however, there was an adaptation to our physical nature more effective than any which had yet been afforded in the course of the past history of the world. Hence, we entirely coincide in the sentiments of Archbishop Whately, when, speaking of the incarnation, he says, "We shall find good reason for concluding that it was designed, in part at least, for the purpose of leading man both to piety and to morality, by a method admirably adapted to that purpose, and which is absolutely peculiar to Christianity; viz., by first bringing down more to the level of our capacity the moral attributes of the Deity, and thus better engaging our affections on the side of devotion; and secondly, by exhibiting a perfect and exalted model of human excellence. Both these objects are effected by the mysterious union of the Divine and human natures; the divine 'Word was made flesh,' to lead us to affectionate piety; and the manhood was taken into God to teach us god-like virtue." Not that we consider this remarkable accommodation to our physical nature, as one of the chief reasons why the 'Word became flesh and dwelt among us,' but we have no hesitation in regarding it as a very considerable benefit arising from the incarnation, that man could look upon the express image of Deity, and thus form more definite, and therefore more practically efficacious, notions of the Divine character and perfections. To assert that we fully comprehend the nature and attributes of the Divine Being, would be tantamount, as has been somewhere remarked, to the assertion that we ourselves are gods; but although fully adequate conceptions are utterly unattainable by our limited intellects, we are not entirely excluded from all knowledge of the Divinity. In our own minds are included the elementary principles of this, the highest department of knowledge in the universe. We cannot grasp the ideas of infinity or eternity, and yet, by an indefinite extension of our own primary transcendental notions of space and time, we may attain more enlarged, and therefore more correct, views of those qualities as applied to God. In order to reason about Deity, it is by no means necessary fully to comprehend Deity, any more than it is necessary to understand the metaphysical notions involved in the doctrine of infinitesimals, in order to carry on even its most intricate processes. By a dexterous use of a merely symbolic notation, we may often produce a result undeniably true, though in its abstract meaning we cannot understand it. And the reason is simply this. Our deductions are in most cases drawn rather from what has immediately preceded, than from a comprehensive view of the whole train of thought which has passed before our minds. Hence the peculiar value of an arithmetical and algebraic notation. It preserves before the mind's eye notions which would otherwise have entirely escaped us, and enables us to reason with the greatest accuracy at a point of our subject the most remote from its commencement. It must not be imagined, however, that in the course of the process a full view of the whole is constantly present to our minds. Were it so, symbols would be comparatively of little importance; but in present circumstances, even to minds the most profound, they are absolutely necessary in every kind of mathematical speculation. Nay, even in the science of mind, language fulfils all the purposes of a regular notation, and brings us, it may be, to an equally satisfactory result.

If, even to the loftiest speculations of philosophy, a visible expression of thought be thus useful, and even necessary; how much more must such a mode of imparting valuable information be necessary to the great mass of mankind, who are utter strangers to abstract reasoning? The manifestation of God in the flesh, however, has given a more palpable form to all our notions of God, both in his natural and his moral attributes. These have been exhibited to the world in a mode the most intimately connected with the ordinary sympathies and feelings of humanity; and by a view, therefore, of all that has been seen, and heard, and tasted, and handled of the Word of Life, we have learned both more satisfactorily and more impressively what God is, than we could have possibly learned from the most profound explanations of the subject. And the moral influence has been remarkably powerful. Holiness has been embodied in human form; and thus, what was in danger of exercising only a vague and undefined impression, has been brought home to us with all the freshness and force of a living example. And accordingly, to urge upon us the importance of any Christian grace, no argument is more frequently resorted to in the apostolical epistles than the example of our blessed Lord. All that was exhibited of his character and doings upon earth, is put forth as affording palpable and impressive illustrations of the true nature and extent of our duty to God and to man. By such frequent and urgent appeals to a living example, to one who himself was "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh," are we forcibly reminded, that as in our ordinary thoughts and emotions, so here also we ought to be influenced by what has been actually "seen, and heard, and handled." Powerfully affected as our minds usually are by material objects, both in our intellectual processes and our moral emotions, the apostles skilfully avail themselves of this most important law of our physical constitution, and bring forward the example of Christ as the most effective motive wherewith to bear upon the hearts and the consciences of men.

This adaptation of the truth to our physical nature appears to have been carefully kept in view in the institution of the standing ordinances of the Church. In the sacramental symbols an impressive exhibition is made, to our bodily senses, of some of the most important and interesting truths of the Christian system; and not only are these truths significantly represented, they are also impressively sealed upon the believing children of God. In other words, by the sensible display given in the solemn ordinances of baptism and the supper, ample provision is made for the emblematic exhibition of the truths as well as of the actings of God in reference to his people. Both were held forth under a figure in the ancient economy; all that referred to the plan of reconciliation was sensibly taught in the mission and meditation of the God-man, Christ Jesus. The full development of the plan, however, in its application to individual believers, was yet to be made known. The general principles, if we may so speak, of the scheme of salvation, were fully taught in the Bible, but the application of these principles to believers separately could only be represented by some standing memorial. Hence the institution of the sacramental ordinances, in which, by external symbols, the leading truths of the Gospel were set forth, both in their abstract meaning and in their practical bearing upon individual Christians.

In the Christian economy, then, the peculiar advantages arising from the mode of instruction by symbols are enjoyed with the same force as in the Jewish Church; and that, too, under circumstances somewhat analogous. The types of the ancient system prefigured events which, though beheld afar off by the Jewish patriarchs, are to us matters of historic statement, and simply recorded, therefore, in the narratives of the Sacred Volume. The truths thus symbolically represented to the Jews were, on principles of the highest expediency, clouded in emblematic obscurity; and it was not until the clear and obvious development of the scheme, that the typical economy was brought to an end. By the sensible signs exhibited to our view in the sacraments, we are frequently and forcibly reminded of truths which are more properly objects of faith than of sense. But, in consistency with that law of our physical constitution, in virtue of which both our intellectual perceptions and our moral emotions are subjected to the influence of external objects, we are powerfully aided in our conceptions of "things which are not seen" by the exhibition of appropriate emblems to our bodily senses. Not that there is any necessary connection between the emblem and the corresponding series of truths which it is intended to represent, but the connection having been established by God, proves a powerful auxiliary to our faith. The transition of the mind from the visible symbol to the abstract truth which it emblematically shows forth, is much easier and more impressive than if no such external medium had been interposed. This remark is applicable to the effect of an outward sign upon minds of every class, but more especially upon those which are unaccustomed to habits of close and consecutive thinking. In such a case the external sign is peculiarly valuable as affording an accurate and sustained guidance to the current of reflection, which in ordinary minds is always in danger of diverging from its regular course. The thoughts of the great mass of mankind are seldom directed with any thing like continued application to any subject whatever; and hence the necessity of an outward emblem, which may not merely lead to the first step in the process of reflection, but may guide the mind from one step to another until the whole system of truth has been suggested so forcibly as to bear with practical efficacy upon the heart and life. Faith realizes objects that are unseen, and to this process of realization the appointed emblems are in no slight degree accessory. They suggest the truths which they are designed to prefigure, and they preserve them also before the mind with remarkable vividness and effect. The sacramental ordinances, therefore, of the Christian Church may be conceived as holding a place somewhat analogous to that of the typical institutions in the Jewish church; with this important exception, however, that while the symbolical rites of the ancient economy related to events which could only be beheld by the eye of faith penetrating the dark vista of futurity, the emblematic ordinances of the Church under the Gospel dispensation refer to events which are already stamped with the impress of historic certainty, and the bearing of which upon individual believers can on that account be more readily comprehended and felt.

There is one of the standing ordinances of the church to which we have not yet adverted, although it involves, we conceive, an obviously designed adaptation to the laws and principles of our physical constitution—we allude to the ordinance of preaching. The superiority of oral to written instruction has been often remarked, and it is founded on the most obvious reasons, as combining the advantages of natural with those of artificial language. The tones, the looks, the gestures of the speaker all combine to lend efficacy and force to "the thoughts which breathe, and words which burn." A written argument comes home to the reader with only such a degree of power as the language adopted can impart to it. The words and sentences are the only, and, it is often much to be lamented, the necessarily imperfect vehicles by which the author's meaning can be conveyed; and where the subject is such as ought to awaken the imagination and arouse the strongest feelings of the reader, how feeble and inadequate is mere artificial language in reaching the heart! But when to the language of words is added the language of gesture, the expression of the countenance, the intelligent beaming of the eye, the finely modulated tones of the human voice, it is impossible to calculate how much the effect upon the hearer is increased. The assertion of the heathen poet, "If you wish me to weep you must weep yourself," is a powerful testimony to the intimate connection which subsists between our physical and intellectual constitution. When we find an ordinance, therefore, established in the Christian Church involving this acknowledged principle of human nature, and proceeding upon the constant recognition of it, we cannot avoid noticing an adaptation which can scarcely be viewed in any other light than as intentional on the part of the Author of that volume in which its institution is recorded.

Instead of leaving the Sacred Writings to find their way unexplained and unenforced to the hearts and the consciences of men, it pleased the Great Head of the Church, who knew what was in man, to appoint oral instructors "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." An institution of this kind was admirably calculated, viewing the matter merely in reference to our physical nature, to subserve the important purpose of bringing the truth to bear with peculiar effect upon man. Constituted as we are, it is impossible that the obligations and motives of religion should ever come home to us with equal force when conveyed in written as in oral statement. The understanding, it is true, must be enlightened, and this requires no more than the naked force of truth; but we are not sure if, even in the process of imparting pure abstract knowledge, the meaning of the author is not rendered more apparent when conveyed in his own language, accompanied with the tones, and gestures, and expression of countenance which indicated his own view of the meaning which the language employed denotes. For there can be no doubt that it is often by the tout ensemble of an orator's delivery that we ascertain the full force or even meaning of his arguments. But where the object is not merely to enlighten but to convince, the combination of natural language with artificial signs becomes doubly important. And it is in this that the value of preaching chiefly consists. A dry argumentative statement may suit an academic chair, but the object of the faithful pastor in all his pulpit exhibitions is not merely to instruct, but to awaken and arouse his hearers. Their minds must be informed in the vital doctrines of Christianity, and, what is of awful importance, their hearts must be convinced, and their consciences smitten with a sense of sin, that they may be led to cry out with the most intense anxiety, "What shall we do to be saved?"

ON THE DEATH OF JOHN COLDSTREAM, ESQ.,*

LATE SURGEON OF THE XXVI. REGIMENT,

Who departed this life January 28, 1841.

By W. H. MADDEN, M.D.

He is gone to the grave, but we will not deplore him;
The time of his trial is past,
And now, in the Arms that have long been stretched o'er him,
He safely reposes at last.

He is gone to the grave, and the place that hath known him
Can never behold him again;
But angels delight in their mansions to own him,
And wipe out all traces of pain.

He is gone to the grave, where his body must slumber,
And crumble in darkness away;
But his spirit hath enter'd on joys without number,
And roams through bright regions of day.

* This excellent man led a very eventful life. He was present at the battle of Corunna, and assisted in carrying Sir John Moore off the field. After leaving the army, he settled, latterly, in Edinburgh, where he employed himself, like his Divine Master, in going about continually doing good—preaching the Gospel of Christ, and supplying the wants of the poor—comforting the mourner, and abounding in every good work.

He is gone to the grave, and the voice of his preaching
Is hush'd through the desolate town;
But the souls who found life in the word of his teaching
Will gild his unperishing crown.

He is gone to the grave, to the Saviour who bought him,
And call'd him from darkness to light;
And, oh! how he prizes the love that hath brought him
To scenes of such holy delight!

He is gone to the grave, and all accents of sorrow
Are hush'd with his last passing breath;
He fears not that grief may return with the morrow—
All doubt hath been banish'd by death.

He is gone to the grave, but we will not deplore him,—
Our loss is his exquisite gain;
Oh! may the same Arm that triumphantly bore him,
Hold us till we meet him again.

MEMOIR

OF A CHILD, WHO RECENTLY DIED IN HIS NINTH YEAR.

By THE REV. AENEAS M. RAY.

PART I.

THE following Narrative contains a brief account of the last scenes of one who, at a very early age, was brought to the knowledge of the Saviour, and died in triumphant hope of going to glory. The substance of it was drawn up by his father, who delighted to mark down every incident that occurred in the last days of the life of a son whom he regarded with no ordinary affection. On reading the Narrative, it seemed that there was something that might be turned to important uses, by stirring up parents to seek and pray for the salvation of their children, and by affording a striking exhibition of the power of Divine grace in converting a child.

J— ———, the subject of this brief Memoir, was born 3d of June 1830. His constitution was originally delicate, and while he was yet an infant, on more than one occasion, his life was despaired of. He was, however, permitted to survive these early dangers—to awaken, by his early promise, many a joyful hope in the hearts of his parents, and then to be cut off just at the time when their affections were every day entwining more firmly around him. He was from the first a remarkably interesting child, attracting the attention and engaging the affections of all who knew him; full of glee and frolic—remarkably active—of a bold, free, and frank disposition, and withal, peculiarly affectionate. No sooner did his father or mother show that they were offended, than he was cut to the very heart at their displeasure—became miserable until they were reconciled; but whenever the reconciliation took place, his down-cast countenance was again lighted up with joy. His face, which appeared utterly incapable of expressing any of the darker passions, generally beamed with an expression of singular sweetness. The principal fault which he displayed was an occasional inclination to equivocation, which was early detected, and resolutely checked, by his parents. Happily, they themselves had felt the power of the truth. Hence, from his earliest years, they diligently laboured to instruct their son in the knowledge of the Saviour, watched with the deepest interest every indication of seriousness, and made it the object of their deepest solicitude and most earnest supplications that he should early be brought to God. At first they laboured under some of those discouragements of which most pious parents have, for a time at least, found reason to complain; but, at length, they received the most abundant evidence that their prayers had been answered, in the transformation of his whole character, and the heavenly elevation of his spirit, when about to take his departure from earth, in order to join that blessed assembly of little children, of whom Christ has declared is the kingdom of God.

J— had spent some time at the Infant School; afterwards, when upwards of six years old, he was, in November 1836, removed to the Circus School, where he remained till January 1838, the time when his illness commenced. There he exhibited great quickness of parts, as well as great amiability of disposition, and gave the early promise of developing superior mental powers. The winter of 1838 was very severe, and began to affect his health. At first the indisposition seemed not to deserve any serious attention, but the seeds of a mortal distemper were already sown in his constitution. At length it became necessary to remove him from the school. For several months the symptoms of his complaint were—increasing emaciation, and a pulse that was seldom lower than one hundred and twenty or one hundred and twenty-five. But during all this time he never complained of pain, and his spirits were generally buoyant. The best medical advice was procured, but all the remedies that were applied proved utterly unavailing. During the summer he seemed to recruit a little, and, when the weather was fine, used to go out with his father to Queen Street Gardens, where he seemed exceedingly happy. In September, however, he had a severe relapse; and in October he became so ill, that he was obliged to keep his bed for some weeks.

As the pulse continued very high, and the work of emaciation was progressing, his parents at length became seriously apprehensive. Hitherto their hopes had greatly preponderated over their fears, and even now they could not believe that his lungs were seriously affected. Their anxiety, however, began to deepen into alarm, when their son was seized with frequent and violent fits of coughing; they, therefore, sent for a physician, who declared that he feared the lungs were deeply diseased—that he could not say that he was incurable, but scarcely expected that he would survive the winter. This news was what they were not prepared for, and it plunged them into proportionable distress. From that time they looked with other eyes on their beloved child, persuaded that he had received the sentence of death in himself, and was destined, after a short time, to descend into the tomb under the influence of a slow, fatal, and insidious disorder.

Hitherto he had afforded no decisive evidence of a thorough change of heart. He had long been accustomed to repeat his Catechism, and his other religious lessons, with great accuracy. He had been quick to apprehend the important instructions which were given him by his parents, and possessed a knowledge of Christian doctrine not generally met with at so early an age, even among the children of pious parents. He already possessed that acquaintance with Divine truth, which only required to be lighted up by a ray from above, in order to render it a means of at once illuminating and enkindling his soul. As early as April, in the same year, there were indications that the Holy Spirit was beginning to operate on his heart. One day, while his father was reading the Bible, and J— was in bed, he suddenly interrupted his father, declaring that God had been showing him his sins—that he was very sorry for them—that he loved Christ, and would now turn good, and sin no more. At this time his mind seemed very deeply affected and impressed; but his emotions, after a while, seemed in a great measure to have passed away. About the 20th of October, however, there began to be symptoms of a decisive internal spiritual revolution. From henceforward his prayers became very frequent, and were distinguished by an extraordinary fervency; while he exhibited a deep anxiety to converse on religious subjects, under an evident sense of their magnitude and importance. He repeatedly said to his father, "that the Holy Spirit had brought his sins to his remembrance," that he had sinned much; but having now received the Holy Spirit, he had repented and was determined to be good as long as he lived. His disorder now continuing to make steady progress, he was afflicted with breathlessness, pain at the chest, and violent cough. These one night constrained him to cry bitterly, yet, in the very act of doing so, he said, "he was resolved to be patient, and not to be discontented," as he knew that God was afflicting him for his good. He had, indeed, already learnt to regard all his afflictions as coming from a gracious Father, as all designed to benefit him; and as no longer evils but blessings in disguise. Hence, he said, "that when he had been well he had not said his prayers, and had neglected God, but that it was a great blessing that God had afflicted him, for that he now knew God, and loved him." He also made it manifest that the dread of death, so deeply rooted in human nature, and which, even the most eminent saints have oftentimes found most difficult to overcome, had already, as respects him, been taken away. He said, "he was quite willing to die, as he knew that he should go to heaven." On another occasion his father had been speaking to him of St John the Apostle, whom he had described as an old man; his thoughts had afterwards been roaming towards that heaven, whither the blessed apostle had departed, and after musing for a while, he asked his father, "if he should meet that old man in heaven." The delight which he felt in reading the Word of God, and the readiness with which he apprehended its meaning, and applied to himself the lessons and exhortations which it conveyed, was very striking. The day before this, his father had directed his attention to the 12th chapter of Hebrews, in which the gracious purposes of God, in visiting his people with affliction are so beautifully unfolded. This chapter arrested his attention—deeply interested his mind, and furnished materials for future consolation. Hence, under one of the most violent paroxysms of pain, he said, that God had declared that no affliction was for the present joyous, but grievous; adding at the same time, that he was resolved to be patient. Sometime afterwards he requested that the Bible might be brought to him, that he might again have an opportunity of reading that chapter. Again, seeing the deep distress of his parents he told them that this affliction was designed to do them good; and with a beautiful and tender solicitude for their welfare, prayed that it might be sanctified to them.

November 8.—He rallied wonderfully, and after a night of extreme suffering, spent the day in comparative ease and freedom from pain. His father and mother frequently conversed with him on religious subjects, in which he seemed to take the greatest delight. His whole conversation indicated, that his mind, his will, his affections, had received a new direction, that his heart was set against sin, and earnestly desirous for holiness, and that he felt that for whatever change had been wrought within him, he was entirely indebted to the Holy Spirit. He said, "he felt quite filled with the Holy Spirit, and had no inclination to do any thing wicked, and that he would not like to turn wicked again, as it would not be easy to return to God." Referring to the necessity of preparation for death, he said, "a minister had told him, that now was the accepted time; but that, notwithstanding, he had never thought of preparing for death, as no telling whatever would do, till lately, when God had afflicted him; since which he was prepared, and was willing to die whenever it was the will of God to take him away;" adding, "that he would not be in the least afraid to die, as he knew the Holy Spirit was with him." On the same day he had said something reflecting upon his younger brother, after which he became dull and thoughtful, and in the end burst into a passion of tears, saying, there was something on his conscience that accused him of having done wickedly, that the Holy Spirit had told him that he had sinned, and that he did not know whether it was his old sins, or whether he had spoken improperly about his brother. At length he requested his father to remove his little brother out of the room, after which he kneeled down and prayed with the utmost earnestness for forgiveness; and then became more composed. On this day his father presented him with a pictorial Testament, which he received with the greatest delight, and immediately began to read. On this, and on many other occasions, he told his father that it made him happy to read God's Word. Indeed, a keen and an ever returning reliash for the Word of God, characterised him from the time he first appeared to embrace the Gospel till the hour of his death; he regularly read in the course of the day two or three chapters, and as many Psalms; and before his death he had read in this manner the greater portion of the New Testament.

November 10.—On this day, and on the one immediately preceding, he had experienced considerable temporary relief. On the 9th he was evidently very deeply dejected; he said there was something on his conscience that told him he was a sinner. He insisted that his mother should go out of the room, for he could not endure to have any one present, when he was engaged in prayer; and then with the utmost fervour poured out his heart before God. Some time after this he was also engaged in loud supplication, and the servants who were outside the room, were so much affected with the solemnity and importunity of his prayers, that they burst into tears. At this time it was evident his thoughts were often turning to that death, which he believed was now approaching him, that he could in general contemplate the king of terrors without any dismay; and that he anticipated and realized the blessedness of dwelling with the Saviour, and the blessed company of immortals. He often told his father that he was preparing for death, and was quite willing to die and be with Christ and the holy angels.

November 17.—At this time, and for a few days before, there had been one of those flattering changes which often take place in the apparent health of those labouring under the disease of consumption, and which fill the minds of relatives and friends with those delusive hopes which soon end in the bitterest disappointment. Appearances had been so favourable, that his father began to entertain hopes of his recovery. He rose from bed every day after breakfast; he remained up during the rest of the day, and went to bed at an early hour in the evening. At this time his discourse had continually a sweet savour of divine things, and it might with justice be said, that his conversation was in heaven. In the morning, the earliest remarks he made were all on the subject of religion; and during the whole time his father was dressing, he was employed in putting questions respecting the Bible, the law of God, his own proneness to sin, and his hope of salvation. After he had risen, and was dressed, he went to a little box which his father had given him, unlocked it, and brought out his Bible, which he then began to read with the deepest attention. Before breakfast he generally engaged in private devotion; and as soon as breakfast was over he retired, and again betook himself to his knees. His anxiety was very remarkable for the salvation of all whom he especially loved, and his prayers most earnest that he might meet them again in heaven. Speaking of his little sister, he said he would not like to be in heaven without her. He prayed that she might be convinced of her sinfulness; and more especially of the sin of lying: he entreated the Lord to take away from her the spirit of lying. He had found these words in the Psalms, and had inquired of his father whether David had ever told a lie; saying, he doubted that he had, from his making use of that form of expression.

November 26.—Still the hopes of his parents were gathering strength. The cough, indeed, sometimes troubled him, but his spirits were good, and, in appearance, he was becoming stouter. But the apparent improvement in his health produced no desire, in his case, to remain in the world; the elevation of his spiritual feelings was still equally remarkable, and the thoughts of heavenly things seemed to absorb his soul. His conversation now was much occupied with heaven. He also spoke of the happiness he should feel in meeting with his brothers and sisters there. He said he prayed much for his father and mother, that God would pour out his Spirit abundantly upon them. While, however, there were times, and these very frequent, and of considerable continuance, when his hopes arose to a confident expectation of entering into heaven, there were other seasons when his mind was the subject of severe and painful conflicts. In the morning of the very day to which reference has just been made, he had cried, saying, he feared he would not go to heaven, for that all his sins had come to his remembrance the last night; and he feared that God was not hearkening to his prayers. His father assured him that it was a good thing for him to know his sins, as wicked boys would not confess that they were sinners at all; and that it was necessary to know our sins, in order that we might repent of them. Still, he was for some time very despondent. About this time, the spirit of prayer was remarkably poured out upon him; he seemed to be literally fulfilling the divine injunction, which requires men to pray always. He never took food, not even a piece of bread, without uttering a grace, or rather a short prayer, before he began to eat; and these prayers were all suggested by his own mind and feelings—not taught him by others; and were all adapted to the circumstances in which at the time he was placed.

November 29.—The weather having been stormy for two or three days before this, it had been necessary, in consequence of the smoke, to remove him from his own room into the nursery, where the other children were generally collected. This rendered him very unhappy, as he no longer had privacy for reading the Bible and for secret prayer. On the morning of this day he proceeded to remove every one out of the room, that he might perform his devotions with greater freedom. The first day after being removed into the nursery, he complained to his father, with many tears, that he was much tempted of the devil; particularly by fears that his sins could not be forgiven. His father replied, that the devil troubled not his friends, but his enemies,—of which he was now one: an answer which seemed to afford him no small consolation. At this time he still seemed to be gathering health and strength; so evident, indeed, appeared the improvement, that the medical man was again consulted, in the hope that he would return a more favourable answer; but he declared that his opinion remained unchanged—that he expected the disease would prove fatal. Silently, but most certainly, the work of destruction was going on. The smile, the flush, the apparent strength, the reviving spirits—were only calculated to awaken delusive expectations; which, in a little while, were destined to be dashed down in the dust, by the cruel hand of the destroyer. But while the process of decay was going on unperceived in the body, it was very evident that the process of purification, of refinement, of assimilation to the image of the Saviour, of preparation for the employments and the enjoyments of the heavenly world, was rapidly progressing in the soul.

RECOLLECTIONS OF FELIX NEFF.

BY ONE OF THE EVANGELISTS OF THE GENEVA EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

We arrived at one o'clock after midnight: I lodged with a Protestant innkeeper. It was the fair day, and I was put into a little room full of beds, where there was only a little straw, and not a single chair to put our clothes upon. There was a great deal of noise in the other rooms, and it was impossible for us to repose although we were much fatigued. In this very house Mr Neff was received with eagerness. Alas! the things of the world have taken the place of piety! Mournful change! We stopped at a place called Les Moulins, with a sister, who has always walked in the good way; and I visited a sick person, who had not had rest from the moment she was told that an evangelist was passing. She had been afraid to die before seeing me. I found her in a stable beside the cattle, and asked her if she was afraid to die. She said, "Yes." Why are you afraid? I said, "On account of my sins," she replied. I then spoke to her of the expiatory sacrifice of the Saviour upon the cross, and earnestly exhorted her to go to Him, to put her confidence in Him—declaring to her that then, instead of being afraid, she would say as the apostle, "My desire is to depart and be with Christ, which is far better."

I went down to another station, where I found a friend who proposed to accompany me to the neighbouring valley, which I accepted with pleasure, for I was ignorant of the road, which is very difficult. The first village we reached, we entered the house of a pious sister, a daughter in faith of Mr Neff. We could not see any others. At the second village I held a meeting, at night, which was well attended. On coming to the house we then found the curate of the place, who often makes visits to try to gain a sister of devoted piety, who is as it were the pillar of the little flock; and who teaches a school in order to keep the Protestant children from the influence of the Papists. This sister is one of the first souls converted under the ministry of Mr Neff. She told me the curate read the Bible with her. She had told a Protestant woman that the true vine was the Romish Church, and the withered branches were the Protestants, whom Calvin had separated from the vine. Our sister reminded him of those words, and said to him—"Tell me, Sir, before God, and with your hand on your conscience, do you believe this? Is it thus that these words are to be understood? Are not the withered branches those who do not believe in Jesus of whatever nation they be?" He said it was. She asked me if she ought to tell him not to come any more to speak with her. I told her it was better to try to pray with him and for him, that if he was not sincere, prayer would drive him thence. "I had not thought of that," she said, "it is a good idea."

On Sunday morning, going up to a place, where I had to preach, we entered a house where Mr Neff used always to retire. They showed me the bed on which he slept, and spoke to me of him with a respect which showed how much he was venerated. After service, where a numerous assembly listened to the Word of God with attention, we went up to the last village of the valley, the most elevated, and that where Mr Neff was the most frequently; there also are the most souls belonging to the Lord. I held a meeting at six in the evening, when the church was filled.

On Monday morning I passed a mountain, which it requires two hours to go up, and three to descend; there is neither road nor house for a considerable distance. Two men conducted me to the summit, where there was still much snow. One of them related to me, that Mr Neff had passed that mountain in winter, up to the arms in snow; and that he was one of those who accompanied him. When we have seen the places which the most blessed Neff travelled over, we then understand how impossible it was for him to bear up; we are even astonished how he could hold out so long. Indeed, he sacrificed his life for the flock of his Masters;

then went to the place which his master had prepared for him. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like his!"

ON CHRIST'S PRESENCE WITH HIS PEOPLE AT HIS TABLE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BUCHANAN,
Minister of the Second Secession Congregation, Dalkeith.

A SACRAMENTAL ADDRESS.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN,—You have come to this ordinance, we trust, with an earnest desire to meet with Jesus, and to enjoy his blessed fellowship. Well, we can assure you, for your encouragement, that Jesus is here. He is symbolically present in the elements of bread and wine, he is spiritually and graciously present in his own institution, according to his promise—where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. O, then, seek to realize his gracious presence—seek the blessed manifestation of it to your souls.

The consideration of the presence of Christ with you is calculated to have a powerful and a beneficial effect upon your exercise. This may well fill you with holy awe and reverence. When the divine Redeemer manifested his presence, in a remarkable manner, to the Patriarchs of old, they were required to exhibit the tokens of the deepest reverence,—“Put off thy shoes from thy feet, for the place where thou standest is holy.” The presence of the divine Saviour now calls for humility, and godly fear. Deep seriousness may well mark your outward deportment, and should pervade your whole souls. You should deeply feel your guilt, your vileness, your ignorance, your weakness, in the presence of so great and so holy a Being,—and though we would not wish you to adopt the very words of Peter, yet we would wish you to feel the spirit of reverence with which he spake, when, after witnessing the Saviour's greatness in the miracle which he had wrought, he exclaimed, “Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord.”

The consideration of Christ's presence in this ordinance should inspire you with confidence in him. His coming in this holy institution is of the most benign nature. The ordinance in which he now comes to you, O Christians, is adapted to your imperfect needy condition. He comes to you in it, not to condemn you, but to save you. He comes to enlighten your minds, and purify your hearts,—to increase your faith, and enlarge your comforts—to heal your diseases, and to feast your souls with his best benefits. He comes that you may have life, and that you may have it more abundantly. Should you not welcome his presence and rejoice in him,—“Lo this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord, we have waited for him; we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.”

The consideration of the presence of Christ should influence you to the contemplation of his glory. When a King appears in the midst of his court, and of his subjects, he is the great object of attention. His attendants, however illustrious, are forgotten and overlooked in the splendour of his superior dignity. And surely when he who is in the most emphatical and glorious sense—“the King”—when he comes to his people in his ordinance,—when he manifests his glory in the midst of them, he should be the great object of their attention and their admiration. Surely it becomes you, Christian communicants, in your present circumstances to see no one save Jesus only. “Behold his glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.” “He is fairer than the sons of men; he is altogether lovely, and the chiefest among ten thousand.”

The consideration of the presence of Christ with you, in this precious institution of his grace, should influence you to observe his words and his actions. He is present, speaking and acting among you. He is speaking in the whole word of the Gospel, and particularly in the words of institution. He is saying to you as really as he said at the first to his disciples,—“This is my body broken for you. This cup is the new testament in my blood, for the remission of sins, drink ye all of it.” Precious words. “Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ the Son of the living God.” Observe, too, his actions,—he is not only speaking, but acting. Wonderful condescension. He is among you as one that serveth! He is not only manifesting himself as the object of your homage and praise, but also as imparting to you the best benefits. And what is he giving you? He is giving you himself, he is giving you his flesh, which he gives for the life of the world. He is setting before you all the precious blessings of his atonement—for the application of your faith, and he is giving you the most generous welcome to the enjoyment of them all. “Eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved.” For the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread; and, when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat; this is my body which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. And, now believing communicants, when Christ is so graciously present with you, avail yourselves of the favourable opportunity of presenting your requests to him. He is now saying to you, at the banquet of wine, “What is thy petition, and it shall be granted thee? and what is thy request, and it shall be performed?” Seek, then, your life from him; the life of pardon—of holiness—of peace. “Let my life be given me at my petition.” Seek, also, the good of others; especially the spiritual and eternal welfare of those with whom you are most intimately connected, and most deeply interested. “Let my people be given me at my request.” Point to the corruption which more easily besets you, and say, “The adversary and the enemy is this wicked Haman. As for those, thine enemies and mine, which will not that thou shouldst reign entirely over me, bring them forth, and slay them before thy face.” In a word—Seek the kingdom. “Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all other things shall be added unto you.”

AFTER COMMUNICATING.

You have now, my Christian friends, joined in observing the precious ordinance of the Lord's Supper, in which he is symbolically present; and in which he is also spiritually and graciously present with his people. Have you indeed experienced somewhat of his blessed presence? Have you got some glimpses of his glory? Have his words penetrated your hearts, and made them to burn within you? Has his Spirit enabled you to take hold of him, and to refuse to let him go, except he bless you? Then you have reason to say, "It is good for us to be here." Value, then, the ordinances in which Christ's presence is to be enjoyed. Say, in the spirit of the Psalmist, "a day in thy courts is better than a thousand."

Let me, then, exhort you before you retire from these tables, to seek the presence of Christ to go with you in all your course through life. Though this is specially enjoined in his ordinances, it is not confined to them. You cannot be always engaged in the duties of the sanctuary; you must go down from the mount; you must again mingle with the world, and join in its affairs, attended with so many temptations and so many dangers. But Jesus does not send you away alone—he promises to go with you. He says, "Arise—let us go hence." Manifest your value for his presence, and your desire to possess it, by earnestly entreating it. Constrain him, saying, Abide with us. It is his gracious office, as the Captain of salvation, to guide all his people, and to bring them to glory; and happy, surely, are they who have such a Guide and Friend, to attend them through all the dangerous paths of life, to support and comfort them in trouble, and to conduct them safely, even through "the valley of the shadow of death."

And let me shortly remind you, that the gracious presence of Christ with his people on earth, is preparatory to their enjoyment of his presence in the most perfect and blessed sense hereafter. When absent from the body, they shall be present with the Lord. And when he shall come at the end of time, of which this very ordinance is a solemn pledge; he will receive them to himself—perfected in soul and body, to be for ever with him. O what tongue can tell, what heart can conceive the blessedness of being "ever with the Lord." Keep, my brethren, this end in view, and it will inspire you with undaunted resolution, through grace, in prosecuting the course which will assuredly conduct you to it.

Be concerned then, to come up from the wilderness leaning upon your beloved. Let knowledge be taken of you, that you have been with Jesus. And now brethren, we commend you to God, and to the Word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them that are sanctified. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

THE WARRANT FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH ON THE FIRST INSTEAD OF THE SEVENTH DAY OF THE WEEK.

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT WALLACE,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Birmingham.

"Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," &c.—
EXODUS xx. 8-11.

It is the object of the present Discourse to state the reasons which warrant us, as Christians, in observing the Sabbath on the first, instead of the seventh, day of the week.

Now, it has to be acknowledged, that there is no precept or command in the Word of God expressly, and in so many words, requiring and authorising the change in the observance of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week. But that fact does not preclude abundant Scripture warrant for this change, arising from what may appear by comparing Scripture with Scripture, and also from a consideration of the example set us in the Word of God by those who acted under the impulse of immediate inspiration. As has been well said, "The mind and will of God, concerning any duty to be performed by us, may be sufficiently revealed in his Word, without a particular precept in so many express terms enjoining it. The human understanding is the ear to which the word of God is spoken; and if it be so spoken, that that ear may plainly hear it, it is enough." But still it is of great importance that we should diligently consider and inquire as to the mind of God in this matter. Christians should always be ready to give, unto every man that asketh them, a reason for the hope that is in them, and also for their conduct, in every particular of it, and especially wherein it may differ from that formerly enjoined by God; and this, not only for the satisfaction of others, but their own satisfaction, that they may pursue their way with assured confidence—even in the strengthening and encouraging conviction, that it is a way set before them by God. And if God's mind, in respect of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, be not revealed to us in so many express terms, but rather indicated to us throughout Scripture, so as eventually to put the matter beyond doubt that such a change is according to his will, the more does this subject require our earnest and thoughtful attention.

I would observe, in the outset, that in the observance of the Sabbath on the first, instead of the seventh day of the week, there is nothing inconsistent with the Fourth Commandment.—The Fourth Commandment is the great standing rule with respect to the Sabbath, applicable to all and binding upon all. It is the only rule on this subject of universal application and obligation; or, other rules in respect of the Sabbath are universally applicable and binding, only in so far as they are consistent with, or arise out of, this one. Therefore, if we can show that there is nothing contrary to the requirements of the Fourth Commandment in the observance of the Sabbath on the first, instead of the seventh day of the week, we shall have completely done away with the objection to such a change, as being an alteration of God's unchangeable law, without a sufficiently express intimation of his will to the effect. The purport of the Fourth Commandment, then, is plainly this, that one whole day in seven be devoted to rest from labour, and kept holy unto the Lord; that six days be spent in labour, but the seventh in rest from it, and the special worship of God. But it does not teach where these six days are to begin, and, consequently, does not bind men down as to any particular day to be observed as the Sabbath. It binds them thus far, but no farther, that they shall work only six days at a time, and rest and sanctify the seventh day; but whether that seventh day is to be, or continue to be, the seventh day, according to the Jewish reckoning of time, or any other day, it does not determine. It leaves that matter unsettled—as fixed by God already, or to be yet fixed by him, as to him might seem good. It says simply, “Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh,” that is, the day after the six, “is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it.”

The Christian, then, in his observance of the first day of the week as the Sabbath, is just as strictly obedient to the letter of the Fourth Commandment as was the Jew. He rests from labour, and keeps holy one whole day after every six, as truly as did the Jew. And this was all that the law of the Sabbath, in so far as it is expressed in the Fourth Commandment, and independent of all other precepts on the subject, required either of Jew or Gentile. Nor can any objection be raised to this, from the reason annexed to the Fourth Commandment, in these words, “For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed”—observe, not the seventh day, as such merely, but—“the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it.” For it is a mistake to suppose that the Christian, in his observance of the Sabbath on the first day of the week, has lost all respect to this reason. He rests on the first day of the week, according to Jewish reckoning, in commemoration of his Lord’s resurrection. But still it is true that he rests every seventh day, or after every six day’s labour: and why does he so? and not every eighth, or ninth, or tenth day? Just for the reason annexed to the Fourth Commandment, because “in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it.”

It is true that the Jews were required to observe the Sabbath on the seventh day of the week, according to their reckoning of time. But it was not from the Fourth Commandment they could learn where to begin their six days, or which was the particular seventh day to be observed by them as a Sabbath. But this knowledge they must either have received by tradition from their fathers; or if, as is generally supposed, during their bondage in Egypt they lost the true reckoning of time by the days of the week, beginning from the creation, it must have been conveyed to them by means of some other precept than the Fourth Commandment, probably by means of that already quoted, “To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord.” Exod. xvi. 23. On this point, Edwards writes as follows:—“The Jews did not know, by the Fourth Commandment, where to begin their six days, and on which particular day to rest. This was determined by another precept.” Then he quotes Exodus xvi. 23–26, and proceeds, “It seems that the Israelites, in the time of their bondage in Egypt, had lost the true reckoning of time by the days of the week, reckoning from the first day of the creation. . . . Hence, we read, in Nehemiah ix. 14, that when God had led the children of Israel out of Egypt, he made known unto them his holy Sabbath,—‘And madest known unto them thy holy Sabbath.’ . . . But they never would have known where the particular day would have fallen by the Fourth Commandment.” We conclude, then, that the observance of the Jewish seventh day is not of the essence of the Sabbath law, as laid down in the Fourth Commandment. And if so, it is plain there is nothing really inconsistent with that law in observing the Sabbath on the first, instead of the seventh day of the week, or on any other day appointed or set apart by God for that purpose; or, in other words, it is plain, that as God appointed the seventh day of the week to be observed by the Jews as his Sabbath, so, in perfect consistency with the Fourth Commandment, may he have appointed the first day of the week to be kept as such amongst Christians. And that we have sufficient intimations of his will to this effect, viz., not that the Sabbath law or Fourth Commandment should be changed in any essential particular, but merely that the time of keeping the Sabbath should be changed from the seventh to the first day of the week, we have now to offer proof.

1. In the first place, it seems to us reasonable to suppose, and Scripture appears distinctly to warrant us in the conclusion, that under the Gospel the finished work of redemption should be commemorated in preference to the work of creation. God is alike the author and finisher of both works. But the former is a far more glorious work than the latter. It is so, as being an imperishable creation, whereas the old creation was made capable of corruption and decay; as being a creation unto holiness and good works, whereas the old creation had become the seat and centre of a wide-spreading rebellion against Heaven, and transgression of the Divine law; as being the rectification of what had gone wrong in the old creation, on a sure and immutable foundation,—the reconciliation of man to his offended God, the salvation of man from the hell he had deserved, and his restoration to the Divine love and favour. We may be sure that the new creation in Christ Jesus is more glorious than the old, from this, that the Scriptures speak of it as exhibiting by far the brightest display of the moral and endearing perfections of God. It is true they direct our attention to the heavens and the firmament, the earth and the sea, to our own bodies, and the whole mechanism of visible nature, as manifesting the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of God; but, to show us the love of God, and the holiness of God, and the power of God, and the wisdom of God, in the most overpowering light, they tell us of the finished work of the Son of God, on the sinner's account and in the sinner's room. With them, it is the Gospel of Christ that is emphatically the power of God and the wisdom of God; and "herein," they say, "is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins."

Now, if the work of redemption, equally the work of God with the work of creation—for he who is the "Author and Finisher of our faith," "in the beginning laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of his hands," (Heb. i. 10); if, I say, the work of redemption is so much more glorious than that of creation, it seems but reasonable to suppose that now, under the Gospel, it should be commemorated in preference to the latter. And Scripture, we have said, seems abundantly to sanction and bear us out in this supposition, if not to confirm us in such a conclusion. "Behold, I create new heavens, and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." Isa. lxxv. 17, 18. In this passage there is mention made of a new heaven, and a new earth, to be created by God; on account of which the former should be comparatively little remembered or thought of. And in the second verse it is explained, that this new creation means God's making "Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy;" that is, under the Gospel: and it is in this, in preference to the work of creation, that his people are especially to be "glad, and rejoice." So that this passage seems clearly to imply, that it is God's will, that, under the Gospel, the work of his redemption, in and by his Son, should be held in remembrance, or commemorated, in preference to the work of creation. The same thing seems taught, Heb. iv. 9, 10, "There remaineth, therefore, a rest" (literally a sabbatism, or the keeping of a Sabbath) to the "people of God." And why does there remain such a rest for the people of God now, under the Gospel? The answer is in the tenth verse,—“For He that is entered into his rest,” (that is, Christ,) “he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.” Now, here it seems clearly taught, that it is Christ's rest from his works, into which he entered when he rose from the dead, and not merely or principally God's rest from the work of creation, that is the reason of a Sabbath, or sabbatism, to the people of God under the Gospel dispensation.

2. The 118th Psalm has been adduced as indicative of the will of God, that the Sabbath under the Gospel should be held on the day of the Saviour's resurrection. In the twenty-second verse of this Psalm we read, "The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner." In Acts iv. 10, 11, St Peter clearly applies these words to the Saviour, and with evident reference to his resurrection from the dead. We conclude, therefore, that the Psalmist in this twenty-second verse speaks of Christ, and of his resurrection. And when he says, (verse twenty-four,) "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it," we again infer, that by this day he means the day of Christ's resurrection, or the day on which the stone set at nought by the builders, was made the head stone of the corner; and that that day has been specially made, or appointed by God, as a day of rejoicing and gladness in the Christian Church—a day of worship and religious devotion.

3. Our Saviour, who is Lord of the Sabbath, seems clearly to intimate his will, in respect of the change of it from the seventh to the first day of the week, by continuing during the whole of the seventh day in the grave, and rising on the first. The Sabbath was a day of joy and thanksgiving. As commemorative of God's work in creation, it was naturally such, and also, to a pious mind, in virtue of its peculiar services. But how could the Church rejoice whilst its Lord and Husband lay buried in the grave? How could the disciples rejoice in that night of disappointment to their fondest cherished hopes, and triumph to the enemies of their Lord? Our Saviour himself taught, that they could not, and would not, when he said, Matt. ix. 15, "Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the Bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the Bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." But, by his resurrection from the dead, Christ hath consecrated the first day of the week, of necessity, a day of joy and thanksgiving to all his faithful followers. It was a day of peculiar joy to his immediate followers. How eagerly they ran to assure themselves of the blessed news of their Lord's resurrection! and, when assured of it, to communicate it to others! It is a day of peculiar joy to all Christ's true followers, because, by his resurrection, they are "begotten again to the lively hope of an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." And so, as if by set purpose, in his death and resurrection has the Saviour rendered the seventh day unfit, whilst he hath solemnly constituted and appropriated the first day of the week for all the purposes of a Sabbath—a day of spiritual rest and rejoicing.

4. The will of God, in respect of observing the Sabbath on the first instead of the seventh day of the week, seems strongly indicated in this, that the first day of the week was to be specially observed by Christian Churches as a day of almsgiving, and laying up for pious purposes.—“Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the Churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.” 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. Observe, 1st, This was an order that applied to the Churches in general, as the Holy Ghost teaches, by making it known that it had already been delivered to the Church of Galatia, which lay at a great distance from Corinth. Observe, 2d, That the duty of almsgiving was considered by the Jews as one particularly belonging to the Sabbath. Josephus and Philo, who wrote not very long after our Lord's time, give an account, that it was the manner among the Jews, on the Sabbath to make collections for sacred and pious uses. Our Saviour himself teaches us, that the giving of alms, and showing of mercy, are proper works for the Sabbath-day. He teaches this by his example, and in many of his precepts,—as Matt. xii. 7; Luke xiii. 15, 16, and xiv. 5. Hence we conclude that the Holy Ghost, by directing that the first day of the week should be specially observed amongst Christians as a day of alms-giving, this intimated, that the Sabbath under the Gospel should be kept on that day.

5. This is still more strongly indicated by the fact, that on the first day of the week the apostles and their immediate converts met for the mutual worship of God, and the most solemn services of our religion. Thus, in Acts xx. 7 we read, "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them." It will not be denied, that the public worship of God was peculiarly a Sabbath-day's service. It was not confined to that day amongst the Jews, more than it is amongst us; but still, it was especially observed by them on that day, even as it is in this country at the present time. Now, when we read of the apostles and their converts acting under the impulse of the Holy Ghost, assembling on the first day of the week to break bread, and hear the preaching of the Gospel, is it not a strong indication of the Divine will as to the observance of that day as the Sabbath by Christians throughout the world? Why is it that the day is so particularly mentioned, but to teach us on the same day to engage in similar services?

6. Again: the first day of the week was again and again specially honoured by our Lord, and chosen by him for the most gracious manifestations of himself to his Church, and fulfilment of his promises. On the first day of the week, as we have already seen, he arose from the dead; and that same day showed himself to his disciples, being assembled together. On the first day of the week following, he met them; being again assembled together. On the first day of the week, at the feast called Pentecost, the Spirit descended, in a miraculous and glorious manner, on the apostles; and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls. On the first day of the week our Lord appeared in vision to St John, disclosing unto him more of his glory than had yet been manifested. And, may I not add, that on the first day of the week the Redeemer has manifested himself most graciously to his Church in all ages; causing many to say, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, in it we shall rejoice and be glad."

Now, doubtless our Lord had a wise end in view, in thus distinguishing and honouring the first day of the week. It could not be, more and more, in all ages, to blind his people in the error of observing it as the Sabbath. No. But rather to teach them to observe and to hallow it as such.

7. The Apostle John calls the first day of the week "The Lord's Day." Rev. i. 10. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day." "This expression, the Lord's Day, is found, by the ancient use of the whole Christian Church, by what appears in all the writings of the ancient times, from the Apostle's day, to signify the first day of the week." And no wonder the first day of the week has been honoured with such a name, since the Saviour was pleased again and again, as we have just seen, to honour it in such a manner. But it is called the Lord's Day, not only because it was a day which had been specially honoured by Christ, but also, to denote it as a day set apart to be kept holy unto him. Because it is a day consecrated and to be kept holy in perpetual remembrance of Christ's work. "When any thing is called by the name of God in Scripture, this denotes its appropriation to God." Thus the children of Israel were called by the name of God; and the city of Jerusalem; and the temple,—all to denote that they were peculiarly God's; and that not only in respect of love and favour shown them, but the special purposes for which they were set apart, and services required of, and in connection with them. And so the first day of the week is called "the Lord's Day," not only because he has specially honoured it in times past, but because also he hath chosen it as a day to be sanctified and kept holy unto him in all ages of his Church.

8. The first day of the week was observed as the Sabbath by the ancient Christian Church. By the immediate successors of the apostles, it was so observed; and upwards, without exception, to the fourth or fifth century it was so observed. We attach little weight to the opinion of the fathers, as such, even to the opinions of the earliest of them, whose opinions have been handed down to us, because, on examination, their principles are often found inconsistent with the doctrines of Scripture. We should never think of bringing forward the practice of the ancient Church as by itself an authority in matters of doctrine. But certainly where we find the universal practice of the ancient Church in perfect accordance with the strong scriptural arguments for the change of the Sabbath, it becomes to us a strong confirmatory proof of the Divine will as to this matter, and that the apostles, whose teaching was followed by such uniformity of practice amongst their converts, in respect of the observance of the Sabbath on the first day of the week, had themselves been infallibly taught by the Holy Spirit to that effect. And the practice of the primitive Church in regard to the observance of the Sabbath on the first day of the week, is of the more weight on this account, that all the erroneous tendencies, and they were many and grievous, and very early, of that Church, were towards attaching great and essential importances to mere outward and external observances—to the observance of days, and months, and times. Had the fathers, then, not been expressly taught by the inspired apostles, or those taught by them, that the Sabbath was to be changed, the probability is, that we should have found them attempting, what was actually attempted by a party, but not till the fourth or fifth century, to establish the observance of two Sabbaths in the week—to continue the Jewish, and add to it the Christian Sabbath.

Let us condense our argument into as few words as possible, and then ask you if we have not sufficient evidence of it being the Divine will, that the first day of the week should be observed by Christians as the Sabbath? There is nothing in the observance of the Sabbath on the first day of the week contrary to, or inconsistent with, the spirit or letter of the Fourth Commandment. It is reasonable to suppose, that as the Sabbath was at first instituted in commemoration of the work of creation, the day of observing it should be changed in commemoration of the still greater work of redemption; and in this supposition Scripture abundantly warrants and bears us out. In the 118th Psalm, the day of Christ's resurrection is foretold as the day made by God, and on which the righteous should rejoice and be glad. The Saviour lay buried during the Jewish Sabbath, thereby necessarily unfitting his Church for the special and appropriate duties of a Sabbath. He arose again the first day of the week, necessarily constituting it a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving to his Church. On this day, especially, the apostles and their converts gave to the poor, and laid up for pious purposes. On this day they met for preaching, worship, and the administration of the sacraments. This day the Saviour has honoured above all other days in all ages of his Church. It is called the Lord's Day; it is holy, consecrated unto him, specially set apart for his use and service. And as such it has been observed by Christians, all but universally, from the days of the apostles to the present time. Look not at these arguments singly, but consider them together, and I ask, almost without fear of a negative reply, Are they not sufficient warrant for the Christian's observance of the Sabbath on the first instead of the seventh day of the week?

Still it may be wondered at, that in the New Testament we have not some direct and explicit intimation of God's will in respect of so important a matter as the change of the Sabbath. I would just say as to this, we have no reason to find fault with, or to wonder at, or to concern ourselves much in inquiring as to the reason of God's not revealing his will on any subject to us, after this or that manner, provided that he has revealed it to us in any way. There are many doctrines taught in Scripture, which might have been taught in language far more plain and simple; but because they are not so taught, we find no fault with God; nor do we inquire the reason of their not being so taught, farther than to know, that it is thus God has been pleased to exercise the mental powers and capacities of his rational creatures. And so we should be perfectly satisfied with that revelation of God's will in respect of the change of the Sabbath which he hath given us, believing it sufficient for the instruction and conviction of all, on this subject, who will be at the pains diligently to inquire into it.

There is just one thing, however, that may be said, that possibly the Holy Spirit purposely avoided any direct precept, as regarded the change of the Sabbath, in the first ages of the Church, in consideration of the Jews, who entertained a most solemn regard for their Sabbath, and to prevent their minds from being unnecessarily prejudiced against the truth as it is in Jesus. Acting on the scriptural principles, of feeding them with milk, and not with strong meat, and here a little and there a little, it may have been, that the observance of the Lord's Day as Sabbath, was introduced by degrees into the early Christian Church; but yet so as to leave Christians in after times no room to doubt, that it is the will of God that it should be so observed. Amen.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

When wilt thou arise and reign,
Lord of angels, King of men?
Gird thy sword upon thy thigh,
And lift thy banner, thou Most High!
Heathen cities only wait
Thy bidding, to throw wide each gate;
Heathen temples only stay
Thy beck, to bid their gods away.

Trumpet-tongues, that wont to vaunt
Of idols dumb, thy word but want,
Jesus' matchless name to shout
All the wondering world throughout.
Speak—and o'er each heathen isle
Bethlehem's star-beams sweetly smile!
Speak—and by each heathen tongue
Bethlehem's angel-hymn is sung!

And 'tis done!—already see Myriads shout thy victory;
Kings of Ind already greet
With costliest gems thy welcome feet.
Thou hast conquer'd, thou hast slain,
Lord of angels, King of men!
Girt thy sword upon thy thigh,
And waved thy Cross triumphantly!

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

An All-seeing God.—God's eye is upon every hour of my existence. His Spirit is intimately present with every thought of my heart. His inspiration gives birth to every purpose within me. His hand impresses a direction on every footstep of my goings. Every breath I inhale, is drawn by an energy which God deals out to me. This body, which, upon the slightest derangement, would become the prey of death, or of woful suffering, is now at ease, because he at this moment is warding off from me a thousand dangers, and upholding the thousand movements of its complex and delicate machinery. His presiding influence keeps by me through the whole current of my restless and ever-changing history. When I walk by the way-side, he is along with me. When I enter into company, amid all my forgetfulness of him, he never forgets me. In the silent watches of the night, when my eyelids have closed, and my spirit has sunk into unconsciousness, the observant eyes of him who never slumbers is upon me. I cannot fly from his presence. Go where I will, he tends me, and watches me, and cares for me; and the same Being who is now at work in the remotest domains of Nature and Providence, is also at my right hand to eke out to me every moment of my being, and to uphold me in the exercise of all my feelings, and of all my faculties. Now, what God is doing with me, he is doing with every distinct individual of this world's population. The intimacy of his presence, and attention, and care, reaches to one and to all of them. With a mind unburdened by the vastness of all its other concerns, he can prosecute, without distraction, the government and guardianship of every one son and daughter of the species. And is it for us, in the face of all this experience, ungratefully to draw a limit around the perfections of God—to aver, that the multitude of other worlds has withdrawn any portion of his benevolence from the one we occupy—or that he, whose eye is upon every separate family of the earth, would not lavish all the riches of his unsearchable attributes on some high plan of pardon and immortality, in behalf of its countless generations?—REV. DR CHALMERS.

Friendship with Christ.—Surely, instead of concern for the grand objects of Christianity decreasing through the lapse of time, every successive year ought to be felt as enlarging your interest, by urging you nearer to the contemplation of the Christian hope. Years of life are hurrying fast on, and the closing one hastens forward to break every tie, the dearest not excepted, that binds you to this earth. But friendship with Christ survives the stroke even of death. It is formed and cultivated for eternity. Whatever friendship you gain, let his be the object of chief care to you. Whatever friendship you love, unto his do you cling. This is union to one who never changeth, the first dawning of love to whom is peace, and the perfect sunshine of it in heaven, blessedness.—REV. DR MUIR.

Unbelief striving with the Christian.—If there was the least limitation in the blessed Gospel,—if the worst of sinners were excluded,—if the feeblest sincere desires were liable to be rejected, I must have lain down in despair long ago, and I must certainly do so after all, for I have no better plea yet than that which I began with (blessed be God, no better can be either needful or possible.) When Satan, or my own unbelieving heart, attacks me with ifs and buts, I cannot reason much with them; if we come to particulars they have me at advantage; much of what they lay to my charge is too true; yea, more than all they can surmise would be my just desert,—but I deny this consequence. I am, it is true, a sinner; nay, one of the chief of sinners. I was a hardened, obstinate rebel; and now, I am a slothful, unprofitable servant. But when I consider the unbounded mercy of God,—the merits, sufferings, intercession, love, and power of Christ,—the condescension, variety, extent, and unchangeableness of the Divine promises,—then, I say, no matter what I was, or what I am, provided only God has shown me the necessity of salvation, made me willing to be saved in his own way, and taught me to ask for those things which he has engaged to bestow. If these things are so, I say I have the truth and power of God on my side; either I, as well as less sinners, must be saved, or it would appear at the great day, that Christ was either not able, or not willing to make good his own promises. Excuse such a shocking expression,—but the case is really so,—unbelief flies in the face of all the Divine attributes, and, under the specious pretence of humility, robs God of his highest glory—the pardoning iniquity freely for his own name's sake. But then the doubt returns as to sincerity. The devil will allow these things are true to real believers, but how are you sure you are one: many have made false professions and fallen off at last: you cannot judge your own heart, and therefore may be deceived. I have been sometimes pinched at this; for though there are undoubted marks and evidences, of a work of God laid down in the Scripture, it is not always easy to apply them, without falling into a legal temper, and then they can afford us no comfort. They are something like a dial, which will direct you with a glance when the sun shines, but are of no use at other times. When the Spirit of God shines into the heart, and witnesses with our spirits, then we can both distinguish the evidence, and trace the growth of our graces; but, alas! sin, like a thick cloud, often interposes; our sun withdraws, and what can we do? However, there is one mark which seldom fails. Had our Lord said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," and said no more, alas! what comfort would this have been to me, who am so full of impurity even in my solemn minutes; but he has stooped so low in compassion to me, to you, and to all that seek him, as to say, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." Now, though I might question and scruple, whether I have any righteousness or no, yet, if I can be judge of any thing at all—if I can tell whether I am asleep or awake, hot or cold, in Liverpool or in Yorkshire, so sure I am that God has inspired me with a hungering and thirsting, which nothing worldly can satisfy. This is the experience of every day, abroad or at home, alone or in company: I still feel a void. I feel that I want a conformity to God, a sense of his presence and of his love, to make the happiest scenes of life agreeable to me. In proportion as these withdraw, or advance, I find myself more or less satisfied with myself, and every thing about me. Now I can well remember when I had not these desires. I am sure I did not give them to myself, neither can they proceed from evil influence, because their direct tendency is, to destroy sin and promote holiness, therefore they must be of God: if so, they must be prevalent in the issue, or, as the promise runs, they shall be satisfied, for God is not like the unwise builder, who began a work at unawares, which he was not able to finish. No: His hands that laid the foundation, must, and will, bring forth the top-stone with joy, and give us everlasting reason to cry, Grace, grace, unto it. God had promised to rebuild the second temple: he raised up Cyrus on purpose to set the work on foot; he sent his prophets to encourage the people: how many difficulties, stops, and oppositions, did that work meet with? yet it was accomplished in its appointed time.—REV. JOHN NEWTON. (Twenty-five Letters hitherto unpublished.)

Sin.—There are some poisons which have a lethargic effect, and produce a great drowsiness. Sin is a poison of this description. Before it destroys, it administers an opiate to stupify the feelings. A condemned criminal, having taken a stupifying draught, feels not. It is the first work of the Spirit to awaken man out of this stupefaction.—HOWELS.

The Temple of God.—Consider as exemplary, the temper of the royal Psalmist, how he swears, how he vowed, "I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed; I will not give sleep to my eye-lids, until I have found out a place for the Lord, a habitation for the mighty God." Yours is a business of less inquisition, less expense; this temple is to be within you. Lament, O bitterly lament the common case, that he may look through a whole world of intelligent creatures, and find every breast, until he opens, shut up against him; all agreeing to exclude their most gracious rightful Lord, choosing rather to live desolate without him. The preparation, or prepared mansion, is a penitent, purged, willing heart. Fall down and adore the most admirable and condescending grace; that the high and lofty one, who inhabits eternity, who, having made a world, and surveying the work of his hands, inquires, "where shall be my house, and the place of my rest?" and then resolves it himself; the humble, broken, contrite heart, there, there I will dwell."—REV. J. HOWE.

Religion all-important.—It is religion that can stand before you with oracles, lights, and an exhibition of the most great and awful image. It is that which represents to you the whole truth of the state of your soul toward God, the union of your eternal interests, the relation you stand in to another world, the peremptory requirement of what you must do to be saved,—what can ever, through endless duration, be worth your considering, if this be not? You know that religion, unless it be a fable, has all this importance, that it has this importance to you, and that it is to you now, while this day, this hour, is passing. In a matter of incomparably less magnitude, you would feel that the concern pressed importunately and justly on the thoughts and cares of the present instance. You say he advised you to take no trouble of vigilance or exertion about it, to occupy yourself entirely with other matters, and indifferently await the event; you would spurn the suggestion, as equally unfeeling and absurd. What! you would say, when the whole question of safety or utter ruin may be depending on the judgment and activity which I may exercise this day? But here is the supreme interest of your existence. It cannot be safe, you will confess, it cannot, if you will give it no serious attention. But then you are confessing that you have left it but now in peril, and that it is so at this very hour; nay, in greater peril than ever before, as aggravated by the guilt of such wilful neglect, and by the diminution of the term allotted for the attainment of a happy security.—REV. J. FOSTER.

The necessity of Affliction.—It is not an easy matter to be drawn from, nor to be beaten from the love of the world, and this is what God mainly requires of his children, that they be not in love with the world, nor the things of it; for that is contrary to the love of God, and so far as that is entertained this is wanting. And if in the midst of afflictions they are sometimes subject to this disease, how would it grow upon them with ease and prosperity! When they are beaten from one worldly folly or delight, they are ready through nature's corruption to lay hold upon some other; being thrust out from it at one door to enter at some other: as children unwilling to be weaned, if one breast be embittered they seek to the other; and, therefore, there must be somewhat to drive them from that too. Thus, it is clear, there is need, yea, great need of afflictions, yea, of many afflictions, that the saints "be chastened by the Lord, that they may not be condemned with the world." Let us learn, then, that in regard of our present frailty there is need of afflictions, and so not promise ourselves exemption, how calm soever our seas are for the present; and then for the number, and measure, and weight of them, to resign that wholly into the hands of our wise Father and Physician, who perfectly knows our mould and maladies, and what kind and quality of chastisement is needful for our cure.—LEIGHTON.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A SABBATH SCHOOL.

It is now more than thirty years since, one Sabbath evening in winter, wishing for a place more favourable to contemplation, than the fire around which a numerous family was gathered, I went out to take a solitary walk. The night was lovely; the ground partially covered with snow; the moon shone clearly, unless when covered with a fitting cloud. I continued the pace at which I had set out, till I came within view of the Cathedral of ———; my speed was then abated by the imposing objects around me, and I willingly yielded my mind to the impressions which they imparted. I gazed on the solemn magnificence of the time-worn edifice—its tall spire, its rows of "ebon and ivory," buttress and lattice, and aerial clarestory, more bright, because less shaded—the stillness that prevailed around it—the thought of the myriads that were reposing in its crowded cemetery, affected me much. My melancholy feelings were aided by the dull gurgle of the stream; by the occasional gust of wind, moaning through the few relics of the firs that once gave a name, now almost forgotten, to part of the scene; by the dark shade that rested on the bottom of the ravine, especially at the place where the small unembattled arch, now thrown into degrading contrast by the "Bridge of Sighs," stands, making it appear like the entrance to another world. I sat down on a stone, yielding to the solemn impressions that crowded on my mind.

I will not say that, on that evening, my feelings were above those stirrings of sensibility which the objects that filled my view, and occupied my thoughts, were fitted to excite. I might at the time think them religious—they were certainly pensive; and how often do we flatter ourselves that such a feeling is the calm of devotion? It is not. The crowd of the city—the solitude of a desert—the recollection of some mournful event—the plaintive sounds of music, will occasion similar feelings, but feelings that have only the guise of devotion, and not its depth and stability.

We are often led by ways that we know not, and on these unknown paths we sometimes tread our first footsteps towards heaven. Often is some incident, apparently the most casual—some circumstance, in appearance the most trivial—the first link in that chain of love by which the soul is drawn towards the Redeemer. I had gone out with the intention of taking a solitary walk, a single circumstance attending an incident of the most common occurrence led me to new acquaintances—to other views of this world and the next—subsequently to the greatest changes of life, and, I humbly trust, will terminate in leading to an eternity of happiness.

I had taken a circuitous road home, and on passing a schoolhouse my course was stopped by a number of young persons, mostly children, coming out. Among them I thought I observed an old school-fellow, with whom I had a wish to renew my acquaintance, and chiefly, if not entirely, from this motive, I resolved to attend the school next Sabbath.

I accordingly went, and took a seat among the biggest boys present. I was mistaken respecting my former acquaintance; but that night I sat next to a boy, with whose grave demeanour and knowledge of Scripture I was much pleased, and, I may add, much humbled. I became very intimate with him, as he also attended the Outer Church, and ever afterwards regarded his acquaintance as a blessing.

I was so much pleased with J. W.—and with the prospect of religious instruction which I was desirous of obtaining, and which the exercises of the school seemed to promise, that I resolved to attend regularly. I carefully observed the order of their procedure the first night, but would take no part in the exercises, which, besides repeating tasks, consisted in reading passages parallel to one given out the previous Sabbath. To assist me in the search of such passages, for my knowledge of the Sacred Volume was, at this time, very imperfect, I purchased a Bible with marginal references; and the second night I was so fortunate in my selection, that the master who was presiding that evening desired me to read some of them twice. I felt much gratified at this token of approbation, which, I have no doubt, tended to confirm the resolution I had formed to be regular in my attendance at the school.

The teacher, under whose immediate care my companion and I were, was a very quiet and apparently deeply serious man, humble and unassuming. He belonged to the Established Church; the other teachers were Dissenters. He left the school soon after I joined it, and I do not think that any member of the Established Church was a teacher in the school during my subsequent connection with it. It gradually assumed more of a sectarian character than it had at first. As a proof of which, I may mention, that the Shorter Catechism was neglected.

By far the most eminent teacher in the school was Mr R—. He was truly a wonderful man. He possessed a thorough knowledge of human character, a familiar acquaintance with the Bible, a critical knowledge of many passages which have been debateable ground between conflicting parties. He had a retentive memory, richly stored with passages from various poets, especially from the evangelical Cowper; a sound and vigorous understanding; a chastened and correct taste. His manners had much of the ease and politeness of the gentleman, though his education had not afforded him more than ordinary advantages.

I never heard any person address young people with more effect than Mr R—. His appearance was prepossessing; the little action he had, graceful. I have seen few faces exhibit feeling so marked as his did. The earnestness of his manner arrested the most thoughtless, and often was his voice affected by the intensity of his feelings. His labours were much blessed, but his time of usefulness was short. The vigorous confinement which his occupation imposed on him, and the Sabbath bringing him no day of rest, soon undermined a constitution not naturally robust. He was aged only thirty-three years at his death, which occurred about three years after I had the pleasure of his acquaintance. Sincerely was he lamented by his young flock, for he was much beloved. Few were the faults that dimmed the lustre of his virtues. He had an occasional ardour of temper, and, though his chief object in teaching was the triumph of the Cross, I cannot altogether acquit him of partiality in stating the principles of the religious party to which he belonged.

J. W— and I became very intimate, and what helped to promote our intimacy was the removal of my father's dwelling to the neighbourhood in which he resided. We did not part on leaving the school, but would walk long together; and sweet are the recollections of my Sabbath walks with him in the burial-ground of the High Church, before and after hearing the pious and eloquent Dr Halfour. We talked of doctrine; and the simple and scriptural manner in which that pious boy spoke to me of the doctrine of election, did more to establish my faith in it than the most elaborate treatise on that subject which I have read.

We talked of texts. He first directed my attention to 1 Peter iii. 19, of which he gave the Protestant interpretation. I said I would like to know Mr F—'s opinion about it, that was the name of the teacher in whose class we were. That humble unassuming man acquainted Mr R— with our application, and we were requested to remain after the dismissal of the school.

After the scholars were gone, the teachers, J. W—, and I, formed a small circle in the corner of the room. Mr R— seemed delighted with our application, and gave the same interpretation of the passage which I had heard. He requested us to make known to the teachers any difficulty we experienced in understanding the Holy Scriptures, and that they would instruct us as far as they could; "and," said he, with evident delight and much feeling, "it gives us great pleasure to learn that you have formed a meeting for prayer."

A clap of thunder could not have struck my companion and me with more surprise; and I yet think I see the modest blush on his saintly countenance, when I stared at him in astonishment, and perhaps with some distrust, that he had been the tell-tale—a suspicion which he was equally warranted to entertain of me. One of the teachers, who had more caution than Mr R—, showed some uneasiness at the abrupt declaration which he had made. Perhaps he himself had felt that he had spoken prematurely, if not rashly, and this may have prompted a rebuke which we soon afterwards received.

J. W— and I had formed a meeting for prayer, which was attended by only another of the scholars, when it thus became known. So far from courting publicity, our meetings were conducted with all the secrecy and stealth which we could practise. We met, in fact, as if we had combined for the commission of some mischief; and never did sinner adopt more precautionary measures to hide his guilt, than we employed to conceal our meeting and its purpose. Why, the first place in which we met was the coal-cellar of my father's house! Well do I remember how I used to steal the key without attracting notice; and, watching till no one observed us, we darted down the stair to the dark uncomfortable hole.

I soon got a more convenient place—a room in an uninhabited flat of the house in which my father resided, the key of which was intrusted to his care. Still, we were as afraid of notice as ever, and generally entered the house by a back-stair. Our numbers kept increasing, and secrecy was not so easily maintained; but I never could learn how Mr R— knew of our meeting, at the time he did.

SELF-DEDICATION TO CHRIST ENJOINED ON THE RULERS AND MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE ORDINATION OF ELDERS IN ST JOHN'S CHURCH, LEITH, ON SABBATH, 21ST MARCH 1841.

BY THE REV. JAMES LEWIS, Minister of that Parish.

"And this they did, not as we hoped; but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God."—2 Cor. viii. 5.

SUFFER me, beloved brethren, and fellow-servants in the Gospel of Christ, to recall to you the passage of Scripture which has already been under our consideration, for your future direction in the service of the sanctuary, to which you have now been set apart. The words of the apostle are very remarkable, and should be held in perpetual remembrance by all called to minister in any of the offices of the Church. First, says the apostle, the Macedonian Christians gave themselves to the Lord, and afterwards to us, the apostles, for the service of the Church. He puts an especial mark and emphasis upon the word first; as it is his design to teach this doctrine,—that before we can dedicate, with acceptance, our substance or our services to God, we must give our own selves to him. The first act of these Macedonian Christians was not an act of liberality, or an act of service—it was not a deed done on behalf of the Church, or for the advancement of its interests; but an act that had exclusive reference to themselves—a deed of personal submission to Christ. First in order was their dealing with God for their own souls; and only second, their offices of kindness and duty towards his Church. First, was the gift of themselves to God; and only second, the gift of their substance and time to his service. First, they yielded their own hearts to the Lord; and only second, they offered themselves to the apostles, by the will of God. First, the altar was erected in their own souls; and then the gifts followed, which were sanctified by the altar. This is God's fixed order; he must first have ourselves, ere he will accept of us as his ministers and elders. He will be served by a holy and sanctified vessel; which he has first made holy, and then turns into the special use of the sanctuary. "Look ye out among you men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business."

And here lies the secret of your usefulness and success in your office in the Church. It lies not in your possessing great talents, abundance of leisure, peculiar facilities for doing good, or in your occupying an influential station in society; but in personal devotedness, in self-dedication to God. Consider these Macedonian Christians; they present a memorable illustration of this truth. Paul informs us, that they had been enduring a great trial of affliction; which, from other sources, we know to have been a severe and active persecution let loose upon them; that, in consequence of this persecution, they were in deep poverty; having suffered, in all probability, the spoiling of their goods for the sake of Christ; or, at all events, having sustained loss and serious injury, from their ordinary industrious pursuits and sources of gain being broken up. Yet, under the pressure of these calamities, and whilst actually enduring these privations, their gifts exceeded those of all other Churches; and from the apostle they obtain the testimony, that they abounded to the riches of liberality. Whence these riches, coming out of deep poverty? Whence this abounding liberality, from a people persecuted and spoiled? We might have been told of the peculiar advantages of the Macedonian Christians, of their ample resources, of their great possessions, of their prosperous commerce and accumulated wealth, and referred to these as the causes of their distinguished liberality, and pre-eminence in this grace over other Churches; but the apostle cuts off these suppositions and gratuitous conjectures, by the unquestionable assurance, that whilst exercising this enlarged charity, and rebuking, through their example, the parsimony of other Churches, they were suffering under a great trial of affliction, and in deep poverty. Whence the secret of these great achievements? Whence the source of those contributions, which even amazed the apostle? They first gave themselves to the Lord. They were Christ's devoted ones, and having given the greater gift—their own souls, how easy to give the less—their earthly substance! and to an extent so disproportioned to their means, as to astonish a selfish world, and even surprise an apostle.

Here, also, lies the secret of your future usefulness in your holy office. We ask not what are your talents, or the amount of your leisure, or your favourable opportunities, or especial facilities for doing the work of the Lord—only give to the Lord a devoted heart, only let your own personal covenant with him be often renewed, and your walk be a walk with God, and you will be surprised at the amount of service which, under all disadvantages, you will be able to render to the Church—how time, and opportunities, and occasions of spiritual ministrations, will multiply on your hands—how those difficulties which alarmed you, and at first seemed insurmountable, will vanish, as the mountains became a plain before Zerubbabel. Is it not known to you, that it is of all things the most difficult, for a rich covetous man to find any portion of his substance which he can spare for God? He has nothing to give out of his treasures; his substance is pre-engaged, and he cannot touch one of his heaps; and yet a pious widow hath her mite to cast into the treasury, and a poor Macedonian Christian abounds in liberality. In like manner, a worldly-business man can find no portion of his time which he can allot to God. The twelve hours of the day, in which man ought to work, are too few for the engagements of his business, and the variety of his engrossing cares. Every hour is occupied, and every flying moment hath its work—and all is too little for the greatness and multiplicity of his avocations. But let that same man become the subject of a saving change, let him first give himself to God, and it is incredible what fragments of time he will gather up—how many hours every day or week he will redeem for the divine service, and yet needful business not be encroached upon—and how in proportion to the entireness of his personal dedication will be the greatness of the redemption of his time from the world to the service of the Church.

It is by such a previous and often renewed self-dedication to God, that the duties of your office will become easy, and that time, and opportunities, and talents, will be found for their discharge. We do not think it needful, were it even practicable, to specify the exact portion of time that should be devoted to the labours of your office. Neither do we think it necessary to enumerate the opportunities and occasions of Christian usefulness that will habitually arise before you, and which it will be your duty to watch for and instantly embrace. The commonly prescribed duties of the eldership are already well known to you. Need we speak of the charge laid upon you of visiting the sick and dying of this congregation and parish, or of instructing the ignorant by domiciliary visitations, or of labouring for the conversion of souls, or of admonishing and reproving the families of professed Christians that live without the daily worship of God, or of vigilantly superintending the young, that they may receive at the hands of the Church, the education that shall prepare them for the life that now is, and for that which is to come, or of tenderly, yet firmly, governing, and carefully inspecting the moral and Christian habits of the members of the Church.

These, and a long roll of other services might be enumerated as the recognised and prescribed duties of your office. Yet, however exact the enumeration, and ample the details of official duty, it would fall infinitely short of the willing service that would be rendered by the self-dedicated soul. There is an instant readiness, an intuitive alacrity in discovering occasions and opportunities of doing the work of the Lord, when the heart has been first yielded to him, even as the man whose heart is set upon the world, and whose study is to grow rich, discovers and seizes with an instantaneous and almost miraculous sagacity, the most secure and certain openings to a gainful merchandise. He needs no directory how to labour successfully in the service of the God of this world. His intellect is sharpened by his desires, and his invention stimulated by the ardour of his affections. The Macedonian Christians left far behind the directions and suggestions of the apostle, and exceeded his most sanguine hopes. "To their power, yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themselves."

Go forward, then, beloved brethren, to the duties to which your office calls you, with the example of the Christians of Macedonia before you—giving yourselves first to the Lord; which will both multiply your services, and make the most difficult easy. How difficult and trying the services to Christ and his Church you may yet be called to render, we cannot foretell. They are perilous, and will prove yet searching times, in which you have taken upon you this holy office—times in which many shall be tried, and some shall fall. The Church of which you have this day been ordained office-bearers, is passing, like the Church of Macedonia, through a great trial of affliction; and it may be, shall speedily pass into deep poverty, and suffer the spoiling of her goods. It is your lot to have been ordained her office-bearers at a time when she is not hid from the strife of tongues, and when, on all sides, she is surrounded with imminent dangers. We enter not, at present, into the causes of her trials and conflict; only, we exhort you to be strong, to stand fast, to quit you like men, and suffer no fear of consequences to turn you aside from contending for "the faith once delivered to the saints." As dedicated men, it has ceased to be any longer with you a disputable matter, whether God or the world is to be obeyed. You have decided the question which master you are to serve. "We must obey God, rather than man," is the immovable rock on which the man that has yielded himself to God stands; and, come weal or come woe, he cannot move from his position. The least intelligent whisper of God's voice, the slightest intimation of his will, must be more authoritative to him than the most imposing of human commands. His Master is chosen,—his Lawgiver, his King is chosen. Other lords, other lawgivers and kings are in his eyes usurpers, when they come in competition with the King of kings; and rather than cast reproach on His sovereign will, he will endure the loss of all things. To stand halting between the commands of his heavenly Master and the commands of the world, imposed with its highest authority, were rebellion against his chosen King; it were in effect to say, he was still doubtful whether Christ were the better and more rightful Lord; in other words, whether he had yet made his choice, and surrendered himself to Christ. In this resolved spirit and temper of dedicated ones, discharge your public duties to the Church; not looking to consequences, but to the commands of God—prepared to suffer any loss rather than knowingly relinquish any portion of his will—yea, prepared to avow, that, beloved as is the Church of which you are members, for your fathers' and brethren's sake, though it be the Church of your prayers and of your heart's love, yet not for a world would you save it, or any visible Church, at the expense of the sacrifice of any part of the truth of the invisible God.

God only knows whether the Church of Scotland shall survive your days, or you shall survive it; whether you shall be permitted, during the whole of your earthly pilgrimage, to pursue your quiet labours of Christian love,—or whether your labours shall be suspended before your lives, and the Church, driven for a season into the wilderness, be exposed to the arm of secular violence. Let the uncertainty of the season of labour in your office redouble your diligence—let its apprehended shortness quicken your zeal; so that whether it be the night of your own death or the night of divine judgments that shall close your ministry in the eldership, you may be found at your post, watching and waiting for the coming of your Lord, and doing with all your might what your hands find to do.

Let me remind the congregation, that though all are not specially called to dedicate themselves to the service of the sanctuary, yet all are called to dedicate themselves to God. What is your submission, or reverence, or obedience, or duty to us, the office-bearers of the Church, if you have not first given yourselves unto the Lord? It is the surrender of yourselves unto Him we crave. Our heart's desire, our prayer for you, brethren, is, that ye yield yourselves unto God. Our aim is, to make a conquest of you for Christ, and to bring you into subjection to our heavenly Master. Why should any of you resist his call? Is it not most reasonable, that, when the great God goes round amongst you, and says to one man after another, "Give me thy heart," that you should submit yourselves unto him? Have you ought to say against his claim? Can you give one reason why it should be refused? Scripture, reason, conscience, Providence, urge a thousand reasons why you should yield yourselves, and that immediately; and you have nothing to answer to the demand. Try what any of you can say against God's call for your affections. Many of you will not yield him your hearts; but can you plead against the rightfulness of his claim? Produce your strong reasons. Speak, that we may know why you should reject the living God, and serve his adversary. Tell us wherefore you should be the servants of sin, and of the god of this world? Can you produce one reason that will satisfy your own reason? Can you say that the master you now serve, made you, put breath into you, upholds you, is your owner; and that he pays you large wages, and gives you great rewards for your service? You cannot plead these in behalf of Satan's service. No; it is an unreasonable as well as a degrading service. His very servants can say nothing in its behalf; they dare not vindicate it, their judgment disowns it, and their mouths are stopped—though their hearts and hands still drudge in his service. How long are you resolved to carry about the horrid impiety written in your hearts—I will not have the Lord to reign over me? How, with that inscription on your souls, will you face your Judge? How will the boldest rebel then feign submission, hide his real character, and even lay claim to the merits of obedience, with a "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name done many wonderful works?" How even will you answer for this call that is now made upon you, when, in the name of Christ, we demand you for his service, beseech you by his mercies, and command you by the authority of God to yield yourselves unto him?

Our first call, therefore, to you, brethren, is on behalf of Christ. We cannot ask obedience, submission, reverence, for ourselves, until we have spoken to you on God's behalf—till, first in order, we address to you the call, "Yield yourselves unto God." And now we exhort as many as have given their own selves unto the Lord, to yield themselves unto the brethren appointed to rule over them by the will of God. You asked of God that he would add to the elders of this church, for its better oversight and spiritual edification, and this day four of your brethren have willingly offered themselves on the service of your faith, and been solemnly set apart to minister amongst you in holy things. Receive our beloved brethren from the Lord. The secret of benefiting by every creature, is to accept of it as coming from the hand of God. It makes the gift both pleasant and profitable. Even the common food, the common air and light, the most ordinary comforts, that minister to your temporal necessities, have in them a double blessing and sweetness when recognised as the gift of God. You lose both the pleasure and the profit, or have only the Atheist's use of them, if enjoyed apart from Him, or taken without considering the operation of his hand. What are ministers or elders, if viewed apart from Christ? What profit can you expect from them—what submission can you yield—what reverence and honour can you pay to them, if they stand dissociated in your thoughts from their risen Head, and be neither recognised as exercising his authority, nor sent by his grace? Receive, therefore, our brethren gladly in the Lord, and accept of them at the hands of Christ, as the gifts which he ascended to bestow, when he gave to his Church pastors, teachers, helps, governments. Submit yourselves also unto them in the Lord. They have been nominated to the office by your own voice, and now have been invested with its authority, not by you, but by the Head of the Church, in the way of his own appointment—by solemn prayer and supplication. Bear in mind, that it is to Christ alone that all power and authority in the Church belongs. The members of the Church may call to the office, and mark out amongst their brethren the men distinguished by gifts and graces for the eldership, but it is Christ that bestows the power of office, and clothes with authority the object of your choice. It is on this account that you are called to obey them that have the rule over you. Your own election of the brethren, your willing consent to their authority over you, engages you to submission; but chiefly and beyond all other considerations, you owe to them obedience from the power with which Christ has invested them. As in the State, so in the Church, the powers that be are ordained of God; and, assuredly, if you are commanded to obey kings and magistrates, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake, much more ought you to submit yourselves to the governors of Christ's own house, when administering its laws and exercising its discipline according to his revealed mind. Think not, as many do, that Christ's is a house without laws, without government, without rulers—that "there is no King in Israel, and that every man may do according to what is right in his own eyes." It was the assertion of his kingly power that drew upon the Saviour the wrath of his adversaries. In its defence, he laid down his life; and though his kingdom was not of, it was yet in, the world, and was ordained to be visibly administered by his servants. Be afraid, therefore, of despising the power and authority of the rulers of the Church, lest ye be found striking at the crown which the Redeemer wears, and disowning the government which is upon his shoulders.

