking of Jesus Christ.—PASCAL.

NO MORE SEA.

BY THE REV. JOHN LONGMUIR, A. M.,

Minister of Mariners' Parish, Aberdeen; Author of "Bible Lays."

"There was no more sea."—REV. XXI. 1.

FORTH unrestrained the tempest rush'd,
And toss'd the billows mountain high;
The clouds surcharg'd with thunder rush'd,
And darkness veil'd the midday sky.

The sails were reef'd to scarce a span,
Lash'd was the steersman to the helm,
Our vessel bounded like a swan,
O'er waves that threaten'd to o'erwhelm.

At last the sails were torn in shreds,
The masts went crashing by the board;
The thund'ring waves swept o'er our heads—
We helpless cried unto the Lord.

We sunk—the waters clos'd around,
Life pass'd before me like a dream;
I slept the sleep of death profound,
And woke in this celestial beam.

Transported to this peaceful strand,
By angel convoy gliding near;
I gaz'd upon the glorious land,
And wond'ring found no sea was here!

No sea, in tempest's fury toss'd,
To fill maternal breasts with fears,
Make orphans weep their fathers lost,
And widows melt in bitter tears.

No sea, with proud and powerful wave,
To battle with the shatter'd bark,
And o'er the vanquish'd sailor rave,
Deep-sepulchr'd in cavern dark.

No sea forth-foaming all its shame,
Emblem of guilt with conscience sear'd ;
A spirit of polluted name
Ne'er on this holy hill appear'd.

No sea—vast waste without a path,—
To separate the ransom'd race,
No hostile fleets with thund'ring wrath,
Cut short the sailor's day of grace.

No sea to bring the costly stores,
That Lux'ry asks from foreign plain ;
Or nourish by her sandy shores,
The pearl for folly's glitt'ring train.

No sea to bring the scaly brood
In evil net was often swept ;
Man asks no more the sea for food—
His hunger lies where last he slept.

No sea beneath exhaling beams
To swell the cloud with genial rain ;
Man needs not here the murmur'ing streams,
To fertilize the smiling plain.

No sea to bear in tainted ships
The fetter'd captive o'er the wave ;
For Jesus spoke with gracious lips,
Redemption for the meanest slave.

No sea with constant ebb and flow,
To picture sin-disorder'd things ;
Though lull'd in summer's warmest glow,
It heav'd beneath the halcyon's wings.

No sea—when guilty earth was fir'd,
And heav'n recoil'd with awful sound,
To feed the flame the waves conspir'd,
Then melted, and no more were found.

Seamen! the Bible-course pursue,
And Jesus' saving grace implore,
That you may make, with bearings true,
The land where sea is found no more.

SKETCHES OF CELEBRATED FIELD- PREACHERS IN THE DAYS OF THE COVENANTERS.

IN extracting from "The Sketches of Scottish Church History," by the Rev. Thomas M'Crle, a few rapid notices of some of the most celebrated men in the days of the Covenant, we would call the attention of our readers to the volume itself, which has just appeared, replete as it is with the most valuable information in regard to the spirit-stirring events of our Church's history; and that, too, conveyed in a style so popular and deeply interesting, that we trust it will be welcomed by the public as a rich accession to the stores of our ecclesiastical literature. The work does great credit even to the son of the enlightened historian of Knox and Melville:—

One object of these Sketches being to afford the reader a correct idea of the most distinguished characters who appeared in the history of our Church, as well as of the scenes in which they acted, we may take occasion here to notice some of the field-preachers, who rendered themselves the special objects of the vengeance of the Government at this period. And we shall commence with those who, though neither indulged nor approving of the Indulgence, did not disown the authority of Government, or refuse allegiance in civil matters, but who, loyal as they were, suffered for resisting the Erastian encroachments made by the civil rulers on the royal prerogatives of the King of Zion.

Among these a chief place is due to Mr John Blackader. Bold in spirit, steadfast in the faith, and dauntless in the exercise of his office, he was one of those denominated the three first Worthies, because he, with Mr Welsh and Mr Semple, were among the first to unfurl the banner of the Covenant in the Lomonds, and preach the Gospel in the fields of Galloway and Nurbdale.* The sufferings which he underwent, and the hazards which he run in the course of his eventful life, would furnish materials for the most interesting romance. His eloquent and powerful discourses in the fields and fastnesses of Teviotdale, were blessed, not only for the refreshment of the persecuted Presbyterians who flocked from all quarters to hear him, but for the conversion of many of the inhabitants of these neglected districts, who, living in ignorance of the Gospel, had hitherto been addicted to rapine and every species of outrage. Possessing a cultivated and well-balanced mind, warm-hearted, but cool-headed and sagacious,† he lamented the excesses into which some of his brethren were driven, and used all his efforts to prevent those divisions and irritations which he foresaw would lead to the most disastrous results. This excellent man, who was allied to a family of rank, though disclaiming all rebellious sentiments and practices, was at last apprehended; and because he would not bind himself to refrain from preaching wherever Providence might call him, was sent to the Bass, in the unhealthy dungeon of which, after a long imprisonment, he contracted a disease which terminated his useful life.

Mr John Welsh was the son of Josias Welsh, minister of Temple-patrick in Ireland, who was designated "The Cock of the North," and grandson to the celebrated John Welsh of Ayr. He was, consequently, great-grandson of the illustrious reformer John Knox; and he seems to have inherited from this line of truly noble ancestry, the piety, the zeal, and the indomitable fortitude which distinguished them. He was settled in the parish of Irongray; and the reader cannot have forgotten the affecting scene which took place when he was ejected from his charge in 1662. But though compelled thus to leave the scene of his pastoral labours, Mr Welsh did not remain idle; he was constantly engaged in preaching at field-meetings, and frequently, notwithstanding all the edicts passed against him, returned and preached, sometimes once a-week, in his old parish, and baptized all the children. Nothing is more remarkable than the escapes which this faithful and undaunted minister met with on these occasions. He was present at all the insurrections,—at Pentland, Drumclog, and Bothwell Bridge; and there, as elsewhere, he took an active but unsuccessful part in endeavouring to allay the animosities regarding the Indulgence, and counselling the younger and more violent leaders to adopt moderate measures. "He was," says Kirkton, "a godly, meek, humble man, and a good popular preacher; but the boldest undertaker (adventurer) that ever I knew a minister in Christ's Church, old or late; for notwithstanding all the threatenings of the State, the great price of £500 set upon his head, the spite of bishops, the diligence of all blood-hounds, he maintained his difficult task of preaching upon the mountains of Scotland many times to many thousands, for near twenty years, and yet was kept always out of his enemies' hand. It is well known that bloody Claverhouse, upon intelligence that he was lurking in some secret place, would ride forty * Blackader's Sufferings, Adv. Lib.; Crichton's Memoirs, p. 114.

† Grace formed him in the Christian hero's mould
Meek in his own concerns—in's Master's bold;
Passions to Reason chained, Prudence did lead;
Zeal warm'd his breast, and Reason cool'd his head.—
Epitaph on Mr Blackader's tomb, Memoirs, p. 310.

miles in a winter night, yet when he came to the place, he always missed his prey. I have known Mr Welsh ride three days and two nights without sleep, and preach upon a mountain at midnight on one of the nights. He had for some time a dwelling-house near Tweedside, and sometimes when Tweed was strongly frozen, he preached in the middle of the river, that either he might shun the offence of both nations, or that two kingdoms might dispute his crime." After all his dangers, he died peaceably in his bed in London, on the 9th January 1681.

The intrepidity and self-possession of this worthy minister, to which, no doubt, under Providence, he owed many of his escapes, are illustrated by the following anecdote:—On one occasion, being pursued with unrelenting rigour, he was quite at a loss where to flee, but depending on Scottish hospitality, he called at the house of a gentleman of known hostility to field-preachers in general, and to himself in particular, though he had never seen Mr Welsh before. He was kindly received. In the course of conversation, Welsh was mentioned, and the difficulty of getting hold of him. "I am sent," said Welsh, "to apprehend rebels: I know where he is to preach to-morrow, and will give you the rebel by the hand." The gentleman, overjoyed at this news, agreed to accompany his informant next morning. When they arrived, the congregation made way for the minister and his host. He desired the gentleman to sit down on the chair, at which, to his utter astonishment, his guest of the previous night stood and preached. During the sermon, the gentleman seemed much affected; and at the close, when Mr Welsh, according to his promise, gave him his hand, he said,—“You said you were sent to apprehend rebels, and I, a rebellious sinner, have been apprehended this day.”

There is only one instance recorded in which Welsh spoke in a prophetic or foreboding strain, but it is one of the most remarkable we have met with. A profigate youth at the University of St Andrews, who had come to hear Mr Welsh preach, threw something at him in mockery, which struck him. Mr Welsh paused, and before the whole multitude, which was very large, said,—“I know not who has put this public affront on a servant of Jesus Christ; but be he who he may, I am persuaded there will be more present at his death than are hearing me preach this day!” It turned out to be a son of Sir James Stanfield of Newmilns, near Haddington; and, strange to say, some years after, this unhappy youth was executed for the murder of his own father!

As a specimen of the manner in which the loyal and peaceable Presbyterians who suffered at this period vindicated themselves, we might refer to the case of Mr Archibald Riddel, brother to the Laird of Riddel, who was charged, in 1680, with preaching at conventicles. Mr Riddel denied that he had been preaching in the fields, but allowed that he had done so in private houses, while the people stood without doors. Preaching even in private houses, without the consent of the incumbent of the parish, was now accounted high treason, as well as preaching in the fields. "Will you be content," said the Lord Advocate, "to engage not to preach in the fields after this?" "My Lord, excuse me," said Riddel, "for I dare not come under any such engagement." "This is strange," observed the Advocate, "that Mr Riddel, who has had so much respect to authority as not to preach in the fields since the indemnity, will not, out of the same respect, be content to engage to behave hereafter as he has behaved heretofore." "My Lord Advocate, I can answer somewhat for the time past, but not for the time to come; I have not, since the indemnity, judged myself under a necessity to preach out of a house; but I know not but He who has called me so to preach, may, before I go out of the world, call me to preach upon tops of mountains, yea, upon the sea; and I dare not come under any engagements to disobey his calls." "If I were of Mr Riddel's principles," said the Advocate, "and did judge in my conscience that the laws of the land were contrary to the laws of God, and that I could not conform to them, I would judge it my duty rather to go out of the nation and live elsewhere, rather than disturb the peace of the land by acting contrary to its laws." "My Lord," replied Mr Riddel, "if I do any thing contrary to the laws, I am liable to the punishment due by the law." "That is not sufficient," said the Advocate; "a subject that regards the public good of the land, should, for the peace and welfare thereof, either conform to the law, or go out of the land." The reply of Mr Riddel to this reasoning, which has been the convenient logic of persecuting governments at all times, is worthy of notice. "My Lord, I doubt that argument would militate against Christ and his apostles as much as against us; for they both preached and acted otherwise, against the laws of the land; and not only did not judge it their duty to go out of the land, but the apostles, on the contrary, reasoned with the rulers,—‘Whether it be better to obey God or man, judge ye.’" "Will you promise not to preach in the open fields?" cried the judge from the bench. "My Lord, I am willing to undergo what sufferings your Lordship will be pleased to inflict on me, rather than come under such an engagement."

The other case to which we here advert is that of Alexander Hume of Hume, in 1682. This worthy gentleman, whose only real offence consisted in his having attended conventicles, was accused, without any proof, of having had intercourse with some of the rebels; and indeed it was part of the cruel mockery of justice then practised, to insert as a preamble in every indictment against the Presbyterians, all the insurrections that had taken place, with the murder of Archbishop Sharp, though they had nothing more to do with these acts than the judges who sat on the bench before them;—a practice resembling that of the bloody inquisitors of Spain, who clothed the victims whom they condemned to the fire for heresy with cloaks, on which hideous likenesses of monsters and devils were painted, to infame the bigotry and quench the sympathy of the spectators. It is said that a remission of Mr Hume's sentence came down from London several days before his execution, but was kept up by the Earl of Perth, a bigoted Papist and persecutor; and when his lady, Isobel Hume, fell on her knees before Lady Perth to entreat for her husband's life, urging that she had five small children, she was repulsed in the most insulting manner, and in terms which cannot here be repeated. On the scaffold, this pious and excellent sufferer vindicated his character from the aspersions of those who had thrusted for his blood. "The world represents me as seditious and disloyal," he said, "but God is my witness, and my own conscience, of my innocency in this matter. I am loyal, and did ever judge obedience unto lawful authority my duty, and the duty of all Christians. I was never against the king's just power and greatness; but all a Christian doth must be of faith, for what clasheth with the command of God cannot be our duty; and I wish the Lord may help the king to do his duty to the people, and the people to do their duty to the king." He then said,—“My conscience bears me witness, I ever studied the good of my country. I hope I shall be no loser that I have gone so young a man off the stage of this world, seeing I am to make so blessed an exchange as to receive eternal life, the crown of glory. I bless His name he made me willing to take share with his persecuted people; for I hope I shall also share with them in their consolations. Farewell all earthly enjoyments, farewell my dear wife and children—dear, indeed, unto me, though not so dear as Christ, for whom I now suffer the loss of all things; I leave them on the tender mercies of Christ. And now, O Father, into thy hand I commend my spirit; Lord Jesus, receive my soul!" When the rope was put about his neck, he concluded by singing the last verse of the 17th Psalm,—

"But as for me, I thine own face
In righteousness will see;
And with thy likeness, when I wake,
I satisfied shall be."

These instances are sufficient attestations of the fact, that there were many among the Presbyterians who suffered at this period perfectly unimpeachable in their loyalty, and whose only crime, even in the judgment of their accusers, was, that they would not, and could not, comply with the dictates of human authority when these conflicted with the Divine. And they show the falsehood of the pretence set up by the persecutors, that none were condemned during this period for their religion, but simply for sedition and rebellion. It is certain that there were some who went the length of disowning Charles and all his minions, and did not scruple to do so in the face of their persecutors; but the examples we have given (and many more might have been added) are sufficient to prove that, even in the case of those who went this length, it was not simply because they refused allegiance to the tyrant that they were condemned to die, but that they would have suffered with equal certainty, though they had professed the utmost loyalty, provided they qualified that profession by declaring that they could not obey him in matters of religion.

At the head of those who set the authority of the government at defiance, and disowned all allegiance to the civil rulers, stood Richard Cameron. He was originally of the Episcopal persuasion, but having been led to hear the Gospel preached in the fields, he forsook the curates, and took license from the ousted ministers. He entered on his labours with all the ardour of a new convert, who, tracing his first serious impressions to field-preachings, could not bring himself to think with patience of those who availed themselves of the Indulgence. Finding that he could not help preaching against it, though he had come under a promise to refrain from it, he retired for a time to Holland, but returned after the stipulated period, in 1680, burning with a desire to disburden his conscience. His sermons were filled with predictions of the fall of the Stuarts, and the sufferings of Scotland which would precede it. But his course was brief; for in July of that same year, Bruce of Earlsburgh, a violent persecutor, came upon him and his followers with a troop of dragoons, at a meeting held in a desert place called Airsmoss. On seeing the enemy approach, and no way of escape, the people gathered close around their minister, when he offered up a short prayer, repeating thrice the memorable words,—“Lord, spare the green, and take the ripe!” He then turned to his brother Michael, saying—“Come, let us fight it to the last; for this is the day that I have longed for and the death that I have prayed for—to die fighting against our Lord’s avowed enemies; and this is the day we will get the crown.” And there, accordingly, he died, fighting manfully back to back with his brother. The enemy, foiled in their object, which was to bring him to an ignominious end, wreaked their vengeance on the inanimate body of the hero. They cut off his head and hands, and carried them to his father, who was then confined in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, tauntingly inquiring if he knew to whom they belonged. “I know them, I know them,” said the poor old man; “they are my son’s, my dear son’s. Good is the will of the Lord, who cannot wrong me nor mine.” They were then fixed upon one of the ports of the city, the hands close to the head, with the fingers upwards, as if in the posture of prayer. “There,” said Sir Robert Murray, “there’s the head and hands of a man who lived praying and preaching, and died praying and fighting.”

In the same skirmish at which Cameron fell, David Hackston of Rathillet was taken prisoner. Having been one of those present, though not active, at the death of Archbishop Sharp, a large reward was offered for his apprehension; and having fallen into the hands of his enemies, they determined to pour upon him all the vials of their wrath and revenge. Upon his trial, he boldly refused to own that the bishop’s death was murder; and he was the first of those who, at the bar, openly declined the king’s authority, as a usurper of the prerogatives of Jesus Christ. Being brought to the scaffold, first his right hand was struck off and then his left; he was then drawn by a pulley to the top of the gallows, and suffered to fall with all his weight three times; while yet alive, his heart was torn out of his body, and then—but we refrain from adding more. Even at this distance of time, the flesh creeps, and the blood runs cold, at the bare recital of the cruelties perpetrated, under the sacred name of justice, on this unhappy gentleman.

Had our space permitted, we might have spoken of Donald Cargill, who was executed about the same time; Alexander Peden, and other remarkable characters of the period. We shall only observe regarding them, that as the persecution waxed hot, they became more distinguished for that prophetic spirit which has furnished as much ground of profane ridicule to their enemies, as matter of superstitious veneration to some of their indiscriminate admirers. Here, also, the middle course appears to be the safest and the most rational. That they were men of God cannot be questioned, for they were men of prayer; and that they were favoured with very extraordinary pre-impressions of what was to come, which were actually verified in many instances, cannot be denied, without questioning facts which have been amply attested. But in the case of many of them, and of Peden in particular,* it is equally vain to deny that much must be ascribed to the workings of a heated imagination, excited almost to frenzy by the incessant watchings, turmoils, and apprehensions of a life embittered by persecution, and spent in lonely caves and gloomy deserts. Placed in such circumstances, they were exceedingly prone, if not to create ideal pictures of misery, at least to exaggerate the reality. If the remains of some of these worthies appear to us sometimes rhapsodical, and sometimes even bordering on irreverent familiarity, we must remember that, not only were the younger ministers of that period deprived by persecution of the advantages of a liberal education, or at least of leisure for study, but that, in order to feel their eloquence, we must have been born in the same century, and stationed on the same spot, and environed with the same perils as their hearers; and we ought not to criticize with the nicety of modern taste, productions which, homely enough as they came from the lips of the speaker, must have become still more so, after passing from mouth to mouth in the traditions of a devout but unlettered peasantry.†

* Wodrow denies, on the best authority, the genuineness of the strange book entitled “Peden’s Prophecies.”—Vol. iv. 337.

† We refer particularly to the Biographia Presbyteriana of Patrick Walker, and similar works, of which the enemies of Presbyterians have taken so much advantage.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glasgow Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISSET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M’COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—The Ordinance of Baptism amongst the Primitive Christians. By the Rev. Robert Jamieson, ..... Page 641 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Christian Watchfulness." By the Rev. John Longmuir, A.M., ..... 644 3.—On the Being and Perfections of God. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D. Part II., ..... 65	4.—Biographical Sketch. Mrs W. W. Duncan. By the Editor. Part II., ..... Page 646 5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Alexander Davidson, ..... 649 6.—Sacred Poetry. "The World's Prospects," ..... 653 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Rev. Dr Gordon, Rev. E. Erskine, and Adam, ..... 654 8.—Henri Arnaud and the Return of the Waldenses. Part I. 65
---	---

THE ORDINANCE OF BAPTISM AMONGST THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

Minister of Currie, Mid-Lothian.

BAPTISM, the rite with which an approved course of discipline was crowned, was regarded by the primitive Christians with sentiments of extraordinary reverence. Independently of the sacred interest that was attached to it, as an ordinance of the Saviour, instituted among the last words he spoke on earth, and associated with the promise of his gracious presence and blessing to the end of the world;—independently, too, of the invaluable spiritual blessings of which it was the sign, and which, no doubt, were the primary causes of all the value set upon it, it acquired an adventitious importance of no ordinary kind in the eyes of men, who could not arrive at it but by a course of laborious and prolonged preparation,—into whose minds the sentiment was instilled from day to day, that baptism would sever them from the world, and seal their union to Christ as their spiritual master; and whose desires to attain that distinguished honour were for two or three years before wound up to a pitch of the highest excitement. Previously to their reception of the initiatory rite, they were scarcely recognised as in the ranks of Christians. They were regarded, indeed, as standing a step higher than Jews or heathens, but still occupying the lowest grade in the Church,—were treated by the faithful with the condescending sympathy and tenderness shown by superiors to those beneath them,—not with the kiss of peace, and the overflowings of affection bestowed upon the brethren,—and spoken of by names, implying that they were as yet in a state of non-existence in regard to the profession of Christianity. The ceremony that ushered them into Christian society, naturally drew to itself, in these circumstances, all the interest of an event, that constituted an era in their religious history; and not more ardently does the minor long for the period that will raise him to the dignity of manhood, and give him the free and uncontrolled disposal of his affairs; not more impatiently does the apprentice anticipate the term which will emancipate him from the shackles of servitude, and announce him to the world as master of his art,—than the catechumen looked forward to baptism as the period of his attaining the dignity of a follower of Christ,—as the passage from the threshold to the interior of the church,—the passport to the privileged ranks of the faithful,—the badge by which he was stamped as an illuminated, approved, and perfect Christian.*

This ordinance was dispensed at all times, in private and in public, by night and by day. The moment that a catechumen had satisfactorily completed his appointed probation, he might claim the administration of baptism, and the zeal of the primitive age was always so ready to give encouragement to the young convert, that his pastor would have complied with his wishes by admitting him to the holy rite, at whatever period his novitiate was ended. But as a large proportion of the candidates for baptism were adults,—persons of mature years, who came from the ranks of heathenism to join the Christian society,—and as great numbers were always passing through their appointed trials at the same time, it became customary to introduce these into the Church in a body; and hence two or three periods in the year, such as the days that preceded the celebration of any of the great festivals, were selected as the most convenient for baptizing them. The place where the rite was performed was long as unsettled and fluctuating as the time,—the ordinance being administered indifferently, in a house or a prison—by a river side, or the sea shore,—in salt water, * Persons baptized were said to be illuminated, from their being then enlightened in a knowledge of the mysteries previously concealed from them,—to be approved and perfect, as having passed through the state of the catechumens with approbation.

or in fresh, according to the convenience or situation of the party. But in after-times, when the form of Christian worship was duly established, it was usual to administer the ordinance in a baptistery or font, belonging to the church, situated at first in the porch, as emblematical of the rite being the entrance into the society of the faithful; but afterwards fenced in the body of the church itself. It was a spacious receptacle, contrived as well for the accommodation of several persons at a time, which the number of the candidates often made necessary, as adapted to the mode of baptizing then generally adopted. In situations where there was a scarcity of water, or in cases of sickness and imminent danger, the ordinance was administered by sprinkling,—and this being in the latter circumstances generally performed at the bed-side of the convert, received the name of clinic baptism;—a form which, however necessary it was considered, was yet looked upon as imperfect, and as interposing an obstacle to the future advancement of the person so baptized to any of the offices of the ministry. With the exception of such cases, however, the mode which seems to have been most prevalent was by immersion; and, while, from the greatest number of the primitive Christians being natives of the warm climates of the East, it was most suited to their habits to plunge the whole body under water, it was thought that this practice more fully answered to the idea of being buried with Christ in baptism; and their coming out of the element, to that of rising with him to newness of life. The wooden structure in which it was performed, was divided by a partition wall, for the orderly and decent accommodation of the persons about to be baptized. The men were waited upon by deacons, the women by deaconesses,—and the ceremony was gone through always in presence of the assembled congregation, from which, however, they were separated by the little tenement appropriated for the action.

From the peculiar notions entertained of the virtues of baptism, there gradually arose several superstitious customs, one of the most prevalent of which was that of postponing the reception of the rite till an indefinite period after the catechumenhip had terminated. In the beginning of the third century, the spirit of the age, which was peculiarly prone to multiply observances, and to cherish a reverence for time and seasons, prompted many even of the greatest and most pious men of the time, to defer their baptism till the close of life. Witness the well-known cases of Constantine and Constantius, both of whom, though they had long made a public profession of Christianity, remained unbaptized till they were on their deathbeds,—and the not less notorious example of Theodosius, who, though all his lifetime sustaining an eminent character for piety, did not apply for baptism till he was overtaken by a dangerous illness, from which, however, he afterwards recovered. The reason of this delay of baptism was, that the ordinance, being thought of the greatest efficacy in cleansing the whole man, and removing all the stains and defilements of sin, it was supposed that the recipients, when baptized immediately before death, would enter into heaven in greater purity; and also, because a tedious and troublesome course of discipline was imposed on all who did not walk up to their baptismal engagements, or who, after receiving the rite, contracted foul impurities, and returned to their former habits of vice. Persons, however, who entertained such notions of the efficacy of baptism, and of its indispensable necessity to salvation, would not always find themselves in a condition to enjoy the comforts of the ordinance; and circumstances frequently occurred, which, depriving them of the means and opportunity of obtaining it, led them to sigh, with bitter, but unavailing regret, over the custom that occasioned its postponement. The history of Gregory Nazianzen affords a remarkable case in illustration of this. Having received from his earliest years a pious, as well as a liberal education, he was a zealous Christian from the time he arrived at maturity, and was fit for entering the world. To complete his classical studies, he was sent, according to the custom of his age, to Athens; and during his voyage to that celebrated seat of learning and science, he was overtaken by a storm, which threatened to consign the ship, and all who were on board, to a watery grave. While the rest of the passengers were giving themselves up for lost, and were bitterly bewailing the sad and untimely fate that apparently awaited them, Gregory was engrossed with reflections of another and more serious description. The apprehension of death and another world, had summoned him to review his past life, and nothing so pained him as the thought of his being unbaptized, and thereby unentitled to the privileges of the Christian life. This reflection, brought home to him by the circumstances, in the most vivid and alarming manner, wrung from him the most passionate exclamations of sorrow: he tore his clothes—threw himself on the floor—uttered such loud and piercing cries, that the very sailors, laying aside the sense of the common danger, came and sat beside him, weeping from sympathy. Recollecting himself, he addressed his prayers to heaven, pleading before God that he was his by private dedication in his early years, and that now, a second time, he devoted himself to God, which he would assuredly confirm by a public baptism, the moment he arrived on land, were it the Divine will to deliver him.

Scarcely less importance was attached to the person by whom, and the place at which, the ordinance was administered. Some would not be baptized except by some pastor eminent for his orthodoxy and piety, and were content to wait till they had an opportunity of receiving it from the hands of their favourite idol,—as Augustine used to boast, that he had been admitted to baptism by the celebrated Ambrose. Some fancied, that to be plunged in the stream whose waters were poured over the sacred person of the Redeemer, was alone sufficient to the purifying of the flesh,—as Constantine, who was on his progress to the Jordan for that purpose, when his journey was arrested by death. Others considered it their duty to delay baptism till they attained thirty years of age, the period at which Christ was baptized,—as Eusebius was not baptized when elected Bishop of Cesarea, and Perpetua till she was thrown into prison, a little before her martyrdom. While another class selected one of the annual festivals, as the fittest season for their baptism,—Epiphany, as the time when Christ was baptized,—or Easter, that they might die with him,—or Whitsuntide, that they might celebrate with due honour the descent of the Holy Ghost. All these customs originated either in the fancy and caprice of individuals, or in a superstitious attachment to times, places, and persons,—when Christians had begun to rest the efficacy and virtue of the ordinance less on the thing signified, than on the outward circumstances with which the celebration was associated.

The rite of baptism was originally administered in a very simple manner,—the apostles and their contemporaries contenting themselves with an appropriate prayer, and the subsequent application of the element of water. At an early period, however, a variety of ceremonies was introduced, with the pious though mistaken view of conveying a deeper and more solemn impression of the ordinance; and affording, by each of them, a sensible representation of the grand truths and spiritual blessings of which it is significant. The baptismal season having arrived, those catechumens who were ripe for baptism, and who were then called competentes, or elect, were brought to the baptistery, at the entrance of which they stopped, and then mounting an elevated platform, where they could be seen and heard by the whole congregation of the faithful, each, with an audible voice, renounced the devil and all his works. The manner in which he did this, was by standing with his face towards the west, and with some bodily gesture, expressive of the greatest abhorrence, declaring his resolution to abandon the service of Satan, and all the sinful works and pleasures of which he is the patron and the author. This renunciation being thrice repeated, the candidate elect turned towards the east,—the region of natural light, and therefore fit emblem of the Sun of Righteousness,—made three times a solemn promise and engagement to become the servant of Christ, and submit to all his laws. After this he repeated the Creed deliberately, clause by clause, in answer to appropriate questions of the minister, as the profession of his faith. It was deemed an indispensable part of the ceremony, that this confession should be made audibly, and before many witnesses; and in those rare and unfortunate instances, where the applicants for baptism possessed not the power of oral communication, this duty was performed through the kind offices of a friend, who, testifying their desire to receive the ordinance, acted as their substitute. In ancient history, an anecdote is told of an African negro slave, who, after having passed satisfactorily through the state of catechumen, and been entered on the lists for baptism, suddenly fell into a violent fever, which deprived him of the faculty of speech. Having recovered his health, but not the use of his tongue, on the approach of the baptismal season, his master bore public testimony to his principles, and the Christian consistency of his conduct, in consequence of which he was baptized, along with the class of catechumens to which he belonged. The profession of faith being ended, and a prayer being offered, that as much of the element of water as should be employed might be sanctified, and that all who were about to be baptized might receive, along with the outward sign, the inward invisible grace, the minister breathed on them, symbolically conveying to them the influences of the Holy Spirit,—an act which, in later times, was followed by anointing them with oil, to indicate that they were ready, like the wrestlers in the ancient games, to fight the fight of faith. The preliminary ceremonies were brought to a close by his tracing on the foreheads of all the sign of the cross; an observance which, as we formerly remarked, was frequently used on the most common as well as sacred occasions by the primitive Christians, and to which they attached a purely Christian meaning,—that of living by faith on the Son of God. All things being prepared, and the person about to be baptized having stripped off his garments, the minister took each by the hand, and plunged him thrice under the water, pronouncing each time the name of the three persons in the Godhead. The newly baptized having come out of the water, was immediately dressed by some attendants in a pure white garment; which signified, that having put off his old corrupt nature, and his former bad principles and practices, he had become a new man. A very remarkable example of this ceremony occurs in the history of the celebrated Chrysostom. The conspirators who had combined to ruin that great and good man in Constantinople, resolved on striking the first blow on the eve of an annual festival, at the hour when they knew he would be alone in his vestry, preparing for his duty to the candidates for baptism. By mistake, they did not arrive till he had begun the service in the church. Heated with wine, and goaded on by their malignant passions, they burst into the midst of the assembly, most of whom were young persons, in the act of making the usual profession of their faith, and some of whom had already entered the waters of the baptistery. The whole congregation were struck with consternation. The catechumens fled away naked and wounded to the neighbouring woods, fields, or any places that promised them shelter from the massacre that was perpetrated in the city. And next morning, as soon as it had dawned, an immense meadow was seen covered all over with white,—on examining which, it was found to be filled with catechumens who had been baptized the night before, and who were then, according to custom, dressed in their white garments, amounting in number to three thousand. Those white garments, after being worn a week, were thrown aside, and deposited in the antechamber of the church, where, with the name of the owner inscribed on each, they were carefully preserved as memorials of baptism, ready to be produced against them in the event of their violating its vows. A memorable instance of this use of them occurs in the history of the primitive age. A Carthaginian, who had long been connected with the Christian Church of his native city, at length apostatised, and joining the ranks of its enemies, became one of the most violent persecutors of all who named the name of Christ. Through the influence of friends, he was elevated to a high civil station, the powers of which he prostituted to the cruel and bloody purpose of persecuting his former friends. Among those who were dragged to his tribunal, was a deacon, once an intimate friend of his own, and who had been present at his baptism. On being put to the rack, he produced the white garments of the apostate, and in words that went to the heart of all the bystanders, solemnly declared that these would testify against his unrighteousness at the last day.

Immediately after the baptism, the new-made members, in their snow-white dress, took their place among the body of the faithful, each of whom that was near, welcomed them as brethren with the kiss of peace; and, as being admitted into the family of God, whose adopted children alone are entitled to address him as "Our Father," they were permitted, for the first time, publicly to use the Lord's Prayer, and to partake of the communion.

Besides, at this period, they generally assumed a new name. Many of the names in familiar use among the heathens being borrowed from those of the objects of their worship, the converts to Christianity deemed it becoming and consistent with their new principles, to change their family name for others that had been borne by some distinguished personage in the history of their faith, or that was significant of some virtue recommended by it. Hence we find many in the primitive ages bearing the name of prophets and apostles, and even of the Christian graces; such as, in Greek, Eusebius, Eustachius, Gregory, Athanasius; and in Latin, Pius, Fidus, Speratius. An example may be given from the interesting history of the Martyrs of Palestine. "When the governor," says the historian, "had made trial of their invincible fortitude by tortures in every form, he asked the chief person among them who he was, and heard in answer, not a real or common name, but that of some one of the prophets; for it happened, that those men, having laid aside the name by which, as received by their parents, they were called, as being the appellations of idols, had assumed unto themselves other names; and one might have observed them using the names of Elias or Jeremiah, Samuel or Daniel; and thus showing themselves to be, not in deeds alone, but even in their very appellations, as 'that Jew who is such inwardly,' and as that Israel of God who is such really and in sincerity."<sup>2</sup>

CHRISTIAN WATCHFULNESS.

BY THE REV. JOHN LONGMUIR, A. M.,

Minister of Mariners' Parish, Aberdeen.

"And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.—Matt. xiii. 35."

Watch—and ev'ry sin decline,
That would watchfulness impair;
Surfeiting, excess of wine,
Wealth's deceit and worldly care.

Watch—and ev'ry means employ—
Search what holy men record,
Pray in sickness, sing in joy,
Meet with those that fear the Lord.

Watch—the foe is at your door,
Full of wiles and great in pow'r;
Hark!—it is the lion's roar,
Seeking whom he may devour!

Watch—a precious charge you keep—
Souls design'd for heav'n's rewards,
And the eye that cannot sleep,
Marks how ev'ry watchman guards.

Watch—the Master like a thief,
May appear when least you think—
Long the time may be or brief,
Let not then the eyelid sink.

Watch—how blest when he appears,
Will the ready servant be!
Ends his watch with all its fears—
Triumph crowns fidelity!

ON THE BEING AND PERFECTIONS OF GOD.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

PART II.

SEVERAL of the Divine attributes, viz., "holiness, justice, goodness, and truth," are usually called God's moral perfections, inasmuch as they form together the law of his nature, according to which he invariably acts and orders all things; and as they present in him a character which demands our supreme love and imitation. Without the thought of these perfections, as forming his essential and unchangeable character, any other view of his mere natural perfections would render him only an object of dread and aversion. A Being, capable of being present everywhere at all times, and knowing and doing all things, yet guided by no regard to "holiness, justice, goodness, and truth," could be viewed by all inferior beings with a feeling only of perpetual alarm, as more likely to prove to them the author of evil than of good. But, on the other hand, we must continually keep in mind, here, the natural perfections of his being, before we can rightly conceive of him as God. We might think of a being possessed of a purely spiritual nature, and endowed with power, wisdom, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, in a degree far beyond what we can comprehend, and yet to be only a created being, to whom all these attributes had been communicated from the Supreme; and who, thus posessing nothing of himself, would be as nothing in comparison with the Godhead. Hence, in the account of what God is, it is farther stated, and in order to form any just idea of his glorious majesty it must be always remembered, that he is "infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being," and in all his perfections.

<sup>2</sup> The foregoing Article is extracted from Mr Jamieson's valuable and popular work, "Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians," which we are glad to see has reached a second edition.

He is infinite, without bounds or limits in all that belongs to his nature and character; and is thus every where present,—every where perceiving,—every where acting. "Behold, the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain thee." "Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord." "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good."

He is eternal, without beginning, or ending, or any succession, in all that belongs to his nature and character. "Even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." "The high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity." "The Lord of lords, who only hath immortality." "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, which is, which was, and which is to come, the Almighty."

He is unchangeable, always the same, incapable of any change in all that belongs to his nature and character. "I am the Lord, I change not." "With whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." "The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations."

These attributes of infinity, eternity, and immutability, belong to God alone, and are therefore called his incommunicable perfections. They constitute his incomprehensible being or essence, his absolute independence of every other being, and his unchangeable excellence or blessedness in himself; and are all expressed in his own peculiar name, "I am that I am." These are attributes, if we may so speak, or essential properties also of all his other perfections, and express the immeasurable and inconceivable degree in which all these other perfections exist in his nature. He is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably wise; infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably powerful; infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably holy; infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably just; infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably good and merciful; infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably true and faithful. Not one of all these his perfections can our finite faculties possibly fathom or comprehend. "Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out." "Canst thou by searching find out God? and canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" "Lo, these are parts of his ways, but how little a portion is heard of him."

All these perfections also, and all the excellence that can be included in them, belong to God alone. Not only do they exist in him supremely, but they exist in him solely; and whatever measure of them is to be found in any other being is all owing to his sovereign pleasure, has all flowed from him, as their original source,—all rest upon him as their only support. Strictly speaking, God alone has being, and all creatures are, in comparison, as nothing. "None is good save one, and that is God." He is indeed all in all. "Of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

1. How worthy is the most high God of our utmost reverence, when we think of him, or speak of him, or draw near to worship him! How deserving of imitation the practice of an eminently wise and good man,* who is said to have made a pause in his speech, both before and after pronouncing even the name of God. "Holy and reverend is his name." "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all that are about him." "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear."

2. How much are we here called to believe concerning God! How full of momentous meaning is this brief statement in the Catechism of what God is! How deserving of a devout pause is every word that it contains, as expressing one of his glorious attributes and excellences. Let us duly consider this when we have occasion to repeat these words, or even when we bring them to our recollection; and strive to cherish the corresponding emotion, which every one of his sacred titles is fitted to call forth in our souls. "Give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness." "Worship him in spirit and in truth." "Keep yourselves in the love of God."

3. Observe, especially, the practical purpose for which the most high God thus reveals his nature and character, viz., as a rule of direction how we may fulfil and follow out our "chief end." His word thus teaches us "what we are to believe concerning God," not that we may indulge in idle speculations about his incomprehensible being and infinite perfections; but that we may know how to glorify him as God, and to enjoy him as our God. "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him."

Do we believe, concerning God, that in his very being he is a Spirit, and the Father of all spirits? Let us remember always that "in him alone we live, and move, and have our being;" that he weigheth the spirits, and that we are called to be "in subjection to the Father of spirits, and live;" "to offer unto him spiritual sacrifices," and to be "renewed in the spirit of our minds," and so to "glorify him in our body and our spirit, which are God's."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinite in his being? Let us remember that "he is not far from any one of us," that we can never see from his presence; that we walk, therefore, as "seeing him who is invisible," and as seeking in his presence our fulness of joy at last, and for evermore.

Do we believe concerning God, that he is eternal in his being? Let us remember that his ways, therefore, are everlasting, and glorify him, by rejoicing in the assurance that he reigneth as our God for ever and ever, and that "when our heart and our flesh faileth, he is the strength of our heart, and our portion for ever."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is unchangeable in his being? Let us glorify him, by showing that we rejoice in the assurance that his "gifts and callings are without repentance;" that he hath said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee;" and that "he which hath begun a good work in us will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably wise? Let us cease from our own wisdom, and adore the wisdom wherewith he hath made all his works, and abounded towards us in our redemption, and ask of him "who giveth to all men liberally," that wisdom which cometh down from above, and which he promiseth to them that ask him.

* The Hon. Robert Boyle.

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably powerful? Let us glorify him, by fearing the power of his anger, and trusting in his power to accomplish all that he pleases, and to save all them that put their trust in him.

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably holy? Let us glorify him, by humbling ourselves before the throne of his holiness, and daily confessing that in his sight we are, in ourselves, altogether unclean; and by seeking his own Holy Spirit to make us "holy in all manner of conversation," and to teach and train us to follow that "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably just? Let us glorify him, by pleading guilty before his righteous tribunal; and, in the prospect of giving account of ourselves unto him, as the Judge of all, while desiring in all things to do justly, let us seek above all things, and though at the loss of all things, "to win Christ" as our righteousness, and "to be found in him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably good? Let us glorify him, by praising him for his goodness to all, by choosing him as our own true good, and by reposing on the assurance that he will make all things work for good to them that love him, and that "nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."

Do we believe concerning God, that he is infinitely, eternally, and unchangeably true? Let us glorify him, by an unshaken faith in his word, that "there shall be a performance of those things which have been told us from the Lord;" by "holding fast the profession of our faith without wavering," like faithful Abraham, "staggering not at any promise of God through unbelief, but strong in faith, giving glory to God;" and especially, preparing for enjoying him for ever, in the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness, "in hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MRS W. W. DUNCAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

AFTER the death of Mr Lundie, the family took up their residence in Edinburgh, where Mary devoted herself, with the utmost diligence and perseverance, to the cultivation of her mind, availing herself of the numerous advantages, which the metropolis presents, for the acquisition of the various branches of a refined and elegant female education. And while thus busily engaged in the attainment of general information, she sought to make rapid progress in that knowledge especially which maketh wise unto salvation. She had been subjected to one of the sorest earthly trials, the loss of a beloved and revered parent, and it was often with her an anxious inquiry whether she had profited under the Divine chastening. Thus we find her in the spring of 1833 referring, in her diary, to the melancholy bereavement she had sustained a year before:—

"I have been thinking of the events of last spring. It is nearly a year since my beloved father's death, and all this time he has been praising his Saviour with fulness of joy, while we have still been occupied with the fleeting things of time. Has this affliction given me an abiding sense of the instability of earthly joys, and made me long more for that purer delight, which is found in seeing the Lord face to face? Has it made me walk more circumspectly, and devote myself more completely to my God? Has it made me feel the value of that blood which has washed away sin, and taken the sting from death? O! I thought at first that I could never more fancy this world my home, nor forget how fast it must fade from my view; but sometimes I have forgotten this. How lovely heaven would appear, did I always think of it as my resting-place, and employ my thoughts on what would prepare me for going there! My heavenly Father sees all my sins, and the coldness of my heart—my readiness to forget the Rock whence I was hewn, and to live and act as if my daily duties might be performed without his aid, or a reference to his glory. O! that he may help me to live to him, to watch my heart, and to be humbled by my sins, so as to receive gladly my Saviour's offers of guidance, and to feel that 'without him I cannot go!'"

In the course of the summer of the same year, Mrs Lundie spent a short time at the manse of Ruthwell. While there, we are informed by her biographer, "the germ of that attachment was formed which gave a bent to the remainder of her life;" and although for a time her mind might be somewhat disturbed in religious exercises by the distracting influence of such a feeling, yet such was the power of Divine grace in her heart, that she gradually began to view matters through a more sanctified medium, and to have her warm sensibilities regulated and chastened in their outgoings by religious principle and motive. The wandering of her thoughts in prayer often affected her very deeply, and led her to lament the power of indwelling corruption. Earnestly did she strive and pray against this working of internal depravity, nor did she doubt that notwithstanding all these conflicts between the flesh and the Spirit, she was still a redeemed child of God. And thus supported by a firm confidence in the love of her God and Saviour, she was enabled to bear up under the struggles of sin within her, and strenuously to resist the temptations of the Evil One. The following beautiful lines written in one of those moods of melancholy retrospect to which she was occasionally subject for years after her father's death, exhibit a flow of pious but pensive feeling, evidently the result of frequent ponderings on the past.

ON LEAVING KILSO.

"There is a spot where memory loves to rest,—
A scene whose image, pictured in my breast,
Is twined with all that's beautiful and dear,
With all that weep affection's mournful tear—
My home! By the soft sunshine of thy glades,
Thy daisied pastures, mixed with ferny shades;

The gentle breeze, that fans thy waving tree;
 By thy sweet wild-flowers, I'll remember thee
 And thou, my native stream, whose waveless flow,
 Whether thou laugh'st in morning's roseate glow,
 Or spread'st thy bosom to the noontide beam,
 Or smile'st in beauty at the sunset's gleam,
 Art lovely still.—Bright stream! farewell to thee,
 Thy silvery waters flow no more for me;
 No more for me the music of thy play,
 When lengthening shades proclaim the close of day.
 One hour there is, I've prized above the rest,
 One halcyon hour, when thou wert loveliest:
 'Twas when the day of rest was wellnigh sped,
 And it's sweet influence o'er my heart was shed;
 When courting solitude, at balmy even,
 I sought for peace, in communing with heaven.
 'Twas rapture then, to gaze on thee, fair stream,
 All sparkling in day's last and tenderest beam;
 While the rich trees, that graceful o'er thee wave,
 Were trembling in the golden light it gave;
 And breezes stirred the incense of the air,
 As though some spirit kept his Sabbath there;
 It seemed as if those deep and spacious skies,
 That kindled earth with their celestial dyes,
 Shot rays of glory from some heavenly clime
 To bless the Sabbath of the sons of time,
 And raise the soul, on contemplation's wing,
 To the pure source whence endless pleasures spring—
 A forest of that glorious land of light,
 Where those who love the Lamb shall dwell in robes of white."

Miss Lundie added to an elegant and accomplished mind, personal attractions of a very high order, but instead of being elated by the obtrusive adulation to which she was in consequence exposed, she uniformly exhibited that modest, humble, unassuming manner, which only heightened her other charms in the estimation of all who could appreciate her consistent Christian deportment. She maintained a close walk with God, and was daily seeking to rise above all earthly enjoyments to the contemplation of those higher and purer pleasures which are at God's right hand. Her diary and correspondence are throughout pervaded by a spirit of genuine piety and fine devotional feeling. In a letter to Mr Duncan, her future husband, she thus adverts to the lamented death of the Rev. John Brown Patterson.

"July 7.—We all feel deeply for the family of Mr Patterson, who are plunged into the deepest distress by their heavy bereavement. He was, I believe, the victim of conscientiousness; for Falkirk is a large and most discouraging parish. He was dissatisfied with the measure of good he was enabled to do, and, during his short convalescence, his spirits were in a state of painful depression, and he said, 'Oh, I cannot return to Falkirk!' He preached eighteen times in the last fortnight of his health, and the last time he was so exhausted, that he rested on the sofa, in clothes drenched by a heavy rain, during his walk home. Thus were the seeds of disease sown. At last, typhus turned to brain-fever, and he was in wild delirium for the last few days. During that time, he was now praying, now preaching. At times, the beauty of his thoughts was quite beyond himself. That glowing spirit is gone. That voice, so zealous in the good cause, is hushed. That mind, mingling religion and literature so invitingly for the young and studious, shall weave its splendid imagery no more; but all—all those powers shall be perfected in the land of his joyful habitation; and all shall be swallowed up in the near and rapturous view of the Lamb, whom he shall follow whithersoever he goeth. I never remember to have prayed for any one in sickness, not in the immediate circle of my friends, so earnestly as I did for him, and his mourning relation; and it enlarges and softens the heart, to weep for those who weep, and commit their cause to God. May you and I know much of the blessedness of thus sympathizing with the sorrowful, in a world where sorrows abound, and may we be the instruments of binding up many worn and sad spirits! I would also desire that, if it be the will of God, we may not be subject to such trials as were his lot, in his bright but troubled course, and spared such anguish as now rends the hearts of his bereft ones. My uncle made some just and beautiful references to Mr Patterson in his sermon."

For some time Miss Lundie's affections had been engaged; and, in the spring of 1835, the prospect of her union to the object of her choice seemed to be near, Mr Duncan having received a royal presentation to the parish of Urr. The hopes excited by this event, however, were not destined to be realized. By the operation of the veto law, the presentee to Urr was vetoed by an apparent majority of five. He appealed to the higher Church Court, but the decision of the Presbytery was sustained. The effect of this severe disappointment upon the tenderly sensitive heart of Miss Lundie was painful. She strove to yield a calm submission to the will of her heavenly Father. Her reflections on the occasion, as contained in her Diary, are brief, but they are beautiful. "I want truly to say, 'Thy will be done;' but dread a spirit of settled sullenness or discontent. My hopes were so precious! Yet the child of God can never be in despair. I—we—need chastening, and it has been sent in love and mercy. We may yet be happy; at least, resigned we must, and, by God's help, will be." Her letter to Mr Duncan at this period exhibits her in a truly amiable and interesting light, and we cannot withhold it from our readers:—

"August 7.—I would write comfort to you, though my aching eye-balls, and pained head, tell that I have need of it too. Comfort, and sources of new hope, are what we may be likely to turn to, though at present I feel no temptation of that kind; but do you not think that we should rather search our hearts diligently, to see wherefore our God contends with us? We have sinned in many ways. If we have not cast out those sins before, let us do so now! This is the voice that makes itself heard. Let us strive for holiness of heart and life, and then our God may give us so much heavenly peace, that we shall be happier far, than if all our wishes had been fulfilled. He can do this! in as far as it regards man. I know you will not give place to any angry feelings, but only pray for your enemies, and look on all as coming direct from the hand of God. I feel that He must have something to teach you, and from this very thing, while I weep, I derive encouragement; for many a careless shepherd is plunged at once into the work of the ministry, while those, who are to be true vessels of honour, are tried as the silver is tried; but our merciful Saviour watches the furnace, and does not let it burn too fiercely. It may be, my dear W., that we shall, at some time, look back on this cloudy and dark day as one of the happiest of our lives, if it is the beginning of better things to our souls. I have been indulging in the delightful hope that your character and graces would be best improved by the exercise of preaching and the care of souls. But a wise God sees that more of those disguised blessings, which come in the form of trials, are needful for you, and for me. Oh, I hope it is not through my sins and my negligence that this has befallen you! There is reason to think He designs us both to glorify his name and to win souls, or He would not take so much pains with us, and send us back so often to examine the foundation. And shall we turn away as if we were injured, repining and rebelling against the will of God? No!

let us rather kiss the rod that smites us, and exercise truer love than ever to our King. We are short-sighted creatures, but our precious faith teaches that all is well. I pray that the people and their pastor, whosoever he shall be, may be blessed; and we too, doubt it not, shall not be forgotten of God. He has blessings in store for us, more precious than earth can offer. I grieve for you among comparative strangers, to none of whom you can fully open your own heart, oppressed as it must be. But the throne is your sure refuge; there you will find relief. Never, when things seemed to smile, did my heart cleave to you more than now. You have one earthly friend who will never have divided hopes or interests from yours.

"Farewell, dear W., and may God ever bless you and keep you, prays your attached and sympathizing
"MARY LUNDIE."

The Urr case was pending for some time before the Church Courts, and, in the meantime, Mr Duncan had officiated for some time as assistant to the minister of Cleish, in Kinross-shire, when that aged pastor died. An immediate and almost unanimous petition was presented to the patron, by the parishioners, in favour of Mr Duncan. The petition was favourably received, and in a few days the amiable and excellent assistant was appointed minister of the parish. The remarks which occur in Miss Lundie's Diary, on receiving intelligence of the appointment, are characterised by her usual high-toned piety:—

"Now the gloom is rolled away, and the bright sun of happiness appears. The buds of hope and promise become green beneath his rays—the sad heart revives and sends forth a song of joy and praise, sweeter than the song of the birds at the approach of spring. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and delight thyself in the remembrance of them! He has seen the tears that feeble nature shed in the day of disappointed hope. He has marked the dread with which coming events were anticipated, and he has with one word dispersed those fears and changed the whole aspect of things. He has, by his own hand, opened a way, and pointed W. to pursue it. He has desired him to pitch his tent beside the flock at Cleish; and may we not trust that his blessing will be with him henceforth, and that this district may be brought into subjection to Jesus? Away, distrust. The Lord has provided. How sweet an ending to an unquiet year! Though the earthly portion connected with it be slender, yet godliness with contentment is great gain, and if I do not err, there will be much more than contentment. The 19th was the day of the presentation, and now we are doubly bound, by trial and care on one hand, and by abounding goodness on the other, to have faith in Him who leads the children every step, and even when they dash their foot against a stone, turns the pain to advantage."

Miss Lundie now set herself, with the utmost diligence and ardour, to prepare for the position which she was soon to occupy, as the partner of a pastor in a retired country parish. Adorned with all the graces of a lowly and devoted Christian, she was pre-eminently fitted to enter upon the responsible station which, in God's providence, she was called to fill. The right-hearted motives by which she was actuated in the choice she had made, are finely expressed in the following extract of a letter to a friend:—

"Do not, my beloved friend, for one moment regret that I have not sought wealth and its accompaniments in my choice for life. You know I was not brought up to be rich; my habits do not require it; and my real welfare is better advanced without what has proved a snare to many. I love the work to which my friend has devoted himself, and shall have more opportunities of seeking to glorify God in doing good to my fellow-immortals, than I might probably have met with in any other station. I do hope it is the God whom I desire to serve who has appointed my lot."

The marriage-day at length arrived, and we cannot conceive a lovelier scene, and more worthy of the artist's pencil, than that which is thus graphically described by the elegant pen of the accomplished authoress of the published Memoir of Mrs Duncan:—

"Among the circumstances of her marriage-day, only one recurs to the imagination with the vividness of reality, as worthy to be particularised, and it will bring the image of her who is now a bride in heaven, in the beauty of her holy, humble, beaming smile, to the mind of many a loving and beloved friend. A party of lively and interested cousins and friends had busied themselves in decorating the drawing-room for the solemn service during the morning. After this pleasant task was accomplished, and they had retired, one who felt a quieter and more profound anxiety for her happiness, stole gently to that room, which, for the time, seemed to possess the air of a sanctuary. The door having been opened noiselessly, the chamber was surveyed. There hung the gay bouquets of flowers, which, in compliment to the taste of Mary, were in unusual profusion. There lay the gaily adorned bride's cake, which, according to the fanciful custom of the country, is elevated into great importance. There stood the sofa, wheeled with its back to the light, from which the pair were to rise to take their solemn vow; and there in front of that sofa knelt the lovely bride, so deeply absorbed in communing with her God, that she was unconscious of the presence of an intruder. The occasion was too sacred to admit of social union, even in prayer, and the door was closed as it had been opened, with a petition that Jehovah would hear and accept her sacrifice, without her becoming conscious of the inspection of a human eye."

The union, thus hallowed by the ardent aspirations of a devout heart, was celebrated on the 11th July 1836; and the feelings with which the youthful bride entered upon her new home are thus recorded in her Diary:—

"I have felt the separation from a mother so revered, and all the loved home circle, more since coming here, than on the 11th, or even before, I think. But my husband smiles so tenderly and beamingly on me, that I feel I could give up still more for him. Oh, let me try to make him happy, and never let the tender flower of love be nipped by hasty words: let me try to make his home comfortable, and study his tastes, even in small things. Our income amply supplies our present wants; and when the thought of the future comes over me, I turn it into a prayer for increase of faith, for what have the future and I to do with each other? I mean not only to give orders, but sometimes to superintend their execution; and I hope it may be proved, in our experience, that godliness with contentment is great gain. How numerous are our blessings! W.'s people love him; the surrounding families here have received me kindly; we have lovely scenery around, and are engaged in the most honourable work that can employ mortal man. Shall we not raise here our Ebenezer, and bless the Lord who hath done so great things for us?"

Mrs Duncan no sooner became the wife of a parish minister, than she planned and put in operation means for assisting her husband in advancing the interests of true religion among the people. Her attention was at first directed chiefly to the young, for whom she established a Sabbath-class, which she herself taught. In this department of duty she was remarkably successful. Her pupils at once loved and respected her; and, before a few months had elapsed, she was quite a favourite in the parish.

Gladly would we proceed in the history of this distinguished Christian female, but our space warns us that we must pause till our next Number.

THANKSGIVING DUE TO GOD FOR HIS GOODNESS:

A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER DAVIDSON,
Minister of Nurthesk.

“O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endured for ever.”—1 CHRON. xvi. 34.

THERE is no object to which we can turn our attention so well fitted to fill the mind with noble and elevated sentiments, as a contemplation of the works and attributes of the Supreme Being. When we think of one whose beginning was from everlasting, and whose duration shall be extended to infinity,—who had only to speak the word, and all creation started into being,—who supports by his power the mighty machine of the universe, and regulates by his wisdom all the intricacies of its movements,—who is present at one and the same instant in every part of the wide dominions of creation, and whose mind comprehends the present, the past, and the future;—when we think of these, and other similar attributes of God's nature, we are lost in admiration of his greatness,—the faculties of the human mind are bewildered amid such a profusion of majesty and grandeur; and after spending all its energies in endeavouring to comprehend a subject so transcendently magnificent and glorious, it at last shrinks back upon itself, conscious of its own feebleness, and total inadequacy to fathom such depths of infinity: and when it is considered that this Being is not merely omnipotent, omniscient, and infinite, but likewise absolutely holy, and just, and true,—that his nature is altogether pure and spotless,—man, conscious of his own sinfulness and depravity, trembles at the contemplation of so much holiness, and is afraid to lift up his guilty head before him. And were the attributes I have now mentioned the only attributes of God, well indeed might man tremble; dismal would then be the condition, and fearful the prospects, of the human race. Man's weak and imperfect vision would be stunned and confounded with all this dazzling and unsoftened brightness; the omnipotence of God, apart from some milder attribute, would appear to him the fearful means by which his destruction would be rendered inevitable; the consciousness that an omniscient Being was taking cognizance of all his thoughts, and words, and actions, would fill his heart with terror and distraction; his justice, his holiness, and his truth, would present themselves as flaming barriers to exclude him from happiness and peace. But, blessed be God's name, these are not the only views which we, as sinners, have to take of his character. There are other attributes of his nature which shed an enlivening ray over the prospects of man. There are endearing perfections about God, which are calculated to raise up the guilty from the dust of death, and encourage them to look to him as a Father and a Friend. Truth meets in his character with mercy, and righteousness with peace. His omnipotence has not been wielded for man's destruction, but exerted for bringing about his salvation; his omniscient eye is not turned to him for the purpose of enabling him to record, with minute precision, his transgressions and his sins, but in order that he may see the extent of his wretchedness, and afford him relief; his wisdom is directed in bringing about every event, so as finally to contribute to the everlasting happiness of his people; and his truth and justice secure the performance of that which his mercy and goodness have prompted him to promise. He does not always chide, neither does he keep his anger for ever. He does not deal with us after our sins, nor reward us according to our iniquities. We will, therefore, follow the exhortation of David in my text, and “give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.”

* Preached on the evening of a day of thanksgiving appointed by the Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale for an abundant harvest.

Now, in turning your attention for a little to these words, what I propose is, to enumerate some instances of the loving-kindness and mercy of God which we have experienced, and especially to advert to his great goodness toward us in the late abundant harvest; to express our thankfulness for which, is the object we are called upon by our Church to keep particularly in view at this time in the house of God,—and a call which, I trust, meets with a cordial and willing response in each of your bosoms.

In enumerating, my friends, generally, the loving-kindness and mercy of God towards us, I am at a loss where to begin, and feel altogether oppressed with the magnitude and extent of the subject,—or rather, I should say, I know where to begin, but know not where to end in my enumeration. I know which is the greatest of God's loving-kindnesses to the children of men, but I cannot follow them through all their varied windings, and tell you which is the least. I know where is to be found the fountainhead of his tender mercy; but its streams are so varied and widely spread, that to explore the thousandth part of them were a vain and fruitless attempt. His mercy is boundless as eternity. It is as high as the heaven is above the earth, and as wide as the east is distant from the west. It is from everlasting to everlasting to them that fear him. And if you ask to what I allude when I speak of the greatest of God's tender mercies, I answer that, without all contradiction, it is the unfolding of a plan of salvation for fallen sinners, and sending his only begotten and well-beloved Son into our world to die that they might live. There is an extent and depth of mercy about this plan of salvation, that not only at present baffle our finite and feeble comprehension, but which, although they will engage the unceasing attention of angels and the spirits of the just made perfect through eternity, will never be able to be fathomed or explored. "Without controversy," to quote the language of the Apostle Paul, "great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." That he who sat from eternity on the right hand of his Father, enthroned in glory, should have descended from thence, and taken upon him the frail nature of man,—that he should have submitted to sorrow, and suffering, and persecution,—that he should, at last, have expired upon the cross, a spectacle of woe, and become an inmate of the mansions of the dead,—and that he should have done all this for those who had rebelled against heaven's authority, and were trampling the laws of the Omnipotent under their feet, is a display of mercy so magnificent and marvellous, as may well lead us to exclaim with an apostle, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!" "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins!" In all this there is a richness and magnitude of loving-kindness that may well fill us with shame and sorrow for the carelessness and indifference with which it is contemplated by many an impenitent sinner. Is it not a marvellous thing that even all this love fails to melt the hardness of many a heart,—that there are those to be found who can look to the cross of Calvary, and see Christ dying for sin, and yet feel no compunction or sorrow for indulging in it? There is in this a depth of depravity so great, that were we not sure such a thing does really exist, we would be apt to set it down as a moral impossibility, that the heart of man could ever reach such a degree of insensibility and hardness.

Such, then, is the greatest manifestation of mercy that has ever been made to our race, and well, in reference to it, may we join in the sentiments of David, and "give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever." But the loving-kindness of God does not stop here. If we go on to review his general dealings towards us, we see before us such an expanse of mercy and goodness, that, at every step of our progress, it well becomes us to adopt the glowing expressions of gratitude conveyed in the words of my text. When you think that God has not merely sent his Son into this world, but that, with him, he has furnished you so fully with the means necessary to salvation,—that not merely has the Son of God died, but that you have been born in a Christian land, where you have heard of his death and atonement,—that you have the Bible in your hands, and are favoured with the preaching of the everlasting Gospel,—your souls and all that is within you should be stirred up to bless the Lord for his great mercies. And how much ought this feeling of gratitude to be strengthened, when you remember that these privileges which you enjoy, have been denied to many others around you in the world. Without any thing about you to recommend you to God's favour, you have been illumined with the light of truth; whilst they, in his sovereignty, have been left in ignorance and darkness. Salvation has been proclaimed to you, whilst multitudes have never heard its blessed and its cheering sound. God has favoured you with a revelation of his will, and furnished you with the means of grace; whilst millions of our race know nothing of the existence of such a revelation, and are left in total ignorance of the way of salvation through a crucified Saviour. When you contemplate all this, whilst it is fitted, in one point of view, to awake your sympathies, and draw forth your prayers and exertions in behalf of those who are left destitute of the spiritual blessings which you enjoy; strikingly is it calculated, in another aspect, to lead you to join cordially and gratefully in the language of David in my text, and "give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever."

Turn, also, for a moment, to the temporal blessings which you, as individuals, enjoy, and the review of them must excite your gratitude. If you are in the enjoyment of domestic happiness,—if you have been blessed with a long course of health, and your families preserved from the ravages of sickness and death,—if you have had food to eat, and raiment to put on, and many comforts of life supplied to you,—if you are blessed with a promising family which is rising up around you in the fear of God, and will, you trust, be a future honour to themselves and to you,—if you have experienced the happiness of genuine friendship, and the social endearments and sweetness of home;—all these, and a thousand similar blessings, are the gifts of God's bounty, and call loudly upon you to join with David in giving "thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever."

Nor let those of you imagine, who have not experienced these blessings to the same extent as others, that you have no cause for thankfulness; for if you are in a right frame of mind, you will feel that the least blessing which you enjoy being infinitely greater than you deserve, should awaken in your souls the deepest gratitude. Your affairs, it may be, have not prospered in the world as you anticipated, and, instead of being blessed with plenty, you may be struggling with poverty, or, at least, see his spectre-looks behind you, and following so hard on your footsteps, that you know not how soon he may seize you in his iron grasp. But though this be the case, learn to praise God that you have other blessings remaining, and are in the enjoyment of health. Contrast your condition with those who, in addition to their struggling with poverty, are also the victims of disease, and stretched on beds of sickness, and the contrast will teach you to give thanks unto the Lord, because he is good, and because his mercy endureth for ever. If you are mourning for the loss of one of your children, let your sorrow be mixed with joy that you have not lost them all; or, if this has been the case, then thank God, that he, who is the partner of your life, is spared to comfort you under this bereavement; or, if deprived of him also, still learn to praise God for the consoling promise he is giving you, of being the husband of the widow. If you have lost a fond father, remember, with gratitude, that your mother still lives; or, if you have lost them both, learn to bless your God that he has promised to make up even for this sore bereavement; for his comforting assurance is, that he will be the stay of the orphan, and that those shall feel the want of no earthly comfort who put their confidence in his name. So that, in whatever condition we may be placed; whether in prosperity or adversity; whether in affliction or in health; whether mourning under bereavements, or blessed with the enjoyment of those whom we love—it becomes us all to be influenced by the feelings of the Psalmist, and “give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.”

Look again, in passing, at the privileges which we as a nation enjoy,—at the civil and religious liberty which are the birthright and the boast of Britons,—and the varied, the numberless blessings which flow to the community from the prevalence of public tranquillity and order. Contrast your condition with that of those who are subjected to the scourgings of tyranny and oppression, and fettered by the chains of slavery, or with the condition of that nation which, within our own recollection, has had its name blotted out by the hand of despotism from the map of Europe, and its brave and persecuted sons scattered, by the cruelty of a tyrant, over the length and breadth of the world's surface,—and you cannot help seeing great cause for thankfulness. And although it becomes us all earnestly to pray that all contentions between nations, which bring so many evils in their train, may soon cease through the earth—that men may soon learn to beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; yet, engaged as we are at present in war, by the providence of God, we have much cause for thankfulness in the success that is attending us. Our arms are, at this moment, victorious at the ends of the earth. One of the most splendid of modern naval achievements has been accomplished by Britain's brave sons, in the capture of the strongest of the Syrian fortresses; and whilst the seizure of this place, to effect which baffled, in days that are past, the prowess of a Napoleon himself, proves to the world at large the intrepidity, and matchless skill, and undaunted valour of our troops, it has, at the same time, had an immediate and most salutary influence in establishing the peace of Europe, which the efforts of an unprincipled minister in one country, and the grasping ambition of a despot in another, had wellnigh disturbed. The success, too, of our arms in another quarter of the globe, and the falling into our hands so easily of an important island in the East, may, we trust, be hailed as a token, that the mighty empire to which that island belongs will soon be opened up to British civilization; and especially, that the Christian missionary, with the Word of God in his hands, and the glad tidings of salvation in his mouth, will soon have free access to those places from which hitherto a narrow policy had excluded him—that this vast moral wilderness will soon begin to rejoice—this spiritual desert to blossom as the rose, under the genial warmth of the Sun of righteousness, and the dews of the influences of the Spirit of God.

Nor, my friends, is it meet that, on such an evening as this, we should refrain from adverting to the great cause of thankfulness we have for the deliverance lately wrought for our gracious and dearly beloved sovereign, and for the birth of a princess royal in these realms. The mind trembled at contemplating what might have been the consequence, had God not been pleased, in his mercy and goodness, to grant a safe recovery to our queen on this occasion. This land, for any thing that we can tell, might have again been the scene of civil commotion, and have undergone a revolution as dark and fearful as ever it has come through in its past history, before her successor could have been settled on the throne. But God, in his goodness, has prevented the occurrence of such a sad calamity. In the recovery of our queen, and the welfare of the royal babe, we have, under the blessing of Heaven, a guarantee for the continuance of internal peace; and assembled, as we are on this occasion, to offer up thanksgivings to God, it is fitting, surely, that a part of these thanksgivings be presented for God's great goodness towards us in this respect. O! may God Almighty grant to our gracious queen a long reign of happiness and glory over us—a reign to which posterity will look back as a period when this nation enjoyed more than ordinary prosperity, and displayed more than ordinary zeal in the cause of pure and undefiled religion! May our queen's consort ever continue to endear himself more and more to the people of this land, and be a bright example to the nation of godliness and grace! May their little babe, our beloved princess, be defended from all ill, and followed all the days of her life by the goodness and mercy of God! And may the crown which our queen now wears, descend untarnished in a long line of sovereigns of her illustrious house,—a delightful anticipation, to which the birth and welfare of the princess royal make us fondly cling!

But it is time that I should hasten away from these and similar interesting topics,—on which, instead of their being exhausted in one sermon, volumes might be written,—and proceed to turn your attention to the object which we are directed by the Synod of the bounds to keep particularly in our view this evening, viz., the goodness of God manifested towards us in the late abundant harvest. The crop of this year is, I believe, on an average of the whole country, fully equal, if not superior, to any for a considerable time back, both in quality and quantity; and as, from the propitious nature of the weather, it has all been safely secured, there is now in our land a sufficient and wholesome supply for man and for beast, and our poor shall be satisfied with bread. And surely, my friends, if we reflect for a moment on the many processes that are to be gone through, and the many dangers to which the crop is exposed in its progress towards maturity, our hearts ought to be filled with the deepest gratitude to that beneficent Being who has sent such a season as the past, for advancing and ripening the fruits of the earth, and filling our barns and storehouses with plenty. Man may plough the fields, and select and sow the seed, and harrow it into the earth,—but here his agency terminates,—all its future progress depends upon something over which he has no control. The soil must possess that wonderful property by which the deposited grain is made to spring up and germinate. The dews and the rain from heaven must descend to moisten and fertilize the earth. The sun must shine upon it, without whose light and heat vegetation cannot make progress. The breath of spring and summer must be sent forth to refresh the fields, and promote the growth of that which covers their surface. The crops must be whitened unto harvest. The yellow stalk must wave in the autumnal breeze. The clouds of heaven must be sealed up from depositing their rain to prevent the process of reaping, and the shaking winds be restrained by the hand of Omnipotence. All these, and a thousand other circumstances, so essentially necessary before the fruits of the earth can be brought to maturity, depend exclusively on the goodness of Almighty God. In his hand alone is the regulation of the seasons. He alone, in the magnificent sentiment of Job, “knows the balancing of the clouds; he divides a water course for the overflowing of waters; he causeth it to rain on the earth, to satisfy the desolate and waste ground, and to cause the bud of the tender root to spring forth. He numbers the clouds in wisdom; he stays the bottles of heaven.” Or, to quote the words of another sweet poet of Israel, “He sendeth the springs into the valleys which run among the hills. He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man; that he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man’s heart.” And thus, therefore, my friends, had it not been for the goodness of God, the seed which was sown in the ground might have remained dormant,—the heavens above us might have been as brass, and the earth as iron,—the beasts of the field might have groaned because they had no pasture,—the fields in autumn, instead of being covered with a rich and luxuriant crop, might have presented the gloomy aspect of barrenness and desolation; and instead of having met here this evening, with hearts full of joy, to offer up our thanksgivings, it might have been with us an evening of humiliation, and fasting and sorrow, on account of the famine with which our land had been visited, and the deficiency of the means of subsistence that was staring us in the face. And when we reflect on all this, and see these evils not barely averted, but the contrary blessings so largely and munificently bestowed, O! surely every heart in this assembly must be glowing with gratitude to God, and the feelings of the Psalmist, in my text, will be our own; we will “give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.”

And this gratitude to God, if it really exists, will not merely be shown on such an evening as this, by drawing forth from you acknowledgments of thanksgiving, but will pervade and influence your whole lives. It is in vain for any one to say, that he feels as he ought to do the goodness of God towards himself, if he shuts up his bowels of compassion towards the destitute, and withholds from the needy around him what he can well and conveniently spare. O, let not those among you, whom the Lord has blessed with plenty, be stinted in your charities in the season of inclemency, which has this day set in. If you are blessed with wealth, O, I beseech you, by the tender mercies of God, and the love of your Redeemer, let a portion of it flow in the channel that conducts to the poor man’s dreary dwelling-place; if your houses are filled with abundance, be not hard-hearted and unfeeling towards the destitute children of poverty,—imitate the conduct of the good and generous Boaz of old, in letting fall some handfuls to be gathered up by the widow and the fatherless. Whatever we may now possess, none of us know what yet lies between ourselves and the grave. Human life is a changeful and varying thing, full of vicissitudes, and full of turnings. It is a wheel that has only to be turned half round by the finger of God, and the man who stands highest will then be turned to the lowest position, and the lowest will occupy his room;—and little does any child of prosperity among us know how soon the hand of God, as far as he is individually concerned, will give it that impulse. Let the mutability, then, of earthly things teach us the lesson of kindness and charity.

And now, my friends, in conclusion, I have a very important practical consideration to lay before you, which is pressed upon our notice by the subject to which our attention has been turned. God has this season, altogether undeservedly on our parts, seen meet to send us an abundant harvest, and to scatter plenty over our land: a rich and full crop has been reaped, not only in the Lowlands, but also in the more remote and sterile parts of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland,—and this unspeakable blessing to our country, he has, we are sure, bestowed for the specific and definite purpose of leading us to repent of our sins, and to devote ourselves, and all that we have, more than we have ever done to the promotion of his glory. And if this effect is not produced—if we remain impenitent and hardened under this, and all the mercies with which we are daily loaded—if his goodness fills not our hearts with gratitude, and a determination to dedicate to his glory the blessings of his providence,—then let us be warned of the consequences which may follow. It is no new thing, in the history of the world, for those who have been favoured in a similar way with ourselves, but have misimproved their privileges, to have had their mercies turned into judgments, on account of their ingratitude and sin. It was the word of God to Israel of old, that if they would not hearken unto the voice of the Lord their God—to observe to do all his commandments, and his statutes, cursed should they be in the city, and cursed should they be in the field; cursed should be their basket and their store; cursed should be the fruit of their body, and the fruit of their land; the increase of their kine, and the flocks of their sheep. The Lord should make the rain of their land powder and dust; they should carry much seed out into the field, and gather but little in; for the locust would consume it. And the history of the world proves that this word of the living God is no vain and meaningless declaration. The inhabitants of the old world were blessed with plenty, but they abused it; they ate and drank, and married, and were given in marriage, but gave not God the glory, and the flood came and swept them all away. The plain where Sodom and Gomorrah stood was a plain of great beauty and fertility, well watered every where, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt; but its inhabitants misimproved their mercies, and swift destruction came upon them from the presence of the Lord. The sun which one morning saw them in all their loveliness and beauty, rose upon them the next a heap of ruins, consumed by fire and brimstone from heaven. It was the case with Babylon, that city of unrivalled splendour, that she had grown fat, even as an heifer at grass, and was abundant in treasure, and full of oxen and horses, and corn and wine; but devoted not this abundance to the glory of God, and his anger, therefore, overtook her. The sower was cut off in the midst of her, and he that handled the sickle; her bullocks were slain, and her land emptied; the horse and his rider, and the shepherd and his flock, and the husbandman and his yoke of oxen, were broken in pieces; and her pleasant palaces converted into dens for wild beasts; and her houses made the habitation of dragons and owls, and all doleful creatures. It was the case with Israel, that God made them ride on the high places of the earth; and gave them honey out of the rock, and butter of kine, and milk of sheep, and fat of lambs, and wheat, and the pure blood of the grape; but they waxed fat, and forsook the God of their mercies, and they are not only now, as was predicted, consumed from off the country, whither they went to possess it, and removed into all the kingdoms of the earth; but the very land which they inhabited, in fulfilment of the threatening of God which I have quoted above, has been turned into comparative desolation,—on that goodly land which Moses describes, as a land of brooks of water, of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees, and oil-olive, and honey, the curse of God has lighted, and turned it into barrenness for the wickedness of those that dwell therein.

Let us beware, then, of following their example, lest a similar curse overtake ourselves. For these things are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world have come. The word and threatening of God still stand in full force, and what has happened to them may happen to us, if we tread in their ungodly footsteps. Not only may our ingratitude and sin lead him to visit us with temporal calamities, but, what is a thousandfold worse, may cause him to remove the candlestick of the Gospel out of its place among us, and give us up, as he has done the churches of Asia of old, to spiritual desolation and death. O, let the goodness of God, then, lead you all now to repentance. Improve both the temporal and spiritual privileges you enjoy to the promotion of his glory. Whilst partaking of the bounties of his providence, O, forget not to render thanks to the gracious Giver;—whilst favoured with the far higher privilege of a preached Gospel, O, accept of the offers of a Saviour that are made. And may God grant that his blessing not only rest upon us as individuals, but upon the community and nation to which we belong—that we may continue to be that happy people “whose God is Jehovah, the Lord of hosts.” Amen.

THE WORLD'S PROSPECTS.

WHEN shall thy sons, oh! Judah, cease to roam
Through every clime that girds this changing world?
When shall thy daughters find a peaceful home
Where now the Moslem banner waves unfurled?
When shall the mountains of their father-land
And Jordan's banks by Bible heroes trode,
Sing nature's welcome to that mighty band,
Returning, Christians, to the Christian's God?
When shall the bright millennial morning break
And burst the fatal charm that blinds the soul;
When shall the glories of Redemption deck
The human family—one enlightened whole?
The Pioneers of this approaching time,—
Events unveiled to holy men of old,—
Seem sweeping on to purge the earth from crime,
And usher in the brightness long foretold.
From where the giant Himalayas wear
Their snowy turbans under eastern suns,
To where Peruvian zephyrs incense bear,
Through streams of science golden wisdom runs.
Aye,—and salvation's trumpet has been blown,
With notes of joy to savage and to sage,— Notes which in love can melt the heart of stone,
And quell the passions when they foam with rage.
The champions of the Cross are now abroad
Storming corruption's demon-mounted towers;
Thousands are mustering to the ranks of God,
And Heaven's blessings fall in sacred showers.

The clouds of strife are gathering in the east,
And some great crisis slumbers in the gloom,
Destined, perchance, to crush the Roman beast
And seal Mohammedan imposture's doom.

It may be, that the arrogant Chinese

Now groping with Confucius in his dreams,
Ere long shall hail, o'er intervening seas,
The truth which cradles Britain in its beams.

Then let our watchword be redeeming love;
Let each less noble motive yield to this;—
And may the Spirit, breathing from above,
Diffuse through all the lands millennial bliss.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The perseverance of the Saints.—The Christian life consists not in metaphysical speculation, and the believer will soon be convinced by the most overwhelming of all arguments, the argument of experience, that he is labouring under some grievous mistake, or is guilty of some mischievous perversion of the truth,—if he finds in the doctrine of perseverance, any thing else than an encouragement and an impulse to persevere. When he feels that the world is in the way of an ascendancy in his heart; that his affections are beginning to lose their hold of spiritual and divine things; that his communion with God is more frequently interrupted, and yields him less satisfaction; and that he is not so scrupulous as he once was, on many points that involve the glory of God, and the honour of the Redeemer; it would appear to him at such a moment a very fearful and revolting idea to satisfy himself with the reflection that he cannot fall away; to lull himself into security by persuading himself that he is safe, while every thing about him gives him the most distinct answer that he is in danger; and to harden himself in his growing indifference by speculating on the doctrine of perseverance, at the very moment that he is conscious of ceasing to persevere. If he thinks at all, he must perceive that a cloud is beginning to interpose between him and the light of his Father's countenance. If the light of that countenance has ever been precious to him, he must feel that the source of his richest consolation is ready to be shut up; he must be aware that the removal of the obstacle that obstructs the communication of spiritual comfort is identified with his return to his former love; and if he has not apostatized so far as to cease putting any value on the divine favour, his anxiety will be, not to console himself with the abstract doctrine of perseverance, but how he may most speedily regain the path, where alone perseverance will terminate in glory.—REV. DR. GORDON. (Discourse.)

The righteousness of Christ.—Wantest thou a shadow or covering to shelter thy weary soul from the scorching heat of divine anger, or of temptation from Satan, or tribulation from the world? Improve this righteousness, and sit down under the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Wantest thou courage to look the law or justice of God in the face? There is a fund for it; for under this covering thou mayst look out with confidence, and say, "Who can lay any thing to my charge?" Wantest thou to have the New Covenant confirmed to thy soul? Improve this righteousness by faith; for Christ, by his obedience and death, confirmed the covenant with many. This blood is the blood of the New Testament; and when the soul by faith takes hold of it, the covenant of grace is that moment confirmed unto it for ever. In a word, by virtue of this righteousness thou mayst come to a communion table, and to a throne of grace, and ask what thou wilt. Our heavenly Father can refuse nothing to the younger brethren who come to him in their brother's garment. By virtue of this righteousness, thou mayst lay claim to every thing, to all the blessings of time and eternity. May not all this revive thy drooping spirit, and make thee take up that song, "In thy name will I rejoice all the day, and in thy righteousness will I be exalted?"—REV. E. BASKIN.

Examine yourselves.—Our whole behaviour by nature is a perpetual disguise. The mischief of this is, that we take ourselves not only for what we are to be, but for what we would be thought to be; and continue strangers to the corruption of our hearts, and deaf to the word of God; the great purpose of which is, to discover and make known that corruption, the method of cure, and the necessity of complying with it. Alas! it is to be feared that even those who are called, and think themselves Christians, are sadly insincere and little known either to themselves or others.—ADAM.

HENRI ARNAUD,

AND THE RETURN OF THE WALDESEES.

PART I.

IN the summary historical notices which we have recently given of the Waldenses of Piedmont, we contemplated a small and simple community struggling for ages in behalf of Divine truth, and lifting their testimony, like a voice in the wilderness, against a world that lay in darkness and iniquity. A mysterious Providence, which had preserved them so carefully through centuries of oppression and persecution, at last saw fit to resign them to the enemy, and in 1686-7 they were driven from their valleys by Victor Amadeus II., their ruthless and ill-advised sovereign. The miserable remnant that survived the persecution was scattered abroad among the Swiss Cantons, Holland, Prussia, and the Protestant states of Germany; and to add to the improbability of their return, their homes were peopled with Roman Catholics, and their mountain-passes were fortified and garrisoned with a numerous soldiery. It seemed impossible that a remnant so dispersed could be gathered, or that obstacles so strong could be surmounted. But what difficulties can daunt that Christian heroism which, fearing God, has no other fear? And what is that achievement in behalf of His cause, which can be termed impossible? So at least reasoned Henri Arnaud, one of their pastors, a man within whose heart beat as ardent a patriotism as ever delivered a land from bondage. As he belonged to a militant church which, for ages, had occupied the fore-front of the battle, he felt that there was no dereliction of clerical duty in becoming the leader of such an expedition; and the examples of former priests, his predecessors, who had led their flocks to the conflict, when there were no other champions to head them, and by whom God had wrought a deliverance for his people, were fresh in his mind. In this spirit, he girded on his weapon, which he termed the "sword of the Lord and of Gideon," while that motto of the Waldenses, "The light shineth in darkness," was constantly upon his lips. Two events, indeed, had already occurred, which might well have dismayed a faith less firm than his own. Scarcely had the exiles been driven into banishment, than with that vehement longing for their native land which so strongly characterises the people of a mountainous country, several of them attempted to return; but they were a handful without arms, leaders, or arrangement, and the attempt came to nothing. Another that was made in June 1688, was detected by the governors of the Swiss Cantons, and providentially frustrated, as the effort was premature. These partial explosions put the Duke of Savoy on his guard; the troops were increased, the fortifications strengthened, and every precaution adopted to baffle any further attempt. But, still Arnaud did not despair; and to raise the hopes of his people, he preached to them from that text, "Fear not little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." The exiles had now derived experience from their former failures; and a third expedition was undertaken under the superintendence of Arnaud himself, that, whether for the boldness with which it was planned, or the energy with which it was carried into execution, has scarcely a parallel in the whole range of history.

The head-quarters of this new coalition were at Berne; and in the event of a movement, it was necessary that the Bernese should be kept in ignorance of their purposes, as well as their enemies of France and Savoy, that the safety of their allies might not be compromised. The rendezvous of the exiles was therefore held secretly in a large forest, in the Pays de Vaud, called the wood of Nion; and to this meeting the dispersed, to the number of eight hundred had assembled from various countries. Here, the whole plan of the expedition was settled, and Henri Arnaud vowed that he would never resign his sword until their thirteen churches in the valleys should be cleansed from their idolatrous emblems. It was the night of the 16th of August, 1689, when this daring resolution was adopted; and such was the secrecy of the meeting, that only certain vague whispers had floated about concerning it, in consequence of which several people, excited by curiosity, had crossed the lake, to ascertain what was going on in the neighbouring forest. This was a providential circumstance for the Waldenses, who seized the boats of these new comers, and thus transported themselves to the other side, between Nernier and Ivoire. An alarm was given upon their landing, and as they advanced, they saw enough to convince them that their march would be speedily opposed; upon which they seized two gentlemen of the district, as hostages, for their safe conduct through the country. This precaution was absolutely necessary, as they were strangers to the way, and even as it was, the second day of their march had like to have proved their last; for the inhabitants of Cluses, who grudgingly allowed them a free passage, sent a messenger to those of Sallanches, advising them to attack the Waldenses in the narrow defile of Maglan, while they themselves would assail them in the rear. But Arnaud, who discovered their treachery, seized two more hostages from Cluses, and rapidly advanced to the terrible defile which a few men, armed only with stones, could have made good against a host. He seized it, and crossed it with all his troops, before the people of Sallanches had intelligence of his coming. The toils and perils of this march, amidst torrents of rain, and over rocks and mountains, were also aggravated by the treachery of their guides, who, on the third day, led them across the mountain of Haut Luce, by the most frightful and difficult of the passes, that the Savoyards might have time to overtake, and destroy them. In this emergency, Arnaud was obliged to have recourse to the usual harsh usages of warfare, so that he threatened to hang up the guides if they persevered in their design, a menace that reduced them to fidelity. After the Waldenses had scaled with immense toil this precipitous mountain, they were obliged to descend seated, and sliding, with no other light than that which proceeded from the whiteness of the snow; and on their landing late at night at St Nicolas de Verose, a miserable hamlet at the bottom of a frightful abyss, there was no fuel to be obtained, but by unroofing the huts which protected them from the rain. Such were but a few of the difficulties experienced by the invaders in this most surprising march, until they reached the valley of Isere on the fifth day; and during the whole course of their route the sagacity of Arnaud in anticipating and averting dangers, had only been equalled by the fervour with which he prayed for his followers, and the earnestness with which he preached, and exhorted them to perseverance. And still, notwithstanding the extremities of hunger and thirst, of cold and weariness, which they endured among the dismal gorges of the Alps, their moderation was wonderful, and excited the applause even of their enemies. None of those instances of rapine and cruelty which would have marked the tract of even the best ordered troops under such irritating and distressing circumstances disgraced the march of the Waldenses. Although they were among enemies, upon whom they could have levied the usual contributions, they abstained from pillage, and paid out of their scanty supply of money for the provisions which they ordered upon the way.

Hitherto, the encounters which the Waldenses had sustained in their progress arose from occasional skirmishes; but on the eighth day, they were to experience the brunt of regular battle. They had advanced along the banks, at the foot of the Col d'Albin, which closes in upon the river, and leaves a pass by which regular troops can barely march even when unmolested by an enemy; and at the narrowest part of this pass, near Salabertrand, which they hoped to find undefended, was a bridge, by which they could cross the Dora. But no sooner had they neared this point of difficulty than they saw on the opposite side of the bridge a force of two thousand five hundred French soldiers strongly entrenched, and ready to dispute the passage. The condition of the Piedmontese was perilous. On either side they were hemmed in by impassable rocks; the hostile garrison of Susa could effectually bar their retreat, and in front of them was an enemy confident in their superiority. They dashed forward to the bridge; and to the cry of "Qui vive?" from the opposite side, they answered, "Friends, if you allow us to pass!" The cry of "kill! kill!" instantly rose among the French, and was followed by a heavy volley of musketry, in which more than two thousand shots were fired. But Arnaud had ordered his men to throw themselves on their faces, and thus only one man was wounded by this terrible shower. At the same instant the Waldenses were charged by two companies in their rear, so that they were placed between two fires. They saw that all must be hazarded, and, therefore, they still dashed forward, shouting the name of their leader: some voice in the crowd exclaimed, "courage, the bridge is won!" and at this, the whole mass rushed onward with confidence, until they came to close conflict with the enemy. The bridge, indeed, was not yet won, but it was soon carried, and swept of its defenders; and the onward movement carried the Piedmontese into the midst of the French troops, where a close hand-to-hand conflict was maintained, in which the heavy sabres of the mountaineers shivered the swords of their enemies, and struck fire from the muskets that were raised to parry the blows. After an engagement of two hours, the Marquis de Laney, who saw his men falling, or flying in every quarter, while he was himself wounded in the arm, exclaimed with furious oaths, "Is it possible that I have lost the battle, and my own honour?— and immediately adding, "Save himself who can!" he fled with several of his wounded officers to Briançon, from which he was conveyed in a litter to Embrun. Such was the confusion of the enemy, and so completely had they been mixed up with their intrepid assailants, that many of them remained among the ranks of the Waldenses, thus hoping to escape undetected. But they mistook the watchword of the latter, which was Angrogne, for Grogne, and in consequence of this perverted Shibboleth two hundred were discovered and slain. The greatest part of the baggage, and all the ammunition, fell into the hands of the Piedmontese, and when the moon rose, not a foe was to be seen. When all was over, the trumpets were sounded; and the victors, throwing their hats into the air, made the rocks resound with the acclamation, "Thanks to the Eternal armies, who has given us the victory over our enemies!" It was, indeed, a wonderful achievement; and the following extract from the account of Arnaud himself will best exhibit that feeling of devout astonishment with which he regarded it. "What! a handful of men attack an army well entrenched, among whom were fifteen companies of regulars, and eleven of militia, with all the peasants that could be collected, besides the troops, which attacked this handful in the rear! Belief in so improbable a fact must be grounded on a conviction, that the hand of God not only fought with the Vaudois, but blinded the French. For how else can we account for their not thinking of cutting away the wooden bridge, and thus effectually checking the Vaudois: for the Dora was so swelled, that any attempt to wade through it, would have been to court inevitable death? If this glorious victory is matter of surprise, the small loss of the Vaudois in obtaining it is not less so. It amounted only to ten or twelve wounded, and fourteen or fifteen killed, in addition to one of the hostages, six only of whom failed in making their escape during the conflict."

After this signal instance of success, the intrepid invaders, although half famished, and exhausted with a heavy march of three days, and as many nights, continued to advance, lest the enemy should receive reinforcements; and on the evening of the battle they scaled the mountain of Sci by the light of the moon, although their friends were falling at every step, from drowsiness and fatigue, and had to be roused and urged onward by the rear-guard. But on the following morning, which was Sunday the 25th, they could see afar off the summits of their own native mountains; upon which Arnaud, summoning his people together, conducted their thankgivings and prayers, and exhorted them with his animating addresses. They continued their march, driving before them the few skirmishers who ventured to interrupt their progress, and on the 27th they arrived at San Martino, in the valley of which, had mere safety been their wish, they could have securely settled themselves. But it was their country and their native Churches which they fought to recover, and the restoration of their brethren to the full blessings of Christian liberty, and therefore they boldly advanced to new trials and dangers. On the 29th, they descended into the valley of Lucerne, which was strongly occupied by French and Piedmontese troops, two hundred of whom were intrenched upon the Col de Giuliano, to dispute the passage. The Waldenses rushed to the attack in three divisions, and with such courage that the enemy were confounded, and, after a few volleys, fled from the pass, while the assailants drove them from point to point, with the loss of only one man. The fugitives took refuge in the village of Bobbio, occupied by Papists, to whom the confiscated property of the Waldenses had been granted; and it was accordingly attacked by the latter, carried by storm, and given up to pillage. This was the first abandonment of that spirit of moderation which the exiles had hitherto exhibited; and even in reclaiming their own, they exposed themselves to the cavils of a reproachful enemy. The still greater atrocity which they were compelled to commit, during these and subsequent skirmishes (of putting their prisoners in several instances to death), admits of a stronger palliation; and which cannot be better given than in the words of the record from which we have already quoted. "Let not the reader be surprised that the Vaudois should thus put to death those who fell into their hands. We had no prisons to confine them; our numbers were too small, and the warfare too desultory, to admit the possibility of guarding them; and to have released them, would have been to have published our plans, our weakness, and every thing on which depended the success of our enterprise. The relaxation of this unavoidable maxim in the instance of Gras and his father, was eventually highly prejudicial to the Vaudois, from the injury they received through the means of these two ungrateful wretches; who, however, received, in the end, the just reward of their perfidy." In fact, almost every prisoner whom the Waldenses had spared went over to the enemy, and betrayed their plans and movements. Of a truth, war is a fearful thing, even when the cause is just and holy; because it leads, yes, compels, to the commission of deeds which the tender heart abhors, and a righteous Gospel condemns. Even the clerical and apostolic spirit of Arnaud, also, was not always proof against that military excitement which, in such a state of life, became his besetting temptation; and thus, after he had commended his flock to God in prayer, and given the signal for battle, he was immediately after to be seen in the thickest of the tumult, and the first in the onset. The peril to which he thus exposed himself alarmed his followers, who often entreated him to be more careful of his person; but to all their remonstrances he fearlessly replied, "I best know what the occasion and the cause require of me: while I advance follow me; and when I fall, revenge me."

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACRAE & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMSBIDGE, London; W. CORY, Junr. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMA, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE

SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—On the State of Civilization described in the Book of Job, ..... Page 657	5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. John Thomson, ..... Page 668
2.—Sacred Poetry. "Triumph of the Gospel." By Kelly, ... 660	6.—Sacred Poetry. "Comfort for Mourners." By Hutton, ... 668
3.—The Warning, ..... 661	7.—Henri Arnaud and the Return of the Waldenses. Part II. 66.
4.—Biographical Sketch. Mrs W. W. Duncan. By the Editor.	8.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Rev. T. Boston, Bayly, Rev. W. Romaine, Rev. J. Hart, ..... 671
Part III, ..... 663	9.—Tyre in Ancient and in Modern Times, ..... 66.

ON THE STATE OF CIVILIZATION DESCRIBED IN THE BOOK OF JOB.

AMONG the various controversies to which the Book of Job has given rise, one fact has been universally conceded, namely, that it is an independent record, that it has no connection with the Hebrew history or code of laws, and that it presents a system of religion differing in all its visible forms from that established by Moses.

The religious knowledge possessed in the age of Job was founded on the unity of Deity, both in the creation and government of the universe; but that this was not a natural theology,—a doctrine discovered by unassisted reason,—is proved by the reference of Job himself to a revelation, when he declares (chap. vi. 10), "I have not neglected the works of the Holy One;" and again (chap. xxiii. 12), "I do not neglect the principles of his lips: I have treasured up his words in my bosom." This religion was embodied in formal acts of worship: Job offered expiatory sacrifices for himself and his family, not in the character of a priest, but as patriarch and head of a tribe. We find from the Book of Genesis that sacrifices began to be offered immediately after the expulsion of our first parents from Paradise; and as there cannot be found any reasonable ground for the suggestion of sacrifice to an uninstructed mind, the character of Job's religion, both in doctrine and form, is that of a theology derived from a primitive revelation, and not evolved from barbarism or paganism by any mental process.

That the knowledge of the Divine unity was derived by Job from a revelation to himself, or from a former revelation transmitted to him by writing or tradition, appears further proved by his reference to the corruptions of religion which were gradually increasing in his time. He describes Sabaism, or the worship of the celestial luminaries, as an error to which he might, like others, have been led by his natural propensities, and from which he was protected only by the firmness of his belief in what had been revealed. This is a remarkable confirmation of his having obtained his own knowledge of religion from some external source, for he mentions the superstitious practices connected with Sabaism as customs with which he had been tempted to comply.

If I have looked with a superstitious eye,
At the sun when he shone in his strength,
Or the moon when she walked in her brightness,
And my heart hath been secretly enticed,
And I have worshipped by carrying my hand to my mouth,
I should have been chargeable with a great transgression,
For I should have denied the Supreme God.*

The religion of Job, the first great element in the patriarchal system of civilization, is thus clearly shown to possess a derivative character, and the only form of religion which we find to have been self-evolved, was a corruption. It is not to be expected that the ideas of morality formed by the patriarch could be so clearly traced to their source, but there are still proofs of their derivative character in their disproportion to the state of physical knowledge represented in the book. It was not until a very late period in the history of the Grecian philosophy, that moralists discovered the necessity of imposing a restraint on the inward sentiment. Now, we find that Job had anticipated this great principle, for he disclaims not the overt act, but the impure desire which might have prompted to its commission.

I made a covenant with mine eyes
That I would not gaze upon a virgin,
For what portion should I then have in God,
Or what inheritance from the Almighty on high?

In all the civilized nations of antiquity, and in some which claim to be civilized in modern times, the rights of slaves are ostentatiously disregarded; their persons and properties are at the disposal of their masters. The worst forms of slavery are to be found in pastoral and nomade races, yet we find Job expressly recognising the rights of his dependents, and asserting their claims to justice with a spirit of equity not to be found in any of the Pagan philosophers, or in some Christian legislators.

* The quotations throughout the chapter are taken from Wemys's admirable translation, and the author has made extensive use of that gentleman's researches and illustrations.

If I denied justice to my male slave,
Or to my female slave when they disputed with me,
What then should I do when God maketh inquest?
When he inquires what answer should I give?
Did not He who formed me form them?
Were we not fashioned alike in the womb?

Such morality is clearly beyond the general state of knowledge at the period when Job lived; we find nothing like it in any of the pastoral races existing in the East, though there are many of these whose civilization, estimated by the advance in the arts and sciences, would appear to be greater than that which was possessed by the Idumeans in the days of the patriarch. This superior purity of the ethical code, so far in advance of the progress made in the other branches of human intelligence, is a strong presumptive evidence that it was derived from a source external to the state of society.

We find also that the friends of Job refer to moral maxims and principles derived from sages of old, and assert the obligation of the rules which experience had proved to be efficacious. Thus Balaam:—

Examine, I pray thee, former generations,
Inform thyself of the wisdom of their ancestors:
(For we are but of yesterday and have no experience;
Our days on the earth are but a shadow.)
Shall they not teach thee and instruct thee?

The amount of natural history possessed by Job, is greater than he was likely to have obtained from his personal experience, since he not only mentions, but describes animals which were not natives of Idumea, such as the crocodile and the hippopotamus. It is not likely, indeed, that his knowledge of these was derived from tradition, he more probably obtained his information from the commercial travellers who traversed Idumea on their way to Egypt; but it is remarkable, that so animals beyond those he mentions, have been domesticated and rendered useful to man since his day. The shepherd's dog is found to have been used at this early period, and the horses of Arabia are shown to have been already subjected to the dominion of man. At the same time, the animals which could not be tamed or rendered serviceable, are specified with as much accuracy as could be attained at the present day.

Though the descriptions of the animals are not technical, they are far from being deficient in scientific accuracy; the author has, with extraordinary felicity, seized the leading characters of each, and the peculiarities by which it is distinguished from its fellow-brutes; in a few words, the amount of instinct it possesses, and the application of that instinct to its habits and modes of life, are brought before us; experience must therefore have been miraculously aided then, or marvellously neglected since, for the accumulated observation of subsequent ages has not added so much to our knowledge of the animals described as would equal the amount possessed by Job.

The Scriptures mention the use of metals and musical instruments, as additions made to the stock of human knowledge; we have already noticed Job's acquaintance with mining operations and refining processes, and need not here repeat our estimate of the amount of his skill in metallurgy, but we may direct attention to the fact, that such an amount possessed at so early an age is strongly confirmatory of the antiquity assigned to the invention in the Book of Genesis.

Mention is made of bread, cheese, butter, oil, and other manufactured forms of agricultural produce. Wine was preserved in leather bottles, or skins, as it is still in most parts of the East; and it is curious to find Job referring to the fermentation of new wine, in nearly the same words used by Jesus Christ after the lapse of several centuries.

I am overcharged with matter;
My mind within me impels me—
My feelings are like new wine closed up;
As vessels of new wine they are bursting.

There is reason to believe that men had become accustomed to fixed habitations in Idumea, as we should be led to conclude from the account given of the building of Babel. The mention of cities, indeed, is not decisive, for the Hebrew word so rendered may be applied to assemblages of tents or waggons. But Zopher, in his third address to Job, draws a very manifest distinction between temporary habitations and permanent structures.

He had built his house like a moth-worm,
Like a booth which the garden-watchman constructs.

The various artifices used in hunting, and the instruments employed in war, to which Job incidentally alludes, though very interesting to Biblical students, do not come within the scope of our reasoning, because there are no similar references in the early part of Genesis. The art of clothing is expressly mentioned among the communications made to Adam, but in his case it was confined to preparing articles of dress from the skins of beasts; in Job's time textile fabrics were known, for he says:—

My days are slighter than a weaver's yarn;
They are finished like the breaking of a thread.

The first mention of the balance and scales occurs in the history of Abraham, but it is there introduced as an instrument familiarly known, an invention so long in use that no reference is made to its origin. Job speaks of it in terms of similar familiarity:—

Would to God my grief were weighed in a balance,
And my calamity laid in one of the scales!
It would be found heavier than the sands of the sea,
Therefore my complaints are vehement.

We have also an allusion to the practice of sealing with a signet ring, to which there appears no parallel in the Book of Genesis previous to the history of Joseph:—

At present thou numberest up my devices,
Not one of my inadvertencies escapes thee.
My offences are sealed up in a bag;
Yea, thou tnest together mine iniquities.

No definite account of institutions, and of social or domestic habits, is found in the Book of Genesis previous to the patriarchal record relating to Abraham and his family. Many points of similarity could be found between the habits of Abraham and Job, as might reasonably be expected, since both were emirs or chiefs of pastoral tribes. It will, however, be sufficient to notice one or two of the most prominent resemblances, particularly such as best tend to illustrate the state of civilization in the patriarchal age. Great attention was paid to the wisdom and years of Abraham, by the kings and princes among whom he sojourned; the reverential simplicity of the homage paid to knowledge and experience is, indeed, one of the most delightful traits in the patriarchal history. The reply of the children of Heth to Abraham, when he wished to purchase a burial-ground from them, is an interesting proof of the great respect which he "a stranger and sojourner with them," had acquired, solely by the influence of his personal character. Job could boast of similar marks of respectful homage:—

To me men gave ear and attended,
They were silent at my admonition,
After I had spoken they replied not,
For my reasons dropped on them as dew,
They waited for me as for a spring-shower;
They opened wide their mouths as for the harvest-rain.

The transaction between Abraham and the children of Heth brings before us another very interesting peculiarity of the earlier patriarchal times, the influence of public opinion in enforcing obedience to the rules of morality. Abraham, in the absence of courts of record and registry-offices, made his purchase in the presence of the general assembly of the people, and thus the multitude became witnesses of the bargain, and judges of its equity. In like manner Job dwells upon the influence of public opinion manifested by a public assembly of the people, as an efficacious sanction for rectitude of conduct:—

If human-like I concealed my sin,
And hid my transgressions in my bosom,
Let me be confounded before the multitude;
Let me be covered with public contempt;
Let me be dumb, nor dare to go abroad.

Few circumstances connected with patriarchal life have a more touching effect on the mind, than the hospitality accorded to the wearied traveller and way-worn stranger. So sacred was the obligation of extending such assistance felt to be, that the host looked upon himself as the obliged party, and supplicated guests to give him their company as an honour and a boon. Thus, when the vision appeared to Abraham in the plains of Mamre, "he lifted up his eyes and looked, and lo, three men stood by him; and when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the tent-door, and bowed himself toward the ground," and said, "My lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant; let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree; and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts; after that, ye shall pass on; for, therefore, are ye come to your servant." He then directs Sarah to prepare the bread, while he goes in person to choose the best calf from the herd, and to prepare other provisions for his guests. In the same way, when two angels visited Sodom, Abraham's nephew, Lot, urgently entreated them, as a favour, to become his guests: "Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray, into your servant's house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet, and ye shall rise up early and go on your ways." When they refused, "he pressed them greatly," as if his house would be honoured by the presence of the strangers. Job lays claim to the exercise of the hospitable virtues in their widest extent:—

If my domestics were not wont to say,
"Who is there that hath not been filled with his dainties?"
The stranger lodged not in the street,
My door was open to every comer.

From the history of Abraham and Esau, it seems evident that polygamy was not so common in the earlier as it was in the later patriarchal ages, and that the marriage union was a connection on terms of equality, which by degrees changed into the degradation of the weaker sex. Both Sarah and Rebecca appear to have been more influential persons in the households of their husbands, than the wives of Jacob. Job's wife is also represented as the companion, and not the slave of her husband. In our version, her conduct appears harsh and revolting, because the most important word in her address to the patriarch has been rendered into the very opposite meaning of what was intended. She is made to say, "Curse God and die. But the Hebrew word (berek) most usually, if not invariably, signifies bless; and any one who looks at the passage, unprejudiced by the translation, will see that she obviously alludes to the previous declaration of the patriarch:—

Naked I came from my mother's womb,
And naked I shall return to the earth;
Jehovah gave; Jehovah hath taken away;
Blessed be the name of Jehovah!

This was Job's exclamation when property and family were reft away; but a second course of misery had now fallen upon him, he was smitten with loathsome disease, which covered him externally with ulcers, and racked all his bones with pain; his wife, therefore, exhorts him to reiterate his former words of resignation, to bless God and die. Mr Wemyss adds, that "she may have deemed his sufferings to have arisen from some trespass or iniquity which required a penitential confession, and, therefore, she may have uttered the words in the sense in which Joshua advises Achan (Joshua vii. 19), "Bless God," that is, "Give glory to God, by confessing thy sins, hoping also that such confession might avert the divine wrath, and procure to her husband a mitigation of his sufferings."

That this is the correct view of her conduct, appears evident from the terms of Job's reply: "Thou speakest like a foolish woman; what, shall we then receive good from the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil also?" There is, indeed, some severity in the reproof, but it is not such as the act of blasphemous impiety, imputed to her in the ordinary version, would have required. He seems to assert that she had misunderstood the nature of his case, as his friends did subsequently, by regarding it as a punishment for some transgression which required to be confessed, in order that the moral providence of God should be justified, and he therefore insists that there is no necessity for such a justification, since he who had conferred prosperity, could, in his sovereign power, inflict adversity.

Mr Wemyss adds,—“Neither does the Scripture throw out the least word of reprehension as regards her conduct. She remains with her husband to the last; and at the close of her own and his trials, she becomes again the mother of ten children, and partakes of the renovated happiness of her husband. Nor, when the Almighty orders expiation for the improper language of Job's friends, is there any mention made of her conduct as betraying unbelief, impatience, or impiety.”

From the very earliest period to which historical information reaches, travellers in the East formed themselves into caravans, or companies, for the purposes of mutual protection and assistance. Though their first mention in Genesis is in connection with the history of Joseph, there can be little doubt that they existed much earlier, for the brief notice of Egypt, in the life of Abraham, shows it to have been already a commercial country. But Job, who lived in the land through which the caravans passed, and where they had to encounter their greatest difficulties, supplies the exact circumstances which the sacred historian has omitted.

He beautifully compares his friends to a land-flood formed by the melting snows, which had speedily been absorbed in the sands and evaporated by the summer heat; and he describes the consternation of the caravan from Teman, when they came to the place where torrents were known to descend from the mountains, in the hope of being able not only to slake their thirst, but to fill their water-skins, and found the torrent-bed dry and the waters dissipated; he further notices the dismay of the caravans from Sheba, when their associates did not meet them at the appointed place:—

As to my brethren, they are perfidious like a brook,
Like the torrent which rushes through the valley;
Whose waters are swollen by the melting of ice,
And turbid by reason of the snow—
Summer comes and they disappear:
The heat absorbs them and they are dried up.
Caravans turn thither on their route;
They perish in the midst of the desert.
The travellers of Teman looked anxiously,—
The caravans of Sheba panted for them;—
They blushed for their own confidence—
They came to the spot and were confounded.
—In like manner ye are become useless to me;
Ye see my misery and recoil with horror.

A dissimilarity of habits and customs suffices to show that the Books of Genesis and Job, while they agree in the general estimate of patriarchal civilization, yet present it to us in different phases, and with such variety of species, as to show that the records are independent of each other.

The funeral ceremonies of the Hebrew patriarchs, previous to the migration of Jacob's family into Egypt, were remarkable for their severe simlicity. Abraham was an emir of great wealth and power; kings had shown him respect, and courted his alliance. It might reasonably be expected, that the funeral obsequies of such a powerful chieftain and public benefactor would have been celebrated with all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of oriental magnificence; but, on the contrary, we find him simply borne to the grave by his two sons, unaccompanied by any mourning train or pompous solemnities.

The account which Job gives of the gorgeous procession attending the funeral of a man of rank in his country, affords a striking contrast to the almost naked simplicity of the funerals of Abraham and Isaac. He replies to the assertions of his friends, that adversity is a proof of guilt, by describing the gorgeous obsequies of wicked chieftains in the countries bordering on the Euphrates:—

He is brought to the grave with pomp;
They keep watch over his tomb.
The sods of the valley are sweet to him;
Crowds follow his funeral solemnity;
Vast numbers go before it.

Another point of dissimilarity between the patriarchal records in Genesis and the Book of Job is, that the Hebrew fathers are never represented as coming into contact with a wretched and miserable race of outcasts; indeed, it would appear that an average share of comforts was possessed by the various races amongst whom they settled. Job, on the contrary, describes a degraded and impoverished race of exiles, driven out from the fertile portions of the country, to seek shelter in the wilds and wastes of Northern Arabia. This circumstance is characteristic of the difference which may exist between the developments of the same system of civilization in different lands. Palestine had neither organized bands of plunderers, nor such a miserable herd of outcasts, as Job describes, when, as an aggravation of his misery, he says, that he was an object of contempt to the most wretched of the earth.—

But now
I am held in derision by my juniors,
By men whose fathers I would have disdained
To set among the dogs of my flock.
Of what value was the power of their hands?
They had neither strength nor vigour in them;
Hardened by hunger and by wretchedness,
They retire into the solitude of the desert—
Into desolate and uncultivated wastes;
They pluck up the mallow among thorns,
The root of the broom is food for them;
Should they leave their retreats for a moment,
Men cry after them as after a thief;
They dwell in cliffs, among the valleys,
In crevices of the earth, and in rocks:
They bray among the bushes, like wild asses;
They couple beneath the beds of nettles;
Brutish people! without character and infamous,
Who were driven in disgrace from their country.*

TRIUMPH OF THE GOSPEL.

ZION'S King shall reign victorious,
All the earth shall own his sway,—
He will make his kingdom glorious,
He will reign through endless day:

* This Article forms part of a very able and enlightened work, lately published under the title of "The Natural History of Society." By Dr W. C. Taylor.

What, though none on earth assist him,
God requires not help from man;
What, though all the earth resist him,
God will realize his plan.

Nations now from God estranged,
Then shall see a glorious light;
Night to day shall then be changed,—
Heaven shall triumph in the sight.
See the ancient idols falling,— Worshipp'd once, but now abhorr'd;
Men on Zion's King are calling,—
Zion's King by all adored.

Then shall Israel, long dispersed,
Mourning seek the Lord their God;
Look on him whom once they pierced,—
Own and kiss the chastening rod:
Then all Israel shall be saved,
War and tumult then shall cease,—
While the greater Son of David
Rules a conquer'd world in peace.

Mighty King, thine arm revealing,
Now thy glorious cause maintain;
Bring the nations help and healing,—
Make them subject to thy reign.
Angels, in their lofty station,
Praise thy name, thou only wise;
Oh! let earth, with emulation,
Join the triumph of the skies.

KELLY.

THE WARNING.

[From "Pastoral Annals." By an Irish Clergyman.]

It was on the afternoon of a fine Sunday in June, when, having concluded divine service in the parish church of —, I was walking slowly and alone towards the house wherein I at that time sojourned, the parsonage being in progress of repair. Scarcely had I proceeded above a hundred paces, when a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age overtook me. He was quite out of breath from running and the heat of the day, and remained for nearly a minute unable to speak from agitation. At length he hastily announced that his mother, the wife of a blacksmith living about half a mile distant, lay at the point of death, and desired above all human things to see me, and to give the last testimony of her faith in the Redeemer. The story was calculated to rouse even a careless clergyman, and such I certainly was not: but it made only a slight impression upon me (though I did not altogether disbelieve it), because I had seen the woman two days before, and entertained no suspicion that her end was so near. My mind also being otherwise occupied, I contented myself with telling the boy that I would come to his mother by and by. The poor fellow appeared exceedingly disappointed, but made no reply. I remember, that after about the lapse of a minute, I happened to turn round, not well knowing why. My young friend still stood as I had left him, merely his face was bent towards home, and not looking after me, as might have been supposed. The circumstance soon ceasing to attract my attention, I continued my walk, and forgot it and the message together.

An hour had scarcely expired, when the boy came again. He was sadly distressed and in tears. He prayed me to accompany him without delay. His mother, he assured me, was on the point of death. "She is going fast, very fast, indeed, Sir," sobbed the disconsolate youth, "and desires to see you for one moment before the breath leaves her." When he delivered this message, I was sitting, with my head uncovered, upon the steps of the front door of the house. "I will get my hat," said I, "and come presently."

"Shall I wait for you, Sir?" asked, hesitatingly, the weeping lad. Piqued by the implied distrust, I desired him, with some impatience of tone and manner, to go home.

He obeyed, but as he retired, looked back several times to see whether I followed him. I retained my sitting posture, determined—poor weak creature that I was!—not to change it till he was out of sight. While thus wilfully offending against duty and conscience, I heard a rumbling noise, proceeding I could not tell from whence. At first I supposed it might be the rolling report of a signal gun from one of the ships of war in the harbour, about five miles distant: a conjecture which the next moment dissipated. It was, as I have stated, a lovely afternoon; not a breath of air disturbed the perfect calm which reigned around; hence the fact which I shall relate is the more remarkable. The rumbling sound which I had heard was occasioned by a slate of the roof above me, which suddenly detaching itself rolled down the slope, and before I was aware fell edgewise upon my unprotected head. Happily I had bent forward in the attitude of listening, and consequently presented an oblique surface to the descending mass. Had Providence not so ordained it, my skull must have inevitably been cloven asunder. From such a fatal issue the Lord preserved me; but the sharp substance penetrated to the bone, and prostrated me with excessive violence upon the earth.

I was quite stunned, and bled profusely. But oh! how was I moved, when recovering my senses, I perceived amongst the most active of four or five persons who had come to my relief, the very boy whose entreaties I had so unfeelingly disregarded.

It was he, indeed, who had given the first alarm, for he had seen the slate fall, and instantly ran back. While he staid beside me, rendering such services as he could, his sister, a child of ten years of age, came crying up the avenue, sent to make a last appeal to the procrastinating minister. Alas! the time was gone by when that appeal could be responded to.—"The harvest was past, the summer was ended,"—the poor woman remained without a pastor. To the child, whom her brother signed to hold her peace, I could give no answer; to the mother I had denied the consolation which it was no longer in my power to bestow. My spirit accused me with justice of a flagrant dereliction of trust; and as the thunder-clouds of self-reproach burst upon my terrified conscience, hers returned to the God who gave it.

My wound, though deep, was not dangerous, nor was the cure protracted beyond three or four days; that short period was sufficient to restore my bodily health. Far otherwise was it with my mental part. During my confinement I suffered extreme anguish of spirit. I tried to allay it, sometimes by prayer, sometimes by seeking palliatives for my conduct through every imaginable pretext. But none of them satisfied me. My days dragged on heavily amidst the torments of conscious omission of duty—my nights were far worse. Unable to sleep, from a dull sensation of headache, the spectacle, or rather the spectre of her I had so inexcusably abandoned, haunted my waking thoughts. Like the impression which the bloody death I had seen a few months before made upon my imagination, so now this death, which I had not seen, took strong possession of it.

I thought that she had left her dying bed and come to mine. Again and again I fancied that I looked upon her pale countenance, as she sat beside my pillow, and mildly, if I may use the expression, frowned upon me as I lay. Now I well knew the whole time that these ideas were unreal, and no more than mere phantoms of the diseased mind. But I could not minister to it, nor pluck from memory the rooted sorrow which still remained unextirpated. Distressed beyond endurance by those visions which the periodical return of fever at eventide brought with it, I directed that a night-lamp should be placed in my chamber. Many find this a sovereign remedy against nightly fears; upon me the effect was quite opposite. A month of my then state of bodily and mental excitement, and I had become a confirmed Swedenborgian, so far as believing that I held converse with departed men.

Whether it were that the flickering flame of the lamp cast varied shadows around, or that a crisis had come, I know not. This I do know, that I embodied every shadow, and set them before me upon as many chairs as creative fancy could assemble.

My conversations with these people, as may be supposed, were highly animated, but not very profitable; yet I received many answers and assurances from my company. But time rolled on, and obliterated day by day some one phantom of the brain, and weakened at the same time the force of self-reproach. In short, I recovered full health and partial spirits; for the withers of conscience had been sorely wrung. My reflections were very painful and self-accusing; and though, indeed, I prayed much, still the exercise brought no comfort—the Spirit had not come. The truth is, my supplications were rather deprecatory, than enjoyed as the richest and most sublime privilege bestowed upon man. I spoke to my God, but not with him. There was no speaking face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend, but merely a crying for mercy from afar—the beating upon the breast of the penitent sinner, not the hosannas of the believer rejoicing in hope. My mind was, therefore, a theatre in which conflicting feelings wrestled—a sea where the four winds struggled for mastery.

I suffered exceedingly at the time; but subsequent experience has taught me, that these strong emotions are generally the prelude to sober and wholesome convictions. The storm blows by,—a gentle breeze remains, the pleasing vestige of the elemental rage by which we had been alarmed. I rejoice now—I rejoiced even then, that I felt such profound sorrow. I think it is very advisable to cultivate such feelings, when circumstanced as I was then. The sorrow which a sense of neglected duty inspires may torment for a season, but bright beams of hope shoot from behind its darkest clouds, and tell to the afflicted soul the tidings of happier days. So certainly was it, and often since has it been with me. The first use I made of my convalescence was to visit the widower. To my surprise, and I may add confusion, he received me with unbounded cordiality, testifying the deepest gratification at my recovery, and the universal regret the parishioners had felt when the account of the accident I had met with became known. Still, beneath these external demonstrations some hidden sentiment at variance with his professions must have lurked. He spoke of his sorrow for the loss he had suffered, and of the religious disposition of his deceased partner; but not a word of her latter moments, nor did he make any allusion to her desire of seeing me. This might have been delicate forbearance—or perhaps conscience made me suspicious, and that all was mere accident; but when he spoke of the fright his son had experienced at the sight of my accident,—that bore somewhat upon the question, and probed the wound. However, the general impression made upon my mind was that of thankfulness for the feeling consideration which he evinced: and truly his reception of me heaped coals of fire upon my head.

After submitting to this torture for some few minutes, I freely confessed my fault, and asked his forgiveness. Poor fellow! he appeared willing enough to forgive, but I had touched a tender string, which vibrated in his heart's core. Bitterly did he weep, and loudly bewail the dispensation with which it had pleased God to try him. Overcome by the recollection of twenty years of cloudless happiness, he remained for a long time a prey to irrepressible bursts of affliction. By degrees they subsided; and when he felt himself sufficiently composed to speak distinctly, he sobbed out,—“Oh! dear sir, I cannot take upon myself to forgive my teacher.”

The words were, I believe, spoken in the purest singleness of intention, and with unfeigned humility; but I was fully sensible how much more they meant than he intended to express. They absolutely made me start. Forgive my teacher! Again and again I pondered upon the phrase,—and the more I thought on it, the deeper it sank. Forgive my teacher! “You won't take upon yourself,” I inwardly exclaimed, “to forgive, because you know that the account is between God and his soul, and that it is not yours to deal with.” No! the poor man did not think so; and I am sure that if he had, he would have gladly prayed for me. He merely felt that I was too much above him to require his forgiveness; while I, in heart, confessed myself so far below him, as earnestly to desire both his forgiveness and his prayers. And I have lived to receive both. Two years had scarce fulfilled their course, when he, too, was summoned to depart, and pass into “the land where all things are forgotten.” Before his day arrived, he had become a changed character: when it had come, he left this world rejoicing in hope. His last words were a fervent entreaty that God would bless my labours in the parish; and as I held his clammy hand in mine, we exchanged a final blessing.

Few reflections can be required upon the narrative of so very simple an incident. In the criminality of selfish delay all mankind are agreed. Such, undoubtedly, was mine. A merciful God has, I trust, sent an answer of peace to the sighings of a contrite heart, and not withheld the full measure of his love from her whom a negligent minister deprived of the dying glory of professing her reliance upon her Redeemer's sacrifice.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MRS W. W. DUNCAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART III.

HITHERTO we have viewed this excellent Christian lady in some of the most interesting aspects in which practical piety is displayed in domestic life. Nor did her high-toned religious character shine to less advantage in the more conspicuous station which she was called to occupy as the wife of a faithful minister of Christ. The augmented responsibility which her new position entailed upon her, deeply impressed her mind. She sought in all points to prove herself a counsellor and help-meet to her husband; entering into all his plans for the good of the parish with an interest and ardour the most exemplary and becoming. Her anxiety for the young is beautifully evinced in the remarks which she penned in her Diary, when restrained on one occasion by God's providence from attending the class which she had formed for their spiritual instruction:—

April 23.—My class is gone; there were thirteen. When shall I see that any real good is done? I must pray more for them. I have been exhorting them to try, like good old Berridge, to put the words of Scripture into the form of supplications, and use them as they walk by the way. Oh for the teaching of the Spirit, to make them wise unto salvation! I painfully feel my own coldness and deadness, and would I were awake to newness of life. My God has shut me up alone, while others meet in his beloved courts. I do love them! but is it with the fervent love of earlier days, when the words of truth were as manna to my soul? I often look back nine years, to the time when I was first admitted to the visible Church, and feel tempted to say, 'Then it was better with me than now.' What but the blood of Jesus can ransom me? I might have been far advanced in the Christian race ere now, instead of being the weak and erring child I am. When I come to die, I shall not be able to say, like Paul, 'I have fought a good fight,' but through grace I will cling to my Saviour. Oh! that my dear husband and I lived daily nearer to him. May a blessing be on his preaching to-day! In three days I shall have lived twenty-three years. In the last, how many mercies has God given me, with some slight chastisements that came threefold increased, because I did not cast all my care upon him, but kept some of it to carry myself! I have the prospect of introducing a new inhabitant into a world of sin, and, I trust, an heir of glory to the dawn of an immortal existence. Oh may my babe be one of Jesus' lambs! I scarcely dare form wishes for the future, but, at present, my mind needs cleansing. I do not feel the glow of Christian love to all; my affections are too much confined to a few objects. I am easily made impatient, and this was not the case formerly. I want the charity that thinketh no evil. My thoughts are too much on self. Alas! when shall I be like Jesus? In heaven?—Yes; but the likeness must begin on earth. Oh that the breath of prayer may be fervent and unwearied!

The prospect to which she alludes, of ere long becoming a mother, awakened in her reflective mind many solemn reflections; and accordingly, we find her thus giving vent to her feelings in a letter to a friend:—

"I do not know if I hinted to you in my last the prospect that lies before me, that of becoming a mother. Oh! my friend, what a tide of feelings rushes upon me as I write! How great the responsibility of being entrusted with the care of a young immortal—one who may be a holy and zealous child of God, or care for none of these things. But here, again, the Lord will lay no duty upon me, but what he will enable me to discharge. Will you pray much for me, dearest F.? You will not know when I am suffering, or what the issue is at the time. But, oh! commit me to a God of compassions every day, and then you will be able to feel for me what, I hope, He will enable me to feel for myself, a sweet confidence that all will be well. Yes; it must be well! It would be a mercy to be raised up again, and restored to my tender husband, and the duties of life that lie before me. But if I am taken, I know whose shed blood will gain access even for me. He will give me a place in his own temple. It will be the lowest place. It is wonderful, indeed, that there should be one of any kind for me. But the 'many mansions' are for the poor and needy, the sinful and the helpless; and I am of that number. My precious Saviour died that I might live."

In process of time Mrs Duncan was invested with all the anxieties as well as pleasures of the parental relation. "How my heart longs," she exclaims, "that this little one may be folded with the flock of Jesus, the loving Shepherd of helpless little children! and I have a cheering hope that so it shall be,—for she is a child of prayer, and our Father is a God of love." Ah! it were well if the hopes and the happiness of home were oftener hallowed by the prayer of faith. In the dwellings of the righteous may be heard the voice of earnest supplication, to him who is the God of the families that call upon his name; and hence it is that the candle of the Lord is ever shining upon their tabernacle, while, alas! fearful contrast, "the curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked." Mrs DUNNAN felt that in her domestic circle, enlivened as it often was by the visits of kind relatives and friends, she enjoyed a happiness greater far than usually falls to the lot of mortals; and it was often an anxious subject of self-inquiry, "What shall I render to the Lord for all his mercies?" In devising and executing plans of usefulness she was indefatigable, as far as her now increased family occupations permitted. Besides teaching a Sabbath class, she spent some time weekly in distributing tracts among the families in the parish; availing herself of the opportunities which she thus enjoyed of conversing with the people on their eternal interests. Such subjects were ever present to her own mind, and she loved to speak of them. It was evident, indeed, to all around her, that she breathed habitually the atmosphere of heaven; and when reminded, by the trials of life, that "here we have no continuing city, no sure place of abode," she clung with all the greater tenacity to the hope of heaven. In accordance with this spiritual frame of mind, we find her thus recording her feelings in her Diary, in prospect of being mother of a second babe:—

"I pray for grace to bear my trial as a child of God, in patience and willingness to suffer according to his will. I was rebellious the last time, and bore the pain, not because God sent it, but because I could not escape it. May it be different now!

'His love in time past forbids me to think He'll leave me at last in peril to stak.'

'When I pass through the waters, He will be with me.' His exceeding great and precious promises encourage me to hope and enable me to cling, though weaker than a child, to the Cross, which rises, as my prop and stay, amid these deep waters. If it should be the will of God that these should prove for me the waters of the Jordan, still he has said, 'I will never leave nor forsake thee.' Often my faithless heart has forsaken Him—been occupied with creature affections, with worldly cares, or with the too engrossing pleasures of imagination, or sloth has prevailed, and made me forget that the time is short wherein I may do my Master's work. I have but a life of leaves, with very little fruit; and yet my Saviour would willingly work in me the same fair fruits that have adorned his most favoured children. Shall he have to say to me, 'and thou wouldst not?' Beloved Saviour, I entreat thee to mould my spirit as entirely to thy pleasure as thou didst my frame at first. Let me feel thee near, and be thou to me the chief among ten thousand. When I see thee face to face, I shall love thee as I ought, and rejoice, being satisfied with thy likeness. Till then, oh! for a more prayerful spirit, and more zeal to work—more grace in my heart, to hallow my converse with"—

Such were the closing words of her Diary, and they are beautifully in unison with the whole earthly career of this devoted young Christian. She was obviously ripening fast for heaven. The birth of her second child, which occurred on the 7th January 1839, was followed, before her constitution had overcome the shock which it then received, by the departure of two of her brothers to Australia. A letter which she wrote to one of them, in little more than a month after her confinement, shows that her tender heart was deeply wounded by the sudden stroke of separation. Though somewhat long, we quote it, as affording a fine specimen of the spirit of pious and calm resignation by which she was actuated, even in circumstances the most painful and affecting :—

"I cannot tell you, my beloved brother, the many anxieties that have filled my heart for you, since we heard of your present state and prospects. You are going with Corie to the far country where we shall no more be near you. But, oh! if it is blessed to the establishment of your health, how joyfully shall we look on the separation that grieves us now. I am much distressed that your native clime is too stern for you; but God will be the guide of your way, and will, I trust, make a pleasant home for you in the wilderness, as long as it is His pleasure to continue you there. May you be able to say with Madame de Guion :—

'I can be calm and free from care
On any shore, since God is there.'

"You must help each other to run in the heavenly way. You can do that as well in Australia as here. The ear of the Hearer of prayer is as open to the suppliant there, as in this land of privilege. He is himself the fountain of blessing, and sometimes gives it in the greatest abundance, when he has made us feel that we have little outward help. He puts the means, that we are so apt to rest in, out of reach, that we may look straight up to Him; and when we do this, what showers of grace and comfort does He pour into the heart! He shows us what a God of love and mercy He is, and how safe we are, amid the many slippery places and weary steps of our journey, walking in His light, and resting under His shadow. He is weakening your strength in the way, dear brother, that you may lean, more undividedly, on Him who is strong to save. He is changing the plan we all loved to think of, that of your soon being a messenger of glad tidings, a shepherd of the flock of Jesus. But I trust it is, that you may see more of the glory and beauty that shine in the face of this precious Saviour, and may learn the depths of his tender sympathy; for, oh! what is human love to this? And then, having learned the lesson in the school of Christ, how fervently will you declare to poor sinners the riches of his grace; and what a blessing will follow your labours, if, in after years, you are permitted to feed the flock! But I must check the utterance of these hopes; which, however, will dwell in my own bosom while we are divided. Oh George! if I did not know who is at the helm of events, I should call it cruel that you are to go; and I am not even to see you, or bid you farewell. But it is our Father's will, and this must be enough for me. I have a wavering heart that often departs from Him, and he sees it needful to subdue it in many ways,—and this is one of them. I should have felt it a happiness to contribute to your comfort, and have some sweet converse to think of, when seas are between us. But this may not be. Oh may it please God to make me willing to submit to this! Dear J. will be with you, and do for you all that a kind sister could; but do not forget that you have another sister, whose heart is with you; and do not forget to pray for me. Oh I have need that all who love me should do so! Pray for Wallace too, that he may live nearer to Christ every day, and win many souls by his ministry; and pray for our dear babes, that they may be among the children whom Jesus blesses. Henry Robert was devoted to Him in baptism yesterday; may the mantle of both his dear grandfathers rest on him! The weeks you are now to spend in Scotland will be very precious,—remembered by those who go, and those who stay. May they promote the growth of grace in each! And may I, too, grow, though not with you! I was hoping to have had a few quiet weeks with you, before the General Assembly. Alas! when may we have a quiet week together again!"

The valedictory poem is in the same strain :—

"TO MY BELOVED BROTHER, GEORGE ARCHIBALD LUNDIE.

Celick, April.

"Since o'er the wave thy Father's mandate calls thee,
And bids thee seek thy home in climes afar,
Sweet brother part in peace! What'er befall thee,
Still may His presence be thy guiding star,
To point with Heavenly light thy pilgrim way,
And shine in warning love when thou would'st stray.

"Trusting, we yield thee to the mighty ocean,
For 'in the hollow of His hand' 't Heav,
And on its bosom vast, with meek devotion,
Thou'lt look from its calm wave to calmer skies,
And bless the love that reigns through every clime,—
The God who fills the universe sublime!

"When Albion's shores, from thy strained gaze receding,
Are fading in the dim uncertain haze,
And sad affection is thy spirit leading
Back to the beautiful home of former days,
Oh! may a voice divine be in thine ear:
'Fear not, thou'rt still at home, for God is here!'

"Should languor come, thy gentle frame oppressing,
And tremble in thine eye the silent tear,
That now no more thou hear'st a parent's blessing,
Nor tender words, that sickness' self could cheer,
Be Jesus' sheltering banner o'er thee spread,—
His everlasting arms support thy head!

"Shouldst thou, in spirit to thy home returning,
Behold the lessened circle sigh for thee,
And each, with mournful love and ardour burning,
For thee, retiring, bend the suppliant knee,
May faith's assurance soothe thy soul to rest,—
'Their prayers are heard, thou shalt be surely blest!'

"With thine, our prayers shall rise, to Heaven ascending, Nor seas, nor furthest space, a barrier prove,
And, at the shrine of mercy, sweetly blending,
Shall find acceptance through redeeming love;
In lands remote our parted course may run;
But nought can sever hearts in Christ made one.

"How bright has been our hope to see thee feeding
His little flock in these our quiet vales;
With watchful care the faint and wounded leading
To living streams, whose water never fails;
Aiding the feeble from the dust to rise,—
A man of God,—a herald of the skies!

"But go! Heaven's blessing on thy path attending,
Where nature's glories shine on frozen hearts,
And as the sun, the veil of darkness rending,
His morning splendour o'er creation darts,
May gospel beams diffuse resplendent day,
To guide the hapless flock that darkling stray!

"How beautiful, on earth's dark hills appearing,
Day's harbinger, the messenger of peace;
How sweet his earnest voice, the wanderer cheering,
That tells of morn arising, ne'er to cease!
Bear thou those tidings o'er the heaving main,
And turned to songs shall be our parting pain!"

The brief career of this heavenly-minded woman was now drawing to a close. Her bodily constitution had never been robust, and frequent attacks of headaches, to which she had been subject for some years previous to the period of her history at which we have now arrived, threw around her whole character that pensive calmness and chastened sobriety of feeling, which form the twilight of the Christian's departing day. During the whole of the summer of 1839, though able to nurse her child, Mrs Duncan often complained of weakness. The slightest exertion fatigued her. Still she was active, as far as her strength permitted. Her leisure hours she occasionally devoted to her favourite literary pursuits, and some poems, written about this time for her children, are very favourable specimens of her poetic power. In September, she accompanied Mr

Duncan in a short excursion to the Highlands, which recruited her general health, though it still left her subject to headaches.

At this time, the revival of religion in Kilsyth, and other places, gave a refreshing and invigorating impulse to many portions of the country. Both ministers and people were aroused to a greater ardour in the good work of the Lord: and of this happy impulse the pastor and parish of Cleish were privileged to partake. Mrs Duncan felt a lively interest in the glad tidings which came from time to time of another, and another, and still another parish, experiencing refreshing showers of the Spirit's influence. Her whole heart became engrossed with the subject, and she longed and prayed that the people of Cleish might also be favoured with the loving-kindness of the Lord. Ah! little did she know, while she was thus imploring the droppings of divine grace upon others, that she herself was so soon to drink of that exhaustless river which flows from the throne of God and of the Lamb. The circumstances of her death, and the glory with which her sun went down, shedding a softened radiance all around, have already been described in our pages,* by the pen of one whose elegant and accomplished mind, refined taste, and devoted piety, so singularly qualified him for appreciating and doing justice to a character so pure, so lovely, so elevated, as that of Mrs Duncan's obviously was.

We lay aside the volume† from which the materials of our Sketch are taken with the deepest reluctance, strongly recommending it to the notice of the public, as one which every Christian reader will highly prize.

ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF OUR TALENTS :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN THOMSON,

Minister of Yester, East-Lothian.

"Occupy till I come."—LUKE xix. 13.

THE parable of the talents teaches us, most impressively, the heavy responsibility which attaches to the professing servants of God, the deep obligations under which they are laid to improve their privileges, and the solemn account which they must render at the second coming of Christ. At the beginning of the parable, we are told that "a certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." The person here meant is obviously our Saviour himself, who, when he arose from the dead, "went into a far country," even into heaven itself, to receive that mediatorial "kingdom" which was procured and established by his sufferings and death. In conducting the government of that kingdom, our Mediator bestows, upon his professing servants, certain gifts or "talents," which it is their duty to improve diligently; for, when he ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, he gave gifts unto men. These gifts He continues still to bestow upon us, and He accompanies the bestowal of them with the solemn charge, "Occupy till I come." That is, use them in the manner which I have appointed, apply them to the holy purposes which I have prescribed;—for a day of reckoning will come; the Mediator will "return" to call his servants to account; and while those who have improved their talents shall be liberally rewarded, yet those who have hidden them in the earth shall be cast into outer darkness, and consigned to irremediable woe.

I. I remark, in the first place, that God has given to all of us valuable talents.

1. The gift of reason, the power of thought, the faculty of conscience, the affections of the heart, all that distinguishes man, as a rational and moral being, from the beasts that perish, all that elevates him in the scale of creation,—all this is the gift of God, who holds us responsible to Him for the use that we make of His gifts. "Who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?" No doubt, there are "diversities of gifts" possessed by different men,—diversities of natural talent and intellectual power; and some are capable of making higher attainments in knowledge than others. But all of us possess a mind capable of being enlightened by divine truth, and a heart capable of being purified by divine grace. And what a valuable talent is this! Instead of dooming us to grovel in the dust of the earth, God has endowed us with the capacity of soaring above sublunary things, to contemplate "those things which are above;" He has rendered us capable of knowing, and loving, and enjoying him for ever. And how great is the responsibility connected with the possession of this talent! Surely it is not becoming, that minds, endowed with immortality, and formed originally after the image of God, and capable of endless and lofty advancement in divine knowledge, should be wholly "occupied" and engrossed either with the pleasures or the business of this transitory world. Ought we not rather to cultivate and improve our minds, by the knowledge of God, by the contemplation of his works, by the study of his ways, by the investigation of his plans of mercy toward the human race? What subjects can be more worthy, than these, of our notice and inquiry, or more fitted to elevate and enlarge our minds? What can be more becoming than that all our intellectual talents should be hallowed on the altar of religion, and touched with the live coal of piety, and consecrated to the service of him whom the seraphim adore? As all these talents have been received from God, so they should be devoted to God, to the advancement of his glory, and the showing forth of his praise. However great these talents may be, though we were endowed with the highest genius, though we possessed the lofty intellect of an angel, though we understood all mysteries and all knowledge, still we would have no reason to be proud, or puffed up in our own conceit. Every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights; and it is the inspiration of the Almighty that giveth us understanding. Ought we not, therefore, to be "clothed with humility?" especially when we consider that great talents involve great responsibility, and that to whom much is given, of them much shall be required.

* "A Brief Notice of the late Mrs Duncan of Cleish. By the Rev. Henry Grey, A.M."—Scottish Christian Herald, No. 61, Second Series.

† Memoir of Mrs W. W. Duncan, being Recollections of a Daughter. By her Mother. Edinburgh: William Oliphant and Co. 1841

2. Again, God has given to some of us wealth and worldly possessions. This also is a valuable talent, which it is our duty to "occupy" and improve till the Saviour come. But how seldom do those who are placed in circumstances of prosperity or affluence consider, that they are not proprietors, but merely stewards, of God's bounty; and that their wealth is not given to them, merely for their own use or their own selfish enjoyment, but as a sacred trust, to be employed for God's glory and for man's good. There are few who would utter the language of the rich fool, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." Most men would blush to avow their resolution to employ their wealth in so discreditable a manner:—and yet there are many who are not ashamed, in practice, to do it. They have no feeling of responsibility to God for the use they make of their wealth, no sense of their obligation to use it in the manner, and for the purposes which God has prescribed, no dread of that solemn account which they must render for misapplying and wasting their Master's goods. If their cold hearts were melted and constrained by the love of Christ, and if they would regard their wealth as a "talent" entrusted to them by God, then would they know the truth of the Saviour's words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and they would account it both a duty and a privilege to offer their gifts on the altar of God, in order that they might advance his glory in the world, and promote the welfare of their fellow-men.

3. Another talent which God has entrusted to us is religious privileges;—a translated Bible, a preached Gospel,—all the various means of grace, and the ordinances of religious worship. This talent, though frequently underrated and despised, is one of inestimable value. When we look merely to the temporal benefits which Christianity has conferred on the human race, we cannot but see abundant reason to bless the God of salvation for establishing, in our favoured land, the ordinances of his grace. Nothing but our possession of this talent has rendered Britain a land of light and liberty, a land of science and civilization, a land of intellectual greatness and high attainment. Look to those countries where this talent is not enjoyed, where the Gospel has never been preached; and you see there the grossest superstition, the thickest darkness, the deepest debasement, the most shameless profligacy. Look again to the islands in the South Sea, where Christianity has been embraced by those who, not long ago, were sitting in heathen darkness; and there you behold the blessings of civilization, the beauties of holiness, the fruits of virtue, springing up, in rich luxuriance, from the seeds of Gospel truth, planted by the hand of the missionary, and watered by the dew of heaven. He must be an ignorant man who knows not that all our civil privileges have been secured, and are preserved, by our religious privileges; and that if the Gospel had never been sent to us, in this distant island of the sea, we must still have been, like our forefathers, prowling barbarians, debased by superstition and plunged in vice. "The moment a slave sets his foot on the British shores, that moment his chains are broken, and he breathes the air of freedom." And when a nation embraces Christianity, the fetters of superstition and vice are broken; the mind is emancipated from those chains which cramped its energies and debased its powers; the truth makes it free, and it becomes free indeed,—free to explore the wonders of science and to unlock the mysteries of art, but free especially to ascend the heights of heavenly wisdom, and to acquire the knowledge of the true God and of Jesus Christ, whom to know is eternal life. When we look then even to the temporal benefits which Christianity has conferred upon our country, in dispelling the shades of heathen and Popish darkness, in enlightening and enlarging the national mind, in raising the standard and tone of public morals, and in supplying the most powerful motives to the practice of virtue and the exercise of justice and kindness between man and man,—and especially when we look to the spiritual benefits which Christianity has conferred, its saving instructions, its numberless conversions, sinners turned to God, and saints built up in holiness,—we cannot but see that the possession of Christian privileges is a "talent" of inestimable value. And no right-hearted man could contemplate the withdrawing of this precious talent from us, as any other than the most signal calamity, the heaviest judgment which it was possible to inflict. "A famine of bread" is a calamity to be deeply deplored; but there is a famine that would be more deplorable still, and far more fearful in its consequences,—even "a famine of the Word of God." Esteem this talent, therefore, highly, and improve it diligently, as those who must give an account. Value all the ordinances of grace, for if you undervalue them, you may soon be deprived of them. God may remove your candlestick out of its place, or he may shut your eyes to the light, by judicial blindness; and then the light which was in you will become darkness, and from you will be taken even that which you once had.

4. There is another talent which God has entrusted to some of you, namely, the gift of his saving grace. This talent is possessed by all the true followers of Christ. To such, God grants the forgiveness of their sins, "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus;" he gives them "a new heart, and a right spirit;" he renews them after his own image, "in righteousness and true holiness;" he strengthens them to "depart from all iniquity;" and he inspires them with the hope of an eternal inheritance in heaven. These are the privileges which you enjoy, if you be the true followers of Christ. But remember, that privilege is inseparably connected with duty: God's great goodness to you, lays you under deep obligations, and invests you with a solemn responsibility. His saving grace is a talent which must be "occupied" and improved; it must not be hid in a napkin, and buried in the earth,—it must be employed for his glory, and for working out your own salvation. If God has called you out of darkness, then "walk as the children of the light;" if he has forgiven you much, then love him much; if he has "bought you with a price," then "glorify him in your bodies and in your spirits, which are his."

II. Let us now consider, in the second place, the use that we ought to make of our talents.—The Saviour commands us to "occupy" them. The original word, which is translated "occupy," literally means, to be employed in any business—to engage in trade or traffic. The purpose for which a man engages in trade, is, to increase his capital,—to improve his condition in life,—to secure a larger portion of this world's comforts and enjoyments. And what anxiety does the merchant show, to lay out his talents of gold and silver to the best advantage! What eagerness does he manifest to avail himself of every favourable opening in trade, and to secure the most ample returns for his outlay! How diligent is he in his business, and how devoted to his object! Ought not we, then, to be as diligent in "occupying" the precious talents which God has given to us, in order that we may trade, not for time, but for eternity, and secure "the pearl of great price?" The merchant may fail to secure the object of his pursuit, his labour and anxiety may be fruitless—a sudden reverse of fortune may blast his hopes, and reduce him to abject poverty; but those who diligently improve the talents which God has given them, shall in no wise lose their reward; they are laying up treasures in heaven, treasures which no rust can corrupt, and no thief can steal. But I observe,

1. That we should "occupy" our talents in diligently attending to the salvation of our souls. Perhaps there may be some of us who have not hitherto attended as we ought to this most important matter, and who have been living "without God, and without hope in the world." If so, I would solemnly ask them,—Do you not know or believe that your sins expose you to great and imminent danger, and that it will not profit you, though you should gain the whole world, if you lose your souls? If you believe this, then surely it becomes you to apply your minds instantly and earnestly to the work of your salvation. Think of the wrath of God, which abideth on the impatient and unbelieving; think of the joys of heaven, from which your unbelief will exclude you; think of the miseries of hell, to which your sins, if unforgiven, will eternally consign you. Remember that the soul, if once lost, is lost for ever. Awake, therefore, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." You have minds capable of understanding and appreciating the danger to which, as sinners, you are exposed; and you have hearts capable of being impressed by the warnings and entreaties of God. See, then, that ye "occupy" this talent aright; apply your minds to understand the truth as it is in Jesus, and lay open your hearts to its saving and sanctifying influence. You enjoy also the privileges of the Gospel; you have the Scriptures of truth to testify of Christ; you hear the invitations of God, beseeching you to be reconciled to him, and offering to cleanse you from all sin, by the Saviour's atoning blood; "occupy" this talent, therefore,—improve your privileges,—beware of turning a deaf ear to the "still small voice" of mercy,—but "seek the Lord while he may be found," and come by faith to the blood of sprinkling, that you may be "washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

But even those who have obtained peace with God, through the death of his Son, are also required to "work out their own salvation with fear and trembling;" not their salvation from the guilt of sin,—for that is wrought exclusively by the atoning sacrifice of Christ,—but their salvation from the power of sin, and their transformation into the holy image of God. This part of salvation is accomplished through the diligent use of the means of grace, and by the accompanying power of the Holy Spirit. To the Christian, therefore, we say,—"Occupy" the talents which God has given you, improve diligently all the means of grace, seek to be wholly sanctified through the Word of Truth, stir up the gift of God which is in you, and pray unceasingly for divine teaching and saving grace; "for it is God who worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." Seeing that "there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed," many sinful passions to be subdued, many temptations and spiritual enemies to be overcome, many Christian graces to be acquired, and many attainments in knowledge and holiness to be made; study to go on to perfection, and, "forgetting the things that are behind, press towards the mark, for the prize of your high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

2. We should "occupy" our talents in promoting the welfare of our brethren.—No man, and especially no Christian, should live for himself alone. It was a murderer who said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Has God bestowed upon us the gift of reason, or the gift of superior intelligence? Then let us "occupy" this talent in instructing the ignorant—in devising and conducting plans of benevolence—in teaching the young to fear the Lord their Maker—in guiding the minds of all over whom we have influence to the knowledge, and love, and obedience of the truth. How melancholy to see the gift of reason prostituted to the service of infidelity and impiety, and employed in perverting and corrupting the minds of men. But how pleasant to behold a man of superior understanding devoting all the energies of his gifted mind to the instruction and improvement of his brethren, and seeking, by argument and by entreaty, to win them to the practice of virtue and to the service of God. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

Again, has God given to any of us the talent of wealth? Then let such "occupy" that talent in promoting the temporal and spiritual welfare of their fellow-men. Let them be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, of their abundance to the wants of their poorer brethren. Let their charity be without ostentation and without partiality; let it be given, not for effect, but from principle; let them do it unto the Lord, and not unto men; and He who seeth in secret will reward them openly. But let us be especially diligent in "occupying" this talent to provide for the spiritual necessities of our fellow-men. There are multitudes, in our own land and in heathen lands, who are living without God and without the Gospel of his Son, and hastening onward to an unknown and uncared-for eternity. How, then, shall they call on Him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear, without a preacher? and how shall they preach, except they be sent? and how shall they be sent, except they be supported and maintained? Bibles must be provided, and the ambassadors of Christ must be sent forth to preach the everlasting Gospel, otherwise multitudes must perish for lack of knowledge; and the blood of their souls will be required at our hands, if we, possessing the talent of wealth, refuse to "occupy" it in providing for them the means of grace. But the man who has earnestly sought the salvation of his own soul will always care for the souls of his brethren. The Christian desires not that the peace and joy of the Gospel may be confined to his own breast, but that they may be communicated to all his brethren of mankind: and he prays, "God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us, that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations."

3. We should "occupy" our talents in promoting the glory of God.—"Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." This should be the great aim and object of our existence—to glorify God by doing his will, by departing from all iniquity, and bringing forth the fruits of holiness. "Herein is my Father glorified, when ye bear much fruit."

III. We should now consider, in the last place, the  motive which is here presented to induce us to be diligent and faithful in occupying our talents, namely, the coming of Christ to call his servants to give an account of their stewardship. This solemn truth is much forgotten, and its influence is but slightly felt, by many who call themselves the servants of Christ. Beware, therefore, lest that great and terrible day of the Lord should overtake you, as a thief, and find you unprepared.

"He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry;" and then the mask of a false profession shall be torn off, and the hope of the hypocrite shall utterly perish; and the infidel, who now scornfully asks, Where is the promise of his coming? shall call upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon him, and to cover him from the terrible wrath of the Lamb. Prepare, therefore, to meet thy God, who now says to thee, "Occupy till I come." Be warned by the doom of the slothful servant, who hid his talent in the earth, and was cast into outer darkness. Be ye diligent, and steadfast, and immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour in the Lord shall not be in vain. Those who are faithful to Christ upon earth shall be abundantly and graciously rewarded in heaven; for the Judge shall say to them, "Well done, good and faithful servants; enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

COMFORT FOR MOURNERS.

CHILD of sorrow, lorn, forsaken,
Whom the world hath long oppressed,
Though by misery's storm o'ertaken,
Calm the tumult of thy breast.

Why this anguish?

Hither come, and sweetly rest!

Child of sorrow, hush thy wailing!

One there is who knows thy grief,

One whose mercy, never failing,

Waits to give thy soul relief;

He, thy Saviour,

Faithful still,—of friends the chief!

Child of sorrow, do they leave thee,—

Those on whom thy hopes have stayed?

Jesus calls, and will receive thee,

With a love can never fade;

Hark, he bids thee

Seek the home for sinners made!

Child of sorrow, tempests lowering

Hang around the clouds of care,

But thy Father's smile, o'erpowering,

Breaks the gloom, and gilds despair;

See thy Father

On the cloud his bow prepare!

Child of sorrow, why dejected?

Own, approve my righteous will!

I afflict,—'twas I protected;

Chastened son, be still, be still!

Grace and mercy

Ever thus my word fulfil!

HUTCHESON.

HENRI ARNAUD,

AND THE RETURN OF THE WALDENSES.

PART II.

IN consequence of the success of the Waldenses at Bobbio, they were enabled, on the sixteenth day of their expedition (Sunday, September 1), to celebrate divine worship, when a sermon was delivered by M. Montoux, the only associate of Arnaud, who addressed his audience from a door, which was laid flat upon two rocks. An oath of mutual fidelity was also taken, between the officers and soldiers, in which they swore to be faithful and true to each other, and never to separate or disunite, even though their numbers should be reduced to three or four, until their sacred mission should be accomplished. On the following day they marched to attack Villario; upon which, those who garrisoned that place fled as soon as the Waldenses approached, and took refuge within the walls of a convent. This building was immediately invested, and would soon have been starved into surrender, but for the approach of a strong force to its relief; and the Waldenses, after several skirmishes, in which they inflicted severe losses upon the enemy, were obliged, on the morning of the 7th of September, to raise the siege, and retreat from the valley of Lucerna to the fastnesses of San Martino. Nothing could be now, apparently, more hopeless than the condition of this devoted band, in the course of their retrograde movement. Their original number of eight hundred had been considerably reduced, by sickness and the sword; eight thousand French soldiers, and twelve thousand Piedmontese, had been collected, for the purpose of crushing them; and while their retreat was followed by numerous detachments of the enemy, with whom they were almost incessantly engaged in combat, the country was so effectually wasted of provisions, that they were obliged for several days to subsist entirely upon fruits and vegetables. But even under these trying circumstances, not a word was mentioned of flight or surrender. When they were driven from one strong point, by hunger or the enemy, they established themselves upon another; and for several weeks, the only provisions and ammunition they possessed was that which they captured from the enemy. In the numerous combats which, in such a warfare, they were obliged to sustain, whether collectively or in small bands, their knowledge of the rugged country, and admirable skill as marksmen, were of essential service: they attacked when they were least expected, and if overpowered, they retreated to places where they could not be followed; while they inflicted such havoc upon their pursuers by this plan of action, that at length whole troops would fly in disorder at the sound of a single Waldensian musket. Of the dangers which they encountered in this campaign, from the nature of the country, one instance will be sufficient. On their retreat from the valley of Lucerna to San Martino, their path lay by a way so difficult, that even sure-footed mountaineers would not have attempted it by day-light; and yet this was to be surmounted by a midnight march. The darkness was so intense that the guides, in order to be seen, were obliged to wear the whitest linen upon their shoulders; and in this fearful route the Waldenses lost the whole of their baggage among the rocks and precipices. They reached the Balsi in safety; but when they looked back with day-light, and saw the dangers they had surmounted, they shuddered. "Those who have not seen such places," says Arnaud, in his narrative, "can form no notion of the danger; and those who have, may be inclined to discredit this statement. It is, nevertheless, perfectly true; and, moreover, many who performed this dangerous exploit have since visited the scene by day, and were struck with horror at the recollection that they passed in darkness over spots which they never would have traversed in light."

We shall not trace the various incidents that followed throughout this campaign, after the Waldenses had established themselves at the Balsi, a lofty rock rising by three different terraces, on the top of which was a plateau, where a sort of barracks was excavated in the ground. This place had been so carefully fortified by Arnaud with palisades, parapets, and loop-holes, and furnished with piles of stones to hurl down upon the enemy, that access to these fortifications, which was only practicable on one side, was rendered dangerous and difficult; and although, at the close of the winter's campaign, the number of the defenders was reduced to less than four hundred, they resolved to make good their post against the united forces of France and Savoy. Incessantly did their enemies attack this place of refuge, and with overwhelming numbers; but the indomitable garrison on every occasion repelled them with great slaughter. It was then hoped that the Waldenses would be reduced by famine, during the severe months of winter; but here the good providence of God had provided for his faithful witnesses in an unexpected manner. On their first return to their native valleys, they had found an abundant harvest either ripened or already reaped, for their present sustenance; after which, however, a heavy fall of snow completely buried the standing crop, and seemed to destroy their hopes of a future supply. But this alarming event, so far from being ruinous, was the cause of their safety. Had the whole crop been gathered, it would have been destroyed with the magazines and barns which the enemy burnt, when they raised their first siege of the Balsi, and retired into winter quarters; but during the season of frost and snow, the buried corn was recovered in good condition, so that it served for the sustenance of the garrison. One incident which we will mention, affords an idea of the nature of this warfare, and the heroism with which the Waldenses were inspired. The besiegers having learned that the mill at Macelle was unprotected, and that some persons of the garrison might be surprised while grinding their corn there, sent a detachment of not less than five hundred men, to break up the mill, and apprehend a few stragglers. In this chivalrous expedition, they managed to encounter three of the Protestants, who were French refugees; two of whom they shot, and took the third prisoner. On the soldiers returning with their trophies to headquarters, it was resolved by the commandant to hang their captive, with which cruel decision the humane Juge du Pays interfered; but with this interposition the military officer was so enraged, that he threatened to hang both victim and intercessor. The prisoner's last prayer before he suffered was expressed in language so simple and touching, and so full of pious fervour, that even those who assisted at the execution could not refrain from tears. As he ascended the ladder, he addressed the judges and bystanders, expressing his readiness to die in so just a cause, and for so pure a religion as his own, while he reproved them for their hopes of being soon able to subdue and extirpate the Waldenses. Their situation, he added, was by no means so hopeless as was imagined: they had plenty of bread, corn, salt, and gunpowder; and, instead of one man who was now lost to the good cause, many would be raised up by the arm of God. Such a spirit showed that the people might be destroyed, but could not be subdued.

During the spring a desperate effort was to be made upon the Balsi, and the troops of France and Piedmont, to the number of twenty thousand, were concentrated, on the 30th of April, upon the neighbourhood of this obnoxious rock. As it was accessible only by one difficult path, formed by a torrent that ran at the foot of the precipice, it became a question who should first attempt this pass of peril, the French and the Piedmontese mutually conceding it to each other. At length the best regiment of the former, consisting of five hundred picked men, advanced, protected by the fire of their main body; while their officer, pointing to the barracks upon the summit, exclaimed, "My lads, we must sleep there to-night!" This detachment rushed on with their national vivacity, until they gained the first barricade composed of trees; and while they were vainly endeavouring to remove them, the Waldenses, at only the distance of a few yards, opened upon them such a tremendous fire, that the greater part of the assailants bit the dust; after which the besieged, bursting from their entrenchments, cut down the rest, except ten or twelve men who escaped to the main body. This sudden and singular success was obtained by the Waldenses without the loss of a man; and the besiegers, confounded at the result, fell back on Macelle and the Champ de Salsa. After taking rest for a few days, the enemy returned to the attack; and, on the evening of the 10th of May, the Balsi was completely surrounded by five encampments, so that not a man of the besieged could appear without being struck down by a shower of bullets. Nearer and nearer the besiegers carried their approaches, and the summons to surrender was repeatedly issued, while a reward of five hundred louis was offered to every man who would yield. But these tempting offers were only answered by the Waldenses with midnight sorties, in which they displayed their resolution to hold out to the last, and inflicted heavy losses upon the assailants. At length, all things being in readiness for a decisive assault, it was made on the 14th of May. The cannon of the assailants soon crumbled the feeble walls of the garrison, which were only calculated to resist musket-shot; and the Waldenses, after endeavouring to resist with fusils and stones, were driven back to their innermost entrenchments. They saw that their post was no longer tenable; and as a heavy fog had arisen at night, under which the numerous watch-fires of the enemy burned dimly, they resolved to evacuate it. This they did down a ravine full of dreadful precipices, sliding upon their backs, and holding by the branches of trees or twigs, while they groped their way in the dark with their feet, having laid aside their shoes for the purpose. On the morning, the besiegers advanced with great confidence to storm the barracks; but they were confounded to find nothing but empty huts—their victims had escaped, but how they could not conjecture. On the day previous, the French were so confident of triumph, that they had invited, by sound of trumpet, all who wished to see the end of the Waldenses to come to Pignerol on the morrow, where they would behold them hung up two by two. But instead of this regale, they could furnish nothing but the spectacle of their own encampment broken up, and the waggons filled with their wounded.

The case of the intrepid handful, notwithstanding their late escape, was still critical. They were obliged to traverse a hostile country; and even a succession of triumphs would soon have been sufficient to destroy them, although, as hitherto, they might have inflicted a loss of twenty men upon the enemy for every one of their own. But one of those interpositions of Providence occurred, by which the great Ruler of kingdoms makes even the wrath of men to praise him. Louis XIV. and Victor Amadeus II., who had hitherto been leagued together for the destruction of the Waldenses of Piedmont, suddenly became enemies, and commenced against each other a rancorous warfare; but in such a contest the dukedom of Savoy would have been an unequal match for a kingdom like France, now at the height of its prosperity and power. It was then that the gallant exiles showed to the whole world what patriotism true religion can inspire. They forgot their injuries and sufferings, and remembered only their sovereign and their country, to the defence of which they now hurried with their wonted alacrity and courage. Splendid offers, indeed, were made to them on the part of France, to win them over as auxiliaries. They were promised a safe re-establishment in their native valleys, and the free exercise of their religion, but they would not compromise their native land by accepting such a boon from a national enemy. With Arnaud at their head, they united themselves to the troops of Savoy; and the good service which they did on this occasion subdued the heart of their sovereign, as well as the arms of the foes whom they encountered. At an interview, therefore, with the leaders of the exiles, Amadeus thus affectingly addressed them:—"You have only one God and one prince; serve them faithfully. Hitherto we have been foes; henceforward we must be friends. To strangers are your misfortunes to be attributed; but if, as is your duty, you expose your lives for me, I will also expose mine for you; and as long as I have a morsel of bread, you shall have your share."

We have thus seen the return of the exiles, and their settlement in their own country, after a campaign which has no parallel in the annals of military history. Perhaps we cannot better conclude this hasty narrative than by adopting the language of Arnaud himself, in which he thus impressively sums up the chief events of the expedition:—

"Reader, your attention has been directed to events scarcely to be imagined. But, with the Vaudois, you will impute them only to the providence of God, who, to render his presence more visible, chose for his chief instrument in this wonderful struggle a man ignorant of arms or of war, excepting with Satan.

"Is it not wonderful that such a person, after escaping the pursuit of those who sought to deliver him to the flames at Constance, should have been able to effect a passage through Savoy, taking as his prisoners the nobles and gentry of the land, to be witnesses of the valour and discipline of the Vaudois? Was the victory of Salabertraun less than miraculous, where eight hundred men, most of whom had never handled a musket, routed two thousand five hundred regular troops, killing six hundred, with a loss on their side of only fifteen?

"To what other than a Divine cause can be attributed the fear which, on the approach of the Vaudois, caused the disgraceful flight of the usurpers of their possessions, and of the troops who should have protected them?

“Who but God, and God only, could have inspired a destitute handful of men with the design of re-entering their country, sword in hand, in opposition to their own prince, and to the king of France, then the terror of all Europe? And who but He could have conducted and protected them in this enterprise, and finally crowned it with success, in spite of all the vast efforts of these powers to disconcert it—in spite also of the vows and prayers of the Pope and his adherents for the glory of the Papal standard, and the destruction of this little band of the elect?

“And was it not rather Divine Providence, than the ordinary course of nature, that so preserved the grain upon the earth, that the Vaudois gathered the harvest in the depth of winter, instead of the height of summer? Thus did their Canaan, as though rejoiced to see them, present to them a supernatural gift. Is it conceivable that, without Divine aid, three hundred and sixty-seven Vaudois, confined in the Balsi for six months, existing on vegetables, water, and a scanty allowance of bread, and lodging like corpses in the earth, should regel and drive into disgraceful flight ten thousand French and twelve thousand Piedmontese? Or that, after their brilliant defence, they should escape from a second attack, when the French, enraged at the desperate opposition of a handful of men, brought executioners and mules laden with ropes, to offer up the Vaudois on gibbets as a sacrifice of thanksgiving?

“Surely it must be granted, that in all their troubles and dangers the Omnipotent delivered them, gave them victory in all their battles, supported them when they were faint-hearted, supplied them with necessaries when it appeared that they must be destitute, and finally inspired their prince with the will to reinstate them in their heritage, and suffer them to restore true devotion in their churches. Events so surprising, clearly prove that the French and Piedmontese arms were aided only by the deceitful benedictions of Rome—of her who would be God upon earth—while those of the Vaudois were blessed by the great God who is King of kings, and delegates his sceptre to no earthly hands.

“Thanks, then, be to the Eternal, who, in selecting the Vaudois as the instruments of such wonders, appears to have sanctioned their religion as that in which He would be served, honoured, and obeyed by all the redeemed. Amen.”

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The believer's cross.—If we should reckon the cross amongst the benefits flowing to believers from their union with Christ, I judge, we should not reckon amiss. Sure I am, the sufferings they suffer with him, and the assurances they have of the cross, have rather the nature of a promise, than of a threatening. The covenant of grace does truly beat the spears of affliction into pruning-hooks to them that are in Christ: Isa. xxvii. 9. “By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this is all the fruit to take away his sin.” Why then should we be angry with our cross? Why should we be frightened at it? The believer must take up his cross and follow his leader, the Lord Jesus Christ. Now that the church of God is yet militant in this lower region, how can it be, but the clouds will return after the rain! But the cross of Christ, (which name the saint trembles to bear), is a kindly name to the believer. It is a cross, indeed, but not to the believer's graces, but to his corruptions. The hypocrite's seeming graces may indeed breathe out their last on a cross, as those of the stony ground hearers did, Matt. xiii. 6. “And when the sun (of persecution) was up, they were scorched; and, because they had no root, they withered away.” But never did one of the real graces in a believer die upon the cross; nay, as the candle shines brightest in the night, and the fire burns fiercest in intense frost,—so the believer's graces are ordinarily most vigorous in a time of trouble.—REV. T. BOSTON.

Little sins.—Esteem no sin little, for the curse of God is due to the least; and the least would have condemned thee had not the Son of God died for thee. Bewail, therefore, the misery of thine own state; and as occasion is ministered, mourn for the iniquity of the time. Pray to God to amend it, and be not thou one of them that make it worse.—BAYLY. (Practice of Piety.)

The blessedness of the saints in heaven.—The body falls asleep, and rests safely till the morning of the resurrection. The soul in a moment enters into the joy of its Lord, a joy like his—pure and holy—a fulness of joy—every sense has its proper object—enjoys it—and is satisfied for ever. Oh! what will the heart feel in this blessedness! What acknowledgments will it make to God and the Lamb! To praise him for the wonders of his grace, in bringing to that glory, will be the happy enjoyment of eternity. To see him as he is in his divine majesty, is heaven. For how great communications of his love the being ever with him, and ever like him, will make the soul capable of, we cannot perfectly conceive. These things are at present too high and heavenly for our thoughts. These are happy moments, when we are permitted to behold the King in his beauty, when he discovers his matchless loveliness, and gives us a taste of the heavenly feast. At such blessed seasons the soul is bowed down and humbled to the dust, adoring the infinite mercy and goodness of God. If there be so much of heaven in these manifestations of divine love, what must the full enjoyment be!—REV. W. ROMAINE.

The characteristics of a Christian.—A prayerless spirit is not the spirit of Christ. Prayer to a Christian is as necessary as food to a natural man. The usual way of going to heaven is through much tribulation; the sinner who is drawn to Christ is not he that has learnt that he is a sinner by head knowledge, but that feels himself such by heart contrition. He that believeth hath an unction from the Holy One; a true Christian is as vitally united to Christ as my hand or foot to my body, consequently suffers and rejoices with him. Where there is true faith, there will be obedience and the fear of God; he that lives by the faith of the Son of God, eateth his flesh and drinketh his blood. He that hath the Son hath life, he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. Christians are sealed by the Holy Ghost to the day of redemption; and to this seal they trust their eternal welfare, not to naked knowledge, or speculative notions, though ever so deep.—REV. J. HART.

TYRE IN ANCIENT AND IN MODERN TIMES.

FROM “Travels in Palestine and Syria,” by George Robinson, Esq., we extract the following account of Ancient and Modern Tyre:—

The ancient city of Tyre, the most celebrated of the cities of Phœnicia, and once the emporium of the world, was founded by a colony of Sidonians. It was conprised in the district allotted to the tribe of Asher, though never completely subdued by the Israelites. It was early celebrated for its pre-eminence in the arts and sciences, in commerce and in navigation. The vast power of the Tyrians upon the Mediterranean Sea, and even upon the Ocean, are sufficiently well known. Amongst the numerous colonies which it sent out to distant regions, thus extending the benefits of civilization to countries which were then considered as the most remote of the habitable globe, Carthage and Cadiz stand foremost in historical interest. The former was the enemy and rival of Rome. From the latter, an expedition went out and discovered a new world!

Many important settlements on the coast of Arabia, and even on the Indian Ocean, have a similar origin. Its total destruction, which had been foretold by the prophets with extreme minuteness, was effected by the Assyrians under Nebuchadnezzar (573 a. c.), after thirteen years' siege, one of the longest recorded in history. At the time of the delivery of the prophecy, a century before its fulfilment, the latter were an inconsiderable people, whilst the former were at the height of opulence and power. The reason assigned for the judgments that were to overtake them were, their "pride and wickedness, their exultation over the calamities of the Israelites, and their cruelty in selling them to slavery." That part of the prophecy which related to its reconstruction (one hundred and seventy years afterwards), but definite fall, was fulfilled by the settling of the inhabitants on the adjacent island, distant about half a mile from the shore to the westward, whilst the ancient or continental city remains to this day buried in the sand. "Thou shalt be built no more; though thou shalt be sought for, yet thou shalt never be found again." Ezek. xxvi. 4, 12, 21.

The fall of Insular Tyre has been no less remarkable. Alexander the Great had already made himself master of the whole of Syria, and a part of Phœnicia, whilst Tyre (the insular town) still offered an obstinate resistance to his victorious arms. Irritated by several unsuccessful attempts to storm it by sea, he conceived the bold design of filling up the channel which separated it from the continent. This was effected by sinking piles into the sea, and throwing into the intervening space immense blocks of stone. The ruins of the ancient city afforded ready materials for the purpose. The whole was covered with sand.* On this artificial mole he erected his battering-rams, and other instruments of war known in those times. But even here success did not immediately follow the enterprise. It was only after seven months' close siege, that the inhabitants, attacked simultaneously by sea and by land, and the town being set on fire, surrendered to the Macedonian chief.† It recovered its commercial importance, and was a flourishing city under the successors of Alexander; nor did it cease with the Roman conquest. The Emperor Hadrian repaired the fortifications, and made it the metropolis of a province, giving it all the advantages of a Roman colony. From the dominion of Rome it subsequently fell into the hands of the Saracens, about A. D. 639, who remained a long while in possession of it. It was taken by the Crusaders in 1124, after five months' siege, who were forced to surrender it in their turn to the Mamelukes of Egypt in 1289.

The destruction of the city, which followed the capture, that they might no longer harbour the Christians, induced the people to emigrate to Acre. It still remains nearly in the state in which they abandoned it, with the addition of about a hundred new stone dwellings, occupying a small space to the north of the peninsula, contiguous to the port. The latter is a small circular basin, now quite filled up with sand and broken shafts of columns, leaving scarcely space for two small boats to enter. At the entrance stood two towers, with, probably, a chain drawn across. The few fishing-boats belonging to the place are sheltered by some rocks to the westward of the island. On seeing their nets hanging out to dry, I was forcibly struck by the sad fulfilment of that part of the prophecy concerning the place which says, "I will make her like the top of a rock; it shall be a place for spreading of nets in the midst of the sea." Ezek. xxvi. 5.

* "They shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust in the midst of the water; and I will also scrape her dust from her." Ezek. xxvi. 4, 12, 21.

† 332 a. c. This circumstance was foretold. "Tyre did build herself a stronghold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold, the Lord will cast her out, and he will unite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire." Zech. ix. 2, 4.

Many parts of the double wall which encompassed the island are still visible, and attest the strength of its ancient fortifications. There was only one gate which opened out upon the isthmus; this side was protected by a triple wall. The isthmus is so completely covered with sand, washed up by the sea on either side, that none but those acquainted with the history of Tyre would suppose it to be the work of man. The peninsula is about a mile long, and half a mile broad. Its surface is covered with the foundations of buildings now nearly all in ruins. On the western side, where the ground is somewhat more elevated than the rest, is the modern citadel, probably occupying the site of the ancient one.

On the eastern side are the remains of a church, of Gothic architecture. As the early Christians were in the habit of converting heathen temples to the worship of the true God, by way of reparation, this may probably be built upon the site, and with the materials of the temple of Jupiter Olympus, which was destroyed by Constantine the Great, or that of Hercules, particularly honoured by the Tyrians. The interior is divided into three aisles, separated by rows of granite columns. At the extremities of the two branches of the cross were two towers, the ascent to which was by a spiral staircase, which still remains entire. This was, no doubt, the cathedral of which Eusebius speaks, calling it the most magnificent temple in Phœnicia, and of which Gulielmus of Tyre was the first archbishop. The see was dependent upon the Patriarch of Antioch, but had under it fourteen suffragan bishoprics. Here was interred Frederick the First, surnamed Barbarossa, who died in the year 1190. Tyre was the birth-place and residence of many persons celebrated in history.

Hiram, one of its kings, was the friend of David and Solomon. He contributed to the construction of the great temple, by sending timber (from Mount Lebanon), gold, and workmen. It is probable that, out of gratitude for these services, Solomon repaired the cisterns and aqueduct of Tyre, which now bear his name. Several councils and synods were held here; the most important was that which condemned the heresies of Athanasius. The place is now known to the natives by its ancient Hebrew name of Tsar (corrupted by the Greeks into Tyrus, and by the Romans into Serra), though ignorant of the classic ground on which it stands. I was so annoyed by their crowding round me wherever I went, and by their refusal to accommodate me with any thing like a decent lodging, that I left the place abruptly. The cause of this inhospitality, no doubt, arose from suspicion as to my real character, having been seen taking notes whilst visiting the ruins.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACRAE & Co., 12, Glasgow Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMSBIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—Why did our Lord teach in Parables? By the Editor. Part I., ..... Page 673 2.—Sacred Poetry. "The Trinity in Unity." By Barton, .. 675 3.—Biographical Notice of Miss E— B—, late Scholar in the Sabbath Evening School, P— T—, W—, .... 6. 4.—History of the Abbigeness. Period I., ..... 677	5.—Sacred Poetry. "Mount Calvary." By Cunningham, Page 681 6.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Mathew Kirkland, ..... 68. 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Bennet, Harvey, Howels, Martyn, Bayly, Howe, Waugh, Bradley, and Ambrose Serle, Esq., ..... 685 8.—On the Unity of God. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D., 687
---	--

WHY DID OUR LORD TEACH IN PARABLES?

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

A PARABLE is a figure taken from natural objects to instruct us in the knowledge of things spiritual. Such a mode of instruction has been always prevalent in rude ages and nations, and its origin is, therefore, probably to be sought in those general habits of mind to which the peculiar circumstances of uncivilized life have given rise. But in investigating the reasons on which our blessed Lord founded his preference of parables, as the means of imparting spiritual information, we must obviously consider not only the general condition of mind to which such figures are adapted, but also the peculiar circumstances in which they were employed. Such, therefore, is the plan of the present article.

In impressing upon the great body of mankind any grand moral truth, or in urging them to a holy walk and conversation, we must never lose sight of the great springs of human conduct,—those general laws by which our thoughts and actions are uniformly regulated. When an important moral doctrine, for example, is stated and applied, if addressed only to the understanding of ordinary men, it will fail to actuate their lives. The whole system of Christianity, indeed, seems admirably adapted to overcome our hostility to speculative reasoning, by embodying the attributes of Deity in varied and impressive scenes of interesting action. The love of God, for instance,—that principle so consoling to guilty man,—adorns every page of the inspired volume; and what principle can more certainly elicit the tenderest affections of the human soul? But when this glorious feature of the Divine character is portrayed in such a beautifully glowing scene as that of the prodigal son,—when God is represented as an affectionate parent beholding from afar his penitent child,—running eagerly to meet him, falling on his neck and embracing him, it speaks to the heart, and even to the understanding, with a power which the most forcible statements or the most cogent reasonings would in vain attempt to equal. That simple yet touching tale, has a beauty that no paraphrase can heighten, a perspicuity that renders all interpretation needless, and a force which every reader not totally insensible must feel.

There is no disadvantage which more obviously presents itself as arising from abstract reasoning, than the vague and undefined influence which it exercises even over intelligent minds. How often does it happen, that understandings, the most exalted, rest in vague speculations, and take no trouble in reducing them to practice. The innumerable cases in which the principle is applicable, seem to operate as preventives to its application in any. By parabolic instruction, however, this disadvantage is obviated. The teacher exhibits the truth to be illustrated as operating in one case, and that commonly an extreme one; and thus while we are taught the great extent to which the principle may go, we are also furnished with an interesting example of its operation. These remarks might be illustrated by a reference to the parable of the good Samaritan.

In addition to the strong aversion which prevails in ordinary minds to abstract reasoning, there is also a natural deep-rooted hostility to the great subject, for the illustration of which these parables were delivered. That the carnal mind is enmity against God, is a position which it requires no great extent of observation or experience to prove. Unless this mind, naturally alienated from God, becomes the subject of a spiritual change, we witness the melancholy spectacle of a human being growing up from youth to manhood, and, it may be, from manhood to age, without God, and therefore without hope in the world. Amid the countless host of thoughts and feelings which compose the history of that man's mind, not one can be selected which has for its immediate object the Being who created him, the character he holds in the view of the great Searcher of hearts, or the grand realities of an eternal world. By what avenue shall you gain access to that man's heart?

Should you, by abstract reasoning alone, attempt to convince him of the error of his way, it is much to be feared your attempt would be fruitless; for this simple reason, that the vanities of the world have already pre-occupied his mind and usurped the supremacy of his heart. The subject to which you now solicit his attention, is one which, besides requiring, on his part, an exertion of mind to which he has been hitherto a stranger, is itself in opposition to all his usual associations in thought and feeling. The most successful way, therefore, to arouse him from his spiritual slumber, is to steal in upon the ordinary habitudes of his mind, by introducing religion in close connection with the objects which commonly engross his attention. This was the mode adopted by our Lord. He clothed the most abstract notions in language so strictly connected with the ordinary occurrences of life as to attract the attention of his hearers, to overcome the hostility of their hearts, and to give the subject a share in the operation of their common laws of thought. To have presented the doctrines of religion in a sudden and obtrusive form, would be to have secured their instant rejection. Our Lord, however, addresses his hearers in a simple and often pathetic story, which, beautifully arranged in all its parts, calls forth some of the tenderest sympathies of their souls. Under this captivating narration is couched some important doctrine, in favour of which, however revolting it would have been if abstractedly stated, the best feelings of their hearts are now engaged. Or, perhaps, the scope and design of the parable is intended to enforce some important branch of duty, which, from the skilful invention and arrangement of the history, comes in for a share in the interest which the awakened sensibilities impart. Thus, in either case, the hearers quitted the scene of instruction, not only in possession of an important moral truth, but with their sensibilities excited in favour of that truth. In many cases, no doubt, the hearers would perceive the necessity of the duty recommended, by beholding in the allegorical picture the shocking appearance which a human being presents when destitute of its power. This is finely instanced in the parables of the good Samaritan and the rich fool. In the latter narrative, especially, how affecting the contrast which would be suggested to the hearers between the imaginary happiness of the vain worldling and his appalling agony of mind as he heard Heaven's awful mandate: "This night thy soul shall be required of thee." By what arguments, even the most conclusive, could we more strikingly enforce the folly and the fatal tendency of immoderate attachment to the world?

Having thus briefly traced the suitability of parabolic instruction to mankind in general, we shall now proceed to consider the circumstances in which it was employed by our Lord.

It has been often remarked, that under Eastern climes the imaginative greatly preponderates over the reasoning powers. Their poetry is so richly luxuriant, and even their ordinary language is so highly figurative, as to place the truth of this observation beyond all doubt. Hence, in conveying intellectual, but especially moral instruction, fables and allegorical descriptions are in these countries almost universally employed. To whatever cause this peculiarity of mind may be traced, it affords an additional reason why our Lord taught in parables. He well knew that moral principles and precepts, if plainly and abstractedly stated in language destitute of imagery, would neither be listened to nor understood. The minds of the people were so accustomed to be addressed through the medium of the fancy, that a train of dry argumentative reasoning could have exercised no possible influence over them. Our blessed Lord, therefore, when he wished to impress upon his hearers salutary doctrines and duties, did so by means of allegorical paintings presented to their imaginations, which both enlightened their understandings and captivated their hearts.

The parables, too, often refer to subjects, manners, and customs with which the audience was familiar. There seems to originate in the extreme selfishness of our nature, an overweening attachment to the manners of our country. We listen with far more than patient attention to a glowing description of, or even a distant allusion to, the characteristic features of the land we proudly call our own. We, in some measure, identify ourselves in fame with all ranks of the community, and put ourselves in for a share in the praise or the blame, feeling proud of the one or indignant at the other, which may be cast upon any individual as exhibiting the general characteristics of our countrymen. While a Jew, for instance, listened to a faithful and picturesque description of a marriage ceremonial, in the interesting parable of the ten virgins, he would, on the above-mentioned principle, be the more readily benefited by the all-important truths it was adduced to convey. In the highly fertile land of Judea, too, we can easily conceive with what interest multitudes would listen to the parable of the sower; and the solemn warning with which our Lord closes the narrative: "Take heed how ye hear," would be the more deeply impressed upon their minds, as connected with the every-day occupation of their lives. From the laws which uniformly regulate the succession of our thoughts, such maxims would frequently be recalled, and at length, through the Divine blessing, operate a renovating change upon their hearts.

The state of the Jewish nation at the advent of the Messiah, displays still more strikingly the advantage of parabolic instruction. They were so rude and uncultivated; to such a degree had they lost sight of the spirituality of the moral, and the great end of the ceremonial law, that simple external signs were absolutely necessary to convey any religious ideas to their minds. At this period, the great mass of the Jewish people trusted to their sacrifices and external offerings for the pardon of sin, thus substituting the letter for the spirit, having the form of godliness but destitute of its power. To what people, then, could parables be more appropriately addressed than to the Jews? While they were accustomed to think of religion as consisting merely of external ceremonies, and were only employed in tithing mint, and anise, and cummin, parabolic instruction was the simplest and easiest mode of leading their minds away from such a false view of Divine truth to the spiritual perception of it. Their ceremonies were originally intended to point their thoughts to a higher and nobler dispensation. In the numerous observances of their ritual, were typically displayed all the grand abstractions of the spiritual system. When our Lord, therefore, appeared on earth to introduce a new dispensation, there was a beautiful propriety in his adopting a mode of teaching, which combined somewhat of the material nature of the old with the spirituality of the new scheme. Under a plain and possible story, finely wrought in all its details, he revealed some sublime doctrine, or enforced some necessary duty; and many, no doubt, who listened with interest, would remember with advantage the doctrine in the one case and the duty in the other, long after the narratives themselves were forgotten.

THE TRINITY IN UNITY.

Give glory unto God on high !
To Him who arch'd the vaulted sky ;
Who mighty Earth's circumference spann'd,
And weigh'd its waters in his hand ;
Who form'd the countless orbs that gem
Dark night's resplendent diadem ;
Gave life unto each living thing ;
Created man their earthly king ;
Then gave his Son for man to die —
Give glory unto God on high !

Give glory to the Son, who came Cloth'd in our fleshy, mortal frame ;
Who bore our sins, vouchsaf'd to give Himself to die, that we might live :
Who—holy, harmless, undefiled,
Was patient—spurn'd ; was dumb—revil'd,
Who, in the agonies of death,
Pour'd for his foes his parting breath ;
Was perfect God and man in one :—
Give glory to the Incarnate Son !

Give glory to the Holy Ghost !
Who, on the day of Pentecost,
From heaven to earth in mercy came,
Descending as in tongues of flame ;
The promis'd Comforter and Guide,
Through whom the soul is sanctified,
Who still is manifest within
To prompt to good, convict of sin :—
Ye saints on earth, ye heavenly host,
Give glory to the Holy Ghost !

Join all on earth, in heaven above,
In honour, blessing, glory, love !
Sing praises to the great I AM ;
Sing praises to the spotless Lamb ;
Sing praises to thine Power Divine,
Who sanctifies the inner shrine ;
That so the Father's glorious name
All creatures hallow'd may proclaim,
And, through the Spirit shed abroad,
Confess that Jesus Christ is Lord !

Though Reason gives not finite man
Divine infinitude to scan,
Yet man may his Creator own—
May bow before a Saviour's throne
The Comforter with awe receive—
Their true Divinity believe ;
And while he chants the Father's love,
Who sends the Spirit from above
To win dominion for the Son—
With joy confess that GOD IS ONE !

BARTON.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF MISS E—— B——

LATE SCHOLAR IN THE SABBATH EVENING SCHOOL, F—— T——, W——.

As God, in the natural world, has "never left himself without a witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness;" so, in the Church, which his right hand hath planted, he has never failed to produce lively tokens of his sovereign grace, and glorious trophies of redeeming mercy. These monuments of Divine love are in general few, when compared with the numerous votaries of Satan who crowd the visible sanctuary. They are like the gleanings of the grapes after the vintage—"as the shaking of an olive-tree—two or three berries in the top of the uttermost bough, four or five in the outmost fruitful branches thereof." But we rejoice to know that there are times when Zion shall appear clothed with all the exuberance of millennial glory—when "the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters."

These testimonies of the Creator's compassion, and fruits of the Redeemer's toils, are collected from the various tribes of the earth, and the different denominations of men. Jehovah, infinitely exalted by nature and essence above the human race, strikes out a path for himself in the gathering in of his sons and his daughters. He is not dazzled by the majesty of the palace, the grandeur of the court, or the gorgeous retinue of the prince. He is not drawn by the precious treasure, by the rubies, the fine gold, or the choice silver. The man of profound erudition and extensive acquisitions does not charm Him, nor does the most accomplished artist attract Him. Moving on his path of grace with sovereign sway, He enters the princely habitation, the stately dwelling, or the humble cottage. He takes the young or the old as he pleases, and having stamped the Divine image upon the soul, He, in due time, carries the spirit in triumph to everlasting habitations.

The subject of the following Sketch was taken away in early life. Soon was the silver cord cut, and the golden bowl broken. Eleven years had only performed their revolutions during her limited pilgrimage, yet within this span of human existence she gave proofs of possessing a knowledge, a Christian experience, and a resignation to the will of God, seldom evinced by those who arrive at the advanced age of threescore and ten, or fourscore years.

Miss E—— was, from the days of infancy, a lively and an interesting child. Having an engaging deportment and amiable disposition, she soon became a great favourite in the family and in the school. Possessing a quick apprehension and a retentive memory, her mind in a short time became the receptacle of a fund of knowledge rarely to be found in one of her years. In the Sabbath school she soon distinguished herself by her extensive knowledge of the Word of God, and a surprising facility in quoting texts of Scripture applicable to the subject under consideration. Stranding sometimes in an attitude of seeming carelessness, as if unmindful of what was doing, she at the same time showed that she possessed all the vigilance of a faithful sentinel, and allowed no opportunity to pass without showing the deep interest she took in the duties of the evening. But all these favourable symptoms and encouraging anticipations of future promise came short of the marks of Divine grace upon the heart. This young person, as she afterwards declared, was at this period a stranger to the power of the truth upon the soul, and an alien to the teaching of the Holy Spirit. She appeared one of the most hopeful in the school, yet ignorant of the first principles of the oracles of God; and this stage of her history points out to parents the great danger of taking exemplary behaviour, a deep interest in the duties of the Sabbath-school, earnest application, an ardent thirsting after Bible knowledge, and extensive information, as sure tests of the work of the Spirit upon the hearts of their children. The first time that the friends of this young person were especially directed to the opening of her mind, as to the condition of her soul, took place after the superintendent of the Sabbath school had visited her the first time during her distress, which terminated in death. He had been speaking to her about Christ "carrying the lambs in his arms;" and after he went away, she said to her mother, to whom she was most devotedly attached, "Dear mother, how delightful it would be if Jesus would make me one of his lambs, and take me in his bosom!" Soon after this she was seized with the tokens and accompaniments of awakening grace. Deep convictions of guilt took hold of the conscience; her imaginary goodness vanished; her mispent time rose up against her—the valuable privileges she had despised, and especially the greatness of her sin in having heard much about a Saviour whom she had heedlessly disregarded. It pleased the Lord, however, in due time, to dispel the darkness and enlighten her soul. To this happy change of mind she made a feeling allusion in the following terms:—"How good God was to me in first showing me my sins, and very soon after making me to experience the beauty of Christ's righteousness, and the great happiness of trusting in him!" She frequently dwelt with rapturous delight on the perfection of the Redeemer's righteousness; on the glory of heaven, because Jesus was there, and the happiness she would experience in always beholding him. But this happy strain was not without its alloy. The joy of the righteous, in this vale of tears, is not without its interruptions. The truth will be verified in the experience of the young and the old, that "we must through much tribulation enter the kingdom of God." This youthful sufferer was very early brought into the furnace. And at this period she was labouring under great bodily pain; disease pressed heavily upon the mortal part; yet, amidst the pangs of a dissolving earthly tabernacle, there was a keener anguish struggling within her breast. She was not a stranger to "the fiery darts of the wicked one." Temptation assailed her, and thick clouds surrounded her path; her transient beams of light and joy vanished like a passing glimpse of the sun, and in her darkness and despondency she was led to think that she was lost and undone. But the Lord was watching over his young disciple, and protecting her in the wilderness. The aid of his grace was at hand, and the leadings of his Spirit were near. Light burst forth on her mind in the midst of her pangs of sorrow; and it appears that the heart became too full to contain its joy, for she awoke her mother from sleep, and said that now she felt very happy that the following words came home to her mind with power: "A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench." She also expressed her strong conviction, that He who had begun the good work in her soul would finish it in due time.

During her distress she frequently dwelt on the way in which she had mispent her time,—on the manner in which she had trifled away her privileges in the Sabbath school; and declared, that if it pleased God to restore her to health, she would now act a very different part. "I thought," said she, "when I could answer Mr M—the questions he asked me, that I understood their meaning, but God has taught me that I understood the true meaning of nothing until he himself made me to understand it by his Spirit; but it is good to have passages of Scripture by heart, for they now come to my mind, and I feel very happy." As the disease advanced, the fruits of the Holy Spirit became more discernible; divine grace had taken possession of her soul, and her whole character bore the impress of a child on whom God had stamped the image of his Son. The body was reduced to a mere skeleton, and this skeleton racked with pain; yet there was a heavenly serenity settled on her countenance, which seemed to bid defiance to the ruthless hand of the destroyer. There was a placid look and a benign composure which bespoke a child destined for exalted enjoyment. There was a child-like attachment evinced to her exalted King, which showed that she considered herself in the arms of an affectionate Father, who neither afflicts willingly nor grieves the children of men in vain. Her resignation to the Divine will was not that of a person who wished to make the most he could of a bad case, or of some trying dispensation which could not be avoided; she showed, by her patience and docility of mind, that it was her earnest desire to be made a willing subject in the day of God's power. She appears to have made, in Divine strength, a thorough dedication of herself to her Saviour, and to have followed in the path of him who was enabled to say, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." With regard to her earthly prospects, she said, if it would please God to give her health and strength, she would like to go out and teach the children of the heathen, and tell them about Christ. Her views relative to her departure from this world were still more instructive; for when, on being asked by one of her friends how she felt as to her bodily pains, she replied, "Rather poorly; but I feel His blessed presence with me. I could close my eyes this moment, I feel so happy, and leave you all without shedding a tear, and go to glory." On being asked how she could part with her mother, to whom she was exceedingly attached, she answered, "Oh!

but I expect to meet dear mother there; and I hope we will all, as a family, strive to meet in heaven. How blessed a thing would it be if all our afflictions were sanctified, if we should all meet in glory at last; we would then see that we have been afflicted for our good." She frequently exhorted and admonished her youngest sister in a very serious and affecting manner; dwelling upon the extent and abundance of her privileges,—earnestly beseeching her to seek the Lord,—urging her to seek his glory; requesting her to be obedient to her mother; and concluding, on one occasion, by saying, "For if you do not, your mother, or I, or your dearest, dearest friend on earth, must acknowledge your sentence to be just, when the righteous Judge will say at the last day, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.'"

During her distress she often said to her mother, "I hope you would not grudge to part with me; you know we may soon meet again." On the last Sabbath but one she spent on earth, she derived much comfort from the following words: "They shall mount up with wings, as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint." At this period her strength was very much reduced, and her feeble frame exhausted,—acute pain was raging through her shattered tabernacle; yet, in the midst of this trying ordeal, she was enabled "in patience to possess her soul." Her ardent desire was, to wait upon the Lord in the furnace of affliction, and to receive with meekness the rod of discipline as well as the consolation of his Spirit. She frequently said, "How good God has been to me since I have been laid on this bed, I am unable to express his loving kindness. I have had more happiness since I lay here than ever I had all my life at play or at school." In her extremity she often said that she prayed that the Lord would either remove the pain or give her patience under it; and she was frequently known to add, "He has done both." The superintendent of the Sabbath school called upon her on the evening of the Lord's day before her death (two days before she died). She was so fatigued, and the body so heavily borne down, that she could not see him; but said, "I have always had great pleasure in Mr M——'s visits, shall I send a message to him?—or will he think me impudent?" "Oh! no," said one of her friends. "Well then, say I am so very weak I cannot see him just now; but say, I am very comfortable and happy in my mind, and if it be His blessed will to call me, it will be to heaven I will ascend." This she said with great composure and emphasis. Next morning she laboured under great pain, and one of her friends remarked that she was very ill, and suffered much. Her reply was, "Ah! yes; but what is it to what Christ suffered for us? and we are guilty sinners, it is no wonder that we are made to suffer,—when we think of Him who was holy and without spot suffering so much, this is the wonder." Among the many passages on which her mind rested, and from which she derived consolation, the following held a prominent place: "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." She dwelt on these memorable words as an impregnable fortress; and they proved to be so in her case to the very last; for on Tuesday morning, about one o'clock, with a countenance beaming with heavenly joy, with a heart glowing with love to her glorious Redeemer, and with the accents of "Mercy! mercy! mercy!" flowing from her lips, her soul departed to the eternal world.

Reader, what have you discerned in the foregoing Sketch to attract your attention, or engage your thoughts? Have you beheld the traces of eternal love to man, and the working of the Spirit of the Lord upon the human heart? Have you seen Christ training up one of his flock, and beheld one of his lambs stedfastly following him through the wilderness? Have you seen a young disciple reposing on the finished work of Christ, admiring his righteousness, and zealous for the promotion of his honour? And have you an ardent desire to be quickened by the same Spirit, and supported by the same grace? Are you young, attending a Sabbath school, careful in preparing your tasks, attentive to the duties of the evening, and distinguished by an exemplary deportment? More than even this is required; for you cannot be taught savingly without the aid of the great Teacher sent from God,—without the operations of the Sanctifier, and the wisdom which cometh from above. Have you lived to an advanced period of human existence, and have you seen the middle-aged, the man of full vigour, the youth, and the child, cut down? and will your experience in the spiritual warfare stand a comparison with that which was manifested in the history of this young disciple? Have the children of Zion been issued into this world, converted, purified, refined, and carried to glory, during your pilgrimage, and are you still standing an unmoved spectator, a cumberer of the ground, unfruitful and unproductive? Is it profitable, safe, or grateful in you, to have received such a long continuance of privilege and forbearance, and still to persevere in treasuring up condemnation against the day of wrath? Be persuaded to see to Him who possesses the fountain of life, and who is willing to give your soul "living water" from the refreshing stream. Ah! remember that one hour's heavenly composure upon a death-bed will far outweigh ten thousand spent among the most intoxicating delights this world can afford,—and such a boon the Redeemer is able and willing to bestow. "He will swallow up Death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces."

HISTORY OF THE ALBIGENSES.

PERIOD I.

TO THE DEATH OF RAYMOND ROGER OF BEZIERS.

Who, and what were the Albigenses? They were a people who lived in the darkest and most ignorant periods of the middle ages—who were hated and despised by the multitude, as well as by the learned and the powerful—who suffered years of persecution, which ended in all but a total extermination. Kings and rulers drew the sword against them; inquisitors carefully destroyed the records of their belief, as abominations unworthy to see the light; and after the work of destruction and dispersion had been finished, the persecutors coolly sat down to write a history of their victims. And could such a history be expected to be free from obscurity and misrepresentation? The character of the Albigenses has, therefore, descended to the present day laden with falsehood and reproach. And firstly, as to their origin, we have been told that they were a set of heretics, who were never heard of in the world before the days of Peter Waldo, in the twelfth century. As to their faith, we are told that they were Manichees, who worshipped God and the Devil in the same breath; that they denied the resurrection of the body, and believed that the souls of men were demons incarcerated in human forms, to do penance for their sins. And as to their moral practice, we are gravely told that they were a flagitious people, hating marriage, and living in promiscuous concubinage; and also that they were sour ascetics, who mortified their bodies by severe abstinences, and led a life of rigid and ridiculous continence. A very short examination is sufficient to show the absurdity of some of these charges, and the impossibility of others. According to the Romish ecclesiastics of the middle ages, all Christians were Manichees who denied the authority of the Pope, and all marriage was fornication which had not been celebrated according to the Romish ritual. As to the other aspersions which have been adduced against the creed and character of the Albigenses, they are easily answered. The Inquisitors, who did their utmost to annihilate the very memory of this unfortunate people, were unable wholly to extinguish that light which shone in darkness, although the darkness comprehended it not; and from the laborious investigations of a profound and pious writer,* who has produced an array of evidence which malice itself cannot contravert, we find that in the dioceses of Narbonne and Aquitaine, there had been continued from the apostolic ages a systematic hostility to the growing errors of Rome—that these protests embodied the great leading principles of the apostolic faith—that they were the same as those for which the Waldenses of Piedmont were persecuted—that, in short, they were the Protestant faith itself, which had smouldered through ages of darkness and death, until the Divine breath should raise it into a glorious flame, when the season of light and life to the world had fully revolved.

Until the beginning of the twelfth century, the dioceses of Narbonne and Aquitaine had remained independent of that Papal authority which was arrogantly claimed over Christendom at large. This, however, was an anomaly which Rome was not likely to tolerate; and the spiritual Cæsars of the seven-hilled city, after reducing the rest of France to vassalage, resolved that the two recusant provinces should not check their career. The pontiffs, favoured by the weakness of the French kings, had hitherto encroached step by step upon the spiritual liberties of the Gallican Church; and after their legates had been admitted into other dioceses, to control the ecclesiastical councils at pleasure, they resolved to inflict the same despotism upon those that had hitherto resisted. Narbonne was chiefly selected for the experiment, and thither Innocent III. sent Guy and Regnier, in the year 1193, with full powers to discover and punish all who impugned the supremacy of Rome. Trial, indeed, had been made since the beginning of this century of what persecution could accomplish; and the Albigenses had been subjected to fine and banishment, but in vain, so that the new inquisitors were obliged to have recourse to more decisive measures. Accordingly, by their preaching, they gathered a formidable armed force; and proceeded upon their crusade through the province. Where they found the heretics too powerful, they were obliged to content themselves with disputation, and for this purpose they were attended by a throng of friars; but in places where they were superior, they unsheathed the sword, and used its edge with unsparring severity. So far, however, from extinguishing these opinions, violence only scattered them abroad, so that several provinces on both sides of the Loire were pervaded with refugees, who made converts wherever they came. The persecutors multiplied their forces, and increased their severities; but these only seemed to call forth a stronger spirit of endurance on the part of the oppressed. At length a new manœuvre was tried, by which heresy was to be crushed at a blow. The Papal party gave out that they willed not the death of sinners, but would rather reclaim them by gentle argument; and, relying on these assurances, the Albigenses repaired to the neighbourhood of Carissonne, in 1206, to hold an impartial disputation with the challengers, based on the authority of Scripture. But in the midst of the debate, they were surrounded by the soldiery, and an immense number were treacherously put to the sword. That Providence, however, which tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, had not permitted such a storm of persecution to burst upon his people without a remedy; and, under their afflictions, they were enabled more fully to learn the nature of the cause for which they suffered, and the glory with which it would be crowned. These were the days of the illustrious Peter Waldo—a bright star upon the brow of midnight. This man, who has been erroneously represented by Popish writers as the founder of the Waldenses and Albigenses, had attached himself to their doctrines about the year 1160. Having been enabled, in the course of his wide experience and connections as a wealthy merchant of Lyons, to perceive the errors which every where disfigured the Romish Church, he saw that, to restore the faith to its ancient purity, its sacred standard the Bible, now almost a sealed book, from being confined to a dead language, must be opened to universal perusal. He accordingly procured large portions of it to be translated into the French language, and circulated among the people; and, in addition to this, he maintained missionaries at his own expense, who preached and expounded the principles of the Gospel. In this manner, the Word of God was provided for the persecuted at a season when it was most required. The consequences of this interference on the part of Waldo may be easily surmised. His books and translations were cursed and excommunicated; he was himself soon visited with the same anathemas; and so fierce was the opposition, that he was obliged to flee from Lyons, and take refuge in Bohemia, where he entered into the rest of the righteous, after twenty years of laborious, self-denying apostleship.

The persecutions we have already mentioned were but the beginning of sorrows. In consequence of the labours of Waldo and his missionaries, the doctrines of the Albigenses had been so widely disseminated, that nearly the whole province of Languedoc was devoted to them; and to add to the strength of the party, Raymond VI., Count of Toulouse, offered them protection and favour—in consequence of which the county became a place of refuge for the oppressed. Against him, therefore, Innocent III. turned the full brunt of his wrath; and Peter of Castelnau, a fierce inquisitor, whose hands were already dyed with the blood of the Albigenses; was sent as legate to Raymond, commanding him to drive the heretics from his territories, and join a league which had been formed for their extirpation. But Raymond refused to depopulate his provinces by the banishment of so large a portion of his subjects, or to permit the ingress of a hostile army to destroy them, upon which Castelnau, in obedience to the Papal instructions, excommunicated the Count, and laid an interdict upon his territories. Thus the fair county of Toulouse was thrown forth, like a waif upon the political common, to be the prize of the first who could win it; and as if this had not been enough, the Pope transmitted a tremendous missive in May 1207, in which, among other threats, the Count was addressed in the following terms:—"Pestilent man, what arrogance has filled your heart, and of what folly are you guilty, to refuse peace with your neighbours, and brave the Divine laws, by protecting the enemies of the faith? If you do not fear eternal flames, does it not behove you to dread the temporal punishments which you have merited by so many crimes?" This, indeed, was arrogant language from a priest to an independent sovereign within his own territories; but this was nothing compared with the style which the same Innocent III. adopted towards Richard I. of England. He declared that no man ought to hold any authority who did not reverence the Holy See; and he told this lion-hearted monarch, that if he dared to show symptoms of rebelliousness, he would soon teach him, by a sore punishment, how hard it was to kick against the pricks; adding, that he would not endure the least contempt, either towards himself, or towards God, whose place he held upon earth, but would punish all defaulters, whether kings or people, in a sovereign fashion.* If the bravest and greatest of crusading kings and warriors quailed beneath this thunder, it was no wonder if the Count of Toulouse trembled and obeyed. Castelnau was admitted into the province, to exercise his inquisitorial functions; but he soon found that Raymond would not heartily co-operate in the work of persecution; upon which he reproached the Count for lack of zeal, and excommunicated him once more. After this, an event occurred, which was not to be wondered at, considering the character of the times. An adherent of Raymond entered into a fierce debate with the legate, in the neighbourhood of the Rhone, touching the nature of heresy, and its punishment. The discussion warmed; and the layman was so incensed by the language of his opponent, that he silenced him with a stroke of his dagger, and immediately fled from the country.

* Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the Ancient Churches of the Albigenses. By Peter Allix, D.D. Oxford, 1681.

The Church of Rome, which had so adroitly improved the assassination of Becket, for its own interests, had now a similar opportunity, and eagerly secured it. A bull was forthwith published, in which Raymond was declared to be the chief minister of Satan, who, at the instigation of his master, had assassinated a legate of the Holy See; and that, "as no faith was to be observed towards those who kept no faith with God," therefore all his subjects were absolved from their allegiance, and every man who pleased might pursue him, and seize upon his territories. The Count, alarmed at his own danger, as well as that of his subjects, repaired with his nephew, Raymond Roger, Viscount of Beziers, to the camp of the crusaders, who were in full march to execute the sentence of the Pope; and being admitted to the presence of Arnold, Abbot of Citeaux, the leader of this holy warfare, he offered to justify himself from any participation in the murder of Castelnau; but he was haughtily told that he must appeal to the pontiff, and implicitly wait his award. The unfortunate Lord of Toulouse submitted himself wholly to the good pleasure of Arnold, and agreed, not only to surrender eight of his strong castles, but to join the army of the crusade for the extinction of heresy. On the following year, in order to obtain absolution, he suffered himself to be conducted with a cord about his neck to the church of St Giles, where Peter of Castelnau was buried, and before the gate of the building to be scourged with rods; after which, he was dragged to the tomb of the inquisitor, with a yoke round his neck, in the presence of twenty archbishops, and an immense multitude who were assembled to witness the degrading ceremony. In this "lowest deep," too, there was a still "lower deep;" for, after all had been endured, he was permitted, on the year after, as a matter of favour, to assume the cross against his own heretical subjects, whom he had hitherto pitied and protected.

In the meantime, Raymond Roger, who had accompanied his uncle upon his journey of submission, and been indignant at the manner in which it was received, resolved to adopt a different course. For this purpose he hastened to his own feudal sovereignty, and endeavoured to put his towns and castles in a state of defence against the enemy. It was a bold, a hazardous experiment; for the crusading zeal of Christendom, which at present could find no scope upon the fields of Syria, had been concentrated, and directed by the adroit Pontiff against the heretical Albigenses; and an army of a hundred thousand red-crossed warriors were ready to burst upon his little territory. To embitter his situation, also, his humbled uncle was the unwilling leader of this overwhelming force. But Raymond of Toulouse could no longer endure this "bad eminence" to which the refined cruelty of the Church had raised him; and having solicited, and obtained, permission to travel to Rome, that he might humble himself before his spiritual lord, he was spared the guilt of shedding innocent blood, and warring against his young nephew. In 1209, the crusading army entered Languedoc, and took several towns, the Albigenses of which were either massacred in the streets or delivered to the flames. But Beziers and Carcassone, the two strongest cities of the province, were relied upon as the chief rallying points of the anti-papal cause. The siege of Beziers was first undertaken, and the city was reeling beneath the force of the assailants, when Raymond Roger, anticipating the fall of his capital, made a generous effort in behalf of the townsmen. He hurried from Carcassone, into which he had thrown himself, and cast himself at the feet of Arnold, the legate, beseeching him to have mercy upon his unfortunate people; but the legate would grant no terms unless the men of Beziers would accede to the Romish Church; or give themselves up to the army. The Roman Catholics of the town were perfectly ready for the first requisition, and entreated the Albigenses to accept favour on the same terms; but the latter refused. They would not, they said, receive life itself as the price of their faith. God, if he pleased, was able to protect them, as well as to be glorified by their death; and as for the Pope, he might kill their bodies, but could do no hurt to their souls. With noble disinterestedness, they added, that the Count and the Roman Catholics might try to obtain on their own behalf the best conditions they could; but as for themselves, they would remain, and abide the worst. The Roman Catholic inhabitants then endeavoured to secure exemption for themselves, by representing their steadfastness to the faith; but the truculent Arnold replied, that unless every individual within Beziers confessed his guilt, and made implicit submission to the holy see, not a man of them would be spared. Scarcely had this ferocious message been delivered, when a general assault was made; the defences of the city were levelled, and the knights of the red-cross had couched their long lances, to charge through the gate-ways at the head of their followers, when they reined up for a moment with the following natural question, "How shall we know the good Catholics of Beziers from the heretics?" "Kill them all!" shouted the legate; "the Lord knows, and will take care of his own!" And this fearful mandate was fearfully obeyed. Such was the rage of indiscriminate massacre, even after Catholic and Protestant blood had flowed through the streets in one mingled stream, that when a procession of priests and monks, in full canonicals, and singing "Te-Deum," advanced to greet the conquerors, and congratulate them on having purged the city from heresy, they were assailed as fiercely as the Albigenses had been, and cut down without mercy, until almost every man of them had perished.

* Gerardi Chron. vol. 1207, 1216, 1224.

The gallant young lord of Beziers was not likely to find, in this terrible example, an encouragement to submit: he saw that his own ruin, as well as that of his uncle, had been determined by an enemy from whom there was no hope of mercy, and he resolved to shut himself up in Carcassone, and there hold out against the whole power of France and Rome. This stout resolve was strengthened by Don Pedro II., the King of Arragon, his kinsman, at present in the crusading camp, but who secretly favoured and corresponded with Raymond Roger, and revealed to him the destruction that was designed for him. Carcassone was not only stronger by nature than Beziers, but its defences had been augmented and its garrison increased by the Count, who vowed to perish sword in hand, at the gates, and among his people, rather than yield up the town. And now the tide of invasion advanced; the red-cross army, increased to the number of three hundred thousand men, sat down before Carcassone on the 1st of August and after a furious and overwhelming assault, they made themselves masters of the first suburb. Flushed with this success, they pressed forward to attack the second; but after a desperate struggle they were driven back from this post by Raymond, and his brave townsmen. During eight days, a desperate hand-to-hand conflict was maintained, with few intermissions; but at last the second suburb was forced, and the defenders retired into the city. When matters had thus come to a crisis, the King of Arragon endeavoured to mediate with the legate in behalf of his kinsman: but it was in vain that he represented the justice of Raymond's resistance in behalf of his persecuted subjects, and the fact that he still continued a faithful adherent of the Romish faith. The ferocious ecclesiastic, who was already drunk with the blood of Beziers, thirsted also for that of Carcassone, and he would only consent that Raymond Roger should depart, with eleven others of his company, and leave the rest of the city to the will of the crusaders; but to this proposal the Count replied like a sovereign, a knight, and a Christian. "Tell the legate," he said, "that rather than do what he demands, I will submit to be slayed alive. Not one of even the meanest of my people shall he have at his mercy; and I am resolved to defend both myself and my subjects by every means which God has put in my power." In consequence of this answer, hostilities were resumed, and the crusaders rushed to the walls; but they were flung from tower and battlement, until the moat beneath was filled with the dead and dying by thousands. After a fearful conflict, in which not a step of advance was won, the retreat was sounded, and the crusaders fell back from the well-contested ramparts. These attacks were repeatedly renewed, but with similar results; and, to add to the chagrin of the besiegers, the period of forty days, during which the soldiers were bound to serve, by their military tenure, had almost expired, after which they would return to their own homes. In this emergency, the legate resolved to have recourse to craft and treachery. A kinsman of Raymond Roger was in his camp, whom he employed to enter into a negotiation with the Count, and, if possible, to persuade him to appear in person before him: and Raymond, whose honourable heart apprehended no fraud, and who saw that Carcassone could not be defended much longer, because the water of the cisterns was dried up by the summer drought, was easily persuaded to repair to the tent of the legate. He went in the promise of a patient hearing, and the prospect of an honourable capitulation,—and he found himself a prisoner! The legate, believing, with Innocent III., that no faith was to be kept with those who did not keep faith with God,—that is to say, who did not believe in all points as the Church of Rome believed,—immediately caused Raymond, and the three hundred knights who attended him, to be arrested, in spite of the safe-conduct, as well as solemn oaths, in reliance upon which they had issued from their walls. And now, Carcassone was deprived of that intrepid spirit which had given strength and perseverance to its resistance, and the crusaders advanced in the confidence that it would fall before a single onset; but Providence had not forsaken the good town, although its lord was in captivity; and an outlet of deliverance was at hand, by which the people could escape from the intended massacre. There was a subterraneous passage, three leagues in length, which ended at the Castle of Cabardes; and as some of the townsmen were aware of this secret outlet, the whole population silently passed through it at midnight, leaving their goods and treasure to the enemy. On the following morning the trumpets sounded; the crusaders advanced, and scaled the walls,—but when they looked down, it was upon empty streets, and silent houses! Their victims had escaped, and nothing remained but the spoil. This, however, the legate took care to secure for himself, by consecrating it to the Church, and threatening all with excommunication who should bezzle the smallest part of it. To cover his disappointment and disgrace, also, he pretended that the people of Carcassone had evacuated the town by his permission, for that he had signed a capitulation with them on the morning of the 15th of August,—the day of the assault. But blood must be shed somewhere; and as his scouts had gleaned a few prisoners in the neighbourhood, and from among the last of the fugitives from Carcassone, and as he still held in durance the three hundred knights who had accompanied Raymond Roger, he selected from all these, four hundred and fifty victims of both sexes, of whom he caused four hundred to be burnt alive, and the rest to be hanged. Thus the two principal strongholds of the Albigenes had fallen, and a new lord was sought to occupy the captured territory; but rich as was the prize, the means by which it had been won were so atrocious and ignoble, that the chief lords of the crusade shrunk from the polluted boon. The offer was first made to Eudes III., Duke of Burgundy; but this great feudal potentate replied, that he had already domains and lordships enow, without dispossessing the lord of Beziers; and that it was foul shame to bereave the true owner of his proper heritage. The proposal was then tendered successively to the Count of Nevers and the Count of St Paul; but these grim warriors turned away, and answered in the language of him of Burgundy. This touch of honourable feeling is one of the very few redeeming points by which the history of the crusade is relieved. The legate, however, was not likely to wait long for a client; and Simon de Montfort, the lord of a castle ten leagues from Paris, on receiving the offer of the lordships of Carcassone and Beziers, to have and to hold them in behalf of the Church, and for the extirpation of heresy, gladly closed with it, and took possession of the provinces. And what of the noble Raymond Roger, the betrayed and the dispossessed, while his heritage was thus hawked through the market, and banded from hand to hand? After his arrest, he had been committed to the keeping of Simon de Montfort (of that very man who now usurped his lands and possessions), and the legate was well aware that he was not likely to escape from such an interested keeper. The lord of Montfort, accordingly, proved himself an able jailer, until the sympathy of the neighbours, and the relationship of the King of Arragon to the prisoner, made Raymond's detention somewhat perilous,—and therefore Raymond died! This event, which occurred on the 10th of November, in a tower of the Palace of Carcassone, was said to be occasioned by natural disease; but men thought that the sickness was too opportune to be natural. A report was general that he had been taken off by poison; and Innocent III. himself acknowledged that the viscount had perished by a death of violence. Such was the close of the first act of a terrible drama of iniquity and persecution; but deadlier atrocities were yet to be perpetrated, and greater miseries endured.

MOUNT CALVARY.

FROM Calvary a cry was heard,
A long reiterated cry:
My Saviour! every mournful word
Bespeaks thy soul's deep agony.

A horror of deep darkness fell
On thee, the Immaculate, the Just;
The congregated hosts of hell
Combined to shake thy filial trust.

The scourge, the thorns, the deep disgrace,
These thou could'st bear, and not repine;
But when JEHOVAH veiled his face,
Unutterable pangs were thine.

Let the dumb world her silence break;
Let pealing anthems rend the sky;
Awake, my sluggish soul, awake!
He died, that we may never die!

Lord, on thy cross I fix my eye;
If e'er I slight its pure control,
O let that dying, piercing cry
Melt and reclaim my wandering soul!

CUNNINGHAM.

THE AWFUL DANGER OF NEGLECTING THE GREAT SALVATION:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. MATHEW KIRKLAND,

Minister of New Cumnock, Ayrshire.

“How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?”—HEB. ii. 3.

It is a truth, founded at once on the dictates of reason and the declarations of Scripture, that the more exalted are our privileges, the greater is our responsibility,—the more clearly our duty is revealed, the stronger are our obligations to perform it; superior advantages, if not improved to the purposes for which they are granted, as they aggravate our guilt, so they shall increase our condemnation. Hence said our Lord to the Jews, who were favoured with his personal ministrations, and who witnessed the miracles which he wrought, “If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin. Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for you.” The same truth is inculcated in the passage from which our text is taken. The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having shown the superiority of the Christian dispensation over that of Moses, which preceded it, from the reasoning he has there advanced, deduces this important practical lesson: “Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we let them slip. For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect the great salvation?” If, even under the comparatively dark dispensation of Moses, every act of disobedience was visited with the threatened punishment, how much more severe will be the doom of transgressors living under the unclouded light of the Gospel? If they who rejected the message which God delivered by his ministering servants were held inexcusable, then, how inevitably certain, and how inexpressibly awful, will be our condemnation, “if we neglect the great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him."

In directing you to these words, we shall consider, 1st, In what respects the salvation here mentioned may be denominated "great;" 2d, Who they are who are chargeable with the guilt of neglecting it; and, 3d, Show that it is impossible that they who do neglect it can escape.

I. In what respects may the salvation here mentioned be denominated great.—In whatever light we contemplate it, the salvation of the Gospel is emphatically a great salvation. It is great in its origin,—for it was God that devised it; great in its execution,—it was the Son of God by whom it was accomplished; great in its application,—it is the Divine Spirit by whom it is rendered effectual; it is great in its final results,—it will issue in the complete emancipation of believers from sin, and all its fatal consequences,—in their perfect assimilation to the God that made them,—in complete and everlasting happiness in his presence.

But while in all these respects the Gospel brings a great salvation, it is evident that the apostle, in the text, has a special reference to the dignity of Him by whom it was accomplished. It was the consideration that it "at the first began to be spoken by the Lord,"—that it was introduced by his personal ministrations, and consummated by his sufferings and death,—that drew from him the emphatic exclamation of the text: "How shall we escape?"

God did not send a prophet of our own nature, a mere man, to carry round our dwellings the message of peace and reconciliation; nor did he commission one of those exalted spirits who surround his throne, with an angel's sympathy, to pity and console us in our forlorn condition;—he "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." He who was "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person," whom angels worshipped, and to whom the hosts of heaven did reverence,—at whose command the world rose into existence, and on whose right hand creation leans,—himself came in the name of the Lord to save us. It was the Creator of man who descended to earth as the Father's messenger of mercy; it was he against whom we had rebelled, who brought down to us the overtures of peace and pardon; it was "God manifest in the flesh," who walked his rounds of beneficence among the creatures he had formed, who entreated and beseeched the work of his own hands to come unto him that they might have life, and who wept over their obstinacy and infatuation when they would not hear; and not only "was he found in fashion as a man,—he took upon him the form of a servant;" through all his days on earth, he was a man of sorrow, and familiar with grief in its most distressing forms. He had fitted up this fair world with all its accommodations for our use, and adorned it with all its beauties to minister to us delight, yet his affecting declaration was, "The foxes have holes; and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

And as his life was sorrowful, so did his death combine all that was ignominious in shame with all that was tremendous in agony. We cannot, indeed, comprehend the full extent of our Saviour's woes; we know not the severity of that anguish which wrung his spirit, when in the garden of Gethsemane, under the pressure of divine wrath, he exclaimed, "Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say?" we know not the bitterness of that cup which God himself had mingled for him, and for the removal of which he poured forth his prayer with "strong crying, and tears;" we know not what a flood of sorrow passed over his holy soul, when bereaved of the manifestations of His presence with whom from eternity he dwelt in glory; but this we do know, that all that he did, and all that he endured, from the hour that he wept a helpless babe in Bethlehem, till the hour that he exclaimed on Calvary, "It is finished!" was done and endured, that salvation might be wrought out for guilty men. And what a magnificence does it give to the work of our redemption, that for its achievement God, in our nature, had thus to travel in the greatness of his strength! Great must have been the work, that required from "Immanuel, God with us," the agony of a conflict so severe; overwhelming the weight of that wrath, which none but he could bear; inconceivable the malignity of sin, when the blood of God's own Son was the only channel through which pardon could flow to the sinner; fearful the breach between man and his Maker, when none but he could effect their reconciliation; and not one announcement of pardon could have reached our desolate world, had not he who was God's fellow and equal bowed his head to the sacrifice, and poured out his soul unto the death.

It might surely have been expected, that a salvation wrought out by such means, and productive of such blessed results, would have been hailed as a great salvation by all to whom it was addressed, and that one universal shout of thanksgiving and praise would have echoed back to heaven the announcement of "peace on earth, and good-will to men." It is indeed strange, that criminals should even need to be solicited to accept of pardon; and stranger still, that pardon should be urged on the "acceptance in vain. Yet is it a truth, which the experience of every day attests, that there are multitudes who "neglect the great salvation," and spurn away from them its gracious offers, and resist all the tenderness of its appeals; and those blessings which the Son of God came from heaven to earth to purchase, which are the fruit of His incarnation, and agony, and death, are rejected as of no value, by the perishing sinners to whom they are offered: and still, when we carry round the message of reconciliation among our fellow-men, and lift up the free and unfeigned invitations of the Gospel, are we forced to reiterate the prophet's lamentation,—“Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" and still, too, might the Saviour, from the throne of his glory, say, as in the days of his flesh, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life."

II. This leads us to consider, in the second place, who are they who are chargeable with the guilt of neglecting the great salvation.

1. They neglect the great salvation, who do not trust exclusively in the atonement of Christ for the pardon of sin and acceptance with God. The doctrine of justification by faith, in the perfect righteousness of Christ, is the great distinguishing tenet of the Christian system. "He bore our sins in his own body on the tree." "He suffered, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God." "He made an end of sin, and brought in an everlasting righteousness." "No man," saith the great Redeemer himself, "cometh unto the Father but by me." In no other way is salvation offered,—by no other way can access to God be obtained. To trust, therefore, either in whole or in part, to any thing in ourselves—whether it be our own works of obedience to the law, or our faith and repentance, or our religious profession, or our correct moral conduct before men—is to subvert the very foundations of the faith; it is to shift the only ground on which God will meet with a sinner in peace; it is to tell him that we will not be saved by the method which his wisdom devised, and his mercy proclaimed.

2. Again, they neglect the great salvation, whose lives are not regulated by the precepts of the Gospel. While it is most true that, in the matter of justification, our own merits are utterly excluded, it is just as true that, wherever the principle of faith in the Redeemer's righteousness exists in the heart, it will manifest its existence by a holy life. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus"—there is the believer's privilege; "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit"—there is the believer's character. Christ gave himself for men, that he might redeem them from all iniquity, and purify them to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. The great salvation which he died to purchase, and is now exalted to bestow, includes not merely deliverance from the penal effects of sin, but also from its polluting power; and the former is never enjoyed apart from the latter. Christ came, not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. He did not endure its penalty that we might trample on its precepts. He appeared on earth, not to relax, but to strengthen the obligations to obedience; not to proclaim the abolition of God's moral government, and to lead men back to their offended Sovereign over the ruins of his administration, but to declare to the whole intelligent universe, more impressively than ever had been done before, his untainted holiness, his inflexible justice, his irreconcilable enmity to sin; and to eradicate the principle of sin in the heart, and to form men anew after the image of God, was the ultimate design, at once, of his holy life and atoneing death. The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, teacheth us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. If, therefore, any man imagines that he is the subject of the grace of God, that he has embraced the salvation which it brings, or is at all interested in its blessing, while, at the same time, he indulges in those practices which every precept of the Gospel emphatically condemns, he deceiveth his own soul. He has neither part nor lot in the matter. And, however accurate may be his knowledge of Divine truth, and however competent he may be to defend the faith once delivered to the saints, he is as decidedly neglecting the great salvation, and as completely excluded from all participation in its privileges, as though he were ignorant of what be the first principles of the oracles of God. There is no real reception of Christ as our Priest, without submission to him as our King; no faith in his death as our atoning sacrifice, without conformity to him in his life, as our example.

3. But we remark, in the third place, they neglect the great salvation, who do not seek an interest in its blessings, with an earnestness proportioned to their importance. According to the intrinsic value of an object, ought to be our efforts for its attainment. This is a principle universally admitted, and acted on, in the ordinary affairs of life. Now, on this principle, with what ardour ought we to exert ourselves to secure an interest in the great salvation? What, among the multiplicity of objects with which the human mind is busied, and on which the great majority of our race are expending their energies, is of an importance twice to be put in competition with it? What hazard so awful as that which we run by its neglect?—what reward so vast as that we secure by its acceptance? It delivers from all that is agonizing in the torments of hell, and ensures for us all that is rapturous in the bliss of heaven; rescues from all the misery which an immortal soul may endure, or an omnipotent God inflict; and invests us with a happiness boundless as our most enlarged desires, immutable as the unchangeable God, and everlasting as the Saviour by whom it was purchased. And is it with cool indifference that blessings of such magnitude are to be sought? Is it not rational—(I speak as unto wise men—judge ye what I say)—is it not rational, and in accordance with the principles on which we daily act, that inasmuch as the blessings which the Gospel offers infinitely transcend any advantage to be derived from any worldly pursuit, so ought they to be prosecuted with proportionably greater ardour and zeal—that their acquisition ought to form the leading aim of your lives, that to this every thing else should be subordinate, and for this, if necessary, every thing else should be sacrificed? Now, we ask, do the generality of mankind, the generality even of those who professedly believe the Gospel, seem to be thus really interested about the salvation of their souls? Is it really true; is it ought approaching the truth, that they are making it their great endeavour to escape from hell and rise to heaven? Where is the striving to enter in at the strait gate?—the running for the prize?—the wrestling for the crown? Amidst the fears which agitate men's minds, where is their terror of God's wrath?—amidst the cares which harass and distract them, where their solicitude about how they may be saved?—amidst the objects of ambition, the riches, the honours, the pleasures of this world, where are the candidates for the crown of glory, the imperishable treasures in the heavens? In the affairs of this world, men act as if really in earnest, they have prudence to discern, and firmness to prosecute, their temporal interests; but in the matters that relate to eternity, they are undecided, wavering, and irresolute. They seem to have come to the conclusion, that religion in the meantime may be safely postponed till they have acquired a competent portion of this world's goods, and fully satiated themselves with its enjoyments, and that any fragment of their time which may remain is sufficient to devote to the work of preparation for eternity. The questions, whether they are the friends or the enemies of God—whether their future abode is to be heaven or hell—whether they are to swell with their praises the anthem of the blessed, or mingle their wailings with the groanings of the damned,—are the very last about which most men deem it necessary to come to any definite conclusion. Few, indeed, we know, will avow these sentiments. Almost all profess to entertain a hope of being saved, but multitudes are living utterly regardless of the only means of salvation. They trust to be delivered from the misery to which they are exposed, but they are making no effort to escape. They hope to enjoy the privileges which the Gospel offers, but they breathe not one ardent prayer, and put forth no exertion, to obtain them. They reverse our Saviour's injunction. They labour for the meat that perisheth, not for that which endureth to everlasting life. They lay up treasure on the earth, but provide no treasure in the heavens. Such neglect the great salvation. How could men more plainly manifest their contempt of the Gospel, than by just living as if its gracious proposals had never been addressed to them? They may have no decided hostility to the Gospel—they may have a vague, indefinite belief in some of its leading doctrines—they may cherish the delusive hope of being hereafter put in possession of its privileges; but if their lives are not regulated by its principles—if the attainment of its blessings is not the chief object of their solicitude—then, though they may not oppose, they neglect the Gospel; and it is of such that the apostle declares, they shall not escape.