Finally, I exhort you to yield yourselves in willing service, as well as in obedience, to the eldership of the Church. I would set the example of the Macedonian Christians before you, who, having given themselves to the Lord, stood prepared for whatever work of faith or labour of love they should be called to by the apostles. Their self-dedication was the spring of active duty, and of self-denied sacrifices. They felt that they were not their own, but bought with a price; and that whether the Church called for their prayers or their contributions—for their patient sufferings or for their active deeds—for their personal labour or for the gains of their industry—they only rendered unto God what was included in their previous dedication of themselves. It was scarcely an additional sacrifice: it was rather a part of the first and greater act of self-dedication—an expression of its sincerity, when they poured the riches of their liberality into the lap of the apostle, and, with unexampled alacrity, forwarded his mission of benevolence in behalf of the poor saints. In dedicating themselves unto the Lord, they had in effect said to Christ and his Church, that they were ready to be offered on the service of its faith, and now, when a special call is made, they stand at their post of duty, and yield themselves unto the apostle, willing agents for the promotion of his labour of love. How great the amount of service which might be rendered to the Church of Christ, even by a single congregation!—how numerous the blessings it might diffuse throughout its own immediate vicinity, and the world at large, were its members united in zeal, like the Macedonian Christians, and ready to occupy the fields of usefulness opened and marked out by the wisdom of their rulers! But how contrary to this is the present experience of the rulers of the Church! What plan that is devised, what enterprise that is projected, is not frustrated or shrivelled in its dimensions—is not either strangled in the birth, or shorn of its proportions, and cast back upon its projectors, to chill their hearts and damp their future exertions in the cause of Zion! Who amongst the members of a Church recognise even the duty of following where the rulers of their Church lead, and of entering into those fields of labour opened by their Christian enterprise? Let it not be so with you. Quench not the zeal of the eldership of the Church—frustrate not their plans and devices of Christian usefulness, by refusing to come to the help of the Lord. They are set over this parish, to turn its wilderness into a garden; and whatever is needful for the planting and dressing of this vineyard, they are entitled to demand at your hand; and on you shall rest the responsibility of souls perishing for lack of knowledge, and means and opportunities of good neglected, if you refuse cheerfully to answer their call. Say, then, to the brethren in the eldership, as the people said to Joshua, for the encouragement of his heart and the strengthening of his hands, "All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go: according as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses."

FOR EVER WITH THE LORD.

Oh! how the thought that I shall know
The Man, who suffered here below,
To manifest his favour,
For me, and those whom most I love,
Or here, or with himself above,
Does my delighted spirit move,
At that sweet word—for ever!

For ever to behold him shine,
For evermore to call him mine,
And see him still before me!
For ever on his face to gaze,
While all the Father he displays,
In all his full assembled rays,
To all the saints in glory!

Not all things else are half so dear
As his delightful presence here,
What must it be in heaven!
'Tis heaven on earth to hear him say,
As now I journey day by day,
"Poor sinner, cast thy fears away—
Thy sins are all forgiven!"

But how will his delightful voice,
Make my enraptured heart rejoice,
When I in glory hear him!
While I before the heavenly gate,
For everlasting entrance wait,
And Jesus on his throne of state
Invites me to come near him!

"Come in, thou blessed, sit by me,
With my own life I ransomed thee—
Come, taste my perfect favour;
Come in, thou happy spirit, come,
Thou now shalt dwell with me at home—
Ye blissful mansions make her room,
For she must stay for ever!"

When Jesus thus invites me in,
How will the heavenly host begin
To own their new relation!
"Come in! come in!" the blissful sound,
From every voice will echo round,
Till all the crystal wall resound
With joy for my salvation!

RECOLLECTIONS OF A SABBATH SCHOOL.

AFTER our meeting had been regularly kept for some time, J. W. became seriously indisposed. As I had never been in his father's house, I had not the courage to go now. On the Sabbath Mr R. wished me to show him the house, which I did, and was glad of the opportunity of seeing my sick companion. On leaving his bed-room, Mr R. and the parents of the sufferer entered into conversation, suggested by the circumstances in which we had assembled. It became too affecting for me, and, leaving the room, I again went beside my companion, anxious to have another look of him. He observed my emotion; which was certainly not allayed by the calm, resigned manner in which he said, "I do not think I am to get better." I could not answer him. His faithful companions assembled every evening during the crisis of his illness, to implore the mercy of our heavenly Father; prayers to which an answer of peace was returned, and he was soon again at our meeting. I believe it was owing to the feeling I reluctantly betrayed on the occasion referred to, that I owed my intimacy with Mr R.; for ever after that day he treated me with a kindness and confidence which were neither due to my merits nor my years, and which I never can forget.

It was with no common pleasure that we saw J. W. again at our meeting; for his piety, which threw a sweetness over the whole of his demeanour—made him the favourite of the whole circle. As winter approached our place of meeting became very cold and uncomfortable. We made ourselves as comfortable as the place would permit, shutting ourselves within a bed-closet, and taking care that no light should betray our place of retirement. Here we held our meetings in quiet, undisturbed by the tumult of the town, in the midst of which we found a place of seclusion: and I well remember of our leaving our retreat one beautiful moonlight night, when almost the whole town had been abroad to look at an eclipse. We emanated from our retreat, ignorant that such a phenomenon had taken place, but in time to witness its conclusion. At another time, on leaving our place of prayer, we were surprised at the unusual sounds of commotion which we heard. A dreadful fire, by which several persons perished, had for some time been raging, at no great distance from the place of our seclusion.

The rebuke to which I have already adverted was incurred by the following incident:—We had the imprudence once to betake ourselves to prayer at a time and place most unseasonable. The boys who composed the little meeting had undesignedly assembled at the school-room a considerable time before the hour of opening. The person who was employed to light the fires was leaving the room, and allowed us to enter. We really loved the school, our whole hearts were engaged in our exercises; and on leaving it, our impatience to be in it again made us think the Sabbath at a great distance. Darkness was gathering fast on the night I allude to. When we entered the room, no other of the scholars was in sight. I thought it was a considerable time to the hour. We sat around the fire, talking about our tasks, and other matters connected with the object of our meeting, when some one, I forget whom, but probably I was the person who made the ill-timed suggestion, that one of us should implore a blessing on the exercises of that evening. If I mistake not, a request to be short accompanied the suggestion; and a boy, whose correctness of expression and ready utterance in prayer were very remarkable, was requested to officiate. He began, but whether I had mistaken the time, or whether our conversation had insensibly whiled it away, I know not, but he had not uttered more than two or three sentences, when I heard voices at the door; and the moment after, one of the shutters of a window on the outside violently shaken, as if by a person attempting to pull it open. I was instantly at the door, and opened it. Mr R. and a few scholars were there. He gave me a look of displeasure, such as few men could give. That was not all; he said a few words to me. I could not now venture, with the hope of precision, to state them. I did not even hear them all at the time, but at the moment they struck me as implying the charge that we had been playing the Pharisee.

There was room for his suspicion, I grant; we had acted imprudently, but in the simplicity of our hearts. I sprang to my seat, with the most painful feelings. Smarting under an implication which each of us would have spurned, but in which I had involved all, I could scarcely keep my seat; and said, in my rage, to J. W——, that I would no longer attend the school. "No, no," said the amiable boy, "don't speak in that manner, forget it—we were wrong." True, I replied, I had been greatly mistaken, for I thought it was far from the hour; but did you hear what Mr R—— said? "Oh," said he, with a smile, "never think more about it." My face must have revealed my emotion, or Mr R—— must have thought he had been too precipitate, for as this short colloquy ended, he came to us, and, addressing me, said, "What's the matter, W——? I did not mean to give you any offence,"—or words to that effect. I need scarcely add, that I instantly resumed my composure, and all ended here. I must have carried a painful recollection to my grave, if it had not.

It was probably from the supposition that we had not a very comfortable place for holding our meetings, that Mr R——, with much delicacy, told us that there was a woman whose son was very anxious to attend our meeting, but that it was too far for him to come at night, his mother's house being in the High Street, but that she had a small house, in which meat for her cows was boiled in the evening, and that we would be made very welcome to assemble there. We readily agreed to a proposal which promised us a place of equal secrecy to the one we had occupied, and much more comfort in winter; and for some time our meetings were held in a close in the High Street. The son of the woman who allowed us this place joined us; and a very quiet boy he was.

Our number at length increased so considerably, that the small place could no longer accommodate us. We were more able, on this account, and from other causes, to be at a little expense for a place of meeting, and engaged a spacious school-room for this purpose. In this room the meeting was long held. The greatest number that attended was forty. My connection with it at last terminated, by the removal of my father to a considerable distance from Glasgow. It continued to be held long after I left the town; and, I believe gave rise to other meetings for the same purpose.

They were sweet hours that were thus spent. Often have I thought upon them; the remembrance of them has always been soothing, and often have I wished that my devotional feelings were fresh and simple as they then were.

Some may ask, What good resulted from this juvenile association? Did this morning cloud pass rapidly away? Was it perceptible at noon? Was it gone before evening? I could not answer all these questions,—I cannot yet answer for the evening of all; but the evening of some of these early companions was peace. It is many years since the pious J. W—— breathed his last. I made a hurried ride to see him, when I heard he was in a hopeless state of illness. He was suffering much from the languor that accompanies the fell disease of which he was then the helpless victim; but as to his mind, all was sunshine—serene and peaceful—tranquil, as his life had been. I suspected that he was not free from other ills than disease; but it was only at this visit that I had any reason to entertain such a suspicion. It vexes me yet, to think that I did not know sooner what I learned afterwards, or I would not have offered him the contemptible gift which I did; yet I reproached myself afterwards, that I did not read his necessity in the grateful look with which he, after some reluctance, accepted of my gift. He was one of those manly spirits, who preferred suffering to making known such a grief.

At his humble funeral, a number of his early associates in the prayer-meeting assembled; more of them than I had seen together for many years; more than shall ever now meet on earth again.

It would certainly be contrary to experience, that all the boys thus associated from thirst of religious knowledge, influence of companionship, or in obedience to parental wishes, should have maintained lives suitable to this early and unusual promise; some of them, I am sorry to say, did not. Some of them soon showed that the tie which bound them to this singular confederacy was easily broken; but, though I have long lost sight of many of them, I am not aware that any one of them ever became openly dissolute or profane.

Many have held on their way, waxing stronger in the good fight of faith; several have now finished their course with joy; some yet remain, adorning the doctrines of the Gospel by lives of active usefulness, and by the prosperity to which sobriety and steadiness have assisted to conduct them, affording a proof that the virtues of godliness are consistent with commercial enterprise and success. The misfortunes of a few have been alleviated by the experience that godliness with contentment is great gain. None of them ever regretted the hours which they thus devoted to seek after God. How varied has been their professions! To what distant lands have they gone! That little band has furnished the army with the soldier, the navy with the mariner, the heathen with the missionary, the Church with the minister. The remembrance of these meetings has soothed the seaman amid the perils of the deep; the missionary and the soldier on the plains of Hindostan. Three of the number obtained license in the Established Church, and what is not unworthy of notice, the parents of these three were, and, so far as my knowledge goes, had ever been, Dissenters.

HIS NINTH YEAR.

BY THE REV. ÆNEAS M. RATE.

PART II.

WE had brought down the narrative of the life of J—— to the 13th of December 1838. This was the last entry that was made previous to his father being seized with an illness, which, at one time, rendered it very uncertain, whether he or his son would soonest be called into the world of spirits. On the 26th December, he was attacked by fever, and, during the first fourteen or sixteen days, was often in a state of insensibility. When the nature of his malady was discovered, he was removed to a room by himself, where his wife had to watch at his sick-bed. Poor J—— could not endure to remain apart from those to whom he was so tenderly attached, especially when one of them was afflicted with a dangerous disease. So great, indeed, was his grief on account of the separation, that it was judged necessary to seek, from the medical man, permission to place him in a bed in the same room with his father; this permission was at length granted, and for several weeks father and son lay side by side, until the sanctified spirit of the child exchanged its frail and wasted tenement, for a mansion-house in the realms of the blest. From this time till the middle of January the father had no remembrance of the circumstances that transpired. His earliest recollection, when he began to return to consciousness, was, that of seeing his son sitting upon his bed, looking wistfully towards him, and speaking to him. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered to observe accurately the objects around him, he was struck with the remarkable change that had taken place in the boy. His whole frame had become exceedingly attenuated by disease; his limbs and arms were so miserably wasted, that it was painful to behold them. Notwithstanding this, his spirits were excellent, and his strength still seemed considerable, to such an extent did the natural buoyancy and energy of his spirit enable him to rise above the depressing influence of disease.

Towards the close of January he was often afflicted with severe paroxysms of coughing, and such difficulty of breathing, as at times threatened utterly to rend his already enfeebled and emaciated frame. When he was thus suffering, both himself and his father often united in earnest prayers for his recovery, while at times his distress was so great, that he expressed his wish to die, if it were only the will of God to relieve him.

If a peculiar tenderness of conscience—if a mind pained more by the slightest deviation from the path of holiness than multitudes are by the commission of the most glaring sins,—if an intense anxiety to obtain the Divine approbation, and a profound sorrow at the thought of having offended a gracious God and a merciful Saviour—if these be indications of deep and genuine piety, then the subject of this memoir afforded evidence, that young as he was he had made no mean attainments in the Christian life. If at any time the intensity of his sufferings prevented him from reading his Bible or praying to God, at the times he usually devoted to these exercises, he became most unhappy, and would anxiously inquire whether God would forgive the omission. At other times he questioned his father, whether or not he had during the day marked any thing sinful in his feelings or his conduct. When his father replied, that all men without exception sinned daily, but that he had not noticed the commission of any particular sin during the time he specified, the answer seemed to afford him satisfaction.

It has already been remarked, that his affection for his parents had always been peculiarly strong; but it might have been imagined, that when his soul became absorbed with more elevated emotions, his attachment to his earthly friends would have abated. It is, however, the nature of genuine piety to refine, exalt, and even deepen the natural affections, and to give them a nobler character than before, by leading them to seek the everlasting welfare of the objects on which they are placed. His attachment to his parents was unbounded. He would address them by the most endearing names, and caress them in the most affectionate manner. Most touching was the anxiety he manifested, when he himself was suffering most deeply, to alleviate the distress they felt on his account, so that he often seemed to forget his own sorrows, in his desire to soothe theirs. When so ill, that he could only articulate in a whisper, the general answer to the inquiries about his health was, "Better, better." This was his favourite expression to the last; and one of the latest sounds which escaped, faint and feeble, from those lips which were in a while to be sealed in death, was "Better, better;" thus showing that, while engaged in the last conflict, he was anxious to conceal his sufferings, lest they should be distressed. Often, too, did his mind recur, with the greatest delight, to the prospect of meeting his parents in heaven. "Papa," said he repeatedly, "I think you are good; I think you will go to heaven." If he received no answer, he seemed disappointed; if the reply was, "I hope I will;" he would endeavour to encourage his father, by saying, "But I really think that you will."

If it were desired to convince an unbeliever that a supernatural Power is sometimes exerted in illuminating the mind and elevating the affections; if evidence of the operation of the Eternal Spirit were sought, to convince those who were not obstinately resolved to deny his agency, that he sometimes visits in a peculiar manner the souls of men, an argument of no mean power might be furnished by the experience of this child. The Scriptures assign to that Divine Agent the title of the Spirit of Grace and of Supplication, and teach us to consider that he convinces the soul of its misery and destitution, draws forth its vehement longings after spiritual blessings, and, overcoming its natural tendency towards earthly things, disposes it to be ever ascending to Him who is the fountain of living waters. On J—— the Spirit seemed remarkably poured forth. He seemed to live and breathe in an atmosphere of devotion. It would be difficult to find a greater contrast to that heartless religion which so many display, than was afforded by the warm aspirations after holiness, and the elevated communion with the Creator, by which he was distinguished. After his last attack of illness, he was so enfeebled that he could but seldom kneel down to prayer; and, from that time till his death, his supplications were offered up while he was lying in bed. So long was he engaged in these exercises, that his father entreated him to shorten his prayers, assuring him that God, who knew his weakness, did not require such lengthened devotions. To such appeals he seldom returned a direct answer, and showed the utmost reluctance to omit any of his usual petitions. He always prayed aloud, in a strong clear voice, with eyes closed, and hands clasped together, and with an expression remarkably devout. And so natural was the tendency of his mind to such exercises, that, when no one was expecting it, he would frequently burst forth into prayers, breathing such pathos and piety, that with difficulty those who were present could refrain from tears.

Towards the close of January, the symptoms of approaching death became more and more manifest. On the 1st of February his weakness was very great; he, however, made an effort to put on his clothes, and rose for a short time; endeavouring to finish one of his drawings, which he intended as a token of his affection to his father. On the following day his exhaustion had increased. Still he was anxious to be dressed, and, having left his bed, made one or two tottering steps; till, finding his strength gone, he returned to the arms of his mother, and, at his own request, was replaced in that bed from which he was destined never to rise more. He for the last time, took out his New Testament, in which, by a regular course of reading, he had now reached the middle of the Epistle to the Galatians, but was soon obliged to close it.

On the 3d of February his devotional feelings rose to an elevation which they had never attained before, and his whole appearance and demeanour indicated the extraordinary happiness he was experiencing. His cheeks were tinged with a beautiful bloom, his eyes were bright and sparkling, and he spoke in a low composed pleasant tone of voice, and without affording the slightest indication of enthusiasm or excitement. The breathlessness which had so grievously afflicted him before had at this time entirely left him, not a single ache seemed to disturb his repose; and throughout the whole day his mind appeared to be in a state of unalloyed and sustained blessedness. It was the Sabbath-day, and it seemed as if the Lord were affording him a sweet foretaste of that Eternal rest, on the full enjoyment of which he was destined in so short a time to enter. During the forenoon, he often said to his parents, "I am happy—I am in a very happy state of mind." At a later period of the day he exclaimed, "I have great joy in the Lord, I feel that I have done with every thing, and that I have nothing to do but to die." Being asked what it was that rendered him so happy, he replied, "I think it is God and Christ; I have been happier to-day than at any time during my affliction; I feel the Spirit of God in my heart; I am filled with great love to God and to Christ; I never was in this happy state before. O I am happy, I am very happy!"

During the two following days he was reduced to such extreme weakness, that he was able to speak but little. On more than one occasion, however, he broke forth in fervent prayer, thanking God for the affliction with which he had been visited, and in tones and language expressive of the warmest affection, supplicating spiritual blessings for every member of the family.

On Wednesday the 6th, he revived a little, and again exhibited that joyful frame of mind, which had been so remarkable on the preceding Sabbath. For the greater part of the day he was free from all pain; the cough was nearly gone, and there was nothing to ruffle the serenity of his spirit. His face all day lighted up with smiles, and remarkably bland in its expression, afforded clear indications, that the "peace which passeth all understanding" was reigning within. In general he spoke in a soft tone, approaching a whisper, unless when engaged in prayer, and then the power of his emotions imparted a temporary strength while in fervent accents he poured forth his supplications before the Lord. About three o'clock in the morning he said to his mother, "I have a glorious feeling in my heart; I feel as if God, and Christ, and the Holy Spirit were with me. I am very happy in my heart." A little later he addressed his mother, and with much feeling said,

"I love you mamma, but you are to be pitied as well as myself, for you have suffered much."

Shortly after this he, in the warmest language, expressed his love to his parents, but, at the same time, made it manifest that there was another and more powerful affection that held the supreme place in his heart. "Mamma," said he, "I love you, I love papa too. I love you with great affection, better than the whole world." Again he said, "Come mamma, come here. I love you and papa very much, more than you really think, but I love God and the Holy Spirit ten times more than either you or him."

About eleven o'clock, he again gave vent to his emotions, showing, at the same time, that it was his views of the glory of Christ, of the security of the foundation he had laid, of the prevalence of his intercession, and of the stability of the Divine Word, that filled his heart with triumphant joy. "My mind, said he, is in a glorious state, resting on Christ. The Holy Ghost is with me more than ever, and Christ is pleading for us all, and this is as true as the Bible; I feel a load of happiness. My thoughts are delightful, I cannot tell how fine they are."

Somewhat later than this, he requested that he might see his brothers and sisters, who were brought to him one by one. He addressed them all in the kindest manner; and in the presence of each of his sisters lifted up a short and solemn prayer, beseeching God "to make them good," to "give them the Holy Spirit," and to "cause them to desist from all wickedness."

During the whole of the night it was evident that he was rapidly sinking, and in the morning he remained for some hours without speech or motion. About the end of this time, feeling that he was unable to collect his thoughts in prayer, he begged his father to pray for him. At the close of his father's address to the throne of grace, he whispered that he had listened very attentively, while his countenance indicated that his spirit had been refreshed. After this, his thoughts frequently wandered. He talked about his boyish sports, and evidently fancied at times that he was in the midst of his youthful companions. At other times his mind became quite collected; and then the smiles that illuminated his countenance spoke at once of the intelligence and the serenity that prevailed within.

About one o'clock he rallied a little, and at his request one of his sisters was brought to his bed-side. When she arrived he gazed at her earnestly for some time, without uttering a word. Being asked whether he had any thing to say to her, he with some difficulty raised himself slightly in the bed, and looking her full in the face, gave utterance to the following words, in a manner that was peculiarly solemn:—"May God bless you, and make you a good girl all the days of your life; and may Christ, who died for you on the cross, be in your heart for ever! Amen." After this he sunk down, utterly exhausted with the effort he had made.

Another instance of the delicacy and tenderness of his feelings towards his parents he exhibited about this time, for, having observed his mother in tears, he seemed to be very unhappy, and inquired what was the cause of her distress. When she said that it arose from seeing him look so ill, his immediate answer was, "Then do not look at me, mamma. I will turn away my face, that you may not see me;" and the dying child, already reduced to the last extremity of weakness, exerted the feeble remains of his strength, in order to turn round and conceal his countenance.

About two o'clock the power of speech had nearly departed. Several times he endeavoured to express some sentiment or feeling to his parents, but failed, or only uttered unintelligible sounds, with the exception of the words "Happy, happy," which his parents thought they could distinguish. A little later he suddenly threw out his hands and feet, and for a moment seemed to endure a feeling of acute agony, but almost immediately afterwards became placid again. Imagining that he was just about to expire, his father now offered up a fervent prayer for his departing spirit, when, to his surprise, the dying boy suddenly uttered a faint, but distinct and solemn "Amen," the last word he pronounced upon earth. Though now in the very midst of the valley through whose frightful shades believers have to pass before they reach the land of light and glory, he, to all appearance, was sensible and happy. His parents now took a final farewell of him, while he smiled pleasantly and intelligently upon them, so as to convey the assurance that the Great Shepherd was with him, and his rod and staff comforting him. After this, his extremities began to become cold, and it was evident that life was retreating to its last citadel—the heart. Even after this he knew his parents, and by his looks conveyed most distinctly the idea that he was unwilling they should leave him, even for a moment, in his last struggle. They understood his meaning, and continued to lean over him, and watch for the moment of his spirit's dismissal to glory. Several times his father desired him to look at him, which he did; but, at other times, his eyes were steadily and intensely fixed on his mother, while his father lifted up earnest supplications that his God and Saviour might be with the departing spirit. After a while, his eyes, hitherto full of animation and feeling, became motionless; but his spirit still lingered in its earthly tabernacle, while with pain the parents looked on, expecting the result of the protracted mortal struggle. At length, about twenty minutes to five o'clock, a slight convulsive shudder passed over his whole frame, succeeded by a deep, heavy sigh, after which his head fell backwards, and his spirit took its willing flight to the realms of glory. All was now over. His pains, his weakness, his mortal sorrows were ended. The body was a piece of lifeless clay,—the spirit was before the throne of God. The parents united in thanking God for his kindness to their now glorified son. They pressed the cold lips, closed the eyes, and, stretching out the wasted limbs, resigned their son to the Lord, saying, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord."

Such were the circumstances of the life and death of this interesting child. There are certain reflections suggested by them, which will naturally recur to every mind. To his parents, the remembrance of his amiable character, his filial affection, and his joyful departure, will, without doubt, be cherished to the latest moment of their mortal existence; and, while they realize the presence of the beloved object in the land of rest, they will feel an additional incentive to press forward, in order to win the crown. Christians in general, even those who are advanced in life, may find something in the experience of this child both to humble them and to stir them to seek after higher attainments, through the grace of that Spirit to which he owed all that was really excellent in his life, and whatever was peaceful and triumphant in his death. But the grand lesson, which is taught above all others by this narrative, is, the importance of parents labouring, when their children are very young, to bring them to the knowledge and the love of God. It was the early and assiduous instructions, the consistent example, and the fervent prayers of his parents, which, through the Divine blessing crowning all their efforts, led to whatever the Christian mind can contemplate with unalloyed satisfaction in the history and character of their son. Happy would it be if any parents, animated by the success that attended their labours, were to begin, with an energy and a hope never experienced before, to seek after the spiritual welfare of their youthful offspring. Should there be any who read this narrative, who are accustomed to ascribe all religious feelings to purely natural causes, it would be well for them calmly to consider whether their principles will indeed rationally account for the scenes which have been described, and whether they are indeed fully satisfied that this young and unsophisticated child was the victim of delusion and enthusiasm, when he so constantly, and with such firm conviction, ascribed the change that had been wrought within him to the operation of the Spirit of God. And if it be indeed enthusiasm which produces such effects as were manifest in his history,—which refines and invigorates the mind,—gives delicacy and tenderness to the conscience,—exalts the natural love of friends into a noble affection, which seeks their everlasting interest, and anticipates a joyful union with them in heaven,—which, finally, enables even a child to meet the last enemy without alarm, and transforms the bed of death into the scene of triumph,—who would not desire to have more of this enthusiasm, both for himself and his friends? Who is there that would not immeasurably prefer it, to that rational piety, as some are pleased to call it, which never yet, since the world began, warmed a single soul with a ray from above,—which leaves the soul enslaved by sin during life, and then allows it, in cold apathy, or trembling uncertainty, or gloomy despondency, to plunge into eternity at the hour of death?

THE JEWS INSTRUMENTAL IN PRESERVING AND EXTENDING A KNOWLEDGE OF DIVINE TRUTH IN THE EARTH:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GEORGE GILLESPIE,

Minister of Cumbernauld, Dumfriesshire.

"Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?"—ROM. xi. 12.

Whosoever will consider the social and religious movements now going on at home and abroad, may clearly perceive that a superintending and directing Providence is using, at this time, more than ordinary means to lead men to consider their ways, and to acknowledge that there is a God who reigneth. The long-established and well-known parties are breaking up, and amalgamating into two distinct classes—the religious and irreligious. And every day the religious and irreligious portions of society are becoming more marked, separated, and distinct; and each seems to be daily more strongly attracted towards that centre to which it belongs. Amidst this almost universal shaking and transition state of society, there is one movement peculiarly interesting to every one who loveth the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth. There is a "shaking among the dry bones of Israel." The Lord, by his providence towards his ancient people at this time, is plainly putting this question to each of us who believe his word, Son of man, can these bones live? The apostle, in the words of our text, declares, that "if the fall of the Jews is the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" If you but duly weigh the import of these inspired words, you will, through the good hand of God upon you, freely give the first-fruits of your increase to promote the spread of the Gospel among the dispersed and scattered remnant of Israel. So, in farther discoursing to you from the words of our text, I shall, in humble dependence upon Divine grace, endeavour to show you that the Jews, ever since the calling of Abraham, have been eminently instrumental in extending and confirming a knowledge and belief of the true God among the nations of the earth.

When God called Abraham, to go forth from his father's house into a strange land, and established his covenant of promise with him, that "in his seed, all the nations of the earth should be blessed," he gave to all created intelligence a clear and explicit manifestation of his eternal purpose to destroy the works of the devil. In this new and marvellous token of God's mercy and faithfulness—the setting apart a particular family to be the guardians of his name and worship among men, until he should send forth the Deliverer out of Zion—there was the establishment of a visible Church upon earth—a Church rejoicing in faith to see the Saviour's day afar off—a Church which, although few in numbers, was beheld with reverence and respect by all who feared God, while it shed the light of holy truth over surrounding darkness—a Church, for whose preservation the Lord made bare his holy arm, and wrought many signs and wonders in the sight of all the nations. In the promise made to Abraham, that "in his seed, all the nations of the earth should be blessed," the powers of iniquity had a wound given them, that they never shall be able to recover. A standard was now erected, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against. The captives, weary and heavy laden with Satan's bondage, had, in Abraham and his posterity, a visible and abiding promise of deliverance set before them. The repeated intimations of the Divine will, and the many favours conferred upon the father of the faithful, upon Isaac, and upon Jacob, were not only blessings to themselves as individuals, and to the Church of Christ in their days, but also to believers in Christ to the end of time. And ever since the days of the patriarchs, the Jewish nation has been "as a city set upon a hill"—"a light shining in a dark place," shedding abroad over the nations of the earth a living and abiding testimony of the holiness, the truth, mercy, and faithfulness of the Lord of hosts. When Jacob and his family went down into Egypt, and sojourned for four hundred and thirty years in the land of Goshen, they were all that time profitable to the Egyptians, and the surrounding nations, "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness." When a king arose, "who knew not Joseph," and made the lives of the children of Israel grievous with hard bondage—who, hardened in iniquity, said, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey him, to let Israel go?"—then God, by the hand of his servant Moses, wrought such wonders in the sight of all Egypt, as made the haughty and stubborn Pharaoh acknowledge that the Lord is righteous, but that he and his people are wicked. The miraculous deliverance of the children of Israel from the house of bondage—their passage through the Red Sea—forty years' preservation in the wilderness—their receiving the law of the ten commandments from God himself at Sinai—their victories over the nations of Canaan, and establishment in the land of promise—are just a series of eloquent, striking, and practical sermons preached by God's providence, to teach the nations of the earth that, indeed, a righteous and promise-keeping "God reigneth, and doeth according to his will among the sons of men."

The whole civil and ecclesiastical polity of the Jewish commonwealth, while it continued an independent state, governed by judges of God's own appointment, or by kings selected and anointed with holy oil, according to God's direction, is a continued illustration of this important truth, that God, by the instrumentality of that people, preserved and shed abroad the light and knowledge of his name for the benefit of mankind. And thus, while the Mosaic economy "served as a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ," the Jews, who were subjects of that economy, were constituted by God a sacred college for the benefit of the human race. The various rulers, doctors, professors, and teachers of that college, while they received their instructions from the immediate and unerring Fountain of all truth, communicated their lessons to the people, as God was pleased to appoint. Even the peculiar laws and institutions, by which the Jews were separated from other nations, were all so many means devised by infinite wisdom, for preserving pure and entire the knowledge and worship of God from the corruptions of a world living in wickedness. And O how small the benefit! how wavering and dim the light shed abroad over the world, from the far-famed schools of ancient Greece and Rome, compared with the holy and divine light which emanated from the sacred college at Jerusalem! The theology of the inspired prophets, the jurisprudence of Moses, the ethics of David, and the natural philosophy of Solomon, were not only beneficial to their own age and country, but serve to benefit and bless mankind, so long as sun and moon endure. When the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the sacred teachers were carried away captive to Babylon, so far was the instruction intended by God, to be communicated to the world by the instrumentality of the Jews, from ending with their captivity and dispersion, that in many respects it was increased, and the sphere of its immediate and direct influences became vastly more extensive. Instead of being, as hitherto, confined in its immediate effects to the small boundaries of Judea, it was, in consequence of the Babylonian captivity, spread throughout the whole one hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the Chaldean or Persian empire.

It is true, that many of the Jews dishonoured God in the land of their captivity, and caused the name of God to be profaned among the heathen, wherein they were scattered. Yet a goodly number continued faithful to the God of Israel, and worshipped the God of their Fathers in spirit and in truth, in the face of all opposition, danger and persecution. In the very midst and depth of their captivity, there was a devoted band of faithful and right-hearted men, who boldly proclaimed the name, and worship of the Lord of hosts among the blinded heathen wherein they dwelt. They were commanded by God, to seek the good of the country wherein they were captives; and there remain many illustrious proofs, that not a few faithfully discharged their duty, and by their prayers, their instructions and example, were true ministers of God's Word, in the wide spread empire of Persia. Such were the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who were faithful and inspired expositors of God's will, by the rivers of Babylon, while their captive brethren wept when they thought on Zion and the city of their fathers lying in ruins. Daniel from the lion's den, and the three children in the midst of the burning fiery furnace, were honoured witnesses of the existence, the power, faithfulness, and goodness of the God of Israel to the astonished king, his courtiers, wise men, and soothsayers, and also, to all the nations and kindreds of men to the end of the world. Yet the spread of the knowledge of God, through the dispersion of the Jews by the Babylonian captivity, was small in extent, and ineffectual in its consequences, when compared with the true knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, spread abroad throughout the world by the fall of the Jews, referred to by the apostle in the words of our text. If to be translated out of darkness into marvellous light be a rich blessing; if to be delivered from the most ignominious slavery, and brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God be a rich and great deliverance; if to be redeemed from sin and the bondage of corruption, raised from the gloomiest apprehensions, to the clear and certain prospect of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that passeth not away, be riches more precious than silver, and better than gold; if the unsearchable riches of Christ Jesus be to the never-dying soul, wealth better by far, than this world and all things therein, then has the fall of the Jews been the riches of the Gentiles.

To illustrate this important truth so plainly declared by the apostle, we observe, that it removed Gentile prejudices, and accelerated the spread of the knowledge of Christ by sending forth to the work of the ministry among the Gentiles, multitudes of faithful and devoted servants of Christ. Such was the jealousy and envy wherewith the Jews were regarded by the surrounding nations, that any occurrence in the land of Judea that tended to exalt Israel, was regarded by them with the greatest suspicion and distrust. Kings, princes, and people, were always ready to combine, and to plot against the prosperity of Jerusalem. And had the Jewish rulers, priests and people, (whose views of secular glory were so well known) generally as a nation, received Christ as the promised Messiah, suspicions of fraud and collusion, would have been excited among the Gentiles that would have greatly retarded the spread of the Gospel in that, and all succeeding ages of the Church. But when the Sanhedrim declared that they would not have that man to rule over them, when the priests, Scribes, and Pharisees, and the great body of the people cordially united in persecuting Christ as an impostor, and in crucifying him as a blasphemer, this treatment of Christ by his own countrymen according to the flesh, removed all grounds of suspicion from the minds of the Gentiles, that the Saviour being born a Jew was a cunningly devised plan of the Jews, to aggrandize their nation at the expense of all others. This suspicion being removed, the Gentiles could candidly examine the justness of the Saviour's claims to his being the long foretold and promised Messiah. They could, without prejudice, search the Scripture, like the noble Bereans, to know if the things spoken of Christ were so, and form an unbiassed judgment in regard to the wonderful miracles and mighty works whereby the disciples of Christ confirmed the truth of the Christian religion. Thus has the unbelief of the Jews issued in the riches of the Gentiles.

All the Jewish zeal against Christianity, indeed, was overruled by God, to promote the progress of the Gospel over the world. When the apostles and disciples were, through the instrumentality of their own countrymen, persecuted for preaching Christ in one city, they fled into another city, and there likewise proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation. So that through the Jewish rage against Christ, was the knowledge of Christ spread over the world in a few years, after the Saviour's death and resurrection. The Jews having rejected the Gospel of peace, as might have been expected, soon quarrelled among themselves, and rebelled against the Romans, who destroyed both city and temple, and banished the inhabitants far from their beloved Zion; so that they could neither fulfil the Mosaic ritual themselves, nor impose its burdensome yoke upon the Christian converts, to the corruption and hindrance of the growth and spread of pure and undefiled religion in the world.

No doubt the grand primary cause of the awful judgments poured out upon Jerusalem and its inhabitants, was the rejection and crucifixion of the Son of God. But it may be questioned, if any event either in ancient or modern times tended more to accelerate the diffusion of Christianity over the world, than the destruction of Jerusalem, and banishment of the inhabitants. Truly God's ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts; a judgment that seemed, to human calculation, to threaten entire destruction to the whole nation of Israel, was, in the hand of the Lord, made to promote the spiritual riches of the Gentiles in a greater degree, than any previous occurrence in the history of that people since the calling of Abraham. Christ had forewarned his disciples, when they saw Jerusalem encompassed about with armies, to know that the desolation thereof was nigh. Then, says he, "let them which are in Judea, flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it, depart out, and let not them that are in the country enter thereinto." When the Christians saw the Roman armies under Cestius Gallus encompassing Jerusalem, they remembered Christ's words, and fled from the devoted city, as from a sinking ship; and escaped to Pella and the mountains of Gilead, where not a hair of their head perished. And, although we have no sure account of the number of Christians who escaped from the slaughter at Jerusalem, yet, from what is said of the multitude of Christians all over the world, shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem; and as we know from the Acts of the Apostles, that three thousand souls were added to the Church in one day, nearly forty years before its overthrow, we may reasonably conclude, that the Christians who escaped from Jerusalem, amounted to many thousands. So that through the fall of the Jews, thousands of faithful and devoted servants of Christ went forth in one day, to enlighten the Gentiles with the unsearchable riches of free grace in Christ Jesus. And so successful were the early Christians in propagating a knowledge of Christ among the Gentiles, that Pliny the Roman pro-consul of Bythnia, wrote to Augustus Cesar, about the end of the first century, that the contagion of the Christian superstition, as he called it, had spread among all ranks and degrees of the people, both in town and country, that the temples were deserted, and the usual sacrifices were neglected. Justin Martyr, about the year 146, writes, "That there is no nation, whether of Barbarian or Greek, amongst whom prayers are not made to the Father and Creator of all, through the name of the crucified Jesus." So while Divine judgment fell heavy upon that nation, and God's anger was poured out upon the people who crucified his eternal Son, the purposes of God respecting Israel remained unchanged. The Jews were, are, and will be, until the fulness of the Gentiles is accomplished, special instruments in God's hand, for showing forth his power and faithfulness to all kindreds and nations of men throughout the world. And those who are alive upon the earth when the Jews are returned to their own land, and converted to the faith of Christ, will undoubtedly see the apostle's words verified to the very letter, that the fulness of the Jews is life from the dead to the Church of Christ, by extending the boundaries of the Messiah's kingdom, and by stirring up a spirit of vital godliness among nations already professedly Christian.

Whether the establishment of the Jews in their own country is to precede or to follow their conversion, is beyond our power clearly to determine; yet we find several passages in the prophets which seem to indicate, that their ingathering to the land of Canaan is to precede their faith in Christ. Thus God declares by the prophet Ezekiel (xxxvi. 24-28), "For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and I will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." And when you consider, that the great blessings specified by the apostle in our text are yet in store for mankind, through the instrumentality of the Jews, I trust that you will give, as God hath blessed you, to the spread of the Gospel of Christ among the sifted remnant of Israel, who are dear to God for their fathers' sake. If they have been, as "touching the Gospel, enemies for your sake," remember, God established the covenant of promise with Abraham, and therefore they, "as touching the election, are beloved for their fathers' sake; for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." The history of these eighteen hundred years has been a continued verification and fulfilment of the judgment pronounced against the Jews. Their prayer, that the blood of the Saviour might be upon them and their children, has been answered to the very letter. From the time that millions of that generation perished in the land of Judea, their blood has flowed like water in every country whither they have been driven. They have indeed been a peeled people, scattered, persecuted, and slaughtered, among all the nations of the earth. In every land, the blood shed on Calvary has cried aloud to Heaven against them; in so much, that until the present time, little or no account has ever been made, in any court of justice, of the blood of a Jew. But it now appears, from the course of God's providence towards the remnant of Israel, that his ancient people are coming up in remembrance before him—that "the set time to favour Zion" is now at hand. The thoughts of the Gentiles, and of those who have dominion over the Jews, are now directed to a favourable consideration of their condition. A British Consul and Protestant Church have been established in Jerusalem; so that there is already the commencement of the uprearing of an ensign to recall the wandering tribes back to the land of their fathers. The great interest that the missionary enterprise of the Church of Scotland has excited all over the country, and the remarkable success that has crowned the British arms along the coast of Syria, seem to indicate, that Britain is to have an important and conspicuous duty assigned to her in breaking the yoke of the false prophet from off the neck of God's heritage, and in turning them to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. All who have considered the past and present aspect of the Jews, agree that there is something in their present condition peculiarly favourable to their receiving Jesus of Nazareth as the Saviour of lost and perishing sinners. The obstinate prejudices wherewith the Jewish mind has been so long enthralled, are now rapidly giving way—a spirit of inquiry is on the increase amongst them; and their hostility to the New Testament Scriptures is so far abated, that many are willing to examine, and consider the evidences whereby the divinity of the Saviour is established. Let us, therefore, be up and doing, to extend the boundaries of the Messiah's kingdom among his ancient people. Have we, the branches of a wild olive tree, been grafted into a holy root?—let us testify our gratitude, by persuading the children of so many promises to come and receive nourishment from the same root, and to rejoice with us in the goodness and abundance of their Father's table. Have we derived any benefit from the example of the "father of the faithful," the meekness of Moses, the wisdom of Solomon, or the sweet songs of "the man according to God's own heart?" Oh! then, remember the children, and be kind to them for their fathers' sake. Do you desire that we and our country may escape the punishment of those who come not "to the help of the Lord against the mighty?"—be up and doing, then, for the Lord's sake, to deliver his people from the hand of their enemies. Rest not until "the Lord bring again the captivity of Jacob, and gather the dispersed of Israel into one." What endless love and gratitude do we all owe to the Son of David—the Redeemer of our souls! The Son of David, the Saviour of our souls, was a Jew, according to the flesh. Finally, remember, that these words of God concerning Israel still hold true to the whole extent of their original import,—“Blessed is he that bleaseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.” “Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thy peace.” Amen.

REST FOR THE WEARY.

There is a tear, for those that weep—
There is for all the weary, sleep—
There is a hope, for those who sigh—
There is a rest, for those who die.

No rest is here from irksome pain;
One throb transpires—it throbs again
But there is rest where willows wave,
Yea, sweeter rest beyond the grave!

Hope can the wounded spirit bind,
And Faith can bid the fainting mind
Repose upon the Saviour's grace,
But Sin can find no resting-place.

In Jesus' arms we all may rest,
And lose our troubles in his breast;
No more the soul need long for peace,
Nor languish for a resting-place.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The spiritual temple.—God has from eternity determined to erect an edifice in the world exceeding in glory all the works of his hands; but there was no foundation here on which to build it—and why not? There is an alarming deficiency—an awful void. Direct your attention, however, to Scripture, and see the Rock of Ages rolled down from heaven to earth, filling up the dreadful abyss created by sin, and forming the foundation of all our hopes. Behold Deity becoming the foundation of his Church. Here is a living stone; and who can he be but one who is possessed of essential life. He says of himself,—“I am the life.” Had he been a finite being he could not have used such language; for it cannot be said of any finite being that he is life. Of the highest intelligences it can only be said that they live. Life in God is essence. They are only the off-spring of essence. In this living Rock the life of the foundation ascends and pervades every stone: this is the reason why they adhere to each other. Here, then, is the edifice rising; God himself is the architect, God himself is the life pervading not only the foundation but every stone in the building. His truth and his ministers are the means made use of in erecting it, and he will ere long present it to the wondering gaze of universal being, as the grand master-piece of infinite wisdom and love. Are we part of this noble building? If so, O could we but form an idea of the honour conferred upon us by God in uniting us to such a foundation, all our little joys and sorrows in travelling through time to eternity would be absorbed in the overpowering thought. Thoughtless sinner, consider the expense of Deity in laying this foundation; and shall the corner-stone be despised with impunity? Consider the peril that attends its rejection, every sin must be visited with punishment equal to its desert; but this ascends above every other: the choice is—a throne in heaven, or the lowest bed in hell. Happy is he who knows what it is to prize the Saviour, and cling to him in exact proportion as he discovers the depth of his own depravity: verily he is a living stone in that building which will appear, in a short time, in all its glory.—HOWELS.

The Temple of God defaced.—That God hath withdrawn himself, and left this his temple desolate, we have many sad and plain proofs before us. The stately ruins are visible to every eye, that bear in their front, yet extant, their doleful inscription,—“Here God once dwelt.” Enough appears of the admirable frame and structure of the soul of man, to show the Divine presence did sometime reside in it; more than enough of vicious deformity, to complain he is now retired and gone. The lamps are extinct, the altar overturned, the light and love are now vanished, which did the one shine with so heavenly brightness, the other burn with so pious fervour; the golden candlestick is displaced, and thrown away as a useless thing, to make room for the throne of the prince of darkness; the sacred incense, which sent rolling up, in clouds, its rich perfume, is exchanged for a poisonous, bellish vapour, and here is, "instead of a sweet savour, a stench." The comely order of this house is turned all into confusion! "the beauties of holiness" into noisome impurities; the house of prayer into a den of thieves; for every lust is a thief, and every theft sacrilege. He that invites you to take a view of the soul of man, gives you but such another prospect, and doth but say to you, "Behold the desolation;" all things rude and waste. So that, should there be any pretence to the Divine presence, it might be said, if God be here, why is it then? The faded glory, the darkness, the disorder, the impurity, the decayed state, in all respects, of this temple, too plainly show the great inhabitant is gone.—REV. J. HOWE.

The Bible.—It is God's heart of love opened to us for the knowledge of salvation, for pardon and peace, for strength and comfort in the Holy Ghost; it discovers to us our corruption and helplessness that we may be in fear of ourselves, and gladly receive the remedy which God has provided for us; it reveals to us the Lord Jesus Christ born in our flesh that we might be born again into his life and nature; it is the record of his actions and miracles that we might go to him as the physician of our souls, and trust in his power for our own healing; it calls us to him all guilty and defiled as we are for washing in his blood; it is God's standing declaration of his mercy to a perishing world, and his offer and conveyance of full and free redemption from our sin, misery, and danger.—ADAM.

THE HOUSEHOLD SANCTUARY, OR FRIENDLY HINTS ON FAMILY RELIGION.

BY A CLERGYMAN'S DAUGHTER.

ONE of the most remarkable internal evidences of the divine origin of the Christian system is, its admirable adaptation to the varied characters and circumstances of those to whom it is addressed, and for whose regulation it is designed. This is sufficiently obvious from a little consideration of the nature and requirements of the system itself, and the corresponding condition and capacities of the beings under its administration. When we look abroad over the world, whatever be the numerous minor diversities that exist amongst the myriads of its inhabitants, it is plainly evident, that mankind must be arranged under three grand heads, and contemplated in three distinct positions—national, social, and domestic. To each of these classes every individual of our race belongs, from the wild Arab, with his leader, his horde, and his hut, to the man of civilized life, enjoying the protection of a wisely organized government, the advantages of a well compacted society, and the comforts of a peaceful home. At an early period of the world's history, this distribution obtained, and the earliest code of Heaven appointed statutes embracing the regulation at once of kingdoms, of communities, and of families,—those divine enactments extending to the minute details of the latter with as much precision as to the higher administration of the former. Confining our attention, however, to our own day, and our own land, we shall nowhere find those distinctive features of the moral aspect of mankind more strongly marked, or the duties involved in their respective relationships more unequivocally acknowledged,—acknowledged, we say—would we could add, fulfilled. There may be instances, indeed, of the humble peasant—engrossed with the every day labour by which he provides his hard-earned bread, and provides the scanty meal for his hungry little ones—his thoughts and desires confined within the narrow sphere of his daily occupations,—we say there may be instances, nay, there unquestionably are instances, of such individuals knowing little, and caring less, about the affairs of the great nation of which they form a part—the immunities to which, in that character, they are entitled, or the obligations under which, in that character, they are laid; while, on the other hand, there are not wanting instances of legislators, of statesmen, of philanthropists, so overcharged with public duties, as almost to forget their domestic position, and certainly to overlook their domestic responsibilities. Noting these, however, merely as exceptions, we find men in general ready enough to recognise the relations to which we have referred, and the duties, at least the more obvious duties, which they respectively require. Still there is in many who make this recognition, who admit these duties, a glaring and palpable inconsistency, which it is the design of these pages in some measure to expose. We have said, that the Christian system derives a strong internal evidence from its admirable adaptation to the condition of those whom it concerns. As addressed to man, under the different aspects we have now been considering, we find it accommodating itself to each, providing for each, regulating each. We find it prescribing the duties of each, preparing remedies for the defects of each, supports under the difficulties of each, consolations under the trials of each; and in its different departments, we find a simple, striking, and beautiful analogy, proving, to a demonstration, the relation of the integral parts to one great and glorious whole—every section of which, while perfect and complete in itself, is in most exact proportion and most harmonious keeping with the entire system. Now, it is this analogy that is overlooked and violated by the inconsistency to which we have alluded, and which we shall now endeavour to point out. It is readily admitted on all hands, that it is required of every nation, appropriating to itself the name of Christian, to acknowledge, in its national capacity, its dependence for stability, security, prosperity, and peace, on the God of nations,—to recognise his authority, to enforce his laws, and provide for his worship. Again, it is no less readily admitted to be the duty of every Christian society to follow out the same course, to acknowledge the same dependence, to recognise the same authority, and to do so by certain conventional and intelligible actions;—that, while the national government enacts, the social community may observe, the sanctification of the Sabbath; while the national government provides for, the social community may engage in, the stated public worship of God. Again, it is readily enough admitted, (but here we must assume a new aspect of man, and consider him in his individual capacity,) we say, it is readily enough admitted, that it is binding on every professor of the Christian name to invoke the blessing, to revere the authority, to obey the law, to observe the worship of the great Being on whom his existence momentarily depends, and from whom his every blessing flows. Now, it will be observed, that in this gradation there has been a degree of the scale passed over, a link of the chain broken, a relation in which we have not paused to trace this uniform analogy of Christian duty and Christian obligation, and that, too, the very last which we should have been expected to omit—the allowed circle of domestic life. This omission, however, is exactly the inconsistency which it is our object to expose. For the very persons who do most readily admit, who would shrink from denying the religion of the nation, the religion of the community, the religion of the individual, seem altogether and unaccountably to overlook, both in practice and profession, the religion of the family—as if beside the domestic hearth alone no altar should be reared to the God of all the families of the earth—as if within the domestic circle alone no homage should be rendered to the source and centre of all our good—as if from the domestic choir alone no song of gratitude should ascend to him who inhabiteth the praises of eternity. In our farther remarks on the violation of the moral economy, which this inconsistency exhibits, we shall take for our motto the declaration of Joshua, "Whatsoever others do, as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," and address ourselves to two classes: those who, from carelessness and inconsideration, pretend to no form of household godliness—and those who attempt to justify the absence of all religious services from their domestic arrangements, on some ground that arrogates to itself the name of principle. To those who can urge nothing in their defence, but that they care for none of these things, while they may admit the propriety, and keep up the formality of certain social or individual acts of worship, any thing we can say in the way of argument will be of little avail. But those who employ arguments, however flimsy and futile, in their justification, we would meet on their own ground, and combat with their own weapons; while we would endeavour to enforce on both classes, the necessity and importance of those duties they neglect, by the consideration, that if devotional exercises are required of individuals and communities, since these are composed of families, and they again of individuals, certain intermediate requirements of a like character are doubtless binding on this intermediate relation. To be more particular, are we not in our family capacity, equally as in our national, social, or individual, dependent for all we have, or hope for, on that great Being who holds our destinies? Is it not within that consecrated inclosure, that we taste our keenest joys, our acutest sorrows? What matters it to the man surrounded with the felicity of domestic bliss, that nations rise and fall, that change after change sweeps over the face of society, and makes its aspect new and strange? He shuts himself in amid his own heart-treasures, and looks around on the smiles of love and tenderness that win and welcome him away from an unfriendly world, and knows no pang. And, on the other side, what boots it to a sorrowing household, that events are taking place around, affecting the weal of the realm, or the neighbourhood in which they dwell? What avails the tale of battles won, the shout of victory, the joyous peal, the loud huzza, to that weeping band that mourn the slaughtered brave stretched on his gory shield? Yes, it needs no argument to prove, that to the varying emotions of one's own home scenes the heart is most finely strung; that within that sacred shrine there are depths of feeling with which the outward world cannot intermeddle. And shall those deepest, tenderest, purest feelings of our bosoms have no communication with the throne of God—no escape from the pollutions, the sufferings, the shadows of this dark world—no access to the purer atmosphere that floats above? Have we no family sins to confess, no family mercies to acknowledge, no family blessings to implore, no family sorrows to unbosom? And shall there be no family altar around which to assemble in time of need? Oh! it is not amid the crowded congregation, and in the more general supplications of the house of God, that these touching and simple, but not insignificant details can be spread out; and yet, it is a sad and solitary thing to have no shrine at which to lay them, but the privacy of the closet, with its shut door, and companionless seclusion. Shall the trials, the anxieties, the hopes, and the fears, the joys, and the sorrows, which in our family capacity we must experience,—shall they, and they alone, have no place in the angel's censor, and on the golden altar that is before the throne?

Is there nothing becoming, nothing fitting, nothing worth wafting to the gates of heaven, in the family orisons poured forth for the weak ones of the little band, that they may be strengthened—for the suffering ones, that they may be supported—for the absent ones, that they may be shielded from danger—for the young ones, that they may be lambs in the bosom of the Good Shepherd—for the aged ones, that their sun may go down in peace, and that their hoary hairs may be a crown of righteousness? Does not the very seemliness of the duty render it independent of all argument—place it beyond all proof? Are there not in every household duties to be inculcated, lessons to be taught, ignorance to be instructed, youth to be trained, faults to be acknowledged, forbearance to be exercised?—and what time or place more fitting than the solemn and stated seasons of family devotion? "When we behold a master of a household, a father of a family, seated with his dependents around him, 'blessed in his basket and his store,' his children rejoicing in health and smiling in beauty, fresh and vigorous in youth, green as the plants of the olive, round about his table, do we not behold one indebted in no ordinary degree to the bounty of Heaven? But when we see a man, thus highly favoured of the Lord, neglecting to praise him for his bounty, to bend the knee with his family in gratitude for their common mercies, what does this indicate? Death in the midst of life!—a community of intelligent and accountable beings advancing to eternity, and who, under Christian discipline, and with a Christian example set before them, might have been trained for enjoying glory, honour, and immortality; but now, alas! ripening for that day of wrath which awaits all who 'know not God, and who obey not the Gospel of his Son,' when he shall 'pour out his fury upon the heathen, and on the families that call not on his name.'" We have, as yet, referred only to the absence of any express and united acknowledgment of God at the domestic altar: we have yet a few words on the absence of any recognition of his authority in the domestic arrangements, particularly as regards the sanctification of his holy day. There is an amount, a fearful amount, of the Sabbath profanation in the land, that lies at the door of families professing godliness—families, at least, whose pretensions to Christianity were we to presume to question, we should be met with indignation and branded with uncharitableness—families appearing in their accustomed places with decency and regularity in the house of God. We speak not of the Sabbath walk, of the Sabbath visitors, of the Sabbath conversation—those carrion birds which the great Enemy sends forth to devour the good seed of the word as soon as it is sown, and to prey upon the souls he marks for his victims;—we speak not of the sacred leisure of Sabbath hours surrendered to worldly thoughts, to carnal ease, to listless idleness;—we speak of those individuals, those members of such households, whose souls, on that day more than any other, are left to their own keeping, and who, released for a season from the yoke of servitude, are set adrift amid a godless world, to be the prey of the spoiler, at the mercy of him who goeth about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour; not only permitted but encouraged to spend that day of hallowed rest just as sinners may entice them, and taught to regard as a Sabbath privilege the liberty of spending it as they please.

Is it, then, a Sabbath privilege to be set free from the restraints of that law which requires that we shall not even think our own thoughts on that holy day?—Is it a Sabbath privilege to be tempted to quit the privacy of sacred retirement, and mingle with those who, if they say not, "What a weariness is it; when will it be over, that we may buy, and sell, and get gain?" assume yet a tone of bolder impiety, and declare, "Who is the Lord of the Sabbath? let us break his bands asunder, and cast his cords from us: who is the Lord that we should fear him?" Is it a Sabbath privilege to be allowed to squander in idleness or vice those precious hours that are provided by the cessation of the world's business to flee from the wrath to come, and prepare for eternity? Is it a Sabbath privilege to be permitted to walk in the paths of the destroyer, where, if life itself does not immediately pay the forfeit, as the experience of many an awe-struck survivor can record, lessons are learned, early initiatory lessons, which are to prepare the soul for the society and employments of that world where Sabbath opportunities shall recur no more, and where the remembrance of Sabbath profanation shall be one of the sharpest gnawings of the worm that dieth not—one of the hottest flames that never can be quenched. Yes, if these and such as these are Sabbath privileges, then we are at a loss to know wherein shall consist a Sabbath curse. But let not those who may deplore, when, perhaps, too late, the results fatal to soul or body, or both, of such unhallowed license, shelter themselves in the vain imagination that blame and blood shall not lie at the door of them who grant it. And dark as is the stain of the warm heart's blood, the blood of the soul will lie upon the conscience with a more fearful weight, and crimson it with a stain of more indelible hue, that will eat as doth a canker, and burn as living fire. Yes, in that place where worldly distinctions have been long laid aside, if not forgotten, many a lost soul whose first footsteps on the broad road which has led to destruction were directed by those awfully misnamed Sabbath privileges, will spend eternity in criminating the companion of its damnation, the master or the mistress who betrayed its everlasting peace by setting it at large on that sacred day, exposed to the noxious influence of evil example—to the fatal seductions of evil society. One word more, and we have done. Let not those families who call not on the Lord with united voice, who promote not the honour of his laws, and the sanctifying of his Sabbath with united influence, lull themselves with the belief that they shall fare never the worse. Man in his ungodliness is apt to think that all things come alike to all—that family misfortunes, or family prosperity, depends on chance, or fate, or human exertion; and, in the blindness of his unbelief, beholds not the finger that is behind the scenes. This, it is true, is no world of retribution. The moral Governor who presides over its destinies, is pleased to make his sun to shine, and his rain to descend, on the good and on the evil; yet it is his own declaration, "Them that honour me, I will honour." Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. The sun of prosperity may indeed for a season shine upon some that make little acknowledgment of Him who could, in a moment, seal up its light; but it may not be always thus. Clouds may rise, and tempests lower, and a day of darkness and of gloominess overspread the clearest sky; then may He lend a deaf ear to your extorted cry,—then may He "laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh." "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it unto dogs." He had, indeed, great things for Israel; but he would be inquired of by them to do it for them. He has blessings to bestow; but they are for those that ask him for their daily bread. He has protection to vouchsafe; but it is for those who implore him for their nightly security. He has consolations to impart; but they are treasured up for those who call upon him in every time of need. Ye, then, who have souls committed to your care—souls over whom ye must watch as those that shall give account,—if ye would not have your children, your dependents, those who have encircled your table, who have eaten of your bread, to rise up and curse you on the great day of reckoning, see to it now, that ye be faithful to your trust.

There is a day coming for every family to be dissolved, every household to be broken up; and, in this world of change and uncertainty, how soon such a day may come to any family or household, none can tell. Painful and affecting is every such dissolution; sorrowful and sad are the emotions which, under any circumstances, it must excite. Shut not out the consolation which alone can be derived from the anticipated reunion of an undivided family in heaven. Gently does this blessed hope dry the mourner's tears; softly does it whisper peace to the orphan's bosom; brightly does it gild the darkest scenes of domestic woe—the darkest hour of human sorrow. Let it not, then, be excluded; let not the anguish of final separation, when the ties that have bound parent and child, husband and wife, brother and sister, master and servant, are for ever sundering, be aggravated by the conviction, either that such separations must be eternal, or, that they are but the prelude to an endless reunion where there is "weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

THE URIM AND THE THUMMIM.

BY THE REV. J. J. BONAR,
Minister of St Andrew's Parish, Greenock.

First, For a right understanding of this subject, it is essential to remark, first of all, that, "the Urim and the Thummim" was something distinct from the twelve stones in the pectoral of the High Priest. Evidently "the breastplate" with its jewels was outward and visible—"the Urim and the Thummim" were inward, and concealed beneath the ephod; for it is said of the former, "they shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof, unto the rings of the ephod, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod." With regard to "the Urim and the Thummim," on the other hand, it is enjoined "thou shalt put in—inclose within—the breastplate, the Urim and the Thummim, and they shall be upon,—next,—Aaron's heart when he goeth in before the Lord." Nor is it to be overlooked, that, with carefully selected terms, Moses speaks of the stones in the breastplate being "set, or filled in;" but the Urim and the Thummim he describes simply, as "put in," as if the one had been fixed with elaborate art, the other merely deposited by the hand—dropt in. Nay, it is stated expressly, that "Moses put the breastplate upon Aaron;" and that after he had thus put on him the breastplate, all gemmed and finished, "he put in the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim." The artificers, therefore, must have prepared the sacerdotal vestment, even to the stones of the breastplate, whilst Moses provided "the Urim and the Thummim."

Second, It is next to be observed, that Urim and Thummim are not proper names which admit not of being interpreted. They are susceptible of a very definite and obvious meaning. Urim might have been given in our translation as "light," or, as the Septuagint has it, "manifestation," for it imports "a light or shining thing." And Thummim might have been rendered "truth or perfection," meaning as it does, "the perfect or the true."

Third, If, however, "the Urim and the Thummim" be not the breastplate of the high priest, and something distinct from the stones thereof; if, likewise, it be entitled to the designations of "light and truth," a "perfect and a shining thing," being thus loftily characterised of God himself, what else could it mean than the LAW as given on Sinai, and written by Moses, when he descended from the mount? 1. It is to be noticed, that when the article is first introduced, Moses refers to it as already in existence, and not as a thing that needed to be prepared. As if it were well known and at hand, no information is given with respect to it—no making of it is ordered. God does not, as usual, say that he will provide it. Its existence is taken for granted, and all that must be done, is to put it into its receptacle or case. "Thou shalt put within the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim." All which accords wholly with the idea, that the law was meant, it being already in possession of Moses, and known to all the camp. 2. Let it also be taken into consideration, that the LAW received different names, according to the light in which it was viewed. It is called "the ten commandments" when its moral precepts are numbered. It is designated "the table of covenant," when regarded as the tenure by which Israel held Canaan. It was spoken of as "a commandment" considered as being stamped with Divine authority. It went under the name of "judgment," when adduced as the standard that fixes all moral truth. And it is "a testimony," when meaning a public declaration of what God expects from his creatures. If however the Law were thus denoted by expressions taken from some of its aspects and properties, there is nothing forced in the supposition that it may also have received the designation of "light and perfection,"—"Urim and Thummim,"—as another formula by which briefly to signify its character as a whole.

3. And the appellations given both to the breastplate, and the Urim and Thummim, add probability to this view. The former is entitled "the breastplate of Judgment," which can only mean, the breastplate including Judgment, or containing the Law. Urim and Thummim, are likewise designated as "the Judgment," that is, the Law of Israel. So that "the Urim and Thummim," it would seem, were only titles of the Law, or "the Judgment," laid up within the breastplate, expressive of its character and design. 4. It enhances the argument, and almost renders it conclusive, to consider that the terms "Urim and Thummim," "light and perfection," answer precisely to the description God has given of his LAW: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my paths." Nay, "the law of Jehovah is perfect" (Thummim); "the law of Jehovah is pure, enlightening the eyes," (Urim.) It would be something worse than rash to transfer to any thing else, a designation which God has not merely applied to his law, but which he has restricted to it exclusively. 5. It need only be hinted, that the explanation offered invests the practice of consulting "the Urim and the Thummim" with dignity and reasonableness. Were the Urim and Thummim a mere ornament of skilful jewellery, it would seem not only unmeaning, but a direct encouragement of idolatry to associate it with the revelation of the Divine mind. But let it be admitted that the Law is within the sacerdotal robe, and it is at once apparent that the man who consults by Urim and Thummim, is only advising with the high priest as to the statutes of Jehovah, and ascertaining their import from him who had been ordained to interpret them. 6. Finally, Taking "the Urim and the Thummim" to mean the Law, this article completes the typical character of the sacerdotal apparel, as pointing out the offices of Christ. The robe and mitre worn by Aaron, denoted the priesthood of Christ; the golden plate on the forehead signified the royalty of the Saviour; and "the Urim and the Thummim," if interpreted to be the Law, would shadow forth the Redeemer's prophetic office. On any other supposition, however, there is no emblem of Jesus as a Prophet in the Aaronic vestments. 7. The sum of all is this. By Urim and Thummim, was meant something well known among the Israelites; and this was the case with the Law; the Law received frequently an appellation from the aspect in which it was viewed; and so it might be called Light and Perfection, from the admonitions it uttered; both the breastplate and the Urim and the Thummim are expressly called the Law of Israel; the Law is the only thing in Scripture characterised as light and perfection, and therefore the only thing entitled to these epithets; we can scarcely suppose that the Almighty would give forth his oracles above a few chosen gems; but how accordant with all his procedure to reveal his will by the mouth of the Law; and, lastly, by making Urim and Thummim to represent the Law, the typical ful-ness of the Mosaic priest is completed. An alternative inference, therefore, is not left. The Urim and the Thummim can signify nothing else than the Law—the whole Mosaic code—just the manuscript of the Law as written by Moses, to the dictation of God in Sinai.

I. The view now taken throws light on several passages of Holy Writ.—1. To hide a law would, according to usual notions, mean any thing but showing it reverence and obeying it with anxiety. Yet "thy Law," says David, "have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee." The phrase, therefore, is strictly a Jewish one, and can only be explained by the custom now illustrated. The allusion is to the high priest depositing the Law within his breastplate, for the purpose of being consulted. 2. Throughout the whole of the 40th Psalm, Christ is shadowed forth in reference to the ancient priesthood; and in the words, "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy Law is within my heart," the allusion is manifestly to Aaron carrying the Law beside his heart within the breastplate. The meaning is, therefore, not simply that Christ is holy. But, first, it is to be understood that, as Priest of the Church, Jesus is prepared to fulfil all that has been typified in the Law; and, next, that, as the Prophet of God, he alone can guide and sanctify. 3. The prayer, "O send forth thy light and thy truth; let them lead me," is just a request that the Urim and Thummim might be David's guide, so that he may not miss his way to God, or come by a forbidden road. But the Urim and the Thummim being the Law, the Psalmist's desire was to approach God in the observance of those rites, and in possession of that spirit, which the Law required. 4. The Jew ever turned to his high priest for information on all religious points, and guidance in all perplexing junctures, knowing that in him was hid a source of light, and the means of perfection which could neither fail nor mislead. But the apostle asserts that the High Priest of the Christian profession is also thus gifted and benignant. "In Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Within his breast there is a spring of knowledge as exhaustless—a law of holiness as authoritative—a beam of light as pure. In him are laid up all the wealth the impoverished sinner needs. He will lead in the paths of truth and holiness all who ask counsel at his lips. 5. It may, finally, be asked, to what are the Jewish phylacteries to be traced, but to the Urim and Thummim of the high priest? There is a Divine command to bind the law as a bracelet on the hand,—on the head, as a frontlet; but the practice of inscribing portions of the law on parchment, and depositing them in a case, is evidently the Urim and the Thummim, on a smaller scale. Indeed, the idea of interpreting literally the order of Moses above alluded to, must have arisen from observing what the high priest did with the scroll of the law entire, and a desire to imitate his practice.

II. The view taken suggests some practical lessons. 1. It teaches the Sinlessness of Christ; for, let the character of Jesus be surveyed in his type, as bearing the law within his heart, and it must be instantly felt, that in One, of whom this was a just and chosen emblem, there could be no unrighteousness; that Jesus could never feel the least estrangement from the will of God, or any reluctance to the demands of the law; that the Saviour, on whose perfectness the atonement depends, must have been what the apostle represents, and Jehovah requires—"without sin." 2. It shows the manner in which Christ executes the office of a Prophet. It is not by creating a new law, or giving direction independent of the law; for then would he not correspond with his type, the high priest, who drew his responses from the will of God written within his inspired scroll. It is by pointing us to the law which bears upon our case, through the influence of his Spirit, and explaining its precepts, and enforcing its sanctions. By the commentary which Jesus left upon the spirituality of the law, and the light he still confers by the Holy Ghost, he does to the believer what the high priest was ordained to do for the Jew. On all occasions he shows them the law as the standard of duty; and teaches them at once to appeal and how to its decisions. Christ has not come, therefore, to relax, but to interpret the law; and all who are his friends will never seek another guide, nor be swayed by another authority. 3. Finally. Let the Believer, from this statement, understand more exactly what is required of him, in point of character, as being a priest of God. God has called him to "the royal priesthood;" he has given him at once the crown of royalty and the mitre of priesthood. He must not, however, exult in this distinction, without adverting to the qualifications it infers, but remember that, if a priest to God, he must place the law as a candle within his heart, and fasten on what the apostle, in allusion to the sacerdotal equipage, calls "the breastplate of righteousness." So long as he is in this imperfect tabernacle, and this seductive world, he cannot be "undefiled," like his great High Priest; nevertheless, to the utmost must he strive to keep his "garments unspotted by the flesh," and so observe the statutes of the law, that his footsteps "may teach transgressors the way." The high standard of his duty must be Jehovah's will; his interior soul must be put under the control of righteousness; his whole deportment must reflect the image, and commend the Gospel, of Christ. All eyes are directed to a believer. The scoffer looks at him, to find the priest of God in error; the inquirer, to regulate his steps by a holy example; the Church, to mark his steadfastness; heaven, to admire and animate his zeal. Let him, then, hide the law within his breast, and never sin. Imagining himself to be the high priest, ever giving forth responses which will either lead men to glory or land them in perdition, let him, by "manifestation of the truth, commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God." The world will laugh at his fantastic dress, and strange speech, and singularity of manner, as did the heathen at the Jewish priesthood; nevertheless, if he be "an epistle of holiness, known and read of all," not only will he deliver his own soul, but be the means of guiding many a pilgrim unto eternal rest.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MR JOHN MURRAY,

MINISTER OF LEITH AND DUNFERMLINE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

[THE following Sketch is from the pen of the late Dr M'Crie, and forms a small portion of his "Miscellaneous Writings," which have just appeared, edited by his son. The memory of Dr M'Crie is justly held in the highest respect, and the present collection of his fugitive pieces scattered through various periodicals, will be hailed by the public as precious relics of the distinguished author whose name they bear. The notes and illustrations of the learned Editor greatly enhance the value of the Volume.]

Those persons who have been faithful in bearing witness for the interests of Christ, deserve to have their memories preserved, even although there be nothing very remarkable in their story. Several of the following particulars were never, as far as known to the writer, before communicated to the public.

Mr John Murray was a witness and sufferer for the Reformed principles of the Church of Scotland against the usurpation of the bishops, in the beginning of the seventeenth century. He was settled as minister of Leith, where he was colleague to Mr David Lindsay, who was made bishop of Ross. He opposed the appointment of the bishops, and denounced the innovations made in the discipline and government of the church. Archbishop Spottiswood, who was son-in-law to Bishop Lindsay, and others of that fraternity, being often in Leith, and being employed to preach for the Bishop, Mr Murray watched them narrowly; and if they uttered any unsound doctrine, or endeavoured to support the authority of bishops over other pastors, he never failed, in his next sermon, to confute them. When the scheme of constant moderator was introduced, he opposed it in the Presbytery of Edinburgh, not only by his vote, but also by his strenuous reasoning, demonstrating that its tendency was to overthrow the liberties of the Church. When the six ministers, who had kept the Assembly at Aberdeen in 1605, were pronounced guilty of high treason at Linlithgow, for declining the judgment of the secret council in that matter, Mr Murray publicly condemned the sentence, in his addition to the exercise at Edinburgh; and he kindly entertained the ministers at his house in Leith, when they were on their way to banishment. After this, Gladstones and Spottiswood, with a number of other bishops, having come to Leith, with the evident design of triumphing in their success, he boldly challenged them in his sermon for obscuring the good cause, and slandering the banished ministers, to promote their own selfish and worldly interests.

Being an eye-sore and continual restraint upon them in that situation, they were determined to have him removed from it, and waited an opportunity against him.

This soon occurred, and they prosecuted it in a manner suitable to their character and design. At a Provincial Synod in Edinburgh, in 1608, Mr Murray, having been moderator of the preceding meeting, preached on Gal. v. 1: "Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free." &c. In this sermon, he rebuked the avarice and ambition of some of the ministry, who claimed superiority over their brethren, worldly dignities, and rich benefices, asserting this to be the cause of the distractions in the Church of Scotland at that time, as it had often been before. "We carry more credit," said he, "and are better accounted of in the hearts of those who fear the Lord, when we contain ourselves within the compass of our calling, with the style of Mr George, Mr John, pastor of such a place, than when we borrow, through ambition, the titles of worldly honour and dignities, loving the style of my Lord Bishop, better than to be called a faithful and diligent minister. The time hath been, when our Church and liberties have been as a defended city or house; but now, doors and windows are partly cast open, partly broken up, and enemies entered; so that faithful keepers will be forced either to yield, or to suffer. But to suffer is far better. For, if either our liberties, through craft, be undermined, or, for reward, given out of our hands, it is likely the Lord will never honour us with them again. But if, by violence, they be thrown out of our hands, then possess we a good conscience, and, in God's mercy, shall repossess them again, when he thinketh time. Some of us, not contented with our standing in the ministry, have climbed up to higher places, both in kirk and commonwealth, than God hath called us unto, through covetousness, seeking the profits of this present and perishing life, through ambition affecting preferment, and imparity in power and authority over their brethren; who to win to themselves preferment, have troubled the peace of Jerusalem, and hurt the liberties thereof. If any will call to mind the times past, when there was any trouble or stir in the Church, they shall find that the authors and instruments of it were ever some who, through covetousness and ambition, which two were the bane of the Church, have sought to themselves a pre-eminence among their brethren; whose deaths and epitaphs may be a terror to those who tread in their footsteps." The sermon was without his knowledge printed at London,—of which Bishop Bancroft getting intelligence, most probably from his good friends in Scotland, caused a search to be made among the printers, and, having seized upon it, put a copy into the King's hand. The King marked some passages which he called erroneous, and sent them, with the sermon, to Secretary Elphinstone, charging him to examine Mr Murray, if the sermon was his, if he put it to press, and if he stood in defence of the errors contained in it. He acknowledged that the sermon was what he had preached, and that he had given a copy of it to a friend, who importuned him for it; but maintained that it was printed without his knowledge. He declared, that he could not retract any thing in it, nor acknowledge that it was erroneous, and showed that the King had put a harsh construction upon some passages in the sermon. The Secretary required him only to acknowledge that he had given offence, and promised him preferment, if he should leave the cause in which he was engaged. All the answer he returned was, "God make me faithful in that glorious office wherunto I was called."

Upon the Secretary's writing in his favour to the King, it is said his Majesty was content to let the matter rest. But this coming to the knowledge of two of the bishops, they insisted for a sight of the sermon from the Secretary, and called a meeting of their brethren, who, after joint deliberation, drew up four articles of charge, in which they endeavoured to prove, from different parts of the sermon, that he had accused the King's Majesty. Though what chiefly galled them was the reproof of their ambition and avarice, yet they endeavoured to state the prosecution upon a ground which would appear less invidious, and more actionable. Having procured Mr Murray's citation before the council, the King's advocate produced the articles against him. He was appointed to give in answers next day. But, instead of giving particular answers to every article, which would have implied an acknowledgment of the council as the competent judge of his doctrine, he presented a supplication, in which he stated, that the charges were founded upon inferences drawn from his sermon, contrary to its scope, which was not directed against his Majesty, but against the evils which prevailed among the ministry, and begged that the trial of his sermon might be left to the presbytery, or provincial synod. The council were disposed to accept this as a sufficient answer; but the bishops insisted that he should give an answer in writing to every particular article, thinking by this to ensnare him. Being required to comply with this, he said, that his answer, though general, applied to every article in particular; that, if he were to answer formally, it would be by denying the inferences, and that the places of his sermon would answer for themselves. He appealed to his hearers, among whom were many judicious noblemen, gentlemen, and ministers, if he had uttered any thing in that discourse which could bear the construction which was now put upon it. Chancellor Seaton still urging him to give in particular answers in writing, he answered with firmness, "I have given in my answer, my Lord; I have my calling to attend upon." The clerk having read the places from which the articles were drawn, it was clearly seen that his words were wrested. The chief persons in the council spoke in his defence at some length. Archbishop Gladstones, in a passion, told them that the supplication which he had given in was in fact a declination. But, instead of being listened to, he was rallied upon his logic. "Albeit ye be Lord of St Andrews," said the chancellor, "yet it seemeth ye have never been in St Andrews." Mr Murray was, in the end, called in, and favourably dismissed to his charge. The bishops, mortified with their own disappointment, and irritated by the manner in which they had been treated, sent up an information to the King, complaining heavily of the procedure of the council. Upon this his Majesty, displeased that the council had showed so little deference to his own critical powers, and those of his bishops, sent them a sharp rebuke, and peremptorily ordered the captain of the guard immediately to apprehend Mr Murray, and to commit him to confinement in the castle of Edinburgh.

The bishops, having got this faithful man removed out of their way, preached whatever they pleased in Leith without opposition, and held their principal consultations in that town. But they were not satisfied with his confinement in the castle of Edinburgh, which was too near to his parish, and the place of their consultations. They therefore sent up one of their number to London, with instructions drawn by the hand of Spottiswood, among which this was one, that he should obtain of his Majesty, that Mr John Murray be charged by the council to enter into confinement in the town of New Abbey, on the borders of England, near Dumfries. Accordingly, by the King's direction, he was brought out of the castle (where he had been confined about a year), and presented before the council. Large promises were made to him by the Earl of Dunbar, provided he would comply with Episcopacy; but he declared that he never would. The King's letter, stating the particulars of his confinement, being read to him, he, with some temper, expressed before the council the feelings of a generous mind at the unworthy conduct of his persecutors. "It may be," said he, "it is his Majesty's will; but I know well that it is not his Majesty's invention, whom I never offended. It is the device of men maliciously set against me, without a just cause, for their own particular ends, before whom I may prefer myself in all loyal obedience to his Majesty, both as a minister and as a subject." The bishops felt, and were abashed. Chancellor Seaton, gathering some courage, said, "that it was a most barbarous and unworthy dealing in the bishops to put one of their brethren in the ministry from the place where he exercised his calling, and cast him out to a remote part, where he had no provision allowed him. His calling, his quality, and the quality of the gentlewoman his wife, did crave another kind of respect, and greater discretion." The bishops were silent; the Lords of Council were almost ashamed of their own passiveness. But the former trusted to the efficacy of the King's misgiving; the latter were afraid of incurring his Majesty's displeasure a second time.

Mr Murray went to the place of his confinement, where his family suffered greatly both for want of fuel and provisions. His wife and children, who had been delicately brought up (for Mr and Mrs Murray were descended from, and connected with, some of the best families of the kingdom), unaccustomed to such hard treatment, became sickly, and at last two of the children died. He had removed to Dumfries, where he preached for some time; but finding his situation little improved, and that there was no appearance of the malice of the bishops relenting, he resolved, without license either of King or council, to transport himself and family to Dymart. After having remained there privately for about half a year, he removed to Prestonpans, where he preached. Some years after this, he received a call from the town and parish of Dunfermline (with consent of the presbytery), to be their minister. His settlement among them was obtained with great difficulty, after much interest being used. But he was not suffered to remain there long, for Spottiswood, his arch-enemy, being made Bishop of St Andrews in 1615, almost the first thing which he did, was to visit the kirk of Dunfermline, when he silenced Mr Murray, and devolved the whole charge of that extensive parish upon Mr Andrew Forster, a person destitute both of gifts and grace. This person, having been visited by Providence with sickness, was seized after his recovery with great distress of mind. He confessed that at the Assembly of Glasgow 1610, he had sold Christ for a paltry sum of money; and that, having a numerous family, and being very poor, he had, by means of a false key, at different times abstracted money from the kirk-box. One Sabbath, the subject in his ordinary course of lecture being John xii. 6, he was seized with such horror when about to begin, that he ran out of the pulpit, expressing, among other things, an apprehension that the magistrates were coming to take him out to execution. Being in this situation, he silenced himself, and requested Mr Murray, for Christ's sake, to take the charge of the congregation. And yet, some time after this, having been reduced to beggary, Archbishop Spottiswood intruded him in spite of the people, into a country parish in Perthshire, where he died covered with debt and infamy.

Mr Murray, thus providentially restored to his ministry, continued to exercise it in Dunfermline from the year 1616 to 1622. No sooner, however, was a new occasion given for prosecuting him, by his non-conformity to the Articles of Perth, at that time ratified by Parliament, than he was summoned before the High Commission, removed from Dunfermline, and confined within the parish of Fowles in Strathern. Here he resided in Gorthie, which belonged to his brother, Sir David Murray, a courtier. Upon the death of his brother in 1629, he removed again to Prestonpans, where he died in the year 1632.

On his death-bed he enjoyed much comfort. To those who visited him during his sickness, he delivered many excellent exhortations. In particular, he entreated them never to consent to the corruptions which had been introduced into the Church. He was not one of those who represent the external government of the Church as of trivial concern, comparing it to anise, mint, and cummin; he considered it as nearly connected with the rights of the Redeemer, and the promotion of practical godliness. He professed that "it was to him matter of much praise and joy, that the Lord had thought him worthy of the honour of suffering for the glorious cause of God, and of giving a testimony to his truth, before a corrupt generation; that it was his comfort on his death-bed, that he had never disfigured the well-favoured face of the Kirk of Scotland. As Christian experience and practical godliness have been so often pressed to the disparagement of all contentings about the external form and discipline of the Church, it may be observed, that in this eminent person they were closely united, as they have been in a great cloud of witnesses, with which we are compassed about." He said, "his keeping of himself clean from the corruptions brought into this Kirk," albeit in weakness, "was a great comfort to him now in the time of his extremity. And any that have consented to them, if they were in my condition," continued he, "exchanging time with eternity, they would repent of their wicked courses, or else they would not find such comfort in death as I do this day. Blessed be the name of my gracious Lord therefor, in Christ Jesus my only Saviour."

THE BIRTH-DAY.

BY MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

I SAW a fair and blooming boy
Stand by his father's knee,
And smile to catch the birth-day toy,—
His years were only three.

Amid his clustering hair soft fell
The parting daybeams bright,
His violet eyes were large and full
With deep untold delight.

The thousand springs of happy thought
In childhood's bosom laid,
Were opened in that simple soul,
And o'er it sparkling played!

At length the music of his joy
His silver tones confessed—
The father raised his prattling boy,
And clasped him to his breast.

Within a window's dim recess
The mother leaned apart,
And silent pondered on the scene,
And stored it in her heart.

The tear, unconscious, gemm'd her eye—
What might its fountain be?
The thought how Heaven had spared her flower,
And that his years were three!

The sun went down—the rosy cheek
In slumber pillowed lay,
Calm as the cloud still lingering round
The gates of closing day.

That night two grateful souls were poured
In prayer and praises deep,
That He whose goodness gave at first Might aye the treasure keep!—

Might shield his youth—his manhood crown,
Not with earth's glittering dust,
But Faith's own armour burished pure,
The Christian's deathless trust!

Oh! that these parents' deep desire Fulfilled of Heaven may be,
Breathed for that fair and blooming boy,
Whose years were only three!

CAUSES OF THE DECLENSION OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH ON THE CONTINENT AFTER THE REFORMATION.

TRANSLATED BY T. ROBINSON.