III. To all who are living regardless of the great truths which the Gospel sets before them, or habitually indulging in the violation of its precepts, we have now to put the solemn question of the text, "How shall ye escape?" You cannot have resolved to advance, at all hazards, in the way that leadeth to destruction. If you reflect at all, you must be conscious that you are exposed to God's righteous indignation; and, as human beings, it must be your desire to escape his wrath and secure his favour. What, then, is the foundation of your hope? Divine mercy is the only quarter to which you can look for deliverance; but, neglecting the great salvation, on what ground do you trust that that mercy shall be granted? Is it not the prerogative of God to determine the method in which his mercy shall be extended? Now, God has revealed a way in which he is waiting to receive us graciously, and to love us freely. To every serious inquiring sinner, his answer is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." But, while mercy is freely offered, and even urged on our acceptance, through the Lord Jesus, no other way of salvation is revealed. The hope of the Gospel is the only hope set before us. Christ is not only a Saviour, but the only Saviour. "No man cometh to the Father but by him." God hath declared, "He that believeth, shall be saved;" but he hath accompanied this declaration with the announcement of the awful alternative, "He that believeth not, shall be damned." And the same faithfulness which secures the fulfilment of the promise, is pledged for the execution of the threatening. Will you, then, still reject the counsel of God against yourselves, and hope to do so with impunity? Shall the criminal refuse to accept of pardon, and yet trust to escape the punishment? Does it belong to the rebel to dictate the terms on which he will receive forgiveness, or to prescribe the conditions on which he will throw down the weapons of his warfare? Has God devised a plan for our recovery from sin and guilt, and because we will not embrace it, must it be superseded by another more congenial to our wishes? Shall the unerring counsels, and the solemn averments, of Almighty God, be made of none effect, because man, in the pride of his heart, will not comply with them? Must he rescind his decrees, recall his declarations, and vary his administration, to suit the caprice of beings who, but for his indulgent goodness, would, ere now, have their dwelling in the region of despair? Be assured, my friends, man will not be permitted, at once, to spurn the invitation of the Gospel, and to brave the terrors of the Law, to reject God's mercy, and defy his justice. The astonishing spectacle of God beseeching, and of man refusing, to be reconciled, will not always be exhibited, there will be a limit even to Divine forbearance. The Gospel is God's final message of pardon to our rebellious world. Life and death are in its offer, the blessing and the curse. The everlasting destiny of every human being is suspended on the treatment he gives to its proposals. If you will not embrace it, you are inevitably shut up to condemnation. "There remaineth no more sacrifice for sin." And is it not just that it should be so? What can be done with the man who first rebels against God, and then refuses to be reconciled?

who first violates his law, and then casts back his pardon? What can be done, but just that he be left to bear the penalty of his crime? But in the question, "How shall we escape," much more is implied, than seems at first sight to be expressed. The interrogatory form of expression here employed, is to be understood, as the strongest affirmation, not only, that the neglectors of the Gospel shall not escape, but that they shall assuredly be subjected to the most awful punishment. "If they who despised Moses' law, died without mercy, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall they be thought worthy, who have trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing." They must reckon with God, at once, for violating his law and contemning his grace, for trampling on his authority, and setting at nought his offers of reconciliation. How certain and how awful must be their doom. Behold the Lord Jesus cometh with clouds and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced every shall mourn. We know not the agonies of that hell to which the wicked shall then be doomed. We can form no adequate conception of the torments of the worm that dieth not, and of the fire that never shall be quenched; but this we know, that within the storehouse of the Almighty's vengeance, every element of misery shall be treasured up. We cannot reveal to you the secrets of that dark prison-house, whither the enemies of God and his Son shall be driven, but this we know, that from its doleful mansions no wretched inmate ever shall escape, and from its deep recesses ever and anon shall be heard the weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth; and we know also, that the dreariest abode in all this doleful dwelling-place, shall be assigned to the obstinate despisers of the Gospel; pre-eminent in guilt now, they shall have a mournful pre-eminence in woe hereafter, and as across the impassable gulph, by which they are severed from God and heaven, they catch a glimpse of the glory of that far distant land, from which they are for ever exiled. Oh what a poignancy will it give to the pang of their sorrow, that all this happiness might have been theirs, had they not insulted and abused the mercy that would have saved them! "To-day then, while it is called to-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart." God yet waits to be gracious. The Saviour still bends over you with an eye of pity and of love. The fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness, is still full, and still flowing, in which you may be washed from every stain. The gate of the city of refuge is still open, within which no avenger of blood will overtake you. "A man shall be an hiding-place from the storm, and a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, and the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The value of an ascended Saviour.—As you see the Saviour ascend to the skies, you feel that earth is poorer.

and exclaim, "What has it left, compared with what it has lost!" But if earth is poorer, heaven is richer. May we not reasonably be expected to be seen, standing like the men of Galilee, gazing upon that heaven into which we have seen Jesus enter? If from him we could wish never to be parted, we must long to follow him whither he is gone. To serve Christ is, indeed, worth living for, and, therefore, we should be content to stay; but to see Christ is worth dying for, and for this we should be ever glad to go. Nor should we be allured to linger on earth, by any of its tinsel glories, when once we have seen, in this history, what heaven contains, and what it will show to us when we enter there. When surveying a lily, we feel all the truth and beauty of Christ's words; "Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these." But all the Solomons, and all the lilies, and all the gems, and all the suns of all worlds, have no glories, compared with those of Jesus Christ. One who was accustomed to repose in his bosom, when he was on earth, seeing somewhat of the glory he now wears in heaven, fell at his feet as dead. "But he laid his right hand upon me," adds the beloved disciple, "saying, I am He, that living one that was dead; and behold I am alive for ever more, and have the keys of death and the unseen world." "When we shall see him, we shall be like him." Our affections will then keep pace with our knowledge. To see Jesus as he is, to love him supremely, to resemble him exactly, to live where he lives, to be wholly absorbed in his worship and service, and to know that eternity is stamped upon this state, will be the heaven of heavens. But for this we must die. Then let me die. "To depart and to be with Christ is far better."—REV. DR J. BENNET.

The confidence of the Christian.—The righteous seem to lie by, in the bosom of the earth, as a wary pilot in some well-sheltered creek, till all the storms which infest this lower world are blown over. Here they enjoy safe anchorage, are in no danger of foundering amidst the waves of prevailing iniquity, or of being shipwrecked on the rocks of any powerful temptation. But ere long we shall behold them hoisting their flag of hope, riding before a sweet gale of atoning merit and redeeming love, till they make, with all the sails of an assured faith, the blessed port of an eternal life.—REV. J. HARVEY.

Leprosy a type of sin original and actual.—Leprosy was typical of sin and its pollution; contaminating every thing with which we are connected, visiting in itself with destruction, all things with which man is concerned. In consequence of sin that dwells in him, he changes every blessing into a curse. All the gifts of providence are excellent in themselves; but man by abusing those gifts, extracts a curse from every thing which was originally given him by God as a blessing. There is nothing with which we are connected, that does not by reason of our transgressions involve in it a curse. The leprosy separated a man from his fellow-creatures, it banished him from society and obliged him to live in a state of solitude. Sin separates from God and every thing like him; it separates us from the holy angels of heaven; it separates us from the Church of God here below, and eventually consigns us to the eternal prison of hell. There was something very insidious in the leprosy; it was a white spot, at first treated, in a variety of instances, with thoughtlessness, if not with contempt; nevertheless in this incipient state it was the leprosy; and if the progress of the disorder was not checked, and that too by Almighty power, it visited humanity with destruction, tore limb from limb and consigned man to his original dust. Leprosy though in one sense a striking type of sin, is yet but a weak one. Sin has invaded all the faculties of body and soul: it makes man his own enemy, destruction reaps within, a civil war is carried on within the human bosom. It is absolutely necessary that we should know and see and feel that we are lepers. It would appear that no one could tell the individual whether he was a leper or not but the priest. The priest was taught by God himself to distinguish the plague of leprosy from any thing else and to pronounce him clean or unclean. No one can teach us that we are sinners but Jesus Christ. The High Priest of our profession can alone convince us by his Holy Spirit that we are transgressors. He healed lepers while here below to teach us his power and disposition to heal diseased sinners. The Saviour is a physician as well as a priest. The health of God himself is imparted to the human soul, when the sinner is forgiven and cleansed by the infinitely precious blood of Christ. Medical men will tell you that when there is health in the constitution it fights against disease, and drives it from the vitals to the extremities; and then though appearances may be bad, yet the skilful physician knows that all is well, health is in full possession of the vitals of his patient. It is not uncommon to find individuals full of complaints against themselves, dwelling on their own imperfections, weeping over their sins and indisposed to receive comfort. Now let me show you the spiritual leper—here he is: "I acknowledge my transgression and my sin is ever before me. Against thee, thee only have I sinned and done this evil in thy sight;" (here the leprosy is coming out, the health of God is taking possession of the vitals of the patient, and is driving out the leprosy) "that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest and be clear when thou judgest. Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." Ye mourners in Zion take this to comfort yourselves. Are you honest mourners? In the sight of God, then you are white lepers. God himself pronounces you clean; take the comfort and consolation to yourselves. The man who honestly takes his sins to the Lord and believes God will forgive him for the sake of Jesus Christ, however shameful his past life may have been, is one with the leprosy all over his skin. The health of God triumphs in the inmost recesses of his frame and is driving the disease out of it.—HOWELS.

To know God is to love Him.—If there be the least spiritual life in you, it came not thither by accident, but by the love wherewith he loved you. If the pure minds of the saints need to be stirred up by way of remembrance, what shall be said to the heedless part of the world, who, because they hear of a just and holy God, think of him with suspicion and dislike? "O righteous Father!" said Christ, "the world hath not known thee." He who came from the Father, and was in the world, seems, in the close of his farewell prayer, to have summed up his reflections on mankind in these words: "O righteous Father! the world hath not known thee." Did they but know thee, they could not but love thee? All then that is asked of you is this; learn to think rightly of God, your views of all things will then be rectified; you will acquaint yourself with him, and be at peace.—REV. H. MARTYN.

Choice advices.—Let thy talk be gracious that he who hears thee may grow better by thee; and be ever more earnest when thou speakest of religion than when thou talkest of worldly matters. If thou perceivest that thou hast erred, persevere not in thine error, rejoice to find the truth, and magnify it. Study, therefore, three things especially,—to understand well, to say well, and to do well. And when thou meetest with God's children, be sure to make some holy advantage by them; learn of them all the good that thou canst, and communicate with them all the good things that thou knowest. The more good thou teachest others, the more will God still minister unto thee.

Beware that you believe not all that is told you, and that you tell not all that you hear; for if you do, you shall not long enjoy true friends, nor ever want great troubles. Though thou hast many acquaintances yet make not any thy familiar friend, but he that truly fears God. For be assured that what friendship never is grounded upon any other cause than true religion, if ever that cause fail, the friendship falleth off; and the rather because that as God diffuses among men truth, peace, and amity, that we should live to do one another good; so the devil daily sows falsehood, discord, and enmity, to cause, if he can, the dearest friends to devour one another. Make not a jest of another man's infirmity. Remember thine own. Abhor the frothy wit of a filthy nature whose brains having once conceived an odd scoff, his mind travails till he be delivered of it. Yea, he had rather lose his best friend than his worst jest. But if thou be disposed to be merry, have a special care to three things.—1st, That it be not against religion. 2d, That it be not against charity. 3d, That it be not against chastity. And then be as merry as thou canst, only in the Lord. When the glory of God, or good of thy neighbour require it, speak the truth, and fear not the face of man. The frown of a prince may sometimes be the favour of God. Ever think him a true friend who tells thee secretly and plainly of thy faults. He that sees thee offend, and tells thee not of thy fault, either flatters thee for favour, or dares not displease thee for fear. Reprehension, be it just or unjust, come it from the mouth of a friend or from a foe, never does a wise man harm. For, if it be true, thou hast a warning to amend; if it be false, thou hast a care at what to avoid. So, every way, it makes a wise man better or more wary. But if thou canst not endure to be reprehended, do thou nothing worthy of reprehension.—BAYLY. (Præctice of Piety.)

Submission to God.—I absolutely surrender and resign myself to thee. Thy love constrains me henceforth no more to live to myself, but to thee, who diedst for me and didst rise again. And I subject and yield myself to thy blessed light and power. O Holy Spirit of grace! to be more and more illuminated, sanctified, and prepared for every good word and work in this world, and for an inheritance among them that are sanctified in the other! Sinner, never give thy soul leave to be at rest till thou find it brought to some such transaction with God (the Father, Son, and Spirit), as this; so as thou canst truly say, and dost feel thy heart is in it. Be not uneasy or impatient of waiting and striving, till thou canst say, this is now the very sense of the soul. Such things have been done in the world, (but O how seldom of latter days!) So God hath wrought with men to save them from going down to the pit, having found a ransom for them. And why may he not yet be expected to do so? He hath smitten rocks ere now, and made the waters gush out; nor is his hand shortened, nor his ear heavy. Thy danger is not, sinner, that he will be inexorable, but lest thou shouldst. He will be entreated, if thou would be prevailed with to entreat his favour with thy whole heart.—REV. J. HOWE.

The Christian looking to the Cross.—Christians, whilst they contemplate the goodness of God as displayed in the works of creation and providence, ought also to ascend and touch a higher key. It is to the cross that we may summon each of you, where you may refuse the tear of gratitude if you can. "Transport is temper here." Is Gabriel's heart cold while he stands before the throne of the Eternal? Ah, no! they manage these things better in heaven, where the hallelujah of praise and the ardent devotions of the heart are in unison. Have these promises sounded on your heart? "I have blotted out as a thick cloud your transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins: return unto me, for I have redeemed thee." "I will forgive thine iniquity, and I will remember thy sin no more." To men who have received pardon of their sins, all is mercy. Are afflictions measured out unto them? The trials of life, are they strowed thick in their path? Amid all these, peace has possession of the heart,—the peace of God that passes all understanding, reigns within. There shall it continue, till death shall usher the weary traveller into a land of endless peace and rest. Have the enemies of the mind been brought low? Have envy and pride been broken, and all foul tempers been subdued? Is the mind recovered from her vassalage to sin, and the heart become purified? Then what peace and calm now pervade it! Such vassals "were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." Your lusts are not now on the throne, but where they should be, under your feet. Then we call on you to join in the song,—“To him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever.”—REV. DR WAUGH.

The glorious fulness of Christ.—If the Lord Jesus Christ were not glorious in himself—strip him of the light he dwells in, silence the praises of heaven, remove far away the ten thousand adoring spirits who worship at his footstool, veil him once again in a body of humiliation,—yet this one fact, that all blessedness which sinners ever knew has sprung from him, lays the believer at his feet in adoration and wonder. We esteem him rich, who after supplying his own wants has still wherewith to relieve the wants of others; we call him great, who has preserved a nation; but here are riches that have unnumbered millions blessed for ever, and a power that has saved a world. It is this, which causes the Church below to glory in nothing save the Redeemer's cross;—it is this, which the Church above takes as the subject of its loudest praise. It was the prospect of this glory, that enabled Christ himself to “endure the cross, and despise the shame;” it is the enjoyment of this, which now fills and satisfies his soul. And when the Son of man, at the last great day, shall “sit on the throne of his glory,” what is it that will make him so glorious there? the hosts of mighty angels around him? an assembled world at his feet? the melting away before his presence of the earth he suffered on, and of the sun which beheld his reproach? No; the salvation of the lost. “He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe.”—REV. C. BRADLEY.

The mercy of God everlasting.—How do the things of this world pass away! One generation followed another, and another after that; and so on from age to age, filling up their long rolls of time in melancholy array. They appear long to me, because my rule of comparison is taken from the shortness of human life; but to eternity, to the everlasting existence of God, these ages are almost as nothing. Into this eternity all that can be called time is continually passing, as into a gulph which hath neither bottom nor bound. Then time is full of changes and vicissitudes; while eternity is not only a perpetual now, but also a constant and perpetual same. In the midst of all this perishing and disorderly state, there is one rich blessing, which never can fail. The mercy of Jehovah in Christ Jesus endureth, yea, endureth for ever. This is often repeated by the Lord himself, that it might be constantly and cheerfully believed and kept in mind. O my soul! thy time faileth, thy body is decaying, the world is daily changing, and nothing about thee continueth in one stay! Blessed be God, to thee likewise a change shall soon come, and come for the better in the midst of it all! Whatever alterations appear, thou hast an unalterable God, and an imperishable home before thee. If the earth fall into destruction, as soon it will, thy estate cannot be lost; for thou art only a pilgrim and traveller here, and thy inheritance is above, far out of the reach of ruin. Thy interest in Christ being safe in Christ, all is safe that is worth saving, with respect to thee. Thou canst only pass from death to life,—from sin to holiness,—from pain to peace,—from earth to heaven,—from mortals to God. O how then should I rejoice in thee, my Saviour and my Lord!—In thee, who makest all things mine; all, either as good, or to lead me to good! I adore thee, that thou disposest the world, life, death, things present, or things to come, in my behalf; calling them mine,—making them really mine, because they contribute to my welfare. Above all, I bless thee for the end. I am lost in love and admiration, when thou tellest me that I am thine, O my Redeemer! even as thou art God's.—AMBROSE SERLE, Esq.

ON THE UNITY OF GOD.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

WE are here endeavouring to give a plain and precise view of the statements contained in the Shorter Catechism, as a summary of revealed truth. To these statements, therefore, and to what may fairly be considered as embraced in them, our observations must be confined. The Catechism also, it must be kept in mind, confines itself to a specific object, or course of instruction, namely, to what the Scriptures principally teach; to what they teach as a rule of direction; to the directions, which they give for attaining our chief end of glorifying and enjoying God. These directions the Catechism arranges under two great heads; and the first of these comprises what we are to believe concerning God. What they teach and what we are to believe concerning the being and perfections of God, is the first statement under this head, and has already been considered. The next statement of what they teach and we are to believe concerning God is, that there are not more Gods than one; that “there is but one only, the living and true God.”

This great truth, the Scriptures of the Old and of the New Testaments do most clearly and constantly teach.

There is only one God. “Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord.” “Know therefore this day and consider it in thine heart, that the Lord he is God, in heaven above and upon the earth beneath; there is none else.” “I am the first and I am the last, and besides me there is no God.” “God is one.” “To us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things and we in him.” “There is one God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus.”

He is the living and true God. “But the Lord is the true God; he is the living God; and an everlasting king.” “Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God.” He is the living God, who has life in himself, and is the author and upholder of all life in all other beings. “In him we live, and move, and have our being.” “God who quickeneth all things.” He is the true God, as distinguished from all that have been falsely called gods, and that exist only in men's vain imaginations. “They are vanity and the work of errors; in the time of their visitation they shall perish." There are many such, indeed, that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, "gods many and lords many;"—so many, that in some heathen lands they are numbered by thousands, nay, by millions. But we know, that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one. "There is but one only the living and true God." This, indeed, seems to follow from every enlightened notion of what God is; and does, indeed, clearly follow from the statement already given of what God is, of what the Scriptures teach concerning him, as infinite in his being and perfections. This view of God once admitted, it seems impossible for the human mind to conceive, that two such beings, each infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, could exist together; that there can be even two original causes and supreme preserving powers in the universe.

Yet this simple truth, which appears so clear to our reason, does not seem to have been the discovery of human reason; and not only is it a truth which the Scriptures plainly teach, but it is a truth, we may say also, which the Scriptures alone do plainly teach.

They are the only rule to direct us, even as to this first and plainest truth concerning God, namely, that he is one. There are facts in the history of the human race, which go far to prove, that mankind have acknowledged and adored more Gods than one, just in proportion as they have applied their own reasonings to the subject, instead of resting in the belief of one God, originally conveyed from God himself to our first parents; and that, wherever this original belief has been lost or corrupted among any people, it has never been recovered by the teaching of their own reason, but solely by the knowledge which they received from the sacred Scriptures. The original belief of the most ancient nations appears to have been, that God is one; and even the notions of the most savage tribes appear to come nearer to this truth of there being but one great and good spirit. It is altogether among those nations, who seemed to make the greatest use of their natural reason, and who applied it to the nature of God, that gods were multiplied without number, and worshipped with all manner of absurdities and abominations. The source of such errors is very obvious and intelligible to all, who know the truth of God from his own word, namely, the corrupted nature of fallen man. Such a God as the Scriptures reveal, a God infinitely great and glorious, infinitely excellent and lovely, men in their natural state could neither wish to know, nor relish when made known. Such a God they did not like to retain in their knowledge; and, once departing from the true light, they have plunged into utter darkness and been lost in interminable errors.

Let us here observe,

1. The insufficiency of mere human reason as a guide in religion, either in searching out or preserving pure its simplest truths, and let us beware of trusting to its suggestions as to the Divine nature and will, or listening to its objections against the more peculiar doctrines revealed in the Divine Word, especially on the very subject of the Godhead. If our own reason, when left to itself, has neither been able to prove at first, nor to preserve when known, the simple point of the Unity of God; how utterly unfit to pronounce upon the manner of his existence, or the manifestations of himself to his creatures. "The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." "They became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened." "Thou thoughtest, that I was altogether such a one as thyself."

2. The supreme importance of a revelation from God himself, as a rule to direct us in regard to his own nature and will, and how we may glorify and enjoy him. If we clearly required such guidance to know whether there was one God or many, whom it was our duty and happiness to serve; how much more do we need its instructions to learn the way by which we may please the father of our spirits. Let us, therefore, see the wisdom of keeping close to its declarations in all that we believe concerning him, or render in obedience to him. "The meek will be guide in judgment, and the meek will be teach his way." "As new born babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." "Give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies." "Show me thy ways, O Lord; teach me thy paths: Lead me in thy paths and teach me; for thou art the God of my salvation, on thee do I wait all the day."

3. The plain practical use of this first truth, that there is only one living and true God; if we know God, that we glorify him as God. Let us mark the connection of this truth with our chief end, as the Lord himself points out to us in announcing it. "The first of all the commandments is, Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." While holding in our understanding the belief of one God, let us see, that we be not, in our hearts, following other gods, and be actually "estranged from him through our idols." Let us mark the real spirit of idolatry, namely, "changing the truth of God into a lie," "worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever." Let us watch against our tendency and temptations even to the worship of idols, and see, that, while acknowledging in words the one living and true God, the author of life and of all good, we be not worshipping, with all our might and in all manner of ways, the very god of this world, the power of death, and source of all evil; bowing down, not indeed our bodies, but what is worse, our souls to silver and gold, nay wood and stone, as our trust and true good; setting up such vanities, not indeed in his visible temple in the form of images, but, what is worse, in his true living temple, our own souls, as his rivals in our affections and services; nay, choosing, it may be, grosser matters still as the objects of our idolatry; and making a god even of the belly and its gratifications, "serving diverse lusts and pleasures" as our supreme good; and remember, in the apostle's words, the close connection between the doctrine and the duty: "This is the true God and eternal life. Little children keep yourselves from idols." Amen.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTON, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACGILLIVRAY & Co., 18, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junr. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—Why did our Lord teach in Parables? By the Editor. Part II., ..... Page 689 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Death of an Infant Son," ..... 692 3.—Rosamond Robson; or, the Triumphs of Divine Grace. By the Rev. M. Brown, A.M., ..... ib.	4.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Henry Grey, A.M., ... Page 696 5.—Sacred Poetry. "Saturday Night." By Walker, ..... 700 6.—Missionary Operations in Athens, ..... ib. 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Heber, Blunt, and Wilberforce, ..... 701 8.—The Witnesses for Christ in the Middle Ages, ..... 703
--	---

WHY DID OUR LORD TEACH IN PARABLES!

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

THE next reason to which we shall advert, is founded on a statement made by our Lord himself: "And Jesus said, Unto you it is given to know the mysteriis of the kingdom; but unto them in parables." There were many circumstances regarding the future progress and ultimate success of the Gospel in the world, which it was unnecessary, and might have been injurious, to have divulged to the common people. They required to be taught solely the first principles of the oracles of God. But the all-seeing eye of Him who knew the end from the beginning, could clearly discern that a period would arrive when such information would be both interesting and important to all true Christians. To such a state of spiritual ignorance had the Jews reduced themselves, that, at the period of our Lord's ministry, their minds were quite unfitted for the reception of the doctrine, that the Gospel, like the Eastern mustard-seed, should become a large tree, overspreading the whole earth. That such important truths, however, might be handed down for the instruction and encouragement of Christians in future ages, our Lord was pleased to convey them in emblematic obscurity to the minds of his immediate disciples. In a personal point of view, besides, such a revelation was peculiarly needful to them. The sufferings, the hardships and privations which they were doomed to undergo in preaching the Gospel to their bigoted countrymen, as well as to idolatrous strangers,—the cruel persecutions to which the primitive Church was afterwards exposed, were all intimately known to the Saviour of men. To strengthen, therefore, their faith, to enliven their hope, and to animate their confidence, he reveals to his disciples, in language unintelligible indeed to the multitude, but to them sufficiently clear, the nature of his kingdom upon earth, the character of its faithful subjects, its gradual enlargement and invaluable blessings. Had our Lord openly proclaimed to the people, that the Gospel which he was commissioned to preach would break down the middle wall of partition which separated the Gentile from the Jew, with what feelings would the haughty descendant of Abraham have heard such unwelcome truths? He would have unhesitatingly pronounced the Gospel a lie, and the Divine Teacher an audacious impostor. But while we thus speak, it is by no means intended to assert that our Lord concealed any necessary truth through dread of popular violence. By no means. But while he faithfully and undauntedly declared the counsel of God, he never unnecessarily provoked public odium, knowing that his hour was not yet come. Had it been necessary for the salvation of a Jew that he should be acquainted with the calling of the Gentiles, he would have been minutely informed of that event; but no such necessity existed, and therefore our Lord limits the information to his more immediate followers.

We remark also, that our Lord, on some occasions, employs parabolic instruction to screen himself from his bitter enemies—the Scribes and Pharisees. By a well-arranged allegorical description, he often sharply reproved the ingratitude, unbelief, and hardness of their hearts. Each one felt the force of the remark as applicable to himself; yet, from the general and delicate terms in which the reproof was couched, it was impossible to fasten any charge upon the Speaker. Thus, while he gained the great purpose of reproof, he escaped any remarkable expression of popular hatred. The success which attended the parable of the good Samaritan, may be adduced as a remarkable instance of the efficacy of such a mode of instruction in silencing objectors. The captious doctor of the law attempted to cavil upon the meaning of the word neighbour. Our Lord, in reply, directed his attention to an instructive little history, the circumstances of which are so naturally combined, and related with such tender simplicity, that it cannot fail to interest every reader. He closed the narrative with that forcible ble admonition: "Go thou and do likewise,"—and a more delicate or more powerful reproof of a cruel, covetous, and narrow mind can scarcely be conceived. While administering necessary reproof, our Lord often embraces the opportunity to convey instructions the most important under parabolic figures. It was on such an occasion, while vindicating his conduct in keeping company with publicans and sinners, against the aspersions of the Scribes and Pharisees, that he delivered the narratives of the lost sheep, the lost piece of silver, and the prodigal son. All these parables are intended to illustrate the abundance and the freeness of redeeming mercy, and each is set forth as an emblem of the favourable reception which penitent sinners shall, through the merits of the Redeemer, meet with from the God of Love. As a gentle, and, at the same time, a most effectual mode of obviating the prejudices and rectifying the errors of his hearers, our Lord had frequent recourse to allegorical description. As he journeyed towards Jerusalem to finish the work which his Father had given him to do, he perceived that his followers were looking forward with fond anticipation to the period when he would assume the dignity of an earthly monarch. To correct these mistaken notions, he narrated the parable of the ten pounds, in which he illustrated the nature of his dominion, and the opposition which would be made to it,—warning his hearers, at the same time, that the proper business of his people is not to be solicitous for secular honours, but to employ themselves diligently in their appointed work till he should come again.

The principal reason why our Lord taught in parables, is declared by himself in a passage already alluded to: "And Jesus said, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom: but to others in parables; that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand."—(Luke viii. 10.)

The whole history of the Jewish nation, from the period of their selection as a peculiar people, to that in which the Messiah appeared, strikingly displays the long-suffering mercy of Jehovah. They had enjoyed an almost uninterrupted series of divine communications, both through the medium of angels and men. God is forcibly represented as "rising early, and sending prophets unto them;" yet they are afterwards, by the highest authority, accused of having "killed the prophets, and stoned them that were sent unto them." To that highly favoured people had been originally committed the oracles of God,—those predictions and precepts, those promises and threatenings, which he spake unto their fathers by the prophets; yet, when the promised Messiah came, they were ignorant of the spirituality of the law, and of the real character of Him to whom Moses and all the prophets bear witness. The Old Testament Scriptures conveyed to their minds no higher idea of the promised Deliverer, than of one who would appear in all the glittering pomp of regal authority, and at length restore the kingdom to Israel.

With such erroneous notions of the Messiah's character, can it appear astonishing that their proud imaginations were offended at the meanness of his parentage,—that they should have spurned from them, as an impostor, the carpenter's son? Some have regarded it as an anomalous circumstance in the history of the Jews, that their mental vision was so impaired as to render them unable to recognize in Jesus the Old Testament Messiah; but the slightest reflection will convince us that such a result is in perfect consistency with the acknowledged influence of our moral upon our intellectual constitution. Whether in individuals or societies of individuals, every instance of deterioration in moral principle is certainly, though not perhaps visibly, followed by an equally melancholy deterioration in intellectual energy. Select, for the purpose of illustration, a man whose mental faculties were once acute to perceive, while his moral powers were sensitive to feel, any, the least deviation from the path of duty. Mark the painful reluctance he evinces in yielding at first to the allurements of the world, and how revolting to his mind is the first occasion of his departure from God. Trace, if you can, the awfully increasing celerity with which he advances on the road that leadeth to destruction; think of the augmented strength which inward pollution acquires every moment from outward temptations; observe the influence, baneful indeed, which every instance of submission to the powers of darkness exercises over the vigour of his intellect; compute, if you can, the depth of the gloom which, every step he proceeds, is gathering around his understanding; and say, do you not perceive the period approaching when conscience's whispering voice shall no longer be heard; when his moral being, once the seat of purity, shall become a loathsome sink of pollution; when that intellect, which could once penetrate far into the deep things of God, shall be withered in its strength; when the whole man, in short, shall be prostrated before "the prince of the power of the air," and "Ichabod" shall be seen inscribed on his forehead,—"the glory is departed?" Extend your thoughts to a whole nation of such polluted beings; attend to the acting and reacting influence which every individual of that sinful nation exerts over every other; mark, as it proceeds in its mournful course, the thousandfold series of transgressions which each and all of these sinful beings are every moment adding to the frightful catalogue of the nation's iniquities; reflect on the noxious influence which every item of that fearful computation has had on the intellectual strength of every individual among that infatuated people,—and you will form a tolerably correct idea of the intellectual and moral condition of the Jews at the advent of the Messiah. They who had been, as it were, exalted to heaven by their privileges, were now cast down to hell in degradation and guilt. It was at this point of the nation's history that our Lord commenced his public ministrations in Judea. He by no means attempted to overpower their minds by irresistible arguments, but in short and impressive narratives he declares doctrines which it became all to believe, and enforces duties which it was befitting that all should obey. This mode of instruction he employed to try his hearers; and, accordingly, we find him exclaiming, after having related one of these histories, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Our Lord was, no doubt, surrounded by men of all characters, and this remarkable expression is used in allusion to the varied phases which the moral and intellectual constitution of each presented to his all-seeing eye, and the equally varied effects which would follow the allegorical descriptions he set before them. Some, nay, perhaps many, who listened with avidity to the instructions of our Lord, would easily comprehend his parabolic figures. The minds of such individuals had acquired a spiritual discernment of the ancient prophecies, and had become familiar with the allegorical medium through which their fathers saw the Messiah's day afar off, and were glad. "If any man do the will of my Father, he shall know of the truth, whether it be of God." It is a melancholy fact, indeed, that in proportion as a man deviates from the purity of divine truth in his belief, his moral character is proportionably affected.

To some among all classes of our Lord's hearers, it is undeniable that the allegorical signification of the parables might be somewhat obscure; but this very obscurity constituted an essential part of the probation. They whose hearts were so hardened, and their understandings so beclouded, by a long course of sin, that even his wonderful works failed to convince them that he was sent from God,—such individuals would urge the obscurity of the narratives as an excuse for inattention on their part, and suppress any faint desire they might feel to investigate farther what these things meant. In this class was verified that awfully affecting mandate given to the prophet of old: "Go ye and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert and be healed." It is only by grace communicated, that we can understand the truth of God; but if we do despite unto the Spirit of grace, we deprive ourselves of all the convincing and consoling light he would have poured into the soul. It is an awful period in a man's moral history, when the arrows of conviction, aimed at his heart by the Word and Spirit of God, rebound as from a flinty rock, and fall pointless to the ground; when he deliberately shuts his eyes that he may not see, and his ears that he may not hear, and hardens his heart that he may not feel the influence of the truth as it is in Jesus; when the Gospel is considered a cunningly devised fable, and the man is given up to believe a lie. To such men as this, the instructions of our Lord only aggravated their guilt. They proved the occasion of adding to the already accumulated mass of their violations of God's law one more fearful and, alas! unpardonable crime—the despising of his Son. "My Spirit will not always strive with man, saith the Lord." There is a mournful period, both in individual and national history, when the Lord becomes weary of repenting; when, after innumerable provocations and pre-eminence privileges, the arm of Jehovah is laid bare to avenge him of his enemies, to . . . . .

But we refrain from dwelling longer on this distressingly painful subject, and turn to the description of another class of our Lord's hearers. There were some who, from the striking proofs which he gave of his divinity, recognised in Jesus the true Messiah. Such men would turn to a far different account the obscurity of the parables. Anxiously intent on deriving benefit from his instructions, they would assiduously ponder and pray over the words they had heard. Applying their minds to the subject with an energy in some degree proportioned to its vital importance, and with an assiduity unshaken by its imagined obscurity, the clouds would ere long disperse, and He who at first commanded the light to shine out of darkness would shine into their hearts, to give them the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ Jesus. The mysteries of the kingdom would now be clearly understood, and the instructions of the Saviour would bear upon their hearts with an efficacy and a power which their spiritual foes would in vain attempt either to gainsay or resist.

Such is the ordinary mode of the Divine procedure in imparting instruction to the children of men. Instead of furnishing us with new and extraordinary means of discerning the truth, he encourages us to employ the means which, as rational beings, we already possess. He hath endowed us with intellectual and moral powers, which are intended to move harmoniously onward in a glorious career of indefinite improvement. In consistency with this progressive advancement, the Divine Being hath willed that, at every stage in our progress, our faculties should enlarge in capacity of knowledge, and increase in intensity of action. Gradually to develop our mental energies, he hath spread out his fair and beautiful creation; he hath, in some measure, unfolded the mysterious volume of Providence, and pointed our inquiries to the revelation of his will. In proportion to the diligence with which we use these means of spiritual improvement, is the Divine goodness exercised in enlarging our field of knowledge. "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath." If, therefore, we shall, either through the misimprovement of our privileges or the indulgence of evil passions, paralyze our intellectual or moral energies; if, through this self-induced obliquity of mind, we shall cast away from us the Gospel as an idle tale; if its alluring promises, and its awful threatenings, are alike unavailing to induce our compliance with its overtures, no possible blame can be attached to the Divine decrees, but all to our own voluntary and deliberate rejection of the Divine counsel, and our equally deliberate contempt of the Divine reproofs. Our blood, therefore, must rest upon our own heads.

In concluding these remarks on the advantages attendant on parabolic instruction, we cannot refrain from briefly advertent to the striking proof which even this slight and superficial view of the subject affords of the excellence of our Lord's character as a Teacher sent from God. Intimately conversant with the secret springs which regulate our intellectual and moral nature; well aware of the many prejudices which ever beset our minds, tending in a great measure to defeat the best-directed human efforts to enlighten and convince, he adopted a mode of instruction in admirable consistency with our ordinary associations in thought and feeling, and calculated imperceptibly to overcome those deep-rooted prejudices which might have obstructed the avenue to the hearts of his hearers. But, while the great framework of parabolic instruction was accommodated to mankind in general, and thus, with the strictest propriety, made the vehicle of truths which were destined to be taught among all nations, our Lord so arranged the subordinate circumstances of the parables, as to suit the people to whom they were more immediately addressed. Minutely acquainted with the manners, and customs, and local peculiarities of the country, he takes advantage of national partiality to recommend his doctrines to their attention; and, by a beautiful coincidence in his pictures with the objects of their every-day observation and experience, he enshrined these narratives in the minds and hearts of the Jews, and rendered their transference from the literal to the spiritual meaning comparatively easy. The ultimate object, finally, with which our Lord resorted to parables, as forming a part, viz., of a probationary system, was admirably accomplished. He who could say, "Before Abraham was, I am," knew the exact point in the Jewish history when such a mode of instruction could be most properly introduced. His opportunities of teaching were carefully watched, and their full effect foreseen by the eye of "Him who searcheth the hearts, and trieth the reins of the children of men." Let us, therefore, adore the infinite wisdom and amazing condescension of this Divine Teacher, who "spake as never man spake," and of this Divine Mediator, by whom is bestowed "repentance unto Israel and the remission of sins."

DEATH OF AN INFANT SON.

FAREWELL, my boy, my much lov'd boy!
Tears oft shall flow for thee;
And while this broken heart shall beat
Thou'lt ne'er forgotten be.
No laughing welcome greets me now,
As I approach the door;
Thy footsteps light are heard no more
Upon the parlour floor.

Thy merry voice, resounding full
Of mirthful song and glee,
Is silent now,—no more thou'lt smile
Upon thy father's knee.

Thy little chair is empty now
At our once gladsome hearth;
And all is sad and gloomy now,
Where all was joy and mirth.

But oh! he only sleeps; look there,—
How beautiful my boy!
His lips are red,—he slumbers, love,—
It is indeed my boy.

Come near,—his golden ringlets bind,
And softly, sweetly sing,
As thou wert wont to do, my love;
O strike the sweetest string.

And he will smile to thee, his mother,
When he awakes again,
And clasp thee in his little arms,
And make thee glad again.

And yet he sleepeth long, love,—
Fear cometh on me now:
Ah! feel that cheek,—'tis cold, 'tis cold,—
And colder still that brow!

"Thou said'st he slept,—O why deceive?"
Yes! he but sleepeth still,
But 'tis the sleep of death, my love,—
It is our Father's will.

Oh! come with me, then to His throne,
And reverently adore,
And kiss the Almighty hand that Afflicteth us so sore.

And, oh! He'll bless and comfort us,
He'll not forsake us now,
When waters deep encompass us,
And Death hath bent his bow.

And tho' by Babel's streams we weep,
And think how glad we've been;
Altho' our harps in silence hang
Upon the willows green;

O still our God will gracious be:
Forsake us will He never,
Till we in Zion dwell with
Our little one—for ever.

G.

ROSAMOND ROBSON; OR, THE TRIUMPHS OF DIVINE GRACE.

BY THE REV. M. BROWN, A. M.,

Minister of the Presbyterian Church, Morpeth, Northumberland.

ROSAMOND ROBSON, the subject of the following brief Memoir, was the daughter of respectable parents in this town. She was a very engaging child from her infancy, and greatly beloved, not only by her father and mother and the members of the family, but also by all who knew her. She was quick, lively, and intelligent; possessed of very amiable dispositions, and of a warm and affectionate heart. As soon as is customary she was sent to school, where she was taught the usual branches of education. The mistress being a pious woman herself, no doubt would take special care that her pupils should be early made acquainted with the Sacred Scriptures, and the leading doctrines of Christianity, as contained in the admirable summary of our holy religion to be found in the Shorter Catechism of our Church. Rosamond, therefore, would be taught, not only at home, but in the school, to read the Scriptures and attend to the duties of religion. But there was nothing remarkable in her conduct during the time she attended school. Like almost all children, she was fond of amusement, and seemed to derive great pleasure when engaged in play with her youthful companions. She was fond of her lessons, and always manifested great willingness to go to school; and as she was a pretty girl, kind-hearted and playful, she was, I believe, a great favourite with her associates. She was destined to lose her father when she was only seven years of age. His death would, no doubt, make an impression on her young mind at the time; and she would feel the loss of one who had shown her so much attention, and to whom she was fondly attached. But, though she might remember him, and speak about him long after that event happened, yet it did not produce any salutary change on her heart. Such dispensations of Providence are well fitted to impress the mind with the paramount importance of true religion, and with the necessity of making preparation to meet our God. But it must not be forgotten, that, in order to be productive of lasting impressions, they must be sanctified by the Divine Spirit; without this, the most painful bereavements to which any person may be subjected will be utterly fruitless in converting the soul, and leading to the practice of piety. The death of a father is a heavy loss; but Rosamond was not old enough fully to appreciate it, and it passed away unimproved.

Nothing of importance took place in the family to impress Rosamond's mind till the death of her eldest sister, which took place about three years after her father died. Her death was rather sudden, at least it was not preceded by long illness; and as she was cut off in the very bloom of youth, it was well calculated deeply to affect the members of the family, and to lead them to think seriously of the shortness and uncertainty of time—to lead her brothers and sisters to remember their Creator in the days of their youth. But affecting as it was, it did not seem to make much impression on Rosamond. After the funeral was over, and the bustle and excitement which such an event always occasions in a family had passed away, she soon recovered her wonted buoyancy of spirits; and, busy herself in the enjoyment of good health, soon forgot apparently what had taken place.

Not many weeks, however, had elapsed, till a sister younger than herself died, after a few days' illness, during which she suffered very severely. This melancholy event seemed to produce a very powerful impression on Rosamond's mind, for ever afterwards she appeared more serene and thoughtful. A visible change took place in her appearance and manner, evident to her mother and all who saw her. Not that any saving change as yet had taken place in her heart and affections, but she seemed to think much of the extreme brevity of time; and the idea of her younger sister being dead and buried, had the effect of leading her to think seriously of her own death and burial. And the time was at hand when she was to feel the power of Divine grace in sanctifying all her afflictions, and making her a wonderful monument of redeeming love. Only a short time elapsed after her sister's death, till she herself was taken ill, and laid upon the bed of sickness. Then it was she began in earnest to seek the Lord. Hitherto she had been in the habit of reading the Scriptures, and saying her morning and evening prayers; but she had engaged in these exercises more as a task to be performed, than as a sacred and religious duty. Now she felt a delight in the performance of this duty. Affliction, as she frequently confessed, was the means which was blessed to open her eyes to see the natural corruption of her own heart, and the need of a Saviour, and which led her to peruse the Scriptures every day, and make preparation for a coming eternity. Soon as she ascertained that her disease bore the symptoms of consumption, and might terminate in death, she became more deeply impressed with the value of time, and the necessity of improving it to the best advantage. As the disease increased, and the probable issue became more apparent, she became more alive to the business of religion, and manifested a greater anxiety for her soul's salvation. At first, she showed some aversion to speak to me on the subject of religion and the state of her mind; but this soon wore off, and she delighted to talk of nothing else than about the Sacred Scriptures. The love of Christ, as displayed in the amazing plan of human redemption, was a theme on which she delighted to dwell. Her whole soul was ravished at the contemplation of the wonders of redeeming grace; and she often expressed her surprise that we should think so little of Jesus Christ, who loved us, and laid down his life that we might be saved from everlasting misery. I remember once hearing her say, when speaking of the sufferings of Christ, "Oh, how much I love him! How precious he is to me! He is all my salvation! I love my mother very much, and can never repay her for all her kindness towards me, especially since I have been ill; but I love the Saviour far more. I delight to meditate on his name, and his wonderful works to the children of men. I am astonished to think of his kindness to myself, in making me a member of his household and an heir of heaven."

By conversing with her mother, and other religious friends who visited her during her illness, she acquired very accurate and comprehensive views of the grand scheme of mercy for fallen man, as made known in the Bible; and, in looking back on her past life, she deeply regretted having been so giddy and thoughtless, and that she had spent so much of her time in pursuit of the vanities of the world, without ever thinking of her character as a sinner, and her destination as an immortal being—without ever thinking of Christ, and of a coming eternity. How different now her feelings and sentiments! Now she regarded the Sacred Volume as her richest treasure; and she delighted to read its blessed pages, and to meditate on its precious and soul-reviving truths. She could, indeed, say with the Psalmist, "O how love I thy law: it is my meditation all the day: it is sweeter than honey, yea, than the honey-comb." During the first weeks of her illness, she read other religious books besides the Bible; but latterly the New Testament was the chief subject of her reading: and to show how much she valued it, she made a present of two New Testaments to two female friends, who called to see her not long before she died, adding, that she hoped that they would read them, and would derive as much comfort and delight in so doing as she had done. Her mode of reading was very profitable, and fit to be imitated. She read a few verses, sometimes only one, and then made what she read the subject of meditation and prayer, applying it to herself and her own spiritual condition. It was very delightful to hear her speaking of the promises of Scripture, which she found so comforting. The following are some of the promises from which she derived much consolation:—"Him that cometh unto me, I will in nowise cast out." "Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out," &c.

Through the exercise of faith in Jesus as her Redeemer, she could apply the promises to herself, and could rest in the assurance that they would all in due time be realized in her own happy experience. Hence she derived unspeakable comfort in thinking that her sins were all blotted out from the book of God's remembrance, and that she was accepted as righteous on account of the imputed righteousness of Christ, and that she now could look up to God as her reconciled Father, and behold his face without a frown. She could say of him, "Once he was angry with me, but now his anger is turned away, and he is comforting me." She delighted much to think of the glories of the celestial state, and of the holiness and happiness of the redeemed around the throne, and looked forward with joyful contemplation to the time when she would be made a partaker thereof. Accordingly, she often repeated the following beautiful hymn, by Dr Watts—the 66th of the Second Book:—

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain.

"There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death, like a narrow sea, divides
This heavenly land from ours," &c.

This was a hymn she had committed to memory at school; but she never saw its beauties, nor felt its consoling power, till now, when laid on a bed of sickness, and preparing for her departure from this vale of tears. Every time she repeated it, she felt her soul comforted and refreshed thereby. It was to her as good news from a far country.

As she felt the consoling influence of Divine grace on her own mind in a very wonderful degree, so she was most anxious that all her relatives and friends should be made partakers thereof. For several weeks previous to her death, she was reduced to a state of great bodily weakness, and she passed many sleepless nights in consequence of the severe cough; but she always said she was happy, and she wished that all her acquaintances were just as happy as she was. I never saw one so young so patient, and so resigned to the will of God, so completely alienated from the things of this world, and whose affections were so firmly fixed on things heavenly and divine. Though she suffered much, yet she never murmured nor complained. Under her severest sufferings she would say, they were as nothing when compared with what Christ was called to endure, when he died the ignominious death of the cross. It was through faith in Jesus that she was enabled, to possess her soul in patience, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. "What a glorious and transporting thought," she once remarked, "that Jesus Christ is looking down from heaven on such a poor, frail, worthless creature as I am, and sending forth his holy angels to minister to my comfort while here, and at death to take my spirit to heaven! What am I, to be so highly favoured?"

She was most anxious to impress all who came to see her with the importance of religion. As long as she could, she would send in the evenings for her brothers and little sister, and talk to them of the love of Christ, and what he did for perishing sinners; and them to put their trust in the Lord—to remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy—to attend the Sabbath-school, the house of God, and live a holy life—doing justly and loving mercy, and she would have the happiness of meeting with them in heaven. She said, "What a happy meeting that will be!—meeting never to part, and spending a never-ending eternity in the enjoyment of the pleasures which are at God's right hand!" To all who visited her on her death-bed, she spoke of the happiness she felt in religion; and was most wishful that they too would become acquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus, and be made wise unto salvation. She always appeared happy, and always spoke of her happiness in the prospect of her departure. She said to me one day, "Tell my aunt how happy I am at the thought of soon being in heaven."

Though she was only twelve years old, yet she had attained the full assurance of faith for several weeks previous to her death, and could speak of her departure not only without dismay, but with holy joy. I remember asking her, one day, if she was not afraid to die. "O no!" she replied, with great emphasis, "not in the least. I once had a great horror of death, and of being put into the grave, but now I rejoice at the prospect; for I know death to me will be great gain,—it will not only put an end to all my sorrows and sufferings, but introduce me to the New Jerusalem, the city of the great King. I know, too, the grave will be to my worn-out body a bed of rest, where it will sleep in peace till the resurrection morn." She had great delight in reading about the death of Stephen, the first martyr to the Christian faith. Her eye seemed to glisten with delight, when she thought of his seeing the heavens opened, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, ready to receive him. The 14th chapter of John's Gospel afforded her great consolation under her affliction. "Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions." After repeating these words, she said to me, one day, "How comforting the thought, that Christ is preparing mansions of bliss for his people! and I have no doubt there is one prepared for me,—and soon I will be in possession of it." It was this hope which gladdened her spirit. Often she repeated the 65th hymn of the Second Book, (Watts):—

"When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies,
I bid farewell to every fear,
And wipe my weeping eyes.

"Should earth against my soul engage,
And hellish darts be hurl'd,
Then I can smile at Satan's rage,
And face a frowning world.

"Let cares like a wild deluge come,
And storms of sorrow fall;
May I but safely reach my home,—
My God,—my heaven, my all.

"Then shall I bathe my weary soul
In seas of heavenly rest,
And not a wave of trouble roll
Across my peaceful breast."

From the time of her conversion till her death she enjoyed, in rich abundance, the smiles of God's countenance, and had "great joy and peace in believing." There was only one occasion when she felt, as it were, a dark cloud come over her bright prospects of heavenly glory; and she had to walk in darkness. This caused her great depression of spirits. She seemed to think that God was forgetting to be gracious, and that she must have done something to displease him. During this period of spiritual darkness, which continued for two days, she read the Scriptures as before, and engaged earnestly in prayer; but felt little comfort from these exercises. I happened to call on the evening of the second day, and found her greatly depressed. She told me her state of mind, and I entered into conversation with her, and pointed out the freeness and fulness of the Gospel offers of salvation, and spoke of the gracious assurance that God has given that he will never leave nor forsake his people; at the same time, noticed that sometimes, for the trial of their faith and patience, he withdraws from them for a little the light of his countenance. This seemed to afford her some relief. Before parting, I prayed, as I was always wont to do; and directed her to some promises, as the subject of her meditation during the night. Next time I called, she was in her usual happy frame of mind: the dark cloud had passed completely away, and she saw the Sun of Righteousness shining in meridian splendour. She felt weaker in body, but stronger in faith, and could again rejoice greatly in the Lord.

I asked her, one day when she appeared a little better, if she had any wish to be restored to health. "O no!" she replied, "I have a strong desire to depart, and to be with Christ,—to be freed from sin, and to be made perfectly holy; and soon I expect the Saviour will send his angels to take me home to himself. Oh! I am glad at the prospect of being ever with the Lord." The time was now at hand when her ardent wish was to be fully gratified. She was reduced in body to a mere skeleton, and the symptoms of death were visible to all who saw her. Last time I visited her, it was apparent her earthly career was soon to terminate; and of this she was perfectly sensible. She said to me, "Now I find death is drawing nigh. Soon my warfare will be accomplished; and I am so happy I shall in a very little time be in glory. What a happy Sabbath the next will be to me,—not on earth, but in heaven!" She had a strong presentiment of her death, and told her mother of this the morning on which she died. To prepare herself for the last struggle, she caused her mother to read the intercessory prayer of our blessed Saviour, in the 17th chapter of John's Gospel; also, the 65th and 66th Hymns, (Second Book), by Dr Watts; in which, as already noticed, she felt great pleasure; and likewise the following, from the General Assembly's collection:—

"The hour of my departure's come,
I hear the voice that calls me home;
At last, O Lord, let trouble cease,
And let thy servant die in peace.

"The race appointed I have run,
The combat's o'er, the prize is won;
And now my witness is on high,
And now my record's in the sky.

"Not in mine innocence I trust,
I bow before thee in the dust,
And through my Saviour's blood alone
I look for mercy at thy throne.

"I leave the world without a tear,
Save for the friends I held so dear:
To heal their sorrows, Lord, descend,—
And to the friendless, prove a friend.

"I come, I come, at thy command,—
I give my spirit to thy hand;
Stretch forth thine everlasting arms,
And shield me in the last alarms.

"The hour of my departure's come,
I hear the voice that calls me home;
Now, O my God! let trouble cease,—
Now let thy servant die in peace."

This hymn, in which she delighted much, was, I believe, the last read in her hearing; and it was exceedingly appropriate to her character, and the situation in which she was now placed, being on the very verge of eternity, and just about to bid farewell for ever to the things of time. For about two hours, she had a severe struggle with the last enemy; after which she became very calm and composed, spoke to her mother of the joyful prospect before her,—and when she saw her mother weeping, she said, "Oh! weep not for me, for I am perfectly happy to leave this world. I am going home to my Father's house, and I hope I shall meet with you and all my friends there." Then, with a smile on her countenance, she laid down her head on the pillow, and gently breathed her soul into the arms of her Redeemer.

Thus died Rosamond Robson, at the early age of twelve years. Her spirit, I doubt not, was conducted by angels into Abraham's bosom, and is now in the enjoyment of perfect felicity. I attended her funeral, and saw her mortal remains laid in the dust, but in the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection. I have witnessed many death-bed scenes, and have seen the power of divine grace displayed in comforting the dying, in the near prospect of dissolution; but never did I witness such a striking manifestation of redeeming love, and of the efficacy of true religion in cheering the mind and comforting the heart, as in the death-bed of this dear young saint. Faith in her was so strong as to amount almost to vision. So far from being afraid of death's approach, she rejoiced at it as a welcome messenger, sent to set her free from the bondage of corruption, and introduce her to the presence of the King of kings. She could triumphantly say, with the apostle, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

To the young her premature death speaks in accents loud as thunder, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. Remember now your Creator, in the days of your youth. Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." Do not procrastinate the season of repentance, for the present time is only yours,—the future is an awful uncertainty, and may never come. And the triumphant manner in which she was enabled to meet death, should teach you to live by faith on the Son of God, and cultivate a spirit and temper becoming the Gospel. Never forget, that if you would "die the death of the righteous," you must live a holy and religious life. While "diligent in business,"—in the discharge of your relative and social duties,—be ye also "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord;" and then, come death when it may, you will be prepared for it, and find it to be "great gain," for so "an abundant entrance will be administered unto you" into the celestial kingdom, there to be for ever with the Lord, and enjoy happiness large as your wishes, and lasting as your immortal souls.

THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY IN COMMON LIFE:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. HENRY GREY, A.M.,

Minister of St Mary's Parish, Edinburgh.

"Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord."—ROM. xii. 11.

It is thought by many, that serious religion, if widely disseminated, would unfit men for the active business of life; that it would teach them to occupy themselves with high and speculative questions, to the neglect of domestic and social duties; that it would make them impatient of their common labours, would chill their ardour, blunt their ingenuity, enfeeble their exertions, and prove an obstacle in the way of all spirited undertakings, and of all improvements in art and science. But this idea arises from total ignorance of the subject, or rather, from deep and inveterate prejudice. True religion, indeed, if generally obeyed, would alter considerably the range and character of human pursuits. It would suppress those arts and avocations that foster licentious and irregular passions, and put an end to those practices that are inconsistent with Christian watchfulness and purity; but in every thing useful and desirable it would greatly improve the condition of men. Inspiring them with love to God and to one another, it would lead to a cheerful and habitual attention to all private and social duties; it would both direct and invigorate their efforts; it would make them better in every relation,—better husbands and wives,—better parents and children,—better masters and servants.

I grant, indeed, that false religion, whether characterised by cold formality, or by hypocrisy and spiritual pride, is far from improving men, as active and useful members of society. A mere formal profession produces no effect on the character, excepting as it serves to harden the mind, and foster a delusive peace. Hypocrisy and spiritual pride are ever accompanied with selfishness and contempt of others, and are hostile to all that is amiable in feeling and liberal in conduct; but let not true religion be charged with effects springing from entirely opposite principles. Religion, rightly so called, renders the soul humble and conscientious, affectionate, and earnest to fulfil its duties toward God and toward men.

I can think of only one state of mind connected with religious experience which deserves to be noticed as unfavourable to the active performance of the duties of common life—the state of a soul oppressed and borne down by a consciousness of sin and guilt. This depression of soul is often experienced in the first formation of the religious principle. When any one, hitherto careless and secure, awakes to a sense of his true position—in the presence of "God the Judge of all," and in the view of death and eternity—he is, naturally and necessarily, so engrossed with his own situation, so oppressed with the heavy burden of his iniquities, so appalled by the awful prospects before him, that we need not wonder if he feels little heart for pursuits that have lost their importance to him, and if he either endeavours to escape from them, or pursues them with a heavy and dejected spirit. But this state of mind is only an accidental and temporary result of religious conviction. Indeed, it is not religion that causes his distress, but a feeling that he has hitherto been destitute of it; or, if the Gospel inflict the wound, it also administers the cure; and when once established in the soul, it diffuses over it the purest joy and peace, and, invigorating and animating all its powers, impels to every act of duty and labour of love.

Accordingly, the apostles, in prescribing the conduct Christians should maintain, by no means confine themselves to duties directly religious—they show that the principles which actuate the believer, in the immediate service of his God, must exert their influence in every situation, and in all the walks of ordinary life. In the beginning of this chapter the apostle exhorts us to "present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God; which is our reasonable service." He then points out a variety of duties relating to ourselves and to others; and in the text adds, "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." This is an interesting subject. When I see you, my friends, continually, day after day, engaged, and properly engaged, in mechanical arts, commercial avocations, agricultural labours, professional pursuits, I cannot but wish that you may be pursuing these occupations in the spirit of Christians—that your exertions may be consecrated to a divine Master, and accepted by him with approbation. How interesting, in this case, your humblest labours!—and how honourable your character!—The diligence in business, which Christians are required to exert, the fervour of spirit with which it is to be accompanied, and the manner in which it becomes a service done to the Lord,—these are the subjects that present themselves to our attention.

1. Diligence in business has, from the beginning of the world, been the allotted duty of man. That he should spend his days in idleness, never was the design of his Creator. Even in paradise, besides those religious exercises which were to engage the higher faculties and affections of the soul, our first parents had an employment assigned them, fitted both to call forth their ingenuity and exercise their physical powers. After the fall, they were doomed to severer toils. It was said to Adam, "Cursed is the ground, for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns, also, and thistles shall it bring forth: in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground." Since the passing of this sentence, bodily labour has been the grand appointed means of human subsistence; labour of one kind or other, the universal duty of man.

The necessity of daily labour, though originally imposed as the punishment of sin, is indeed, for creatures such as man now is, a merciful appointment. This necessity protects us from many temptations and many sins. It imposes a salutary restraint on the ignorant and the vicious; bridle their appetites—keeps their passions in check—holds them back from many a wicked work; it makes them, in various ways, useful members of the community, whereas, without this preventive, they would be let loose to be the plagues and curses of the world. It even civilizes and humanizes them. While labouring for the support of their families, and prosecuting their various arts, they learn to exercise feelings and affections of which otherwise they would be destitute. Their labour, by the appointment of Providence, receives its reward; they eat the fruits of their industry, and distribute these to their children around them. But the labours of life yield still richer benefits to the faithful and the upright, calling into operation many virtues and graces which would otherwise remain dormant, and furnishing continual occasion for the exercise of dependence, prayer, and gratitude. If the necessity of daily labour were done away, and men were left absolute masters of their own time, the world would soon be a scene of confusion and misery. For how many would at once surrender themselves to unrestrained sensual indulgence, and to the impulses of pride and ambition, rapacity and tyranny! Abandoned to the devices of their own hearts, how would the wicked cast off fear, and unite in bitter persecution of the righteous! And how would the better disposed, if special grace prevented not, be carried away with the flood of abounding ungodliness!

The injurious effects of exemption from labour are conspicuous in those regions of the world where, from the fertility of the soil or the habits of the people, there is the smallest portion of regular industry. In those countries where the earth yields her fruits almost spontaneously, and man resigns himself to indolent enjoyment, human nature appears in its least elevated form; men are almost universally sensual and depraved, violent in their passions, deceitful, revengeful. And even among ourselves, who so unhappy and useless as the man who, having no profession, art, or trade, has, at the same time, no capacity or vigour of character to find out and create employment for himself? The precept, "Be not slothful in business," is not more imperative as declaring our duty, than worthy of acceptance as concurring to our happiness.

Now, in the application of this precept, the Christian should see to it, in the first place, that the business or occupation he engages in be a lawful one—consistent with the maintaining "a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man." And it should be his endeavour to find, for the exercise of his employment, a situation favourable to his religious interests. Is it not your duty, for example, as persons professing godliness, to prefer a situation where you may have the benefit of a faithful ministry of the Word to one where you would not have that privilege? If you know and love the Gospel, you will not esteem lightly the ordinances of religion, and will willingly submit to some outward loss rather than relinquish them. If you be in the situation of domestic servants, is it not your duty to prefer a well-regulated and religious family to a family of a different description? If parents are seeking a situation for their children in professional or commercial life, is it not their duty to place them in connection with those, if such can possibly be found, whose authority, and influence, and example may be favourable to the promotion of their best, their eternal interests? The little attention given to such considerations as these, shows how little of conscientious, considerate religion is found among us.

His occupation and his place being fixed, the Christian, in the prosecution of business, must be "not slothful." Whatever be his calling, he must regard its duties as of no trivial importance, but must give them his serious and earnest attention. These are the services in which he is required to show his fidelity to God and man; and he must, therefore, address himself to them with activity and perseverance. His first concern should be to acquire the knowledge and skill necessary for the performance of his duties. The disciple of Christ will not be content to be ignorant and unskilled in the offices that belong to him, but, like the ministers of the Gospel in their proper sphere, will "study to show himself a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." And whatever knowledge and skill he may attain, he will regard these as talents which he is to improve by occupying them. If you would be "not slothful in business," you must study to perform all the duties connected with your daily calling. It is not enough to do some of them, leaving others undone—to perform the easy and pleasant part of your work, neglecting the difficult and unpleasant; but it must be your endeavour to do all things that belong to you to do, and this not carelessly and superficially, but to do them well. You must not do that slightly which requires to be done thoroughly; nor seek only to get through your work, but to accomplish it creditably and effectually. Farther, you must endeavour to do all in its proper time and place—not wasting two or three hours over that which might be done in one, not suffering one duty to interfere with another. It is a good rule not to leave that to the next hour which should be done now, nor that till to-morrow which should be done to-day. You must be thoughtful as well as active, having your duties present in your mind and memory.

This assiduity we often see exerted in the pursuit of worldly objects. How earnest and constant the assiduity of the miser in scraping together wealth!—of the candidate for office in seeking to outstrip his rivals!—of the warrior in defeating the purposes or resisting the power of his foe! But let us refer to purer examples. Where shall we find greater diligence, in civil as well as religious duties, than in Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Daniel? Above all, where any example comparable to that of Christ? "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day," was his emphatic declaration; "the night cometh when no man can work."

But in this diligence in business, continual hindrances arise from sloth—a principle deeply inlaid in our frame, and constantly renewing its influence and repeating its solicitations. In entering on any new course of action, we are perhaps very diligent for a time. But, after exertion, nature requires rest; and though rest is designed only to prepare us for new exertion, yet its sweetness leads us to long for its return, and often to seek it before, by new efforts in duty, we are entitled to its refreshment. There is in us a natural love of ease, and we find many apologies for indulging it. We begin to decline the more arduous parts of duty, or to perform them superficially. This negligence comes at length to be habitual, and extends to our whole course of proceeding. Exertion becomes painful; our thoughts are withdrawn, our hearts are alienated from the serious duties of life, and are given to indulgences and pleasures incompatible with the faithful and successful performance of them. Our loins are no longer girt—our minds become enervate—we even become incapable of diligent application. The encroachments of a slothful spirit are progressive, and its effects soon become visible to others, and even to ourselves. We feel some convictions and pangs of conscience, and make some partial efforts after amendment; but, alas! our nerves are unbraced; and too often the habits induced by sloth, before they are seriously adverted to, have grown too strong to be overcome.

Idleness is usually attended with many other vices—with "foolish talking and jesting"—with censoriousness and backbiting—often with deceit and dishonesty—with drunkenness and dissipation. Its effects are fatally injurious. Idleness, it has been said, is the worst of thieves—robbing a man not only of his substance, but of his respectability. "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: so shall poverty come on thee as destruction, and want as an armed man." Let those who value their true interests, beware of the encroachments of sloth. If you find your minds less impressed than formerly with the obligation of diligence in business; if you perceive that you begin to neglect some parts of duty—to perform others slightly—to indulge in vain talking, and idling away of time; beware—you act not the Christian part, you forfeit your evidence of a right to the title of Christians, and are called seriously to consider whether you are not "lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God."

II. This diligence in business is to be accompanied with ferveur of spirit.—The Gospel prescribes not only the performance of outward duties in the life, but the cultivation of holy principles in the heart. Even in the actions of common life, the heart must still be devoted to God. It is this that distinguishes Christian from heathen morality, and a child of God from the children of the world.

Diligence in business often arises from motives religion has nothing to do with, and exerts itself in ways she cannot approve of. A regard to interest will often make men almost insensible of the influences of sloth, and will stir them up to vigorous and unwearied exertions. But, in addition to "not slothful in business," the apostle adds, "ferveur in spirit;" or rather, as the original Greek intimates, "ferveur in the spirit, serving the Lord." Here he prescribes duties which the men of the world have no conception of, and which exalt the character of the Christian above that of all other men.

What, then, is meant by that ferveur of spirit here prescribed? Not certainly a warmth of temper, an ardour of natural feeling, which at best is an ambiguous quality; but a principle of a spiritual and sacred nature. The expression "the spirit" often stands opposed to "the flesh;" the latter signifying the corrupt nature we bring with us into the world—the former, the new nature formed in us by the Spirit of God. I apprehend the fervency of the spirit here mentioned, signifies the ardent, lively exercise of the principles and graces of the new man. It denotes a holy zeal and fervour in the exercise of faith and love, and purity and good works. Then are we "ferveur in the spirit;" when we feel a holy indignation against sin, whether in ourselves or others—an ardent zeal for the glory of God and the honour of Christ—a fervent love to our fellow-Christians and fellow-creatures—an earnest solicitude for eternal salvation—an impressive sense of judgment to come—a readiness to sacrifice every thing for Christ, and to rejoice in all sufferings for his sake. This fervour of spirit can arise only from true and firm faith in things unseen and eternal; it can be preserved only by habitual close communion with God, and the continual influence of his Holy Spirit.

Now, the precept may be viewed either as a caution or as a direction. It may be taken as a caution; for diligence in the common business of life often introduces negligence in the things of religion. If the cares of the world too much occupy us, we forget the care of eternal things. If the love of the world intrude, we are quickly estranged from the love of God. If our thoughts be employed from morning to night on worldly things, and our hands be full of business, our hearts are too commonly gained over to the world and the things thereof. Occupied with the scene around us, we forget the things that are above. Human agency alone is looked to, Divine Providence is neglected, and sin, becoming familiar, loses its revolting character. Against these evils the apostle warns us: "Be indeed diligent in business, but let not your worldly occupations blunt your spiritual sensibility, nor withdraw your hearts from God. Let not the cares of the world perplex, nor its joys intoxicate, nor its gains cause loss to your souls. No: let a holy fervour be cherished in your hearts—the fervour of love to God and Christ, and his saints; let the sacrifices of prayer and praise be ever offered with fire of the altar; let not the floods of temptation quench or suppress the holy flame."

The precept may also be regarded as a direction. This fervency of spirit which the apostle prescribes, is not merely to be preserved amid the labours of life, but it is to be the animating principle of these labours. In pursuing his common business with diligence, the Christian is not to be actuated by the love of the world, nor merely by the natural desire of obtaining a competent portion of the good things of this life; he is to be under the government of far nobler principles, similar to those which governed his divine Master. It is a holy zeal that is to impel him, inspired by pure and heavenly affections. He is to be animated by a zeal for God's glory; for that great end is promoted in the diligence, purity, activity, and usefulness of his servants—by a desire to advance the Redeemer's honour, for his Gospel is commended by the exemplary conduct of his followers—by an earnest concern for his own salvation, for that salvation he works out in common as well as religious duties—by a love of those of his own house, who are dependent on his exertions—by a sense of the shortness of time, and the nearness of eternity. This holy zeal will, in a thousand ways, direct, restrain, and stimulate the believer in the labours of life. It will preserve him from envy, strife, and selfishness, and excite him to follow with ardour whatever is "true, honest, just, lovely, and of good report."

III. We notice the manner in which diligence in business becomes service done to the Lord. Think not that the service of God is confined to acts of devotion. He is ever near you, ever around you; his claims on you never cease for one moment; he requires you to do him service in the pursuits of ordinary life, as well as in the immediate duties of religion. Now, if you would convert your daily labours into service done to him,—

1. Consider the business in which you are engaged as appointed you by Him; for, in commanding you, as he does in the text, to be "not slothful in business," he requires you to attend to your business as a service assigned you by himself. Learn to regard yourselves, in the occupations of common life, as not your own masters, but as the servants of Christ. It is he who appoints you your place, who numbers out your every hour, and determines every circumstance in your lot. Acquiesce in his appointments. If you have trials, remember he sends them; if duties to perform, he prescribes them. Whatever be the calling of a Christian, his duty is, to "abide in that calling with God." The upright and faithful have ever looked for guidance to a heavenly Master; saying, "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God."

2. Seek from above wisdom and ability to fulfil the duties of your calling, remembering that God is the "giver of every good and perfect gift," and that your dependence on him is unceasing. As Nehemiah, even in the presence of King Artaxerxes, and before answering the question he had put, "prayed to the God of heaven," so do you "acknowledge him in all your ways, that he may direct your steps."

3. Look to him for your reward. As it is he who "blesses the earth, and crowns the year with his goodness," so it is he who prospers and "establishes the work of our hands." If, by your honest exertions, you obtain "bread to eat, and raiment to put on," recognise, in these his gifts, the kindness of your heavenly Father. But be not content with those blessings which he bestows indiscriminately on friends and foes. Let your diligence have a higher object in view: strive to approve it to the Lord, "that of the Lord you may receive the reward of the eternal inheritance." The Master you serve is a liberal Master,—rich, free, infinite, are his rewards.

The observations offered in this discourse refer, it will be seen, to the period of health, and to circumstances as suited to the usual occupations of life. To times of sickness and sorrow other duties belong. But, in ordinary circumstances, the words of the text should lead to a watchful inspection of our every-day life, and of the habitual application of our time and talents. Idleness and sloth, with their many evil concomitants, are most unbecoming in any one professing godliness, and most injurious to the soul, no less than to the outward estate. My brethren, there is a work assigned to each of us, consisting of many duties, and extending to every day, and, in some sense, to every moment of our lives—a work never to be neglected, and in all its parts important. This is the work given us to do in this our state of probation, the labour which God hath appointed to man, to be exercised therewith. Apply yourselves, my Christian friends, to your portion of it with diligence and perseverance. Beware of the encroachments of sloth—in the management of your time, in the performance of your common labours, in the regulation of your thoughts and words,—above all, in the concerns of religion and eternity. Diligence in business is necessary to your success, to your comfort, to your respectability; idleness is injurious, is ruinous to them all. But see to it, that your diligence be animated by Christian motives, and conducted in the Christian spirit; "And whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him." "The time is short,—the fashion of this world passeth away;" the hour approaches when we must, each of us, give account of the things done in the body, whether they have been good or bad. Our every hour, every moment, will enter into that account,—nothing will be neglected, nothing forgotten. The secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, and every man shall receive his exact portion of praise or of condemnation. Wherefore, be careful to "so run that you may obtain" the prize. "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." "Be diligent, that ye may be found of Christ in peace, without spot, and blameless."

SATURDAY NIGHT.

AGAIN the week's dull labours close,—
The sons of toil from toil repose;
And fast the evening gloom descends,
While home the weary peasant wends.
This night his eyes, in slumber sweet,
Shall droop their lids; to-morrow greet
A day of calm content and rest,—
To labour's aching limbs how blest!

Now, ere I seek my peaceful bed,
And on the pillow rest my head,
O come, my soul, and wide display
The mercies of the week and day!
From danger who my frame hath kept,
While waking, and what time I slept?
Who hath my every want supplied,
And to my footsteps proved a guide?

'Tis thou, my God!—to thee belong
Incense of praise, and hallowed song;
To thee be all the glory given,
Of all my mercies under heaven.
From thee my daily bread and health,
Each comfort—all my spirit's wealth,
Have been derived; my sins alone,
And errings I can call my own.

Oh! when to-morrow's sun shall rise,
And light once more shall glad these eyes,
May I thy blessed Sabbath prove
A day of holy rest and love.
May my Redeemer's praises claim
My constant thought; the Spirit's flame
Descend, my accents to inspire,
And fill my soul with rapture's fire.

And when the night of Death is come,
And I must slumber in the tomb,
Oh! then, my God, this faint heart cheer,
And far dispel the shades of fear;
And teach me, in thy strength, to tread
The path which leads me to the dead,
Assured, when life's hard toils are o'er,
Of rest with thee for evermore!

WALKER.

MISSIONARY OPERATIONS AT ATHENS.

FROM the writings of a recent traveller in Greece, we extract the following interesting account of the labours of the American Missionaries in the once famous Athenian capital.

The first thing we did in Athens was to visit the American missionary school. Among the extraordinary changes of an ever-changing world, it is not the least that the young America is at this moment paying back the debt which the world owes to the mother of science, and the citizen of a country which the wisest of the Greeks never dreamed of, is teaching the descendants of Plato and Aristotle the elements of their own tongue. I did not expect among the ruins of Athens to find any thing that would particularly touch my national feelings, but it was a subject of deep and interesting reflection that, in the city which surpassed all the world in learning, where Socrates, and Plato, and Aristotle taught, and Cicero went to study, the only door of instruction was that opened by the hands of American citizens, and an American missionary was the only schoolmaster; and I am ashamed to say that I was not aware of the existence of such an institution until advised of it by my friend Dr W.

In 1830, the Rev. Messrs Hill and Robinson, with their families, sailed from this city (New York) as the agents of the Episcopal Missionary Society, to found schools in Greece. They first established themselves in the island of Tenos, but finding that it was not the right field for their labours, employed themselves in acquiring a knowledge of the language, and of the character and habits of the modern Greeks. Their attention was directed to Athens, and in the spring of 1831 they made a visit to that city, and were so confirmed in their impressions, that they purchased a lot of ground on which to erect edifices for a permanent establishment; and, in the meantime, rented a house for the immediate commencement of a school. They returned to Tenos for their families and effects, and again arrived at Athens about the end of June following. From the deep interest taken in their struggle for liberty, and the timely help furnished them in their hour of need, the Greeks were warmly prepossessed in favour of our countrymen; and the conduct of the missionaries themselves was so judicious, that they were received with the greatest respect and the warmest welcome by the public authorities and the whole population of Athens. Their furniture, printing-presses, and other effects, were admitted free of duties; and it is but justice to them to say, that since that time they have moved with such discretion among an excitable and suspicious people, that, while they have advanced in the great objects of their mission, they have grown in the esteem and good-will of the best and most influential inhabitants of Greece; and so great was Mr Hill's confidence in their affections, that, though there was at that time a great political agitation, and it was apprehended that Athens might again become the scene of violence and bloodshed, he told me he had no fears, and felt perfectly sure that, in any outbursting of popular fury, himself and family, and the property of the mission, would be respected.

In the middle of the summer of their arrival at Athens, Mrs Hill opened a school for girls in the magazine or cellar of the house in which they resided. The first day she had twenty pupils, and in two months one hundred and sixty-seven. Of the first ninety-six, not more than six could read at all, and that very imperfectly; and not more than ten or twelve knew a letter. At the time of our visit, the school numbered nearly five hundred; and when we entered the large room, and the scholars all rose in a body to greet us as Americans, I felt a deep sense of regret that, personally, I had no hand in such a work, and almost envied the fel-

* Since my return home I have seen, in a newspaper, an account of a popular commotion at Syra, in which the printing-presses and books of the missionaries were destroyed, and Mr Robinson was threatened with personal violence.

ings of my companion, one of its patrons and founders. Besides teaching them gratitude to those from whose country they derived the privileges they enjoyed, Mr Hill had wisely endeavoured to impress upon their minds a respect for the constituted authorities,—particularly important in that agitated and unsettled community; and on one end of the walls, directly fronting the seats of the scholars, was printed, in large Greek characters, the text of Scripture, "Fear God. Honour the king."

It was all-important for the missionaries not to offend the strong prejudices of the Greeks by any attempt, in the first instance, to withdraw the children from the religion of their fathers; and the school purports to be, and is intended for, the diffusion of elementary education only; but it is opened in the morning with prayer, concluding with the Lord's Prayer as read in our churches, which is repeated by the whole school aloud; and on Sundays, besides, the prayers, the Creed, and sometimes the Ten Commandments, are recited, and a chapter from the Gospels is read aloud by one of the scholars, the missionaries deeming this more expedient than to conduct the exercises themselves. The lesson for the day is always the portion appointed for the Gospel of the day in their own Church; and they close by singing a hymn. The room is thrown open to the public, and is frequently resorted to by the parents of the children, and strangers; "some coming, perhaps," says Mr Hill, "to hear what these habblers will say;" and "other some" from a suspicion that "we are setters forth of strange gods."

The boys' school is divided into three departments, the lowest under charge of a Greek, qualified on the Lancasterian system. They were of all ages, from three to eighteen; and, as Mr Hill told me, most of them had been half-clad, dirty, ragged little urchins, who, before they were put to their A, B, C, or rather, their Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, had to be thoroughly washed, rubbed, scrubbed, doctored, and dressed, and, but for the school, would now, perhaps, be prowling vagabonds in the streets of Athens, or training for robbery in the mountains. They were a body of fine-looking boys, possessing, as Mr Hill told me, in an extraordinary degree, all that liveliness of imagination, that curiosity and eagerness after knowledge, which distinguished the Greeks of old; retaining, under centuries of dreadful oppression, the recollection of the greatness of their fathers; and, what was particularly interesting, many of them bearing the great names so familiar in Grecian history. I shook hands with a little Miltiades, Leonidas, Aristides, &c., in features and apparent intelligence worthy of the descendants of the immortal men whose names they bear.

But the principal and most interesting part of this missionary school was the female department under the direction of Mrs Hill; the first, and, except at Syra, the only school for females in all Greece, and particularly interesting to me, from the fact that it owed its existence to the active benevolence of my own countrywoman. At the close of the Greek revolution, female education was a thing entirely unknown in Greece, and the women of all classes were in a most deplorable state of ignorance. When the strong feeling that ran through our country in favour of this struggling people had subsided, and Greece was freed from the yoke of the Mussulman, an association of ladies in the little town of Troy, perhaps instigated somewhat by an inherent love of power and extended rule, and knowing the influence of their sex in a cultivated state of society, formed the project of establishing at Athens a school exclusively for the education of females; and, humble and unpretending as was its commencement, it is becoming a more powerful instrument in the civilization and moral and religious improvement of Greece, than all that European diplomacy has ever done for her. The girls were distributed in different classes, according to their age and advancement; they had clean faces and hands (a rare thing with Greek children), and were neatly dressed; many of them wearing frocks made by ladies at home,—probably at some of our sewing societies.

Mr and Mrs Hill accompanied us through the whole establishment, and being Americans, we were everywhere looked upon and received by the girls as patrons and fathers of the school.

Before we went away, the whole school rose at once and gave us a glorious finale with a Greek hymn. In a short time these girls will grow up into women, and return to their several families; others will succeed them, and again go out, and every year hundreds will distribute themselves in the cities and among the fastnesses of the mountains, to exercise over their fathers, and brothers, and families, the influence of the education acquired here; instructed in all the arts of women in civilized domestic life, firmly grounded in the principles of morality, and of religion purified from the follies, absurdities, and abominations of the Greek faith. I have seen much of the missionary labours in the East, but I do not know an institution which promises so surely the happiest results. If the women are educated, the men cannot remain ignorant; if the women are enlightened in religion, the men cannot remain debased and degraded Christians.

The ex-secretary Rigos was greatly affected at the appearance of this female school; and, after surveying it attentively for some moments, pointed to the Parthenon on the summit of the Acropolis, and said to Mrs Hill, with deep emotion, "Lady, you are erecting in Athens a monument more enduring and more noble than yonder temple;" and the king was so deeply impressed with its value, that, a short time before my arrival, he proposed to Mr Hill to take into his house girls from different districts, and educate them as teachers, with the view of sending them back to their districts, there to organize new schools, and carry out the great work of female education. Mr Hill acceded to the proposal, and the American missionary school now stands as the nucleus of a large and growing system of education in Greece; and, very opportunely for my purpose, within a few days I have received a letter from Mr Hill, in which, in relation to the school, he says, "Our missionary establishment is much increased since you saw it; our labours are greatly increased, and I think I may say we have now reached the summit of what we had proposed to ourselves. We do not think it possible that it can be extended farther without much larger means, and more personal aid: we do not wish or intend to ask for either. We have now nearly forty persons residing with us, of whom thirty-five are Greeks, all of whom are brought within the influence of the Gospel; the greater part of them are young girls from different parts of Greece, and even from Egypt and Turkey (Greeks, however), whom we are preparing to be instructresses of youth hereafter in their various districts. We have five hundred, besides, under daily instruction in the different schools under our care; and we employ under us in the schools twelve native teachers, who have themselves been instructed by us. We have provided for three of our dear pupils (all of whom were living with us when you were here), who are honourably and usefully settled in life. One is married to a person every way suited to her, and both husband and wife are in our missionary service. One has charge of the Government female school at the Piræus, and supports her father and mother and a large family by her salary; and the third has gone with our missionaries to Crete, to take charge of the female schools there. We have removed into our new house" (of which the foundation was just laid at the time of my visit), "and, large as it is, it is not half large enough. We are trying to raise ways and means to enlarge it considerably, that we may take more boarders under our own roof, which we look up to as the most important means of making sure of our labour; for every one who comes to reside with us is taken away from the corrupt example exhibited at home, and brought within a wholesome influence. Lady Byron has just sent us one hundred pounds towards enlarging our house with this view, and we have commenced the erection of three additional dormitories with the money."

Athens is again the capital of a kingdom. Enthusiasts see, in her present condition, the promise of a restoration to her ancient greatness; but reason and observation assure us that the world is too much changed for her ever to be what she has been. In one respect, her condition resembles that of her best days; for, as her fame then attracted strangers from every quarter of the world to study in her schools, so now the capital of King Otho has become a great gathering-place of wandering spirits from many near and distant regions. For ages difficult and dangerous of access, the ancient capital of the arts lay shrouded in darkness, and almost cut off from the civilized world. At long intervals, a few solitary travellers only found their way to it; but since the revolution, it has again become a place of frequent resort and intercourse. It is true that the ancient halls of learning are still solitary and deserted, but strangers from every nation now turn hither;—the scholar, to roam over her classic soil; the artist, to study her ancient monuments; and the adventurer, to carve his way to fortune.

The first day I dined at the hotel I had an opportunity of seeing the variety of material congregated in the reviving city. We had a long table, capable of accommodating about twenty persons. The manner of living was à la carte, each guest dining when he pleased; but, by tacit consent, at about six o'clock all assembled at the table. We presented a curious medley. No two were from the same country. Our discourse was in English, French, Italian, German, Greek, Russian, Polish, and I know not what else, as if we were the very people stricken with confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel. Dinner over, all fell into French, and the conversation became general. Every man present was, in the fullest sense of the term, a citizen of the world. It had been the fortune of each, whether good or bad, to break the little circle in which so many are born, revolve, and die; and the habitual mingling with people of various nations had broken down all narrow prejudices, and given to every one freedom of mind and force of character. All had seen much, had much to communicate, and felt that they had much yet to learn. By some accident, moreover, all seemed to have become particularly interested in the East. They travelled over the whole range of Eastern politics, and, to a certain extent, considered themselves identified with Eastern interests. Most of the company were or had been soldiers, and several wore uniforms and stars, or decorations of some description. They spoke of the different campaigns in Greece in which some of them had served; of the science of war; of Marlborough, Eugene, and more modern captains; and I remember that they startled my feelings of classical reverence by talking of Leonidas at Thermopylæ, and Miltiades at Marathon, in the same tone as of Napoleon at Leipsic and Wellington at Waterloo. One of them constructed on the table, with the knives and forks and spoons, a map of Marathon, and with a sheathed yataghan pointed out the position of the Greeks and Persians, and showed where Miltiades, as a general, was wrong. They were not blinded by the dust of antiquity. They had been knocked about till all enthusiasm and all reverence for the past were shaken out of them, and they had learned to give things their right names. A French engineer showed us the skeleton of a map of Greece, which was then preparing under the direction of the French Geographical Society, exhibiting an excess of mountains and deficiency of plain which surprised even those who had travelled over every part of the kingdom. One had just come from Constantinople, where he had seen the sultan going to mosque; another had escaped from an attack of the plague in Egypt; a third gave the dimensions of the Temple of the Sun at Baalbeck; and a fourth had been at Babylon, and seen the ruins of the Tower of Babel. In short, every man had seen something which the others had not seen,—and all their knowledge was thrown into a common stock. I found myself at once among a new class of men; and I turned from him who sneered at Miltiades to him who had seen the sultan, or to him who had been at Bagdad, and listened with interest, somewhat qualified by consciousness of my own inferiority. I was lying in wait, however, and took advantage of an opportunity to throw in something about America; and, at the sound, all turned to me with an eagerness of curiosity that I had not anticipated.

In Europe, and even in England, I had often found extreme ignorance of my own country; but here I was astonished to find, among men so familiar with all parts of the Old World, such total lack of information about the New. A gentleman opposite me, wearing the uniform of the King of Bavaria, asked me if I had ever been in America. I told him that I was born, and, as they say in Kentucky, raised there. He begged my pardon, but doubtfully suggested, "You are not black?" and I was obliged to explain to him that in our section of America the Indian had almost entirely disappeared, and that his place was occupied by the descendants of the Gaul and the Briton. I was forthwith received into the fraternity, for my home was farther away than any of them had ever been. My friend opposite considered me a bijou, asked me innumerable questions, and seemed to be constantly watching for the breaking out of the cannibal spirit,—as if expecting to see me bite my neighbour.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Death is great gain.—"To die is gain;" but it is gain to them only to whom it has been "Christ to live;" and by how much the greater salvation has been tendered, and by how much the easier the terms have been on which it was tendered, so much the blacker confusion must our face one day gather; if our obstinacy in sin has abused the long suffering of the Lord, and we have presumed on the merits of his blood to disgrace the name of his religion! Those are ill taught in the language of Scripture who suppose that salvation is not offered to us, but forced on us; who forget that they are the children of God who only are heirs with Christ of a happy immortality; and that the promise is not that we shall be made the sons of God, but that "power shall be given us" to become so.—BISHOP HEBER.

The Lord looked upon Peter.—Surely no malefactor condemned to suffer for the violated laws of his country, ever heard his last hour strike upon the prison bell with half the agony of feeling with which that cock-crowing rang upon the ears of Peter. Still was there a sight which smote far deeper than that sound: "The Lord turned and looked upon Peter." Who can portray the silent eloquence of that last look? What volumes must it have spoken to the fallen apostle! Could he behold that well-known countenance, and again repeat, "I know not the man?" Could he see his divine Master "as a sheep before his shearers is dumb," and again break forth into oaths and imprecations? Could he bear the reproach of that meek eye, and yet remain in the gully scene amidst those enemies of the Saviour and of his own soul? No! that single glance was all that was required to send home the arrow of conviction and repentance to his bosom; he instantly "remembered the word that the Lord had spoken, and he went out and wept bitterly."—BLUNT.

The Gospel of Christ.—"Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," was the sum of the apostolical instructions. It is not an occasional invocation of the name of Christ, or a transient recognition of his authority, that fills up the measure of the terms, believing in Jesus. This we shall find no such easy task; and if we trust that we do believe, we should all perhaps do well to cry out, in the words of an imploring supplicant, (he supplicated not in vain,) "Lord, help thou our unbelief." We must be deeply conscious of our guilt and misery, heartily repenting of our sins, and firmly resolving to forsake them; and thus penitently "seeking for refuge to the hope set before us." We must found altogether on the merit of the crucified Redeemer, our hopes of escape from their deserved punishment, and of deliverance from their enslaving power. This must be our first, our last, our only plea. We are to surrender our lives up to him, to "be washed in his blood," Rev. i. 5; to be sanctified by his Spirit; resolving to receive him for our Lord and Master; to learn in his school; to obey all his commandments.—W. WILBERFORCE, ESQ.

THE WITNESSES FOR CHRIST IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

THE following excellent remarks form a part of the Appendix to an Ordination Charge, which has been recently published. It is a very faithful, well written production, from the pen of the Rev. James Young, Minister of the Gospel, Tillicoultry. We are particularly pleased with the unflinching firmness with which the excellent author maintains the integrity of the standards in these days of melancholy laxity.

"A seed shall serve Him," it is said (Ps. xxii. 30), nor in any past age, however degenerate, has the prediction failed of accomplishment; there always has been "a generation" of those who have resembled Him, and so proved themselves "born from above." When Romanists ask us Protestants where our religion was before Luther's time? (and the question is a legitimate one, resting on the just assumption, that the true religion never dies out or becomes defunct among men,) our answer is easy; and it may consist of two allegations. Of these, the one is, that amidst all the ignorance, error, secularity, wickedness, and impiety, that stain the history of ecclesiastical society, and even within the pale of the Church calling herself Catholic and Apostolical, it is possible to trace, in various periods and countries, numbers of persons who repudiated her errors and heresies, and although in, were not of her. The language of prophecy itself, in the call addressed to some within the mystical Babylon, "Come out of her, my people" (Rev. xviii. 41), plainly supposes this. The other allegation is, that Christianity subsisted in scriptural purity and substantial identity with Protestantism, among portions of mankind who, for a succession of ages, stood aloof from, and abhorred even an external alliance with, the Romish Antichrist. Among these the Vaudois, otherwise called Waldenses, occupy a conspicuous and honourable place. Of this nation of confessors and martyrs, the original and indeed the constant seat lay in that part of the Alps which skirts the north of Italy, in and opposite Piedmont,—a region well fitted, by its mountain recesses, to afford a refuge from the many and cruel persecutions inflicted on them, first, by the Pagan emperors of Rome, and afterwards by the same spirit of evil working in the Popes; for, in fact, they suffered a series of persecutions from both. Church history distinctly avers, that the Christian religion was planted on both sides of the Alps in the second century; but the constant tradition of the Vaudois, dates its extension to their ancestors as early as the times of the apostles. The locality of Piedmont, viewed in connection with the facts recorded in the New Testament, respecting the propagation of Christianity in Rome and the south of Italy, by Paul and his fellow-labourers,—the considerable number of these men, their well-known activity, and the journeys or missionary tours they are said to have made,—all these things supply very strong presumptive evidence in favour of the tradition. History not only makes the existence of Christianity in Piedmont coeval with the apostles, but describes the occasion of its extension to that quarter, which is said to have been the persecution carried on by Nero against the Christians in Rome and the southern parts of Italy, as Henry Arnaud, a writer of the seventeenth century, affirms in the following words:—"Neither has their (the Vaudois) Church been ever reformed, whence its title, Evangelic. The Vaudois are, in fact, descended from those refugees from Italy, who, after St Paul had there preached the Gospel, abandoned their beautiful country, like the woman mentioned in the Apocalypse, and fled to those wild mountains, where they have, to this day, handed down the Gospel from father to son, in the same purity and simplicity as it was preached by St Paul." By this account, which, in truth, is that of many other and earlier writers, the Waldenses were a branch of the primitive Italian Church.

To sketch, even in the most rapid manner, the history of the Waldenses, from their reception of the Gospel, down to the full development of "The Man of Sin," and during the season in which they only occupied a place among the various communities that, with greater or lesser degrees of purity, professed the Christian religion, is no part of the present design. During that period, we believe, they endured their full share of suffering; but the grandest trial and triumph of their constancy took place in what have been called the middle or dark ages. "Here," in the language of Scripture, "is the patience and the faith of the saints." Rev. xiii. 10. Even after the Church in the ancient kingdom of Lombardy, within whose limits Piedmont was at that time situated, after holding out against the encroachments of Rome longer than those Churches which were remotest from the metropolis of Antichrist, did at length, in the eleventh century, yield to that domination, the Vaudois, unmoved by the defection of their neighbours, maintained their independence of the Papal see: and then, in that long and dreary period that followed, and in which a darkness that might have been felt settled down upon all Europe, the habitable parts of the Cottian Alps, like Goshen in the preternatural night of Egypt, continued to be cheered by the lamp of scriptural knowledge, and the benign influence of true Christianity. The lamp did not burn more dimly because of the general obscurity, or because of those lesser lights (kindled, by the way, chiefly from itself) which sprang up for shorter periods, and in different places; these served to alleviate, indeed, the darkness of these localities, but not to disperse the prevailing gloom. "The light shined in the darkness, but the darkness comprehended it not." And, like the true "eternal fire," which it was, it never ceased to shine, till overpowered by the brighter effulgence that arose on the world at the revival of letters and the era of the Reformation. Thus, Waldensian fidelity to the Christian cause stretched over a period of five centuries, affording an example of constancy as remarkable for the length of its endurance as the particular season over which it extended. Where, in all the Christian history, do we find the like, even in the case of Churches more favourably situated for the maintenance of their purity, and exposed to fewer temptations? Surely the finger of Providence should be acknowledged in this singular conservation of the truth; and in this, as above hinted, is to be found what "the Spirit of prophecy" meant to adumbrate, when it testified beforehand of the woman who fled into the wilderness, where she had a place prepared of God for her reception and support. Rev. xii. 6.

"Rejoice that human hearts, through scorn,
Through shame, through death, made strong,
Before the rocks and heavens have borne Witness of God so long."—Felicia Hemans.

To the numerous and heavy afflictions borne by the Vaudois on account of their religion, their extraordinary magnanimity and perseverance in spite of these, the high state of morality obtaining among them, and the zeal with which they endeavoured, under the greatest discouragements, to extend the knowledge of the Gospel in various countries, including England, Germany, Spain, and Calabria (by these efforts, though they did not extensively succeed at the time, sowing that precious seed, which was warmed into life at length by the genial influence of the Reformation):—to all these things, almost all writers of all ages and parties, who have approached the subject, bear their united testimony. But an occurrence which took place within the territories of the Waldenses, in the middle of the seventeenth century (whether in 1655 or 1659 does not on a cursory examination clearly appear), and which was meant for evil, served in the issue to put mankind in possession of a far greater amount of information respecting them, than possibly might otherwise have been obtained. This was a persecution raised against them at that time by their Roman Catholic neighbours, and which had for its object, not only the extermination of the people, but of the historical monuments which they possessed of their early and separate existence as a nation, professing and practising a different religion. The destruction of these precious literary remains proceeded to a lamentable extent, and among the sufferers from the worse than Gothic rapacity of the plunderers, was John Leger, one of the pastors or "barbes," as they were called, who was deprived of "every leaf of manuscript" that he possessed. The loss suffered by Leger, however, only stirred him up to the business of collecting manuscripts, and after "incredible" exertions in those valleys which had not been rifled by the persecutors, as being under the government of France, he succeeded in not only obtaining copies of those he had lost, but in discovering a great number of others equally valuable, amounting in all to twenty-one volumes, which he delivered to Sir S. Morland, at that time in Italy, and who, having returned to England, deposited them in one of the libraries of the University of Cambridge, where the greater part may still be seen. Of these invaluable papers, authentic memorials of the Vaudois, a number were appended by Leger to the historical work given to the world by himself; some also have been attached to the publications of Mr Jones and Mr Blair. Would it not be highly desirable, that some one, having access to the MSS., and who is, at the same time, competent to the task, should examine and publish such of them as have not yet seen the light, so that the Protestant world may have the full benefit of whatever further information they contain, respecting a people whose annals are so full of interest to every enlightened Christian? The documents appended to his work by Mr Blair, consist of confessions and catechisms, and other public papers of various dates, from the commencement of the twelfth century downwards. They indicate a state of high Christian intelligence on the part of their authors; they throw a flood of light on the faith, worship, and discipline of the Waldensian Churches; they show that not only in the leading articles of faith, but even in minute details, they were at one with the early Churches of the Reformation; they go farther, and prove that even in matters of external church order, about some of which the first Reformers differed, the Vaudois very nearly approximated to the order obtaining in Presbyterian communities. Any one who chooses to consult the papers referred to, will be easily convinced of all this, and satisfied that the affirmation above made, as to their oneness with the Westminster Confession in reference to doctrinal articles, is correct.

Owing to the singular fidelity with which the Waldenses preserved the faith and practice of primitive Christianity, they have always been regarded with no small deference, and their sentiments appealed to as a kind of authority on questions which divide the opinions of modern Protestants. The writer has felt a degree of curiosity to ascertain what their views were on the question, so much agitated of late, as to the extent of the atonement; and he embraces the opportunity to submit the result of his inquiries into such of the documents above referred to, as he has had the opportunity to peruse. The following extracts are all which have met his eye, as bearing on the point at issue, and they seem decisive:—

"Because Adam sinned at the first beginning,

"By eating of the forbidden fruit,

"And thus the grain of the seed taking root in others,

"He brought death to himself and his posterity.

"Well may we see this is an evil morsel.

"Howsoever, Christ hath redeemed the good by his death and passion."

Extract from "The Noble Lesson," a treatise dating A. D. 1100. It contains chiefly a narrative of the events of Scripture history; and is in a kind of blank verse, that "the youth may more easily imprint it on the memory."

"Christ is our life, peace, and righteousness, and pastor and advocate, and sacrifice and priest, who died for the salvation of all those that believe, and rose for our justification."—Confession of Faith of date A. D. 1120, article 7th.

"All those of our profession teach that his (Christ's) death and blood are sufficient to abolish and expiate all the sins of all men."—Confession of A. D. 1508.

"That Jesus Christ having been ordained by the eternal decree of God, to be the only true Saviour, and only Head of that body which is the Church, he redeemed it with his own blood in the fulness of time, and offers and communicates unto the same all his benefits by the Gospel."—Confession of 1655, article 12th.

"That God so loved the world, that is to say, those whom he has chosen out of the world, that he gave his own Son to save us by his most perfect obedience, especially that obedience which he expressed in his suffering the accursed death of the cross, and also by his victory over the devil, sin, and death."—Same Confession, article 14th.

In all this, there is nothing like the doctrine of Arminius concerning the extent of the atonement, as laid down in the second of the five celebrated articles of his creed, thus: "That Jesus Christ, by his death and sufferings, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular;—that, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of their divine benefit."—M. A. cent. xxiii. ch. 3.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE
SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—A Pastoral Address on Sabbath Observance. By the Presbytery of Kirkaldy, ..... Page 705 2.—Sacred Poetry. "The Scheme of Redemption," ..... 708 3.—History of the Albigenses. Period II. To the Death of Simon de Montfort. Part I., ..... 6. 4.—On the Salts or Saline Substances, referred to in Scripture. By the Rev. James Brodie, A. M., ..... 710	5.—Sacred Poetry. "Emmaus." By Raffles, ..... Page 712 6.—A Discourse. By the Rev. John Paul, ..... 6. 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Baxter, Sheppard, and Bayly, ..... 717 8.—On the Three Persons in the Godhead. By the Rev. James Brewster, D. D., ..... 710
---	---

A PASTORAL ADDRESS ON SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

BY THE PRESBYTERY OF KIRKALDY.

BRETHREN,—They who, by office, are bound to watch over you in the Lord, deem it to be an imperative duty, at the present time, to address you with all plainness, on a matter which greatly concerns your character as Christians, and your obligation, as accountable beings, to conform to the legislative will of your Almighty Creator.

Need we remind you of that will, so emphatically declared in the fourth commandment of the decalogue? Ye know it well. But we pray you to reflect how fearfully significant is that word,—"Remember,—remember the Sabbath-day—remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy!"—"Speak unto the children of Israel, saying,—verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you."—"Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death."—"It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever."—"For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day, He rested and was refreshed."—"Wherefore, the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." With such solemnity was the commandment given! With such impressive sanctions was it promulgated to Israel in the wilderness. Not that the Sabbath was then first enjoined and imposed on a single nation, as a badge of their peculiarity; for its institution dates from the completion of the revealed creation, having been given to the parents of the human race as a law; doubtless, to the whole world that should in successive ages descend from them. And though Christianity may have altered something that was positive, or ceremonial, in the institution, as observed by Israel of old, it were a grand mistake to infer from this, that by the New Testament dispensation, the institution itself has been abrogated, or shorn of its sanctity. There is a reason for Sabbath-rest, which is in its nature moral and immutable; and though its observance might be vindicated on the lower ground of its being evidently beneficial and expedient for man, and other creatures put under him, we cannot lose sight of the higher argument, nor cease to maintain, that He who gave us a being, justly claims a certain portion of our time to be sacredly devoted to his service and glory. Such is His sovereign will! And need we remind you, brethren, that God-fearing men, in all ages, have been of one mind, and one general practice, as to the keeping of this everlasting and most salutary commandment; for, was there ever a religious community, well-reported of, that neglected, or did not carefully observe the Sabbath? Was there ever, in all the commonwealth of Israel, a tribe, or family, or single individual, eminent for religious attainments, that was not eminently devoted to the keeping of that day? We answer—not one! Neither know we any one thing that shall afford a fairer and more faithful criterion of national or personal religion, than does this point of Sabbath observance, which may still, in a manner, be regarded as a sign expressive of our relation to God.

"The Sabbath was made for man," said He, who is also "Lord of the Sabbath-day." And truly wholesome and pleasant to a religious mind is the observance of it; for in the sacred stillness of a Sabbath atmosphere, grace grows exceedingly; and by frequenting its soul-feeding ordinances, man's moral constitution acquires a healthier tone and a finer sensibility where spiritual life is; and, if it is lacking, there is provision made for its revival,—Psalm lxxxvii. 5. The soul is elevated and refined by its nearer intercourse with Heaven, the benign influence of which, spreads over Sabbath hours and exercises an air of heavenly fragrance that soothes, and enlivens the strictest piety.

But high as is the authority which enjoins Sabbath rest, and unspeakably profitable to man as it unquestionably is to observe it, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that among ourselves, and throughout our land—once distinguished for better things—a practical inattention to the Sabbath exists and is growing. Whither shall we go, and not find examples of this? What place is exempt from sights and sounds of Sabbath desecration? The news of the world are careered from city to city with enforced acceleration, in order to provide fresh alimnet for minds, which cannot endure that a Sabbath interval should divide their course of worldliness, and impede any of its wonted channels of intelligence and entertainment. The lovers of pleasure, the agents of business, speed their needless way on sea or land, striving all they can, not to remember the Sabbath-day, nor keep it holy. Sabbath traffic, though forbidden, lurks in our streets; worldly business hath its announcements flaring on the walls and gates of God's house, as if it were a place reared for the god of this world and those that worship him! Nor can we forbear to notice that, in some places, without the plea of necessity, the funeral proceesion, to save a week-day hour, unworthily takes from the Lord's day, nor counts it robbery.

These, in general, and others that we might refer to, are public evils, in some instances sanctioned by authority, and tolerated in all. But against the sanction and the toleration, we lift up the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and can extend to them neither countenance nor exculpation. But, while we testify and warn you against evils like these, which, with a high hand, and it may be, with an authoritative front, invade our Sabbath rest, we are not less bound to testify and approve for inattention to the duties of the Lord's day, though no external despite be done to it, as a divine institution, in the way of open and offensive violation. For, what avails it that the business of this world is suspended, if the proper business of the Sabbath be left undone? The required cessation "from worldly employments and recreations" releases, indeed, from incompatible engagements, and leaves one in a condition for entering on the proper duties of the Sabbath, but does nothing more; and in this position, should the mind remain unoccupied, and the thoughts be misapplied, the mere bodily resting were but a worthless and a wretched thing. We say, wretched, for it is universally felt and confessed, that truly wretched is the state of those, who, shut out from the engrossing avocations of the week-day calling, do not supply their place with the heart-stirring interests that Sabbath duties give rise to.

Now, in noticing prevailing omissions as to Sabbath duties, we cannot overlook what, in a great degree, is the cause of them all,—the want or weakness of a devotional spirit. That day calls for devotion early and late,—devotion in the closet, in the family, and in the house of God. The meditations of the day, the social intercourse, the whole carriage and conduct, in public and in private, should be characterised by devotion; for, if that be wanting, how can the services of religion, appropriate to the day, the family worship, the secret prayer, the Scripture lection, and church solemnities, be adequately fulfilled? Nay, wanting the principle of devotion, all will be neglected, or gone about in a manner unprofitable to the performer of them, and dishonouring to God.

We have heard of the devotion of our forefathers,—what prayers they offered, and what sacrifices they willingly made, of goods, or life itself, in order to enjoy the ordinances of their God. Do we resemble them in this respect? or rather, must we not confess, that the spirit of devotion hath greatly left us, and the very aspect of it solemnizes our public assemblies no more? It is plainly wanting in the gathered flock, and seldom visible in the individual family apart. Hence, domestic religion has seldom a place assigned it in the family arrangements. The morning and evening sacrifice, indeed, is still offered by a goodly number among us; but the greater part, we fear, count it no honour to be priests unto God in such offices, and habitually contemn them. There are heads of families that tell their children that all should pray, who are themselves never seen by their children in the exercise of prayer,—not even on a sacramental day, when they went to the table of the Lord, or brought their offspring to the baptismal font.

Thus, unexercised at home, how unprepared come they to the house of God! There, nothing is learnt,—nothing seems to edify or impress.—nothing delights them in the service but its close. To a people thus lifeless and undevout, the sanctuary feel as a house of bondage; and though, in compliance with custom, it is their manner to resort to it, very small matters are made to serve as an excuse for non-attendance,—a little excess of heat or cold, or wet or wind, constituting a potent reason for an often-occurring absence: and if God, in his providence, has placed one high in the conditions of life, or contrariwise, very low,—in the one case, rank, riches, or official station, are held to justify an unfrequent or partial attendance; and in the other, the privations of poverty are alleged. "A punctual appearance in the house of God, morning and evening, should not be required from persons like us,—of note and consideration; surely, for us, half-day attendance is enough, and that, also, when perfectly convenient." So speak the more consequential class; while the poor man points to his mean attire and precarious means, and thinks church-going altogether out of his way. Give him better appointments, and none more willing than he,—while the superior appointments he covets, constitute to the possessors of them an excuse.

Thus, a certain amount of wealth, or height in station, or deficiency in the means of life, alike detain from public worship. The fatigues of labour are pleaded by some, and the delicate lassitude that results from doing nothing, deters others; and thus do numbers flee from the means of grace as unendurable. The very day that God specially calls perishing sinners to wait upon him, in order to receive blessings of salvation, that day is to them most unwelcome, and sedulously turned to other uses,—uses most incompatible with devotion. To be so estranged from him that made them,—to be so alienated and averse that they flee from his ordinances, shun the intercourse of prayer, and hate godliness in proportion to its power, is most perilous and heaven-provoking. But it is, meanwhile, says the profaner of the Lord's Day, much more pleasant and joyous to spend the day as one lists,—at ease or motion, as taste, inclination, or opportunity, shall prompt. Compared with this freedom, how joyless is the austerity and gloom of what is called—Sabbath-rest.

And is Sabbath-rest, then, rightly understood, answerable to this account of it? Far from it. On the contrary, it is full of sublime interest, and fraught with enjoyment. When the Creator had finished his work, it is said, he rested and was "refreshed!" When the Saviour of the world had accomplished the work given him to do, he also rested, and his rest was "glorious." The Divine eye contemplated the ancient creation, and beheld it as "very good." The Author of the new creation saw in it results that satisfied him for the travail of his soul; and into a rest resembling in blessedness that of God the Father, and God the Saviour, may we be said to enter in keeping the Sabbath in a proper spirit. For, what have we so much to do on that day, as to contemplate the new creation, and rejoice in the wondrous scheme of redeeming grace, resting in its provisions, and refreshed with its manifold promises of things present, and things to come. We see it to be very good, and over its riches and moral beauty the eye of faith expatiates with fresh delight. Our duties vary, but none are irksome,—we repent of our misdeeds—we sue for pardon—we cease from our own works—we embrace an offered Saviour, and we enter into rest! Accepted in the Beloved, and receiving of his Spirit, we no more regard God as unfriendly and implacable; but having knowledge to discern the blessedness and glory of the Most High, and feeling reconciled to him by the blood of Emmanuel, we love to seek his face in all appointed means of dutiful approach; we love to present ourselves before him in secret, and, along with others that assemble in Zion, to hear his word of truth, and express their creature-homage and thankfulness in exercises of adoring praise and undissembled joy. In those Sabbath hours and exercises the spirit breathes in a religious atmosphere, reviving to the inner-man. The soul draws nigh to God in Christ with aspirations after him—sometimes plaintive and penitential, sometimes wafting high desires that cannot be expressed. The duties we engage in are so interesting, the objects we contemplate so vast and animating, that none but souls destitute of religious feeling can be dull—none but the alienated from God can want delight. Surely it is not without reason that we are bid call the Sabbath a delight, and honourable—it is an emblem of the Sabbath of eternity.

And is there, we ask, in this abstraction from worldly cares, in this contemplation of Christ, as a Saviour, and in these communings with God, that he would show us his salvation—would show us his glory, and seal us unto the day of redemption, by the Holy Spirit's blessed operation—is there here ought to cover the countenance with gloom, or depress the spirit with sadness? Pharisæic rigour, and legal scrupulosity, and cold formality, without complacency in God and his Son, without a free and willing mind, may exhibit to the world a picture of Sabbath observance, unamiable in all its features, calculated to repel, rather than allure to imitation. But in such a frame as we have described, (and what upright believer need dispense with it?) there is much to cheer humanity, and nothing to darken or discolour the fairest scenes of social life, to check the expansion of its best affections, or spoil the creature of its greatest happiness. Indeed, such Sabbaths on earth are preparations and preludes for that which is to be hereafter. The rest below is but the vestibule through which we enter into the rest of heaven above.

Why, brethren, should any of you disparage such a desirable rest, and reckon it joyless? We beseech you consider what you lose in misspending Sabbath hours—what sin ye commit—what guilt ye incur—what seasons of salvation ye let pass ir retrievably away—and what peril ye encounter in thus despising the day of the Lord! Your pastors are grieved in beholding the appearance of principles and practices that threaten to overspread the land with a flood of Sabbath profanation, such as has long desolated the continental nations, where any pursuit or pleasure that depraved nature calls for is indulged in without shame or restraint. In this once Christian land, public opinion begins to give way in favour of undistinguished laxity; and any attempt to stem the tide is held up to public censure as an unjustifiable interference with natural rights—a hateful encroachment on liberty of thought and action. They are not their country's friends, however, that strive to make void the law and supersede the government of God. Be assured, no country shall gain by desecrating Heaven's ordinances; nor shall man or woman, no, nor child, do it with impunity! Be persuaded, ye stout-hearted, to yield to God that day he calleth his. Let His terror persuade you, if his mercy fail to subdue; and, as for you who have tasted and seen, or who desire to taste and see, that the Lord is gracious, remember ye the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy.

Elders, heads of families, teachers of youth, men in authority, owners and managers of public works, reverence the Sabbath yourselves, and aid us with your influence in maintaining its sacredness. Countenance our endeavours to recall all classes of the community to a becoming respect for the Sabbath and its ordinances. If men will not be reclaimed, if they contend for liberty to sin openly, and protest against any interference with evils that sap public morals, and bring communities to dissolution and ruin, be not ye, at least, patrons of iniquity, and partakers in other men's sins, lest ye share in the punishment that awaits them. If ye cannot deter others from offending, let your own houses be clear. Every well regulated family, not only saves itself, but affects the conscience of a neighbourhood. Its shining example holds up a moral mirror to show the Sabbath-breaker his own deformity—a sight which self-condemnation accompanies; and, if amendment do not follow, a useful check is at least applied. Hold up, then, this fair example of Sabbath-fidelity, and keep it holy. Motives and rules for doing this will be laid before you in a subsequent discourse, as enjoined by the Presbytery in its zeal for your best interests, even those that are eternal. Meanwhile, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation, which we pray God to bless for your edification in Christ. Amen.

THE SCHEME OF REDEMPTION.