[The following interesting Paper is translated from the last circular of the Geneva Evangelical Society, and is worthy of serious attention. It traces to some of its principal causes, the grievous decline in piety that so rapidly succeeded the glorious days of the Reformation. It directs our thoughts to the revival, that has begun to take place in our own day, especially in France and Switzerland. It is also calculated to call forth the earnest supplications of the people of God, as well as to lead to pecuniary sacrifices, in order that the work which has so prosperously begun may rapidly extend; and that sound doctrine and genuine piety may again take root among the leading Continental nations.]

of a slackening in the work of God, and of a relapse into the slumber from which they were beginning to awaken. Addresses delivered at the anniversary meetings of religious societies, deplore a want of inward life and Christian activity. Other voices, not less serious, point out the same evil. "Zeal has become calm," says a Christian Journal, "the joints have been loosened; life has withdrawn; the extremities of the body are already cold, and we must put our hand on the heart to be convinced that it still gives signs of life. Men have not, doubtless, renounced the title, nor the privileges of Christians; on a solemn occasion each one would even be willing to defend them; once a year persons will think it necessary for them to give proofs of it to such and such brethren, to such and such societies; but they do it only to be acquitted by conscience, and without laying it much to heart whether the work prospers or perishes. The reports of the Societies are published; they are not read; so that the appeals which they contain pass away unheeded. To the person who calls their attention to them, people answer that they are already very numerous, without considering that what they make the subject of complaint ought to be matter for thanksgivings."

If we must declare our thoughts, we believe that the revival of the Church, which Christ has commenced in our days, is not in danger, and we have our security in heaven; and as a society far from having complaints to make, we are grateful for the eagerness with which many Christians have co-operated in our work. But on the other hand, we must recognize with our brethren, that there are in many places, and especially, no doubt, in our own hearts, remissness and slumber. This slumber ought to be dissipated. The Church must be shaken, alarmed, if it be necessary. She must hear the voice of Him, who comes to her and says, "Is it possible thou couldst not watch with me one hour?"

We have scarcely emerged from an epoch of infidelity and Materialism which has been signalized by unheard of disasters. And whilst God had interposed in the glorious days of the Reformation, and restored his Word to the Church, how have modern times which opened under so happy auspices so quickly degenerated? How has the awakening of the period of Luther and Calvin been so quickly followed, not only by a new sleep, but even by hideous and bloody dreams? How have the hopes of humanity been so sadly deceived? The answer to this question may be useful.

The three last centuries, the sixteenth, the seventeenth, and the eighteenth, may be considered as exhibiting three great conflicts, of which each is marked by a character peculiar to itself.

The sixteenth century is the contest of the living Word of God. Then God himself interposes, and the infidelity of some, and the superstition of the rest, the haughty hierarchy of Rome on the one side, and the false philosophy of the learned on the other, are struck by the shock of the celestial Word of God, are astounded, confounded, and put to flight. Such is the first contest.

The seventeenth century is, in general with the Protestant Churches, a contest of a narrow and lifeless orthodoxy. The Word of God seems to retire while the systems of theologians advance. Vitality retreats and conceals itself; forms only appear and display themselves; the spirit is neglected while the letter is worshipped. Then the adversaries who had been defeated muster again; Popery rises and marches again to battle, having the immense society of Jesuits for its advance guard; and the celestial weapon which had vanquished it having been, as it were, put back into the scabbard, Rome gains every where, and especially in France, signal and terrible victories.

The eighteenth century is the contest of reason; then triumph false philosophy, and human Materialism. Rome had gained the victory in the preceding century with the aid of the immortal Bossuet, and the dragons of Louis XIV.; but it was not for itself. Evangelical doctrine alone could, and still can, save Christianity. Rome is incapable of doing it. In striking at the Protestant Churches already weakened, Rome not only destroyed Protestantism, but Christianity,—it destroyed even itself. The Reformation, as we have said, had conquered two enemies—Infidelity and Popery. It was Popery which returned first to the contest. Loyola, the Capuchins, the Pope and his kings, were organized so as to be able to enter promptly on a campaign. The other adversary, Infidelity, waited; it smiled to see Popery rush with violence on their common enemy; and during the whole of the battle of the seventeenth century, it lay couched on the ground that it might not be perceived. Then, when the battle was done, when the Jesuits and the dragons had gained a deplorable victory, Infidelity rose, and declared that it would have its battle; and in a moment, immediately after its triumph, all the power of Popery was crushed. The period of Infidelity continued a hundred years; and terminated like the tremblings of Vesuvius, by a frightful explosion, a horrible deluge, from which we and our children are scarcely emerging.

We repeat our question, therefore, Why has the movement of the Reformation not continued? This is the origin of the evil; and it concerns us to know this cause, in order to know how to escape from its influence.

A period of devotedness and energy is often followed by one of remissness and selfishness. After the intervention of God comes the intervention of man. This, which is often seen in the history of each individual, is seen also in the history of the whole Church.

It was, especially, in the country which had been the principal theatre of the Reformation, in Germany, that this evil was manifested; but it is found, more or less, in all Protestant countries. The germ of the evil proceeds even from the excellent Luther himself. He had laid it in the gulf which he was pleased to dig between the Church of the Augsburg Confession and the Reformed Churches. From that origin the evil proceeded.

The formula of agreement, which had been drawn up in 1577 by the Lutheran divines, Andreæ, Chemnitz, Selnecker, Chrytæus, Musculus, and Koerner, had for its object to repulse for ever the Reformed doctrine. It was rather a formula of discord and a principle of death.

From that time the Protestant theology ceased to proceed under the living impulse of the Bible, and began to conform itself to the dry method of the theology of the schools. All was defined to the smallest matter. There was no more place for liberty or vitality. The incessant war against the Calvinists and Crypto-Calvinists transformed theology into dialectics, and removed it farther and farther from the practical tendency which it possessed under Luther. In the place of a living faith, nothing was seen but a cold and dead orthodoxy. The form of doctrine made the foundation to be forgotten; the bark of the tree caused the sap to be neglected.

Ministers no longer engaged in the exposition of the Bible or the history of the Church, but chiefly laboured to find arguments against Popery or the Protestant Churches with which they disagreed. Instead of expounding to the people the Holy Scriptures, as the Reformers had done, with the view of instructing and edifying them, they spoke to them of little else than the polemic divinity of the schools; and religion was no longer any thing for youth but a matter of memory.

Here was a great evil. What does it teach us? That the Reformation almost destroyed itself, in employing the life and activity which God had given it in warring against the Churches which proceeded from its own bosom, instead of consecrating them to the advancement of the grand doctrine of justification by faith, the precious heritage of all the Reformed families—to the renovation by means of it to the whole of Christendom—to the conversion of the whole world,—that thus it might leaven the entire mass.

One grand means, then, of not losing vitality, and of recovering it in a more abundant measure when it has been lost, is to march towards unity. Let not any Christian, any Society, any portion of the Church, any Church isolate itself; but let all the parts of the body of Christ, on the contrary, strive to draw near to one another. Let us put down the war of Protestants against Protestants; and let us reserve those arms for Rationalism, Socinianism, Popery, and all Antichristian systems.

Is it not time to repair what the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century destroyed? If evangelical and Christian unity was then broken, ought it not now to be re-established? Do we not all come forth from one death—Reformed, Lutherans, British Episcopalians—and ought we not to embrace each other in returning to life? Called to contend against mortal errors, should we still give so great an importance to our trifling differences? Does the Lord not shed on all our Churches the same faith? Does he not baptise them all with the same Spirit? And, if we are one, ought we not to stretch our hands beyond the Jura, beyond the Rhine, beyond the sea? Shall we not all confess with one mouth Jesus Christ the Lord, to the glory of God the Father?

But this is not enough; and since the question particularly, in this Paper, is of the work of Christian societies, we will add one word farther, that all common efforts ought to be dear to us, and that we should prefer them to individual efforts. Doubtless, these ought not to be checked. The spirit of association is not what it ought to be, if it hurt the spontaneous efforts of the individual. A Christian who would only work by means of a society, by giving it from time to time his purse and his presence, would be culpable; and, in the day of judgment, God will not ask what societies have done, but what each soul has endured for his name.

Nevertheless, it is the Lord's will that there should be a union in the action of his members. "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee;" and, from the time of the apostles, we see holy men of God working in concert.

When the Churches shall be in their pure state, it will be from them, perhaps, that this combined action, which is eminently that of Christianity, shall proceed. But we are not yet so far advanced. The identical elements, then, which are found in our decayed Churches, should be united in societies—the living parts combine their strength, work, act together, and thus become for the whole mass one precious leaven.

This necessity is so great, that, if societies are not formed, churches will be formed; and the formation of Christian societies, in the old churches, is the only means of preventing those new compartments which are dreaded. The one or the other must be done. For our part, we do not hesitate to give the preference to the formation of societies, having for their end the revival and regeneration of the Church. We ourselves are only a Christian society in the ancient Church of the Reformation; and as soon as that Church shall be re-established in the doctrines and works which belong to it, we will cease by that act alone to exist. God grant that the edifice be speedily raised, that the scaffolding may be soon struck down!

But the second evil, which brought the great disasters of the seventeenth, and, by that also, of the eighteenth century, was that Christians, both clergy and laity, by turning their attention too much to the special dogmas of their Confession, and to those of other Confessions, became weak as to their personal piety. They turned their regard from Jesus Christ, who is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," and who ought to be the constant adoration of his redeemed; and made it their glory to be a part of an orthodox Church, rather than to be personally clothed with Jesus Christ. Now as soon as we forget our soul's personal relation with Christ, all is in jeopardy—all is lost. If, then, the first lesson is, the importance of unity; the second is, the necessity to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

Towards the end of the great contest of the seventeenth century, it was attempted to bring about a powerful reaction, in order to furnish a remedy to the evil which was consuming the Church. It was the great attempt of reformation generally known under the name of Pietism; and whose two principal authors were, Spener, in 1666, first pastor of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in 1686, first preacher of the Court of Dresden, and in 1691, provost at Berlin; and Franke, in 1694, professor at Halle. These excellent men, who ought to be the object of the admiration of ages, and the numerous disciples who surrounded them, believed they recognised the cause of the Church's decline, in abandoning the scriptural and practical path of the Reformers. They insisted on the necessity of having in their own heart the experience of the transforming power of the truth, on the obligation of obeying the commands of God, and on the uselessness of faith without that obedience. Every where they founded meetings for edification; and there was seen the operation of an immense movement in all the Church of Germany.

But that movement, instead of regenerating the Church, was, on the contrary, immediately followed by the immense fall, called Rationalism; for which it seemed only to have prepared the way.

Whence does this come to pass? We would say a word on this subject, because there is also, in the experience of past centuries, instruction for the present.

Pietism threw itself into the opposite extreme to that which it found in the Church. Orthodox theologians had doctrines without life; Spener and Franke, or at least their disciples, attached themselves to life; and although maintaining doctrine, no doubt, yet no longer gave to it that importance which it ought always to have.

Sound doctrine is the first principle of the Church; Christian life is the second. It flows from the first, it is intimately united to it, but there is subordination between the two; and that order cannot be changed without great injury.

The essence of the Evangelical Church is, to oppose all Pelagianism, and to place the cause of our salvation in God alone. It follows from this, that if, in this Church, people insist on piety, or practical and individual Christianity, more than on what God has done in Christ for man's salvation, they commit a grievous error—they establish a secret righteousness, and strike a blow at that great article, justification by faith, proclaimed by the Reformers as "the article with which the Church stands, and without which it falls."

Pietism found, in the Church, abuses arising from this, that justification by faith had not been rightly entertained; it saw people who imagined they were justified without really being so. The only means of remedying that evil, was, to preach that doctrine of justification with so much more zeal and force, and to show to Christian formalists, by their own works, that they were not truly justified. But Pietism did quite another thing,—it supposed the righteousness of faith was properly established in the Church, and believed that the question was only about insisting on practical Christianity. This was a great error, and a great evil.

Pietism did still more,—it rejected all exact definition of doctrine, as a scholastic subtlety; it declared, that every dogma of which people did not see the direct influence upon the life, was without importance; and that the best doctrine signified nothing, when it was found in a man who had not piety. No doubt Pietism was right in opposing, in this manner, a dead orthodoxy; but it took, nevertheless, a dangerous position. Indifferentism, which regards doctrine and Christian faith as things of no value, and which had been kept concealed until then, came out of its retreat, and made, in appearance, common cause with that new system of piety. The great evil of Pietism, was, not recognising that the first and most precious treasure of the Christian Church is the truth; that doctrine does not borrow its importance from piety, but that it is piety, on the contrary, which depends upon, and proceeds from it; and that there, where sound doctrine abides, piety cannot fail to return. But the indifferentism which succeeded it soon went much farther,—it rejected all doctrine as useless, it effaced all Christian articles of belief, and changed the whole of Christianity into a simple morality. Thus Pietism, in wishing to regenerate the Church, introduced Rationalism; and it is not, doubtless, without reason, that the University of Halle has been successively the seat of both.

We have here important lessons to learn, that the awakening in our days may not degenerate, as that which took place at the end of the seventeenth century, in the times of Spener and Franke.

On the one side, we ought to hold fast by doctrine, to give it an elevated place in our hearts, and to be ready to sacrifice every thing to maintain it in its purity. On the other, we ought to labour actively for the dissemination of the Word of Life, for the conversion of souls, for the propagation of a practical and a living Christianity.

If we concentrate ourselves in doctrine, there would be reason to fear, that, beginning to put secondary things for essentials, we should isolate ourselves; separate, by degrees, from other Christians, and other Churches; and, withdrawing into the past, we should no longer have any living communion with the present. If we content ourselves with labouring actively in the kingdom of God, neglecting the maintenance of the truth, there would be reason to fear, that we should, by degrees, wander out of the right path, and that, with truth, we should speedily lose life.

If God has put a blessing upon our Evangelical Society, (and we think, with humility, but with adoration, that He has,) He has done so especially, in granting to it to comprise equally those two great concerns—in calling it at once to found the School of Theology for the re-establishment and the maintenance of sound doctrine, and to undertake the work of Biblical distribution and evangelization, for the active work in the kingdom of God. We believe that these two works are essential to the prosperity of our society, and that one could not be retrenched without the other receiving a wound which might become mortal. Let us apply ourselves, then (and let all the Churches apply themselves also with us,) to preserve these two great elements of Christianity. Woe to him who despises doctrine! woe to him who despises vitality! but especially miserable are those who despise both. If Jesus Christ is "the way" to heaven, it is because He is, at the same time, "the truth, and the life."

COMMUNION WITH GOD THE HIGHEST ENJOYMENT OF THE BELIEVER.

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. DAVID CARMENT, A.M.,

Minister of Rosskeen, Ross-shire.

"Master, it is good for us to be here."—LUKE ix. 33.

THESE words were spoken by Peter, the most zealous of the disciples, when, awaking from sleep on Mount Tabor, he saw the glory of the transfiguration, and felt the power of Divine love in his soul, raising his heart farther above the world, and worldly thoughts, than his person was, though on the mount, above the valleys beneath. Their minds were surprised and ravished, with a heavenly sweetness, nor could they themselves well estimate their happiness, or appreciate, or comprehend the nature of their joys. One thing they knew; they felt such delight of soul, such disengagedness from the world, such a holy fervour of zeal, such overflowings of spiritual joy, and such satisfaction in the communion they enjoyed, and the discourse they heard, as made them wish to remain there; they forgot they themselves were mortal, and that Moses and Elijah were glorified spirits; and they lost sight also, of what their Lord had told them of his sufferings and death so short a time before, although this foreseen in the Divine mind as accomplished, was the source of their present joys. Thus apt, we see, are the best of men, ignorantly to desire what is pleasant and comfortable for the time, though it should really prove hurtful to their interests. It is the common desire of men when in comfortable circumstances, without considering consequences, to say with Peter, "It is good to be here."

In discoursing from these words of the apostle, I shall endeavour First, To accommodate and apply them to the circumstances of our present meeting together this day. Second, To inquire whether the language of the Christian's heart, when in a similar frame of mind with Peter, is at all times most for his soul's benefit. Third, To show that it ought to be the earnest and frequent prayer of the Christian, to enjoy communion with God; and, Lastly, To mention some of those circumstances which operate to prevent, or to lessen the joys of the Christian, or to shorten their duration;—and then make some short application.

I. Then, we are met here this day, with the avowed purpose of humbling ourselves before God, on the prospect of a near approach to him at his table, to commemorate the death, and sufferings, and love of a crucified Jesus. To the Christian who has seen the evils of his heart, and laments the carnality of his frame, surely this will ever appear a necessary and important duty; as the disciples, before the transfiguration of Christ, were presented, for their humiliation, and to excite their love, with a view of the sufferings, death, and glorious resurrection of Christ, so ought we, ere we approach the mount of ordinances—the table of the Lord, to be feasted on his love—to look to Jesus on the cross for a humbling view of the evil, the enormity, the guilt of sin; to look to his suffering—to learn the extent of his love; to his resurrection—to learn the extent of his power, and the completion of his work. It is here we see him as a Saviour indeed, as a God indeed, as a victorious Captain, and a full and complete Redeemer; we see here that there is nothing left undone, that the debt is paid, justice satisfied, the law fulfilled, the prisoner discharged, and in his discharge, we behold the discharge of all his covenant people, written by his blood, sealed by his death, and attested by his resurrection. It is good, then, for us to be here, that we may have this view of the Saviour as a proper preparative for a closer approach, a nearer view of his amazing love, and a more heart-felt experience of his love, for without humility there can be no love, no desire to know and feel the power of the resurrection, or the constraining efficacy of Divine love. If we only meet here this day because it has been long customary for Christians in our country to do so, it is not good for us to be here, for it is a proof that our hearts are hardened, our souls dead in sin, and our whole profession an empty name, and we need not, we cannot, we do not expect to be able in the celebration, to say, from a soul-experience of union to Christ, or communion with him at his table, "It is good for us to be here." I ask you, then, sinner, with what views have you come here this day? Are you as willing to be humbled for sin as you are to enjoy the love and favour of God? Are tears of sorrow sought for by you, in remembrance of the sins of your youth, and the present hardness of your heart, as earnestly as the joys of experience by the Christian, or the prospect of worldly comfort by the sinner? If not, it is not good for you to be here,—you are an intruder in this place. The King will count you so at his table; for humility is ever the under garment of the wedding robe. Have you felt, or do you now desire to feel, sorrow for sin, as sin—sorrow for sin in a believing view of the crucified "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world? If not, expect not that you shall view Jesus in his glory, until you see him in his humiliation; expect not to feed on his love, until you have eaten the bread of sorrow for your offences against him. If you have been, or are now, brought to say, "It is good to be here," let us inquire, as we proposed.

II. Whether the language of the heart of the Christian, in a similar situation, is at all times most for his soul's benefit. It is a case too common with Christians, to measure the growth of their grace, and the strength of their faith, by the liveliness of their frames and the comforts of their experience. Their love to God, and even God's love to them, they are too apt to judge of by this standard; but this will be found, on a fair and scriptural examination, no proper criterion by which to judge of the strength of our grace, the ardency of our love, or even the vigour of our faith. There are two situations in which the Christian may be: the one he longs for and desires, and that lawfully; the other he shuns, flees from, and complains of; yet what he seeks is most dangerous oft—and what he shuns most salutary for his soul. Mounts Tabor and Pisgah he loves to ascend, and to dwell on, and travels, to reach; the valley of humiliation he shuns. Of the first he says, Oh! "It is good to be here;" of the other, God, in his dealings with his soul, in effect says to him, "It is good to be here." It is good, we are told, to bear the yoke, and be afflicted in our youth; that is, it is good for the Christian to be humbled, for there is nothing like this for killing pride, and for rooting up self-love. It is in the valley of humiliation the creature gets a sight of himself, as well as of the purity, and holiness, and perfection of God's law; a sight very necessary for him, to fit him for that other sight, and those enjoyments, which his soul pants for; whereas, when on the mount, he sees nothing, hears nothing, feels nothing, but the love of Jesus. The filthy creature, the wicked heart, the tempting devil, are for a time forgot, and there is danger, unless strongly stayed in his descent by the Hand which raised him, that his head will become giddy, and he stumble and fall,—to his own great hurt, and the offence of others. There is another danger attending these enjoyments,—we are apt to be contented with them; we are apt, with the Spouse, (Song v. 2,) to lie down to sleep, reposing on our privileges, and clothing ourselves with our enjoyments, and forgetting the Source of them, and, in such a case, we are ready to say, with Peter, "It is good to be here,"—without desiring to go further—to go from Tabor to Zion above.

III. We proceed to show that it ought to be the earnest prayer of the Christian to enjoy communion with God.—Though Peter and his companions were asleep when this glorious sight was vouchsafed to them, yet Christ was earnest in prayer; and it was Christ's prayer that prevailed for their support, and was the source from which comfort was derived to their souls. Though I have said that it is often better for the Christian to be in the valley, yet I need scarce mention to you, that I hope no Christian will consider this as an inducement to, or an excuse for, laziness; for we are allowed, nay, commanded, to pray not only for grace, but for the comforts of grace; so that no real Christian can well lie down satisfied in the absence of Christ; and it has always been seen, that though God is a Sovereign, and deals as such with his people, in imparting light, life, and comfort to the soul, that the most diligent in prayer, and in every commanded duty,—the most active and earnest in the right use of means,—the most holy and spiritual, and they who have hated and feared sin most,—have ever enjoyed most of the Divine presence, and been most frequently filled with comfort and a sense of his love, when in the enjoyment of public ordinances, as well as on their knees in their closets. There is great danger in laziness, and in a foolish resting on former experiences, or in having felt a law work in the conscience. Better feel a Gospel work. You may feel a law work, like Cain and Judas, and go to hell; but before you go to heaven, you must feel a Gospel work; I mean, the love of Christ constraining you so far, as to desire, to long for, his coming—to hate that for which he suffered, and to love that in which he delights, a desire not to rest contented in the mere struggling of doubts and fears; and a bad, uncomfortable experience, but a desire to forget these things, and to press forward towards that to which we have not yet attained; and this ordinance is a great mean, in the Spirit's hand, to accomplish this great purpose—to raise us, by a view of his great love therein manifested from the Slough of Despond—to behold his glory upon the mount, and to desire to abide for ever in his presence.

IV. Lastly, I mention some of those causes which operate to prevent or to lessen the joys of the Christian, or to shorten their duration.—Peter here sought only to abide where he was. He considered not the work Jesus had to accomplish, nor what he himself might have yet to undergo or to perform in this probationary state. He had got enough—he had a glimpse of the glory, and a foretaste of the joys of heaven, and this he wished to make his rest. Thus it often is with the Christian. He lies down contented in his comfortable feelings, and seems satisfied with what he already possesses. He thinks he has got a stock sufficient of his own to trade with; but soon a cloud overshadows him, hides Christ from his eyes, and then all is over—his sight is darkened, his views clouded. When the creature falls in love with the beauty of Christ within him, and forgets the Author, he is left to lose sight of Him from whom his beauty came,—nothing is to be seen, heard, or felt of what he formerly experienced. Now Satan and unbelieving thoughts are up in arms against him. He sees nothing in himself, but what tends to condemnation and alienation from God. He cannot look above to Christ, who is “the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever,” but looks to his own feelings; and as he sees nothing but deadness, dryness, and want of will and ability, he concludes all he felt before was delusion. As well might Peter have said he had not seen the marvellous glory of Jesus, or Moses, or Elias on the mount; and it is probable, when they entered into the cloud and became afraid, that they also doubted, until the voice from heaven and the fellowship of their Master reassured them. In such a case, then, we are not to sit still, idly lamenting ourselves, but to be up and be giving all diligence to recover that precious jewel which we have lost by our folly. Prayer is the great mean of receiving soul-comfort. We wonder frequently that we are so dead and dull under the hearing of the Word—so lifeless and so cold at the table of the Lord. Do you ask, or are you ignorant of the cause of this? Prayer restrained, prayer dry, lifeless, and formal—before you go to the house of God and to the table of the Lord, and a vain or worldly frame of mind indulged in after returning,—unbelief in prayer; these are the causes of your lifeless state. Again, because you have had a long fast, have been long waiting at the pool and are still unhealed, and are still humbled under doubts and fears of your unworthiness—therefore unbelief tells you, and sloth tells you, and the devil tells you, and self tells you it is in vain, and so you go and come lamenting, and doubting, and fearing; and all this, through the power of these, together with the killing power of some ruling hidden sin, which you are not active to discover, earnest to avoid, or faithful to overcome and destroy.

We find that the apostles here were asleep, as we find them on another very important occasion, when they ought to have watched; but surely this will not sanction slothfulness, or be urged by any real Christian to justify religious sloth and security, so dangerous to the soul, and always productive of so much hurt to the tender conscience. We are commanded to “watch and to pray, lest we enter into temptation.” Is it good to enjoy the favour of God, and the light of his reconciled countenance? Is it good to grow in grace, and to increase in love, in holiness, in humility, and self-denial? Then, Christians, be earnest, in the first place, that it may be good to be here in his house, hearing his word and partaking of his ordinances, and frequent in private and social prayer; for these are the means he blesses for obtaining the other, and for perfecting them. Is it good, dost thou think, sinner, to be here? Is it good to enjoy the happiness of being united to Christ here, and of being for ever with him at last? Why, then, see that you deem it good to seek him where he is to be found. Seek not the living amongst the dead, and rest not satisfied with the outward form, or mere name of devotion, saying in your hearts, “It is good to be here,” for it is only good to be where Christ is. Amen.

BLESSEDNESS OF THE SAINTS ABOVE.

HARK! a voice divides the sky,
Happy are the faithful dead,
In the Lord who sweetly die,
They from all their toils are freed!
Them the Spirit hath declared
Blest, unutterably blest;
Jesus is their great reward,
Jesus is their endless rest.

Followed by their works they go,
Where their Head is gone before;
Reconciled by grace below,
Grace had opened mercy's door:
Justified through faith alone,
Here they knew their sins forgiven;
Here they laid their burden down,
Hallowed and made meet for heaven.

Who can now lament the lot
Of a saint in Christ deceased?
Let the world, who know us not,
Call us hopeless and unblest;
When from flesh the spirit freed,
Hastens homeward to return,
Mortals cry, “A man is dead!”
Angels sing, “A child is born!”

Born into the world above,
They our happy brother greet;
Bear him to the throne of love,
Place him at the Saviour's feet:
Jesus smiles, and says, “Well done!
Good and faithful servant thou,
Enter and receive thy crown,
Reign with me triumphant now!”

Angels catch the approving sound,
Bow and bless the just award,
Hail the heir with glory crowned,
Now rejoicing with his Lord:
Fuller joys ordained to know,
Waiting for the general dooms,
When the archangel's trump shall blow,
“Rise, ye dead, to judgment come.”

COMMON MERCIES.

BY MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

“When all thy mercies, O my God!
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love, and praise.”

THERE can be no proof more strong of the Almighty's benevolence in the formation and government of His creatures, than that our common mercies should be the source of our uncommon happiness; so much so, that the sudden withdrawal even of the least of them is the immediate cause of anxiety and discomfort. It is not on extraordinary occasions, in critical emergencies, in rare and signal instances, alone, that the care and kindness of the Divinity is peculiarly manifested. There is a beautiful thread of unwearied parental love and mercy interwoven with the whole tissue of our daily life, which appeals to the heart with mute but resistless eloquence. If the adorable tenderness of God's character towards men is not perceived and acknowledged in the general tenor of his ordinary providences, it is but another evidence of the blindness of our minds, that we should require any more special manifestations of it to awaken our slumbering gratitude. Jehovah does not always ride in the whirlwind, or walk on the tossing ocean, and, bidding its angry surges be still, avert the fury of the storm from the heads of his fearful children; for many and many are the weeks and months, nay, even years, in which, in the plenitude of his goodness, he spreads around hundreds of families on the earth nought but the smiling landscape and the peaceful sky. Yes, the long-suffering of Deity to a guilty race is the theme of continual wonder and thankfulness to the chief of saints. Alas! that it should be so little regarded by the great and thoughtless multitude of sinners.

Let us just consider for a moment in what those every-day blessings consist, of which so many never think; or, at least, never in their legitimate connection with the omnipotent Giver. But here, my Christian reader, I am sure you will sympathize with me, when I confess that I am well-nigh overcome by the vastness of the subject I have proposed; for who can compute the mercies of the Lord? Who can reckon up the infinitude of his blessings? Are they not like our own transgressions—numberless, as the hairs of our heads—countless, as the rays of the meridian sun? Yet, although we cannot name all, we may allude to some; and we are inclined to hope, that the consideration of these (few as they be, compared with the mighty mass that seems to defy enumeration) may afford no profitable employment for a leisure hour.

The Bible informs us, in its own peculiar and beautiful language, that after having prepared this earth for his habitation, "the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Hence, at the very commencement are we reminded of the common mercy of our worldly existence: and let us not pass by with coldness this marvellous proof of the Divine goodness, that creatures, sinful and helpless as we, should be fashioned in the same image with their Creator, and so have a portion of His being literally infused into our own. Even corporeally, as Inspiration has solemnly expressed it, "we are fearfully and wonderfully made;" and when to this we add the inexplicable mechanism of the immaterial spirit, how spontaneous the exclamation that bursts from our lips,—“Who can, by searching, find out God? Who can find out the Almighty unto perfection?” The beautiful union of mind and body, in the structure of man, exhibits, perhaps, the most striking emblem of power and goodness that the whole wide range of the universe can afford. We are full of mysteries, we are full of wonders, we are full of mercies; and the same Omnipotence is the author, and centre, and end of all. Every sense is an inlet to happiness; every intellectual faculty, every silent emotion, is a fountain of deep, and elevated, and ever growing enjoyment. The very air we breathe, the very earth on which we tread, the manifold loveliness of hill and dale, the grassy meadow, the waving forest, the tinkling stream, the majestic river, the lordly ocean, the changing aspect of the far-spread sky, the golden dawn, the blazing noon, the purple evening, the clouds of thousand shapes and dyes, the sun, the moon, the stars, the world around us, and the world above,—oh! what a rich treasury of astonishment and delight is unfolded to us, even in the one common mercy of living, and looking on such a universe as this! Then, turning for a moment from the eye to the ear, let us ponder that feast of pleasure which accrues to us from the harmony of sounds—music. Who does not court, who does not love its magic sway? It is the spirit of peace, floating, like a young seraph wandered from his sphere, amid the turmoil of a noisy, tumultuous world: and so sweetly, so enticingly, does it weave its gentle chain around the heart, that, as we catch the thrilling melody soaring and melting away into the heaven whence it had its birth, we long for the angel's wing, to follow it in its liquid flight! So precious is the common mercy of hearing, to the pilgrim on the shores of time. But the subject opens upon me beyond my ability to grasp it. The figures grow and multiply upon the field of thought, and forbid, from the confusion of their numbers, that I should give even a passing allusion to each; and, while I would speak of the overflowing provision for the wants of man, in the subjugation of the animal race, and the rich and endlessly diversified abundance of the vegetable kingdom—the refreshing shelter of the forest shade, the delicious perfume of earth's thousand flowers; the cool fountain, whose waters allay the thirst, invigorate the constitution, and give comfort and beauty to the abodes of men; the food and raiment, and house and home; the light that gladdens, the heat that warms, the sleep that recruits the weary limbs, and restores the exhausted spirits; the health of body, and soundness of mind, which, in a certain sense, are more or less common to every child of humanity;—I gladly escape from the infinitude of the objects presented to me, into another branch of the subject, which still must very shortly detain my pen.

Come with me, reader, into this cheerful dwelling, where, amid many of the comforts, we find also some of the elegancies of life. It is a dwelling full of mercies. Doubtless there are sorrow, and pain, and disease, and death, under the roofs of thousands at this very moment; but, here every thing is peace and prosperity. And this house is no solitary or extraordinary exception to every other; it is but a type of hundreds, which God has watered with the dew of his long-suffering, and crowned many years with the fruits of his bounty. Let us look at the family circle. Whatever Providence can do by outward means to render it happy, has been done here, and riches, and health, beauty and good humour, have been severally showered down upon the heads of them all. The master and mistress of the mansion have every requisite within their reach for the perfect harmony of domestic enjoyment. They possess the love and esteem of each other; their children rise around them in blooming and gleesome loveliness; they have corn and wine in abundance; they have the regard of their friends, the respect of the world, they are honoured in their household, they are happy in themselves. I pause not to inquire whether the Spirit of Piety has hung over the portals of this dwelling the fadeless olive Branch of her purity and peace; for as I have only to deal at present with external good, such a digression were unnecessary.

"Domestic love! to thy white hand is given
Of earthly happiness the golden key!
These are the joyous hours of winter's even,
When the babes cling around their father's knee;
And thine the voice that on the midnight sea
Melts the rude mariner with thoughts of home,
Peopling the gloom with all he longs to see—
Spirit! I've built a shrine, and thou hast come,
And on its altar closed, for ever closed thy plume!"

Surely there is no scene more worthy of gratitude than a scene like this. For family affection is a treasure which no gold can buy, and for which all the power and distinction of emperors were but a miserable substitute. The most illustrious statesmen, the heroes most renowned in our battle histories, whether by land or sea, the most dazzling intellects, the most bold and enterprising spirits, all, must make the allowance at last, (when ambition's fervid excitements are over), that home, the domestic hearth, the dear, the hallowed circle of family companionship, is the only true haven of their heart's best joy. The betrothed of early days, whose souls by long confiding intercourse have been moulded in their every taste and wish, into kindred sympathy; the sweet prattlers of childhood, that heaven scatters like a burst of sunshine and of flowers, to delight the parental heart, and beautify the parental path; the brothers and sisters growing up in loveliness side by side, whose mutual offices of ready kindness make doubly enchanting the green pastures of youth;—these, these are indeed precious gems shining in the wilderness of terrestrial existence; and yet costly though they be above all that earth can yield, they are not rare—they are not thinly sown, like the pearl or the diamonds on the wide coasts of time;—they are stung in profusion around us like the rose blossoms of the summer garden,—they are beside us every day, they are but a part of our common mercies.

Ah! how soon might not God by one stroke of his righteous judgment change all this fair picture of love and joy into a waste of suffering and desolation! It is a solemn thought, but in his mercy he forbears.

Yet, great and marvellous beyond all computation as are these our daily blessings, falling like the dew of heaven on the good and on the evil, the thankful and the unthankful alike, we would never forget that there are others of a far higher, even of a spiritual nature, for which the full weight of our lowly gratitude ought always to be reserved. "What is a man profited," asks the Holy Book, "if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" And dear, unquestionably, as are all our temporal mercies, and well fitted to awaken continual recognition of the Divine Giver; yet the Lord has mightier benefits and more exalted privileges in store for us, even the soul's communion with himself while here, and eternal enjoyment of his presence hereafter. The mercies of our daily lot, though they are many, therefore, are not all; nay, they are but the least part of them. For what is the food that satisfies the sensual appetite, compared with that spiritual manna which nourishes the godly mind?

What is the splendid apparel, "the purple and fine linen," that clothes the dusty tabernacle, to that spotless robe of righteousness in which the justified sinner shall appear? What is the glittering heap that perisheth in the using, in comparison with the treasure, which eye hath not seen and heart hath not conceived, laid up for the saints above? What is the honour and dignity of princes of the earth, compared with the title of sons and daughters of the Highest? What is the transient repose of the animal frame, to the beatific rest that remaineth for the people of God? What is the greatest magnificence of a mere terrestrial abode, contrasted with the glory of those mansions which await the just in the New Jerusalem? And what, oh what, is the affection, even the most faithful, the most devoted, of our fellow-beings below—our kindred, our friends—creatures of yesterday, and subject to like passions with ourselves, compared with the holy, the unchangeable, the everlasting, the perfect love of the Creator?

While we survey, then, with wonder, with adoration, and with praise, the thousand daily manifestations of our Maker's goodness, which are everywhere within and around us, be this thought ever borne on our hearts, in deep and solemn remembrance, What would all these avail us, if the Divine sacrifice had never been offered? Yes, Jesus Christ is indeed the great, the unspeakable Gift; and while in every breath of health that we inhale, every supply of daily bread that we receive, every sweet sound of melody that charms our ear, every soft smile of friendship that gladdens our spirit, we trace the care and kindness of the unseen God, it is here, above and beyond all the rest, in the ransom of a lost world by the atonement of the Redeemer, that we read, as in a mirror bright but mysterious, the full concentrated power of the Father's mercy. It is only when, constrained to feel our need of a Saviour, we joyfully flee to him for refuge, as the Rock of our salvation, that we can duly appreciate the excellence of the love of that Being who loadeth us unceasingly with his bounty. The worldly man may imagine, in his delusion, that he worships the Lord aright, because he withholds not the tribute of his gratitude for the abundance of his earthly comforts. But the Christian dishonours not his Master's blessings, by acknowledging merely the least and neglecting the greatest; and while he takes up the sacred strain of David, "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works," still the deepest chords of his heart's thankfulness are ever stirred by those hallowed words, "Bless the Lord, O my soul! who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction!"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Habitual preparation necessary for the Lord's Supper.
—It is a solemn and sacred service in which we are invited to engage, and when we do engage in it, we ought to be impressed with a proper spirit of repentance, humility, reverence, and love; but as to the nature and length of the previous preparation by which we are to attain to that state of feeling, there is much error even among those who profess and call themselves Christians. There are some who think, that however unfit they may have previously been, yet that by setting apart a large portion of the preceding week to a vast routine of outward acts of devotion, they can suddenly bring themselves into what they consider to be a fit and proper state. But we say at once to these persons, that a proper state of preparation for the Lord's Supper rather consists in that habitual holiness and spirituality of mind, and in that constant watchfulness and self-government which every Christian should cultivate and observe; and that what we require, is not so much an additional time for extraordinary preparation, as the occupying the usual ordinary time which, as Christians, we should regularly employ in acts of meditation and devotion, in a more close and searching examination of ourselves, and in a more prayerful and thankful fixing of our minds upon the facts of our redemption by Christ, before we come to the Lord's Table. We repeat it—our meetness for coming to the Lord's Table should be habitual and constant, and not occasional or periodical, as if we might be less holy at other times than when we mind to come to the communion of the body and blood of Christ; and instead of feeling it necessary to employ a more than usual amount of time in order to bring us into a fit state for communicating, we should rather look upon a constant partaking of the Lord's Supper as being itself the best means of strengthening and maturing every Christian grace. For we may err in looking exclusively to extraordinary acts of devotion before we communicate, as the means of strengthening those Christian graces which by God's appointment are especially strengthened in communicating. It is, in fact, one of the evils which the modern practice of partaking of this sacrament so seldom has produced, that instead of looking upon the Lord's Supper as intended to prepare us for a holy and humble walk, we consider it necessary to make protracted and extraordinary preparation for it. But in this matter, it is the same in reference to spiritual as to natural food: we take our daily food, in order that it may prepare us for our daily toil; we eat, in order that we may live and discharge our duties as men; we do not live and work, in order that we may eat. And thus we feed upon the spiritual food of the body and blood of Christ, in order that we may have spiritual life and strength to perform our religious duties; and that, as Elijah went unto the Mount of God in the strength of the meat and drink which had been provided for him, so we may advance in our Christian course, after feeding on that food which is provided for us in this holy sacrament, "from strength to strength, until we shall appear in Zion before God."—THE REV. DANIEL BAGOT. (A Treatise on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.)

Compassion for the Heathen.—I see a poor Hindoo driven by a guilty conscience to inquire after an expiation. I see a Bramin directing him to cross a desert of a thousand miles, to the temple of Juggernaut in Orissa, and there, after the practice of severe austerities, to offer the costliest gifts which he can present; he does all this, and on his return he receives a little consecrated rice: he attempts to subsist upon this till, furnished, he perishes on the plain,—white to this day with the bones of such deluded pilgrims. Is this romance? Nay, it is a well attested fact. But who among us that knows the virtue of that "blood which cleanseth from all sin," who would not rejoice to seize the hand of this wretched votary and say—"Behold the Lamb of God!"—CECIL.

The incarnation of Messiah.—The incarnation of the Son of God is such a stupendous truth, that it could never have been believed by any individual but on the clearest testimony. The reason why it is so frequently disbelieved, insulted, and rejected, is, that men know not their own hearts, and they listen to their own deceitful thoughts. The voice of unbelief tells them that it is impossible. But no truth in Scripture can be properly understood, but in the light of Messiah. As in the absence of the material sun, we find it impossible to judge of and distinguish colours, and are in consequence frequently deceived; so, without the rays of the Sun of Righteousness, we shall be mistaken in every thing: and when man descends into the dark pit of the human bosom, with his own rushlight only in his hand, is it a matter of surprise that he should be misled? Instead of spurning the remedy which is provided in the light of Jesus, they would fall down in the dust before him, their Saviour, their God, their All, for ever and ever. In this incarnation he has connected himself with man in every possible way, and this should encourage trembling sinners to cast themselves upon him. His holiness could not be so fully developed were not this the case. Read the history of his ancestors, and you will find the conduct of some of them most infamous; they comprise not only Jew, but Gentile; and what does this teach, but that he delights in saving sinners. Remember what has been bestowed upon us—the heart of Deity and the heart of humanity. When we do justice to this truth, and remember what the Saviour has done for us, can we keep back our hearts from him? He only can fill them; he only is worthy of them.—HOWELS.

The Dark Valley lighted up by the Gospel.—Dense as the gloom is which hangs over the mouth of the sepulchre, it is the spot, above all others, where the Gospel, if it enters, shines and triumphs. In the busy sphere of life and health, it encounters an active antagonist; the world confronts it—aims to obscure its glories, to deny its claims, to drown its voice, to dispute its progress, to drive it from the ground it occupies; but from the mouth of the grave the world retires—it shrinks from the contest there; it leaves a clear and open space, in which the Gospel can assert its claims, and unveil its glories, without opposition or fear. There the infidel and the worldling look anxiously around; but the world has left them helpless, and fled. There the Christian looks around, and, lo! the angel of mercy is standing close by his side. The Gospel kindles a torch, which not only irradiates "the valley of the shadow of death," but throws a radiance into the world beyond, and reveals it peopled with the sainted spirits of those who have died in Jesus. It descends with us into the low chamber of the grave, bids us look on its silent inmates, and look on them with the persuasion that they only sleep. It assures us that death, like sleep, is not the destruction of the living principle, but only a temporary change in the mode of its operation; that, like sleep, it is a state of rest, discharging us from all the concerns of the world; that, like sleep, it principally affects the body, the activity of the soul being, meantime, continued, and perhaps greatly increased; and, most of all, that, like sleep, it will not be perpetual, but only endure for a night. It tells us, that a day will dawn on the world, when Jesus, assuming an aspect of infinite benignity, will say, in effect, of all his sleeping saints, as he said of Lazarus, "I go to awake them out of sleep."—HARRIS. #### THOUGHTS ON THE RESPONSIBILITY OF MAN FOR HIS BELIEF.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

It is almost unnecessary to remind the reader, that the design for which evidence is adduced and argument offered, on any subject whatever, is that belief or conviction may be thereby produced in the mind. According to the degree of evidence, then, must be the degree to which we are convinced of the truth of that statement in favour of which the evidence is brought forward. If the evidence be strong, our belief is firm; if weak, we doubt; if awasting, we deny. On this view of the matter, belief appears to be entirely dependent for its very existence, as well as its degree of strength, on something external to us, and therefore it can be scarcely considered as voluntary. We cannot believe by a mere act of volition on our part, without reference to the evidence by which a fact or statement is supported. This is admitted by all parties, and indeed cannot be denied, without forgetting the fundamental principles of the human constitution. We are so formed, that there is a ground-work laid for belief in the essential structure of the mind. Had no provision been made for our believing, rather than doubting, it is impossible to discover how man could ever have arrived at a belief of any statement whatever. If, however, a principle of belief form one of our first intuitions, is there not some danger of the conclusion being drawn from such an admission, that belief must be independent of evidence—that we are so formed, as to believe whether we have evidence or not? Such an objection could only arise from ignorance of the circumstances in which our intuitive tendency to believe is developed. We believe at the commencement of our intellectual history, not independently of evidence, but on the strongest of all evidence, that of intuition or consciousness—evidence the purest and the most satisfactory to a rational and intelligent being constituted as man is.

Evidence, then, is invariably the ground and the measure of our belief; and were man a purely intellectual being, viewing evidence in all circumstances by pure intellect alone, it could never be asserted that there was the slightest ground for alleging that he was responsible for his belief. Opinion, argument, conclusion, would be the processes of a mere automaton, who possessed no control over the actings of his own intelligence, and was regulated, as to the degree and even the existence of his belief, by circumstances external to his own mind. Such, however, is not the actual condition and character of man. Far from being under the direction of pure intellect alone, he is the creature of a thousand prejudices, and ever-varying feelings, and fitful moods, which all, more or less, affect his opinions and the whole processes of his understanding. He not merely thinks, but he feels; and in the mutual influence of thought and feeling, of the mind and the affections, lies the whole secret of man's responsibility for every opinion he entertains—for the degree of evidence which he yields to any statement whatever.

From the influence of our moral upon our intellectual constitution, it is quite possible that evidence the strongest may be neglected entirely, or if examined, may be firmly resisted; and that too from no defect in the evidence itself, but from the actual condition of the mind to which it is presented. This principle is habitually recognised in courts of justice, where it is well known that the moral character of the witness is regarded as affecting the credibility of his statements. We perceive examples of the same influence every day in the world around us. How often do individuals present themselves to our notice, whose views are evidently modified to a great extent by the peculiar cast of their moral character, or even their situation in life! We do not see the truth, in many instances, from no other cause than that we are unwilling to see it; we do not examine, or we examine under the influence of strong prejudice, and therefore cannot be convinced. Though belief, then, is entirely dependent on the nature and the strength of the evidence, unbelief, at all events, has its origin not unfrequently in the mind and heart of him who judges of the evidence. And is not this sufficient to show that man is responsible for his belief or disbelief in any given case? There is no doubt a class of truths which, from being purely intellectual, and therefore we are more likely to be uninfluenced in receiving them, are not fitted to entail guilt upon him who either receives or rejects them. There is neither merit nor demerit, right nor wrong, in either believing or denying such statements as those which the science of mathematics involves.

But when from mathematical we pass to moral truth, we must necessarily view the matter in a totally different light. Moral truth is fitted to operate both upon the affections and conduct of the individuals to whom it is addressed. Belief, as an abstract principle of the human mind, can exercise no possible influence either upon the heart or life; its whole practical efficacy must obviously depend upon the nature of the things believed. There are many truths; the belief of which involves no moral consequences, as is the case, in fact, with all strictly intellectual truths. It is only when the object believed is of a moral nature that any moral results follow the belief of it. The great mass of truths, however, with which man is conversant, are more or less entitled to the appellation of moral truths, as affecting, whether remotely or immediately, our moral character or condition. And in the belief of all such truths, the influence must be recognised of our moral upon our intellectual character. We do not receive or reject them as matters in which we have no possible interest; but they come home to us as statements involving results deeply affecting our actual character and condition.

Even in regard to such truths, however, the principle still holds, that the extent of our belief in them depends upon the evidence with which they are accompanied; always bearing in mind, however, the important fact, that our reception or rejection of such truths is not exclusively dependent upon the evidence, but is modified to a considerable extent by the peculiar feelings and affections with which we enter upon, and carry forward, the examination of the evidence. We feel as if personally interested in the subject, and therefore we are liable to be affected by a host of prepossessions and prejudices, from which we have the greatest difficulty in extricating ourselves.

That we are responsible, then, for our belief or disbelief of all such truths, is, evident from the fact, that we can resist the strongest evidence adduced in their favour. It is not alleged that, by a simple exercise of volition, uninfluenced by any motives, we reject the evidence; but this much is affirmed, that the influence of our moral feelings and character supplies powerful motives, which are sufficient to account for our disbelief of the truth and our rejection of the evidence by which it is supported. We do not act in such a case blindly; but, impelled by certain motives, we reject evidence as imperfect and unsatisfying, which would otherwise have been readily admitted. Now, the question comes to resolve itself into one which is applicable to particular cases only. What is the moral character of those motives which have led to the rejection of this evidence?—a question which comes strictly within the cognizance of the great Searcher of Hearts. By our fellow-man, who is incapable of scrutinizing motives, the question can never be satisfactorily answered. Hence, it is not right to say that man is responsible to man for his belief. No human being is in such a condition as enables him to judge of the extent to which an individual is warranted, or otherwise, in receiving or rejecting any moral statement. Yet such a claim hath often been put forward in the history of the world; and men have been subjected to the severest punishment which the civil laws can inflict, for their disbelief of particular abstract truths. To proceed on such a principle is nothing less than to arrogate the authority of the Supreme Being himself. To him alone belongs the power of ascertaining how far any man was culpable in rejecting any truth supported by a certain degree of evidence. The problem involves too many circumstances to come within the limited range of the human understanding; but by the great Omnipotent, the solution of this problem, intricate and perplexing though it be to the human mind, is easily accomplished. To God alone, therefore, is man responsible for his belief.

We freely admit, that if the matter were a mere abstract metaphysical question, involving no reference to man as he is at present constituted, but viewing belief simply as connected with evidence, it might not be so easy to support the doctrine of man's responsibility for his belief. But to render the matter at all intelligible, we must take into view the constitution and actual condition of man. It is not a question of pure metaphysics, but one which concerns the most important interests of man. It is right, therefore, to bear in mind, that it is from the fact, that in the intellectual constitution of man a foundation has been laid for belief; and that, in the moral constitution of man, there are certain elements which affect, to a considerable extent, the degree and even the very existence of our belief; it is from these two combined facts that the conclusion seems to be inevitable, that disbelief, in many cases of truths supported by satisfactory evidence, is not merely an intellectual error, but a moral crime, arising from a vicious state of the moral affections and feelings. Unbelief, in this sense, belongs not to the head, but to the heart; and it is the circumstance of such being its character, that renders man answerable to a Higher Power for his rejection of satisfactory evidence,—so satisfactory, in fact, that, had not his affections been depraved, he would have readily yielded to its force. There is, in the case now supposed be it observed, no defect in the evidence, at least no defect of such a nature as to warrant the rejection of the truth, but simply a defect in the actual condition of that mind which was engaged in judging of the evidence. It is not enough to reply, as is sometimes done, that the mind cannot believe or disbelieve any truth at pleasure; and therefore, belief not being a voluntary act, cannot be a subject of merit or demerit, praise or blame, reward or punishment. Such an objection does not apply to the circumstances of the case. It is quite true, that a man cannot believe without evidence, nay, without such evidence as is satisfactory to him; it is quite true, that a man cannot believe or disbelieve a truth at pleasure—he must be supplied with evidence so strong as to impel him to believe; but the question is, May he not reject that evidence, however strong? Undoubtedly, he may. But then his rejection may arise from the fact, that the evidence is not sufficiently strong to satisfy his mind. Be it so. Does his dissatisfaction originate purely in the weakness of the evidence, or, does it not rather originate in the state of his mind? We are reminded of this latter alternative by the fact, that there are many individuals to whom the same evidence has proved satisfactory and decisive. Are there no specialities in this man's case? Has he no prejudices against the truth? Has he entered upon the examination of the subject with that candour and impartiality which indicated a mind open to conviction? Has he conducted the investigation throughout in the same spirit, and with a perfect readiness to yield to the force of evidence? These are questions which, of course, no man can answer with certainty in regard to his own case, much less in regard to others. No individual is so intimately conversant with the latent feelings and motives which are ever operating in his mind, and influencing all his opinions and decisions, of every kind; and hence no individual can claim for himself, nor can he claim for others, that simplicity and purity of intention which is necessary to place him in such a condition that his belief shall be affected exclusively and solely by the force of the evidence which is brought forward. In such a case only would he be in the condition of a purely intellectual being, unaffected by those disturbing influences which have their origin in our moral feelings, and principles, and motives of action. In such a case only could he decide as to the precise force of the evidence in any given instance, uninfluenced by prejudice or passion. This state of mind, however, would in vain be sought in the world; and hence we are compelled to admit, among the circumstances which modify our belief, those varied moral feelings which so often sway the judgments and modify the sentiments of men: and the admission of this moral element alone is sufficient to show that man is, and must be, responsible for his belief; that principle being not simply an intellectual state, but a moral act, subject to all the fluctuations which attach to moral acts in general. It is affected by motives of different kinds; and that, of course, shows it to be a voluntary principle, to a certain extent. We can easily conceive a state of matters in which belief would be so exclusively dependent upon the evidence, as to become compulsory upon man. This, however, is not the situation in which man is placed. His free agency is called into operation, and his character put to the test, by the constant play of a thousand unseen influences and motives, which are modifying the decisions of his judgment, and transforming even his intellectual operations into moral acts. Hence it is impossible to calculate the effect which any given mass of evidence will have upon an individual's mind. Even our most sagacious conjectures on this head are often strangely disappointed.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

No. XII.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D.D.,

Minister of Cramond, Mid-Lothian.

"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."—PSAL. xxxvii. 37.

To a superficial observer of what is taking place in this world, it may seem that all is in disorder, that one event happens to the righteous and to the wicked; yea, that the wicked are often in the greatest prosperity in this world, and that the sorrows of the righteous abound. He may be at a loss to understand how such a state of things can be reconciled with the righteous administration of the holy God. The ungodly are ready to conclude, that the Lord does not regard what is done upon the earth; and even the ungodly have been in great perplexity, when perceiving how the wicked prosper. Thus was it with Asaph:—"I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked;" until he went into the sanctuary, and then he found out his mistake; "thou understood I their end."—Psalm lxxiii. And, in like manner, when we go to the Word of God, we learn there not to fret ourselves, or be disquieted by the prosperity of the wicked. Their seeming triumph is but short. Even in the midst of their prosperity they are not truly happy; "the little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." Their wicked devices against the godly are overruled for their good, and are made to return in vengeance upon their own heads: and the time hastens on when the wicked shall be no more, and when the reign of righteousness shall be every where triumphant,—when there shall be "a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

The psalm from which the quotation at the head of this Paper is taken, appears to have been intended to dispel the disquieting thoughts that may at times arise in the minds of the godly, from their imperfect knowledge of God's dispensations. It serves to open up to them the mysterious dealings of God, both with the righteous and the wicked, in the present state of things; and it serves the purpose of reconciling them to the darkest dispensations of Providence, as all proceeding from the righteous Ruler of the universe, in whose all-perfect administration matters are so ordered, that "it shall go well with the righteous, but it shall go ill with the wicked." Thus is it declared by the prophet Isaiah, "Say ye unto the righteous, it shall be well with him; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." In this psalm the states of the righteous and the wicked are set in opposition to each other. The wicked are often plotting against the righteous; but the righteous need not be disquieted. Many of their wicked purposes they are not permitted to accomplish; often, too, the plans which they have formed against the righteous are made to recoil upon their own heads, and they are taken in their own snare. "The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the needy, and to slay such as be of upright conversation. Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bow shall be broken." And even when they are permitted to execute their wicked purposes, the Lord overrules all for the good of his people. Nor have they the true enjoyment of prosperity even during the short time when all seems to go well with them; for they are without the blessing that "maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow therewith." But, to see in the most striking light the contrast between the state of the righteous and the state of the wicked, we must look at their "last end." "The wicked are driven away in their wickedness; but the righteous hath hope in his death." "I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree: yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace."

Having, in former Papers, stated a variety of cases of Christian experience, all going to show that true religion, wherever it is embraced, does change the heart and the life, and becomes a powerful and active principle of conduct, I have just one other case of Christian experience to set before the reader, namely, that of a Christian in the immediate prospect of death. This is evidently a case of great importance—it is one of the most trying situations in which a Christian can be placed; it is a case, too, in which all of us must, sooner or later, be placed; and it will bring our principles to the test, and will manifest of what sort they are. A variety of circumstances occur to render this case peculiarly trying. There is the arranging of all secular concerns, so far as can be done; there is the parting with all that is dear to us in this world; there is the prospect of entering upon a new, untried, and unchangeable state; there is the enduring, it may be, of great bodily pain and languor; there may be the assaults of the tempter; it is, moreover, the last opportunity which a Christian shall enjoy of glorifying God on earth, by leaving his dying testimony to God's truth, and faithfulness, and love. On all these accounts it is desirable that our attention should be directed to this case, and that we should learn how a Christian may be enabled to encounter this last enemy, and to obtain a peaceful, if not a triumphant, entrance into the heavenly inheritance.

1. To this subject our thoughts are directed in the portion of Scripture that is quoted at the head of this Paper. Before entering, however, upon the consideration of this comfortable experience of Christians in the immediate prospect of death, it may be proper to premise, in the first place, that it is not meant to assert that all Christians do, in an equal degree, enjoy uninterrupted peace in the immediate prospect of death. Many do so in a very high degree. But there are cases where, from the nervous state of the body, from the weakness of faith, or, it may be, in the sovereignty of God, there may not be that full enjoyment of peace which is so desirable in the trying hour. Their sun may set in a cloud. It holds true, however, even in such cases, of all true Christians, that their end is peace. They are safe in the hands of Christ, and death puts an end to all their doubts and fears, bringing them into the immediate presence of their Lord.

2. In the second place, I would premise, that if any of God's people have not the full assurance of faith and hope, in the immediate prospect of death, it is not because there is any lack of provision for their peace, and comfort, and joy, on the part of God, in the revelation of the Gospel; but because they have not suitably availed themselves of that abundant provision. We are not straitened in the Lord; let us not be straitened in our own bowels. "These things," saith Christ, "I have spoken to you, that in me ye may have peace. In the world, ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain with you, and that your joy may be full."

3. In the third place, I would premise that, since there is ample provision made in the Gospel for the support of Christians under all trials, and especially for their peace and joy in the immediate prospect of death, it is of great importance that they should gladly avail themselves of that provision before-hand, that they may have the benefit of it in the trying hour, when other sources of comfort fail, and are seen to be miserable comforters all of them. This is most desirable for Christians themselves, at a time when they would wish especially to be preserved in a calm, composed, and spiritual frame of mind. It is desirable, for their friends' and brethren's sakes, that they may be encouraged to look forward to that trying hour without over-anxious solicitude. And it is most of all desirable, that thereby Christians may glorify God, by bearing dying testimony to the faithfulness and love of their God and Saviour, and may, in the lively exercise of faith, adopt the triumphant language of the Psalmist, "This God is our God for ever and ever: he will be our guide, even unto death." Keeping these remarks in mind, let us now contemplate the experience of Christians in the near prospect of death.

The description of their experience, in the words of the Psalmist, quoted at the head of this Paper, is short, but very comprehensive, interesting, and delightful. It is said of them, not simply that their end is peaceful, but absolutely that their "end is peace"—such a peace as diffuses a sweet calm, composure, and rest, over the whole frame. Nor need this be matter of wonder, when it is considered that it is peace with God, through the Lord Jesus Christ. It is "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," that keeps the heart and mind through Jesus Christ. It is peace "which the world cannot give, and which the world cannot take away." Christ hath left it as a legacy to his disciples. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your hearts be troubled, neither let them be afraid." What renders the prospect of death alarming, is the thought of God's righteous displeasure against sin, the terror of a guilty conscience, and the awful foreboding of judgment to come. But the enjoyment of peace with God, through the Lord Jesus, delivers from such gloomy apprehensions; "for there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." "Christ hath delivered us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Again, this peace of God proves a safeguard against the assaults of the wicked one. They are assured that none shall be able to pluck them out of the hands of Christ. Satan is, with regard to them, a vanquished enemy. He may rage and storm against them, and occasion them no small annoyance, but he cannot deprive them of their peace; and they rest assured that God shall bruise Satan under their feet shortly. Again, as to their bidding farewell to this world, and all connected with it, they can the more easily be reconciled to that, because they are going to a better country—a land of perfect peace, where they shall be for ever freed from all the toils and troubles, all the trials and temptations, all the sorrows and disappointments of this weary wilderness—a land where “the wicked cease from troubling, where the weary are at rest.” Again, Is the prospect of parting with near and dear relatives and friends naturally painful?—The enjoyment of this peace with God inspires with the hope of again enjoying the company of their dear friends in Christ, in much more favourable circumstances, and where they shall never more be separated from them. Again, Have they the prospect of leaving those ordinances of God’s grace, which had often been sweet and refreshing to their souls?—It is that they may engage in the nobler services of the heavenly sanctuary. And, finally, Is there something revolting to the feelings, in the prospect of a separation being made between soul and body?—They who enjoy peace with God, through the Lord Jesus Christ, are assured that, “when absent from the body they shall be present with the Lord,” which is far better than any thing that can be enjoyed in this world; so that, in this blessed hope, they may say with Simeon, “Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.”

Now, whence do Christians derive this peace that proves so effectual a support to them in the immediate prospect of death? It is God who bestows it; for it is the peace of God. “I create the fruit of the lips. Peace, peace to him that is afar off, and to him that is near,” saith the Lord. And saith the Psalmist, “I will hear what God the Lord will speak; for he will speak peace to his people, and to his saints; but let them not turn again to folly.” And the Lord speaks this peace through the Lord Jesus Christ; for Christ came preaching peace, through the blood of atonement. He is our peace, who hath made both one, and who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us. It is, then, in believing the testimony which God hath given concerning his Son, that we may be said to lay hold of God’s strength, that we may make peace with him; and then we shall make peace with him. And the Holy Spirit is eminently the agent of conveying this peace into the soul. The fruit of the Spirit is peace. And all who believe have the Spirit of Christ dwelling in them, uniting them to Christ, taking of the things of Christ, and showing them unto them, and filling their minds with all joy and peace in believing. And this peace is established and confirmed in them, by a believing contemplation of the exceeding great and precious promises, which are in Christ, yea, and amen for ever. And it is farther established, by that near intercourse which they are permitted to enjoy with their God and Saviour in the ways of his appointment. When, in their attendance upon the ordinances of his grace, God is pleased to lift upon them the light of his countenance, this puts gladness into their hearts, more than can be enjoyed in the greatest abundance of earthly good things.

It may be remarked, too, that God is often pleased to grant special tokens of his love to his people in the near prospect of death. He knows their need of support in that trying hour, and manifests himself graciously present with them, to strengthen their faith, to establish their hope, and to unfold to them something of the unseen glory of the spiritual and eternal world. On such occasions, they seemed hardly to feel their bodily pains, all earthly objects seemed to vanish, their souls were enraptured with the glorious prospects before them; and they were ready to begin that song of triumph, “O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.” Such we find has been the experience of God’s people, in what is recorded of their history in the Scriptures. Thus Jacob, on the eve of his departure from this world, was inspired to foretell his sons what should befall their posterity in the latter days. And in the midst of his farewell address, he pauses, to express his own happy experience in the prospect before him of coming to the full enjoyment of that salvation for which he had been waiting. “I have waited for thy salvation, O God!” Thus Joshua, when about to go the way of all living, bears his dying testimony to the faithfulness of God in fulfilling to the people of Israel all that he had promised; and engages them solemnly to renew their covenant with God. And thus David, in the near prospect of death, lays fast hold of God’s covenant. These be the last words of David. “Nevertheless God hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure. This is all my salvation, and all my desire.” And to come to New Testament times, Behold aged Simeon, with the child Jesus in his arms, exclaiming in rapture, “Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.” Thus the Apostle Paul, in the near prospect of death, exclaims in the language of triumph, “I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord will bestow on me on that day; and not on me only, but on all who love his appearing.” And there have not been wanting many testimonies of the people of God in former and in latter times, who have had special manifestations of God’s favour made to them in the immediate prospect of death. Out of many that might have been adduced, take the three following as a specimen. Mr Matthew Henry, when dying, said to those around him,

"You have been used to take notice of the sayings of a dying man. This is mine, A life spent in the service of God, and in communion with God, is the most comfortable life any one can live in this world." Mr Toplady, on his death-bed, said, "It will not be long before God take me; for no mortal man can live after the glories which God has manifested to my soul." And Mr Haliburton exclaimed on his death-bed, "Glory, glory to him! What do I see? I have never seen any thing like it. O, what of God do I see? The beginning and the end of religion is wonderfully sweet! I long for his salvation! I bless his name, I have found him! I am taken up in blessing him! I am dying rejoicing in the Lord!"

It will not be deemed unsuitable to close this Paper, and the whole subject of Christian experience, by suggesting a few hints respecting preparation for death. All, I am sure, must be convinced that it is desirable to die the death of the righteous, and to have our last end like his. There is what may be termed habitual preparation for death, consisting in our being found united to Christ by faith, and having faith in lively exercise, and in our leading a godly life, keeping consciences void of offence towards God and towards man, a life of close walking with God. Here is the great security for a peaceful end. "Great peace have they that love thy law; and nothing shall offend them." "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is staid on thee, because he trusteth in thee. Trust ye in the Lord for ever; for with the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength." But in addition to what may be called habitual preparation, it is desirable that there should be actual preparation for the approach of death. And on this subject, I would suggest those few hints. 1. Let Christians set apart some seasons for a serious contemplation of their latter end, for bringing the thoughts of death near. 2. Let them guard against being much entangled with the cares of this world; that they may be ready to quit their hold of this world at the call of God. 3. Let them treasure up in their minds some of those portions of Scripture that may be suitable for a dying hour. 4. Let them read carefully the accounts that are on record of those who have finished their course with joy. 5. Let them often contemplate the rapid flight of time—the near approach of eternity. 6. Let them often meditate on the rest that remaineth for the people of God. And finally, Let them plead earnestly with God for his gracious presence to be with them in the trying hour; that they may fear no evil, that they may rise above all slavish fear of death, that they may bear dying testimony to his faithfulness and love, and that they may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.

AT PARTING.

BLESS'D be the dear uniting love
That will not let us part:
Our bodies may far off remove,
But we are join'd in heart.

Join'd in one spirit to our Head,
We wait his will to know,
That we in all his steps may tread,
And do his work below.

O may we ever walk in him,
And nothing know beside,
Nothing desire, nor aught esteem,
But Jesus crucified!

To him still closer let us cleave,
And all his laws embrace;
Expect his fulness to receive,
And grace to answer grace.

(A SKETCH.)

It was on a beautiful day in autumn, when the sky was dark blue—the sun bright and lovely, in his shining through a thin bracing September air, and the little white clouds scattered and spread here and there over the face of the heaven, to add to the beauty of the upper scene, that I went out to wind my way among the hills, and especially to visit a little lonely cottage on the moor. The heath was yet in purple, but its purple was in decay. The "dear hair" was long and shaggy, but lovely to look upon, and suggested to my fancy, by its similarity in appearance to that after which it has been named, the time when the red deer roamed or bounded among the solitary mountains of B—— now clustering around me. The "flying bent," &c., seen here and there, in spots of white on the summits of the hills, like the marks of coming decay on the head of the yet fresh man of middle age, made me say of the year in moralising mood—"it seems to have become aged before its time." The mowers, with their glittering scythes, were cutting down the sprettis of the bog for winter hay and fodder for their flocks, which made me think and shrink at the thought of the coming storms, which might again soon visit us in our dreary solitudes; but the words of the poet of the Seasons spoke to my remembrance, and, in something like the language of reproof, admonished me—

"These as they change, Almighty Father;
These are but the varied God:
The rolling year is full of Thee."

But now looking before me as I sauntered slowly along, I saw, at a little distance, the lonely cottage of "the common;" and as my visit was to an aged and only surviving sister, a few days after the funeral of her still more aged relative that had been removed from her by death, the words of the Psalmist now led me on in musing mood, and in sympathizing thoughts, to the cottage door—"Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth."

I lifted the latch by a small string hanging out at a little hole in the centre of "the fence," in the shape of a door, but I found no access. On turning to leave the little solitary abode, I felt a sort of regret, not so much at having gone so far, but at not finding her on whom my mind had been set. Having turned a few steps, however, and moving homeward, I heard the sound of a feeble female voice at a little distance behind me. On looking up the steep and towering hill that rose above the cottage, I saw two frail female figures approaching, either of which might be my aged, solitary, and mourning friend; but the foremost, carrying a few peats in "a plaid" on her back, motioned me to look on her frail companion following a few steps behind. That was Betty——. On our reaching the door together, I was spared the trouble of first speaking, by my old friend making, in her own peculiar manner, the following simple appeal and apology:—"Oh, Sir, we're happy to see ye. Ye'll wonder that I hae been out the day, and sae soon i' the mornin' too. But the pickle peats hae never been heedit syne my sister Chirsty turned ill. An they're sae wet, Sir, that Tibby, my niece, and I, thought it was our duty to gae out this fine mornin' and sort them up, though our hearts are e'en heavy." And here she gave a feeble sigh, and secretly wiped her eyes with her sleeve. "Our hearts are e'en heavy, we have had a stroke—a heavy stroke of bereavement since we last saw you; but she has been long, long lent to us. We are not to mourn as those who have no hope. While we are in the world we are to look after the things of the world, though the form and the fashion of it passeth away. Indeed, 'tis said, 'Be not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.'"

By this time we had entered and seated ourselves. Betty had taken her own little old chair, in which she had always used to sit. Tibby had placed herself on a low stool close by my side, while the arm chair in which Chirsty had ever been accustomed to preside had been previously set in near the fire for me. We remained silent for a little after we had been thus seated, and the silence gave me an opportunity for putting a few questions in order to engage and lead out the conversation. Had your sister been long ailing, said I, before she had been confined to bed? for I had not seen them for a few months, as they were at a considerable distance from me; and, moreover, belonged not to me as a part of my flock. "She had been for a considerable time falling off, Sir. She had seen a long, long age, being upwards of fourscore and five; and we have had the assurance and experience of what the Scripture says, 'The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow: for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.' Ay, ay! that used to be a Psalm we often repeated together.

* Threescore and ten years do sum up
Our days and years, we see;
Or if, by reason of more strength,
In some fourscore they be."

She had been ailing, as I said, for some time, but had for about six weeks been confined to bed, with growing infirmity and weakness, and especially with a violent pain in her right side, and had no ease, except when a heated smoothing-iron was applied to the place; but still she was patient, very patient, and resigned to the will of Him who doeth all things well." Pleased with this answer, and especially with the way and manner in which she expressed it, I asked her if her sister had ever said to her that she thought she was dying. "Oh!" said Tibby, who had been listening to the conversation, and looking at me shyly, "I think she thought she was in a dangerous way. It is very strange," added she, "and we couldna account for't, that when she was engaged in religious exercises she had neither pain of body nor mind; and she spent a great part of her time in bed, repeating psalms and portions of Scripture, and offering up fervent prayers and praises to God, through the merits of her blessed Saviour." "But how do you think," said Betty, roused from a fixed thoughtfulness into which she had fallen, and turning her little quick black eye with a bright gleam on me, "how do you think it happened that her pain left her on these occasions; for it was hie ordinar?" We cannot say that we can fully explain this, said I; but you know as well as I do, Betty, that the soul and the body are very intimately connected, and that what affects the one most readily and invariably affects the other. They are, in fact, sharers of one another's sufferings, and partakers of one another's joys; and we should fondly hope, that the holy delight and fervour of your sister's mind was a means, in the hand of the great Physician, for allaying the pain, and causing her at the same time to experience, and to sing, in feeble voice, as I think you said she did:—

"My flesh and heart doth faint and fall,
But God doth fail me never:
For of my heart God is the strength
And portion for ever."

Betty, your sister, was the oldest descendant of the old race and "remnant" that lived here in the days of the venerable B——. Now there are but a few, and a very few, of the descendants of that ancient race residing among us. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth for ever." The first person who died in this place, after my coming to live among this people, was an aged, pious and devoted female; not only a descendant of the old race of your fathers, but one of the nearest relatives at the time of the venerable man whose name we have mentioned. She lay on her death-bed insensible to every sound, and apparently unconscious of every thing passing around her. While she gave no symptoms, however, of hearing or "heeding" any word addressed to her by any one, when her pious and affectionate son joined in worship with his family by her bed-side, she raised her voice in the tune, and with the same words that were sung by the rest, as in the days of her health:—

"Yes, though I walk in death's dark vale,
Yet will I fear none ill;
For thou art with me, and thy rod
And staff me comfort still;"

and immediately afterwards she sunk into the same apparent insensibility and stupor as before, and continued so till she breathed her last; and we fondly hope she fell asleep in Jesus, to join in his praises before the throne. "This also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts, who is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working." My aged friend drew nearer to me; all her reserve was now rubbed off. "Oh! Sir, I am much pleased that ye came to see us to-day. If you will but bear with me, I will tell you something about our way of living here together,—or rather, of the way in which we have lived together, in our lonely and solitary habitation. The great work of our salvation must not be put off to a death-bed; a sick-bed has plenty to do with itself. Many are the nights that we (her that's away and I) have, in the dead hour of the darkness—for one bed was the resting-place for us both,—repeated over together the Shorter Catechism, trying to understand it by our little explanations. We have had many sweet meditations on the Word of God, after repeating portions of it to each other, when no other ear heard us but the ear of our ever blessed Father in heaven. Oh! Sir, I'm not ashamed to say, that we have often raised the psalm of praise at the still, solemn hour of midnight, and have felt and experienced a joy 'which the world cannot give, and which the world cannot take away,' when engaged in the exercise:

"When I do Thee upon my bed
Remember with delight,
And when on Thee I meditate
In watches of the night," &c.

* And we have repeated a chapter from the prophets, or from the epistles; and my sister, after it was finished, offered up the midnight prayer. O I remember well, and I hope you'll bear with my recital, and, believe me, it comes from a sincere and humble heart. I remember how she used to pray for her dear friends—for the old and the young—and for the whole Church of the Redeemer, and that its boundaries might be extended. Eut, dear Sir," added she, "let me yet speak a little more about her that's away!" In her youth, after she had been married, she went with her husband to live in the Highlands. She felt that she was far from her own home, and far from all her own dear friends. She had few she could speak to, but she had Him whose word shall ever stand, and she took his promise; and from that time, with that promise, she has often told me, she thought that she was inwardly supported, and could ever after fix all her reliance on the Lord, as her righteousness and strength,— 'And in the day of trouble great,

See that thou call on Me;
I will deliver thee, and thou
My name shalt glorify.'

*** "Her husband died from home, and suddenly, at P——, about sixteen years ago. She was for a time much dejected, but these words of assurance came to her,—and they were not merely a passing support, but as a staff to her steps—'A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widow, is God in his holy habitation.' I have detained you too long, Sir," said she; "but what I have said is a sincere and simple account of her for several years. When she took her last illness, she had a strong desire to be prayed for in the church. This was put off; and, I fear, we did wrong, on the score of prudence, as we belonged to a different denomination of professing Christians." I immediately freed her from her little gutter of embarrassment, by remarking, that I fondly hoped that on her bed of languishing, her fellowship was with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ!

"Precious Bible! what a treasure
Does the Word of God afford!
All I wait for life or pleasure,
Food or med'cine, shield or sword,
Let the world account me poor,
Having Thee, I need no more!"

On the last morning of her life, she received a little nourishment; after which, she seemed to fall into a sleep, and seemed to sleep soundly. She breathed loud, and by degrees lower and lower, till she fell asleep. Oh, 'I fondly hope she fell asleep in Jesus!

"In vain my fancy strives to paint
The moment after death;
The glory that surrounds the saints,
When yielding up their breath.

"One gentle sigh their fetters breaks:
We scarce can say, 'They're gone!'
Before the willing spirit takes Her mansion near the throne.

"Faith strives, but all her efforts fail,
To trace her in her flight:
No eyes can pierce within the veil,
Which hides the world of light."

THOUGHTS ON THE RESPONSIBILITY OF MAN FOR HIS BELIEF.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

THE influence of our moral upon our intellectual constitution is exemplified in all the various subjects to which the human mind is applied; but the class of truths in which it is most apparent is moral truths, which are addressed more especially to the heart, and are fitted to affect both the moral character and feelings. To them, then, more than to any other, do the remarks in reference to responsibility apply. In our judgments, generally, with the exception, perhaps, of those which are purely abstract, we are more or less affected by our moral principles; but in our moral judgments, the influence is too obvious to escape the notice of even the most superficial observer. It is not, then, of belief as an intellectual, but as a moral act, that we assert responsibility; and it is only in so far as it is so that it can ever be liable to either praise or blame. Pure intellectual acts being mere acts of the understanding, can neither be moral nor immoral; but when the moral nature of man is taken into view, connected with its influence upon the operations of the intellect, we are driven to the belief of man's responsibility in his present state for every act of the understanding. It is not sufficient to say that had the evidence been stronger in some cases than it is, conviction would have taken the place of doubt or even of disbelief; but the question is, whether the evidence, such as it is, has been examined, and weighed with that simplicity and sincerity which ought ever to characterise the candid inquirer after truth? Has ample justice been done to the degree of evidence, which has been presented to the mind, so that nothing is wanting on our part, but all is due to the deficiency of the evidence? Could such a case occur, culpability could not be charged upon the inquirer. All that the nature of the circumstances demanded had been accomplished, and yet conviction had not resulted. There is here plainly either a defect in the man's understanding, or a defect in the evidence which is presented to it; and neither of those can render the inquirer culpable. We are supplying hypotheses, however, instead of facts. In the great mass of instances, moral truths are rejected not from any defect of understanding, but from a perversion of understanding; not from any want of evidence, but from a neglect of evidence, such as it is, which has been set before them.

While, then, evidence is the ground and the measure of belief, a certain state of mind is necessary to appreciate that evidence, and it is quite possible, that a man may so weaken and pervert his understanding by the indulgence of evil habits and feelings, that he may become incapable of seeing the force of evidence, which to another man is quite satisfactory. "Both as intellectual and moral beings," says Dr Abercrombie, in his inaugural address delivered in Marischal College, Aberdeen, "The great agent by which we are acted upon is truth. Truth derives its power from evidence; and there are laws of evidence which are in their nature as absolute and immutable as the laws of physical relations. But for the operation of them, a state of mind itself is required, and without this, even the best evidence may be deprived of its power to produce conviction. For the result of evidence upon the mind depends on close and continued attention; and this is a voluntary process, which every one may be able to perform. It is on this ground, therefore, that we hold a man to be responsible for his belief; and contend that he may incur deep moral guilt in his disbelief of moral truths, which he has examined in a frivolous or prejudiced manner; or which, perhaps, he indulges in the miserable affectation of disbelieving, without having examined them at all."

So clearly, in fact, may the responsibility of man for his belief be deduced from the structure of the human mind, that the denial of it could only have arisen from an imperfect mental analysis—so imperfect, indeed, that one of the great elements which enter into the nature of man, even as an intellectual being—his moral feelings, has been overlooked. It is impossible to keep before us the fact, that the moral feelings of man influence and modify his intellectual acts, and yet deny the responsibility of man for every process of his mind as well as for every affection of his heart, and every action of his life. Man is not thus independent of that great Being to whom he owes the high station he holds as a being endowed with intelligence. The whole aspect of his nature impresses upon us the consideration that he is throughout a moral agent. It is not in one department that he is amenable to a higher power, while in another he is independent and irresponsible. The arrangements of Providence are uniform. Man is responsible in one point, and he is responsible in all. If it is the fact that he is a moral agent, which thus renders him liable to be called to account, the morality of his constitution is apparent even in his intellectual acts; and the moral and mental nature being thus indissolubly connected, it is impossible so to dis sever them as to assert that while for the acts of the one we must render an account, for the acts of the other we will be subjected to no such scrutiny. Before this can be believed, the line of demarcation must be shown, which separates the actings of the one from the actings of the other. No such line, however, exists. We think, and feel, and act, in a manner simultaneously, and as it is impossible to point to a single action which is not the result of a mental process, it is impossible to point to a mental process, which is not more or less connected with the moral feelings. Such and so complicated is the nature of man; requiring, in order to ascertain the degree of criminality which attaches to any one act, whether mental or moral, the all-scrutinising eye of Omniscience itself. But it is no reason surely why we should deny the moral character of our mental acts, that we are unable to state in precise terms the degree of influence which has been exercised in any one instance. That there is a connection intimate and indissoluble between the two departments of our nature, can scarcely be denied. It is apparent in the prejudices which affect all our opinions and judgments of whatever kind; it is apparent in almost every view we take of evidence. And if the mental and the moral be thus inseparably blended, it is impossible to escape the doctrine of man's responsibility.

In arguing, however, in favour of a doctrine which has of late years assumed peculiar prominence, it is right that the candid admission should be made, that we attach little importance to the argument brought by the supporters of man's responsibility, and, among the rest, by Dr Abercrombie, from the voluntary nature of attention. In Dr Brown's explanation of that power, as it is imagined to be, of the human mind, we agree, that it is simply a mental act rendered more intense by the co-existence of a moral feeling of whatever kind. It is at this point, in fact, that the influence of the moral upon the intellectual constitution of man, becomes apparent. A feeling has been excited by a mental act, which, in its turn, gives rise to a peculiarly intense mental act, which is termed attention. It is not, however, the voluntary character of the act, which connects it with the responsibility of man; it is its moral character as co-existing with, and influenced by, a moral feeling. If by a voluntary act of mind be meant an act arising from an independent self-determining power of the will, it is impossible for us to admit the possibility of its existence, believing, as we do, the law of sequence to be equally constant in mind as in matter. An independent exertion of will, therefore,—that is an exertion of will independently of an antecedent state of mind as its origin,—we conceive to be impossible. But it is not necessary to the maintenance of man's responsibility, that such a self-originating effort of mind should be conceded. It is enough for our purpose, that with all our mental acts there co-exist moral feelings, which of themselves impart a moral character to the intellectual acts, and on this fact we ground the responsibility of man for his belief, not indeed to his fellow-man, but to his God.

TWILIGHT.

I STILL must love the twilight hour,
When hanging o'er the mountain's height,
In various hues, fantastic tow'r
The clouds, illum'd by streaked light.

Twilight! it sheds a solemn calm:
Oh! then, alone, in pensive mood
I love to eye the misty lawn—
The browner shade that clothes the wood.

At such a time I oft recall
The sportive scenes of youthful years—
Trace back my earliest bliss; and all
In softer, lovelier hue appears.

Twilight! it was my fav'rite time,
E'er yet a city I had known,
In solitary thought, sublime,
To wander thy dim scenes alone!

When the blue hare-bell hung its head,
The flower cup's tender leaves were closed,
Day's broader flaunting glories fled—
When all was tranquil and composed :

The chirping of the nest-going bird,
The wood-dove's melancholy moan,
At intervals alone disturbed
The walk that Silence call'd her own.

The dew-drop on the violet—
Mild, modest, unassuming plant,
Where brightest tints with crimson meet,
The yellow with the dark lines blent ;

I've brushed it, as I walked alone,
And I have felt my sandals wet
While coming o'er some rustic song,
Heedless how I my steps have set.

Aye, it was pleasant, and I still Must love the evenings I have passed,
When, by the Gilburn's brattling side *
I eyed the glories of the west,

And marked the ling'ring ruddy glow
Playing around Dumait's head, †
After the sun had sunk below
The far-horizon's burnished red.

While gazing on the lovely scene,
I thought that on the dark'ning sky
I saw, e'en in the shadowy gleam,
An emblem of eternity.

Eternity! how dark!—and can
I ever thoughtlessly forget
What awful light must burst on man
When his last waning sun is set?

Can I forget, that 'neath that sky
Ending or change comes never, never;
As the tree falls so must it lie,
In weal or wo, ever, ever?

AIKMAN.

"AN OLD DISCIPLE."

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. THOMAS DOIG, A. M., Minister of Torryburn, Fifeshire.

"There went with us also certain disciples of Cesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge."—ACTS XXI. 16.

WHILST a splendid painting will be found to attract general admiration, its minuter beauties will be appreciated only by a few. So it is that many a portion of the inspired narrative is regarded. The majority are aware of the interest which, as an entire piece, it is fitted to create; and own its power, thus considered, to rivet their attention; but they overlook a variety of minuter beauties that adorn it. The several statements, or sentiments, embodied in a connected portion of Scripture are admitted, it is true, to be worthy of the place they occupy; because each of them is known to have contributed towards the filling up of the inspired composition; just as the several touches of the artist's pencil are acknowledged to have been worthily bestowed, because they have contributed individually towards the production of an admired master-piece. But as the minuter sketches of the painter, when viewed apart from the picture in its entire form, are often overlooked, under the impression that they exhibit little or nothing to interest the beholder; so, many of the more brief notices in the Sacred Record are imagined to be of little or no moment, apart from the connected portion of Scripture with which they are associated.

Amongst the notices in Scripture which have often thus been overlooked, may perhaps be numbered the statement in our text,—“There went with us also certain of the disciples of Cesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge.” In as far, indeed, as it concerns the name, the employment, or the general history of the individual here introduced to our notice, there may not be much room for comment or remark; but in the designation of “an old disciple,” by which he is characterised, there is undoubtedly that which is fitted to awaken our interest, and to convey to us important instruction.

Viewed even in connection with the situation of the Apostle Paul at the time, the statement regarding Mnason as his travelling companion, with whom he was afterwards to lodge, is not without its value. On every occasion, and especially amidst the more trying scenes of his life, he appears to have drawn peculiar comfort from the society of Christian friends. Thus, when the brethren came out to meet him at Appii Forum, he “thanked God, and took courage.” Their visit was the more prized by him, as a thousand sorrows must then have pierced his heart. Now, so it was on the occasion referred to in our text. He was then journeying to Jerusalem; and knew, by means of a prophetic warning, that “bonds and imprisonment awaited him” there. Thus situated, the companionship of one who stood conspicuous in the Church, as “an old disciple,”—whose conversion was not of yesterday, and who had long since risen above the station of a “babe in Christ,”—would be felt by him to be no ordinary privilege. The enlarged views which such an one must have acquired of the truth as it is in Jesus, his lengthened experience of the manner of God's dealings with his people, together with the example he had been enabled to exhibit of a steadfast adherence to the faith, would qualify him for imparting to the apostle an amount of consolation which others were not so eminently fitted to communicate; and thus an interesting illustration is afforded of the fact, that when God sees it meet to subject his people to any trial of unusual severity, he mingles with the cup of bitterness some special ingredients of spiritual joy.

The character of an old disciple, of one who has been long a believer in Christ, exhibits, as an object of contemplation, much that is fitted both to interest and instruct. This will appear,

I. If we advert to his superior attainments in religious knowledge.—There is such a thing as growth in grace; and, in like manner, there is such a thing as progress in a saving knowledge of the truth. As it was with the blind man whom our Lord cured at Bethsaida, so one may be enabled, at a certain stage of his spiritual illumination, to say, "I see men as trees walking;" and, in the case of some, a considerable time may elapse before they can apply the faculty of vision to a distinct discernment of objects. There may be a period in the history of one's discipleship, as there was in that of Apollon, when it may be necessary to "expound unto him the way of God more perfectly." His eyes may have been opened to a perception of his wretchedness as a sinner, and of the grace of God in the work of his redemption, while much may still be awaiting to give to his creed the character of order and consistency; and, because of partial and ill-arranged views of the Gospel, he may be exposed to many doubts and fears, and be involved in much perplexity and distress.

But the old disciple, the man who has been conversant with the truth during a long succession of years, has advanced beyond the mere rudiments of the faith. With a grasp, enlarged as well as firm, of the articles which lie at the foundation of the system, he has learned so to connect these with the minor points in the evangelical scheme, as to view them in their due proportion as entering into a composition of the most perfect harmony. Whilst the young convert may have difficulty in discerning many of the parts of the revelation presented to him in any other light than that of a given number of distinct and separate truths,—the man to whom the same truths have long been familiar, is enabled to connect them all with Christ, as their grand centre. In each of them he perceives an intimate relation to the great Redeemer, on whose fulness, as Emmanuel, they necessarily depend.

Is he so struck, for instance, with the majesty of the Divine law, as to be convinced that not one jot or tittle of its requirements can pass till all be fulfilled? These, his views of the eternity and immutability of its demands, have made him aware of the impossibility of any fallen creature being justified, by his obedience, before God; but, by means of these views, his conceptions of the riches of that grace which is treasured up in Christ are enlarged; and so, in like manner, is his prospect enlarged of the sacrifice of the Cross, as the foundation of a sinner's hope; while, at the same time, a disclosure is made to him, in all its brightness, of the glory of the Most High, as it shines in the fulfilment of the law, on the one hand, whose demands the Redeemer's atonement has satisfied; and in the blessings of a free salvation, on the other, which the believing penitent enjoys through the Redeemer's imputed righteousness.

Is he arrested by the sentiment, so emphatically announced in Scripture, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord?" He is reminded, in consequence, more forcibly than ever, of the preciousness of the work of the Holy Spirit, in applying to the soul the benefits purchased by Christ; and is led, accordingly, by prayer, with thanksgiving for the grace imparted to him, to look for a larger measure of that which alone can quicken him in the path of duty.

Thus his heart is stayed on the Almighty. His views of God in Christ, as his reconciled God and gracious Father, have been so blessed to him, as they have advanced in consistency and clearness, that he is "filled with joy and peace in believing." His knowledge is mature, and a strength and symmetry are imparted to his sentiments, to which, in many respects, the young convert is a stranger.

II. It is interesting and instructive to contemplate the character of an old disciple, because of the experience he has acquired of the manner of God's dealings with his people.—The aspect of one at his outset in the world, especially if the profession he has embraced be of an arduous or perilous character, is associated with much that is interesting. It is thus that we look upon the sailor boy, as he embarks for the first time on the ocean, to pursue his voyage to some distant shore; yet his case does not awaken a sentiment of regard like that of the hoary-headed mariner, who for forty or fifty years has traversed the billows of the deep, and whose dark and furrowed countenance reminds us of the storms he has encountered and of the difficulties he has overcome. It is the experience through which he has passed that elicits our interest so powerfully in his behalf.

To be aware of that diversity which may obtain in the matter of experience, we have only to consider the case of several generations of a family, including a father, a son, and a grandson, residing under the same roof. Each of these individuals may be supposed to have a measure of experience in regard to the ordinary affairs of life. But the experience of the son will be greater than that of the grandson; while that of the father will exceed the comparatively enlarged experience of the son. Or, if our illustration be drawn from the case of a religious family, we may imagine Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, dwelling together as heirs of the same promises. Jacob, who was about fifteen years of age at the time of Abraham's death, must ere then have known something of the manner of God's dealings with him, as a member of the chosen family; although far less than his father Isaac, who had been so much longer a sojourner in Canaan. Yet even the more extended experience of Isaac was not to be compared with that of Abraham, who, during an entire century, had been leading a life of faith in the promises, and marking, as a pilgrim, the way by which God had conducted him.

The workings of Divine grace, it is true, are wonderful; and it is difficult to say how soon one's experience, after conversion, may become deep and powerful, as well as rich and varied. For the most part, however, the young disciple is deficient in an experimental acquaintance with God's treatment of his people. It is only by degrees, as he is led by a way which he knew not, that he forms a proper estimate of this important feature in the Christian life. Even the great apostle of the Gentiles, with all the high gifts imparted to him to qualify him for his work, was not, in respect of an experimental knowledge of the ways of God, when he first preached the Gospel in Damascus, what he afterwards became, when he had been "in labours more abundant than his brethren, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft." It was a far more extended experience that he had acquired of the manner of the Lord's dealings with his people, when he could say, that, for Christ's sake, he had been "in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by his own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." These, the manifold trials to which he was subjected, viewed in connection with that grace which enabled him amidst all his sorrows to rejoice, furnished him with matter of religious experience, to which, at the commencement of his evangelical career, he was necessarily a stranger.

It is a privilege, which none but an old disciple can fully enjoy, to review the many mazes of the path which he has traversed, and to feel that in all of these the hand of the Lord has been upon him for good. What a variety of scenes must have passed under the eye of him who, for forty, fifty, or sixty years, has known his God and Saviour! What dangers he must have escaped! What difficulties he must have encountered! What obstacles he must have surmounted! What mercies he must have experienced! What deliverances must have been vouchsafed to him! What special manifestations of an overruling Providence must have compassed him about! All are so many passages in his religious history, which must have given a superior tone to his sentiments, and contributed powerfully towards the development of his character. Many of the ways of God, which at one time appeared to him dark and intricate, have at length come home to his apprehension as equally necessary and gracious; and those of the dispensations of Divine Providence, which once filled him with desponding thoughts, he has since learned to regard as the most endearing testimonies of his Father's love.

The man who has newly entered on the Christian life, may doubtless have tasted much of the loving-kindness of the Lord,—in his experience of that sweetly-constraining influence which has drawn him to the Saviour, or even in connection with the terror which he felt before a view was given him of God in Christ as his reconciled Father. But it is reserved for the old disciple to review the subsequent care and kindness of his Lord, with a thousand illustrations of the animating truth, that He who remembered him originally in his low estate, has ever since been his faithful Shepherd, by whom all his wants have been supplied. Whilst able to declare how the first application to his soul of God's gracious provision was adequate to quicken him to a new and spiritual life, he can also tell how it has often since restored him when ready to faint, and imparted to him strength according to his day. Under the influence of this lengthened and growing experience, he knows that the good work which the Holy Spirit has begun within him will be performed until the day of Christ; and, as his table has already been so often richly furnished, and his cup of mercies made to run over, he is satisfied that goodness and loving-kindness will follow him all the days of his life, and that the house of the Lord will be his portion for ever.

III. How interesting and instructive, as an object of contemplation, is the character of an old disciple, will appear, if we advert to the long continued example which he has necessarily exhibited of the power of religion over his soul.—There is much, in the season of spring, that is pleasing. The sight of the bursting clouds, and of the green herb rising above the surface of the earth, and imparting a freshness to the face of nature, is a spectacle which we delight to look upon. But it is difficult to divest ourselves of the thought, that the frosts of the night may check the vegetation; that, under a scorching sun, it may wither and die, or that the lightning of heaven may blast it for ever. However pleasing, then, the appearance of spring, with the richness of its verdure, it is not to be compared with the mellowness of autumn, when the tender plant has triumphed over accident and danger, and is seen bending under the weight of a golden luxuriance.

Although the young convert, from the commencement of his religious career, may exhibit decided evidence of the transforming power of his principles, it is not at once, perhaps, that the change is noticed; and, apart from that which may afterwards invest his character with unusual weight, and attach to it a more than common celebrity, it is often difficult at first to persuade the world of the sincerity of the convert. It is the old disciple—the man who, during a long succession of years, has adorned the doctrine of his God and Saviour, and has held fast his integrity amidst a thousand snares, and in opposition to a host of enemies—it is the character of this description that gives to the Gospel a resistless evidence, as fraught with a holy tendency.

Imagine, in illustration of this, the case of Caleb and Joshua, who followed the Lord fully, during the entire course of the journeying of the Israelites in the wilderness. These illustrious individuals, at the very commencement of their career, were "living epistles," that might have been "known and read of all men." But their example was unnoticed at the time because of the multitude that set out towards Canaan along with them. It was the events of the succeeding forty years, that unfolded the true greatness of their character. It was the waters of Marah, where their brethren murmured; and the graves of Kibroth, where so many of them were ignominiously buried,—it was the trespass of Aaron, the anointed high priest, for which he was sentenced to die; and the failure of Moses, the honoured lawgiver of Israel, for which he was excluded from the earthly Canaan,—it was these memorable circumstances wherein they, in contradistinction to their brethren, held fast their integrity, that rendered their behaviour so remarkable. The course which they pursued when, strong in faith, they marched through the channel of the Red Sea, was glorious. But that which, forty years afterwards their passage through Jordan exhibited, was far more glorious: because of the host of full-grown men that quitted Egypt in their company, they alone had evinced a constancy in the path of duty, which no difficulty could overcome, and no strength of temptation shake.

It is on this principle that the example is so important, which the religion of an old disciple affords. By means of its duration, it is invested with pre-eminent grandeur; its stedfastness gives to it a commanding influence. The men of the world may jeer at the example of the young convert; while the footsteps of him, who has been known for many years to have walked with God, they are constrained to regard with reverence. The hoary-headed Christian, who has feared the Lord from his youth, is a spectacle which none may treat with ridicule. In the presence of the grey hairs of the aged believer, even the scoffer feels abashed; and the infidel, who has challenged the whole world to convince him, is almost persuaded to embrace that faith, whose example has outlived an entire generation.

When I look to an old disciple, I behold a living demonstration that my religion is divine. Whilst all else around me has changed, here is an object, whose elevation of sentiment, and uniformity of complexion, have continued the same. Thrones I have seen subverted, and empires overturned; and their fall has reminded me of the instability of every thing here below. Theories, and schemes, and purposes without number, have had their day of admiration; and the next have been discarded and despised. But whilst humanity in every other aspect under which I have viewed it has been only a gleam that has speedily disappeared in darkness, here is a light which, the longer it has burned, has shone with increasing brightness. Here is a monument distinct from every other that is seen around it; and which, as it towers in majesty above them all, bears the visible impress of a heavenly workmanship. Other structures have evidently, if we look to their perishable aspect, been reared by the hand of man; but here is that whose enduring strength exhibits it at once as “the temple of the Holy Ghost,”—illustrating with a clearness which none may gainsay, the momentous fact, that while “that which is born of the flesh is flesh, that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.”

1. And now, brethren, to apply these observations.—There are, I trust, amongst you, those who may justly be styled old disciples. It is now a long time since you began to know the way of God. And, as the result of your acquaintance these many years with the truth, you are prepared, I doubt not, gratefully to acknowledge the goodness of the Lord. It is by his help that you have continued unto this day. Your frames and feelings may have been diversified, but he, who is your refuge, has never changed; he has never failed nor forsaken you; when you were weak, he imparted to you strength; when you were in perplexity, he directed your footsteps; when fears had come upon you, he removed and dispelled them; and when your sorrows were seemingly about to be multiplied, he filled you with joy and rejoicing. A thousand tokens of the Lord's goodness have surrounded you. And all, I doubt not, has led you, as you have tasted of his loving-kindness, to cleave to him more closely than ever as your covenant-God. You must soon put off your mortal tabernacle. But you know whom you have believed; and are persuaded that he is able to keep “what you have committed to him against that day.” A few more efforts in the Christian race, and the prize will be yours—a few more struggles against sin and Satan, and the battle will be over, and the victory won. “Shine,” then, “as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life; that others seeing your good works, may glorify your Father who is in heaven.” And when God, in his holy providence, shall see it meet to call you hence, may it be your dying aspiration, in the full assurance of hope, “Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.”

2. Are there amongst you those, who, while advanced in years, are still young in discipleship?—For a long period you were “aliens from God; enemies to him in your minds and by wicked works.” But you have been “plucked as brands from the burning.” He, by whose grace you are what you are, has redeemed your life from destruction. See then, that you “show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light.” Much of your time has been spent in folly and sin; and this is now the cause of your deepest lamentation. But let this very circumstance be improved, by exciting you to redoubled diligence in that work, on which, through grace you have been spared to enter. And as the lateness of the period at which your profession has commenced, may possibly, by many, be sneered at as a hypocritical display, be particularly careful to “keep yourselves unspotted from the world,” avoiding even “the appearance of evil.” As “much has been forgiven you,” strive to make your love correspond in some degree to the magnitude of the mercy shown you. Thus, even yet, during the comparatively little time that remains to you, you may rapidly advance towards “the measure of the stature of perfect men in Christ;” and when called to give an account of your stewardship, instead of being “barren and unfruitful,” you may be found to have “abounded in the work of the Lord.”

3. Are there none amongst you, who are advanced in years, who have in a manner completed the term of human life, while their discipleship is not yet begun?—Hoary-headed sinners, yours is indeed an affecting condition; on the verge of eternity, yet without an interest in the Saviour. With you "the day is far spent." The shades of night are closing rapidly around you. Your season of grace is almost gone, and soon will be gone for ever. O, then, delay not a moment longer; but "seek the Lord while he may be found; and call upon him while he is near." Your salvation, indeed, can only be "at the eleventh hour." Yet even now, if you cordially embrace the offered mercy, it will be yours. "To-day, then, if you will hear the voice of the Lord, harden not your hearts." Another day, and the Holy Spirit grieved at your obduracy, may cease to strive with you. Another day, and your season of grace may have come to an end. Another day, and the Lord may refuse to hear your prayer, and leave you to "wonder and perish."

Finally, Let not the young disciple, who is at the same time young in years, imagine that his case is deemed unworthy of notice.—"I love them," says the Saviour, "that love me; and they that seek me early shall find me." With a youthful conversion an unusual share of happiness is associated; and much sin and sorrow are thereby prevented. A field of improvement is entered upon, which those who have embraced the Gospel only at a late period of life, have in a great measure lost; while it is thus only that the hope can be cherished of arriving at those attainments which constitute the character of the "old disciple." Coming to the Saviour while young in years, you have "chosen that good part which shall not be taken away" from you. Your decision has ensured your happiness. It is true, there are trials awaiting you. But he, to whom you have committed your cause, is engaged to be with you, to sustain and comfort you under them all. Cleave to him, then, with "full purpose of heart;" and "hold fast your profession without wavering." "Be faithful unto death;" and "the Captain of your salvation will give you the crown of life." In the meantime, remembering that you are "babes in Christ, desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby." Cultivate a spirit of true modesty. Avail yourselves of the counsel of those who have made greater progress in the divine life. Thus advancing "from faith to faith," and from one Christian attainment to another, may it be your experience to "flourish like the palm-tree, and grow as the cedar in Lebanon;" that, "planted in the house of the Lord," you may "flourish" through eternity "in the courts of our God."

PART I.

GOD, THE CENTRE OF THE UNIVERSE.

THE striking and obvious analogy that may, to a very wide extent, be traced between the natural and spiritual world, admits of a transition from the one department of God's works to the other, at once simple, beautiful, and legitimate. And though a certain degree of caution is quite indispensable, that Fancy may not wave her wing too freely, in passing from the one region to the other; yet, since our sentient natures are so constituted as to receive impressions more vividly and distinctly from material than from spiritual objects, our conceptions of the latter are often much assisted by illustrations drawn from the former; and our Saviour himself, who knew what was in man, and was intimately acquainted with all the most direct avenues to the heart of man, has, with wonderful wisdom and condescension, adapted many of his public addresses to this peculiar feature of our constitution. With these views, and with these examples, we may not be unwarranted in humbly attempting to carry out some of the grander principles of the noblest secular science into a close and analogical application to that which is divine.

In tracing this analogy, then, between the material and moral universe—between the respective arrangements and relative positions of the objects comprised under each vast system or economy—we shall first consider one or two of the more obvious and essential principles that are displayed in the manifestations and mechanism of the material universe, and then follow these out as they may illustrate (in so far as they legitimately do so) the system of the moral universe. In the prosecution of this object, however, it does not come within the reach, either of our design or ability, to investigate with critical acumen the nature of such principles, or to establish them by any elaborate and scientific demonstration; but, simply assuming as our data what has already been sufficiently established by those whose discoveries have conferred no small benefit on the rest of mankind, we shall endeavour to draw from these such illustrations as they may be calculated to afford.

But, before contemplating the universe at large, we may consider that portion of it with which we are more immediately connected, and which supplies us with a key to unlock the mysteries of more distant worlds—we mean the solar system, or that arrangement of bodies, including the globe we inhabit, which have the sun for the centre of their revolutions, and the source of that light, and heat, and vivifying influence on which they so materially depend. The principle, or rather combination of principles, by which those revolutions are uninterruptedly performed, and that influence as uniformly diffused, we conceive one of the most interesting displays of the Divine wisdom which our system exhibits, while it is of universal application throughout the innumerable systems which people the realms of space. As a specimen of beautiful contrivance, while it is now no subject of hazardous or fanciful conjecture, we bring forward that remarkable union of forces, of diametrically opposite tendency, counteracting each other with such admirably-adjusted influences, by which the planetary bodies are preserved in their circular orbits, or in that relative position to their great luminary which insures the uniformly equal supply of all they derive from him. By the laws of motion, the impetus communicated to these bodies, when first launched from the Divine hand, would have carried them forward in one direct and undeviating course through the vast field of unlimited space; and unless this projectile or centrifugal force (as it is termed) be counteracted by another of equal influence, it is obvious that nothing like revolutionary movements can be produced. In order, then, to the production of the circular orbits in which the planets revolve, we find the opposition of the centripetal force, or the attraction of a central body, which, by continually acting against the projectile impulse, in exactly equal proportion and with uniform regularity, preserves the planet throughout the whole of its revolution, equidistant from the central point or seat of attraction, and effectually prevents it from being carried along the eccentric track to which the centrifugal force has the constant tendency to impel it. From all this, it is manifest that, if either of these opposing forces were for a moment suspended or permitted to vary in their proportion, the effects would be such as must tend to the derangement of the whole planetary system. Were the proportion to vary irregularly, the orbits or paths of the planets must vary accordingly, bearing them sometimes nearer to, and sometimes farther from, their centre, as either force may prevail. Were the proportion altered, but uniform, the circle which the planet describes round its centre must either be larger or smaller, according as the centrifugal or centripetal force is more powerful; but if one were entirely suspended, the planet must either fly off in a direct line far beyond the range of solar attraction, leaving the system to which it had been attached far behind it, in its unrestrained career through the immensity of the universe; or it must yield to the resistless influence of that uncontrolled attraction which, like the eddy of a vortex, the suction of a whirlpool, draws it in, with a fearfully accelerating rapidity, to be consumed by the scorching blaze of the fiery orb, whose moderated influence had been the source of vitality and joy to the myriads of its busy population. Thus we see how portentous would be the results of the suspension of either of these nicely adjusted powers. That there is even a suspicion of a secret process going on, whose ultimate tendency is, the final prevalence of the one, and the cessation of the other, after a period, finite, indeed, though beyond the reach of man's arithmetic, is a circumstance fraught with the deepest interest; and although we proposed to confine ourselves to the consideration of principles incontrovertibly established, yet, as the process we have adverted to bears upon it the strong impress of probability, and may also furnish an apt illustration, when we proceed to the department of the moral economy, we feel scarcely justifiable in passing it over in silence. The supposition we have referred to is simply this (simple in its elements, as it is stupendous in its consequences), that resistance, to a certain extent, is offered to all movements through space, and consequently, that all planetary motion is affected, in however minute a degree, by this resistance. This position once established (and it does seem to stand on pretty satisfactory ground*), the inference follows, of course, that the impetus of the projectile force being weakened by such resistance, the velocity is lessened; and, the velocity and impetus reciprocally affecting each other, the force is obviously losing ground. Thus we may conceive, if the resistance were sufficient to render any alteration calculable, after a planet's first revolution, the opposing forces equal at its outset, the projectile being weakened by resistance, the centripetal to a certain extent prevailing over it, the planet is drawn nearer to the centre of its orbit, and consequently, revolves in a smaller circle; the resistance continuing, the projectile force is weakened in the same proportion during each revolution, and the orbit in each succeeding revolution inevitably becomes smaller and smaller, till the attraction, increasing in an inverse ratio to the square of the distance, assumes a resistless power, to which the expiring influence of the counteracting force offers a vain and a puny opposition. That such a process must be so gradual and imperceptible in its operation as scarcely to come within the reach of practical demonstrability, may be easily imagined; but if the principle be established, it is at least sufficient to prove that matter, in all its variety of form and motion, in its present constitution, is not eternal.

There is another class of heavenly bodies, which, as they may appear in some degree an exception from the universal application of these principles, demand at least a passing notice,—bodies whose orbits, so far from demonstrating the uninterrupted regularity of the proportion of these opposing powers, from their extreme eccentricity, afford us an instance of an altogether contrary nature. We mean comets, whose revolution, although they may be so regular as to connect them with a system of worlds, yet exhibit such unequal distances from the centre of that system as plainly discover a corresponding inequality in the proportion of those impulses by which they are carried forward. After the comet leaves its perihelion, or that point of its orbit where it is nearest the sun, it is obvious the projectile or centrifugal force is permitted to gain the ascendancy, (always under the control of Him who hath said, "Thus far shall ye go, and no farther,") and, by necessary consequence, the counterforce of attraction decreases, according to its essential law, till the body has reached its aphelion, or remotest point, when it is recalled from its wanderings by the Hand that directs its devious path; and the attractive power increasing in the same ratio in which it had previously diminished, brings it back to the very point from which it started centuries before to set out anew on its widely eccentric career. The law to which it is subject in common with all planetary bodies, of describing equal areas in equal times, providing that when from its remoteness from its centre, the attraction or centripetal power is weakest, its velocity should be slowest, that the projectile may retain the due proportion, thus keeping up the wondrous equilibrium. Hence, we see the motions of these wanderers are merely a variety of administration in the mighty economy we have been considering.

In prosecution of our design after having confined our observation to the system with which we are more immediately connected, and which, as we have said, supplies us with a key to unlock the mysteries of more distant worlds; we proceed to remark on the analogy which is believed to subsist between what we term the solar system, and what may with equal propriety be termed the other solar systems which constitute the universe. Advancing upon the sufficiently established position that every star which can pass over the field of the most powerful telescope is itself a sun similar to our own, and the centre of a system of worlds, similarly dependent upon it, as are those planetary bodies with whose history we are more familiar, upon the luminary around which they so steadily revolve. What a glimpse into immensity this fact permits our straining faculties to obtain! What a vast and unfathomable idea of the stupendous fabric of the universe! There is, however, another and a deeply interesting discovery to which we hasten, another view of this sublime frame-work which represents it in a new, and, perhaps, yet more surprising aspect. Independently of the various movements of the celestial bodies, which with their causes have passed under our consideration, it has been discovered, that the whole of this vast machinery has a simultaneous motion round one grand and common centre, so that each system of worlds, independently of the minor revolutions of the individual bodies of which it consists, is moving on in a wide and mighty circle, whose centre is common to, and whose orbit is tracked by, all the other systems of the universe.* Whether the principles of this grand revolution are exactly analogous to those which produce the planetary motions, may not have been exactly ascertained. Whether systems as well as individual worlds have a propensity to fly off into the wilds of boundless chaos, and whether there be a central attraction of sufficient force to counteract this propensity at such an immeasurable distance as we must conceive between the centre of the universe and its outskirts (if indeed it has limits at all), we are not prepared to say, but this we will hazard, even at the risk of being accounted chimerical, that if such an attraction does exist as one of the principles of this mighty movement, its force can scarcely be imagined short of infinite, and if so must be found in the concentration of that light which is inaccessible and full of glory—from which as from a grand and glorious centre emanate light, and life, and blessedness to the remotest boundaries of the universe; and were that universe, like its Creator, proved to be without a bound, there is enough of light, and life, and blessedness, in that exhaustless fountain, to diverge over the infinite extent.

Admitting in its fullest sense the Omnipresence of an all-pervading Spirit, we do not think we are unwarranted by Scripture, in conceiving there may be a locality where the visible glory of that Divine Being is more peculiarly manifested—where he dwelleth in light which no man can approach unto, where the splendours of the throne of the Godhead are displayed to those exalted intelligences, who are admitted to the nearest contemplation of it—even the upper sanctuary—the holy of holies—the presence-chamber of the Most High—and that the locality of this visible concentration of glory may be the centre of nature's mightiest revolution. . . . But pause, daring reasoner, "Who can by searching find out God? who can find out the Almighty unto perfection?"

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A change in the Christian's views.—Though an unbeliever may by experience perceive that the enjoyments of this world are uncertain and unsatisfactory, yet he can hardly think of any thing else of much consequence to him. But, if he ever becomes a convert to Christianity, how is he surprised to see, by the light of this faith, himself and every thing about him appear so very different from what they did before! He is amazed to see how the things of this world have been tinselled for the vain, gilded for the covetous, and aggrandized for the ambitious; and more amazed still, when he perceives into what a despicable meanness they are sunk again, by that prospect of immortality and eternal life which true faith sets before him. This sweetens and sanctifies correction; this gives calm within, when all is tempest without; this makes day-light in the mind, when there is night only in the world, confusion in the pursuits of men, and mystery in the schemes of providence; this clearly shows us our path, or safely leads us by the hand through that we cannot see. When the nature of God's works, the drifts of his providence, or the depths of his religion, become unfathomable to the scanty line of our reason, this "evidence of things not seen," lays the soul to rest on a downy resignation, in the fortress of a comfortable trust that all is right or will be well.—REV. P. SKELTON.

* We are aware that the appearances on which this theory is built, has been accounted for by the hypothesis of a retrograde revolution of the poles of the earth's axis, but are unwilling to adopt it as a substitute for a more sublime hypothesis without incontrovertible proof.

Christian Consistency.—Oh! you who are the children of God, how are we walking worthy of our high and heavenly calling? What is there in us that indicates a heavenly mind? What have we to show that we are Christ's, beyond the mere outward profession of his name, and the approval and adoption of an evangelical creed? They who have not the Spirit of Christ in the least degree, can approve and adopt an evangelical creed; can enter into religious conversation; can be very charitable, even to the giving away of all their property; can be very active and laborious in forwarding the cause of religion and religious institutions.—What have we to show, that these have not? What have we to distinguish us from those, whose religion is thus the child of the earth, the effect of nature only? Believe me, we ought to be known by something more than this; something more peculiarly spiritual; something more eminently divine. Those who see us ought to see something in us, by which they may take knowledge of us, that we are the seed that the Lord hath blessed; that we are the tree of righteousness, which the Lord hath planted; whose fruit, though it may grow from a stock in which the world may see no beauty, and which the world may despise, is yet not only more lovely, more approved in the sight of God, but more luxuriant and plentiful also, than any thing the most imposing trees of nature's growth ever bore.—REV. M. VINCENT.

The fulness of Christ.—Come unto me, saith your Redeemer, and all your maladies shall be remedied, all your necessities shall be supplied. What though you you have committed numberless sins? I offer to you unlimited pardon. What though the law of God, which you have violated, the law to which you can render no satisfaction, denounces its curse upon your head? Fear not, I have turned the curse from you; I have borne it myself in your behalf; I have fulfilled the law; I have made an atonement. What though you are immersed in weakness and corruption; unable to think any good of yourself; unable to will or to do; unable to discover the method of pleasing God; unable to continue in the path of righteousness were you placed in it? In your weakness my strength shall be made manifest and perfected. Your corruption I will cleanse in the fountain I have opened for uncleanness and sin. By the Holy Ghost the Comforter, whose influence is at my disposal, I will enlighten your understanding, and renew your heart. From me you shall learn the will of my Father; from me you shall have grace, whereby you shall serve him acceptably. What though you are surrounded by present evils? I am head over all things; all power is mine in heaven and in earth. My peace I give unto you. All things shall work together for good to you in the end. I lead you to a world where there shall be neither pain, nor sorrow, nor death. Your friends who sleep in me shall God bring with me. "Your light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work for you a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."—REV. T. GISBORNE.

NATURAL HISTORY VIEWED IN ITS CONNECTION WITH RELIGION.

All the advantages that result from science, are comprehended under two distinct classes:—1. Either they relate to our worldly prosperity, by opening new sources of wealth, of convenience, or of luxury; or, 2. They administer to intellectual gratification and our spiritual welfare. When, therefore, we speak of the advantages attending the prosecution of this science, we must readily admit that they chiefly belong to the latter class, although they may, in a limited degree, be applied to the former. The great characteristic, however, of natural history, is its tendency to impress the mind with the truths of religion; and thereby of improving and regulating the moral feelings. Its application to the wants of man is comparatively slight, and generally so remote as not to be immediately perceptible. It has not, like chemistry, been employed to the improvement of manufactures; nor can it contend with botany in adding to the luxuries of the table, or the elegancies of taste. It very rarely opens a new source of commerce, nor can it assist astronomy in giving power and confidence to the mariner. Neither does it lead, like other kindred pursuits, to pecuniary advantage, public employment, or academic honours. Natural history, therefore, will never assume its real station in a commercial country like this, so long as it is not protected and fostered, encouraged and rewarded, by the Government. The office of natural history is to expound the works of Omnipotence; and it becomes, from that very circumstance, one of the most dignified that can employ the human mind. It seems, in fact, to be that peculiar study, which is, above all others, most designed to bring man into communion with his Maker. In this respect, it is even superior to astronomy. The grandeur of the heavenly bodies may speak more impressively to our senses, and their periodical movements excite, at the moment, a greater degree of wonder; but all inquiry into their precise nature is futile. We know not whether those distant worlds are inhabited by mortals or by spirits; whether they are the abodes of imperfect beings like ourselves, or of spirits exempt from sin. All this is hidden from human research. But with natural history the case is different: the objects of which it treats are continually before us; we can, in a great measure, distinguish their properties, examine their structure, and explore their economy: the most minute parts of their organization can be investigated, every nerve traced, and every substance analysed. And if our knowledge of the system upon which they are formed, has hitherto borne no comparison with that which we have acquired in other physical sciences, it is only because the minds of men have dwelt upon minute details, instead of searching for universal principles.

It may be thought unnecessary, perhaps, to advert to those reflections which arise in a religious mind, on contemplating the works of nature, and which, upon some occasions, must force themselves on the notice of the mere worldling. One of the first impressions which arises on studying natural history, but more particularly animals, is, the conviction of design in their creation. And this design not only relates to the formation of an animal to effect a particular purpose, but is equally manifest in the peculiarity of its structure, the season when it is most active, and the means by which it effects its allotted object. The moment we arrive at the conviction of design in the material world, we are persuaded that there is a Designer; or, in other words, the atheistical doctrines of chance, and of self-development, vanish like a mist. This design must have emanated solely from the Creator; and as perfection is His attribute, design can never be partial, because it would then be imperfect. Every thing in nature being thus formed for some specific purpose, it follows, man was created with the same object. But what this object is, unassisted reason can never discover. It requires no depth of penetration to perceive that one of the chief uses of the vegetable kingdom is, to supply food to the animal; this object being effected, the plant dies. Insects either furnish nourishment to other animals, or they assist the propagation of plants, or they hasten the decomposition of decayed matter; this done, the purposes of their creation appear to be effected, and they pass away. In like manner we may trace the outlines of design through every branch of the animal kingdom: each is dependent the one upon the other, and this dependence produces the most inconceivable harmony.

But when we come to MAN, who reigns over the whole—when we ask for what visible purpose, or with what design, he was called into being, our natural reason is baffled. No part of the economy of nature is dependent upon his existence: he assists not in one of the innumerable operations which are continually going on, by which the harmony of nature is upheld, and a mutual dependence preserved in all the parts. The fruits of the earth require not his care, nor do the beasts of the field need his protection. His power is not wanted to prevent the increase of noxious animals; for his Creator has chosen other and more humble instruments to effect such an ignoble purpose. The rapacious tribes of quadrupeds, of birds, and of insects, keep their respective classes within due limits, while it has been ordained that these animal destroyers should propagate slowly and sparingly. We find, moreover, that, in countries very thinly inhabited, there is no disproportion between those animals which are predacious, and such as live upon vegetables. Man, in short, although the noblest work of nature, is yet so unnecessary to her operations, and so disconnected with all those designs she is carrying on in the material world, that his absence from the earth would not be missed. He rather impedes than advances the free development of her works. In this point of view he is inferior to the very worm he treads upon; the extermination of whose race would render the earth unfruitful, and bring famine and death upon its inhabitants. It may be argued, indeed, that the design of the Creator, in calling into existence this last and best of his works, was to give him happiness, to fill him with delight at the wonders which surrounded him, and that he should do good to such of his creatures as he was to govern; but had he been created solely for those purposes, we should have seen them accomplished; because imperfection in the means for accomplishing the end belongs not to the Omnipotent Being. What, in short, do we actually see? Human happiness is a shadow; the mass of mankind are totally indifferent to the wonders of creation, and cruelty to the beasts of the field is to them an amusement. Seeing, therefore, that unassisted reason is totally incompetent to solve the momentous question, we are naturally led to inquire into the truths of religion, to see whether they will explain this apparent anomaly. Here, then, we find every difficulty solved, and every doubt removed. Man discovers that the chief design of his creation is, that he should enjoy an immortal happiness in a higher region; and that he is placed upon this earth, not as necessary to its well-being, or to perform a part in its regulation, but as one who is undergoing a state of probation,—who is journeying, indeed, as a stranger and a pilgrim, but who is provided with those means, and aided by that assistance, which may finally secure the great, the glorious designs of his Maker.

It may be questioned whether the above train of reasoning, agreeable alike to logical deduction and to indisputable fact, could thoroughly be entered upon by any one who was not a naturalist, or, at least, who had not an intimate acquaintance with some of the most remarkable phenomena of the animal kingdom. Hence it is manifest how intimately the study of nature is connected with the truths of religion. Every philosophic argument which can be drawn from the material world, in corroboration of the books of Scripture, will tend to bring those who doubt, to investigate their pages more closely; while those who already believe their divine inspiration, will have that belief strengthened and confirmed, rejoicing that sound philosophy bears witness to those truths which they feel to be immutable.

Such are the evident conclusions which result from a conviction of design in the creation: and this conviction will be equally attained, whether we take an enlarged view of the subject, or descend to minutiae; whether, with the scholar or the philosopher, we discuss the question by the rules of logic; or whether, with the ordinary observer, we adopt the more simple process of contemplating those innumerable and beautiful objects of the creation which lie before us. If every thing in nature which we examine and reason upon, evinces this principle of design, it follows that design is universal: and as experience teaches us, that, although we can trace the principle, we know but a limited portion of its extent, it may be fairly inferred, that even of that portion which man may discover, we know as yet but an insignificant part,—and that, too, is seen “as in a glass, darkly.” How little, for instance, do we know of the manners and instincts of the common animals around us! and how little have we yet learned of the purposes for which they were created! Now, as the Author of this principle of design is himself the type of perfection, that perfection must extend to all his attributes. Hence arises the supposition, that every created thing has a twofold use; one in relation to the economy of nature, and another to the exemplification of moral and religious truths. The first is palpable to the most illiterate observer: every one, for instance, can see, that without insects, there would be no occasion for spiders; and that without swallows, we should suffer from a plague of flies. But the moral use of the book of nature is not so apparent: we can, indeed, perceive how forcibly, though silently, the duties of industry, perseverance, order, and subordination, are exemplified in the ant and the bee; yet, if this was the only moral or religious precept that could be learned from the study of nature, we might be tempted to think the application of this science to moral truths was but slight; and to spiritual, no greater than that of proclaiming the existence of their Creator.

That there is a general analogy between the different parts of the animal world, by which one object or group represents another, is a truth so universally admitted in modern science, that it need not be here advocated. It is confirmed, not only by the most profound investigations, but is perceived and is assented to by the vulgar, who, in many instances, have given to particular animals such names as express an intuitive perception of this principle, without the power of demonstrating the analogy implied by such epithets. Hence the origin of such names as night hawk and Tern owl, as given to the goat-suckers; chæone souris, or flying mice, applied by the French to the bats; water hens, to the Fulice; sea swallow, to the Terns: and swallow butterflies, to the genus Podalirius. The provincial or vulgar names of well-known animals, in every language, furnish innumerable instances of the same perception of natural analogies. These resemblances, therefore, being undeniable, we must come to one or other of the following conclusions:—Are we to consider them as partial and incidental, incapable of being reduced to any definite rules, and governed by no fixed principles? or, are we to view them as the prominent features of some part of the plan of creation; as the strong indications of something beyond the surface of things, and as forming a portion of some great system of harmonious relationship? Upon this point, again, the scientific world has been set at rest. The theoretical inference which would favour the last of these suppositions, has been demonstrated to be correct both by reason and experience; and we now know that all these resemblances are to be traced to one universal and consistent plan, as similar in its laws, as it is harmonious in its results. Here, then, is opened an exalted and a boundless field of design; wherein the Christian philosopher is not only enabled to draw proofs of the Divinity from the individual objects, but from the system by which this endless diversity of forms is regulated.

The results attending the investigation of this system of representation, having been uniform in every department of nature yet investigated, we are led to inquire, what farther can be learned?—whether there be still any ulterior design, for the instruction of man, beyond those which we have discovered? and whether the knowledge thus gained by analysis, can be applied to the illustration of higher truths connected with our spiritual welfare? On this point, again, the Christian philosopher will have no doubts. He is told in that Inspired Volume, in which he at least believes, that “we see now, as it were in a mirror, the glory of God reflected enigmatically by the things that he has made.” He is thus assured that the book of nature is a book of symbols; and if he require farther evidence of this assurance, he finds it in the concurrent opinions of some of the greatest and most learned men whom the world has produced. The existence of an analogy between the material and the immaterial world has been a doctrine of firm belief in all Christian ages, and has been illustrated with force and eloquence by many powerful writers who were not men of science. There is one, however, now among us, who unites in himself the pious divine and the scientific naturalist, whose words are too remarkable not to be here quoted. “The instruction of man was best secured by placing before him a book of emblems or symbols, in which one thing might represent another. If he was informed by his Creator that the works of creation constituted such a book, by the right interpretation of which he might arrive at spiritual verities, as well as natural knowledge; curiosity, and the desire of information concerning these high and important subjects, would stimulate him to the study of the mystic volume placed before him; in the progress of which he would doubtless be assisted by that divine guidance which even now is with those who honestly seek the truth. Both divines and philosophers have embraced this opinion, which is built upon the Word of God itself.”

THE EFFECTS OF INFIDELITY AND CHRISTIANITY UPON NATIONS CONTRASTED.

THE following remarks are extracted from a work to which we formerly adverted, as an excellent antidote to the pernicious principles of infidels. Its title is, "Infidelity contrasted with Christianity," by the Rev. J. Sherman of Surrey Chapel, London.

The only instance in which the avowed rejectors of revelation have possessed the supreme power and government of a country, and have attempted to dispose of human happiness according to their own doctrines and wishes, is that of France during the greater part of the Revolution, which, it is now well known, was effected by the abettors of infidelity. The great majority of the nation had become infidels. The name and profession of Christianity was renounced by the legislature. Death was declared by an act of the republican government to be an eternal sleep. Public worship was abolished. The churches were converted into "Temples of Reason," in which atheistical and licentious homilies were substituted for the proscribed service; and an absurd and ludicrous imitation of the pagan mythology was exhibited under the title of the "Religion of Reason." In the principal church of every town a tutelary goddess was installed with a ceremony equally pedantic, frivolous, and profane; and the females selected to personify this new divinity were mostly prostitutes, who received the adorations of the attendant municipal officers, and of the multitudes whom fear, or force, or motives of gain, had collected together on the occasion. Contempt for religion or decency became the test of attachment to the government; and the gross infraction of any moral or social duty was deemed a proof of civism, and a victory over prejudice. All distinctions of right and wrong were confounded. The grossest debauchery triumphed. Then proscription followed upon proscription; tragedy followed after tragedy in almost breathless succession on the theatre of France; almost the whole nation was converted into a horde of assassins. Democracy and atheism, hand in hand, desolated the country, and converted it into one vast field of rapine and of blood. The moral and social ties were unloosed, or rather, torn asunder. For a man to accuse his own father was declared to be an act of civism worthy of a true republican; and to neglect it was pronounced a crime that should be punished with death. Accordingly, women denounced their husbands, and mothers their sons, as bad citizens and traitors. While many women, not of the dregs of the common people, nor of infamous reputation, but respectable in character and appearance, seized with savage ferocity, between their teeth, the mangled limbs of their murdered countrymen. France during this period was a theatre of crime, which, after all preceding perpetrations, have excited in the mind of every spectator amazement and horror. The miseries suffered by that single nation have changed all the histories of the preceding sufferings of mankind into idle tales, and have been enhanced and multiplied without a precedent, without a number, and without a name. The kingdom appeared to be changed into one great prison, the inhabitants converted into felons, and the common doom of man commuted for the violence of the sword and bayonet, the "sucking-boat" and the guillotine. To contemplative men it seemed, for a season, as if the knell of the whole nation was tolled, and the world summoned to its execution and its funeral. Within the short time of ten years, not less than three millions of human beings are supposed to have perished in that single country by the influence of atheism. Were the world to adopt and be governed by the doctrines of revolutionary France, what crimes would not man perpetrate? What agonies would they not suffer? Yet republican France is held up in the present day as an example worthy to be followed in this country! All will allow that the experiment which France made to govern her nation by the principles of infidelity signally failed; and if we are to judge from that specimen, misery and ruin must attend it wherever it rules.

We have but few instances of Christians who carry out the principles of the Gospel in ruling a kingdom. Many of those who profess to be Christian rulers are infidels in practice. Besides, Christianity, as delivered by Christ and his apostles, is scarcely adopted by any state. It is often found mixed with offices, forms, and ceremonies, to give it pomp and circumstance in the eyes of an unthinking multitude, but which have no warrant in the New Testament. Allowing for these defects, it is capable of demonstration, that pure Christianity, when incorporated with a government, sheds invaluable blessings on the community.

Let us take an instance or two. The islands of the southern sea were notorious for sanguinary wars, murders, infanticide, robbery, polygamy, ignorance, and crime. Every foul vice seemed to be nurtured and reigning there. Christianity entered those beautiful spots of our earth by means of a few devoted Christians, who left their homes to dwell among the people, and teach them the Gospel of Christ. Amidst great persecution, ridicule, privations, and discouragements, they laboured for twenty years, with scarcely any perceptible effects from their instructions; but faith in Christianity as a remedy, and in Christ as their friend, sustained them. At length God appeared for their help; the king of Otaheite, followed by many of the people, embraced Christianity, and the influence spread through the community, till the whole population renounced their false, ugly, and senseless deities. Some of them they destroyed, others they enclosed in a case shaped like a coffin, with this inscription, "Dead gods," and sent the package to England, that British Christians might see the foolish gods which Tahiti formerly worshipped. Then knowledge spread—civilization progressed—commerce flourished—clothing was adopted by the natives—houses were built and factories established—murders ceased—schools arose—domestic comfort increased—God was worshipped, and Christianity triumphed! These were bloodless conquests. No tears of orphans and sighs of widows accompanied her progress; the only regrets heard were, that she had not entered before, and saved many of their children whom they had ignorantly murdered.

The testimonies to this renovation of a people are not confined to the reports of the missionaries, but come from various sources. Captain Fitzroy, of her Majesty's navy, thus speaks:—

"A few months only have elapsed since I returned to my native land, from regions which are every day becoming more and more interesting, and where the influence of Christianity is hourly, we may say, changing the very spirit of the inhabitants. In the islands of the South Seas which I visited, beginning, in the first place, with the Society Islands, as lying nearer, all those who were with me were astonished, as I was, to find such orderly, civil, cheerful, and happy societies as we there found. I, for one, and many of those who were with me, had been taught to believe, that a morose, sullen, gloomy disposition had taken the place of the former amusements which there prevailed. But I can bear the most solemn testimony that such is not the case. Never in my life have I seen a happier or more cheerful people than in the islands of Otaheite. While there, I had an opportunity of asking those who had lately visited the neighbouring islands, to many of which our countrymen have not yet penetrated, where only native missionaries have been sent, what was the state of those islands? They invariably told me, that similar results have been produced. Into almost every island of the South Seas ships may now go, and their crews land, without fear of being immediately massacred by the natives. But this is invariably the case where the missionaries have succeeded in establishing themselves. Yet I am sorry to say that many seamen, who have come home from those islands, have been guilty of the basest ingratitude, in depreciating the labours of those very missionaries to whom, probably, they owed their lives. Many persons have said, that the natives only conformed outwardly to the doctrines of the missionaries among them, and only because the eyes of the missionaries were upon them, but that when they were no longer under their observation they acted in a very different manner. I have been with the natives at the tops of the mountains, when no eye was upon them, except that of a stranger, whom they might never see again, and the conduct of the natives of Otaheite was just as correct; they were as sincere in their evening and morning prayers, and the manner in which they spoke of the exertions of the missionaries among the neighbouring islands, as in the low country near the sea, where the missionaries resided."

If we turn our eyes to Africa, her degraded and oppressed sons exhibit the same results of the Gospel wherever it has reached them. Mr Campbell informs us, that some of them who inhabited a spot, called Hootte Kraal, were the most wretched beings he ever beheld: they were without clothing, except a few, who had remnants of tattered sheep-skins thrown around them: their persons were filthy in the extreme, exhibiting no symptoms of having been washed from their birth; and ignorance and misery characterised the little community. They, however, entreated him to send them a missionary, which he was enabled to do, Mr Pacalt being at that time employed at the Cape. By the prayers and labours of this servant of Christ, things soon began to assume a different appearance. In five years from the period of Mr Pacalt's arrival among them, Mr Campbell again journeyed to visit this spot. As he approached it, one and another remarked, "You will see a wonderful change for the better at Hootte Kraal;"

"and so I did," observes the intrepid Christian traveller; "for there were houses built in the European style, with gardens attached to them, in which were growing peaches, apricots, and other English fruits, with various kinds of vegetables; a wall surrounded the little town several feet high; a church reared its head above the rest of the buildings, and a school was attached to it, in which native children were teaching their companions to read, after the plan of the British and Foreign School lessons; the people were decently clad; comfort and order were observed; and a people who were once little above the brutes, now exhibited intelligence, industry, benevolence, and piety." Captain Fitzroy states respecting Christian missionaries in Africa,—“If the opinions of such a man as Sir J. Herschell—living in the calmest retirement, untied to any party, unconnected with any set of men,—if the opinions of a man of his ability and his character, are worth any thing, I have it in writing from him, to the effect, that the missionaries are doing the greatest good to their fellow-creatures, and deserve the full support of his Majesty's Government.” And if Christianity were to ascend the throne, and rule all heathen lands, the changes would be equally obvious and beneficial.

Leaving pagan countries, let us turn to our own nation. What has raised England to the elevated position she sustains among the nations of the earth? How has she acquired the prodigious moral influence she exerts over every government in the world? Simply because more of the principles of the Gospel are found incorporated in her laws and habits than in most other governments. Her administration of justice—her commercial wealth—her spirit of enterprise—her defence of the oppressed—her efforts to evangelize the world—her liberality—her magnanimous courage—she owes to Christianity. It is the glory of England, not that she has ruled so widely or conquered so splendidly, but that she has conquered to save, and ruled to bless. The evils that now exist in the nation are not attributable to Christianity, but to the want of it. Let its influence be felt in all departments of the State—among all the officers of the Church—in every mercantile pursuit—and in every relation of life, and England must become “the garden of the Lord,” in which beauty, harmony, glory, and pleasure would dwell.

America is emulating the mother land. The religion of Christ laid the foundation of the spirit of liberty and enterprise so astonishingly manifested by that rising nation. One infidel assisted in raising the cry of independence among her sons, but Christianity sustained it. If the nation had copied the example of his drunkenness, tergiversation, injustice, and filth, America had never been free. She owes all she is, and hopes to be, to the Gospel. When Christianity has wiped the foul stain of slavery from her escutcheon, and made her a true land of liberty, then glory shall dwell in her, and England and America, when filled with the purity of the Gospel, shall rule and bless the world.

From the preceding facts, we see sufficient reasons for—

1. The confidence of Christians in Christianity as the only remedy for man.

The chemist, who makes many experiments to prove the truth of a principle which he has adopted, feels no hesitation in applying his discovery to practical purposes, when it has long and often borne the test of experiment. Christianity is no untried speculation—no enthusiastic dream—no vision of some fanciful metaphysician; experiment has demonstrated it to be every thing that fallen man needs in all the circumstances, states, and conditions in which he can be placed. Christians are, therefore, confident in its adoption. To themselves it has proved the power of God unto salvation. They see its renovating influence on others, and therefore they say to all the world, “That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life; that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.” Many of them prove the confidence they have in it by the sacrifice which they make of property, comforts, and even life, to propagate it. When one of the Moravian Brethren offered himself as a missionary to Greenland, to teach the poor ignorant natives the knowledge of salvation, he was asked how he meant to live in that inhospitable climate? “I will,” said he, “cut down timber, and build me a house.” “But,” replied his friend, “no trees grow there.” “Then,” said he, “I will dig a hole in the earth and live there, so that I may preach the Gospel to save their souls.” Where are men of like spirit that infidelity has sent forth? on what spot of the globe are its pious, devoted missionaries? where are the sacrifices it has made to rescue man, and render him happy? where are the barren spots it has cultivated and rendered fertile? where its Pacaltsdorp and Otaheite, blooming with civilization, industry, and holiness? Alas! its course is blood, rapine, and slaughter; its effects, moral and social disorder; its end, destruction and misery. When infidels put their own systems to the test, they have no confidence in them. They are often ashamed of the principles they have avowed;—retract, expunge, deny, and curse them in the day of their trouble. Such facts illustrate the assertion of our Lord, “He that believeth on the Son, hath life; and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.”

If the experiments of infidelity have failed, and Christianity has every where succeeded when received, then—

2. What powerful motives have Christians to propagate Christianity! Christians, lift up your eyes, and see all the myriads of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and disciples, gathered to heaven by the Gospel! That blessed world has been peopled by spirits made perfect by its renovating power. Many dear to us are there. We saw them live, we saw them die. Christianity adorned their character on earth, was the basis of their hope in death, and made them meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. There they shine forth like the sun in the kingdom of their Father—there, redeemed from among men, they incessantly praise, love, and serve the Saviour whom the Gospel revealed, and enjoy the salvation which by faith they embraced. Christians, gaze on the scene around you! Many of your relatives, friends, and neighbours, proclaim the power of the truth; once they were darkness, now they are light in the Lord—once afar off by wicked works, now brought nigh to God by the blood of Christ—once aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, now fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of faith—once indifferent to the welfare of others, now labouring to pluck sinners out of the fire. What has effected the change? They "received the Word in much affection, with joy of the Holy Ghost, and became followers of us and of the Lord!" Christians, look beyond your own seagirt isle, to lands remote, and regions in the shadow of death—there, surrounded by idolatry and vice, and once practising both, thousands have been emancipated by Christianity from the slavery of sin, and introduced into the liberty, joy, holiness, and peace of the Gospel:—

"Nations, the learned and the rude,
Are by these heavenly arms subdued,
While Satan rages at his loss,
And hates the doctrine of the cross."

PRAISE TO JEHOVAH.

By THE REV. JOHN LONGMUIR, A. M.,
Minister of Mariners' Parish, Aberdeen.

"Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me."—PSALM 1. 23.

GREAT GOD, pervading time and space,
Dispensing life and reason's ray,
Controlling the apostate race,
And prompting the seraphic lay;

Receive the praises of a worm—
His life a span, his home the grave,
The shipwreck of temptation's storm,
The dupe of sin, and Satan's slave.

Praise for the pity of thine eye—
The aid of thine Almighty arm,
That rescued me when pleased to die,
And broke the yoke and burst the charm.

Praise for the myst'ry of thy name—
In substance one, in persons three;
Praise for the tidings that proclaim
The part that each sustains for me.

Praise to the FATHER reconcil'd,
Who sent to helpless, godless man,
Jesus, his dear and only Child,
To execute redemption's plan.

Praise to the SON, whose love and might Endur'd for man reproach and toil;
Unaided, triumph'd in the fight
With death and hell, and took the spoil.

Praise to the HOLY GHOST, whose breath
Revives the dry and lifeless bones;
Who cheers amid the gloom of death—
Makes love of hate, and flesh of stones.

Praise to JEHOVAH, Three in One,
For love, and grace, and comfort given;
Praise by the Spirit through the Son,
Begun on earth, prolong'd in heaven!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE MRS PATERSON,
WIFE OF THE REV. DR PATERSON, ST PETERSBURG.

By THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THE subject of the following Sketch was the daughter of Admiral Greig, who, though a native of Scotland, spent the greater part of his life in the Russian service. Early imbued with a high admiration of the Christian scheme, the Admiral continued, amid the active duties which devolved upon him, to retire regularly every morning and evening for meditation, prayer, and the perusal of the Word of God. The Bible was his constant companion, and he carefully instilled into his family a high veneration for its sacred truths. The earliest recollection which his daughter had of him, was his taking her upon his knee and hearing her repeat her infant hymns and prayers.

At the early age of nine years, Miss Greig was deprived of her mother, and thus cast upon the care of the Almighty. When informed of the severe loss she had sustained, the child retired alone into the garden to weep, and, conscious of her helpless situation, she fell upon her knees, and implored the protection of Him who is emphatically the "orphan's stay." Nor was her prayer unheard. One of her trustees, an eminent English merchant in St Petersburg, received her into his family, where she was educated and treated in all respects like his own children. To her religious training the most careful attention was paid; and while, from her natural talent, she made rapid progress in the acquisition of knowledge, and soon excelled in every female accomplishment, she displayed also a strict regard to the duties and ordinances of worship. Naturally of a sedate, reflective turn of mind, she was remarkably devout when engaged in the public duties of the sanctuary, and in the private exercises of the closet she was regular and conscientious.

To the family under whose roof she resided, Miss Greig was devotedly attached; and her obligations to their kindness and attention she never ceased to feel and to acknowledge. At the age of twenty-one, she went to England with her brother, who was then Russian Consul. The company into which she was now thrown was of a nature by no means favourable to her progress in religion. The gay and giddy whirl of fashionable life is, of all situations, the most opposed to the cultivation of vital godliness. It was not long, accordingly, before any serious impression which might have been made upon Miss Greig's mind by the education of her early days was effaced. She regarded all strictness in religion as enthusiasm. The pleasures of the world and the duties of religion she sought to combine, forgetful of the solemn warning, "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." But frivolous amusements were not likely to engross the whole attention of so strong and vigorous a mind as that which Miss Greig possessed. She devoted much of her time to the improvement of her understanding. Besides reading the most approved authors, both in the English and French languages, she commenced the study of Latin. About the same time, she entered upon a course of mathematics; and so much did she delight in this abstruse department of inquiry, that she uniformly rose at five o'clock in the morning, and spent three or four hours before breakfast in the solution of difficult problems. The extent of her acquirements soon attracted the notice of the most eminent mathematicians, both in England and Scotland, who paid her marked respect.

After residing in England for several years, Miss Greig suffered a very painful calamity in the death of her brother, who was cut off by consumption after a lingering illness. Though she, no doubt, felt severely the loss she had sustained, no change took place in her pursuits. She still continued absorbed in mere intellectual enjoyments. A short time after this, however, a train of providential circumstances led to a decided change in her religious sentiments and views. Having gone in 1811, to spend the summer at Ramsgate, she there became acquainted with a young lady, who had but recently been brought under the saving power of the truth, through the instrumentality of the Rev. Mr Young of Margate. To the sentiments of her new acquaintance, Miss Greig made strenuous opposition. Many a bitter controversy ensued, but so strong were Miss Greig's prejudices against evangelical religion, that she remained for a long time unconvinced by the arguments of her friend. At length she was persuaded to go to Mr Young's chapel, and hear him preach. The result was so far favourable. The excessive violence of her opposition to him and his doctrines, was somewhat subdued. She was not so exasperated as formerly, though she still continued to disapprove of evangelical doctrine. Having once begun to attend the chapel, however, she occasionally repeated her visits, more perhaps from a desire to gather arguments with which to oppose her friend, than from any strong wish to receive benefit to her soul. And yet, though brought by such unhallowed motives to the house of God, she gradually became more impressed with the importance of salvation, and the necessity of learning the truth of God on this vital point. That she might be more favourably situated for prosecuting her inquiries, she left Ramsgate, and became a boarder in the house of a pious lady, who kept a respectable seminary in Margate. Her young friend, with whom she had so often argued on religious matters, lived in the same place. Miss Greig now attended regularly on Mr Young's ministry, and declared herself pleased with his discourses in many respects, but by no means convinced of the truth of his opinions. At length she thought of conversing with him on the subject, with the view, as she hoped, of proving to him that his principles were false. An interview accordingly took place, which lasted for three hours, and the result was blessed to her soul. She became, from that time, an eager and attentive hearer of the Gospel of Christ. Her views now underwent a gradual change. No longer confiding in her own wisdom, she was much at a throne of grace, in earnest prayer to the Almighty that she might be savingly enlightened by the Spirit of God. Her feelings, on being led to see somewhat of the preciousness of Christ, are thus expressed, in a private record which she kept;—

“And do I see thee now, great Shepherd of my soul? and hast thou permitted me to say, ‘I see?’ Long have I heard thy voice, O Lord; but man's delusive arguments, together with my own depravity, have kept me from thee. I would not listen to my Master's voice that called; I said, I would not go. Instruct me how to praise thee—how to utter gratitude for love to me unspeakable. Why has thy mercy been so great to me? Why hast thou chosen me? Before I recognised thy presence in me, I said, O that the days of my mourning here were ended, that I might ascend to my Redeemer; but now hast thou descended unto me; heaven is in my breast, and now my song is, ‘Let me live to thy glory.’ Now first I see the wonders wrought for me. My soul is amazed by such transcendent love. But those of thy flock who have long known thy voice, say they have sometimes wandered from thee. Wilt thou also let me wander? Shall I, too, wander from my Shepherd, although I know his voice, and lose this heaven on earth which now I feel? O permit me not to quit thee! Let me not know the voice of strangers, but flee from them. And now that thou showest me how to pray, accept my prayers for those who know thee, and who prayed for me, when I in ignorance attempted to adore thee. O bless them, gracious Lord! Give them as large a portion of thy love as now thou givest me. How can I supplicate a greater blessing on them? Can greater joy exist while soul is joined to body? If greater peace may be enjoyed while here on earth, then grant them greater, for thou hast heard their prayer, and hast blessed me! Amen.”

From this time Miss Greig sought to advance in the knowledge and experience of Divine truth. Feeling her own sinfulness and depravity of heart, she was led to appreciate more highly the suitableness and all-sufficiency of Christ: and in proportion as her views became clearer, and more enlarged, she became more earnest that others also might be brought to the obedience of Christ. Her prayers, accordingly, frequently ascended in behalf of her friends, of the family in which she resided, and in behalf of Russia, her native land. An individual who had been, under God, instrumental in her conversion, thus describes her character and general deportment after the change:—

“She was now decided for God, and teachable as a little child. Her knowledge of the Gospel plan of salvation became correct, and interested all the best feelings of her heart. The New Testament was to her invaluable. The preaching of the Word, by the blessing of God, endkinded in her soul a supreme confidence in, and a supreme regard to, God, as her highest and unchangeable good. She delighted to dwell on this theme, in connection with the redemption of Christ, and the influence of the Holy Spirit. She was, from her believing persuasion of the truth as it is in Jesus, full of joy, and abounded in hope. The exercise of her judgment, and the corresponding flow of her affections, really astonished us. We knew not how sufficiently to admire her heart-affecting views of the Gospel, her deep humility, her ardent zeal, her burning love to that Saviour, who had set her soul at happy liberty from the bonds of sin and error. O how she used to breathe forth her tender concern for her friends! and how ready to sacrifice all for God! The children of the poor lay very near her heart. She wished to become their instructress. Her former delights, music, mathematics, natural philosophy, light reading, and diversions, became tasteless. ‘Ah!’ said she one day to me, ‘you have spoiled me for all these; they have lost their charms; they are all insipid. I have employment so infinitely superior, that I have no time, no relish, for these things. I am too happy to attend to them.' When she looked back on her past profession of religion, she would lament her prepossessions against the truth, and her formal and unscriptural performance of external rites. We were much struck with observing how deeply she venerated the name Jesus. She told me she thought professors and ministers blameable in the too frequent use of the name. 'It is, I think, Sir,' she would say, 'a great name—it contains every thing. I would pronounce it with the same reverence as that of God.' Formerly she thought that praying on the Lord's day was quite sufficient for all the week; and when she found that we had religious services on the week evenings this appeared to her quite unnecessary. But she afterwards delighted in these extra services, as they formerly appeared to her. Her desires for usefulness rose very high; they were not the effect of any sudden flow of the affections, but arose from a deep impression of the necessity of being active for God. Her attachment to those whom she considered as sincerely loving our Lord Jesus Christ, was fervent and enlarged. It was delightful to observe, that, with a mind so strong, and active, and argumentative, she was at the same time no less interesting from her cheerfulness, condescension, frankness, affection, and readiness to give and receive information. She wished to be employed in doing good; and was, at the same time, desirous of being little known. We adventured to take her out with us one day, to spend three or four hours with a pious cottager. I wished to see how she would conduct herself in such an interview. She charmed the friends who accompanied her, and was herself no less delighted. 'It has been,' said she, 'the most delightful evening I ever spent in my life.' She frequently thought, that, from the large measure of joy and peace which she found in believing on Christ, that the Lord would soon take her home to himself; but I supposed that those enjoyments were to fit her for future conflicts on behalf of the truth,—for suffering, and extensive usefulness. She acquiesced in this suggestion. To glorify God, by being useful in the world, was her highest ambition."

Now that she had been brought out of darkness into God's marvellous light, Miss Greig thought it her incumbent duty to urge her views on the subject of salvation upon her intimate friends, both in Britain and Russia. She, accordingly, addressed letters to a great number of individuals with whom she was acquainted, inviting and beseeching them to make the great concerns of eternity a subject of sincere and earnest examination. Few of these letters were ever answered. She was now regarded by her worldly friends as an enthusiast and a Methodist; and one family, whom she had been in the habit of visiting, requested her henceforth to discontinue her visits. None of these things, however, moved her. She was contented to endure reproach for Christ's sake. Such, indeed, was the lot which our blessed Lord warned His followers to expect. "Marvel not," said He, "if the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

The time now approached when she must leave Margate, with the view of returning to her friends in Russia. The thought of quitting the place of her spiritual birth was painful in the extreme. She had come to that town with the strongest prejudices against evangelical religion, and now she left it rejoicing in the humbling doctrines of the Cross, as the source of her sweetest consolation—her highest joy. From Margate she proceeded to London, where she resided with a family who attended on the ministry of the late Dr Nicol, of the Scotch Church, Swallow Street. From the solid, pious instructions of that excellent divine she derived much benefit; and she continued to be a member of his church while she resided in London. Her studies were at this period almost exclusively directed to theology; and, ere long, she acquired an astonishing acquaintance with the Scriptures.

It was well for this interesting young lady that she thus thought of arming herself with the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, as she was likely to encounter formidable opposition to her principles in Russia, to which she was now preparing to return. Soon after her arrival in St Petersburg, she thus speaks, in a letter to a friend, of her feelings on leaving England, and the temptations to which she was exposed in Russia:—

"You will believe it was not without deep regret I quitted England, which has been rendered far dearer to me than the land of my nativity, by the inestimable mercies there showered down upon me. Though I am here deprived of those privileges I formerly enjoyed, and separated from the religious friends I so much loved, my faith in the fundamental truths of Scripture seems to gain strength; and the contemplation of them is a never-failing source of consolation.

"If I had not, in my past life, been guided wonderfully to a knowledge of the truth, I might now tremble, when considering the many temptations which would lead me from the path of duty; but my experience of past mercies gives me confidence in the same superintending care for the time to come. Though deprived of the inestimable blessing of hearing the Gospel preached in its purity, the consolation I derive from it in private, arms and supports me in every trial. I desire to testify this to the glory of Him "in whom I live, and move, and have my being," and without whom I could do nothing."

Separated as she now was from the Christian friends who were wont to cheer and encourage her, Miss Greig found her chief enjoyment in the perusal of some choice religious books, which she had carried with her from England. But the Bible was her constant companion. She spent much of her time in poring over its precious pages—reading it with the greatest care, along with Matthew Henry's valuable Commentary. To impress the more deeply upon her mind what she read, she accustomed herself to make extracts from the works which she perused. For some time after she returned to Russia, she felt deeply the want of religious society; but at length she became acquainted with some excellent persons, who sympathized with her in the warmth of her devotional feeling, and in her attachment to the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. In their company she felt the highest enjoyment, and with them accordingly she passed some of her happiest hours.

PART II.

GOD, THE CENTRE OF THE UNIVERSE.

WE now proceed to the second division of the task we have assigned ourselves, and pursue those natural laws and principles we have been considering, as they may be employed in illustration of a moral system—the economy of the moral universe. We are not insensible that, in such a field, we tread a soil from which may spring up, under every footstep of a roving imagination, the gaudy, but fast-fading blossoms of a day, which, however, exuberant in their growth, and even ornamented in their decoration, yield no lasting fruit, and impoverish without repaying the ground out of which they have arisen. Not deterred, however, by this conviction, we would endeavour, with cautious step, to pass the border-line between the regions of matter and mind, and inquire, whether (to drop the metaphor) we may not ascertain, from reason and Scripture, the existence of laws and principles in the moral world very closely analogous to those of the material, which have now passed under our consideration. That the Deity is to his creatures all, infinitely more than all that can be represented by the glory of the natural sun—the centre of spiritual light, life, and every cheering influence—were sufficiently established, independently of the testimony of those creatures themselves, by the circumstance that, in the revelation he has been pleased to give of himself in the Sacred Scriptures, he has condescended to appropriate the sun as the emblem of his glory. “God the Lord is a sun and shield;” “he causeth his face to shine on us;” “the Sun of Righteousness hath arisen upon us with healing in his wings;” “His face did shine as the sun;” and of the new Jerusalem it is said, “The city hath no need of the sun to shine in it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.” Considering Him, then, in this relation to his creatures, it is obvious that those creatures are bound to regard him not only as the source whence proceed all the blessings they possess in such rich abundance, but as the centre, around which must revolve all those hopes, desires, and affections, which constitute an intelligent being. How far a sense of such an obligation is exemplified in the history of this rebel province of his dominions, let experience testify in sorrow and in shame; but, undoubtedly, such must be the acknowledged obligation of all created intelligences, who have not broken asunder the chain that binds them to his throne. There are daring spirits who have broken that chain, when they shook off their allegiance to the great Supreme, and there was mutiny in heaven. May we not, then, conceive that all intelligent beings, while continuing in that sphere for which they were originally designed, must have God as a centre, around which, if we may adopt the illustration, they must constantly revolve; and may we not still farther conceive, that for their security, in their due relative position, certain moral laws, illustrated by, if not analogous to, those of planetary revolutions—were originally impressed on all intelligent natures;—that, for inscrutable reasons, one of these natural tendencies was permitted to prevail, and to carry the presumptuous and infatuated subject of its influence away, in a direct line, from the centre of glory—the throne of the Eternal, and is still carrying, and will continue to carry him for ever, with all his miserable attendants, farther and farther from that God to whom, through eternity, he has no possibility of return. Descending from the history of apostate spirits to the rebel race of man, and following his eccentric career, do we not perceive something analogous still? Do we not behold the prevalence of that tendency which leads him away from God, carrying him far from the peace and the purity of Paradise, and forward in his erring course, through a wide and waste howling wilderness of moral desolation? The tie that united him to his Creator is severed—the tendency to depart from his presence and escape from his control is unrestrained—he turns away from the manifestation of his glory, and plunges onward towards the blackness of outer darkness, for which “wandering stars” are expressly declared to be reserved. He is, however, arrested on his fatal track by the counter-force of divine attraction, put forth in renewed, and yet more vigorous exercise, and recalled like the comet from its distant orbit, to his true place in the moral universe, and his original relationship to his grand and glorious centre. That the opposing influences by which he is affected have not yet returned to that equipoise which insures his stability in this position, the experience of every individual who has come within the sphere of this divine influence at all is sufficient to attest, being a continued exemplification of the struggle between contending powers—“a law in the members warring against the law of the mind; the flesh lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these two contrary the one to the other.” But there is a grand moral process at work in the history of every Christian, by which the one must ultimately, though gradually, yield to the overpowering ascendancy of the other; by which the Christian’s revolutions, so to speak, round his divine centre, becoming gradually narrower and narrower, he approximates more and more to the Source of all light, life, and blessedness, till at last he shall be admitted within the hallowed circle of the immediate presence of Jehovah, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life; and, in full possession of distinct individual consciousness (contrasted with the favourite Brahminical theory of absorption), he shall be received into a glorious participation of the Divine nature, and be united to Him that sitteth upon the throne by such an indissoluble bond, as to preclude the possibility of separation through eternity: “He shall go no more out for ever.” These are the leading ideas that have suggested themselves to us, as naturally arising out of the considerations we have been reviewing. We might enlarge, but we fear to give rein to imagination on subjects passing mortal ken, and which angels only “desire to look into.”

THE TROUBLED SOUL FLEEING TO GOD FOR REFUGE.

In deep affliction’s troubled hour,
When sorrow rules the breast,
And earthly soothing hath no power
To quiet its unrest;
And mirth but maketh jarring din,
Where all is heaviness within;

To thee we fly, O God! to thee,
When all denies relief;
And still more tremulously see,
In storms of deeper grief:
While all around to darkness turns,
Thy inward light more brightly burns.

Thy love which passeth mortal sense,
 To soothe, enlighten, save,— Through life-sustaining Providence,— Redemption in the grave:
 Without it, life is idle breath;
 Without it, terrible is death.

THE DUTIES OF THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT WALLACE,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Birmingham.

“Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy,” &c.—
 EXODUS xx. 8-11.

WE propose, in the present Discourse, to point out the duties of the Sabbath, or the manner in which it ought to be observed and kept.

I. The first and plain duty of the Sabbath is rest, or cessation from all ordinary worldly employment or work on that day. This is so plainly and distinctly required in the Sabbath law, that it is astonishing how so many, who profess to respect the law of God, should be found erring in this particular. What can be more plain and distinct than the words, “Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work?” And what is more plain, than that this command is especially addressed to men as heads of families, and as masters; and that they are bound by it, not only to allow, but to require of, all over whom, as heads of families and as masters, they have control, the same rest from labour on the Sabbath which God requires of themselves? “Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates.” We have already proved that the Fourth Commandment, as to the substance thereof, is of perpetual and universal obligation—that it applies to and is binding upon the Christian, under the Gospel, in the same degree as it applied to and was binding upon the Jew, under the Law. What can be more plain, then, than the duty of Christians to observe, in their individual capacity, in their families, and the establishments placed under their control and influence, a strict religious rest from all manual labour and all worldly business on the Sabbath? This is what the Fourth Commandment—the great standing rule in respect of the Sabbath—most distinctly binds us to. And to the same effect we are frequently and earnestly exhorted in the Word of God; as, for example, “Thus saith the Lord, Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath-day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath-day, neither do ye any work; but hallow ye the Sabbath-day, as I commanded your fathers.” Jer. xvii. 21, 22.

It is true, indeed, the Fourth Commandment, and precepts like it, such as the one just read, are not to be supposed precluding and forbidding works of necessity and of mercy on the Sabbath-day. Our Saviour very clearly taught us this, (Matt. xii. 1-13.) The Pharisees and other Jews had put a wrong interpretation on the law of the Sabbath, and stretched it to an unwarranted length, as is evident from this passage. They held that it put an interdict upon all work one day in seven, even upon works of necessity and of mercy; except, indeed, in some rare cases, that nearly and clearly affected their own personal and worldly interests, as that supposed by our Lord, in the 11th verse of the chapter just referred to. But, in that chapter, our Lord clearly teaches, that works of absolute necessity, such as are required to satisfy the cravings of nature's hunger; and works of benevolence and mercy, such as visiting and endeavouring to alleviate the state of the sick and the afflicted, are not only lawful, but dutiful on the Sabbath.

But great abuse, my brethren, has, from time to time, been made of these reasonable and merciful exceptions. We are free, indeed, to admit that, in some quarters, there has been manifested a tendency towards a Pharisaic observance of the Sabbath, which is at once unnatural, and at variance with the Law of God, and the precepts and example of the Saviour. But such cases are rare, indeed, when compared with the multitude of instances in which the Lord's Day is shamelessly broken and desecrated under a false pretext of necessity and mercy. It is easy for a man, if he look not beyond present advantages and conveniences, and if his conduct cease to be influenced by a sense of the future, and is only influenced by temporary views and prospects—it is easy for a man, so minded and actuated, to persuade himself that it is necessary he should travel on the Lord's Day—that he should transact business on that day—that he should tolerate on that day the calls of men of business and of the world—and that he should require his servants to act in a similar manner. But every one who views his conduct in the light of Divine truth and Christian principle, sees no necessity in the case at all, save what his own grasping worldliness, and his unprincipled conformity to the world, for the world's sake, and his mistrustfulness of a good and a merciful Providence, have created. It is melancholy to hear men plead necessity for their breach of the Fourth Commandment, when every man of common sense must perceive that the only necessity in the case is, that of making rich faster than other men. The worldling is little aware how much he loses by breaking the Sabbath. He loseth “the blessing of the Lord, which maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow with it.”

But, alas! my brethren, how awfully, openly, publicly, is the Sabbath of the Lord broken amongst us, in respect of that particular duty of it we are now considering, viz., rest from work, without any plea of necessity or mercy for it whatever! What is Sabbath travelling, so common in our day, but a most palpable, and, in the manner and on the scale in which it is practised, systematic, and public act of disobedience to the command, "Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work?" The Government of that country is prodigiously to blame that tolerates such a wanton and public breach of a Divine commandment, as that which attends upon Sabbath travelling, as at present practised in our own land. And the voice of a Christian public should be most loudly raised against what is not only a nuisance to Christians, that ought in justice to them to be put down, but, moreover, a national sin, that cannot be long persisted in without bringing down upon us the judgments of Heaven. "Thus saith the Lord, If ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath-day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched."

But it is not on our highways alone, though there chiefly and most publicly, that we may see a flagrant breach of the Sabbath law, in respect of work; but, moreover, in our gardens, and in our workshops, and in our dwellings. All these are frequently scenes of busy work, instead of rest, on the Lord's Day—some of them more so on that day than any other. It is on this day, especially, that our gardens may be seen filled with busy labourers; and on this day, too, that the work of a week, in cleansing and putting things to order, is frequently done in the household. It is on this holy day—this day on which the Lord has said, "Thou shalt not do any work"—that our gardens frequently receive their weekly quota of dressing, and our houses and yards of scrubbing and washing. It is on this day, too, that our servants and families are required to be unusually busy in preparing for our repast. All this is but the habit of general society, more or less confirmed and manifest.* And what is all such conduct, but a disgrace to a Christian community, and a flagrant violation of the Fourth Commandment, which says, on the Sabbath "thou shalt not do any work?"

The duty of the Christian plainly is, to use diligence and foresight in so disposing and seasonably despatching his worldly business, whatever that business may be—whether that of the market or the manufactory, the workshop or the household—that the Sabbath may be as wholly and entirely as possible a day of freedom, not only from worldly and ordinary business and occupation, but, moreover, worldly thought and care. It is the duty of every man, yea, and his interest too, to rescue the Sabbath, as perfectly as it is possible, from the encroachments of the world; and to devote it to the purposes, and spend it in the services, of religion.

* It will be observed that this Discourse, originally composed for, and addressed to, an audience south of the Tweed, refers to some peculiar modes of Sabbath desecration, which, amid all our admitted laxity, are as yet, we have reason to be thankful, comparatively unknown in Scotland.—Ed.

II. This brings me to observe, secondly, that although the Sabbath is to be a day of rest from our ordinary worldly employment, it is not to be a day of idleness; but, on the contrary, is a day which ought to be especially spent by us in the worship of God, and the more solemn duties of religion—such as prayer, meditation, reading and hearing the Word of God.—Every day of our lives, indeed, we ought to engage in such service. God ought to be worshipped, and his Word read in our families and in our closets, every day, without exception. We ought continually to bear about with us a sense of the Divine presence, and in all our actions be influenced by the fear and the love of God, and a respect to his glory; and it is only by daily and earnest prayer and supplication at a throne of grace, that we are enabled, in any degree, so to live. But whilst the worship of God, and other solemn religious services, are the duties of every day, they are especially, and in an eminent degree, the duties of the Sabbath. On that day especially we are to set our hearts to seek the Lord; on that day especially we are to endeavour to stir up within us a spirit of grace and supplication; on that day especially we are to give ourselves to meditation on the Word of God, to the contemplation of heavenly things, and the consideration of whatever concerns our everlasting peace; on that day we are especially to attend to the reading and preaching of God's Word, and all the services attendant upon his worship both public and private. This is the day which the Lord hath made, on which we ought especially to humble ourselves before him on account of our great unworthiness, and our great abuse of time, and talents, and opportunities; and on which we ought especially to give God thanks for all his mercies, and to rejoice and seek to make sure our interest in his great salvation. "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."

But more particularly, the positive religious duties which, although not to be confined to the Sabbath, yet, especially belong unto it, may be divided into such as are personal, family, public, and charitable.—The personal duties of religion appertaining especially to the Sabbath, are those which we owe unto God, and the Church, and our own souls in secret. On the Sabbath morning we should carefully imitate the example of our Saviour, of whom it is said, Mark i. 35. "And in the morning," that is, on the morning of the first day of the week, which was afterwards to be consecrated by him as the Sabbath, "rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed." A due portion of every Sabbath ought to be spent in self-examination, and secret prayer. "Enter into thy closet, and, when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret." It is when we are alone with God that we can best disburden our minds unto him, and spread out our necessities before his Fatherly eye. And they who neglect such a season as a Sabbath morning, solemn and still, affords for purposes of secret devotion, neglect the most precious opportunity of holding profitable communion with God; such communion as gives the soul a relish for all the after solemn services of the day, and without which they are like to be insipid to the taste. It is in secret, too, we can pour out our hearts with least reserve unto God in behalf of others, our ministers, and our fellow-worshippers, and the Church in general, to the effusion of a rich blessing upon those for whom we pray, and our own individual preparation for Christian communion and fellowship. O, my brethren, neglect not the secret duties of the Sabbath, and especially of the Sabbath morning.

The family duties of the Sabbath are those which, as heads of families, we especially owe unto the members thereof on that holy day. Family as well as secret prayer is most solemnly and devoutly, and with special reference to the duties, and the privileges, and the temptations of the Sabbath, to be engaged in on this day. The Scriptures and other books of a devotional and religious character are to be read to our children and domestics; they are to be instructed by us in the elements and principles of religion, where this is necessary, or has not been already done. We are to endeavour savingly to interest them in the great truths of religion, and to awaken them to a concern about their souls. We are to encourage and allow them in all Sabbath duties, whilst we authoritatively repress and forbid whatever is inconsistent and at variance with the sacred character of that holy day. It is on this day, in short, the Christian parent and master is to take special heed to lead his children and servants to a throne of grace, and by the still waters, and in the green pastures of God's Word. And I am sure that he only needs a heart truly interested in such a work, to be enabled more or less to interest his family in it also; and that he only needs affectionate consideration mingled with solemn earnestness, to prevent the danger of his making the Sabbath a weariness, or other than a delight to those around him—those who at once love and revere him.

The public duties of the Sabbath consist in a regular and diligent attendance upon the public worship of God—upon the Word publicly preached—the sacraments publicly administered, and prayer publicly offered up. That men should publicly unite in the worship of God, and in doing homage to their Lord and Saviour by showing respect to his ordinances, reason and nature themselves do teach. And, hence it is, that idolaters and the worshippers of false gods, in every age, and in every country, are no way behind, but the contrary, in their public exhibitions of devotedness and blinded worship. The Sabbath is the day specially appointed for the public worship of the true God. This we learn from the example of the Jews, who, as had been appointed by God, worshipped before the Lord on the Sabbaths; from the example of the Saviour, whose custom it was to go into the synagogues on the Sabbath-day, to read and to expound the Scriptures; and from the custom of the apostles, and first Christians, who, on the first day of the week, that is, as we have already shown, the Sabbath under the Gospel dispensation, came together to break bread, and engage in the most solemn services of our holy religion.