THE mighty frame of glorious grace,
That brightest monument of praise,
That e'er the God of love design'd,
Employs and fills my labouring mind.

Begin, my soul, the heav'nly song,—
A burden for an angel's tongue;
When Gabriel sounds these awful things,
He tunes and summons all his strings.

Proclaim inimitable love!—
Jesus, the Lord of worlds above,
Puts off the beams of bright array,
And veils the God in mortal clay!

He that distributes crowns and thrones
Hangs on a tree, and bleeds and groans!
The Prince of Life resigns his breath;
The King of Glory bows to death!

But see the wonders of his power,—
He triumphs in his dying hour!
And while by Satan's rage he fell,
He dash'd the rising hopes of hell.

Thus were the hosts of death subdued,
And sin aton'd by Jesus' blood:
Then he arose, and reigns above,
To conquer sinners by his love.

Who shall fulfil this boundless song!
The theme surmounts an angel's tongue:
How low, how vain, are mortal airs,
When Gabriel's nobler harp despairs!

WATTS.

HISTORY OF THE ALBIGENSES.

PERIOD II.

TO THE DEATH OF SIMON DE MONTFORT.

PART I.

SIMON DE MONTFORT having become the feudal lord of the forfeited viscounties of Carcassonne and Beziers, was obliged, by his ecclesiastical tenure, to make war upon the heretics of his provinces, in consequence of which he made preparations for resuming hostilities. As the forty days of military service had expired, the crusading army had almost wholly disbanded; but in those periods, when to slay a heretic was supposed to expiate a multitude of sins, enough of conscience-stricken recruits could be found for such a service, more especially as the prospect of plunder was temptingly held out, in addition to spiritual advantages. He, therefore, continued the campaign, and took Fanjeux, Castres, and Lombes; but, in attacking the castle of Gabaret, he was repulsed with considerable loss. Indeed, his acquirement of the new territories was neither to be safe nor certain; for although the more timid of Carcassonne and Beziers had done homage to him as their rightful lord, many castles, even in his immediate neighbourhood, were fortified against him, either by the Albigenes themselves or those who favoured their cause. His chief antagonist, however, was the Count of Foix, whose name was also Raymond Roger; and as this feudal sovereign possessed the greater part of Albigeois, which was considered the head-quarter of the obnoxious doctrines, his suppression was necessary before the cause could be overthrown. De Montfort, therefore, who was as skilful and brave in war as he was cruel and fanatical in religion, urged the remains of the campaign with such vigour, that his antagonist was unable to stand his ground; and after the latter had lost several castles, he was obliged to submit.

In the preceding Number, we have seen how completely daunted, and how shamefully disgraced, Raymond VI., Count of Toulouse, had been, after the assassination of Castelnau, the Papal legate. Raymond, indeed, was a stout warrior in conflict, as well as a kind and gentle ruler in peace; but he completely lacked that moral courage, without which the mere physical quality is of no more account than the natural courage of the dog or the bear; and thus unequal for the trial, he was about to be dragged into hostile competition with the bold and subtle de Montfort. After the capture of Carcassonne, Raymond had hopes of being reconciled completely to the Church; but as such a step would have been prejudicial to the interests of the usurper Simon, the latter had interest to procure the Count to be excommunicated, and the province of Toulouse to be placed under an interdict. He also occasioned the assassination of the Abbot of Eaulnes, and then adroitly managed to throw the blame upon Raymond, after which he assembled his crusaders, and proclaimed war against the Albigenes of Toulouse. Raymond was terrified; but instead of flying to arms, he hastened to Rome, in the hope of obtaining protection from Innocent III. The pontiff received him graciously, for the cause of Raymond had acquired a dangerous popularity among the feudal counts and princes of the period; and after absolving him conditionally from the sentence of excommunication, he referred him to a council that was to meet three months afterwards, for his complete expurgation. Raymond attended, full of hope, as the only charges he anticipated were those of heresy and the murder of Castelnau, from both of which he could easily free himself; but, during the interval, a course of successes had crowned the arms of Simon de Montfort, so that his rival could now be disposed of without ceremony. The unfortunate Raymond, therefore, found a new charge preferred by the council against him. He was told that he had not done his utmost for the extirpation of heresy; and when he wept at the ruin which he foresaw for himself and his people, his tears were turned into ridicule by a perverted passage from Holy Writ. This council, which was held in September (1210), excommunicated the Lord of Toulouse; and, during the course of the winter, Montfort succeeded in taking castle after castle from the unfortunate Albigenses. And it was not only by the merciful death-stroke in the field of battle that these victims of Popery expiated their offences. The defenders of the captured towns and castles were, in some instances, hanged upon gibbets; in others, they had their eyes torn out and their noses cut off; and even the vineyards and olive-trees were destroyed, that the heretical peasantry might no longer have the means of subsistence.

In the course of this series of military operations, Montfort laid siege to the castle of Minerva, one of the strongest in the kingdom of France, and an appanage of the viscounty of Carcassonne. After a gallant defence of seven weeks, the garrison was obliged to capitulate from want of water; and de Montfort, in the absence of Arnold, the Papal legate, granted them favourable conditions. But when the treaty should have been fulfilled, Arnold returned to the camp, and Montfort immediately declared that the terms were null and void, until the legate's assent had been pronounced. The legate was grieved at the capitulation, for his wish was that the whole garrison should be put to the sword by the crusaders, as he could not doom them to death himself; for, by the canon law, no priest was to shed blood, or procure it to be shed.* But such a difficulty was by no means insuperable to an ecclesiastic of that period. He found that, by the terms of agreement, the heretics in the castle might quit it with the rest, provided they acceded to the Catholic faith, and Arnold eagerly fastened upon this unfortunate clause. Certain of the crusading lords murmured at it, for they said that they had armed to put heretics to death, and not to convert them; but the legate, who knew the spirit of the Albigenses, replied, with a smile of deep meaning, "Tush! very few of them will consent to be converted." He was right in his conjecture. The castle was surrendered on the 22d of July 1210, and the crusaders entered chanting Te Deum, and with the cross borne before them. The unfortunate heretics were, in the meantime, mustered in two parties, the men in one house and the women in another, upon their knees, and engaged in prayer; for they had resolved to perish rather than recant. An abbot now advanced, to receive their adhesion to the Church; but the men replied with one voice, "Your application is in vain, for we will not renounce our faith." He then turned to the women, but they expressed the same resolution, in still more energetic language. The Count de Montfort then approached, and pointing to a mass of dry wood which he had caused to be heaped up, he cried, "He converted, or ascend this pile." All preferred death to apostasy; and more than an hundred and forty were led to the huge conflagration, who, not waiting for the aid of their executioners, leaped cheerfully into the flames.

From Minerva, the crusaders advanced to the siege of Termes, a strong castle on the frontiers of Roussillon, which was bravely held out by Raymond de Termes, its commander, for the space of four months. But no skill or valour on this occasion could avail; for the thousands of red-cross soldiers, who looked upon a breach through a heretical rampart as the best entrance to paradise, increased so greatly, that the besieged were exhausted, and overpowered even by successes; and, in consequence of drought and disease, they endeavoured to escape on the night of the 22d of November, by stealing privately from the place. But their flight was soon detected, and they were pursued, overtaken, and cut down, except a few who were brought, with their leader, as captives to Simon de Montfort. Many of these were burned alive; and as for the brave commander of Termes, he was thrown into a dungeon, where he endured a dark and miserable captivity for many years. After these successes of the crusaders, the garrisons of the smaller castles lost heart and fled, so that the invaders were enabled to enter the Albigeois, and ravage at pleasure. They chased the wretched inhabitants among the woods and mountains; and those who were reserved from the sword, were only spared to be committed to the flames.

We must now, in the progress of events, turn our attention to Raymond of Toulouse, whom we left employed in endeavours that threatened to be fruitless to reconcile himself to the Church. This unhappy noble, as we have already seen, had sounded the depths of degradation, in the hope of appeasing his enemies; and, at length, a council was convoked at Arles, about the middle of February 1211, for the final adjustment of his case. But although he came accompanied by his royal kinsman, the King of Arragon, he was received with insulting haughtiness; and thirteen articles were communicated to him in writing, with which, if he complied, he was informed that he would be restored to all his seignories—when Montfort and the legate were pleased that it should be so! The bitter insult of this last clause, too, was not the worst; for, by the conditions themselves, he would not only have been degraded into a mere puppet, depending for every movement upon his worst enemies—obliged to give up all his strongholds—to banish his military retainers—to renounce all his imposts by which he subsisted—and to wear, as well as his nobles and subjects, a penitential dress,—but also to give up every one of his heretical vassals, such as de Montfort and Arnold might be pleased to require, that they might be consigned to the flames. Raymond was astounded at these requirements, and his eyes were opened when it was too late. His timid and compliant spirit had been lured on step by step with false hopes, until the season for action had expired, and now his enemies had become so strong that they could afford to throw off the mask. His astonishment and indignation were shared by the King of Arragon; and although they had received strict charges not to leave Arles without permission of the council, they stole from the city without the ceremony of a leave-taking, for they felt that they had entered a den of assassins. In consequence of this unauthorised departure, Raymond was excommunicated anew; his lordships were declared to be forfeited; and Simon de Montfort, who had waited impatiently, expecting this consummation, prepared his forces to enter and take possession. This terrible persecutor, whose ambition was equal to his fanaticism, had kept his keen eye fixed upon the county of Toulouse, by adding which to his late acquisitions, he would have been raised from the mere lord of a castle into an equality with sovereign princes. His army was large, for crusaders had now found it much more safe and profitable to enlist for a holy war at home, than to encounter the risks of a Syrian campaign, and hostilities commenced upon the 10th of March, by a siege of the castle of Cabaret, which was soon taken. After this event, other castles were yielded without a blow; and the crusaders continued their victorious march until they reached Lavaur, a strong castle about five leagues from the city of Toulouse. This place, which was chiefly garrisoned by those who held the pure faith, was regarded as the principal stronghold of heresy, and therefore was besieged in form. The Albigenses made a gallant defence, and held their formidable enemies for some time at bay; but Montfort, who was one of the most skilful leaders of the age, employed successfully the best modes of attack which were at that time known. At last, a practicable breach being made, on the 3d of May a grand assault was ordered; and while the knights and men-at-arms rushed to the walls, the bishops and priests, who attended the army clothed in full pontificals, shouted with joy, and raised the hymn of Veni Creator. The breach was won by a single onset, and then de Montfort himself interfered to stop the carnage which had commenced; but it was from no touch of mercy that he thus interposed;—he commanded his fierce warriors to make prisoners rather than slay, “that the priests of the living God might not be defrauded of their promised joys.” Eighty captives were taken, with Aimery, their commander, who were all ordered by Montfort to be hanged upon the gibbet. But when Aimery, who was a powerful and a heavy man, was suspended, the gallows fell; upon which the Count gave the word, and all the prisoners were massacred on the spot. The lady of the castle, who was the sister of Aimery, was thrown into a pit, and buried under stones; and four hundred heretics, who were found in the castle, were, to use the words of the monk who chronicles the event, “burned alive with the utmost joy.”

* The Bishop of Beauvais, a fierce warrior of this age, used to elude the statute against clerical blood-shedding, by wielding a ponderous mace, or rather bludgeon, instead of sword or lance. With this weapon, which he wielded with merciless vigour, he was wont to knock his enemies on the head, without, as was alleged, the effusion of blood. Other priests and prelates, however, were not so scrupulous, but were accustomed to gratify their warlike propensities with the usual weapons of chivalry, while the Church connived at their irregularity.

During this siege, the unfortunate Count of Toulouse was held in a state of painful suspense; he still clung to the hope, notwithstanding all that had happened, of being reconciled to Rome; and under this idea, he forbore sending reinforcements to Lavaur, when such a measure might have been effectual. He also endeavoured to move in his favour de Montfort and the legate; but these embittered and interested enemies rejected his advances. He then resolved upon a decisive resistance, and for this purpose formed a coalition with several of the counts of France who were suspected of a leaning towards heresy, and had, therefore, been menaced with punishment. He did not, however, proceed to action till after the fall of Lavaur. And truly it was more than time to bestir himself, for de Montfort was advancing with a violence which nothing could resist, so that castle after castle was either surrendered to him or evacuated; and about the middle of July he sat down before the city of Toulouse, which had resolved to hold out to the utmost in defence of its vacillating lord. It seemed impossible, however, that such a resolution could be made good, for the Roman Catholics within the city, instigated by their bishops and priests, had banded themselves in an association against those of the other creed, so that conflicts were of frequent occurrence in the streets, by which much blood was shed. Raymond at last persuaded them to unite against the common enemy; and the turbulent ecclesiastics, on finding that the waters they had troubled had been calmed, shook the dust of Toulouse from their feet, and marched away in solemn procession to the enemy. The city, however, was saved; for Raymond, being ably seconded by his allies, gave de Montfort several severe checks, so that on the 25th of June the latter was obliged to raise the siege. Raymond was now able to become the assailant in turn; and, towards the end of the year, his efforts had been so successful, that he reconquered all the strong places in Albigeois which his adversary had usurped; while the power of de Montfort, which was now generally obnoxious, was scarcely sufficient for his own defence. But he was always certain of having an army, notwithstanding the short space of forty days which his military levies were bound to serve in the field; for the monks were indefatigable in preaching for new recruits, and the spiritual as well as temporal allurements of such a service were too tempting to be disregarded.

ON THE SALTS OR SALINE SUBSTANCES, REFERRED TO IN SCRIPTURE.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE, A.M.

Minister of Monimail, Fifeshire.

THERE are but few allusions made in the Sacred Writings, to the chemical properties of the different minerals with which Canaan abounds, and it might, therefore, be considered a matter of little importance whether attention be paid to them or not. Nothing, however, can be regarded as unworthy of notice, which tends either to explain the words of inspiration, or to illustrate the advantages of the land which the Lord gave unto his people. A few remarks, therefore, on the various salts known to the Jews may not be altogether destitute of interest.

The class of substances generally known by this name, includes an immense number of mineral and vegetable compounds. They have this in common, that they are all formed by the union of acids, of which vinegar and oil of vitriol are familiar examples, with an alkali or earth, such as soda and lime; but they differ widely from each other in their properties and appearance. The term Salt, was originally restricted to that with which our food is seasoned, and which has been known from the remotest antiquity. Modern chemists, on analysing its nature, found it to be a compound of soda with the muriatic acid, or spirit of salt as it is generally termed, and, therefore, named it muriate of soda. Its composition has since been more carefully examined, and it is now more accurately called chloride of sodium. This substance is sometimes procured from the water of the ocean, in which it abounds, and serves by its presence many valuable and important purposes; but more generally, it is the produce of mines and mineral springs. It sometimes occurs in rocky masses free from mixture, and brilliant as crystal; but commonly it contains a variety of earthy ingredients, and requires to be purified before it is applied to the service of man.

Its use in seasoning our food is familiar to all, and reference is occasionally made to it in Scripture; thus, in the book of Job, it is said, "Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt?" and the apostle, in directing the Colossians how to behave themselves towards those that are without, refers to its savouring property, and tells them to have their "speech always with grace seasoned with salt." In this case we may look on it as the emblem of prudence and discretion.

It is also employed as a means of preserving food from decay, and on this account may be considered as one of the first necessities of life. The power it possesses of preventing decomposition serves to explain the reason of its being employed in sacrifice; "with all thy offering," said the Lord, "thou shalt offer salt." Lev. ii. 13. In this case it was probably employed as the emblem of purity and faithfulness. For a similar reason, it is still used in the East in ratifying bargains and treaties. When two parties make an agreement, they sprinkle salt over some article of food, of which they both partake, and this "covenant of salt" is regarded as one of the most solemn and binding of all engagements. Reference is apparently made to this use of salt, in Ezra iv. 14, where Rehum and Shimshai and their companions, endeavoured to hide their jealousy and hatred against the Jews, under the specious pretext of zeal for the interest of King Artaxerxes, and say, that they inform him of the probable damage that would arise to the revenue of the king, if Jerusalem were built again, because they were "salted with the salt of the palace;" for such is the literal meaning of the original passage, rendered in our translation "they had maintenance from the king's palace."

The Lord in ordering salt to be used with every offering, must therefore be considered as informing us that sincerity of heart, purity of purpose, and steadfastness in his service, are required of all that would acceptably approach him. He, in fact, exhibited by emblem the same doctrine which our Saviour expressly declares in words, when he says, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

When found in great abundance, salt is destructive to animal and vegetable life; though in small quantities it is favourable to both. If thickly strewed, for example, on a paved court, or gravel walk, it will effectually prevent the springing of grass and weeds. In this country, though its destructive powers are familiarly known, we have no example of barrenness, to any great extent, being in this manner produced. In Judea the case was different. In that land the rocks and soil are frequently found to contain such a quantity of this mineral, that the springs and streams are impregnated with it. When a stream, therefore, terminates in a pool, or lake, that has no outlet, the influence of a burning sun evaporates the water and leaves the salt behind. Wherever this takes place, vegetation is necessarily destroyed, and the ground that has been covered by the winter's flood, is not unfrequently seen in summer arrayed in a glittering crust of snowy whiteness, instead of a mantle of verdant green. The Dead Sea, which is now an inland lake, without any communication with the ocean, is one of the most remarkable examples of such a process. The Jordan, Arnon, and Jabbok, all bring down into it a portion of salt dissolved in their waters, and, though the quantity be but small that is added year by year, there has been such an accumulation in the course of centuries, that this extensive sheet of water has become, in fact, a sea of brine, in which no living creature moves, and around whose shores, it is said, there is scarcely a tree to be found. In allusion to this destructive power of salt, when Abimeleck fought against Shechem, and took it, "he slew the people that were therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt;" intimating, thereby, his desire that it might always remain uninhabited and barren. (Judges ix. 15.) Again, in the 107th Psalm, we are told that "the Lord turneth a fruitful land into saltiness," that is, barrenness, "for the wickedness of them that dwelt therein."

The facts to which reference has been made, it may also be added, are not only interesting in themselves, but are well fitted for supplying a profitable subject of meditation to the contemplative mind. He who finds "wisdom in brooks, sermons in stones, and good in every thing," when he reflects on the properties of salt, and remembers that the general diffusion of this mineral is of the utmost benefit, while its superabundance causes desolation and death, will perhaps be led to remark; this is also the case with riches, and honours, and all that man delights in, a limited portion is a boon, but an unbounded possession proves a curse. He will see in the, comparatively speaking, equal diffusion of the good things of this life, a proof and illustration of the wisdom and goodness of God, and may, perhaps, be thereby led to moderate his own desires, and to repress the rising feeling of envy or ambition.

There is another reference to the properties of salt which leads to the supposition, that the Jews must have given the same name to a substance altogether different in its nature from that to which the term is usually applied. In Luke xiv. 34, we are told, "salt is good; but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? it is neither fit for the land nor yet for the dung-hill, but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear let him hear." Here there is allusion to some substance which, from its bearing the same name, we may conclude had a close resemblance in appearance at least to common salt. Its properties, however, must have been very different, for it is described as liable to lose its savour, in which case it was "cast out and trodden under foot of men," (Matt. v. 13,) and it is spoken of, not as an article used for domestic purposes, but as a manure "fit for the land or dung-hill." Common salt never loses its savour, but is, on the contrary, one of the most permanent compounds with which we are acquainted, and, as a manure, in so far as modern experiment has been able to ascertain, it is almost entirely worthless. What the substance here referred to was we cannot tell; if a conjecture may be hazarded, we may suppose it to have been a mixture of several ingredients, containing a portion of some of the salts of ammonia, which are known to be not only very volatile, or liable to evaporate, but to be powerful agents in stimulating the growth of vegetables.

The use of the various species of salt, as a means of increasing the fertility of the soil, is but beginning to be known amongst us, and the passage referred to, leads us to suspect that the Jews, ignorant as we suppose them to have been of natural science, were acquainted with a secret which all our philosophy has as yet been unable to discover.

Be this as it may, the lesson intended to be conveyed to us is sufficiently plain. If professing Christians who are designed by God to be the salt of the earth, that is, the means by which it is made to bring forth the fruits of righteousness, shall fail of accomplishing the purpose for which they are chosen, the Lord will cast them aside as unprofitable and vile; they will be trampled under foot, and made the objects of universal contempt. The counsel given in the passages now under consideration, is essentially the same as that addressed to the Church at Ephesus, in the second chapter of Revelation, "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent."

Nitre, another saline substance, is also spoken of in Scripture; Solomon says (Prov. xxv. 20), "As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart." And Jeremiah, reproving Israel for their pollutions, says (Jer. ii. 22), "Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap; yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God."

The substance here referred to is not, however, that which we commonly know by the name of nitre; but the natron of the Greeks and Romans. It is an impure carbonate of soda, an article sometimes used in medicine, and familiarly known in most families from its use in baking bread. It is found on the sides of several lakes in the East, when their waters, which in the rainy season overflow the banks, are reduced in size by the heat of the summer sun. It is still collected in considerable quantity, and is of some importance as an article of trade. When vinegar is poured upon it, a violent effervescence takes place, which the wise man compares to the vexation and annoyance caused by addressing mirth and songs to an afflicted spirit. When mixed with water, its effects are similar to those of the simple soda; it makes it softer, as it is called, and by increasing its solvent power facilitates the washer-woman's labour. This property rendered natron all the more valuable to the Jews, because the salt with which the soil was impregnated seems in many cases to have rendered the water hard. When the prophet, therefore, tells the people of Israel that, though they should wash themselves with nitre and soap, their iniquity would remain; he, in fact, declares that no effort of the sinner, and no means that man can devise, can possibly remove his guilt. We may cleanse the body, we may regulate the external conduct; but we cannot purify the soul. Nay, we may use the appointed means of grace, but without the blessing of the Lord, and the working of his Spirit, we must continue for ever vile.

EMMAUS.

ABIDE with us—the evening shades
Begin already to prevail;
And as the ling'ring twilight fades,
Dark clouds along th' horizon sail.

Abide with us—the night is chill,
And damp and cheerless is the air;
Be our companion, Stranger, still,
And thy repose shall be our care.

Abide with us—thy converse sweet
Has well beguil'd the tedious way;
With such a friend we joy to meet—
We supplicate thy longer stay.

Abide with us—for well we know
Thy sacred, thy prophetic lore;
Like balm thy honied accents flow—
Our wounded spirits feel their pow'r.

Abide with us—and still unfold
Thy sacred, thy prophetic lore;
What wondrous things of Jesus told!
Stranger, we thirst, we pant for more.

Abide with us—and still converse
Of Him who late on Cal'ry died—
Of Him the prophecies rehearse;
He was our Friend they crucified.

Abide with us—our hearts are cold;
We thought that Israel he'd restore;
But sweet the truths thy lips have told,
And, Stranger, we complain no more.

Abide with us—we feel the charm
That binds us to our unknown friend:
Here pass the night, secure from harm;
Here, Stranger, let thy wand'ring end.

Abide with us—to their request
The Stranger bows, with smiles divine;
Then round the board the unknown guest
And weary travellers recline.

Abide with us—amaz'd they cry,
As suddenly, while breaking bread,
Their own lost Jesus meets their eye,
With radiant glory on his head!

Abide with us—thou heavenly Friend;
Leave not thy followers thus alone:
The sweet communion here must end,
The heav'nly visitant is gone!

RAFFLES.

CHRIST OUR FORERUNNER WITHIN THE VEIL:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN PAUL,

One of the Ministers of St Outhbert's Parish, Edinburgh.

"Whither the forerunner is for us entered."
HEB. vi. 20.

THE sentiment to which we mean at present to direct your attention, is contained in the first clause of this 20th verse, "Whither the forerunner is for us entered;" and, in order that we may comprehend the meaning, and enter into the spirit of it, we would observe that the expression forerunner, here made use of by the apostle, is a military one, and refers to the custom which obtains in days of warfare, of the victor in a hard-fought battle despatching a messenger to the seat of government with the news of the successful valour which the army had displayed, that at head-quarters the welcome intelligence might be proclaimed, and purposes formed, and plans executed, and honours awarded, that might be meet and congruous with the happy results which had been achieved. No doubt, as such an occasion, a forerunner is generally inferior to those who come after him, under whose skilful management the victorious prowess has been put forth; and he is so because he is a forerunner, and nothing more. Thus restricted, however, the term has no meaning when applied to Jesus Christ; for though he be the Forerunner of his people, yet the splendour of his character in this respect is to be traced to the circumstance that he is much more. Upon his shoulders was laid the conducting of that matter, on account of which he is now entered as a Precursor within the veil. He fought the battle; he slew the enmity; he closed the breach; he subdued the foe; and he was himself the Forerunner, because of the greatness of that which he had accomplished, and because it was not fit either that the enunciation, or the following of it up, should be committed to another.

The idea, then, of Christ as the Forerunner of his people, who has gone in that capacity into heaven to publish what he hath done for them, and to occupy the mansions on their behalf, until they be invested in a full measure with the promises and beatitudes of the new covenant, is one which cannot fail to be sweet and savoury in the contemplation of Christian piety, and which comes home to the most important obligations, as well as to the most permanent interests, of mankind. We propose to meditate upon it for a little, and to solicit your attention to it while, in dependence on Divine aid, we endeavour to unfold it, to confirm the truth of it, to show the end and effects of it, and practically to apply it.

I. Let us observe, that Christ is our Forerunner entered in within the veil.—We have several notices given to us in Scripture, that the scheme of human redemption did ever excite great interest among the heavenly inhabitants—that it is a subject on which their curiosity is awakened, and their emotions roused, and their inquiries set on foot—that its commencement, its progress, its consummation, are apprehended as important, and felt as attractive, and worthy of the most solicitous investigation. “Which things,” says the apostle (the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow)—“which things the angels desire to stoop down and look into,” like the cherubims toward the mercy-seat, desirous to comprehend them.

Now, this desire was gratified on Christ’s visible departure out of the world, in the form of a literal ascent—on his entrance within the veil, as the Forerunner of his people; and this is the first view that we may take of his character in this respect. He went into heaven proclaiming what he had done upon earth—that he had finished transgression—that he had made an end of sin—that he had brought in an everlasting righteousness—that he had sealed up the vision and the prophecy which did centre in him—that, having sustained the pressure of avenging justice, he opened up a medium of access, a door even to the most rebellious—that, by virtue of his blood, he had obtained remission for sinners, paid the price of redemption for those who were captives, made reconciliation for enemies—that, in harmony with God’s attributes, and even while he did conserve the sacredness of his law, he had redeemed, from the power of all who did hate her, the Church whom he had eternally chosen—that he had delivered her from the dominion of sin, and made atonement for it in respect both of its condemning power and its indwelling influence, having borne it as a burden and suffered its penal effects—that he had emancipated her from the thralldom of Satan, and put his foot on that serpent’s head—that he had freed her from the maledictions of the law, for that he had satisfied on her behalf every jot and tittle of its most rigorous requirements—that he had delivered her from the final dominion of death, and made that which was the fruit and punishment of transgression the door through which she enters on the sanctuary of immortality. On the part of the believers who had gone to their place ere ever he had been made manifest in the flesh, he had discharged the obligation under which he had come, that he would work out their deliverance by the satisfactory virtue of his own death; and he now entered within the veil, proclaiming the great truth, that what they had reposed in confidence upon, under the veil of symbol and of shadow, was now literally accomplished, that figurative representations had been turned into visible realities, and that salvation really wrought out which the sacrifices of the olden worship did but ritually represent. And it is, perhaps, not more a pleasing than a just thought of divines, that the proclamation of tidings like these did add to the felicity of those saints who had been taken to their Father’s house under the Old Testament dispensation; that, till then, they could not discern the divine glory in Christ’s actual purchase of redemption; that, till then, there was no throne of grace erected in heaven—no High Priest appearing before it—no Lamb as it had been slain—no joint ascription of praise to Him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, God having ordained some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect. And, with respect to those others whom he had chosen and called, whom he had left behind him upon earth, and who as yet had no existence except in the decrees of God, he testified that their salvation was equally complete—that every thing competent to meet the exigency of their spiritual state—that every thing which they should require in the way, either of righteousness or of grace, had been adequately procured, and at the time appointed by the Father should be assuredly vouchsafed to them; and, in the retrospect of what he had done and suffered for the sake and service of both, he could exclaim, and exult in these words of the prophetic Psalm, “I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my going. And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God."

Such is the intelligence with which Christ, as our Forerunner, has entered into that within the veil. And the very act of his going up did presuppose and ratify to them the most important truths, that he led captivity captive, just because he had ascended up on high—that he had spoiled principalities and powers, when by it he made a show of them openly—that he had unlocked the gates of heaven, and quenched the flaming sword, and discharged the mighty cherubim which guarded paradise from all access to men, seeing that he did enter in as the Forerunner of men; and though we are not able to conceive the full impression which such intelligence would produce, yet we may suppose that it invigorated the raptures of the inhabitants of heaven—and that it furnished them with the richest scope for the most varied and most exalted song—that they proclaimed his doings among the people with augmented interest and renewed alacrity, and did sing and celebrate his return in this welcome of joy and jubilee, "The Lord is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises unto our King, sing praises." "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this Lord of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory."

But again, our Lord has entered as a Forerunner within the veil, and there he ever liveth. Now, there is a threefold life which Christ lives above. There is a life which he has as the Eternal Son of God, the life which belongs to his divine nature; for as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself—given it to him by eternal generation—given it to him by communicating all his own attributes. There is also a life which belongs to him, and which he doth live for himself, in consequence of his having become man—a life of glory inconceivable in his nature as man. He lived a mortal life in this world—a life liable to pain and to death, and he suffered and died accordingly. This life has now been exchanged for a life of ever-during glory. Henceforth he dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. This life is conferred upon him in reward and in honour of that work which he first visibly began, when, veiling the glory of the Divine perfections, he took upon him the nature of man, submitted to the form of a servant—submitted yet farther, and refused not the disreputation of a sinner; and to it do belong the enjoyments, and the whole eternal exaltation, of the human nature in the person of Christ.

But, over and above these two different kinds of life which the Lord Jesus Christ doth enjoy, and which shall never come to an end, there is a life which he leads as Mediator in heaven, and in respect of which it is that he is a forerunner within the veil. Though removed beyond the cognance of the senses, and no longer seen by the bodily eye, he is still carrying on his great work in heaven, and is there the prophet, priest, and king of his Church, as really and as effectively as when he dwelt upon earth. He died on our account, he liveth still on our account, and is intrusted with all power for the service of his Church; and though this life differs not essentially from that life of glory in his human nature which he liveth for himself, it yet so far differs from it, that it shall one day have an end. He will throughout eternity enjoy the life which he possesses as a Divine Being, he will throughout eternity enjoy the life which he possesses in his glorified human nature; but his life as Mediator, his life as a Forerunner, he shall cease to have, when the work of his mediation shall have been finished, when the elect shall all have been gathered into the fold of the good Shepherd, and the kingdom delivered up to God, even the Father.

And what is it that, in this view of his character as a Forerunner, he is not fitted to procure? Are we not to trace to it all the gifts which are bestowed on the Church in general, for common edification, and on each member of it singly, for his particular benefit? Does he not, as the Prophet of his people, send down those supplies of divine truth which, in every age, they do successively require,—the saving light by which they come to understand the real meaning of his Word,—and so spiritually apply it to their souls, as that these souls do feel its power, and become filled with that solid comfort which is only to be had from enlightened views of the truth? And in the exercise of his kingly office, are not his actions, by virtue of his mediatorial life above, also and equally various? Is he not constituted Head over all things for the benefit of his Church? And, as the reward of his obedience, as the consequence of his triumph, as the ornament of his princely state, as the proof of his accepted royalty, is he not exalted to the right hand of the Father in the exercise of supreme authority and universal dominion? Is he not possessed of all power both in heaven and upon earth; and is not this power put forth by him in preserving his people from many dangers, in controlling the adversaries that may rise up against them, in defeating the designs they form for their hurt, and in showing more to the principalities and powers in heavenly places, than to his own people themselves, in the world, that Satan, that death, that hell, that all their enemies are made his vanquished; that he hath trampled upon, that he hath trampled over them all? And is it not in these actions especially which he executes in his mediatorial character, on their behalf, that his exaltedness as a Forerunner does most prominently appear? Has he not gone before them to prepare a way for them,—to make ready mansions in his Father's ouse,—that where he is, there may also his purchased inheritance be? And with this view is he not ever interceding on their behalf,—making a continual presentation of his humanity before his Father, as a continual declaration of his earnest desire for the salvation of his people,—and of his having, in obedience to the Father's will, assumed flesh, suffered death, and manifested merit to deserve it? Does he not urge an ever actually represented argument for divine mercy and grace being vouchsafed to them, by the perpetual exhibition of his own person in the presence of his Father? and may not this act of intercession be justly considered as that great end which his office as Mediator and Forerunner is intended to subserve? He lives to rule his Church, he lives to subdue her enemies, he lives to communicate his Spirit,—but all these blessings are given into the hands of Christ, to bestow them, upon the strength, and as the fruit, of the intercession he presents. This is the great ordinance which has been appointed for the exercise of his power towards, and the communication of his grace unto, the Church. And in exercising it, has he not every quality necessary for insuring to it effect—touched, as born of a woman, with a fellow-feeling of their infirmities for whom it is offered up, and possessing, in virtue of his divine nature, all conceivable influence with Him to whom it is addressed? And on the strength and merit which it has ever to be successful, does he not, as their Forerunner, send to them all the supplies which they need, until the days of their warfare be ended, and they themselves entered within the veil? Even to the believers who lived under the Old Testament dispensation he was the “well-spring” of all saving influence. Their economy, however, being merely a “shadow of good things to come,” that influence was imparted to smaller numbers, and in a less plenteous degree. His glory in this respect was but little known, in that comparatively mysterious dispensation. The grand out-pouring of the Spirit was reserved to do honour to a risen and to an ascended Redeemer; and what are the diversified graces which, through his Spirit, he both dispense to them, but the treasures of his kingdom—the goodness of his house—the riches and the revenues of his dominion? Invested with the high office of imparting of him to his people, does he not bestow upon them his eminent and his ample fruits,—the supplies of that actual as well as of that habitual grace which are necessary, for their yielding a savoury obedience here, and becoming meet for the participation of immortal glory; restraining grace, to keep them from the commission of sin; the renewing grace, that is needed to feed their abhorrence of it; the strengthening grace, that will give effect to earnest, laborious, incessant strivings against sin,—that will uphold the principles of holiness in the heart,—and that will maintain and perpetuate their ascendancy? And though some “root of bitterness” is still to be found in the best of them, though the difficulties of an indisposed nature are not entirely got over in any, and the sordid pleasures and fading glories of a present world have still some influence with them all; yet, as a royal Priest upon his throne, as a minister of the sanctuary, does he not deal out to them such gracious influences as enables them to make daily a nearer approach to the universality of spiritual attainments, to grow in the relish of every occupation, and every discourse which savours of the exercises of an holy life, and of the enjoyments of an everlasting home.

Having said this much on the character of Christ as the Forerunner of his people, let me now advert to some of those lessons in which this great truth is fitted to instruct us:—

1. This view of Christ's character is a proof of the perfection of his atonement.—Had this salvation been incomplete, had it been of any ambiguous efficacy, he who was “made manifest in the flesh,” would not in the flesh have been “received up into glory.” Necessary, indeed, it was, for the full comfort and quietness of our minds, that the Divine estimation should be known regarding the work which he had undertaken. We know, it is true, when we look earnestly at the work itself, that perfection is its marking peculiarity,—that it possesses every thing that could commend it to Divine acceptance.

But we have not been left to the conjectures of mere reasoning on the nature and character of the work itself, to assure ourselves that it did meet with the Divine acceptance. We know that in the course of his tabernacling upon earth, the Saviour was often greeted with the tokens of the Father's approbation; that even at his nativity, an angel from heaven did signify it to the pastoral witnesses of the blessed incarnation; that at his baptism, by the descent of his Spirit visibly upon him, he gave him a pledge that his sacrifice should come up before him as a sacrifice of a sweet smell; that at his transfiguration he gave him a prelude of that glory to which he should be raised, in the issue of that combat which he had undertaken to carry on for sinners; that even in the hour of darkness, when the floods compassed him about, and the waves of Divine wrath passed over him, and he cried to the Lord “from the deep,” he sent an angel to strengthen him; that on the cross itself, he enabled him to sing, in the exulting language of victory, “It is finished!”—and signalised the solemn scene that was there acted, by perturbations in the material world,—the sun hiding his beams under a robe of mourning, the earth shaking with an unquiet trembling, dry bones being rejoined and re-inspired with life, and the very dead coming out of their graves; that, by his mighty power, he unlocked the sepulchre, and showed that “it was not possible that he should be holden of death.” But striking though these testimonies were, yet is it not the case that they are all comparatively absorbed in that emphatic testimony which was afforded to this effect, when, in the very act of blessing his disciples at the village of Bethany, “he was parted from them and a cloud received him out of their sight?" Can we doubt the validity of the price that was paid, when we see the weight of the glory that did follow? Is not his appearance in heaven as glorious, a proof that his oblation on earth was satisfactory? Was not this coronation of him by the Father an evidence, that in him the Father was well pleased? Did he not thus lift up the head because he had drunk of the brook in the way, because having sorrowed and suffered for us, his sufferings and his sorrows had a meritorious virtue! Was he not thus invested with his royal dignity, just because he had first descended into the lower parts of the earth and made reparation for that honour which sin had eclipsed? What brighter evidence can we have of the sufficiency of his atonement, than we have in the fact, that he was taken from prison and from judgment, and sat down at the right hand of the majesty in the heaven? Did not God's thus showing him the path of life, and welcoming him to his presence, demonstrate that he had faithfully performed and completely finished the work which he had given him to do? Is not the very fact of his exaltation an evidence of his right to that character to which he had previously laid claim? Does it not prove that he had verified all the declarations which he had made, that he would save his people from their sins by the blood and the virtue of his death, as the price that was asked, as the atonement that was required, as the satisfaction that was given, that God might be reconciled to them? Is it not an argument to plead in proof of the entire security and complete salvation of all who believe upon his name? Can it for one moment be imagined that he should in this manner have been taken up, had there been any defect in his redeeming work, had it come short in any thing which the fitness of a righteous Government could require, had it wanted any measure of that obedience or that suffering which the majesty of a law that was not to be jested with, did clamorously demand, and does not the simple fact that he, whom men despised, he whom the nations abhorred, this servant of servants, was for the suffering of death thus crowned with honour, give warrant for believing the truth of his character as Mediator between God and man, the justice of all the claims he did ever prefer, the completeness of that atonement which he made upon earth, and the prevalence of that advocacy which, as the minister of the true tabernacle, he now presents in the sanctuary above.

Let us cultivate and give effect to this view of Divine truth which the character of Christ as our forerunner is so fitted to enforce. Let us think upon the perfection of that atonement, which is thus so endearingly demonstrated. Let us look to the fact in the text as the ground, even as it is the glory of the belief we repose in him, to his ascension as the cause, and to his present absence as the crown of our faith; and let this meditation take effect and be influentially operative upon the conscience in the increased measures of confidence which we put in the decease which he accomplished at Jerusalem, and the force with which the impression becomes more rivetted "that God gave him a name that is above every name, because he had been obedient to the death, that he set him down at the right of the majesty on high," because not only with success, but with acceptance, he had purged our sins.

2. A forerunner, one who goes before, suggests the idea of some who are to follow after. Jesus the Son of God is entered within the veil, and if he be indeed a forerunner for us, then may we be assured that we must follow him. Now, how are we to follow him? How is it that we are to enter within the veil? He reached it by obediently doing, and by patiently suffering all the will of God, and how, in modesty, can we ever expect to attain it if we break off the yoke of obedience, and resist the exercise of discipline, and seek to reconcile eternity with fleshly enjoyment, and relax in the strictness of an holy, and the severity of a Christian life. No, brethren; aiming at the same place we must follow in the same way. In the road of obedience and in the road of suffering we must not refuse to walk if we would expect like him to be ultimately received up into glory.

How was it that he did comfort himself while he dwelt upon earth? Upon his first appearance in the world he declared that he came not to do his own will, but the will of him who sent him; and what he declared at first, he did ever literally exemplify, for he gave obedience to his Father's commands in all the variety of his eventful life. He obeyed it to the full, he obeyed it from the heart, he obeyed it in the most trying circumstances, he obeyed it under the pressure of temptations more than common to men, he ever thirsted after the doing of it even as the parched earth doeth thirst after the cooling stream. Who is it that can fasten upon any period or any circumstance of his life, when in the shape either of precept or of precedent, this principle of obedience was not uppermost in his mind, and as the reward of it, he has now gone into heaven. And is it not clear to every man who reflects that, if ever we are to follow him there, and become fit for the purity of the Divine presence; it is indispensable that we be previously trained, by cultivating a like spirit of conformity, that instead of repining under dispensations that cross our wishes, we take heed that we "submit ourselves to God," that on all occasions we pay to him the homage of a loyal and a liberal obedience,—an obedience that is affectionate, and given with the good will of the heart,—an obedience that is persevering, and that suffers not, even in the most trying circumstances, the voice of complaining nature to be heard,—an obedience that is unreserved, and that has respect to all God's commandments,—an obedience that is progressive, and is ever reaching after a fuller measure in every variety of Christian virtue. If it is not thus that we comport ourselves, if we give not the service that is due, the subjection that must be paid, and but few lineaments can be traced in us of the mind that was in him, then, indeed, may we be assured that though entered as a forerunner within the veil, he has not entered as a forerunner for us, and that we can have no interest in the merits, either of his death or intercession, seeing that we tread not in his holy steps, nor cultivate the graces of his virtuous example.

But our Lord sorrowed as well as obeyed. The obedience he gave was a suffering obedience. The glory with which he is now crowned is the result of severe and continued self-denial—the reward of exertion and of conflict—the hard-earned recompense of labour, and sorrow, and sweat, and blood. If we, therefore, expect to be associated with him hereafter, must not we follow him in the same path here? Is our nature weak, addicted to self-indulgence and ease, apt to sink under difficult duties, and to avoid, if possible, denying itself to those enjoyments to which its propensities are strong? Then many of the precepts which our Forerunner did enforce by his own example must be painful and displeasing. There are many things which we have form our enjoyment, that are lawful in themselves, and which, in a manner we feel to be necessary for our state of imperfection, houses to shelter us from the impressions of the weather, lands left us by inheritance, and through whose produce we acquire the means of a creditable subsistence, friends and relatives on whose sympathy we count in the hour of distress, and whose positive help we anticipate in the day of destitution. These blessings are suited to refresh us in our journey through the wilderness. The frailty of our common nature reminds us how much we stand in need of them; but, still it is grievous to think how much the heart is apt to rest and to repose in them; how much it mutinies under the thought, that in a moment, sudden and surprising, God may recall the blessings which his own bounty did give. Now the Spirit that was in Christ requires that we sit loose to all these things, that we proportion the esteem we ought to have for them, that we look upon them, though fit to be used, yet too mean to be courted, though meet to be enjoyed, yet not meet to be doted upon, that we labour with all assiduous diligence to get introduced into the heart a new and supernatural affection which will regulate at least, if not subdue, the love which we have for them, to subordinate all former affection for lawful things, to this new superinduced affection for Christ which, unless it do supremely rest within the heart, can never dwell within it at all, and which, notwithstanding of the fits and working of occasional impatience, makes a man at last willing to forsake father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, willing to forsake all that he hath, willing to suffer the loss of all things, willing to endure all things, that he may carry about with him the marks, when he thus carries about the mortification, of Jesus Christ, and be the liker unto him, who did suffer ere he entered upon his glory.

In the path of obedience and of suffering, therefore, we must follow, if it be the case, that for us Christ the forerunner has entered within the veil. Let us, therefore, walk in it, with cheerfulness, and with perseverance and without reserve. Let us remember that we can never hereafter be seated above by him, unless we be previously in this world seated there in him; that we never can reap the fruits of glory except from the seeds of godliness; that we can never participate of his celestial blessedness, if we be not imitators of his earthly life, and never shall be made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, unless these places have been sought after, in the way of holy living, and patient suffering, and active service.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The sinner brought to Christ.—Till humiliation makes a sinner feel his sin and misery, it is not possible that Christ, as Christ, should be heartily welcome to him, or received in that sort as his honour doth expect. Who cares for the physician that feels no sickness, and fears no death? He may pass by the door of such a man, and he will not call him in; but when pain and fear of death are on him, he will send and seek, and bid him welcome. Will any man fly to Christ for succour, that feels not his wants and danger? Will they hold on him as the only refuge of their souls, and cleave to him as their only hope, who feel no need of him? Will they lie at his feet, and beg for mercy, that feel themselves well enough without him? When men do but hear of sin and misery, and superficially believe it, they may coldly look after Christ and grace, and feel the worth of the latter, in such a manner as they feel the weight of the former. But never is Christ valued and sought after, as Christ, till sorrow hath taught us how to value him; nor is he entertained in the necessary honour of a Redeemer, till humiliation throw open all the doors; no man can seek him with his whole heart, that seeks him not with a broken heart.—BAXTER.

The prayer of the believer accepted.—The efficacy of prayer must be proportioned to the real amount of sincere and true devotion which enters into any exercise of worship. If a mass of gold and silver ore be sent to the refiner, he will value, not the amount or variety of heterogeneous matter, but the amount of pure metal which is found in it. He may accept and prize it, notwithstanding the alloys and worthless substances with which it is debased, but it can be accepted only at the worth of the separated bullion. It is not meant to intimate, by this comparison, that our prayers, were they ten times more unalloyed than those of fallen creatures can be, would possess any meritorious value; the mind and will, the ability and inclination, for these as for all other services, are themselves the gift of God. But he has chosen to connect his blessings with prayer, and encourages me to hope, that through the intercession of the "one Mediator," he will accept such prayers even as mine. Though they be accepted, however, notwithstanding their alloys and defilements, the result of them, the blessings to be procured by them, can only have relation to the sum and intentness of real devotion. The hope that my real prayers are presented, and made availing, by so glorious an Advocate, should confer, in my estimation, an immense importance on the privilege of worship, and should make me more solicitous, that my prayers may be real, and that "out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth may speak."—J. SHEPPARD, ESQ.

The final sentence of the sinner.—"Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." "Depart from me"—there is a separation from all joy and happiness. "Ye cursed"—there is a black and direful excommunication. "Into fire"—there is the cruelty of pain. "Everlasting"—there is perpetuity of punishment. "Prepared for the devil and his angels"—here are thy infernal tormenting and tormented companions. Oh terrible sentence! from which the condemned cannot escape; which being pronounced cannot possibly be withstood; against which a man cannot except, and from which a man can nowhere appeal. Then thou shalt lament, and none shall pity thee: thou shalt weep to think that thy miseries are past remedy: thou shalt weep to think that to repent is to no purpose: thou shalt weep to think, how for the shadows of short pleasures, thou hast incurred these sorrows of eternal pains: thou shalt weep to see how that weeping itself can nothing prevail; yea, in weeping, thou shalt weep more tears, than there is water in the sea, for the water of the sea is finite, but the weeping of a reprobate shall be infinite.—BAYLY. (Practice of Piety.)

ON THE THREE PERSONS IN THE GODHEAD.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,
Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

THE Sacred Scriptures, in teaching us what we are to believe concerning God, teach us, at the same time, that we cannot comprehend the nature of God, that "His greatness is unsearchable," and that on such subjects we can here only know in part. Of his essential being and manner of existence, they in fact teach us nothing; inasmuch as these things cannot be communicated to our present limited faculties. We cannot, indeed, comprehend our own being and manner of existence, nor that of any single object in creation around us; and may, therefore, be prepared to expect, in any revelation of the Infinite Jehovah, to find the subject altogether beyond the reach of our reason or investigation. We are concerned only to receive humbly his testimony of himself, and to believe what the Scriptures, as his Word, do plainly teach. Now the Scriptures, besides teaching that there is only one living and true God, teach us also, that there are "three in the Godhead." "There are three persons in the Godhead; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory."

This is purely a doctrine of Revelation, and is taught only in the Scriptures of truth. There are, indeed, numerous traces of this doctrine in the religious belief of the most ancient nations of the world, so remarkable, as to prove, that it must have been made known from the earliest times among the first communications from God to man; but, as our fallen race could not retain in its purity even the simpler truth of one true and living God; we cannot be surprised to find, that they soon perverted the deeper doctrine of there being three in the Godhead. It is only in the written Word that we have a sure and clear guide in regard to this great mystery of the Divine nature; and it is more especially important to adhere strictly to the express language of Scripture in every statement relating to it, and to attempt no explanations beyond what is plainly revealed. It is most plainly declared in the Word of God, and runs so uniformly through the whole plan and progress of man's redemption, revealed in that Word, that it may justly be stated as one of the principal things which the Scriptures teach, and one of the essential things which man is to believe concerning God.

There are three spoken of as engaged in the work of man's redemption, and so frequently spoken of, that their names cannot fail to be familiar to every reader of the Book of God, "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." They are repeatedly spoken of separately, in regard to their respective offices or actings in the work of man's redemption, as will afterwards be to be considered; but here we are desirous to confine our attention to the statement before us of there being three thus engaged in the work, and to those passages of Scripture where the three are spoken of as united in that work, and where they are presented together in one and the same passage. Now this fact, that these three are thus repeatedly spoken of, and that they are also spoken of at one and the same time, in various passages of sacred Scripture, must at once be admitted, and is not indeed denied. This very circumstance, then, of their being so spoken of together, and presented at the same moment to our view, as associated in the same work, is of itself calculated to favour the belief, that they are all included in the Godhead; and so, were this not the case, presents a carelessness in leading to so grievous an error, which we cannot well reconcile with the thought of an inspired rule of direction. But these passages of Scripture do not merely, in this way, favour the belief, that there are three in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; but do expressly present them together as objects of our faith and worship, as sources to us of spiritual and eternal blessings.

The form of blessing, appointed in the Old Testament (Num. vi. 28), was understood by the Jews and was so used by them, as to express their belief in three, as objects of their adoration. "On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, the Lord, or Jehovah, bless thee and keep thee; Jehovah make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; Jehovah lift up his countenance upon thee and give thee peace. And they shall put thy name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them." This threefold repetition of the name Jehovah, is called his name; and the priest in making it had three fingers of his hand extended, to express the three in the Godhead.

A remarkable passage in Isaiah (ch. xlviii. 16) expresses a similar union of three in the Godhead. "I have not spoken in secret from the beginning; for I have not spoken in secret from the beginning; and now the Lord God and his Spirit hath sent me." The person speaking these words is previously called (ver. 2), "the Lord of hosts," or Jehovah of hosts, and is represented (ver. 12) as saying of himself, "I am he; I am the first; I also am the last;" and here he says, "and now the Lord Jehovah hath sent me, and his Spirit hath sent me," or the Lord Jehovah hath sent me and his Spirit—"thus saith Jehovah, thy Redeemer; the Holy One of Israel."

Similar to this passage are the following words of the Redeemer (John xvi. 13, 14), "when he, the Spirit of truth is come, he shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you; all things that the Father hath are mine; therefore said I, that he shall take of mine and show it unto you." The Father, the Son, and the Spirit, are here spoken of as so acting together, and so having all things, and so taking of these things, as common to each, as we cannot understand to be said of mere creatures in conjunction with the infinite Jehovah.

This union of action was very strikingly illustrated, and in a manner manifested to the senses, in the account of the Lord's baptism, Luke iii. 21. "It came to pass, that Jesus also being baptized and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him; and a voice came from heaven which said, thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased." Here the three in the Godhead are clearly set forth as acting together, according to the parts sustained by them in the work of man's salvation; the Father appointing the Son as Mediator, the Son entering on that office, and the Spirit coming, through him, to be communicated at his pleasure.

In the address of the Apostle John to the Churches in Asia, the three in the Godhead are solemnly adored together as objects of worship, and as uniting in imparting blessings in answer to prayer. "Grace be unto you and peace from him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and from the seven spirits which are before his throne (that is clearly in the style of the Revelation the Holy Spirit), and from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness." Rev. i. 4-6.

In the form of benediction used by the Apostle Paul, the three in the Godhead are distinctly addressed in prayer, as equally objects of worship and equally authors of the blessings of salvation. "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen."

And, above all, in the form of baptism, a most solemn act of worship and profession of faith, the words prescribed by our Lord himself bring the three in the Godhead explicitly into view, as receiving our adoration, and concerned in our salvation, and composing the name of that God, to whom we are devoted in that ordinance; "baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

But a question here arises, What are these three? Are they only three different names by which the blessed God is made known? or three attributes ascribed to him in his Word? or three offices in which he acts towards his creatures, as the Creator, Saviour, and Sanctifier? There is no word given in Scripture, to fix the meaning or fill up the term; and it would be well if we could dispense with using any; because we have no language to express suitably the nature of the Godhead. It should be enough to say in the words of Scripture, "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one." But when men presume to add such interpretations, as clearly contradict the truth revealed, it becomes necessary to guard the truth from being perverted or set aside. These three are repeatedly spoken of as distinct agents, to each of whom, separately, the titles, attributes, works, and worship, peculiar to God alone, are ascribed; and by each of whom a distinct operation is assigned in the work of man's redemption, the Father originating, the Son executing, the Spirit applying the great salvation. Hence it is said, "there are three persons in the Godhead." We have no better word or way of expressing ourselves to distinguish the separate actings of the three in the Godhead, than to say that they are three persons; but, at the same time, we must feel the inadequacy and the unsuitableness of a term, which is apt to convey to our minds the idea of three distinct beings; and, while we are warranted in the use and application of this term to the Godhead, by the apostle speaking of the Son in relation to the Father, as "the express image of his person;" and, while we, therefore, say that there are three persons, three distinct personal agents in the Godhead, we are concerned to guard against any idea of three Gods, remembering always, that it is the first of all the commandments, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord;" and that it is here added, "these three are one God." There is no contradiction in the statement. The three are not one in the same sense in which they are three. We do not say, that three persons are one person, or that three Gods are one God; but that three persons are one God. By this it is not meant, either that they are one merely in consent or agreement, but one in essence; not merely similar, but the same in substance. Among the three in the Godhead there is no distinction declared, save that of personality and agency, and no idea of inferiority or order is to be admitted; as if there were one supreme, and the others inferior—one to be truly adored as God, and the others to receive a lower degree of worship, as only the highest of created beings; but clearly it is stated, that they are all truly God, "equal in power and glory."

In this, indeed, there is a great mystery, above our comprehension and beyond our explanation; but it is made known to us as a mystery, as, indeed, every thing relating to the essence of the Godhead must be, and must more or less be expected for ever to be, to all finite minds, even to the highest of created intelligences, between the highest of whom and the infinite Jehovah there must always exist a distance immeasurable, a distance that cannot be expressed by any means of computation that we possess, a distance that can be declared only by saying, that he alone is being, and that they are as nothing. It is of all things most irrational to require, that there shall be no mystery to us in regard to the nature of the Godhead, which is just to require an absolute impossibility. All that can be expected is, that what we are required to believe concerning God be distinctly declared in his Word; and most distinctly is it declared in his Word, that there are three, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in whose name united we are baptized, to whom at the same time we are to pray, and whom we are always to honour the one as we honour the other. Most distinctly, also, is all this declared in such a manner, as to show that it is a fundamental truth, running through the whole of man's redemption, and entering into the practical influence of all saving knowledge. It is the key-stone of the arch, essential to the support of all Christian piety. One God in three persons is the object of our adoration; and this mystery, in itself incomprehensible, is yet kept in view in every exercise of faith in the mercy of the Father, the mediation of the Son, and the ministration of the Holy Spirit. The harmony and tendency of the plan of redemption is habitually and intelligibly exhibited in the distinct parts assigned to the three Divine persons; the Father sending the Son, the Son executing his Father's will, and the Holy Spirit sanctifying the people of God by his power in their hearts.

All this is a doctrine of pure revelation, which no reason of man can render more clear or certain; and all that we are concerned to do is to receive the plain testimony of God's Word with a sober, humble, and teachable mind. The mysterious nature of the doctrine in no respect weakens its practical influence. We are as able to adore the grace of the Father, the love of the Son, and the communion of the Spirit, as if the whole depth of the mystery were laid open to our view; and though we understood the whole mystery and all mysteries, it would profit us nothing, without this practical influence felt and cherished in our hearts. Little would it avail any man to be able to display and to defend this great mystery, in the most persuasive manner and by the most profound speculations, while in his own heart he remained a stranger to those devotional feelings which it calls forth, and indifferent to those daily duties to which it constrains us. "He who goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words and names of man's invention—may amuse himself, and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something, he knows not what; but the good man, who feels the power of the Father, and to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit is shed abroad—this man, though he understand nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity."* Let us duly consider, that we are concerned not merely to receive the truths which the Scriptures teach us to believe concerning God, but also so to receive them, as to be thereby directed how we may best glorify God, and how we may most enjoy God. Let us then learn in this mystery of the Godhead:—

1. Humbly to adore the depth of the Divine nature, which we cannot fathom, and which it is the most profane presumption to pretend to search out. Our proper inquiry on subjects so sacred and profound is not, "how can these things be?" but, "are they things which the Scriptures plainly teach?" Then let us not like "fools rush in where angels fear to tread;" but, as even these exalted intelligences veil their faces with their wings while merely standing in the presence of the glorious Jehovah, let us humbly submit our minds in silent, simple, and sober faith to the testimony of God concerning himself. By presuming to pierce the light inaccessible in which he dwells, we should only plunge our dazzled sight in deeper darkness. Here believing ignorance is both wiser and better than such presumptuous knowledge; and this very submission of our proud reason opens the way to much higher attainments and happier enjoyments. The very mysterious grandeur of the doctrine exalts our conceptions of the Divine majesty, and fills the soul with a salutary awe of the Divine glory. "We rejoice," says one of our deepest thinkers on sacred things, "in its incomprehensibility; we delight to lose ourselves in the impenetrable shades which invest the subject; because in the darkness and cloud which envelope it God dwells." †

2. Cautiously to adhere to the simple words of sacred * Jeremy Taylor.

† Rev. Robert Hall.

Scripture, in all our apprehensions or explanations of this great doctrine of the Godhead. As purely a doctrine of revelation, let us preserve it purely as it is revealed. Let us neither fail to worship the three in the Godhead, nor yet forget that these three are only one God. In worshipping one God let us beware of ignorantly and unthinkingly excluding the Son from our adoration, as if he were merely some excellent one under God; or the Holy Spirit, as if he were only a Divine energy or influence proceeding from God. And, on the other hand, let us equally guard against the still grosser confusion of thought of imagining, that in acknowledging three persons we are addressing three Gods. "Our minds," says one of our most Scriptural yet close reasoners, "are reduced to such a simple unity, as we think upon one of them alone; or else distracted and divided into such a plurality, that we worship in a manner three Gods instead of one. It is a great mystery to keep the right middle way. Learn, I beseech you, so to conceive of God, and so to acknowledge him, and pray to him, as you may do it in the name of Jesus Christ, that all the persons may have equal honour, and all of them one honour; that, while you consider one God, you may adore the sacred and blessed Trinity; and while you worship the Holy Trinity, you may straightway be reduced to a Unity."*

3. Carefully to follow out the practical influence of this truth concerning God. Seek the blessings which flow to your souls from the three in the Godhead, in the distinct offices in which they are revealed. Rest not in your outward baptism in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; but desire to be found indeed worshipping and serving them at all times, in spirit and in truth. Rest not in the mere hearing or uttering of that most comprehensive benediction, with the sound of which you are so familiar, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all;" but make it your daily prayer, from the heart, that so it may be fulfilled in your experience, to your everlasting consolation. Thus pray to the Father, in the name of the Son, by the aid of the Spirit. Place all your hopes for eternity on the everlasting love and free mercy of the Father; on the atoning merits and all-prevailing intercession of the Son; and on the enlightening power and sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit. Strive thus to lay hold of the substantial truths and consolations connected with the doctrine, and which are beyond all controversy. Rejoice to behold the three in the Godhead so harmoniously consenting and concurring in your soul's salvation, and so graciously calling you to the most sacred intercourse with themselves in your spirits, even to "fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ," that, here walking in the light as he is in the light, you may be finally made meet for seeing him as he is, and knowing as you are known.

† Binning.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACRAE & Co., 13, Glasgow Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junr. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—Address to Christians on the "Signs of the Times," and the Duty of Diligence in the Cause of Christ, Part I., Page 721 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Angelic Rest." By Weir, . . . . . 724 3.—Biographical Sketch. The Rev. John Campbell, the African Traveller. By the Editor. Part I., . . . . . 730 4.—Edinburgh Continental Association. Part I., . . . . . 726	5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Charles J. Brown, . . . . Page 729 6.—Sacred Poetry. "Christ's Resurrection." By Grahame, 733 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Bennet, Bowdler, and Stewart, . . . . . 734 8.—History of the Albigenes. Period II. To the Death of Simon de Montfort. Part II., . . . . . 734
--	---

ADDRESS TO CHRISTIANS

ON THE "SIGNS OF THE TIMES," AND THE DUTY OF DILIGENCE IN
THE CAUSE OF CHRIST.

PART I.

"Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto eternal life, that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."—JOHN iv. 35, 36.

It has been frequently observed, that progress, either towards good or evil, is not usually made by equal measured steps, but by tides, or waves. Believing this to be the case, and that such a tide has been for some time setting in, we consider the times as peculiarly fitting for addressing the Christians of Scotland, and calling their attention to the responsibility under which they are laid, particularly in this age of universal activity, of putting forth greater diligence in the cause of that Master whose they are, and whom they profess to serve.

The spirit of the age is decidedly one of movement; all classes of the community seem aroused,—and, thanks be to God, the disciples of Christ have not been left to slumber amidst the general awakening. The excitement which exists among the people is undoubtedly one of a more intellectual and interesting cast than in former times. It is not now as formerly, that a cry is raised merely under the pressure of immediate distress; on the contrary, a restless spirit of inquiry exists in the body of the people, and prompts them to look forward, and to examine the foundations on which they imagine their interests to be based; the laws which regulate the constitution of society are inquired into, and the most important abstract questions are keenly discussed. Individual interest and aggrandisement are, doubtless, now as much as formerly the actuating motive; but we may now observe much more of method in the way in which these are sought to be obtained, than in times past.

There is something fearful, yet grand, in this leaven of intellectualism which pervades the community, and which we observe working and agitating the masses of society. This, however, is a wide field, and one on which we do not intend to enter further than to remind the Christian, that amidst so much philosophising and professed seeking after truth, he has also, as well as others, a public testimony to maintain; his warning voice to the world is this, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." Matt. vi. 33. The Christian thus introduces a new element, and puts things into a different order of arrangement from the man of the world. He must, indeed, if he be a man of enlarged mind, ever be foremost in all plans of secular amelioration; but all such objects of merely worldly improvement he boldly stamps with the title, "earthly," and discusses them to the world with this commentary. He may, indeed, espouse warmly this or that course of public measures; but he knows their proper position and value; he knows that it is not so much in the adjustment of the machinery of the body politic that the defect lies, as in the material of which the machine is composed; his primary object is, therefore, the saving a people out of the world, rather than the establishing them in it.

The Christian cannot fail to have his interest awakened by the great political questions of the day; his attention is, however, mainly directed to other objects, and from these his principal satisfaction is derived. A life, and activity, and spirit of decision is to be seen arising among those who are not ashamed to be considered Christians; and from the gracious proofs to be observed in different parts of the country of the wider opening of the people's hearts, and their more gladly hailing the Gospel tidings, encouraging evidence is afforded that the Lord's hand is not shortened in this our day, but that it is really stretched out to bless the exertions which are everywhere more abundantly making in his service: this is the Christian's encouragement, and it should be his spur to still greater activity in the cause.

Notwithstanding the increased activity which certainly exists, it must, however, be lamented that great, very great, is still the lack of individual exertion among the body of Christians. It is, indeed, a strange and startling proof of the small amount of love that is felt for Christ, that there is so little putting forth of individual exertion in his service; a great deal of money is given, but how little are the bulk of Christians in the habit of lending their personal exertions in promoting the good cause! how seldom does a Christian venture to speak a word for Christ among his associates! how seldom does he find resolution to write a letter, even to his bosom friend, on the subject! or, to take an instance of service of the easiest and lightest kind, how seldom does he even think of handing a tract, calling his neighbour's attention to what he himself considers a matter of transcendent importance. He screens his lack of zeal by assuming a false humility; he says he is not qualified for instructing others,—he does not consider himself hired to work in this vineyard,—it is not his calling. What! art thou a Christian? hast thou turned thy back upon the city of Destruction, and art thou treading the road towards the heavenly city, and art not thou able to put in a single word, not even a whisper, asking thy bosom friend to join company with thee? Wilt thou not be ashamed, in the great day of account, to meet thy brother face to face, before thy Judge and his Judge, and confess that you walked often with him, and yet did not warn him? Hast thou no misgivings of conscience, as to the sincerity of thy faith? Hast thou no fear of that sentence being applicable to thee, "Cast thou the unprofitable servant into outer darkness." We say not these things to discourage, but to arouse and stir up the indolent to a consideration of the obligations which are upon them. "Are there not twelve hours in the day? Work while it is called day, lest the night come, when no man can work." "Why stand ye idle all the day? hath no man hired thee?"—the Lord himself gives thee both warrant and encouragement to begin: "Get thee into my vineyard, and at the end of the day whatsoever is right I will give thee." Here is both thy work and thy wages placed before thee. The day is perhaps far advanced, but still there is light, and thou mayest do some work, and get thy reward. The summer is perhaps far spent, but it is not yet ended; the harvest is drawing on, but still there is work for thee. "Lift up thine eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest;" and, for thy encouragement,—“He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto eternal life, that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together.” Depend upon it, a Christian is neither in a healthy nor a happy state, who is doing nothing in his Master's service. It is not here maintained that every Christian has the gift of teaching, still every one has some talent committed to him, and is called to occupy it till his Master come. He is not a hard Master, reaping where he has not sown, and gathering where he has not strawed.

It is a grievous mistake, if any one imagines that he is only serving Christ when he is preaching, or teaching, or expounding the Gospel; this is altogether a mistaken view of the constitution of the household of faith. In every house, and especially in the House of Christ, there are diversities of offices and gifts. "Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers?" No; but Christians are all ministers or servants of the household, and they should consider it their high honour and privilege faithfully to exercise each their own department; not contending for the mastery, the one over the other; neither the one despising the office of the other; neither, let it be carefully observed, any one despising his own office,—for this is despising, not himself, but his office, and the Lord, whose servant he is,—and nothing is more than this a cause of feebleness and slothfulness of service. Each servant is therefore called to glory in his office, whatever it is, considering how great a Master he serves, remembering also his Lord's own words, that "he that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." Luke xvi. 10. Those who desire to strengthen and consolidate the mystical body of Christ, would do well to keep this in mind, and give honour even to the weaker members; realizing the doctrine, and remembering the words, of the apostle, that while all the members are necessary for the completeness of the body, "much more those members which seem to be more feeble are necessary." 1 Cor. xii. 22. There is a weighty mystery here, and much more than is generally understood, or fully received.

The Christian who ministers at the sick-bed of his poor neighbour, who gives a crust of bread or a cup of cold water, in the name of Christ, is he not worthy of honour, as a servant of Christ? The rich man of rank and station, who, notwithstanding the scoff and contempt of his contemporaries, steadily takes his ground, and is not ashamed of maintaining a testimony for Christ and vital godliness, is he not an honoured member of the body, and a most useful minister in the household? He that, by a mild yet firm rebuke, checks the course of profane conversation; he that persuades his friend to accompany him to the house of God, and withdraws him from the desecration of the Sabbath; they that "lodge strangers, wash the saints' feet, relieve the afflicted, and diligently follow every good work" (1 Tim. v. 10);—are they not all to be esteemed and honoured for their work's sake? or are their offices to be despised? We will say, moreover, that while exercising these Christian graces, they are not only commending the Gospel to men's consciences, and, so laying the foundation, or, as it were, opening the soil for the man of other gifts to come afterwards and sow the seed, but they themselves have the best opportunity of speaking "a word in season" to the weary soul, and of drawing it to Christ.

It is indeed a glorious privilege, that of being allowed to plead for Christ—to endeavour to open hearts to the understanding of the Gospel—to deliver men from the "fear of death and the bondage of corruption, and translate them into the glorious liberty of the children of God." He who feels this, will scarcely keep silence; "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak;" every opportunity and every means will be eagerly sought after.

We would say here a few words in commendation of what we conceive to be one means whereby any Christian may most advantageously be employed in widely diffusing the Gospel, and a means which, we conceive, is not sufficiently appreciated,—it is that of tract distribution.

A tract is a short treatise on some branch of Gospel truth; its object may be, to arouse the careless, to instruct and edify the Christian, or to comfort the mourning. Because it may be short, let it not be despised; a word is sufficient, if God opens the heart. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing;" If the words written be the words of truth, "they are spirit and they are life." Man can only sow—God alone can give the increase. Despise not small things; think not it requires a long treatise to convey an important truth. Many long books have been written, nevertheless, God often chooses "the weak things of this world to confound the things that are mighty." Did not Philip meet the Ethiopian in ignorance and darkness, solitary, sitting in his chariot? and did he not leave him with the knowledge of salvation, and with Christ for his friend and companion,—that friend who, in all his after life, would never leave him nor forsake him? Did not Christ sit down weary, to take a brief rest on his way to Galilee, and did he not reveal himself to the woman of Samaria, so that she left her water pots at the well, and went to bring her friends, saying, "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" And may not a Christian now, as then, by a few words seasonably dropt in, or by a judicious tract, tell a sinner of the love of God? Is it not by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ, that a sinner is saved? Is it not by his asking, that he receives eternal life? Are the words of Christ less true now than they were formerly? "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest ask of him, and he would give thee living water?" What a mighty gift is this which a Christian has, of being able to offer such streams to a poor, thirsty, perishing sinner! A Christian is one who has himself found "the pearl of great price,"—he is rich, he has a treasure which no man can take from him; and what is equally delightful and wonderful,—by communicating to others, he does not impoverish himself; but, on the contrary, when he is enabled to open the heart of another, his own heart is thereby the more strengthened and enlarged.

One practical remark we would make in this place. A man soon wearies in thinking and acting by himself. In union there is strength, and in Christian fellowship there is encouragement and support; and this should be always sought after. In every town, and in every village, a Christian may find, it is hoped, some fellow-Christian willing to associate and work along with him. It only requires faith to begin; but having taken the first step, he will probably find the work accompanied with blessing and profit both to himself and to those for whom he works. From the mere circulation of tracts, he will derive satisfaction, as there is in every exercise of faith, for faith is required even for this; but if this is followed up with visiting and conversing with his fellow-men, he will find a new vein of sympathies opened up, the exercise of which he will find to constitute the true and natural enjoyment of the renewed heart. Tracts are the more likely to be read, being brief, and particularly by the poorer classes, who have not the surfeit of desultory reading, which distracts the upper classes, and which, as a matter of fashion and conventional necessity they are compelled to overtake. A tract left at a poor man's dwelling, is therefore the more likely to be read, and become the subject of conversation, when the labour of the day is over, and the family is assembled. For this purpose, we would recommend the frequent use of narrative tracts, as being at once instructive and attractive. Tracts are a most useful auxiliary to a minister, in an extensive parish, or among a large scattered congregation. A clergyman in these circumstances finds it impossible to come into such frequent and close intercourse with his people as is desirable. Tracts not only help to supply this deficiency, but they also pave the way for his visits, and enable him to enter at once on the subject he has in view. In the remote and thinly peopled districts of Scotland, any thing in the shape of reading is eagerly sought after; and in the absence of the distractions and excitements of more busy life, the truth, when brought pointedly forward, is more likely to be pondered, and to find a lodgement in the heart. Charitable individuals who are in the habit of visiting the dwellings of the poor, with a view of ministering to their temporal comforts, if they are Christians, will surely feel a painful regret if they neglect the opportunity of offering at the same time the consolations which the immortal part requires, either by conversing with them, or by leaving a tract suited to their circumstances; and those who have not the gift or means of visiting,—and there are many, who, from constitutional temperament or education, feel a timidity, at intruding into the presence even of the humblest cottager,—still such a person may, by means of tracts, have the satisfaction of thinking that he is, though unseen, and perhaps unheard of, nevertheless working in the service and under the eye of that Master, who notes and records all his actings.

ANGELIC REST.

Oh! had I wings like yonder bird,
That soars above its downy nest,
I'd fly away, unseen, unheard,
Where I might be for aye at rest
I would not seek those fragrant bowers,
Which bloom beneath a cloudless sky;
Nor could I rest amidst the flowers
That deck the groves of Araby.
I'd fly—but not to scenes below,
Though ripe with every promis'd bliss;
For what's the world?—a garnish'd show—
A decorated wilderness.

Oh! I would fly and be at rest,
Far, far beyond each glittering sphere
That hangs upon the azure breast
Of all we know of heaven here.

And there I'd rest, amidst the joys
Angelic lips alone can tell;
Where bloom the bowers of paradise—
Where songs in sweetest transports well.

There would I rest, beneath that throne
Whose glorious circle gilds the sky;
Where sits Jehovah, who alone
Can wipe the mourner's weeping eye.

WRIB.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. JOHN CAMPBELL,
THE AFRICAN TRAVELLER.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THIS truly excellent man was born at Edinburgh in 1766. His father, who was a native of Killin, and an individual of great piety, died when John, the youngest son, was only two years old. Thus deprived of the care of one parent, the children, three sons, were thrown upon the sole charge of their widowed mother, who, however, survived her husband only four years. On the death of their mother, the three orphan children went as boarders into the house of their uncle, Mr Bowers of Edinburgh, "a pious and judicious Christian, who was an elder or deacon of the Relief Church." Placed under such guardianship, the utmost attention, was paid not merely to the domestic comfort, but to the religious training of the young Campbells. John was educated along with his brothers at the High School, then under the rectorship of Dr Adams, and he appears to have made considerable proficiency in the acquisition of classical knowledge, though, from failing to pursue such studies, in after years his acquaintance with the languages of antiquities was by no means such as might have been expected from his early advantages. From his childhood he was characterised by habits of enterprise, and he was often accustomed to tell that his uncle thought him an unpromising scholar, because he was fonder of rambling about the Salisbury Craigs, or of building turf huts, like the Africans, in the garden. The same disposition continued with him through life. He delighted in travelling, and the ample scope which he afterwards found for this propensity in the wilds of Africa, seemed to give fresh vigour and force to his active mind.

Under his uncle's roof, young Campbell was reared with a peculiar view to the formation of a decidedly religious character. The following graphic sketch, written in his seventy-fourth year, gives an interesting description of this period of his life:—

"We regularly attended Mr Baine's ministry on the Lord's Day, and the following was the manner in which every Sabbath evening was spent at home:—Immediately after tea, the whole family were assembled in uncle's room, viz., we three brothers, the female servant, and an apprentice. Each was asked to tell the texts, and what they remembered of the sermons they had heard during the day; then a third part of the questions in the Shorter Catechism were asked, to which we repeated the answers in rotation. He then took one of the questions as it came in course, from which, off hand, he asked us a number of questions, for the trial of our knowledge, and informing our judgments. The service was concluded by singing two verses of a psalm, and uncle offering a most pious prayer for a blessing on the evening exercises. From the variety that we attended to, we did not weary in the service; indeed, I do not recollect one of us ever yawning during it. This way of keeping the Sabbath deeply impressed us with its sanctity. Had I heard a boy whistle, or a man laugh loud, or overheard the sound of an instrument of music from a house, I was actually shocked. We were never permitted to cross the threshold of the door on the Lord's Day, except when going to worship. Some might conclude, from all this, that we must have been a gloomy, morose family; but the fact was the reverse. Uncle was a cheerful man,—possessed peace of mind, and the prospect of a happy eternity. He was a long time ill before he died, and for weeks before he expired his agony was almost intolerable; his moanings were incessant night and day. For years after his death, I never heard the mourning of a dove but I was reminded of him. I do not know what his disease was, but I recollect hearing people call it 'A burning at the heart.' In the course of a few years," he goes on to say, "after uncle's death, we all made a profession of faith in Jesus Christ, by becoming members of a Presbyterian Christian Church, and by establishing regular worship in the family, morning and evening; each of the brothers taking his turn to officiate by rotation. On afterwards comparing notes together, we found that, reflecting on the uniform, consistent, and upright conduct of our uncle, led each of us to think seriously about the salvation of his own soul."

At this time, Mr Campbell was an apprentice to a goldsmith and jeweller in Edinburgh, and in this situation he conducted himself with the most exemplary fidelity and conscientiousness. Still, by his own confession, though he had enjoyed many religious advantages in his uncle's house, he was addicted in his boyish days to profane swearing. This, however, never settled into a habit; and, by the blessing of God upon the pious instructions and example of Mr Bowers, he was led to forsake the company and the practices of those wicked associates who strove to ensnare him. The death of his uncle appears to have made a deep impression upon his mind. He began to be more in earnest upon the subject of religion, and he strenuously endeavoured to acquire such a state of holiness as would recommend him to the Divine favour. In all this, he was seeking to establish a righteousness of his own, while he was neglecting to submit himself to the righteousness of God. He now set himself to study Dr Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." At the same time, he read Bunyan's "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners." Neither of these well known treatises produced the desired effect upon his mind. He imbibed erroneous conceptions of the salvation of God, and he was kept in a most unhappy state of mind for nearly two years. As he advanced in the knowledge of the Scriptures his views became clearer and more completely in accordance with Divine truth. For a long period, however, he was unwilling to recognise a crucified Saviour, as the only ground of his hope. From this condition of legal bondage, he was gradually delivered, chiefly by a careful and prayerful study of the Bible, and intercourse with pious acquaintances. A graphic description of one of these worthy men, is thus given in Mr Campbell's own language:—

"I never met with two persons exactly alike, whether Christians or not; shades of difference are perceptible, even where there is the nearest approach to resemblance. I have taken the pen to tell you a few things concerning a venerable man of God, the outlines of whose character differed from all I ever knew; and perhaps you will be surprised to hear that he was a gauger (or excise officer), an employment as much despised in those days, in the north, as that of the publicans, or tax-gatherers, by the Jews, in the days of our Lord. When his piety became generally known in the town where he lived, he had the honour of being distinguished by the appellation of 'The Praying Gauger!' In reference to his being a man of prayer, perhaps you will be startled at a remark I heard made by one of his most intimate and oldest acquaintances,—'That he believed Duncan Clark (for that was his name) had not for the last forty years slept two hours without engaging in prayer.' This was the nearest approach to literal obedience to the apostolic injunction, 'Pray without ceasing,' that I ever read or heard of. Was not such an one in downright earnest to obtain the blessings of salvation?"

"He was the first person to whom I opened my case, when I was greatly alarmed about the state of my soul before God. I wrote to him a very simple letter, which he first showed to some of his intimates, for their opinion, and then wrote a cautious, brief answer, which he did not send off by post, but actually brought himself, and delivered into my hands in Edinburgh. He explained his doing so, by telling me that he had been at Dunfermline sacrament, to which place he carried it; and while there, he thought that, being within fifteen miles of Edinburgh, he would just walk to it, and have a little conversation, as well as deliver the letter. He had walked more than twenty miles to the sacrament. He walked thus to save his money for the poor. He was accustomed to gather together the smallest crumbs on the table, opposite to where he sat, and to put them into his mouth; very probably in obedience to our Lord's orders, 'Gather up the fragments, that nothing may be lost.'

"I remember a friend asking Mr Clark how old he was. He returned an answer like the following:—'I am twenty-seven thousand, three hundred and seventy-five days,' and, taking out his watch, told also the number of hours and minutes. No doubt he did this as literally conforming to Ps. xc. 12, 'So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.' He had a great reverence for those ancient writers, who are frequently called fathers of the Church, and often quoted them as such. I remember one day when he had done so frequently, Dr Wright, another friend of mine, said to him, 'Mr Clark, these fathers of yours prove nothing to me; I must appeal to the grandfathers, the apostles; a saying of theirs settles a point at once.' Duncan was the son of a clergyman, and had thus obtained his knowledge of the fathers. "I remember," says Mr Campbell, "he told me he had called upon Dr Macknight, to whom he had been long known as a Christian. He was also an acute critic. 'We talked,' said he, 'on various subjects, but my views did not please him. I therefore said, Doctor, do you know any subject upon which we are agreed?—I should like to talk with you on that.' I heard him once say, that from the worst sermons he ever heard he could suck some honey out; and if any of them were scanty of the Gospel, he took it as a rebuke to himself."

Amid the severe conflict to which Mr Campbell was subjected, he was held in high esteem by many eminent Christians, and spent most of his leisure hours in visiting the sick and dying poor. At length, in 1789, he began to think of dedicating himself to the service of God, in the work of the ministry. On this subject he consulted the Rev. Thomas Scott, the commentator, who gave his advice in the following terms:—

"Chapel Street, 24th Sept. 1789.

"DEAR SIR,—I should have written a line in answer to your last very friendly letter, but that necessary engagements so much engrossed my time, that I had not leisure and spirits for the purpose. I have been very poorly of the asthma, &c.; but, I bless God, I am much recovered, though I cannot yet bear my former degree of application. However, I find it very good to be made sensible how frail I am, and how vanishing all things here below are; so that I am satisfied the Lord hath done all things well. But I know you will excuse me not entering copiously upon any subject, as I have so much writing; and, therefore, I shall only drop a few hints upon the subject of the latter part of your letter. I thank you for your confidence, but I am a poor counsellor. I cannot, upon the view I now have, see any material objection to your prosecuting your intention. The requisite qualifications, so far as human learning can supply them, may abundantly be attained, with moderate application, in the terms of years you mention, which seems to me needlessly long. Natural talents, I am persuaded, you do not want; and spiritual gifts for the work God will not withhold from those who desire the ministry as a good work, and in a proper manner. Faithful and diligent ministers were always wanted; and whilst we daily pray the Lord of the harvest to send them forth, we cannot, consistently, discourage those who seem likely to prove such; so that the whole seems to turn upon the internal consciousness of your own mind respecting the motives and principles of his choice. He who counts all but loss for an interest in the unsearchable riches of Christ and the whole of his salvation; and who is willing to renounce, venture, or engage in any thing, rather than give up that hope, is prepared for the general calling of a Christian. He who hath that love to Christ, and to the souls of men, that he desires to be an instrument in promoting his glory in their salvation, in preference to more easy, lucrative, or creditable employments; and who is willing to endure hardship, to labour, and, if called to it, to suffer, in promoting this work; who counts the cost, feels the importance and difficulty of the undertaking, but trusts in the Lord to assist, and support, and carry him through; and who does not willingly allow of the desire of popularity, praise, &c., as the motives of his choice, but is willing, if the Lord please, to labour in obscurity, in poverty, and under reproach, so he may be but useful; I think this man is prepared for the calling of a minister, and is moved by the Holy Ghost to take this office upon him, and may fairly conclude himself to be so, provided the Lord, in his providence, open a door for his admission, in a way consistent with his judgment and conscience. I have nothing to add to these loose hints, but to desire that you would remember me in your prayers. Mrs Scott desires her respects.—I am your sincerely affectionate friend, &c.,

“THOMAS SCOTT.”

Mr Campbell did not act upon this advice for several years subsequent to the date of this letter; but he still continued to do all the good in his power. About this time he became acquainted with the Rev. John Newton, with whom he regularly corresponded for a long period. On all the stirring points of the day, whether ecclesiastical or political, he communicated his views to this excellent man; and the advices and judicious counsels which he received in return, he felt to be peculiarly valuable. From one of the letters which formed a part of this correspondence, we quote a passage, descriptive of the great change which, at length, after many years' hard contest with conflicting doubts and fears, took place in Mr Campbell's views of the Gospel scheme of salvation:—

“Upon the evening of the 28th day of January 1795, the Lord appeared as my Deliverer. He commanded, and darkness was turned into light. The cloud which covered the mercy-seat fled away! Jesus appeared as he is! My eyes were not turned inward but outward! The Gospel was the glass in which I beheld him. When our Lord first visited Saul upon the highway, he knew in a moment that it was the Lord. So did I: such a change of views, feelings, and desires, suddenly took place in my mind, as none but the hand of an infinite Operator could produce. Formerly I had a secret fear that it was presumption in me to receive the great truths of the Gospel; now there appeared no impediment—I beheld Jesus as the speaker in his Word, and speaking to me. When he said, ‘Come,’ I found no difficulty in replying, ‘Yes, Lord! thy pardoned rebel comes.’ If not the grace of God, what else could effect such a marvellous change? I chiefly viewed the atonement of Jesus as of infinite value, as a price paid for my redemption, and cheerfully accepted by the Father. I saw love in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, all harmonizing in pardoning and justifying me. The sight humbled and melted my soul. Looking to what I felt was no help to my comfort; it came directly from God, through his Word.

“The following evening, about nine o'clock, while sitting before the fire, writing to a reverend friend, I had such a charming, surprising view of sovereign, pardoning, redeeming, unmerited mercy, that I was hardly able to bear it. The great doctrines of redemption, as stated in the Bible, opened to my view in a way I never experienced before. I beheld a crucified Jesus nigh me in the Word; I threw away the pen, and turned about to see this great sight! I looked steadfastly to the Lamb suffering for me! So much was I overpowered with the magnitude of this discovery of eternal, boundless love and grace in Christ, that I felt a difficulty in breathing.

“This view of my redeeming God in Christ completely swept away all the terrible horrors which had so long brooded over my mind, leaving not a wreck behind, but filling me with a joy and peace more than human—truly divine. I sat pensive; at one time beholding the pit from whence I was redeemed, at another the hope to which I was raised. My soul rushed out in wonder, love, and praise, emitted in language like this:—‘Wonderful mercy! why me? what is this? Thanks be to God who giveth me the victory through Jesus Christ, my Lord!’ Shuddering at sin, as pardoned; wondering that ever I could have been guilty of such transgressions, I continued sitting, wrapped up in silent wonder. For long after, when I thought of my hopes, I leaped for joy—I really had a glad heart. This visitation also created an extent of mildness and complacency in my temper that I never felt before. I felt a burning love rising in my heart to all the brethren in Christ; with a strong sympathy for all such as were not born of the Spirit. I earnestly breathed after their incorporation into the family of Christ.

“A light shone upon the Scriptures quite new to me. Passages, which formerly appeared hard to be understood, seemed plain as the A, B, C. Earthly crowns, sceptres, and thrones appeared quite paltry in my eyes, and not worth desiring. I felt a complete contentment with my lot in life. I trembled to think of any abatement of my faith, love, and sensibility: it required resolution to be resigned to remain long in the world. Indeed, I could scarce admit the idea of long life: I feared the trials and vicissitudes connected with it; but was completely silenced with that noble saying of our reigning Redeemer, ‘My grace is sufficient for thee.’ I saw I was fully warranted to mind the things of to-day, leaving the concerns of to-morrow to His wise disposal. I felt it easy to introduce spirit conversation wherever I was, and to recommend Christ wherever I went. I saw that every thing acceptable to God, or comfortable to ourselves, was the product of Divine power. I saw the folly and criminality of being too much in company, though composed of the best people in the world. I feel nothing more conducive to internal peace and prosperity than a regular meek, even walk.”

The suddenness of this gracious deliverance may appear startling to many readers, but we ought ever to remember, that the Spirit is regulated by no certain and definite modes of acting. He gives no account of any of his matters. Some, as in the case of the Philippian jailor, are suddenly, and in a moment called out of darkness into God's marvellous light, while others are gradually and imperceptibly led to see and to embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. Mr Campbell for this period felt that he had become a partaker of that glorious liberty wherewith Christ makes his people free. He had now received the Spirit of adoption whereby he could cry Abba, Father.

EDINBURGH CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION.

QUARTERLY PAPER, DRAWN UP BY THE SECRETARIES OF THE EDINBURGH CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION.

PART I.

It is with pleasure that the secretaries of the Edinburgh Continental Association, seek to call the attention of the religious public to the intelligence they are receiving respecting the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom in continental Europe. When the Committee sent forth their first circular, they especially directed attention to the operations of two societies, (those of Geneva and of France,) as deserving support; nor have they had any reason to alter the opinions they then expressed. The secretaries will therefore afford intelligence respecting the recent operations and successes of these two institutions, as well as of another society, to which allusion was made,—the Belgian Evangelical Society; and then make a few remarks on the claims which the Continent possesses on the liberality of Christians in this country.

The Evangelical Society of Geneva is at present in a remarkably flourishing state. The students of the Theological School, when it was reopened in March last, were thirty-two in number, of whom thirteen were Swiss, sixteen French, two Waldenses, one Dutch, and another an Italian. The opening address was delivered by M. Merle D'Aubigné, the distinguished president, and contains a clear and striking exposition of the divinity of the Spirit, and of his work in the conversion and sanctification of sinners, in opposition to the Pelagian heresies, which are unhappily taught from the professorial chair of the old institution. We are thus reminded of the great object of the founders of the school,—that of preserving, and of holding up to view, in the most prominent manner, the grand doctrines which Calvin and Beza, and the other Reformers, counted it their glory to proclaim, but which their successors in the Geneva Church had expunged from their creed, in order to teach the most fatal heresies in their room. It would be difficult to over-estimate the importance of this Institution. It is but a few years since it was commenced, and already its agents are labouring in France and Switzerland, in Piedmont and Holland, in Belgium, and in other parts of the world; unfolding, wherever they are placed, the pure doctrines of the Reformation, and illuminating the darkness by which they are surrounded. It is, we believe, the only theological seminary in France or Switzerland where the whole of the professors are acquainted with the Gospel, sound in their doctrinal views, and men of decided piety. On these accounts it is peculiarly deserving of the support of the religious public. Its founders and supporters at Geneva have made the most self-denied efforts and sacrifices for the purpose of maintaining it in its efficiency. One of them at the commencement contributed ten thousand francs; another, at a later period, afforded a similar sum. The expenses of the Institution amount to about twenty-three thousand francs annually, and which are incurred by maintaining the professors, and admitting a certain number of students into bursaries. The annual expense of a bursary for a theological student is about twenty-five pounds. A few additional pounds would cover all his other expenses, so that for this inconsiderable sum, a student may be prepared for some of those important spheres of usefulness that are opening upon the Continent every day. Should any individuals or particular congregations be deeply interested in the spread of religion on the Continent, the secretaries would suggest, that it would be difficult to discover a more efficient way of doing so than by undertaking to support a student at Geneva. "All the students," says Mr Merle D'Aubigné, "give evidence that they are converted. None of them have yet failed."

Many interesting circumstances might be related regarding the labours of the evangelists of the society, did space permit. These evangelists consist of students who, after being educated at the theological seminary, have been sent forth to labour; some of whom have been ordained, and others not. They have raised up numerous congregations in that part of France which borders on Switzerland, and a large portion of their hearers and members have been drawn from the Roman Catholic population. They are indefatigable in their exertions, and eminently distinguished by the simplicity of their aim, and of their dependence on God, and the fervour and elevation of their piety. It was but lately that the Superintendent of the Society visited their various stations, and returned home impressed, delighted, and benefited by what he had witnessed of their spirit and labours. Among these evangelists is to be numbered a Romish priest, who had recently resigned his office into the hands of his bishop,* and had been followed by a large number of his parishioners, whose eyes had been opened to discover the delusions of the Church of Rome. The influence, the piety, the strength of mind, the weight of character by which this individual is distinguished, invest him with a peculiar interest, and tend to awaken the hope that he may yet be instrumental in remarkably advancing the kingdom of the Redeemer around him. He is now labouring as an agent of the Geneva Society, and is assisted by one of the ablest and most devoted of the young men connected with their institution, whom they sent forth to strengthen his hands, and more fully instruct him in the knowledge of the truth. It is a deeply interesting fact, and calls loudly for the help of Christians in this country, that from all quarters the Geneva Society are receiving the most importunate applications for new labourers. They gaze around them and see the fields on all sides ripe for the harvest. They feel oppressed and afflicted when they consider their utter inability to answer the imploring calls of those who are earnestly beseeching them to send them the Gospel.

The third department of the Society's labours,—that of the Colporteurs, is also receiving remarkable tokens of the Divine approbation. During the last winter, sixty of these devoted men traversed fifteen different departments of France, carrying with them the Word of God. Of these sixty, there are thirty who are Scripture readers,—prying, holding meetings for edification, and in a simple manner explaining to the benighted people the most vital and striking passages of Holy Writ. It is gratifying to know that, notwithstanding the unwearied and determined resistance of the Romish priests, the sale of the Scriptures has been greater during the past year than on the former one, and that the very opposition the colporteurs have experienced, has in many instances awakened an additional interest in the Word of God. Thus, in the department of Jura, a colporteur was awakened early in the morning by the sound of a drum, which the priest had commanded to be beaten for the purpose of giving warning to the people, that they were not to approach the Bible distributor, nor to purchase or receive any of his works. The sound of the drum, however, had a very different effect from what the priest intended. The inhabitants of the place crowded around the colporteur, full of anxiety to procure the denounced volume, and he had an excellent sale that day.

Great are the blessings that are in all quarters resulting from the labours of these humble but most useful men. Here, there are some poor peasants whose consciences are awakened. There, there are some artisans or citizens whose attention is drawn to the Gospel. In a third place, there are soldiers who unite in reading the Testament at the guard-house, or draw from its pages their highest comfort, when confined by sickness to the hospital. Even among the rich of this world, there are some who receive with gratitude from the colporteurs, not only the written Word, but even their own remarks. It is an interesting fact, that many little bands of Jansenists—the descendants of those illustrious men, who, exposed to the fury of the Jesuits, and in the very heart of the Romish apostasy, walked with God, and openly avowed the doctrines of grace—have survived the horrors of the Revolution, and are scattered up and down France under the name of Beguins. These have renounced all connection with the Church of Rome, and take the Bible as the sole and all-sufficient rule of faith and of conduct; but from the utter want of instructors, were generally very imperfectly acquainted with its doctrines. But in the providence of God, the colporteurs have found them out—have explained to them the great truths of the Gospel. Their instructions have been cordially received, and eminently blessed; the divine spark that was wellnigh extinguished, is now kindled into a flame, and, full of zeal and courage, they openly avow the truth as it is in Jesus. A striking instance of this nature is also related in the narrative of the labours of the Evangelical Society of France. One of their colporteurs had long laboured in one of the towns of France, amid discouragements, persecutions, and dangers, that would have overwhelmed any ordinary faith. But, supported by the Divine promises, he persevered in hope, till at length he fell in with a number of Jansenists. They received him, and listened to the Gospel gladly, and God was present to bless his labours. The result has been, that seven now give evidence that they are genuine converts; five seem to be near the kingdom of God; and twenty-one are accustomed to listen with interest to this humble messenger of salvation. But it is not only among the Beguins that the colporteurs have left behind them the evident and blessed effects of their labours. In some instances a considerable number of individuals have been benefited by their humble efforts; and in one district there are now two hundred persons receiving the instructions of two Protestant pastors, and avowing themselves Protestants—who, but for the instructions of a colporteur, had remained till this moment the wretched bond-slaves of the Church of Rome.

* As it is probable the greater part of our readers have not seen the deeply interesting letter, addressed to the bishop, containing the Abbe Maurette's resignation, we shall introduce it into the Supplement.

It is farther gratifying to learn, that the most beneficial effects are resulting, not only to the people where they labour, but to the colporteurs themselves, and to the flocks from which they have been taken from their missionary labours. "Young Christians," says one of the circulars of the Society, "have been seen leaving their native village with a load on their backs. After a successful campaign, they have returned with fresh life and zeal, to become the instruments of a new revival in their own parishes. Nothing strengthens faith so much, as being engaged in the heat of missionary warfare. When these experienced soldiers return to their village church, they are the objects of the greatest respect and attention. Many hearts are touched by their recitals. They win others by their example, and after having done much good in other places, they are instrumental in doing yet more in their own churches. A faithful pastor in France was so struck with this phenomenon, that he felt himself called upon to invite, by circular letters, a large number of his colleagues, to encourage their parishioners to engage in colportage—were it only for the benefit that would thence result to their own churches. A single individual," said he, "might change the appearance of a whole flock."

While God is thus crowning with his effectual blessing the labours of the Geneva Society, there is an urgent call to Christians in this country to lend their most energetic aid. "The number of colporteurs," says the circular, "is yearly increasing, and it is France that principally supplies our forces. Among the sixty labourers of this year, only fourteen are Swiss. It is money that France does not, and cannot furnish. And now, perhaps, more than ever, this saying is accomplished, To the poor the Gospel is preached. For many years to come, the expense of this Society for propagating the Gospel must be defrayed by foreigners. But is it not a privilege for every Christian to whom the Lord has given the good things of this world, along with the pearl of great price, to devote a portion of them to the advancement of his kingdom among the nations?"

Not less cheering than the accounts we have just referred to, are the reports of the recent operations of the Evangelical Society of France. That institution, also, is daily achieving fresh triumphs over infidelity and superstition, and filling the hearts of its supporters with more abundant joy. Its receipts for the last year exceeded those of the preceding one by about 47,000 francs, while the native or French contributors to it also increased about one-third. In the northern parts of France the society possesses twenty-six stations, which are occupied by thirty-three agents, several of whom are labouring in some of the most important and populous cities of the kingdom. In the central parts, it possesses six stations and eleven agents. In the southern districts, it numbers sixteen stations and twenty-two agents, under which title are included pastors, evangelists, Scripture readers, teachers, and simple colporteurs. It is raising up new Protestant congregations, where a few years ago not a trace of religious impression could be found. It is awakening the love of the truth in parishes where the wretched delusions of Neology and Socinianism had long been taught. It is strengthening the hands of those who alone, and amid many discouragements, are proclaiming the truth; and, we trust, is hastening forward the period, which may not be very far distant, when the faithful pastors of the Reformed Church shall be so numerous, that should a synod be formed, they would no longer be in danger of being defeated and overborne as they would be at present by the enemies of the Saviour. The agents whom it employs as pastors and evangelists, are generally distinguished by the clearness of their doctrinal views, their zeal and their piety,—having been instructed at the Theological School at Geneva, in which, at present, there are ten students supported by the French Society.

The last report of this Institution abounds with interesting and striking evidences of the beneficial effects of the labours of its agents. Like the Geneva Society, it has its colporteurs, who carry the Word of God to the most distant parts of the land. The nature of the employment in which they are engaged, which seldom allows them to continue long in the same place, does not, in general, suffer them to see the fruits of their labours. Yet, when they have cast their bread upon the waters, they often find it after many days. One of these humble men, during one of the most dismal nights of winter, sought shelter in an inn, and took up his lodgings in the strangers' room. Here the subject of conversation was—the severity of weather—the depression of trade—and the gloomy aspect of affairs; when at length a voice was heard, clear and distinct, rising from one of the beds, and giving utterance to the following words:—"My friends, do not disturb yourselves, our heavenly Father knows what we have need of. 'Let us seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, and all these things shall be added to us.'" Great was the joy of the colporteur at this unexpected meeting with a fellow-Christian; but how was that joy augmented on the following day, on his discovery, that this young man was one with whom he had conversed, and to whom he had given a Testament the year before. No sooner did this stranger discover his benefactor, than he flung himself on his neck, and holding up the Bible, exultingly exclaimed, "This is the book which you sold me, it is all my consolation in the midst of my troubles." On another occasion, a colporteur was wending his way homeward, during the winter season, worn out with fatigue, and oppressed with a burning fever, which scarce left him strength to carry his burden. A stranger approached, and with the greatest kindness begged he would allow him to bear his load. On expressing his gratitude for the service, the stranger replied, that it was he who ought to be grateful, for he had met him a long time before—had conversed with him and derided him, but being persuaded at last to take a Bible and peruse it, his eyes were opened, and now he humbly solicited forgiveness. It is gratifying to find, that the circulation of the Bible awakens in the hearts of those who have been the most illiterate, an earnest desire to be acquainted with its contents; and that frequent instances have occurred of persons never taught to read before, who have laboured with unwearied assiduity to acquire the power of perusing the Sacred Volume. One of the agents relates that many adults, and even some individuals who were advanced in years, had devoted themselves to this work with energy and success. Another narrates the case of a pious woman, who, being converted herself, began to labour for the conversion of her husband and children. At length her fervent appeals deeply touched her husband's heart; he began earnestly to desire to be able to read the Bible; his wife was most anxious to aid him; and now the interesting spectacle is exhibited of this woman and her husband daily kneeling together, to supplicate grace from on high, to assist his endeavours to obtain access to the Word of God.

Numerous and striking are the incidents related in the report, which show that God is present to give efficacy to his Word. Among the rich and the poor, among the learned and the grossly ignorant, among the cold-hearted infidels and the self-denied ascetics; among the aged, decayed in mental powers and on the borders of the grave, and among the young, whose faculties are just unfolding, and who are only commencing the career of life, the preaching of the Gospel has, in many instances, done its work. Two or three incidents may be mentioned, which show the effect of the Word upon the young. One pastor relates that he was followed by five or six boys, eager to be instructed in the Word of God. When asked, what knowledge they wished to obtain,—their answer was, the knowledge of Jesus Christ. These young persons, along with several others, were in the habit of retiring, during their play-hours, to some secret place, in order to pour out their hearts before the Lord, were also accustomed to talk of the Gospel to their school-fellows, and expressed their earnest desire to devote themselves to the work of missions. The same individual relates, that soon after this about ten of these boys, who were afterwards joined by several others, accompanied him for a league and a-half on his journey, conversing with the deepest interest on divine things, and respecting the way in which they might best advance the kingdom of the Lord. Every night these young persons were accustomed to assemble in various houses for prayer, at the invitation of the people, who resided in the several hamlets, while even adults came together to hear them speak with such zeal and humility respecting the things of God. A single instance more we would mention, which shows the operation of the Spirit on the hearts of the young. The instructions communicated at the school to a Roman Catholic child were blessed. Having discovered what it was to pray in truth, he would no longer submit to mutter over Latin prayers which he did not comprehend. Meeting with great opposition from his parents, he bore their severity with the utmost meekness, and at night was heard by them pouring forth the most earnest supplications to his heavenly Father in their behalf. This was the means which God employed for their conversion; and now both father and mother are a portion of the Christian flock, who meet for the worship of God in the village in which they reside, and contribute for the support of the evangelists. Such are some of the cheering facts which the report of this society announces. Doubtless, there must be some discouraging as well as encouraging circumstances. If, in some cases, the Spirit has been more manifestly and abundantly poured forth, there are others in which there has been less striking demonstrations of his divine power; but it is undeniable that God is using this Institution as an instrument for effecting great good, in a land of deep moral and spiritual darkness. As, moreover, the society, if supplied with the pecuniary means, might indefinitely extend its operations, with every prospect of remarkable success, we trust it will draw forth the sympathy and the contributions of the people of God.

JUSTIFYING RIGHTEOUSNESS BROUGHT NEAR:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES J. BROWN,

Minister of the New North Parish, Edinburgh.

"Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring near my righteousness."—ISAIAH xlv. 12, 13.

It appears, from a comparison of many texts of Scripture, that when the word "righteousness" is connected, as it is in this passage, with "salvation"—"I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry: and I will place salvation in Zion for Israel my glory"—it does not mean, in those cases, the divine attribute of justice or rectitude, but the work of righteousness wrought out by the Lord Jesus Christ, and which it is the grand design of the Gospel to reveal and make offer of to sinners of mankind for their justification—their salvation. The words of the prophet here are evidently parallel to such as these: "The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen." "I will show forth thy righteousness, and thy salvation. I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness." "My salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished." "Look unto me, and be ye saved. One shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness." "Now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets, even the righteousness of God which is by faith in Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe." "Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring near my righteousness." Assuming, accordingly, without any farther remarks, that such is the meaning of this important word, let us first inquire a little, with reference to the righteousness spoken of, why it is termed, in this and so many other parts of Scripture, "the righteousness of God?"—"I bring near my righteousness," says He. Why is it called God's?—"Now the righteousness of God is manifested." And then let us ask concerning it, where, how, and to what parties or persons the Lord brings it near?—"Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring my righteousness near."

I. The Lord, you will observe, terms the work of his Son Christ Jesus—his obedience unto death—his whole endurance of the curse, and fulfilment of the precept of the law, his own, God's righteousness. There is no difficulty in seeing why it should be called Christ's, because he wrought it out; and, accordingly, we often speak of it in this manner—we speak of the righteousness of Christ as the ground of a sinner's justification. The Scriptures also speak of it thus from time to time. Paul, for instance, when contrasting the first and second Adams, says, "As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." And again, "As by one man's disobedience, many were made sinners; so by the obedience, the righteousness, of one shall many be made righteous." But much more frequently it is termed in Scripture, God's righteousness. And our first question is, Why, on what accounts the obedience unto death of the Lord Jesus Christ is termed "the righteousness of God?"

1. It is so called, I remark first of all, in marked contrast and opposition to man's—to the sinner's own fancied righteousness. Paul, for example, speaking of the carnal Jews, says of them, "They being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness," their own imaginary, fancied righteousness, "have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God; for Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." He marks the same contrast between God's and man's, when he says of himself, "That I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Jesus Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith"—not having mine own, but God's. The truth is, that there is in the conscience of every man a testimony to this truth, that a righteous and holy God cannot look upon a man without righteousness. I question if any man ever looked death in the face, without a deep secret conviction, that his meeting with God in peace could only be in connection with righteousness—with some kind, at least, of obedience to that law which God has given to man, and which he has written so deep upon his heart, that the work of it is found in the souls even of the most degraded heathen, "their conscience," as Paul says, "bearing them witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another." Hence it is, that every man has a righteousness of some kind or other. He feels that he seeks one; he contrives somehow to find one. When Rousseau, the infidel, was upon his death-bed, it is said of him, that he opened his windows towards heaven, and exclaimed (poor, miserable man!) "I give back this soul unto the hands of its Maker, unspotted as it came from him." Wretched, however, as the delusion was, conscience was there bearing testimony to great and momentous truths. He was deceived, of course, in fancying that his soul was righteous; but he felt, and rightly felt, that he needed righteousness. He was deceived in imagining that he rendered his soul back to God pure as He made it; but he was right in deeming this to be his duty, and resting in nothing short of it. His general conception had much truth about it. The application of it to himself was the lie: he went down to the grave with that "lie in his right hand." So, brethren, every man has a righteousness. He cannot think of God—of a judgment-seat—of a coming eternity, without looking out for one. Some men, casting their eyes anxiously about, perhaps, in times of dangerous sickness, find not a few things in their lives, with all their faults, on which they can look back with complacency. They have maintained a character without reproach; they have been esteemed kind and upright members of society;—that is their righteousness. Some men find a righteousness in their amiable natural qualities of mind. They are generous, benevolent, sincere; if they pretend to nothing higher, at least they are above the meanness of hypocrisy;—that is their righteousness. Other men find a righteousness in sacraments, in prayers, in devout observance of religious institutions;—that is their righteousness. Other men look to austerities, self-inflicted austerities, which God never required at their hands. Perhaps the merits of Christ combine with all these things, to furnish the righteousness of others still. The shapes, in short, are endless which man's righteousness assumes. The work of the Lord Jesus is God's righteousness, in opposition to them all. They are delusions; this is a glorious, divine reality—God's and man's. The one is a seamless, perfect robe; the others are filthy rags. The one is a robe that can wrap the sinner completely in from the storm of the Divine indignation; the others are rags that cannot cover him—filthy rags, which positively defile him. Man's righteousness,—that which the sinner would vainly offer to God; God's righteousness,—that which God alone can or will accept! This leads me to remark,—

2. Secondly, that the work of Christ is termed 'God's righteousness,' because it is that which God has, for the sinner's justification, devised, provided, and stamped with the seal of his approbation and acceptance. Observe, that when we view the righteousness as Christ's merely—as wrought out by Christ—this does not meet the difficulties of a soul anxiously inquiring for some adequate and solid ground of acceptance before God. It is with God as such—as the Judge of all the earth—as the Creditor to whom my debts are owing,—it is with Him that I have to do in this matter. The question with me, a sinner, is, "Where-withal shall I come before the Lord?" "How shall man be just with God?" Where shall a righteousness be found which He will accept, at whose judgment-seat I must soon stand? The Lord himself steps in, saying, "Behold, I bring near my righteousness;" that which, in opposition to all those vanities, I have devised, provided, accepted, sealed, to be the ground, the only and perfect ground, of a sinner's justification. "Now the righteousness of God is manifested, even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe." God devised it; it is His righteousness. He planned it in the counsels of peace before the world began. "I have made a covenant," said He, "with my chosen. I have found David, my servant." "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities." God provided it; it is His righteousness. When man had cast away, had trampled in the dust the righteousness which God gave him at his creation—when he stood naked before the Lord—defenceless—without a covering for his guilty soul, God did not leave him thus. He announced the provision of another covering—of a more glorious righteousness still—to be wrought out in due time by the seed of the woman. He announced the provision many ways in the law and the prophets. "I will raise unto David a righteous Branch." "His name shall be called The Lord our Righteousness." At length he provided the righteousness itself. He proceeded to carry the eternal purpose into effect. "He sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law," to put more honour upon its curse, by enduring it, than if all the sinners that should be redeemed had together borne it; and more honour upon its precept, by obeying it, than if no one of them had ever transgressed it. He sustained and upheld him throughout his whole work, until he could say, "It is finished!" Then he put his seal upon it; he stamped it with the seal of divine judicial acceptance. He raised Christ from the dead—he glorified his Son Jesus—he set the surety at liberty when the debt was paid—he set him down at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, as it is written, "He shall convince the world of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more;" that is, "of righteousness" accepted, and in this sealed with the seal of heaven, "that I go to my Father, and ye see me no more." It is God's, in short—devised by him, provided by him, accepted, sealed by him. What a consolation! What a security for a soul looking anxiously for a ground of justification! "I bring near my righteousness."

3. Once more, I remark here, that it is called God's, because it was wrought out by God in the person of his eternal Son,—by Emmanuel, "God manifest in the flesh." We have here a more wonderful ground than any we have yet seen, on which this righteousness is termed God's. He not only devised and provided it; he himself accomplished, wrought it out. It is his own in this highest mysterious sense, that, having for this very purpose taken to him a created nature, become "manifest in the flesh," he did therein accomplish a righteousness altogether without a parallel, an obedience truly and strictly divine,—a righteousness at once human and divine,—human in the matter of it, divine in the author, and the infinite excellency and glory of it,—human, inasmuch as it was the true and proper obedience of a man under the law,—divine, inasmuch as that man was the very fellow of the Lord of hosts, the Creator of all worlds, "God over all blessed for ever." "Surely shall one say, in Jehoyah have I righteousness," not only from him, but in him, it is his own, his very work. "This is his name whereby he shall be called, Jehovah our righteousness." "Drop down ye heavens from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness; let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation; and let righteousness spring up together; I the Lord have created it." Thus, is the glory of that expression, "God's righteousness," complete. It stands forth the grand central word of divine revelation. It not only tells what it is that God will, and alone can accept, in opposition to all the fancies of men, but it tells why it is that this righteousness can be,—that it is worthy to be accepted for the justification of all that put their trust in it. It is, as Peter calls it, "the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ." It is, truly, "clothing of wrought gold," God's own righteousness. Well might the Church exclaim, "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord; my soul shall be joyful in my God, for he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels." "Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring near my righteousness."

II. But this leads us to inquire much more briefly, as proposed, farther, where, how, and to what parties or persons the Lord brings this righteousness near? Where he brings it near I answer in the words of Paul, in the first chapter of Romans, at the 16th verse—"I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek, for therein," in the Gospel, "is the righteousness of God revealed." It is in the Gospel that this righteousness is revealed,—that it is "brought near." This, on the one hand, is the grand central discovery of the Gospel, as Paul intimates, when he says—"I am not ashamed of the Gospel, for therein is the righteousness of God revealed." And no where else, on the other hand, but in the Gospel, is this discovery to be found. Philosophers never made it. The reason of man never approached it. Men may have some obscure conceptions of Divine mercy. But of Divine righteousness in and for the remission of sins, they never dreamed. This is pre-eminently a righteousness revealed, a matter of pure supernatural revelation. As distinguished, moreover, from the shadows and darker intimations of the law, it is revealed in the Gospel. "Now the righteousness of God is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets." The text, indeed, in the Old Testament, may seem to oppose this. But this passage is just one of many anticipations of the Gospel, which we find scattered up and down through the Old Testament Scriptures. Even here, if we lay out of view the discoveries of later times, the righteousness could scarcely be said to be brought near. The words evidently point forward to Gospel days. The law and the prophets had ever borne witness of this righteousness. But now, in the Gospel, properly and eminently so called, it is revealed—"brought near." This leads to our next question, how it is brought near. I answer, in the free and earnest character of the offers and invitations of the Gospel. Can any thing be conceived to bring this righteousness nearer, save the very faith that appropriates it, than words like these. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take,"—"behold, I bring near my righteousness,"—"let him take the water of life freely." Or these words—"If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee,"—"I bring near my righteousness"—"he would have given thee living water." Or these words,

"Behold, I stand at the door"—"I bring near my righteousness"—"I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him, and he with me." Yes, it is brought, perhaps, still nearer,—it is pressed still more closely home on our acceptance, in commands, and blessed threatenings and expostulations like these—"He that believeth not, is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God." "He that believeth not, God hath made him a liar." "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned." O, how very near does the Lord thus bring his righteousness to us! He seems to lay it down, as if in the way between us and hell; and to say that, if we go there, we must make up our minds to tread over the very righteousness of the great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, into it. The second question runs insensibly into the third and last,—to what parties or persons the Lord brings his righteousness near. Observe, there might be a free, unrestricted offer of it to some particular persons only. This question, therefore, though closely connected with the last, is quite distinct from it. The answer is furnished gloriously in the text—"Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring my righteousness near." Ye that not only have no righteousness, but are living at ease,—"stout-hearted," careless, and indifferent, for the present, at least, about finding one,—"I bring near my righteousness" to you. While ye despise it, "stout-hearted," I offer it to you; while ye are "far from righteousness," righteousness is brought near to you,—it is pressed and urged upon you. "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see." "Now, the righteousness of God is manifested, even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all, and upon all them which believe: for there is no difference; for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins; that he might be just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus." In place of enlarging further on these things, let us add one or two closing remarks, for the improvement of the subject:—

1. It may occur to some as an objection, What use in bringing near, and freely offering, a salvation to men wholly indifferent about it? Now, there can be no doubt, that so long as men are "stout-hearted, and far from righteousness," they cannot, in the very nature of the thing, embrace this righteousness, and the offer of it to them is thus, in one sense, to no purpose. But only in one sense. For, not to speak of believers, who often find their hearts so hard, that till they see invitations to the "stout-hearted," they cannot perceive their warrant at all to trust in Christ,—not to speak of them, the very freeness and universality of the offer, coming with overwhelming grace upon the "stout-hearted" sinner, may just be among the most powerful means blessed of the Holy Ghost for awakening him to deep and serious concern and thought. The Laodiceans were stout-hearted, and far from righteousness. Christ, however, is not content with opening up their case,—“Thou art neither cold nor hot;” with threatening them,—“Because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth;” with calling them to repentance,—“Be zealous, and repent. Besides the invitation just noticed, which occurs in that epistle, “I counsel thee to buy of me gold,” and so on, he throws in, immediately after the call to repentance, that other invitation, “Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me.” An eminent minister was asked, what he thought of the question as to the priority of repentance and faith,—which of them was first. He replied, that it seemed to him very much a question of words. “Repentance,” said he, “is setting out for heaven; faith, is taking the way to heaven.” This may show the vast importance of mingling, with calls to repentance, free offers of Christ, even to the most careless. It is then, as if we should say to them,—Arise, repent, set out straightway for heaven: behold the way, what hinders you to take it now? “why will ye die?” “I am the way, the truth, and the life.” “Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness: I bring near my righteousness.”

2. Further; I observe, very briefly, that you may see how little weight there is in the objection to the doctrine of Christ's righteousness as the ground of justification, that we read comparatively seldom in Scripture of the righteousness of Christ,—generally of the righteousness of God. We do, however, read of it expressly. Not to speak of numberless texts where it appears by inference and implication, we read expressly of the righteousness of Christ, and that as the ground on which many shall be made righteous. Over and over again, he is declared TO BE the righteousness which is unto justification. But besides, we have seen, I apprehend, abundant reasons for the justifying righteousness being still more frequently termed “God's righteousness.” I am deceived, if an awakened sinner, feeling his need of righteousness, will not find, in place of a difficulty, a glorious truth, while he hears the very God with whom he has to do saying, “Behold, I bring near my righteousness.”

3. In fine, we might have remarked, on the question, how the righteousness is brought near, that, besides the freeness and urgency of Gospel offers, the Lord comes specially near at particular seasons, in the events and dealings of his providence. He comes to the very heart and conscience of sinners. He “stands at the door and knocks” aloud,—awakening in him misgivings which he cannot repress,—appealing to him by arguments which he cannot turn aside. For aught I know, he may be thus coming near to some, even while we speak. Oh! refuse not to listen to his voice. He says, “Hearken unto me.” Say to him, “Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.” He comes with this message “I bring near my righteousness.” Let your reply be, “I believe, Lord; help mine unbelief.” “In Jehovah have I righteousness.” “This is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness.”

CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

THE setting orb of night her level ray
Shed o'er the land, and on the dewy sward
The lengthened shadows of the triple cross
Were laid far stretched—when in the east arose,
Last of the stars, day's harbinger: no sound
Was heard, save of the watching soldier's foot.
Within the rock-barred sepulchre, the gloom
Of deepest midnight shrouded o'er the dead—
The Holy One. But, lo! a radiance faint
Began to dawn around his sacred brow:
The linen vesture seemed a snowy wreath,
Drifted by storms into a mountain cave:
Bright and more bright the circling halo beamed
Upon that face, clothed in a smile benign,
Though yet exanimate. Not long the reign
Of death: the eyes that wept for human griefs
Unclose, and look around with conscious joy.
Yes; with returning life, the first emotion
That glowed in Jesus' breast of love, was joy
At man's redemption, now complete—at death
Disarmed—the grave transformed into the couch
Of faith—the resurrection and the life.
Majestical he rose: trembled the earth;
The ponderous gate of stone was roll'd away;
The keepers fell; the angel, awe-struck, sunk
Into invisibility,—while forth
The Saviour of the world walked, and stood
Before the sepulchre, and viewed the clouds
Empurpled glorious by the rising sun.

GRAHAME.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Incarnation.—What devout and grateful adoration we owe to the Saviour for his incarnation! We must exclaim with the apostle, “Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness; the living God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, received up into glory.” He stooped to raise us who were fallen. Man aspiring to equal God, sinks into the miserable apostasy of devils and God, to recover him, stoops to become man—this is the glory of men, the wonder of angels, and all miracles and favours in one! If every thing in this affair is humiliating, let not our wonted pride reject the grace for what makes it so much the more glorious; let us rather observe how well this humiliation accords with the whole transaction. When the eternal Word resolved to be born of a woman, we cannot wonder that he would stoop to be the son of a poor one; he that condescended to be made in the likeness of sinful flesh, while yet he avoided the taint of original sin, would not refuse to expose himself to whatever indignity might attach to him from suspicion thrown on his virgin mother's chastity and honour. That condescension which deigned to be born in this world at all, would not hesitate to be born in an inn or stable. If angels announce to men that he was born their brother, he could as readily choose that they should proclaim him to shepherds as to kings. Humble men, looking for the promised Saviour, were more fit recipients of the glad tidings than kings, who were roused by the news to jealous and murderous plots,—or philosophers, whose pride of intellect would ask, how God could be made man; how he bowed down to hold out to us a helping hand, taking not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham? Then we will stretch out to him the hand that "lays hold of the hope set before us." The union to us, by the incarnation, should bring us in contact with him by faith, and by the residence in us of that same Spirit that dwelt in him. For as we are bound to adore the Holy Spirit, for the part he took in our redemption, by forming the body of the Saviour, which was the temple of the Deity, where dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and which was offered up a sacrifice for us; so we are encouraged by this to seek and expect the operation of the same Spirit, to apply that redemption to our souls, "that Christ may dwell in our heart, the hope of glory."—REV. DR J. BENNET.

A Holy Trust in God.—Man born for immortality, and endowed with an intellectual and moral nature, his true felicity must certainly be sought in those things which are permanent as himself, in whatever may furnish a fit and noble employment for his faculties, or awaken his feelings to emotions of generosity and affection. Thanks be to God, this world, with all its imperfections, supplies abundantly occasions for both. But God is himself the highest object to which the soul in all its powers can be directed. None ever trusted in him without tasting largely of his bounty. To trust in God, in its more advanced state, is to have the image of his perfection ever before us; to live in his continual presence, encircled, as it were, by the visible forms of his majesty and goodness. What words can adequately portray the dignity of such a condition; the tranquillity it communicates, the courage it inspires, the joy and gratitude, and holy affections it breathes through the soul!—J. BOWDLER, Esq.

The Glory of Christ.—And when Christ does come, what will be his glory! Oh that the Spirit of God would reveal to us some few of his bright rays! When the martyr Stephen was dying, he looked steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus sitting at his right hand. And is he not still visible to the eye of faith? Is he not at this very moment in the midst of the throne, ten thousand times ten thousand bowing before him, and myriads waiting upon him? Yes, he is. And even so shall he be with us. He shall give his orders to the heavenly host to attend his glorious train. "The Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him." The trumpet shall sound; "The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed; for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." And then what will be our joy! Oh! what will be our joy, when the King of glory, seated on his throne, shall say with his own lips, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." For my sake you were put out of my earthly courts: your prayers and your praises were stopped there; but here is an everlasting mansion for you; here you shall go out no more; here, with all who are washed in my blood, and covered with my righteousness, you shall unceasingly sing my mercies. You shall sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb. You shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more: there shall be no more crying, no more pain, no more death; but God himself shall wipe all tears from your eyes. Such, or rather infinitely more glorious will our joy be; and, therefore, be not discouraged at our present trial. True, it is hard to part with those we love. True, it is grievous, yes, very grievous to think of the lapse of the flock being scattered abroad; to think that "our sun is going down at noon;" that his name shall cease to be honoured, and his praises to be sung, in this house of prayer. But it is the will of God. He permits it, "who is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind." He orders it, who has given us his Son, who has called us by grace, has promised never to leave nor forsake us, has opened to us the gates of heaven, and assured us of a joyful resurrection. Let us, then, quietly submit to his will. Let us entreat the Lord to grant us strength according to our day.—REV. J. H. STEWART.

HISTORY OF THE ALBIGENSES.

PERIOD II.

TO THE DEATH OF SIMON DE MONTFORT.

PART II.

IN 1212 Simon de Montfort received such an accession of strength, that he was once more in the ascendant; and the Albigenses, driven from the open country, took refuge in the cities of Toulouse and Montauban, which were strongly fortified against a siege on this account. The crusaders, who had been taught that only by the slaughter of heretics they could have their sins remitted, were obliged to glean the scantily inhabited fields in quest of expiatory victims, and put to the sword the garrisons of such castles as they were able to reduce. De Montfort was thus once more the absolute lord of the greatest part of the province of Toulouse, and Raymond was obliged to fly for protection to his steadfast friend, Don Pedro, the King of Arragon. No person had greater right than Pedro to interfere in such a cause; for, independently of his near relationship to Raymond (Raymond and his son had married two sisters of Don Pedro), he was the feudal sovereign of those provençals who had been so grievously persecuted and exterminated by the usurper, de Montfort. He was not likely, also, to be an ineffectual advocate with the pontiff; for he was at this time the chief bulwark of the Christian cause in Spain,—which was menaced, and all but overthrown, by the Moors. Innocent III., therefore, on receipt of energetic missives from Don Pedro in behalf of Raymond, quickly altered his former line of policy. He heavily rebuked both Arnold the legate and Simon de Montfort, for their acts of indiscriminate spoliation and oppression; commanded them to suspend their crusading operations; and, declaring that Raymond was a true son of the Church, he took him from thenceforth under his own especial protection. Shall we gratify ourselves with the hope that, in this instance, the Pope was moved by sentiments of justice and clemency? But his previous proceedings afford no grounds to suspect him of such weakness. Arnold and de Montfort were becoming too powerful, so that it was necessary to hold them in check; and to raise their humbled rival from the dust, after he had been so effectually tamed into subjection, was the best method of reducing them to their proper level. The Papal authority was a despotism of opinion, and therefore it could only rule by a nice balancing of all parties, rather than the undue aggrandisement of one portion at the expense of others. It was by this refined policy that it controlled, during the middle ages, those turbulent and warlike sovereigns who trembled at an invisible and mysterious influence which they continually felt, but could never comprehend. Sometimes, however, these Pontiffs, yielding to their personal resentments, lost sight of their great principle of government, and by humbling an adversary too far, in a moment of secular irritation, they made the victor more dangerous than him they had suppressed. Of this fact Innocent III. was now fated to experience an unwelcome proof. The crusaders, who had revelled in carnage and spoil, were not now to be driven from their prey by a mere signal; and de Montfort, who had parcelled out his conquests among his own creatures, was so strong in their adherence, that he was able to refuse compliance with the Papal rescript. He expressed his resolution to continue the war, in which he had also enlisted the popular voice; and Innocent found himself obliged to sanction with a good grace what he was unable to resist. He did it, therefore, with the air of a master, and as if it had been a spontaneous movement of his own heart. By a letter written on the 21st of May 1213, addressed to the King of Arragon, he accused that monarch of having taken undue advantages of the Roman Court, by his misrepresentations; and announced, that therefore every concession made in favour of Raymond of Toulouse was revoked, and his sentence of excommunication confirmed.

Thus the war, which had been suspended for a moment, was only the more fiercely resumed; and Don Pedro, believing that if his brother-in-law could but gain a victory over de Montfort, he would be strong enough to obtain favourable terms from the Pope, crossed the Pyrenees, and was joined by the forces of Toulouse, Foix, Cominges, and Béarn, the counts of which were allied by a common danger. He then, on September 10, laid siege to the town of Muret, about nine miles distant from Toulouse; but Simon de Montfort having assembled his army, arrived three days after to the encounter. The forces of the latter were greatly inferior in numbers, but their chief strength consisted of men-at-arms, covered from head to foot in steel, and mounted upon powerful barbed horses; while the Spanish cavalry were lightly armed, and accustomed to the flying warfare of the Moors, rather than the close onset of regular European warfare. In the engagement which followed, the Spanish troops were trampled down, and crushed beneath the terrible charge of the mailed soldiers of France; and Don Pedro, after resisting gallantly to the last, was overpowered, and slain. Upon the close of this encounter, de Montfort, who was at the head of his rear-guard, advanced against the forces of Raymond and the counts, and put them to flight. Such was his ferocity on this occasion that at the close of the engagement, seeing the infantry of Toulouse, who had taken no part in the engagement, standing aloof and helpless, being deprived of their cavalry, he surrounded them with his knights and men-at-arms, and nearly destroyed them all, by trampling them down in their ranks, or driving them into the waters of the Garonne.

The cause of the Albigenses, in consequence of the battle of Muret, was brought to the lowest ebb, and de Montfort, rising upon its ruin, became daily more powerful. The conquests of the crusade were conferred upon him, including Toulouse, while Raymond VI. was reduced to the condition of a private person. Indeed, it seemed as if there were no longer any heretics to massacre; for those who survived had retired into concealments, where they might tremblingly whisper their prayers into the ear of Heaven without detection: and yet the crusading spirit, like the waves of a tempest, still continued to heave after the winds had been stilled; and in 1215, Louis, the son of Philip Augustus, King of France, would needs vow a forty days' campaign against the Albigenses. Such an expedition, now that the danger was over, was likely to be nothing more than a military promenade, and therefore thousands joined his standard, for the purpose of living at free quarters for forty days in Languedoc, and plundering the helpless inhabitants, for the sake of religion. The expedition, as might be expected, turned into a mere peaceful pilgrimage, for there were none to oppose them. But now that the conquerors had accomplished their purposes, they began to quarrel among themselves about the spoil. Arnold, the legate, who had been the impersonation of the spiritual power of the crusade, had seized for himself the rich archbishopric of Narbonne, to which, he pretended, the rights of temporal sovereignty were attached; but Simon de Montfort, as the man of the sword, entitled himself Duke of Narbonne, and was indignant that a shaven priest should usurp a ducal coronet, as well as an archiepiscopal mitre. The people of Narbonne sided with the archbishop, and Simon denounced them as heretics, and entered the town by force, with trumpet and banner. Arnold then laid all the churches of the city under an interdict, while his rival remained there; but the latter made light of the sentence. The oppressive despotism of Simon, and his feudatories, had also alienated from him the affections of his new subjects, who now remembered their gentle and amiable sovereign, Raymond, with compassion and regret. To this spirit of disunion among the conquerors, and dislike of them by the people, we may also take into account, that the preaching up of crusades against the Albigenses had been finally terminated by a decree of the council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, so that de Montfort, instead of having whole armies at his command, was obliged to depend upon his own military retainers, and the Condottieri, whose services were to be purchased with a high price;—and in these causes we shall understand the reaction which ensued, and the reappearance of the Albigenses upon the field.

Raymond VI., inspired by the situation of affairs, was resolved to recover his possessions by force; and in this resolution he was confirmed and ably seconded by his son, Raymond VII., a heroic youth now in his nineteenth year. The latter raised an army, by the aid of the provençals, and advanced against Beaucaire, the gates of which were opened to him; he then invested the castle, that was defended by a French garrison, while de Montfort himself was hurrying to its relief. Undismayed, however, by the high name and prowess of this terrible enemy, the youth held out the town and cessfully against him, and took the castle under the very beard of the veteran who had come to relieve it. In the meantime, Raymond VI., who had raised forces in Catalonia and Arragon, burst down upon the opposite side of the province, and was making for Toulouse, which had already invited his arrival. Simon was thus beset from two quarters at once; but after forming a truce with his young antagonist, he hurried to the defence of his new capital. Raymond VI., who was not strong enough to meet him in the field, retreated to the mountains, after which a terrible retribution awaited the people of Toulouse. That city had been cursed, during the whole period of the crusade, with a murderous bishop, named Fouquet, whose chief delight was bloodshed, and who had massacred the heretics within his diocese, while the armies were assailing them from without. When the chiefs of the army urged de Montfort to receive the Toulousians to mercy, Fouquet breathed nothing but carnage, and told the count that severity alone would restrain these pestilent rebels. He then put into execution a plan of treachery which nothing but hell could have suggested. Pretending to mediate in behalf of his flock, he prevailed upon the people, by solemn oaths and assurances of safety, to go out to de Montfort, by successive deputations, instead of repairing in one body; but as fast as they arrived at the count's tent, they were loaded with chains, and hurried out of sight. This villainous game went on prosperously until more than eighty were made prisoners, when a citizen happily escaped, and fled to the town with a cry of alarm, and the report of what had happened. Instantly the barricades were secured and the ramparts manned, although a large portion of the soldiers, directed by the bishop, had already entered and commenced the work of violation and massacre. These the Toulousians encountered in the streets, and drove out of the city; and when Simon himself advanced with all his cavalry to sustain them, he was three times repulsed with great loss. Maddened at this disgrace, he threatened to put to death the eighty citizens whom he had already trepanned; and, to save them, the men of Toulouse agreed to surrender their arms and fortresses, after receiving the most solemn oaths from the lords and ecclesiastics that they would be received to immediate mercy. But no sooner had they thus disarmed themselves, than the chief of the citizens were put in irons, and afterwards destroyed by famine or execution, while the rest were compelled to pay an enormous ransom, to save themselves from massacre, and their city from the flames.

Even this terrible example, however, was not sufficient to quell the spirit of the Toulousians, and in September of the following year, while de Montfort was making war in Valentinois, Raymond VI. entered his capital, at the invitation of his affectionate subjects. He then, by a victory over Guy de Montfort, brother of Simon, at Montolieu, so raised the spirits of his adherents, that the neighbouring lords and knights, whom the terrors of the tyrant had hitherto rode like a nightmare, raised their standards, summoned their retainers, and rode off in military triumph to Toulouse, where they were received with exulting welcome. The terrible Simon returned at the tidings; but as a large portion of his army consisted of the men of Languedoc, who followed him through fear, they stole away from his standard when they heard of the successes of their brethren. Being joined, however, by Guy, his brother, he resolved to carry Toulouse by storm, before the dismantled walls could be repaired. But a deadly shower of cross-bow bolts thinned his troops, as soon as they had reached the ditch; his brother and nephew fell, dangerously wounded; and he was obliged to call off his forces, and desist from the attempt. He returned towards the end of the month, intending to besiege Toulouse in form; and for this purpose he divided his troops to attack the city on both sides of the river at once; but in the midst of this attempt he was surprised, and routed by the Count of Foix, and chased as far as Muret, the scene of his former victory, where he narrowly escaped being drowned in the Garonne.

Loss and disgrace thus clouded the latter days of this prince of persecutors, which were only to be consummated by a death of violence. The siege of Toulouse was continued, and a fresh crusade was preached throughout France; but the new levies which were raised by these means were unlike the former red-crossed veterans whom Simon had so often led to victory. The siege was therefore protracted for nine months, and the cardinal-legate who shared the command, becoming impatient at the delay, and the frequent successes of the Toulousians, reproached his partner with having lost either zeal or courage. At length the count, having constructed a military engine called a cat, had hoped with it to batter down the walls, or tear them stone from stone; and before advancing it to the ramparts he retired to mass,—a practice which he never neglected, whether in war or massacre. In the meantime, the townsfolks made a sally, to set fire to the engine. Hasty tidings of this were carried to the church, to Simon; but still he would not stir until he had finished his devotions. When the host was elevated, he exclaimed, in the language of the venerable Simeon, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation!" and rushing forth at the head of his hardy retainers, he assailed the men of Toulouse, and drove them back into the city. But while he was standing before a wooden tower, which he had recovered from the enemy, a huge fragment of rock discharged from the city wall lighted upon his head, and struck him dead in an instant. Thus fell the usurper before the city which he had so often covered with mourning,—and at his fall it resounded with an overwhelming shout of triumph. An armed throng immediately rushed from the gates and sally-ports, and fell like a tempest upon the besiegers, who were put to the route, while all their tents and equipage were captured or destroyed. Amoury de Montfort, the son of Simon, contrived to gather the relics of the discomfited host, and lead them back to the siege; but their courage had received a mortal blow, so that after a month of desultory efforts, during which they encountered nothing but loss, they abandoned the undertaking on the 25th of July, and retired to Carcassonne.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 18, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. COREY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—Address to Christians on the "Signs of the Times," and the Duty of Diligence in the Cause of Christ. Part II., Page 737 2.—Sacred Poetry. "The Dying Christian," ..... 741 3.—Biographical Sketch. The Rev. John Campbell, the African Traveller. By the Editor. Part II., ..... do. 4.—On the Decrees of God, and the Execution of them in His works. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D., Part I., ... 744	5.—A Discourse. By the late Rev. Alexander Bullock, Page 745 6.—Sacred Poetry. "God is Love," ..... 749 7.—Christian Treasury. Extract from W. Wilberforce, ..... 760 8.—History of the Albigenses. Period III. To the Subjugation of Raymond of Toulouse, and the Permanent Establishment of the Inquisition. Part I., ..... do.
--	---

ADDRESS TO CHRISTIANS

ON THE "SIGNS OF THE TIMES," AND THE DUTY OF DILIGENCE IN
THE CAUSE OF CHRIST.

PART II.

"Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto eternal life, that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."—JOHN iv. 35, 36.

In many of the larger towns, by means of faithful clergy, assisted by an efficient eldership, and the other machinery of a missionary establishment, the dark and crowded dwellings of the too much neglected poor, are now visited, and they are in some degree brought within the hearing of the Gospel, and with God's blessing much good fruit may in time be expected. In the country parishes there is an equally wide and interesting field, and in many places, it is to be feared, a field but little cultivated. To Christians, therefore, who are residing in agricultural districts, we would address a few words. In every situation the Christian has his peculiar temptations, and we fear that indolence is the besetting sin of those enjoying the repose of a country life. How many are there among the families of our aristocracy whose employments day by day are little else than a repetition of languid and unsuccessful efforts, to render time less irksome, and not, we fear, principally, how to render it more profitable. Are there among this class any disciples of Christ? surely there must be such; if so, most earnestly do we beseech you, as dear friends, to bethink you, and devise some plan of operations more worthy of your calling, and more befitting the rank and station you hold in the community. Religion, we admit, implies more or less a habit of solitude and contemplation, but if this is not relieved and varied by active benevolence, it is apt to degenerate into a sort of selfish sentimentality, the very reverse of useful. Man is not merely a contemplative being; by the constitution of his mind and body, he is fitted for a life of action, and it is from not observing this law that so many Christians, particularly in the upper ranks, are weak and fanciful in spirit, and inclined, for the sake of excitement, either to relapse into the ways of the world, or to become morose in their dispositions, and mystical in the habits of their minds; and most naturally is this result to be looked for. They are in so far dead to the world as to have lost the keen relish for its pursuits, but they are not yet sufficiently alive to Christ, to have entered heart and hand into his service; they are loiterers between two distinct classes, the professed lovers of pleasure, and the lovers of God. You profess to belong to this latter class, but we put this question to your conscience, and we beseech you to examine yourself. Is thy principal pursuit not a strenuous endeavour after thy own comfort and happiness, without any ulterior object? I admit you may be seeking your happiness in a way far different from the man of the world. You may be aiming to shut out all that is evil, and endeavouring to fix your thoughts on whatsoever things are pure, and lovely, and of good report, still we believe that even in the indulging of these, there may be a kind of selfish epicureanism; and this assuredly is not the legitimate aim and object of a Christian's life: moreover, most distinctly do we take on ourselves to tell thee that aiming at happiness for its own sake, thou shalt most miserably fall short of thy object. A man is never so sure to miss the mark, as when happiness is made the primary object of pursuit. It seems almost to be a fixed law of our nature, that happiness is never to be found when it is sought after, but only when we are engaged in the pursuit of some object good and laudable in itself. The mere indulgence of self-enjoyment seems not intended for man in this fallen world; let the Christian, therefore, shake himself out of this vain, and delusive, and most unworthy pursuit, under whatever guise it may present itself. Let him consider his true position—a field of active, healthy, invigorating exertion, is before him, if he has heart to enter upon it. The botanist, when he visits a new district, gives himself no rest till he has explored every corner, rock, wood, and valley, within his range, and if he finds a single new species of plant, he is abundantly satisfied; the geologist, or other naturalist, in his own department of science, does the same, and after much toil they feel amply rewarded by what appears to others intrinsically of very trifling value; we blame them not,—on the contrary, we greatly admire them; a man without enthusiasm must always be ranked low in the scale of that observing, reflecting, feeling being, called man. We would not wish a single rational pursuit curtailed, and if thou, oh Christian, art an inquirer into the rich and curious cabinet of nature, no one has a better right than thee to examine and admire, and to catalogue and classify the various and wonderful works of thy God; we would only desire to extend thy range, and to open up to thee another and a far richer, and more varied field, and one which will repay thee better in the prosecution of thy labour, and for which thou shalt be more abundantly rewarded at the day of the resurrection of the just. Lift up thine eyes—around thee are the habitations of thy fellow-men—all heirs of immortality—all encompassed with like trials, and subject to like passions with thyself,—all having human hearts and human wants, and all requiring advice, assistance, sympathy, encouragement. In yonder cottage, which you have never entered, lives a Christian; she has been tried in the furnace, and has come out more refined; she is a widow, the desire of her eyes was taken away with a stroke, and she was left to struggle amidst grief and poverty for the support of herself and her young family. God has proved himself to be the widow's stay; He that feeds the ravens has opened up a way for her obtaining her daily bread; she appears poor, but is cheerful and contented; it is not stoicism that constitutes her philosophy, it is something better—she suffers as seeing Him, who is invisible, and her heart renders thanks to God, for all the blessings she yet enjoys; she envies thee not in thy stately mansion, but if thou art a Christian, she is ready to hold converse with thee; enter in, she is fellow-heir with thee of the heavenly kingdom,—she is treading the same road,—she is encompassed with the same infirmities as thyself,—she is one thy equal, perhaps thy superior, with whom thou mayst have religious communion and sympathy: only throw off what is artificial, and enter upon the realities of the Christian life; this is a natural, and, therefore, a healthy employment, and it will give thy soul tone after the relaxing and artificial atmosphere you have been breathing. But let us cross over the way and make acquaintance with the inmates of this other cottage. An aged couple inhabit it, the husband and wife have grown old together, their family is off their hands and are scattered in the world—some are to be found settled in the neighbourhood, and some are in the distant colonies of the empire; the old woman is grown feeble, and deaf, and it is difficult to hold much conversation with her—one of the avenues to instruction is already closed, and soon the other senses will also be shut upon a that is transacted below the sun. The tall and once massive frame of the old man is bent and contracted by the hand of time; both, however, appear comfortable in worldly matters, so far as can be discovered by the arrangements of the little cottage, the internal economy of which is directed by a young girl, who is busy preparing the fragrant dinner for her grand-parents. Their children are in the habit of sending them small sums of money, to assist the scanty earnings the old man can now get for his labour; altogether, their outward circumstances seem comfortable. There is something deeply interesting in a sight such as this; an aged couple, the partners linked together during a long life of hard and honest toil, and both spared one another, to the extremest point of old age—how merciful is God in this! how suited are they still to be companions even at this stage of their existence! They can look backward and moralize together over the past, these aged companions who have shared all the ups and downs of life together. What consolation to look forward together, and anticipate the coming evening on which they are both so shortly to enter! Surely this will be the principal occupation of their thoughts till their change come, and their aged heads be laid in the dust. There is an intense interest in this consideration; but, at the same time, a mysterious dread at approaching to solve so momentous a problem, and endeavouring to discover whether Christ is dwelling in this venerable couple, the hope of Glory; whether the close of their long journey is cheered by the prospect of that rest which remaineth for the people of God; whether the evening of their day is illuminated by rays from the coming glory. They are from their kindred frailties, most meetly calculated together, in all that concerns this life. Are they certainly bound together as heirs of the eternal life? are they, like travellers at the end of a toilsome journey, content to lay aside the frail habiliments of mortality, knowing that other things are reserved for them? Ah! these are questions which, answered in the affirmative, a glow of celestial light is thrown over the picture otherwise sad and cheerless, and all the ensigns of mortality are at once swallowed up in life. Alas, alas! would that we could give colouring to the picture, but we cannot do so. We judge no man as to his acceptance with God. We can only say, that we see one man in the world with hopes which are full of immortality, and we see another who seems altogether indifferent to the prospects beyond the grave. We judge not our aged couple. They say they believe in Christ, therefore we condemn them not; we only feel that, if Christ is their Saviour they do not talk of him as of a well-known and tried friend—one who was to comfort them on their dying bed, and one who was to meet them on their entrance into the other world. The cares and comforts, or rather the aches and discomforts, of the mortal tenement, seem the principal object of their thoughts. They say they fear not death; and it is difficult to determine whether they have ever yet discovered that they are lost sinners. One cannot discover the slightest pulse about them, to prove that there is spiritual life, and to enable us to rejoice with them on the heavenly prospect which is before them. We quit this sombre and equivocal picture, and leave the cottage with a sigh. It is a case, alas! of too frequent occurrence.

We direct our steps to this, in every way, meaner and more sordid-looking dwelling. We lift the latch;—a man's cottage is his castle, but when the rich condescend to visit the poor or the wretched, when is it that this boasted right is asserted?—we open the door which ushers us into the small room constituting the dwelling of the poor—at once the bed-room, kitchen, and parlour, if such a term is admissible. A little girl is sitting at the window, engaged at a piece of needlework; she rises at our entrance. As we are about to address her, our attention is attracted by the movement of a figure sitting up in bed, in a darker corner of the room; it is a female, apparently between twenty and thirty years of age; we start back—for who does not recoil from misery? O God, how mysterious art thou in thy dealings to poor, sinful man! and yet thou art revealed as a God who dost not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men. Why, then, at all hands, do we see so much suffering? Surely the Lord seeth it not! Such is frequently the first suggestion, when misery is brought unexpectedly before us. So natural is it for us, in the first movement of our mind, to form a presumption against the wisdom of God's dealings; so natural is the habit to us of judging of every thing only with reference to the present world—looking only to the things which are seen, and not to the things which are unseen—a closer examination and reflection is required to put things in their true position. We draw nigh to the bed, to inquire if we can in any way alleviate the apparent misery of the poor woman. Her colour is ghastly pale, and an expression almost of anguish shows that she is suffering from some deep-seated and fatal disease; while, at the same time, a faint smile seems to welcome us to approach and speak to her. She was suffering from cancer in the system, which had now come to its last stages. At times, she was comparatively free from pain, which, however, ever returned at short intervals, with excruciating paroxysms. "Did I not feel," she said, "that Christ was with me, I could never bear to look forward to these fits; but I know that he is by my bed-side, and therefore I can bear all; and I know I shall think them very light when I get to heaven, and see Him who bore so much worse for me. I have, indeed, often wearied of my life during my long sickness; but I do not think that God would hold me here so long, if it were not for some good purpose; and I think that many of my words have been blessed to my friends, who come to my bed-side to see me." Here was a dying saint. Her body was, indeed, the vehicle of nothing but suffering; but her conversation was in heaven, from whence also she looked for the Saviour, who should change her vile body, that it might be fashioned like to His glorious body. The more frail her body became, the more clearly did she seem to behold heaven approaching; as her "outward man perished, her inward man was renewed day by day."

She had been at service, and had been obliged to give it up nine months ago, when her disease first made its appearance. While yet in the opening of life, she had returned to her mother's house a victim whose days were numbered—with death written on her face, and all his terrors brought suddenly before her eyes. She had counted upon the enjoyment of many years, and the consideration of so soon meeting her Judge had never entered her mind, and it was found very fearful to her. God, who had laid his hand thus heavily on her, had, however, done so in mercy, and in mercy He had provided one to minister to her in her distress. The widow whom we first called on was, indeed, found a messenger from God. She visited her daily; and He that provided the messenger, prepared also the heart of the sufferer. She received gladly the tidings of a crucified Saviour, and of pardon freely offered to the sinner, and thenceforth her sorrow seemed wellnigh forgotten in the clear apprehension of the love of a reconciled God. Christian, dost thou now despise this poor widow? Dost thou not consider her as an honoured servant of God, in having conducted this poor smitten lamb to the fold of Christ? and will she not have her as her crown of rejoicing in the day of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ? Dost thou not now feel, in some measure, constrained by the command, "Go thou and do likewise?"

Christians are apt to be discouraged by the small amount of good they see effected, and especially by the slow progress of missionary efforts. An important question here occurs, What is the Christian authorised to expect on this score?—what is the warrant of Scripture? We believe that the performance of duty is always established on the surest foundation when it rests, not upon imagination or feeling, but upon a firm and intelligent understanding of the truth; we, therefore, consider it a matter of great importance to direct Christians to the careful examination of the Scriptures on this subject, in order that they may discover for themselves the standing of the Church of Christ during the present dispensation, and that they may regulate their expectations on the subject of missionary prospects by the infallible standard of the Word of God. Glorious things are spoken of the triumphs of Christ's kingdom in the latter days, and to this it is the duty, as it will ever be the strongest encouragement, of the Church to look forward. It appears to us, however, that our lot, under the present dispensation, is cast in times rather of labour and conflict, than of glory and millennial rest. The Lord has not yet taken the rod of his power, to rule in the midst of his enemies. The Church of Christ is still a widowed Church, mourning because the Bridegroom is taken away from her. Believers are still in the wilderness, contending with their powerful enemies and their inherent corruptions; struggling as it were for life—scarcely saved, and that as by fire. We are, indeed, encouraged to pray for, and expect an increase of, the good seed; but still, from the Word of prophecy, we consider it very probable that the world, and the nations of the world, will continue distinctly one thing, and the Church of Christ another thing, even till that day when the Son of man cometh. Therefore, in all our labours, we have need of patience, that, after we have done the will of God, we may receive the promise, "For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." The people of God are always represented as only a remnant gathered out of the world. We are told that the wheat and the tares are both to grow together till the harvest; again, that "as in the days of Noe, so shall the coming of the Son of Man be. They were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark." We are told that the Gospel of the kingdom was to be preached in all the world, only as "a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." The present is, therefore, the period of working, amidst much weakness and discouragement; but the end shall at length come—the end of the six days of weariness and work—the end of the long period of toiling and testifying—the end of the Church's watching and fasting,—and then cometh the day of rest—the Sabbath of the world, the reign of Christ's kingdom upon earth. Let the Christian, therefore, in the present time, not look for more than prophecy would seem to warrant, lest "hope deferred make the heart sick." Let him go on steadily in well-doing, and "in patience let him possess his soul." The times are, indeed, momentous, and from them let him draw what encouragement he lists, and such as prophecy instructs him to expect. The harvest assuredly will come, and then in due time he will reap, if he faint not. Then will be an out-pouring of God's Spirit, different far from what has yet been seen in the world, and of which that of the day of Pentecost was but a type. We would not say lightly or inconsiderately that this consummation is at hand; it is certainly, however, drawing on, and the Christian is desired to observe "the signs of the times." No one denies that they are most portentous at the present moment, though, whether portentous of good or evil, men will decide according to their various theories or feelings. We believe that they are portentous of both good and evil, and in an eminent degree; and, therefore, we take this opportunity of calling especially on the Christian to stand to his duty, and prepare to quit him like a man—to gird up the loins of his mind, and bethink him of his own peculiar calling. It is when iniquity is coming in like a flood, that the righteous, in an especial manner, are called on to lift up a standard against it.

Much good may, indeed, emerge from the midst of the confused and jarring elements presently in agitation; but the follower of Christ is not to expect the Christian regeneration of nations to be carried by means of any one of the principles now so eagerly put forward on one side or the other. The march of wisdom and the progress of improvement have been much vaunted. Who does not see that it is not from the agency of these that the fierce spirits now at work are to be allayed? Just as certain is it that it is not to nations nominally Christian that the disciple of Christ is to trust, as the means by which the kingdom of Christ is to be established. The kingdoms of this world are not yet become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ. Nationally, they are still the kingdoms of the world. In their policy, public measures and motives, earthly power and glory is still their watchword. The language is still much the same as formerly: "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the honour of my majesty?" We say it is not the glory of God that is the moving principle of nations, as nations; and probably it will never be so, till a power is put forth from on high different from what God has yet exhibited under his present dispensation. When this new dispensation is introduced, then that which is old will be done away; the times of the restitution of all things will be then come, but not till then. The day and the hour of this eventful shift in the world's history it is not given to us to know. Prophecy tells us it will not be introduced when there is peace, but will be ushered in amidst war and great tribulation, "such as was not from the beginning of the world until this time;" so that, except "those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved."—These are the secret, and deep, and fearful things of God, and are to be sought for in his Word. We believe they are not dimly revealed to those who read with the spirit of humble inquiry. One thing at least is certain, and to this the Christian directs his eye and begs his help; it is this, that amidst all the convulsions of nations, and the upsetting of institutions, and the anxious experimenting of politicians, who do alone occupy the attention of the world, God is silently building up his Church—he is gathering his elect from the four quarters of the earth. To the building of this spiritual edifice the Christian earnestly looks; for he knows that, when it is completed, the mystery of God will be finished, and the purposes of this perplexed world solved. Till then, his prayer should unceasingly be, "Thy kingdom come; even so come, Lord Jesus. Amen."

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

Ah! who can tell the joys that fill
The dying Christian's breast,
While, lying on the bed of death,
He calmly sinks to rest?

His sunken eye seems lighted up
With bright celestial fire,
While dwelling on the love of Him
Whose goodness cannot tire.

"Jesus! my Rock, my sure Defence!
Oh! hear thy servant's prayer!
Free me from every gloomy thought,
And every anxious care!

"Be with me in the hour of death;
Support me with thy grace;
And take me to thyself at last,
To see thee face to face!"

Thus prays the happy dying saint,
To Him who dwells on high;
May I, like him, at last, through faith,
With resignation die!

THETA.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. JOHN CAMPBELL,
THE AFRICAN TRAVELLER.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

MR CAMPBELL was naturally of a humane and benevolent disposition. He delighted to search out, and, as far as possible, to relieve, cases of distress, and, for this purpose, often did he repair to the dark and dirty hovels of the poor, warning, reproving, exhorting, or consoling, as the circumstances seemed to warrant. That he might be the means of doing good more extensively, he published and distributed tracts, thus diffusing the truth as widely as possible. It is interesting to learn from his own pen the origin of his efforts in tract distribution. The description which he gives of it is as follows:—

"I think it was while looking over a bundle of pamphlets at a book-stall that I observed one of a religious cast, entitled, 'The Life and Experience of F. S.' (or, as I afterwards heard, Fanny Sydney,) published by some bookseller in England. It was only eight pages, stitched in a blue cover, which I purchased for two-pence. On reading it, I was so pleased with the simplicity and piety of the narrative, that I got an edition printed; part of which was sold, and the rest circulated gratis. While on a visit to London, having fallen in with the fine old story of Poor Joseph, in verse, I printed an edition of it on my return to Edinburgh, which I circulated among friends. The next I published was Mr Newton's second anniversary of Mrs Newton's death; a printed copy of which he sent me in a frank, which I reprinted, and presented copies to friends. During the three succeeding years, he sent me, in manuscript, the third, fourth, and fifth anniversaries of the same event, all poems; which I gave away also among friends—presenting also a portion of them to the author. Acting in this little way, as a tract circulator, for a few years from 1789, it occurred to some friends, that something more effectual might be done in this way, by forming a little society for the express purpose of printing and circulating religious tracts. When the matter was mentioned to me, I highly approved of it, and was one of about a dozen who formed ourselves into a Religious Tract Society. This, as far as I know, was the first society of the kind that ever existed in the world."

His next scheme for the advancement of religion was the establishment of Sabbath schools, of which very few then existed in Scotland. He accordingly opened one of these schools in the old Archer's Hall, on the south skirts of Edinburgh, and, as the plan succeeded to a wish, giving the highest satisfaction to all concerned, he opened another in the hall belonging to the Edinburgh Dispensary. The teachers selected by Mr Campbell were, in both these cases, plain, sensible, pious men, who understood their Bible well, and instructed the children in the essential truths of the Gospel. Encouraged by his success, Mr Campbell established a Sabbath school in Loanhead, a village a few miles distant from Edinburgh. This school, which was attended by about two hundred scholars, he taught himself. The example soon spread. Schools were opened in the village of Bonnyriggs, in Dalkeith, Penicuik, and other places. In all these exertions to do good, Mr Campbell received both counsel and encouragement from the venerable Countess of Leven, and indeed the whole Balgownie family, and others of the Scotch nobility. But while Sabbath schools were thus beginning to be planted, and to prosper in and around Edinburgh, they were almost entirely unknown every where else in Scotland. To suggest the idea in other places, Mr Campbell set out on a week's tour, accompanied by his friend and coadjutor, Mr J. A. Haldane. Setting out one Monday morning, they travelled to Glasgow, distributing tracts to rich and poor as they proceeded along the road. In Glasgow, Paisley, Greenock, and other towns in the west, they succeeded in calling public attention to the peculiar importance of the institution of Sabbath-schools; and they had the high gratification of learning, in three months afterwards, that the result of one week's exertion in itinerating for this great object, had been the formation of sixty Sabbath-schools.

The next philanthropic plan to which Mr Campbell devoted his energies, was the introduction of the preaching of the Gospel into villages and districts which had long been destitute of Divine ordinances. The first place of this description which attracted his notice, was the village of Gilmerton, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. Here he succeeded in establishing a regular Sabbath evening service, which was supplied by students of divinity and lay-preachers. Mr Joseph Rate led the way in this good work, and was followed by Messrs Aikman, Haldane, and Campbell, who commenced their exertions as lay-preachers in Gilmerton. From this small beginning arose very important results, which, in fact, gave rise to a new era in the religious history of Scotland. We quote Mr Campbell's account of what followed the selection of Gilmerton as a preaching-station:—

"By and by, this sphere of usefulness became too confined for them; they began to think of making a preaching tour over the whole of Scotland, north of Edinburgh. In the view of it, they commenced printing large editions of tracts for distribution on the journey. They also purchased a strong horse, and a roomy chaise, capable of containing the three preachers and portions of their tracts. Those which they could not take, were sent on before them to different towns by carriers, &c. Meetings, to pray for their success, were not neglected; for without the Divine blessing, all connected with the journey were fully convinced that no real permanent good would be effected. The novelty of it excited very general attention; for nothing of the kind had occurred in that country in the memory of man; for the short visits of George Whitefield, more than a quarter of a century before, only extended to Edinburgh, Glasgow, and a few other towns in their vicinity. They preached in the open air in every town and large village to the extreme north end of Scotland; and, crossing over to the Orkney Islands, they proclaimed the glorious Gospel over them all. As a full account of this journey was afterwards published, it is unnecessary for me to enter more minutely into it. On their return, they found their bishoprick at Gilmerton not much fallen off, as meetings had been kept up by a few friends during the whole of their absence."

That such varied and exciting labours should have affected Mr Campbell's health, is not at all surprising. Besides attending to his business as a hardware merchant—visiting the poor, the sick, and the dying—preaching in the surrounding villages—teaching and superintending Sabbath schools—he carried on, at the same time, an extensive correspondence with the leading religious men and philanthropists of the day. In vain did his venerated friend, the Countess of Leven, warn him to beware of overtaking his mind and body. He was young, ardent, and zealous in the good work, and he could scarcely be persuaded to spare himself. At length, however, painful necessity compelled him to pause in his exertions for a time; but no sooner did he regain his strength, than he set out anew, with redoubled efforts, on his work and labour of love. He soon saw the itinerating system, which he had been the first to introduce, assume a prominence in the public eye which he had not anticipated; and he never failed to speak in the warmest terms, even in his old age, of the unwearied labours of the Messrs Haldane in preaching the everlasting Gospel throughout the whole extent of Scotland.

Interested as Mr Campbell felt in all that concerned the progress of Christ's cause, his sympathies were strongly drawn forth by the accounts which he had accidentally heard of the revivals of religion in Wales, under the ministry of the truly apostolic Mr Charles of Bala. He opened a correspondence with Mr Charles upon the subject. A few extracts from the letters which he received, in reply to his inquiries on the subject of the Welsh revivals, will be read with interest:—

"In Carnarvon and Anglesea congregations are very numerous and very large. Thousands flock together at the sound of the Gospel trumpet, and hear with great earnestness and attention. Awakenings, also, are frequent; but as to any extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit, there is none at present, but in two places besides this neighbourhood; and, in those places, it does not carry with it the strong marks of power irresistible and convincing demonstration which has attended it here. The report of what was going on here has awakened the attention of all the country, and filled the Churches every where with a spirit of thanksgiving and prayer. I have hardly a doubt but it will spread; the beginning was so glorious that I cannot suppose but it precedes great things. The Churches every where are, if I may so say, 'in labour;' and I cannot but expect that 'a man-child is to be born.' They are prepared—they are praying—they are waiting and longing for his coming. He has, indeed, already done great things in this principality. Within these fifty years there have been five or six very great awakenings; a land of darkness and of the shadow of death hath seen great light; but oh! may we live to see still greater things. Your saying, 'that a similar revival took place in your country about fifty years ago,' enkindled a spirit of prayer in me for the return of your jubilee. I am persuaded, that unless we are favoured with frequent revivals, and a strong, powerful work of the Spirit of God, we shall, in a great degree, degenerate, and have only 'a name to live.' Religion will soon lose its vigour; the ministry will hardly retain its lustre and glory; and iniquity will, of consequence, abound. I am far from supposing this to be the case in your country; I am only speaking of the thing itself. Scotland, I know, has, in ages past, been a most highly favoured country. I hope it still continues so; but I am perfectly ignorant of the present state of religion in it. May the good Lord hasten that blessed time when 'the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.'"

And again:—

"I must not omit informing you that one great means of promoting the work of God among our young are circulating charity-schools, which have been supported among us for these nine years. They are supported entirely by subscriptions and charitable donations of friends of the Gospel. We have now about twenty schoolmasters, employed in five different counties, to each of whom we pay ten pounds per annum; they are entirely at our disposal, and we move them from place to place all over the country, and teach all that will attend them, rich or poor, gratis. Half a-year we find sufficient to teach a child of moderate capacity to read the Bible well in the Welsh language. The only intention of these schools is to teach children to read their own language, and to instruct them in the first principles of religion, and to endeavour to impress their minds with a sense of the importance of divine truths. It is impossible to express the blessing which has attended these little seminaries, and still continues to attend them. I visit them myself, and catechise the children publicly. Sometimes the congregation has been so large on these catechetical occasions, that I have been obliged to perform the whole service in the open air. I have drawn up a little form comprehending the first principles of Christianity, according to which they are instructed. In some of the schools we have had general awakenings among all the children; they have been a great means of soberizing the minds of young people, drawing their minds to the Bible; it gives them a taste for reading, and the next step will be to attend preaching, which is seldom without some effect on their minds. We take care that the teachers are men of piety, and zeal for the conversion of sinners. We have but one only point in view in these institutions; that is, the salvation of their souls. We endeavour to bring this point into their view in all its infinite importance, as far surpassing all other matters whatsoever. This is what we aim to do; but, alas! how little would all avail, were it not for the powerful agency of the blessed Spirit. Blessed be the Lord, we see him evidently and gloriously at work among us; never more so than at the present time, taking the country at large. Bless the Lord in our behalf, and pray for a continuance of his loving-kindness."

The letters received from Mr Charles, as well as the narrative of the Welsh revivals, Mr Campbell circulated throughout Scotland, and awakened a spirit, in many places, which led to great searchings of heart and eager inquiry after the truth as it is in Jesus.

But while Mr Campbell was thus evincing a lively concern about the progress of religion in other places, he did not relax his efforts in endeavouring to do good at home. About this time, indeed, he was mainly instrumental in forming the Philanthropic Society; which was the commencement of what is now known as the Magdalene Asylum of Edinburgh. To this highly useful and benevolent institution Mr Campbell acted as secretary; being the first who occupied that office in connection with the Society. In a few years, however, he resigned the office, and removed to Glasgow. While there, he was again honoured of God to be one of the first originators of the Magdalene Asylum in that city.

It was at this stirring period that the subject of missions to the heathen began to occupy a prominent place in the attention of the religious world. The formation of the London Missionary Society, composed, as it was, of Christians of all denominations, seemed a new era in the religious history of Britain. Mr Campbell tells us, in his usually happy and homely manner,—

“It had a most electrifying effect on the Christians of the north. ‘We were like men who dreamed.’ From the days of George Whitefield till then, the Christians on both sides of the Tweed had been fast asleep. The Christians of different names were busy repairing and adding to their walls of separation, and now and then throwing squibs at each other from their battlements; but the news of the above Society was like the bursting forth of a bright meteor in a dark night,—it attracted every eye, and became a text at every tea-table; and those who had not heard of it for a week were looked at as persons who had been living in a coal-pit; many of which pits are in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh.”

The example of London was speedily followed by the northern metropolis; and, on the formation of a similar institution in Edinburgh, Mr Campbell was chosen one of the Directors. Sierra Leone in Africa, was selected as the first scene of their operations, but the unhealthiness of the climate put an end to the mission. This disastrous result led to the following plan, which we explain in Mr Campbell’s language:—

“Musing on the unhealthiness of the climate to European constitutions, one morning, when stepping out of bed, this thought occurred,—‘Might we not bring over Africa to England; educate her; when some, through grace and Gospel, might be converted and sent back to Africa; if not any converted, yet they might help to spread civilization: so all would not be lost. The amount of which was,—To try to bring over twenty or thirty or more boys and girls from the coast of Guinea, through the influence of Governor Macauley; educate them in Edinburgh, and send them back to their own country, to spread knowledge,—especially Scripture knowledge.’”

This plan he communicated to several friends, and among others, to the Countess of Leven,—through whose kindness he procured an interview with the late Charles Grant, Esq., chairman of the East India Company, who had just before returned from India. Mr Grant approved of the scheme, and also Mr Wilberforce, but the London Anti-slavery coterie, who were consulted on the subject, advised, that the execution of the scheme should be postponed till peace with France, which they hoped would not be far off; and because the war-taxes pressed hard upon the people, they urged that it would be difficult to obtain subscriptions to defray the expenses. Mr Campbell yielded with reluctance to the proposal for delay. About a year and a-half after this, however, having mentioned the subject to Mr Haldane, the scheme took strong hold of that benevolent and devotedly Christian man, and after revolving the matter in his mind, he sent for Mr Campbell, when the following conversation took place:—

“‘What is the real reason why you were advised to defer commencing the Institution?’ ‘Entirely the dreaded difficulty of obtaining funds to defray the expense of the institution.’ ‘Have you calculated the probable amount of those expenses?’ ‘Yes; the probable expense of bringing over thirty children, lodging, supporting, and educating them for five years, and their passage back to Africa, will cost from six to seven thousand pounds.’ ‘Supposing you were to write to the Governor of Sierra Leone, stating that you had sufficient funds for supporting such an institution, and requesting him to collect thirty or forty of the sons and daughters of the African chiefs over whom he had influence, and send them over to you; do you think he would have sufficient confidence in you to fulfil your commission?’ ‘I think he would.’ ‘On what do you ground that expectation?’ ‘When the French destroyed the settlement or free-town, Governor Macauley came to London to lay the state of things before the Company. After finishing the business there, he visited Scotland to see his relations. On coming to Edinburgh, he called upon me with a letter of introduction from the Rev. John Newton, (which would be a sufficient passport to any Christian in Scotland, so highly were his works prized.) The Governor had four sisters in Edinburgh, living together, and as they had no particular friend to advise with, he requested me to engage to be their adviser; to which proposal I readily consented. In the course of a year after they came under my wing, I was bridegroom’s-man to three out of the four.’ On hearing this statement, Mr Haldane was satisfied, and volunteered to be responsible for the whole expense of the scheme, and gave me a letter to that effect. Accordingly I wrote by that day’s post to Governor Macauley, Sierra Leone, requesting him to obtain thirty or thirty-five African boys and girls, and send them to Edinburgh, as I had obtained funds to defray all expenses. I sent it to the care of Henry Thornton, M. P., Treasurer to the Sierra Leone Company; and that day week sent a duplicate to the care of the Messrs Anderson of Philpot-lane, who had a large slave establishment on Bance Island, in the neighbourhood of Sierra Leone.”

Two years elapsed without receiving intelligence from Africa. At length a letter arrived from Governor Macauley, dated Portsmouth, and stating that he had brought over twenty boys, and four girls. Mr Campbell hastened to London to receive his young charge; but before taking them to Scotland, it was judged prudent that they should be inoculated, and for that purpose, they were all received into the Small-pox Hospital at St Pancras. While waiting for their recovery, Mr Campbell was asked to supply Kingsland Chapel, which was then vacant. He did so for a few Sabbaths, a circumstance which, in the mysterious arrangements of Providence, led to his appointment as minister of that chapel. Whilst the African children were still in the hospital, some difference of opinion arose among the patrons about their education. This annoyed Mr Campbell much, but a society was formed in London, which took them off his hands, and he returned to Edinburgh without them. Thus failed an experiment which he had much at heart, and which promised, by the Divine blessing, to prove a signal benefit to poor, enslaved, degraded Africa.

ON THE DECREES OF GOD, AND THE EXECUTION OF THEM IN HIS WORKS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

PART I.

FROM the view already presented of the only living and true God, as infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being and perfections, we may be well prepared for the statement which immediately follows, respecting the sovereignty of God, that is, his absolute power and undoubted right to order all things, in all worlds, according to his own will. Nothing can possibly exist or take place without his will, giving it existence, continuing its existence, or at least permitting its existence; and in this his will to give, or continue, or permit the existence of any being or event, he is and must be altogether independent and irresistible, acting solely from his own pleasure and for his own purposes. "He is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth."

But when we speak of all things thus proceeding from the sole and sovereign will of God, it is not meant that his will is arbitrary, or without reason; but, on the contrary, it equally follows, from his infinite perfections, that he wills nothing without the best reasons, whether those reasons be made known to his creatures or not. His sovereignty is inseparable from his perfect wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth; and he never can deny himself, or be otherwise than "righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." The supposition of his making a wrong use of his sovereign will and supreme power is impossible, and would involve a contradiction of the infinite and adorable excellences which are admitted to belong to his nature and character as God. However we may apprehend or explain the matter, it is not possible to question the general truth, that all things proceed from the sovereign will of God, and are all ordered in the way that is best. This truth the Catechism states most fully and explicitly, and distinctly teaches, that all things thus proceed from one eternal act of the Divine mind, for the manifestation of the Divine glory. "The decrees of God are his eternal purpose, according to the counsel of his will, whereby, for his own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass."

The word "decree" is rarely used in Sacred Scripture in reference to God, and in no case as denoting his secret purposes in general. It is not found in the New Testament at all in reference to God; and, when so used in the Old Testament, it signifies always some particular determination concerning a particular thing or event. The words employed in the Scriptures, in expressing this doctrine, are such as these—pleasure, will, choice, counsel, purpose. And thus we read of "the counsel of the Lord—the thoughts of his heart—the purpose of the Lord—the good pleasure of his will." By the decrees of God, is therefore to be understood the pleasure of the Divine mind, or act of the will of God, by which he purposed to produce or permit whatever exists or comes to pass. But while we speak of the Divine decrees as many, because they relate to various objects and periods; and while the Scriptures, in condescension to our weakness, use similar language; yet must we conceive only one act in the Divine mind, proposing to himself at once all that should take place in time throughout the universe. This act must be understood also to have been from all eternity, as there can be no succession with God, nor any change in his mind; but all things possible, and all reasons for preferring one thing to another, must be present together to his view. Hence it is said in the Catechism, "The decrees of God are his eternal purpose;" one purpose, and that from eternity.

In this purpose he acted "according to the counsel of his own will," his own free and sovereign choice; "for who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor?" Yet was his will guided by "counsel," the counsel of his own wisdom and holiness, directing all his pleasure to the best and most glorious ends.

The reason of the Divine choice, or the end which the blessed God had in view in his eternal purpose, was and must be the manifestation of "his own glory," which could indeed be accomplished only by bringing creatures into existence, capable of knowing, loving, and adoring his perfections, and to whom as a subordinate end, the highest happiness would be imparted by the exercise of such contemplations and affections.

This end comprehends all beings and all events, whatsoever exists, and "whatsoever comes to pass," especially all that relates to his rational creatures, their natural endowments, their course of action, their temporal condition, and their eternal state.

All this God hath "foreordained," hath not only known or foreseen, but hath appointed and determined beforehand; so that nothing can come to pass, but what he hath willed, or in any other way, than what he hath arranged.

All this the Scriptures plainly teach us to believe concerning God; and if we may so speak, they simply teach it, or take it up rather as a truth already admitted, than as requiring to be revealed. They do not, therefore, say much on the subject as a separate doctrine, either as declaring it, or as discussing it; but they repeatedly affirm it as the truth concerning God, and as running through the other truths which he has revealed respecting his government of the world, and his gracious plans for man's salvation. It is thus to be seen, not so much in particular passages, as in the general strain of the Inspired Word; and is, in fact, a doctrine of what is called natural religion, as much as of Divine revelation. It is the uniform strain of the Divine record, that all things and all events proceed from God. "Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." "He doth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of earth." "I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." "Of him, and through him, and to him, are all things." "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." "He hath chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will—according to the purpose of him who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will—according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ our Lord.” “Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show my power in thee, and that my name might be declared through all the earth.” “Therefore, hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy; and whom he will he hardeneth.” “Against thy holy Child Jesus whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done.” “Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain.” “The Lord hath made all things for himself, yea, even the wicked for the day of evil.” “What if God, willing to show his wrath and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction; and that he might make known the riches of his glory, even us whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles.” “Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground, without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered.”

From these and numerous similar portions of Sacred Scripture, it is clearly taught, or rather taken as granted, that the Most High God ordereth all things as it pleaseth him, all things that come to pass, both good and evil, even things apparently trivial and accidental, whether relating to the circumstances of our earthly lot, or to our everlasting condition, that thus all things were foreknown, and purposed in his mind from all eternity, exclusively according to the counsel of his own will; and that all things thus agreeable to his purpose or pleasure are determined to come to pass, and directed to his own glory, or the manifestation of his perfections.

The same conclusions clearly follow from the consideration of the Divine perfections. As all things derive their existence from the will of God, and cannot exist in any other way or manner than as he pleases, all beings and all events must have been perfectly known to God from all eternity. All these, in all their qualities and relations, must thus have been present to the Divine mind in one view, in the most perfect manner, and never can be otherwise for a single moment. The supposition of God doing any thing in time which he did not eternally foreknow and intend, would imply, that he is not infinitely wise and absolutely unchangeable, but that he makes progress in knowledge, and alters his plans according to circumstances, of which he was not aware, and which he was not able to control. This is utterly contrary to all that reason teaches of God's nature, as well as to what Scripture teaches us to believe concerning him. “With him is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.”

All things that could possibly exist being thus at once and for ever before the Divine mind, he could not but choose those things to exist which were the best or fittest, both for his own glory and the good of his creation; and this choice of God, that such and such things should exist, is the cause, and alone can be the cause, of their existence. All beings, with all their several faculties, and all the use which they would make of these faculties, “whatsoever comes to pass” as their actions, proceeding from their own exercise of the powers bestowed upon them, must all equally have been foreseen and foreordained, as composing that universal system, which he willed into existence, and which never could exist without his will. It is not conceivable that things could have been otherwise—that the infinite and eternal Jehovah could have called the universe into existence without any design or end in view, or that, having some great good end in view, he should not fully provide for its accomplishment. This he could not be unable to do, when he knows all things, and can do all things, that in their nature are possible to be done or take place. This he could not be unwilling to do, when there could be to him no trouble in planning, and no labour in executing, the means of accomplishing his own great and good end. Hence it must follow, that he hath provided the proper means for accomplishing his purposes; and that all events, both the end and the means, “whatsoever comes to pass,” and whatsoever was necessary to bring it to pass, has been at one glance foreseen, and by one act arranged, in the eternal purpose of God's sovereign will.

To deny this doctrine involves the greatest absurdities respecting the Divine nature; and is just saying, that God is limited in his knowledge, always learning what he did not know before; that he is changeable in his plans, which he must alter as he acquires further knowledge; that he is dependent on his creatures and their actions, requiring him to adapt his proceedings to theirs; that he is, and must always be, uncertain of the accomplishment of his own ends, and has called a universe into existence, without being sure whether it would tend to good or evil.

THE NECESSITY OF WORKING OUT OUR SALVATION WITHOUT DELAY:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ANDREW BULLOCK, A.M.,
Minister of Tulliallan, Perthshire.

“Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.”—ECCLES. ix. 10.

In discoursing from these words, I shall, by the help of God, first, consider what it is which our hand findeth to do, or the work which is set before us to be done by us; second, the manner in which the work should be done, viz., with might; and, third, the great inducements to our doing it with our might.

I. Then, the work which our hand findeth to do.—We shall not do justice to the words of our text, if we consider them merely as containing a general exhortation to activity and diligence in the business of life. In the Word of God, all indolence is not only discouraged, but pointedly forbidden. We are distinctly and solemnly commanded not to be slothful in business, but to labour working with our hands the thing which is good, and to provide for the wants of our own house. We must, however, bear in remembrance, that the labours of our lawful worldly calling, and the duties which we owe to society, do not, and should not, form the only objects of our attention.

For these labours and duties there is a fit and appropriate season; and they are each of them entitled to a certain portion of our attention and our care, according to their relative importance. But there is one work which, in point of importance, infinitely transcends them all—the work of our personal salvation. Whatever be the claims of other pursuits, and however much we may be cumbered and troubled about other things, this is the one thing needful—this is the great work which we have to work out, and which we cannot neglect or leave unfinished without certain and eternal ruin. We are all of us by nature involved in guilt, and by wicked works we are all of us sinners before God. The Bible repeatedly and solemnly asserts this, and our own consciences, by the fears with which they are alarmed, add their testimony to these assertions. In consequence of our original guilt and our actual transgressions, our condition is truly awful. The sentence of our condemnation has been already pronounced. We are excluded from the favour of God; his wrath hangs over our heads; and if we continue to live, and should we die in such a state as this, that wrath will assuredly overtake and overwhelm us. How sad and appalling the circumstances to which we have reduced ourselves! How miserable the present condition, how gloomy and alarming the future prospects, of those who are regarded here with that perfect detestation with which unspotted holiness contemplates guilt, and shall hereafter become the objects of all that weight of everlasting vengeance with which omnipotent power and justice, untempered by mercy, shall visit rebellion before God! How galling is the bondage of corruption in this life; but, oh! how indescribably dreadful the punishment of sin in those abodes where the gnawing worm of conscience dieth not, where the fire shall burn without ever being quenched, and where the flames shall continually consume, but never destroy! Such is the misery of which we are heirs, to which our transgressions have rendered us obnoxious, and which, unless the grace of the Lord interpose, we must certainly and for ever endure. From this condition, sad and woful as it is, there is, however, a possibility of being delivered. God, in his great and tender mercy, hath provided a method of redemption. In his Holy Word he distinctly reveals to us the means of escaping the wrath to come, invites us to have recourse to them, and promises to us, for this purpose, the assistance of his Spirit. Since, then, on the one hand, we are all of us exposed to the wrath of an offended God, and the curse of his violated law; and since, on the other hand, there is such a thing as deliverance from wrath and redemption from the curse, should we not regard it as our chief concern to strive for these blessings, and to work out the great work—the salvation of our immortal souls—with “might, knowing there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither” we are all fast hastening. What can be so deeply interesting to us as this? What need we care however many and however great may be the temporal advantages which we relinquish, or of which we are deprived, or however severe may be the inconveniences to which we are subjected in this life, if we know of a surety that we are now the heirs, and shall ere long be the possessors, of perfect and eternal felicity. And what will the wealth and the honours of this world, what will the pleasures of sin, avail us, if we ultimately lose our souls? The redemption of the soul is precious, and when once lost it perisheth for ever. Our loss can never be recovered, and never be compensated. The work of our personal salvation, and whatever is connected with it, tends to advance it, or serves to accomplish it. Repentance towards God, faith in Jesus Christ, the resistance of sin, perseverance in duty, the diligent use of means, and steady growth in grace, as far exceed in importance every other concern, as the heavens are higher than the earth, or as eternity transcends time. If there is any language spoken by the voice of conscience, when reviewing our transgressions with remorse, or anticipating the punishment due to them with terror; if there is any truth in the declarations of the Word of God; if there is any thing dreadful in the endurance of his wrath, or any thing desirable in the enjoyment of his favour—then let us consider the work of our salvation as the great work given us to do—as our chief, yea, our sole concern—in comparison with which all other affairs sink into utter insignificance, and in which a sense of duty, and a regard to our own true and substantial interests, should constrain us to engage with ardour and to persevere with diligence.

II. Since the salvation of our souls is to us a matter of great, yea, infinite importance, and since the degree of importance must determine the degree of care and diligence with which we shall labour in any business, it follows undeniably, that it is incumbent upon us, being both our duty and our interest, to commence and to carry on the work of our salvation, not in a careless, spiritless and indifferent manner, but with all our power and might. This will appear still more clearly, when we consider that, besides being a work of infinite importance and necessity, it is momentous, attended with many and great difficulties. The alluring pleasures of the world—the crafty devices of Satan—the deceitfulness of riches—the engrossing cares of this life—the opposition to be expected from worldly men—the love of their praise, and the dread of their censure—the corruption of the human heart—our natural indolence—our natural fondness for what is sensual and present—our natural aversion and disinclination to enjoyments of a spiritual kind, and to the pursuit of objects which are future;—these form each of them so many obstacles in our path, which all must admit to be great, and which many will feel to be insurmountable. In perfect accordance with this view of the matter are the declarations of Scripture. There the work of salvation is represented as a striving to enter in at a great gate, and a holding on a narrow path—as a race, in which, if we expect the prize, we must lighten ourselves of every incumbrance, and with unremitting ardour press forward to the goal—as a warfare with enemies formidable for their numbers, their malignity, and their power, before whom we cannot be secure, or finally victorious, unless our swords be always in our hands and our armour always on our backs. Here it is compared to the state of servants having their loins girt, and their lamps burning, and with vigilance, which neither the toils of the day nor the stillness of midnight hour must overcome, waiting for the arrival of their Lord; and there it is described as nothing short of a steadfast and immoveable resistance of all the sins by which we are beset, and a ceaseless and abounding perseverance in the love and practice of every thing that is true, honest, pure, lovely, and of good report. And what are the inferences to be drawn from the representations of this matter? Are we to conclude from it, that indolence is allowable and is harmless? or that we must work out the work of our salvation with all our heart, and soul, and strength, and mind? Let us only consider how we act in the affairs of common life. Go to the men of the world, ye spiritual sluggards; consider their ways and be wise—wise for yourselves in time, and wise unto salvation for eternity. How do they act (or how would you act), in the pursuit of any temporal advantages which they regard as desirable and important, and at the same time know to be of difficult or of dangerous attainment? Are indolence, and carelessness, and procrastination the means which they employ (or to which we ourselves would have recourse), when they are anxious to increase their wealth, or to multiply their comforts, or to widen their influence or their power, or to better their condition in society, or to emerge from obscurity in which they were originally placed?

Has not Providence decreed, that no temporal comfort shall be gained without previous solicitude or toil? And why should we imagine that the blessings of a spiritual nature are to be acquired, or are to be retained, in any other way? Are we acting a consistent, a wise, or a safe part, if we lavish away our time, our thoughts, our endeavours, in the pursuit of uncertain riches—the unsatisfying enjoyments and the fading distinctions of the world; and neither ardently desire nor resolutely struggle for blessings, lasting as eternity, and pure and exalted as heaven itself; and yet flatter ourselves with the hope of these being ultimately ours?

It is not thus, my friends, that the wrath to come was ever escaped from, or the heavenly inheritance ever was won. In such a spirit no temptation can be successfully encountered, and none of our spiritual enemies be put to flight. In this spirit we may, indeed, begin to run the race set before us in the Gospel; but most assuredly, in this spirit we never shall reach the mark, nor obtain the “prize of our high calling.” In such a spirit we never shall work out the “work of our salvation with fear and trembling.” It is not enough that we do something, that we feel some desires, and put forth some efforts to be saved. Were the kingdom of heaven to be entered into on such terms, few, few, would come short of it. The truth is, that no man can hear the solemn statements concerning our present melancholy condition, and our future destiny, which are contained in the Word of God, without, at least to a certain degree, having his heart impressed, and his conduct influenced. No human being can coolly and deliberately relinquish the hope of heaven, and act in a manner which he knows will render him unhappy for ever,—no man, in any Christian country, ever perished in this manner; but thousands have lost their souls, not by doing nothing whatever in the work of their salvation, but by not doing enough—by not entering upon the business with ardent zeal, and persisting in it to the very last. The conduct of the great majority of professing Christians resembles that of the foolish virgins, whose disappointment was occasioned, not by their making no preparation to receive the bridegroom (for, like their wise companions, they took their lamps), but by their not making preparation enough—by taking their lamps without any oil in their vessels; or that of the man who built a house to shelter himself from the storm—and in so far acted well; but whose edifice was overthrown, because he possessed not industry and perseverance to dig as deep as the rock for a foundation. In like manner, unless we work at the work of our salvation with all our might, determined that no obstacle shall hinder, no opposition deter, and no avocation divert us from carrying it on, we need not work at it at all. Whatever we may feel, and however we may act, as to other affairs, here, unquestionably, our hearts must be in earnest, here our hands must be diligent. We must make this work the great business of our lives; in comparison with which, we must view and we must treat every other concern as utterly insignificant; and to the accomplishment of which, we must never imagine it sufficient to devote one day out of seven, or such fragments of time as may be left behind by the pleasures and occupations of the world, or the languid wishes of a heart the fervour and energy of whose affections have been lavished away on the enjoyments of sensuality, or the pursuits of ambition. No, we must regard this work as requiring the concentrated force of all the affections and powers of our rational nature, as long as we have breath and being in the world.

Do not think, my friends, that I am exhorting you to that which is impracticable, or which is superfluous: I am not urging you to give to the work more than it deserves, more than is necessary, more than the Word of God requires, or more than others have given before you—or more than some of you will wish to have given, when your wishes shall come too late. What I am stirring you up to engage in, is the great work of your personal salvation, and to engage in it with your might. The object towards which I am exhorting you unceasingly and strenuously to direct your endeavours, involves every thing that can give complacency to hope, or torment to fear—it is deliverance from all that your immortal souls shall endure in hell, and all they shall enjoy in heaven. And say, then, whether this object is not worthy of your desires, your prayers, your efforts?—whether it is not worthy to be struggled for, however much the struggle should cost you, and however long it should last? This is the “one thing needful,”—this is the “pearl of great price;” succeed in it, and you are happy for ever, whatever else you may lose; neglect it, and you are for ever miserable, though you should gain the whole world as your portion. He who “works out the work of his salvation,” though it should be “with fear and trembling,” has neither lived nor laboured in vain; and he dieth not as a fool dieth. He is wise for eternity—he hath hope in his death, and after death, he hath heaven for his home. He who will not begin this great work, or who, having begun it, leaves it unfinished—better were it for that man that he never had been born—better for him that Christ had never died for sinners—and that the offers of mercy, through faith in the blood of atonement, had never been sounded in his ears, and pressed on his acceptance.

III. We come now to consider the great motive to diligence in the work of our salvation, furnished by our text—that “in the grave, to which we are going, there is no work, nor device, nor wisdom, nor knowledge.” It is impossible to conceive a more affecting or powerful inducement to labour with our might in the work of our salvation, by sincerely repenting of sin, and cordially believing the Gospel, than this, that in the grave, to which we are all going, and to which we know not how soon we may go, repentance cannot avail, and faith cannot be exercised. How solemn is the thought, that we have before us a work of infinite importance—for it is the salvation of our never-dying souls; of great difficulty—for we have to contend with the temptations of the world, the wiles of the devil, and the corruptions of the flesh; while we are utterly uncertain how short a period may be assigned us for bringing it to a close! How awful will be our condition, if we should be summoned to the grave before our work is commenced, or before it be concluded! How deeply does it concern us to “give all diligence in making our calling and election sure.”—to be “steadfast and immovable,” always vigilant, and abounding in the work of the Lord, since we know assuredly, they only are blessed whom “their Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing!” Here, we enjoy the means of grace, the offers of mercy, and spiritual privileges of incalculable value—space for repentance, the free invitations of the Gospel, and opportunities of embracing them; but when death comes, as come at last he must, then shall our day of mercy end, then shall our privileges cease, and our state for eternity be unalterably fixed.

To him that is joined to all the living, there is hope; there is hope that, although hitherto repentant, God may, ere long, “give him repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth;” there is hope that to-day he may improve the privileges he yesterday despised,—and that, although he has continued for years “stout-hearted, and far from righteousness,” he may yet flee for refuge to that great propitiatory sacrifice whose merit can never be pleaded in vain.

But the dead know not any thing; they cannot know “things pertaining to their peace, for they are hid from their eyes.” “They have no share for ever in any thing that is done under the sun;” they cannot share in the mercy of the Lord, which is in the heaven above and upon the earth beneath, and which is over all his other works, but which reaches not to them; they have no share in the offers of a Saviour—they can neither hear, nor understand, nor embrace them; and they cannot work at that work to which I am this day exhorting you—for they are inclosed in the shades of that long and dark night in which no man can see to work. Those irregular heaps around us, on which the wild grass grows with such rank and unprofitable luxuriance, contain, beneath them, limbs which were once knit together with strong sinews, and bones once clothed with flesh and covered with skin; these are all the remains of living, thinking beings, who once gave animation to those scenes in which you now move, that once occupied the habitations in which you dwell, and assembled within the same house of prayer. But they shall never return to the homes which they loved; they shall never gather round the blazing hearth, where, with his children climbing his knees, the wearied labourer refreshed him from his toils,—and where the poor man, for a season, either forgot his poverty, or was happy in spite of it; they shall no more go up with the multitude to the sanctuary of the Lord, at the sound of the Sabbath-bell.

Of those now in the state of the dead, some, perhaps, were men that made a mock at sin, and who, because sentence against their evil works was not speedily executed, had their hearts set in them to do wickedly; some of them were men whom conscience had often warned with unbecoming earnestness, and with whom the Spirit of God had long striven in vain; there multitudes are lying, some who were mere formalists, who imposed on others and deceived themselves by a bigoted, bustling, and ostentatious profession of religion, by a speculative acquaintance with the form of sound words, while their hearts were as unimpressed with the power, as their lives and their actions were unadorned with the fruits of holiness. And could we have access to know the histories of those that are beneath that turf, we should find among them persons who were once concerned about the salvation of their souls, and who once were nearer the kingdom of heaven, than numbers of those whom I am now addressing, but, notwithstanding, fell short of it and never entered in. They, perhaps, could trace their first serious convictions to some striking providence, the intelligence of a sudden death, or the hearing of an awakening sermon on the uncertainty of life and the importance of eternity; these convictions remained and deepened, and with some of them, the time was, when they derived comfort from prayer, when their Sabbaths were their happiest days, and the people of God their chosen companions; but, alas! they grew weary in well-doing, and did not work at the work of their salvation, with their might, and forsook their first faith, and forgot their first love; temptation assailed them, and they yielded to its power; their conscience became seared through the deceitfulness of sin; the warnings of the Spirit were, in righteous judgment, for ever withdrawn from them, and in this state of spiritual deadness and worldly mindedness they went down to the grave. Were these men to be permitted to revisit the earth, and to resume the work which they had so foolishly abandoned, how wide the difference between their present and their past conduct! "All old things are passed away, and all things would become new." What burning zeal and what inflexible perseverance would they manifest? With them there would be no misspent Sabbaths, no idle wishes, no cold lifeless prayers, no careless inquiries, no feeble endeavours, no slothful delays; they would not merely seek, they would strive to enter in at the strait gate; from such men the kingdom of heaven would suffer violence, and their violence would take it by force. What would they who had died in a state of impenitence and sin give to enjoy, even for a single day, those opportunities which you have possessed so abundantly, which some of you have so long despised; but which you may soon be unable to find, though you should seek for them carefully and with tears? Were the stillness of their prison-house to be broken, but for once, by the renewed publications of offers of mercy and calls to repentance, with what speechless earnestness would they listen to the sound? With what joy would they hail the messengers of such glad tidings, and how eager the gratitude with which they would embrace them? But none of these events can take place. In the grave, whither they have gone, "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom." They dwell in the land of silence, and they shall never awaken from their sleep in the dust, or arise from their low and narrow bed, till the trumpet of the archangel shall sound, and the heavens be no more. Such is the sentence, such the appointment of Divine justice, and before this sentence can be reversed, Omnipotence must be overcome. The state of the dead cannot be changed; as we are left by death so are we overtaken by judgment. Our character, dispositions and views before death, continue with us for ever, and unchangeably determine our spiritual condition. "As the tree falleth so it must lie." Death, to the people of God, is followed by happiness which shall never end, and by glory which fadeth not away; but to those who are strangers to the faith of the Gospel, whose sins remain unpardoned, and whose hearts remain unsanctified by grace, it is succeeded by a state of misery in comparison of which all the pains that can torture the body, and the deepest anguish that can tear the heart, would be merely a state of tranquillity and repose.

How solemn, then, and how powerful is the exhortation rendered, to work with our might at the work of our salvation, by reflecting that in the grave, no work, nor device, nor wisdom, nor knowledge is found.

As long as we walk on the earth, or breathe the air, or behold the sun, there is no ground for despair. While life lasts, hope remains. While there is life, conscience warns, the spirit strives, the Saviour pleads, the Gospel invites, the promises may draw, and the threatenings may drive from sin to repentance, and from iniquity to holiness,—the fervent prayers of righteous friends may avail, the sinner himself may supplicate for his own soul, and repairing to a throne of grace, his prayers when offered in the name, and urged on the merits of the Redeemer's righteousness, may move the Almighty to repent of the evil he had purposed to inflict, may change the threatening into a promise, the curse into a blessing, and the wages of sin, which is death, into the gift of God, which is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. While there is life, nothing which we may have done, nothing which we may have left undone; neither the number of our offences, nor their greatness; neither the length of time during which we have persisted in committing them, nor the aggravating circumstances by which their guilt has been deepened, can extinguish hope in the breast of the sinner, or restrain the exercise of forgiveness with God. As long as our mind can think, as long as it is capable of understanding the meaning of the words in which the offers of pardon and reconciliation are made, as long as the warm current circulates within us, and the silver cord remains unbroken, God may be just, and yet justify us, and we may repent and believe, and be saved; but when the night of death comes, all is over, the moment the pulse ceases to beat, that moment the Saviour ceases to plead, the Spirit to strive, and the Gospel to invite,—then the salutary warnings from conscience become the gnawings of unavailing remorse, then the intercessions of the righteous would be a mockery of heaven, and then the state of the sinner himself, to whom so lately the most encouraging offers of pardon were addressed, becomes the same as if no atonement had been provided for sin, and as if mercy had never been numbered among the attributes of God. Amen.

---

"GOD IS LOVE."

OR! child of grief, why weepst thou?
 Why droopst thy sad and mournful brow?
 Why is thy look so like despair?
 What deep, sad sorrow, lingers there?

Thou mourn'st, perhaps, for some one gone—
A friend, a wife, a little one;
Yet mourn not, for thou hast above
A friend in God, and "God is love!"

Was it remorse that laid thee low?
Is it for sin thou mournest so;
Surely thou bear'st a heavy grief;
Yet, mourner, there is still relief.

There's One on high can pardon give,
Who gave his life that thou mayest live;
Seek, then, thy comfort from above—
Thy friend is God, and "God is love!"

Has cold unkindness wounded thee?
Does thy lov'd friend now from thee flee?
O turn thy thoughts from earth to heaven,
Where no such cruel wounds are given.

In all the varying scenes of woe—
The lot of fallen man below—
Still lift thy tearful eye above,
And hope in God, for "God is love!"

Sweet is the thought, time flies apace—
This earth is not our resting-place;
And sweet the promise of the Lord
To all who love his name and Word.

Thou weeping pilgrim, dry thy tears,
Comfort on every side appears;
An eye beholds thee from above—
The eye of God, and "God is love!"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.— Experience warrants, and reason justifies and explains the assertion, that persecution generally tends to quicken the vigour, and extend the prevalence, of the opinions which they would eradicate. Christianity, especially, has always thriven under persecution. At such a season, she has no lukewarm professors; no adherents concerning whom it is doubtful to what party they belong. The Christian is reminded at every turn, that his Master's kingdom is not of this world. When all on earth wears a black and threatening aspect, he looks up to heaven for consolation; he learns practically to consider himself as a pilgrim and stranger. He then cleaves to fundamentals, and examines well his foundation, as at the hour of death. When religion is in a state of external quiet and prosperity, the contrary of all this naturally takes place. The soldiers of the Church militant then forget that they are in a state of warfare. Their ardour slackens, their zeal languishes. Like a colony long settled in a strange country, they are gradually assimilated in features, and demeanour, and language, to the inhabitants, till at length almost every vestige of peculiarity dies away.—W. WILBERFORCE.

HISTORY OF THE ALBIGENSES.

PERIOD III.

TO THE SUBJUGATION OF RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE, AND THE PERMANENT ESTABLISHMENT OF THE INQUISITION.

PART I.

AFTER the death of Simon de Montfort, a deeper darkness involves the history of the Albigenses,—a friendly darkness to the advocates of the persecutors, as it conceals a fearful amount of woe and suffering, inflicted upon this devoted people during the last stages of their existence. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with tracing only a few of the leading steps by which the mysterious designs of Providence were accomplished, in the destruction of a gallant and virtuous people, and the downfall of a holy cause,—and endeavouring to read the language of warning and instruction which it so impressively inculcates.

Raymond VI., become weary of a strife for which he was so little fitted, had resigned his government into the more energetic hands of his son, the seventh of the name; but Amaury de Montfort, who succeeded to Simon's feudal rights, was not only an ardent persecutor, like his father, but was also backed by the power of France, with Louis the Dauphin at its head. This prince, who, three years before, had signalized himself by an unsuccessful attempt upon the crown of England, at the instigation of the Pope, whose tool he was on that occasion, now devoted himself with equal zeal to a crusade against the Albigenses; and as Honorius III., the successor of Innocent III., was eager for such a measure, he granted the young prince the subsidy of a twentieth upon the clergy of France for the expenses of the war. Louis, accordingly, took the field, at the head of a large body of knights, and ten thousand archers, and being joined by Amaury, the war was commenced against Raymond Roger, Count of Foix, in whom the obnoxious cause had ever found a steadfast supporter. Raymond VII. flew to the support of his ally, and being joined by the latter, he obtained a signal victory at Basiège, over two of Amaury's lieutenants. But Louis and Amaury, who were, meanwhile, employed in the siege of Marmande, were so successful, that the outworks were won, and the besieged were obliged to capitulate. The garrison offered to surrender, on condition of being allowed to depart with their lives and baggage; but Louis would consent that they should carry nothing with them but their bodies. This hard condition was accepted, and the soldiers came forth to the Dauphin's tent, with their homage and submission; but no sooner did the Bishop of Saintes perceive them, than he said, "Sire, my counsel is, that you instantly kill and burn all these people as heretics and apostates, so that none of them be left alive; and then, that you do neither more nor less to those of the city." The nobles and knights who stood by exclaimed against the treason of inducing a Child of France to violate his pledged word, and Louis permitted the prisoners to depart unharmed. But during this interview, Amaury de Montfort entered the town with his troops, and ordered them to destroy and slay, that the blessing of God might be purchased by their labours; and forthwith a sanguinary massacre commenced, in which five thousand men, women, and children, were put to the sword.

From Marmande the crusaders proceeded to the siege of Toulouse; of which city the cardinal-legate had sworn that not a man, woman, or child, should be spared from the slaughter, or one stone left upon another. But this terrible vow, and the example of the fate of Marmande, only made the Toulousians more determined in their purpose of defence; and Raymond VII. was powerfully reinforced by a thousand knights, with their armed attendants, while every division of the garrison swore to defend its post to the death. These heroic resolutions were not empty words. On the 16th of June 1219, the crusaders arrived before Toulouse, conducted by Louis, Amaury, and the legate. The lines of circumvallation were traced, and the attacks commenced, but the besieged beat off their assailants at every point; and as sickness as well as the sword began to work fearful havoc in the camp, the crusaders could make no impression. At length, as the forty days of military service had expired, Louis, who could no longer keep his army together, abandoned the siege, and precipitately retreated. After this event, Raymond VII. assumed the offensive, and with such success, that one stronghold after another was wrested from de Montfort, so that in March 1221 nothing remained to him, of all his father's acquisitions, but the city of Carcassonne. This was attacked repeatedly by Raymond of Toulouse, and the Count of Foix; and although Amaury, after having expended all his means in his defence, offered to pledge his lands, and even his person, he could find no assistance, in men or money, from his brother counts, or the King of France, so that he was obliged to submit to his opponents on the 14th of January 1224; and on the following day he left the city, with his military retainers, and abandoned for ever an inheritance acquired by his father's injustice. He repaired to Louis, now King of France (Louis VIII.,) to whom he ceded the territorial rights which his house had acquired from the crusades; while Trevental, the son of the late Raymond Roger, Viscount of Beziers, was reinstated, by the Counts of Toulouse and Foix, into all the possessions of which his father had been deprived.

As Louis had acquired a nominal right to the heretical territories, by the cession of Amaury, he resolved to signalize his zeal for the Church, at the opening of his reign, by the conquest of Albigeois; and he demanded from Honorius III. the usual ecclesiastical sanctions for the commencement of a new holy war, which were gladly accorded. But the Pontiff was obliged to revoke his permission, in consequence of the remonstrances of Frederic II., who, being about to undertake a crusade to the Holy Land, would need the aid of every soldier in Christendom enlisted to shed blood for the remission of sins, and who, therefore, could not afford a diversion of the Church militant against heretics at home. Louis was wroth at this disappointment, more especially, as he was now ready for action; but nothing remained for him save the virtue of obedience. Raymond VII., at the same time, was applying to the Papal court, to make his peace with the Church,—for which he was ready to make important concessions; and if Frederic had commenced his march, the conditions of the Count of Toulouse would have been accepted, as a most welcome offering: but Frederic delayed, and therefore the court of Rome would decide nothing. He postponed his expedition to a more convenient season, and the Pope could now let loose the imprisoned storm of his ire upon the heretics without let or mitigation. Raymond was informed that all his submission was fruitless, unless he renounced his heritage for himself and his heirs for ever; and when he indignantly spurned this iniquitous ultimatum, after having been duped so long by a treaty in which far other prospects were held out, Louis, like a hooded falcon, was to be slipped from his jesses, and allowed to work his pleasure upon the Albigeois. A crusade was preached anew for the suppression of heresy; large subsidies from the ecclesiastical revenues were assigned to Louis, for the prosecution of this righteous warfare; and on the 30th of January 1226, he formally assumed the cross, while Raymond of Toulouse was excommunicated, with all his adherents.

The situation of the Albigenes was now truly helpless. The Kings of Arragon and England, whom policy would have induced to aid the oppressed against the King of France, were stultified into neutrality by dread of the Papal thunder; the same cause operated in reducing to inaction, or enlisting upon the other side, the great feudatories of the French kingdom, except the Count of Foix; and Raymond found himself all but alone, while the combined national army, consisting of fifty thousand knights, and mounted men-at-arms, and their usual proportion of foot-soldiers, seemed to render the hope of resistance an impulse of utter frenzy. Accordingly, while Louis was traversing the Nivernois in May, cities, towns, and castles, in rapid succession, poured forth their deputies, with entreaties for pardon, and offers of submission. The crusaders then advanced to Avignon, a city so attached to Raymond, that, for his sake, it had languished twelve years under excommunication. It could not now, however, resist the inundation that rolled against it; and, accordingly, the citizens agreed to allow the army a supply of provisions, and the free passage of the Rhone, but not to receive it within the walls. These conditions, which were highly favourable to the French king, were accepted, and three thousand soldiers passed over by a wooden bridge constructed for the purpose, one extremity of which rested upon a small island in the middle of the river, and the other upon the mainland, above the city. But the legate hungered for revenge upon the excommunicated city; the crusaders, for its rich plunder; and the proud king himself demanded to cross the river by the bridge of stone, and to ride through the city with his lance in the rest, like a conqueror, and at the head of his whole army. This insulting proposal the magistrates indignantly refused, and immediately shut the gates. The city was then besieged in form; but it was strong in double walls, and the stout hearts that manned them, and the crusaders were encountered with such bravery and success, that they were occupied for three long months before the ramparts, during which a fearful pestilence broke out among their ranks, so that twenty thousand soldiers are said to have fallen by disease and the sword. After a gallant defence, the city capitulated on the 12th of September; but the besieged succeeded in their object, for they obtained by condition that only the legate, and the chief lords of the crusaders should be admitted within the walls. The enemy, however, thinking that keeping faith with heretics was a superfluous ceremony, took possession of the gates, put to the sword the French and Flemish soldiers of the garrison, demolished part of the walls and battlements, and levied a contribution upon the citizens. After thus treating Avignon like a conquered city, in defiance of the most solemn treaties, Louis proceeded on his career of success; and as he marched through the province, several castles laid their keys at his feet, and tendered the oath of allegiance. And now the land was occupied, the sentence of doom pronounced, and the pile ready to be kindled—but where were the victims? Alas! fifteen years of persecution had done their work, so that the inquisitors, after the strictest search, could only find one, a preacher of heretics named Peter Isarn, who was so old and feeble, that he could not run away; and, accordingly, he was sentenced, and committed to the flames with great solemnity. After this deed, Louis commenced his retreat, and led his still sickening and exhausted army towards Auvergne, strewing the way in his march with the dead and dying, till he arrived at Montpensier, in Auvergne, on the 29th of October 1226. Here he felt the hand of death heavy upon him, for he had sickened of the same pestilential disease that destroyed his soldiers; and he died on the 3d of the following month. By this event, the bereaved Church of Rome lost as dutiful and compliant a monarch as ever abased a kingly crown before a tonsured head.

Louis IX., the son of Louis VIII., was but a child when his father died, and, therefore, the reins of government were intrusted, during his minority, to his mother Blanche, under whose energetic administration the war against the Albigenses was not likely to languish. Indeed, as we have already seen, there remained no longer the apology of religion to the invaders; for the heretics had disappeared as a public body, and ceased to be heard of in the business of life; but the crusading spirit had survived the emergency that first set it in motion; and the love of rapine and massacre, which had been gratified for so many years, looked abroad for new victims, after the old had disappeared. While such was the popular impression upon the subject, ecclesiastics and statesmen lent their sanction to the feeling. The clergy thought that a sufficient example had not been given of the evils of heresy so long as a single town that had nursed it encumbered the ground; the very stone and lime, in their eyes, seemed to be polluted with a plague-spot that could not be cured until these habitations were broken into fragments, and the fragments themselves swept away. And with the French politicians who surrounded the throne, the Counts of Toulouse and Foix were obstinate rebels who opposed, and partly eclipsed the royal authority, and, therefore, must be utterly humbled; while their forfeited possessions would extend the power of the monarchy, and prove a valuable addition to the growing territories of France. From such motives, the war was continued, although the spirit of fanaticism had gradually sunk into indifference; and the close of it, towards which we gladly hasten, was a loathsome impersonation of those selfish and grovelling principles which we have just specified.

At the commencement of the year 1228, Raymond of Toulouse was every where prosperous; Guy de Montfort, the brother of Simon, was slain at the siege of Varailles, and Castel Sarrazin surrendered to his arms. But at this last place, he seems to have forgotten those generous sentiments in which he had hitherto warred, for he frightfully mutilated the prisoners that fell into his hands. Again he was victorious, and again his captives were treated with the same atrocity. The nature and length of the war seemed to have maddened him—but it was that madness of the heart from which every good principle has been banished, and which commonly proves the immediate prelude to ruin. His resistance was no longer a holy conflict, and he never prospered more. The crusaders advanced upon Toulouse, and the citizens doggedly abode within their walls, in the hope that the enemy would be wearied out by a long siege. But their atrocious Bishop, Fouquet, in whom they had hitherto experienced a persecuting feud, was an indefatigable leader in the hostile camp; and by his advice, a plan was adopted, that struck a death-blow into the vitals of Toulouse. All the vines, the corn, and the fruit trees were destroyed; all the houses burned on every side, for miles round the city; and at the end of three months, during which the work of demolition was systematically carried on day by day, Toulouse, like Balbec or Palmyra, reared its head in the midst of a frightful solitude. No courage could sustain such a terrible species of warfare, and the hearts of the citizens were dried up within them by the sight of this universal desolation, and the poverty it entailed, while Raymond, baited successfully in the field, beheld the miseries of his capital without being able to relieve it. His spirit was broken, and he wanted peace—peace on any terms, and at whatever price. And peace he obtained; but he had better have died bravely in his harness, and found that rest where the "wicked cease from troubling," than lived, to experience their "tender mercies." By a treaty signed at Paris on the 12th of April 1229, he voluntarily became a lord without authority, and a knight without honour—even a man without a will. It would occupy too much space to particularise the numerous conditions to which he subscribed on this occasion; they were all that a merciless and proud enemy could propound to a victim who grovelled in the dust before them. The light of France was thus extinguished, and ages of darkness were to elapse before it could be rekindled. But can man quench the radiance that streams from heaven? it is impossible! The imperishable rays, obscured in one quarter, will only break out in another; and when the night has set upon a people for their sins, it is then that others who have sat in the shadow of death behold the coming of the dawn, and the rise of the "Sun of Righteousness." The few heretics who survived the persecution fled into other lands—to Piedmont, to Austria, to Bohemia, and other countries, even to our own England, where they reappeared under the name of Lollards. But wander where they might, they carried with them the record of their sufferings, and the tenets of their faith; and men every where listened with wonder and delight to their marvellous revelations so unlike whatever their own teachers announced. In this way, a spirit was communicated from heart to heart, over the length and breadth of Europe, that only waited the season of rising; and thus when the first signal was given by the man of Wittenberg, the echo resounded at once from many a land, and myriads simultaneously started up from many quarters, who had been preparing, during the silence of three centuries, for so glorious a restoration.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Street, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACRAE & Co., 19, Oldmarket Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, JUNR. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE
SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—A Recent Visit to Dusselthal Abbey, and Count von der Recke, ..... Page 753 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Ararat," ..... 755 3.—Biographical Sketch. The Rev. John Campbell, the African Traveller. By the Editor. Part III., ..... do. 4.—The Army of the Covenanters on Dunse Law, ..... 759	5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. James Hamilton, ..... Page 760 6.—Sacred Poetry. "Longing to be with Christ," ..... 763 7.—The Present Population of Jerusalem, ..... 764 8.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Milton, Gisborne, Fawcett, and Hill, ..... do. 9.—Edinburgh Continental Association. Part II., ..... 766
--	--

A RECENT VISIT TO DUSSELTAL ABBEY, AND COUNT
VON DER RECKE.

There are at present fifty-seven girls and sixty boys at the Abbey. There are twenty-six boys at Overdyck with the family of the Count, the person who assists in the education of the children, the house and farm servants. There are two hundred people fed in the Abbey every day, almost literally dependent on Him who feeds the ravens for their daily bread. Not long ago some English ladies visited Dusselthal and gave Miss Murray three pounds for the Institution. When she took it to the Countess, the tears stood in her eyes, and she thanked God who had sent the money at the very moment that their last handful of flour had been baked into bread, and there was not the smallest coin in the house to buy any more. As you will like to know every particular about Dusselthal, I will endeavour to give you an account of our visit; but it is impossible to describe the impression that is made on the mind by being brought into contact with such lively faith and charity, accompanied by such deep humility. The Count never refers to himself as the principal in the Institution, but in every thing acknowledges the hand of the Almighty who has made use of him as an instrument to work His will. But to return to our visit. My mother, and I, and one of my nephews, went from this place to Dusselthal last Friday, and early on Saturday drove to the Abbey, which is about three miles from the town. I had learnt German enough to make it understood that we were friends of yours, and come at your desire to visit the Count. The servant said he was very unwell and confined to his room, but offered to let him know we were there, and took us into the house into a neat small parlour; and in a little while returned, accompanied by a lady who introduced herself as a country-woman of ours. We rejoiced to find that we should get the account of the Institution in a language we could understand without difficulty. She offered to show us through the building, and first took us into the linen room, which is under the Countess's particular care, and was a picture of neatness. On one side was the house linen (not a very great deal.) Opposite to it were rows of shelves divided into compartments, and numbered from one to sixty, and each containing the little wardrobe of one girl. Another side, divided in the same manner, contained the linen, &c., of each boy; and the remaining side was a press where hung the Sunday frocks of the girls. We next visited the library, which was filled with books printed in the establishment, and some others given by kind printers to be sold for the benefit of the orphans. Here we made some purchases, and my mother got a print of the Count, and one of the Abbey, which she hopes to present to you, on her return to Leamington. We then proceeded to the part of the house appropriated to the girls, a school-room, an eating-room, a washing-room where each had her own bason, also her own towel hanging on a hook marked with her number, and the sick ward, which contained only two sick children, on one floor. The whole of the floor above was a large dormitory for the girls; fifty-seven of whom, three governesses, and three servants, sleep in it. Nevertheless it seemed quite airy, as there are windows opposite each other all along the sides, and small holes, purposely left in the walls, to keep up a constant circulation of air. The lower storey of the girls' wing is the chapel where they all assemble for family prayers, every morning at seven, and each evening at eight; and on Sundays there are two services. The chaplain is tutor to the Count's sons, and likewise assists him in the general superintendence of the orphans. The lower storey of the boys' part of the house contains a kitchen, wash-house, laundry, dairy, scullery, &c.; above their eating-room, the eating-room for the servants, and the store-room, the school-house, and the attics, their large dormitory where forty boys and two masters sleep. These two buildings were added to the Abbey by the Count, and when he began to build them he had but six shillings in the world, but as they were absolutely necessary, he believed the funds would be provided, and his faith was not disappointed. The very morning the first payments were due, the post brought him a letter from a friend saying, that one of his acquaintances having told him he wished to lay out a certain sum in assisting some charitable work, he had recommended Dusselthal as a suitable object; and his advice being accepted, he enclosed him the exact money that was necessary for this day's payment. The old Abbey, besides the rooms inhabited by the Count and his family, contains the room where the printing-press is, and where the bookbinding is carried on, and where the shoemakers and tailors work. In summer there is not a great deal of work done in the house, as they find out-of-doors' work so very healthful, and the boys have employment on the farm. They are divided into small companies, under a man who understands the work, dig the ground, and manage the little crop of either potatoes or corn themselves. The girls, in small numbers, under a female superintendent, go out to weed, in harvest to bind the sheaves, and do any part of the farm work that their strength is equal to. In winter, and bad weather, the boys make mats and baskets, work either at printing, bookbinding, shoemaking, or tailoring, according to their abilities; and the girls knit stockings, and make the shirts, &c., that are worn in the Institution. They all look most happy and contented. We saw the boys assemble for dinner. The Count asked the blessing, and they each sat down to a comfortable bowl of pease soup, with vegetables in it. The soup is made without meat, except on Sundays, when they are allowed a little meat, and curds and whey. They get soup for breakfast, dinner, and supper, and a large piece of bread at four o'clock every afternoon. This sounds a meagre kind of food to us, but the children seem to thrive on it, and they have but little sickness amongst them, particularly since the money raised by Miss Aikman enabled the Count to buy and drain the bush as they called the marsh near the Abbey; before that, the ague prevailed among them. One of the Count's children died last year, and as he was anxious to have her buried near the Abbey, he consulted the inmates about it; they said they should like to have a burying-ground within the walls of the garden, if he would be buried there also. Accordingly, a very neat burying-ground has been prepared and ornamented, as is the custom here, with flowering shrubs; when they have a little money, it is to be enclosed, and Mrs Fry has given them a print of herself, and liberty to have it lithographed, and the copies sold to raise a small sum for that purpose. Another means of supporting the institution is distilling Eau de Cologne. It is really very good, and I think when you try what we bring home with us, you will have no scruples in recommending it to any friends who use this scent, and who might like to think that while they are indulging themselves in a pleasant luxury, they were doing good to destitute orphans. I will inform myself particularly of where it can be got in London, which I stupidly forgot to do when I was at Dusselthal. Some profit is derived from their dairy. They keep eighteen cows, and sell the butter, and skim-milk cheese. The funds raised from these sources, and their books, are in no way adequate to meet the expense of the Institution; but hitherto they have been provided for. The Count's faith has never failed, and, though often in perplexity he has never been in despair. After we had inspected the whole house and affairs, the burying-ground, the garden, and play-ground, to all of which Miss Murray was so kind as to accompany us,—we were introduced to the Count and Countess, and found them very agreeable people. She speaks French very well, so we got on easily with her, and the Count tried to understand my bad German, and was so kind as to talk to me, as I can understand it better than I can speak it. He is a most benevolent looking man. His countenance is most delightful, his manner most excellent. And his wife too is ladylike and agreeable, and a clever looking person. She keeps all the accounts, and manages all the domestic arrangements. They both inquired most affectionately after you and Miss Aikman, and desired their most grateful and kind remembrance to both. Your little name-daughter is a pretty, fair, delicate looking child. We also saw the other girls belonging to the Count, and one boy, but the two eldest boys were out. It is most encouraging and strengthening to faith, to behold the wonderful way in which it has pleased God to supply the wants of this establishment. Last summer, there were some fields to be sold, which lie in the middle of the Count's fields, and the possessor of which had a right to a road through the Count's lands. Many things made him think the purchase a desirable one, but he had only one shilling and sixpence in the world. After much conversation on the subject, he requested those in the house who had faith, would pray, that he might be guided to a right determination, and the next day was set apart for prayer. The morning the sale was to take place, the count said he had made up his mind to offer a certain sum for it, which was accepted. Weeks went on, and the time of payment drew on, but still no money,—till three days before it must be paid, the post brought a letter from the secretary of the Empress of Russia, enclosing the sum, with orders to lay it out either in the purchase of lands, or, in adding to the house. The King of Prussia is very kind to the Institution in various ways. He sends a small barrel of salt once a month, as a present, and all the letters and parcels go free in his dominions. The Germans are not a rich people, therefore, instead of money, a number of ladies send beautiful pieces of work, others send china and ornaments, for which there is a lottery once a-year. The tickets are one shilling a-piece, and this year there are two hundred of them, so if they all sell it will assist their funds. It is to be drawn next month. I hope you will not be tired with reading all this detail, which I have written, because I thought you would like to know every thing, and now I fear I shall fatigue you. But you wished to know who Miss Murray was. I must not conclude without telling you that she is of Scotch parents. Her father came from Selkirkshire. She came to Germany as one of the Queen of Hanover's attendants, and was six years in her family. Her parents being both dead, and her sisters married, she has no particular home. Last year she visited Dusselthal, and was so pleased with all she saw, that she remained a month on a visit. After a short time she returned, and has been there nearly a year, assisting the Countess in the general superintendence, translating English books into German, for their printing press, and devoting herself to the interests of the Institution. She is very lady-like and agreeable, and from her conversation, I should judge, a real Christian.

ARARAT.

[From "Sacred Mountains and Waters Versified, by Lady S. . ."]

THE torrents cease, the waves retreat,
The trembling dove finds rest;
The terrors of the Lord abate,
His mercies stand confest.

Full on the troubled deep no more
The patriarch bends his eye:
Calmly he waits, in Heav'n's own hour,
The promis'd sign on high.

And lo! to his astonished view
That airy pledge is given,
Dyed in each bright ethereal hue,
Resplendent in the heav'n.

But oh! what boon more precious far
Does God's rich bounty yield—
The Glorious light of Bethlehem's Star
Salvation has reveal'd.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. JOHN CAMPBELL,
THE AFRICAN TRAVELLER.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART III.

DURING his residence in Edinburgh Mr Campbell was indefatigable in his efforts to promote the cause of the Redeemer. He visited the sick—examined into and relieved, as far as he possibly could, the destitute and friendless—established and superintended Sabbath schools—preached in the surrounding villages—distributed tracts—wrote small books, for the instruction of the young. "Soldiers and sailors," says his biographer, "wrote to him for advice; the needy and greedy, for money; the reclaimed outcasts, for prayer and counsel; dark villages, for itinerants; and chapel builders, for help; besides those who ordered their missionary magazines, books, and Scott's Commentary, and paid their accounts through him." While thus actively employed in advancing the interests of true religion, Mr Haldane having projected the formation, at his own expense, of a mission to Bengal, applied to Mr Campbell to accompany them on their Christian enterprise. At first his decided conviction was, that it was his duty to go; but the arguments of his friends, particularly Mr Newton and the Countess of Leven, were effectual in leading him to abandon the design. "I have no doubt," said the former, with his characteristic naïveté, "but Satan would be glad to see you shipped off to India, or any where, so he might get rid of you; for you stand in his way where you are." Mr Haldane was not convinced by Mr Newton's reasonings, and urged the matter upon Mr Campbell with increasing earnestness, but without success. This decision, however, though opposed to Mr Haldane's wishes, did not alienate the two friends from each other in the slightest degree,—they still moved with the utmost harmony in all their schemes for the promotion of the truth as it is in Jesus.

The acceptance which Mr Campbell met with as a village preacher, led him to think of devoting himself wholly to the good work. He had been accustomed to associate with the godly ministers of every evangelical denomination in Edinburgh, and he was in intimate correspondence with the leading ministers both in England and Scotland. At the table of the late accomplished and excellent Rev. Dr Buchanan, one of the ministers of the Canongate, he met with many distinguished men; in reference to one of whom, the late Lord Hailes, we find him narrating the following striking anecdote:—

"I remember distinctly an interesting anecdote referring to the late Sir David Dalrymple (better known to literary men abroad by his title of Lord Hailes), a Scotch judge. I had it from the late Rev. Walter Buchanan, one of the ministers of Edinburgh. I took such interest in it, that though it must be about fifty years ago since he told it, I think I can almost relate it in Mr Buchanan's own words:—

"I was dining some time ago with a literary party at old Mr Abercrombie's (father of General Abercrombie who was slain in Egypt, at the head of the British army), and we were spending the evening together. A gentleman present put a question which puzzled the whole company. It was this: Supposing all the New Testaments in the world had been destroyed at the end of the third century, could their contents have been recovered from the writings of the three first centuries? The question was novel to all, and no one even hazarded a guess in answer to the inquiry.

"About two months after this meeting, I received a note from Lord Hailes, inviting me to breakfast with him next morning. He had been of the party. During breakfast he asked me if I recollected the curious question about the possibility of recovering the contents of the New Testament from the writings of the three first centuries? 'I remember it well, and have thought of it often without being able to form any opinion or conjecture on the subject.'

"Well," said Lord Hailes, 'that question quite accorded with the turn or taste of my antiquarian mind. On returning home, as I knew I had all the writers of those centuries, I began immediately to collect them, that I might set to work on the arduous task as soon as possible.' Pointing to a table covered with papers, he said, 'There have I been busy for these two months, searching for chapters, half chapters, and sentences of the New Testament, and have marked down what I have found, and where I have found it; so that any person may examine and see for themselves. I have actually discovered the whole New Testament from those writings, except seven or eleven verses (I forget which), which satisfies me that I could discover them also. Now,' said he, 'here was a way in which God concealed, or hid the treasure of his Word, that Julian, the apostate emperor, and other enemies of Christ who wished to extirpate the Gospel from the world, never would have thought of; and though they had, they never could have effected their destruction.'

When Mr Campbell had at length formed his resolution to serve God in the work of the ministry, he repaired to Glasgow, where he studied under the Rev. Greville Ewing, who had shortly before left the Established Church and joined the Independents. Here Mr Campbell's mind found ample scope for its exertion. Not only did he diligently prosecute his theological and classical studies, but "during all the time he was at Glasgow," we are informed by his biographer, "he was absorbed with the cause of Home and Foreign Missions, and keeping up his extensive correspondence, as well as preaching or teaching almost every day." His desire to do good was unbounded; and, as an instance, we may quote the following statement in his own language:—

"Soon after taking up my residence in that populous city, I proposed to have a similar institution there for the children of the rich, as I had in Edinburgh for two or three years before leaving it. The friends to whom I mentioned it gave me every encouragement to attempt it. Mrs Baillie, a zealous lady, whose house was in the very centre of the city, offered me the use of her large dining-room. The meeting was to be held from seven to eight every Monday evening.

"In the course of a month there was a stated congregation of fifty or sixty young ladies and gentlemen, with some of their parents, through the active exertions of several friends, both male and female.

"We began with a short prayer, then read a few verses of Scripture, and from one or from the whole, preached a sermon of twenty or twenty-five minutes' length; then added some memorable anecdote, when I had one to relate, then the service ended with a short prayer. I do not remember of it ever exceeding an hour, or having heard that any of the young people were tired. Since that period I have known several of those who attended having become Christians.

"I remember a young woman calling on me, that I might answer a letter her mother had just received from her son. 'At the time of my father's death,' said she, 'my brother was a very thoughtless young man. Instead of helping her, he sold every thing he could lay his hands on; after which, he left us, and became a sailor. He tells us, that afterwards he was pressed, and put on board the Barfeur, of ninety-eight guns; that some society had furnished him and others with a copy of the Scriptures,—which he had carefully read, and had thereby been brought to a conviction of the sinfulness of his past conduct, and repentance for it; that he had besought, and hoped he had obtained God's forgiveness, but he could not have peace till he had obtained his mother's also, for the great wrongs he had done her. He also solicited her advice.' It was that I might fulfil this last request, that she brought his letter to me. I wrote a letter, containing the best counsels I could offer, and sent it off to him, on board the Barfeur, at that time lying in Causand Bay. In about a fortnight I received a letter from eight sailors, including himself, who had all been affected in the same way, by reading the Word of God, and who often met together for reading and prayer; and they requested I should write a letter addressed to them all, as a united band, which I soon did, and sent off; but as the fleet had sailed on a cruize off the coast of France, I heard no more from them for perhaps three months, when a letter did come, from twenty-four sailors—to which number the little band had increased during the interval; and these expressed a desire that I should address a general letter to the whole; and if there was any particular book I would wish them to have, that I would mention it in the letter. They also informed me that a similar work had taken place on board the Thunderer, and the Terrible of seventy-four guns. I did address a letter to twenty-four, and said, that if the fleet should happen to put into Portsmouth, if any of them would call on the Rev. Dr Bogue, with my compliments, he would most readily do what he could for them; and knew of none more capable of giving advice.

"The peace with France in 1802, took place shortly after sending off this, and a great part of the way was paid off, and the seamen scattered in every direction; and I left Glasgow, so I never heard any more of the fruits of that charming display of the grace of God towards those poor sailors."