And, after all, it is the duty of public worship in all its parts, that is the most distinguishing, and characteristic, and important positive duty of the Sabbath. On other days as well as on this day, we have duties of a sacred character to discharge in our closets, and in our families, which we cannot neglect without sin and danger to our souls; but on the Sabbath-day alone has God positively required of us the duty of public and united worship; on that day alone has he required of us our services and presence in the sanctuary. Many Christians feel it to their advantage to meet oftener for united worship than on the Lord's Day, and the practice of doing so is most highly to be commended. But still, it is only on the Sabbath, God, in his Word, hath positively required of his people the public and united acknowledgment, and worship of himself. These, then, are not only Sabbath duties, but the most distinguishing characteristic duties of the Sabbath.

The charitable duties of the Sabbath, I dwell not upon. They are such services as are required of us to others on that day, and which are consistent with its sacred and religious character. As for example, alms giving to the poor and needy; instruction and advice to the ignorant, and those who are out of the way; and visiting and comforting the sick and the afflicted.

That such duties as we have been enumerating, namely, the reading of the Scriptures, meditation, prayer, and the worship of God, in secret, in our families, and in public, together with such works of necessity and mercy as we may be called to, should occupy our time, and engage our attention on the Sabbath-day, seems to me evident from the very first clause in the Fourth Commandment. What is that clause? "Remember the Sabbath-day." For what purpose are we to remember it? "To keep it holy." "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." Now how is this to be done? How is the Sabbath to be sanctified and kept holy, except in the careful observance of such duties as we have called your attention to? Except in holding communion with a holy God; and engaging in those exercises which bring us nearest unto him, and which are the nearest approximation to the services of heaven. None will dare to hold, that the Sabbath may be kept holy unto the Lord, when willfully spent for our own use and in our own service. All whose judgments are worthy of respect must at once pronounce, that so to spend it is a desecration of the Sabbath—a palpable breach of the Sabbath law. Neither will it be held, surely, that we keep the Sabbath holy by merely resting from worldly business and employment on that day, whilst we seek our own pleasure in idleness, or in other ways of self-gratification. God himself has given us clearly to understand, that it is not thus the Sabbath is to be kept holy—that it is not after the fashion of an ordinary holiday, when He says, “If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words.” Isaiah lviii. 13.

Now, if worldly employment, and idleness, and pleasure-hunting, be one and all forbidden on the Sabbath, in what light is it to be looked upon by us, but as a day intended and set apart for the special worship and service of God, in the most solemn duties of religion? And so the Sabbath law teaches, on the very face of it; and so the Sabbath has been observed in all ages, by God’s true people, both under the Mosaic and Gospel dispensations.

Now, my brethren, if in the duties to which we have called your attention consists the service which God requires of you on the Sabbath-day; and if our observance or breach of the law of God, as contained in the Fourth Commandment, is just dependent on the manner in which such duties are discharged by us, oh! how ought we, on each Sabbath-day, to stir and give ourselves up to prayer and devout meditation! How attentive ought we to be to the reading and preaching of God’s holy Word! How forward to “do good, and to communicate” to the wants and necessities of our fellow-men, as opportunity may offer! And how carefully and scrupulously ought we to avoid and shun whatever has a tendency to unfit our minds for these, the peculiar and solemn duties of the Lord’s Day!

1. In the first place, how carefully ought we to be on our guard against worldly thoughts! If these are allowed to enter and abide in our minds, they will soon destroy all devotional feeling, and render the peculiar services of the Sabbath a weariness to us, and in a great measure, if not altogether, in our case, a solemn mockery and mere form. The temptations of men of business to worldly thoughts on the Sabbath-day are no doubt great; but if conscious of this, it should only teach them to be more on their guard against such thoughts; and to be more careful and prayerful, that in all the services of the Sabbath, both at home and in the sanctuary, they may be enabled to wait upon God without distraction of mind.

2. But, secondly, how carefully, in order to maintain a state of mind at all fit for the solemn duties of the Sabbath, ought we to abstain from worldly and idle conversation. Worldly and idle conversation must necessarily lead to a worldly and frivolous frame of mind, utterly inconsistent with the solemn spiritual duties and character of the Sabbath. It is sinful in itself, as a breach of the Sabbath law, God having distinctly required in his Word, that on that day we do not speak our own words; and it unhinges and gives a worldly and frivolous tone to the whole mind. In respect of conversation, professing Christians frequently err, egregiously err, on the Lord’s Day. Too often their conversation, instead of being of a heavenly and spiritual character, differs nothing from the ordinary talk of every-day life,—and not unfrequently is most decidedly and shamefully worldly. To allow ourselves in such conversation is certainly to unfit ourselves for prayer and meditation; and therefore, with our eyes open, to run in the very face of duty.

3. But, thirdly, to avoid worldly conversation on the Lord’s Day, it will be necessary for us also to withdraw from worldly company. To throw ourselves into the arms of the society of the world on the Lord’s Day, is to countenance what is in itself evil, and necessarily attended with a breach of the Fourth Commandment—company-keeping on the Sabbath, and to expose ourselves to influences which tend not only to unfit us for sanctifying the Sabbath, but to destroy all sense of its sanctity. In such company we must either join in conversation directly worldly, or appear in the inconsistent character of reprovers of a vice in one particular, which, in another, we countenance and commit.

4. But, fourthly, that we may not unfit ourselves for the duties of the Sabbath, how careful ought we to be as to what we read on that day! If our reading be of a worldly and secular character, our thoughts and habit of mind will necessarily be so too. If we spend our Sabbaths in reading newspapers, even though they come to us under the name, and with the character, of religious ones; or in reading works of ordinary history, or of science, or mere morals; by that very act we must unfit ourselves for the services of the Sabbath; whilst, moreover, we break in upon time which ought to be set apart by us for reading the Scriptures, and works of a devotional character. If we would spend the Sabbath dutifully, pleasantly, and with profit, let us lay aside on that day whatever works have not a direct tendency to exalt God, and the soul, and the Cross, in our thoughts, and give ourselves to the reading and consideration of those which have such a tendency—and especially of the Bible.

5. Fifthly, Let us not only guard against what may unfit us for, and is inconsistent with, the duties of the Sabbath; but, moreover, indulge those thoughts which have a tendency to solemnize and prepare us for all the services of this day. Let us think of God’s rest from his work, after the creation of all things, and his authoritatively sanctifying and hallowing the seventh day. Let us think of the rest into which Christ hath entered, having finished the work of our redemption; and of which a Sabbath on earth, truly spent, is to all his believing people a foretaste and an earnest. Let us compare the things of time with the things of eternity,—these present, perishable things, about which we are allowed six days employ, with those future and imperishable things about which God requires our undivided thoughtfulness one day in seven. Let us remember death, and judgment, and eternity; hell, where there will be no Sabbath; and heaven, which will be an eternal one. Let us call to mind the experience of the people of God in the past, as when they said, "A day spent in thy courts is better than a thousand: I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." And such thoughts and reminiscences will tend greatly to the elevation of our mind, to solemnize it, to humble it, and to prepare it, in faith and love, to engage in the sacred duties of the Sabbath.

Last of all, my brethren, to be prepared for duty, and preserved in the way of it, on the Lord's day, ask the teaching, and the quickening, and the supports of the Spirit of all grace. Oh! it is he alone who can lead us in the right way, and keep us from falling, on any day. It is in him we stand; and without his assistance we shall prepare our hearts in vain for, and act but a poor and a miserable part in, the duties of a Sabbath-day. "The preparation of the heart is of the Lord." Let our Saturday's evening prayer, let our Sabbath morning prayer, unto him be, that his Spirit may sanctify us for our Sabbath duties—interest and support us in them. So we shall be enabled, in some degree, to "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy;" and shall have reason to live in the hope of those to whom, through grace, it has been promised, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable,.....then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord: and I will cause thee to ride on the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Remedy for Trouble.—For the troubles and calamities of life, there is but one remedy; and, thank God, that remedy is a specific; it has stood the test of nearly two thousand years, and has never failed in a single instance; it is the repose of the Christian upon his Saviour,—a consciousness of his perpetual presence and support: "Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid." The Christian lays the entire score to the charge of sin. Man had no fear, no trouble of any kind, when in a state of innocence; and when he shall be removed from his present sinful condition, he will be removed also from the sorrows and perplexities that are indigenous to it. In heaven, the heart is happy; because it is holy. There can be no tears where God is present; no anxieties to mar the pleasures that are at his right hand for evermore. The harmony of the skies has no discord; the song of the Lamb is all triumph. How can he be afraid, who has for ever sat down by the side of the great Captain of his salvation, and whose banner waving over him is love?—Dr. J. M. Good.

The Tempting of Abraham.—When it is said that "it came to pass that God did tempt Abraham," we are not to suppose that the expression means any thing more than that he tried him, put his faith to the test, to see whether it was genuine and firm; and certainly this trial was the most severe that was ever laid upon a true servant of God: "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him as a sacrifice;" slay him and consume him to ashes as a burnt-offering unto the Lord. Every particular in this extraordinary command was calculated to put a father's feelings to the test: he was to sacrifice his son, yea, with his own hand, and that his only son, his favourite son—Isaac, the child of promise, the support of his old age, the comfort of his gray hairs; and this simply because the Lord had said it. But was he sure that the Lord had said it? Might not this be some satanic delusion? Could the holy and just God impose such a command? could a human sacrifice propitiate his favour? could he delight in seeing a father imbrue his hands in the blood of his own son? These and many other surmises might have risen in quick succession in the mind of the patriarch, and combining with the strong dictates of nature, might have urged him to disobedience. But he was sure that this was the word of the same God who had called him out of Ur of the Chaldees, and for whom he had forsaken his country and kindred and father's house; and therefore in simple faith in his wisdom and goodness he immediately obeyed: "And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt-offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him." There is something very affecting in the minute detail of these trivial circumstances, when taken in connection with the feelings which must have been passing through the patriarch's mind. He occupied himself in preparations for his journey with all the coolness of deliberation; he arranged the particulars himself; and even clave with his own hand the wood which was to consume his son! This was not the result of a sudden ebullition of faith; it was the effect of resignation and habitual confidence in God. During his long and painful journey he had time to consider well of his conduct; for three successive days did this affectionate father travel with his innocent victim by his side, and even then he saw the place of "trial afar off." Leaving his young men at this spot, lest they should attempt by interference to oppose the will of God, it is said, "Abraham took the wood of the burnt-offering and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together." And here a touching incident is mentioned, which, if any thing were wanting to heighten the conflict of the father's feelings on such an occasion, must indeed have wounded him to the very soul. Isaac, in the simplicity of his heart, "spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" How little did he think at that moment that he was himself the sacrifice which his father was commanded to offer! The reply of Abraham was full of faith and resignation; he said, "My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." Thus they pursued their way. Reaching at length the fatal spot, we are surprised as much by the meek submission of Isaac as by the constancy of his believing father. He was now about twenty-six years of age, and therefore must have voluntarily suffered himself to be bound. His early piety, which is afterwards commemorated, gives us every reason to believe that he did so. The crisis was now arrived in which Abraham's faith was to be finally ascertained; he had built the altar, and had laid the wood in order, and had bound Isaac, and had laid him on the altar upon the wood, and as he stretched out his hand to grasp the fatal knife that was to slay his son, the angel of the Lord suddenly called to him out of heaven, saying, "Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I." Yes; he was there in the path of duty, in the act of obedience: he would have slain his son had not the Lord recalled his command; but it was enough; he had proved himself willing to part with every earthly object, however beloved, and to rend asunder the dearest human ties if God required it of him: "And the Lord said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me." And God made good the words of the patriarch, for he did provide a sacrifice, a ram caught in a thicket, and Abraham offered it in the place of his son, calling the name of the place Jehovah-jireh, which means, "the Lord will provide." And God called to him a second time out of heaven, solemnly declaring that "because he had done this thing, and had not withheld his son, his only son, in blessing he would bless him, and in multiplying he would multiply him;" and that he should be the progenitor of the Messiah, for "in him all the nations of the earth should be blessed." Thus, every difficulty was removed; the trial proved the forerunner of an enlarged blessing, and the apparent harshness of the command only sweetened the mercies to which it led.—REV. F. CLOSS, A. M. (Lectures on Genesis.)

Christ an example of Prayer.—Great and unquestionable as was the inherent power of our divine Saviour, every mighty work which he performed on earth, was ushered in by prayer. Was he to be announced at his baptism as the beloved Son? We are told it was "while Jesus was praying, that the heavens opened, and the Holy Ghost descended." Was he about to ordain his apostles? "He continued all night in prayer to God." Did he intend to spend the day in preaching? We read that "rising up a great while before day, he departed into a solitary place, and there prayed." Did he design to encourage the falling apostle? "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." Did he seek consolation for himself? "Being in agony, he prayed more earnestly." Thus was it also in the instance we are considering: "As he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light."—REV. H. BLUNT.

The value of God's Word.—If you would grow in grace, you must let the word of God abide in you richly and wisely; it must dwell in your understanding, in your will, your affections, your memory, and your conversation, and it will thus prove to you a shield which you can hold up at all times, and a sword to fight against all your spiritual foes. Does Satan tempt you to sin? you can bring to remembrance some precept to prove it is sin; if tempted to embrace erroneous views, then call to mind some doctrinal passage; if to unbelief, some promise; if likely to fall into a snare from fear of men, then some threatening, such as, "fear not him that can only kill the body, but fear him who can cast both body and soul into hell;" and when in danger of falling away, then think of some such character as Demas, and pray for grace to resist,—remembering that all these things are written for our admonition, for it is by the word of God the Holy Spirit directs the children of God, and keeps them from falling.—REV. W. MARSH.

A word of warning and consolation.—Before the institution of the Passover, the Jewish year began in autumn; thenceforward it began in spring. Are any of you living in sin, and strangers to the application of the blood of Christ? It is still the autumn of your existence; your summer sun set in Eden. Death will strip you of every idol, and if you die in your sins, a winter of eternal storm awaits you. You who know what it is to eat the paschal Lamb, and feed on him by faith, it is the spring-time of your existence; your sun shall never go down. The beams of the Sun of Righteousness shall illumine the dark valley of the shadow of death, and an eternal summer is beyond. Contrast the Israelites eating the lamb in peace and safety, with the Egyptians mourning the loss of their first-born and their gods. But what is it in comparison with the state of the friends and enemies of Jehovah, when time shall be no more?—HOWELS.

THE NECESSITY OF BECOMING CHILDREN.

BY M. A. VINET, PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF LAUSANNE.

Translated from the French.

"Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."—MATT. xviii. 3.

MY DEAR HEARERS,—I have endeavoured in preceding Discourses, to commend Christianity to your reason; I have constantly connected the chain of my argument with the immutable truths of nature; I have appealed to your own consciences. I have, as it were, set you up as a tribunal, and brought before you the religion of Jesus Christ to be judged. What I have done, I believed myself at liberty to do. Nothing forbids me to treat you with the same condescension as the apostles did their first disciples; and, since God himself has established preaching as a means of conversion, so long as he shall not accompany our words with the powerful support of miracles, the method which we have followed must be considered as fully sanctioned by divine authority. Preaching will always consist in setting out from one point, upon which all are agreed, with the view of reaching together some other point on which some differ. With men convinced of the truth of Christianity, we set out with the declarations of the Gospel themselves; but with those who are not so, we must necessarily begin at a more remote point, which can be no other than some one of those convictions common to all our hearers, either bestowed by nature, or acquired by means of study. We have then, nothing to regret in having pursued the path on which we have hitherto trod: but we confess that the attitude in which we have been forced to place Christianity—the attitude, if we may so say, of culprit as to you, of client as to us,—is not the one we should in preference have given it: and we are not insensible to the danger of the position in which both you and we are, almost inevitably, placed by this method. In continually appealing to your reason, we have had to fear, on the one hand, that we should flatter its vanity; and, on the other, that we should give to Christian revelation a false air of philosophic system and theory. We may have also given some reason to think that the work of conversion to Christianity is brought about entirely by the actings of human intellect;—that one becomes a disciple of Jesus Christ in the same way that he would become the disciple of Plato;—that, in this wonderful change, reason and philosophy do all; and that, in short, the proud reasoner can make this long and important passage from the world to Christianity without losing or giving up any thing by the way.

If we have allowed such an impression to be made on your mind, we shall now endeavour to efface it. Instead of patiently listening to an advocacy of its rights before our little tribunal, Christianity shall, from this moment, assume the tone which becomes it, and dissipate the mistakes under which you may labour with regard to its position and your own. You have, perhaps, been imagining that it desires nought but an expression of your attachment, and that it would be too happy in securing that to give you any farther trouble; and thus you may hope that it will now leave you, as if the affair had been settled amicably between you. Perhaps you think that, in assenting to the justice of its pretensions, in pronouncing, so to say, the sentence of its acquittal, you have done all that it can expect you to do, and that your relations with it should continue on the same footing of equality as before. Indeed, you are very much deceived. You must not think that, because you have yielded to the evidence—historical, philosophical, and moral—which so clearly establishes the truth of Christianity, you are converted; the proper work of conversion has not even been commenced: all that we have said, all that you have believed, is little more than the preface to it; you have not yet read one syllable of the book itself. The road to the kingdom of heaven has been pointed out to you, but you have not yet entered into the kingdom. In your natural state, you could not enter in. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children," the Master himself says to you, "you cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Do you remember the reply of Archimedes to his disciple, the tyrant of Sicily, who was provoked by the slowness of his method or the difficulty of his theorems? "There is no royal road to science." We have better reasons for saying the same to you with regard to our subject. Christianity neither presents nor acknowledges any privileged road. So long, I admit, as you confine yourself to inquiries concerning the truth of the Christian revelation, the very nature of such preliminary researches leaves in you the feeling of independence and of dignity. This part of the road is large; there is space enough on it for all your pretensions; there you may, at your ease, enlarge and extend yourself, and occupy it entirely with the splendid display of your science. But this road, how wide soever it may be, you and all other men will find terminating at a door so narrow and so low, that, far from being able to take along with you all your magnificence, you cannot yourselves pass through it without lessening your size, and without exchanging, if it be possible, your stature of a perfect man for that of a little child. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Do we mean that, at the decisive moment on which entrance into the kingdom of heaven depends, man is called upon to give up his reason, to acknowledge as null and of no avail the learning which he has acquired, and that the infancy which we spoke of as being a condition of admittance could be nothing else than ignorance and stupidity? Those who think so must forget that the Gospel every where supposes the contrary—that the Christian religion includes within itself the richest source of intellectual development—that it first reduced to the level of common understandings the most sublime doctrines—that the apostles feared not to say to men already converted, "We speak to you as to men,"—and, finally, that in the Gospel we meet with this remarkable antithesis, "Be not children in understanding; howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men."

The Christian ought to be a man in understanding; but, before he can enter the kingdom of heaven, he must be a child in heart. I presume you to be the first:—are you the second also?

During the time that you have been engaged in examining the evidences and proofs of Christianity, we have treated you as perfect men—we have regarded you as nothing less; but now that these independent researches have forced upon you such a degree of conviction as binds you to the doctrine of Christ; now that, by whatever method, you have assured yourself of the great truth that Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom each of you may consider himself the chief; or, to speak more plainly, now that the man of reflection, the subtle genius, the scholar, has confessed that, as a child forsaken, he was picked up in the bye-paths of the world, without shelter, without raiment, without food, without even strength to walk, or voice to ask his way, does it become him to put on the airs of a being of importance, or ought he not rather to suffer himself to be treated as a child—as one become so in reality?

What, then, in the eyes of God, is he whom the world honours as learned? What but an ignorant man? What is the strong amongst men, but weakness itself? What the intelligent, but a fool? What the rich, but a very beggar? And even when he has discovered a new heaven, or founded a new empire on the earth, what is he in the eyes of God but a fool, who has forgotten the first of truths, incapable of spelling the first syllable of the name with which the heavens resound, and which angels adore; unable to discharge, or even to attempt, the first, the most sacred, the most simple of his duties; and, notwithstanding all his knowledge of nature, so estranged from nature itself, that he adores what he ought to despise, and despises what he ought to adore?

What a little child is in point of knowledge compared with the man, he himself is compared with the knowledge of God. But what the child has, he has not. All the child's strength is a sense of his weakness; all his science a consciousness of his ignorance; all his wisdom an instinct which carries him towards his natural protectors. The man of the world possesses not this wisdom; he would fain rise from the cradle where lies his weakness; he would fain discover, without assistance, his road through a country which he knows not; he spurns the hand that is offered to support him, and, always endeavouring to play his part as a man, would willingly forget that he is but a child.

This disposition, at once natural and common to all the unconverted, continues to show itself very often even in those whose reason has been subdued by the Gospel. They would fain, in their character of perfect men, set their seal to the Gospel; but they cannot resolve to become children—in other words, to become Christians. Here it is that they meet with the great stone of stumbling, which their wisdom had not foreseen. Here they make a stand, as much disconcerted as if they had been entrapped. It was not with this view that they embraced Christianity; they have been deceived; they have been led on farther than they wished to go; they will not go back, that is now impossible, but they will not advance.

We must go forward; we must unite heart and mind. Christianity is not a mere system of externals; it is a life within us. Christianity is a renewal of the soul, and absolutely, nothing less. A Christian is not a man who has dismissed from his mind one theory to make way for another; but an humbled man, who feels that it is through mercy alone that he exists, who adores and praises this mercy, who feeds upon the promises of God as his only hope, whose life is one continued act of self-denial, who presents himself every day as a sacrifice to his Saviour, living no longer to himself, but allowing his Saviour to live in him, and living the life which he now lives in the flesh by faith on the Son of God, who loved him. It would be, doubtless, more agreeable, and more flattering to self-love, to present himself to the world as a man who, from amongst many systems, has made his choice, and who is ready to justify it, by setting forth the reasons which have induced him to profess Christianity as a religion eminently rational. But something more than this is required even in profession. Look at the child. Not only does he not blush to own his father, but he glories in so doing; he never conceives the idea of his father being less respected by others than by him; in his opinion, he is exalted far above all other men; in every place he shows him respect and obedience; and even when his father is obliged to appear in a humbled attitude, he perceives not that he is not regarded by the world in the same light as by him; or, if he should perceive it, he is astonished and grieved, and openly declares his feelings. Ask of the man, who is, as yet, but a speculative Christian, these proofs of love, these avowals, this open and ingenuous profession, expect him to declare without embarrassment, and without equivocation, alike in every place, his exclusive confidence in the blood of the new covenant; let him be seen at the foot of the cross, humble, insignificant, miserable; full of the love of his Father, adoring his glorious goodness, feeling that in comparison with this divine work, nothing is grand, nothing beautiful; let him give free utterance to the sentiments of his heart, and speak of the news of salvation as of news always fresh, always interesting, claiming attention in preference to all other intelligence. You will ask him for all this in vain. He did not imagine that this was the matter on hand. Is it thus that it is understood? In truth, you greatly astonish him.

A little child can do nothing for himself; he expects all from his father. He knows that he is loved by him, and that nothing really necessary will be denied to him. He prays; the life of the little child is one continued prayer. How many reasons has man to think and to act in like manner! But, "pray!" says the wise man. "Pray! this is by no means natural to my heart; all that can be said with regard to prayer, I know, and hold it to be true; but, notwithstanding, I do not feel myself disposed to engage in it; it seems as if it were something foreign to my nature, and altogether the concern of another person. I should appear singular to myself in praying, as if I were doing what I had learned of copied. Did I think of all this in becoming a Christian?"

A little child has more philosophic views with regard to the relations of society than any philosopher. With him men are men; dress does not, in his estimation, communicate to them any new quality; he loves them if they be good; he loves them if they love his father. In this view, also, the Christian is a child. He admits and accepts of social distinctions for a temporal use; frequently he conforms to them from motives of Christian prudence; but, in his heart, he disowns all such distinctions; Christian love levels all. He hesitates not to treat all men as brothers; for, in them, he sees the children of his father; and, if there be any towards whom his heart is drawn in preference, they are those who love his father. Not only are the distinctions of rank insufficient to restrain the outgoings of his love, but even more formidable obstacles, such as those produced by differences in cultivation, intelligence and character, are, with equal facility, surmounted. He has always something to say to the simple, something to teach the ignorant; some sympathy even with characters most unlike his own. In whatever society he may be placed, he feels neither weariness nor disgust. The bond of a common interest unites those who, without it, would be strangers to one another. To the Christian, all seem to be equally learned, equally ignorant, equally foolish, equally wise. The distinctions which exist in other spheres cannot here be remarked. They appear, when viewed in relation to the end of life, to be little worthy of regard. Wherever the Christian meets with a Christian, he finds an equal. But nothing of all this can be said by one who is merely a speculative religionist. To attach him to a Christian, something more than Christianity is required; if not equality of rank, at least of cultivation; he has nothing to say to the uneducated Christian; he feels ill at ease in his company, he shuns him. He must also have similarity of views; a mere shadow disturbs him; he does not raise himself above the impression which an unreasonable prejudice may have made on his mind. He cannot overlook the shadow, and attach himself to the substance, which is Christianity itself. He seeks equals rather than brothers.

A little child believes what his father tells him. He is his father; does he not know all that the child has occasion to know; and would he deceive him? This amiable instinct is that of the Christian. He knows that his father has spoken, and that is enough for him. He will not submit the authentic communications of Divine wisdom to the control of man. After having believed that the Gospel is of God, he believes what the Gospel says. The theoretic Christian, on the other hand, continues to be actuated by the pride of reason, even within the sacred enclosure, at the doors of which he ought to have relinquished it. He would still like to judge and choose for himself, apply to his own use, prescribe to God what he ought to say, reform the maxims and the truths of revealed religion, and fashion the Bible according to his own taste after having accepted of it. Do we speak to him of submission? Do we remind him of what he has promised—of the inconsistency of meddling with those mysteries the sacredness of which he before acknowledged? His reason, accustomed to enter every where, is surprised to find one door shut against it: he had not considered the tendency of his engagements, he experiences the vexation of it, and, thinking it impossible either to retreat or advance, urged on by pride, and restrained by fear, he remains immovable and inactive, upon the very ground which separates between Christianity and the world.

The transition from knowledge to possession, from belief to life, is what our Saviour represented by the image, at first sight so singular, of a return from mature age to childhood. Whilst, then, in the world the teacher says, "Come, behave as a man;" Jesus Christ, our divine Master, says to the man, "Conduct yourself like a child: be in heart, in all your relations with God and with men, like a little child in its conduct towards its father, and towards those around it." Child-like simplicity of heart is the characteristic which distinguishes the true from the speculative Christian. But what is this simplicity of heart but humility? What is it that distinguishes the child from the man, but a kind of natural humility? It is humility, then, which forms the line of demarcation between the speculative and the living Christian; it is humility which he chiefly needs; it is humility which he must possess before he can enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Let us be more explicit, my brethren; let us not excite the notion, that one virtue is, more than another, a condition of salvation. Jesus Christ has only given us to understand, that his religion is of such a nature, that, unless we consent to humble ourselves, we cannot obtain an interest in it. He might, in like manner, have said, that without love we cannot enjoy it; and this he has also declared, and his disciples have repeated it. But humility itself is a proof of love; he who loves has no difficulty in humbling himself; he who is not humble, loves not. He who has seen the Son of God descend from heaven to earth, share in all our sorrows, degrade himself to a level with the malefactor, and drink up reproach like water, in order that he, a sinner, might enjoy eternal glory in the bosom of the Father;—he who has seen these things, who believes them, and yet thinks that the disciple is above his master, or the servant above his lord; he who cannot make up his mind to drink but one drop out of the cup from which Jesus Christ drank in long draughts; he who, at the foot of the cross, cannot resign his frivolous pretensions, his pride, his self-confidence, his little glory, his vanity; he who expects to sit upon a throne in presence of Jesus nailed to the accursed tree,—certainly loves not. And, on the other hand, he whom so much love cannot move, who can believe in it without loving; he who will not suffer his heart to be caught in this net of mercy—certainly will not humble himself. Love and humility become, by turns, antecedents one of the other; but never exist separately in the heart. Look there, and you will find them united and blended into one sentiment, whose different qualities manifest themselves in concert, by one motion, and by one virtue.

Reason may tell us, that the Gospel is of such a nature that one cannot, without becoming a child, receive it in deed and in truth; but it does no more: it leaves us in this case, as in so many others, at the very point where the true difficulty begins. Reason is not the efficient cause of any of the emotions which spring up within us; all that it can do, is to introduce us to the facts fitted to excite these; it then retires, and leaves the facts themselves to convince us. It is thus that it places us in the presence of the great fact of redemption; a fact which is connected with this peculiarity, that, however fit it may appear in its nature to touch the heart, it meets in this very heart with the most formidable obstacles. Theoretically, we say, that in this fact every thing is so combined as to charm and elevate the soul; in practice, we seem to reject it as altogether revolting. Accordingly, the Gospel does not attribute to our natural faculties the power of believing and applying ascertained truth to themselves. "No one can believe," it tells us, "that Jesus is the Son of God, but by the Holy Spirit." The meaning of which undoubtedly is, that no man can, without the aid of the Holy Spirit, put on the dispositions of a true disciple of Jesus Christ. No man can enter the kingdom of heaven "except he be converted, and become as a little child."

So, then, you cannot of yourselves become children; it is your part to act upon the conviction, that, being proud and self-sufficient by nature, it behoves you to ask of God to humble this pride, to bring you down to the stature of little children, and to give you their hearts. And it is not only you who are learned, and men of genius, who have need of this; your pride is not much greater than that of other men, although your intellect may be superior to theirs. They, too, in their mediocrity, are haughty and proud; and they are so regarded by God, even when they appear before their fellow-men humble and modest. Their reason is as presumptuous as yours, their dignity not less easily offended; it costs them as much to become abased as if they were, like you, exalted to the skies. To be children, little children in leading-strings, not daring, for one step, to let go the hand which supports them, depending on his mercy for the supply of their daily wants, walking with the humble, being seen in the company of the lowly, united with the simple-hearted—what abasement!—what disgrace! Happy, however, he who accepts of this shame, and covers himself with it! The shame of the earth is the glory of heaven. If it be still repugnant to your feelings, if you choose not to become children along with the children of God, depend upon it, notwithstanding the sincerity of your profession, you are not yet in the kingdom of heaven; you are upon the very threshold of a door open before you, through which you dare not pass. You must pray God to humble your pride by giving you a lively sense of your state as a sinner, a deep view of your misery, an implacable hatred of yourselves, such as sin has made you, and a serious conviction of your danger. Ask him so to humble you, and to bring you so low in your own estimation, as that you shall believe yourselves supremely happy in being received again as mere children under his paternal care. Then alone will the religious convictions which you have acquired profit your soul; they will no longer be a burden, a source of perplexity, a sad thought, of which in vain you try to rid yourself; they will form the ground-work of your peace, the foundation of your happiness; a life within you, a life in death; your hope in time, your glory in eternity.

PART I.

"And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection."—REV. xx. 4, 5.

THIS remarkable passage has given rise to much discussion, and not a little controversy; having, from a very early period, divided the opinions of the Christian Church, or, at least, of those who have made prophecy their study. On these words chiefly is founded the doctrine of those who contend for a personal reign of Christ and his saints upon the earth; a doctrine surrounded with so many attractions to susceptible and sanguine minds, yet beset with so many difficulties, that it has naturally become the subject of much zealous and interesting argument; a doctrine, we add, which deserves the more serious attention, on account of the influence it is fitted to have on the expectations and desires, and, therefore, on the character and pursuits, of those who embrace it. In investigating this subject, our aim should simply be, to ascertain the meaning of the Inspired Word. The fancies of an inventive imagination have nothing to do here; and reason, though still indispensable as our companion, cannot be our guide, on the holy ground appropriate to Him who "dwells in the bush that burned and was not consumed."

The doctrine of the personal reign of Christ's faithful servants, raised from their graves, and dwelling anew for a thousand years upon the earth, has been held in different forms, and with various modifications. Some have restricted this reign to those who suffered martyrdom from Pagan or Papal persecution; others have joined with these all who adhered to the truth under the reign of Antichrist; others have extended the privilege to the apostles, the prophets, the patriarchs, and, in fine, to all saints from the beginning of the world to the era of the millennium. Some have supposed that the persons destined to this privilege, be their number greater or less, shall rise together at the commencement of the millennium, and live together to its close; others have thought it more probable that they will rise in succession, throughout the whole period, and take their several parts in it. Some few conjecture that Christ and his saints, though reigning upon earth, may be invisible to the men then living in a probationary state; but the far greater number are of opinion that they must be visible, as having resumed their own resuscitated bodies.

To these illustrious denizens, the advocates of a personal reign have assigned the distinctions of dignity, and office, and authority,—as teachers and as rulers; as priests, conducting the worship of God; and as kings, guiding the affairs of men. They have surrounded them with such forms of happiness and enjoyment as their own tastes have led them to esteem; pleasures of the body as well as of the mind, of the senses as well as of the intellect and the affections; pleasures derived from nature, in all its beauty and fruitfulness,—from art, in all its inventions,—from science, in all its discoveries,—from friendship, in its closest intimacies from devotion, in its most elevated communion.

The grosser conceptions of the early heretics, who disgraced their millennium with licentious pleasures, were rejected by the purer minds of the orthodox fathers; many of whom adopted the doctrine of the personal reign. These appear to have held, that the first resurrection was to embrace all the just from the beginning of the world, some rising sooner, some later; that Jesus Christ was to come down in person from heaven, and to reign in visible majesty with his servants; that the temple and city of Jerusalem were to be rebuilt with great splendour, and the land of Judea to be the special seat of the Government; that the earth was to enlarge its fertility, and produce spontaneously all manner of fruits, so that the table of the happy guests was to be prepared of God, and loaded with the richest gifts of his providence; and that, while the faithful exercised rule and authority, the nations of the aliens were to be their servants in all manner of servile labour,—interpreting literally the sayings of the prophet, “The sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee; for the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted. Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vine-dressers; but ye shall be named the priests of the Lord; ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.” (Isa. lx. 10, 12; lxi. 5, 6.)

Other views of the early writers, more open to objection,—as that the saints, restored to the earth, should marry, and multiply a holy progeny,—I pass by, being willing to regard them as individual follies, and exceptions from the current opinions; but the doctrine of the personal reign, embracing the views before stated, is asserted by many of the fathers, and seems to have been the popular belief of the three first centuries. Its reception, it is true, was far from universal; since it was rejected by the many commentators who, in opposition to the disciples of the letter, contended for a figurative interpretation of the prophecies, and was condemned by the most distinguished names of the immediately succeeding centuries. Still it may claim, to a considerable extent, the sanction of tradition and antiquity; and in modern times, down to the present day, has been held and defended by men of great learning, as well as eminent piety. But with all my respect for its advocates, and with, I trust, a perfect readiness of mind to receive whatever the Word of Inspiration may reveal, I cannot discover, either in the words before us, or in any other part of the Scriptures, any solid foundation for this doctrine.

The language of prophecy, as we have often remarked, is essentially figurative; and therefore, a literal interpretation, if required in any particular case, is not the rule, but the exception, the figurative being, in fact, the natural and appropriate construction. Thus, the prediction of Malachi, “Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord,” might be regarded by the Jews as very precise, specifying both the name and the office; yet they erred in understanding it literally, for it was meant to describe one who should come “in the spirit and power of Elias,” and our Lord himself, speaking of John the Baptist, declared, “If ye will receive it, this is Elias which was to come.” That an interpretation is literal, is therefore no argument in its favour, but rather the reverse. Moreover, the figures before us are of frequent recurrence, and well known signification. Why, then, entangle ourselves gratuitously in innumerable difficulties, by departing from the ordinary rules of interpretation?

The language of the text and context, when accurately examined, will, I think, be found to be inconsistent with the idea of a literal resurrection and a personal reign.

It is admitted on all hands that those who were “beheaded,” or, literally, “slain with the axe for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God,” signify the martyrs; and that those “which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands,” are those who kept themselves pure from idolatry, and the other deadly errors of an apostate Church. The question is, Whether the text affirms a literal or a figurative resurrection,—a resurrection of their bodies, or a revival of their principles in men of like temper with themselves? I observe, first, that the expression, the “souls of them that were beheaded,” suggests the idea, not of their bodies as raised from the dead, but of the living, animating principles, of the characters referred to. The term employed in the original is never used in connection with a proper resurrection. In all the other places of this Book where it occurs, six in number, it signifies either the soul while yet in this life, or the soul in a separate state; being never employed as descriptive of the resurrection of the body. In chapter vi. 9, the apostle “saw the souls of those that were slain for the Word of God lying under the altar,” where they were directed to rest till their fellow-servants, destined to be killed as they were, should be fulfilled; a description, manifestly, of souls in a separate state. In the other passages, (chap. viii. 9, xii. 11, xvi. 3, xviii. 13, 14,) the word means life, or a living principle. It must be used in a sense altogether peculiar if it denotes, not the soul, but the whole man, including specially the body, which alone can properly be said to rise and live. A resurrection of the body is never in the New Testament expressed by the living of the soul, but by the raising of the body out of the dust, or out of the grave. Thus, of those who rose with our Lord at his resurrection, it is said that “many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves.” Matt. xxvii. 52. To interpret souls as meaning bodies, is surely unnatural; and is also an inversion of the laws of parabolic instruction, which employs things seen to illustrate things unseen; while, on the other hand, to interpret it as meaning the animating principles of the martyrs, or their representatives and successors of the same spirit, is altogether agreeable to the genius of symbolical and prophetic language.

I observe, secondly, that to rise from the dead and to live again, with many similar expressions, are continually used in Scripture to denote a revival, whether in communities or in individuals, of political, moral, or spiritual existence. Thus, in chapter 13th of this book, when one of the heads of the beast was wounded to death, after the healing of the wound the beast is said to live again. (Verses 12-14.) So in the 11th chapter, where the two witnesses had lain dead for three days and a-half, we are told that, after that period, "the spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet," and afterwards "ascended up to heaven." Now, as the two witnesses cannot be supposed to mean two individuals, but a competent number for attesting the truth, their resuscitation must be understood of a succession of men of the same faith, energy and fidelity. In the prophets the revival of religion and the restoration of the church are frequently spoken of as a new life and a resurrection. (See Psalm lxxi. 20, lxxxv. 6; Isa. xxvi. 19; Hos. vi. 2.) Nothing can be more graphic than the language of Ezekiel (chapter xxxvii.), where being set down among dry bones, he is asked, "Can these bones live?" and is then commanded to prophesy to them; when suddenly the bones come together, are clothed with sinews and flesh, are animated with breath, and live, and stand up, an exceeding great army. Now, mark the explanation of the symbol (xxxvii. 11-14), "Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live; and I shall place you in your own land." The very word used by the apostle to express the first resurrection, "they lived," is used by the prophet to express the revived glory of the Church.

If it be said that the first and the second resurrection must be presumed to be of the same kind, and since the second, which is usually called simply "the resurrection of the dead," is believed to be a resurrection of the body, so also must the first, — I answer that it is quite common with inspired teachers to use the same expression in different senses, leaving the sense to be deduced from circumstances. Observe, for example, our Lord's words (John v. 25.), "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live." Here he speaks of those spiritually dead, who at that very hour were made to hear his voice, and to live spiritually. But look forward to the 28th verse: "The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Here he speaks of those literally dead and of a literal resurrection. Above all, remark the apostle's words with respect to the restoration of the Jews (Rom. xi. 15.), "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" that is, the restoration of the Jewish Church is a resurrection from the dead; yet none has ever imagined for it any other than a spiritual resurrection.

Thirdly, From the expression, "they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years," it is inferred that Christ will personally descend at the beginning of the millennium and reign upon earth. This was the general opinion of the ancient millenarians, and though rejected by the ablest advocates of the doctrine in the last age, is by later writers restored to its place as the centre and glory of the system; as, indeed, if there be any truth in the doctrine, it unquestionably is. But this opinion seems inconsistent with the prophecies that relate to our Lord's second coming, and connect that event with the final judgment of the world and perfected salvation of the saints. There are different events, it is true, in which he is said to come; as in the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, in the destruction of Jerusalem, and in other signal dispensations; but no intimation is given of his proper personal coming again till that day of his "glorious appearing," so often spoken of in the New Testament, when he shall come "the second time without sin unto salvation." "The heavens," as St Peter tells us, "must receive" and retain "him until the times of restitution of all things," when the purposes of God shall be completed, and the "Son shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be all in all." (Acts iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 28.) If this time of restitution be supposed to coincide with the millennium, as the advocates of Christ's personal reign hold, still the difficulty remains; for if Christ then come to reign upon earth, that is his second coming, spoken of by St Peter; and his coming at the end of the world must be his third coming, in opposition to St Paul's assertion that "unto them that look for him, he shall appear the second time without sin unto salvation." (Heb. ix. 28.)

To escape this difficulty it is supposed that the second coming of Christ commences with the millennium, and continues through that period, and onward even to the end of the world. But how, in this case, shall we account for the termination of Christ's reign on earth at the close of the millennium? If he go away and return, this will still make a third advent. If he remain, it seems strange that the progress of the general judgment, which is supposed to be all the while going on, should be interrupted, or at least assailed, by the invasion of hostile powers encompassing the camp of the saints.

Further, it is supposed that the martyrs and confessors rise at the beginning, or during the progress of the millennium ; that the rest of the good assumed to be referred to in the 5th verse, rise at its close ; and then that the wicked rise after the destruction of Gog and Magog. Does not this make three resurrections ? whereas the Scriptures constantly represent the resurrection as one great event, embracing all classes of persons, "both the just and the unjust," and as effected instantaneously, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." (Acts xxiv. 15 ; 1 Cor. xv. 52.)

Fourthly, Another argument against a literal resurrection of the saints may be drawn, I think, conclusively from what is said in the 5th verse, the referring of which to good men, not martyrs, appears to be unwarranted, and contradicted by the context. The dead, described in the 4th verse, include expressly not only the martyrs but all who had not worshipped the beast nor received his mark ; "the rest" must therefore mean those who had worshipped and obeyed him ; who, indeed, are spoken of under this very term in the last verse of the preceding chapter ; "The remnant," or the rest, "were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse." Now the expression in the 5th verse, that they "lived not again until the thousand years were completed," implies that they shall then again begin to live. None, however, can imagine that the rebellious remnant that had fallen by the stroke of death, and the sword of judgment, shall be literally raised from their graves to live in the flesh. But, as Mr Mede, though for a different purpose, remarks, "It would be a harsh and violent interpretation to say, that the expressions, the dead and the living again of the dead, should not be taken in the same sense," in two consecutive verses, there being no intimation of a change of meaning. If, then, "the rest of the dead," the enemies of the Church, live again only in a metaphorical sense, when Satan is loosed and gathers them together to battle, so we must conclude that it is only in a metaphorical sense the martyrs and the faithful live again and reign.

Further, it appears that during this millennial period the saints owe their safety, not to their being securely and for ever confirmed in holiness, but to the restraint imposed upon Satan ; for when he is loosed, he again deceives the nations and pours his hostile forces even upon the camp of the saints. It is the absence of temptation, the imprisonment of the adversary, that leaves them in peace : when the wolf is let loose again, he scatters the flock. Is this state of insecurity and danger consistent with the condition and character of "the spirits of just men made perfect," whose reunion with the body, whensoever it takes place, must be supposed only to advance their perfection ?

And this suggests another remark, namely, that the body ascribed to believers at their resurrection is of a character that appears unsuited to a continued residence upon earth. "Raised in incorruption, in glory, in power, a spiritual body"—for the bodies of the martyrs, if raised to life in token of the peculiar honour given them, will surely not be inferior to those of other believers—it seems ill fitted for the common offices of human life, and the necessary accompaniments of animal existence ; while the purity of a perfected spirit seems still more unsuitable for admixture and association with fallen and sinful men. For the earth is not to be swept of her existing inhabitants, to make room for the resuscitated saints, but is still to nurse a progeny of men born in iniquity, who, after struggling with temptation themselves, whether they conquer or be overcome, transmit a corrupt nature to each succeeding generation. The union of perfect and sinless souls, that have finished their probation, and are now incased in bodies incorruptible, glorious, powerful, spiritual—their union, I say, in the various offices and relations of life, with sinful, tempted, dying men, involves difficulties and incongruities innumerable and insuperable. How could sinful men endure the presence of these glorified saints ? How could glorified saints find pleasure in companions so imperfect and corrupt ? Are they really to be brought down from the pure enjoyments of heaven, in the presence of the Father, to mingle in the affairs of this world, in association with sinning men ?

These difficulties apply with equal, or still greater force to the idea of Christ's personal residence upon earth ; and, in this view, have led some of the ablest advocates of the literal resurrection of the saints to reject this part of the theory, though, as I before hinted, the very centre on which it hinges. For "that Christ should leave the right hand of his Father, to come and pass a thousand years here below, living upon earth in a heavenly body," says one of them, "is a thing I never could digest." "I dare not imagine," says the learned Mede, "of this presence of Christ in his kingdom, that it should be a visible converse upon earth ; for the kingdom of Christ ever hath, and ever shall be, regnum cælorum—a kingdom whose throne and kingly residence is in heaven."

Without enlarging upon difficulties which it were easy to multiply, I shall only add this grave objection to the doctrine of a literal resurrection and reign of the saints on earth—that it appears to be inconsistent with the spiritual character of Christ's kingdom, which "is not of this world ;" with the many precepts that require us to "set our affections on things above ;" and with the promises that direct our hope to "a better country, that is, an heavenly." For, if this reign with Christ upon earth—in the exercise and enjoyment of honour, power, and pleasure—is indeed to be the portion of all believers, and is set before them as a high and glorious distinction, how can they do otherwise than set their hearts upon it ? Is it not even their duty to aspire after it ? Is not their ambition thus brought down from heaven to earth, and from everlasting to temporal things ? In looking at the actual influence of this doctrine upon those who embrace it, while we smile at the puerile conceit of familiar and even convivial intercourse with apostles, prophets, and patriarchs, we apprehend the doctrine necessarily serves to lessen the spirituality and lower the aims of the mind, inducing a spirit more akin to Judaism, with its promises of long life and prosperity, than to Christianity, with its better and more spiritual promises. To you, my brethren, I say, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth, but lay up treasures in heaven; for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." "Set your affection on things above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God; that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, ye may also appear with him in glory." Be "dead to the world," that ye may "live to God." "Let your conversation be in heaven," and look for your reward there, even that crown of glory which fadeth not away.

The considerations now stated, compel me to reject the literal interpretation of this passage, and to acquiesce in that interpretation which is, I think, sanctioned, and even required, by the well known character of prophetic language, as not simple, but figurative; by the analogy of many other passages; by the scope of the context, showing that the kingdom of the beast was to be succeeded by that of the saints; in fine, by the genius of the Christian faith, and the nature of those "exceeding great and precious promises," on which God hath taught us to hope. The passage teaches us that, Satan being bound and restrained from deceiving the nations, there shall be a wonderful and glorious revival of the Church; so that the spirit of her most honoured sons, martyrs, and confessors, faithful in times of greatest tribulation, shall animate the general body of her members, who, in intimate communion with their Lord, shall enjoy the blessings and extend the power of that "kingdom of God which is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." For successive ages the generation of the righteous shall flourish—shall rule the councils of men, and govern their affairs. Then "the mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills by righteousness. He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass, as showers that water the earth. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom;" yea, "the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." "This," then, "is the first resurrection," namely, this revival of the Church, including, specially, that restoration of the Jews which the apostle describes as "life from the dead." Its characters are specified in the following verse, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." Those who share in the abundant effusion and reviving energy of the Spirit in that glorious period of the Church are happy indeed, and not less holy than happy. "On such the second death," the punishment prepared for the enemies of truth and righteousness, "hath no power," either to destroy or to alarm them, for they are secure from its approach. "But they shall be priests of God and of Christ," as ministers consecrated to his glory and employed in his service, "and shall reign with him a thousand years."

HAPPINESS.

HAPPINESS, thou lovely name!
Where's thy seat, O tell me where?
Learning, pleasure, wealth, and fame,
All cry out, "It is not here!"
Not the wisdom of the wise,
Can inform me where it lies:
Not the grandeur of the great,
Can the bliss I seek create.
Object of my first desire,
Jesus, crucified for me!
All to happiness aspire,
Only to be found in thee:
Thee to praise, and thee to know,
Constitute our bliss below!
Thee to see, and thee to love,
Constitute our bliss above.
Lord, it is not life to live,
If thy presence thou deny:
Lord, if thou thy presence give,
'Tis no longer death to die:
Source and giver of repose,
Singly from thy smile it flows;
Peace and happiness are thine,
Mine they are, if thou art mine.
Whilst I see thy love to me,
Every object teems with joy;
Here, O may I walk with thee,
Then into thy presence die!
Let me but thyself possess,
Total sum of happiness!
Real bliss I then shall prove;
Heaven below, and heaven above.

THE JEWS IN MODERN JERUSALEM.

In a volume of "Travels in Palestine and Syria," by George Robinson, Esq., published three or four years ago, the following remarks occur, on the present state of the Jews who inhabit Jerusalem. To read of the degradation of the children of Abraham is deeply touching, and ought to draw forth our prayers and efforts on their behalf:—

Decidedly the most interesting population of Jerusalem is that of the Jews themselves. Here, as in all other Eastern towns, they are confined to a particular quarter. The part they occupy in Jerusalem is the hollow space lying between the site of the ancient temple, and that part of Mount Zion which is included within the walls. It is called Harât-el-Yahoud. Their habitations have a mean appearance from without, being generally built of unpolished stones, hastily put together, without any attempt at architectural embellishment. This affected simplicity does not arise from poverty, for most of them are in easy circumstances, but entirely from prudential motives, it being found necessary not only to conceal their wealth, if they have any, from the jealous eye of their rulers, but even the appearance of comfort, which might lead to a suspicion of its possession. The interior distribution of these houses is nearly uniform throughout. A gateway opens into a quadrangular court, round which several distinct families often reside.

The approach to the several apartments, which are usually on the first floor, the court being common to all, is by a stonestair running up the outside wall. In one of these we visited the Khakham, or chief rabbi. On entering a small low chamber, but neatly furnished, we found an aged patriarchal-looking gentleman, seated on a divan, surrounded by a family of several generations. As we advanced, he made an effort to rise up to salute us, which we prevented. His aged eye, nevertheless, glistened with pleasure, as he welcomed us to his house—a welcome that was immediately put in practice; for no sooner had he ceased speaking, than, making a sign to the younger females looking on, they retired, and in a few minutes afterwards returned with sweetmeats, rosolio, coffee, and pipes. Our conversation was necessarily restricted to trivial subjects, the more interesting topics, such as religion and politics, not being touched upon, out of respect for our host and the persons present. We all felt more or less embarrassment, but if all had dared to speak out what they felt, what an interesting revelation of feelings would have been here put forth!

Our party was composed of French and English, and they complimented us upon our nationality, in a way that made it evident, without saying it, that they looked upon us as the instruments, in God's hands, of their speedy deliverance from the yoke of their enemies. Would that it may be so! for there is something peculiarly affecting in the sight of this devoted race, living as strangers and slaves in the land of which they are the rightful owners; and he must have a cold heart, indeed, that can look on, and not sympathize with their sufferings. For my own part, I could not help, as I retired, uttering a prayer to the Almighty, that he would hasten the moment of reconciliation with his once chosen people, and remove the obstinacy that surrounds their hearts, by way of preparing them for its blessed results.

The well-known peculiarities of this people, for they have long ceased to form a distinct nation, are observable in the Jews residing at Jerusalem; but, in addition to these peculiarities, they have adopted others, belonging to the countries they respectively inhabited, previously to their coming to settle here. The more apparent feature contrasting with those of their brethren of the Levant, is a certain freedom of manners between the sexes, particularly observable in social intercourse; nevertheless, their women go veiled when abroad, a practice universally followed by their sex in the East, females of loose morals alone forming the exception. It consists in a white piece of muslin thrown over the head, which falls over their shoulders, leaving the features, however, more exposed than is customary with Turkish women to do. The number of Jews resident in Jerusalem has been greatly exaggerated by some travellers. There being no trade or commerce whatever, they must necessarily be limited to the few families that are attracted here for devotional purposes. I do not think they exceed three thousand. Of this estimate a large proportion are females. The synagogues in Jerusalem are both poor and small, not owing to the poverty of the possessors, or the want of alms from abroad, but from the prudential motives mentioned above.

I was moved almost to a tear, by seeing just outside the great mosque, which stands on the site of their ancient temple, four or five Jews, apparently rabbis, with books in their hands, in the attitude of prayer, and their faces directed towards the wall. I fancied I heard them saying, "How long, O Lord, how long shall we be the objects of thy just anger?" "Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. xxiii. 39. In this part of the wall are several large stones, evidently hewn at a very remote period, being cut in a peculiar fashion. Some of them measure twelve or fifteen feet in length, by four or five in height. Can these be some of the stones about which the disciples inquired, "Master, see what manner of stones are here?" &c. Mark xiii. 1.

Similar stones are worked into other parts of the modern walls, particularly at the south-east angle. They do not bear upon them any marks of the action of the fire that consumed the original temple, at the time of the destruction of the city by Titus; which has made some travellers suppose they formed part of the materials prepared by Julian for the rebuilding of the temple, in the course of which he was interrupted, it is said, by flames issuing from amongst the ruins.

HOPE.

THERE is a thought can lift the soul
Above the narrow sphere that bounds it,
A Star, that sheds its mild control
Brightest, when grief's dark cloud surrounds it;
And pours a soft, pervading ray,
Life's ills can never chase away.

When earthly joys have left the breast,
And ev'n the last fond hope is cherish'd
Of mortal bliss—too like the rest—
Beneath woe's with'ring touch has perished,
With fadeless lustre streams that light,
A halo on the brow of night.

And bitter were our sojourn here
In this dark wilderness of sorrow,
Did not that rainbow beam appear,—
The herald of a brighter morrow,—
A friendly beacon from on high,
To guide us to ETERNITY.

THE ORIGIN AND CHARACTER OF THE FIRST BOOK OF DISCIPLINE.

We have just received the First Part of a new History of the Church of Scotland from the pen of our able and accomplished contributor, the Rev. William M. Hetherington of Torphichen. If we may judge of the character of the work from the portion of it in our hands, we are inclined to hail its appearance as an enlightened, accurate, and, on the whole, impartial history of our national Church. There is an elegance, and vigour, and graphic power, about his delineations of the stirring scenes of an eventful history, which is likely to render the work a favourite with the public. We select the following passage, as giving a view of a document which has been too little understood both in its nature and design:—

The first meeting of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland was held, on the 20th of December 1560. The number that convened was but small: it consisted of forty members, only six of whom were ministers; but they were men of great abilities, of deep piety, and of eminent personal worth, fitted and qualified by their Creator for the work which he had given them to do. The very next step which was taken proved both their qualifications and their zeal. It was very clearly seen by the reformers, that the power of discipline was essential to the wellbeing of a Church, since without it purity could not be maintained, either among the people or the ministers themselves. They determined, therefore, to draw up a book, in which there should be a complete system of ecclesiastical government; and the same eminent men by whom the Confession of Faith had been composed were appointed to undertake the new and scarcely less important task. This, indeed, they had been previously desired to do by the privy council, as appears from the preamble of their production. They applied themselves to their task in the same spirit as before, having respect, indeed, to the circumstances and the exigencies of the time, but looking to Divine direction and authority alone. "They took not their example," says Row, "from any kirk in the world; no, not from Geneva;" but drew their plan from the Sacred Scriptures. Having arranged the subject under different heads, they divided these among them; and, after they had finished their several parts, they met together and examined them with great attention, spending much time in reading and meditation on the subject, and in earnest prayers for Divine direction. When they had drawn up the whole in form, they laid it before the General Assembly, by whom it was approved, after they had caused some of its articles to be abridged. At the close of the brief records of the first General Assembly, there is an intimation that the next meeting was to be held on the 15th day of January following; but no record appears to have been kept of that meeting; yet, as we find the Book of Discipline referred to in the next meeting of May the same year, we may conclude that it was in January that it was approved and ratified by the Assembly. It was also submitted to the privy council; but although many of the members highly approved of the plan, it was keenly opposed by others. "Every thing," says Knox, "that repugned to their corrupt affections was termed, in their mockery, 'devout imaginations.' The cause we have before declared; some were licentious, some had greedily gripped the possessions of the Church, and others thought that they would not lack their part of Christ's coat." This points out clearly enough the cause of the opposition made to the Book of Discipline,—partly aversion to the strict discipline which it appointed to be exercised against vice, and partly from reluctance to comply with its requisition for the appropriation of the revenues of the Popish Church to the support of the new religious and literary establishments. But though not formally ratified by the privy council, it was subscribed by the greater part of the nobility and barons, members of the council, and thereby virtually ratified. The document deserves to be recorded:—

"At Edinburgh, 17th January 1561.

"We, who have subscribed these presents, having advised with the articles herein specified, as is above mentioned, from the beginning of this book, think the same good, and conform to God's Word in all points; conform to the notes and additions hereto eiked; and promise to set the same forward to the uttermost of our powers. Providing that the bishops, abbots, priors, and others prelates and benefited men which else have adjoined themselves to us, bruike [enjoy] the revenues of their benefices during their lifetimes; they sustaining and upholding the ministry and ministers, as herein is specified, for the preaching of the Word, and ministering of the sacraments."

To this,—termed by several writers "an act of the secret council," which indeed it was, being subscribed by a large majority,—there were affixed the names of the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earls of Arran, Argyll, Glencairn, Rothes, Marischal, Monteith, and Morton, Lords James Stewart, Boyd, Yester, Ochiltree, Lindsay, Sanquhar, St John of Torphichen, the Master of Maxwell, the Master of Lindsay, Drumlauring, Lochinvar, Garlies, Bargannie, Cunninghamhead, Alexander Gordon, bishop of Galloway, Alexander Campbell, dean of Murray, and others of less note.

As the Book of Discipline contains the deliberate opinions of the Scottish Reformers, respecting what they regarded as the fundamental principles of the Church which they are labouring to establish in Scotland, it seems necessary to give a brief abstract of those principles, that the reader may the better know what the Church of Scotland, from its beginning, has either been or striven to be.

The ordinary and permanent office-bearers of the Church were of four kinds: the minister or pastor, to whom the preaching of the Gospel and administration of the sacraments belonged; the doctor or teacher, whose province it was to interpret Scripture and confute error, including those who taught theology in schools and universities; the ruling elder, who assisted the minister in exercising ecclesiastical discipline and government; and the deacon, who had the special charge of the revenues of the Church and the poor. To these permanent office-bearers, there were added two others of a temporary character. It has been already stated that, in the arrangement entered into previous to the first General Assembly, there were only twelve Reformed ministers to preach the Gospel throughout the whole kingdom; and that to accomplish the utmost possible amount of duty by so small a number, seven were placed in the chief towns, and large country districts were assigned to each of the remaining five. These five were called superintendents; and their duty was to travel from place to place throughout their districts, for the purpose of preaching, planting churches, and inspecting the conduct of the country ministers where there were any, and of another temporary class of men termed exhorters and readers. This latter class consisted of the most pious persons that could be found, who, having received a common education, were able to read to their more ignorant neighbours, though not qualified for the ministry. When the readers were found to have discharged their duty well, and to have increased in their own knowledge, they were encouraged to add a few plain exhortations to the reading of the Scriptures; and then they were termed exhorters. If they still continued to improve, they might finally be admitted to the ministry. To search out, employ, and watch over the conduct of such men, giving them instruction from time to time, was the chief duty of the superintendent, from which, indeed, he derived his name, so naturally expressive of his duty—a duty, the very nature of which shows it to have been temporary, and intended to expire whenever the necessities which called it into being should have been removed by a sufficiency of qualified ministers.

No person was allowed to preach, or to administer the sacraments, till he was regularly called to this employment. "Ordinary vocation [calling] consisteth in election, examination, and admission." "It appertaineth to the people, and to every several congregation, to elect their minister." "For altogether this is to be avoided, that any man be violently intruded or thrust in upon any congregation; but this liberty, with all care, must be reserved to every several Church, to have their votes and suffrages in election of their ministers." The examination was appointed to take place "in open assembly, and before the congregation," to satisfy the Church as to his soundness in the faith, his "gifts, utterance, and knowledge," his willingness to undertake the charge, the purity of his motives, and his resolution to discharge the duties of the office with diligence and fidelity. Admission then took place by the person being solemnly set apart by prayer, at first without imposition of hands, which, however, was afterwards appointed to be done. Superintendents were admitted in the same way as other ministers, were tried by the same Church Courts, liable to the same censures, and might be deposed for the same crimes.

The affairs of each congregation were managed by the minister, elders, and deacons, who constituted the kirk-session, which met regularly once a-week, and oftener if business required. There was also a meeting, called the weekly exercise or prophesying, held in every considerable town, consisting of the ministers, exhorters, and educated men in the vicinity, for expounding the Scriptures. This was afterwards converted into the Presbytery, or classical assembly. The superintendent met with the ministers and delegated elders of his district twice a-year, in the provincial Synod, which took cognizance of ecclesiastical affairs within its bounds. And the General Assembly, which was composed of ministers and elders commissioned from the different parts of the kingdom, met twice, sometimes thrice, in a year, and attended to the interests of the National Church.

Public worship was attended to in such a manner as to show the estimation in which it was held by our Reformers. On Sabbath days the people assembled twice for public worship; and, the better to instruct the ignorant, catechising was substituted for preaching in the afternoon. In towns a sermon was regularly preached on one day of the week besides the Sabbath; and on almost every day the people had an opportunity of hearing public prayers and the reading of the Scriptures. Baptism was never dispensed unless it was accompanied with preaching or catechising. The Lord's Supper was administered four times a-year in towns; the sign of the cross in baptizing, and kneeling at the Lord's table, were forbidden; and anniversary holidays were wholly abolished.

Education was very justly regarded as of the utmost importance, and deserving every possible encouragement. It was stated, as imperatively necessary, that there should be a school in every parish, for the instruction of youth in the principles of religion, grammar, and the Latin tongue; and it was farther proposed, that a college should be erected in every "notable town," in which logic and rhetoric should be taught, along with the learned languages. It was even suggested that parents should not be permitted to neglect the education of their children; but that the nobility and gentry should be obliged to do so at their own expense; and that a fund should be provided for the education of the children of the poor, who discovered talents and aptitude for learning.

To carry these important measures into effect, permanent funds were requisite; and for these they naturally looked to the patrimony of the Church. The hierarchy had been abolished, and the Popish clergy excluded from all religious services, by the alteration which the Parliament had introduced; and whatever provision it was proper to allot for the dismissed incumbents during life, it was unreasonable that they should continue to enjoy those emoluments which were attached to offices for which they had been found totally unfit. No successors could be appointed to them; and there was not any individual or class of men in the nation, who could justly claim a title to the rents of their benefices. The compilers of the Book of Discipline, therefore, proposed that the patrimony of the Church should be appropriated, in the first instance, to the support of the new ecclesiastical establishment. Under this designation they included the ministry, the schools, and the poor. For the ministers they required, that such "honest provision" should be made as would give "neither occasion of solicitude, neither yet of insolence and wantonness." The stipends of ministers were to be collected by the deacons from the tithes; but all illegal exactions were to be previously abolished, and measures taken to relieve the cultivators of the ground from the oppressive manner in which the tithes had been gathered by the clergy, or by those to whom they had farmed them. The revenues of bishoprics, and of cathedral and collegiate churches, with the rents arising from the endowments of monasteries and other religious foundations, were to be divided, and appropriated to the support of the universities, or of the churches within their bounds.

The Reformers were well aware of the necessity of establishing and maintaining a systematic course of discipline. "As no commonwealth can flourish or long endure without good laws, and sharp execution of the same, so neither can the Kirk of God be brought to purity, neither yet be retained in the same, without the order of ecclesiastical discipline; which stands in re-proving and correcting of the faults which the civil sword either doth neglect, or may not punish." "To discipline must all the estates within this realm be subject, as well the rulers as they that are ruled; yes, and the preachers themselves, as well as the poorest within the Kirk." These quotations may alone serve to show, that there was nothing in which the Scottish Reformers approached nearer to the primitive Church, than in the rigorous and impartial exercise of ecclesiastical discipline; the relaxation of which, under the Papacy, they justly regarded as one great cause of the universal corruption of religion. "In some instances they might carry their rigour against offenders to an extreme; but it was a virtuous extreme, compared with the dangerous laxity, or rather total disuse, of discipline, which has gradually crept into almost all the Churches that retain the name of Reformed; even as the scrupulous delicacy with which our forefathers shunned the society of those who had transgressed the rules of morality, is to be preferred to modern manners, by which the vicious obtain easy admission into the company of the virtuous."

There is one almost casual expression in that part of the Book of Discipline which treats of Church censures, of too much importance to be passed by without notice, tending, as it does, to throw a flood of light on the character of the age, and to vindicate the Reformers from one of the heaviest of the accusations brought against them,—“Correcting of the faults which either the civil sword doth neglect, or may not punish.” Every person at all acquainted with the history of those times will see the deep meaning of these very pregnant words. Rent, as the kingdom had long been, into feudal factions, there was scarcely any thing in it deserving the name of public justice. Every ambitious nobleman was ready to defend the most notorious criminals, for the purpose of strengthening his “following,” by the accession of fierce, lawless, and unscrupulous adherents. Impartiality in the administration of justice and the suppression of crime neither did exist, nor was possible in such a state of matters; and the Popish clergy, being themselves as licentious and unjust as either people or nobles, were not disposed to attempt enacting or enforcing laws by which they might themselves be condemned and punished. There was, therefore, an absolute necessity that the Reformed Church of Scotland should take decided measures, not only for the teaching of truth, but also for the suppression of vice and immorality, as far as its authority could possibly reach,—and much farther than in a better state of society would have been either necessary or desirable. Yet, even when impelled by these urgent considerations, the Church of Scotland never attempted to dictate in civil matters, nor even called upon the secular authorities to inflict civil penalties for the purpose of enforcing discipline purely ecclesiastical. That the Church called upon the Parliament to suppress idolatry, and to abolish the Papal jurisdiction in the kingdom, is admitted; but this cannot justly be regarded as any thing more than the public voice of the Church, calling upon the civil magistrate to do his own duty in his own province, as idolatry is a violation of natural religion, and even of reason itself, and the Papal jurisdiction involves the national crime of allegiance to a foreign secular power, which no well governed country can safely tolerate. A slight apparent confusion between the secular and ecclesiastical jurisdictions arose from the fact, that the Parliament, or the magistracy of particular burghs, had enacted punishments of a corporal kind against certain crimes which were ordinarily tried in the Church courts; but the infliction, as well as the enacting of them, pertained to the civil magistrate.

THE GRACE OF GOD THE AUTHOR AND FINISHER OF THE CHRISTIAN'S ATTAINMENTS:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN HOFFE,

Minister of the Chapel at Leadhills, Lanarkshire.

'But by the grace of God I am what I am.'—1 COR. xv. 10.

THESE are the words of Paul, and they ascribe to Divine grace all that was valuable in his character, whether as an apostle or professor of the Gospel. That portion of the chapter with which they are more immediately associated constitutes no part of the argument which he was laying down for the conviction of the Corinthian converts. His main object with them was, to establish to their satisfaction the certainty of Christ's resurrection; and for this purpose he appeals, not merely to Old Testament predictions, but also, and especially, to the testimony of many eye-witnesses, who saw him after he was risen from the dead. Having introduced at the eighth verse the subject of his apostolic character, as a chosen witness of our Lord's resurrection, he takes occasion to make a humble digression, to speak of his own unworthiness of such an honour, and to magnify the grace of God, in having made and fashioned him what he was. "And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time. For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the Church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am." And having made this digression, upon matters altogether personal, he resumes his argument, which he continues throughout the remainder of the chapter.

In attributing to Divine grace all that was valuable in his character, either as an apostle or professing Christian, he was giving utterance to a truth, not merely in accordance with the testimony of God's Word, but also with the remarkable circumstances of his own conversion. Every reader of the Bible is acquainted, I presume, with the miraculous and instantaneous manner in which Paul became a Christian man, and a Christian minister. All may recollect how the Lord appeared to him on the way, as he journeyed to Damascus, to persecute the Christians in that celebrated city. He was not converted in the ordinary way by which sinners are brought "from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to serve the living God." It was not the candid examination of the evidence of the truth; it was not the persuasive preaching and pleadings of the Gospel; it was not any thoughtful meditation upon the sublime doctrines of God's Word; it was not the effectual workings of a conscience lifting up its testimony against sin, and in favour of holiness; it was not the sanctified improvement of any painful dispensation of Divine Providence, that changed him from being a persecutor, to become a preacher of Christianity; from being a sinner, "without God, and without hope," to become a saint, and heir of immortal life; from being "dead in trespasses and sins," to become a new creature, endowed with spiritual life, and adorned with spiritual loveliness;—it was by the immediate and almighty interposition of the Lord Jehovah, and without the application of any of the outward and ordinary means of grace, that he was raised to the honour and privilege of being an apostle, and exalted to the hopes and happiness of a genuine believer: and well and truly might he declare, that all that was valuable in his character as a minister of Christ, and all that was virtuous in his conduct as a reclaimed subject of the Divine moral government, and all that was cheering and delightful in his prospects as an immortal creature, was solely to be ascribed to the mercy and grace of God.

Paul could not, by any possibility, attribute his conversion to his own diligence in improving the means of grace; for up to the very moment that the light from heaven shone round about him, and the voice of the Lord from "the most excellent glory" broke upon his astonished ear, he was a bitter and unrelenting enemy of the Cross, and had obstinately resisted all the evidence and overtures of the Gospel. He could not plead, that he had become a preacher and professor of Christianity by the guidance of his own reason and judgment; for although the truth of the Gospel would commend itself to his understanding after he was converted and enlightened, yet, up to the very moment of his hearing the voice of Christ, saying unto him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" his mind was blinded by prejudice and passion, to the irresistible evidence of Divine revelation. Moreover, he could not declare that it was a conviction of the great honour attending the office of an apostle, or of the inestimable advantages resulting from being an humble believer, that led him to embrace the faith of the Gospel, and to be instrumental in bringing others to believe and obey it; for nothing can be more clear than that Paul, before the Lord appeared to him on the way to Damascus, despised the humble apostles of the faith, and firmly believed that no earthly advantage whatever was to be obtained by becoming a Christian. The whole circumstances of his conversion precluded him from taking any credit to himself; and although he was conscious of his own zeal and diligence in the cause of Christ, after the happy change had been effected in his heart and character—although he well knew that, both by his preaching and practice, he had been happily instrumental in planting the standard of the Cross in many a heathen vineyard, and in converting multitudes of dying and destitute sinners to the faith of a crucified Redeemer; yet, on these accounts he conceived himself all the more a debtor to Divine grace. "By the grace of God I am what I am;" as if he had said, By the grace and mercy of Jehovah I was first snatched as a brand from the burning, and raised to the honour of being an apostle, and to the happiness of being a Christian. By the same grace I have lived and laboured as a servant of the Redeemer, and spread his name to earth's remotest bounds. To this inexhaustible source of holy principle, and spiritual gift, and religious attainment, I owe all that is good in me; and, by the help of its constant and strengthening outpourings, I hope still to persevere in my labours as an apostle, and to proceed in my course as a Christian, and candidate for heaven.

The declaration thus made by Paul is applicable to the spiritual state and religious character of every converted sinner. What he said of himself, we may say of ourselves: "By the grace of God, we are what we are." Whatever we feel of the power of the Gospel in our hearts, whatever progress we may have made in Christian excellence, and whatever services we may have rendered to the cause of Christ, it is to God, and to him alone, that we must give the praise and glory. True, none of us may have been converted to the faith of the Gospel, by the same miraculous means that were employed to snatch Paul as a brand from the burning. The change effected in our hearts may not have been accompanied, or marked by any striking manifestation of Divine interposition; and our progress in the path of Christian holiness may have been slow and gradual, like the morning light, that "shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Yet it is true, that all that is valuable in our character, and all that is cheering in our hopes as Christians, must be ascribed to the grace of God.

The following reasons, I trust, will render this apparent to all:—

I. The means by which we have attained to any progress in Christian excellence, are the gifts of God's free grace; and therefore, "by the grace of God, we are what we are." It is an undeniable truth, that no sinner can hope to be converted and saved, unless he avails himself of the appointed and corresponding means; and hence, if we are really and truly changed in our character, as depraved and polluted beings—if sin has no longer dominion over us, and we have "put off the old man, with its affections and lusts," and are now walking in the faith and fellowship of the Redeemer, it is because we have been led to give heed to the means provided for accomplishing these blessed ends, and to profit by the opportunities placed within our reach. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God;" and, if we are Christians indeed, it is because we have heard the Word in the faith and love of it, and with humble and teachable spirits have received its doctrines as faithful sayings. As no mortal man can continue to exist, unless he daily uses the means for preserving and sustaining the principle of life within him; so no soul, dead in trespasses and sin, can live anew, unless the means for its regeneration and sanctification are improved. And it is just as true, that we have become Christians, because we have been influenced to use Christian means, as it is true that we live and have our being, because we, day by day, use the means for the preservation and nourishment of animal life within us. But, is it not to the free grace of God that we owe the various means by which we, and others of our fellow-sinners, have been converted, and redeemed, and raised to the hopes of immortal life? Is it not because He hath made the day-spring from on high to visit us, and given us the knowledge of his gracious mind and will, by the revelation of his own eternal Son, "that we are what we are?"

What, I would ask, would have been our spiritual state and condition, had not the blessed God vouchsafed to us the revelation of the Gospel, and given us his Holy Word, which is "able to make us wise unto salvation?" In the absence of that Sacred Volume, which tells us of a Saviour to redeem our souls, and of a Holy Spirit to sanctify our hearts, and of an eternal heaven and habitation, with its unceasing joys, to animate our spirits in the path of holiness, would we have been what we now are? Would the mere light of nature have made us Christians? Would the guidance of mere reason have converted us to that holiness and happiness, the revelation of which constitutes the peculiar value and excellence of the Holy Scriptures? Had we been left to the teaching and training of our own unaided faculties, could we ever have arrived at these attainments to which, as Christians, we especially lay claim? Ah! no; if God had not favoured us with the light of Divine truth, and vouchsafed the other means of religious improvement, now happily within our reach, we must have been in the same state of deplorable ignorance, moral destitution, and spiritual death, that we find these nations and people to be to whom the Gospel has not yet been published, or, if published, by whom the Gospel has not been believed. And, brethren, when we reflect that we are Christians, because God has given us the means of being so—when we consider that we cherish the hopes of Christians, because he has revealed to us the knowledge of heaven, and the way to reach it, through the mediation of Christ—when we thoughtfully meditate upon the fact, that we are raised to the dignity and privilege of being called the sons of God, because the everlasting Father hath "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life"—truly may each of us say, with the apostle in the text, "By the grace of God, I am what I am."

II. "By the grace of God, we are what we are," because it is by his Spirit that he inclines and enables us to implore the means of grace, in order to our becoming Christians.—There are many in the world who imagine, that when once the means of salvation are placed within the reach of a sinner, and he is invited to submit himself to the obedience of the truth, his own desires and inclinations will lead him to become a Christian; and, consequently, that all the merit of his practical Christianity, both in its commencement, progress, and perfection, is due to himself. "All that is necessary," such persons say, "for God to do is to reveal the means, and the sinner will do the rest." But there cannot be a greater, a more dangerous mistake; for it goes upon the supposition that the heart of man is not at enmity with God, and that it is not averse to the reception of spiritual truth. It involves the supposition, that we, in our fallen state, though ignorant, are not depraved; that, though destitute of the knowledge of salvation, we are not destitute of the will and wish to be saved, if once the means of redemption were made known to us; that we still have the principle of love to God in our hearts, although we are unacquainted with the way by which it may be practically and profitably manifested. Besides, such a doctrine is at variance with the lessons of observation and experience; for, if the sinner's own desires and inclinations will lead him to be a Christian, upon the mere presentation to him of the means of grace, how does it come that such multitudes in the world live unmindful of them, and die as they have lived, without God and without hope? If God has nothing more to do but furnish the means, the result would be very different from what is now presented to our contemplation; for as all, according to this doctrine, wish to be saved, so all would be saved without exception.

But this is not the doctrine of the Bible, neither is it the doctrine of experience. "The carnal mind," says Paul, "is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither, indeed, can be." "Without me," says Christ, "ye can do nothing." And the same infallible authority declares, in speaking of those who believe in his name, and become the adopted sons of God, "which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." There is a natural and rooted repugnance, in the heart of fallen and sinful man, to receive any spiritual truth. He cherishes a strong aversion to every thing that pertains to God; and unquestionably this hindrance to the practical influence of the Gospel, must be removed, before the sinner can earnestly and cordially apply himself to the work of being a Christian; and, moreover, it must be removed, not by the will of the flesh; not by the will of man, but by the power and Spirit of God.

If, then, we have attained to the character, privilege, and happiness of being Christians, by improving the means of grace, it is because God has taken away the enmity of our hearts, subdued the perversity of our wills, and given unto us the wish and desire to be saved. It is because "he hath worked in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure," that we are "giving all diligence to make our calling and election sure." Had we been left to our own inclinations and desires, the mere knowledge and offer of salvation, and the means of becoming Christians, would have proved unavailing; and if the power and Spirit of God had not called us from darkness to light; had our natural inclinations not been sanctified by Divine grace, and turned into a channel advantageous to our best interests, we must have been still "in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity." True, we cannot with the eye of sense discern and trace the operation of the Spirit in our hearts; for "the wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Moreover, the operation of Divine grace in our conversion, may not have been accompanied by any striking and wonderful feature. Still, if we have cordially and diligently improved the means of grace, we have evidence that the Spirit has been at work within us. If we are really and truly Christians, walking in the faith and obedience of the Gospel, we have the sure testimony, that we have been born not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. And if we have the evidence that the Holy Ghost thus dwelleth in us, moulding our souls after the Divine image, and filling our hearts with the hope of an eternal and unfading inheritance; then, each of us may truly say with the apostle, in the text, "By the grace of God I am what I am."

III. Our present attainments in religion are the work of God's sanctifying grace; and, therefore, "by the grace of God we are what we are." If it is the power and Spirit of God, that converts a sinner, and makes him a Christian, assuredly, by the same power he must make progress as a Christian, and reach that measure of religious perfection, to which every believer is called upon to aspire. It is the same in the moral and spiritual constitution of man, as it is in the history of his animal existence. That principle of life which is imparted to him, at his birth, by Divine goodness and power, must be preserved and maintained by the same Almighty agency throughout every stage and moment of his subsequent being. He is not independent of God, and dependent upon himself or others, for existence, the moment that he breathes the breath of life. In advancing through all the successive stages of childhood, and youth, and manhood, and old age, it is the Providence of Jehovah that sustains him. In him, he "lives, and moves, and has his being," until he moulders and mixes with the dust out of which he was originally formed. And in like manner, when the soul of man is made to live anew, by the life-giving power of Divine grace; when the principle of spiritual existence is revived within it, and all its faculties and feelings, formerly dead to the love and service of God, are quickened into holy and lively exercise; it cannot advance to the strength and maturity of the perfect man in Christ Jesus, independent of the power that first caused it to breathe the breath of life. The means of its regeneration must also be the means of its sanctification. The same power from on high that sowed the seed in the spiritual field of the heart, must give it fertility, and bring it to rich and abundant fruitfulness. He that is the Author of life in the soul, must necessarily preserve and sustain it in all the subsequent stages of its progress and perfection; and, hence, whatever may be the attainments which now distinguish our Christian character; whatever may be the service which we have rendered to the cause of the Redeemer; whatever may be the measure of holiness to which we may happily and humbly lay claim, it is to the sanctifying power of Divine grace, and to it alone, that we are the debtors. And when the thoughtful reflect and meditate upon this undeniable fact, well and truly may each of us say with the apostle in the text, "by the grace of God, I am what I am."

Oh! let every Christian humbly, and reverently, and gratefully hold by this truth. It will effectually subdue that spiritual pride, which many are too apt to cherish, in meditating upon the progress which may have been made by them in the path of holiness, as if all the credit was due to their own diligence and exertions. It will put down that vanity and self-sufficiency which we are too ready to indulge in, as we advance in religious attainments, and probably excel others of our fellow-Christians in religious excellence. And whilst we become more and more humble-minded under the faith and feeling, that we owe all to God, let our hearts kindle into all the fervency of the warmest gratitude towards him; and let our dependence rest entirely upon him, for reaching the stature of the perfect man, and being presented blameless before him at the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

REFLECTIONS UPON THE DEATH OF A CHRISTIAN FRIEND.

How blest is our brother bereft
Of all that could burthen his mind?
How easy the soul that has left
This wearisome body behind!
Of evil incapable thou,
Whose relics with envy I see!
No longer in misery now,
No longer a sinner like me.

This earth is affected no more
With sickness, or shaken with pain;
The war in the members is o'er,
And never shall vex him again:
No anger henceforward, nor shame,
Shall redder this innocent clay;
Extinct is the animal flame,
And passion is vanish'd away.

This languishing head is at rest,
Its thinking and aching are o'er;
This quiet, immovable breast,
Is heav'd by affliction no more;
This heart is no longer the seat
Of trouble and torturing pain;
It ceases to flutter and beat,
It never shall flutter again.

The lids that so seldom could close,
By sorrow forbidden to sleep,
Seal'd up in unbroken repose,
Have strangely forgotten to weep;
The fountains can yield no supplies,
These hollows from water are free;
The tears are all wiped from these eyes,
And evil they never shall see.
To mourn and to suffer is mine,
While bound in a prison I breathe,
And still for deliverance pine,
And press to the issues of death.
What now with my tears I bedew,
Prepare me, great God, to become:
My spirit created anew,
Ere I am consign'd to the tomb.

THE ORDER MANIFEST IN THE ARRANGEMENT OF CREATION.

[From the Second Series of Jesse's 'Gleanings in Natural History.']

"And often by the murmur'ing rill Hear the thrush, while all is still."

I now and then visit a copse of young trees and under-wood, sometimes of an evening, and never at this time of the year (the end of September) without being struck with the variety of pleasing sounds which I hear as soon as I enter. It is on the slope of a rising piece of ground—a path or two has been cut through it, and a little purling rill trickles gently between two mossy banks. With whatever silence I may enter the copse, a note of alarm is immediately given, and this is generally by the blackbird, except, indeed, a wood-pigeon happens to have settled in a tree close to me, in which case the loud flapping of her wings as she takes flight, is sufficiently understood by all the inmates of the wood. The rabbits scud away from the path—the pheasants quit it at the same time to seek shelter in the underwood, while the jay screams in notes which are any thing but melodious, and which are answered by the whole family as they fly from one tree to another. The magpie, that most cautious and cunning of birds, may be seen quitting the neighbourhood while I am there, chattering now and then, and communicating all her forebodings of evil as she flies along. If I stand still for a few minutes, the disturbance which my presence had excited soon ceases. I am stationed under an old decayed oak—

"——— On whose sprays,
The throistle chaunts her roundclays," and I can then see and listen to all that is going forward. The pheasants return to the ride, and at the same time the rabbits make their reappearance, rising on their hind legs, and looking about in every direction to see if danger is near. After they have grazed for a short time, little skirmishes take place between them, two or three meeting and springing up together, and then chasing each other in circles. Above my head a family of tit-mice are seeking for insects upon the branches of trees, hanging with their backs downwards, and now and then uttering a note which is understood by all the party. They are odd, amusing birds. The heavy flight of the wood-pigeon is again heard as she returns to her favourite tree, followed at intervals by numbers of her congeners; and a large flock of starlings settle in the alders which grow in the lower part of the copse. The sudden whirrs they make, and their chattering noise, may be heard at some distance, and the latter is kept up till late in the evening. The distant call of the partridge, the abrupt crow of the pheasant as he goes to roost, and the cawing of rooks as they return—are amongst the pleasing sounds of a fine autumnal evening.