In the course of his studies at Glasgow, Mr Campbell occasionally itinerated, along with Mr Haldane, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in destitute parts of the country. He was requested, in 1802, by some of his attached friends in London, to visit the metropolis during the summer, that he might supply the Kingsland Chapel. It will be remembered that, several years before, when in London, he had preached at that chapel, and the impression which he then made had not been effaced. Many of the congregation were forward to him as their spiritual guide. While in Glasgow in 1799, Thomas Reyner, Esq., had written to him in these terms:—"We have been expecting and waiting for a minister to watch over us. Several have been proposed, but our way has never been clear hitherto. We are now of one heart and mind, and believe that the Lord has work for you here. We therefore say, 'Come and help us; and may the Spirit and presence of the Lord come with you!'"

In prosecuting his journey to London, to gratify the congregation of Kingsland Chapel, he spent a month in preaching the Gospel in different counties of England. As soon as he reached the metropolis, he renewed his acquaintance with his friends and correspondents, Mr Newton and Rowland Hill. He preached frequently for the latter, and helped him to correct some of the proof-sheets of his "Village Dialogues." The religious society in London he enjoyed much, particularly during the May meetings, which afforded him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with many of the most eminent ministers from all parts of the country. On the 1st of June, he left London and returned to Glasgow, spending some time by the way in investigating the religious state of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

After his return from the excitement of London in May, Mr Campbell resumed his studies under Mr Ewing; his teaching in Sabbath schools, and occasional preaching in the suburbs, particularly at Rutherglen. In the spring of 1803, he set out on a long preaching tour in the Highlands with Mr James Haldane; and in the autumn of the following year he prevailed on Mr Haldane to visit, along with him, the northern counties of England. Whilst the one preached in the large towns, the other went to the large villages, alternately. Their labours were accompanied with an evident blessing. A few months after this tour, Mr Campbell again visited London, and after supplying Kingsland Chapel for two months, a call was presented to him, to take the pastoral charge of the congregation. He was ordained in the beginning of 1804, and soon after he returned to Scotland, to settle his affairs before taking up his residence finally in the metropolis.

No sooner had Mr Campbell entered upon the new sphere of duty to which he was now called, than he set himself to devise plans for the spiritual benefit of his people. His attention was first directed to the instruction of the young. For their improvement, he set on foot "The Youth's Magazine;" a publication which has been blessed to the diffusion of much useful knowledge among a large mass of juvenile readers. Mr Campbell was editor of the first ten volumes; it was then committed to the charge of a small committee, who still continue to superintend it.

In the year 1805, though he had only been a few months in his new charge at Kingsland, Mr Campbell spent four months in a preaching tour throughout various parts of Scotland. Long as this journey was, he made another into the Western Highlands in the summer of the next year.

The period at which Mr Campbell settled in London was one of peculiar activity in the religious world, and he was therefore called upon to take a part in the formation of various associations for Christian and philanthropic purposes, which were then formed. He was one of the favoured few who were privileged to be the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of the London Hibernian Society, and of the Female Penitentiary. In every one of the religious movements of the time he took an active part. But while thus busily employed in promoting the best interests of his fellow-men, he had to betake himself to the drudgery of keeping a school at Kingsland, in order to procure a subsistence for his own support. The income derived from his congregation was small, and he found it necessary to resort to this expedient for the purpose of enlarging his income.

While thus discharging, at one and the same time, two laborious offices—those of a pastor and an instructor of youth—he was suddenly, and almost unexpectedly, called upon to occupy a very important work in connection with the London Missionary Society. That useful institution had been deprived, in the mysterious arrangements of Providence, of one of their most efficient agents in South Africa, the laborious and devoted Vanderkemp; and, in consequence of this melancholy event, both the Hottentot and Caffre Mission had been reduced to a very critical state. In these circumstances, the Society resolved to send out a representative to inspect the actual condition of their missions in South Africa, and make such arrangements as might be deemed most prudent. Mr Campbell was fixed upon to discharge this responsible office; and, after mature deliberation and earnest prayer for Divine direction and counsel, he consented to undertake the mission. Supply having been procured for his church at Kingsland and for his school, he was set apart to his new ministry in Miles' Lane Chapel. The venerable Dr Waugh presided on the occasion, and the charge which he delivered produced a most electrifying effect upon the audience. The closing sentences of the discourse were singularly beautiful. They ran thus:—

"Could I place the prophet Isaiah at the base of one of the lofty mountains in Africa, which you, my brother, are about to visit; and if, whilst gazing on its varied

scenery, an earthquake were to rock it upon its deep foundations, until, like the Numidian lion shaking the dew-drops of the land of Ham from his mane in the morning, it threw off from its hoary and heaving sides the forests, and flocks, and hamlets of huts, and cliffs crowned with lichens and lign-aloes; and were a whirlwind to rush in at that moment, scattering the broken and falling masses in mid air, as if playing with the sand-clouds and columns of the desert; still, the voice of the prophet, could it be heard amidst the convulsive war of elements, would exclaim, 'Though the everlasting mountains bow, and the perpetual hills be scattered, yet will I rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation!' Go, my brother, and do thou the same, whatever dangers you may meet in Africa. As God was with Vanderkemp, so will he be with thee, Campbell."

On uttering these words, the aged minister of Christ suddenly sat down, and buried his face in his hands. Under the influence of this striking appeal, Mr Campbell set sail for Africa on the 24th June 1812, in a ship bound for Calcutta. After a somewhat tedious voyage, he arrived at Cape-Town, Cape of Good Hope. It is unnecessary for us to detail the particulars of this visit to Africa, a narrative of which has been long in the hands of the public. Suffice it to say, that he minutely examined the various mission stations in South Africa, travelling about three thousand miles, in a savage country, amid dangers and difficulties of every kind. In the good providence of God, Mr Campbell was preserved in perfect health and safety, and arrived in London in the beginning of May 1814, after an absence from England of scarcely two years.

No sooner had he returned to London, than he resumed his labours both in the chapel and in the school. In all the public societies he took a warm interest, striving by his exertions and his prayers to advance the great cause in which he so much delighted. Little more than four years elapsed, however, when he again set sail for Africa on a similar errand as his former, accompanied by Dr Philip, an active and influential Independent minister from Aberdeen. This second visit to Africa seems to have been peculiarly gratifying to the mind of our traveller. The influence of missions in promoting the progress of civilization and refinement had become quite apparent. Where he had formerly found ignorance, and immorality, and savage cruelty, he was now refreshed with the sight of an educated, industrious, and happy people.

After an absence from England of about two years and a-half, Mr Campbell reached London in time for the May meetings of 1821. He was quite the lion of the day, and both in the metropolis and throughout the provinces his presence at missionary meetings created a great sensation. Multitudes flocked to hear his racy, humorous anecdotes of the Hottentots and Bushmen in South Africa. Even in his sermons, occasional allusions were made throughout the whole of his future life to his African travels. His popularity, however, produced no injurious effect upon him; he still continued the same modest, unpretending man he had always been.

Shortly after he had resumed his duties at Kingsland Chapel, he entered into the married state. This step, to all his friends, afforded much gratification, promising as it did to enhance his domestic happiness. He had hitherto lived with an aunt and a niece, who had been

which), which satisfies me that I could discover them also. Now,' said he, 'here was a way in which God concealed, or hid the treasure of his Word, that Julian, the apostate emperor, and other enemies of Christ who wished to extirpate the Gospel from the world, never would have thought of; and though they had, they never could have effected their destruction.'

When Mr Campbell had at length formed his resolution to serve God in the work of the ministry, he repaired to Glasgow, where he studied under the Rev. Greville Ewing, who had shortly before left the Established Church and joined the Independents. Here Mr Campbell's mind found ample scope for its exertion. Not only did he diligently prosecute his theological and classical studies, but "during all the time he was at Glasgow," we are informed by his biographer, "he was absorbed with the cause of Home and Foreign Missions, and keeping up his extensive correspondence, as well as preaching or teaching almost every day." His desire to do good was unbounded; and, as an instance, we may quote the following statement in his own language:—

"Soon after taking up my residence in that populous city, I proposed to have a similar institution there for the children of the rich, as I had in Edinburgh for two or three years before leaving it. The friends to whom I mentioned it gave me every encouragement to attempt it. Mrs Baillie, a zealous lady, whose house was in the very centre of the city, offered me the use of her large dining-room. The meeting was to be held from seven to eight every Monday evening.

"In the course of a month there was a stated congregation of fifty or sixty young ladies and gentlemen, with some of their parents, through the active exertions of several friends, both male and female.

"We began with a short prayer, then read a few verses of Scripture, and from one or from the whole, preached a sermon of twenty or twenty-five minutes' length; then added some memorable anecdote, when I had one to relate, then the service ended with a short prayer. I do not remember of it ever exceeding an hour, or having heard that any of the young people were tired. Since that period I have known several of those who attended having become Christians.

"I remember a young woman calling on me, that I might answer a letter her mother had just received from her son. 'At the time of my father's death,' said she, 'my brother was a very thoughtless young man. Instead of helping her, he sold every thing he could lay his hands on; after which, he left us, and became a sailor. He tells us, that afterwards he was pressed, and put on board the Barfeur, of ninety-eight guns; that some society had furnished him and others with a copy of the Scriptures,—which he had carefully read, and had thereby been brought to a conviction of the sinfulness of his past conduct, and repentance for it; that he had besought, and hoped he had obtained God's forgiveness, but he could not have peace till he had obtained his mother's also, for the great wrongs he had done her. He also solicited her advice.' It was that I might fulfil this last request, that she brought his letter to me. I wrote a letter, containing the best counsels I could offer, and sent it off to him, on board the Barfeur, at that time lying in Causand Bay. In about a fortnight I received a letter from eight sailors, including himself, who had all been affected in the same way, by reading the Word of God, and who often met together for reading and prayer; and they requested I should write a letter addressed to them all, as a united band, which I soon did, and sent off; but as the fleet had sailed on a cruise off the coast of France, I heard no more from them for perhaps three months, when a letter did come, from twenty-four sailors—to which number the little band had increased during the interval; and these expressed a desire that I should address a general letter to the whole; and if there was any particular book I would wish them to have, that I would mention it in the letter. They also informed me that a similar work had taken place on board the Thunderer, and the Terrible of seventy-four guns. I did address a letter to twenty-four, and said, that if the fleet should happen to put into Portsmouth, if any of them would call on the Rev. Dr Bogue, with my compliments, he would most readily do what he could for them; and knew of none more capable of giving advice.

"The peace with France in 1802, took place a short time after sending off this, and a great part of the navy was paid off, and the seamen scattered in every direction; and I left Glasgow, so I never heard any more of the fruits of that charming display of the grace of God towards those poor sailors."

In the course of his studies at Glasgow, Mr Campbell occasionally itinerated, along with Mr Haldane, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in destitute parts of the country. He was requested, in 1802, by some of his attached friends in London, to visit the metropolis during the summer, that he might supply at Kingsland Chapel. It will be remembered that, several years before, when in London, he had preached in that chapel, and the impression which he then made had not been effaced. Many of the congregation looked forward to him as their spiritual guide. While at Glasgow in 1799, Thomas Reyner, Esq., had written to him in these terms:—"We have been expecting and waiting for a minister to watch over us. Several have been proposed, but our way has never been clear hitherto. We are now of one heart and mind, and believe that the Lord has work for you here. We therefore say, 'Come and help us; and may the Spirit and presence of the Lord come with you!'"

In prosecuting his journey to London, to gratify the congregation of Kingsland Chapel, he spent a month in preaching the Gospel in different counties of England. As soon as he reached the metropolis, he renewed his acquaintance with his friends and correspondents, Mr Newton and Rowland Hill. He preached frequently for the latter, and helped him to correct some of the proof-sheets of his "Village Dialogues." The religious society in London he enjoyed much, more particularly during the May meetings, which afforded him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with many of the most eminent ministers from all parts of the country. On the 1st of June, he left London and returned to Glasgow, spending some time by the way in investigating the religious state of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

After his return from the excitement of London in May, Mr Campbell resumed his studies under Mr Ewing, his teaching in Sabbath schools, and occasional preaching in the suburbs, particularly at Rutherglen. In the spring of 1803, he set out on a long preaching tour in the Highlands with Mr James Haldane; and in the autumn of the following year he prevailed on Mr Haldane to visit, along with him, the northern counties of England. Whilst the one preached in the large towns, the other went to the large villages, alternately. Their labours were accompanied with an evident blessing. A few months after this tour, Mr Campbell again visited London, and after supplying Kingsland Chapel for two months, a call was presented to him, to take the pastoral charge of the congregation. He was ordained in the beginning of 1804, and soon after he returned to Scotland, to settle his affairs before taking up his residence finally in the metropolis.

No sooner had Mr Campbell entered upon the new sphere of duty to which he was now called, than he set himself to devise plans for the spiritual benefit of his people. His attention was first directed to the instruction of the young. For their improvement, he set on foot "The Youth's Magazine;" a publication which has been blessed to the diffusion of much useful knowledge among a large mass of juvenile readers. Mr Campbell was editor of the first ten volumes; it was then committed to the charge of a small committee, who still continue to superintend it.

In the year 1805, though he had only been a few months in his new charge at Kingsland, Mr Campbell spent four months in a preaching tour throughout various parts of Scotland. Long as this journey was, he made another into the Western Highlands in the summer of the next year.

The period at which Mr Campbell settled in London was one of peculiar activity in the religious world, and he was therefore called upon to take a part in the formation of various associations for Christian and philanthropic purposes, which were then formed. He was one of the favoured few who were privileged to be the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of the London Hibernian Society, and of the Female Penitentiary. In every one of the religious movements of the time he took an active part. But while thus busily employed in promoting the best interests of his fellow-men, he had to betake himself to the drudgery of keeping a school at Kingsland, in order to procure a subsistence for his own support. The income derived from his congregation was small, and he found it necessary to resort to this expedient for the purpose of enlarging his income.

While thus discharging, at one and the same time, two laborious offices—those of a pastor and an instructor of youth—he was suddenly, and almost unexpectedly, called upon to occupy a very important work in connection with the London Missionary Society. That useful institution had been deprived, in the mysterious arrangements of Providence, of one of their most efficient agents in South Africa, the laborious and devoted Vanderkemp; and, in consequence of this melancholy event, both the Hottentot and Caffre Mission had been reduced to a very critical state. In these circumstances, the Society resolved to send out a representative to inspect the actual condition of their missions in South Africa, and make such arrangements as might be deemed most prudent. Mr Campbell was fixed upon to discharge this responsible office; and, after mature deliberation and earnest prayer for Divine direction and counsel, he consented to undertake the mission. Supply having been procured for his church at Kingsland and for his school, he was set apart to his new ministry in Miles' Lane Chapel. The venerable Dr Waugh presided on the occasion, and the charge which he delivered produced a most electrifying effect upon the audience. The closing sentences of the discourse were singularly beautiful. They ran thus:—

"Could I place the prophet Isaiah at the base of one of the lofty mountains in Africa, which you, my brother, are about to visit; and if, whilst gazing on its varied

scenery, an earthquake were to rock it upon its deep foundations, until, like the Numidian lion shaking the dew-drops of the land of Ham from his mane in the morning, it threw off from its hoary and heaving sides the forests, and flocks, and hamlets of huts, and cliffs crowned with lichens and lign-aloës; and were a whirlwind to rush in at that moment, scattering the broken and falling masses in mid air, as if playing with the sand-clouds and columns of the desert; still, the voice of the prophet, could it be heard amidst the convulsive war of elements, would exclaim, 'Though the everlasting mountains bow, and the perpetual hills be scattered, yet will I rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation!' Go, my brother, and do thou the same, whatever dangers you may meet in Africa. As God was with Vanderkemp, so will he be with thee, Campbell."

On uttering these words, the aged minister of Christ suddenly sat down, and buried his face in his hands. Under the influence of this striking appeal, Mr Campbell set sail for Africa on the 24th June 1812, in a ship bound for Calcutta. After a somewhat tedious voyage, he arrived at Cape-Town, Cape of Good Hope. It is unnecessary for us to detail the particulars of this visit to Africa, a narrative of which has been long in the hands of the public. Suffice it to say, that he minutely examined the various mission stations in South Africa, travelling about three thousand miles, in a savage country, amid dangers and difficulties of every kind. In the good providence of God, Mr Campbell was preserved in perfect health and safety, and arrived in London in the beginning of May 1814, after an absence from England of scarcely two years.

No sooner had he returned to London, than he resumed his labours both in the chapel and in the school. In all the public societies he took a warm interest, striving by his exertions and his prayers to advance the great cause in which he so much delighted. Little more than four years elapsed, however, when he again set sail for Africa on a similar errand as his former, accompanied by Dr Philip, an active and influential Independent minister from Aberdeen. This second visit to Africa seems to have been peculiarly gratifying to the mind of our traveller. The influence of missions in promoting the progress of civilization and refinement had become quite apparent. Where he had formerly found ignorance, and immorality, and savage cruelty, he was now refreshed with the sight of an educated, industrious, and happy people.

After an absence from England of about two years and a-half, Mr Campbell reached London in time for the May meetings of 1821. He was quite the lion of the day, and both in the metropolis and throughout the provinces his presence at missionary meetings created a great sensation. Multitudes flocked to hear his racy, humorous anecdotes of the Hottentots and Bushmen in South Africa. Even in his sermons, occasional allusions were made throughout the whole of his future life to his African travels. His popularity, however, produced no injurious effect upon him; he still continued the same modest, unpretending man he had always been.

Shortly after he had resumed his duties at Kingsland Chapel, he entered into the married state. This step, to all his friends, afforded much gratification, promising as it did to enhance his domestic happiness. He had hitherto lived with an aunt and a niece, who had been both of them remarkably attentive and kind. His aunt, however, having died, and his niece being comfortably married, he felt himself compelled to take refuge in the matrimonial state. When Mr Campbell had gratified the country at large by his African visits, he was applied to by the Missionary Society to visit in the same way their Polynesian Missions. This proposal, however, he declined, at least for the present. Now settled at home, he set himself to an abridgement of his African Travels, in two small volumes, for the Tract Society, adding to them a similar volume, giving an account of his voyages. A small unpretending, but useful, little book followed, entitled "African Light;" the object of which was to illustrate passages of Scripture, by a reference to his own observations in South Africa. The work is in small compass, but it illustrates no fewer than five hundred passages in the Sacred Volume.

Notwithstanding the laborious life through which he passed, Mr Campbell enjoyed remarkably good health until he was nearly seventy years of age. At that period, however, he began to decline. His medical attendant recommended a visit to Scotland. This was productive of much good, and he returned so improved in health, as to resume his usual duties. A change was now perceptible in his pulpit discourses as well as in his private conversation. He was evidently ripening for heaven. An account of his last days is thus given by his colleague and successor, the Rev. T. Ayleing:—

"From 1821, up to the time of his removal from earth, he remained with his people, gathering around him a band of friends who loved him, and now mourn his departure from their midst. Their attachment towards him was evinced by the institution of an evening lecture, to relieve him from a third service, which continued until within the last two years. Some time before that, a proposition was made that permanent help should be afforded him by a co-pastor. To this he most cheerfully assented, desiring to see his people fixed with a successor before he died. Arrangements to that effect were made, and a co-pastor was obtained. When this had been done, he seemed to turn his thoughts more than ever towards his Father's home, and the language of his heart was, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.' He saw a prosperous Church and a united people; and was permitted to witness the accomplishment of an object which of late had much engaged his thoughts—the choice of three additional deacons, to assist the venerable and esteemed brethren who had grown grey in their Master's service.

"It now remains for me to give you a very brief account of the last few days of his life.

"For six months past he had been visibly declining, and his whole deportment evinced increasing spirituality of mind in an eminent degree. During that time he had been much engaged in writing the memorials of the chief events of his life; and the exercise often cheered him, as it carried him back in memory to the scenes of his childhood, and the friends of his youth and riper years.

"The declining state of his health, to which I have alluded as visible during the last six months, did not assume any alarming appearance until the second week in March. He was present at the united sacrament of the three Churches, when he presided. This was his last public service. There was an unction about his address, which struck most of his people, as did the last discourse he delivered, on the first Sabbath evening in the month; but there were also indications of extreme debility, which were remarked by many, and a fear expressed that they should see his face no more.

■ We are happy to learn that a new and improved edition of this work is in the press.

"On Thursday, March 12th, he felt very ill, and wrote for advice to his medical friend, Dr Conquest, who kindly and promptly attended to his request. He rallied a little before Sunday, and although much pressed to remain at home, he attended public worship in the morning, fearing, he said, 'lest his flock should be alarmed about him.' That service was the last at which he was present.

"The following week his debility again returned, and gradually increased; and I believe he had then a kind of presentiment that he would not recover. I enjoyed many conversations with him during his illness, and noted down some of his expressions as he gave them utterance. They were indicative of extreme self-abasement, and humble reliance on the Saviour of sinners.

"I told him his people prayed very earnestly and affectionately for him. The tears came into his eyes, and he said, 'O sir! I need it, I need it; I am a poor creature.' He said his mind was much harassed by Satan, who told him he had not done half what he ought for his Master; and when I said, Depend upon it, sir, he would have been very glad if you had not done half what you have, he replied, 'Ah! but I have not done what I could.' Such were the low views he entertained of his labours in the service of Christ. This harassment, however, which, in a great measure, was attributable to his infirm state of body, speedily ceased.

"On one occasion, speaking of the preciousness of the Saviour, he said, 'Oh! I love to be near the blood of sprinkling; and talked in an animated manner of the happiness drawn from the consideration of the unchangeableness of Christ. 'All I want,' said he, after we had been speaking of the Saviour's atonement, 'is to feel my arm round the cross.' I told him I doubted not it was, and asked him if his heart was not there. He smiled, and said, 'Yes.' I told him, then, that I believed that his arm was too, although a little numb with grasping hard. He smiled again, and then spoke of the wonderful love of God, in saving sinners by such a sacrifice as that of his Son.

"On Wednesday, April 1st, he took to his bed; and on my saying to him, when I visited him, that I hoped he was happy, he turned to me, and said, 'The debt is all paid; the sufferings of Christ have discharged it, and therefore I am free, and have peace with God.' From this time not a cloud obscured his mind. He steadily declined towards the grave, but nothing hung around his setting sun, or cast a shadow upon his hopes for the future.

"On his death-bed he was not forgetful of his ministerial character; for, addressing a beloved friend who stood by his side, he said, calling her by name, 'Oh! mind your soul.'

"When asked if he believed he should go to heaven, he said, 'I have no doubt of it.' Broken sentences repeatedly fell from his lips, such as, 'A full and free salvation,'—'How softly the waters flow;' most probably referring to his departure from earth, of which he was at intervals, during the last two days, quite conscious. When his mind a little wandered, he talked of Africa, and missionary meetings, and friends with whom he had been associated in them.

"April 3d, when I stood by his bed, he recognized me, and said affectionately, alluding to our association in the ministry, 'We have served as a father and a son in the Gospel. Now God will be a Father to you.'

"The following day, on which he died, I saw him in the morning, and, leaning over him, I heard him whisper, 'You see me in peace.' These were the last words I heard from his lips. During the day, while his beloved wife was standing by his side, for a short time consciousness returned, and recognizing her, he said, 'Don't grieve; there's nothing melancholy in dying and going to glory.'

"In the course of the day he was heard exclaiming, 'Let it fly! let the Gospel fly!'—the spirit of the minister and the missionary of Christ remaining to the last. Among his last coherent sentences was a prayer for his people and their junior pastor. 'Lord bless the Church,' he exclaimed, 'and poor Mr Aveling.'

"At a quarter past six in the evening of Saturday, it was evident that life was ebbing fast, and his friends were summoned to his bed-side to witness his departure. It was a sacred scene; the spirit of a good and truly great man was about to bid farewell to its earthly abode, and return to the God who gave it. To all, such an hour must be one of deep solemnity and momentous interest; to him, it was the hour of triumphant joy. The sun had just set, and the last gleams of light, struggling through the window, fell upon his bed. There was a sweet smile passing over his countenance as the curtain was removed; and as the attendant bent down over him, he drew two or three short and rapid breaths, and then lay motionless and silent. Again he breathed quickly and smiled; then heaved a gentle sigh, and all was still once more. It was the stillness of death. In the hush of evening his happy spirit had passed away. 'Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.'"

Thus died this excellent and useful minister of Christ on the 4th April 1840, at the advanced age of seventy-four. His loss was deeply felt by his congregation, his friends, and family. Few men have been honoured to be more extensively useful in their day and generation. Most disinterested and generous, he kept his eye singly fixed on the promotion of his Redeemer's glory. To accomplish this grand object, he counted no sacrifice too great to be made—no trials too heavy to be endured—no expense of time, of money, or of personal exertion, too costly to be surrendered. He lived for Christ, and having finished his work, he sweetly fell asleep in Jesus.

THE ARMY OF THE COVENANTERS ON DUNSE-LAW.

We are happy, in presenting our readers with the following spirited extract from Principal Baillie's Letters and Journals, to announce the publication of a new and complete edition of this valuable work. Its appearance at the present time is peculiarly seasonable; and the elegant manner in which the volumes are got up, as well as the accurate and careful manner in which the work is edited, do credit alike to the editor and publisher. We trust both will meet with all the encouragement from the public which their exertions so richly deserve.

It would have done yow good to have casten your eyes ahort our brave and rich Hill, as oft I did, with great contentment and joy, for I (quoth the wren) was there among the rest, being chosen preacher by the gentlemen of our shyre, who came late with my Lord of Eglintoun. I furnished to half a dozen of good fellows musquets and picks, and to my boy a broadsword. I carried my self, as the fashion was, a sword, and a couple of Dutch pistols at my saddle; but I promise, for the offence of no man, except a robber in the way; for it was our part alone to pray and preach for the incouragement of our countrymen, which I did to my power most cheerfullie. Our Hill was garnished on the toppes, towards the south and east, with our mounted cannon, well bear to the number of fortie, great and small. Our regiments lay on the aydes of the Hill, almost round about: the place was not a myle in circle, a pretty round rysing in a declivitie, without steepness, to the height of a bowshot; on the toppes somewhat playns; about a quarter of a myle in length, and as much in breadth, as I remember, capable of tents for fortie thousand men. The crowners lay in keennous [canvass] lodges, high and wyde; their captains about them in lesser ones; the sojourns about all in hutts of timber, covered with divott or straw. Our crowners for the most part were noblemen; Rotbes, Lindesay, Sinclair, had among them two full regiments at leist from Fyfe; Balcarras, a horse troupe; Lowdoun, Montgomerie, Areskine, Boyd, Fleming, Kircudbright, Yester, Dalhousie, Eglintoun, Cassilie, and others, either with whole or half regiments. Montrose's regiment was above fifteen hundred men in the Castle of Edinburgh: himself was expected; but what detained him ye shall hear at once. Argyll was sent for to the treatie of peace; for without him none would mint to treat; he came, and sett up his tent in the Hill; bot few of his people with him. It was thought meet that he and his should lie about Stirling, in the heart of the cuntry, to be alwayes readie in subsidies for unexpected accidents; to be a terror to our neutralists, or bot masked friends; to make all, without dinn, march forward, leist his unkannie trowesmen should light on to call them up in their rear; alwayes to have an eye what either the north, or the shippes, or the west, or our stail host should mister of help. It was thought the cuntry of England was more afraid for the barbarietie of his Highlanders than of any other terror; these of the English that came to visit our camp, did gaze much with admiration upon these couple fellows, with their playds, targes, and dorlachs. There was some companies of them under Captaine Buchanan, and others in Areskine's regiment. Our captains, for the most part, barons or gentlemen of good note; our lieutenants almost all sojourns who had served over sea in good charges; everie companie had, lying at the captaine's tent-doore, a brave new colour stamped with the Scottish Armes, and this ditton, ROX CHRIST'S CROWN AND COVENANT, in golden letters. Our Generall had a brave royall tent; bot it was not sett up; his constant guard was some hundreds of our lawiers, musqueteers, under Durie and Hope's* command, all the way standing in good armes, with cocked matches, before his gate, well apparelled. He lay at the foot of the hill in the Castle, with Baylis his serjeant-major, or lieutenant-generall. That place was destinate for Almond,† in whose wisdom and valour we had bot too much confidence; yet in the tyme of our most need, the grievousness of his gravell, or the pretence of it, made him goe to France to be cutted; alwayes when he came there, it was found he needed not incision, so he past to his charge in Holland, where to us he was as dead in all our dangers.

The counsellis of warre were keaped dailie in the Castle; the ecclesiastick meetings in Rotbes's large tent. The Generall, with Baylis, came nightly for the setting of the [watch] on their horses. Our sojourns were all lustie and full of courage; the most of them stout young plewmen; great cheerfullness in the face of all; the onlie difficultie was, to gett them dollors or two the man, for their voyage from home, and the tyme they entered in pay; for among our yeomen, money at any tyme, let be then, uses to be verie scarce; bot once having entered on the common pay, their sixpence a-day, they were galliard. None of our gentlemen was any thing worse of lying some weeke together in their * Sir Alexander Gibson of Durie, and Sir Thomas Hope, two distinguished lawyers.

† Sir James Livingston, second son of Alexander Earl of Linlithgow, was created Lord Livingston of Almond in 1653, and Earl of Callendar in 1661.

cloake and boots on the ground, or standing all night in armes in the greatest storme. Whyles, through storme of weather, and neglect of the commissaries, our bread would be too long in coming, which made some of the Eastland sojourns half-mutinie; bot at once order being taken for our victualls from Edinburgh, East-Louthian, and the cuntry about us, we were answered better than we could have been at home. Our meanest sojourns was alwayes served in wheat-bread, and a goat would have gotten them a lamb-legge, which was a daintie world to the most of them. There had been ane extraordinarie crope in that cuntry the former year, besyde abundance which still was stollen away to the English campe for great pryces; we would have feared no inlake for little money in some moneths to come. Marche and Tevidaille are the best mixt and most plentiful shryres both for grasse and corn, for fleshes and bread, in all our land. We were much obliged to the Toun of Edinburgh for moneyes: Harie Rollock, by his sermons, moved them to shake out their purses; the garnerers of non-covenanters, especiallie of James Maxwell and my Lord Wintoun, gave us plentie of wheat. One of our ordinaunces was to sease on the rents of non-covenanters; for we thought it bot reasonable, frae they syded with these who put our lives and our lands for ever to selle, for the defence of our church and cuntry, to employ for that cause (wherein their interesse was as great as ours, if they would be Scottish-men) a part of their rent for one year: bot for all that, few of them did incur any losse by that our decreit, for the peace prevented the execution.

Our sojourns grew in experience of armes, in courage, in favour dailie; everie one encouraged another; the sight of the nobles and their beloved pastors dailie raised their hearts; the good sermons and prayers, morning and even, under the roof of heaven, to which their drumms did call them for bells; the remonstrances verie frequent of the goodness of their cause; of their conduct hitherto, by a hand clearlie divine; also Leslie, his skill and fortoun made them all so resolute for battell as could be wished. We were feared that emulation among our nobles might have done harme, when they should be mett in the fields; bot such was the wisdom and authoritie of that old, little, crooked souldier, that all, with ane incredible submission, from the beginning to the end, gave over themselves to be guided by him, as if he had been Great Solymán. Certainlie the obedience of our Nobles to that man's advyces was as great as their forbears wont to be to their King's commands; yet that was the man's understanding of our Scott's humours, that gave out, not onlie to the nobles, bot to verie mean gentlemen, his directions in a verie homelie and simple forme, as if they had been bot the advyces of their neighbour and companion; for, as he rightlie observed, a difference would be used in commanding sojourns of fortune, and of sojourns voluntars, of which kind the most part of our camp did stand. He kept dailie in the Castle of Dunc, ane honourable table for the nobles and strangers with himself, for gentlemen waiters thereafter, at a long side table. I had the honour, by accident, one day to be his chaplaine at table, on his left hand; the fare was as became a Generall in tyme of warre; not so curious be farr as Arundall's to our nobles; bot ye know that the English sumtuositie, both in warr and peace, is despised by all their neighbours. It seemes our Generall's table was on his own charge; for, so farr as yet I know, neither he, nor any noble or gentleman of considerable rent, got any thing for their charge. Well I know that Eglintoun, our crowner, intertained all the gentlemen of note that were with him at his own table, all the tyme of our abode; and his sonne, Montgomerie, kept with him verie oft the chief of his regiments; for this was a voyage wherein we were glad to bestow our lyves let be our estate.

Had ye lent your eare in the morning, or especiallie at even, and heard in the tents the sound of some singing psalms, some praying, and some reading Scripture, ye would have been refreshed; true, there was swearing, and cursing, and brawling, in some quarters, wherest we were grieved; bot we hoped, if our camp had been a little settled, to have gotten some way for these disorders; for all of any fashion did regrait, and all did promise to contribute ther best endeavours for helping all abuses. For myself, I never fand my minde in better temper than it was all that tyme frae I came from home, till my head was again homeward; for I was as a man who had taken my leave from the world, and was resolved to die in that service without returne. I fand the favour of God shyneing upon me, and a sweet, meek, humble, yet strong and vehement spirit leading me all along: bot I was no sooner in my way westward, after the conclusion of peace, than my old securitie returned.

A WORD TO THE WEARY:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES HAMILTON,

Minister of the National Scotch Church, Regent, Square, London.

"The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary."—ISAIAH, L. 4.

Who is this, to whom the Lord hath given "the tongue of the learned?" From the sixth verse we find that it is he who "gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair,"—it is the Lord Jesus, in his mediatorial capacity. And what was the "word in season," which Jesus spake to the weary? You will find a specimen in Matt. xi. 28,—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." And believing that it will be a word appropriate to many here, we would send round the invitation to three classes of weary men:—

1. Are there any weary worldlings here? The soul of man once found its rest in God. In those days it would not have understood such an invitation as this; for it was never weary. Weary, was a word unknown in the language of Eden; for Jehovah was then the spirit's home—God was its resting-place. Its affections reposed upon the all-sufficient God. He was a friend of whose company the soul could never tire, and in whose service it never could grow weary. But now that the soul has taken leave of God, it has never found another rest like him. It wants a rest, but it cannot find it. I have seen a poor blind worm on the top of a wall, running along the coping, and then halting, and lifting its head, and exploring all round, as if in search of something; and then resuming its race, running along again in evident anxiety,—stopping on the margin,—feeling all about it—disappointed—running on again. And I have seen such a worm on the top of a slender pole, stretching every ring of its fragile form, and groping all round in vacant space—tingling with impatience to climb higher; but doomed to stop there. It was a caterpillar, whom a rough wind had shaken from the green tree where it was quietly feeding. When it found itself on the hard ground, it wandered about "in dry places, seeking rest, and finding none," till it reached the bottom of this wall—the foot of this pole—and then it climbed. But you see it has made nothing of it. The green-painted pole, the brick and mortar wall, is a very different thing from the leafy tree it used to live in. Poor creature!—it is hungry; and the reason why it runs along, and stretches upward so anxiously, is, if haply it may find the juicy foliage it once fed upon. It will never find it there. Up among the branches of the Tree of Life man once had his home, his resting-place—and there he fed sweetly; but a rough storm of temptation shook him down: and now he runs about among the "dry places, seeking rest, and finding none." And you will sometimes find him—poor grovelling worm!—fallen man!—trying to better himself by climbing up some painted pole; and once he gains its top, you will see him exploring blindly round in emptiness; feeling for some higher object on which to rest—some green thing for his hungry soul to feed on; pivoting and balancing himself, and stretching outward and upward. But the tree of life is not there.

Worldly men, tell me true—Do you not sometimes detect yourselves doing this? You are fallen—fallen from God—fallen from happiness; but you wish to right yourselves. You want to get back to happiness; but you do not want to go back to God. You are ambitious—you climb the pole; you want to be counted wise—learned—clever; and so you are. People give you credit as a knowing man; but as long as you do not know a reconciled God, your learning does not make you happy. It sets you higher than your fellow-worms, that crawl upon the clay; but it does not plant you in the tree of life. Your soul still hath appetite; and even from the airy pinnacle of science you still feel round in vacancy for that soul-filling good you cannot find. You run along the coping; you are very diligent in search of joy—you run hither and thither in quest of it. You run to diversions,—to music-rooms—to evening parties—to all places of amusement. So set are you on mirth, that perhaps you look occasionally into the theatre, to find it there; and though conscience may hint that you are hiring poor wretches to undo themselves for your diversion—what although? you must have your amusement. And what does it all come to? If you were so happy last night, why so wretched this morning? Why that languor when you rose? Why so heartless that you almost felt yourself without a motive? Why those exclamations of disappointment at this weary world? Why yawning, as if you would pour out your very soul? Why, when you were so bright and joyous among strangers last night, why so cross and sullen to your brothers and sisters, to your wife and children, this morning? You call your own way of it, "Enjoying life." I wish with all my heart that you did enjoy life—and then your families would enjoy you; but in order to enjoy life, you must enjoy God: and the way you live shows plainly that you have not hurrying to and fro o

the wall, whilst the yonder.

Till it comes to liv soul of man never wil
as you were passing a worm we were speaki attempts and uneasy
on it; you knew ene
what was good for fo
you saw the very appl which it must have fe
a leaf, and carried it tree, and put it hig
where it would soon per food. If you ever caterpillar, you just di to a poor weary wor almost tired of living sang in the hedge-row was happier than he;
table—because, if it w it guilty. The Lord choosing strangling r compassion on it—ha
will give thee rest."
own wonder, found th
it. In search of joy i
"dry places" no mor
hand of a meek and lo
dreary "high places," branches of the Tree
long-sought resting-pl
ciled God. Ye worl
through a godless w withered hearts, seek come to Jesus, and H

2. Are there any w pardoned guilt?—Fe
head which refuses t few who cannot blus not redder if their mi fellow-men. But you reason. Your secret into the light of God's look up, but you see direct upon you. He the light of his count insincerity, your dish bitterness, your uncha impure thoughts, and not look up, but you
He has brought your Sabbaths you have pr
in which you have mir which you have wilfu of grey-haired parent hearts that you hav worse) the hearts yo has reminded you of broken vows, and pres has bound together, an den too heavy for you.

in that heavy burden—your ungodliness, your contempt of God, your aversion to God. This is your burden: to think that all these sins are yours—that they are all unpardoned—that they all are hell-deserving. No wonder you cannot look up. No wonder that trembling seizes you at times. No wonder that, when you think upon them, such confusion covers you, that you would fain creep into the earth to hide you from the terror of God's majesty.

But you must look up; if not as high as an absolute God, you must, at least, look as high as to Jesus nailed upon the tree. If you cannot lift your eyes as high as Calvary, the burden which now bows you to the dust will sink you in despair, and from despair to hell. The repugnance God has for sin is very great. No words can express it. But the love he bears to righteousness is equally great. And of all righteousness, there is none he loves so well as the righteousness of Christ. It is dear to him, because it is divine. But it is also dear to him for another reason. He who wrought that righteousness stands related to him as no creature does. The Author of surety-righteousness, is God's own Son. And because he loves his Son with a surpassing love—a complacency and intensity of affection very different from the love he bears for the highest seraph—a love which highest seraphs do not grudge, for they know that He who is its object is infinitely worthier,—just as God the Father loves his own Son with a surpassing love, even so he loves the righteousness of his own Son with a love unutterable. Dear in God's sight is the blood which moistened the dust of Calvary; for it was the blood of his own Son. Dear in God's sight was that scrupulous obedience to each iota of the holy law which, for three and thirty years, Jesus kept rendering; for it was the obedience of his own dear Son. Dear in God's sight was that painful homage to a broken law which a suffering Saviour rendered, in all his bitterest pangs, down to that latest, when he said, "It is finished," and justice did not gainsay; for the sufferings were those of his best-beloved—his own Son. Emmanuel hath so magnified and made honourable the law, that the Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake—so well pleased, that if that righteousness be yours, the law will not challenge you, and God will not condemn you. Precious in God's sight was the death of his own Son; and precious will your death be the day you die to sin, and begin to live with Christ in you, the hope of glory; and precious will your death be the day you fall asleep in Jesus—wrapped round in surety-righteousness. Now, weary and heavy-laden sinner, it is to a share in this righteousness that the Lord Jesus invites you.

If you see this, your heart will rejoice. You remember when Christian had panted up the hill, and came in sight of the Cross, how his burden fell off and rolled away down into the sepulchre; and you remember how he wondered that the sight of a cross should instantly relieve him of his load: "Then was Christian glad and lightsome, and said with a merry voice, He hath given me rest by his sorrow, and life by his death." Comply with this seasonable invitation, and come to Christ upon the Cross, and you will understand the pilgrim's wonder; for your burden will, in like manner, fall off and disappear.

3. Are there any wearied with the greatness of their way?—Perhaps you are concerned about salvation, and perhaps you have had some concern for a great while past. You have been long seeking salvation, but you fear that you have not found it yet. You would like much that you saw more hopeful appearances in yourself. You have looked forward to communion seasons and special ordinances, in the hope that a blessing might be sent you then—something that would lift you above your habitual worldliness, and give more elevation and heavenliness to your character. You would fain have peace in believing, and you are persuaded that you would have it if you saw better symptoms in yourself. You would go to the Saviour, if you saw such improvement in yourself as might warrant you to go; but this is what you do not see. You were somewhat anxious years ago, and you are only somewhat anxious still. You see no more warrant in yourself for going to Christ now, than you ever saw.

This is very possible—for if you ever go to Christ, it will not be because you see a warrant in yourself; but because you see grace and truth in him, and sin and unworthiness in yourself. You seem to think that Christ is afar off, and that it is by a long approach and laborious preparation, that you are to find him. Now, if he were afar off, no heavy laden sinner would ever reach him. If he were a distant Saviour, his words would not be words in season to him that is weary. He is very near—far nearer than many anxious sinners think.

Suppose that one of these winter evenings you went down into the country on a visit to a friend. It is a dark night when the stage coach stops; the conductor steps down, opens the door, and lets you out. He tells you that your friend's house is hard by, and if the night were a little clearer, you would see it just over the way. "Tis but a step. You cannot miss it." However you contrive to miss it. Your guide springs up into the box—the long train of lamp light is lost in misty gloom, and the distant rumble of the wheels is drowned in the rush of the tempest. You are left alone. The directions you received were quite correct, and if you followed them implicitly, you could not go wrong. But you have a theory of the matter in your own mind. 'What did he mean by saying, that it was just a step? He cannot live so very near the highway.' You pass the gate, and plod away up the hill, till at last you become impatient—for there are no symptoms of a dwelling here. You turn aside into this lane, and you climb over that stile, till weary with plashing through miry stubble fields, and all drenched with driving rain, you find yourself, after many a weary round, precisely where you started. Half dead with fatigue and vexation, you lift the latch of a cottage-door, and ask if they know where such a one resides. And a little child undertakes to guide you. He opens a wicket, and points to the long lines of light gleaming through a casement a few paces distant. "Do you see the lights in yon window? Well, that is it; knock, and they'll open the door."

In such a homely instance, you all know what it is to be weary in the greatness of your way—to spend your strength in a long circuit, when a single step might have sufficed. But are you sure that it is not in some such way, that you "labour and find no rest," whilst there is but a step betwixt you and the soul's "quiet rest;" betwixt you and Christ? He is not afar from any one of us, and yet thousands pass him by, and among the rest many who are anxious about salvation. They wish to deserve him. They wish to be better prepared for receiving him. They even wish to be more anxious before they go to him.

Now, that is the wisest and happiest course which the sinner can take—to go at once to the Saviour. Had you been present when he said, "come to me," would you have felt bound to wait till you had laboured,—spent your strength for nought some time longer, and till you were "laden" with heavier guilt, or more burdensome convictions? Or would you not have chosen to arise at once and go? That invitation proved a word in season to at least one weary soul.* It would seem that one heard it, of whom we are told no more than that "she was a woman which was a sinner." But her sin was her burden. She never doubted Christ's sincerity. She went to him. She found him in the house of Simon the Pharisee. It does not appear that she spoke a single word; but her tears spoke for her, and Christ did not need to be told her errand. They were all reclining at table when she entered; but passing by Simon and his pompous guests, this poor penitent took her stand behind Jesus, weeping,—for the sight of this friend of sinners opened the flood gates of her grief anew. And as the warm tears fell upon his feet, and she wiped them away with the long tresses of her hair, and then poured over them the fragrant balsam from her alabaster box, the prim and supercilious Pharisees looked on with amazement and contempt. "Had he been a prophet he would have spurned her away. He would have known who this is that toucheth him, for she is a sinner." It was because he was a prophet that he was so glad to see her, and because he was more than a prophet, that he made her so glad by saying, "Thy sins are forgiven." This was one of the weary ones to whom he was charged with a word in season. This was just the sight which Jesus loved to see. He had no pleasure in looking at Simon, and his pompous guests, with all the folly of self-ignorance, and all the pride of a rotten, though white-washed morality, disdaining this contrite transgressor. But he had pleasure in her broken heart, for it was a heart which love to himself and hatred of sin had broken. To him, the sobs of this weeping penitent were sweeter music than the harp and the viol of Simon's banqueting room; and the tears that flowed from grief and gratitude together, were to him more precious than the ointment which she herself had poured forth.

Jesus has gone back to heaven, and you cannot now watch the dwelling where he enters, and follow him in thither, and with a broken box of ointment and a broken heart, fall at his feet. But he is as truly here as he was in Simon's house that night, and you may go to him as truly as that sinful woman went. And if you go, you will meet the same reception. His bosom is as full of tenderness as ever: his lips as full of grace, and his tongue as learned to speak that word in season to the weary,—"Be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee."

LONGING TO BE WITH CHRIST.

My gracious Redeemer I love,
His praises aloud I'll proclaim;
And join with the armies above
To shout his adorable name:
To gaze on his glories divine,
Shall be my eternal employ—
To feel them incessantly shine,
My boundless ineffable joy.

He freely redeemed, with his blood,
My soul from the confines of hell;
To live on the smiles of my God—
In his presence and glory to dwell;
To shine with the angels of light;
With saints and with seraphs to sing;
To view with eternal delight,
My Jesus, my Saviour, my King.

In Meshech, as yet, I reside,—
A darksome and restless abode!
Molested with foes on each side,
And longing to dwell with my God:
Oh! when shall my spirit exchange
This cell of corruptible clay,
For mansions celestial, and range
Through realms of ineffable day?

My glorious Redeemer! I long
To see thee descend on the cloud,
Amid the bright, numberless throng,
And mix with the triumphant crowd:
Oh! when wilt thou bid me ascend,
To join in thy praises above;
To gaze on thee, world without end,
And feast on thy ravishing love?

Nor sorrow, nor sickness, nor pain,
Nor sin, nor temptation, nor fear,
Shall ever molest me again;—
Perfection of glory reigns there:
This soul and this body shall shine
In robes of salvation and praise;
And banquet on pleasures divine,
Where God his full beauty displays.

Ye palaces, sceptres, and crowns,
Your pride with disdain I survey!

* See Doddridge's Harmony, where Luke vi. 36 is made the continuation of Matt. xii. 30.

Your pomps are but shadows and sounds,
 And pass in a moment away:
 The crown that my Saviour bestows
 Yon permanent sun shall outline:
 My joy everlastingly flows—
 My God, my Redeemer, is mine!

B. FRANCIS.

THE PRESENT POPULATION OF JERUSALEM.

FROM Dr Robinson's "Researches in Palestine" we extract the following statement, which is the most recent that has been published:—

"After careful inquiry, the information which we found most worthy to be relied upon amounted to the following:—1. The Muhammedans are reckoned in the government books at 750 men, but amount really to 1100. This gives at the utmost a round number of 4500. 2. Of the Jews only 500 males are enrolled; but there are actually many more. According to the careful estimate of the Rev. Mr Nicolayson, who has a better opportunity of judging than any other person, the whole number of the Jews at this time was about 3000. In former years the number had sometimes amounted to 5000. 3. Christians. The Greeks are reckoned by the government at 400, but are actually 460; the Latins at 260; the Armenians at 130: total, 850 males, indicating a population of about 3500 in all. Hence,

Muhammedans	4,500
Jews	3,000
Christians	3,500

Total population . . . . . 11,000

If to this we add something for possible omissions, and for the inmates of the convents, the standing population of the city, exclusive of the garrison, cannot well be reckoned at over 11,500 souls. The Muhammedans, it will be seen, are more numerous than either the Jews or Christians alone, but fewer in number than these two bodies united." Upon this a note says:—

"I have more recently learned (Oct. 1840) that some of our friends in Jerusalem, on the strength of later information, have been led to estimate the number of the Muhammedans at about 1500 higher, or 6000 in all; and the Jews at 7000, according to the reported enumeration obtained by Sir Moses Montefiore in A.D. 1839. This would give for the whole population of the city about 17,000 souls. But I have yet to learn that the new sources of information as to the Muhammedans were more correct than ours. As to the Jews, the enumeration in question was made out by themselves, in the expectation of receiving a certain amount of alms for every name returned. It is, therefore, obvious, that they here had as strong a motive to exaggerate their number, as they often have in other circumstances to underrate it. Besides, this number of 7000 rests merely on report; Sir Moses himself has published nothing on the subject; nor could his agent in London afford me any information so late as Nov. 1840. The Scottish deputation of clergymen in 1839, as I learned from some of its members, estimated the Jews in Jerusalem at 5000 souls; while Mr Calmon, who accompanied them, himself a converted Jew, still supposed them not to exceed 3000 in all. The estimate of the British consul at Beirut, who makes the whole population of Jerusalem only 10,000, is, on the other hand, certainly too low.

"Of all this native population, as well as throughout Syria and Egypt, the Arabic is the vernacular language; as much so as the English in London, or the French in Paris. The Jews are, for the most part, not natives of the country, and speak a corrupt medley of tongues among themselves. Among the other foreigners, the Greek, Armenian, and Italian languages are also found; but whosoever desires to obtain access to the common people, whether Muhammedans or Christians, can do it only through the medium of the Arabic. Of the Jews now resident in Palestine, the greater number are such as have come up to the land of their fathers, in order to spend the remainder of their lives and die in one of the four holy places—Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, or Safed. Those in Jerusalem desire to lay their bones in the Valley of Jehoshaphat. They come hither from all parts of the Levant, and especially from Smyrna, Constantinople, and Salonika, in which cities there are many thousands of this people. Two years before our visit, the Jews were said to have flocked in great numbers to Syria, and particularly to Damascus and Tyre, where formerly they were not permitted to reside. But subsequently, as the high prices of provisions, and of living in general, increased, this circumstance prevented the coming of more, and compelled the return of many; so that the number of Jews in Jerusalem had been much diminished. They live here, for the most part, in poverty and filth. A considerable amount of money is collected for them by their emissaries in different countries; but as it comes into the hands of the rabbins, and is managed by them without responsibility, it is understood to be administered without much regard to honesty, and serves chiefly as a means of increasing their own influence and control over the conduct and consciences of their poorer brethren. Most of the Jews now in Palestine appear to be of Spanish or Polish origin; very few are from Germany, or are able to speak the German language. The very motive which leads them thus to return to the Land of Promise shows their strong attachment to their ancient faith; and would of itself point a priori to the conclusion (which is found to be true, in fact), viz., that the Jews thus resident in Palestine are, of all others, the most bigoted, and the least accessible to the labours of Christian missionaries. The efforts of the English mission have as yet been attended with very slight success; and it remains to be seen, whether the proposed erection of a Jewish-Christian Church in Jerusalem will add to the influence and prosperity of the mission. The site was purchased during our stay in the city; and the building is understood to be now in progress. The Christians of the Latin rite live around the Latin convent, on which they are wholly dependent. They are native Arabs, know no other language than the Arabic, and are said to be descended from Catholic converts in the times of the crusades. They are in number about 1100 souls, according to the preceding estimate; and live partly by carving crosses and beads for rosaries, and partly on the alms of the convent."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A prayer to the Saviour.—Come, O thou that hast the seven stars in thy right hand, appoint thy chosen priests, according to their orders and courses of old, to minister before thee, and duly to dress and pour out the consecrated oil into thy holy and ever-burning lamps. Thou hast sent out the Spirit of prayer upon thy servants over all the earth to this effect, and stirred up their vows as the sound of many waters about thy throne. Every one can say, that now certainly thou hast visited this land, and hast not forgotten the uttermost corners of the earth, in a time when men had thought that thou wast gone up from us to the farthest end of the heavens, and hadst left to do unavailingly among the sons of the last ages. O perfect and accomplish thy glorious acts; for men may leave their works unfinished, but thou art a God, thy nature is perfection. The times and seasons pass along under thy feet, to go and come at thy bidding; and as thou didst dignify our Fathers' days with many real actions, above all their foregoing ages, since thou tookest the flesh, so thou can vouchsafe to us, though unworthy, as large a portion of thy Spirit as thou pleasest; for who shall prejudice thy all-governing will? Seeing the power of Thy grace is not passed away with the primitive times, as fond and faithless men imagine; but thy kingdom is now at hand, and thou standing at the door. Come forth out of thy royal chambers, O Prince of all the kings of the earth; put on the visible robes of thy imperial majesty, take up that unlimited sceptre, which the Almighty Father hath bequeathed thee; for now the voice of thy bride calls thee, and all creatures sigh to be renewed.—MILTON.

Christ's care of his People.—Christ the good shepherd, will not permit the powers of darkness to pluck thee from him by violence: and he will afford thee grace sufficient, if thou wilt seek and employ it aright, to preserve thee from abandoning his fold of thyself. He will not suffer thee to be tempted above what thou art able to sustain; but with the temptation will also make a way to escape, that thou mayest be able to bear it. He will so overrule the events of thy life, that all things shall work together to thee for good in the end, because thou lovest God and thy Redeemer. When he chastens thee, he will think upon mercy. When distress and anguish are ready to overpower thee, he will fill thy heart with the peace of God, which passeth all understanding. He will strengthen thee upon the bed of languishing; he will make all thy bed in thy sickness. When thou walkest through the valley of the shadow of death, thou shalt fear no evil; for he shall be with thee, his rod and his staff shall comfort thee. When thou standest before his throne of judgment, he will acknowledge thee for his servant. He will interpose his atonement between thee and condemnation. He will cover thine unworthiness with his merits; he will array thee in his righteousness. He will change thy vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. He will say unto thee, Come, thou blessed of my Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for thee from the foundation of the world. He will cause thee to reign with him for ever and ever.—REV. T. GISBORNE.

The duty of forgiveness of injuries.—Let us consider the circumstances of the person who has offended us. Is he a child? His youth will plead in his defence. Is he an aged person? Allowance must be made for his years and infirmities. Is he poor? His poverty should move our compassion. Is he rich? His wealth lays him under a temptation to forget himself. Is he a wise man? Let respect for his abilities soften our resentment. Is he a weak and foolish man? He knows no better. Is he a wicked man? We need not wonder at his ill-treatment of us; it is his general character. He fears not to offend God, and why should we think it strange that he offends us? Is he a good man? It is a pity to harbour resentment against a worthy character. To contend with our equals is dubious, with our superiors is madness, with our inferiors is meanness.—REV. DR. FAWCETT.

Prayer always necessary.—There are those who think they ought never to pray but when they find their hearts drawn out by the Spirit of grace and supplication, inviting them as it were to that holy exercise. This notion appears to have no foundation in Scripture; yea, it seems directly contrary to Scripture, and if given way to, may, in the end, leave the soul totally prayerless, if not graceless. I would rather follow the example of Luther, who always hastened to the throne of grace, when he found the greatest indisposition to go thither; and by that means often warmed a cold heart at the fire of God's altar. Under the law, if the sacrifice would not go willingly, it was to be dragged. And under the Gospel, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.—SIR R. HILL.

EDINBURGH CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION.

QUARTERLY PAPER, DRAWN UP BY THE SECRETARIES OF THE EDINBURGH CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION.

PART II.

It is generally known to those interested in the spread of religion on the Continent, that Belgium, since the year 1830, has been thrown open to the heralds of salvation; that numerous copies of the Holy Scriptures have been circulated and read; that a society was formed, about three years ago, called The Belgian Evangelical Society, which supports several faithful evangelists, by whose labours little Churches have been collected (principally from the midst of the Roman Catholic population), and which, at the present moment, are exposed to the fiercest storms of Romish persecution. As a pretty detailed account lately appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of the operations of this society, instead of dwelling upon its general labours and successes, we shall extract, from a letter of the Secretary, an interesting account of one of its evangelists; by which we may form some estimate of the character of its agents. For a long time great difficulty was experienced in finding a person who was able to preach in the Flemish language, the prejudice against Dutchmen being so powerful, that no talents, nor piety, would have been sufficient to overcome its influence. At length such an one has been discovered. "The Lord," says a letter from the secretary, "has now sent us a minister, we trust, who is able to preach in the Flemish language; and it is to the sixth station that he will be called. A clergyman of the Church of England, passing through this country some short time since, stayed a few days in the town where we propose (God willing) to form the present station. Seeing its state, and believing it possible to preach the Gospel there, he offered to support the expenses for three years, if we would send a minister. Mr Van Maasdyk, being just returned from the Geneva Evangelical Society's Theological College, was named, with the consent of our friend, the clergyman, above referred to; and, we trust, will soon enter on his labours.

"We cannot forbear giving a few particulars of the very interesting conversion of our brother, who was formerly a priest, possessing a pretty good living in the Roman Catholic Church. Brought, by circumstances, to examine the Scriptures, he soon found out that what he was teaching, as the Word of God, was nothing else than the tradition of men; and that he was not following Christ, but Satan. The Lord led him to seek the counsel of a minister of the Gospel. After some time, he relinquished his parish; very much to the regret of his bishop, by whom he was much respected. He then offered himself to our Committee, who sent him to Geneva, in order to study at the Theological College, under the direction of M. Merle D'Aubigné. After passing nine months under the care of our respected brother, he returned to Brussels; giving us the greatest satisfaction, by his very decided piety. He has already preached the truth at Brussels; and several persons came forward to beg us to fix him in that town, but believing the offer made us of supporting him for three years to be a direction from above, and the state of our funds being very low, we could not consent to the request of those friends. We shall here add an extract from a speech which he delivered at one of our annual Bible meetings:—"I was led to compare it," (he here refers to a Testament which one of his parishioners, frightened by a sermon which another priest had preached against the reading of the Scriptures, brought to him, begging that he would burn it, and forgive him the sin of having purchased it,) 'I was led to compare it with the Vulgate, and found it very correct; but in reading it, I met with this passage, 'It is finished.' My mass fell to the ground as a heap of sand,—it crumbled into dust. Further on I met with another passage, which told me that the righteous went into eternal life, and the wicked into eternal damnation. I saw but two parties, and but two places. Where was my purgatory? I saw it was an invention of men. I found that it was said, Christ, 'by one offering, for ever perfected those that are sanctified.' I saw, then, that there was no need of any further sacrifices: he entered once for all into the holy of holies. My unbloody sacrifice was of no more use; and I shuddered at the thought of such a traffic of souls—of pretending to sell the blood of Christ for a franc; (alluding to his saying mass for the pardon of sins.) 'I was constrained to quit my living. I was adored by my people, as a saint, as a demigod, whilst I felt within that I was but a whited sepulchre, a vile hypocrite. I demanded my dismissal: I only received it after asking it three times. But though I saw the errors, I did not yet know the truth. I went to Antwerp: there I was much tempted and tried—so much so, that I thought I was given up by God on account of my sins. I then thought of shutting myself up for life, and of thus offering to God all I had, as a sacrifice for my former life.

" 'I determined to sacrifice every thing that was dear to me, and, by austerity of life, and punishment of body, to restore peace to my soul. The day was fixed for my entering into the strictest of convents—that of the Trappists. At this time I suffered great agony of mind. The day before that fixed for my entering the convent, I cast myself upon my knees,—I earnestly implored God to direct me. If it was his will that I should thus sacrifice myself, I begged him to enable me to do so; if not, plainly to show me so. I gave myself up entirely to his pleasure. I arose from my knees, I took the Bible from the table, I opened the 51st psalm. I knew it well in Latin, I had often repeated it, but at that moment it was fixed in my mind in a peculiar manner; I shall never forget its effect,—it will always be precious unto me. My eyes caught the verse, 'Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.' The truth flashed across my mind—I understood it all; I saw that it was not by inflicting on my poor, weak, and sinful body, pains and sufferings, that I could be delivered from my sins. The 16th and 17th verses decided me what to do. From that moment I have had a peace and joy which surpass all expression. I found rest for my soul—I still find it, amid all the trials and temptations to which the Christian is subject in this vale of tears. Attach yourselves to the Word of God, and not to the traditions of men; that alone can lead you aright.' We have no doubt," proceeds the secretary,

"that he who began this good work will perfect it in our brother, and that, ere long, we shall see him boldly lifting up the standard of the Cross amongst those who be led, little more than twelve months ago, as the first lead the blind. He pants to be able to preach 'Christ crucified' as the only refuge for poor soul-sick sinners. May the Lord give him his heart's desire."

This extract suggests one or two remarks. It suggests the importance of Scottish clergymen and religious laymen visiting the Continent, when they have the opportunity of doing so, for the purpose of making themselves acquainted with the spiritual condition of its inhabitants. It was his personal inspection of the wretched degradation of the Belgians that awakened the sympathies of this English clergyman, and led him to take that step which may be productive of such momentous consequences to the population among whom the converted priest is destined to labour; and did Christian men from this country more frequently survey with their own eyes the deplorable condition of the Romish and infidel population on the Continent, they would return to their own country burning and zeal to send them the Gospel. It further exhibits the powerful claims upon the cordial support of British Christians which are possessed by the Geneva Theological School,—that invaluable institution in which the truth is shining with the clearest lustre, and where converts from the neighbouring countries may, at a small expense, be educated amid circumstances eminently favourable to piety, and prepared to carry back the torch of divine truth to their own countrymen. Nor ought we to forget, that though Mr Van Maasdijk is secure of support for two or three years to come, there are other agents of the Belgian Society not less zealous and devoted, who are preaching the Gospel with evident tokens of the Divine blessing amid the most violent persecution; but who, unless British Christians send them pecuniary aid, may speedily be reduced to the necessity of abandoning the scene of their labours and successes.

At the time of the last meeting of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, the association were favoured with a deputation from the Geneva and Paris Evangelical Societies, consisting of Mr Scholl of Lausanne, and Mr Frederick Monod of Paris. It afforded the Committee the greatest pleasure to meet these excellent strangers, and to hear from them of the triumphs of the Gospel on the Continent. It was especially interesting to see a minister who had come to this country to express the warm feelings of Christian interest and affection cherished towards Scottish Christians by a body of the servants of Christ, at Geneva, whom, though separate from the old religious establishment, the secretaries must regard as the true and rightful representatives of that Reformed Church whose memory is so dear to every Scottish Christian's heart; for never can they regard that institution to be a Church of Christ at all, which has abolished the evangelical creed of their forefathers, and has authoritatively sent forth from its divinity chair the wretched delusions of Socinianism and Pelagianism,—those delusions which the reformers to whom Scotland and Geneva owed so much never ceased to repudiate and abhor. A portion of the letter which introduced Mr Scholl to the Committee we shall introduce, as expressing the feelings with which such men as Merle D'Aubigné, Gauden,

Sec., regard their Christian brethren in Scotland:—
 “We are united, brethren,” says this document, “by the most endearing ties; in the past, by the glorious remembrance of that holy Reformation which was common to us and you, and which established the faith in the Churches of which it is our lot to be members; in the present, by that love of Christ which impels all those who are his members to ‘enlarge the place of their tent, and stretch forth the curtains of their habitation;’ in the future, by the hope of the appearance of that divine Saviour who shall deliver those from temptation who honour him, and shall create the ‘new heavens and the new earth.’”

“We shall rejoice that our representative draws closer the precious ties which unite all those members of the true Catholic Church, which, after having taken its rise in the time of the apostles, and being developed in the earliest ages, and renewed at the period of the Reformation, now multiplies its children over all the earth, by the power of the Word, and the efficacy of the Spirit.

“Geneva calls to mind, that in all times evangelical Christians of your country have stretched out to her the hand of fellowship, and have aided her with their succour and their prayers. You will rejoice in the thought, that though a dark cloud has passed over our city, and conceals from a great portion of our Church the rays of the Sun of Righteousness, there are members of the Church of Geneva who boldly confess God manifest in the flesh, and who, calling to mind the vocation wherewith the Lord has called our little city, desire to labour to carry into other regions the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Never were our wants greater than at present. Sixty colporteurs have, during the past winter, disseminated the Holy Scriptures among a people who knew them not. Our evangelists, our pastors, our teachers, placed in the heart of a country hitherto entirely Roman Catholic, have been increased, and along with them have multiplied the fruits of their labours. Our theological school, destined to rear up ministers well instructed in the Old and New Testament, prospers by the grace of God.

“You have already, brethren, afforded us valuable proofs of your Christian interest. We assure you of our lively gratitude; and we pray you to continue your good-will towards the work which the Lord has committed to our hands.”

A similar letter introduced Mr Monod, the representative of the Evangelical Society of France, the other valuable institution, whose labours and successes the Secretaries have recorded, also a minister of that Church which, once one of the fairest of the daughters of the Reformation, but afterwards pierced with thousand wounds by her enemies, and long trodden under foot by the infidel and the blasphemer, had almost expired, but which, animated with new life from above, is again rising from the dust—putting on her beautiful garments and beginning to shine with the brightness of her Lord. Earnestly do the Secretaries desire that the feelings thus expressed may be cordially reciprocated by Christians in Scotland; and that Churches in our own country, and in Switzerland and France, awakening out of the profound spiritual sleep in which, during the past century, they were entranced, will cordially embrace one another. And it is their hope and expectation, that these several portions of the Church of Christ with such endearing recollections and powerful ties to bind them together, are destined, ere long, to unite with heart and hand for the overthrow of the common enemies of the truth, and for the advancement of the glorious kingdom of our Lord and Saviour in the world.

Many interesting communications might be made respecting individual congregations on the Continent, some of which are in the most urgent need of assistance; but it would extend this Paper too much to introduce them here.

The facts already related are abundantly encouraging, and furnish the strongest motives to combined and energetic exertion. They show that the door, so long effectually closed, is at last, in the providence of God, thrown open for the spread of the Gospel in Continental Europe. They show that, in France in particular, the fabric of Romish superstition has been shaken to its foundations. From all sides, indeed, evidences crowd upon us, that Popery, however desperate its struggles, is losing its hold upon the understandings and consciences of its votaries. The numerous little Protestant Churches rising up in the heart of the Romish population—the frequent and eager demands of Catholics for the Bible, notwithstanding the fiercest denunciations of the priests—the willingness of the Romish laity to allow their children to be educated in Protestant schools, and in the principles of the Protestant faith—the contempt with which, in private, they are wont to speak of their priests and of the mummeries of their religion—the Catholic churches in France almost utterly deserted by the male population,—all indicate the departure of the Papal power. Were such observations only made by Protestants, they might be ascribed to the blinding effects of prejudice; but the Roman Catholics themselves clearly perceive these things, and loudly bewail them. The priests feel their power gliding out of their hands, and often rage with impotent malice against the propagators of evangelical truth. The charges of the bishops bespeak their alarm. Even the Pope deploras the successes of the Bible distributors, acknowledges the desertion of numerous adherents from the Church of Rome, and declares that those things afford matter for lamentation to him both by night and day.*

While the Romanists thus deplore the departure of their influence on the Continent, it is remarkable that they are directing their eyes, with eager anxiety and lively hope, towards Great Britain. Their journals are full of confident anticipations of future triumphs in these realms. Gregory himself, in an apostolic letter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, President of the Roman Catholic Institution of Great Britain, finds consolation for the afflictions of the Church in other places from its prospects in Great Britain. “Whilst filled,” says he, “with sorrow for the ever increasing calamities of the Church of Christ, we have received such abundant cause of gladness, as has not only relieved us amid the bitterness wherewith we were afflicted, but has excited in us more than ordinary joy. * * * We are encouraged to entertain the cheering hope, that the light of Divine faith will again shine, with the same brightness as of old, upon the minds of the British people. We desire nothing with greater earnestness, than to embrace once more, with paternal exultation, the English nation, adorned with so many and such excellent qualities, and to receive back the long-lost sheep into the fold of Christ." Nor are the Roman Catholics confining themselves to anticipations. It is evident that they are concentrating their energies for the purpose of making an effectual assault upon the religion of our forefathers. Immense sums of money are collected in Popish countries for the propagation of the Romish faith, and not a doubt can be entertained that a large portion of this money is designed for the diffusion of Popery in Great Britain. "In this city," says a letter recently received from Lyons, "the Society for the Propagation of the Faith has its centre—an institution which raises between two and three millions of francs a-year, to scatter the doctrines of Popery abroad over the face of the earth." "Immense sums of money," says a letter from Belgium, "are, I am told, sent from this country to support Popery in other lands."

* We shall introduce into the Supplement a portion of the Pope's letter in which these sentiments are expressed.

While Popery is thus losing ground on the Continent, and yet seems to be gathering strength in our own lands, is there no important lesson that is taught us? Is there no momentous duty to which Christians in this country are immediately called? The time seems at length to have arrived, when the friends of the Gospel, instead of maintaining an inglorious defensive war, are called upon to shake off their apathy, and boldly to advance into the heart of the territory of the Church of Rome. It can scarcely be doubted that, were an energetic attempt made to spread the doctrines of the glorious Gospel in the benighted Popish countries, especially France and Belgium, the most momentous consequences would result. Continental Protestants would be stirred up to far greater efforts; numerous and extensive defections might be expected to take place from the already trembling and disheartened ranks of Rome. But this is not all. We should trust that, through the Divine blessing, the power of Popery would be paralyzed in our own country, its most zealous propagators disheartened, while the friends of the truth would be inspired with unwonted courage. In war, it has often been found the most successful method of repelling an invader, to send forth powerful armies into the centre of his own dominions, already laid open to attack by the absence of his troops, in consequence of which his resources have been cut off, and discouraged and paralyzed, he has been constrained to make a speedy retreat. Thus also, compelled to draw together their forces in order to defend their own hereditary possessions, we might expect that, ere long, the Roman Catholics would be constrained, in a great measure, to abandon their attempts to propagate the Romish faith in Protestant countries. The call to spread the Gospel on the Continent is the more urgent, because there is no great machinery to be erected—there are no new and uncertain plans to be attempted; because there are already societies in existence worthy of cordial support, and able, had they the pecuniary resources, to extend their operations on all sides; also because, by means of these societies, the Gospel may be diffused without awakening that jealousy which would be kindled if British agents were sent, as missionaries from their own country, into these foreign lands. How urgent the necessities of our Roman Catholic neighbours; and how important the openings for usefulness, that are occurring every day, may be judged from the following extract from one of the Geneva circulars:—"Now," says this paper, "is more than ever the time to preach the Gospel, when, as Jesus has said, 'the fields are already white to the harvest.' It is then he cries to us, 'Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he would send labourers into his harvest.' Now never, perhaps since the Reformation, have the countries of the Western Roman Empire, and especially France, been so disposed to receive evangelists and Bibles. We must avail ourselves of the opportunity. Such circumstances say, in effect, to us what Jesus said to Philadelphia, 'I have set before thee an open door, which no man can shut.' If the priests burn the Word of God, their people receive it—read it—ask for it again. It is farther remarkable that, while beyond the limits of the land of the ferocious beast (Dan. vii.), or of the ancient Roman Empire—in Ireland, Germany, America, England—the Popish population believe they are gaining ground; on the contrary, in Spain, in Belgium, in France, the population more than ever disgusted with confessionals, legends, relics, clerical taxes, are now desiring something better. Letters from Spain, that classic land of Popery, inform us that this people are expecting, from one month to another, an eternal separation from Rome. Now is the time to preach the Gospel. Besides, what urges us still more, and you will feel the force of the motive, dear brother, is that demands are abounding. From all quarters we are addressed with earnest entreaties. If we had a hundred evangelists, if we had a thousand colporteurs, we should know immediately where to send them with advantage. Without doubt, we ought to preach the glad tidings where they were not desired, and our efforts met with universal indifference. There are unfortunate days when the patient does not desire, and feels no need of, the remedy. There is a time when the friends of the Gospel only hear in vision, a man in strange attire, exclaiming to them, 'Come over and help us.' But there are other days, in which the patient sends for you, and, with clasped hands and earnest cries, entreats the remedy. Such a day is the present. It is not in vision, but a reality, that Frenchmen are continually coming to us, and saying, 'Come over to France to help us.' Fervently do the Secretaries desire that these affecting representations may not be made in vain; that many prayers may ascend from Scottish Christians to the throne of the Eternal for a blessing upon the labours of their Continental brethren; and that many efforts will be made to procure them pecuniary assistance, in their time of need."

(Signed) CHARLES J. BROWN,
D. T. K. DRUMMOND, } Secretaries.
ÆNEAS M. RATE,

* Collecting Cards may be had from the Secretaries, from R. Haldane, Esq., W.S., Drummond Place, Treasurer, and from Messrs Johnstone, White, Lindsay, Innes, Paton, &c., Booksellers.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 3, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMSBRIDGES, London; W. COBBY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMBS, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—What is the Design of my Creation, and the Great Purpose to which my Life should be directed? By the Editor. Part I. . . . . Page 769 2.—Sacred Poetry. "A Mother's Birth-day Song to her First-born." By the Rev. Thomas Dale. . . . . 771 3.—Biographical Sketch. Mr Thomas Craiga, late Elder in the Scottish Church, Wooler, Northumberland. . . . . 3.	4.—Sacred Poetry. "To the Memory of the Rev. Alexander Kerr." By William M'Comb. . . . . Page 773 5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. John Thomson, A.M., . . . . . 776 6.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Beza, Moucreliff, Sieve-right, Fenelon, Wilson, Ewing, and Jackson, . . . . . 781 7.—History of the Albigenses. Period III. To the Subjugation of Raymond of Toulouse, and the Permanent Establishment of the Inquisition. Part II., . . . . . 782
---	---

WHAT IS THE DESIGN OF MY CREATION, AND THE GREAT PURPOSE TO WHICH MY LIFE SHOULD BE DIRECTED?

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

IT is related by an ancient author, that, previous to his time, nearly three hundred different opinions had been entertained in regard to the chief good of man, or the ultimate end to which all his thoughts, and words, and actions ought to be uniformly directed. This remarkable diversity of sentiment upon a subject the most interesting and important to a rational and intelligent creature, may, perhaps, on its first announcement, excite surprise; but the intricacy of the problem will appear sufficiently obvious, when we reflect that it requires for its solution a knowledge, not merely of the intellectual and moral constitution of man, but also of the nature and relative importance of all the objects in the universe with which he stands connected, and which might present their claims to be considered as his chief or ultimate aim. Should we attempt to institute an investigation so complex, the conviction would soon force itself upon us, that it is utterly impossible, without the aid of Revelation, to establish satisfactorily what ought to be the grand object of our pursuit in life. Difficult, however, as the question, theoretically speaking, appears to be, every man proposes to himself some object which, in his progress through life, he is resolved, if possible, to obtain; and though, when attained, it fails to yield the promised enjoyment, another object equally plausible succeeds, which, in the end, is found equally deceitful; and thus, instead of one, many different objects are successively proposed—all of which have proved fallacious. Wealth, Fame, Pleasure—each have their votaries, from whom they receive unwearied homage; but failing, as all experience attests, to satisfy the desires of a rational and immortal soul, their attainment can never be viewed as properly constituting "the chief end of man." The inquiry may be thus proposed,—Of all the designs which a rational creature can entertain, what object is it the pursuit of which is fitted to call forth the exertion of all his energies, intellectual and moral, and the employment of all his thoughts, and words, and actions? In past ages, the question hath baffled the ingenuity of the most highly gifted philosophic inquirers; and to revelation, therefore, must we resort for a satisfactory solution. And, accordingly, in the pages of Inspiration we are plainly informed, that even in the most minute and apparently least important actions and operations of life, "Whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of God."

The expression, "the glory of God," is of frequent occurrence in Sacred Scripture, and that, too, under a variety of significations; all of which, however, may be reduced to two classes,—those which have an immediate reference to God, and those which have an exclusive reference to the conduct of man. In the former case, it must be understood as indicating the harmonious display of the Divine attributes; and in the latter, as denoting the harmonious development of our intellectual and moral powers, in strict accordance with the Divine will, and for the accomplishment, as far as they have been revealed to us, of the Divine purposes. We have been endowed with powers of understanding, and therefore it becomes us to know God, the highest object of knowledge in the universe; we have received affections of the heart, and therefore it becomes us to love him who is the most amiable and attractive of beings; we are possessed of active powers, and therefore ought we to yield a cheerful and unreserved obedience to the will of him who is the Supreme Ruler of universal nature. To know, therefore, to love, and to obey God, is the chief end of man. It is this which constitutes the perfection of our character, and the summit of our happiness, on earth; and it is this which prepares us for the full and uninterrupted enjoyment of God in heaven.

I. To us, his intelligent creatures, the Divine Being is the highest object of knowledge in the universe; and though our comprehension of his character must necessarily be imperfect, yet the employment of our faculties in an investigation so interesting, is happiness itself. The pleasure arising from the contemplation of God, is a high and a holy delight,—it approximates man to the nature of the angelic hosts, and even of the great God himself; for what object can be worthy of the Divine complacency and regard in comparison with his own essential and unchangeable perfections? Such knowledge, in its full extent, is too wonderful for us; still, every step we proceed in our necessarily partial acquaintance with it, is intimately connected with an increase in our capacity for, and enjoyment of, true happiness; and were it possible for us fully to comprehend the Divine excellencies, it would prove an inexhaustible source of happiness to us; but from the limited extent of our minds, we are incapable of knowing, and from the deep depravity of our hearts, we are incapable of appreciating, his wonderful perfections. Before the Divine character can become the object of our delightful contemplation and knowledge, the earthly tendencies of our nature must be changed, and a principle of holiness implanted; for how repulsive to the unrenowned man is the view of the character of God, especially as a pure and holy Being! But as soon as the Spirit hath caused light to arise in the soul, we learn to meditate with peculiar delight on the Divine purity; and we enter with some degree of interest into the feelings of the righteous, who "give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness."

God is the supreme object of knowledge to man, not merely viewed as he is in himself, but in the various manifestations of his character which he hath been pleased to impart. The display of the Divine glory or excellencies forms, indeed, the grand design to which all the acts of his natural and moral administration are rendered subservient; and it must be obvious that the accomplishment of this design in the creation and government of the world is an end alone worthy of infinite Wisdom. If moral excellence, in the highest degree of perfection, be the characteristic feature of the Divine nature, surely the full display of this excellence must form the most sublime object of desire in the universe; and must, therefore, constitute the source of the Divine felicity. And in regard to his intelligent creatures, endowed with the capacity of perceiving and relishing moral beauty, the manifestation of these perfections must be, in the fullest extent, adapted to promote their happiness. Before, however, such an effect can follow, in regard to any individual, the Divine attributes must become the objects of his knowledge and believing contemplation; and thus it is that the more we know of God, and the clearer our conceptions of the Divine character, we become the more fitted for the enjoyment of the purest, the most permanent, the most exalted happiness in which finite creatures are permitted to participate in time or in eternity.

It is an undeniable truth, that "none can by searching find out God—none can find out the Almighty unto perfection;" but the obligation is not the less imperative on all the intelligent creatures of his hand to recognise him as the supreme object of their knowledge. In contempt, however, of this admitted obligation, the past history of our race infallibly demonstrates that the world by wisdom hath not known God. The intellect of man hath made profound researches into every department of science, both of matter and of mind; but instead of ascribing the varied appearances, intellectual and physical, to the agency of an Almighty Being, who is "wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working;" even the most learned men of antiquity have attempted, by the introduction of hypothetical causes, to account for the creation and subsequent arrangement of all things. Fate, Necessity, Fortune, Chance—have each been considered as regulating the affairs of the universe; while He who "counteth the number of the stars, and nameth them every one," hath either been excluded entirely from the knowledge of man, or denied all interest and concern in the works of his hands. These remarks apply not only to the sages of antiquity, but to many of the learned as well as illiterate of our own day, in their view of the providential arrangements of God. The slightest observation will suffice to convince us that many who would startle at the charge of direct Atheism, still think, and speak, and act, as if they denied the superintending providence of the Almighty. Unwilling to retain God in their knowledge, they view all events, whether calamitous or prosperous, as the operations of a blind chance or an accidental concurrence of circumstances. Thus do they deprive themselves of the comfort and support which is derived from devoutly recognising, in the diversified events of their personal or domestic history, the infinitely wise and righteous arrangements of the great Governor of the universe.

God is the supreme object of knowledge to man, as the Creator and Ruler of universal nature; but to know him aright, we must extend our views still further; for it is in the work of redemption that he must be especially contemplated by guilty creatures. As our Creator, his excellencies are presented to our awakened consciences under an aspect of terror; but he hath graciously revealed himself in a more endearing relationship to us, and his character hath assumed an aspect of tenderness and love. He hath "so loved the world as to send forth his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." This illustrious exhibition of the Divine character is peculiarly fitted to engage the eager inquiry of the whole intelligent creation. It is a mystery into which even the angels, those pure and lofty intelligences encircling the throne on high, are represented as desiring to look. With what interest, therefore, ought we, for whom the mighty scheme was planned, to make this view of the excellencies of God the primary object of our knowledge! To recognise the Supreme Being in the wonders of his creating power, and in the mysterious arrangements of his providence, and yet to be ignorant of him in the riches of his redeeming mercy, is tantamount, in our circumstances, at least, to denying the truth of revelation—and thus exposing our souls to everlasting ruin. But to know God in Christ as our redeeming God, imparts to the soul a peace and a joy "which the world can neither give nor take away."

A MOTHER'S BIRTH-DAY SONG TO HER FIRST-BORN.

BEAUTIFUL and most beloved!

The year that dawned upon thy birth
On rosy wings hath lightly moved;
And still thy healthful hue, thy buoyant mirth,
Gladden thy mother's conscious heart:
Oh! could'st thou ever be what now thou art!
But vain the wish, and wild—
The stroke of suffering or of woe
Must reach the mother through the child;
And thou, unconscious babe! thou, too, must know
The general doom—thou, too, must share
Man's common heritage of toil and care!

Dear as thou art, and dear
As to thy father's heart and mine
Thou ever must be, yet the tear,
From which we cannot shield, may soon be thine;
And pain on that sweet open brow
May set a seal, though all is sportive now!

But, O thou loveliest flower!
Though blasts may bruise thy slender stem,
Or winter's bleak ungenial shower
Weigh to the dust thy scarce-expanding gem;
Still is the root secure in earth,
Still lives the promise of a brighter birth!

Hence, at thy natal hour,
'Tis not the anxious mother's prayer
That far from thee may fall the shower,
The cloud sail o'er thee, and the tempest spare;
And that thy life may glide away,
Unvexed by cares, a cloudless summer-day.

The path to heavenly light
Through darkness leads; a wreath divine
Succeeds the struggle and the fight.
O may that light, sweet babe! that wreath be thine!
And to the mother's prayer be given
To hail her first-born child the child of heaven!

DALE.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MR THOMAS CRAIGS,

LATE ELDER IN THE SCOTTISH CHURCH, WOOLER, NORTHUMBRLAND.

COMPARED with the mass of mankind, God's people in all ages have not only been "a little flock," it has also been found, in the words of the great apostle, that "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are; that no flesh should glory in his presence." The steps of the warrior leave behind the unobliterated traces of blood; countries desolated, cities ravaged, wives made widows, and children left helpless orphans, mark invariably his progress: yet trophies are raised to perpetuate his name; while history, in glowing terms, records his deeds, and the loftiest strains of the Muse are engaged to perpetuate his praise! The soldier of the Cross, however, claims no such notice, and usually receives but a scanty share of this world's regards. Like his great Master, the world perceives in him little to be admired, and hence usually leaves the believer in Jesus to his native obscurity. But such as are "despised and rejected of men," are yet often precious in the sight of God, and at the great day shall be numbered among Jehovah's choicest jewels.

Thomas Craigs, the subject of the following Notice, was of humble origin, and literally, through "life's sequestered vale, pursued the noiseless tenor of his pious way." He was born in the year 1770, in the village of Lanton, on the banks of the river Glen—within two miles, on one side, of the scene of the celebrated battle of Flodden, and about an equal distance, on the other, from the spot where that of Homildon was fought in 1402, in the reign of Henry IV. This district of country is one of the richest and most romantic in the north of England, and is within nine miles of the border of Scotland. It is chiefly pastoral, and abounds with green hills—the eastern termination of the Cheviot mountains, among which meander clear and classic streams. In the days of yore, this district was famous for other scenes than those in which Thomas Craigs, from infancy to age, found the sweetest solace of his life. War, in those rude times, here sadly marred the fair face of nature, and fields were then every where red with carnage, which now are "rent by no ravage, save that of the gentle plough." Thomas Craigs was a hand-loom weaver by trade, at which employment he continued till he left Northumberland, in May of the present year. He was naturally of a quiet, unassuming, and peaceable disposition; of great simplicity, as well as godly sincerity. His sincere, but unobtrusive piety, procured him, during his long life, the respect of all classes, and, generally speaking, the love, and almost veneration, of those who moved in his own humble sphere. Having been born and brought up a Presbyterian, though living in a land of mixed heads, where religion is connected with much of the pomp and circumstance of the present world, Thomas Craigs warmly admired the simple, but apostolic, and impressive forms to which he had been inured. So uniformly exemplary was his conduct, that, about the year 1810, he was chosen an elder of the Scottish Church in Wooler, which he had attended from his infancy, and he was ordained to that office by the late Rev. James Mitchell, then minister of that body of Christians. Having always evinced a taste for sacred music, he was, much about the same time, requested to become precentor (or clerk, as that office is named in that part of the country); and his duties in both he continued, with great approbation, to discharge until the time of his departure for America. He was twice married; and, at the time of his removal from Wooler, had one of the finest families in that part of Northumberland, who, having all been trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, most of them, to the great satisfaction of their parents, while they prospered in their own humble callings, gave evidence that they were "growing in grace," and in the knowledge of the great Redeemer. When they appeared before the kirk-session, for examination previously to partaking of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, they showed a more than common acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, and a deep reverence for divine things; so that Thomas Craigs', however humble, might be said to be one of the best regulated households in the neighbourhood; for within its walls might daily be heard "the voice of rejoicing and salvation." The man who conducted so well his own domestic affairs, was not one to neglect his public duties; and accordingly, in the two capacities in which he officiated—as elder and clerk—no one could possibly have been more diligent or exemplary. In regard to his attendance upon Divine worship, the present minister of the Presbyterian Church at Wooler can testify that (though to and from church Thomas Craigs had full twelve miles to walk), during the six years in which he knew him, Thomas Craigs was never but once absent from his post, and that was when a thunder-storm of unusual violence, on a Sabbath-day, visited, as is often the case, that neighbourhood. As an elder, this good man was "instant in season and out of season," showing truly what an elder should be, and the most valuable assistant, in that respect, which any Christian minister could desire. His placid and kindly disposition gained him an easy access to almost every dwelling; but in the humble cottages of the peasantry he was especially a welcome guest. The stormiest night, or the bleakest road, would not prevent him from braving all their inclemencies, if he knew that there was a case of sickness or distress in which he could be of the least service to a fellow-creature. These Christian offices he confined not to the congregation to which he belonged; for, indeed, he regarded all mankind as his brethren, and hence was found the spiritual adviser, and the meek minister of mercy, at every sick or dying bed he could possibly attend. His diligence in this respect was truly astonishing; while, at the same time, he never neglected to provide, as well as his humble means allowed, for the wants of his own house. Yet, labouring chiefly for "the meat which endureth to everlasting life," temporal comforts or personal advantages were but of secondary estimation with him; for he lived under a constant persuasion of the truth. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

But not only upon such emergencies as those we have mentioned was Thomas Craigs found at the post of duty. All the spare time he could command was usually devoted to similar pursuits. On the Sabbath-day, in particular, he seldom passed the cottages of any of his common acquaintances without tarrying by the way, to speak to them about the "things which belong to their eternal peace." In this mode of reaching the human heart, he possessed a peculiar facility; and often have the peasantry been heard, in their own homely, but expressive phrase, to eulogise the edifying and acceptable hours passed by him in this pious and interesting manner. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is celebrated thrice a-year in the church to which Thomas Craigs once belonged; and as his dwelling was deemed too distant from the place of worship for an old man, on a day when the hour of meeting was earlier than on ordinary Sabbaths, he was usually pressed by some of his neighbours, in the more immediate vicinity of the church, to spend [with them the Saturday night; when, we have often been told, that such<sup>s</sup> was his fervent piety and heavenly converse, they were the means, under Divine grace, of bringing more than one to the house of God, on those solemn occasions, in the most devout and besetting frame of mind.

From the paucity of preachers in that district, it sometimes happens (though rarely) that the minister, when he leaves home to assist at a neighbouring communion, is under the unavoidable necessity of leaving behind him a vacant pulpit. But on such occasions, Thomas Craigs was never known to remain at home, or in the least degree to show, like too many professing Christians, that to him the Sabbath was "a weariness," which he wished to be gone; on the contrary, his feelings were, as he has often expressed them, that of the Psalmist, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longs vehemently, yea, faints, for the courts of my God!" When in the vigour of life, and in good health, he has been known to have often walked distances of upwards of twenty miles, to listen to the glad tidings of salvation, from the lips of such servants of Christ as had been mentioned to him as more than usually devoted to the Redeemer's cause, and the eternal interests of perishing souls.

In the Sabbath-school, Thomas Craigs was a constant and most efficient teacher; in the occasional absence of the minister, always opening its exercises by prayer, as well as praise. At the stated prayer-meetings for the spread of the Gospel at home and abroad, he not only attended as punctually as on the Lord's Day at public worship, but also took a prominent and most acceptable part in the duties of those associations. Scanty though his means were, he was likewise a regular subscriber to the missionary and other such-like schemes connected with the congregation, which had for their great end the amelioration of human misery, and the eternal welfare of mankind.

He was useful in more than his own proper department in life; for about the time that fearful epidemic, the cholera, visited our shores, so expert was Thomas Craigs in bleeding, and similar operations usually prescribed for the removal of that malady, that his very presence was deemed of no little service by the most intelligent among the humble people with whom he dwelt. He was tolerably well versed in the more popular periods of ecclesiastical history, and took a particular delight in reading the lives of those pious and eminent men who suffered at the time of the general Reformation from Popery, as well as of those who endured unspeakable hardships in contending for the purity of the Presbyterian faith in Scotland, during the tyrannical and unprincipled reign of the Second Charles.

Thomas Craigs had, besides all this, some little turn for sacred poetry, and the composition of themes on religious subjects, though, of course, in these departments, much could not be expected from one whose eduation had been but very limited. It is too often characteristic of the employment followed by the subject of this notice, to be intermeddling, speculative, curious, and given to change; no man, however, was ever less remarkable for these offensive qualities than was Thomas Craigs. He was truly content with the allotments of Providence, and respectful to his superiors; while he left the matters of state policy to abler hands, and was never heard to drop an angry or censorious word regarding any human creature. Of him it might well be said, "What hath grace wrought!" The year previous to his departure, the congregation presented him with a handsome and entire suit of clothes, a pair of silver spectacles, and a psalm-book, to which a grateful reference is made by Thomas Craigs in one of the subjoined letters from himself.

It could not but happen that a man so amiable and exemplary in every relation of life, would be much missed and greatly regretted, when he left the sphere in which he had so long moved, and in which he was so much and so deservedly beloved. Accordingly, when he found, in his old age, that his trade, at no time lucrative, was becoming daily more precarious, and having been often and earnestly urged by two dutiful sons, who had preceded him as settlers in America, to take up, during the remainder of his life, his residence with them, he at length, after much prayerful reflection, acceded to their proposal. Various and urgent persuasions were used by his friends in Northumberland to induce him to forego this purpose, but to no effect; and at length, when it was perceived he was fully bent on taking a final farewell of them, and the scenes of his former life, a subscription was set on foot, headed by the most respectable members of the Church to which he belonged, to defray the contingent expenses of his voyage across the Atlantic, with that of his wife and a son and daughter, who accompanied him. The money raised was more than sufficient for the intended purpose; and to it many persons had contributed of the greatest distinction in that part of the country, unconnected with the congregation of which Thomas Craigs had been a member so long. Various necessaries of life were, besides, given for the use of their voyage; and themselves and household effects conveyed, free of charge, to the ship which was to convey them part of their way from their native land.

Early on Monday, the 17th of May, they left the port of Berwick-upon-Tweed for Newcastle, and from thence proceeded via Carlisle to Liverpool, where they finally embarked for North America. It should not be omitted here, that though Thomas Craigs had nearly twenty miles to go after attending Divine service, he could not allow himself to be absent from his wonted post on the day previous to his final departure. Accordingly, on that day, having officiated in his usual capacities of elder and clerk, and sung, as his last hymn, the 122d Psalm, from the 6th verse, ("Pray that Jerusalem may have peace and felicity," &c.) Mr Gray delivered a suitable sermon, which seemed to make a deep impression on the audience, from Gen. xii. 1, "Now, the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, and come into a land which I will show thee;"—with the peroration of which discourse, as the part more immediately referring to the subject of this Sketch, we shall conclude this notice; first, however, giving two of Thomas Craigs' letters, after his departure from Wooler,—which in an affecting manner evince the piety and benevolent feeling of that truly excellent and amiable man:—

"Liverpool, May 23, 1841.

"REV. SIR,—I take this opportunity to let you know that we have got thus far on our journey. Your kind letter, which arrived here before me, I received from Mr Bolton, the mayor of Liverpool, who has shown us much kindness. We hope to sail on Monday or Tuesday next, having got a ship to St John's, when we shall have to encounter the dangers of the deep; but I hope that God, who has brought us thus far, will neither leave us to ourselves in a strange land, nor to periah in the midst of the seas. I heard a sermon here on Sabbath, from Col. iii. 26, "Ye serve the Lord Christ;" but I thought it strange, when I was not in my usual place praising the Lord. We are all well, and hope this will find you so likewise. Oh! remember me to all your congregation, whom I love so dear. May the Lord bless you all. When I arrive, I will not fail to write you." (Signed) "THOMAS CRAIGS."

This pious family were altogether six weeks and four days on their passage from Northumberland to Canada; and, punctual to his promise, Thomas Craigs wrote to Mr Gray the following letter:—

"Harvey's Settlement, July 12, 1841.

"REV. SIR,—I now take my pen to let you know that we have got safe to land—thank God for his goodness to us all! I am now in a distant land—absent from you and your people in body, but often present in spirit. My pen, reverend sir, is not able to express the feelings of my soul to you and your congregation, my friends in Jesus Christ, for whom I will not cease to pray; for while memory and time last with me, I cannot forget all the favours you have conferred upon me and mine. It would give me inexpressible pleasure to be in your company for a single day, that I might disclose all the feelings of my soul, since I parted with you and my friends in Wooler; but I must at least write, were it only to say that I have received good from all your prayers; for I never went to a place, but God went before, and friends were always ready to receive me; so that it has been made good to me, 'Commit thy way to God, and he will bring it to pass.' From Berwick to Newcastle, we were one day on the passage, and stopt two nights in our brother's house at the latter place; next day we went by the railway to Carlisle, where we stopt two nights, and met with our former fellow-worshipper, William Mathieson, who showed us much kindness. We landed late on Friday night at Liverpool, and were taken in by a Mr Cook, with all our goods, and treated kindly. I then went to the mayor, Thomas Bolton, Esq., where I received your letter; and he went and found a ship for St John's, by which we sailed on the Tuesday following,—and were five weeks and four days until we landed at our port. The ship we sailed by was large, and employed in the timber trade, having many sailors for her crew. At first, these spoke very unguardedly, but I believe I have seldom had a better opportunity of doing good; for being much in their company, I failed not to let drop such words of advice as might be of use to their immortal souls. So favourable seemed the impression at length made, that we parted with great reluctance at the end of the voyage,—by which time our conversations had become very different from what they were at first; and when taking leave, I said, I hoped we should all meet in heaven. One of them came with us several miles, helping us to bear part of our goods to another ship, which was to take us up the river; and before parting, he requested earnestly one of the owners of that ship to take notice of us; who, accordingly, showed us much kindness. Thus we had friends all the way to Frederick Town. When we arrived there, we found one Thomas Kay, ready to receive us, from our sons; for he got a place for us, and all our lading, free of charge: after which we had twenty-five miles to walk to our sons' house, on a Saturday,—where we once more all met in Christian affection and love. There is a place of worship five miles off, to which I went next day, although I was very wearied; and as there is here, as yet, no regular ministers to preach the Word, having been called upon, I made some remarks from the 7th, 8th, and 9th verses of the 89th Psalm; pointing out the nature of the fear due to God in the meeting of the saints,—that none can be compared with our God, who reigns even in the raging of the sea, and doth still the waves again when they roar and swell. On this I could speak by experience, to men who had had similar experience; for they had all come from England, and many of them had seen the need of God's protection, when the seas rolled, and danger threatened. I concluded by singing the same verses of the same Psalm. Thus far have I gone, my reverend friend; but yet, like David, I often long that I had 'the wings of a dove,' that I might find myself among you all, my former friends, on the Lord's Day. O that I may feel the same joy when I close my eyes in death, that I have often felt when singing the praises of God, and sitting down at a communion table! From this last unspeakable privilege I am, for a time, withdrawn; but there is a table in heaven which will never be drawn any more. But now that God hath led me into the wilderness, O that he would speak comfortably to my soul! To you, my spiritual friend, I will not withhold, for I have felt the love of God on my soul more than I could in word or in writing express—when none but God, that knoweth all things, was present.

"The people here show me greater respect than I deserve, and seem glad to have me among them on the Sabbath-day. Yet I often regret leaving my friends, from whom I received so many tokens of respect. When I put these on, I yet fancy I am among you all! How can I speak of all your kindness, and not be moved with gratitude and love to your souls? I know not what the Lord may have to do with me, who am but a weak instrument in his hand; but O that I were able to proclaim his glory to all men on sea or land, for what he hath done for my soul! To you, with whom I have been so long acquainted, and one whose welfare I am bound to pray for from my very soul—to the congregation, too, of which you are minister—how often do my thoughts turn! I have three times dreamed of being in that hallowed place—and none but God and myself can tell how ardently I wished that it had been more than a dream! This should teach us to improve our privileges while we enjoy them, and to catch the favourable influences of the Spirit of grace, lest God withdraw from us our mercies. When I look back, I can see many failings, which should lead me to "redeem the time since the days are few and evil." I have not much opportunity of writing, as the house I am in is unfinished; but they promise to have it ready soon, and all that is needful is at hand, for this end. You will remember me, my reverend friend, to all your congregation, and let them know how dear they are to my soul. O that they may improve under your ministry, and that teacher and taught may both be taught of God! Peace be within the walls where I have worshipped so long, and to which I joyed when it was said, Go up to the house of God! Oh! remember me in your prayers, who am in a distant land; and when this comes to hand, write me an answer—it will be a cordial to my soul! Once more, to you, and the elders and trustees, and to all the people, I send the respects of us all; and may the Lord bless you all! Amen! Waiting your answer, I remain your humble friend and well-wisher." (Signed) "THOMAS CRAIG."

This letter was immediately replied to from Glasgow where Mr Gray then was, on professional duty.

[Conclusion of Discourse preached on the departure of Mr Thomas Craig for America. By the Rev. THOMAS GRAY, A. M., Minister of the Scotch Church, Wooler,* Northumberland.]

Finally, brethren, did Abram, though sojourning in the Land of Promise, ever regard himself only as a stranger and a pilgrim upon earth? So also do ye continually, like him, "looking for a better, even an heavenly country." Here, indeed, "we have no continuing city," and no abiding-place; and the people of God, in particular, are doomed to many changes,—especially if they are long sojourners in this vale of tears. Like Israel's tribes at the wells of Elim, when refreshed by cooling streams, and reposing under the grateful shades of their spreading palms, we linger for a season on some sunny spots in the wilderness; each sitting under his own vine, or beneath his own fig-tree, with inexpressible delight; yet earthly joys and earthly privileges are uncertain and transitory; for, like God's ancient people, we must again strike our tents, and brave once more the toils, the trials, and the dangers, of the desert. Abram, you have seen, was not only called from his country, his kindred, and from his father's house, to a land wherein he was a stranger; but after he had been comfortably settled in that land, a famine for a time forced him thence into the territories of the king of Egypt. Of the apostle Peter our Lord said, "Verily, verily, when thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not;" and, in accordance with this prediction, when age and debility had nearly extinguished life's feeble flame, this intrepid servant of Christ was carried to martyrdom and death. Naomi, with her husband and sons, too, driven from their country by famine, "went out full, but she returned again empty:" and when her former friends, moved at

* We think it right to avail ourselves of the present opportunity to correct an error into which we inadvertently fell in a former article of the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD. The error and its correction are thus noticed in a letter from Mr Gray:—

"SIR.—In your Biographical Sketch of my predecessor, the late Rev. James Mitchell, allow me to direct your attention to two inaccuracies into which the author of that Sketch seems inadvertently to have fallen. In your 27th Number, (of 6th March 1841.) p. 152, after referring to the late Mr Mitchell's tours in England and Scotland, with the view of collecting money to assist in erecting a new chapel in Wooler, it is said that he went to London in the following year, for the same purpose; after which it is added,—"This tour, however satisfactory, did not realize a sum sufficient to build the chapel. He completed it, however, by another journey through some parts of Scotland which he had not already visited." Now the fact is, that notwithstanding Mr Mitchell was both arduous and successful in this cause, and that several small sums have been subsequently obtained for it, there still remains a debt upon the said chapel of upwards of three hundred pounds.

** It is also mentioned, in p. 152, that the period of Mr Mitchell's incumbency at Wooler was forty-one years, whereas it was twenty-seven.

** Your insertion of the preceding, in one of the earliest Numbers of your valuable Work, will much oblige, Sir, yours, &c.,

THOMAS GRAY, Minister.

"We, the undersigned, trustees of the said chapel, certify the accuracy of Mr Gray's corrections of the Biographical Sketch of the late Rev. James Mitchell, in the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD, as aforesaid.

"WM. JOHNSON,
"ROB. JOHNSON,
"JOHN BORTHWICK," } Trustees.

the sight of her misery, exclaimed, with sorrow and surprise, "Is this Naomi?" the bereaved, broken-hearted widow feelingly replied, "Call me not Naomi" (which means pleasant), "but call me Mara" (which means bitter); "for the Lord hath dealt very bitterly with me." Of how many has Naomi been the typical mother, since sin first entered into the world, and death and sorrow by sin! Since the days of the patriarchs and prophets, who "were strangers and pilgrims on earth," how numerous and heart-rending have been the instances in which families as well as individuals have been "carried whither they would not!" The gripping hand of poverty seizes its shrinking victims; and while increasing infirmities are pressing them to the earth, they are compelled, like these ancient saints, to seek in a foreign soil that support which their native land denies. Behold such a family driven from their wonted home, and forced to seek supply beyond the swelling wave! Shuddering to face the deep, they take a long and last adieu of the loved abodes of former peace and pleasure. The manly sire totters forth, leading his little son; the wailing mother follows close behind, embracing her helpless children, whose artless looks bespeak how little they know of the cause of all this unfeigned sorrow. There are the graves of their fathers! and there, every spot is associated with remembrances, to sever from which pulls the heart-strings asunder! They return, and look—and still they return again! They think of the dead, whose ashes cannot embark in the same ship, and for whose absence at this heavy hour they yet chiefly lament! In the beautiful language of Scripture, hope, which lingers last in the human breast, may whisper in their ear, "Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears, for there is hope in their end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border." Yet, alas! who that looks on such a scene is not rather disposed, with Jeremiah, sadly to say, "Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan them, but weep sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country!"

How forcibly do these remarks lead our minds to the cause of our present Discourse! Your estimable clerk and family, actuated by a sense of duty, have for some time past determined to leave their native land, and by to-morrow's sun, will embark for Transatlantic shores! and though it be unusual to take particular notice when such an officer leaves any congregation of the faithful, yet the many virtues of your clerk—his long and well-tried worth—all combine to remind me that it would neither be justice to these nor to our own feelings, to allow him silently to depart, in all probability for ever, from these, the scenes of his long and piously performed duties. Really, Christian brethren, your excellent clerk was no ordinary man; as most of you can well attest, from your knowledge of his uniform integrity—the "simplicity and godly sincerity" with which, from infancy to age, he has walked among you; but he who has worshipped for upwards of sixty years in this sanctuary, will, in all human probability, worship no longer here. He who has, for nearly the half of that period, acted in this congregation as one of its elders—dispensing the symbols of that Bread which came down from heaven for the life of men—and carrying about, at the holy communion of the supper, the emblem of that precious blood which was poured out on the cross abundantly for human salvation—shall no longer perform these, and the other sacred duties of this important office in this part of the Saviour's Church. He who, for thirty long years, has taught your voices, on the Sabbath-day, to rise in grateful accents in your Maker's praise, is now about, for the last time, to raise its tremulous tones within these sacred walls! And now no more shall he, who was your ever ready counsellor in distress and difficulty, and who so sincerely felt your joys,—“who rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept,”—yes! no longer, on the errands of Gospel mercy and grace, shall he seek your humble but well-known dwellings, among your green hills, or in the sweet seclusions of your lovely vales; no longer, with his undeviating regularity, shall he find his way, from his distant dwelling, to this house of prayer, on that day of sacred rest, when the tribes of God delight to go up to the New Testament Jerusalem, the place where Jehovah has recorded his name, and promised his peculiar blessing. Who that knows, as we do, his well-tried worth, his long and faithful services, under four ministerial incumbencies in this church, would refuse their humble tribute to such excellence, now about to depart from among us? He departs, like Abram in our text, in his old age, for a foreign land, and for scenes unknown and untried. A few more suns, and between him and you the wide Atlantic will roll; but though oceans may intervene between the faithful in Christ, your spirits can ever meet at a throne of grace. Oh! then, ever in this manner consult both his and your own welfare; and always, as ye think of your absent friends, let the prayer of Jacob and Laban rise to your lips,—“May the Lord watch between me and thee, when absent one from another.” Let us, indeed, all remember, that a season of separation and death awaits, sooner or later, every child of Adam,—that the time cometh, when, called by him that created us, “the dust shall return to the dust as it was, and the spirit unto God who gave it,”—when weeping relatives shall surround the bed of death, and the spirit, worn out with the trials of life, and the struggles of mortality, shall breathe its last sigh; for “what man is he that liveth here and shall not see death? or who shall deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?” “All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field.”

So live, then, as “strangers and pilgrims” here, that when “the time of your departure is at hand, and the hour of your offering up draws nigh,”—“when the earthly house of this your tabernacle is dissolved,”—ye may cherish a well-grounded hope, through the merits and mediation of Jehovah's dear Son, of inheriting “a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.” Amen.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE REV. ALEX. KERR,

One of the Irish General Assembly's Missionaries to India, who died at Rajkote, August 16, 1841.

In India's groves the towering palm
Lifts high its feathery plumes to heaven;
The golden orange sheds its bealm—
Perfume to flower and fruit is given;
But he is gone who shed abroad
The fragrance of the Word of God.

In Rama there is heard a wail—
 Lo! Rachel for her children weepeth :
 They are not—and the mournful tale,
 He is not—no, alas! he sleepeth.
 The sleep of death now seals the eye
 That fondly gazed on Eastern sky.

For it he left his father-land,
 His Church, his heritage, and nation—
 Perilled his life on India's strand,
 To spread the tidings of salvation.
 He lived, a Saviour to proclaim ;
 And died, rejoicing in his name.

There's mourning 'neath the palm-tree shade,
 Where now his honoured form is sleeping ;
 His brother seeks in vain his aid—
 His widow and his sister weeping :
 His little one no more shall hear
 The voice that soothed his infant ear.

There's mourning where the Hindoo roams,
 For still is now the voice of kindness ;
 Mourning within our Church and homes,
 For cold neglect and long supineness ;
 For God, in judgment just, hath said,
 Mourn, Christians, o'er your scanty aid.

Zion, arise! put on thy might—
 The heathen calls, awake to duty!
 No longer let the clouds of night
 Eushroud thy splendour and thy beauty ;
 The voice of thy departed son
 Cries that " the work is scarce begun." *

And shall his last loud dying call
 Be heard at home, and unattended ?
 Would warriors leave the rampart wall
 To be by one lone guard defended ?
 No ;—though forlorn the hope should be,
 Thousands would rush to victory !

Or does the merchant cease to toil
 Because the wild sirocco sweepeth
 Its wings of death o'er India's soil,
 Where many a son of commerce sleepeth ?
 No ;—love of gold drowns every sense,
 Braves burning winds and pestilence.

And shall our Church in doubting stand,
 While warriors in the field are falling ?
 Shall Rajkote's little mourning band
 For speedy help in vain be calling ?
 Zion, awake! go forth with speed,
 And succour in the time of need!

" The work is scarce begun," so long
 As India for thy help is crying ;
 Go, stand amidst the heathen throng,
 Between the living and the dying ;
 Burnish thy tarnished sword and shield,
 And haste thee to the battle-field!

W. M'COMB.

THE GOSPEL HID TO THE LOST :
 A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN THOMSON, A.M.,
 Minister of Mariners' Church, Leith.

[Preached at the Induction of the Rev. Thomas Clark, in the Old Church, Edinburgh, August 19, 1841.]

" If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost."—
 2 COR. iv. 3.

In the chapter preceding the one from which our text is taken, the apostle states in what respects

* " I would say to the Church, that until his labourers are in this province, two in Rajkote, two in Furbander, and two in the direction of Gogo, the work can scarcely be regarded as begun."—Extract from Mr Kerr's last letter.

the dispensation of the Gospel is superior to that of the Law. It is superior in two respects,—in its light, and in its power. The revelations given to Moses and the prophets did, indeed, contain an exhibition of the character of God, and of the principles of the Divine government, but the information conveyed on those subjects, although correct, so far as it went, was limited and imperfect, and consequently, as it is through the truth that men are sanctified, it is certain that in this case, where the amount of truth communicated was small, its power over the soul to regenerate and purify would also be small. But the Gospel throws a full, a clear, and a steady light, over all those subjects which it is of the greatest importance for man to know—a light which leaves no doubt on the mind, either as to the reality or nature of the truth conveyed. It is the full revelation of the glory of God. This full revelation exercises a correspondingly strong influence over the mind of man. This is owing as well to its inherent strength as to the more enlarged outpouring of the Holy Spirit with which it is accompanied. The Gospel is pre-eminently "the manifestation of the Spirit,"—it giveth life. Its light is such as to dispel the darkness, and its power is such as to remove the deadness, of the soul. It may be compared to a light shining upon the eyes of a man who, though not incurably, is yet actually, blind. Such a light may be conceived to possess a mild restorative power ; having in it an influence capable of bringing again into exercise the suspended powers of vision—while, at the same time, it invests with a clear and strong lustre the objects of external nature, so that they are easily discerned by the restored eye. So it is with the light of the Gospel. When it is brought to bear upon the dead and dark soul of man, it exercises a mighty influence, in the hands of the Spirit. It reanimates and reinvigorates, while at the same time it casts a flood of clear lustre on all those objects which man, as an immortal being, ought to know. These, again, exert a reflex influence over the state of his heart, being instrumental, in the hands of the Spirit, in carrying forward to perfection the already begun work of sanctification. " We all with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

But if such be the nature of the Gospel—if its light is so great as to command conviction, and if its power is so strong as to produce a change in the bent of the inclination—how does it happen that there are many of those to whom it has been fully explained who have never been benefited by it? In the days of the apostles there were, as in our own times there still are, many on whom all the glorious light and mighty power of the Gospel have been brought to bear, without producing any salutary effect—what shall we say of these? Concerning them the apostle says, in the words of our text, that they are lost—" If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost." There is something very awful in this statement. Its import may be thus explained:—The Gospel is indeed as glorious as it has been described; wherever it shines upon a soul, it enlightens with divine knowledge, and it transforms into the image of God; and with regard to those on whom it has shone without producing any saving effect, the fact that it has done so is a proof that they are lost—lost beyond the reach of recovery. Just as when a powerful remedy has been brought to bear upon the dark eye-balls of a man, if, after having produced an effect upon all others, it has produced none on him, it becomes evident that his eye-sight is totally gone—gone beyond the possibility of recovery. The Gospel light exerts a powerful healing influence on the human mind, but if that influence has been made to bear without effect on any human mind, the conclusion to be drawn is obvious—that such a mind is lost, lost beyond the possibility of recovery, being beyond the reach of the most powerful instrument that shall ever be devised for its restoration.