"To fly in circles o'er yon distant wood,"

Returning from my walk, I am struck with the varied shades one sees on the trees at this season of the year, the beauty and elegance of the foliage, the richness of the colours, those golden tints which a painter dare not attempt to imitate. They are seen under the arch of yonder bridge, and sparkle on the top of that embrowned beech-tree.

"Who can paint
Like Nature? Can imagination boast,
Amid his gay creation, hues like these?
And can he mix them with that matchless skill,
And lay them on so delicately fine,
And lose them in each other?"

I enjoy these "sylvan strolls." They awaken all ones best feelings. The "gleams and glances of nature," leave a sunny recollection on the mind, which can only be appreciated by those who have felt them. The dreary wild, the sedgy pool, parks, chases, heaths, all in their turn either entertain the imagination, or afford new subjects for contemplation and enjoyment.

The more I reflect upon the order and arrangements of Providence in the works of creation, the more reason I find to admire them. My friend Mr Yarrell has the credit of being the first to bring under the notice of naturalists the fact that the tips of the bills of birds, before they are hatched, are strengthened by a deciduous scale, which enables them to perforate and burst the shell more rapidly. The apparently useless fungus which I see near me affords food for the beetle, and the dry tuft of grass growing against the trunk of an old oak is a place of retreat and security for the chrysalis of a moth. Yonder woodpecker is enabled to run up trees perpendicularly in search of those insects which are necessary for its existence, in consequence of being furnished with peculiarly stiff, sharp-pointed feathers in its tail. These feathers are bent inwards, and the bird, having besides strong claws which are much hooked, two of which are placed forward and two backward, is able to cling to trees with perfect ease.

I am aware that these remarks may appear to some persons minute and trifling, but I must confess that little facts and circumstances, in the economy of Almighty God, have irresistible charms for me, and serve, like others more prominent, to show the perfect and beautiful manner in, and for, which every thing has been created. In contemplating them, what a delightful lesson may we not learn! We may find in them the strongest testimonies of the truth of revelation, and the superintendence of an all-wise and benevolent Creator. It has been well said that in the Book of Nature is written in the plainest characters the existence of a God, which revelation takes for granted—of a God how full of contrivance; how fertile in expedients! how benevolent in his ends! At work every where—every where, too, with equal diligence; leaving nothing incomplete—finishing "the hinge in the wing of an insect," as perfectly as if it were all he had to do—unconfounded by the multiplicity of objects, undistracted by their dispersion, unwearied by their incessant demands on him, fresh as on that day when the morning stars first sang together, and all nature shouted for joy.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE MRS PATERSON,

WIFE OF THE REV. DR PATERSON, ST PETERSBURG.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

A SHORT time before Miss Greig returned to Russia, the Russian Bible Society had been instituted; and, deeply interested as she felt in all that concerned Christ's cause and kingdom, she was naturally desirous to procure information in regard to an institution which had for its object the dissemination of the Scriptures. Her wishes in this matter were soon gratified. Dr Paterson, who had been on a visit to England, carried with him to Russia, on his return, a letter to Miss Greig from one of her friends. This circumstance led to a correspondence, which brought her acquainted with the religious state and prospects of her native land, whose welfare she had so much at heart. She now dedicated herself, with the utmost ardour, to works of benevolence and piety. She distributed copies of the Scriptures among the poor; and it was her anxious desire to build a school, and to support a schoolmaster, for the education of poor children. This latter design, however, she was compelled to abandon, in consequence of the malicious reports of some evil-disposed persons, who wickedly invented and circulated the charge of a design to turn the people from the persuasion of their fathers. The persecution and reproach to which she was subjected at this period of her life was painful and distressing. She repaired frequently to a throne of grace, and found much relief in communion and fellowship with her Father in heaven. The consciousness, besides, of suffering in a good cause tended much to support her in this hour of trial. Nay, such was the peace and consolation which the Spirit of God poured into her soul, that she was enabled to understand and to feel the blessedness which is promised to the believer under persecution: "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my name's sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven." It is interesting to notice her state of mind, as described in her own words, during the season to which we now refer. Thus she remarks, in her Journal, under date September 19, 1815:—

"How much pride and self-love rankle in my heart, since the conduct of others can occasion me so much uneasiness! The dissimulation and falsehood I experience from friends, pierce me through with many sorrows. But is not the same dissimulation practised in the presence of the God of truth? and does not he much more abhor a lie than I do? Yet he patiently waits to be gracious, while I anxiously look to the right and to the left to escape from the trials appointed me, dreading future consequences of present evils, and forgetting past deliverances. O merciful Redeemer, sanctify my trials to thy glory and my good. Let me come out of these trials, purified and fitted for thy service, and then vouchsafe to employ me in it. Grant me wisdom from above; teach me how to act as becomes thy servant. Extirpate self-love and pride from my heart. Let love to Thee be my ruling passion—the actuating motive of all I do, say, and think. Comfort me, by impressing upon my mind that no creature has any power over me to hurt me, but what thou MY FATHER givest it. Grant me faith and strength to persevere in asking from thee the conversion of —, and to support me in wrestling for deliverance from sins."

And again, in the following month:—

"Glory be to thee, most merciful Lord, for the graces received! O enable me to look to thee completely to subdue my fears and anxiety in times of trial; and let me recognise a Father's love in every dispensation of thy providence. I am amazed at the composure of my mind, under a trial which a few weeks ago plunged it into the most distressing anxiety. I bless thee for the grace which makes me now to differ from what I was, and entreat thee to communicate more grace, until I become what I ought to be. Sanctify the past dispenactions of thy providence to my good—to my furtherance in holiness; and may all events which yet await me, transform me more and more into the image of my blessed Master. For his sake, leave me not to myself, nor in the power of my spiritual enemies. Grant me more faith, more charity, more humility, more deadness to things temporal, and more energy in seeking those which are eternal. Amen.”

These extracts are sufficient to indicate that this interesting Christian female had been mercifully supported under all her trials, and was undergoing a purifying process by the blessing of Him, who had cast her into the furnace, and was thus preparing her for the duties, which, during her brief career, were yet to devolve upon her.

Early in the year 1816, Miss Greig paid a visit to her friends in England, and on arriving in London, she learned that her younger brother in Devonshire was far gone in consumption. Having been invited to come and live with him, she hastened to his place of residence, anxious to tend the sick-bed of one so near and deservedly dear to her heart. Her fears in regard to the state of his health were but too sadly realized. Little expectation was entertained of his recovery. During her stay in Devonshire she regularly attended the ministry of the Rev. Mr Small of Axminster, and as the distance was considerable, she walked thither on the Saturday evening, and returned on the Monday morning. Under Mr Small she made rapid progress in her knowledge of the truth. On the death of her brother, which happened a few months after her arrival, she removed to Axminster, and took up her residence in the house of a pious lady with whom she contracted a very intimate and mutually profitable friendship. At this period she experienced much rational enjoyment in the study of the Scriptures. Some information in reference to her mode of acting was furnished to her excellent biographer. We extract a few passages:—

“Her evenings were generally employed in visiting the cottages and asylums of the poor. Neither rain nor cold ever prevented her from going to administer to the spiritual and temporal wants of her poor fellow-creatures. It was an interesting sight to see her in a work-house, surrounded by fifteen or twenty children, whilst, with a cheerful and engaging countenance, and in simple language, she endeavoured to win their attention, and direct their minds to God—instructing them in the first principles of Christianity, and giving them little rewards for learning hymns, &c. At other times she was found kneeling by the beds of the poor, and afflicted, and dying, and pouring out her heart before God for them. These were her recreations, her enjoyments; and, however low or vulgar they may be deemed by some, and derogatory to the rank she held in society, they are pleasures in which the angels of God delight. These are scenes which ennoble and purify the mind. ‘Pure religion, and undefiled, before God and the Father, is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world.’ James i. 27.

“The injurious sentiment which is often expressed concerning vital godliness, that it alienates the affections from relatives, was totally contradicted by her daily practice. No one possessed stronger affections than she did towards her friends; but, like all other sanctified passions in the renewed mind, they were under the direction and regulation of the Word and Spirit of God. The love she bore her relatives, and other dear friends, was exceeded by nothing in her affectionate breast, but the love and duty she owed to the God of her salvation. With delight have I seen her come from her secret chamber, and mention what she would not have done, but in the ear of friendship—the enlargement of soul she felt in prayer, whilst daily pouring out her soul for the dearest relatives she had upon earth. ‘Is not this,’ she would say, ‘a token for good? Is it not a scriptural evidence that the God who has thus excited prayer, will answer it in his own time?’ Her seasons for secret worship were regular. Sometimes for an hour or two she would secrete herself in her chamber by calm moonlight, and then from that ‘Bethel’ she would descend to unite at the family altar, with her countenance and manner all cheerfulness, animation, and peace.

“There is one circumstance which I forgot to mention before. It occurred, as she told me, soon after her conversion to God. A Bible Society meeting was to be held, I think, at Henley; and never having witnessed such an assembly, and having felt so recently the effects of the Scriptures, she was delighted in the prospect of having an opportunity of being present. She went full of expectation, and her raised hopes of gratification were fully answered. She felt the force of the animated appeals for help; but being nearly at the end of her half-yearly remittance, she, of course, was short of money; and as her next supply was to come from Russia, its arrival was somewhat uncertain. I think the whole sum she had on hand was twenty-five or thirty pounds. Strong in faith, and relying on Providence, she put a twenty-pound note into the collector’s plate. This being the first offering she had presented in the glorious cause of the Bible, it afforded her unspeakable pleasure; and, no doubt, the grateful incense of that offering instantly ascended to God, and was graciously accepted through her Redeemer. She soon after returned to London; her little remaining stock just exhausted—and what to do she had not determined; but in her necessity she trusted in her all-sufficient God, who alone knew the circumstance which had occasioned it. Almost the first news which reached her delighted ear was that of a dear friend’s unexpected arrival in England, from whom she immediately received an ample supply.

“This incident she ever remembered with peculiar pleasure; and it encouraged her in the persuasion, that as this her first expression of attachment to the cause of the Bible was the occasion of much secret enjoyment to her soul, and thanksgiving to God for his goodness, all that she should be enabled to do in the same spirit, would be equally marked with tokens of the Divine favour and approbation.”

While at Axminster, Miss Greig, in the prospect of returning to Russia, devoted a considerable portion of her time to the study of the Russian language. She had been able to speak it from her infancy, but she wished to acquire an accurate and grammatical knowledge of it.

We have formerly mentioned that an acquaintance had already been formed between Miss Greig and Dr Paterson. A correspondence commenced which continued for some time, and, at length, in April 1817, she was married to that respected minister and missionary. The society in which she now moved was in complete harmony with her feelings of piety and devotedness to God. Shortly after her marriage she paid a visit to Mrs Hannah More, with whom she continued to maintain an interesting correspondence during the remainder of her brief career. The large circle of acquaintances into which Mrs Paterson was introduced in London, was by no means so favourable to her progress in the Divine life, as the calm retirement which she had once enjoyed. Her opportunities for meditation and prayer were much abridged, and her spiritual views in consequence became dark and clouded.

In the month of June, Dr and Mrs Paterson made a tour to Birmingham and several other places, in company with Dr Steinkopff and Mr Hughes, to visit the auxiliaries to the British and Foreign Bible Society. Towards the end of the same month Mrs Paterson, with her husband, bade farewell to England, and sailed for Russia by way of Sweden. The voyage was short and pleasant, and on reaching Gottenburg, the first place of their destination, they started for Stockholm, spending a night on the road at the country seat of the pious and venerable Archbishop of Upsala. In Stockholm, George, Dr Paterson's son by a former marriage, was committed to her care, and she acted towards him through life as if she had been his own mother. On arriving at Petersburg, which was to be Dr Paterson's head-quarters as agent for the Bible Society, Mrs Paterson was received by her former friends with great kindness. She was delighted to find, that an entire change had come over the spirit of the place. By the express permission of the Emperor, the Gospel was preached in the English language. She now associated with the small but noble band of Christians around her, who strove to promote the cause of their Lord. She took a lively interest in the prosperity of the Bible Society; and from her knowledge of the Russian and other languages, she was enabled to assist in the good work. A Society for the Improvement of Prison Discipline having been established in Petersburg, she lent her aid in promoting its important object. She was chosen treasurer of the Ladies' Committee, and entered with the utmost enthusiasm upon the duties of her office, striving to advance in every possible way the temporal comfort, and the spiritual improvement of the poor prisoners.

It was soon evident both to her husband and her Christian friends and associates, that Mrs Paterson was exerting herself beyond her strength. In vain did they remonstrate with her on the subject; she counted it her privilege no less than her duty to spend and be spent in the service of her Lord and Saviour. On the first Sabbath of January 1820, she was able, though weak, to be present at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper in the small English congregation. She experienced great enjoyment in the ordinance. After the service, she complained of being unwell, and was unable to attend chapel in the evening. During the night she was very feverish, and medical assistance was called in. Her illness continued for some days to be almost stationary, but on the Thursday evening she was decidedly worse, and the symptoms assumed a typhous character. The following day she felt herself so much worse, that she was persuaded death was approaching. On the morning of Saturday she dictated a letter to Mr Swan, the missionary at Selingsinsk, whom she held in high respect and cordial esteem, and who afterwards compiled the interesting memoir on which the present Sketch is founded. She then sent for her husband, and stating to him her apprehension that she was dying, she gave him directions about the education of her infant daughter, about her interment, and other things. Seeing that her husband was deeply affected she stopped, but her mind was calm, peaceful and resigned. An account of her last moments is thus given by two Christian female friends who were present:—

"It was on Friday, 7th January (N. S.), that I called to see my sweet friend (knowing that she had been indisposed), and found her in a very high fever, lying on the sofa, which she preferred to the bed. I felt greatly concerned, and asked her if she would allow me to come and remain with her till she was better. She cheerfully accepted my proposal, but added, 'whether I shall ever be better in this world is only known to God. I had such enjoyment at the table of the Lord on Sabbath morning, it was almost too much for me. Perhaps the next time I shall drink 'new wine' in my Father's kingdom.' The next day I went to nurse my dear friend, and never left her day nor night, till she slept in Jesus. If I have any thing to reproach myself with, on the retrospection of that period, it is my extreme anxiety to have retained her here, which made me incline too scrupulously to the wishes of her physicians, that she should be restrained from speaking. This occasioned me to lose many precious sentiments that ought to have been recorded, but which were swallowed up in the solicitude of my mind for her recovery.

"When I came to her on Saturday, the dear invalid was in bed, but apparently not worse. She asked me to read a few verses of the Bible. Do you wish to hear some particular chapter? 'Yes; read the 14th chapter of John—'In my Father's house are many mansions,' &c. She repeated, as I read, the 2d verse, and with an emphasis that marked the rich satisfaction afforded by the assurance. I read on to the close of the 19th verse; at the words, 'because I live, ye shall live also,' she said, 'That is enough—read the rest in the afternoon; now, let me think a while.' On Sabbath morning she said, 'Why do you not go to chapel to-day?' A friend replied, 'It is a duty to attend upon you in your sickness; God requireth merry, not sacrifice.' 'If you think to oblige me,' was her answer, 'by staying away from the house of God, you are very much mistaken. I do not wish to keep any body at home on my account; I entreat you will go immediately.' At this time the physicians began to apprehend symptoms of a regular fever, but of what kind they could not pronounce. A considerable degree of delirium succeeded, and continued for several days; but even the wanderings of her brain were sweetly tinged with the peace and joy that the Gospel imparts. At one time, she spoke of conversion to God. 'Those idle fancies,' said she, 'never produced a real change, and it is impossible they should.' Then she would seem to be directing sinners to the Saviour; and her language was, 'Let them only take the Bible, and there they will find good news—glad tidings of a Saviour which is Christ the Lord!' Soon after, she seemed to be reasoning with some subtle opposer of the truth; and expressed in these words her rejection of his arguments, 'I just want the simple Gospel; not the logic taught in the schools. I want clear views—a simple system; nothing but the Gospel will do for me.' I cannot help mentioning these sentiments, although she was by no means in a capacity, at the time, to speak quite coherently; but I mention them, because it struck me how much more sense, and reason, and wisdom, and propriety, are to be discovered in these aberrations of her unhinged mind, than are to be found in the conversations of many persons who yet consider themselves in their right senses. On the Friday preceding her death, she became more collected, and at times perfectly sensible. The tranquil enjoyment she had in communion with her God knew little interruption, except when grateful slumber closed her eyes for a few moments. From such slumber she more than once awaked refreshed, and turning to a friend (Mrs F.) observed, 'He giveth his beloved sleep.' Upon which she raised her eyes to heaven, in acknowledgment of the favour she had received. At another time, when all was silent, and we thought she was falling to sleep again, she uttered the feelings of her heart in the following lines of a hymn, that she was fond of in the days of health,—

'Lord I come to thee for rest,
Take possession of my breast;
Here thy blood-bought right maintain,
And without a rival reign.'

'Grant this, O my Saviour!' she added. 'Grant this, O my Father!' she again repeated, in a tone of deepest earnestness and holy delight. And more than once she repeated, in the same spirit of ardent devotion and holy joy, a verse of another hymn,—

'Sweet as rest to pilgrims weary,
Light to newly opened eyes,
Or full springs on deserts dreary,
Is the rest the cross supplies,
All who taste it
Shall to life immortal rise!'

"Another thing delightfully intimated what was ever uppermost in her mind, even at those times when the disease prevented her from otherwise showing it. She thought every day was a Sabbath; and appeared always most satisfied, when she thought her friends were employed in those exercises to which that day is more peculiarly devoted. She wished to have none about her but such as she considered the children of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. It being necessary to call in a sick-nurse, as soon as she saw her, she asked who that person was, and whether she was a child of God. It was replied, she was a good woman who had come to help to nurse her. On this she smiled to her, bidding her welcome. But she soon found that this woman was not like-minded with herself, and often pleaded with dear Mrs F. to send her out of the room, that they might enjoy undisturbed that conversation about divine things in which she delighted. She complained bitterly that this beloved friend was so reserved in speaking to her of the Saviour, which she was not wont to be, and said she could not comprehend the cause. 'You used to speak to me of the Saviour—why not now? O feed me, feed me!' A little sago being offered her, she took it, saying, with one of her expressive looks, 'That is not the food I want.' We well understood her meaning; but being enjoined to keep her very quiet, it was necessary to converse as little as possible. Some drink was then given, and this she received as before, saying, 'That is not the drink I want.' It was thought proper to tell her, that we would speak more with her when she was better, but that at present it would hurt her to talk much. To which she replied, 'Why all this care about my body? I am sure it is a poor diseased body. Why so much more care taken of my body, than of my mind?'

"On the Sabbath morning she appeared somewhat depressed in mind. She wept, and said, 'I am afraid my sins are not forgiven. I do not doubt,' said she, 'that I shall be saved, but I am afraid that my sins have provoked God now to withdraw his face from me.' She then proposed to Mrs F. that they should join in prayer. 'It is promised,' said she, 'That if two shall agree on earth, touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them;—unite with me in asking that the light of my heavenly Father's countenance may be restored unto me.' After they had accordingly engaged in prayer, Mrs F. proposed that Dr Paterson, who came in, should pray. He did so, and also said something appropriate, as well as his feelings would permit him, to the afflicted saint. She spoke of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, of herself as a great sinner, and of what her sins deserved. She seemed at a loss how to conceive how a holy God could pardon so great a sinner as she was. Her husband then said, 'You know what the Redeemer has done for poor sinners.' 'And can I hope for forgiveness through him?' She was answered in the affirmative. She then exclaimed, 'O blessed Redeemer; speak to me about the Redeemer! O speak to me about the Redeemer!'

At the mention of his name, these 'morning clouds' vanished away.

"From this time her mind seemed engaged in a train of reflection; in the course of which she rose to an ecstasy of joy, from the rich views of grace and mercy that filled her soul. For the space of about two hours she continued uttering the most delightful expressions; but it was impossible for her friends, who were mingling tears of joy and grief, to remember much of what fell from her lips. She began in this way:—'I was a poor, silly, wandering sheep, and the Good Shepherd caught me, and laid me upon his shoulders, and brought me into his fold.—What a poor, foolish, ignorant creature I was; and yet he entered into covenant with me!—O wonderful! Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' Here she paused; then resumed, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.—Eternal salvation! Eternal salvation!—Eternity we cannot comprehend. Ages we may comprehend; but eternity has no bounds, no limits.' Here she lay a considerable time in prayer—her lips moved—her eyes were uplifted—but her strength seemed exhausted; and the petitions she uttered were only heard by that Ear which not a word, a sigh, a breath, escapes. At length, breaking out in a fervent petition for one who never ceased to be dear to her, she pleaded thus: 'Heavenly Father! I come to entreat thee for ———. He has no Saviour, and he has never sought one. All things are possible with thee! O grant him repentance unto life.' I am sure it must have melted his heart, could he have heard a once loved, ever amiable, and dying ———, praying for him in her last hours.

"From this time I do not recollect that she spoke much. Her weakness rapidly increased; but never one murmur, one fretful word, one impatient look, escaped her. ———. Thus was her mind kept in 'perfect peace.' She suffered agonizing pains a few hours before her departure. Her friends were afraid lest this should affect her inward serenity, and make the valley of death seem dark to her; but of this there were no indication. Once she was heard to whisper, 'Many mansions,' which showed where her thoughts were reposing. After the pain had subsided, I perceived that she looked round, as if wishing for something. Imagining what it might be, I asked her if Mr Paterson should pray with her. This was what she wanted, and she signified her acquiescence. It was a solemn hour. Our friend was on the threshold of heaven; and some of us were willing to 'depart' with her, 'and be with Christ, which is far better.' I believe our dear Saviour was very near us all; and soon He took one of his beloved disciples from among us. I watched every breath as I sat by her side, moistening each moment her dear parched lips. She breathed—and stopped—drew another breath—again a pause—the next gentle breath was her last! Not a finger moved, not a feature changed. 'O Death, where was thy sting? Thanks be unto God, who gave her the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord!'

Thus fell asleep in Jesus a devoted Christian female, who, both in life and death evinced a warm attachment to the religion of Jesus, and manifested its purifying influence in her whole character and disposition. "To her to live was Christ," therefore, "to die was gain."

PART II.

"They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years," &c.—REV. xx. 4, 5.

THE millennial reign of the saints is a scene so attractive in its character, and so important in the Divine dispensations, that the mind loves to rest upon it. Let it not be thought that, in preferring the figurative to the literal interpretation, we would deprive this illustrious period of the Church's history of any share of the glory, purity, and blessedness so emphatically attributed to it. The strength and vividness of the imagery under which it is presented have truth for their foundation, being designed to convey a just and right impression of its real character. It is ever to be remembered that figurative language, in the Sacred Scriptures, is not the less essentially and substantially true for not admitting a literal interpretation; and that figures are often resorted to, because direct language would not adequately express the importance, the glory, or the terror really belonging to the subjects treated of. The metaphors of prophecy are a veil which, in part, conceals the object it enwraps, yet adds to the effect of its disclosures, by the prominence it gives and the vivid light it sheds on them. Let us, then, look back, for a moment, upon the wonderful annunciations of the preceding verses, and endeavour to mark some of their more distinctive features.

1. The binding of Satan for a thousand years is an event mysterious, indeed, but of the most auspicious character. From the beginning of the world, to this day, he has been the contriver, author, and promoter of all wickedness; being permitted, in the depths of the Divine councils, to be the tempter, and, as it were, assayer of human virtue—too often, alas! the despoiler and destroyer. And his object has been nothing less than the ruin of the human soul, and the entire overthrow of the kingdom of Christ. His attempts have still looked beyond their immediate objects to larger and greater results. He tempted Eve to eat the forbidden fruit, that through her he might seduce Adam, and secure the fall of all his posterity. He tempted Judas to betray Christ, that he might "kill the Prince of life;" and this Divine victim he sought, that he might defeat all God's purposes of mercy, and leave mankind without redemption and without hope. Who can describe or conceive the extent of his influence over human affairs, in private and in public life, in the conduct of individuals, and in the councils of communities? How incalculable the benefit secured to mankind when he is bound and imprisoned for a thousand years!—when the subtily of the "old serpent" is defeated, the malice of the "devil" chained, the hostility of "Satan" arrested and made of no avail! One end of his restraint is marked emphatically, namely, "that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be finished." The nations intended are, I apprehend, those of the Roman earth; spoken of under the same appellation in chapter xi. 2, as the Gentiles (for though christian in name, they were heathen in character), who were to "tread" or occupy "the holy city for forty-two months." But now his power to deceive shall be taken from him; his "lying wonders" shall be detected; the "strong delusion" shall be broken, that led men to "believe a lie." They shall no longer "depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines concerning demons; through the hypocrisy of liars, having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." 1 Tim. iv. 1-3. The impositions of idolatry and superstition, the worshipping of angels and of images, the pretences of a crafty priesthood to absolve men from their sins and admit them into heaven, shall be discarded as impious deceptions. Yet, I apprehend, the binding of Satan must be understood not absolutely, but in a limited sense, and with reference to communities rather than individuals; for, as partakers of a fallen nature, men must still, even to the end of their probationary state, have a conflict to sustain with the world, the flesh, and the devil. But this last enemy, during his period of restraint, shall no longer maintain his former mastery over the opinions and customs of the nations. Error shall no longer be imposed and upheld by decrees of councils and senates, nor iniquity "established by law."

2. The succession of a righteous to an unrighteous authority, even the reign of Christ and his saints to that of Satan and his instruments, is a revolution of the most glorious character. "I saw thrones, and they sat upon them; and judgment was given unto them." A wicked ruler is a curse to the people, but "a king sitting in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes." And his example and influence are not less effective than his power. The minds of men are subject to authority no less than their bodies. The government of opinion is not less influential than that of force. The multitude are guided by their superiors, and individuals are carried along by the current of widely-prevailing sentiment, almost as necessarily as the straw by the water on which it floats. It is impossible to estimate how beneficial must be the influence exerted upon the character and fortunes of mankind, by the establishment of wise and good men in the seats of authority—by the prevalence, in all the influential classes of society, of just and right principles—by the ascendancy, in practice as well as speculation, of truth, uprightness, and public virtue. Let the power of Satan be suppressed, and the throne of uprightness established, and the earth shall be blessed with peace and enriched with the fruits of righteousness.

3. The revival of religion in a succession of men coming in the spirit and power of those "who were slain for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God"—fit representatives and worthy successors of the holy prophets and apostles, martyrs, confessors and reformers—shall be another glorious feature of the millennium. We admire the ancient pillars of the Church, the burning and shining lights in the firmament of the spiritual heavens; but is God's hand shortened, his power diminished, or his grace contracted, that he cannot raise up men of kindred spirit, of equal attainments? The last-called of the apostles, was "not a whit behind the very chief." And, then, how shall the testimony of Jesus be revived in the mouth of many witnesses! How shall the Word of God run and be glorified! The truth shall then prevail, and falsehood, and sophistry, and infidelity shall be put to shame. A zeal, courage, and faithfulness, not inferior to that of the martyrs, shall be exercised in better circumstances, and with happier results.

4. The suppression of idolatry, of persecution, of mere worldly religion, and the vicious example associated with it, shall be another invaluable advantage enjoyed in the millennial reign. The "image of the beast," with all the emblems of idolatry, his "mark" also, and the symbols of his tyranny, shall be destroyed. His wicked adherents, "the rest of the dead," as opposed to the faithful, shall not live again during this period—shall have no successors to propagate their perverse doctrines and pernicious ways.

In fine, the presence of Christ vouchsafed in remarkable spiritual communications, perhaps, even in occasional miraculous manifestations, will give a peculiar glory and lustre to the Church. "Blessed," therefore, "and holy," shall be the subjects of this spiritual reign, that have part in this first resurrection: blessed, as being put into conscious possession of the choicest gifts of divine love; holy, as being renewed after the divine image, and made "priests of God and of Christ."

But shall this reign of the saints be spent in indolent repose? Shall the Church, when "fair as the moon and clear as the sun," confine her light within her own bosom? When "terrible as an army with banners," shall she form no schemes of noble ambition, of generous conquest? Animated with the spirit of apostles and martyrs, can she forget the command, "Go to all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature?" We cannot doubt that her heavenly ambition, "seeking not its own profit, but that of many, that they may be saved," will aim at the conquest of the whole world; and, that going forth in alliance with omnipotence, her victories shall be rapid, extensive and universal. This, we apprehend, is the period appointed for the fulfilment of the countless prophecies of Christ's universal, everlasting kingdom. "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him." "There shall be given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages shall serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." (Psalm lxxii. 8, 11; Dan. vii. 14.)

Before quitting this subject, it may be proper to advert to certain questions that may naturally be asked with respect to the times of the millennium; particularly the date of its commencement and the term of its duration. As to the date of its commencement, it is generally admitted that the one thousand two hundred and sixty years, during which the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth, must be brought to a close before it begins. Now, according to some writers these years are to be dated from the year 538, when Justinian issued his edict acknowledging the Roman Pontiff as universal bishop; which would make them terminate in 1792. According to others they are to be dated from the year 606, when Phocas renewed the name, and the Pope actually assumed the power, of supreme head of the Church; which would make them terminate in 1866. According to others, they are to be counted either from the year 727, when the Pope obtained the government of Rome as a temporal prince, or from 755, when he was invested with the exarchate of Ravenna; which would bring them down to about the year 2000. But though all admit that that term of one thousand two hundred and sixty years must first expire, many writers suppose that the millennium will not follow immediately, and that two periods mentioned by Daniel must intervene. That prophet, in chap. xii. 7, specifies the very period mentioned by St John, "a time, times, and half a time," that is, three years and a half; which is the same as forty-two months, or one thousand two hundred and sixty days; but to this period Daniel adds thirty days, in the 11th verse of that chapter, making one thousand two hundred and ninety days; and then, in the following verse, he adds another period of forty-five days, making the sum of one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days. These distinctions of time have unquestionably an important meaning; there must be something to mark these successive periods. It has been conjectured that the first additional period, of thirty years, will embrace the conversion of the Jews; and the second, of forty-five, the conversion, in whole or in part, in either case conspicuously, of the Gentile world.—According to a different view, the one thousand three hundred and thirty-five years mentioned by Daniel commence at the same time with St John's millennium, and, extending beyond it by three hundred and thirty-five years, mark the time of the final destruction of Gog and Magog, and the peculiar blessedness of those who shall witness that event.—To me it certainly appears, that the one thousand two hundred and sixty days are not yet expired; but whether they shall terminate so soon as the year 1866, or shall extend to about the close of the following century, must be left, I believe, to be decided by the event. "It is not for you," said our Lord, "to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath kept in his own power." It is an old Jewish tradition, that, after six thousand years of weakness, toil, and corruption, there shall be a Sabbatical millennium, of peace, truth, and happiness; but a Jewish tradition will scarcely be considered as a solid foundation to calculate upon. The days, however, hasten on, and the time for fulfilling the prophecy with respect to Christ's reign on earth is undoubtedly at hand.

As to the question relating to the duration of the millennium, a brief answer must suffice. The analogy of prophetic language might suggest that the thousand years, according to the principle of putting a day for a year, should be interpreted to mean three hundred and sixty-five thousand years; but this space of time is so much out of all proportion to all other periods belonging either to the word of prophecy, or to the life and experience of man, that it appears altogether inadmissible, and has accordingly been rejected by nearly all interpreters. Besides, the admission of such an endless series of ages before the second coming of Christ, appears to contradict the many passages of the New Testament which warn us that his coming is at hand; a warning perfectly consistent with the intervention of a few thousand years, for "with the Lord a thousand years are as one day," but not, surely, with a period of such immeasurable length. Further: the instant out-breaking of wickedness after the millennium may well enough consist with its being held down and suppressed among the nations of the Roman earth for a thousand years; but will scarcely be credible, if that suppression had continued for three hundred and sixty-five thousand years, and this space had been allowed for the thorough evangelization of the world. We speak not, it must be remembered, of those sins to which a corrupt nature might ever have been obnoxious, but of that open and daring impiety foretold as consequent on the loosing of Satan again,—indicating obstinate prejudice and determined habits of wickedness. It may further be remarked, that the term year, as used by the prophets in several passages of the Old Testament, in predicting future events, signifies simply the natural year; particularly in repeated predictions of the seventy years' captivity in Babylon. Jer. xxv. 12, xxix. 10; Dan. ix. 2. Nay, more than this, the word here translated year, is not used in prophetic language to denote three hundred and sixty years, time being used instead of it when that period is intended. There is a passage that may seem an exception. In chapter ix. 15, it is said, "The four angels were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year—and the word translated year does here signify a prophetic year, or three hundred and sixty years; but it is a different word from that in the verse before us, and is expressive of a revolution, or involution. The exception, therefore, is only apparent. In the passage before us, the thousand years may be regarded as denoting either exactly that period of time, or more generally, a very long and extended period. It has been remarked, that, for the comfort of the Church, promises of spiritual blessings are usually given in the largest and most animating terms.

With this whole passage respecting the millennium, many of Isaiah's predictions, especially in the closing chapters of his prophecy, which seem to have a special reference to the conversion of the Jews, and its happy consequences, are strikingly correspondent. "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated, so that no man went through thee, I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations. Thy people also shall be all righteous, and I will take of them for priests and Levites, saith the Lord. For as the new heavens and the new earth which I will make shall remain before me, so shall your seed and your name remain." Isa. lx. 1, 15, 21; lxvi. 21, 22. As a community, the Church shall remain, even to the end of the world; as individuals, its genuine members shall inherit eternal life.

While we rejoice in the promises made to the Church, and take encouragement from them in our efforts to bring the whole human race to participate in her privileges, let us make it our first care that we ourselves possess the character of her faithful children—that we live with Christ in vital union; yea, that "Christ live in us, so that the life we lead in the flesh be by the faith of the Son of God." Let us "follow after that holiness without which no man can see the Lord." This attained, we shall share in the happiness of the millennium; for there is joy in heaven over every convert to the Church on earth. And when the day of the resurrection comes, the Lord shall "change even our vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body, according to the energy whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."

THE PAST AND PRESENT STATE OF CHRISTIANITY IN BELGIUM.

WRITING regarding the progress of Christianity toward the latter part of the seventh century, Mosheim says, "Many of the British, Scottish, and Irish ecclesiastics travelled among the Batavian, Belgic, and German nations, with the pious intention of propagating the knowledge of the Truth, and of erecting churches, and forming religious establishments every where. This is the true reason which induced the Germans, in after times, to found so many convents for the Scots and Irish, of which some are yet in being." This is the earliest occasion on which this learned historian mentions the disseminating of Christianity in the "Belgic nation." As that enterprise was conducted by the Scottish and the other ecclesiastics of our empire, and as some monuments remain in memorial thereof, we trust the mentioning of such facts will not be uninteresting to our readers. Surely, in these days of revival of theological learning, of devotion, and piety, and of missionary zeal in Scotland, Scottish ecclesiastics will be found ready to emulate the zeal of their ancestors of the seventh century. So far as we know, it was a disinterested zeal to extend the knowledge of religion to foreign lands that prompted the missionary spirit among the ancient Scottish clergy. They had not the motive, probably, of carrying the tidings of salvation to their own countrymen gone to reside abroad, as many in our own times have done, and whose spiritual wants loudly call for sympathy and relief. It is pleasing to know, that these ancient Scottish Churchmen not only propagated the Gospel on the Continent, and among the pagan invaders of England, but also maintained a stout contest for the spiritual freedom and independence of the Native British Churches, and resolutely resisted the innovations inroduced by Augustine and other monks of Rome. Consistently with this praiseworthy conduct, they are characterised by Henry, in his "History of Great Britain," upon the authority of the venerable Bede, as men of "great learning, piety, and virtue;" as distinguished for their "contempt of riches, and for their great diligence in their ministerial offices;" taking as their directory "only the prophetic, evangelical, and apostolical Writings." What benefit might be again conferred on Belgium, were the doctrines contained in these Sacred Writings promulgated throughout its length and breadth, either by its own Evangelical Society, or, as of old, by missionaries from Scotland, accomplished with all the improvements of biblical knowledge which this age can impart!

In no country blessed with civil freedom has bigoted and intolerant superstition got a firmer hold, than in Belgium. The Reformation, when it had got a footing in Germany and France, soon spread into the Low Countries. There the scriptural theology of Calvin gained a wide and favourable reception. To arrest the progress of defection from the Church of Rome, Charles V. published an edict (1550), prohibiting any books censured by the University of Louvain, upon pain of death. His successor, Philip II., erected archbishoprics and bishoprics, to prevent the spreading of the opinions of the Reformers; and, for the suppression of the Protestantism that already existed, ordered the establishment of the fearful Inquisition. A celebrated Romish author (Dupin) informs us, "that Cardinal Granville, Councillor of State, caused those suspected to be of the new religion to be severely punished, and the places in which it was supposed they held their meetings to be burnt." When application was made to the Government of Philip at Madrid, for a mitigation of the rigours exercised on his Protestant subjects, it met with no better success, than that burning was exchanged for hanging. Perceiving that no safety could be obtained, either from justice or clemency, the Protestants determined to maintain the Reformation faith at all hazards. They, therefore, caused it to be preached publicly in all the Provinces, attended the ordinances in full armour, and concluded a league with the Protestants of Germany. There was no city or town in which there were not Protestants enough to form a numerous congregation. Thus far Dupin. Open warfare soon ensued; and Edgar, in his "Variations of Popery," tells that inquisitorial and military executions aided in the work of death, in all its shocking forms. The Duke of Alva boasted of having, in six weeks, caused the execution of eighteen thousand for their Protestantism. Paola reckons the number who, in the Netherlands, were in a few years massacred, on account of their religion, at fifty thousand; while Grotius raises the list of Belgic martyrs to one hundred thousand.

The result of the contest between Protestantism and Popery in the Low Countries, was the establishment of the former in the Seven United Provinces under the government of the Prince of Orange, and the continuance of Popery in the Ten Provinces that remained subject to Spain. These Southern Provinces were ceded by Philip III. of Spain, in 1714, to Austria, as the portion of his daughter, who had married the Archduke of that country. Being thus always under bigoted Popish masters, unfortunate tributary Belgium continued in as slavish and subject superstition as did its rulers; nay, more so. Joseph II., Emperor of Austria, being deeply convinced of the manifold evils arising to his dominions in the Low Countries from the intolerance of the Romish Church, and being willing to promote toleration throughout his territories, was obliged to abandon these liberal and tolerant reforms he had attempted to introduce, in consequence of the sedition raised among the Belgians, by the accusations of heresy and despotism made against him by the priesthood. It may be interesting to note the fact, that the too-celebrated Peter Dens was then lately deceased, and that the influence of his intolerant principles was thoroughly manifested in the determined resistance offered by the Belgians to the Emperor's efforts to introduce toleration. It may gratify the curiosity of our readers to see one of the Emperor's proposals, and the response which the priests made to it. "Although the Emperor was firmly resolved to maintain and protect the Catholic religion, his Majesty, nevertheless, deemed it consistent with Christian charity to extend civil tolerance to the Protestants, whom he could consider in no other light than that of citizens, without regard to their faith." Mark the extraordinary answer returned by the University of Louvain. "Tolerance would be the source of dissensions, hatred, and interminable discord; because the Catholic religion regards all heretics, without distinction, as victims devoted to eternal perdition." This is the maxim that the Popish religion impresses upon her children, as an essential dogma and invariable article of their faith. This is the undisguised utterance of the spirit that breathes in Dens, and in the Rheinish Notes to the Bible. This spirit of intolerance hath not yet departed from Belgium, if we may believe the Bishop of Ghent, who asserts, that "the Belgians, inviolably attached to the faith of their fathers, are known through all Europe for their extreme aversion to heterodox principles, and for their opposition to every worship different from their own." How corrupt the Belgian theology is, may be evident in one sentence. "The theology of Dens," says the Bishop of Ghent, "is taught in almost all the seminaries of Belgium."

No one can travel in Belgium, without seeing the most public proofs of the grossness of the reigning superstition, in the crosses and groups of images set up by the highways. The Cathedral at Brussels has St Gudule for its patroness, a great miracle-worker. She was a nun, and while at her prayers the devil blew out her candle, which was instantly lighted again by a higher power. A picture, representing this fact, hangs still in the Cathedral. In the same place are preserved three consecrated wafers, which, being stabbed with a dagger, poured forth a quantity of blood! But this is not so marvellous as the worship of the Manikin, a little bronze image which is placed over a fountain. This bronze boy is a kind of protection of Brussels. Enemies have often stolen him, but he always came back again! The Emperor Charles V. gave him a suit of new clothes, and a pension! Other sovereigns have honoured him in a similar way; and, within the last twenty years, a lady bequeathed him an annuity! He has a servant, who is paid four hundred francs for dressing him on feast-days. We only add farther, that we have seen in another church at Brussels a miraculous image of the Virgin Mary, and that we possess a book, published by a Romish priest, showing that, to increase the devotion of the Belgians toward this image, the present Pope granted an indulgence in 1833, which was gained by upwards of three hundred and twenty thousand coming to visit her wonder-working ladyship.

The corrupt doctrine, and gross, debasing superstition which thus spreads over Belgium, is upheld and propagated, amid a population of little more than four million, by about eight thousand priests. How are these strongholds of iniquity to be assailed? By the preaching of the Gospel. The Belgian Evangelical Society have already effected a breach; but it has not resources to enable it to sustain the attack. It is languishing for want of pecuniary aid. Let Scottish Christians come promptly forward, and grant a generous assistance. Moreover, we think, the time is come, when the General Assembly must send some of her clergy to the British residing on the Continent in great numbers, and by awakening a religious concern among them, and by restoring them to the habits of attendance upon religious ordinances, may thus remove one of the greatest hindrances to the progress of Protestantism.

THESE MAKE DEATH TERRIBLE!

BY A. PARK,

Author of "A Vision of Mankind,"—"Bridegroom and Bride,"—"Blindness, a Poem," &c.

LIFE'S princely homes, superb with towers,

And gold-enamelled halls,
Where breathe sweet Oriental flowers
Round highly sculptur'd walls;
While gorgeous guests assemble gay,
Their sun, the pale and waxen ray,
And all that wealth and wit can buy
To please each sense, and charm the eye,
In broad profusion smile,
Are but the chains that link the soul
More firmly to this lowly goal,—
This world of endless guile!

These make Death terrible!—for, oh!

'Tis surely awful to resign
The glowing goblet brim'm'd with wine,
And sink in death below!

To leave each cherish'd joy behind
The bounding steed, the hound of chase,
Which used to far out-lee the wind
Across the mountain's face!

The courtiers great, the ladies fair,
The ease, the luxury of life;
Where Grandeur, in her easy chair,
Knew not the poor man's strife.

To die, to bid these joys farewell,
To sink into the narrow tomb,—
Oh! who can half the horrors tell?
Who paint the soul's sad gloom?

When the film'd eye is closing fast
On all the joys it loved so dear;
When each pulsation seems the last,
And noble friends stand near!

To die, to give all up!
To drink Death's bitter cup,—
To leave those gorgeous halls,
And in a few short hours,
Over a path of flowers,
Carried without the walls!

To mix with clammy clay,
Where nothing is that's gay!

There ever more to lie,
Cold, mouldering, forgotten, dead!
As though no gem e'er decked the head,
Or pleasure lit the eye!

These make Death terrible!—the poor,
The weary wretch, who day by day
Solicits alms from door to door,
Feels Death more kind than they!
Why should a poor man fear to die?
He has few hopes to bind to this
His tortured soul; let him not sigh,
The grave's calm rest is bliss!
Weary, and worn with endless cares,
Half kept, half clad, why should he dread
To leave a fruitless world of tares,
And rest his weary head?
If old, and frail, and broken down,
Too long perplexed on Fortuna's wheel;
If disregarded by his own,
What right has he to feel?

Yes, joyless man! ye need not mourn,
Like those rear'd up in palace gay;
Well may they dread the noblest urn
That smiles their crowns away!
Their swelling titles lose their power,
And fall in mockery on the ear;
What charms have they at life's last hour
Of sorrow and of tear?
Around him lie earth's sweetest things,
Each human bliss is at his call;
His liveried vassals, as on wings,
Glide through the pictured hall.
Wine in his veins, might on his lip,
A thousand pleasures 'fore his eyes,
What are they all? He cannot sip—
"Tis thus the rich man dies!

LILLIAS CHISHOLM;

OR, GRACE MAGNIFIED IN THE CONVERSION AND PEACEFUL DEATH OF AN UNHAPPY FEMALE.

"Short was her bloom, her happiness was short:
One saw her loveliness, and, with desire Unhallow'd burning, to her ear address'd
Dishonest words;
Thus he upon her womanish nature won,
And age suspicionless, ruin'd and foresook."

Few instances have occurred which have more strikingly illustrated the mercy of God, and the power of Divine grace, than that of the individual a brief sketch of whose life, conversion, and peaceful departure is now about to be narrated. And as the Apostle Paul was commissioned to declare that it was "for this cause he obtained mercy, that in him first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting;"—we may regard this, with similar instances of the divine compassion and patience, as so many patterns of mercy to a sinful world, inviting and encouraging transgressors to return and to come to the knowledge of the truth, "that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus."

Lillias Chisholm was born in Edinburgh, and in early life received a decent education. Her mother died when she was very young; and being without the benefit of any religious restraint, she became exceedingly wild and wicked. At an early age, she left her father's house, and entered into the service of a lady named Welsh, a useful and distinguished member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, who has since gone to her reward in the skies. Here she was provided with suitable raiment, of which she was very destitute, and was instructed in the fear of the Lord, and the principles of our holy religion. She became delighted, according to her own account, with the devotional exercises in which the family daily engaged, and "never was so happy in her life as here." After six months' residence in this situation, in order to obtain higher wages, she unfortunately went into another family,—a step which she regretted to the last moments of her life. In this family, a medical student resided as a lodger, with whom she formed an improper intimacy, on the discovery of which her mistress dismissed her; and the young man ultimately abandoned her to the mercy of the world. It is melancholy to state that her evil habits, which had thus been formed, led her on to a course of abandoned and reckless profligacy, from this time until a few months before her death, which took place in her 27th year. Reckless, however, as she was about the interests of her soul, she was nevertheless more provident in reference to a provision for the body than the generality of such unhappy creatures are;—for she entered a Benefit Society, in which she insured five shillings weekly in the time of sickness, and a sum of money sufficient to inter her decently when she died. And, abandoned as she had become, her conscience ceased not to smite her from time to time; conviction for sin pursued her wherever she went; and so wretched was the state of her mind, that she would frequently drink to intoxication in order to get rid of the terrors and anguish of a guilty conscience. One day, as she was walking along Adam Street, she saw a number of people congregated together, and listening to the pious exhortations of Dr Coldstream, a medical gentleman of great respectability, who had retired from practice, and was a member of the Wesleyan Society,—whose zeal for the glory of God and for the salvation of souls induced him frequently to stand up in the streets to call sinners to repentance, and to point them to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." As she was passing by, the Doctor was remarking, that "those who persisted in rejecting salvation, were in the way to hell, and would assuredly be damned!" This sentence made an indelible impression upon her mind, and was like "a nail fastened in a sure place" by the Master of assemblies. She immediately thought within herself, "What that gentleman says is right, and I am wrong. I reject salvation. I am in the way to hell. I shall assuredly be damned!" To get rid of these appalling convictions, she fled to her usual expedient—intoxication; and whenever afterwards she caught a glimpse of the Doctor engaged in his self-denying labour of love for perishing souls, she ran away with the utmost speed, unwilling to be reminded of her dreadful condition and melancholy prospects; for "had I listened to him," she said, "I could not have carried on my evil courses." In this state of wretchedness and misery, she continued until the Lord laid his hand upon her, and she was so reduced as to be obliged to take to her bed. Her complaint proved to be a confirmed consumption, most probably induced by her intemperate habits. In proportion as her illness increased, the burden of sin became more and more intolerable; and, at length, with great earnestness, she entreated those around her to send for the gentleman whose admonitions had made so deep an impression on her mind. "On entering her apartment," the Doctor states, "I found an interesting young woman apparently near death. I observed to her, 'You seem very ill.' She replied in the affirmative." After ascertaining the nature of her disease, he inquired into the state of her mind, and asked her whether she was prepared to die. "O no, Sir!" she replied, with deep emotion: "I cannot come to God; for I have been a very bad—bad woman!" She then gave him the outline of her sad history, and confessed, with every aggravating circumstance she could recollect, the iniquities of her life. Dr Coldstream told her that he was sorry to hear the account she gave of herself; but assured her that, wicked as she had been, there still was salvation for her, if she came to God through faith in his Son. He then represented to her the infinite value of the Atonement; and assured her, on the authority of the Scriptures, that "though her sins were as scarlet, they should be white as snow; and though red like crimson, they should be as wool;" if she sincerely repented, and looked to Christ for mercy:—that He received the vilest of sinners on their coming to him; and that persevering unbelief was the only sin that would prove the ruin of her soul. On his second visit, he again directed her to the Saviour, explained more fully the plan of salvation, assured her that to disbelieve was to render the truth of God a lie, and to dishonour God; whilst faith in the sacrifice of Christ glorified God; and that if she thus believed, and cast her soul upon the Saviour, she would obtain a "peace which passeth all understanding," and become a child of God, and an heir of the kingdom of heaven. She listened with the deepest attention and the liveliest interest to all that was said; faith seemed to spring up at once in her heart; and, though overwhelmed with a sense of her guilt and unworthiness, she ventured her soul upon the Saviour.—"her chains fell off, her heart was free," and she sprang into the glorious liberty of the children of God. During the succeeding night, so great was her peace and joy of mind, that she awoke her sister, to tell her how wonderfully happy she was while resting her soul upon the merits of Christ. The next day her spiritual friend, the Doctor, encouraged her to hold fast her confidence, and cautioned her against doubting or calling in question what the Lord had done for her soul. She replied, "O Sir, from what you have told me, I dare not doubt. I believe the Saviour died for me. I feel that he loves me. I have a solid foundation to build upon. O! I will never doubt his love!" From this time to the end of her life, she was kept in a serene and happy state of mind. Her faith became more and more steadfast and vigorous, and her hope bloomed with immortality. "The death of Christ on Calvary," she said, "was a solid foundation to rest on;" and she loved to hear about the Saviour, and what he was doing before the throne. At the thought of meeting her first mistress, who had been so kind to her, she was in an ecstacy of spirit. "Wonderful—wonderful mercy of God!" she exclaimed. "What a meeting! What a meeting! After I have almost broken her heart by my sins, to meet her in heaven! What a gracious God! O, how can I praise him enough!" Some worldly people having been conversing with her, she became discouraged and cast down. The thought of meeting her Judge to give an account of the deeds done in the body, oppressed and overwhelmed her. "Who am I," she said, "to give an account of such a life?" But on being reminded that her iniquities had been forgiven through believing in Christ, she became again calm and happy. "O!" she exclaimed, with her hands clasped, and her eyes uplifted to heaven, "O, the height, the length, the breadth, and depth of the love of Christ to me, the chief of sinners! If God were to restore me to health, I would live, through his grace, a life devoted to his glory; for he has changed my heart, and turned me from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. His people should be my people; their Lord, my God. I would go to the chapel in Nicholson-square, and join the Doctor's class, and strive, through the grace of God, to lead a blameless life." "But," she added, "I would rather die than live, if it be the will of God." To a female friend, who attended her during her illness, and smoothed her dying pillow, she gave a small present as a token of her gratitude and Christian love, desiring her to "keep it in remembrance of one of the greatest sinners that ever walked the streets of Edinburgh, though now, blessed be God, washed in the blood of Christ, and made white!" "And while you," she continued, "are thinking of me, I shall be before the throne, casting my crown at the Saviour's feet; holding a golden sceptre in my hand, and singing the wonders of redeeming love. I will be the first," said she, "to meet you on the shores of Canaan, and to welcome you to glory. I'll be there, waiting till you come." Then she called her father and sister to her bed-side, beseeching them to seek the salvation of their souls in health, and to "take warning from her." She begged her parent, especially, "to hear the voice of his dying child," and earnestly importuned him to "forsake all sin, and to turn to Christ while it is called to-day;"—reminding him that "if he died in his present state, though old and grey-headed, he would die in his sins, and be lost for ever!" With these and similar words, she addressed all around her. At length, exhausted by the effort she had made, she observed, "Now I have said all I can to you. See that you are not found at the left hand, when we meet at the judgment-seat of Christ!" She then begged every one of her relations to give her their hand; and said, in a tone of affectionate earnestness, "Will you do this? Will you forsake sin, and come to Christ?" and on their engaging to attend to her dying wishes, she became composed and satisfied. She also implored the kind friends who had visited her during her illness, and thus led her to the Saviour, to visit her relations after her decease, and to speak to them as they had done to her, that, through the blessing of God, they might be brought to the knowledge of the truth, and be induced to tread the narrow path that leads to heaven. This request she repeated several times. To the last, she assured her friends that "she enjoyed perfect peace, and was not, for one moment, afraid of death." When she was unable to speak, though quite sensible, and fully alive to the solemnity of the occasion, a friend was sent for to pray with her, who gave out also a hymn she had previously requested should be sung when she was entering the valley of the shadow of death. It was a paraphrase upon 2 Tim. i. 12, from the Scotch version:—

"Jesus, my Lord! I know His name,
His name is all my boast;
Nor will He put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost."

" I know that safe with Him remains,
Protected by His power,
What I've committed to His trust,
Till the decisive hour.

" Then will He own His servant's name,
Before His Father's face,
And in the New Jerusalem
Appoint my soul a place."

Subsequently she had several severe spasmodic attacks, during which she conjured the doctor not to deceive her, but to tell her faithfully if they were not the fore-runners of death. On his replying that they were, she thanked him, and, with a placid smile upon her countenance, said, "O then I am happy. It will soon be over; I shall soon be with my Lord in heaven." "O Sir!" she said at one time to him who had been, under God, the instrument of her conversion, "the Lord will bless you. But for you, my soul would have been lost!" She then exclaimed, with her eyes filled with tears of gratitude, "Perfect peace! perfect peace!" Yet, though delivered from the dread of death, the fear of dying sometimes harassed and distressed her. "O!" she would say, "O, the dissolution of the body!—the separation of the soul and body!" The thought occasionally clouded the sky of her peace and happiness; but when reminded that this was "the last enemy," and that Christ had conquered him, she replied, with much composure, "O yes;" and at length this fear was entirely removed, and she spoke of dying with the utmost calmness and serenity. When she felt assured that her end was near, she made the entire arrangement for her funeral, and ordered mourning to be made immediately, at her expense, for her father and sister, that there might be no confusion after her departure. In this peaceful and happy frame of mind she continued till the messenger arrived, when "calm at length, she breathed her soul away," and immediately sunk into the arms of death.

" A smile divine illumed her face,
And threw a radiance round her bed;
She triumph'd in the strength of grace,
And softly sunk among the dead."

There was one feature in the character of Lillias Chisholm that deserves attention. During the whole career of her profligacy, she never dared to tell a lie, and never recollected having told one in her life. This, she said, procured her many friends, as her word could be depended upon. It appears that a fondness for dress early led her astray. Her person, when in health, was beautiful; and she often remarked, that "her good-looking had been her ruin." O let the young guard against vanity and pride! Among the seven things which God is said emphatically to "hate," a proud look is mentioned as the first and the most prominent. Prov. vi. 17. Remember that beauty is but clay refined, and is often made to consume away like a moth.

" Let not gay clothing captivate the sight;
Shun tawdry ornaments, as vain and light;
Let sense and modesty thy dress prepare;
Th' immortal mind demands the utmost care."

Should this Sketch fall into the hands of servants, the writer would earnestly admonish them to avoid the too prevalent and baneful evil of frequently and unnecessarily changing their places. It was a subject of much pain to Lillias Chisholm, after her conversion, that she had never lived more than six months in one family. "O Sir!" said a young woman once, to a minister, when he visited her in goal, "had I not left that mistress," naming one who had restrained her from evil company, and instructed her in divine things, "had I not left that mistress, I would never have come here." Guard against taking offence at trifles, and resemble not those who are "given to change." The value of a good situation in a pious family is incalculable. The blessing of God rests upon such a residence, while a curse cleaves to the habitation of the wicked.

It may be that the reader of this Sketch is one who never, in common phrase, "fell from the paths of virtue," and may ask the question, What concern have I with such a narrative as this? The question is not an unnatural one. The remainder of the Sketch shall be devoted to it.

First, The narrative suggests the duty of the virtuous even to the vicious. Their vices are to be hated. Nothing is to be permitted to lessen our abhorrence of sin. We must guard against this with the utmost care. Criminals are sometimes spoken of in language that shows there is not, in the mind of the speaker, a due sense of the fearful evil of transgression. But it is bitter as well as evil; and therefore, while sin is to be hated, *sinner*s are to be pitied, and every opportunity to be embraced of bringing them to repentance and salvation. If thou standest thyself, raise up them that are fallen, that they may stand with thee, and that both may glorify God.

But, Secondly, They who stand should give God the praise of their preservation. That preservation may be distinctly traced up, not to any superior excellence and strength in ourselves, but to a series of providential circumstances, for which we can never be too thankful. We were favoured with early instruction and admonition, our habits were carefully formed in favour of virtue, good principles were implanted, salutary restraints imposed,—we were so early reminded of God, that we find it difficult to remove the impression, even if we unhappily should wish to do so. Are we indeed safe? Let us acknowledge, that it is because "mercy hath compassed us round about."

Lastly, If, in one or two points, there has been freedom from outward transgression, yet on others a very different judgment must be recorded; and, what is still more necessary to be remembered, the law of God refers to the heart, as well as to the life; forbidding, for instance, not only murder in the outward act, but all those principles and tempers which, followed to their natural issue, produce the external act of transgression. The law that forbids murder, forbids malice, and hatred, and envy. Now, keeping this spiritual character of God's law in view, begin with the First Commandment, and proceed to the Tenth, trying yourself by each. Ah! my friend, thus understanding the matter, thou hast broken them all, and art verily guilty before God. Dost thou ask what thou art to do? Meditate on these three short directions; they will point out to thee the proper path:—1. Humbly confess thy sin before God. Attempt not to dissemble nor cloak it. Say, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord; for in thy sight shall no flesh living be justified." 2. Earnestly implore the mercy of God to forgive thy past sins, for the merit of his Son. Come, not boasting of thy goodness, "the rich he sendeth empty away;" but saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" for "he filleth the hungry with good things." 3. Seek from God the grace which shall incline thee to obedience and enable thee to render it to him, as a sacrifice acceptable to him, by Christ Jesus. Say, from thy very inmost soul, "Lord, have mercy upon me, and write all these thy laws in my heart, I beseech thee!"

SABBATH CHIMES.

THERE'S music in the morning air,
A holy voice and sweet,
Far calling to the house of prayer
The humblest peasant's feet.
From hill, and vale, and distant moor,
Long as the chime is heard,
Each cottage sends its tenants poor
For God's enriching Word.

Still where the British power hath trod,
The Cross of faith ascends,
And, like a radiant arch of God,
The light of Scripture bends!
Deep in the forest wilderness
The wood-built church is known;
A sheltering wing, in man's distress,
Spread like the Saviour's own.

The warrior from his armed tent,
The seaman from the tide,
Far as the Sabbath chimes are sent
In Christian nations wide,— Thousands and tens of thousands bring Their sorrows to His shrine,
And taste the never-failing spring
Of Jesus' love divine!

If, at an earthly chime, the tread
Of million, million feet
Approach where'er the Gospel's read
In God's own temple-seat,
How blest the sight, from Death's dark sleep,
To see God's saints arise;
And countless hosts of angels keep
The sabbath of the skies!

SCRIPTURAL ARGUMENTS FOR THE STRICT RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT WALLACE,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Birmingham.

"Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," &c.—
Exodus xx. 8-11.

In the present Discourse I propose to adduce a few of the more plain and scriptural arguments and motives to a strict and religious observance of the Sabbath.

And of these I would place first and foremost the authority of God. He hath commanded us to "remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy;" he hath challenged a special property in the seventh day; and he himself hath set us the example of resting on that day. Now this ought to be enough to influence the practice of all who profess to be God's people; of all who would not be thought to live in wilful disobedience to his commands. It should be enough for all such to know, that God addresses them in the Fourth Commandment; there commands them to rest from business and labour, and to sanctify one whole day in seven; and that the day appointed under the Gospel for that purpose is the first day of the week; to know this ought to be argument and motive enough in favour of a most strict and religious observance of the Sabbath to all the professed people of God. Their motto ought to be, "Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do?" With Samuel they should always be prepared to say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth;" and to whatever course the Word of God calls them, that course they should instantly pursue. "As the eyes of a servant look unto the hand of his master, so their eyes ought to wait upon the Lord their God," for an intimation of his will in respect of them; which will they should at once recognise as the Law of their lives—the rule of their conduct. It is only because man is sinful, and because the Divine authority has lost that hold over even the best men it ought to have, that it is necessary at any time to add motives of obedience to a Divine command, beyond and above what are in the command itself. That it is the will and command of God, is motive enough to all perfect beings. The angels who surround the throne above need no other, and can have no higher motive than this. And so the will of God, and the command of God, ought of themselves sufficiently to influence the practice of all his professed people, whether in respect of the observance of the Sabbath, or any other duty whatever.

But the Divine authority and sovereignty have, as just remarked, lost their legitimate power over even the best men. And in order to influence our obedience to the Divine will, God condescends to use many arguments, and various sorts of motives with us—arguments and motives suited to men in a very imperfect, a very sinful, a very corrupt and rebellious state. Sometimes he addresses arguments to our guilty fears; sometimes to our fond and selfish hopes; all to influence us to an obedience to his will, to which his will in itself ought to be motive and argument enough.

God appears to us in his Word, not only in the character of sovereign Lawgiver, but, moreover, in that of a kind and condescending Parent, in mercy to our frowardness and ignorance, accompanying his commands with many motives and arguments, which we can at once appreciate and understand.

And in respect of no duty does he more clearly appear to us in his Word in this character than the remembrance and sanctification of the Sabbath, for he hath again and again enforced this duty by the most precious promises, and by the most awful threatenings.

1. The most precious promises have been made to those who honour and duly observe the Sabbath. They are as follows:—Isaiah lviii. 13, 14. "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father : for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." (See also Isaiah lvi. 2, 6, 7.)

Such are the precious promises made unto those who truly sanctify the Sabbath ;—they shall be blessed—they shall be made joyful in the house of God—they shall be fed with the spiritual heritage of Jacob—their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted of the Lord.

We are not to suppose that these promises apply to the Jews alone. Promises made to obedience to a Law of perpetual and universal obligation are as universal in their application as the Law itself. Besides, one of the promises just referred to, that from Isaiah lvi. 6, 7, is directly made to the Gentiles, under the name of "the sons of the stranger," and with manifest reference to the time of the present, viz., the Gospel dispensation—the time when God's house is called an house of prayer for all people.

We are fully warranted then, my brethren, all who truly sanctify and observe the Sabbath, are fully warranted, to appropriate the precious promises we have just read unto themselves. Every one who observes the Sabbath, not in a self-righteous spirit, as if therein he did a work of merit, but in the fear of God, and the faith and hope of the Gospel, has abundant warrant for saying, Such are the promises which God, through and for Christ's sake, hath made to me. And is there not herein, my brethren, a strong and powerful motive to Sabbath observance and obedience ?

2. But God seeks to influence us to this duty, not only through our hopes, but also through our fears. He has enforced it, not only by promises, but also by threatenings ; as in the following passages,—Jer. xvii. 27. "But if ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath-day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day ; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched." See also Amos viii. 4–12.

Such are the awful judgments threatened against those who profane God's ordinances, and desecrate his Sabbaths. Let no one say, These are threatenings which applied to the Jews alone. No such thing. As the blessings promised to an obedience required of all are of universal application, so are the judgments denounced against the breach of a Law that is of universal obligation. And we may rely upon it, that, for us, as individuals, or this country, as a nation, to be found in the ways of Sabbath desecration, is to be found on the high road to such national, and family, and personal judgments, and calamities, as those of which the Prophet Hosea speaks in the passage we have just referred to. And, O, have we not in this a motive to Sabbath obedience and duty ?

But although we dare not say that the Divine judgments threatened against Sabbath-breaking are applicable to the Jews alone, we may at once allow, that, as yet, such judgments have chiefly and most markedly lighted upon that people ; and well may the judgments, not only threatened, but executed against them for their disrespect to the Sabbath of the Lord and other sins, teach us the evil and danger of all sin, and of this sin in particular, and that in respect of it God will be true to all the threatenings of his Word. The Jews have been a highly favoured people ; but in every age they have proved themselves a stiff-necked and rebellious people ; and in every age, consequently, they have been visited more or less with condign punishment. Previous to their final dispersion, for their last and crowning sin, in rejecting and crucifying the Son of God, they were several times led captive to distant lands, and visited with the curse of famine, and pestilence, and foreign invasion, and civil war, in their own land. Their prophets, in language of lamentation, acknowledge their country's backslidings and rebellion ; making mention of the judgments of heaven upon them as the consequence of their sins. And amongst the sins enumerated as the cause of Israel's punishment and chastisement, we find that of Sabbath-breaking frequently mentioned ; for example, in the following passages,—Nehemiah xiii. 15–21 :—"In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses ; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day : and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals. There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the Sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem. Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the Sabbath-day ? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city ? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel, by profaning the Sabbath. And it came to pass, that, when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the Sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the Sabbath ; and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the Sabbath-day. So the merchants, and sellers of all kind of ware, lodged without Jerusalem once or twice. Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall ? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the Sabbath." See also Ezek. xx. 12, 13, and xxii. 26–31.

My brethren, such passages as these, in which the judgments of God, with which the nation and people of the Jews were from time to time visited, are clearly attributed, amongst other sins, to that of Sabbath-breaking, ought to be a solemn warning to all nations and to all individuals. They ought to speak in a voice of loud and solemn warning to the rulers of our own land, to our families, and to each one of us. The judgments threatened against Sabbath-breaking are as applicable to us as they were to the Jews ; and if we wilfully expose ourselves to them, why should they not be as fully executed against us as in the case of God's ancient people? Why should not Sabbath-breaking contribute to the judicial eclipse of Albion's glory, as it did to that of Judah? Why should it not bring trembling and mourning into our land and families, as it did into those of the Jews? In our case, the guilt is as great—nay, greater; for the Cross has laid us under stronger obligations to honour the whole law of God, than even the Shechinah laid the Jews; why, then, should our punishment not be as great and exemplary? The mercy of God only prevents. Judgment lingereth; God is long-suffering—he waiteth to be gracious: but still, Britain, and each of its inhabitants should know, that the day of vengeance will come—that “damnation slumbereth not,” but will yet certainly light upon the nation and the people who despise God's Word, and profane his ordinances.

But let us now turn from the direct consideration of the authority, and the promises, and the threatenings of God, as regards the Sabbath, and argue for this Divine institution from its uses, its importance, and its pleasures.

1. It is of great present use and importance to man—of great use and importance unto him, if considered only in his relations to this world.—What a blessing is the Sabbath to men of business, if they would only observe it as a day of entire cessation from their worldly avocations, as they ought! Then it would be a day of relaxation to minds kept on the stretch during the previous six days of the week, and of rest to bodies wellnigh worn out by the incessant drudgery of this busy world. It would be a day of seclusion from the calls either of the compeer, the customer, or the creditor, and of undisturbed retirement within one's self. And surely they, who are most accustomed to live in the din and noise of the world, ought to be best able to appreciate a present use and advantage in such a day as this.

What a blessing is the Sabbath to the industrious and working classes of society! To the wearied and worn out in body, it brings a day of wholesome rest and refreshment, for which they have to thank no man. The Sabbath is the poor man's, not through the indulgence of an earthly employer, or the decisions of merely worldly politicians, but by the command of Heaven. It is his birthright, which nothing but injustice, leagued with impiety, can wrest from him. And whilst he rests his weary bones on the Sabbath-day, he does so free from all feeling of obligation to any but the Great Supreme—the Lord of the Sabbath; so that the Sabbath is of use in cherishing a lawful and invigorating independence of mind in the case of the poor man, as well as in recruiting his bodily strength. It tends to bring him on a level with his superiors, and is a gift which he holds from God equally with them. But deny the Divine obligation of the Sabbath, and, if a day of rest he allowed him at all, the poor man has to thank his earthly rulers and superiors for it; whilst, as their caprice, or covetousness, or notions of expediency may dictate, he may be deprived of it altogether. And yet they, according to some, are the poor man's enemies who insist on the obligation of the Sabbath law; whilst they are his friends who deny its obligation, and for his day of rest—a day which is his by Heaven's command—would leave him dependent on the tender mercies of his earthly master!

What a blessing is the Sabbath to the lower animals! See them toiled and laboured, in ministering to man, during six days of the week, often cruelly and beyond what reason could endure, and surely every benevolent mind must at once admire the wisdom, and adore the goodness, that sanctified the seventh day even for them! And do away, in as far as human law could do away, with the obligation of the Sabbath, as some infidel pamphleteers would, and leave it a day to be spent for man's profit or pleasure as man willeth, and by so doing you inflict a most cruel and deadly blow on that portion of the animal creation, which already groaneth enough under the heavy weight of man's oppression and injustice. Those who call out “cruelty” to the advocates of a strict observance of the Sabbath, would do well to consider to what monstrous cruelty and oppression their own notions on this subject, if fully acted up to, would lead. They are the true friends of humanity, as well as the true interpreters of Scripture, who maintain the full obligation of the Fourth Commandment, and insist on the Christian's duty strictly to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest, both to man and beast.

2. But, secondly, it is to man, as a moral and religious being, as a responsible and immortal being, that the Sabbath is of chief use and prime importance. If it only affected temporal interests, it would, comparatively, be little worth contending for; but affecting, as it does, most nearly and closely the spiritual and eternal interest of men, it is impossible that it can be too earnestly advocated.

From the institution of the Sabbath immediately after the creation, and before the fall of man, it would seem that God deemed it a special season for his more immediate and solemn worship fit even for Adam. His ordinary employment, indeed, in his state of innocence and perfection, was necessarily no interruption to his happiness and communion with God. Yet it may have afforded temptation to this, to a finite and fallible being like Adam; and therefore, even to him, before his fall, a day undisturbed by worldly avocations was appointed, for the more immediate contemplation and intense worship of God. And if Divine Wisdom saw that such a day was needed even by Adam, in a state of innocence and perfection, how much more necessary and important must such a day be to us in our fallen and degraded state!—a state in which we have a strong natural propensity to neglect the worship of God altogether, to live without him, to employ our whole time and thoughts about things that pertain solely to this life, and to place our affections on the creature more than the Creator!—a state in which even the best men have to acknowledge their corruptions, and lament their worldly-mindedness, the predispositions and tendencies of their mind to rest in things seen, and to be immersed in worldly cares and anxieties! Oh, of what unspeakable use and importance to men thus situated is the weekly Sabbath, with the obligation under which it directly lays men to God, to cease for one whole day from all worldly employment, and engage in all the more solemn duties of religion, both public and private. It is an ever-returning check upon worldly-mindedness; it is a break in the ordinary current of human life, whose tendency is to convert it into the channels of virtue and of godliness; it regularly calls, and leads the unconverted under the most wholesome and heavenly influences; and it is a weekly impetus to all the holy desires of a renewed and a sanctified heart, which may continue to be felt until again renewed.

And what would the world be without a Sabbath? What would then become of the unconverted and impenitent? Supposing that our Sabbaths and their religious duties were abolished, would not the fountain of grace to them be in a great measure shut up, opportunities of faith and repentance in a great measure denied them, and the downward way to hell made more downward still? Nay, what would become of the people of God themselves, if the Sabbath were abolished? Could they live without it—live spiritually, and unto God? I believe the thing, humanly speaking, impossible to man, as at present constituted and circumstanced, even to the best man living. I believe, without the season which the Sabbath stately supplies for solemn religious reflection, and the undisturbed worship of God, instead of growing in grace, grace would die in his heart, and he would be amongst the number of those who “go back.”

And we speak not speculatively when we thus speak. A sad experience has impressively taught to what a neglect of the Sabbath naturally leads, both in the unconverted and the converted. In the former, it has often led to the most villanous and bloody crimes. How many condemned malefactors have themselves traced their capital offence and ignominious end to the sin of Sabbath-breaking! In the latter, in the case of the converted, it has often led to humbling falls and mournful backslidings. Let the backslider examine his ways, and I could almost promise him, that he will trace his declension to a neglect, in one way or another, of Sabbath duties. He has first allowed himself to decline in the duties of the closet, the family, or the house of God. But, on the other hand, how many are there who can trace their first religious impressions to a Sabbath-day! And how many who have to acknowledge, that it is on that day especially they have been nourished by “the sincere milk of the word!”

Doubtless, we have instances innumerable of men who seem to have enjoyed Sabbath opportunities in vain,—whose privileges, in this respect, will, if they repent not, increase their punishment, as they have aggravated their guilt; but what good thing will men not abuse? There are thousands who make the Gospel of God’s grace a “savour of death unto death” unto their souls; and no wonder that such persons also should abuse, unto their own undoing, the institution of the Sabbath. But still, it has been a day of grace and mercy, the accepted time, and the day of salvation, to many, many souls. And whilst it is only in heaven the use and importance of the Sabbath will be fully seen, we may derive some faint idea of what society and the world would tend to without a Sabbath, from the general character of those who live in the continued and wilful neglect and profanation of it.

The pleasures of the Sabbath are of the highest and most enrapturing kind; I mean its pleasures to the people of God,—to those who, heart and soul, engage in its solemn and peculiar duties. The pleasures of the Sabbath are the nearest approach to those of angels, and to those of “the spirits of just men made perfect.” They are the Christian’s most distinct foretaste of heaven, and earnest of the inheritance that is prepared for him in light and glory. They are spiritual in their character. It is not the soft stillness of the Sabbath morn that constitutes the pleasure of the Christian on that day, though it may contribute to it; but it is God manifest and reconciled, in the face of Jesus Christ. It is not the bodily rest the Sabbath allows that constitutes its pleasures to a Christian mind, though that, too, may contribute to them; but it is the rest the pious soul, in the exercise of a lively faith, that day enjoys in Jesus. It is not communion with friends and relatives that constitutes the delight of the Sabbath to the Christian; but it is the communion of the soul with God, and with Christ, and with heavenly things, and with the saints on earth. It is not worldly amusement and sensual gratification that give a charm to the Sabbath in the mind of God’s people; but it is the sweet songs of Zion, and the feast of fat things, which God hath prepared in Christ for them that love him. Christians delight in the Sabbath, not because it is a holiday, but a holy day; not because it is a day of amusement, after the fashion of this world, but a day of rejoicing, after the fashion of heaven; not because it is a day of surfeiting, after the manner of men, but a day of banqueting, after the manner of angels. Their Sabbath joy is in communion with God in Christ.

But those who are altogether ignorant of this pleasure, those who have no relish for it, those whose thoughts seldom rise above the surface of the earth on which they tread, and are incapable of the purest delights of the soul,—they are ready to cry out, “Cruelty!” when we desire the poor man to cease from his work, and to give over seeking his mere carnal pleasure on the Lord’s day; that, by giving himself to the solemn religious duties of the Sabbath, he may taste the happiness of heaven and of angelic minds. The Sabbath demands of the poor man the sacrifice of no necessary comfort; and it promises him, in the observance of its solemn duties, "peace with God in Christ, and joy in the Holy Ghost,—joy unspeakable, and full of glory,"—joy such as fills the highest created minds. But what do the enemies of the Sabbath say? They tell the poor man to seek all manner of sensual gratifications on that day; they indulge him in these to a degree that is utterly inconsistent with the proper and the higher exercises of the Sabbath; and they say, they are his friends! Truth declares, and hell will demonstrate, that they are his worst enemies.

May each one of us, my brethren, be enabled more and more to experience and taste the pleasure of the Sabbath! By the blessing of God we shall be so enabled, if we give ourselves more and more fully to the discharge of Sabbath duties. It is by diligently and regularly waiting upon, and serving God, in our closets, and in our families, and in his house in public, on the Sabbath, that we shall know more and more the pleasures of doing so. Let us truly engage in a Sabbath's services, and we shall taste a Sabbath's blessedness; let us faithfully do a Sabbath's work, and, through the merits of him who is Lord of the Sabbath, we shall enjoy a Sabbath's reward. And that the Discourses delivered to you on this subject may be the means of rendering you all more faithful and regular in the discharge of the duties of the Sabbath; and that, through Christ, our Sabbaths here may be to us delightful (though very imperfect) foretastes of an eternal Sabbath, is my earnest prayer. Amen.

THE CUSTOMS OF THE ANCIENT EGYPTIANS IN CASES OF SICKNESS AND DEATH.

THE ancient Egyptians were highly celebrated for their skill in surgery and medicine. As was customary in Europe until a late period, the profession of a surgeon appears to have been united with that of a barber. The Egyptians were almost the only oriental nation that shaved the beard; and this minute circumstance has not escaped the notice of the author of the book of Genesis,—for it is recorded, that Joseph, when summoned from his dungeon by Pharaoh, "shaved himself." (Gen. xli. 14.) Great importance was attached to a beautiful head of hair; and therefore Solomon says to the daughter of Pharaoh, "Behold thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair; thou hast doves' eyes within thy locks: thy hair is as a flock of goats, that appear from mount Gilead." (Cant. iv. 1.) And Isaiah threatens the ladies of Palestine, "It shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty." (Isa. iii. 24.)

This was, however, not exclusively confined to women; we find that men took pride in the length and thickness of the hair; it forms the most conspicuous part in the description given us of the beauty of Absalom: "But in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty: from the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him. And when he polled his head (for it was at every year's end that he polled it: because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it:) he weighed the hair of his head at two hundred shekels after the king's weight." (2 Sam. xiv. 25, 26.) The hair was regarded not only as an ornament, but as a symbol of strength; for it came to pass, when he was pressed by Delilah, "that he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head; for I have been a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb: if I be shaven then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man." (Judges xvi. 17.) When deprived of his hair, the hero of Israel became shorn of his strength; but his prowess returned when his hair grew again, and he was enabled to take signal vengeance on his enemies.

Ointments and unguents were prepared by medical men, not only for healing wounds, but for preserving and beautifying the skin. We find, that when Moses was directed to prepare spices for perfuming the tabernacle, he was further commanded, "Thou shalt make it an oil of holy ointment, an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary: it shall be an holy anointing oil." (Exod. xxx. 25.) Solomon, in his Song, frequently alludes to the unguents with which the "Egyptian princess perfumed herself." Isaiah also takes notice of the use of ointment for mollifying sores: "From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it: but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores: they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment." (Isaiah i. 6.)

Baths were used both for luxury and health; and it seems pretty certain, that the Egyptians and Israelites were acquainted with the use of medicinal springs in cutaneous diseases. The healing of Naaman, the Syrian, by simply washing in the river Jordan, was probably a miraculous cure; but the prophet's prescription, nevertheless, might have been derived from observations on the saline mixtures which rendered part of that stream very brackish. "Elisha sent a messenger unto him, saying, Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean. But Naaman was wroth, and went away, and said, Behold, I thought, he will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper. Are not Abana and Parpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned and went away in a rage. And his servants came near, and spake unto him, and said, My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean? Then went he down, and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, according to the saying of the man of God: and his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean." (2 Kings v. 10-14.)

It is not easy to determine from the monuments whether the Egyptians, like the Israelites, connected the medical art with conjurations and magic; but it is not an improbable conjecture, that they, like most oriental nations, regarded sickness as a supernatural visitation, somewhat like possession by devils, for the priests were the chief practitioners in medicine.

The death of a noble Egyptian was followed by a general mourning of all his family, connections, and dependents. The body was embalmed by the sacerdotal physicians, after which the ceremonies of lamentation commenced, which seem to have been of two kinds—one set lasting forty days, and the other seventy days. "Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father; and the physicians embalmed Israel. And forty days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed: and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days." (Gen. 1. 2, 3.)

The funeral procession was generally very magnificent; it was attended by all the friends and relatives of the deceased; and at the burial of a king, or a man of rank, all the nobles of the land accompanied the corpse. Thus we read in the account of Jacob's funeral, "And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, and all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company." (Gen. 1. 7-9.)

Hired mourners attended at these funerals, as is still the custom in many Eastern countries, and also in the remote rural districts of Ireland. They not only were loud in their wailings, but they rent their garments, and cast dust upon their heads. The melancholy cries of the professional mourners are noticed by Solomon: "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the street." (Eccles. xii. 5.) Wearing sackcloth, rending the clothes, and casting dust upon the head, have ever been the outward signs of sorrow in the East: they are mentioned in Jeremiah's description of the misery of Jerusalem, at the time of the captivity. "The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, and keep silence; they have cast up dust upon their heads; they have girded themselves with sackcloth; the virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground." (Lamen. ii. 10.)

Although the Jews do not appear to have practised the art of embalming to the same extent as the Egyptians, there is no doubt that they endeavoured to protract the time when the body should yield to the process of natural decay, by spices and fumigation. Thus we read, that "Asa slept with his fathers, and died in the one and fortieth year of his reign. And they buried him in his own sepulchres, which he had made for himself in the city of David, and laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art: and they made a very great burning for him." (2 Chron. xvi. 13, 14.)

From the accounts given of the funerals of Jacob and Joseph, it is manifest that great importance was attached to the circumstance of being buried in the family sepulchre. Indeed, kings were more anxious about their tombs than their palaces; and hence we see the great force of Isaiah's denunciation against the haughty rulers of Babylon: "All the kings of the nations, even all of them, lie in glory, every one in his own house. But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit; as a carcass trodden under feet. Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial, because thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people: the seed of evil-doers shall never be renowned." (Isaiah xiv. 18-20.)

This deprivation of sepulchre was also denounced as a punishment against Jezebel, the wicked wife of the wicked Ahab; and we find that the prediction was fulfilled, although Jehu, by whose command she was slain, directed his servants to give her interment: "He said, Go, see now this cursed woman, and bury her: for she is a king's daughter. And they went to bury her: but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands. Wherefore they came again, and told him. And he said, this is the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servant Elijah the Tishbite, saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel: And the carcass of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field in the portion of Jezreel; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel." (2 Kings ix. 34-37.)

Ordinary persons were, for the most part, interred in the earth; but sepulchral chambers were erected for kings and nobles, which were kept carefully closed. The portals of these tombs were viewed with reverential awe, and they were frequently quoted as the symbols of the power of death. They were called by the Jews "the gates of hell," meaning by the word "hell," not the place of torment, but the invisible world, or residence of disembodied spirits. This enables us to explain a passage in St Matthew, which has been strangely misrepresented. Christ promised St Peter that the gates of hell—that is, the portals of the tombs, should not be able to prevail against his church (Matt. xvi. 18.); but this expression, on account of the change in the signification of the old Saxon word Hell, is commonly and erroneously supposed to have a reference to the powers of darkness and the evil spirits.

There can be little doubt that the Egyptians believed in the immortality of the soul; but this important doctrine does not meet us as a prominent article in the Jewish faith, until after the return of the Jews from Babylonian captivity. The ancient patriarchs did not, however, look for temporal blessings only; they knew that "their Redeemer liveth, and that in the latter days he shall stand upon the earth;" they trusted in the promise so finely enunciated by Hosea, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." (Hosea xiii. 14.)

It deserves also to be noticed, that the Sadducean heresy made no progress among the Jews who settled in Egypt under the Ptolemies; they rather fell into the contrary, of speculating widely on the world of spirits, and the nature of the future state of existence. But men of so many various nations, sects, and creeds, were blended together in the schools of Alexandria, that it is impossible to determine which originated or developed any of the visionary theories that were so rife in Egypt from the days of the Ptolemies to its conquest by the Saracens.*

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The spiritual advantages of the poor.—Poverty gives a claim on the compassion of God. None could ever go to a throne of grace, and say, I am rich and prosperous, therefore hear my request. Indeed, chief favourites, and great noblemen, have their requests granted in the courts of kings; but the King eternal "looks to the man that is poor and of a contrite spirit," and who can plead, "But I am poor and needy, make haste unto me, O God!" And well may the poor plead with that God, who, by his prophet Ims said, "I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord;" and, says the apostle, "Has not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith?" O the vast odds between heaven and earth, between God and men! Here "the brethren of the poor go far from him; he follows them with words, but they are wanting to him." Thus "the destruction of the poor is his poverty." But what a sweet relation commences between God and the poor! He is their help, their shield, their kind provider; so that, both in a temporal and spiritual sense, "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongues faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Jacob will not forsake them." He puts himself down as surety in the poor man's bond, and declares, that "he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord;" and, as a good surety, he will not fail to repay him. Now, if this noble connection, and divine relation, will not balance all the perplexity, pain, and reproach, attendant on poverty, to the pious soul, what will do it? In a word, at the general judgment in the great day, the final sentence to the righteous and the wicked will be awarded, though not for, yet according to, the kind or unkind usage of his poor, needy, and persecuted followers in the world.—JAMES MEIKLE. Godliness.—Godliness can have no being, but in a heart warmed with a sense of redeeming mercy.—ADAM.

Religion a living principle.—Religion is not a mere nominal and empty profession,—the running a round of lifeless ceremonies, the adoption of a new theological creed, or the outward adherence to a particular church, however admirable; but it is a new life, the first spark of which is from above; of which a state of grace upon earth may be considered as the infancy, and a state of glory as the manhood and maturity. Let your own religion then, display all the vitality and vigour which such an image implies. Endeavour to die to the world, and live unto God; to "present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto him." Consecrate every power and faculty of the new man to his service. Let it be seen that you "have passed from death unto life," not merely by your love of the brethren, but by your active resistance to every sin, and active pursuit of every duty. Amidst the struggles and pains involved in such a career of self-denial, purity and devotion, console yourselves by the remembrance, that if the morning of spiritual life be heavy and lowering, it will in the end brighten into perfect day. And how rapidly is that day approaching! How rapidly are disease and death accomplishing the hopes and joys of others! "We know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."—REV. J. W. CUNNINGHAM.

THE PURPOSES OF AFFLICTION, AND THE CHARACTER AND CONDITION OF MAN, AS PRESUPPOSED BY THEM.

By A CLERGYMAN'S DAUGHTER.

MUCH has been said, and said well on the subject of affliction. It is a chord on which many changes have been rung, and some of these have no doubt often soothed, and comforted, and consoled under one or other of the various forms in which affliction has presided over human destiny. But the very variety of these forms seems to justify the number of those attempts, which, from time to time, have been made to mitigate its bitterness, or to extract its sting. And while every day, perhaps, as it wings its flight, witnesses a new aspect of suffering, it would only betoken surely a fitting proportion in the amount of sympathy, should every day witness a new endeavour to alleviate the sufferer. We are aware, it is one thing to contemplate, and to moralize from the calm regions of theory, and another and very different thing to writhe under the rod—to agonize in the very fire of endurance, and to practise the lessons of an untroubled hour. Yet we are not without the hope that we may be able to offer some improving or consolatory suggestion to meet the case of one or other of the sons and daughters of affliction. With this view we would endeavour to enumerate some of the more obvious purposes which, in the wise economy of Providence, afflictions seem intended to subserve, and by remarking those features in our character and condition, which those purposes presuppose, and to which they have relation, we may discover somewhat of the mercy as well as the wisdom of those arrangements which at first sight may appear, at the best, but dark and mysterious.

The character of the first purpose to which we shall advert is discovering, of the next subduing, and of the third purifying.—Affliction may be first considered as discovering, or opening up to us clearer views of our own character and that of the great Being with whom we have to do. It is, indeed, a sword in our bones, but may be compared to the sword that divideth between joints and marrow; discerning the thoughts and intents of the heart. The world, ourselves, our position, our pursuits, and our prospects, appear to us in a new and altogether different light from the bright hues they wear in the hey-day of health and prosperity, resigning the glow of ideal radiance for the sober colouring of truth. And as our views of things which are seen and temporal, shrink into their relative proportion, our conceptions of things unseen and eternal, expand towards some measure of their real importance till we are at length enabled to say with a tried sufferer of old, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

As the corresponding feature of our constitution to which this tendency of affliction has respect, we remark our natural ignorance, both of our own hearts, and of the divine Being, aggravated as it is by our propensity to self-deception. The heart is deceitful above all things, who can know it? We are prone to see all objects through a false and distorting medium. We have "eyes of flesh." The world appears to us deserving of our most engrossing attention—its opinions worthy of our most profound respect—its wealth—its power—its honours meriting our most unwearied exertions. The world is our God—its smile our highest reward—its frown our greatest dread. Our own characters are beheld with the jaundiced eyes of partiality and self-esteem. Their failings gilded—their faults extenuated—their virtues magnified. Nay, we call darkness light, and good evil; we put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter. Our false estimates extend to the nature and character of the great Author of our being, and the obligations and requirements under which we are laid by him; "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself." On this point, indeed, we can attain to no ideas but what are vague, general, and indefinite, without the intervention of an express revelation. This, however, is provided, and we remain ignorant still. We are blinded by prejudice, and a carnal mind, by which the things that be of God cannot be known, because they are spiritually discerned. Our wishes frame our creed; our vitiated desires warp our judgments, and darken our understandings. The veil is on our hearts and on our eyes, and merciful is that dispensation of our lot that will rend it asunder, though it should convulse every nerve and sinew of our mortal frames. We "feed on ashes, a deceived heart hath turned us aside, and we shall go down to the grave with a lie in our right hand," unless some Heaven-commissioned stroke shall dash the scales from our eyes, unmask the awful severities of truth,—reveal us to ourselves in all the hideousness of sinners, and our God in all the immaculate holiness, the indexible justice, the inexhaustible mercy, that meet in the cross of Christ.

But, 2dly, Affliction may be considered as subduing. It is the hammer that breaketh the flinty rock in pieces. It possesses a softening influence, that brings down every high thought, and every imagination that exalteth itself. It humbles the pride of man, it lays the mightiest low; affording an impressive comment on the Scripture lesson, "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord, which exerciseth loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, on the earth." It confounds human policy, it frustrates human plans, it makes way for impressions against which, in brighter hours, and more prosperous days, the heart will close in cold and careless indifference,—from which, in the record of its past history, it has oft-times turned away in proud or sullen disdain.

Answering to this subduing influence of affliction, we find our natural position of enmity against God. There are perhaps few things we are more unwilling to admit, than the natural enmity which every child of this rebel world bears in his heart, and evinces by his life, to his almighty Sovereign; but if there be any truth in the Bible, any veracity in God, then is there not a declaration founded on a broader basis, than that the natural man is at enmity with his Maker; and whether this be exhibited in the excesses of impiety, in the most open and daring defiance of the Divine authority, in the most profane violation of the most express precept of the decalogue; or whether it be concealed amid the courtesies of society, within the hypocrite's mantle, under the formalist's garb; the mode of its manifestation affects not the principle,—it lies there still, deep in the heart, like the "dead men's bones in the whited sepulchre,"—like a worm at the root, withering the fairest exhibitions of human virtue, the amiabilities that adorn human character, which, originating from no heaven-born influence, are like flowers that spring from corruption and the grave. The heart, unrenewed by Divine grace, is "hard as the nether millstone," whatever be the tenderness of its human sensibilities; and gracious, unspeakably gracious, is the stroke that lays it, broken and contrite, humbled and abased, at the Redeemer's feet.

Again: 3dly, Affliction may be further and more particularly considered as purifying. It is the furnace in which the gold and the silver are purged from their dross; while the Refiner sits by, regulating its intensity, watching the important process, and waiting only till the precious ore is pure enough to reflect his image. It is the fire that is to try every man's work, and to burn up "the wood, hay, and stubble;" but it is also the crucible in which all that "abideth the fire" must be melted down, that every alloy may be separated; and that which is destined for "the vessels of honour" in the Master's house, must be refined with the greatest care, even "seven times purified," for which, if need be, the furnace must be sevenfold heated: "I will surely purge away all thy dross, and take away all thy tin." And truly there is much base admixture left behind in that furnace. The sordid, and the earth-born, and the carnal of our nature is consumed. All the nobler and more ethereal elements of the unfallen spirit, which once bore the Refiner's image, are recovered from the dross, and fitted for bearing it anew—for reflecting it, in untarnished splendour, to the gaze of an admiring universe throughout eternity; when changed into "the same image from glory to glory," it shall continue to shine, and to brighten with increasing lustre, for ever and ever.

In connection, then, with the purifying effects of afflictive dispensations, we notice the imperfections that cleave to our best estate. "What man is there that doeth good, and sinneth not? The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these two are contrary the one to the other, so that we cannot do the things that we would." It is, indeed, a hopeful symptom when we feel any thing of this struggle within, when the torpor of spiritual death begins to be disturbed by the stirrings of a vital principle, faint and feeble as its first movements may be. Nor is it always when we advance in our Christian course that this struggle becomes less painful, this contest less keen. The very approach of our final deliverance nerves our great adversary (the instigator of all evil) to more desperate efforts to retain his prey, and he combats the more fiercely when in danger of relinquishing his hold—when his victim is eluding his grasp. But the more we know and experience of the severity of this struggle, the more earnestly must we desire to be set free. "Oh, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from this body of sin and death?" was the language of a highly-gifted believer, and has been the language of many a tried follower of his faith. "Who shall deliver me?" Christian, are you prepared for the answer? Are you prepared to meet and to welcome your Deliverer? Receive him. You know his errand. Receive him gladly; nay, start not at his messengers, his heralds, or his train! Sighs, and tears, and sorrows are among them; "days of pain, and nights of waking;" severed brow, and tortured frame. "For He is like a refiner's fire, and who shall stand at his appearing?" Yes, it is your Deliverer's train. Darkly and heavily they move along, and one on a pale horse brings up the rear; yet fear them not. That severed brow, that tortured frame, those days of pain, those nights of waking, are the furnace whence you shall come out seven times purified. Fear them not; for while "no affliction for the present seemeth joyous, but grievous, afterward it bringeth forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness in them that are rightly exercised thereby." But let this be heeded; for it is the savour of life unto life, or of death unto death. Where it does not enlighten, it seals up in judicial blindness; where it does not subdue, it hardens in final impenitence; where it does not purify, it burns up with fire unquenchable.

THE UNION WHICH SUBSISTS BETWEEN ALL INTELLIGENT AND MORAL BEINGS IN THE UNIVERSE.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

IN physics it has been universally admitted, since the days of Bacon, that the facts and phenomena of external nature form the only secure and established groundwork of a decided and certain philosophy. The intellectual principle, or tendency to generalize, in virtue of which the isolated objects of perception are converted into a regular and connected system, is, to a certain extent, inherent in the mind of every man; but the classification and arrangement of those facts which are connected by remote and more recondite analogies is the high attainment of a philosophic genius. It required, we conceive, the powers of no higher than ordinary intelligence in Linnaeus, combined with the habit of diligent and unwearied observation, to unite the individual productions of the soil into the families, and species, and genera, of an accurate and systematic botany; but it was only the mighty intellect of a Newton which could arrange, under the operation of one and the same law, facts apparently so dissimilar as the fall of an apple to the ground and the revolutions of the planets in their orbits. This single achievement in the science of nature has brought to light a principle of connection among all the objects in the physical universe, so intimate, that some have even hazarded the assertion, that if one particle of matter were annihilated, the mechanism and movements of the whole system would be deranged. Each particle, according to this hypothesis, coheres so firmly, not only to the particles in its immediate vicinity, but to all the particles composing the material frame-work of the universe, that such a consequence would certainly follow. Without, however, investigating the truth or falsehood of the deduction thus drawn from the admitted universality of the law of gravitation, we feel ourselves justified in affirming, that a connection no less intimate, though not, perhaps, so palpable, obtains among all the beings composing the moral universe of God. The parallelism may not at first be apparent, but a more minute and careful investigation of the subject may perhaps convince us of its truth.

To affirm, that, in so far as this province of God's moral empire is concerned, each individual of its successive generations stands separate and apart from every other, were to betray lamentable ignorance of the constitution of man, whether viewed in his physical relations, or in his intellectual and moral capacities. For the supply of his natural wants, and the gratification of his natural appetites, he is dependent on other and different individuals from himself; but his connection with the whole species becomes more strikingly apparent when we reflect on his mental constitution,—and especially on that beautiful chain of human thought reaching from the beginning of the world to the present hour; a chain neither less mysterious nor less grand than that which unites all physical existences. Ages have influenced ages,—nations have operated upon nations,—truths have dispelled errors, and errors have in turn given origin to truths. The intellectual history of the world, however, is far from presenting that regularity and uniformity in the progressive advancement of the species which might have been expected; periods, on the contrary, have often occurred when the tide of human thought, after having rolled on for ages with majestic grandeur, has been suddenly arrested in its course; but, trampling over every obstacle, it has resembled, in its after-progress, some mighty river, which has disappeared amid the sands of the desert only to emerge many leagues distant with greater impetuosity than before. Thus it is, that, from the impulse which the mind of man has received since the revival of literature, many brilliant discoveries have been made, which were, at least, obscurely suspected in ancient times. In the meagre astronomy of Pythagoras, for example, was concealed the germ of that true system of the heavens which Copernicus discovered; and even the law of gravitation itself, so fully demonstrated in modern times by the immortal Newton, appears to have been obscurely hinted at in the days of Lucretius. This chain of intellectual conception, which unites us so closely to the men of ancient times, affords us a beautiful illustration of the principle, that, viewed even in his intellectual character, man must not be considered as a mere isolated being, but connected with the men of every age and of every clime.

When we advert to his moral constitution, however, the connection alluded to appears not only to be more obvious, but replete with a moral accountability deeply impressive. The moral responsibility of every man is great, possessed as he is of talents and opportunities and privileges, for the use or the abuse of which he must give an account unto God; but the view of his responsibility becomes wider and more affecting, when we reflect upon that intimate connection by which he is bound, in moral influence, to his fellow-men. In this sense no man liveth to himself, for, by his whole deportment, he is operating, with an unseen but direct agency, upon the minds and the morals of all around him. The character of every man is in some degree modified, by the character of those whom he admits into close and habitual intercourse; and, though in its grand and palpable features his moral constitution may not be for a time subjected to any remarkable change, the influence of outward example may be so effectually modifying some of the minor details of his character, that its traces may soon be apparent, even on his external conduct.

But it is not only the openly avowed influence of example which illustrates the connection referred to; there is also a secret imperceptible influence which all our opinions and words and actions have upon human beings the most remote from us either in space or time. To affirm that any one individual, even the humblest and most obscure, will exert a decided effect on the beings of this earth long after his body shall have been committed to the dust, may perhaps appear extravagant, but it is not the less true; and equally undeniable is the fact, that the character and opinions of the same individual, unacquainted though he may be with the geographical position or characteristic manners of any distant region of the globe, may modify, in no small degree, the opinions and habits of some,—nay, perhaps of all its inhabitants. It is not only the man whose deeds, whether heroic, or useful, or benevolent, emblazon the page of history, that operates with moral power upon the mass of this world's inhabitants, but every, even the smallest integral portion of that mass, possesses in itself a power to modify the whole.

From the interesting position which every man may thus be considered as holding in regard to his fellow-men, might be deduced an ethical principle, co-extensive in its operation with the relations subsisting among the individuals of the human family. I allude to benevolence, or the desire of benefiting every member of that vast community with which he stands connected. Not only are they children of one common parent, partakers of one common nature, and inhabitants of one common territory, but their spiritual interests are so interwoven together, that the problem of human responsibility, in all its intricacies, will never be solved, until that great day shall arrive when He who is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending, will look along the whole series of human beings who have inhabited our globe from the creation to the consummation of all things, and determine the actual situation of each man in point of responsibility.

The fact that a connection so intimate exists throughout the vast community of mankind, is sufficient to bear us out in our demand, that a principle of benevolence ought to operate in every heart, controlling our conduct in reference to others, and impelling us forward in our endeavours to promote, to the utmost extent of our ability, the best interests of the whole human race. The mode in which the principle is exercised must necessarily depend on the peculiarity of those relations from which it originates. On one occasion it assumes the form of filial affection; on another, of patriotism; and, on a third, of general philanthropy, or extended benevolence.

Friend, parent, neighbour, first it will embrace;
Our country next, and then all human race.

From the universality of the relationship we have endeavoured to illustrate, we are entitled to expect that the law of benevolence be in universal operation throughout the whole earth; and any defect in this respect must argue either an original defect or a subsequent derangement of the moral constitution of man. The inference from the existence of moral relations to the existence of a corresponding moral principle, which either is, or ought to be in operation, is warranted by the principles of a sound philosophy, just as the great German philosopher, more celebrated for his profound speculations in mental than in physical science, could with safety announce a priori from a calculation of the relative motions and distances of a portion of the planetary system, the existence of a planet which was discovered some years after by the telescope. We are far from asserting that benevolence is a characteristic feature in the depraved constitution of man; it is sufficient, if, in the present stage of our argument, we have demonstrated that there lies upon every individual of the human race a paramount obligation to the habitual exercise of this principle.

In establishing the predominance of a law of benevolence through the whole moral universe, our purpose in the present argument will fail of its accomplishment, unless we shall be able to prove that the same law obtains in every other department of God's moral government. For it must be obvious, that could a single instance be discovered in the physical universe in which, though constituted in all respects the same with other gravitating bodies, and placed in similar circumstances, a body does not gravitate, we would be fully warranted to deny the existence of the great Newtonian principle as a regulating law of universal nature. In prosecution of our plan, therefore, we might argue from the benevolence of man to the still higher and purer benevolence of God. The perfection of his nature, too, and the relations in which he stands to his creatures, bears out in asserting the existence of such a principle in the Divine mind; but may there not be a condition of the creature in which the benevolence of the Creator is restrained in its exercise, and may not ours be precisely that condition? The character of man, from its opposition to the Divine purity, must bring the justice into collision with the goodness of God, but his benevolence hath never ceased to operate. It still holds true, that "his tender mercies are over all his works," and he causeth the "sun to arise upon the evil, and upon the good, and his rain to descend upon the just, and upon the unjust,"—thus evincing an extent of benevolence and liberality well befitting the character of Him who constitutes the first and the highest link in the chain of moral being. Though a violent disruption hath taken place of the feelings and affections of the human family from their great and gracious Creator, He hath still maintained towards them the tender care of a kind and indulgent parent. Their eternal interests especially are the objects of his anxious solicitude; and hence originated that astonishing scheme of mercy framed in the councils of eternity,—a scheme strikingly illustrative of the existence and operation of a law of benevolence, connecting the Creator with even his rebellious creatures. It were easy, by unrolling the annals of the human race, to show the unceasing operation of this principle on the part of God, from that hour when the ingratitude and rebellion of man first estranged him from his Maker, down to that joyful period when descending angels proclaimed the jubilee of the moral universe,—“Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will to men.” Now, if not before, was the Divine benevolence displayed in all its transcendent lustre; for “herein indeed was love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to die for us.” A fact so important in the Moral History of the human race, is sufficient to convince us, that the Benevolence of Deity has hitherto been unrestrained in its exercise towards the sinful children of men. God is essentially love; and no indignities or insults, on the part of man, have hitherto been capable of arresting in its progress that full tide of Benevolence, which hath by its fertilizing streams enriched the past, and will continue to enrich the future, generations of mankind, even to the end of the world. The utmost extent of human guilt and ingratitude has never invalidated the truth of the declaration, that “God is love”—a truth which is engraven as with a pen of iron on all the varied arrangements of Nature’s operations, as well as on every page of man’s individual, domestic, or social history—a truth which the eternal councils of the Father, as far as they have been revealed, the obedience and expiatory death of the Son, and the mysterious operations of the Holy Spirit, fully and irrefragably attest. To such a degree of certainty are we led by Divine Revelation, in regard to the existence and exercise of Benevolence in God towards guilty man, that any apparent exceptions to it, only enhance our admiration of that lofty and inscrutable principle in the Divine Mind, the height and the depth, the breadth and the length of which, we cannot, nor shall ever, comprehend. The apparent discrepancies in the operations of external nature, it is in innumerable cases impossible for us to solve; how then can we expect to reconcile in every point, the facts and phenomena of the Moral Universe, with the perfections of that Being, who is unsearchable in His greatness, and whose ways are past finding out? In this the infancy of our Moral being, we know but in part, and we understand but in part, and therefore it becomes not us even to attempt a solution of many of the problems involved in that sublime philosophy which regards the perfections and the character of God. Proofs of His benevolence are profusely scattered every where around us, and these alone are sufficient to convince us, not merely of the existence, but of the extended operation of this principle towards this distant province of His wide domains

THE SUFFERING REDEEMER.

BY W. H. MADDEN, M.D.

COME, poor sinner, weak and weary,
Burdened with a load of clay,
As along the dark and dreary,
Toilsome, path you wend your way;
Come, and take a passing view,—
See what Christ hath borne for you.

See Him now, the “Man of Sorrow,”
Crossing Cedron’s sacred brook;
Slowly his disciples follow,—
Slowly, with dejected look:
Hark! their sad foreboding sighs
Herald coming miseries.

Oh! behold Him, crushed with anguish,
Standing there apart, alone;
See His drooping eyelids languish,
Hear that bosom-rending groan:
Mark! the bloody sweat drops now,
Trickling from His pallid brow.

Low in supplication bending,
Hark, He breathes the fervent prayer,— “Father! mercy never ending,
Spare me this, this torment spare;
Yet, O Father, be it done
As thou wiltest to thy Son.”

O what wondrous resignation!
Heaven’s eternal Majesty
Yields to this severe probation,
Bears this load of agony:
On His head the vengeance hurl’d
For a guilt-polluted world.

Who such mighty love can measure?
 Who its compass can define?
 Yet, my heart, this noble treasure,
 None could purchase, may be thine!
 Haste, thy readiness to prove,—
 Haste to claim this proffered love!

LIFE AND MARTYRDOM OF POLYCARP, BISHOP OF SMYRNA.

It is worthy of remark, that the early history of the most eminent of the first converts to Christianity is traditionary and obscure; so that, in most instances, we are acquainted only with their career after they had become Christians. We first see them only at the period when they emerge from darkness into light; and their path becomes brighter and more distinct, as they continue in their course, until the whole effulgence rests upon the history of their martyrdom. May it not be, that the early Christians, regarding conversion as their real birth, and the life of faith as their only veritable existence, were indifferent to chronicle their anterior history; and that they thought it enough to say, like the poor beggar in Scripture, whose eyes had been miraculously opened, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see?"

These preliminary remarks apply to the early biography of Polycarp, one of the most illustrious of those who have been distinguished by the title of Apostolic Fathers, because they had been taught by the apostles, or their immediate disciples. Smyrna has been generally accounted his birth-place, and he was probably born towards the latter end of the reign of Nero. The tradition most worthy of credit is, that he was the disciple of St John himself, and that he enjoyed the high privilege of conversing with many who had seen our Lord in the flesh. The parentage of the illustrious Polycarp must have been sufficiently humble, if what has been related be true, viz., that being exposed to sale as a slave, he was redeemed by Calista, a noble lady, distinguished by her deeds of piety and charity. It is added, that finding him possessed of an amiable disposition and promising talents, she caused him to be carefully educated at her own charge, after which she promoted him to the stewardship of her household. When he had attained the proper age, he was ordained a deacon and catechist by Bucolus, the watchful and active Bishop of Smyrna, who also predicted that the young office-bearer would become his successor. This was fulfilled on the death of Bucolus; and Polycarp, being elected in his room, was consecrated to the office of bishop by St John, his illustrious preceptor. There is every reason, also, to believe that Polycarp was that angel of the Church of Smyrna, of whom "He that liveth, and was dead," bore so high a testimony, when he sent him that impressive warning contained in the Apocalypse: "I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty (but thou art rich); and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. Fear none of these things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison; that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Seventy-four years had elapsed since the time of Polycarp's consecration when this eulogium was pronounced: and the history of that interval—it has vanished, indeed, from the records of the Church upon earth; but we cannot the less conclude, from the foregoing attestation of the Great Head of the Church, how imperishably and brightly it has been transcribed in the annals of heaven!

Amidst the very brief notices which have come down to us of the administration of Polycarp, as Bishop of Smyrna, we learn that he came to Rome, to hold a conference with Anicetus, the Bishop of the Western metropolis, touching the proper time of observing Easter. The Eastern Churches, adhering to the Judaic reckoning, observed this solemn festival on the fourteenth day of the first Jewish month; while those of the West were accustomed to hold it on the night which preceded the anniversary of our Lord's resurrection. It was objected by the Western, against their Eastern brethren, that the latter, by their scrupulous adherence to the letter of observance, were obliged, in general, to hold it upon other days than the Sabbath, and that this was a manifest impropriety. Such was the ground of schism which, even at this early period, was keenly contested as a matter of vital importance. But the venerable Polycarp, and the faithful Anicetus, had too much Christian love to commence a rancorous controversy upon the subject; and, perhaps, they considered and deplored those more deadly matters of division which were already eating into the core of the tree of life. The two bishops met; and, as often happens between good men, each was unable to convince his brother that he was in the wrong. They met and parted, however, in peace and affection, feeling that the spirit of Christian charity was of more importance than observances; and each, therefore, adhered to his own period of celebration, without condemning his neighbour. While he abode at Rome, however, on this occasion, the gentle Polycarp showed that he could enter into no compromise with those who violated the important principles of Christian faith. He reasoned earnestly with those who had been led astray by the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus; and reclaimed many in Rome from these pestilential errors, to the communion of the true Church. On one occasion, he accidentally met with Marcion himself in the streets; upon which the latter, indignant that Polycarp did not salute him, or politically desirous of being countenanced, although in the slightest degree, by one so eminent in the Church as the Bishop of Smyrna, earnestly exclaimed, "Polycarp, acknowledge us!" "I do acknowledge thee," said Polycarp sternly, "to be the first-born of Satan!" In our own day, when Christianity itself is so unscrupulously sacrificed to the established code of courtesy and liberality, such conduct would, no doubt, be deemed ungentle, and even brutish. But Polycarp had not learned to associate in friendly intercourse with the enemies of Divine truth, or even to hail them with the common salutation of "God speed you." His conduct, while he abode in Asia also, was very different from that of a polemic. Instead of plunging into a storm of controversy, of which the wrathful elements were most abundant, it was his delight to assemble his friends around him, and repeat to them what he had learned in conversation from the companions of his Divine Master. His favourite theme on these occasions, was the Apostle John, and all he had told him of the miracles and doctrines of our Saviour. When Polycarp would be informed, also, of the heresies that were springing up, and the monstrous doctrines they embodied, we are told that, on such occasions, he stopped his ears, and cried out in horror, "O God, to what times has thou reserved me, that I should hear such things?" It was from him that Irenæus heard, in the course of these amiable prelections, the following anecdote of St John, which Polycarp seems to have adopted for his example in similar occasions. The most gentle and affectionate of the apostles, while at Ephesus, repaired one day to the bath; but, on entering, he found there Corinthus the Heresiarch, who had taught such pernicious doctrines respecting Christ's divine and human nature. St John immediately started back, and exclaimed to his companions, "Let us be gone, my friends, lest the bath that contains Corinthus, the enemy of the Truth, should fall upon our heads!"

It was some time after the return of Polycarp from Rome that he was visited by Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, who had been educated with himself under the ministry of St John. This meeting was under circumstances which, to men of the world, would have been fraught with nothing but sorrow; but to them they were subjects of holy joy and congratulation, for Ignatius was on his way to Rome, to receive the crown of martyrdom, at the award of the Emperor Trajan. The ship which conveyed the good Bishop of Antioch to the imperial city was obliged to cast anchor at Smyrna, and thus the two fellow-disciples met, to confirm each other with mutual exhortations. Here they conferred also upon the welfare of the Churches, which both had so much at heart. After Ignatius had been carried to Troas, he sent back a letter to the Church of Smyrna, in which he warned them against the prevalent heresies upon the subject of our Lord's humanity, and admonished them to pay a due regard to the pastorship and instructions of their bishop. He also wrote to Polycarp an epistle, containing an interesting summary of the duties of the Episcopal office.

Such are the scanty materials which we are able to glean, at the present day, of a long and well-spent public life; but it is at its close that we particularly learn its usefulness, in the history of the martyrdom of Polycarp—all the particulars of which have been minutely detailed in an ancient encyclical epistle, written in the name of his Church and under the character of eye-witnesses, to the Church of Philadelphia. It appears from ecclesiastical history, that, in the seventh year of the reign of Antonius (A. D. 167), the Emperor resolved to conduct an expedition against the Marcomani; and, in order to propitiate the divine powers, no better method could be discovered than a fierce persecution of the Christians, who were supposed to be the enemies equally of heaven and earth. How a person like Antonius, so famed in the various capacities of politician, philosopher, and philanthropist, could have been directed to such a conclusion, we would be wholly unable to guess, were we not taught by our Divine Instructor the real nature and worth of earthly wisdom, and philanthropy.

In consequence of the Emperor's decision, and the edicts which were issued against the Christians, the storm of persecution raged with great fury, and it soon reached Smyrna, where many were put to death for the cause that was dearer to them than life. The letter to which we have alluded, gives a frightful picture of the various tortures to which these victims of Pagan zeal were exposed; but it also gives us an animating picture of their piety, their zeal, and their devotedness. None of them, we are told, uttered a sigh or a groan: the fire of their tormentors was cold to them, while they endeavoured to avoid the fire that is eternal. Every torture was successively employed to make them renounce their Lord and Master, but in vain: their heaven-born magnanimity triumphed over all. But these exhibitions, instead of softening, only hardened and maddened the hearts of the idolaters; and the war-whoop of the persecution of these ages against the Christians was raised, "Away with the Atheists!" It was natural that the name of the great ringleader of the Christians of Smyrna should also be uttered in such a juncture; and there was soon heard, amidst the popular shout, "Let Polycarp be sought for!" The venerable bishop, undismayed at the cry, resolved to remain in the city; but his friends, knowing his usefulness, and afraid to lose him at such a crisis, remonstrated against his purpose, and reminded him of the permission of our Lord to his followers, that when persecuted in one city they should flee to another. Polycarp yielded to their affectionate arguments, and withdrew to a neighbouring village, where, with a few followers, he spent the day and night in prayer, beseeching, according to his wonted practice, that God would give peace and tranquillity to the Christian Churches. He had not long been here, however, until he received a premonition of his approaching death. Three days before his apprehension, he was in prayer at night, during which he fell into a trance, and dreamt that his pillow was on fire, and was consumed to ashes; upon which he told his friends, when he awoke, that he should be burned alive for the cause of Christ. In the meantime, the pursuit after him was hotly urged; upon hearing which, his friends anxiously entreated him to retire to another village. He complied; but his enemies soon arrived there also, and having seized two youths belonging to his household, they compelled them, by stripes, to show where their master was concealed. When they entered the house, he was in bed in an upper room; and even yet he might have escaped, by getting upon the flat roof, and thus emerging from some other habitation. But the activity of his pursuers was too keen to be eluded by a feeble old man, and a very few hours of farther existence was the utmost that could have been obtained by the attempt. He calmly awaited apprehension, saying, "The will of the Lord be done!" and, understanding that his persecutors were below, he descended, saluted them with a mild and cheerful countenance, and delivered himself into their hands. His behaviour on this occasion softened their rugged hearts; his venerable appearance filled them with reverence and compassion; and they could not help observing to each other, what little need there could be to hunt so fiercely after a poor, old man. He ordered a table to be spread, and provisions to be laid upon it, for them to eat, and requested them to allow him one hour for prayer, without interruption. This they granted; and such was the fluency and fervour of his devotions, that he continued praying nearly two hours, during which he commended to God all his individual friends and acquaintances, as well as the state of the Christian Church throughout the world. His captors, who listened, were now struck with grief and remorse, that a man so divine and venerable should be put to death through their agency.

The devotions of Polycarp being ended, the officers set aim upon an ass, and conducted him towards the city; but by the way they were met by Herod the Irenarch, a magistrate whose functions consisted in maintaining the public peace and apprehending seditious persons; and by Nicoetas, his father;—the two magistrates who had instigated this persecution of the bishop. At present, however, Herod concealed his rancour, and took Polycarp up into his chariot. As they rode towards the city, Herod and Nicoetas urged their prisoner with great earnestness to recant. "What harm was there be," they observed, "to say, Lord, Cæsar? What harm to offer sacrifice, and thus escape punishment?" This recognition of the divinity of the emperor was the test by which the early Christians were tried. Polycarp returned no answer to their repeated entreaties, upon which they gave him abusive language, and thrust him so roughly out of the chariot, that he fell, and severely bruised his thigh. But he rose without a murmur, and proceeded onward to the city with a cheerful countenance, as if nothing had happened. As soon as the guards had brought him into the stadium, there was a noise and tumult among the crowd; but at that moment a voice from heaven, which was heard by many, exclaimed, "Courage, Polycarp, and behave thyself bravely!" He was brought before the public tribunal amidst the clamours of the mob, who exulted at his apprehension; and the proconsul Quadratus, the chief magistrate of Asia, who sat in judgment, demanded of the prisoner if he was Polycarp; to which the latter answered in the affirmative. The proconsul then endeavoured with great urgency to persuade him to recant. "Have pity," he said, "upon your great age: swear by the fortune of Cæsar,—change your purpose,—say with us, Away with the Atheists!" The venerable martyr looked at the crowd, sighed, and, stretching his hand towards the multitude, exclaimed, "Away with the Atheists!" Quadratus must have seen the meaning of Polycarp, so different from the spirit of recantation; but he still persevered. "Swear," he said; "reproach Christ, and I will release thee!" With a burst of noble scorn the martyr replied, "Fourscore and six years I have served Christ, and he never did me harm; how, then, shall I now reproach my King and my Saviour?" The proconsul still continuing to urge him to swear by the fortune of Cæsar, Polycarp said, "Since you are so vain as to urge me to swear by the fortune of the emperor, pretending to be ignorant who I am, hear me plainly and frankly make this confession,—I am a Christian. If, now, you are desirous to learn the doctrines of Christianity, grant me a day and you shall hear them." The proconsul urged him to persuade the people. "To you," replied Polycarp, "I rather choose to speak, for we are commanded, by the precepts of our faith, to give to princes, and the powers ordained of God, all that due honour and reverence that is not contrary to the laws of religion; but as for these men, I think them not competent judges to whom I should apologise, or give an account of my faith." We know the character of the holy bishop too well to conclude from this answer, that he despised what is called the common herd; and thought them unworthy to bear, or unfit to appreciate, the doctrines of Divine truth: the whole tenor of his life and labours had been a continual proof to the contrary. But what was the multitude which Quadratus would have him to address? A ferocious mob, ravenous for slaughter, and who wished to hear nothing but his dying groans—a crowd to whom a deed of martyrdom was a holiday spectacle, and who would have regarded every word as an interruption to their amusement!

When the Proconsul found that he could not prevail by lenient exhortations and entreaties, he had recourse to sterner arguments. "I have wild beasts at hand," he said, "to which I will throw you, unless you recant." "Command them to be brought," replied the bishop, "for we are unalterably resolved not to change the better for the worse; esteeming it fit and becoming only to turn from vice to virtue." "Nay, then," cried the judge, "since you make so light of the wild beasts, I have a fire that shall tame you, unless you repent." To this Polycarp answered, "You threaten me with a fire that burns for an hour, and is then extinguished; but are ignorant, alas! of the fire of eternal condemnation, and judgment to come, reserved for the wicked in the other world. But wherefore delay? Command whatever punishment you will!" All this was uttered by the venerable bishop with noble slacity, and a cheerful countenance, so that the proconsul was astonished. He saw, however, that there was no hope of recantation, and therefore he ordered the public crier, according to established custom, to proclaim thrice in the midst of the Stadium, "Polycarp has confessed himself a Christian!" At this announcement, which was tantamount to a sentence of death, the whole assembled multitude set up a shout of triumph. "This," they cried, "is the great teacher of Asia, the father of the Christians; this is the destroyer of our gods, who teaches men not to do sacrifice, or worship the deities!" It was not the heathens alone who raised this wild outcry of exultation. Many Jews were also present, who joined in the shout, and aggravated the common fury. When the din had partially subsided, the people applied to Philip the asaruch, one of those priests whose office it was to furnish the public spectacles, and besought him to let loose a lion upon the criminal; but this was refused, as the popular show of exposing men to wild beasts had been already exhibited. Upon this, they clamoured to have Polycarp burnt alive; and their desire was granted. Immediately there was a hurrying to and fro in quest of combustibles, and each was eager to collect and pile up the wood and fagots; but of all the throng, none were so active on this occasion as the Jews, whose intense hatred of Christianity, neither the destruction of their country nor their own persecutions could soften.

While the pile was thus preparing, the aged martyr betook himself to prayer; and when the fire was kindling his prophetic dream was remembered, which told him that he should be burnt alive. He now untied his girdle, laid aside his garments, and attempted to take off his shoes,—offices which, for a long time, had been unusual with him; for such was the reverence in which he was held, that the Christians had been wont to perform for him these menial services, even before he became grey-headed; thinking themselves honoured by such an opportunity of only touching his body. All being in readiness, the officers, according to the usual practice, were about to fasten him to the stake with nails; but he besought them to omit this last preparation. "Let me be as I am," he said; "for He who gives me strength to endure the fire, will also enable me to continue within the pile unmoved, without the aid of your nails." Instead, therefore, of making him fast in the usual way, they only bound him to the stake. It was then that, clasping his hands, which were bound behind him, he poured out his soul to Heaven in the following affecting prayer:—"Thou Father of thy well-beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the knowledge of thee; thou God of angels, and principalities, and all creation, and the whole generation of the just who live in thy presence; I bless thee that thou hast graciously vouchsafed to bring me to this day and hour, that I may receive a portion in the number of thy martyrs, and drink of Christ's cup, for the resurrection both of soul and body in the incorruption of the Holy Spirit. Let me be received this day into that number, being found in thy sight as a sacrifice fair and acceptable, such as thyself hast prepared; so that thou mayest accomplish what thou, the true and faithful God, hast promised and appointed. Wherefore, also, I praise thee for all these things; I bless thee, I glorify thee, through the eternal High Priest, Jesus Christ, thy well-beloved Son; with whom to thyself, and the Holy Ghost, be glory both now and for ever. Amen."

When Polycarp had uttered "Amen," which he did with a loud voice, the officers lighted the pile; a large volume of flame arose, and then a prodigy occurred, which it is perhaps best to describe in the words of the epistle from which we have adopted the foregoing account. "When there arose a great flame, we, who were permitted to see it, and who are preserved alive to relate what then happened, saw a marvellous spectacle. For the fire, composing itself into the form of an arch, or half circle, like the sail of a ship bellying with the wind, enclosed within a vacant space the body of the martyr; which being in the midst of it, appeared not like burnt flesh, but gold or silver refining in a furnace; and presently we smelled a most fragrant odour, as if it had been that of frankincense, or of some other of the precious sweet-scented spices. In short, therefore, when these impious wretches saw that the body could not be consumed by the fire, they ordered the confector* to approach, and transfix it with his sword; which when he had done, there issued forth such a quantity of blood that it extinguished the fire; and the whole multitude wondered, to see so great a difference manifested between the unbelievers and the elect." † What shall we make of this miracle? Cold and calculating readers stumble at it; but shall we be justified in lightly disregarding it? We see no reason to do so. The progress of Christianity during the first and second centuries was itself the greatest of miracles; and when we admit this, the miracle that accompanied the martyrdom of Polycarp is but a minor difficulty. Besides, let the epistle itself be examined, and it will be seen how incompatible with a pious fraud it is, in its style and spirit. It is no wonder that Sculiger was so moved by its perusal; or that he declared, that nothing more affecting could be found in the whole history of the Church.

The rage of persecution was not extinguished with the flames that spared the martyred bishop of Smyrna. The Christians wished to bestow upon his body, thus miraculously preserved, the rites of sepulture; but in this pious purpose they were thwarted by the malignity of the Jews, who instigated the idolaters to represent to Miletas, the father of Herod, that the Christians only wished to have the remains of Polycarp, for the purpose of worshipping him, instead of Christ. What an undesigned satire upon the Christians of a later period! The insinuation of the Jews, and their emissaries, was repudiated by the Christians of Smyrna with horror. "They were ignorant," says the epistle, "that we could never at any time abandon Christ, who suffered for the salvation of all those throughout the world who were to be saved; nor yet worship any other. For we adore him as being the Son of God; but we have a proper affection for the martyrs, as being the disciples and followers of the Lord, because of their surpassing love shown to their own King and Master; whose companions and fellow-disciples we also by all means desire to be." When the centurion, who superintended the execution, perceived the obstinacy and perverseness of the Jews, he ordered the body to be consumed to ashes, in the usual fashion; after which, the Christians gathered the charred bones, and decently interred them. Such was the end of Polycarp, which occurred A. D. 167. At the time of his death he must have reached a very great age; some, indeed, say that he was not less than an hundred and twenty years old. But if we recollect, that in his answer to the proconsul he declared that he had served Christ eighty-six years; and also, that he had conversed with the apostles, and been consecrated as bishop of the very important Church of Smyrna by John himself, who would not have appointed a mere youth to that office; he must have been at least an hundred years old when he sealed his testimony with his blood. How amiable a picture does this give us of one ready to endure and suffer to the uttermost, at an age when the affections are generally so cold, and when the love of ease and safety is so prevalent!

SOVEREIGN MERCY.

ALMIGHTY God, before thy throne

Thy mourning people bend;

'Tis on thy sovereign grace alone

Our humble hopes depend.

Tremendous judgments from thy hand

Thy dreadful power display;

Yet Mercy spares this guilty land,

And still we live to pray.

Great God, and why is Britain spar'd,

Ungrateful as we are?

Oh! make thy awful warnings heard,

While Mercy cries, "Forbear."

What numerous crimes increasing rise

Through this apostate isle!

What land so favoured of the skies,

And yet what land so vile?

Oh! turn us, turn us, mighty Lord,
By thy all-powerful grace;
Then shall our hearts obey thy word,
And humbly seek thy face.

Then, should disease or foes invade,
We shall not sink in fear;
Secure of never-failing aid,
If God, our God, is near.

THE DUTIES OF BELIEVERS AS THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE REV. GEORGE BURNS, D.D.,

Minister of Tweedsmuir, Peebles-shire.

“One is your Master, even Christ.”—MATT. xxiii. 8.

PRIDE, ostentation, and vain-glory, were leading features in the character of the Pharisees; hence theirs was a religion of show and ceremony,—a “form of godliness, denying the power thereof,”—a zeal for external observances, not kindled by a live coal from off the altar of God. Instead, however, of rising in indignation against them, or consigning them over to the hypocrite’s doom, the Teacher who came from God, faithfully denounces their conduct, holds them forth as beacons to warn his disciples of their danger, and makes their example the foundation of a most useful and important admonition. Charging them with a love of “greetings,” or salutations, “in the markets,” and such places of thoroughfare; and of being “called by men, Rabbi, Rabbi,”—a title of honour which they would have continually sounding in their ears,—he says to his disciples, “Be not ye called Rabbi; for one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.” As if he had said,—These arrogant men vainly claim that respect from their fellow-creatures to which they have not the shadow of just pretensions. Beware ye of following their example. Renounce every claim to superior knowledge in spiritual matters. Remember that I, as a Teacher sent from God, have an unalienable right to the title of Master; and that all ye, as my disciples, are placed in the same circumstances, and are equally dependent on me for Divine instruction.

“Whatsoever was written aforetime,” brethren, “was written for our learning.” The words of the text, though originally addressed to the primitive disciples of our Lord, and bearing reference to the conduct of a sect peculiarly notorious in his days, are by no means limited in their application. If attended to with seriousness, they cannot fail to suggest matter of salutary instruction to all in every age who profess to acknowledge Christ as a Prophet sent from heaven, to “guide their feet into the ways of peace.”

It may be necessary to remark, that the word translated Master, literally signifies a Leader, or Guide. Of consequence, the text must be understood as representing Christ bearing to his people the relation of a Teacher to his disciples or scholars, rather than that of a Master to his servants. In this sense, our Lord fully verified his title to the appellation of Master. By his personal instructions, he conducted his disciples to regions of knowledge hitherto undiscovered, or unexplored; and by his bright example, he led the way to the mansions of celestial bliss. His qualifications as a spiritual guide were peculiarly estimable. “Never man spake like this man.” “He taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes.” Without the least hesitation or labour of thought, he illuminated subjects which men of the greatest erudition and penetration had hitherto misapprehended. With that coolness and firmness of mind which ever attend true greatness, he exhibited religion untainted by rabbinical pollution; and, notwithstanding the storm of persecution which the folly of ignorance, or the malice of detected error, frequently excited against him, he persevered to declare freely the whole counsel of the Father. Possessed of such qualifications as these, and supported by all the majesty and authority of a Divine Instructor, he might well claim the attention and submissive veneration of men, and address his professed disciples in the language before us, “One is your Master, even Christ.”

What, then, is our duty, as those who profess to be the genuine disciples of Christ, and to acknowledge him as our only Master?

I. We should receive with submission the instruction which our Master communicates. His instructions are conveyed to us through the medium of his Word. In the sacred page we have the most important of all truths clearly revealed, and the whole compass of our duty to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves, plainly set before us. When employed in reading the Divine Word, or in hearing its truths illustrated and enforced by the ministers of the Gospel, we are to consider ourselves as attending the school of Christ, and listening to his instructions. Hence it is evidently our duty to remember whose disciples we are, and to whom we are bound to give an undivided attention. We are too apt to overlook the authority of Scripture, and too prone to treat it as we would treat the production of a human author. Too high an idea of our own powers is apt to render our minds impervious to the light of truth; and our natural love of ease tends to make us fastidiously repel the most solemn admonitions of Inspiration, as stale and unmeaning declamation. To make the truths of Revelation coalesce with our preconceived opinions, they are frequently so distorted, that, as rays of light are refracted in their passage from a rarer to a denser medium, they seldom reach the heart in their direct and authoritative form. In these cases, Reason is exalted to the honourable station of master, and is made our guide in matters of pure revelation. Is this the legitimate conduct of Christ’s disciples? No; having come from heaven to instruct us, because he knew that we stood in need of an instructor, Jesus is entitled to our highest veneration. His instructions should be embraced with the humblest submission of the understanding and heart; his doctrines should gain access to our minds, whether or not they correspond with our preconceived or favourite opinions; his injunctions should command our unfeigned assent, and our implicit obedience. "It is our part," says a distinguished writer of our own Church, and in our own day, "It is our part to purify our understanding of all its previous conceptions. We must bring a free and unoccupied mind to the exercise. It must not be the pride or the obstinacy of self-formed opinions, or the haughty independence of him who thinks he has reached the manhood of his understanding. We must bring with us the docility of a child, if we want to gain the kingdom of heaven. It must not be a partial; but an entire and unexcepted obedience. There must be no garbling of that which is entire, no darkening of that which is luminous, no softening down of that which is authoritative or severe." "Our business is not to guess, but to learn. After we have established Christianity to be a message from God, upon those historical grounds on which the reason and experience of man entitle him to form his conclusions, nothing remains for us but an unconditional surrender of the mind to the subject of the message. We have a right to sit in judgment over the credentials of Heaven's ambassador; but we have no right to sit in judgment over the information he gives us. We have no right either to refuse or to modify that information till we have accommodated it to our previous conceptions. It is very true, that if the truths which he delivered lay within the field of human observation, he brings himself under the tribunal of our antecedent knowledge. Were he to tell us that the bodies of the planetary system moved in orbits which are purely circular, we would oppose to him the observations and measurements of astronomy. Were he to tell us, that in winter the sun never shone, and that in summer no cloud ever darkened the brilliancy of his career; we would oppose to him the certain remembrance both of ourselves and of our whole neighbourhood. Were he to tell us that we were perfect men, because we were freer from passion, and loved our neighbours as ourselves, we would oppose to him the history of our own lives, and the deeply-seated consciousness of our own inferiority. On all these subjects we can confront him; but when he brings truth from a quarter which no human eye ever explored; when he tells us the mind of the Deity, and brings before us the counsels of that invisible Being whose arm is abroad upon all worlds, and whose views reach to eternity; he is beyond the ken of eye or of telescope, and we must submit to him. We have no more right to sit in judgment over his information than we have to sit in judgment over the information of any other visitor who lights upon our planet from some distant and unknown part of the universe, and tells us what worlds roll in those remote tracks which are beyond the limits of our astronomy, and how the Divinity peoples them with wonders."*

* See Chalmers on the Evidences, pp. 245, 252, 253.

Our own minds, however, are not the only masters who may claim our attention and obedience. Other teachers may, in the spirit of rabbinical usurpation, hold themselves forth as infallible dictators, and may claim our assent to their systems of belief and of practice. In a case of this kind, what is the line of conduct we ought to pursue? Are we to give a cordial reception to their authoritative dogmas? No; this would be to act the part of benighted heathens, who give a blind assent to their oracular responses; it would evince a spirit of pusillanimity and of irrational credulity unworthy of independent agents. "One is our Master, even Christ." Convinced that his Word is all given by Divine inspiration, we must give its doctrines that cordial assent which infallibility alone can command. Other masters must be listened to in complete subordination to him; and their doctrines must gain influence over our minds only in so far as they correspond with those of his Gospel. Whilst the blinded Pharisees gave their unequalled assent to the dictates of their rabbis; whilst the Corinthians were divided into different sects, one saying, "I am of Paul,"—and another, "I am of Apollos,"—and another, "I am of Cephas;" and whilst the deluded members of the Romish Church yield a despicable submission to the authority of an exorbitant priesthood; we should remember that we are the disciples of Christ, and that as such we are bound to take our religious sentiments only from his Word; in opposition to all the unauthorised dictates of men who are weak and fallible as ourselves, and in conformity to his own injunction, to "call no man master on earth."

II. As the disciples of Christ, we should imitate the example which our Master hath set before us.—It is seldom that precept and example are found in perfect unison. Men are generally very ready in enjoining upon others the practice of duties which they themselves habitually neglect. The disciples of Aristotle, Plato, and even of Socrates, possessed not the advantage of beholding the duties to which they were called, transcribed into the lives of those who enjoined them. This privilege was reserved for the disciples of Christ. What their Master taught, he invariably practised; and his whole life was a commentary on his instructions. Would we, then, act the part of his faithful disciples? Let us "imitate him in all his imitable perfections." Let that brilliant track which he has left be the sphere in which we move; and let us swerve neither to the right hand nor to the left. The path is extremely narrow, and on every side are "the ways of death."

Professing Christians are like cities "set on a hill, which cannot be hid." They are "spectacles both to angels and to men." Superior purity is justly expected of those who pretend to have learnt of Jesus. Every eye is upon them, every motion is observed, every action is marked. The tongue of malevolence is barbed to assail them. How, then, are the disciples of Jesus to verify their high pretensions? Undoubtedly it must be by being followers of their Divine Master. His character alone is fit to be a standard; for the sun never beheld another completely free from imperfections. Where is to be found exhibited such a bright pattern of that ardent, rational, and elevated piety,—disinterested and expansive benevolence,—uniform and unbending self-command,—which are the ornaments of the Christian character, as is displayed in the life of Him whose meat and whose drink it was, to do the will of his heavenly Father,—“who went about doing good,”—and who was “holy, harmless, and undefiled, and separate from sinners?” Formed on this model, we cannot fail to exhibit to the world an example eminent for its uniformity, consistency, and dignity,—an example so becoming the professors of Christianity, as to lead men to “take knowledge of us, that we have been with Jesus,” that we are his genuine disciples, and that we acknowledge no other Master.

III. As the disciples of Christ, we should be earnest in promoting the interests of our Master.—The disciple who is indifferent to the cause of his master, gives a decisive proof of the insincerity of his greatest professions. He who is earnest to profit by the instructions of his teacher, will be earnest also that these instructions may be beneficial to others. Whilst, therefore, the disciples of Christ listen with attention to the instructions which their Master communicates, and make his example the object of their constant imitation, they must likewise make the advancement of his glory in the world the grand aim of their most strenuous exertions. On the fidelity of his disciples on earth, the success of the Redeemer's cause materially depends. The circumstances connected with their conduct, which hinder or promote the progress of the Gospel, are numerous and diversified. If they are not animated by an ardent zeal to disseminate those doctrines which they profess to believe, the reality of their faith will be suspected, and “the love of many will wax cold.” Indifference in the cause of Christ is real in the cause of Satan; and the most apparently trifling opportunity of usefulness neglected, may have an important effect on the interests of religion.

The field for the Christian's exertion is wide as the universe of God. Even in the country where we dwell, the opportunities of usefulness which present themselves are beyond calculation. Christian! on every talent and opportunity which you possess let these words be engraven,—“Holiness to the Lord.” Do you hear the name of your Divine Master bandied about by the profane, or introduced into conversation without reverence? Fail not to evince a becoming indignation. Does “gross darkness cover the people,” even when surrounded with the full blaze of the “the Sun of Righteousness?” Labour to impart the instructions of your heavenly Teacher. Does the torrent of immorality threaten to overwhelm in its desolating tide every thing sacred and dear to man? Strain every nerve to arrest its progress.

Does the chilling influence of a lukewarm spirit unnerve the arms of your fellow-disciples? Strive to rekindle the expiring flame. Thus, in this land of Gospel light, calls on your exertion are constantly made,—your Master's service has increasing demands on you.

But cast your eye for a moment around the globe on which you dwell, and what do you behold? Ignorance, superstition, and idolatry, stalking abroad, exulting in their malignant triumph. Yes! there are “dark places of the earth, which are full of the habitations of cruelty;” there are “lands of darkness, and of the shadow of death;” there are six hundred millions, of the eight which compose the inhabitants of our globe, who are ignorant alike of their exalted nature and high destiny, because strangers to the religion of Jesus Christ; there are millions of immortal beings expiring on the burning pile, without one gleam of hope to cheer their departing spirits; and, disciple of Jesus, shall you be a cold and unconcerned spectator of the melancholy spectacle? Do the disciples of earthly teachers labour to propagate the tenets of their masters? And shall the disciples of a heavenly Teacher be indifferent whether his cause flourish or decay? No; if you believe the doctrines of the Gospel to be of everlasting importance, you must be animated by an irresistible zeal to promote their unbounded circulation. If you are the genuine disciples of Christ, his cause must be ever dear to your hearts; and for its advancement, you will account no expense too great, and no exertion too severe. If you have an eye to shed a tear over the distressed; if you have an ear to listen to the sigh of the wretched; if you have a breast to heave for the victim of despair; the universal diffusion of the spirit and power of the Gospel will be the grand object of your existence.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The believer united to Christ.—True union to Christ makes a true Christian: many close with Christ, but it is upon their own terms; they take him, and own him, but not as God offers him. The terms upon which God in the Gospel offers Christ, are that we shall accept of a broken Christ with a broken heart, and yet a whole Christ with a whole heart. A broken Christ with a broken heart, as a witness of our humility; a whole Christ with a whole heart, as a witness of our sincerity. A broken heart respects our sense of sin; a whole Christ includes all his offices; a whole heart includes all our faculties. Christ is a king, priest, and prophet, and all as mediator. Without any one of these offices, the work of salvation could not have been completed. As a priest, he redeems us; as a prophet, he instructs us; as a king, he sanctifies and saves us. Therefore the apostle says, “He is made to us of God wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.” Righteousness and redemption flow from him, as a priest; wisdom, as a prophet; sanctification, as a king.—REV. M. MADE.

Frequently contemplates death.—The first step that man makes in life, is also the first that brings him nearer the tomb; as soon as his eyes open upon the light, the sentence of death is pronounced upon him, and as if it were a crime for him to live, it is sufficient for him to live, that he merits death. This was not our first destiny, the Author of our being had at first animated our clay, with a breath of immortality. He had placed in us a germ of life, which the revolutions of time and of years would neither have weakened nor extinguished. This world was converted with so much order, that it could have defied the duration of ages, and nothing could ever have dissolved, nor altered the harmony of it. Sin alone dried up this Divine principle of life, overthrew this happy order, and armed the inferior creatures against man, and Adam became mortal, as soon as he became a sinner; it is by sin, says the apostle, that death entered into the world. It seems that we have sucked in the entrails of our mothers, a slow poison, with which we come into the world, which makes us languish here below some more others, less, but which invariably ends in death. We die every day, every instant takes from us a portion of our lives, and we advance one step nearer the tomb, the body perishes, all that surrounds us destroys us, force corrupts us, remedies weaken us, the spiritual fire which animates us within, consumes us, and our whole life is but a long and painful agony. Now, in this situation, what image ought to be more familiar to man, than that of death? A criminal condemned to die, wherever he casts his eyes, what can he see, but this sad object, and the more or less that we have to live, is the difference so great, that we should look upon ourselves, as immortal upon the earth? It is true, that the measure of our days is not equal, some attain a peaceful old age, like the heirs of the blessings of the ancient times, they die full of years in the midst of a numerous posterity, others arrested in the middle of their career; see, like King Hezekiah, the portals of the tomb open for them, while in the vigour of manhood, and seek in vain, like him, "for the remainder of their years." And lastly, there are those, who only appear on the earth, and are no more, like the flowers of the field, so they perish. The fatal moment for each one of us, is a secret written in the eternal book, which the Lamb alone may open. We live, then, uncertain of the duration of our years; and this very uncertainty, which ought to render us vigilant to prepare for the approach of the last enemy, is the cause of our vigilance. Going to sleep, we do not think of death, because we do not know where to place it in the different ages of our life. Now I say, my brethren, that of all dispositions this is the most rash and foolish.—I appeal to yourselves, a misfortune which may happen any day, it is more to be despised than another, which threatens you at the end of a certain number of years? What? because your soul may be required of you, at every instant, shall you possess it in peace as if you were never to lose it; because danger is always present, should attention to it be less necessary; and in what other affair, than that of salvation, does uncertainty become a reason for security and negligence? Ah, my brethren, if the hour of our death were marked to each of us—if the kingdom of God came with observation—If, at our birth, we saw written on our foreheads the number of our years, and the fatal day which was to see them finish,—this point of view, fixed and certain, however distant, would occupy all our thoughts, and would not leave us a moment in tranquillity. We should always find the interval before us too short. This image would be ever present to our minds, in spite of ourselves. It would disgust us with every thing—would render pleasure insipid, fortunes indifferent to us. This terrible moment, of which we could never lose sight, would repress our passions, extinguish our hatreds, and disarm our vengeance—it would mingle in all our projects; and our lives, thus determined to a certain number of precise and known days, would only be a preparation for this last moment. Are we wise, my brethren? Death seen from afar, at a sure and marked point, would frighten us—would detach us from the world and from ourselves—would recall us to God—would occupy us incessantly; and this same death, although uncertain, but which may surprise us at every instant, when we least expect it, and when we think of it least, and is perhaps at the door, leaves us tranquil and thoughtless. What do I say? Leaves us all our passions, our criminal attachments—all our love for the world, for pleasures, for fortunes; and because it is not certain that we shall die to-day, we live as if our years were eternal.—MASSILLON. (On Death.)

Behold Christ.—Rise, then, to the true dignity of your nature. Repulse the suggestions of a depraved heart. Adhere to the great revelation of mercy in the Gospel. Behold your heavenly Father reconciled. Behold all his love exhausted in the amazing gift of his own Son to die as a sacrifice for your sins. See around the person of the Son of God, all the truths of revelation concentrated. Behold every part of the divine doctrine casting its glory on the face of Jesus Christ. Let the authentic and credible records of your faith lead you up to the feet of this Saviour incarnate for your sakes, performing his mighty works, promulgating his healing doctrine, fulfilling all the ancient prophecies concerning himself, delivering new and most august predictions, promising his Holy Spirit to his disciples, and ascending up to heaven to carry forward all the designs of redemption, to accomplish all the other prophecies of the divine word, and to close the whole dispensation of his mercy at the final tribunal of his judgment.—REV. D. WILSON.

A warning to the wicked.—How terrific will be the vision of eternity to those who have never sympathized with the wishes, or clung to the promises of the Son of God! What a fatal and dreadful discovery will such make of the nakedness of religion, when the time to clothe themselves with the robe of redemption shall have for ever passed away! Oh! for the warning voice which might plead effectually God's cause in their bosoms, and awaken them from the dream of levity and of self-indulgence! "Awake, awake, thou that sleepest in thy sins, and Christ shall give thee light." Use the present moment. Seek the courage which belongs to wisdom—the courage which human ridicule cannot daunt, nor many inward conflicts destroy. Dare to be on God's side. Pursue, as the great end of life, the salvation of the soul. In a few fleeting years, all that now attracts the attention and beguiles the imagination will disappear. Death will introduce the soul to new scenes, and new modes of existence. Oh! be prepared for such a change. Live in the contemplation of eternity. Take pains to be happy, and make serious efforts to be safe.—REV. G. NOSL.

THE RESPECTIVE OFFICES OF REASON AND OF FAITH IN REGARD TO REVELATION.

BY THE REV. JOHN FAIRBAIRN.

MAN possesses two internal sources of knowledge. There is a certain class of propositions which have only to be stated to be acquiesced in, providing always, of course, that the terms of them are understood. There is another class of propositions, the truth of which is not immediately seen, but whose truth can be brought out very clearly through the intervention of another series of propositions. That two and two make four: that a whole is greater than any of its parts, are propositions of the first mentioned class. That the three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, is a proposition of the latter class. The principle by which the truth of the first of these kinds of propositions is perceived is called Intuition:

the faculty by the exercise of which we are made to perceive the truth of the second kind, is Reason. Intuition is immediate, Reason intermediate; the former gives instantaneous perception, the latter perception not less clear, but more remote. Analysis shows us that the process in the two cases is different. State a proposition of the first class; its truth is instantly perceived, nor can it ever be made clearer by subsequent explanations. State a proposition of the second class, and its truth is not so readily perceived. The phrase "we reason from," when reflected upon, conveys a proper idea of the process by which we arrive at the truth of propositions of the second class. We reason from facts which we do know, to some truth which we did not previously know. Take away the intermediate facts, and the conclusion is taken away with them. Without facts, reason cannot be employed. Were there none it would be suspended.

There are two kinds of belief. These are not different in essence, but in mode. The mind reposes upon both with equal confidence. The one is generally termed belief, the other faith. What we know either by intuition or by reason, we are said to believe; what we, upon the testimony of others, give full credit to, but which we are not in circumstances to know, either by intuition, or by the exercise of pure reason, we are said to have faith in.

In what remains, it is intended to be shown, what the province of Reason is, in regard to Revelation;—and what of Faith.

And first, of Reason. The exercise of Reason, it has been said, always implies the existence of facts. In regard to Revelation, the facts or data, about which Reason is to be employed, are of two kinds, external and internal. The evidences which Revelation produces in attestation of its heavenly origin, are of the first kind. What constitute the facts of the second kind will be mentioned afterwards.

With respect to Revelation, Reason is legitimately employed, when it is employed in the examination of evidence. It is here that Revelation must, in the first instance, rest its claims. As Reason shall decide upon the historical, and other branches of external evidence, we are fully warranted to make up our minds upon the subject, whether that which claims to be a Revelation from Heaven, be so in fact. Reason has been bestowed for purposes the wisest and best. What we know by intuition is comparatively little. It would not carry us respectably through life. Reason is the director and governor of man. It is ever philosophizing upon past experience, and thence evolving maxims for the conduct of life. It is jealous of every novelty. Any other impossibility may as well be attempted, as to carry conclusion in its face—to make that which it contradicts act upon the mind with the force of a principle; to respect, and to confide in that, as a Revelation from Heaven, in the external evidence of which, a manifest imposition is detected.

Care, however, must be taken not to abuse the privilege we have of examining evidence. Here especially, where the subject, upon the evidence of which the investigation proceeds, from its very claims and pretensions (so different from all others) gives us a prejudice against it. We cannot here state the rules by which Reason is to be regulated in the investigation. Such a statement would lead into details; the principle, however, by which it is to be governed can be expressed in a sentence. All that is required is, that prejudice being removed, Reason shall be kept steadily at its law; and the process conducted in the same way, with the same pains-taking, impartiality, and candour, as when merely literary or historical questions are the subjects of inquiry.

But neither does Reason step out of its domain, when it employs itself about the contents of Revelation. To examine these is also its prerogative. And, first of all, when a Revelation is announced, there are two distinct classes of propositions which we naturally expect it to contain,—a class of propositions coinciding with our experience, and a class which does not coincide with our experience. If it contained none of the former, it could be of no use to us. Without the latter, it would be no revelation. We expect, then, to find in it many things which our experience shall confirm; many things of the existence of which we were beforehand perfectly aware,—though of their first causes and their ultimate consequences we may be ignorant. We know that we are sinners. We can gather, it may be, from natural grounds, that something must be done, which we cannot do, before God can be reconciled to us. A Revelation would be expected to affirm the same things, and so far it and our experience are coincident. But farther, we would expect to find it stating precisely in what respect, and to what extent we are sinners; and also, if God can be reconciled to us, and how? Here would be something of which we had no previous experience.

As the contents of Revelation are twofold, so also the office of Reason in regard to these contents is twofold.

We shall here mention what constitutes that which, at the commencement, was called the internal facts or data connected with Revelation. These are our experience. Experience furnishes us with data, which enables us to come to a decision regarding the first of the two classes of propositions into which we have generalized Revelation. If experience bears them out, they must be received. If it gives them a direct and uniform contradiction, they must be rejected. This part of Revelation intends to define the precise condition of our moral nature; and Reason must decide upon its merits, as it would upon the merits of any other system which undertook the same task.

Of this portion of Revelation, Reason is competent to judge. In regard to the truth of the other portion, viz., that which does not come within the range of our experience, we can never arrive at a demonstration. For here we have no direct data,—facts of experience to reason from. But demonstration being impossible, probability may be arrived at. If an accurate examination of our moral nature has borne out that description of it which the former class of propositions embody, the conclusion regarding these propositions at which we come is, that they are true; and this conclusion furnishes (not facts, but, if the term be allowed,) hypothetical data sufficient to warrant this decision in regard to the other part (viz., that which falls not within the sphere of experience), that it may be true. And farther, in such circumstances, all the likelihood lies on the side of its being true.

And keeping this in view, let us now consider, what is the exact office of Reason respecting this department of Revelation which treats of subjects beyond our experience; for it is precisely here that Reason is most apt to step out of its province. Here it would willingly rationalize. It is always ready, by supposing resemblances and running analogies, to reduce the propositions of this transcendental portion into coincidences with human experience. All, then, that it has to do in the matter, is, to observe that nothing axiomatically, or necessarily false, be proposed for our assent. It is necessary that there be nothing of this in what assumes the high title of a Revelation from heaven. It must have difficulties; but no contradictions.

Three things about Revelation which Reason has to examine have been stated. First, the external evidence. Second, the truth of those parts which describe our moral nature. Third, the examination of that part which falls not under experience, to ascertain whether there be any thing predicated in it which involves a contradiction. It has still another duty to perform; for the examination of the sense and meaning of what Revelation teaches, or rather the inquiry into it, is a branch which comes under its cognizance. When Reason has applied itself to these several particulars, it has exhausted its duty; and the result of its inquiries (supposing these to have been satisfactory) is Belief.

A few sentences will suffice to state the province of Faith with regard to Revelation. It is very distinct from that of Reason. The province of Reason lies entirely within the known. It terminates where the unknown commences. It is supreme in its own domain. It has no power, because it has no office, in the domain which lies beyond it. Faith is conversant with the objects of that higher domain. The calling of Faith is, not to inquire but to receive. Suppose, then, that Reason has assented to all of Revelation which lies within its sphere: and how do matters stand? We, in consequence of this, are plainly brought under a necessity to receive every thing it (the Revelation) teaches. There is a demand made upon our faith by every doctrine the record contains. There is to be no comparison, and adjustment between what we preconceived God would do, and what it declares he has done. As soon as the sense of the Revelation is (by a sufficient number of passages, or otherwise satisfactorily) made clear, all our own theories must be abandoned, and our faith reposed upon the new and unanticipated doctrine.

We conclude by remarking, that it is the Theist who rejects Revelation that is unreasonable, not the Christian who receives it. The Theist rejects Revelation, not because flaws, breaks, and faults interrupt, and run through the whole series of historical evidence, and those portions of Revelations which come under the cognizance of Reason. No Theist has yet been able to show that that evidence is not complete, and invulnerable; or that that portion of Revelation which delineates the moral nature of man, is not verified by experience. His objection rests upon another foundation. It rests upon certain preconceptions, and prior speculations. The Christian who believes the Bible to be the Word of God, can defend his faith by the same kind (whatever other kinds of evidence he may have, which, though most satisfactory to a converted man, cannot be made use of in ordinary argument) of evidence which the Theist employs to show that the world is the work of God. The word and the world are both manifestations of the same incomprehensible Being. The one chiefly of his moral nature, the other chiefly of his power. The unbeliever will have every thing in Revelation which he cannot understand to be a contradiction. A contradiction is that which, according to the constitution of our nature, we cannot believe: A difficulty that which we cannot understand. Of the one, we say it cannot be; of the other, it may be. Reason can never acquiesce in the one; to the other it may well bow. In a Revelation from heaven we expect not contradictions; we are unwise, if we look not for difficulties. Do we hope to comprehend all the laws which uphold, and all the details which complicate the moral government of him, the contemplation of whose material universe every where presents insuperable difficulties. When we have solved all these, we may reject whatever problem in the moral world we cannot explain. Reason is not to be advanced to a supremacy in the one department, to which we refuse to advance it in the other. In the moral world, the same necessity lies upon us to be Christians as to be Theists in the material. Theism is as monstrous where there is revelation, as Atheism is where there is none.

A MISSIONARY VISIT TO AITUTAKI, ONE OF THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

THE following beautiful and graphic description is taken from that truly fascinating volume, "Williams' Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands."

After about five days' pleasant sail, we reached Aitutaki. A number of canoes crowded around us, filled with men, every one of whom was anxious to get on board our ship. We had, however, determined not to allow any canoes alongside, until we had seen either the chief or one of the teachers; for, had the natives been hostile, they could easily have captured our small vessel. We received a grateful salutation from every canoe that approached us. Some of the natives cried out, "Good is the word of God: it is now well with Aitutaki! The good word has taken root at Aitutaki!" Finding, however, that we did not repose entire confidence in their assertions, some held up their hats,* others their spelling-books, to convince us of the truth of what they stated. As we approached the settlement, we beheld, from the vessel, a flag-staff with a white flag flying, which satisfied us that the teachers were alive. At length the chief's canoe came alongside, when we learned from Tebati, one of the first who embraced the Gospel, that the marae were burned; that the idols which had escaped the general conflagration were in the possession of the teachers; that the profession of Christianity was general, so much so, indeed, that not a single idolater remained; and that a large chapel was erected, nearly 200 feet in length, plastered, and awaiting my arrival to open it. This news was as delightful as it was unexpected. When the teachers came on board, they not only confirmed all that had been told us, but added, that the Sabbath was regarded as a sacred day, no work of any kind being done on it; that all the people, men, women, and children, attended Divine service; and that family prayer was very general throughout the island. At hearing this good news, joy beamed in every countenance, and gratitude glowed in every heart. We hastened to the shore to be eye-witnesses of what had been effected. The natives crowded around the boat, and having to drag it a considerable distance, they amused and delighted us; for, instead of the unsightly gesticulations and lascivious songs with which I was greeted on my first visit, some were now spelling long words, and others were repeating portions of the catechism, or a prayer; another asking a blessing on his food; and others singing a verse of a hymn; indeed, every one appeared anxious to show what progress he had made in the new religion.

Shortly after landing, we convened a meeting of the chiefs and people, at which we expressed our joy at hearing and seeing that they had demolished their marae, embraced the Gospel of Christ, and erected so fine and large a house for the worship of the one living and true God. We also informed them that we had brought two more teachers, who, with their wives, would reside with them, and to whom they must show kindness. We further intimated, that, if agreeable, we would open the chapel on the following morning, when they must lay aside their heathenish ornaments, wash themselves clean, and clothe themselves decently; to which they consented. We asked them if they had any reply to make. They said No, but wished that we would continue to talk with them, for they were delighted to hear us. After this interview, we went to see the chapel. It was a fine building, from one hundred and eighty to two hundred feet in length, and almost thirty feet wide, wattled and plastered, and built after the model of our chapel at Raiatea. The pulpit was rather singular, both in its size, construction, and appearance, being about two yards square, made of wattling, and plastered with the same materials as the walls of the chapel. I gazed upon the building with wonder and delight. We then went to the teachers' house, and found it to be a neat, well-built cottage, plastered and divided into five rooms. We commended them sincerely for the diligence they had evinced, and for the good example they had thus set to the people. Posts, for houses on a similar plan, were collected in every part of the settlement; many dwellings were already erected, and others were in progress. Bedsteads had been made, and hung with white native cloth, in imitation of those of their teachers. Little did I expect to see so much accomplished in so short a time. Eighteen months ago they were the wildest people I had ever witnessed; now they had become mild and docile, diligent and kind.

Next day, while in the midst of an interesting conversation, our attention was arrested by a ringing sound. This was produced by striking an axe with a stone, which contrivance was their substitute for a bell. The ringer, or rather striker, was followed through the settlement by a number of men and women, decently dressed in white cloth, and, when the congregation was assembled, we entered the spacious chapel. The six teachers, with their wives, together with Papeiha and Vahapata, took their seats in front of the pulpit. As they were all clothed in European dresses, their appearance excited much surprise and interest; indeed, it was to the Aitutakians an ocular demonstration of the beneficial effects of Christianity. My esteemed colleague commenced the service with reading, singing, and prayer. I then preached my first sermon to them, from one of the most delightful texts in the Bible, "God so loved the world," &c.; and I may add, at all the islands I have visited, from that time to the present, my first address has invariably been founded, either upon that passage, or upon 1 Tim. i. 15, "This is a faithful saying," &c. It was, indeed, a delightful sight to behold from one thousand five hundred to two thousand people just emerged from heathenism, of the most uncultivated appearance, some with long beards, others decorated with gaudy ornaments, but all behaving with the greatest decorum, and attending, with glistening eyes and open mouth, to the wonderful story, that "God so loved the world, as to give his only-begotten Son." Many of them, however, were dressed very neatly; and I could not help contrasting their appearance with that which they presented on our first visit. At that time, also, they were constantly killing, and even eating each other, for they were cannibals; but now they were all, with one accord, bending their knees together in the worship of the God of peace and love.

The grandfather of the young king expressed a wish to accompany us to Raiatea; and, as it would afford him an opportunity of witnessing the beneficial effects of the Gospel in the Society Islands, and be a source of much gratification to our own people, we thought it desirable to accede to this request. We were desirous also that the young king, his grandson, might accompany him; for we had an impression that they might be of great service to us at the various heathen islands which we intended to visit.

The natives of Rarotonga also were desired to prepare themselves for their voyage. The Aitutakians endeavoured to dissuade us from going to Rarotonga, by assuring us that the Rarotongans were a most ferocious people, that they were horrid cannibals, and exceedingly treacherous; and they feared, if we went, that we should lose our lives. This was very important, although discouraging information.

Wishing for a few quiet hours to consult respecting our future proceedings, we determined to spend the evening on board the ship. The gods and bundles of gods, which had escaped destruction, thirty-one in number, were carried in triumph to the boat; and we came off to the vessel with the trophies of our bloodless conquest, "rejoicing as one that findeth great spoil."

After much consultation on the subject, we determined, at all events, to go in search of Rarotonga, concluding that the work must have a commencement; that it would, at all times, be attended with danger; that natives of the island had been providentially thrown in our way; that we had come for the purpose of attempting to introduce the Gospel among them; and that, therefore, after taking every precaution which prudence suggested for our own safety, we would commit ourselves to the protection of Him in whose work we were engaged. We concluded, also, to take Papeiha with us, as he would be of great service in our intercourse with the people.

During the time we spent at Aitutaki, many incidents occurred, of which the following is a specimen:—

While walking through the settlement, we saw two grim-looking gods in a more dishonourable situation than they had been wont to occupy, for they were sustaining upon their heads the whole weight of the roof of a cooking-house. Wishing to make them more useful, we offered to purchase them from their former worshipper. He instantly propped up the house, took out the idols, and threw them down; and, while they were prostrate on the ground, he gave them a kick, saying, "There—your reign is at an end."

On receiving two fish-bents, he was highly delighted. What a revolution of sentiment and feeling! A few months before, this man was a deluded worshipper of these senseless stocks!

After giving the teachers such advice and instructions as we deemed necessary, and exhorting the chief and people to abandon all thoughts of war, to treat captains and crews of ships with kindness, to be upright and honest in their dealings with them, to be kind to their teachers, and diligent in attending to their instructions, we took our leave of Aitutaki with feelings of the liveliest and most devout gratitude to God, having derived from the visit great encouragement to proceed in our work.

We traversed the ocean for several days in search of Rarotonga, but without success. During this time I received from Papeiha an interesting detail of the dangers to which the teachers had been exposed, the labours in which they had been engaged, and the circumstances by which the people of Aitutaki had been induced to abandon idolatry. It would occupy too much space to narrate more than a few particulars. On landing, they were led to the marae, and given up formally to the gods; the poor deluded people, little imagining that, in a few short months, by the instrumentality of the very persons they were thus dedicating to them, "their gods would be famished out of the land." Subsequently, war had thrice broken out, and all their property had been stolen from them. But, when I asked Papeiha if they were not discouraged by these frequent wars—"No," he replied, "we knew that all was in the hand of God; and we believed that he would make it a means of overthrowing idolatry in the island."

The first favourable impression appears to have been produced by a tour which the teachers made of the island. They stayed a few days at every district, conversing with the inhabitants, and teaching them the alphabet, and the Lord's Prayer. On reaching the district of Tautu, they held, in the presence of a great assemblage of people, an argument with an old priest, who vociferated, "Te-erui made all lands, he made Aitutaki; and after he had made it he gave it its present form, by moulding it with his hands." The teachers answered that it was not so; that God alone had power to create, and that he made Aitutaki, and every other land. The priest continued vociferating about the greatness of Te-erui, and asserted that he was the first man. The teachers asked him who was Te-erui's parent. He replied, "O Te-tareva." They then inquired of him whence Te-tareva came: he said, "From Avaiki." Wishing to know where Avaiki was; he said, "It is beneath: Te-tareva climbed up from it; and because he arrived at the top he was called by that name;" whereupon the teachers said "This land, then, was made before Te-tareva arrived?" "Most certainly," replied the priest. "Then," continued they, "how can Te-erui be the maker of a land which you say was made before even this parent Te-tareva came up from beneath?" This appeared to perplex the priest, and he was silent. They then addressed the assembled multitude, upon the being of God, affirming, that before any thing was made He only existed, and that He was without beginning, and is without end. From this topic they proceeded to speak of angels, and of one portion of them falling from their original happiness, which was followed by a detailed account of the creation of the world. All this was new to the people; and the interest excited by the announcement appears to have been intense; for, if the slightest noise was made, there was a general cry of "Be still, be still, let us hear." Thus encouraged, the teachers went on to describe the creation of our first parents; their being placed in the garden of Eden; their transgression, with its consequences; and the love of God in giving his dear Son to die a sacrifice for sinful man. On hearing which they exclaimed, with one accord, "Surely this is the truth; ours is all deceit." From that time many began to listen attentively, and to believe what they heard.

The progress of Christianity at Aitutaki appears to have been gradual, the converts at times suffering much from the rage of their heathen countrymen, until the month of December 1822, rather more than a year after my first visit; when two circumstances contributed to the utter overthrow of idolatry in this island. The first was the arrival of the vessel from Raiatea, which we had promised to send. The teachers had told the people that a ship would come to inquire after their welfare, and to bring them presents and information from their friends. This was believed by a few; but the greater part called them "Two logs of drift-wood, washed on shore by the waves of the ocean," and said that no ship would ever come to inquire after them. Her arrival, however, set the matter at rest; and, as the captain showed kindness to the chiefs, and made several of them presents of axes and other useful things, their opposition to the teachers was not a little subdued.

There being no quadrupeds in the island, but a few millions of rats, we sent from Raiatea a number of pigs and goats; with a variety of useful articles, which our people had contributed. The teachers gave the pigs and goats to the king's grandfather, and he, on the following morning, distributed them among the various chiefs of the island. A powerful impression was thus very generally produced in favour of Christianity. "Behold," said the people, "we called these men drift-wood, and they have rich friends, who have sent an English ship to inquire after them, and bring them property, such as we never saw before! We ridiculed and called them liars, and behold, they are men of truth!" A few days after the vessel had sailed, a general wish was expressed by the people to renounce heathenism, and place themselves under Christian instruction. The old grandfather of Tamatoa, however, was firm in his determination to adhere to his heathen superstitions; for being, at the time, in the midst of an idolatrous feast, which was of several weeks' continuance, notwithstanding the wishes of the people, the old chieftain determined to remain at the marae and complete the sacred ceremonies. While yet there, a beloved daughter was taken dangerously ill. The priests were immediately on the alert, presenting numerous offerings, and invoking the gods from morning to evening, day after day, in order to induce them to restore the child to health. The disease, however, increased, and the girl died. The chief was so much affected at the death of his daughter, that he determined at once to abandon the gods who were so ungrateful as to requite his zeal with such manifest unkindness, and therefore sent his son early next morning to set fire to his marae. Two other marae near it caught fire, and were also consumed. From thence the son, enraged with the gods for destroying his sister, proceeded to a large marae, before which the people were presenting their offerings, and attempted to set it on fire; but was prevented by the worshippers, who seized and dragged him away.

By such circumstances does God, in numberless instances, work upon the minds of men. This remark may be illustrated by two important incidents which occurred at Tahiti; one of which resembled that which took place at Aitutaki.

When Pomare, the king of Tahiti, first determined to embrace Christianity, and attempt the introduction of it among his people, before taking any decided steps, he convened a number of powerful and influential chiefs, and stated his wishes to them. Very many made strong objections to the proposed innovation; but Tenania and his wife, who were reigning chiefs of a neighbouring island, cordially approved of the king's proposition; stating, that they themselves had almost come to a determination to burn their god. This feeling had been induced by the death of a beloved and only daughter, who was to inherit their titles and estates; and, as might be expected, was the object in which their affections centred, and on whom their hopes were placed. She was a fine girl, about fifteen or sixteen years of age; and when she was unexpectedly taken ill, every priest of note, far and near, was applied to, and every god propitiated with the most costly offerings which it was in the power of this mighty chief to command.