But, in order to derive from the subject that practical improvement which it is designed to give us, it will be necessary to consider what is the exact import of the expression, “if our Gospel be hid.” In illustrating this subject, we cannot adopt a better arrangement than the one to which we have adverted, as being used by the apostle in the preceding context, in speaking of the superiority of the Gospel dispensation over that of the law.

I. In the first place, then, we observe, the Gospel has been hid, when its superior light has failed to illuminate the understanding.—There are, it is to be feared, some in every congregation who have, for a considerable length of time, been in the habit of hearing the Gospel, but have never understood its real import. Some of these, in their attendance on divine ordinances, have no very definite view of being profited at all. They consider their attendance as a sort of homage rendered to God, or of respect paid to religion, which will serve as a recommendation to the Divine favour. They take an outward part in the services, but their heart does not go along with their outward profession. They may join in the singing of the Psalms (although many of those whom I am now describing do not even go that length), but they never think of engaging in it as an exercise of the Spirit—the lifting up of the very soul in praise to God. They stand up during prayer, but their minds are either wandering to and fro over the earth, or they are in a state of complete inactivity. They never think of distinctly forming in their minds the desires embodied in the language of the minister, and of presenting to God these desires as their own. They preserve, perhaps, an outward decorum during the sermon, but they never suppose that the preacher is saying something in which they personally are deeply concerned. The idea that what is said is addressed to them never once enters their mind.

Again, there are others who advance a considerable step beyond this, but to whom, no less than to these, the Gospel is hid. They know that they should take a personal and an understanding share in all the services of the sanctuary. The idea that attendance in the house of God is an act which, for its own sake, and irrespective of the state of mind of the worshipper, is well-pleasing to God, they know to be absurd. They are well aware that attendance on God's house has no mysterious or unintelligible efficacy about it; they know that it is only valuable as means to an end. They know that God is a Spirit; that the worship of the spirit is the only kind of worship with which he is pleased; and that the preaching of the Gospel is profitable only when it is understood, believed, and acted upon by the hearers. But although they know these things, they practise them very little. Occasionally, in prayer or praise, they may seriously think of God; but in general this is not the case. During by far the greater proportion of the time they are occupied with very different subjects. Instead of worshipping God, their minds are running after business or pleasure, or, it may be, sin. During the preaching of the Word, they occasionally understand a good deal of what is said; but they have never taken the trouble to understand the Gospel as a connected system of divine truth, on their knowledge and belief of which, as such, their destiny as immortal beings depends. They may be interested, amused, or delighted by the preacher's manner, by the force of his eloquence, or by the point of some of his reprehensions of particular sins; but with regard to taking any pleasure in the great truths of God's Word regarding our salvation, by the blood and Spirit of Christ, that is a matter altogether strange to their minds. The truths of the Gospel, my friends, are such, that wherever they are understood, they excite an interest in the mind which no other subject ever can do; and if we have not felt interested or delighted in the very truths of the Bible, in a way in which we have never felt regarding any other subject, these truths have to us, as yet, been hid. Apply, then, what I have said to yourselves. I speak as to reasonable men: Is the Gospel hid to you, or is it not? If the Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost.

II. But, in the second place, the Gospel has been hid when its superior power has failed to sanctify the soul. The Gospel dispensation is distinguished from that of the law, by its light and by its power; that is, by its capability of enlightening the understanding, and of sanctifying the heart. To the first we have already adverted, and we have endeavoured to show who those are on whom the light of the Gospel has not produced any saving effect. It is to the second that we have now to direct your attention, for the purpose, in like manner, of describing who those are on whom the power of the Gospel has not begun to operate. By the power of the Gospel, is meant, its capability of changing the mind of man from its natural condition, into a state of resemblance to the mind of God; "we all with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." Those to whom the Gospel has not been lost, have been changed more or less into the image of God.

But let us examine more particularly what is meant by the image of God being on the mind. The language here employed is figurative, being borrowed from an image reflected in a mirror. As then, that an object be reflected in a mirror, it is implied that the mirror be turned towards the object, the expression before us implies, first, that the mind be turned towards God. There is in the human mind a tendency to keep away from God. Of this we must be sensible from the fact that we have spent days and weeks, nay, perhaps years, during which the thought of God has scarcely if ever entered our minds. We pursued our ordinary employments, or engaged in our usual pleasures, without reference to God. It is this that constitutes the essence of all our sinfulness, it is from this, as from a source, that flows sin of every kind, it is this which is in itself the most grievous offence,—this forgetfulness of God, this living, as the Scriptures expresses it, without God in the world. Now, those, to whom the Gospel has come with power, have had this ungodliness of heart removed. They habitually think of God. They not only hold communion with him in prayer; they also trace his hand in the operations of providence, and recognise his presence in the daily transactions of life.

But farther, to have the image of God upon our minds implies, that the same habits and dispositions of mind which are his glory, exist in us. Of these the chief,—as it is the root and essence of all the rest—is the principle of love; love to God as the author of our being, and love to men, as partakers of the same nature with ourselves. Wherever the Gospel comes with power, it implants this principle. This is a principle which is not natural to the minds of men. They are enemies to God in their hearts, and by wicked works, and they are hateful and hating one another. That this is the case, is obvious from the fact, that men are habitually indifferent to God and their fellow-men, and that when their own interests are injured, or their own wills crossed, the most desperate and open hostility will be manifested. But the case is different with those to whom the Gospel has come with power. Having seen the bright display of divine love to man manifested in the cross of Christ, these hearts have, by that amazing exhibition, been sweetly drawn out in love to their God and Saviour. This principle of love manifests itself in a life becoming the Gospel; in sincere, sustained, and, through the grace of God, successful efforts to subdue every evil passion, to renounce every sinful practice, and to grow in the cultivation of every thing that is holy and lovely and of good report:

Such then, is what is implied in the Gospel being hid. It has been hid, whenever it has failed to enlighten the understanding, and to sanctify the will. And the solemn statement made by the apostle, concerning the final prospects of such men as are referred to in that expression, is, that they are lost. Has the Gospel then, let me ask, been brought to bear on any of you without producing such blessed effects? Has its light failed to illuminate your understanding? Has its power failed to mould your will? Are there any now present, who have continued for a length of time to hear the Gospel, and have not found something in it which interests them more deeply than any thing else ever did? Are there any who are still strangers to the pretence of God in their daily occupations? Are there any who are still devoted to the works of the flesh, cherishing sinful passions, or following sinful practices? Or are there any in whose character and conduct the fruits of the Spirit do not appear? O let me entreat such seriously to contemplate the solemn statement of the text concerning their condition,—they are lost. Though certainly still in the place of hope, the probability that they shall be saved, is so very small, as to admit of him who is the God of truth applying to them as descriptive of their present condition, the emphatic words, that they are lost! Men think it a matter of very little importance to listen to the preaching of the Gospel. It is, my friends, an affair of most momentous import. The Gospel is so full of light and power, that when preached, it commands attention, and produces conviction, it illuminates the understanding, and moulds the will; or if it fail to do this, it is because the soul on whom it has failed, is lost—lost beyond the power of the Gospel to reclaim.

But the subject which I have been considering is full of instruction to the real Christian. From this subject, my friends, you may learn to exercise a strong compassion, and to put up earnest prayers in behalf of such of your fellow-worshippers as are unconverted. Were one of the spirits of the lost to be permitted to leave for a little his place of woe, for the purpose of appearing before you, and telling you his state, your minds, I am persuaded, would be filled with the deepest commiseration. But, my friends, there are many around you whose state is almost as hopeless. These are they to whom the Gospel has been hid—they who have long heard the Gospel preached, but have not been converted by it. The case of such men is far more hopeless than that of those who never heard the Gospel. Their continued impenitence under the preaching of the Gospel affords a strong presumption that they are lost souls. Their case is better than that of the spirits already in torment, only in this respect, that being yet in the land of the living, it is barely possible, though very improbable, that they shall ever be saved. O then, when we consider that they are on the very brink of eternal ruin, and when we know that there is, as yet, a possibility that they may be saved, how earnestly should we labour, and how importunately should we pray, that they may even yet be pulled out of the fire! It is an awful thought for a minister of the Gospel to look round upon his congregation and to know that there are some whose destruction is sealed by the very message of peace which he is delivering. Every time you hear the Gospel you are either brought nearer to God, or you are driven farther away from him. If the Gospel does not soften, it invariably hardens. We are either the saviour of life unto life, or we are the saviour of death unto death. And who is fit for these things?

Finally, my friends, if we have in any measure known and tasted that the Lord is gracious, it will be impossible for us to view the light and the power of the Gospel, and to consider that there are men who have resisted that light and power, without being feelingly reminded of the vast extent to which we are debtors to the grace of God. If our souls have been enlightened and softened by the Gospel, while others have become darkened and more hardened, let us beware of ascribing the glory of this to ourselves. On the contrary, let us be humbled when we think of the darkness of mind and hardness of heart with which we long continued to resist the truth, and let the prevailing and deep-rooted conviction of our minds be, that it is by the grace of God that we are what we are. While we take to ourselves all the blame, let us ascribe to God all the glory.

ADDRESS TO THE MINISTER.

YOU have now, by the solemn act of the Presbytery, in virtue of the authority delegated unto them by the Lord Jesus Christ, been invested with the spiritual charge of this congregation and parish. On such an important occasion as the formation of the pastoral union between minister and people, our Church has wisely ordered that both parties should be solemnly reminded of the duties which they mutually owe to one another; and although, in itself, it certainly were a much more seemly thing that you should instruct me, than that I should address you, yet I feel relieved, in the discharge of my present duty, by the reflection, that I have been placed here to-day, not to bring before you such truths and considerations as you previously were unacquainted with, but, as the organ of the Presbytery, authoritatively to call your attention to certain well-known truths.

I. Allow me, then, to remind you, that your first and most important duty is, to preach the Gospel in public on Sabbath to Sabbath. I need not tell you what the substance of your preaching must be. You have already solemnly renewed your engagement to preach "the whole council of God," in all its fulness, as set forth in the Standards of our Church. You must, then, make it your aim to describe the state of man, as a fallen creature. You must tell your hearers, that in virtue of their connection with the great parent of our race, they are condemned by their God, and excluded in his sight. However deserving of the esteem of their fellow-men their character and conduct may have been, a sentence of righteous condemnation has been passed against them in the court of Heaven, assigning them everlasting woe as their well-merited portion. And however amiable may be their dispositions, their minds are the seat of the most detestable feelings towards Him who is the best and the loveliest of all beings,—for "the carnal mind is enmity against God." And however able they may be to devise and to carry through many a deed of noble enterprise, yet, until united to Christ, and renewed by the Spirit of his grace, they are as unable to do any thing really pleasing to God as the dead body of a man is unable to take part in the active business of life,—for "we are dead in trespasses and sins," and "no man can come unto Christ except the Father draw him." But having thus fully explained man's guilt, and depravity, and weakness, you will consider that you have only prepared the way for the full development of the scheme of redeeming love. It will be your delight to tell of what angels desire to look into with adoring reverence the councils of eternity—the eternal covenant between the Father and the Son, the mysterious nature of that mighty Deliverer who was "God manifest in the flesh," and the all-prevailing nature of that sacrifice which he offered, forming, as it does, the foundation of that work which, as "Mediator between God and man," it is his prerogative to execute. Oh! it is delightful thus to dwell with adoring reverence on that wondrous scheme by which God may be the just God, and yet the Saviour,—just, while justifying the ungodly. But you will not consider that you have done enough, even after having explained, in all its fulness, the plan of redemption. You will ply your hearers, from time to time, with heart-touching solicitations to seek, each for himself, a personal interest in Christ. There is an important, a critical step, in the mental experience of every child of Adam who is to enter into the kingdom of glory, known in Scripture by various names, according to the different light in which it may be viewed. It is faith, or believing, when viewed as an act of man; it is the new birth, or regeneration, when viewed as the effect of the Spirit of God; and it is conversion when viewed as exhibited in the changed heart and altered life. Such a vital transition, such a thorough change, is as necessary for the rich as for the poor, for the learned as for the ignorant, for the amiable and correct as for the turbulent and vicious. On this, as on a sure foundation—a changed state, and a changed nature—you will build the noble superstructure of Gospel holiness. It is only when brought into a state of reconciliation with God, that man sees a possibility of loving him; and it is only when his nature is renewed, that he feels any inclination to exercise such a hallowed feeling. When the love of God as a reconciled Father is thus, through the Holy Spirit, shed abroad in the heart, the principle of all right conduct towards God and man is thus established. But a great part of the duty of a minister of the Gospel consists in tracing the connection between principle and practice. You will show them that the reception of the truth must lead to a holy, spiritual frame of mind, to a sustained walk with God, and to the daily exemplification of every grace and the constant practice of every duty. The child of God must walk with his heavenly Father, "enduring, as seeing him who is invisible," and enjoying the light of his countenance, animated by the motives of the Gospel, bringing heavenly principles to bear upon every circumstance of life, and, sustained by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, must exhibit before the world the mild radiance of correct feeling, and the uniform tenor of an upright life. To bring out thus fully the principles, and to exhibit thus faithfully the practice, of the Gospel, is a matter of no ordinary difficulty. Each of our discourses must be so full as that there may be no danger, in the language of Scripture, "of the trumpet giving an uncertain sound;" while, at the same time, each discourse ought to be so simple as to be easily comprehended and retained even by the most illiterate of our hearers. We must endeavour to bring out of the treasury of divine truth what will be profitable to all, but, at the same time, what the most highly cultivated minds will feel to be worthy of their attention, and the most unlearned of our audience will so far understand as to feel interested in. In order to our arriving at this, and at other excellences in our pulpit duties, I need not remind you that great labour throughout life will be necessary. It will not do for us to think of serving God with what costs us little. God can, indeed, if he please, carry on his own work even with an unworthy instrument; but the order of his procedure is, that in proportion to the fitness of the instrument is the good done. In proportion to the amount of prayer and faith, of holy labour and of earnest desire for the conversion of souls, on the part of his servants, is the amount of good that, in most cases, is actually effected. And when we think of the vast honour that God does us in calling us to be fellow-workers with him, in carrying out the plan of redemption, surely it will not be possible for us to weary in well-doing.

II. But, in the second place, allow me to remind you, that it will be by the nature of your intercourse with the world throughout the week in private, no less than by your discourses from the pulpit on the Sabbath-day, that you are to promote the cause of Christ. By the solemn act of ordination, you were not merely appointed to a certain duty—you were wholly set apart to God. A minister of the Gospel is, so to speak, a consecrated thing—he has ceased to be like other men. Is it, then, the aim of all our preaching to bring men into a habitually, prevalent, spiritual state of mind? We must seek to cultivate that state of mind for ourselves. And is it our main object to educe from this all particular duties towards God and man? We must be careful that we do not destroy the effect of our Sabbath services by our week-day conduct. One proud or angry look, one expression of worldly principle or of selfish feeling, will give the lie to many a sermon; whereas the heavenly air which a man of God breathes, the atmosphere of holiness by which he is surrounded, exercises a most commanding influence. You must study, then, to live well, no less carefully than to preach well. We must exercise our thoughts as to how we shall frame our lives, no less diligently than as to how we shall frame our words, so as shall most tend to the salvation of men. Our business is to save souls. That business we are to carry on by our lives, as well as by our words—by heavenly mindedness, by devotedness to God, by holy energy in his cause, by self-denial, and by separation from the world—no less than by full statements of Gospel truth, and by urgent and affectionate appeals to the conscience. "Men must see us live, as well as hear us preach, the life of faith." In every situation, then, you will bear along with you the important maxim—the minister always, less than the minister never.

III. But I have still farther to remind you, that you have this day been admitted to the spiritual charge of a parish, as well as of a congregation. In connection with the inhabitants of your parish, you will have peculiar and self-denying duties to discharge. Degraded as many of them undoubtedly are, you are nevertheless to consider that you have a special concern with the soul of each. As their pastor in the Lord, it will be necessary for you, not only to endeavour to attract them by your preaching on the Sabbath-day, but also to enter repeatedly into their dwellings through the week, to deal with them one by one—entreat, warning, rebuking, comforting, and instructing, according as the circumstances of each case may require. And it will not be one or two visits that, in most cases, will be productive of any good; it will not be till after several years of patient and untiring labour, that you will be able to discern any great change wrought on the general aspect of your parish. You will undoubtedly meet with many, in regard to whom all your labour will be in vain; but even with these your connection is most solemn. It will only be after your labour in regard to them has been closed, either by their death or yours, that you shall have delivered your own soul. O give not up any as hopeless, until God Almighty gives them up by sending them to their own place. With most, however, you will be successful. The Gospel message, repeatedly and affectionately delivered, will be followed by the blessing of God. If you seek for the lost sheep whom God hath purchased with his own blood, they will hear your voice, and will follow you into the fold; and, amid the now degraded population of your parish, you will assuredly find some, and it may be not a few, who, under your careful superintendence, will become characters of surpassing loveliness. In every neglected district, there are to be found many who, if left to themselves and to the influences around them, would have sunk to the very depths of ignominy and wretchedness; but who, possessing natural capabilities of the best kind, become, when brought under the saving influences of the Gospel, peculiarly eminent as examples of every thing that is excellent in the Christian character. And I do not know any enjoyment which a truly Christian mind can feel at all to be compared to the reflection, of having been instrumental in accomplishing such changes as these.

Allow me now, in conclusion, to remind you, that it will not be possible to enjoy comfort in the discharge of these your duties, or even to continue in any degree faithful to your duties, in any other way than by cultivating and habitually maintaining a spiritual frame of mind. Endeavour, then, to realize your connection with the spiritual, the unseen world. Endeavour to keep steadily before you the origin of your office, the aim of your labour, and the end of your course. You are an ambassador for Christ; the aim of your labours is to convert the ungodly and to edify the saints; the end of a faithful minister's course is the "crown of glory, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, himself will give."

ADDRESS TO THE CONGREGATION.

MY CHRISTIAN FRIENDS AND BRETHREN,—members of this congregation, it is part of my duty on the present occasion, to remind you of the obligations under which you are laid, in consequence of the union that has now been formed. Your duties are in all respects reciprocal to those of your minister, and, therefore, having dwelt so fully on these, it will not be necessary that I should address you at any length. Is it the duty of your minister to preach the whole council of God? It is your part to give a constant attendance on his ministry, to receive into your hearts the whole truth, and to endeavour by meditation and private prayer, to have the frame of your minds, and the tenor of your lives brought under its salutary influence. Listen to your minister, not as you would listen to a lecturer, on some branch of natural or moral science. He occupies a position eminently higher than this. Listen to him as an ambassador from the King of glory. This, however, does not imply that you are to receive with implicit confidence whatever he may say. No; as an ambassador he carries with him both his credentials and his written message. He puts it to your conscience, to examine these for yourselves. If, after examination, you are satisfied that his spoken is not in accordance with his written message, you must leave him till the great day of reckoning, when the Judge of all flesh will settle the point in dispute between you, and award such retribution as may be due either to an unfaithful pastor, or to a gainsaying people. But unless you can satisfy your minds thoroughly from the Word of God that your minister is in the wrong, you are bound to receive his message as the voice of God. He holds a commission, not from the kings and judges of the earth, but from the King Eternal, Immortal, and Unchangeable. And, therefore, in rejecting his message (unless you can disprove it), you are rejecting, not man, but God. And should any continue in such a state of mind till the close of life, they will, at the great day of judgment, in addition to all their other charges, stand guilty to having insulted the majesty of heaven in one of his accredited ambassadors.

In conclusion, let me remind the members of this congregation, that they, no less than their minister, have peculiar and very solemnly binding duties in regard to the inhabitants of the parish. In the community of saints, no one is wise for himself: every believer in his own place, is a light to the world. You will then, by your prayers, by your varied efforts of Christian benevolence, and by your interest in the religious education of the young, co-operate with your minister, in his efforts to work a great moral and spiritual change on the population around you. In a particular manner, it is the solemn duty of every elder of this church, to take an active part in this work of faith, and labour of love. By visiting the people, by inquiring as to their regularity of attendance in the sanctuary, by searching among them for the fruits of your pastor's Sabbath services, by reading the Scriptures, by warning, reproving, and encouraging, and by praying with them from family to family, the elders, if faithful to their charge, will take each his part in strengthening the hands, and encouraging the heart of their pastor. And may the great Head of the Church grant, that the beauty of the Lord our God may be upon you; the work of your hands may he establish upon you, yea, the work of your hands may he establish it. And may the Lord bless you and keep you, may the Lord make his face to shine upon you, and be gracious unto you, may the Lord lift upon you the light of his countenance, and give you peace. Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Different classes in the Church.—There are three sorts of men in the Church:—First, Those who know not Christ, and revolt from him; secondly, Those who, according to their own vocation, diligently and zealously use those things which he has given them, to his glory, and the good of their neighbours; and, thirdly, Those who are benumbed by indolence, and do no good. When the Lord shall come, he will inflict righteous vengeance on the first; he will bless the second in proportion to the labours which they have sustained; and he will also punish the last as useless; even those who waste an indolent life in deliberation and speculation.—BEZA.

The Believer's progress.—The Christians' interest in "the kingdom of God," equally determines their personal conduct, and regulates their views of the present life. "They are saved by hope." They hope for the world which lasts for ever. "They go from strength to strength, till every one of them appear in Zion before God." Their faith every day penetrates farther "within the veil, whither the fore-runner is for us entered." It sheds light and peace around all their lot,—it sustains their courage through life and death,—it enables them to become to one another the instruments of mutual animation and fortitude, during their pilgrimage together; and it impresses this conviction deeply on their minds, that their interests in the kingdom of God are permanent and certain; that all their hope will be at last realized; that “their labour is not in vain in the Lord;” and that “in due season they shall reap, if they faint not.”—SIR H. MONCREIFF, D. D.

The Christian and the Worldling contrasted.—Here is a religious man sitting under his vine, or under his fig-tree, viewing the prosperity which God hath given him, in the returns of husbandry or of commerce. Yonder a worldly man is similarly situated. The breast of the one swells with high devotion, in surveying the scene around him; the love of God glows in his heart, the hope of heaven beams in his elevated eye. While his herds feed around him, or the winds waft home in safety the fruits of his successful adventures, he is conscious of something within him, which chastens and exalts the satisfaction that naturally flows from issues of prosperous life. The worldling has no sentiments but such as are connected with things present. In the gains and glories of time, he sees all his portion; nor rise his sentiments above it. In this case, who does not see, that to the possession of present good, piety superadds its peculiar joys? And therefore in their common prosperity, the religious and the irreligious man are very unequal in point of true heart-felt, and reasonable enjoyment. Both have the pleasures of taste, and the gladness of prosperity; but what an exquisite relish is added to this taste, and to that gladness, by the exalted sentiments of devotion! Next view them in privation. Some sad reverse occurs, and both are left in poverty and destitution. The shock is, perhaps, too great for worldly fortitude to stand; and if not overwhelmed in despair, yet happiness is confessedly gone. The believer, however, from his Rock of salvation, sees flocks, and herds, and possessions laid waste; and turns him to rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the hope of a more enduring substance. Contrast them, then, in privation, and shall any one be at a loss to determine whose spirit is the noblest, and whose sentiments are the most connected with joy, and who is the most secure against the reverses of time?—REV. J. SILVERIAUNT.

It is better to trust in God than to put confidence in men.—These are the words of the royal psalmist; and every man may experience their truth. We daily put confidence in friends, who, though perhaps willing and sincere, are weak and frail, and yet we fear to trust in God. The mere promise of a man in power fills us with delight, and gives us full security; and yet the Gospel holds out to us the promises of eternal life and happiness, unregarded. The world promises, and we believe,—God speaks, and we will not hearken. What infatuation misguides us? What delusive phantom steps between us and our good? O God! have pity on thy poor creatures and withdraw this blindness from us! Give us thy grace, that we may place our whole confidence in thy mercy, and know that in the day of adversity thy help shall not fail; for thou art from everlasting, and shalt be to all eternity.—ARCHBISHOP FENBLON.

The wisdom of the Christian Scheme.—An evidence of the wisdom of God in the cross of Christ, is, that the doctrine of it is designed especially to counteract the very sin by which man originally fell. Man fell by pride, he is restored in a way of humility. He fell by self-dependence, he is saved by self-renunciation. We lost ourselves by a vain desire after wisdom, we return to God by the foolishness of the cross. As we sinned by presumptuous curiosity, the wisdom of God humbles us at the very root of the tree of knowledge, and compels us to renounce the pride of our understanding, and submit to faith. Every thing connected with the cross of Christ, opposes the reigning evil of our fallen hearts. Human wisdom receives not the doctrine, human pride comprehends nothing of it. Repentance begins in humility, faith moves in it as its proper atmosphere, claiming nothing but from the undeserved mercy of God; prayer is the breathing of humility; justification is a free gift; salvation is of grace; and obedience is the fruit of submission; every step, every act, every duty, every feeling of a Christian, all is humility. Sin has changed the way to happiness. In the first, God wished to draw men to a knowledge of himself, by the use of their reason, and the contemplation of the wisdom of his works. In the second, the Saviour draws men, by the folly of the word of the cross, and by the subjection of their reason and will to the doctrine of faith. Religion is the remedy of human pride, as it is not so much a science of the understanding as of the heart.—REV. D. WILSON.

Christ our fellow-sufferer.—Let it not be thought that the sympathy of Christ is an imaginary consolation. As a partaker of humanity he felt the tie of a consoling relation. As a partaker of affliction in our humanity, the effects produced on the human mind by actual experience, are expressly ascribed to him. And surely the fact, that he suffered all that we do, and infinitely more, tends very much to produce the happiest effects on our minds. It comforts and encourages us in the hour of trial. We love to have recourse to one who has known our distress. Sorrow in suffering, has often become, even among strangers, the foundation of warm attachment and intimate intercourse. How delightful, then, to have, in the friend who was born for adversity, in the friend who stands closer than a brother, a Saviour, whose heart feels the weight of every sigh which is heaved before him.—REV. G. EWING.

Christ the only Saviour.—How happens it, that there is such a thing as salvation at all for sinful men? I need not say that Christ is all in accomplishing this. It was his own arm that brought salvation; it was his own righteousness that sustained him. What human creature helped the Lord Jesus when he received mercy and truth, and made righteousness and peace embrace each other; when he magnified the law, and made it honourable; when he endured his agonizing bloody sweat, his cross and passion; when he suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; when he made his soul an offering for sin, and died as the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world? It is not the cattle upon a thousand hills, nor the virtues nor the penances of sinners, but the blood of Jesus, that purchased eternal redemption, and opened the kingdom to all believers. The salvation is at all attainable by man, shall be the theme of praise to the Lamb that was slain, and redeemed us to God by his blood, through the ages of eternity.—REV. M. JACKSON.

The chief subject of Scripture.—One commanding object pervades the Scriptures, and rises to view in every page: this recurring theme, towards which all instructions and histories tend, is the great and awful question of condemnation or acquittal at the bar of God, when the irreversible sentence shall come to be pronounced. “How shall man be just with God?” is the inquiry ever and again urged upon the conscience of him who reads the Bible with a humble and teachable desire to find therein the way of life. In subserviency to this leading intention, the themes which run through the sacred writings, and which distinguish those writings by an immense dissimilarity from all the polytheistic literature, are those of guilt, shame, contrition, love, joy, gratitude, and affectionate obedience. And moreover, in conformity with this same intention, the Divine Being is revealed, if not exclusively, yet chiefly, as the party in the great controversy which sin has occasioned. The intercourse, therefore, which is opened between heaven and earth, is almost confined to the momentous transaction of reconciliation and renewed friendship. When the bearer of prayer invites interlocution with man, it is not, as perhaps in Eden, for the purpose of free and discursive converse, but for conference on a special business. "Come now, let us reason together, said the Almighty; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."—NATURAL HISTORY OF ENTHUSIASM.

HISTORY OF THE ALBIGENSES.

PERIOD III.

TO THE SUBJUGATION OF RAYMOND OF TOULOUSE, AND THE PERMANENT ESTABLISHMENT OF THE INQUISITION.

PART II.

MENTION has incidentally been made, in these chapters, of the inquisitorial processes by which the Albigenes were persecuted by the priests, while they were slaughtered in the field of battle, or massacred by military execution. As the history of these sufferers would be incomplete without an account of that odious tribunal which filled up the measure of their sufferings, we shall conclude with a rapid survey of the establishment of the inquisition in the south of France, and the character of its proceedings.

It was the province of Narbonne which first had the honour of this fearful visitation. In the year 1193, as soon as Innocent III. had attained the pontificate, he sent thither Guy and Regnier, two monks of Citeaux, with a commission to pursue, detect, and exterminate heresy wherever they could find it. This was the commencement of the Inquisition, that terrible system by which persecution, hitherto the outbreaks of temporary and fortuitous ebullitions, was organised into regular form, and established as a permanent institution. One of the brethren having fallen sick, Peter of Castelnau, archdeacon of Maguelonne, was joined to the commission, a personage whose atrocious doings occupy a prominent place in the history of the Albigenes. These men actively travelled from place to place, attended by a retinue of friars and soldiers, the former to argue, and the latter to slay; and where the heretics were in force, they vouchsafed to reason and debate, but where they were weak, they had recourse at once to the logic of the sword or the faggot. When the arguments were to be confined to mere words, a crowd was collected as to a tournament; the ecclesiastics, armed to the teeth with the subtleties of the Aristotelian schools, entered the lists; and against such well appointed combatants, it could scarcely be expected that illiterate peasants would often come off victorious. As might be expected also, the friars gloried in these public opportunities of intellectual parade, and were wroth with these antagonists who were non-plussed too easily.

These inquisitors, notwithstanding their zeal, were, from several political obstacles, prevented from carrying the work of persecution and conversion to the extent that was desired; and therefore, in 1208, a formidable auxiliary was sent to them by Innocent III., in the person of Saint Dominic, the great father of inquisitors. Dominic arrived upon the scene of action, and sent his monks to travel on foot, two by two, through the villages, to preach and dispute, and also to take note of those houses in which heretics dwelt, that they might be burned when convenience permitted. And now their task was accomplished vigorously during the whole progress of the war; and while the armed Albigenes rushed to the field, and perished, those who tarried at home, or buried themselves in concealment—the faint-hearted, the old, the sick, the timid woman, and the helpless child—were searched for with a scrutiny which nothing could escape, and tormented or destroyed with a malignity which no pity would soften. Even in spite of the rapid destruction of their victims also by the usual processes of execution, the inquisitors had so overcrowded the prisons, that the prelates themselves were obliged to interpose, and try to mitigate their zeal. In 1226, therefore, the Archbishops of Aix, Arles, and Narbonne represented to them that they must slacken in their work, until, if possible, materials could be procured for the erection of new prisons; but the only answer to this appeal was, a more summary process of jail-deliveries, by which the prisoners were committed by wholesale to the flames! While the spiritual head was thus busy, the secular arm, so far from being stretched forth to protect, was only eager to second the Church in crushing its victims more effectually; and the following laws, enacted in the year 1228, in the name of the king of France, against the Albigenes, will the more effectually illustrate the wretchedness of their position:—

"Wherefore, because the heretics have now of a long time spread their poison in your parts, polluting our mother, the Church, after several manners, we do, in order to their utter extirpation, decree, that all heretics deviating from the Catholic faith, by what name soever they are called, as soon as they are condemned of heresy by the bishop of the place, or by any other ecclesiastical person that hath power to do it, be without delay punished; ordaining also, and firmly enacting, that no man do presume to harbour or protect the said heretics, or favour or trust them; and that, if any one do presume to commit any thing contrary to these premises, he be made incapable of being a witness, or of any honour whatsoever, as also of making a will, or inheriting any thing. Moreover, we enact, that all his goods, real or personal, be ipso facto confiscated, never to return to him or any of his posterity. We also enact and command, that all barons of the land, and our bailiffs, and other our subjects present and future, be careful to purge the land of heretics and heretical contagion, commanding them to be very industrious in searching them out, and faithful in discovering them; and as soon as they have found any of them, to present them without delay to the persons above named, that so being convicted in their presence of error and heresy, they may, setting aside all hatred, entreaties, rewards, fear, favour, and love, give sentence against them. And that those who are diligent and careful in the searching for, and seizing of, heretics may not want the encouragement of honour and reward, we do enact, will, and command, that our bailiffs, in whose bailiwicks the said heretics shall be seized, pay to the taker, for every heretic, two marks in silver, for the term of two years, and after that time expired, one mark only."*

On the final surrender of the down-stricken and despairing Raymond VII., the Inquisition was permanently established in his dominions in November 1229, and it proceeded vigorously upon that ordonnance published in the name of Louis IX. The bishops were to depute a priest and two or three laymen into each province, who were to be sworn to search after all heretics and their abettors. "Let them visit carefully," says the first article of their instructions, "every house in their parish, and the chambers under ground which have occasioned any suspicion. Let them examine all the out-houses, the recesses under the roofs, and all the secret places, which we order them, moreover, every where to destroy. If they find there any heretics, or any of their abettors or concealers, let them, in the first place, take care that they do not escape; and then let them, with all speed, denounce them to the archbishop, the bishop, the lord of the district or his bailiffs, that they may be punished according to their deserts." When the heretic thus hunted after was inevitably caught—for where could he hide himself?—a system of moral torture was commenced for the discovery of all who were implicated in his offence, wherein the tormentors were taught by a code of instructions, of which the following is a brief extract:—"If he refuses to confess and divulge the names of his associates, let him be shut up in prison, and given to know that there are witnesses against him; and that, as soon as he is convicted by witnesses, there is no mercy for him, but that he will be given up to death. At the same time, let his food be diminished; for such fear and suffering will tend to subdue him. Let none of his friends be allowed to approach him, lest they encourage him, or teach him to answer with craft, and not to betray any one. Let no one come near him, unless it be from time to time two cunning believers, who may advise with him cautiously, as if they pitied him, to save himself from death, to confess wherein and upon what points he has erred, and who may promise him that, if he will do this, he shall escape being burned; for the fear of death, and the love of life, sometimes soften a heart that cannot be affected by any other means. Let them speak to him also in an encouraging manner, as thus: 'Don't be afraid to confess, if you believed these men, when they said such and such things, because you supposed them to be virtuous. If you listened willingly—if you helped them with your substance—if you confessed yourself to them, it was because you loved all whom you believed to be good people, and because you knew nothing evil about them. Go to, the same might happen to a wiser man than yourself, who might also be deceived by them.' If he then begins to yield, and confess that he has in some place heard these teachers speak about the gospels or the epistles, you must then ask him cautiously if these teachers did believe such and such things; for instance, whether they denied the existence of purgatory, or the efficacy of prayers for the dead—or if they held that a wicked priest, bound by sin, cannot absolve others—or what they say about the sacraments of the Church." After such questions, the opinion of the person questioned was to be cautiously ascertained upon these sentiments held by others; and thus he was entrapped, and committed at unawares, while thoughtlessly answering an apparently harmless question, and involved in the ruin of those he had betrayed. In the same instructions, the inquisitor was taught to assume the guilt of the arraigned as an ascertained fact, and only to inquire into the circumstances. Thus, to a person against whom no proof was alleged, the questions were at once propounded, "How often have you confessed yourself to heretics? In what chamber of your house have the heretics slept?" The inquisitor was also taught to look from time to time upon a book, as if it contained a record of the culprit, from which he extracted his information. By processes such as these—of confinement, hunger, and subtle cajolery, brought successively to bear upon the exhausted or entrapped victim—the truth was more effectually elicited, than it could have been even by the turning of the rack-screw; and the condemnation of one led to the detection and destruction of many.

* Quoted from "Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the Ancient Churches of the Albigenes." By Peter Alùx, D. D.

In consequence of the generous labours of Waldo, the Albigenes possessed a large portion of the Scriptures translated into their native language; and it was from this sacred fountain that their knowledge of the truth, as well as their endurance under persecution, was derived. This, indeed, was a subject of careful solicitude with their pastors, who continually impressed upon the people the necessity of studying the Bible in their mother tongue; and Raymond VII., Roman Catholic though he was, is said to have seldom gone any where without taking a copy of the Scriptures with him. This Volume, therefore, the Inquisition regarded as the principal source of heresy, and endeavoured to debar it from the multitude; and accordingly the Council of Toulouse enacted the following statute, which forms the fourteenth canon:—"We prohibit the books of the Old and New Testament to the laity; unless, perhaps, they may desire to have the Psalter, or some Breviary for Divine service, or the Hours of the blessed Virgin Mary for devotion; but we expressly forbid their having the other parts of the Bible translated into the vulgar tongue." So much, indeed, had the Albigenes become imbued with scriptural knowledge, that out of the fulness of their hearts their mouths gave utterance; and thus the first indications of heresy were considered to be, the act of quoting from the gospels or epistles! The second criterion of a heretic was a glorious testimony to the moral character of the condemned; for it was an exhortation against the crime of falsehood. A third consisted in the exhibition of any thing like sympathy for those who were imprisoned by the inquisitors.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMBRIDGE, London; W. CURRY, JUNR. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—What is the Design of my Creation, and the Great Purpose to which my Life should be directed? By the Editor. Part II., ..... Page 785 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Belshazzar's Feast." By A. Park, .... 787 3.—Geology of the Deluge. By George Macdougall, Esq. Part I., 788 4.—The Christian Experience of Miss L——. By the Editor. Part I., ..... 791 5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Robert Elder, A.M., ..... 793	6.—Sacred Poetry. "Weep not for the Dead." By William Anderson, ..... Page 796 7.—"Minims of Nature." Part IV. By the Rev. David Landaborough, ..... 797 8.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Grosvenor, Douglas, and Bayly, ..... 798 9.—On the Decrees of God, and the Execution of them in his Works. Part II. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D., 799
---	---

WHAT IS THE DESIGN OF MY CREATION, AND THE GREAT PURPOSE TO WHICH MY LIFE SHOULD BE DIRECTED?

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

II. God is the supreme object of love as well as of knowledge; and therefore it is the chief end of our being to love God. From the original constitution of the human mind, there are certain moral qualities, which, when perceived in intelligent beings, never fail to attract our regard. These qualities are, the amiable feelings and inclinations of the heart. In the beings who every where surround us, these moral feelings are possessed and exercised with various degrees of intensity, exciting in us various corresponding degrees of love. The more amiable the qualities of the contemplated object are, the more ardently are we attached to him; and when the highest moral excellencies are presented to our view, we are called upon to exercise our love to the utmost extent of which we are capable. Now, the perfections of God, calculated to excite our love, are infinitely superior to the highest moral excellencies to which man can possibly attain. As far, therefore, as infinity exceeds an inch of space, or eternity a moment of time, so far does our obligation to love God exceed our obligation to love even the most amiable and attractive of our fellow-creatures. But when we reflect that in God the highest moral excellencies are conjoined with the nearest and most endearing relationship to us, we feel still more intensely that He is well entitled to the supremacy of our affections. We are the workmanship of his hands; he continually upholds us in being, and his are all the comforts we are permitted to enjoy; and though rebels against his rightful authority, he hath caused "the day-spring from on high to visit us," bringing the glorious announcement, that "He hath not spared his own Son, but freely delivered him up unto the death for us all." What mind, then, is so ignorant as not to perceive, what heart so callous as not to feel, its permanent obligation to love God? Yet so depraved is our whole nature, so much are we subjected to the influence of the vanities of time, that the claims of our Creator are completely disregarded. He appeals, in support of these claims, to the judgment as well as to the heart; and although we speculatively admit their justice, we still remain, to a great extent, the willing and obedient slaves of "the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience." Every exercise of our love upon a proper object affords happiness or joy to the heart. When we ardently love an intelligent being, we rejoice in contemplating him, and in imitating those excellencies which we so much admire. Since, then, as we have already shown, we are under the greatest obligations to give God the highest place in our affections, and since our enjoyment is so intimately connected with our love, as to be at all times coextensive with it, it must be obvious that all our enjoyment or happiness ought to centre in God. Were it possible for us perfectly to love this infinitely excellent Being, our happiness would be pure and unalloyed; but although enjoyment so delightful is unattainable by us, who "know but in part," and therefore can love but in part, still a greater degree of happiness may be experienced, in proportion to our knowledge and admiration of the Divine character. We may remark, too, that when we love God, we become more solicitous to inquire into his perfections; and the more we know of him, the more we love him, and consequently the more happy we are. Thus it is that, by a constant action and reaction between our intellectual and moral powers, when called into exercise toward God, is our progress in knowledge and purity of heart gradually promoted, until faith give place to actual vision, and love shall be absorbed in complete enjoyment.

III. God is the supreme object of obedience, as well as of knowledge and of love, and therefore it is the chief end of our being to yield a cheerful and entire obedience to his holy will. This paramount obligation, indeed, naturally arises from the relation in which we stand to him, as being the needy and dependent creatures of his hand, and the subjects of his moral government. The law which he hath revealed for our direction is, in its nature, holy, and just, and good. Infinite in its purity, and involving, in the maintenance of its authority, inviolate, as well the interests of the moral government of the universe as the character of the moral Governor himself, it must be equally obligatory on every individual of God's intelligent creation. Thus connected and thus enforced, it is morally impossible that the severity of its requirements ever can be mitigated, or the inflexible strictness of its obligations ever can be relaxed. As long as the infinitely great God exists, or wields at will the sceptre of the universe, this law must ever retain its original purity unsullied as the Lawgiver himself. Instead, however, of obeying, as we were bound to have done, the dictates of this law, we are chargeable with an open disregard of its most sacred precepts, and with an undeviating tendency to follow each the dictates of his own corrupt inclinations. Having thus engaged in a systematic rebellion against the Majesty of heaven, man hath become blind to the moral loveliness of the Divine character, and insensible, at least practically speaking, to the obligation under which he has been laid to yield obedience to the Divine will. But when brought under the influence of the Gospel of Christ, the moral ability is restored to us of, in a measure, keeping the law of God. By the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we are enabled both "to will and to do of his good pleasure;" and every step we advance in the path of new obedience, our progress necessarily becomes the more accelerated. Beset with numerous and powerful temptations, the image of Christ is faintly reflected in the life of the Christian; and therefore it is that, as God hath "predestinated him to be fully conformed to the image of his Son," a beautiful law exists in the Divine economy, in virtue of which the restoration of his people to this image is the grand object and end of all the dispensations of God to the children of men. The Word of God, especially, is rendered the most powerful instrument in the accomplishment of this benevolent design; for in it is exhibited the character of Jesus, by contemplating which we are "transformed into the same image, from glory to glory." The Christian cannot, indeed, display the heavenly graces to the same extent as they were developed in the character of the Saviour; but still those spiritual principles, those heavenly tendencies, are implanted, by which he is enabled progressively to advance along the road that leadeth unto life. In this view, our earthly state must be regarded not only as a preparation for a future world, but, to the Christian, the threshold of eternity, the very gate of heaven. In this the infancy of our moral existence, untutored even in the elements of that sublime philosophy which regards the perfections of the God who hath created, preserved, and redeemed us, how reluctantly do we yield him, even in a partial degree, the homage of our hearts or the obedience of our lives! How truly may it be said of us, that though "we profess to know him, in works we deny him!" In those even who have in reality returned from "the path of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just," the worldly desires are so unwilling to quit their hold, so repeated are the struggles between the flesh and the mind, and so fluctuating, therefore, is their spiritual condition, that their progress in the divine life might be compared to the web, of which it was fabled of old, that what was done in the day was undone in the night. When amidst so many obstacles, the Christian is enabled to proceed, how encouraging his progress! Every step he advances his faith is more confirmed, his hope more enlivened, and his resolutions of holy living more strengthened; and "he goes on his way, rejoicing" that the same Jesus who is the author, will be "the finisher of his faith," and will conduct him in safety to those mansions of everlasting bliss, where his progress in holiness will be uniform and uninterrupted.

Thus it is, that to know, to love, and to obey God, which is the chief end of man upon earth, terminates, by a natural and necessary progress, in the complete and everlasting enjoyment of Him in heaven. When our understandings are habitually engaged in the contemplation of an object the most sublime and elevating; when our affections are elicited towards an object the most amiable, lovely, and attractive; when our active powers are incessantly employed in obeying the commands, and submitting to the appointments, of infinite Wisdom and spotless Purity; what can be expected but that, under the direction of the Spirit, we should go on unto moral perfection? We are actuated by a motive the purest and the most exalted which could influence an intelligent creature; and in what consists the dignity of our nature, if not in the possession of such a principle? It will enable us to look upon all the events of life as subordinate to the manifestation of the Divine glory, and thus reconcile us to the endurance of those calamities and trials which are incident to all in this valley of tears. Actuated by the pure motive of entire devotedness to the Divine will, our whole characters will evince a unity and consistency which is well pleasing in the sight of God; and soon shall the hour arrive when we shall know the object of our love, even as we are known of Him; when, beholding his transcendent glory, we shall be absorbed in the admiration of his wondrous excellencies, and our whole natures, purified from earthliness and sin, shall be presented before him as "a sacrifice acceptable and well pleasing in his sight."

The pure and lofty motive which we have thus briefly illustrated, is not intended to be brought into operation merely on important occasions, as if under peculiar circumstances; it must be carried with us into the minutest details of every-day life. "Whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of God." The Supreme Being must be known and acknowledged in all we think, and say, and do. It is by acquainting ourselves with him that we shall be at peace; for a knowledge of the Divine character, as it is revealed in his Word, will impart strength for the performance of every duty, and support for the endurance of every trial. As our minds expand in the knowledge, our hearts are enlarged with the love of God; and having learned to delight ourselves in him, we shall be calm, contented, and happy. Though poor, we shall view the Lord as our portion; though afflicted, "his comforts will ever delight our souls;" though deprived of earthly relatives, we are consoled with the thought that we enjoy the favour and friendship of God. Though the world should frown, and bosom-friends should forsake us, "we will trust in the Lord, and stay ourselves upon our God;" though, like our blessed Redeemer, we should be compelled to wander without a friend, a protector, or a home, we are in possession of a "hope that maketh not ashamed," and we experience a "joy that is unspeakable, and full of glory." "Happy, yea, thrice happy, is that people whose God is the Lord."

Thus have we endeavoured briefly to reply to the most important question which a rational being could propose,—“For what end was I created, and what is the grand reigning motive which ought ever to predominate in my mind?” The glory of God, or the knowledge, love, and obedience of the greatest, and wisest, and best of all beings. Innumerable are the purposes and designs which, in the course even of a single day, float along the current of our thoughts; but there is one grand, paramount principle which is intended to regulate the whole; and the presence or absence of this prevailing motive—a regard to God’s glory—may be considered as distinguishing the Christian from the unbeliever. Let us pause, then, and examine ourselves. Every day, as it passes, let us look back upon our thoughts, and words, and actions, in connection with this master-principle, and the result of our inquiry will lead us to a correct estimate of our character in the sight of infinite Purity. Let us endeavour daily to acquire more extended views of the Divine perfections; let our hearts be more enlarged to love him, and then shall we “run in the way of his commandments.” Thus it is that we shall make rapid progress in the attainment of that “holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord;” and at length “an abundant entrance shall be ministered unto us” into that blessed kingdom, where we shall “be like God, for we shall see him as he is.”

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST.

BY ANDREW PARK.

BELSHAZZAR made a gorgeous feast—
A thousand guests were there,
Of haughty eye, and lordly step,
And vain and vaunting air!

“Go, bring the vessels forth,” he cried,
“Of gold and silver bright,
That once within the Temple stood,
And let us drink to-night!”

They filled those sacred goblets high
With red and sparkling wine,
And, draining them to heathen gods,
Proclaim’d those gods divine!

The lyres were struck, the music swell’d
With high voluptuous sound;
And all was wine, and love, and song,
And mirth, and madness round!

When, lo! what dreadful sight is that?—
What fingers long and bright,
Which write upon the palace-wall
With pencil dipt in light?

How do the proudest tremble now?—
Why grows each cheek so pale?
The lustrous eye, the regal brow—
Why seem they all to fail?

Why droops yon mighty monarch’s head?—
Why smite his knees together?
Why shakes he so, with troubled gaze,
As if his soul would wither!

A moment gone, and one had thought
No power in heaven above
Could thus have chang’d these god-like men,
And made them cease to love!

That writing on the palace-wall
Hath made each pulse beat cold—
Hath dimm’d the eye, hath paled the lip
That gladly kiss’d the gold!

Then King Belshazzar raised his head,
And cried from out his pain—
“Bring forth the wise and learned men,
Who may this writ explain!”

The banquet-hall is all confused,
The music silent now;
The brightest gem and panoply
But mock the humbled brow!

Then Daniel came, that mighty man!
Hush’d was each echo then;
Nor trembled he, but bravely spake
Before these lordly men.

“O king, I ask no scarlet robe—
No chain of dazzling gold;
Let others wear your costly gifts,
Yet shall the truth be told!

“Hear, then, the solemn doom, O king!
These words declare to thee,
And let thy princely guests depart,
And bend thy stubborn knee.

“For God hath number’d thy domains;
Thou’rt in the balance weigh’d;
Divided is thy kingdom all:—
Well may’st thou look dismay’d

“Darius comes to claim thy throne—
To wear thy royal crown;
And to the Medes and Persians shall Thy power be handed down!”

Belshazzar groan’d—his guests look’d sad—
Each cheek grew still more pale,
When in that spacious palace-hall
Was told the direful tale!

Then Daniel had his scarlet robe,
His chain of gold—his right;
But King Belshazzar, hapless man!
By Cyrus fell that night!

GEOLOGY OF THE DELUGE.*

BY GEORGE MACDOUGALL, ESQ., SURGEON,
Galashiels, Roxburghshire.

PART I.

THE grand purpose of philosophic inquiry is to discover the laws that have governed, and that still continue to regulate the mechanism of the universe; to ascertain that chain of causation which, in its unceasing effects, is every instant producing such complex, beautiful, and beneficial results; and thence to ascend to that infinite Power whose fiat gave birth to the universe.

Darkness and mystery, necessarily, from the imperfection of our faculties, hang over the approach to the temple of Truth, and though occasionally a ray of light dimly indicates to the truth-seeker the distant glories of the mighty fabric—waywardness, prejudice, or enthusiasm, operate with more or less blinding effect on the vision of all, and, except in some rare instances, produce more or less distorted conceptions of its real beauty and solemnity. Hence the conflict of opinions and statements recorded in the history of the progress of all our known sciences to maturity. Ought we, then, to feel any surprise that so much uncertainty, so much apparent inconsistency should attach to the interesting and youthful science of geology, when, as yet, the proofs of its existence are like the nebulae of some unformed system without any fixed form or arrangement? But the gradual progress of observation and discovery is daily concentrating these atomic proofs around their parent nucleus, working into order the plastic mass, and enabling the science to vindicate its claim to our regard as an exponent of the universal law of harmony. Some geologists, actuated by a mistaken zeal for religion, have proposed systems alike absurd and ill-judged; others, imbued with a spirit of infidelity, have ascribed all natural appearances on the surface of this planet to the effects of agents which operated long prior to the creation of man. And there can be no doubt that many of the phenomena, discoverable on the crust of the globe, were produced by the operation of existing laws long anterior to our present race. Many, however, must be ascribed to causes much more recent; and to the proofs of this assertion I mainly intend to call your attention in the present lecture.

Several of our most eminent geologists boldly affirm that if any such deluge, as that revealed to us in Scripture, did take place, it must have been partial—probably the bursting of some mountain lake, or the inundation of the then inhabited portion of the earth, by the sinking of the land below the level of the sea, or by some obstruction to the onward course of some river to the ocean,—and that no universal deluge did occur. This inference must seem passing strange to those who carefully read the Scripture narrative, and, with unprejudiced minds, compare it with the geological facts adduced by these geologists themselves. It can only be accounted for upon the principle which a diligent perusal of their works will render obvious, that their minds can and will only perceive facts and arrange them into generalizations consistent with their preconceived theories. Thus, whoever reads the work of the talented Mr Lyell, will readily perceive from the principles from which he sets out, that no miraculous event, no phenomena, not traceable to the slow and progressive laws of existing nature, will be by him admitted; inasmuch as he positively affirms that the mode of the formation of the earth's crust can only be explained upon and by the entire admission, that the whole has been accomplished, not by any sudden cataclysm of waters, but by the progressive and ceaseless effects of those laws which have altered, and are now altering, the physical geography of the globe. There is every reason to believe that Mr Lyell's theory is founded upon a just and comprehensive knowledge of the agents which might have operated in effecting all the important and interesting changes discoverable in the strata of the earth. But this admission by no means precludes the interposition of the Almighty Creator from accomplishing many, nay, had he so willed, all of these changes out of the ordinary course of nature.

* Conclusion of a Series of Lectures on Geology, delivered to the Galashiels Mechanics' Institution during the winter of 1839.

And here let me make use of an illustrative fact as a means of preparing your minds to perceive the nature of the arguments adduced in proof of the deluge. Volney, a staunch contemner of miracles, asserts that the Dead Sea is just the crater of an extinct volcano; and that the story of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is merely a Jewish legend. Let us attend to this infidel assertion. Upon the shores of the Dead Sea the Arab is seen industriously collecting masses of a black substance which has been drifted ashore. This is bitumen, a substance highly inflammable, a great seam or stratum of which is discovered below the surface of its banks, and which appears to have been destroyed or removed where the waters approach. The soil for miles along, and from its shores, is waste and sterile, where once, with its rich pastures and flocks, flourished the fertile vale of Siddim. The dark motionless waters are unrelieved by ought that can give interest to the scene. The plain around is one mass of salt, sulphur, and nitre, combined with porous quartz. The hills surrounding its confines, the highest of which, Clarke asserts, possesses the remains of a crater on its summit, are rugged and conical. Hot springs well out from chasms in their sides; while the rocks afford, in their structure, sure evidence of their igneous origin. Here, then, are the physical facts connected with this interesting region—a seam of bitumen below the surface of the plain, discovered to be destroyed where the waters of the Dead Sea approach—the plain surrounded by volcanic hills and covered with volcanic products rendering the soil for ever barren. Mark, now, in connexion with this statement of the natural agents employed in the work of destruction, the Scriptural narrative of the event. While the sons and daughters of the "cities of the plain" were enjoying themselves in fancied security, following the councils of their wicked hearts, God announces to Abraham his intention of visiting Sodom with the punishment due to its desert. Abraham pleads with God, "Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked?" The Lord answers to the petition of his servant, "Should ten righteous men be found there, I will not destroy it for ten's sake." But, in these populous cities, ten righteous persons could not be found. Therefore, on the morrow at sunrise, the Lord gathered his thunder-clouds and sent his lightnings forth to ignite the inflammable materials, upon and of which the cities were built. Over-head, was the cloud of vengeance with its electric flash and appalling thunders; below, the ignited bitumen rising in flames; and, to complete the confusion and dismay of the inhabitants, an earthquake rends the plain, and sulphur and fire are showered from their native mountains, covering man and beast—blotting out this fruitful and populous district from the map of future history, and leaving an enduring monument of the vengeance of Heaven on the sins of mankind. The fact of the miracle, is evidenced by the expression of the purpose of God; for if ten righteous men had existed amid the thousands of their wicked brethren, these cities would, like Nineveh, have been preserved from their merited destruction.

Let me adduce only another preparatory illustrative fact. Cast your eyes on those mounds of ruin, on the banks of the Euphrates, covering the vale of Shinar, where once stood the golden city of Babylon. Reflect on the period when that city was "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency," built on massive foundations, guarded by impregnable ramparts, and scorning the attacks of hostile armies; when all within and around promised security and permanence. Then the voice of a prophet of the Most High proclaimed aloud amid its mocking multitudes, "Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." This prediction was not only uttered, but written; yet, many years passed away, and no symptoms of the coming calamity was seen or apprehended. At length the armies of the Mede line the banks of its guardian river, threatening its conquest by famine or storm. But in full consciousness of superabundant provision and of the impregnability of their walls, its inhabitants laughed to scorn the assaults which even the assailants, in process of time, began to consider unavailing. At length the voice of triumphant revelry echoes through the streets and palaces—the sentinels, in drunken repose, sleep on the walls—the foes steal silently in through an unguarded entrance—and, in a short hour, the blood of slaughtered thousands flows along the streets, and the flames of burning cottage and palace ascend the skies. Still for centuries the complete fulfilment of the prediction tarried. But at last the molten lava-streams come rolling fiercely onwards; the "broad foundations of Babylon are shaken as wheat, and the dust of her mortar rises as a cloud of chaff," her proud towers are hurled to the earth, and seared with fire that issues from its bosom. Nothing now is to be seen but heaps of vitrified brick and mortar, realizing the denunciation of the prophet, "I will make thee as a burnt mountain. Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon; sit on the ground, there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans."

Here, then, are two events, foretold, and accomplished as foretold, attested by geological facts visible at the present day; and we discover a perfect congruity between the latter and the Scriptural narrative.

We are hence prepared to expect, that such an event as the Deluge is recorded to have been, should have left apparent, upon the surface of the earth, certain traces of its devouring progress. The principal facts recorded in Scripture, relating to this event, are these:—"The waters increased greatly and prevailed upon the earth, and the ark went upon the face of the waters; the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered; all flesh died that moved upon the face of the earth; the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days; on the seventh month the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat; and on the tenth month the tops of the mountains were seen." To the circumstance of the ark resting on Ararat, a mountain rising upwards of one thousand five hundred feet before it becomes covered with eternal snow, traditionary record, believed in by the Armenians, Persians, and many other eastern nations, bears strongly corroborative evidence. If the waters, then, covered the top of these hills for fifteen cubits or twenty-two and a-half feet above them, the deluge could not, by any possibility, have been partial. Again, had the deluge been but partial, the winged messenger of hope sent forth by Noah would readily have discovered the land beyond. For when birds travel across an ocean, instinct prompts them to take a lofty flight, that, from a commanding eminence, they may discover the far distant land whither they are winging their course. Again, in the second epistle of Peter, we have the fact of the universality of the deluge, strikingly implied in these words,—“Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with waters, perished; but the heavens and earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.” Thus far, then, Scripture is our warrant for believing in the event and its universality.

We shall now proceed to the test demanded by our modern geologists, and adduce strongly confirmatory proofs, from the traditions of various nations—the arrangement of the surface strata—the collection and collocation of bones—and the banks and shores of our rivers and seas. In examining the traditionary records of various nations regarding some great aqueous catastrophe, we may expect to find differences in the mode of relation, seeing that, in many countries, the facts have been transmitted through successive generations of men ignorant and superstitious,—the natural consequence of which is the gradual loss of their distinctive character, by becoming mixed up with superstitious legends and poetry.

Humboldt, when among the Red Indians of the Orinoco, was surprised and delighted at the glowing descriptions of the deluge given by this people, in connection with the most absurd legends regarding the origin and distribution of mankind. In noticing this circumstance, he remarks, that these ancient traditions of the human race dispersed over the face of the globe, like the fragments of a vast shipwreck, are of great use in the philosophical study of our species, and present, among all nations, a resemblance that fills us with astonishment. Ellis, in his "Polynesian Researches," takes notice of a similar tradition among the barbarous tribes of the islands in the Pacific. The Chinese, in their historical writings, relate that their first king, Fohi, had no father, that his mother conceived him while she was encompassed with a rainbow, at a time when their land was overflowed with water. The Parsees, successors to the Magi, in one of the sacred books attached to their Zendavesta, wildly, but obviously allude to the event in question. The Sanscrit writers of Hindustan, bear testimony to it in their great poem Mahabharat, in their Paranas, and Vedas.

* See SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD, vol. i., p. 372.

Berosus, the Babylonish historian, and Abydenus, record it in their histories of the Medes and Persians. Nouns who was born in Persepolis, in the fifth century, in his Dionysica, gives allusions to it derived from the Hieroglyphics and ancient poetry of the country. Ovid, in his fable of Deucalion and Pyrrha, describes the rise, progress, and decline of the flood, in remarkable harmony with the scriptural account :—

"The south wind quick on moistened wings, darts forth Its fearful face in pitchy darkness shaded,—
And as its mighty arm the hanging clouds oppressed,
A crash is made: dense rains rush down from heaven;
Neptune his trident poised and struck the earth,
Which trembled and laid bare the waters' gulfs;
The rivers boundless rush along the plains,
And 'long with crops, drag trees, and kine, and men,
And hallowed domes, and shrines, and sacred things."

The decrease of the waters is thus described :—

"The floods are lulled, the hills seem to arise.
The ground appears, and with the waves' decrease,
All parts increase, when now the long day done,
The hidden trees their naked tops present,
And on their branches bear the clammy clay."

Without enumerating more evidences from tradition, we shall proceed to the second point, viz., the arrangement of the surface, with the diluvial strata immediately below.

In this we have numerous and interesting traces of the mighty waters having careered like maddened spirits over the face of the globe, washing down the hardest rock, tearing from its airy pinnacle, the jutting cliff, and hurling its monstrous bulk onwards for hundreds of feet. Who can look upon the sloping levels of our planet, which form such beautiful and connected valleys, passing into one another as they descend, till they become lost on ocean's shores—upon its rich comminuted soils, its gravelly subsoils, its rounded hills, its undulating glens, but will at once perceive the strongest proof of a mighty overwhelming flood simultaneous in its force over every part of the surface which polished off and smoothed the rugged ridges of the hills, and scooped out by its powerful eddies, the picturesque valleys; and left the earth, on retiring, in a state fitted for the purposes of health, and plenty to man and beast.

The rounded shape of the hills is admitted by all geologists to display the effects of water, but many maintain that this rounded appearance was caused by the action of the waves of that ocean in which they were formed, while they were slowly emerging from its depths, during ages long prior to the creation of man. Had this been the case, how comes it that we have such a perfect system of levels which uniformly pass into one another; and that the valleys should possess no irregularity, no stoppage or interruption in their uniform inclinations? For the hills coming out of the ocean in the manner stated, slowly and progressively, it is apparent that an abrupt and irregular ridge would be left, possessing the horizontality given to it by the waves, and that the valleys would be suddenly terminated by a flat level plain. We should, accordingly, have had a system of drainage, partial, irregular, and mischievous. But instead of this, we have a system of valleys, some with, some without any water, wholly independent of their important uses as drains to the continent, relieve, by their picturesque undulations, the rugged aspect of mountain scenery; and display an impression of beauty and harmony from the completeness and uniformity of their arrangement.

The explanation afforded above, seems, therefore, inadequate to account for their formation, which we cannot assign to a more efficient cause than the waves of the flood. The probability of this being the case is enhanced by the strata of sand, gravel and clay, deposited over every quarter of the globe. These strata bear decided evidence of their having been deposited and arranged from water; in many places, the ripples and currents of the tidal wave seems still impressed upon their layers,—and, wherever discovered, whether on the tops of the highest hills, or forming a covering to the rocks of the valley, are universally similar in their appearance and arrangement, which proves that the waters which deposited these strata on the surface of Europe, must have, likewise, in a similar manner, arranged the diluvial beds of Asia, and of the whole earth. Another fact in regard to them requires to be noticed, which is,—that these beds do not contain pebbles of those rocks which form the mountains around, but, that in numerous cases, the pebbles which they contain have been derived from rocks at great distances. It is highly probable that many of our fine clayey soils, and gravelly subsoils, have been derived from Cape Horn or the Antipodes.

I shall now call your attention to another class of facts of still greater importance to our argument, viz., the organic remains belonging to the diluvial strata. The natural inference that some remains of animals would be found to corroborate the testimony of the sacred record, is simply borne out in the accumulation of bones in all the diluvial strata in every part of the known world: and what renders the discovery of these bones of greater interest is, the mode in which they are associated. There are no perfect skeletons, or bones of all species of animals of opposite instincts and habits, of different countries and latitudes, commingled together, broken and waterworn. This is what we would, a priori, have expected, for the animals overtaken by the deluge in the gloomy retreats of the jungles, on the peak of the lofty mountain, or in the darksome caves to which they had fled for shelter—must have been drifted, by the tempestuous waves, to and fro around the world of waters—mixed and broken along with the ruins of former cities and countries, and at last deposited in the earth that now is, to constitute part of the soil destined to give wealth and nutriment to future generations. Specimens of these bones have been obtained from all parts both of the old and new world, having been found mingled with the subsoils—in caves, on the tops of mountains, or embedded in the diluvial strata. Bones of elephants have been found many thousand feet high on the sides of the Andes and Himmalayahs. Bones of the mammoth horse have been discovered in the mountains of India.

and in precipitous situations where they could not possibly have lived, and which they dared not have ventured to ascend. United together, have been discovered bones of the glutton and hyæna, of the rhinoceros and rein-deer, of animals native to the frigid zone, and those belonging to the equator.

Whence is it that animals of instincts so dissimilar, of habits and climes so wide asunder, are thus brought together—the tiger with its wonted prey, the lion, hyæna, and wolf, with the ox, horse, and sheep? The only adequate solution of the difficulty is this,—that they have been so commingled, fractured, and water-worn by the waves of the deluge.

THE CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE OF MISS L——.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

How true is the observation of the poet, "That life is long, which answers life's great end." The period of a Christian's sojourn upon earth may, in many instances, be brief; and yet so rapidly may the work of grace be carried forward in his heart, that the great design of his creation may be accomplished in a few short years, and he may be transplanted to a region of unfading bliss, where his boliness and his happiness are alike consummated. The career of the amiable and excellent Miss L—— affords a beautiful and striking illustration of the truth of this remark. Her Christian experience was summed up in a brief period; and yet, so quickly and effectively did the Spirit "perfect that which concerned her," that we find her in her latter days evincing a maturity of Christian knowledge and of holy attainments, which evidently betokened a very marked preparation and meetness for the inheritance of the saints.

Miss L—— was the daughter of the minister of a burgh town in one of the southern counties of Scotland. From her infancy she was of a tender and delicate constitution. Before she was two years old, her father was cut off, after only two days' illness, in the prime of life, and in the midst of his usefulness, leaving a disconsolate widow, with three children, without any other provision for herself or them, than the necessarily scanty allowance derived from the Ministers' Widows' Fund. By this painful bereavement, the family were suddenly precipitated from a condition of plenty and comfort to a state of comparative poverty. The subject of the present Sketch was the youngest of the now fatherless family, and, at her tender age, she was, of course, unconscious of the change which had taken place in their circumstances. She was reared, along with her brother and sister, under the roof of her maternal grandmother, who was herself a minister's widow, and with whom her widowed daughter and the infant children came to live. Miss L——, in an autobiographical sketch which she had commenced a little before her death, and a small portion of which still remains in manuscript, acknowledges that, though she never remembered a time when she did not know there was a God, still she adds:—"My earliest remembrances showed that I neither knew God, nor had been taught to know him as he is revealed in his Word. I never knew or was taught the wickedness of my own heart, nor the way of salvation through the Redeemer. Those who had the care of my soul thought, I suppose, that a child could not understand the wickedness of nature, nor the Gospel plan."

These remarks point to an error which is too common, alas! even among professedly Christian parents. They entertain the false notion, that the peculiar doctrines of the Bible cannot possibly be communicated to the mind of a child, and, accordingly, they limit their religious instructions to a few cold general truths in regard to the existence of a God, of a heaven, and a hell, and thus, unintentionally we admit, they infuse into the minds of their offspring the most defective, and, therefore, erroneous, views of Divine truth. In consequence of an early training of this kind, many young persons are under the necessity, in after life, of unlearning what they have been taught in childhood. This was remarkably the case with Miss L——. As she grew in years, she grew in the knowledge of Christ and his salvation. Her views, under the teaching of the Spirit, became clearer and more scriptural; and, accordingly, we find her thus writing in her Diary, while yet in her fourteenth year:—

"I am weary and heavy laden with sin, therefore I have gone to the throne of God, told him all my sins and wants, and plead with him the fulfilment of that promise, through Christ, 'I will give you rest' (from sin); and this—'He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.' Lord, I have come to thee again and again, and I do now come to thee. Lord, look on thy Son, and through him look on me. I confess I am unworthy, utterly unworthy; I deserve death, and not life—hell, and not heaven. I have nothing to recommend me to thee, but sin—no excuse to offer for myself. When I consider what I am—a worm of the dust, and what thou art—the great and holy God, I am led to 'lay my hand on my mouth, and my mouth in the dust, and to cry out, Unclean, unclean—unworthy, unworthy—ungrateful, ungrateful, sinner.' To think that to such as me the Gospel message is addressed. Lord, I embrace the offer; 'Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief;' Lord, I give myself to thee. Oh! take me under thy care; oh! make me thine; forsake me not, the work of thy hands. Lord, I cannot say I am thine, but I hope I am; and I can say with truth, I wish to be thine. It is the height of my ambition that 'I may be found in Christ, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but the righteousness which is of God by faith.' This is the point on which all my hopes centre, and this has been my petition for years, and still is my petition, viz., O Lord, teach me to rest and to believe on Jesus Christ alone for salvation as he is offered to us in the Gospel. For his sake hear me."

Nor did she pray in vain; for, in the course of a few days after, she thus records the Almighty's goodness in listening to the voice of her supplications:—

"Since writing the above, God has been very gracious to me, and has confirmed my hope in Christ. He has heard and answered my prayers; he has caused light to shine out of darkness, and taught me to believe in his promises, and take them for my own. God has given me 'peace and joy in believing,' greater than I can express in words—greater, far greater joy, than the worldly man ever felt, or can feel, when his corn and his wine are most increased. O that I could praise the Lord with my whole heart! O that my life were one continued hymn of praise! O that every action were an action of gratitude to this great Being, to whom I owe every blessing, temporal and spiritual! Praise to his name for ever!"

Such language, from the pen of a believer so young in years, is deeply refreshing. She had been sitting at the feet of Jesus, and there she had found rest to her soul. Her very words breathe warmth of heart, sincerity of purpose, ardent longings after a holy walk and conversation. Like all the true followers of Jesus, she endured "much tribulation;" yet though her personal sufferings abounded, her "consolations in Christ did much more abound." Accordingly, we find her thus recording her thoughts on this subject:—

"Nature shrinks at the prospect of suffering, but I can endure all things, if God be with me. In general I am supported by this, that I have given myself to God, to dispose of me as he sees fit; and I know he will do all things well—I believe that every thing will work together for my soul's good. He has enabled me to trust in his promises, and apply them to myself,—and 'as my day is, so shall my strength be.' If I am called to great trials, I trust God will give me great grace to endure them; if to great duties, great grace to perform them. I am principally anxious that I may never murmur, or find fault with his dispensations towards me; but glorify him at all times, and always be able to say from the heart, 'Good is the will of the Lord: all his ways are perfect.' Indeed his tender mercies are over all his other works: if it were not unbelief, we should constantly see this. Even in the midst of judgment we may sing of mercy.

"Think on the sufferings the blessed Jesus (who was 'God over all') underwent for us, not only in his body, but his soul. When we reflect on his agony in the garden and on the cross—that he suffered the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God for us sinners; shall we not suffer any thing he is pleased to lay on us without a murmur; particularly if he (as in general he does), while afflicting the body, comforts the soul?"

"If Christ the wrath of God and man
With patience did sustain,
Becomes it those for whom he died
To murmur or complain?"

"God can make up to me for all my sorrows; I know he can. I have ever found him a God at hand, and not afar off; but I have never suffered any thing in this world to cause real sorrow, but sin. It is this that puts a bitter in our earthly cup; compared to which, I think every thing else sweet. It is sin in myself and others, and in those near and dear to my heart, which is the chief, I had almost said the only, cause of sorrow to me; indeed, it is the only cause of any deep or abiding grief. If sin were taken away, this world, with all its ills, would be a heaven to me; and the chief thing that makes heaven a place of happiness must be, that there we shall be free from sin. We shall be happy, because we shall see God, and enjoy his presence; but unless we were without sin (and in this respect like God in kind, though not in degree), we could not be happy, even in heaven. This is the glorious character of our gracious Redeemer, not only that he will save his people from the guilt of sin, but from its power. Yes! it is a precious promise, 'Sin shall not have dominion over you;' and this too is a grand truth, that Christ, if we are his, will purify us to himself, 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works.'

"Oh, ye happy few, the very joys of heaven will be heightened by your arrival. The Almighty himself shall welcome you with a smile; and that very smile, that welcomes you into their presence, adds joy to the whole assembly. 'Come, ye blessed!'"

Miss L——'s life was for many years unchecked by incidents of any kind. She continued to reside in the immediate neighbourhood of her birth-place, and with the exception of those variations in the state of her health to which her weakly constitution rendered her subject, nothing occurred in her history worthy of notice. She was daily endeavouring, however, to become more and more assimilated to her great Exemplar and Head. To the accomplishment of her sanctification her sufferings were evidently blessed. They were means intended by the Almighty to subserve an all-important end; and though they might not "for the present be joyous, but grievous," still they were "working out in her the peaceable fruits of righteousness." Thus in her diary, under date May 24, 1828, she adverts to an attack of illness in these words:—

"I have been from home ten days lately; have been ill with pain in my side, and a degree of fever. I am a good deal better, for which I ought to be thankful to God. I have been much on the mount lately. Felt, when ill, that death might be at hand; felt no fear on that account, but much inward peace, and quite assured of God's love to me through Jesus. I am a poor guilty worm; but God has enabled me, by his grace, to come to Christ for life and salvation, depending on his all-sufficient atonement and perfect righteousness. I believe that what I have committed to him, he will keep; and that my soul shall never perish, neither shall any be able to pluck me out of his hand. These are happy moments, when I am permitted to behold, by the eye of faith, the King in his beauty, when he discovers his matchless loveliness, and gives me a fore-taste of heaven. At such blessed seasons, the soul is bowed down and humbled in the dust, and adores the infinite mercy and goodness of God. If there be such happiness in these manifestations of Divine love, what must heaven be?"

In such a frame of mind afflictions are precious blessings to the Christian. They carry him onward with the most astonishing rapidity along the road that leads to glory. This was the happy experience of Miss L——; she could say with David, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted, for now I have learnt thy law." But while she felt that she was making progress in the divine life, she often looked back to "the rock whence she had been hewn, and the hole of the pit whence she had been drawn." As an example of her reflections on this subject, we may cite the following from her diary for July, 1828:—

"I have been reading this morning, in the Sacred Word, the beautiful relation of our blessed Saviour curing him that was born blind. I was born blind, in a spiritual sense; but, glory be to God, I can say with the man, 'Whereas I was blind, now I see.' Some Christians can say this, but cannot tell the time nor the manner how they came to see. With me this is not the case; I remember both the time and the manner when I was first brought to see in a spiritual sense, and can, as it were, trace the progressive steps by which God has led me to this day, which takes in a space of more than six years. During this time, all my experience confirms and proves more and more unto me, that I am a great sinner, born with a load of original guilt, to which is added a daily burden of actual. This is the case with every individual, and with me in particular. I am the very chief of sinners. Of myself I cannot come to Christ (farther than by the use of the appointed means); for the natural man is prone to evil, and has such a dislike to any thing good, that I believe, did God not pluck many as brands from the burning, we should all inevitably perish. For myself I can say, I was found of Him when I sought him not. All the praise of my redemption and conversion I do, and ever will, ascribe to free, sovereign, almighty grace. Christ died for sinners, and he invites such to come to him, even the chief, such as I. He has enabled me to accept this invitation. I know that I am his, because he has taught me to choose him for mine. I never either could or would have chosen him, had he not first chosen me. By nature, my love to sin was too strong, and my propensity to practise it too active, to be subdued by any thing short of the power of God. By nature, I was too base-minded to love him—too blind to know him—too proud to trust him—too obstinate, and too much a slave to sin and Satan, to serve him. I wished to be saved from hell, and therefore avoided gross sins; but I had no hatred to sin—no sense of its ingratitude. No; instead of this, I regretted the restraints of the law, and thought it was a pity God had threatened such punishment to the breakers of it. I was sorry for doing so and so; such a sin merited punishment; and it was this fear alone that prevented me from committing gross sins. But now God has taught me a very different way of thinking—he has taught me to obey him from love. I believe I shall never be sent to hell; but this, so far from making me commit sin, has the contrary effect. I hate sin (O, that I could say with a perfect hatred!); because it is hateful to God.”

In our next, we shall continue the history of this excellent young person—showing how rapidly she grew in grace as she approached her heavenly home.

THE BELIEVER'S PRAYER FOR TEMPORAL BLESSINGS :

A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. ROBERT ELDER, A.M.,
Minister of St Paul's Parish, Edinburgh.

“Give us day by day our daily bread.”—LUKE xi. 3.

IT was one of the precepts of our Lord, delivered for the guidance of his followers, “Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.” How remarkable the illustration of this rule which he has given in the arrangement of the prayer before us. We are bidden pray that God's name may be glorified,—that his kingdom may prosper in the world,—that his will may be practically acknowledged as supreme, by ourselves and our brethren around us. And then, as entirely subordinate to all these objects,—these being first and chiefly sought by us,—he warrants and enjoins us to pray for whatever may be absolutely needful for this present transitory life. “When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done as in heaven, so in earth;”—and then, giving these great objects the highest place in your affections, pray further, so long as you are here,—“Give us day by day,” or, as it is expressed by another evangelist, “Give us this day our daily bread.”

It is much to be feared that the rule, so clearly laid down, and so strikingly illustrated by our Saviour in the text, is in general reversed by the children of men. The foremost subjects of anxiety too generally are, “What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?” And nothing is deemed more visionary than that any desires should be cherished in preference to these. But mark what notable examples of the opposite spirit are given us in the Word of Inspiration. Thus we read of Moses —“Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.” Of Paul also we read, that when the Holy Ghost witnessed in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions awaited him, he could say, through the grace of God, subordinating the dearest personal considerations, “But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God.” Were these men, think you, visionary or insincere? No; they had been taught of God to weigh every possible object of desire in the balance of the sanctuary,—to regard and compare them in the light of eternity. And, like all who have heard and have learned of the Father, they aimed at entire conformity to the rule illustrated by the Divine arrangement of the text.

* Preached in St George's Church, Edinburgh, on the evening of the 29th October 1841, in behalf of “The Society for the Relief of the Destitute Sick.”

Let us now consider more attentively the petition before us; and may God give us grace rightly to understand it, and truly to imbibe its spirit! What is implied in the right use of this petition, which our Lord prescribes to his followers, “Give us day by day our daily bread?”

I. It implies a sense of continual dependence on God, even for the smallest temporal mercies. —There can be no reasonable doubt, I think, that our Lord refers to temporal mercies in the petition we are now considering. Now, I say, that even in regard to these, our Saviour directs his followers to cherish a continual sense of their entire dependence upon God. This view is abundantly established by the simple fact that, without any limitation arising out of special circumstances, he bids them pray to God for the supply of their temporal necessities. But suffer me to say, dear friends, that my deep conviction is that, practically speaking, no view presented by God's Word is more frequently disregarded by the children of men. Not only with reference to spiritual and eternal realities, but also in regard to the smallest temporal mercies, and the light in which they are contemplated, does the utter ungodliness of the heart of man appear. How often do you hear it remarked in the ordinary intercourse of life, This man is eating the fruit of his labours, and reaping the reward of his industry and exertion; and that man is a child of misfortune, whose every scheme of worldly interest is baffled by adverse circumstances. I fear that such observations are frequently made among men, while God is not in all their thoughts, and that the spirit which lurks within is that condemned in God's word: “For he saith, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom; for I am prudent.” It is very true, and it ought always to be remembered, that it is only in the use of means that we are warranted to pray to God, in reference to temporal as well as to spiritual blessings. There can be nothing in this prayer inconsistent with the duties of lawful and honourable industry; for the same blessed Word which dictates the prayer, declares emphatically, "that if any would not work, neither should he eat;" and "commands and exhorts by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread."

But, with all this, the prayer of my text is in perfect and admirable harmony. It bids us, in the use of means, and in the midst of the labour of our hands, still cherish and express a sense of entire dependence upon God. And think how many considerations there are which, if really appreciated, are fitted to awaken this humble, child-like disposition! What are we, after all our labour, and when our efforts have been crowned with the richest measure of success, but stewards of the bounty of God's providence? "He prepareth rain for the earth, maketh grass to grow upon the mountains, giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry." He says also to man, that he may teach him to feel his dependence, "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." And how soon, and how easily can he send forth a sentence against us, as he did against Israel of old? "Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness." Again, are we not indebted to the tender mercy of God for the smallest benefits we enjoy? Yes, brethren; right views of our position, as sinful and hell-deserving creatures, should make us feel, and confess with trembling and humility, that not only is the hand of Providence to be discerned in our smallest blessings, but that all are the fruit of unmerited mercy and compassion. So Jacob of old felt, when pouring out his heart before the Lord. "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast showed unto thy servant." Such also was the sentiment of the Psalmist, when, praising the God of heaven, he thus speaks concerning him: "Who giveth food to all flesh; for his mercy endureth for ever."

And, once more, who but God, in his tender mercy, gives power or ability to any to use or enjoy the gifts of His providence and mercy? "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not." "There is an evil," said the wise man, "which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men: a man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it; this is vanity, and it is an evil disease." How remarkably is one form of this evil illustrated by the case of the rich man in the parable, who, rioting and boasting in his substance, said to his soul, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" These, then, are some of the considerations which should lead us, in every circumstance, to cherish and express a sense of entire dependence upon God.

But I proceed, farther, to observe under this branch of my discourse, that it is not a mere feeling of dependence on the general providence and mercy of God which our Saviour inculcates on his followers. Mark you, brethren, particularly in whom it is that they are enjoined to place their confidence, with reference to the smallest temporal mercies. It is in their "Father in heaven," who, as the whole Gospel tells us, stands in a new and blessed relation to all who come to him through faith in Christ. He is their covenanted God and Father, dealing with them in all things as truly united to his Son, who is the Elder Brother of the family,—their Surety and Representative in the presence of the Father. Now, there is no other way in which we may warrantably come to him, or present the expression of our desires, even with regard to temporal benefits. Think how solemn and decided is the testimony of the Saviour himself: "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." But O, brethren, to come unto God through Christ, as a covenanted God and reconciled Father, and to cast our care on him, with reference to temporal as well as spiritual necessities, this is the secret of peace—the way to real blessedness and comfort. Thus coming, we are assured that whatever benefits are bestowed, the curse, which naturally cleaves to them, will be blotted out for ever. That fearful sentence will be entirely removed: "I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings; yea, I have cursed them already, because ye do not lay it to heart." Yes, brethren; for if we be one with Christ by a living and abiding faith,—if thus we be the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty,—then "there is no more curse;" "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Again, thus coming and casting our care on God, we have a right, in the covenant of grace, to all things really needful. Its grand and comprehensive promise is, "All things are yours." And so with special reference to temporal benefits, how gracious the provision set before us!—how sure the ground on which the people of the Lord may pour out this prayer at his footstool! "The young lions do lack and suffer hunger; but they that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing." "He shall dwell on high; his place of defence shall be the munition of rocks; bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure." And, once more, in every, even the smallest mercy, nay, more wonderful, even in the denial or withdrawal of his benefits, such an one is privileged to recognise a pledge and token of the unchanging love and faithfulness of Jehovah. All things are given or withheld in terms of that covenant ratified by the blood of Christ, which is ordered in all things and sure. How true, then, and how precious that saying of God's Word, "A little that a righteous man hath, is better than the riches of many wicked!"

Such, then, is the disposition which the Saviour inculcates in the text—true and heart-felt dependence on God through faith in Christ, not only for spiritual blessings and eternal life, but also for the smallest temporal mercies. But,—

II. It implies a spirit of true moderation in our desires after temporal benefits.—"Give us day by day our daily bread." Who can read these few, but expressive words, without feeling how solemnly they enjoin the lesson which I have just announced to you? They tell us plainly, that we are only warranted to ask from God those temporal benefits which are absolutely required for the supply of present necessities. True, it may please God, in his all-wise providence, to give us superfluities. He may give us, by inheritance, or as the fruit of lawful industry, according to the language of the wise man, "riches, and wealth, and power to eat thereof, and to take our portion, and to rejoice in our labour." "This is the gift of God;" this, wherever it is bestowed, is an important trust committed to us by the Giver of all good, and involving a high and solemn responsibility. But the point to be noticed is, that he gives us, in his Holy Word, no warrant whatever to ask or expect such benefits, nor, consequently, to labour for their attainment, as though thus we were compassing the highest end of our existence. We are warranted and enjoined to pray and labour for our daily bread,—that is, as I understand it, for such a portion of temporal necessities and comforts as may serve to maintain us honourably in the stations which Providence has assigned us. But above and beyond this, we have no warrant, that I can see, to ask, expect, or appropriate; all must be left at the disposal of Him whose benefits we enjoy. How well did Solomon of old understand this principle, when, as we read, the Lord appeared to him in a dream by night, and God said, "Ask what I shall give thee;" and when he, though elevated to a throne, feeling that he had no warrant to ask for riches or for worldly greatness and increase, answered, "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart, that I may discern between good and bad!" And how emphatic the approval of these sentiments, "And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life, neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies; behold, I have done according to thy words; and I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour; so that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days." And again, how well is this principle illustrated in that prayer of Agur the prophet: "Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me; lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain!"

Brethren, these are not the views which are current among the children of men. Riches and honours are continually sought for, as though the end of our being lay in their attainment. The sentiment is practically scouted by the world, that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." But, whatever may be said or done by a blinded and ungodly world, the rule of heavenly wisdom is that recorded in the text. And O surely there is every thing in our present state to recommend it! Think of the shortness, vanity, and uncertainty of human life! "Take therefore no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Think, too, of the infinitely greater magnitude of things unseen and eternal! O how unspeakably important, instead of spending our precious days and our nights of sleepless anxiety in the eager pursuit of trifles which perish with the using, to be seeking for that portion which can enrich our never-dying souls,—to be "laying up for ourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through, nor steal!"

These are the lessons which our Saviour would press upon his followers, that, "labouring not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man only shall give us," they may cast every temporal anxiety on him, and humbly, submissively, and in faith, may rest on his precious promise, "Be content with such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

And now, brethren, let me conclude this Discourse, by impressing on your attention the solemn lesson which it teaches with regard to the right disposal of our worldly substance. Is it true that we are bound to cherish a sense of continual dependence on God, even for the smallest mercies; and that, in point of fact, we are but stewards of the bounties of Providence,—debtors to undeserved mercy, and that God only gives us ability to use and enjoy the benefits he bestows? Is it true also, that we are warranted to ask no more than will fairly and honourably supply our present wants,—that above and beyond this we have no right from Christ to expect or appropriate temporal good things? Then how careful, how tender in conscience, should we be as to the use we make of temporal benefits bestowed on us. Is there no guilt or danger, think you, in abusing common mercies,—in turning them into so many instruments of folly, extravagance, and sin? Is not this to dishonour the merciful Giver of them all,—to call down upon our heads that fearful denunciation, "I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings; yea, I have cursed them already, because ye do not lay it to heart?" Or, shall we love and seek them, to the neglect of things spiritual and eternal—of that portion which is treasured up in Christ, which alone can enrich our never-dying souls? Miserable folly and de- lusion! however a blinded world may regard it. "Go to now, ye that say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain; whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow: for what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." No, no, brethren; listen to the counsel of unerring wisdom: "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase." And O, dear friends, if we have really found the rest and portion of our souls in Christ, how cheerfully should our hearts respond to the injunction! Have we not learned in the school of Christ that these blessings, in themselves, are not worthy of our regard? Have we not there been taught to "count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord?" Yes, truly; if we have heard and learned of the Father—if we have seen the King in his beauty, and tasted that the Lord is gracious. And has it not been given us to feel, in a sense to which we formerly were strangers, that as it is true of ourselves that "we are not our own, but bought with a price," so also is it true emphatically of all that we possess? Yes, brethren; these are the views of the genuine followers of Jesus—of all who are growing in likeness to Him who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."

Consider, then, I pray you, the solemn injunction of God's Word: "Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it. Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give; when thou hast it by thee." And, that no doubt may rest upon the question, To whom, then, is it due to receive of the benefits which I enjoy? listen yet again to the counsel of heavenly wisdom: "Let him that stole steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hand the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." Do we see brethren around us perishing for lack of knowledge, or pining away in misery, under the evils of poverty and disease?—and, keeping in view the principles which I have endeavoured to illustrate, is it in the power of our hand to help and deliver them? This, then, is their due—this help we are bound, by every consideration, to extend to them.

And now, think for a moment of the special call which I have this night the honour to address to you. I am persuaded that I need not dwell, in this assembly, on the claims of this excellent Society—a Society which, for the long period of fifty-six years, has laboured in a field of Christian benevolence, than which, I will venture to say, there is none more deeply interesting and important. They seek out chiefly the industrious poor of our community, when the hand of affliction presses heavily upon them; and while cheerfully granting what their means afford for mitigating their temporal calamities, they are careful to administer those spiritual comforts which through grace, may enable them to endure, seeing Him who is invisible. Can there be a sight more affecting, than that of some humble artisan or labourer, who, by the sweat of his brow, had been struggling to rear a helpless, yet interesting family, when suddenly his daily toil is arrested by the hand of some cruel malady? The stream which had been always scanty, is dried quickly at its fountain. With what feelings of anguish, almost of despair, will the sufferer cast his languid eye towards the cherished objects of conjugal and parental fondness, as he thinks the day, so rapidly approaching, when the little remaining store, the hard-earned fruits of his industry, shall be exhausted,—and when from the once happy household the heart-rending cry shall be raised, "Bread, bread; and no man breaketh it unto them?" Such are the cases which it is the object of this Society to relieve. And to such an afflicted household, what a messenger of peace will the faithful visitor of such a Society appear,—bearing the little treasure, so to speak, in the other hand, which conveys to them the comforting assurance that "the barrel of meal shall not waste, and that the cruse of oil shall not fail;"—and with the other pointing them to Him who, from the bowels of his compassion, has declared, "Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest!" Is not this an object, brethren, worthy of your countenance and your prayers? And when we can offer you such a channel through which your liberality may flow, how justly and emphatically may we urge you with the solemn appeal which stands recorded in God's Word: "But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

WEEP NOT FOR THE DEAD.

JEREMIAH XXII. 10.

BY WILLIAM ANDERSON,

Author of "Landscape Lyrics," &c.

OH! weep not for the dead; they are at rest—
No more shall earthly cares their minds molest;
Waste not a thought on them, nor yet bemoan
Who to the grave's cold heritage have gone.

No sorrow know they in their narrow bed;
They sin no more who slumber with the dead;
They are at rest, from earth-born troubles free—
Fixed is their doom, as lies the stricken tree.

Weep for yourself—for those who linger here,
In pain and sadness through the varying year;
Still looking through life's vista to the close,
When faith in Christ alone can bring repose.

And weep for those who go to other climes,
With toil and hoarding to gain gold betimes—
From friends and country parted, as if nought
But this world's fleeting wealth were worth their thought!

Weep for the dead in sin—the guilty soul
That might, but yet refuses, to be whole—

For him who never heard the Saviour's name—
For him who, having heard, rejects the same.

Oh! weep not for the dead, nor those who go
Into mortality's dread depths below;
But weep for those who mourn and suffer here,
The slaves of sin and all its guilty fear!

“MINIMS OF NATURE.”

PART IV.

BY THE REV. DAVID LANDBOROUGH,
Minister of Stevenston, Ayrshire.

ON THE PHOSPHORESCENCE OF ZOOPHYTES.

IN Dr Johnston's truly excellent and interesting work, “The History of British Zoophytes,” in describing Sertularia pumila, he quotes the following passage from Stewart:—“This species, and probably many others, in some particular states of the atmosphere, gives out a phosphoric light in the dark. If a leaf of Fucus serratus, with the Sertularia upon it, receive a smart stroke with a stick in the dark, the whole coralline is most beautifully illuminated, every denticle seeming to be on fire.” I have lately discovered that this is not only probable as to many others, but that it is absolutely certain. The fact mentioned by Stewart seemed an interesting one; but I thought that the experiment must be made in the sea, or in a basin of sea-water, and I had not made the trial.

About two months ago, however, I brought from the shore, in a vasculum or pocket tin box, some Zoophytes attached to sea-weeds, and laid the box on the lobby table till I should have leisure to examine some of them that I meant to preserve. When night came, I was beginning in the dark to take them out of the vasculum, when to my delight and surprise, they began to sparkle. Remembering what I had read in Dr Johnston's work, I gave them, as I removed them from the box, a hearty shake, and they instantly became quite brilliant, like strings of little stars or precious diamonds. To ascertain which were the kinds that sparkled, it was necessary to make the selection by candle-light, and then removing the candle to make the experiment. The first I tried was Valkeria cuscuta, and with it I succeeded. From Sertularia polyzonias and Cellularia reptans little light arose. With Laomedea geniculata I was very successful; on this and on other occasions, it not only, when shaken, became very sparkling, but also emitted a strong smell of phosphorus. Membranipora stellata of Thompson, which spreads itself on a flat surface in a star-like form, on being shaken, became doubly entitled to the name of stellated, as every polype in its cell lighted up its little star, so that for a short time the polypidom became like a little illuminated city. I tried a specimen of Sertularia pumila, the one mentioned by Stewart as phosphorescent; but as it had lain too long on the shore, it did not shine, the polypes, I suppose, being dead. Flustra membranacea, however, was very beautiful. When the sea-weed over which it was spread was shaken or bent—as the cells were closely arranged—it was instantly in a blaze, and became for a little like a sheet of fire.

Since the beginning of November, I have repeated the experiment with several Zoophytes. It cannot be said that there is any cruelty in these experiments; for the roughest concussion that a person can give them is not so great as what they experience in their native element every time the floods lift up their mighty waves. Neither can it be said that it is depriving them of life; for their death is unavoidable as soon as they are cast upon the shore. The sea-weeds, on which they have built their floating habitations, have been torn from their roots by the violence of the winds and waves; and though cast back into the sea, they would never take root again, but would be left by the next tide on the shore, to perish along with the countless living creatures adhering to them. On this last occasion, I got some specimens of the elegant Plumularia cristata; but they had lain too long exposed to the ungenial influences of a November sky, so that only a few of the polypes lighted up their tiny lamps, and their lights were small, and of a darker red, than any I had seen exhibited.

About this time I made a similar experiment with a creature of another family. It was a very large specimen of Botryllus Schlosseri, attached to Halidrys siliquosa. I am not aware that it has been even suspected that any of this tribe is phosphorescent; but on shaking it roughly in the dark, I had the satisfaction of seeing that it was as much disposed as any of the Zoophytes to resent the insult. Though it was beautifully marked with numerous star-like figures, it sent not forth a sparkling light as might have been expected from these rows of stars; but the whole massy body of the creature became at once in a glow, shining, however, with a more lurid and sullen-looking fire.

From these experiments, made with some of the Zoophytes commonly found on the Ayrshire coast, we have been led to surmise that this power of emitting phosphoric light is more generally possessed by the minute inhabitants of the deep, than many are apt to imagine. We are not entitled, indeed, as yet, to conclude that it is possessed by all Zoophytes, but we are now certain that it is possessed by many. We are not at liberty to say that it is possessed by all Mollusca unicata; but we now know for certain, what I think was not known before, that it is possessed by one of them, and what is a property of one may be so of more. We may not venture to say that all the little Medusa which, as transparent jellies, abound in the sea, become luminous in the troubled wave; but when it is known that one of them at least, which takes its name from this property, can shine in the dark, may we not suspect that this is a more general quality than is generally supposed? And may not the beautiful phosphorescence of the agitated sea, at certain seasons, be owing to them and to the marine infusories which in “numbers numberless” abound in the deep?

We are naturally led to inquire why the benignant Creator, who does nothing in vain, has granted to so many of the feeble inhabitants of the deep the power, in certain circumstances, of becoming luminous. As he made all things for his own glory, and as his inanimate and irrational creatures glorify him, by furnishing to his rational and intelligent creatures topics of devout contemplation, fitted to fill them with wonder, and to lead them to show forth his glory and praise, we doubt not that the luminosity of these marine “minims” was intended to be one of these topics. “Praise him in ye dragons, and all deeps,” says the Psalmist, or “all inhabitants of the deeps." The elegant Zoophytes and the little transparent jelly-like medusa are well calculated to show forth his praise during the day; and should not our pious admiration be increased, when the former, on being handled during the night, become more brilliant than rubies and diamonds; and when the latter, it is probable, with other generally invisible "minims," render every troubled portion of the deep a splendid whirlpool of innocuous fire?

But should we not still more adore his wonder-working hand, if we find, that what is beautiful in our eyes is highly beneficial to the floating light-bearers themselves? May not this garment of fire be their armour of defence,—their panoply of protection? They have their enemies amidst the waves, and may not this sudden flash of fire, in the darkness of the deep, be intended to alarm the enemies by which they are assailed? The Lord was to his people of old a pillar of fire by night, and a pillar of cloud by day. By fire and cloud he may design to protect his irrational creatures even in the present day. When the Cuttlefish is pursued by its enemies, it can eject an inky fluid from a bag with which it is furnished; so that, involved in a murky cloud of turbid water, it is concealed from the grasp of its voracious foes. The Botryllus, which we mentioned, seems inert and defenceless, and would be a very savoury mouthful to a prowling haddock; but when, as the gourmand begins to nibble,—its prey on a sudden becomes like a live coal,—we suspect that the boldest haddock would be made to stand aghast. If HE thus defend with a robe of fire this helpless inhabitant of the deep, how much more will He, according to his promise, be a "wall of fire around his people, and the glory in the midst of them!"

And when is it that these tiny dwellers in the deep appear in greatest splendour? It is in troublous times—in the darksome hour of danger. And is it not under the cloud of affliction, and in the dark night of distress, that God's chosen people most sweetly shine? Is not the brightest page of their history that which tells how "they wandered about in mountains, and dens, and caves of the earth, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection?" And if they shone in that hour of darkness, it was like the moon when she looks upon the orb of day—it was because, from the midnight gloom in which they were involved, they looked up to the Sun of Righteousness, and, cheered by his benignant smile, shone with his reflected radiance!

Is there not another solemn lesson which, without overstraining, we may draw from this subject? Take a pailful of the sleeping sea, and examine it in the sunshine, and what can we see but the limpid element? Contemplate in the light of day a shrub-like specimen of the Zoophyte, and what symptoms do we behold that it is the abode of living creatures? Agitate the water, however, during the gloom of night, and it becomes a mass of living fire. Shake the branching Zoophyte in the dark, and the animalcules which, when quiescent, were unseen, shine forth with more than gem-like splendour. Child of the dust, and heir of immortality! in the deepest solitude art thou alone? Are not myriads of bright spirits around thee, though thy veiled eyes cannot behold them? Does not "the angel of the Lord encamp round about them that fear him, and deliver them?" Does he not "make his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire?" "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Does he not give his angels charge over his people, to keep them in all their ways? If we are of his people, were our eyes, like those of the prophet's servant, opened in an hour of seeming jeopardy, might we not see around us a multitude of the angelic host—horses and chariots of fire? When Jacob, as a forlorn and companionless traveller, lay down, with the earth for his bed, and a stone for his pillow, was he not taught, in the watches of the night, that he was far from being in a state of dreary solitude? Saw he not, in a glorious vision, the bright angels of God ascending and descending—holding constant communication betwixt heaven and earth,—receiving their mandates from the Lord; and returning with a faithful report, when they had executed their commission?

And can we forget, that though never angel winged his way from heaven to earth, nor from earth to heaven, there is One that is ever near to every one of us—that the eye of the Eternal "slumbers not nor sleeps,"—that "he besets us behind and before,"—that "he compasseth our path, and our lying down, and is acquainted with all our ways, and understandeth our thoughts afar off?" It was chiefly the presence of the Lord that inspired Jacob at Bethel with such holy awe. And should we not often seek to realize his presence, by holding holy communion with him through Jesus Christ, his Son? In his name, we may draw near to God, as children to a Father; and doing so, with mingled feelings of reverential affection, and holy fear, and unspeakable delight, we shall, like Jacob, be ready to say, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and we knew it not! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Affliction a blessing.—Affliction well sustained improves every part of our religion. It teaches compassion and sympathy towards others in their troubles. It gives an edge to our devotion, an ardency to our prayers, tenderness to our heart, and a life to our grace. It is the trial and triumph of our faith. Patience hath its perfect work; our resolutions for God are confirmed; so that we take faster hold of God, and of those things that cannot be taken from us. Our sorrows, at longest, are but short; and we shall shortly ourselves go the same way. How diminutively does the apostle speak of the afflictions of this present time! "Our light afflictions, which are but for a moment." You call them heavy, he calls them light; and those light afflictions but "for a moment;" and that moment of light afflictions "worketh for us." You are apt to think they all work against you, but they work for you "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." The contrast lies between affliction and glory: light afflictions and the weight of glory; light affliction for a moment and glory eternal: Spoken as much like an orator, as like an apostle. And who was it that said all this? One that knew as well what affliction was, one that had as much of it to his share, as any man in the world.—DA GROSVENOR.

Faith on earth and sight in heaven.—God makes all things double; the eye for light, and light for the eye. While he is preparing the character of the believer for heaven, he is also preparing heaven for the believer; and the believer himself is laying up treasures in heaven, which can never be taken away from him, "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal." Every step of advancement in holiness upon earth, is an acquisition that will last to him throughout eternity. He is not only gaining in heavenly wealth, but in heavenly adaptation. Here those who walk by faith are opposed to those who walk by sight, the new nature is opposed to the old, and the mind of the believer is divided against itself; as St Paul expresses it, "ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." "We groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." But when the trial is over, and the principle of holiness perfected, faith and sight will be reconciled and united. Then they who have believed in him whom they have not seen, shall see him in whom they have believed. And they who now see but a small portion of the divine footprints in creation, shall then see the divinity manifesting itself in its fulness, flowing out into acts of divine energy, and filling with inexhaustible happiness the capacities of numberless creatures.—J. DOUGLAS, Esq.

How to govern the tongue.—Avoid all tedious and idle talk, from which seldom arises comfort, many times repentance; especially beware of rash answers, when the tongue outruns the mind. The word was thine whilst thou didst keep it in; it is another's as soon as it is out. O the shame when a man's own tongue shall be produced as a witness to the confusion of his own face! Let then thy words be few but advised; forethink whether that which thou art to speak, be fit to be spoken; affirm no more than what thou knowest to be true; and be rather silent, than speak to an ill, or to no purpose.—BAYLY. (Practice of Piety.)

ON THE DECREES OF GOD, AND THE EXECUTION OF THEM IN HIS WORKS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D. D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

PART II.

THE truth here taught is, doubtless, attended with many deep thoughts, and things hard to be understood, or rather incapable of being understood, by our finite faculties. This, however, is no reason for doubting or disputing the doctrine itself. It would be a strange supposition, that we may be able to comprehend the depths of the Divine counsels and operations, that any thing finite can contain what is infinite; more absurd than to imagine, that we may hold the waters of the ocean in the hollow of our hand. These deep things of God it is not necessary for us to comprehend, and we are not required to comprehend them; but, nevertheless, they are things which both reason and Scripture plainly teach us to believe concerning God, and which convey much precious instruction to all who receive them as the truth of God, with the humility of faith. The decrees of God, indeed, are neither the rule of our conduct, nor the cause of our actions. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but the things which are revealed belong unto us." He hath plainly made known to us the way of our duty and happiness, and left us free to "refuse the evil and choose the good." His foreknowledge of what we will do, of what we will refuse, and of what we will choose, does not force us in either case, and we ourselves are conscious of our acting without constraint. He presents motives to persuade us, and points out means to be employed by us; and, while he knows assuredly whether we will follow his counsel or reject it against ourselves, whether we will use the means in our power or neglect them, we ourselves are, all the while, acting from our own choice, and are answerable for all that we do.

These two truths, namely, that God knoweth certainly, yet that we act freely, we may not be able to reconcile together, and to see their consistency the one with the other; but yet both are so clearly demonstrated by reason and Scripture, that it is impossible to question them, or really to shake off the belief of them; and we may easily believe that they are quite compatible with each other, though we yet know not how they are so. "The two adverse propositions," says an ingenious writer, "must both be admitted as positively true, though our reason is insufficient to reconcile them together. The point where they meet and are reconciled is alone hidden from us. Except in this particular, the double proof of the respective truth of each is complete. The two truths seem to be two great chains of human destiny, the extreme ends of which descend to earth, while their summits reach to heaven, and the link that unites them is covered by the upholding hand of God."

The extent of the Divine decrees is a subject to us utterly incomprehensible, altogether overwhelming. They in fact have, and can have, no limits. They embrace all space and all duration. They reach from eternity, and throughout eternity. They take in all beings and all events; all things that exist, or that ever shall exist; all things that come to pass, or that ever shall be brought to pass. They are God's eternal and universal purposes; and these purposes he executes in his works, or rather, his works are just the execution of these decrees or purposes of his own counsel and will. These works are twofold: his works of creation and his works of providence—his acts of power, and wisdom, and goodness, in making and preserving the universal system of being. Of that universal system, our world—the earth and its attendant orbs, sun, moon, and stars—forms but a very small portion; and, in comparison with that universe, all the magnitude of our world is but as an atom of matter, and all its history but as a moment of time. But of this our world—this system of sun, moon, and stars—the earth and its concerns form, in like manner, a very diminutive portion—a mere visible point in comparison with the whole surrounding masses of matter which fill the firmament, and form the heavens above our heads. In comparison with these, the earth and its isles are indeed "a very little thing." But to this little thing—this small portion of God's works—to this and its inhabitants it is, that our attention is confined in considering the statements of the Shorter Catechism. It speaks principally of man and his chief end—of his formation and history—of his duty and happiness—of what God hath decreed and executed in regard to the human race. In regard to man and his time upon this earth, it is here more especially taught, that "God executeth his decrees in the works of creation and" providence." All that we see around us, all that takes place with any of us, is only the executing, the doing, the fulfilling, and bringing to pass the eternal purposes of God for his own glory; and his works of creation and providence (which will afterwards come under our consideration more particularly) are, in fact, nothing more than a succession of means put in operation, to accomplish the ends which God had thus decreed from everlasting. The practical uses of this great truth are obviously very extensive, and enter into all that concerns our fulfilling of God's end in our own creation; and we confine our application of the general subject at present to these two particulars.

1. Acknowledge and adore the high and holy God, as the Author of all that exists, and the Disposer of all that comes to pass.—See and understand, that all things proceed from the eternal purpose of his sovereign will, and that all events are ordered by his decree for the best and wisest ends, in the best and wisest manner. "I will do all my pleasure, and my counsel shall stand." "I have purposed it; I will also do it." "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven and in earth, in the seas and all deep places." Contemplate all things, even the smallest atom of matter, as coming into existence; and all events, even the slightest turn in human affairs, as coming to pass, only in consequence of his purpose or agreeably to his permission. Consider always, therefore, that, in strict propriety of speech, there is no such thing as accident or chance in the world; and that even "the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." In all things that are going on around you, or that are befalling any of you, "regard the work of the Lord, and consider the operations of his hands;" even the ever blessed Jehovah fulfilling his holy will, by giving effect in time to what he hath purposed from eternity. Behold a God employed, and be assured that he is "excellent in working." Be not surprised, that his judgments should often be far above out of your sight—that you cannot "find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end;" but be satisfied to know, yea, rejoice to believe, that "the Lord reigneth," and that, though "clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Know that God is great, that God is good, and trust where you cannot see. In all, especially, that concerns our own lot and labour in life, let us fear to murmur in his sight and repine under his will; but desire always to say with Job, "He performeth the thing that is appointed for me; and many such things are with him." Let us guard against the utterance of a word, or the indulgence of a thought, which would imply dissatisfaction with his dealings towards ourselves or any of his creatures, saying rather, with the deepest reverence, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good;" and remembering the end of our creation, that we may feel and say as did our blessed Lord: "For this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name."

2. Desire to be yourselves the instruments of fulfilling his high and holy purposes; and delight in employing the means which he hath provided and prescribed for accomplishing his will.—This deep and seemingly discouraging doctrine of God's decrees is, in truth, if rightly apprehended, the most animating and practical view of our duty and happiness. It presents, as the object of God's decree, and as sure to come to pass, one great end,—the same which is our own chief end, namely, his own glory; and at the same time places before us, in his works of creation and providence, a world of means, closely connected with the ends in view. Let these means be used, either in things natural or things spiritual, and the ends will follow; especially the great end of all—the glory of God, and the true good of his creatures. Some of these means are more or less within the reach of all: (I here speak of those, and to those, who have the Word of God as their rule of direction, and whatever our portion of them be, our duty and happiness are the same, namely humbly and faithfully to employ them for the advancement of this great end. "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." Fall in with this great end, follow out this general rule, and all is well. In his world of means he hath given to every one his work; and he hath said to all, "Occupy till I come." Use, then, his means for his end; and in all that you have or do, desire to be yourselves employed, as instruments in his hands, to his glory for ever. Enter thus into his counsel, and you at once enjoy his blessedness. Be ye workers with God, and workers like God; and so shall you work out your own good, while thus aiming to glorify his name. So are we warranted by his Word to speak. "Trust in the Lord and do good, so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. Delight thyself also in the Lord; and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart. Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass." Refer all to God, then,—your trust, your delight, your way; and all that is good for you shall be brought to pass, in the way that he sees to be most for your good. However little you may be able to do, or may seem to do, yet, while thus doing, you answer and you attain the end of your being—you glorify God, and you enjoy him in so doing. Thus, also, his Word warrants us to say, "Thou didst well, that it was in thine heart." "She hath done what she could." Be not, then, idlers in God's world, purposing nothing good, and, of course, enjoying nothing truly good. Keep always in mind, that, as placed among his works, you are designed to be means of accomplishing his own eternal purposes. Desire, therefore, and delight to be, not numberers of the ground, barren of all good, or worthless weeds in the soil, hindering the good of others; but to be as trees of righteousness, bearing good fruit, much fruit, more and more fruit, to the glory of his grace. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." This is the sum of your own duty, and the secret of your own happiness, to feel yourselves, each in the place assigned to you, and according to the power given you, as instruments in God's hand of fulfilling his holy will, giving some glory to his name, doing some good to his creatures,—and so finding your own good in his favour for evermore.

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 4, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GROOMSBIDGE, London; W. CORRY, Junior, & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

CONTENTS.

1.—The Cross and the Crown. By the Rev. David Davidson, ..... Page 801 2.—Sacred Poetry. "Heaven." By Steele, ..... 803 3.—Extracts of Letters from the Samoan Islands, ..... 6. 4.—Geology of the Deluge. By G. Macdougall, Esq. Part II., 807 5.—Sacred Poetry. "Resignation." By R. Baxter, ..... 809	6.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Robert Burns, D.D., . . . Page 809 7.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Rev. Dr Gordon and Rev. H. Grey, ..... 811 8.—Egotism or Self-Love, ..... 818 9.—The Christian Experience of Miss L——. By the Editor. Part II., ..... 813
---	---

THE CROSS AND THE CROWN.

BY THE REV. D. DAVIDSON.

Minister of Broughty-Ferry, Forfarshire.

IMMENSE is the difference between a Cross and a Crown. The Cross is the instrument of the cruellest torture, but the Crown is the ensign of the highest dignity. He, to whom the Cross is allotted, is doomed to die in agony and shame; but he to whom the Crown is assigned, is called to live in pleasure and honour. These objects, indeed, stand at the very extremities of that range of countless vicissitudes, to which our state on earth is exposed;—the one, marking the lowest depth, the very nadir of degradation and woe; and the other marking the sublimest height, the very zenith of glory and bliss.

And yet, in the history of Jesus, are the Cross and the Crown, intimately connected with each other. The Cross, he once endured. Unlikely as it was, that Messiah should be put to death when he appeared, and most of all unlikely that he should be crucified, the prophets foretold that he should suffer in agony and shame, and pointed out the mode of his suffering, by representing "the assembly of the wicked who inclosed him as piercing his hands and his feet," and those who afterwards repented as "looking upon him whom they had pierced." This also was more clearly predicted by himself, for, towards the commencement of his ministry, he said, "as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up;" thereby, according to John's remark on a similar expression, "signifying what death he should die;" and more plainly toward the close of his ministry did he declare, "behold we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles, to mock and to scourge and to crucify him." And so it was. As he stood before the judgment-seat of the Roman governor, this was the cry of the infatuated populace, "Crucify him, crucify him;" and at length their reiterated demand was granted. He was delivered to be crucified,—he was burdened with his Cross,—he was led forth to Calvary,—he was nailed to the accursed tree,—and suspended thereon, he died a painful, shameful, and accursed death;—painful, verily, and excruciating, for while his back was lacerated by the scourge, and his brow by the thorns, his hands and feet were rudely pierced by the iron bolts, and the whole weight of his body thrown on these torn and tender parts:—shameful also, and fraught with foulest ignominy, for, while great crimes were laid to his charge, and a robber was preferred before him, and all conspired to treat him with scorn, his death was such as was allotted only to the lowest and vilest of mankind, to those who were regarded as the offscourings of society, and the disgrace of humanity; and accursed besides, for it is written in the law, "cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree," and that death, while accompanied by the execrations of the priests and the people, proclaimed that he bore the wrath of God, and was made a curse for us.

And what has been the consequence? "He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross: wherefore God also hath highly exalted him." "Having been made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, he is now crowned with glory and honour." The Father, whom he served and glorified, has, as it were, "set a Crown of pure gold upon his head." Yea; when seen in vision by the beloved disciple, as he "had on his vesture and on his thigh, a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords," so, "on his head were many Crowns." Now, of this exaltation, the prophets spake also, when they testified beforehand, not only the sufferings of Christ, but likewise the glory that should follow. And of this the Saviour spake, when he said, that after he was crucified, he should, on the third day, rise again, that, if he was lifted up from the earth, he should draw all men unto him, and that he should be seen at length sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. Even thus, then, has Jesus been exalted. He soon burst the bands of death, by which it was not possible that he should be holden;—he ascended to the heavens, leading captivity captive; he took his seat at the right hand of the majesty on high. And there he not only entered into the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, but he received also new glory as Mediator,—even the honour and the joy of beholding accomplished that mighty work for which he became incarnate, of beholding the ample provision he has made by his Cross for the salvation of the perishing,—of beholding multitudes of immortals recovered to God and heaven, in consequence of the travail of his soul,—of beholding all the redeemed, as they gather successively around his throne, casting their crowns before him, and crying, “thou art worthy, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood.” And there too will he continue to wield that power in heaven and in earth, which has been committed to him as the King of Zion, till he has triumphed over all his enemies, and achieved the full salvation of all who were given him of the Father, and is prepared at the consummation of all things to present them to him in the glory of their ransomed and renovated nature, as the trophies of his Cross. What a Crown of rejoicing for him who wore the Crown of thorns,—how immense its weight,—how incalculable its worth,—how dazzling its brilliancy! The cloud of shame, in which the Cross was enveloped, is dissipated by the light that streams upon it from that Crown of glory. Yea, rather, as the sun is often seen, when passing behind a dark cloud which threatened to extinguish its rays, to convert the cloud into a halo of glory round about it, so has the Cross erected on earth, but rendered the Crown beyond it in the heavens more attractive and resplendent. Indeed, it may be said, that the Cross which Jesus endured, is emblazoned on the Crown which Jesus wears, since, by all the celestial host he is recognised, and admired, and extolled, as the Lamb that was slain.

Now, as the Cross and the Crown are connected in the history of Jesus, so also are they in the history of his disciples. They too are required to bear the Cross. “If any man,” said Jesus, “will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his Cross, and follow me;” and again he said, “he that taketh not his Cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me.” In conformity with these sayings, has the Cross been borne by the followers of Christ. In primitive times, they were the objects of relentless persecution, and were subject to every kind of trial and torture, which human malice could suggest, and human power inflict; but the fury and cruelty of their enemies were equalled by their own devotion and fortitude, for they “rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus,” and “took joyfully the spoiling of their goods,” and “loved not their lives unto the death.” So also was it with many of our martyred fathers; for they were in their day exposed to like fiery trials, and they also in like manner glorified God in the fires. Nor is the time for bearing the Cross gone by. Though the furnace be not now heated so hot as once it was, and the ordeal to be passed through be not so severe, yet the faithful disciples of Christ are still exposed to reproach and opposition, from a world that lieth in wickedness, and still destined to endure in various forms the enmity of the serpent's seed. Still, therefore, have they to bear the Cross, if they would follow Christ,—to go forth unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach, and accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of this world,—to “take pleasures in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake,” and even to “glory in his Cross,” as those who are honoured by the sufferings they endure for him, while they are saved by those he endured for them. Nor is it thus only, that the Cross must be borne. Christians have to make their way to heaven, through a fallen nature, and a tempting world; and this requires as much as the encountering of persecution, the spirit of a martyr. They must be crucified to the world;—they must crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts. To the Cross, on which Jesus hung, they must, as it were, bring and nail whatsoever is contrary to his will, and opposed to his glory. In other words, they must deny themselves to all that is sinful, and must willingly sacrifice every feeling and desire and interest that would come into competition with the love and duty they owe to the Saviour, that so they may follow him through good and through bad report.

And what shall be the reward? They are even now constrained by the love of Christ; and through the contemplation and experience of the riches of his grace, are led to count every yoke easy, and every burden light, in following him. They feel also, and own that, infinitely meritorious as was the work of Christ, their poor and polluted services are not entitled to any recompense. And yet they too are encouraged and animated by the prospect of a great reward. “Rejoice, says the Apostle Peter, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.” And these are the words of Paul, “it is a faithful saying, for, if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him, if we suffer, we shall also reign with him.” In the case of Christians, therefore, as in the case of Christ, the Cross is the prelude of the Crown. And what a crown! “A Crown of righteousness,”—the perfection of purity, the elevation of the soul to a state of spotless rectitude, in which, without any sin to lament, or any fall to dread, it is enstamped with the image and satisfied with the likeness of God; “a Crown of life,”—the perfection of blessedness,—not merely deliverance from death and suffering, but an enlargement and improvement of the faculties of the soul, a reception and experience of all the joys that can flow from the fountain of life; “a Crown of glory,”—the perfection of honour,—not solely the congratulations of saints, and the welcomings of angels, but the high approbation also of the Judge of all, and an advancement to dignity and splendour like that which he himself enjoys; "a crown that fadeth not away,"—the endurance of all this purity, and blessedness, and glory, not for a lifetime or a thousand centuries, but through the ceaseless duration of eternity. O most glorious object of faith and hope! Blessed is he who is, by the Eternal Spirit, born heir to such a crown; and blessed are all the services and all the sacrifices which are necessary to prepare for his coronation. The Cross seemed heavy and hard to bear; but what is the Cross to the Crown? Let them be cast together into the balance of the sanctuary. Lo! the one is "light, and but for a moment," while the other is "a far more exceeding even an eternal weight of glory." Oh surely when that Crown is placed by the Redeemer's hand upon the heads of his disciples, they will think the severest trials they endured were trivial and transient, will marvel that their sufferings and self-denial have been so richly recompensed, and, in a rapture of joy and gratitude, will extol that wondrous grace which has made them kings as well as priests unto God.

Thus then are things, so extremely unlike, connected indissolubly, both in the history of Jesus, and the history of his disciples. And "what God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." If Jesus had not first borne that Cross of shame, he could not have worn that Crown of honour; for, as he himself said, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" Christ crucified, therefore, ought ever to be associated in our minds with Christ crowned: to him as dying on Calvary, and then living in heaven for the benefit of his Church, should our faith be stedfastly directed; and while it is our duty and privilege to glory in his Cross, it is our duty and privilege no less to contend for his Crown. Nor let it be forgotten, that, in our case also, the Crown must be preceded by the Cross; it being written thus, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried, he shall receive the Crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." The Cross, therefore, let us willingly take up, and resolutely bear, in the prospect of the Crown. "As Jesus, for the joy that was set before him, endured the Cross," so let us be desirous and determined to serve and to suffer according to the will of God, having respect to the recompense of reward. And while relying on the merit of Jesus for acceptance, and the Spirit of God for assistance, let it be our study to live, as if hearing that solemn charge, and that gracious promise from the lips of Him, who once was crucified, but now is crowned—"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the Crown of life."

H E A V E N.

COME, Lord, and warm each languid heart,
Inspire each lifeless tongue;
And let the joys of heaven impart
Their influence to our song.

Sorrow, and pain, and every care,
And discord there shall cease;
And perfect joy, and love sincere,
Adorn the realms of peace.

The soul, from sin for ever free,
Shall mourn its power no more;
But clothed in spotless purity,
Redeeming love adore.

There on a throne (how dazzling bright!)
The exalted Saviour shines;
And beams ineffable delight,
On all the heavenly minds.

There shall the followers of the Lamb,
Join in immortal songs;
In endless honours to his name
Employ their tuneful tongues.

Lord, tune our hearts to praise and love—
Our feeble notes inspire;
Till in thy blissful courts above,
We join the angelic choir.

STERLE.

EXTRACTS OF LETTERS FROM THE SAMOAN ISLANDS.

IN the month of February this year, at page 51 of the SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD, an article is found, entitled, "A Visit to the Samoan Islands." Other communications have arrived from the same group of islands, from which the following extracts are made. They exhibit the power of the Divine Spirit in melting and humanizing the heart of man; the zeal and energy of those faithful men whose hearts have been inclined to choose lives of hardship and privation, for the glory of the Redeemer, and from pity to dark souls; and a few of those missionary straits and difficulties, which are overcome by the willing mind and helpful hand, turning cheerfully to all sorts of occupations. These things remind us of Felix Neff, of Oberlin, of Vanderkemp, or (shall we say?) of Paul the tent-maker; and they also remind us, by contrast, of another set of men, bearing the name of ministers of Christ, whose dignity would be endangered, and their imagined influence with their people shattered, were they ever to be seen as fellow-sufferers, fellow-labourers, or in any exhibition of wants, either physical or spiritual, as fellows of their people. How affecting the contrast between the slothful ecclesiastic, who knows not to be mistimed of a meal, or wearied in frame, or expected to toil for his Master's sake, and the hard-working, emaciated, sunburnt missionary, labouring now with voice, then with hands; giving, now, instruction in doctrine—then, in planting, sowing, or building; and always travelling in spirit, that souls may be born into the kingdom of grace! The mental contrast, were we in circumstances to make it perfectly, is probably still stronger. The missionary, suffering the loss of many things, is content with such things as he has, and finds days and months too swift in their passage for the execution of his plans. But we leave the filling up of the contrast to those whose experience enables them to do it.

In the "Visit to the Samoan Isles," the name of the writer was omitted, without reason. Some reader, for his own sake, and some for the sake of his forefathers, may experience a livelier emotion, when they are told that the writer is George A. Lundie, son of the late pastor of the parish of Kelso; and some kind souls may, perhaps, add a petition, that his zeal in his Master's cause may not be the means of cutting off his day in its dawn; but that he may be strengthened, and honoured to spend his strength in the service of "Him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." *

TO HIS BROTHER.

"Tutuila Samoa, Jan. 15, 1841.

"As to myself, my dear brother, time has passed rapidly since I first saw Samoa. Months here are gone before we are well aware of their commencement; and all of them, clouded and bright, tell of the goodness of the Lord. I am sorry to say, however, that my first object in coming here (the attainment of health) has not been so completely accomplished as we expected. At the end of our voyage I was really strong, and all seemed to promise fair for the future. The climate is delightful, especially at Pago-pago, which is situated at the head of our beautiful harbour, and receives the trades almost constantly, as through a funnel. It is perhaps the most healthy station in the islands. I do not, however, mean to say that there are not days, occasionally, which are oppressively hot, so near the line as we are; these, however, are rare, and we can often be out even at mid-day. I continued pretty well for nearly four months, and then, having attained some little knowledge of the language, I began to use it among the natives. Finding no immediate evil consequence follow smaller exertion, I got to greater; and, pressed by the necessity of the case, twice, in Mr Murray's absence at Leone, I preached at Pago-pago, with an interval of three weeks. This was done urged by the wants and anxiety of the people, and almost without looking to consequences; which a little knowledge of the true nature of my malady would have enabled me almost infallibly to predict. The result which did follow, proved to my formerly incredulous friends that my statements about my internal infirmities were not imaginary. Hemorrhage in the chest returned on me, and I was almost laid on the shelf. Soon after this, Mr Slatyer determined on building himself a house at Leone, and being good for nothing else, I was appointed architect and superintendent of works, as he knew less than even I do about such matters. The plan was made, the timber needed was apportioned among the villages, to be felled and brought to the situation. Two saw-pits were started, and I had the driving on of the whole—calculating lining for the saws, measuring, &c. I should have had the making of the roof-frames, and putting the whole together, if strength had been permitted; but I soon found that even the former part of the work was too much for me; and just when I had determined to leave it to Mr S——, whose other engagements must have obliged him to neglect it, an English carpenter, who had been hitherto most annoying to every thing good, had his heart broken, under Mr Slatyer's preaching, and now is his faithful adherent, and willing to do every thing for the cause of Christ. This filled all of us, and the natives too, with astonishment; and we praised the Lord for it. Since then, I have been better and worse. The only assistance I can now render to Mr Murray, is in relieving him of the care of the sick. The medical department has been mine almost from the beginning. There is a new work put into our hands within the last month, owing to the rude treatment we received at the hand of a desolating storm. Many of the villages were partially protected by the hills, although the wind ran more than half round the compass; but on the others it vented double fury, laying low immense numbers of houses and acres of bread-fruit. Leone suffered very much. The missionaries and their wives, who were all there at the time, were driven out of their house, by the walls falling in; and the chapel, capable of containing nearly twelve hundred people, was fairly overturned. This chapel being of native construction, and of such extent, had been very fatiguing in the use; and so, your servant being architect, we are about to erect a new one, with galleries all round, to contain a greater number of people; being the same breadth, and about a third of the length of the former. I, however, have only undertaken to make the plans, having firmly refused to put myself into the temptation of being near the works."

* To explain the diversity of spelling in proper names, it is necessary to state, that g in the Samoan Isles has the nasal sound. Thus, Pago-pago is pronounced Pago-pango; Kramago is Bramango, &c.

TO HIS MOTHER.

"Apia Isle of Upolu, Jan. 29, 1841.

"On Saturday the 23d, the Camden arrived, and, with advice of Mr Murray and Mr Slatyer, I sailed with them to this place, for change of air, and to consult some of the brethren who have medical skill. Mr McDonald is a doctor of medicine. Tutuila is said to be too rainy, the hills forming so large a portion of the island. Mr Heath talked of my staying with him at Manoa for some months; but this will be settled by and bye. Meantime, all are very kind and brotherly. I speak plainly out, my dear mother, though I know I have acted wrong in disobeying the injunctions laid on me by my medical advisers, against the use of my voice, before I left you. Circumstances may account for it, but cannot excuse it. But you will sympathize with me, especially when you call to mind the very interesting state of the good work in our dear little island. I wish exceedingly you could have some personal intercourse with Mr Murray. I often remember, in connection with his present employments and success, and with his vigour and devotedness of character, your applying to him, at Kelso, the words, 'A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country.' In his new country the Lord has blessed him beyond his brethren, and given him many who will call him blessed to all eternity.

"I rejoice to hear of the progress of true religion in dear Scotland. Kilyth is a favoured spot, and possesses additional interest, as the scene of a similar work in former times. W. Burns was secretary of our Students' Missionary Society the last winter I spent in Glasgow. It is delightful to hear that he had been the means of such good, first in his father's parish, and then in Dundee. Jedburgh I was prepared to hear of as the seat of signal displays of grace, from the character of its pastor. Dear Kelso, too, seems to have a share.* O that the length and breadth of my dear native land were filled with the glory of the Lord! Surely the showers at present descending will excite all who really love the Lord, to seek earnestly for their continuance and extension. Why should a relapse and pernicious reaction so often follow a revival? You have already learned that, though far from Scottish revivals, I am not in a parched and barren land, where there is no water. The Lord had graciously visited Tutuila before I reached it; but his power has been still more signally displayed since that time. Before I could quite follow the native service, there were several shakings. Then, I could not trace the effect directly to its cause; since that, however, I have had great delight in seeing how the close, searching, and startling addresses of dear Mr Murray reached the hearts of the auditors. We have seen them sit in most solemn and rivetted attention during great part of a long discourse, and then, one and another, no longer able to restrain the bursting feelings of their hearts, would cry aloud, and faint away; and ere long, as if the house were shaken with 'a rushing mighty wind,' almost the whole would be melted and broken down, in the most piercing cries and deep-drawn groans. At another time, the stillness, and breathless earnestness of the whole assembly, would call to mind the great day of account, when all shall stand before the Judge; and this would continue from beginning to end unbroken. But the village, and the jungle around, would afterwards resound for hours (more than once it has done so during the whole of the night) with the weeping and lamentations of sinners newly come to a knowledge of their awful state. And again, on the next opportunity of assembling, Mr Murray, merely appearing from the privacy of close communion with Him who wields the hearts of all men,—breathing, as it were, the very air of deep devotion, and his emaciated face and heavy sigh showing but too well how he laboured, being in travail for souls,—he would not have pronounced a few words, with a view of inducing preparedness of spirit for the service, or a few sentences from the Word of God be read, when all at once, as by some wondrous, unusual influence, the assembly would be melted down, and the softest feeling expressed by deep sighs and sobs, which for twenty or thirty minutes would put a stop to public service. We always observed signs of an especial spirit of prayer among the pious people before such seasons as these; and this spirit Mr Murray made it his constant endeavour to excite and encourage, placing sole reliance on the outpouring of the Spirit, and feeling assured that to earnest prayer this would never be denied. And O how often have we been called to adore that grace which condescends to acknowledge the feeble efforts of the feeblest and most unworthy of its subjects, and so abundantly to respond to them. At the times of these especial awakenings, we were constrained, though Mr Murray's weak state of health rendered him very unfit for it, to hold meetings every day; in which addresses, laying the truth simply open, as represented in different parts of Scripture, and urging its personal acceptance, were interspersed with prayer and praise. The assistance of some of the more advanced natives was often made use of, as Mr Murray was physically incapable of doing the whole of such arduous and deeply exciting work: and then we had an opportunity of remarking, that while the Spirit was at work in the hearts of the formerly unenlightened, awakening them to a sense of sin and danger, those who had already 'tasted that the Lord is gracious,' were not unvisited, but were in many instances enabled to forget every thing else in their love for souls, and in the exalted sense they had of the love of Jesus.

* It must be remembered, that these remarks refer to the state of parishes more than two years since.

"As to the fruits of this wonderful excitement, in which chiefly we must look for the proof of its genuineness as a work of grace, these have been of no equivocal nature. It is true, that many have been affected to weeping, and the like, at times, who have not afterwards given signs of true conversion; this may be accounted for on the ground of natural sympathy: but very many others have given satisfactory evidence of a change of heart. They are emphatically 'new men,'—'clothed, and in their right mind, sitting at the feet of Jesus;' having formerly exhibited all that is ferocious, filthy, and diabolical, in the character of the heathen and savage. The congregation at Pago-pago varies from one to thirteen hundred; and it is even larger at Leone, where Mr Slatyer now preaches, having sufficiently mastered the language. There are upwards of five hundred in the island baptized; having given satisfactory evidence, along with humble profession of faith in Christ and newness of heart. Not quite half of that number, however, are in full communion; as Mr Murray's plan is, to detain the baptized for a month or two in a probationary state, before final admission to the Church; and his severe illness prevented him from having the necessary private conferences with them.

As to the Church, it comes nearer the Scripture idea of a true Church than any other I know any thing of. It is separate from the world; and, as 'a city set on an hill, it cannot be hid.' No sooner is a new member received, than he is enlisted on the side of the Lord against the mighty, and his energies directed to the advancement of the kingdom of Jesus. If any one so acts or speaks as to make it clear that he has been either deceived or deceiving, and is not truly changed, he is excluded from the flock of Jesus. This has only happened in four of five instances since Mr Murray's Church was formed. It is one of the most painful things that can happen; but is generally attended with decided advantage—leading to watchfulness and prayer, like Paul's letter to the Corinthians.

"But the benefit of these rich displays of sovereign mercy are by no means confined to those who have been so evidently wrought upon as to be numbered among the professing followers of the Lamb. The moral change which all who have renounced heathenism and joined in the worship of God have undergone, is very conspicuous. Of this we have abundant proof wherever we turn among the people, in the look of activity and comparative intelligence, which has taken the place of the dull, stupid gaze, and haughty, self-complacent look, which used to characterise them; and indeed in every part of their bearing and conduct. But you will be better able to judge of the amount of this change, if I relate to you some of the circumstances attending the wreck of a whaler, which took place a few months ago at the mouth of our harbour:—The vessel was thrown away, many think on purpose. She floated for some hours after first striking; and of course many people were about and upon her. The surface of the water was strewn with floating goods—pigs, tows, clothes, food, &c., &c.; and all, as well as the ship's crew, were in the power of the natives. Many natives rescued articles, and carried them home,—and some of the pigs were forthwith baked and eaten: but there was nothing like violence in any case, I believe; and the captain and men were allowed to secure whatever they could, in the circumstances—or rather, were much assisted to do so.

"The ship went down, and the captain naturally wanted his goods: so Mr Murray, first of all through the native teachers (with one of whom every village is supplied), informed all the respectable people that they could not continue members of the Friday meeting, to which only outwardly respectable persons are admitted, unless they consented to deliver up to their rightful owner all the things they had rescued. To this announcement there was but one answer:—'We will not steal, for we fear God; we will collect all together, and restore it to the captain,' or 'chief,' as they call him. And not one was excluded from the Friday meeting, though its members exceed one thousand. The next thing was, to secure restoration on the part of those who were not members of that body; and this was immediately and spontaneously set about by the chiefs of Pago-pago, the metropolis of the district. They first consulted us as to the right and wrong of the matter, then held meetings themselves, and spent more than a week in going through the villages, and causing every article to be delivered up. Some persons in one large village were refractory, and were punished by losing two for one pig they had seized.

Five years ago, or less, not even a Samoan canoe, much less a foreign vessel, would have been spared. They would have killed any man who offered the least resistance, and carried off whatever they could lay hands on. This is their own account, and that of all who sail these seas.

"O mother, how continually I am made ashamed among these dear people. I often have 'The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it,' brought to mind. How often have I longed that you might be among us, to have your heart rejoiced. But, perhaps, your own parish is by this time the scene of a similar work. That it may be so, for all your sakes, is my constant prayer. The Christian must be separate, and easily distinguishable from the world, if he makes it his endeavour to imbibe and live according to the mind of Christ. This is sadly forgotten in dear Scotland. Were it remembered and acted upon, Christianity might at first lose some of its outward adherents, but the Church would soon assume a new and glorious appearance, and Satan's kingdom would melt before her.

"I have already told you much of how your dear old friend Archy Murray has been honoured of the Lord, and you will perhaps be more surprised, when I tell you that, by the concurrence of his brethren of this mission, it falls to him, for this voyage, to occupy the place which Mr Williams, when with us, so nobly filled. He is to take nine native teachers to reinforce old stations, and form new ones. He received the appointment in a most delightful way, professing his readiness to do any thing for Christ, and his sole reliance for direction and guidance on his Father in heaven.

"The present meeting of the brethren has been a long and interesting one. Three days were entirely occupied with business, except the portion devoted to religious exercises. Among other things, a resolution was passed, in which the brethren virtually pledged themselves to refrain from every thing like trading in cattle, horses, or in native or foreign produce. This was suggested by the evil effects which engaging in such occupations has produced on some other missions.

"Another resolution was, the appropriation of one whole day, at each meeting, to such exercises as shall tend to personal spirituality, and thus bear on the mission,—rendering this as necessary a part of the business as any thing else, and securing it from the intrusion of more secular matters.

"At Mr Hardie's station on Savaii, the good work prospers greatly, not in a violent form, but a silent steady work. There are now two hundred and eleven members, and as many candidates. Some of the other stations go on but slowly. This is evident to me, that when the missionary is of a highly spiritual character (ceteris paribus), things prosper, and, in proportion as he recedes from this, prosperity diminishes."

TO HIS MOTHER.

"Pago-pago, Feb. 22.

"You now know that my immediate prospect is to remain on this island, during Mr Murray's absence, and do what I am enabled for the guidance of the native teachers. He will write to you from Sydney. The doctor* is of opinion that I shall never be able to preach. Pray for me much, that I may be prepared for all that is before me, and that a door of usefulness, and a heart to occupy it, may be vouchsafed, if it is the Lord's will that I continue here. Since my health has been rather better, I have been most fully occupied in the bustle of preparation for Mr Murray's departure.—With kindest love to all—all who love me—I am, my mother, your truly affectionate and not forgetful son, G. A. LUNDIE."

* Physician to the American Surveying Squadron.

Extracts from a Letter of the REV. A. W. MURRAY—part of which is in answer to questions, and shows, in a new form, Missionary exercise of faith, under privations which are hard on civilized men.

"Sydney, June 9, 1841.

"The Camden brings us supplies of flour, sugar, tea, coffee, &c.; and up to the time of our sailing from Tutuila, we had a tolerable supply of the necessaries of life. Pork and fowls, which the island produce, are our only animal food. The islands produce abundance of excellent bread-fruit and taro, both of which are palatable and nutritious. We have yams, bananas, pine-apples, and water-melons; and the oranges which were introduced when we arrived on the island, are now beginning to bear fruit. We have abundance of excellent arrow-root, growing wild in the bush. A few months after George arrived, our cow began to give us milk. I am thus particular, because of your inquiries. In reference to medical aid, we have hitherto been thrown quite on our own resources. A kind and gracious Providence, however, has smiled upon us, and brought us thus far safely through. We are accustomed to use all available means, and then, feeling that we have done all which our circumstances allow of, we leave the result with Him who hath placed us in these circumstances. When our little son was born, I was obliged to be both doctor and nurse, as we had no civilized creature on the island, either male or female; yet all was well. There is, doubtless, considerable risk in being placed in such circumstances; but it has also some advantages, which may we have grace abundantly to improve! A simple, stedfast faith in God is the grand remedy for all our evils; and to be situated as we have been, is calculated, by the Divine blessing, to increase this. * * * * We were very sorry to leave George alone at Pago-pago; and though I was glad, for the sake of the poor people, when he made up his mind to remain, and though I thought that, all things considered, he could hardly do better, yet I did not urge him at all to this step. When the Camden again visits Sydney, it may be a different season of the year, when he will not be exposed to the cold of winter on going there. * * * * We sailed from Samoa on the 13th of March; visited the Missions on the islands of Tana, Nina, Eramago, and the Isle of Pines; and succeeded, by the great goodness of our gracious God, in placing teachers of Christianity on Eranan and Anatoou of the New Hebrides, on Britannia Island of the Loyalty Group, and on the large and important island of New Caledonia. We found the Missions formerly commenced, in a prosperous and encouraging state, with the exception of fatal and never-to-be-forgotten Eramago. Here we found the teachers, left on the island by Mr Heath last voyage, in most pitiful circumstances, and succeeded, with much difficulty and some risk, in getting them alive out of the hands of the barbarous savages. At Tana, Nina, and the Isle of Pines, we had the most encouraging intercourse with the teachers and people; and the Gospel was introduced into the other islands mentioned above, in circumstances of a most cheering character. Our gracious Lord appeared to go before us; and we were enabled to accomplish all our expectation, except in reference to Rotumah, which contrary winds prevented our visiting, and Eramago, which we were compelled to abandon. The day is not distant, however, I trust, when savage Eramago shall be taken possession of in the name of the Lord—when they will bitterly repent of the foul deed over which we now weep, and be made acquainted with that Gospel which can humanize, and civilize, and Christianize them. We left our own dear field of labour in a prosperous state. The great awakening, which had been in progress for about eighteen months, had spread in a degree over the island; and many, who had been the subjects of it, were gathered into the Church. My dear friend, do help us with your prayers for the dear native converts, that they may be faithful unto death.

"A. W. MURRAY."

GEOLOGY OF THE DELUGE.

BY GEORGE MACDOUGALL, ESQ., SURGEON
Galashiels, Roxburghshire.

PART II.

THE solution given of the difficulty in question, is more fully demonstrated to be the correct one, by the discovery of human bones mixed up with the diluvial strata, and associated with the bones of the animals already mentioned. I will bring this fact more fully before you from the excellent work of Mr Fairholm upon this subject:—

"The next proof which the anti-diluvials said was wanting was the existence of human fossil bones along with the other bones already noticed. This was, for some time, an admitted difficulty. Man's remains have, however, been found, from time to time, in various parts of Europe; and in such juxtaposition to bones that are admitted to be fossil, that it at length became a subject of debate as to the precise period when these bones became deposited. In many cases it seemed unquestionable, from the entire state of the skeletons, and from marks of art in the manner of their deposition, that they were bones of post-diluvian beings, who had been interred in the vicinity of the fossil deposits of quadrupeds. Other cases occurred in which it became altogether a difficult matter to ascertain any distinction whatever between the other animal and human fossil remains imbedded in the same soil. At length, a few years ago, some French geologists were so powerfully struck with the mixture of human and other bones, in some of the caves in the south of France, that a more strict scrutiny was instituted; and the results were published in a paper by M. Journal of Narbonne, from which the following is a short extract. 'The discovery of the caves of Herault and of Gard in the south of France, offers to the observer a crowd of human bones and of ancient pottery mixed up in the very same mud with hyænas, tigers, lions, and a number of other animals of lost kinds. Attention was therefore called to the subject; and M. Marcel de Serres, Jules de Christol, and myself, after an attentive and conscientious observation, have come to the conclusion, that all these deposits are of the same date, and, consequently, that the men, whose fossil bones are found, were contemporary with the animals now lost from the surface of the globe. Our conclusion rested principally on the equal alternation of the bones, and on the manner of their being deposited in the caves.'

"Important as is the above admission," says Fairholm, "it must be looked upon as still more so by the advocates for the Mosaic narrative, coming, as it does, from men who profess opposition to that narrative, and who deny, in the same paper, 'that any thing is to be learnt, upon this subject, from our most remote historic annals.'"

One more instance, before quitting this department of the subject, and it is one of the most conclusive that has yet been ascertained. "At Politz in Upper Saxony," says the German geologist M. Von Schlothem, "the upper quarry is extremely instructive, exhibiting wide fissures and caverns entirely filled with the alluvial loam which covers the whole country to a great extent. Considerable masses of stalactite appear in several places; and here, principally, were found those bones of large land quadrupeds now in my possession. They were met with, at the depth of twenty feet, imbedded in the loam. The condition of these bones is nearly the same as that of the bones found at Scharz-field and the other German bone caves, and hence, it seems probable, that they were of the same age and referable to the same epoch of the ancient world. At Kostriez, the entire gypseous mass is intersected and perforated by fissures and cavities which follow every direction and are connected with each other by serpentine channels. They are filled throughout with alluvial deposits, and this loamy sediment appears to be deposited horizontally for short distances, yielding in clusters, as it were, and in precisely the same circumstances, a number of bones of land animals, amongst which are found also human bones. It is also evident that human bones could never have been buried here, nor have been thus mutilated and lodged by any accidental cause in more modern times, inasmuch, as they are always found with the other animal remains under the same relations—not constituting connected skeletons, but existing in a detached state, and mixed up with the other bones. They are, therefore, to be regarded as strictly fossil, and to have been swept hither by floods with the other animal remains at the period of the formation of the diluvial tract itself." Such is the account given by M. Von Schlothheim who personally superintended the operations of the workmen engaged in these quarries. Mr Fairholm personally visited this locality, and found various human fossil bones in juxtaposition with those of the rhinoceros, the lion, the tiger, the hyæna, the ox, the deer, the hare, the owl and other birds, the elk, the rein-deer as well as those of a small elephant. Now it is impossible, according to the present laws of animal life, that these animals could have coexisted in the same locality and climate, could have lived and died in the same situation—as, for instance, the formation, and especially the feet of the reindeer, befit it for snowy regions and rugged lands, unsuited to the luxuriant vegetation, demanded for the sustenance of such animals as the elephant and rhinoceros.

The facts known with respect to this department of the subject, might afford far more ample illustration, but the few adduced, may suffice to convince you of the satisfactory nature of this evidence. Those who desire to investigate the subject farther, will find much interesting and important matter in Fairholm's "Mosaic Deluge," and in Buckland's "Reliquiæ Diluviaræ."

The next class of proofs is derived from the banks and shores of our rivers, lakes and seas. From observations upon the isthmuses of rivers, and filling up of lakes, Cuvier was led to make calculations, which reduced the period necessary for these deposits, to within six thousand years. From the observed effects of the falls of the Rhine, during the last two centuries, it is estimated that the trough or ravine which extends from the falls to the level of the open country, would require a period of four or five thousand years, to hollow it out by the incessant friction, &c., of the water's fall. Another instance of a similar kind is to be found in the falls of Niagara. "Proceeding northward" says Bakewell, "from the falls of Niagara, the road continues on a level with lake Erie, for seven miles, when, at length, the country sinks down to a lower plain, spreading to the shores of lake Ontario. Descending to this plain, I came to the small village of Queenstone, where I was agreeably surprised at seeing the abrupt termination of the opening or channel through which the river flows after its fall at Niagara. It is therefore at Queenstone that the waters commenced their operation upon the solid strata, and since that period, they have excavated a long trough of seven miles in length." From the present effects which the force of the waters is accomplishing, many elaborate calculations have been made by Captain Hall, Mr Bakewell, and others, as to the period it would require to hollow out this trough,—and this is supposed not to exceed five thousand years.

From the nature of some of the observations made by Mr Fairholm, on the cliffs, and precipices of the shores of ocean, apparently formed by the wearing away of earth, from the action of the tidal waves, it is also in the course of being satisfactorily proved, that these cliffs may have been formed within periods not exceeding five or six thousand years.

This last mentioned class of facts is adduced in connection with the preceding, mainly to obviate the conclusion of certain geologists, that all such natural phenomena are of pre-Adamitic origin.

The next department of the subject that claims our attention is, to account for the overwhelming amount of waters that covered not only the whole earth, but exceeded the height of the loftiest mountains. In Genesis, we are informed that, in the sixth hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of the heavens were opened. The fountains of the great deep refer to the depths of the ocean. Their being broken up, refers to the bottom of the ocean being raised and fractured by some power employed in the hands of the Almighty. What this power was, seems evident from the effects that have been repeatedly perceived to be produced by the irruption of earthquakes, near and upon the seashore:—We find the following circumstances concomitant on the great earthquake of Lisbon, in 1755, detailed by eye-witnesses. That the ocean was upheaved, and one vast breast-wave rolled its perpendicular waters onward upon the city, sweeping away every object that opposed its progress, and engulfing thousands of the inhabitants, who, on its retrocession, were swept backward into the sea, and for ever lost. On the coast of South America, especially in Chili and the neighbouring island of Chiloe, earthquakes are frequent. Before the rumbling of the subterranean artillery has become sensible, the ocean is seen greatly disturbed, and, simultaneous with the shock, the waters frequently move forward, in one mighty billow, for miles upon the land, bearing destruction and death upon their retiring waves.

The bottom of the ocean (as we are informed), which then was, being raised (by the earthquake), and broken up (by the volcanic forces), while its waters were urged forwards upon the dry land, bearing devastation in their progress—the elements above combine to complete the work of ruin, for the windows of heaven were opened. The boiling ocean sent up its steaming vapours to the higher regions of the atmosphere. These became condensed, and returned to the place whence they proceeded. Streams of hydrogen, hissing and bubbling up from the volcanic chasms, ascended to the clouds, and there being diffused with the oxygen of the atmosphere, would, at one loud peal, proceeding from the terrible and concentrated thunder-cloud, become a great and dense mass of water, pouring down from the vast laboratory for forty days and nights, terror, confusion, and death on man and beast. Ever and anon, another shock of the earthquake would raise the ocean, sending wave upon wave over the limitless continents. Ever and anon the appalling thunder would render blacker and darker the atmosphere, sending down fresh torrents to swell the accumulating waters.

Who can form adequate conceptions of the terrible scenery of that day and hour when the terror of the Lord came upon all flesh? Hark to the loud rumbling of the earthquake, the deafening roar of the dread artillery of heaven,—and, by that sudden and tremendous flash, lighting for an instant the dark and howling concave! Behold a multitude of miserable wretches flying with frantic shrieks, before the triumphant sweep of the pursuing wave. They struggle to the nearest mountain, each fearfully anxious for his own safety, intensely selfish with regard to the safety of others. The bridegroom hears behind him the wild shriek of his beloved bride overtaken by the raging billow, but he halts not in his onward career. The father's ear is deaf to the piteous cry of his lately fondled child. The mother casts away her infant to the mercy of the pitiless pursuer, that it might not abate by one moment the speed of her flight. They reach the mountain and madly rush to the lofty trees that nod from its steep, whither the lion and the lamb, the leopard and the stag, have fled before them, moaning and crouching together for mutual protection. They climb the towering pines, and strain round their bursting eyeballs, but flash after flash reveal the rapidly advancing waves, swollen by the mountain-torrent, now become a broad and raging river, foaming from the steep above them, tearing up, and bearing along rocks and trees, in its resistless course. Over all the vast plain below, sea covers sea—sea without shore. The utter annihilation of hope is expressed in one wild howl, as a vast heaving wave, rising to the summit of the loftiest tree, engulphs them in the devouring abyss. Dismay and trembling seize upon all flesh. Night succeeds day, and day follows in the train of night, but the pitchy blackness of the sky is unrelieved by a single ray from sun or star. The frequent electric flash reveals but a world of raging waters, upon whose white bosom float the spoils of cities and empires and all those vast forests that lately girded the mountain side, or flung their dense impenetrable belt from shore to shore. Save of the monsters of the deep, the sound and the motion of animal life, hath ceased on the face of the earth. But lo! an object is seen riding in triumph on the waves, contemning alike the fury of the elements above and below. It is the ark, safe in the guidance of Him who holds the waters in the hollow of his hand. It has careered for ten long months over the unconquerable flood, amid the play of lightnings, in perfect security,—and now, without an anchor, it rests from its voyage, on the summit of Ararat. Now, the waters retire within their accustomed bounds, the sun bursts forth in unclouded splendour, and the bow of God is set in the heavens—the glorious token of an enduring covenant, “that while the earth remains, seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.”

And faithful to its sacred page,
Heaven still rebuilds the plan,
Nor lets the type grow pale with age,
That first spoke peace to man.

CAMPBELL.

RESIGNATION.

LORD, it belongs not to my care
Whether I die or live;
To love and serve Thee is my share,
And this thy grace must give.
If life be long, I will be glad,
That I may long obey;
If short, yet why should I be sad
To soar to endless day?

Christ leads me through no darker rooms
Than he went through before;
He that into God's kingdom comes,
Must enter by his door.
Come, Lord, when grace has made me meet
Thy blessed face to see;
For if thy work on earth be sweet,
What will thy glory be?

Then shall I end my sad complaints,
And weary sinful days;
And join with the triumphant saints,
That sing Jehovah's praise.
My knowledge of that life is small,
The eye of faith is dim;
But 'tis enough that Christ knows all,
And I shall be with him.

R. BAXTER.

THE CHARACTER OF DANIEL :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BURNS, D.D.,

Minister of St George's Parish, Paisley.

“Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and, his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a-day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.”
—DAN. vi. x.

IN every age there have been witnesses for God—men who have stood pre-eminent among their brethren for piety, rising above the ordinary level of spiritual attainment, and shedding around them, in the midst of darkness, the steady light of a holy conversation. Such was Enoch, who walked with God, and who ripened with a sacred rapidity for that glory to which he was supernaturally raised. Such was Noah, “a preacher of righteousness,” who, by his discourses and by his life, held forth a standing reproof to “the world of the ungodly.” Such was Elijah, one of the “chariots of Israel, and of the horsemen thereof,” who, in the days of the wicked King Ahab, lifted up a solemn testimony for God, and who is held in remembrance as the great restorer of the law. And such was Daniel who, in the court of the Chaldean monarchs, was not ashamed to witness a good confession, while he reared the standard of the true faith amid the gorgeous ensigns of a sensualized superstition.

The exigencies of the times required that such faithful witnesses for the true God should be raised up by a special Providence, should be qualified for the task assigned them, and carried through all its difficulties with credit to themselves, and to the cause in which they were embarked. A season of darkness required a light of no common lustre, to cheer amid the gloom; and such a light was made to shine. A time of general lukewarmness rendered necessary a zealous, and warm-hearted, and persevering reformer, to revive the work of the Lord as in other days; and such a one it pleased Jehovah to furnish. When the symptoms of general apostasy were manifest, and when the temptations to forsake the true God, and to turn aside after idols, were multiplied, then was the critical moment, when an instrument of extraordinary efficacy required to be put, and kept in operation, to check the flowing tide of degeneracy; and such an instrument was raised up by Him “who hath the hearts of all men in his hands.” The histories of such eminent individuals are preserved, on the imperishable Record of Inspiration, for the instruction of future ages. Their examples are held forth as models of imitation; and in this manner, “though dead,” they “still speak” to the world and to the Church in the language of reproof, of encouragement, and of faithful admonition.

The words of our text stand connected with the exhibition of a very distinguished character, and the statement of a series of very interesting and instructive events. In discoursing from them, we shall, first, attend to the history of which they form an essential part; and, in the second place, we shall trace the lessons of piety and instruction which the conduct and character of Daniel, in this instance, furnish to our minds.

I. Among the children of the captivity in Babylon, there was found a young man of the name of Daniel, who, at a very early period of life, discovered no ordinary symptoms of superior wisdom and piety. Along with a few others of his companions in captivity, he was selected to stand as a page or humble servant in the presence of the king, and was put into a course of preparation for the duties of the palace which might be assigned to him. The Hebrew youths, well instructed in the principles of the true religion, reverencing the regulations of that ceremonial institute which, although put down for a season, was dear to their hearts as the appointment of heaven, and tenderly alive to the seductive influence of sensual indulgences and superstitious associations, steadily declined participating in the royal provision which was made for them, and respectfully solicited that the homely substitute of pulse and water might be allotted as their daily fare. It was so; and the special providence of Jehovah crowned it with a far richer blessing than that which rested on the costly indulgences of their more gay and thoughtless companions. "Man does not live by bread alone." It was tenderness of conscience, a desire to abstain even "from the appearance of evil," and to avoid the contaminating touch of the "garment spotted by the flesh;"—it was this noble principle which actuated Daniel and his companions in this part of their history; and their conduct holds forth to youth and age a fine example of attachment to the God of our fathers—abhorrence of the very first approach to the scenes of corruption—delicate susceptibility of the infinite distance that there is between right and wrong, holiness and sin—ardent and persevering effort to avoid the first approaches of temptation—and vigorous resolution of soul, with manly firmness, and at the risk of blasting the fairest prospects in life, to "confess Him before men," who hath assured us that he will confess his faithful and stedfast disciples in the presence of an assembled universe.

Daniel "grew in wisdom and in piety, as he grew in years;" and a circumstance soon occurred, which at once proved the strength of his faith and the supernatural character of his gifts, while it brought him into public notice, and paved the way for his future advancement. Nebuchadnezzar the king, having dreamed a dream which he had completely forgotten, called upon the wise men and soothsayers of his court to declare at once the dream itself, and its right interpretation, under the penalty of death for non-compliance with the impracticable requisition. Daniel, who was very improperly classed with the ordinary astrologers and magicians of the day, felt the difficulty of the situation in which he and his brethren were placed, and acted, in the painful emergency, on the dictates of heavenly wisdom. He appeals from the folly and despotic cruelty of man to the wisdom and condescension of God. Times of peculiar difficulty render a direct and undisguised appeal to the Majesty of heaven singularly requisite; and the season of danger is exactly the season when we ought "to pour out our hearts before the Lord." It is on the mount of difficulty and danger the Lord shall be seen, and "the Lord will provide." Distrusting ourselves and all human resources, we must rise to God, and repose all our anxieties and fears on Him who hath undertaken to "direct the steps" of those who truly acknowledge him in all their ways. Daniel acted on these principles, and spread the case, in all its formidable difficulties, before the Lord in prayer; and an answer of peace was given. A Divine communication was made to the prophet, who, with deep and becoming humility, and with the most ardent gratitude, ascribes the glory of it to the God of heaven. He tells and explains all the parts of the dream; and he hesitates not to address the haughty monarch of Babylon in the language of wholesome admonition. His character as a prophet of the Most High God is forthwith publicly recognised, and he is elevated to the presidency of the province, and was honoured "to sit in the gate of the king."

"Man that is honoured, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." Psalm xlix. 20. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom!" Prosperity has snares peculiar to itself. The smiles of the world bewitch and beguile the soul. The favour of great men, and the applauses of listening multitudes, are very unfavourable to the fidelity of principle and to consistency in duty; and hence the suitableness and the import of that prayer, whose meaning we are very apt to overlook, "In all time of our wealth, good Lord, deliver us!" Did Daniel hold fast his integrity, when prosperous fortune allured him by her charms? Yes; he "honoured the God of heaven." His exalted station only rendered his piety more conspicuous, and its practical exertions useful on a larger scale. He obtains places of trust for his three pious companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-neg; and thus, in the very centre of the idolatrous city of Babylon, establishes a most powerful interest in favour of the God and the people of Israel. When called to interpret the king's dream of the great tree which was cut down by the judgment of Heaven, he shrinks not from the painful task of foretelling to Nebuchadnezzar his fearful doom; and when invited to read to his ungodly successor the hand-writing on the wall, he hesitated not to announce to the terrified victim of a wounded and distracted conscience the retributive sentence of Jehovah, which deprived him, by one stroke, of his crown and of his life. It is worthy of particular notice that, although Daniel lived to a good old age, and witnessed a great succession of changes in the empire of Chaldea, he retained a sameness of principle throughout, and preserved untarnished a character of consistent and unbending integrity.

When Darius the Mede succeeded to the throne of Chaldea, now united with the monarchy of the Medes and Persians, so great was the reputation of Daniel that, though of a different religion from that of the king and the empire generally, he was elevated to the chief seat among the one hundred and twenty governors or viceroys who were nominated to so many provinces, into which the kingdom of Babylon was subdivided. This was a singularly marked tribute of respect, at once to the known wisdom, the tried fidelity, and the uniform consistency of his character; and the king had certainly no reason to repent the selection he had made. But great men have generally their envious detractors; and good men, when raised to elevated stations of rank and influence, seldom escape the fiery darts of malicious enmity. We commonly find that strict and exalted piety—eminence in true religion and godliness—when associated with high official influence, becomes peculiarly the object of envenomed hostility to se whose vices it rebukes, and whose selfish or crooked designs it restrains and counteracts. The fiercer heads of the Chaldean provinces, offended by the elevated piety of Daniel, and envying the pre-eminence of a stranger and a captive Israelite, formed a conspiracy against his life. We may well suppose that they would examine his public conduct with an eagle-eye, and that the smallest indication would not escape their notice. Their object was to accuse him to the king as unfaithful to his trust, and as a traitor to the best interests of his kingdom. In this they were completely foiled; for the public conduct of Daniel in his official station, when tried in the crucible of keen and malignant persecuting scrutiny, "came forth like gold." He was found to be diligent in his trust, faithful to the minutest departments, and most conscientiously alive to the best interests of the kingdom. Disappointed in their expectations on this ground, they changed the mode of their attacks upon him, and determined to make his religion the ground of their accusation. Poor, deluded men! They knew not that it was, in fact, his religion which made him so exemplary in the discharge of his public trust, so tenderly alive to the minutest call of personal and relative duty, so conscientious as a servant of the king of Babylon, and so superior in all things to the suggestions and the snares of selfishness and crooked policy. Worldly men are compelled to speak reluctantly the praises of consistent and uniform regularity of official conduct in those who fear the Lord; while they select, as the subject of their scorn, the very principle which lies at the foundation of the whole, and gives to the character all its consistency and all its worth. It was just because he "feared the Lord God of Israel from his youth," and acted constantly on the thought of, "Thou, God, seest me," that Daniel was enabled, through a long life, to hold fast his integrity, and thus gave no occasion to the "adversary to speak reproachfully." His enemies, while they were blind to all that was lovely and excellent in his religious principles, were well aware of the sincerity with which he held them, and therefore devised a scheme, to which the very sincerity which constituted such a conspicuous feature in his character, could not fail to insure success. What an honourable testimony do they bear in his favour! "We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God." Happy would we be, could we say this of the bulk of professing Christians around us!—that they are so strict in their conduct, and so blameless in their whole deportment, that no charge can be brought against them, "except it be as concerning the law of their God!"

The scheme devised by Daniel's enemies was characterised at once by impiety and absurdity. In an evil hour, they contrive to obtain from Darius the signature of a decree, that for the space of thirty days, no one shall dare to present a petition to God or man, save to him only. Wide and sweeping was the compass of this infamous decree. The child must not ask bread of its parent—nor must the servant address the most reasonable request to his master—nor must the beggar, from dire necessity, ask an alms from the humane, without running an imminent risk of being "cast into the den of lions." The absurdity of it is only equalled by its daring impiety. The duties of men to their God must be suspended; and the monarch of Babylon, and he alone, must monopolise all the honours of God and of men! The decree was flattering to the vanity of a despotic ruler; and the passing of it speaks volumes on the sad evils which must ever result from the exercise of power, swayed by no principle and regulated by no law, save the will of a despot. May God long preserve our beloved land from such an awful curse!

Daniel remained calm and unmoved amid the dangers which now surrounded him. Firm in his principles, he resolved to bid defiance to the strongest of earthly feelings; and though favoured with no communication from heaven, assuring him of protection in the hour of danger, he fears not the teeth of the devouring beasts of prey. The paramount rights of conscience and of God he fails not to respect, and his customary homage to the Majesty of Heaven he shrinks not to pay, whatever might be the penalty which awaited him. "Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and, his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a-day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforesaid." A complaint is regularly lodged against him, and, without even the formality of a trial, he is, by the irrevocable sentence of the Medes and Persians, "cast into the den of lions." Darius seems to have anticipated his miraculous preservation, and delights to find, on the morning of the following day, that "God had shut the lions' mouths." The time of man's extremity is often the time when God signally interposes in behalf of his people; and, at this particular time and place, a supernatural testimony to the true religion, in the person of its distinguished representative, was essentially necessary. The effect on the mind of Darius was deep and powerful. He publicly recognised the supremacy of the God of Israel. He condemned to death the cruel enemies of Daniel and his God. He bestowed on Daniel many distinguished honours. And this holy man lived to a good old age, even till about the time of the restoration of Judah to their own land; and he was there "gathered to his fathers, like a shock of corn when fully ripe." "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

To be continued.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A help to self-dedication.—"I the Lord will make an everlasting covenant with you." Isa. lv, 3. "Ours shall say, I am the Lord's, and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord." Isa. xlii. 5. Lord God of hosts, thou didst enter into covenant with Abraham, as he waited beside the sacrifices which he had prepared (Gen. xv. 18); and thou art now graciously waiting beside Jesus, the sacrifice which thou hast prepared, in order that sinners may come and enter into covenant with thee (2 Cor. v. 19). "Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and in thy sight, and I am no more worthy to be called thy child;" but thou, in thy rich mercy, art willing to receive me, and I, through thy grace, am willing to be thine! I lay all my sins (Isa. liii. 6), the sin of my nature, the sin of my heart, the sin of my life, the sin of my lips, my secret sins—I lay all my sins, and iniquities, and unrighteousnesses, and transgressions upon Jesus the Lamb of God; and, cleansed by his blood, and made acceptable in his righteousness (Eph. i. 6, 7), I desire now to give myself to thee in an everlasting covenant, never to be forgotten (Jer. xxxii. 40). I am not my own; I am thine. My heart is not my own; it is thine: I will endeavour to keep it for thee, and to make it Bethel—a temple for the Holy Ghost. My thoughts are not my own; they are thine: I will cultivate godly and heavenly meditations. My words are not my own; they are thine: I will avoid all idle, unprofitable, vain-glorious, flattering, uncharitable discourse, and I will seek to have my conversation always savouring of Christ and heaven. My eyes are not my own; they are thine: I will withhold them from looking upon sin and vanity (Habak. i. 13). My wealth is not my own; it is thine—I am only thy steward: I will, therefore, lay it out prudently and faithfully for thee, avoiding all unnecessary expense upon myself (Deut. xxiv. 19-21). My time is not my own; it is thine: I will employ it for thee, doing all I do as unto the Lord, striving every day to grow in grace and in knowledge, and to make myself useful to my fellow-men; I will redeem my time from too long or needless visits, idle imaginations, fruitless discourse, unnecessary sleep, and more than needful care about my worldly affairs. I desire to commit all I have to thee—my friends, my family, my health, my business, my esteem in the world. I am willing to receive what thou givest, to want what thou withholdest, to relinquish what thou takest, to suffer what thou inflictest, to be what thou requirest, and to do what thou commandest. Lord God of hosts, I desire, deliberately, cheerfully, and with full purpose of heart, thus to surrender myself wholly and for ever to thee. I feel that this is my duty, my interest, my privilege, my glory. I believe that thou wilt receive what I thus give. I believe that thou wilt keep what I have thus committed to thee. I will trust in thee for temporal provision—I will trust in thee for support under daily cares and labours—I will trust in thee for pardon of daily sins—I will trust in thee for growth and fruitfulness—I will trust in thee for strength in the hour of death. If I sin, may I grieve without despair; if I walk uprightly, may I rejoice without pride. Lord Jesus, I take thee for my Prophet, my Priest, my King, my life, my light, my rest, my joy, my glory, my All in All. Spirit of Adoption, that proceedest from the Father and the Son, I desire to receive thee into my soul, that thou mayest abide in me. Convince me of sin; convince me of judgment; guide me into all truth; take of the things of Christ, and show them unto me; be as the dew and the rain of heaven to my soul, causing the word of life to take root and grow, and bear the fruits of peace, joy, love, gentleness. Enable me to mortify the flesh, with its affections and lusts. When the enemy comes in like a flood, do thou lift up a standard against him. Be in me as a well of living water; be in me as the earnest of the inheritance—as the first-fruits of heaven, sealing unto the day of redemption. Holy and Blessed Spirit, help me to distinguish between thy voice and the voice of the evil one—between thy suggestions and the impulses of the flesh—between thy leadings and the frowardness of my own heart. I will labour not to resist, not to grieve, nor dishonour, nor quench thee, but with an humble, broken, mortified, self-denying spirit, will endeavour to fall in with thee in all things, and to think, and speak, and act in thee.—(Original.)

The Believer's Privileges.—All the promises recorded by the prophet Isaiah, are for the encouragement of believers in all ages; and they are there assured that God is ready not only to give them their heart's desire, but to anticipate their wishes, and prevent them with the blessings of his goodness; that if they are straitened, it is in themselves, and not in him who has said, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it;" that there are in reserve for them blessings unspeakably richer than any they have yet received, were their own spiritual longings more ardent and more enlarged; and that, although for all these things he will be inquired after, though it is alike befitting his character, and essential to their wellbeing, that prayer and supplication should not be dispensed with, "yet before they call, he will answer; and whilst they are yet speaking he will hear."—REV. DR GORDON.

The Dignity of Man.—The higher faculties and nobler operations of the human mind, I must not attempt to enumerate, far less to analyse; but contemplate, for a moment, some of their vast results. Behold that feeble creature man, by his superior intelligence, subduing animals of strength and activity far surpassing his own, and employing their powers in his service;—see him controlling the vegetative powers of the earth, directing its fertility, and changing the barren wilderness and impenetrable forest into a fruitful field;—see him overleaping the boundaries of country, and guiding his bark through the trackless waves of boundless and unfathomable ocean;—see him, not satisfied with the ample disclosures of nature, subjecting her to experiment, and forcing her to reveal her secrets;—see him collecting, from a survey of the history of man, the accumulated wisdom of past ages, and applying it to the improvement and comfort of the ages to come;—see him, not confining his researches to the plants he tracks on, and the animals around him, but following the stars in their courses, ascertaining their motions and revolutions, and demonstrating, at once, the immensity of the works of God, and the simplicity of the laws by which they are regulated. Behold him in a different aspect, united to his species by a thousand ties; in the family, seeking solace and repose in scenes of domestic affection; in the state, forgetting himself in zeal for the many, and studying only the interests of mankind. Finally, contemplate him distinguished as the subject of the moral government of God; with thoughts, desires, and affections, that address themselves to objects beyond the sphere of created being and moral existence; endowed with conscience, the delegate of the Most High; accosted by prophets and apostles, the oft-returning messengers of heaven; and, O last effort of all-conquering mercy! visited and reclaimed by God himself, wearing the veil of sin-degraded humanity. Ah! could we but learn to estimate our souls by the price God has put upon them, we should not so basely vilify their powers, so boldly misapply their godlike attributes.—REV. H. GRAY.

EGOTISM OR SELF-LOVE.

BY M. ROUSSEL, EDITOR OF "L'ESPÉRANCE."

Translated from the French.

AFTER having probed the egotism of others, I now come to perform on myself the same operation. I am not a whit more free from it than they are.

But what, then, is this fearful pleasure we take in unmining our own wounds? What! doth pride take advantage even of our misery, and inflate itself with consciousness of our littleness? It is true, that I am an egotist; but have I not discovered it? Egotism frightful, unnatural—abominable to God, and fatal to man; granted. But may we not, to a certain extent, compensate for the evil by the clearness of mental vision that can perceive this, by the cool daring with which we analyse it, and by the candour of our conclusions? May not the want of heart be filled up by the qualities of mind? Ah! “knowledge puffeth up,” said, long ago, the apostle. She puffs up, even to folly; she intoxicates, blinds, makes us giddy; and the poor philosopher, whose conscientious study of the human heart leads to the knowledge of his own corruption, will even pride himself on this knowledge, and cloak himself with his own shame!

Yes, pride is stupid; yes, egotism is heaped on egotism. Self-love intrudes on the writer as well as on the reader. For he who listens is no better sheltered from it than he who speaks; the one is no safer than the other.

How much we say to be listened to! And again, how much we listen to for the mere sake of answering! Between two speakers, conversation is often nothing more than egotism in full play, sometimes gathering strength, sometimes spending its strength, and pausing again to take breath for more exertion. This may explain or account for the uselessness of the generality of discussions. Why is it that an argument, whose truth strikes us as irresistible, produces no effect on our adversary? Because, instead of considering its value, he seeks only how to answer it. How could he perceive the truth presented to him, were she armed from head to foot, when his eye seeks only for some fault in the armour, and this happens to the best of us? Perfect goodness, faultless virtues exist not in this world; such flowers no longer bloom on our accursed soil; we must content ourselves with plants of a mixed sort, for the pure seed is gone; we must content ourselves with relative virtues, for the most courageous are sometimes cowardly, and the most sprightly are now and then hypocritical. I may adduce in proof of the influence of egotism on my own readers, from the opinions they form, and the impressions they receive from their reading. For instance among the articles of the “Espérance,” which are most sought after, the most practical,—those in which the reader is personally exhorted or reproved, in a word, the most truly useful? No; but the reverse. Saving among some chosen souls,—some happy souls!

For the most part, what we like is to find others censured; the truths we enjoy, are those which true as they are, do not touch ourselves, and then we feel doubly happy; first, because they do not affect us; and secondly, because we have satisfied our consciences by acknowledging truth as truth, remaining ourselves scathless meanwhile.

The fact is, that the greater number of opinions take their rise in our own character. In many cases, our inclination settles the matter; our indulgence and our non-indulgence are habitually the result of our likings and our dislikings,—so that, oftentimes, when we have slumbered at the passing by of the camel, we have wakened terribly at the approach of the fly. Have you never heard some giant in virtue, give full vent to his indignation against a vice he has been preserved from both by his natural temperament and his youthful training? Ah! my friend, we do not hear you thunder against the failings you yourself lean to! Do you not fear lest he whom you blame so loudly, should turn round and declaim against some moral blemish which appears in you, and appears not in him. Like companions in an hospital, why do you only detest the ailments you are free from? and on this footing, why may not your next neighbour detest the malady that burdens you? To call out so loudly against an evil is, to proclaim that we are not subject to it—nay, that any thing like it is a thousand miles from our door.

Sometimes we only speak indirectly of the vice in question. When on this tack, we praise the opposite quality. This is clever. By exalting the quality we possess, or think we possess—by painting it in bright colours, we leave in the shade those advantages we do not possess, and even render the absence of them unimportant. Thus the miser will take care how he praises liberality; because in his eyes it does not occupy the first place among social virtues; but he will greatly esteem regularity of conduct. Again, if the libertine is compelled to praise purity of morals, he will do it in a slight way; but he will vastly admire generosity. The essential is sure to be what we have, and the accessory what we have not; for we judge quite differently of the gifts of the heart and the gifts of fortune; of the latter, we have never enough—of the former, we have always a plentiful provision.

What shall we say of that class of men so astonishing, and yet so numerous, who, as it were in justice to themselves, having no personal value, place their pride in the things they have gained? These are good-natured plagiarists, as content with their borrowings as if they had been hardy earned. There are faded Adonis's, delighted with the additions and completions fitted on to their persons by the tailor and the hairdresser. There is the crowd of ex-officials, who, living now upon the past, cling to what they have done, and to what they have been.

There is the herd of proprietors, male and female, who innocently turn upon themselves the praises you lavish on their flowers, their horse, or their piano. Egotism! where art thou not? Vanity! idolatry! culpable and foolish incense which we burn to our ourselves! against such an evil is there no remedy? Yes, there is a remedy, thanked be God—but there is but one. Egotism, the love of self, is infinite affection lavished on finite being. Turn from its human bed this exhaustless river, and let it flow on towards God. To bestow the affection of man's heart on an infinite object, so as that man shall love God as he once loved himself, that is to say, with his whole heart—this is the Alphabet of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

---

THE CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE OF MISS L.—

By THE EDITOR.

PART II.

CHRIST's true followers are often trained in the school of affliction. Our views and feelings are so entirely limited to present and sensible objects, that we are in danger of viewing affliction merely as it is in itself,—not joyous, but grievous; without taking into consideration the salutary moral effects which it produces in the character of the sufferer. In adversity the pride of the Christian is humbled; he becomes more deeply sensible of his utter weakness and unworthiness; he cleaves the more closely to the mercy and love of his heavenly Father; and he confides the more simply and the more unreservedly in the grace and guidance of his Redeemer and Lord. He feels that this world is vain and unsatisfying; but in the multitude of his thoughts within him, the comforts of God delight his soul; and however severe may be the trials with which he has been visited, he knows that they are intended to subserve the accomplishment of the will of God—"even his sanctification." What room is there, then, for one repining thought? The Lord is withdrawing temporal comfort, that the believer may be led to "set his affections on the things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." Such was the experience of Miss L—. She was subjected to much bodily weakness, but she was "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." Thus, in the year 1829 her Diary contains these remarks:—

"Well might the prophet say, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee,' the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures are calculated to maintain the soul in uniform serenity, it is unbelief contracts their influence. Oh for grace at all times to view futurity as the only consummation of life and happiness, and see that every thing, however discordant to present gratification, has an ultimate reference to it, that there is a 'need be' for all these things, and that the time is coming, when every dark providence will be cleared up, and it shall be made manifest that every event of this mortal state has been necessary in the great operations of the director of all things to perfect the worth of redeeming grace.

"I have been blessed with much spiritual comfort for sometime past, I scarcely ever had such distinct exercises of faith,—it has been often, during the past year, and the feeling is rather increasing. I have been as conscious of the divine presence as ever I was of the presence of a friend when conversing with me. I have felt within such a persuasion that God did hear my prayers; I have been given, when at the throne of grace, the power to renounce self, and sweetly and entirely to rely on Christ, that I must conclude, my exercises have been different from what the natural man ever felt. I surely know from experience the meaning of that text, 'To you that believe he is precious.' Oh how precious!"

And again, in reference to the benefits which she had derived from affliction:—

"I think God has graciously led me to see that sickness and ill health, and other trials may be profitable, that they may even be pleasant when he sends them and blesses them. I never was so happy as when the fatherly corrections of God showed me that this is not my rest; my soul has relied in faith and hope, solely on the faithfulness and grace of God, through his dear Son. I felt my will say amen to God, and could repose on the precious belief, that a God of infinite wisdom and goodness, governs and guides the concerns of the universe,—the peace and joy thus produced, is unmingled joy, it is a joy in God, while self dwindles into nothing."

Accustomed as we are to connect pain, and calamity, and persecution, with wretchedness and despair, the suffering disciples of the Redeemer cannot fail to be regarded by the ignorant worldling as the objects of pity, rather than of congratulation. They are supposed to be of a morose and austere disposition, utter strangers to cheerfulness and contentment. On this very prevalent misrepresentation Miss L— remarks:—

"Many who have no knowledge of religion, think it makes men gloomy. I know of no such religion. How can that which prepares us for trials—which teaches us to expect and bear disappointments—which leaves our calculations and desires from this world—which resolves all things with sweet complacency into the will of the all-wise, all-merciful Governor of the universe, which assures us, that Jehovah will make all things work for our good, which gives the soul in this wilderness foretastes of heaven, and a hope attested by evidence which God himself has prescribed of ultimate admission to the joys that are at his right hand for evermore. How can this religion make men gloomy?—it is impossible. O yes! I can say from experience, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee.' I know that all He appoints is best. 'My soul, trust thou in the Lord for ever, in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.'"

In 1830 Miss L— removed, with her mother, to Edinburgh, when they took up their residence at Cornhill Bank. Here she attended the ministrations of the lamented Mr Martin, who was then minister of South-bridge Chapel. Under the instructions of this great but highly gifted servant of the Lord Jesus, she made rapid progress in the knowledge and love of the truth. She grew up and flourished in the courts of the Lord's house, and throughout the rest of her Diary we find almost constant reference to the Discourses of Mr Martin, as having refreshed and strengthened her soul. In the beginning of January 1831 she writes her sister in the following terms:—

"MY DEAR R—,—I have long intended to write you, and I am set down at last. I was very much pleased with your last note. If it be, as you say, my sincere wish for yourself and children, to be within the covenant, He, who never heard that wish in vain, will satisfy your largest wish; in this respect we cannot be too ambitious, nor can our desires be too numerous or large,—put thou thy trust in God, he'll give thee that heart's desire.

"To God thy way commit, him trust,
It bring to pass shall he."

"I was sorry to hear your little darling was so ill, but I hope she will be spared to you, if it be God's will; if not, we should not desire it, but I hope you will be made willing to submit to God's will in this and every thing else, and that your will may be one with His, who knows what is best for us. We had a beautiful lecture from Mr Martin last Sabbath, from Luke xvi. 18-28. My mother received your letter; I was sorry you did not send mine, on account of the date, it would have been very acceptable, however old, you must do the same again. I have really enjoyed good health for some time past, and am a good deal stronger than I have been for five years. Oh, what reason have I for gratitude and praise! My spiritual and temporal mercies are more than can be numbered. I really do not think that ever one so completely unworthy was ever so signally blessed as I have been; the only sorrow I have, arises from sin I see and feel clinging to my every action; sin in the world, and sin in myself is the only grief I have, but I take that glorious promise, and rest upon it, and I would entreat you to take it also, 'Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace.' We had a beautiful sermon lately from Mr Martin on these words. I have neither time nor space to put it down here, but what he said was most comforting, that the believer was not to think, because sin sometimes prevailed, that therefore it reigned,—as well might we think, that a king did not reign supreme over his realms, because a subject or two in some remote corner of the kingdom were apt to rebel."

Shortly after Miss L.— came to reside in Edinburgh, she entertained the idea of putting in writing a record of the Lord's dealings with her from her earliest recollections. This design, had it been accomplished, might have put us in possession of a very valuable autobiography; but from some cause or other, (perhaps from the state of her health,) she had only penned a few sentences, explanatory of her object, and the reasons for wishing to accomplish it, when she abruptly terminates the narrative. We regret the loss; but enough remains of her Diary to show, at all events, that the Spirit carried forward the work which he had graciously begun in her soul, and thus prepared her for the glorious change which she was soon to undergo. The concern which she felt for the best interests of every member of her family was a beautiful feature of her character. To her sister she was often accustomed to throw out reasonable hints in reference to the religious training of her children. The following judicious observations on that important subject may be useful to some of our readers:—

"O, R—, you have an important charge given you by God; you cannot teach them to love God too soon, or too early impress on their minds that he is every where present, that he is all-powerful, and that they cannot be good unless he teaches them,—therefore, they should pray for his teaching; whenever they have behaved well, teach them that it is only God who has enabled them, and that they never can at any time do good without the help of a great and invisible God, that they can only get this help for Christ's sake, for what he did and suffered,—they and all men deserve hell, and would have been in it, had it not been that the Son of the great God left heaven, came to this world, obeyed the commandments for us, which we could never do—that his doing this pleased God as much as if we ourselves had done it, that all men deserve hell for their sins, but that Christ had died on the cross to take away sin, that he had suffered for our sins, that we might be saved from suffering the punishment we deserved; and therefore, if we believed ourselves to be sinners, if we felt that we could never without the help of God, do any thing to please him, that we could never act so as to deserve heaven, if we were willing, perfectly willing to be saved, and get there because Christ had satisfied God's justice as stated above; tell the children that if they feel thus and come to God, and pray to him to save them from the punishment and power of sin,—in other words, to save them from hell, and make them holy, for Christ's sake (that only for his sake they are to expect to be heard and not on account of ANY THING ELSE), they will be heard and answered, for God hath said, 'Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out.' He has said in another place, to them that come to him, 'That he will receive them, and be a father unto them, and they shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.' Surely there is nothing in all this that a child may not understand, nothing, were it not that the heart is enmity against God, and unless taken away by him, will effectually blind us to the plan of salvation by Christ. You may say 'well then, if this enmity should only blind the hearts of my children, they cannot come to God in Christ, neither will they understand the great truths of the Gospel, were I to tell them.' This is quite true, but are we on that account, to desist from using the means till the enmity is taken away? No; use the means and look with faith and hope for the blessing through Christ; we should always remember that God is a sovereign, he can work with means or without, for or against them, and he does this in a way often unseen to us, and incomprehensible; we cannot say, with regard to an individual or a child, whether or not the Spirit of God has been, or is at work with them; for ought we know, they may have been sanctified from the womb, nor can we from the first dawn of reason on the soul, say it is too soon to sow the good seed.

"This I am certain of, that God can convince a child of sin, and that it cannot by any of its own works merit heaven. He can make it willing to accept of salvation on any terms which God thinks fit to propose; carry all this on in the heart, and make it quite ready to receive the good seed, even the Gospel of Jesus, and yet not one individual be in the least aware of the great work that was going on. Now, this can be the case, I conceive, with regard to any of your children; and yet you might not know it. Now, your duty is to sow the good seed at every suitable opportunity, always asking God to bless it—to look up with confidence to God in Christ, as a covenant-keeping God, to cause the seed to take root, and bring forth fruit to his praise and glory. If any of your children were very hungry or thirsty, would it not be very cruel in you, having food, to withhold it? They may be hungering and thirsting for spiritual food, and will you not give it them (because some will tell you that they are too young to understand you), by proposing to them the grace and mercy of a Saviour? No earthly desire, however strong, can, I think, equal the desire of a soul convinced of sin and afraid of hell; and if they have never heard of Christ as he is risen, in the Bible, what do you think must be the feelings of the soul in this situation, when he hears for the first time of Christ's complete atonement, and all perfect righteousness? This is offered to him, if he be willing. He has been made already, by the grace of God, completely willing. His feelings, then, can be conceived by one who has felt the same, but cannot be described to one who has not. He no sooner hears of the Saviour than, with joy unspeakable, he flies to him, as just the very Saviour he stands in need of. He feels that Christ is just such a refuge from the storm, and covert from the tempest, as he stood in absolute need of. Without this, he felt that, for any thing he could do to save himself, he must perish, and that for ever; and now that he is safe, dwelling in Christ by faith, what follows? Gratitude and love spring up in his heart to his God and Redeemer, and he presents himself a living sacrifice to God, which he accounts a most reasonable service, and a most delightful one. All the sorrows he ever has spring from the remains of sin; and his chief grief while here is, that he cannot love God more or serve him better. This is no imaginary case; I have no doubt it happens often, and it was my own.

"I hope my dear R— will not think that I meant the foregoing observations or advices as if I would dictate to her. I wrote just as the words occurred to my mind; and if I have been writing what you knew, were convinced of, and acting upon, remember sisterly affection dictated every word written."

It were well if Christian parents would ponder deeply these important remarks, and seek to view their children habitually as immortal beings, committed to their care to be reared for the service of God here, and the enjoyment of God hereafter.

After the removal of Mr Martin from Stockbridge

Chapel to St George's Church, Miss L——, as often as she was able to attend Church, waited upon the ministry of Dr Muir, from whose Discourses she received much edification and comfort. It was not very often, however, that she was permitted to enjoy public ordinances. Naturally of a tender and delicate frame, she was very liable to attacks of illness. In the month of August 1832, she was suddenly seized with a severe vomiting of blood, which continued at intervals for twelve hours. To a constitution already much weakened, this was a violent shock; but, by the blessing of the Almighty, she was gradually restored from what appeared to herself and the family the gates of death. Infirmity of body gave rise, as is often the case, to cloudiness in her spiritual prospects; and accordingly, we find her thus bewailing her state:—

“Of late I have felt my inward darkness much. This, along with a sense of sin—inward sin—has given me much sorrow, finding that in me there was nothing but sin and darkness. I have looked and cried to God in Christ alone for light and deliverance from sin; for I am blind, and sinful, and weak. I will plead this promise, (God be praised for it!) ‘I will bring the blind by a way that they know not; I will lead them in paths which they have not known. I will make darkness light before them, and crooked places straight. Those things will I do unto them, and not forsake them. Praise the Lord, praise the Lord; let all that is within me praise the Lord.’ I wish all men to praise and glorify God; but, alas! sin abounds in all men. The sins of professors, and those around me, give me much grief; the sins of those near and dear to me make me sad, sad. My hope is in the Lord, both for them and myself, or I would be in despair. Ps. xvi. 8, 9, 11.”

Though often conscious of the struggle between the flesh and the Spirit, she never lost sight of her Redeemer. Her views of his fulness and all-sufficiency seemed to become clearer as she advanced. Her end was near, though she knew it not. The vomiting of blood which had so alarmingly seized her in August, returned on the 1st of October following, and proved fatal. The brief record of the closing scene is thus given by a friend:—

“Miss L——’s last illness continued for three days only; and, though suffering great pain, she made no complaints; for, on her mother remarking, ‘Oh, that is severe!’ she replied, ‘Oh, no, mother! What did Christ suffer?’ She often said, ‘Oh, that I may triumph over death!’ and, holding out her arms to her brother, said with a firm voice, ‘William, to live is Christ, and to die unspeakable gain; I am happy.’ On the Sabbath preceding her death, although not able to speak much, she requested to hear some portions of Scripture. The 40th Psalm being read to her, she earnestly exhorted her mother to wait patiently upon the Lord; and, on afterwards having heard read the two first verses of the 42d Psalm, said, ‘That is exactly what I feel.’ She was ever anxious to impart to her mother the joy she felt; and on the latter saying, ‘Are you not sorry to leave me?’ ‘No; I am thankful to leave you, under a Gospel minister.’ She took her parent’s hand, and prayed for Dr Muir (who was her minister), for Dr P——, and for all from whom she had received kindness. When not asleep, she was engaged in prayer. She spoke of all her little matters; arranged every thing; said she was ‘setting her house in order.’ The state of her mind was happy, always rejoicing. ‘O mother, what is prayer, without communion with God? I am perfectly sensible of the presence of God in my apartment.’

“Her character was remarkable for great humility, self-denial, patience, kindness, charity, anxiety to be useful, and to proclaim to sinners the glad tidings of salvation. She was the stay of her widowed mother; advised her in difficulty—soothed her in sorrow—built her up in the faith. With a singleness of heart very remarkable, she glorified God in all things; and wherever affliction was sent to any around her, she was eager to impart comfort, beseeching of the Lord to enable her to speak a right word in season to the afflicted soul! She died October 3, 1832.”

That Miss L—— was quite aware of the approach of death, though not perhaps so suddenly as it occurred, is evident from various passages in her Diary. In anticipation of that solemn event, she penned the following affecting letter, addressed to her mother, which was found among her papers after her decease:—

“MY DEAREST AND BEST OF MOTHERS,—As the illness I now feel may be unto death, I want to write you a few lines, to be read when I am gone to another and better world. As I do not know what conflict I may have at the hour of death, I write this while I am able to be some comfort to my dear mother, who has been so kind and attentive to me during all my long illness. Do not think that all your attention is lost, because my health has not been restored. The Almighty will reward you, though I cannot; for since ever the Lord taught me the value of my own soul, oh, how earnestly did I desire that yours might be blessed! It was my daily prayer to God for you, in which I still continue, that he would be your God and your Guide through life, your support at death, and throughout eternity your everlasting portion. God has heard my prayers in behalf of myself, and I trust also with regard to my friends, and, in particular, you, my dear mother. I here ask your pardon, if I ever did or said any thing to offend you, for it never was intended; and I wish you to bear with me for a little just now, and not take it amiss, when I, who am your child, speak to you (as it were from the grave) of your immortal soul. Oh, mother, reflect more on your spiritual concerns than ever you have done! You will find, when you come to die, that they who study this most, when they come to die, think they have done it too little. Oh, listen to the Bible! ‘Be careful for nothing; but in every thing, by prayer and supplication, make your requests known unto God.’ And again,—

“Trust in the Lord, for ever trust,
And banish all your fears;
Strength in the Lord Jehovah dwells,
Eternal as his years.”

“Let your whole anxiety be about your immortal soul—not for the bread that perisheth, but for that which endureth unto everlasting life. Leave the guiding of your temporal affairs entirely unto God; only watch over the health of your soul, which shall live when this world, and all in it, has passed away. Pray, therefore, to God to enable you more than ever to set your affections on things in heaven (not on things on earth) where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God; ‘for what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or, what can a man give in exchange for his soul?’ Above all things, my mother, ‘Search the Scriptures, for in them is eternal life; and this is life eternal, that ye should know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent.’”

Printed and Published by JOHN JOHNSTONE, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh; and sold by J. R. MACNAIR & Co., 19, Glassford Street, Glasgow; JAMES NISBET & Co., HAMILTON, ADAMS & Co., and R. GRONSBIDGE, London; W. CURRY, Junr. & Co., Dublin; W. M'COMB, Belfast; and by the Booksellers and Local Agents in all the Towns and Parishes of Scotland; and in the principal Towns in England and Ireland.

Subscribers will have their copies delivered at their Residences.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CONDUCTED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF
THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

---

---

CONTENTS.

1.—Concluding Address to our Readers. By the Rev. James Gardner, A.M., M.D., . . . . .	Page 817	3.—Christian Treasury. Extracts from Boston, More, Hawker, and Leighton, . . . . .	Page 820
2.—The Work of Creation. By the Rev. James Brewster, D.D., . . . . .	818	4.—Sacred Poetry. "Sonnets on Prayer." By Trench, . . . . .	821
		5.—A Discourse. By the Rev. Robert Burns, D.D., . . . . .	86

---

---

CONCLUDING ADDRESS TO OUR READERS.

BY THE REV. JAMES GARDNER, A.M., M.D.,

EDITOR.

Most of our readers are probably prepared for the announcement, that the present Number, which concludes the Third Volume of the Second Series, is also the last of the entire Work. Our editorial labours, accordingly, are now brought to a final termination; and, before laying aside the pen, we may perhaps be indulged in giving vent to a few thoughts which naturally befit such an occasion.

Nearly six years have elapsed since the present Publication was originally started, and forming, as it did, an era in the religious literature of the country, its appearance was hailed by all classes of the community with an avidity which far exceeded the most sanguine anticipations of its projectors. From its outset, the CHRISTIAN HERALD assumed a prominent place in public estimation; and the benefits which have accrued from it to the souls of multitudes, will only be known in that day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed. Many and diversified in character, age, and circumstances, have been the individuals and families into whose hands our little Work must have come. "It is striking, to a degree even awful," to borrow the language of a distinguished author, "to reflect what such a book must have done; to how many it may have imparted thoughts new and affecting, and which nothing could expel; to how many it may have been made the mean of leading into a happy life, and to a happy end; how many it has arrested, disturbed, and warned, whom it could not persuade; of how many it has aggravated the responsibility, more than influenced the conduct." Such thoughts as these words suggest, impart a solemnity to our minds which we deeply feel. It has been our anxious endeavour to fulfil the great object for which the Publication was designed—"to illustrate and enforce the doctrines of the Bible;" and while we have sought to connect literature with religion, we have invariably rendered the former subservient to the latter. The exhibition of Divine Truth, in its numerous and diversified aspects and bearings, has been our primary object; thus viewing the things of time in the light of eternity. In doing so, we may have deprived the Work of that exclusively amusing air which cheap periodicals chiefly assume, but which would have been altogether unsuited to the nature and design of our undertaking. Entertainment of itself formed no part of our plan; it was our desire to entertain, only with a view to instruct. Ours was a higher vocation than that of the mere literary trifler; we have never for one moment lost sight of our originally declared aim—"to carry religion home to the heart, and to maintain its paramount importance, as the light of all human knowledge and the joy and solace of human life." Setting out with such professions as these, it would have ill become us to have wasted our energies in ministering to the vitiated appetite for mere amusement, divested of all that was fitted to elevate the intellect or improve the heart. That we have not altogether failed in our object, we have had many pleasing intimations and satisfactory proofs; and although the lowering aspect of the religious world has for a time diverted men's minds into the channel of angry controversy, we doubt not that, in the good providence of God, the storm will ere long pass away, and the pure principles of a catholic Christianity will again receive their due degree of attention and regard.

From the wide range of subjects embraced by our plan, we have found no difficulty in drawing materials of sufficient interest and variety. In the popular department of Ecclesiastical History, it is almost unnecessary to refer to the fascinating and instructive Sketches of Scottish Church History, by the Rev. Thomas M'Crie; to Mr Lorimer's interesting Papers, containing a History of the Protestant Church in France; to Dr Muirhead's rapid Sketches of the History of the Jews; and to the admirably-written Articles, which have latterly appeared, on the History of the Waldenses and the Albigenses. In the Biographical Articles, we have endeavoured to maintain the same diversity of subject and regard to practical utility as formerly. For a series of Papers on the Botany of the Bible, we are indebted to the Rev. William Patrick. In the department of pure Theology, and the Literature connected with it, we have to acknowledge our warmest gratitude to the able and accomplished ministers who have so readily and efficiently tendered their assistance. On the Conversion and Restoration of the Jews, a topic of engrossing interest at the present time, our pages furnish a series of very elaborate Discourses, from the pen of some of our most distinguished ministers, besides various occasional Papers on the same subject, of high merit. Nor can we refrain from adverting to a series of very valuable Articles on Christian Experience, by our highly-respected correspondent, Dr Muirhead. It is impossible to enumerate the many Contributors to whom our gratitude is due; but we take this public opportunity of declaring that, without their valued assistance, we could never have maintained that high and honourable position among the Periodicals of the day, which it has been our privilege, under Providence, to occupy.

In looking back upon the past, we are painfully reminded of the fleeting nature of all things here below. Not a few of those who, at the outset of our career, aided us alike by their counsel and their contributions, have been summoned from this earthly scene; while others, who both felt and expressed the liveliest interest in the prosperity of our peaceful undertaking, have been compelled, reluctantly, to enter the field of fierce and agitating conflict, and to devote their time, and their talents, and their almost exclusive attention, to the noble work of "contending for the faith once delivered to the saints." To have mingled in any one of the controversies, however important and necessary, which are convulsing every religious body in the country, would have been to have broken faith with the Public, declaring, as we did, in our original prospectus, that it was our purpose to "avoid merely speculative controversy, and every thing of a political aspect, in reference either to Church or State." In the maintenance of Christian principle, we have been firm and unwavering; but, while we are not conscious of, on even one occasion, sacrificing purity for the maintenance of a false and unhallowed peace, we have never deemed it our duty to step aside from our proper path—the inculcation of "the great essential Principles of Evangelical Grace and Truth."

In quitting our Editorial functions, we may be pardoned for expressing a hope and earnest prayer, that our humble labours in the cause of Christ and of our country, for these six years past, have not been altogether fruitless. The good seed of the Word has been sown to an extent which it is impossible to calculate; and we trust that, watered with the dew of God's Spirit, it has sprung, and will yet spring up in many a heart, bearing much fruit to the praise and the glory of God. For ourselves personally, we cannot better express our own feelings, in retiring from the position of an Editor, than by adopting the words of Bishop Horne, in closing his Commentary on the Psalms: "Happier hours than those which have been spent on this Work we never expect to see in this world. Very pleasantly did they pass, and moved smoothly and swiftly along; for, when thus engaged, we counted no time. They are gone, but have left a relish and a fragrance upon the mind, and the remembrance is sweet."

THE WORK OF CREATION.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

It was the eternal purpose or pleasure of the ever-blessed God to glorify himself, or to manifest his glory. The means by which he executes this purpose are called his works. These works are, in one word, "the universe, the world, and all that it contains;" all that exists, and all that comes to pass. All this is the work of God, the execution of his purpose; bringing other beings into existence, by whom and to whom he might manifest his glory. That work is twofold,—giving to the universe its first existence, and then providing for its due order and continuance; called, therefore, in the Catechism, "the works of creation and providence."

"The work of creation is God's making all things of nothing, by the word of his power, in the space of six days, and all very good."

God made all things.—This is the first truth that the Scriptures teach. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." "God made the world, and all things therein; and giveth to all life, and breath, and all things." And this simple truth lies at the foundation of all religious worship and service. "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." This is the clearest reason for our glorifying God, and for seeing this to be our chief end, and for making it our entire duty. Nothing can possibly be plainer to every rational mind than this, that it is, and must ever be, our highest obligation and interest to please and serve the gracious Author of our being, and of all the good that comes along with that being, or that can ever flow from that being—that God (as every one may and should say, with the apostle) "whom I am, and whom I serve." But the work of creation is something more than God's making all things as they now are—giving them their present form and existence; it is, as is here farther said,

"God's making all things of nothing."—This is properly the act of creating; not merely fashioning some pre-existent matter into new and various forms, but giving substance and existence where none was before,—producing both form and being out of nothing. "He stretcheth out the north over the empty space, and hangeth the earth upon nothing." This distinction is clearly conveyed by the words of the inspired historian of this world's origin, when he says, that "God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he rested from all his works, which God created and made;" or, as the words more properly mean, "which God created to make;" which God first brought into being, and afterwards fashioned into all the innumerable forms and creatures, with which the universe is filled.

This doctrine of creation is not, indeed, the discovery of man's reasoning or inquiry, but is God's own revelation of his own work. The wisest of the heathen could form only the irrational and self-contradictory notion of some original matter existing from eternity, out of which all things were moulded or made; but the Scriptures plainly teach, that God alone is from everlasting, that he "only hath immortality,"—that "of him, and through him, and to him, are all things." "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God; so the things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." All that exists is, in the words of our Lord, "the creation which God created;" and of every thing and every being he can say, at all times, and in all respects, "I have created him for my glory; I have formed him, yea, I have made him."

But farther, as to the manner of this work of creation, and as here stated, "God made all things by the word of his power." The work of creation was the simple act of God's will. By a powerful word, as intimating that will, the original matter of all things was brought forth out of nothing, and the agents of progressive creation put in operation. "The heavens were framed by the word of God." "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." "He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast." He required only to say, "Let there be," and "it was so." But, while thus he might have produced all things in one instant of time, and by one act of power, he was pleased to put forth a succession of these acts; and hence it is here stated, as what the Scriptures teach, that God made all things "in the space of six days."—"In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." This order of creation, and the work of each day, is distinctly declared in the beginning of his own revealed word of truth; and we may easily understand that many wise and good purposes were answered, both by these successive processes, and by these particular portions of time being employed. But only one special use or reason is made known to us, for the work of creation being completed in six days, rather than any other number; and that is, that thus we may have an example of our own period of labour during six successive days, and resting on the seventh, in obedience to his positive commandment. All that we are really concerned to know and believe respecting the work of creation is, that both in the matter and in the manner of that creation,

God made all things "every good."—This God himself, upon a survey of the whole, pronounced them to be; and we cannot possibly question that they were so. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good." Every thing in its place was perfectly adapted to serve the purpose for which it was designed; and particularly, to answer the great purpose of the whole work, namely, to manifest the glory of the great Creator. Nothing else than a desire to impart good could be supposed to induce the self-existent God, possessing in himself essential glory and eternal felicity, to call this vast universe into being, and to fill it with creatures innumerable, capable of enjoying life and happiness; and this gracious purpose every created object, as it came pure from his hand, was perfectly fitted to serve. Every thing that he made, in every view that can be taken of it, was "very good." Whatever now appears among the works of creation that is the opposite of good, evil in itself, or the cause of evil, is the work of another hand, and belongs not to the first world, which its blessed Creator pronounced to be good, but to the present world, on which he pronounced a curse. Yet in the midst of judgment hath he remembered mercy, and made the good prevail over the evil; nay, hath made the evil itself to praise him, and promote the eternal purposes of his infinite, eternal, and unchangeable love. Still, then, may we look upon his work of creation as reflecting the glory of his perfections, and for ever find cause to say, as his Word teaches us to do, "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord. The earth is full of the glory of the Lord." "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches."

1. Let us keep in mind the design of God in the work of creation. It was the execution of his eternal decree, to manifest his own glory; and how wonderful a work in itself, how far above our comprehension, the act of creation—making all things out of nothing! This was the first miracle, the greatest of all miracles; and still is a continued miracle, daily before our eyes, declaring God's glory. This, indeed, vain man is continually disposed to forget; just the more so, that he thinks he understands the works of creation around him. Much have we been able to search out of the beauty, and the uses, and the relations, of these works, and even to trace the secondary agents by which God works, and the secret operations which he is carrying on, by the settled laws which he hath imposed upon the material world; and much, in this way, are we enabled to discern of the power, and wisdom, and goodness, of the great Creator; but soon do the most profound inquirers, if they inquire wisely, come to deep things, even in the most common works of creation, which they cannot fathom, and become sensible, if they reason rightly, that the existence even of this visible world is a continued miracle, and full of mysteries. "The meanest work of God is inexhaustible, and contains secrets which the wisdom of man will never be able to penetrate. They are only some of the superficial appearances and sensible properties with which we are familiar. Substances and essences we cannot reach. The secret laws, which regulate the operations of nature, we cannot unveil. Indeed, we have reason to believe, that the most enlarged understanding must, in a very short time, resolve its inquiries into the will of God, as the ultimate reason."* There the loftiest and the humblest intellect, the long-searching sage and the simplest man that goeth forth to his labour, are brought together to the same point, to see and say at once it is God's creation; it is his mighty voice, still saying, "Let it be;" his everlasting arm still holding it in existence—"upholding all things by the word of his power."

2. Let us, then, duly consider, in the works of creation, the operation of his hands, and the tokens of his presence.—Therein he manifests his perfections in ways innumerable—by proofs most palpable, in language most intelligible. On every side he bangs out his own hand-writing, in letters, if we may so speak, large and legible, to tell us of his presence with us—of his care over us—of his claims upon us. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." Nowhere, and at no time, "hath he left himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." "The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and godhead; so that they are without excuse." There is no excuse for man forgetting God—living without God in the midst of God's own world; looking daily upon the traces of God's presence—the productions of his power—the proofs of his wisdom—the tokens of his goodness; yet seeing nothing of God, and "saying even in his heart, There is no God." "The open secret," as the universe has been quaintly called, the sign of God's glory openly hung out to the sight of his rational creatures, yet still a secret to so many of them. "A brutish man knoweth not; neither doth a fool understand this." "They are altogether foolish and brutish." There is often, indeed, a sufficient searching into God's works of creation, in order to know and understand his wonders; but this altogether in a manner that is atheistical—looking only at the tools that are in the hand of the Divine Artificer, and the manner in which he disposes them, but leaving, or rather keeping, the great Creator himself out of sight, and so, as saith the prophet, are "brutish in their knowledge." "Their heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed;" and thus, seeing not God in these wondrous works which they themselves describe, are infinitely more irrational than the ignorant idolater of old, who worshipped every wonderful thing in creation as a god. In times of ignorance, the world was full of gods; and, in man's fancied wisdom, is now a godless world. Let us watch against both these extremes of foolishness; and see God in every object of creation, but make nothing created our God. In the least, as well as in the greatest of his works—in the leaf of the forest, as well as the sun in the firmament—you may see God made visible, and in every creature, as has been said, "a window through which you may look into the Infinite;" but let not your souls rest on any thing beneath the infinite, eternal, and unchangeable Jehovah. Harken, then, unto this, as the unceasing voice of creation. "Stand still and consider the wondrous works of God." Muse on the works of his hands. "These works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein;" and they are high, and wide, and deep enough to exercise the most exalted faculties of man or angel. The wisdom of Solomon, that excelled, found pleasure therein, when he "spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; and also of beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes." But there needs not great wisdom, or deep searching, or long leisure, to find this pleasure—nothing higher than every one may attain, who can read for himself what God hath said in his Word concerning the creatures that he hath made. You have only to consider the heavens which are the work of his fingers, the sun for which hath he set a tabernacle, the moon which he hath appointed for seasons, and the stars of the sky in their multitude. You have only to lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, and bringeth out their hosts by number. You have only to behold the great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. You have only to learn who thundereth marvellously with his voice, and sendeth out lightnings that they may go and say, Here we are. You have only to keep in mind who giveth snow like wool, and scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes, and casteth forth his ice like morsels—who hath begotten the drops of dew, and stayeth the bottles of heaven, and stilleth the waves of the sea. You have only to consider who provideth the raven with his food, and maketh the stork know her appointed times; and the turtle, the crane, and the swallow to observe the time of their coming—who causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man. You have only to contemplate the lion, which turneth not away for any; the horse, who paweth in the valley; and the ox, who knoweth his owner; the ants, who prepare their meat in the summer; the locusts, who go forth in bands; and the spider, who taketh hold with her hands. You have only to consider the lilies of the field, how they grow, and by whom they are clothed with a beauty with which Solomon in all his glory was never arrayed. All these you may easily see to be very good, as God created them; and should learn to contemplate daily, as manifesting his glory, his power, his wisdom, his goodness, his presence. All these you are to regard, however, as in themselves nothing, as at first brought out of nothing, and as continually upheld by His will from sinking back into their original nothing. All these, you are to remember, according to His Word, shall at last wax old and pass away, and perish and be seen no more, and no place for them be found among things that are; while the blessed and faithful Creator shall alone remain, to be the portion of your souls—to be glorified and enjoyed for ever more. "Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thine years shall not fail."

* Robert Hall.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Saints in Heaven.—The saints in heaven shall have the glorious presence of God, and of the Lamb. God is every where present in respect of his essence; the saints militant have his special gracious presence. There they are brought near to the throne of the great King, and stand before him, where he shows his inconceivable glory! There they have the tabernacle of God on which the cloud of glory rests, the all-glorious human nature of Christ wherein the fullness of Godhead dwells, not veiled, as in the days of his humiliation, but shining through that blessed flesh (that all the saints may behold his glory), and making that body more glorious than a thousand suns! so that the city has no need of the sun, nor of the moon; but the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof" (properly the candle thereof), the Lamb is the luminary or luminous body which give light to the city; as the sun and moon now give light to the world, or as a candle lightens a dark room; and the light proceeding from that glorious luminary, for the city is the glory of God. Some time that candle burnt very dim, it was hid under a bushel in the time of his humiliation, but that now and then it darted out some rays of this light, which dazzled the eyes of the spectators; but now it is set on high in the city of God, where it shines, and shall shine for ever in perfection and glory. It was sometimes laid aside, as a stone disallowed of the builder; but now it is, and for ever will be, the light or luminary of that city; and that like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone clear as crystal.—REV. T. BOSTON.

Self-Examination.—In order to unmask our hearts, let us not be contented to examine our vices, let us examine our virtues also, "those smaller faults." Let us scrutinize to the bottom those qualities and actions which have more particularly obtained public estimation. Let us inquire if they were genuine in the principle, simple in the intention, honest in the prosecution. Let us ask ourselves whether in some admired instances our generosity had no tincture of vanity, our charity no taint of ostentation? whether, when we did such a right action which brought us into credit, we should have persisted in doing it had we foreseen that it would incur censure? Do we never deceive ourselves by mistaking a constitutional indifference of temper, for Christian moderation? Do we never construe our love of ease into deadness to the world? our animal activity into Christian zeal? Do we never mistake our obstinacy for firmness,—our pride for fortitude,—our selfishness for feeling,—our love of controversy for the love of God,—our indolence of temper for superiority to human applause? When we have stripped our good qualities naked; when we have made all due deduction for natural temper, easiness of disposition, self-interest, desire of admiration, when we have pared away every extrinsic appendage, every illegitimate motive, let us fairly cast up the account, and we shall be mortified to see how little will remain. Pride may impose itself upon us even in the shape of repentance. The humble Christian is aggrieved at his faults, the proud man is angry at them. He is indignant when he discovers he has done wrong, not so much because sin offends God, as because it has let him see that he is not quite so good as he had tried to make himself believe.—MRS H. MORE.

Thoughts on the close of the Year.—My soul, how hath the year been hastening from thee, and thou hastening in it from the world! Where are the days fled? They are gone to be numbered with the years beyond the flood; and thou art now standing as on the isthmus of time. "The end of all things is at hand." Friends are dying around thee—thou art dying thyself—yea, the world is dying, and "the end of all things is at hand." In this state, my Lord, well may I look up to thee; circumstances so very solemn may well induce soberness and watchfulness unto prayer. Yes! blessed Jesus, I would pray thee so to direct each thought of my heart, that every faculty may be on the watch-tower waiting my Lord's coming. Thou hast said, "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Oh! then, for grace to live by faith on thee; and so to live, that when I change worlds I may not change my company; for if in time I live with Christ, and enjoy Christ, I shall not live less with Christ, nor enjoy Christ less, when I exchange time for eternity. Lord Jesus, make me watch unto prayer, and thou wilt be, both now and then, in life and death, my portion for ever.—REV. DR HAWKEN.

Christ the Light and Comfort of the Church.—When the sun takes its course towards us in the season of the year, it drives away the sharp frost, and the heavy fogs of winter, it clears the heavens, decks the earth with variety of plants and flowers, and awakes the birds to the pleasant strains of their natural music. When Christ, after a kind of winter absence, returns to visit a declining church, admirable is the change that he produces; all begins to flourish by his sweet influence,—his house, his worship, his people, are all clothed with a new beauty; but it is spiritual, and, therefore, none but spiritual eyes can discern it. When he will thus return, all the power and policy of man can no more hinder him, than it could stay the course of the sun in its circle. In like manner, a deserted, forsaken soul, that can do nothing but languish and droop, while Christ withdraws himself, what inexpressible vigour and alacrity finds it at his returning. Then those graces which, while they lurked, seemed to have been lost and quite extinguished, bud forth anew with pleasant colour and fragrant smell. It is the light of his countenance that banisheth their false fears, that strengthens their faith, and cures their spiritual infirmities. The Sun is indeed the sovereign physician.—"Unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing under his wings." Mal. iv. 2.—ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON.

SONNETS ON PRAYER.

I.

LORD, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in thy presence will avail to make!
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take!
What parched grounds refresh, as with a shower!
We kneel, and all around us seems to lower;
We rise, and all, the distant and the near,
Stands forth in sunny outline, brave and clear:
We kneel—how weak! we rise—how full of power!
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong—
That we are ever overborne with care—
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled,—when with us is prayer,
And joy, and strength, and courage are with THEE

II.

When hearts are full of yearning tenderness
For the loved absent, whom we cannot reach,
By deed or token, gesture or kind speech,
The spirit's true affection to express;
When hearts are full of innermost distress,
And we are doomed to stand inactive by,
Watching the soul's or body's agony,
Which human effort helps not to make less;
Then like a cup capacious to contain
The overflowings of the heart, is prayer:
The longing of the soul is satisfied—
The keenest darts of anguish blunted are;
And though we cannot cease to yearn or grieve,
Yet have we learnt in patience to abide.

REV. R. C. TRENCH.

THE CHARACTER OF DANIEL:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BURNS, D.D.,
Minister of St George's Parish, Paisley.

(Continued from page 811.)

"Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house;" &c.—DAN. vi. 10.

II. LET us now attend to those lessons of practical piety, which the conduct of Daniel, in the instance before us, is designed and fitted to furnish to our minds.

1. We have here an edifying example of well principled and well regulated devotion.—Daniel, though a great man, was not ashamed to acknowledge a higher and greater than himself; to cherish toward him the sentiments and the feelings of ardent piety; and to bow the knee in his presence, in the attitude of prayer. Prayer he recognised as a duty, and cherished as a source of consolation. Often had it cheered him in his moments of solitude and of sorrow,—often had it proved a most salutary refuge when all other refuges seemed to fail. It lightened the pressure of captivity, and even in the land of strangers, and amid the desolations of Judah, he poured forth his soul before his God, and found that he was a present help, “and that he never saith to any of the seed of Jacob, seek ye me in vain.”

Nor does he satisfy himself with silent and solitary musings—the ejaculations of a devout soul to “Him who seeth in secret,” he “enters into his house,” and he prays in his ordinary habitation, sometimes alone, and at other times with the members of his family around him, having adopted the truly patriarchal, and truly scriptural principle, that every house not only may be, but ought to be, a “place where prayer is wont to be made,” and that wherever we pitch our tent, there God must have an altar. Along with his petitions, he “gave thanks” for the mercies of the past, and the hopes of the future,—remembering, that in the midst of his present dangers and difficulties, he had still abundant cause of thankfulness to his God. He recognised God as standing to him in covenant relation, for we are told “he prayed and gave thanks unto God.” When he prayed and gave thanks,—“he kneeled,” as expressive of humility, and reverence, and submission; he did this “three times a day,” after the example of David and other servants of God, in former and later times—in the morning, when the dawn of another day reminded them of the mercies of the past night, and the snares and temptations which every day brings along with it; in the evening, when the shades of night and the dark mantle of nature associated themselves with the holy musings of their souls on Him “who maketh the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice,”—and at mid-day, when the extreme heat of the sultry clime of Palestine, rendered retirement, and repose, and refreshment absolutely necessary, and when the thought of Him who causeth his sun to shine, and who giveth the things which are requisite for the body, led them to offer before his throne the tribute of humble gratitude, and to ask of him his salutary protection, that the “sun may not smite them by day, nor the moon by night.” This, we read, was done by him as aforetime. There was nothing new in it,—no ostentatious additions, by reason of his peculiar circumstances, and no deviations from, or omissions of, the established rule. It was his ordinary practice, it was part of his established private and domestic economy, the statute and common and confest ordinary law of his chamber, and of his household. What an edifying example of devotion in this pious and consistent nobleman! “Not many great—not many noble are called,” still there are some. How dignified and sublime is piety in every situation, and more especially when associated with the splendours and immunities of rank! Do these make any additions to its native lustre? No; “when unadorned it is most adorned;” but they derive new splendour and new dignity from it: and in the crown of the monarch, and the coronet of the noble, it constitutes the finest and the fairest jewel.

It is no uncommon thing to find men excusing Christians in the neglect of private and familiar prayer, by pleading the number and extent of their secular engagements,—the man of merchandise with his counting-house, and its endless routine,—the mechanic and the operative artisan, with the load of business pressing on them from their customers,—the farmer with his fields and crops, and his servants, and his cattle, and his markets;—the man of rank, moving in a style superior to theirs, with his ceaseless retinue of visitors, and sports, and avocations nameless, domestic and public. Had Daniel been inclined to find an excuse for the neglect of private and household devotion, he might have easily found a most plausible one indeed, in the multiplicity of his secular concerns, and the magnitude of his public engagements. He pleads no such apology; for we find that, amid all the hurry of state affairs, he kept himself at leisure, probably by an admirable adjustment of his time and occupations—for thrice each day waiting upon his God. No false shame prevented him from officiating as the priest at his own altar; and, like David, he felt a peculiar delight in returning from official duty, and retiring from the hurry and bustle of the world, that he might call upon the name of his God, and bless his household.

2. We have here a noble example of steadfastness in the faith.—He knew that the decree was signed, that it was now passed into an established law of the empire, and that the very design and purpose of it were to entrap him and bring him into trouble. The reflection on it must have occasioned him no small measure of anxiety, and the trial of principle is severe. Many suggestions may have presented themselves to his mind, as suitable to such an exigency, and many very fair schemes might have been devised to save him from the cruel alternative. Even a man of sincerity in the main might have thought himself warranted, in a case so trying, to have used a little management so as to secure his life, and yet not violate his principles. He might have refrained from praying visibly, and in audible words, while yet he poured out his heart secretly before the Lord. He might have suspended the worship of the family while he contrived to retain that of the closet and the heart. He might omit for the thirty days, his ordinary times and occasions of devotion, with the understood resolution, that he would pray so much the oftener, when the days were expired, and the danger was over. But Daniel knew that all these plans and schemes, plausible as they might appear, would not do for him. They all proceeded on the principle of concealment, or omission of duty, or a change in the usual manner of doing it, and all from the fear of man, which bringeth a snare. Daniel was a public man, and the representation of the more religious part of his countrymen in Daniel, and the most prominent witness to the honours of the true God, in the midst of surrounding idols. The eyes of many were therefore on him; and had he failed, or appeared to fail now, when his principles were brought so decidedly to the test, "it would have been as when a standard-bearer fainteth." Had he acted on compromising principles, it would have been thought both by his friends and by his enemies, that he had thrown up his accustomed duty, for this time, through cowardice and base fear, which would have tended much to the dishonour of God, and the discouragement of his brethren. Individuals of less decided character, and, moving in a lower and more obscure sphere, might act with caution and reserve, but Daniel, who was a veteran in the army of the saints, and who had so many eyes upon him, must act with more courage, and for this very reason too, that he knew the law to be made expressly for him. He resolves not even to seem to come short of his ordinary and accustomed duty. He follows his usual mode of worshipping his God, and thus by steadfast adherence to the path of rectitude, leaves to his foes not the shadow of a plea, that he had either relinquished his religion or even waived the outward and ordinary expressions of it, for the sake of self-interest.

The pattern here unfolded to us, is a noble one indeed, and the language of it is clear and decided. "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and afterwards have nothing more that they can do," "who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die; and hast feared continually every day, because of the fury of the oppressor, as if he were ready to destroy? and where is the fury of the oppressor?" Isa. li. 12, 13. Our blessed Redeemer lays great stress on the duty of an open and undisguised profession of his name and cause before men, "For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels." We have little cause to fear the "fury of the oppressor," or the arm of persecution to be raised up against us. In these happier days, and in our beloved land, Christianity is recognised and established by law, and we are permitted to sit each under his "vine and fig-tree, none daring to make us afraid." Our temptations then, to hide our religion from others, are trifling in the extreme, when compared with Daniel and the good men of other days. So that our guilt is exceedingly magnified if it be so that we conceal our religious views for fear of displeasing those whom we wish to serve, that we can dispense with our customary religious observances, for the sake of the company who chance to be with us, and who may not be of our way of thinking on these matters—that we tolerate blasphemous and profane and impure communications, for fear of offending by reproof, or by some other decided marks of disapprobation, or that we yield in our practice to the fashion of the world, just because it is the fashion, and we have no power to change it.

Nevertheless, it is quite possible that even now the disciples of the Redeemer may be called to suffer persecution. The sneer of ridicule may be pointed at their superior sanctity. The world's dread laugh may disturb and vex the most placid and amiable, and yet decided minds. The forfeiture of interest and worldly favour and advancement, may be the price which we may be called to pay for purity and integrity of principle; and the trial of cruel mockings "may constitute no small ingredient in that cup of bitterness which is mingled for the drink of Him who trod the wine-press alone." In the ordinary commerce of life, then there will be trials of faith, and Christians may be called to hold fast their integrity, at some considerable expense. It is just in such cases as these, that the example of Daniel holds forth at once a pattern to guide and an encouragement to cheer. Do not the mean compliances of Christian professors harden many transgressors in their evil course? Do you not teach them to despise your principles, by your timorous desertion of them? Do you not thus show that you prefer your ease, your reputation, or your emolument, to the advancement of the kingdom of Christ? And, do you not give occasion to the men of the world to say, that religion is all a trick, or piece of political finesse, and that its most zealous friends can just be as worldly and as complaisant as others, when it chances to serve their turn by being so? Bad as the world is, it loves consistency, and Daniel, through a long life of tried integrity, commanded the respect of his most determined enemies. The language of his history then is clear and explicit. "How long halt ye between two opinions." Let our grand rule of conduct ever be that of the apostle and his followers,—"For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's."

3. Lastly, We have in Daniel a practical illustration of the grand principles whence all true devotion and all genuine piety must flow. We are told that, notwithstanding the infamous decree of Darius, Daniel went into his chamber, the ordinary scene of his devotional exercises, and "his windows being open toward Jerusalem, he prayed unto his God." This was his ordinary practice; and we may rest assured that the opening of his window, far from being a symptom of ostentatious display, was the usual accompaniment of the devotional exercises; that the sight of the visible heavens might affect his heart with a sense of awe and reverence to that God who dwelleth far above the ethereal firmament, and "whom the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain;" that his affections might be elevated far above the dull level of mortality, and receive a holier and a heavenlier direction; that the great principle of the unity and spirituality of the true God might powerfully impress his soul; and that the purifying influence of spiritual things might be habitually present, to counteract the carnal tendencies of the heart. These are amongst the essential principles of all substantial piety; but there is here something more specific and more peculiar to the character of a spiritual worshipper of God. Daniel had "his windows open toward Jerusalem," and thither he directed his eye and the thoughts of his heart, to show that Jerusalem, the holy city, though now in ruins, was still dear to his soul—that he cherished an affection for its "very stones and its dust"—that, though he was a great man in Babylon, he still concurred with the meanest of his brethren of the captivity in remembering "Jerusalem, and preferring it above his chiefest joy." Jerusalem was the place which God had chosen to put his name there; and when the temple was dedicated, Solomon's prayer to God was, "that if his people should, in the land of their enemies, pray unto him with their eye towards the land which he gave them, the city he had chosen, and the house that was built to his name, that then he would hear and maintain their cause." 1 Kings viii. 48, 49. And Daniel acted upon this prescribed principle. There is in it something far beyond the feeling of common patriotism or national attachment. There is in it the pious recognition of Jehovah as, in the most affecting and important sense, the God of Israel. There is a look to the temple at Jerusalem, as the place of the Divine abode and of the Divine manifestation. The mercy-seat is recognised as the symbol of Divine mercy to mankind, and as typical of that "throne of grace" sprinkled with the blood of the Redeemer, to which "we have access with boldness, through the faith of him." That Daniel entertained a spiritual view of the Divine economy towards Israel, is clear from the whole tenor of his writings; and his conceptions relative to the method of salvation are conveyed to us in language peculiarly explicit. "Messiah," says he, "shall be cut off, but not for himself." "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy." In looking to the mercy-seat at Jerusalem, Daniel looked to Him, the glory of whose grace was symbolised by the Shechinah, the brightness of that light which overshadowed the Divine propitiatory—to Him, in whose name alone could he, as a guilty criminal, draw near to his Father—to Him, whose blood was to be shed for the reconciliation of sinners to God—to Him whom he beheld "in the night visions, coming with the clouds of heaven, to the Ancient of Days, and to whom there was given dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him; whose dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." In illustration of the same thing, we are told that Daniel "prayed unto his God;" and he knew full well that a pure and holy Being could be the God of an impure and unholy creature only in that way, on those terms, and according to that constitution which He himself has seen meet to prescribe, and clearly to make known, for our encouragement and salvation. Prayer, acceptable prayer, cannot be presented to the Father in any other way; and we delude ourselves most miserably, indeed, if we venture to draw near to the throne of unspotted holiness in any other way, or on any other footing, than that which has been made known to us in the everlasting covenant. The only true religion is the religion of a covenanted God; and the only true principle which can be recognised as genuine, and as truly valuable, is that faith which rests on the love of the Father, through the interposition of the Son—that faith which humbles the sinner, while it exalts the Saviour who bought him with his blood—that faith which, like Daniel's, looks towards the mercy-seat, and derives from that mercy-seat all its energy and all its hope. It was this faith which Abel exercised, when he offered up a more excellent sacrifice than Cain. It was this faith which Abraham exercised, when he "beheld the day of Christ afar off, and was glad." It was this faith which Job cherished, when, in the impassioned ardour of his soul, he exclaims, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." It was this faith which Daniel exercised, when the angel Gabriel came to him with the answer to his prayer, and hailed him, with affectionate endearment, as the "man greatly beloved;" and it is the very same faith, in substance if not in form, which every true Christian exercises, when he pours out his heart before the Lord, and "goes unto God as his exceeding joy."

THE END.