Still the disease increased, and the child died; and as this happened only a short time before Pomare made his important proposition, Tenania and his wife were well prepared by it to enter most cordially into the king's wishes; for they were bitterly enraged against the gods they had in vain endeavoured to conciliate. Thus Pomare had the influence of a powerful chief on his side, on the very first announcement of his intentions. Tapoa, another chief of equal name, was present at this important consultation. He was a mighty warrior, the Buonaparte of the Tahitian and Society Islands; and, having conquered all the latter, had come to Tahiti, ostensibly to assist Pomare in regaining his ascendancy in that island, but actually to conquer it for himself. Tapoa was a bigoted idolater, and, at the meeting in question, expressed his full determination to oppose, in every possible way, so impious an innovation as the destruction of the gods. Although ill at the time, he removed immediately to Tahiti, for the purpose of making arrangements for the battles he expected to fight; but disease made rapid inroads upon his constitution, and he died very shortly after he had attended the meeting of his brother chieftains. It is the general opinion of intelligent natives to the present day, that, had Tapoa lived, Christianity could not then have been introduced among the people. These events, therefore, show us that, although the age of miracles has ceased, God has ample means of effecting the purposes of his love by the ordinary interpositions of his providence, which are equally mighty to the pulling down of the strongholds of heathen superstition, and in removing obstacles to the progress of his truth.

As at Tahiti, so at Aitutaki, the downfall of idolatry was accelerated by ordinary occurrences; in which, however, a Divine agency was too conspicuous to escape observation. So general and powerful was the impression on the minds of the people at Aitutaki, by the circumstances I have narrated, that, on the Sabbath-day after the death of the chief's daughter, the people of several districts came, cast their idols at the feet of the teachers, and professed themselves worshippers of Jehovah. During the week the rest followed; so that, by the next Sabbath, not a professional idolater remained in the whole island. On the third Sabbath in December, just about fifteen months after the teachers landed on their shores, they had the delightful satisfaction of seeing the whole of the inhabitants convened to worship the one living and true God. Having no house which would contain so great a number of people, they assembled under the shade of a grove of Burritonia and mape, or chestnut-trees, whose interwoven leaves and thick foliage were at intervals penetrated by the rays of the sun, while the cooling breeze from the ocean swept softly among the branches.

At the conclusion of the services of this memorable day, Papeiha requested the people to attend a general meeting which was to be held on the following morning, when subjects of importance would be brought before them. At the appointed hour the whole of the inhabitants of the island assembled, and, after having spoken to them of the immense labour they formerly bestowed in the erection of their maraes in the worship of their false gods, he exhorted them to let their "strength, devotedness, and steadfastness in the service of the true God, far exceed." He then made the two following propositions:—First, "That all the maraes in the island should be burned, and that all the remaining idols should be brought to him, in order that he might forward them to us at Raiatea, that we, with our people, might also rejoice in the triumphs of the Word." The second proposition was, "That they should commence immediately building a house in which to worship Jehovah." To both these proposals the assembled multitude yielded their cordial assent. As soon as the meeting broke up, a general conflagration of the maraes took place; and so complete was the destruction, that on the following morning not a single idol temple remained unmutilated.

The whole population then came in procession, district after district, the chief and priest leading the way, and the people following them, bearing their rejected idols, which they laid at the teachers' feet, and then received from them in return a few copies of the Gospels and elementary books. Thus were the labours of two comparatively weak instruments rendered mighty through God in effecting the utter overthrow of an idolatry, dark, debasing, and sanguinary, which had shrouded the by-gone generations of this verdant little island, and held them bound in its fetters.

They commenced, immediately, the erection of their chapel. The construction of the Aitutaki houses being different from those of Tahiti, and not well adapted for a large building, the teachers had to attend and direct the builders in every particular. When the framework was up, they took a reed's length of thatch and thatched up the ridge pole; and, when the people saw how it was done, they were so diligent in their good work, that in two days the whole roof, two hundred feet in length, was completed.

Having been taught at Raiatea the art of making lime from coral rock, the teachers determined to plaster the chapel, and therefore desired the chiefs to send their people to cut down a large portion of fire-wood; and when this was done, they requested them to send to the sea for a quantity of coral rock; which was brought to the shore, and piled upon the wood. The natives did as they were desired, but could not imagine what all this singular process of preparation was to effect. At length, the teachers requested them to set light to the fire-wood; and as soon as it began to blaze, they could contain themselves no longer, but commenced shouting, "O these foreigners, they are roasting stones! they are roasting stones! Come, hurricane, and blow down our bananas and our bread-fruit; we shall never suffer from famine again, these foreigners are teaching us to roast stones." The missionaries told them to wait patiently, and they would see the result. At daylight the following morning they hastened to the spot, and, to their utter astonishment, the burnt coral was reduced to a beautiful powder; and they were so surprised and delighted at its softness and whiteness, that they actually white-washed their hats and native garments, and strutted about the settlement admiring each other exceedingly. A space in the chapel being wanted, the teachers mixed up a portion of the "roasted stone" with some sand, and plastered it on the space which had been prepared, taking care to cover it up with mats, and to send the people away, lest, prompted by their curiosity, they should scratch it down before it became hard. Early on the next morning they all hastened to see this wonderful sight. The chiefs and common people, men, women, and children, hurried to the spot; and, when the covering was removed, a sheet of beautifully white plastering was presented to their astonished view. All pressed forward to examine it; some smelling it, some scratching it, whilst others took stones and struck it, exclaiming, as they retired, "Wonderful, wonderful! The very stones in the sea, and the sand on the shore, become good property, in the hands of those who worship the true God, and regard his good word." Thus singular and beneficial was the impression produced by the introduction of useful arts among this people.

THE UNION WHICH SUBSISTS BETWEEN ALL INTELLIGENT AND MORAL BEINGS IN THE UNIVERSE.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

THERE is an intermediate link in the chain which we suppose to connect the Source of all intelligence and purity with the lowest of his intelligent and moral creatures,—there is an intermediate link of this chain which to human reason is shrouded in impenetrable mystery. The region which is the habitation of the angelic hosts is far beyond the reach of human perception; but Revelation, which hath been given as a "light to our feet, and a lamp to our path," hath shed a dim, impalpable gleam over that department, also, of the moral universe. It shadows out to us beings of lofty intelligence, and of high moral power, enwrapped in glorious majesty and unutterable felicity. These pure intelligences, encircling the throne, experience the ceaseless kindness and the wondrous love of Jehovah; and they tune their harps to celebrate his praise. That Infinite Purity must delight in contemplating the emanation of itself, is undeniable: and what a reciprocity of feeling, then, must subsist between the angelic hosts and the Great Original of all their purity! For us, who are so far inferior to the "ministers of God, who do his pleasure," it is difficult to contemplate their purity as distinguished from the immaculate holiness of the Divine nature. It was said by Copernicus, and the truth of his observation has since been confirmed, that to the eye of an observer situated in one of the fixed stars, the distance between the earth and the sun, vast as we know it to be, would dwindle to an insensible point: so we, far removed in point of purity even from the angelic hosts, are liable so far to forget their infinite inferiority to the Source of all perfection, as to imagine the moral excellencies of both equally remote from us. That the principle of benevolence or love is exercised by these holy beings towards Him who is the centre of all their enjoyment, it were inconsistent with their alleged purity to deny; but with what feelings do they contemplate a world which has thrown off allegiance to its God? We might have supposed, perhaps, that their love to God would have prompted them to look with abhorrence upon creatures who had dared to wage war against the Omnipotence of heaven; Scripture, however, represents them as casting an eye of most intense interest upon this rebellious province of God's moral empire. How often, in the early ages of the world, did they wing their way to this distant planet, on errands of mercy from the throne of the Eternal! Theirs was the exalted privilege of first announcing to our guilty world the glorious advent of the Son of God; and theirs is still the delightful employment of ministering to those who shall be heirs of salvation. Extended, in the range of their conceptions, far beyond the narrow limits of the human intellect, they view all the objects and events of the physical universe as subordinate to the development of moral dispositions, and feelings, and affections, in the creature. Their happiness is augmented, not by the contemplation of those objects which engross the attention and the interest of degenerate man; but "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." No sooner has the first spiritual desire been awakened in the breast of even the humblest and the most obscure of the human family, than heaven's lofty arches ring with their sublimest notes of praise. The creation of a world where moral order, and beauty, and harmony prevail, they view as much less illustrative of the Divine glory than the recovery of one lost soul to the favour and the image of its God. To man's perverted judgment, the salvation of a sinner is an object of minor, to them, of paramount, importance. In the exercise of their sublime benevolence, they contemplate with joy the revenue of glory which accrues from it to the Creator, and the exalted and ever-during benefits which it confers upon the creature; and the moment that the first sincere prayer ascends from even the most degraded inmate of a Caffrarian kraal to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, these beings of pure and universal benevolence swell a louder and still louder note of praise "to Him who sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever." "And I beheld," says John, in his Apocalyptic vision, "And I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying, with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever."

The existence, therefore, of disinterested benevolence in its sublimest exercise among the angelic hosts is undeniable; but, is there within the limits of the moral universe a single department, where, whether from reason or revelation, we are authorized in affirming, that no such principle can be traced? We know that the apparently capricious wanderings of comets was long supposed to form a singular exception to the universality of the law of gravitation; but, by a more extensive acquaintance with the peculiar orbits which these bodies describe, the alleged exception was reduced under the general law. To the great regulating principle of the moral universe, also, there is a remarkable exception. In one dark and dismal region of the universe, revelation discovers to our view a mighty host of apostate angels, from whose accursed dwellings benevolence hath for ever fled. Theirs is the awful doom, to endure the unmitigated torment of God's righteous indignation; and ever and anon does the maddening thought recur to these infernal spirits, that in the wide expanse of the universe there exists not a single being whom they love, and none by whom they are loved. Into their cheerless prisons the faintest ray of hope can never enter, for they have excluded themselves from all participation in the Divine benevolence; and their foul and fiendish malignity renders them the objects of horror, not of pity, to all the other beings in the universe. Instead of being related to, they stand disjoined from all the other creatures of God; and, gratifying only their own hellish propensities, they are not in a condition adapted either to experience from others, or to exercise of themselves, the principle of pure benevolence. Like a body which has been projected beyond the sphere of the earth's attraction, and, therefore, no longer gravitates to the same centre as before, these apostate angels have cast themselves beyond the operation of that law of benevolence, to which they were of old subjected, in all its purity, and in all its power. All the beings in the universe, possessing a sound moral constitution, are connected in one vast community, which these malignant spirits would in vain attempt to dissolve. In this dark and desolate territory which we inhabit, these deceitful machinations have been too successful; but no sooner was the creature, by the stratagems of the arch-apostate enemy of souls, alienated and estranged from his great Creator, than the glorious scheme was announced, by which Jehovah proposed to defeat the machinations of the Evil One, and to bring men nigh unto himself by the blood of his Son. In the gradual development of this mighty plan, which forms the sum and substance of all written revelation, we are presented with innumerable exhibitions of the Divine benevolence; which, when brought to bear with efficacy on the mind of man, are calculated, under the blessing of the Spirit, to effect the renovation of his whole nature; and no sooner has the mind been enlightened to a cordial belief of the truth, and the heart awakened to the experience of its power, than a principle of benevolence is called into exercise. Many are the counterfeit imitations which are every day to be met with in the world, approximating more or less in resemblance to this heaven-born affection; but pure and lovely as its Great Original, it knows no dwelling upon earth, save in the bosom of the pious and humble disciple of that religion, which not only commands, but inwardly constrains us, to do good to all men as we have opportunity.

Wherever we look around us in the world, we recognise the members of that great family to which we belong all bearing more or less the impress of that melancholy change which sin hath wrought upon the soul. The whole world we inhabit is lying in wickedness; all is barrenness and desolation. The curse of God hath gone over the length and the breadth of our earth, and little or nothing remains of that moral order and beauty which once characterized this fair portion of the universe. It is cursed in its productions, for briars and thorns must it bear; it is cursed in its inhabitants, for cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them; it is cursed, in short, in its every circumstance and relation. The laws and the processes of nature, it is true, still preserve their wonted regularity; the sun still arises, and the rain descends, but man, ungrateful man, recognises not the God from whom they come. This scene of moral desolation and deformity is deeply affecting to the heart of every true Christian. It reminds him that he too was once a child of wrath, even as others, and while the grateful thanksgiving ascends to heaven for the distinguishing mercy of his reconciled Father, his earnest desire and prayer for the whole human race, whom he now recognises to be his brethren, is, that they all may be saved.

The accomplishment of this magnificent design, — the salvation of a lost world, — calls forth the unwearied exertions and the persevering prayers of all who are actuated by the pure benevolence of the Gospel. To preach among the heathen the unsearchable riches of Christ is the delightful employment reserved for those men of God who count not their lives dear unto themselves, so that they may win souls to Christ, and extend the boundaries of his kingdom. It is impossible to deny our mead of praise to a Clarkson and a Howard; but what shall we say of those nobler, and purer, and more devoted benefactors of our species, the Elliots, and Brainerds, and Martyns of the missionary cause? They require not the approbation of man,—their reward is on high; but we cannot refrain from saying, that we know not finer exemplifications than those of the pure, and lofty, and powerful benevolence of the Christian faith. Under its gracious influence, their minds were habitually elevated to the contemplation of objects the most sublime and ennobling,—their hearts were purified from all that is earthly and grovelling,—and their whole nature dedicated to the service and glory of that benevolent and merciful God who hath framed

"Mankind to be one mighty brotherhood, Himself our Father, and the world our home."

LINES.

BY W. H. MADDEN, M.D.

WHERE'er I am, where'er I roam,
In pleasure or in pain;
Should Afric desert be my home,
Or India's scorching plain;
Should it be mine to dwell alone,
In solitude afar,
Where howling winds together moan,
And wage eternal war;
Yet teach me, Lord, with stedfast eye,
To mark thy gracious presence nigh,
And say,—“Thy will be done.”

Should Sickness, with his with'ring dart,
And pestilential breath,
Curdle the life-blood of my heart,
And herald coming death;
When Friendship fails, and Love in vain,
With eager, anxious care,
Attempts to smooth my bed of pain,
And fain my pang would share;
Oh! teach me still, with stedfast eye,
To mark thy gracious presence nigh,
And say,—“Thy will be done.”

THE DAY OF THE MEN.

From a periodical work published a short time ago in England, we have selected the following vivid and accurate description of a Northern peculiarity which will interest our readers:—

The day of the men—la nan daorna, as it is called in the Gaelic language, is not an observance which is enjoined by the formulary of the Scottish Kirk; neither is it common to Scotland, or, indeed, known at all in the more populous or wealthy parts of the country; it is, in a great measure, confined to the counties of Inverness, and Ross, and Cromarty, which is spotted like a piece of patchwork over the latter. Easter Ross, which is in great part both fertile and populous, may be considered as its head-quarters, and it has probably spread thence into all the districts which it has penetrated.

The people of Easter Ross have long been remarkable for strong attachment to the Presbyterian doctrines, sturdy disputants upon doctrinal points, and equally given to the polemics and the practical exercises of their religion. One cause is usually assigned for this, namely, the number of Monroes, and other clansmen from that part of the country, who joined the armies of Gustavus of Sweden, the lion of the north, when he was battling in Germany, as the champion of the Reformation. A good many of these found their way back to their native country, and are understood to have imported a spirit of zeal on religious subjects, which has not abated even at the present day. That such is the fact is probable; but be it as it may, the district to which we have alluded is the one in which the Day of the Men is considered as a very important and highly essential part of the sacred observances of the year.

Every one who knows any thing about the practices of the Kirk of Scotland, must be aware that the sacrament of the Supper is dispensed only once a year in country parishes, and rarely more than twice in towns: The time for dispensing it has reference to nothing commemorated in the calendar, but is chosen when the weather is most likely to be good, and the labours of the people are not pressing. In towns these are less attended to, but in the country the celebration never takes place in seedtime or in harvest, but generally during that portion of the summer when nature is bringing forward the fruits of the earth with the least assistance of human labour. At this particular season the weather is generally settled, the nights are short, and, in the northern parts, there is pretty bright twilight all night long. These circumstances enable parties who are so inclined, to travel twenty or thirty miles, or even more, in order to be present at the sacrament. Thus there are very often gatherings of the people far more numerous than one would suppose, in a country so thinly peopled in proportion to its extent. In the south, the gatherings are not generally so numerous; but they are considerable in some places.

The regulations of the Kirk enjoin public worship for four days: First, Upon the Thursday, which is considered to be a day of fasting and humiliation, ordered to be kept as a Sabbath, and having the same extent and form of service as on the Lord's day; Secondly, The Saturday, which is considered as a day of preparation, but not kept as a Sabbath. The service is not begun till after the noon of this day, and the people are not enjoined to abstain from their ordinary labours any longer than the service lasts. Thirdly, The Sabbath, which is the day of communicating, and by far the most solemn day of the whole; and, fourthly, The Monday, which is a day of thanksgiving, with morning services only, after which the people are supposed to return to their ordinary employments, or to meet with their friends, and commune respecting what they have heard. It will be seen that, in this arrangement, Friday is a blank day, upon which there is no public worship, though, in some parishes, the young, and especially those who are to communicate for the first time, assemble in the church, and are examined as to their religious knowledge, and admonished with respect to their general, and especially their religious, conduct. This, however, is not very common; and as the Friday is one day only, and regular employment cannot be very profitably resumed upon it, some spend it in idleness, and some, it is to be feared, in dissipation.

Friday is “the day of the men” in all parts of the country where such a day is kept, and it is a day of very peculiar and often very interesting character. It is usually the longest single sederunt on the whole occasion; and there is often a vast deal of knowledge of the Scriptures and acumen displayed at it: The men consist not only of the seniors of the parish, but of many who come from a distance to take a part in the business of the day. These consist of catechists, or men who are appointed to look after the religious knowledge of districts where the parish is too extensive for being perambulated by the minister, or when the state of the season renders such perambulation unnecessary; and along with them there are many others who are eminent for their religious knowledge.

It sometimes happens that these men are unable to read, or even to speak the English language; but they all have a great deal of theological knowledge, and their acuteness shows that they are not men of mere rote, but that they have thought deeply upon all the subjects upon which they speak. The greater number of them, too, speak very fluently, more especially those who speak in Gaelic; and they can pray a long time extempore, without pause or hesitation. The Gaelic is well adapted for this purpose, because its whole structure is poetical, and many of its figures are lofty and impressive. It also harmonizes well with the phraseology of the Bible, with which it is copiously mixed. It may be that some of these men attend such meetings, partly through desire of showing off their knowledge, for it is difficult to find any human exhibition without some of the leaven of human vanity in it; but there is an earnestness and sincerity of manner about a vast majority of them which no hypocrite could possibly assume. Our present business, however, is description, and not criticism, though we feel quite sure that the men would have little to fear from the latter.

They meet in the church at rather an early hour on the Friday, and many are in waiting before the doors are open; and when this takes place, the church is soon filled by a miscellaneous assemblage of speakers and hearers. The parish minister himself presides, but he occupies the preacher's desk and not the pulpit; and those ministers who are to assist him on the other days, usually mingle with the congregation, apart from each other, as is also the case with the principal speakers among the men. A psalm and prayer always begin the day, and with the latter the official duty of the minister closes, and the men take up their subjects state their opinions, their doubts, and their perplexities; and always, now and then, interpose a prayer. The subjects are for the most part doctrinal, often involving the most nice and intricate points; but it is astonishing with what acumen the more experienced manage these. There are very many professional ministers, where religious discussions are not common, and who consequently get every thing their own way without contradiction, who would find "the men" most formidable antagonists. This, indeed, sometimes happens to the minister of a parish, especially if he is a young one, and has been appointed contrary to the wishes of his people. This occasionally happens, and when it does, "the men," who generally have a very strong feeling for each other, muster from all quarters, ready prepared on all the difficult points, and work him without mercy. They are enabled to do this in consequence of the position which he occupies on the occasion. We have mentioned that he presides, and that after he has read the psalm, and offered up the prayer in the morning, his formal duty is at an end, until a prayer and psalm again close the day. But although, during the intermediate part, the employment "of the men" is out of his direction, he is by no means out of the power of "the men." Whenever a difficulty arises which they cannot solve, or do not choose to solve, an appeal lies to the parish minister, who is understood to be both able and willing to help them out of every difficulty: if he is disliked, as we have stated, they weigh him in the balance to the nicest scruple; and he must be an acute man indeed, if he is not found wanting in some particulars. If he is a favourite they let him alone, and discuss their knotty points with each other; though, in these cases, he often strikes in of his own accord, and gently brings them back when they are getting beyond their depth.

To make a figure on "the day of the men" is a matter of considerable emulation; and therefore there are always a certain number of novices, catechumens, who make their appearance on every such occasion. These, generally speaking, have been under the training of some catechist, and have been tutored on the subjects of their first displays. They usually begin in a louder tone than the men of experience, but they fall off by degrees, and many of them break down so completely as to be incapable of rallying again: these are cases in which the parish minister is understood to interfere, and give encouragement and assistance; and if this fail, some one stands up to pray, and after prayer a new subject is taken up by a new speaker.

This may seem a singular mode of procedure to those who are not accustomed to it, or the character of the people among whom it obtains; but, notwithstanding this, it is a scene of much instruction, and appears to have no small influence in preserving the zeal for religion, and the consequent uprightness of conduct, for which those shrewd, but sober and simple-minded people are so very remarkable. Scattered widely apart from each, cut off from intercourse for a considerable portion of the year, strangers to what the inhabitants of more wealthy places call the comforts of life, and without any amusements within their reach, religion is to them all in all. It is blended with their every day occupations; it is their resource in the hours of relaxation; it is their consolation under privation and pain; and it is their hope and stay on the bed of death: and, we may add, that "the day of the men" tends much to keep it alive.

LIFE OF JUSTIN MARTYR.

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN APOLOGIST.

JUSTIN, who has been so honourably distinguished by the title of Martyr, which was given to him as a surname, was born at Neapolis, a distinguished city of Palestine, supposed to have been the ancient Sichem. His father, whose name was Priscus, was a Gentile; and it is supposed, with some probability, that he belonged to that Greek colony which had been settled in Samaria. After having been carefully educated in Greek literature and philosophy, Justin betook himself to travel, in order to perfect his studies; and in prosecution of this design, he came to Alexandria, the chief emporium not only of learning, but religious and philosophical investigation.

The youthful traveller had been always distinguished by an ardent and inquiring spirit, and the intellectual character of the Egyptian capital was well qualified to excite such a temper to the utmost. Next to the inhabitants of ancient Athens, the Alexandrians, perhaps, occupied the first rank in the characteristics of mental excitement and investigation: their city was crowded with Mystagogues and Magians, wise men and pretenders, empirics in every science, priests of every creed, and philosophers of every system. This profusion, which would have sated a weaker intellect, only strengthened the resolution of Justin to discover what was divine truth, and he resolved to search for it carefully and patiently amidst this immense diversity. The account which he has himself delivered of this important part of his career is natural, and interesting in the extreme. His first application was to a Stoic, one of that haughty sect who pretended to be superior to all human weakness, as well as to be possessed of all excellence and wisdom; but he found that he could learn nothing from this preceptor concerning the great object of his inquiries, viz., the nature and character of God. Nay, the teacher even told him, in answer to his anxious inquiries, that such knowledge was by no means necessary. Justin then betook himself to another guide, who was of the school of the Peripatetics, and who thought himself a person of no ordinary acumen; but the young inquirer had not been with this follower of Aristotle many days, when the latter began to propound some very close questions upon the subject of pecuniary remuneration. A Pythagorean was next applied to; but this sage rebuffed his applicant with the following characteristic questions: "Ha! are you skilled in music, astronomy, and geometry? or do you suppose you can understand any thing of those matters that conduce to the soul's weal, unless you first know those sciences that detach the mind from sensual objects, and fit it to perceive what is intelligible, so that it may settle upon the contemplation of what is fair and good?" After eloquent laudations upon these steps to divine truth, the Pythagorean dismissed his applicant, who despaired of ever becoming a Musician, Geometrician, and Astronomer. But, determined still to persevere as long as a hope remained, Justin betook himself to the Platonists; and among these men he thought that divine truth had taken up her abode. He now devoted himself to the study of their peculiar tenets; and, amidst his contemplations upon the seductive mysticisms of Plato, he felt as if he were raised, as upon wings, above the grossness of materialism, and would even be transported into the visible presence of divinity. In this mood he shunned society, and delighted to be alone, that he might meditate and dream undisturbed. But the period of his awakening was at hand. As he was walking near the sea, absorbed in lonely contemplation, he was met by an aged man of venerable appearance, who powerfully arrested his attention. "Dost thou know me?" said the senior, gently; and when Justin replied that he did not, the stranger rejoined, "Why, then, do you regard me so earnestly?" "I wonder," said the other, "to see you here alone with me, for I had no thought to see any man in this place." A friendly conversation soon led to the cause of Justin's solitary wanderings upon the sea-shore, and to a discussion upon philosophy in general, in which Justin asserted the superiority of Platonism in teaching the way of happiness, and the manner in which we should know and see God. But the old man soon unfolded a wisdom transcending that of Plato. After refuting these rash assertions, and showing the futilities of the heathen sages, he adverted to the Hebrew Prophets. He told his wondering auditor, that, long before the time of these philosophers, there had existed certain blessed and holy men, lovers of God, and divinely inspired, who alone understood the truth, and had revealed it to the world in their writings. After this, he afforded certain glimpses of the character and evidences of Christianity, such as were calculated to interest an inquiring mind, and then concluded with these impressive words:—"Above all things, pray that the gates of light may be opened to thee; for these things cannot be perceived and understood by any one, unless God and Christ enable him to know them." The long conversation having been ended, the stranger went away, and Justin never saw him afterwards. "But a fire," he adds, "was immediately kindled in my soul, so that I was filled with love for the Prophets and those men who are the friends of Christ, and are beloved of him; and after revolving in my mind the discussion, I found that this was the only certain and practical philosophy."

Such was the manner in which the accomplished mind of Justin received the knowledge of divine truth, and did homage to its authority. He has given us no farther detail of his conversion; but that it was complete, we know by its fruits. The precise period when the event took place cannot now be ascertained; but, from a passage in Eusebius, we may conclude, that it occurred during the reign of Adrian. As may easily be imagined, his secession from Gentile studies occasioned no little surprise, and his contemporaries were unable to account for the change. But he did not keep them long in suspense. Earnestly desirous that others should participate in the heavenly treasure he had discovered, he wrote an oration to the Greeks, in which he exposed to them the errors of their systems, and expounded the truth, while he revealed to them the causes of his altered sentiments. "Do not imagine, ye Greeks," he thus addresses them, "that I have rashly, and without thought, and deliberation, abandoned the rites of your faith. For indeed, I could find in it nothing sacred, and worthy of the Divine acceptance. The doctrines among you, as your poets have framed them, are monuments of nothing but madness and licentiousness; and as soon as a man addresses himself even to the most learned among you for instruction, he is entangled in a thousand difficulties, and involved in utter confusion." We have seen the justice of this bold accusation in the history of his own career. After a farther exposure of the futilities of Paganism, he concludes with this affectionate exhortation:—"Come hither now, ye Greeks, and partake of a most matchless wisdom: be instructed in a divine religion, and acquaint yourselves with an immortal king. Become as I am, for I was sometime as you are. Such were the arguments that prevailed with me; such was the efficacy and divinity of the doctrine; a doctrine that frees the soul from corrupt and pestilential affections; banishes that lust, the source of all evil, from which proceed enmities, strifes, envy, emulations, anger, and such other evil passions; and having driven them out, enables the mind to enjoy delightful calmness and tranquillity. The soul, being thus freed from the evil yoke that lay upon its neck, aspires and mounts upward to its Creator; as it is meet that it should return to that source from which it derived its existence."

Although Justin had renounced the vain spirit of philosophy, he did not abandon the exteriors of the philosopher; but, clothed in the pallium, or cloak, by which the sages of the period were distinguished, he went about advocating the cause, and illustrating the doctrines, of Christianity. Such, also, was becoming a usual practice in the Church, among those who had been reclaimed from philosophy to divine truth. But was such a compromise right, or even expedient? From the history of the second and third centuries of the Church, we are warranted in answering in the negative. This species of tolerant and cloaked Christianity, however, instead of being a dress of conciliation, as it was intended to be, became a badge of popular contempt; and when a Christian passed by, so arrayed, the crowd were wont to exclaim in derision, "There goes a Greek impostor!" With the garb also, it was natural to retain some portion of the spirit and principles of philosophy; and thus the purity of Christian doctrine was gradually leavened, until the whole mass was at last pervaded with corruption. In the results of the labours of such men, so highly endowed as they were, and so sincerely devoted to the truth, what an impressive comment we read of the necessity of becoming "as little children"—of desiring the sincere milk of the word "as new-born babes"—new-born, naked, helpless! It appears that Justin could never wholly divest himself of that philosophizing spirit, which is always so eager to intrude into the illustration of Christian doctrines; and hence the unfortunate phraseology which he sometimes uses in speaking of the Logos, as having been manifested to the heathens, and the semi-Christianity of such men as Socrates and Heraclitus. Had he but given his literary predilections and his Platonism wholly to the winds when he became a convert, his life, in all probability, would have exhibited a more harmonious picture of Christian excellence, and his writings a more persuasive apology for the Christian faith.

From this ungrateful topic we gladly pass to the active and devoted labours of Justin in the service of the sacred cause. He came to Rome, and took up his permanent dwelling upon the Viminal Mount; his zeal and active talents were soon in requisition; and he devoted himself with ardour to his great vocation of refuting error, and extending the cause of Christianity. Among the heresies which then prevailed, and which he assailed with powerful arguments, that of Marcion was particularly distinguished. This Heresiarch, the son of the Bishop of Pontus, having forfeited all hope of obtaining influence in the Christian Church, from which he was ejected, in consequence of a scandalous crime, repaired to the Roman capital; and having adopted the Gnostic heresy for his groundwork, he raised upon it a system of error, which he proceeded to propagate with great success. Justin wrote a work against the dogmas of this apostate, and ably exposed and refuted them. But the labour by which he was more highly distinguished was his celebrated Apology for the Christians; a work urgently required, in consequence of the obloquy with which they were every where assailed. It was addressed to the Emperor Antoninus the Pious, and in allusion to the gross misrepresentations that were generally received, he offers the following refutation, than which nothing could be more conclusive. "As for myself, while I was still in subjection to the Platonic institutions, when I heard the Christians vilified and reproached, and yet saw them hurrying fearlessly to death, and venturing upon all that is most dreadful and startling to human nature, I concluded with myself, that it was impossible that such men could wallow in sin, and be enslaved with sensual indulgences. For what man, the slave of lust and intemperance, and that looks upon the eating of human flesh as a luxury, can cheerfully welcome death, which he knows must terminate all his pleasures and delights? Would he not rather endeavour, by all means, to prolong his life as much as possible; and delude his adversaries, and conceal himself from the magistrates, rather than voluntarily betray, and offer himself to immediate execution?" It was not enough, however, for Justin simply to exonerate his brethren from such monstrous charges. He also adverted to the manifest purity of their lives, the beneficial effects of their example, and the divine nature of that faith, for which they so lived and died.

It is gratifying to add, that this cogent Apology was not without success. Amidst the uproar excited against Asiatic Christians, it was alleged that they were the cause of those calamitous earthquakes which had occurred in several places; and in consequence of this charge the popular fury was excited, and the statutes of former emperors against the worshippers of Christ were revived, and enforced with severity. This was soon stopped by the following proclamation of Antoninus, in which, by the way, the sneer of the philosopher is curiously blended with the provident care of the magistrate:—"I should have thought, indeed, that the gods themselves would take care that this kind of men shall not escape; for it is more their concern than yours, to punish those who will not worship them. You do but confirm these persons the more in their own sentiments and opinions, when you harass them, accuse them of atheism, and bring other charges against them which you are unable to prove. It indeed is convenient for them to be accused, so that they may give themselves to death: in this way, they conquer you by throwing away their lives, rather than comply with your wishes. As for the earthquakes which have already happened, or may yet happen, it has seemed advisable to us to admonish you whose minds are ready to despond upon such accidents, to compare the circumstances of your case with that of the Christians. They, at such a period, are far more secure and confident in their God; while you, appearing to disown God, neglect both the rites of other gods and the religion of that Deity; nay, even persecute and pursue to death those people who worship him. About these men, several governors of provinces wrote to my father of most sacred memory; to which he returned for answer, that no molestation was to be offered them, unless they attempted something against the State of the Roman Empire. Many, also, have written letters to me upon the subject, to whom I answered according to the tenor of my father's enactment. Now, if any one shall still persevere to molest them merely because they are Christians, let the indicted person be discharged, although a Christian, and let the informer himself undergo the punishment."

Not long after he had finished his first Apology for the Christians, Justin left Rome, and visited the East; and while he was at Ephesus, he held that long dialogue with Trypho, a Jew, the substance of which formed the subject of another of his works. This masterly production (from which our account of his conversion has been taken) contains a defence of Christianity against the subtle and malignant misrepresentations of the Jews. The condition of this people at the present period was a mournful illustration of their intense and abiding hatred to the cause of Christ. In the preceding reign, being instigated by a false Messiah, named Barchochebas, they rose in the East against the Romans, and accompanied their rebellion with such atrocities as could only be equalled in their punishment.

After being conquered, they were subjected to a massacre that threatened to extirpate them from the face of the earth. They were commanded never to enter Jerusalem, or even to look at the beloved city of their fathers; and to make the prohibition more effectual, as well as to embitter their sufferings by insult, Adrian caused a temple of Jupiter to be erected on Calvary, and images of swine to be engraven on the city gates. Thus was the bruised reed broken,—the expatriated people more completely doomed to hopeless banishment and wandering. But murder or suffer as they might, the bitterness with which they regarded Rome, their oppressor, was light, compared with their hatred to Christianity. It was upon this that the whole energy of their fierce spirits was concentrated, and no calumny could be too bitter with which to vilify and endanger a cause which seemed to rise on their ruin. Trypho, too, was no mere logical man of straw, introduced into the argument for the purpose of being overthrown; but a man of flesh and blood, and learning and talent, and Jewish feeling to boot,—one who was no grantor of propositions, and who stoutly waged the controversy, inch by inch, for the space of two days. But Justin triumphantly refuted the calumnies of the Jewish nation against the Christians, demonstrated the effete nature of Judaism itself, and showed the truth and superiority of that faith which the Jews were so accustomed to hate and revile. At the close of the contest, Trypho expressed himself highly gratified with the course of argument, declaring that he found more in it than he could have anticipated; and expressed a wish that he could enjoy such an opportunity more frequently, as it would conduce more effectually to his understanding the Scriptures; he also begged, in conclusion, that he might enjoy the friendship of his opponent, in whatever part of the world he might reside.

After Justin had returned to Rome, he resumed his wonted advocacy of the truth, and soon saw occasion to write a second Apology for Christians, which he addressed to Antoninus the Philosopher, the successor of Antoninus the Pious. The motive that occasioned this new production originated in a circumstance characteristic of the times. A certain woman at Rome, and her husband, had lived in a state of great profligacy; but the former being converted to Christianity, laboured to persuade her husband to abandon his excesses. The man, however, was deaf to all her arguments, and only became more depraved; and the wife would have forsaken her unworthy partner, but for the counsel of her Christian friends, who advised her to bear with him a little longer, in the hope that he might yet be reformed. But their expectations were in vain; for the man, proceeding from evil to worse, became so utterly abandoned that the woman was obliged to procure a divorce from him. The wretch was infuriated at her departure, and resolving to be revenged, he accused her of being a Christian; but on her appeal to the emperor, a respite was granted, until she should have time to settle her household affairs. The man, thus disappointed for a time, turned his rage upon another victim, who was Ptolemy, a centurion, the person who had converted his wife to the Christian faith. This soldier being thrown into prison, was kept there for a considerable time, and put to torture, merely because he was a Christian. At last he was brought before Urbicus, the prefect of the city, by whom he was condemned to death. Upon this, Lucius, a Christian, who was standing by, observed that it was iniquitous for an innocent man, charged with no crime, to be sentenced merely because he was a Christian; and that such a procedure was discreditable to the government of their emperors, and the august Senate of Rome. "You, too, appear to me to be of the same sect," observed the prefect, drily; and when Lucius confessed that such was the case, Urbicus forthwith ordered him to be led to execution. Lucius went to death as to a triumph; declaring that he was departing from unrighteous judges to God, his righteous Father and King. This spectacle aroused the solicitude of Justin for his brethren and the Church, and the result was, his second Apology; in which he adopts the train of argument which Lucius himself had suggested before the tribunal. He lays down the simple merits of the case, and then proceeds to show the iniquity and absurdity of condemning men to death unconvicted of any crime, and merely upon the charge of their being Christians. He also answers the popular charges that were brought against them, and desires nothing more than an open trial and fair hearing, that a just judgment might be pronounced.

It is scarcely to be supposed that the active exertions of Justin in behalf of a cause so obnoxious could escape the prevalent malignity. His secession from the schools had excited the resentment of the philosophers; his Discussions and Apologies provoked those who were unable to answer his arguments, and his enemies were eager to silence a man whom they could not refute. On his arrival in Rome he had held, among other controversies, a discussion with one Crescens, a Cynic philosopher,—a personage of that class of fashionable pretenders with whom the writings of Lucian have made us so thoroughly acquainted. He was a loud advocate for virtue and holiness, while he indulged in every kind of excess; and he was eager to refute the doctrines of Christianity, although he was wretchedly ignorant of the subject. Such an antagonist was not likely to aggrandise his intellectual popularity by a debate with Justin; and the second Apology, in which the latter challenged him to a public disputation before the emperor, was sufficient to confirm his hatred. Bent upon revenge, the Cynic accused his adversary of being a Christian; and this was enough for the condemnation of the Apologist. Antoninus, a profound philosopher, was also a persecutor, and it was not difficult to obtain from him a confirmation of the sentence. It is worthy of observation, that the emperor, who was a follower of the Stoical philosophy (that system which pretended to teach men endurance, and make them insensible to pain and suffering), yet hated the Christians for those very qualities which his creed should have taught him to admire the most. Their tranquillity under suffering, their alacrity in going to death, and cheerfulness under its infliction, he branded with the title of sullen obstinacy. But might not this feeling arise from envy? In his heart there might have lurked, unknown, perchance, to himself, a conviction that Stoicism was no match for Christianity; and that the latter, humble and unpretending as it was, could inspire a patience, a fortitude, and endurance, which Zeno never taught, and which his followers could not rival.

The close of Justin's history, from which he derived the glorious title of "the Martyr," is fraught with no ordinary interest. He had himself expected such a termination to his labours; and in his second Apology, he had announced this impression to the emperor himself, declaring that he supposed either Crescens, or some other pretended philosopher, would lay snares to undermine, torment, or crucify him. He, and six other Christians were apprehended, and arraigned, at the instigation of Crescens, before Rusticus, the city prefect, himself a stoical philosopher of high repute, and in great favour with the emperor, whose preceptor he had formerly been. This magistrate expected that Justin would be induced to recant; and he therefore tried to persuade him to worship the gods, and obey the emperor's edicts. The martyr replied, that no man would be justly considered worthy of blame, or an object of condemnation, who obeyed the commands of our Saviour Jesus Christ. The prefect then proceeded to inquire in what learning and discipline he had been brought up. Justin replied, that he had tried all kinds of learning, and had endeavoured to understand every form of discipline, after which he had finally taken refuge in Christianity, although it was so lightly esteemed by those who were led astray by error and delusion. "Wretch," cried the magistrate indignantly, "art thou then taken up with that religion?" "I am," said the martyr, "for with a right faith I follow the Christians." Rusticus then inquired what kind of faith that might be. "The right faith which we Christians piously profess," said Justin, "is this, we believe the one only God to be the Creator of all things, visible and invisible; and we confess our Lord Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, who was foretold by the prophets of old, and who shall hereafter come to be the Judge of mankind—a Saviour, preacher, and master, to all those who are duly taught of him." "As for myself," continued he, "I am too mean to be able to say any thing becoming his infinite Divinity: this was the office of the prophets, who many ages ago foretold the coming of the Son of God into the world." "Where," inquired the prefect, "do the Christians usually assemble?" "The God of the Christians," replied Justin, "is not confined to any particular place." "Where, then," said the judge, "are you wont to instruct your disciples?" The martyr informed him of the place where he dwelt, and told him that there he preached the doctrines of Christianity to all who repaired to him. A short consultation followed, in which the six Christians who were arraigned with the martyr were severally examined. Rusticus, whom his pupil Antoninus has so highly eulogised in his writings for the lessons of placability and forgiveness he had taught him, then turned to Justin, and exclaimed in a burst of angry impatience—"Mark me, thou, who hast the character of an orator, and thinkest thyself to be in the truth, if I cause thee to be scourged from head to foot, dost thou suppose thou shalt go to heaven?" To this the brow-beaten Christian meekly, but firmly replied,—“Though I should suffer what you have threatened, yet I hope to enjoy the portion of all true Christians; knowing well that the divine grace and favour has been reserved for all such, and shall continue to be reserved as long as the world endures.” “Dost thou think,” repeated Rusticus insultingly,

“that thou shalt go to heaven, and enjoy a reward?” “I not only think, but I know it,” said Justin, fervently; “and am so certain, that there is no cause for doubt.”

The judge soon became weary of a discussion in which he was evidently no gainer, he therefore abruptly closed the proceeding, by ordering Justin and his companions to go together and unanimously sacrifice to the gods. But the Christians were not thus to be taken at unawares, and hurried into apostasy. “No man in his right mind,” said Justin, readily, “will desert true religion for the sake of error and impiety.” They were threatened to be tortured without mercy, if they refused. “There is nothing we more earnestly desire,” said the martyr, “than to endure tortures for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ, and be saved; for it is this which will promote our happiness, and give us confidence before that dreadful tribunal of our Lord and Saviour, at which the whole world must appear, according to Divine appointment.” The other six Christians assented to his words, and exclaimed to the magistrate, with holy alacrity, “Despatch quickly what thou purposeth to do, for we are Christians, and cannot sacrifice to idols!” Upon this, the following sentence was pronounced:—“Those who refuse to sacrifice to the gods, and obey the imperial edicts, let them first be scourged and then beheaded, according to the laws.” The seven condemned men, rejoicing, and blessing God for the high honour to which they were thus called, were led back to prison, where the sentence was executed upon them; after which the Christians took up their dead bodies and decently interred them. This event is supposed to have occurred about the year 163.

Such was the end of Justin Martyr, one of the brightest ornaments, as well as one of the most eloquent advocates, of the early Christian Church. It is unfortunate that several of his works have been lost, and that others attributed to him are evidently spurious; but in those which are genuine, we perceive the deep impress of a pure and elevated character, combined with great natural talents, improved by cultivation and study. After having sounded the depths of ancient philosophy, and tried the comparative merits of the various schools, he was enabled to perceive, in their emptiness and futility, the incalculable value of that truth to which he was called; and therefore his subsequent life was a continued course of grateful devotedness to that sacred cause to which he owed so much. Surrounded, as he constantly was, by obloquy and peril, and liable every moment to the stroke of the assassin or the executioner, yet he was not afraid to “die daily,” by a course of daily active service in the cause of Christianity. At home or abroad, stationary or in travel, by oral communication and in his numerous writings, he shows that he felt this to be the great work to which he had been called by Him who had led him from darkness to light. It was natural that a mind so trained as his had been, should particularly devote itself to the conversion of those whom he might especially term his brethren; and therefore his most earnest desire was, that the learned and accomplished should be won from their delusions to the realities of the Christian faith. For this he retained their garb, frequented their society, and invited them, by argument and example, to the study of the truth. It is melancholy to think how fruitlessly the experiment was made, and what return was yielded by the illiberal and persecuting spirit of ancient philosophy. A philosopher accused him,—it was a philosopher who unjustly tried and sentenced him,—and by the sentence of an emperor who gloried in the title of philosopher, he was put to a cruel and ignominious death.

THE BOY'S LAST REQUEST.

HALF raised upon his dying couch, his head
Dropp'd o'er his mother's bosom—like a bud
Which, broken from its parent stalk, adheres
By some attenuate fibre. His thin hand
From 'neath the downy pillow drew a book,
And slowly pressed it to his bloodless lip.
"Mother, dear mother, see your birth-day gift,
Fresh and unsoiled. Yet have I kept your word,
And ere I slept each night, and every morn,
Did read its pages with my humble prayer,
Until this sickness came."

He paused—for breath
Came scantily, and with a toilsome strife.
"Brother or sister have I none, or else
I'd lay this Bible on their heart, and say,
Come read it on my grave, among the flowers;
So you who gave, must take it back again,
And love it for my sake." "My son! my son!"
Whispered the mourner, in that tender tone
Which woman in her sternest agony
Commands, to soothe the pangs of those she loves,—
"The soul! the soul!—to whose charge yield you that?"
"To God, who gave it." So that trusting soul,
With a slight shudder, and a lingering smile,
Left the pale clay for its Creator's arms.

AFFLICTION NECESSARY AND BENEFICIAL TO MAN:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. W. M. HETHERINGTON, A. M.,

Minister of Torphichen, Linlithgowshire.

"For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal."—2 Cor. iv. 16-18.

THERE is not, perhaps, any proverb more frequently on the lip, than that prosperity is more difficult to be borne than adversity; and yet we hazard little in saying, that there is none which so seldom reaches the heart. Whence springs this insincerity? If we believe adversity and affliction to be more advantageous than prosperity and enjoyment, why do we so carefully shun the former, and so eagerly court the latter? There is implanted in every mind an instinctive love of happiness, and consequently a corresponding repugnance to suffering. But there is not, at first sight, any necessary connection between affliction and happiness—very much the reverse. Hence the sudden and instinctive workings of nature impel us to avoid what, after a slow and deliberate process of reasoning, we may be induced to choose. This is the natural view of the subject, and sufficiently explains our instinctive aversion to suffering of any kind, practically considered; but it does not account for our theoretical assent to the advantages of affliction. This is furnished by viewing our present condition as one of probation,—as one in which we are placed for the purpose of undergoing a certain course of training, and a process of moral culture, to prepare us for other and higher duties in a future and more elevated stage of existence. And when we combine the idea of a state of probation, with the belief, that all is under the providential superintendence of Him who created, preserves, and will hereafter judge us, we very readily arrive at the conclusion, that all things must be so arranged as to produce the intended effect upon our minds; and that this arrangement must be formed chiefly with respect to futurity,—that is, that things present are to be valued, not for themselves, but for their ultimate results; consequently, that if present affliction be necessary to future happiness, and present adversity to future prosperity, while the converse is equally true, then the wisest choice of man would be, present and brief affliction, to be followed by future and everlasting happiness. It is for want of having this view of our condition and destinies deeply, and firmly, and constantly fixed in our minds, that our language and our practice so frequently and so widely differ. Having a dim belief that we are in a state of probation, we admit theoretically that trials are both necessary and beneficial; but when they come we resist, and murmur, and bemoan ourselves, as if some thing strange, unnatural, or unjust had befallen us,—so unwilling are we to submit, in our own persons, to that discipline which yet, in the case of others, we are so ready to call "a salutary though painful dispensation." Having thus attempted to obtain a clear conception of the principle chiefly involved in the subject before us, we shall now proceed to the farther elucidation of the subject itself, and shall direct our attention chiefly to three topics of leading importance. 1st, In the first place, we shall attempt to point out what it is in the nature and condition of man which renders affliction necessary; 2<sup>d</sup>, In what manner affliction operates in the production of good; 3<sup>d</sup>, And conclude with some reflections on the inconceivably glorious result of this most wise and gracious discipline, arranged and guided by the very God of peace, of mercy, and of love, for his own glory, and the good of his people. Before proceeding farther, however, it may be expedient to state, that it is our intention at present to consider the passage before us chiefly, if not exclusively, in its application to the Christian. This, it is obvious, will have a very essential influence upon the tone of the Discourse; because of the very different character which affliction bears in its reference to the Christian, from what it does as regards the unregenerated and obstinate sinner. To the one, it is the means of correction and improvement; to the other, it is merely penal, and is, in reality, a foretaste of the endless misery awaiting the impenitent. Remembering, too, that the forms of human trials are like the lineaments of the human countenance, boundlessly diversified, we shall content ourselves with stating principles, and sketching outlines, the individual and specific application of which every person will find no difficulty in bringing home to his own bosom, and applying to his own case. And may the Searcher of hearts assist both speaker and hearers in their solemn duties.

I. We are to consider, then, what it is in the nature and condition of man which renders affliction necessary.—If this earth were the abode of perfect innocence and peace; if there were no storms to blacken the brow of heaven, and scatter desolation and dismay over sea and land; if the bosom of man were undisturbed by one rebellious passion, and his mind unpolluted by one guilty thought; if sin, and misery, and death, had never shed their pestilential blight upon creation; and if it might still be said, as upon the first day of their completed existence, that all things were very good;—then might it be said, that this was no state of probation, and that here man might take up his place of rest for ever. But since the state of the world, and of man himself, is the very reverse of all this,—since sinful and mortal man finds himself in a “world lying in wickedness,” of which all the beauties and pleasures are still more mortal than himself, it plainly follows, that this cannot be his ultimate condition and his final home. Still more obvious does this become, when it is found that the extent of his desires and capacities far outgo the possible means of gratification furnished by earth and time,—giving evidence of a higher origin and a nobler destiny than can be confined within the span of human life, or satisfied with its perishing enjoyments. In such a condition, and endowed with such faculties and powers, it is very plain, that man ought never to consider this world as his home,—never to debase himself by its pleasures,—never to encumber himself with its goods; but keeping his hopes and desires steadily fixed on that world towards which he is so swiftly journeying, make no farther use of the scenes and things around him, than may suffice for his nourishment by the way, or be in some measure instrumental in preparing him for the scenes and duties of futurity. Instead of this, fallen and corrupted man has nearly lost all consciousness of his high origin, and all desire for a more holy and exalted state of being,—clings to the earth, and wallows in its pollution, clasping its debasing pleasures to his bosom, though they perish in his embrace,—confines his hopes and wishes within the narrow limits of this life, while selfishness becomes his ruling spirit, and his own gratification the sole object of all his cares. This is to pervert the very purpose of his being, and to sink himself beneath the level of the beasts that perish, instead of acting in a manner consistent with the dignity of a rational and moral creature, capable in some measure of knowing, of loving, and of serving his God. In such a state of things there seem to be but two modes of acting towards the perverse sinner,—either to leave him alone to perish in his wilful iniquity, sinking, sinking, sinking for ever deeper and deeper beneath his constantly accumulating guilt; or, to dash from his lip the fatal and intoxicating cup, even while his hot and fevered heart is thirsting to drain it to the dregs,—to wrench from his embrace that idol of his soul to which he clings with fondest tenacity, and to compel him, faint, wounded, and mourning as he is, to resume his painful and toilsome pilgrimage. If he will make earth his home, and the things of earth his possession, as fallen man is so prone, so very prone to do, he must either be left to perish with them, or they must be torn away, and he taught, by the stern discipline of affliction, that there is no home for man but heaven, nor any pleasures capable of satisfying his immortal soul but those that are hallowed and exalted by the approbation of God. It would be very easy to extend this view of man's perverse tendency to frustrate the use of this life as a state of probation, by producing a variety of illustrations of the principle thus briefly stated. We might describe the proud man, and show in what manner this strong passion fetters him to earth; or the vain man, who lives but in the flatteries of his fellow-worms, and becomes the slave of even his own sycophants; or the ambitious man, in whom the love of power, or of fame, is a spell confining even his aspiring soul to earth and time, as the place and the period in which alone it can be gratified; or the sensualist, whose enjoyments and desires extend not beyond the range of his animal appetites, and to whom the idea of a different state of existence would present little else than a dream of annihilation;—but as all such illustrations can be very easily imagined, and will readily present themselves to the mind of every thinking person, it seems enough to have merely suggested them. Nor is it necessary to enlarge upon the kindred view,—that all these are but modifications of the carnal mind, displaying the manner in which it chooses some one or other of the world's pleasures, or its own faculties, and makes that the object of its idolatry, instead of worshipping the true and living God, against whom its very nature is enmity. Such is man, and such his condition. His fallen and corrupted nature is “enmity against God,” and consequently alienated from whatever belongs to a future and eternal state of being: his present condition being intended to restore him to that from which he fell, and even to elevate him above it, is necessarily one of trial and probation, of moral and religious culture; but the corruption of his nature inclines him to pervert the means of good into instruments of evil, and to draw upon himself a heavier condemnation by the abuse of what ought to have led him to repentance. What more could God have done for his vineyard that he has not done? Yet it brings forth wild grapes! There are but two alternatives,—destruction, or the pruning-knife! What greater care could God have taken of his children? Yet they wander from the way, and must perish in the wilderness, or the rod of chastisement must bring them back. It thus appears, that in our present fallen and probationary state, afflictions are absolutely necessary for securing our return to God, and our eternal welfare.

II. We shall next consider in what manner affliction operates in the production of good, and the promotion of our best interests.—The important truth, that our present state is one of probation, and that religion alone can bring us safely through the trial, and secure for us the peaceable fruits of righteousness, may be communicated in an almost endless variety of methods. In the words of one who knew human nature well,—“There are those to whom a sense of religion has come in storm and tempest; there are those whom it has summoned amid scenes of revelry and idle vanity; there are those, too, who have heard its ‘still small voice’ amid rural leisure and placid contentment; but perhaps the knowledge which causeth not to err, is most frequently impressed upon the mind during seasons of affliction,—and tears are the softened showers which cause the seed of heaven to spring, and take root in the human breast.” That this is true will be universally admitted; nor is it difficult to see why it is so. Man, as has been remarked, is a being of lofty origin, of large capacities, and of sublime destinies. His native inheritance, his very birth-right, and, consequently, his instinctive object, is, the pursuit of happiness; but his great error lies in pursuing it where it is not to be found, and in degrading and perverting his own nature, by limiting his hopes and his desires to objects, and within a sphere, far beneath his native dignity. This is merely the perversion of what is in its original nature a noble endowment. Even in Paradise man could not rest in perfect innocence, and its corresponding degree of calm enjoyment; but yielded to the ambitious temptation which held forth the high allurements, that they should “be as gods, knowing good and evil.” In that primary instance, the perversion consisted in aiming too high, and by forbidden means; in all subsequent cases it consists in either directing our desires too low, or in mistaking the real worth of objects, and pursuing, as of inestimable value, things only secondary,—in preferring things visible to things invisible,—earthly and temporal to heavenly and eternal. How can such error be remedied, but by the removal of the exciting causes, and the consequent, perhaps compulsory, transfer of the misplaced affections to objects and pursuits more worthy. Let us trace, for a moment, how such a process may be frequently seen in operation; that if at any time we ourselves should be brought under any of its aspects, we may be aided in apprehending and availing ourselves of the salutary though painful discipline.

What is there for which even childhood more ardently longs than to reach full-grown manhood?

The bold and self-willed boy thinks if he were a man, he would have the free dominion over his own actions; and in this fancied freedom he places his vision of supreme happiness. In some of untameable disposition, this desire grows so uncontrollable as to cause the rash stripling to forsake the home of his father, and throw himself headlong on the world, reckless where may be his abode, or what the course of his fortunes, so that he may escape the constraint of yielding to paternal authority. Alas! how soon will he be compelled bitterly to lament his blind wilfulness! Even supposing him not to fall into the snares of vice, and to become the slave of guilty passions and guilty men, he will soon find himself under the necessity of bartering his ill-got freedom for subsistence, and of exchanging the mild and tender sway of a father, for the harsh tones, imperious language, and perhaps abusive treatment, of some pitiless and tyrannical task-master. He has madly snapped asunder the silken leash of love held in a mother’s hand, and brought his neck under the iron yoke of a stranger; he has fled from the light rod of a father’s pitying correction, and must crouch beneath a whip of scorpions. Will not his heart then turn with incredibly enlarged affection to the dear remembrance of the home of his childhood? Will not all its tenderness revive, all its infant-like confidence, and obedient subjection to the gentle authority of his parents, come back; enhanced by the humility arising from his affliction, which has thus taught him to know at least his own folly? Suppose him then to be released from his hard bondage, and restored to the home of his parents, with what eagerness would he strive to execute all their commands, and even if possible to anticipate their wishes! How differently would he regard the sweet authority, and not less sweet obedience, founded upon the ties of nature, and owing all its strength to the bonds of mutual love! Would he not regard this as the truest liberty, and all other kinds of freedom as but modes of slavery in disguise! But suppose him to find, on his return, that his disobedience and misconduct had brought the gray hairs of his parents with sorrow to the grave,—that their habitation was empty, its hearth cold, and no memorial of its heart-broken tenants remaining but the churchyard stone;—oh! who may conceive the intensity of the pang that would then cleave his heart, and drive him to the place of tombs to grovel in his wretchedness above their mouldering dust? How would he then execrate his unhallowed disobedience!—how would he long that they could return to see his deep repentance, and to grant him their forgiveness and their blessing! In such a case, he could not long fail to reach another cause of repentance from which hope was not shut out. He must soon reflect, that he had not only disobeyed his parents, but had also, and especially, broken the law of Him who commanded him to “Honour his father and his mother.” On his hour of earthly remorse a spirit of heavenly contrition may descend; and the broken moans in which he bewailed a mortal parent, may be converted into prayers of unfeigned repentance, addressed to the Everlasting Father. This is no unnatural, we might say, no unusual termination to such a career; and though one of much suffering and woe, yet if it end, as it well may, and is most likely to do, in that "godly sorrow which worketh repentance unto salvation, not to be repented of," will not he who has been exercised thereby have reason to say with the Psalmist, "it hath been good for me that I was afflicted." Such, indeed, has been the experience of many, and no doubt will be of many more. For it is a melancholy truth, that no man becomes wise by the experience of another; so intractable are the materials of which human nature is composed, that every individual must, for himself, pass through the same course of painful but necessary discipline.

Or, contemplate one of the most prominent and painful of the trials that beset the period of warm-hearted youth. The awakening susceptibilities of his glowing bosom begin to crave some object to which they may attach themselves with fond affection. And should he meet with one, capable, as his excited fancy thinks, of more than realizing all his romantic day-dreams, how trivial will every other acquirement or pursuit appear, so that he may be successful in obtaining this—the load-star of his hopes! But in the very midst of his eager pursuit, or in the early years of his realised happiness, it may be his doom to encounter afflictions, the more tryingly severe, that they smite him where he is most sensitive of anguish, and where least prepared to meet them. Death may clasp with chill embrace the fair form on which his tender regards were fixed with such trembling intensity; and all his fondest hopes may be dashed at once and for ever to the earth. What, then, is the condition of the miserable man? The sun itself seems to have been extinguished in the mid-heavens of his life; behind, before, and all around him, spreads one gray waste of thick monotonous blight,—one waveless, sluggish expanse of hopelessness, the very dead-sea of despair! And why was this so? Because he had loved the creature more than the Creator,—because he had made a frail and mortal being like himself the object of his soul's fond worship,—because he had placed an earth-formed idol within that inner shrine of the heart which is due alone to the living God! Therefore God, in mercy to him, in mercy to both, removed the idol; and though his clinging heart-strings may have been lacerated in the removal, they will, in their quivering recoil, but twine more closely to the pillars of the tabernacle—to the horns of the altar—to the foot of the Cross. When the whole powers of the heart have been called into fervent action, then, bereft of their object, and their craving turned inwards, what can the soul discover but the barrenness of life, and time, and self—the utter insufficiency of all earthly things to satisfy its immortal longings; and thus be driven, in its hour of uttermost extremity, to feel after the Author of its being, and quitting every fruitless quest beside, to seek in the knowledge, the love, and the service of its God, that happiness which the dearest human or created object is incapable of yielding. This, too, is a process which has been often, and will again be often undergone. And painful, unspeakable painful as it may be, it is, nevertheless, one of the most salutary, and therefore merciful dispensations of Providence. Men, especially young men, are but too easily led to expect full gratification in the pleasures of earth, and time, and sense; but when all such pleasures are found to be fleeting and perishable, the soul obtains release from the delusions which blinded its vision, and clogged its powers, and kept it spell-bound within the circle of a too-lovely enchantress,—plumes afresh its wings of heavenly faith and heavenly love,—and, with all its energies aroused, refined, and exalted, soars free and unwearied aloft into the pure regions of spiritual life, and love, and adoration. Thus, also, is it "good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth;" and thus may even this species of chastening be graciously made to "yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness."

Take another example of still more frequent occurrence. Mark a family in which the human blossoms are numerous, lovely, and full of promise. How swell the hearts of the glad parents to trace the buoyant and graceful steps of their own bright band of young immortals! A fresher life seems infused into their own expanding bosoms,—nature all around wears the reflected radiance of an earlier brightness,—and they behold all things with the renewed eagerness of younger eyes. Could such a scene but last in its untroubled beauty and gladness, what would it lack to render earth a paradise? But, alas! even then the canker may be rankling at the core of the unexpanded human blossom, and may nip it in its bud! Who may describe the wasting and feeble form,—the languid air,—the cheek pale, but for its one hectic spot,—the eye dim and filmy, or bright with a fatal lustre? Who may, even in imagination, tend the couch, and hear the sick moans, and moisten the parched lips, and support the drooping head, and watch for the last, cold, wavering breath, as the spirit quits its mortal tenement? And the parents!—but let no human hand presume to withdraw the veil which hides their unutterable woe! But was this affliction unnecessary? Was it charged with no message of mercy? Did this dispensation of Providence bear in it no portion of celestial love? Alas! there is sin in all that pertains to man in his fallen state; and where there is sin there must be suffering. The love of their children may have caused the Christian parents to loiter, or turn back from their heavenly pilgrimage,—to give too much of their affections to earth and its concerns,—or even to be too proud of their beautiful and attractive, but ensnaring offspring. If so, then the humbled parent will learn to own that the blow was not dealt in vain, or untempered with mercy; and even when he beholds the green turf close over the bright brow and sunny locks, so recently the very pulse of his heart and light of his eyes, he may be enabled to recognise the gracious purpose of Him who gave in bounty, and has but taken away in compassionate wisdom. There must even be established in his bosom a mysterious, but a hallowing connection between the visible and the invisible worlds,—between earth and heaven,—between the living parent, and that portion of his own propagated life, which has now passed beyond the boundaries of time, and entered into those of eternity! There is thus the transfer of nature's tenderest ties from earth to heaven; and, consequently, a corresponding transfer of the affections. Formerly he may have been too much occupied with worldly anxieties, thinking how to provide an inheritance for his child; now his language is, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me,"—and thus even nature is enlisted on the side of grace, and the child is rendered instrumental in bringing his parent nearer unto God.

Take still another example, one to which the declining stage of life is peculiarly liable. View a couple who have long trod the path of life together. United by the tender and endearing ties of pure and true affection, they have traversed the wilderness of this world in sweet companionship, mutually supporting and supported; the manly strength of the one upholding the feminine gentleness of the other, and by it both graced and cherished. The blessings they have mutually enjoyed, and even the sorrows they have mutually borne, have only knit the more closely the ties by which their hearts are so closely and so warmly bound. But the stern hand of the unwelcome messenger interposes, lays hold on the one or the other of these faithful all-sharing partners, and rends rudely asunder the strong bonds of a life-long and soul-connecting love. To the bereaved survivor the loss is irremediable. Nothing earthly can ever supply the aching void left in the widowed heart and lonely home of the gray-haired mourner. Nothing earthly can, indeed, supply such a void; but may not something heavenly? Nay, is not true affection itself of heavenly origin,—a tried and suffering stranger upon earth,—and always looking to the regions of eternity for its proper and everlasting home? Is not this one of the methods by which God teaches us, that here we have no continued residence,—that we are strangers and pilgrims in this world; thus accustoming us to set our affections on things, scenes, persons, and hopes above, and not on those beneath. And, in the darkest and saddest hour of such a sorrow, may not the voice of inspiration be heard saying,—“Them who sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him.” “Sorrow not, therefore, as those who have no hope.” “He shall rise again.” “Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words.” From the time that such an hour, filled by such solemn thoughts and such holy hopes, has shed its mighty influence upon the bereaved mourner, is not even more than half the chastened heart in heaven, and more than half the soul's purest affections rendered indeed divine? The soul of the tried Christian, borne on the eagle-wings of faith and love, can shake from its strong pinions the dewy sorrows of this life, and soar into the regions of light, and life, and holiness, and happiness eternal: “For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us an excessively exceeding and eternal weight of glory.”

These examples may suffice to show, in what manner affliction operates in the production of good, by correcting the perverse tendency of man, to place his affections on earthly, instead of heavenly things. Another of these tendencies, and one which should not be overlooked, is to awaken conscience to a greater degree of watchfulness and accuracy in its perceptions. In times of prosperity and calm enjoyment, we are too apt to think that all is well, and shall never be otherwise; and to allow ourselves to be lulled into a state of dangerous security, in which we are exceedingly liable to fall into the commission of crimes, from which we should, under other circumstances, have at once recoiled. But, when thus roughly shaken from our slumbers, smitten to the heart, and compelled to look within, because all has grown dark without, we may, by the blessing of spiritual aid, be enabled to discover our secret guilt,—to trace out our hidden sins,—and to learn why God has a controversy against us. When such are the results, we have already begun to learn the lesson those afflictive dispensations were intended to teach; and may then humbly pray for, and even, in general cases, expect their removal, for God “doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.” Or if, when we beseech the Lord for relief, the affliction be not removed, still there may be granted to us, as there was to Paul, a more than equivalent advantage, till we, like him, may be enabled even to “glory in our infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon us.”

III. While attempting to explain in what manner affliction operates in the production of good, by the promotion of our best interests, we have involuntarily anticipated part of what rightly belonged to our concluding topic; in which it was proposed to offer some reflections on the result of this most wise and gracious discipline. But while this relieves us from the necessity of dwelling on minute details, it will permit us to devote a few minutes to the elucidation of one leading idea, to which we think sufficient attention is seldom paid. Men, in general, think, that whatever else they may be ignorant of, they at least know something about themselves; yet there are, in reality, very few things about which they know less. Who can say what he can do, or what he can endure, till he is tried? But, if we have no conception of our own capacity of suffering and enjoyment, we shall feel proportionately little anxiety about our future condition; and thus, ignorance of our own nature produces insensibility respecting our destinies. To cure us of this blind and careless apathy is one great end of the varying course through which we are led by Providence. At one time, our hopes are awakened,—our wishes are no sooner formed, than gratified,—prosperity smiles upon all our undertakings,—pleasure beckons our approach, and holds out for our acceptance her intoxicating cup, while our excited spirits mount into a giddy whirl of almost delirious rapture. At another, disappointment clouds all our prospects, and withers all our hopes,—adversity besets our footsteps,—the garb of sorrow displaces the robe of pleasure,—grief lays its chill grasp upon the heart,—and death grimly pours out for us the bitter draught of unutterable woe. And mark the result: We are thus trained to know the vast extent of our capacity for joy or sorrow, for happiness or misery. The extreme and opposite tendencies of our being are thus explored, and we are made in some measure conscious of what it is possible for us to enjoy or to suffer. We are raised to the very height of transport, to give us one instant's foretaste of those unspeakable enjoyments which await the blessed, to yield us one transitory glimpse into those inner regions of the soul where its immortal energies repose, till they shall be awakened by the sympathetic thrill of eternal glories, that there may be aroused within us a strong anticipating desire of those high and holy pleasures, which are at the right hand of God for evermore. On the other hand, we are plunged into misery, and our hearts are stirred to their inmost depths, to call forth within us a dread consciousness of our own ability to suffer, to give us a terrible impression of what human nature may be destined to endure, in the black and doleful regions of everlasting despair,—that we may shrink with shuddering and instructive horror from those guilty deeds which would hurl us into that pit, “where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.” When our heart-strings have thus been thrilled from their lowest note to their highest pitch,—when our nature has been tried through all its range, and we have been made to feel and know its stupendous compass and marvellous extent,—stretching from the height of heavenly bliss, down to the depth of infernal torment,—shall we not hasten with intensest eagerness to escape the fearful alternative, of which we have thus received a proof, and, it may be, an earnest,—to close with the offered terms of salvation, while it is called to-day,—while the door of mercy still standeth open, and the voice still invites us to come? Is joy—spiritual joy—joy and peace in believing—the present inmate of our bosoms? Oh, let us hasten to render it a perpetual guest! Has grief crushed us to the earth; and is despair rending our heart-strings? Let us up,—let us flee from the wrath to come,—lest those moans, those agonies, that hopelessness, should be our doom for ever. Let us betake ourselves to the shelter of the Rock of Ages, and there hide in safety from the storm of infinite and eternal indignation. While we thus learn that we are indeed fearfully and wonderfully made,—while we thus obtain a dim but intelligible revelation of our own, even tremendous, capacities, as heirs of heaven, or prisoners of outer darkness,—let us adore the merciful arrangements by which this solemn wisdom has been graciously communicated; and let us be more deeply impressed with the awful importance of life and time, as the season in which preparation must be made for that eternity, of which we are the heirs, or the victims; in which we shall be happy, or miserable, for ever and for ever.

But, Christian brethren, though knowing the terrors of the Lord, and feeling the value of immortal souls, we have thus striven to persuade men, we cannot quit the subject without one glance at its brighter and more encouraging aspect. The trials and afflictions that assail us are not messengers of wrath,—they do not prove that we are the objects of God's displeasure. On the contrary, they are proofs that God dealeth with us as with sons; “for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.” Were we permitted to follow our own evil ways unchecked, that were indeed a fearful omen,—it would prove that God had ceased to strive with us, and had left us to fill up the measure of our iniquity. But more, trials and sufferings are useful, not only in reclaiming and correcting, but also in purifying, refining, and elevating the character. Cast the rough golden ore of the mine into the furnace, and if it come out diminished in bulk, it will only be because the dross is gone, and it is now nothing but pure gold. Crush the aromatic shrub, and you will but cause it to give out a stronger and a sweeter fragrance. And let the human heart be cast into the furnace of affliction, or crushed with the hard hand of adversity, it will be thereby the more thoroughly purified, and all its better qualities called into stronger and more permanent existence. When all the earthly hopes of the soul have been blighted, and all the mortal props on which it leaned smitten prostrate, if it can then cast all its cares upon the Lord, and in his strength stand erect in the eye of Heaven, still retain its integrity, and say, “Though He slay me, yet will I trust in him,” it has, in that hour of utter loneliness, or rather of unaccompanied majesty, reached a far more lofty pitch of virtue, a far sublimer dignity, than if it were, or could be, placed by its own irresistible prowess on the throne of universal sovereignty. But still more: “If we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with him.” His mediatorial character was “made perfect through sufferings;” and shall we expect to be made perfect without them? “Shall we not rather,” to use the words of Paul, “rejoice in our own sufferings, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in our flesh, for his body's sake, which is the Church?” Christ bore the punishment due to our guilt, that he might ransom us from everlasting misery; but he left behind those sufferings, and those only, which were necessary for the culture of our nature, both to wean us from earth and to train us for heaven. Even in them our Head still sympathizes with the afflictions of his body, the Church—still hears our cries, and is ever ready to send relief from our sorrows, or such gracious aid as may convert them into matter of rejoicing. And well may they be so; as not only the means of spiritual improvement, but also as proving the sure existence of that thrilling chord of sympathetic union which connects earth with heaven, time with eternity, man with God. And while possessing such unspeakable value in their results, how slight are they, if rightly estimated and considered only in themselves! They are "light"—they endure "but for a moment;" yet they "work out for us an excessively exceeding and eternal weight of glory." They release us from our degrading bondage to things merely visible and temporal, that perish in the using; they fix all our hopes, affections, and desires, upon the invisible, but eternal, realities prepared in heaven for the full enjoyment of our immortal souls with God, and with the Lamb for evermore.

These, Christians, are the fruits that afflictions yield, when, borne as from God, and consecrated to their proper uses by appropriating faith, unfeigned repentance, and submissive, humble, acquiescing prayer. Should it be the lot of any of you, as no doubt it will, to encounter them in some of their many forms, let them be borne in that spirit, and God will in his own good time remove them, or cause them to "yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness," till you, too, shall be enabled even "to glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope: and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Prayer.—Let your prayers be as particular as may be, against the sins of your particular state, and for the graces which you chiefly do most stand in need of. This is the best preservative against sin; makes us best acquainted with our condition, puts us continually in mind of mending what is amiss, lets us see what particular graces we most want, and is the best trial of our hearts. The devil knows, that when we have a relish for prayer, and apply ourselves in good earnest to it, we are in the way of life; he therefore strives, by all ways possible, to divert us. Make it a law to yourself to meditate before you pray; as also, to make certain pauses, to see whether your heart goes along with your lips. They whose hearts desire nothing, pray for nothing. It is a rudeness amongst men, to ask a favour and not to stay for an answer: and do we count it no fault to pray for blessings, and never to think of them afterwards, never to wait for them, never to give God thanks for them? When we offer up our prayers through Christ's mediation, it is then he that prays, his love that intercedes, his blood that pleads—it is he who obtains all from the Father. God will deny us nothing that we ask in the name of his Son. O Holy Spirit of grace! give us a true sight of our miseries, and a sincere shame and sorrow when we make confession of our sins;—a feeling sense of our need of mercy, and a hope of obtaining pardon, when we beg it for Jesus' sake. May we resign our wills to thee, when we pray for temporal things; and when we pray for spiritual graces, may we "hunger and thirst after righteousness." When we praise thee for thy works of nature and of grace, and give thee thanks for thy mercies, let us do it with high esteem and gratitude.—BISHOP WILSON.

The thoughtless warned.—Let me entreat you to be wise in time, for the greater part of mankind are cut off before they begin to think seriously. They die without wisdom, because they die without taking warning: like that senator, who, as he went to the assembly, had an account put into his hand of a conspiracy against his life: he was however too much engaged to attend to it, and therefore put it for the present into his pocket. He intended to read it the first opportunity; but was stabbed before that opportunity came. There is indeed a conspiracy formed against your life; yea, against the dearest part of man, your soul. This soul is very soon to enter an assembly composed of all nations, tongues, and people, standing before God the Judge of all. In the way an adversary (1st Pet. v. 8) lies in wait to give a fatal stab to its everlasting happiness: sin points the dagger in his hand; and a careless unbelieving state of mind affords him opportunity. In such circumstances, shall I scruple to warn you in the plainest terms? God forbid! My silence would hazard my own safety. I cannot forget what was once said to a minister, "If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood shall I require at thy hand." Ezek. xxxiii. 8. The interests therefore of your soul are your dearest interests. You will forget the loss of all other things; but this loss will be irreparable. In losing this all will be lost! "For what shall it profit a man if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Presumptuous minds, blinded by the god of this world, may indeed seek to overwhelm every consideration of this kind with scoffs and ribaldry, and try to harden themselves and others against the evil day, by the worst of all hopes; viz., that God is not to be believed. But this desperate conduct can make no alteration whatever as to the things despised: the awful facts remain: time flies apace: eternity approaches whether we prepare for it or not; and "God is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent." He hath declared his purpose; he hath warned us of our danger; he hath pointed out our remedy. It is his perfection that he cannot change nor deny himself; and therefore he calls upon us to change; that is, to "turn to him and live." Such as think to avoid a danger by turning their eyes from it, have been well compared to that silly bird which, when closely pursued, thrusts its head into the sand or a thicket; and because he does not see his pursuers, vainly hopes that they have lost sight of him. But, "wisdom crieth without, How long ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorers delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge! Turn ye at my reproof." Our wisdom, then, consists, not in shutting our eyes against a danger, but in opening them to discover a refuge:—not in refusing to hear the charge brought against sin, saying with the wicked, "Tush, thou, God carest not for it;" but in humbly confessing the evil; submitting to his account of it, and embracing the remedy which he hath provided against it. For all attempts to conceal or excuse this evil are as vain as they are presumptuous: it meets us in the Scriptures,—in the history of every age,—in the scenes of every day,—and in our own consciences, if they are not blind or seared. If convinced of your sad state in having wandered from the best of Fathers—and if tired, like the prodigal, of the slavery of sin—you are desirous to return, remember how graciously our Lord invites all that labour and are heavy laden to come unto him for rest; declaring that he will “in no wise cast out him that comes;” that his blood shall cleanse such from the guilt of sin, and his Spirit deliver from the power of it; and that he will freely give his “Holy Spirit to them that ask him.” As his servants and witnesses upon earth, we are bound to declare these truths; and to declare them with firmness on the authority of his word. We can speak of them also from our own experience; we have been in your condition; we were convinced of our danger; we advanced upon the credit of his truth; our prospects brightened as we advanced; and the more we know of religion and its Author, the more we feel and admire its evidence and importance. Can we then avoid adopting the words of the Apostle (though in an humbler sense), “That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. And these things write we unto you that your joy may be full.” It is in advancing that you may expect the same increasing conviction; for a Christian’s evidence grows with his experience. “He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself;” and in his time and measure shall be enabled to resist every temptation to apostasy with the holy confidence of that faithful servant, Polycarp, who, when urged to save his life by reviling his Master, replied—“Eighty and six years have I served Christ and never received any thing but kindness from him; how then can I now blaspheme my King and Saviour!”—CÆCIL.

THE SABBATH IN SWEDEN.

[From Rae Wilson’s Travels in Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Denmark.]

It is deeply to be lamented, that in a country released from the darkness and superstition of Catholicism, and where the principles of Protestantism and Lutheranism form a fundamental article in the constitution, so little attention should be paid to what I humbly conceive the proper observance of the Sabbath; and that the inhabitants are so little aware how widely this is at variance with the rules of that faith which they profess, and the practice of their brethren in England, Scotland, Germany, and other parts where the blessed light of the Reformation is allowed to shine forth with such unrivalled lustre. It is true that divine service is performed in the different churches on that day; yet the shops are allowed to remain open, carts and carriages passing along during divine service, trades people going after their callings, and strolling about as on any other day. In the afternoon, I could discover no difference between the capital of Sweden and that of France in this respect, excepting, perhaps, that in the former the amusements and exhibitions were more calculated for the lower orders than on other days. The public-houses are crowded, pleasure-boats full of people swarm on the waters, and fishing parties are seen along the banks; in short, there is a complete “turn out” or general stir among the inhabitants, who are all in search of amusement. On the Admiralty Island, opposite the palace, where are public walks, are found houses of entertainment, and bands of music, nay, discharges of artillery. The theatre is also thrown open, where I observed just as great a pressure for admittance as in Catholic countries. It is impossible to reconcile such a flagrant disregard for the Sabbath with Protestant principles, and a due respect for the ordinances of revelation itself, in which the great God, who allowed his dependent creatures six days for the arrangement of their worldly concerns, claimed the seventh as peculiarly his own, calling upon them to keep this day, not in part, but the whole of it, and that in a holy and devout manner. In the words of an apostle, “He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it.” Such a violation of the seventh day of the week most unquestionably calls aloud for correction, and for the strenuous exertions of those ministers of religion on whom so high a responsibility for the care of souls devolves. Let not, I entreat, my testimony alone be taken as an authority for the fact: the reader is only solicited to question any one person who has travelled in this country, whether that respect due to the Sabbath-day is paid to it as in Britain, or in that solemn manner in which the Almighty himself has commanded, in the imperishable page of revelation; and I am perfectly convinced he will find the fact confirmed. At the same time, I do admit it is laid down, that a different mode of calculation has been adopted in Sweden, and the Sabbath is considered to begin on Saturday night at six o’clock, and to end at the same hour on Sunday.

Now, on this I would remark, that if the seventh day is to be admitted by Christians as “the Sabbath of the Lord their God,” it ought to be guarded against invasion; and it necessarily follows, that any part of the preceding has not the least connection with this day, or vice versa; but the Sabbath must be understood to commence after the expiration of the sixth day. On the other hand, if Sunday is to commence from six o’clock, or any other hour, on the last day of the week, and to be finished at the same hour on the first, when the Sabbath is totally at an end, and the remaining six hours of that day pertain to Monday—by this calculation three days are confounded that are totally distinct. Such a principle, I apprehend, can be considered in no other light than an arrangement adapted for the accommodation of man himself, or, in other words, to afford him time for pleasure the moment public service in church is finished. In fine, it must be evident that the whole of the seventh day must be considered as the Christian Sabbath, and, consequently, a period of time that ought not to be diverted from its true purpose, and so disposed of in order to meet the taste of the creature, but to be exclusively set apart as a day of rest and devout contemplation, and altogether distinct from those allowed for business or pleasure by the Almighty. He claims the whole of the seventh as exclusively his own, and requires it to be sanctified, not only in commemoration of his having accomplished the glorious work of creation, during six, and resting on the seventh, which he hallowed, but to keep alive in the mind of men the glorious resurrection and ascension of the great Redeemer of our world. Admitting, however, the Swedish plan to be proper in itself, I can in truth aver, that I took particular pains to discover whether any part of the evening of Saturday was marked by peculiar solemnities; but I could not perceive this in any one respect whatever, either by the sound of church-bells, the shops being shut up, or any degree of tranquillity in the streets. On the whole, if we admit the full force of the language of the Word of God, that righteousness “exalteth a nation,” so, on the other hand, indulgence and frivolity, amusement and dissipation, on this most sacred of all days, must be considered in no other light than that of degrading it.

ON THE COMPOSITION AND CONTENTS OF THE SHORTER CATECHISM.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D. D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

THE Shorter Catechism was composed by the Assembly of Divines, which was convened at Westminster by order of the English Parliament in the year 1643, and which consisted of one hundred and twenty divines, with thirty lay assessors, ten of whom were lords and twenty commoners. Along with this Assembly at Westminster was associated a commission from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, consisting of four ministers, namely, Alexander Henderson, Samuel Rutherford, Robert Baillie, and George Gillespie; and three elders, namely, the Earl of Cassilis, Lord Maitland, and Sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston. The greater number of the divines in this Assembly were clergymen of the Church of England, selected on account of their acknowledged piety, eminent abilities and extensive learning; and it is generally admitted, that the Christian world, since the days of the apostles, has never seen a convocation of more learned and judicious, grave and godly men. They held their meetings occasionally in the Jerusalem chamber, but ordinarily in Henry the Seventh's chapel; and, with little interruption, continued their sittings for the space of nearly five years. During this period they completed what are usually denominated the "Westminster Standards," namely, the Confession of Faith, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Directory for Public Worship, and the form of Church government; and how deeply they felt their responsibility in this great work may be understood from the solemn vow, which was taken by every member of the Assembly in these words:—"I will maintain nothing in point of doctrine, but what I believe to be most agreeable to the Word of God, nor in point of discipline, but what may make most for God's glory, and for the peace and good of this Church."

relating to Church government and the directory for public worship, they directed their attention to the Confession and the Catechisms; and in framing these, while they had less controversy, they appear to have employed no small labour. While the Assembly was engaged in drawing up the Confession of Faith, committees were appointed to arrange its doctrines in the form of two catechisms, one of which was intended to form the subject of public expositions from the pulpit, and the other to be used for the instruction of families; these are the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. It is understood, that the first draught of the Confession was prepared chiefly by the Scottish commissioners, and resolutions were subsequently passed that the catechisms should contain nothing that was not expressed and settled in the Confession. The most distinguished persons in the committee, engaged in framing the Shorter Catechism, were Dr William Gouge, minister of Blackfriars, London, and author of a body of divinity in a catechetical form; Mr Herbert Palmer of Ashwel, who became master of King's College, Cambridge, and afterwards published a work entitled "the Principles of the Christian Religion made plain and easy," which is said to bear a considerable resemblance to the Shorter Catechism; but particularly Dr John Arrowsmith of Lynne, afterwards master of John's College, Cambridge, and the author of several valuable theological treatises, is generally believed to have drawn up the first sketch of the Shorter Catechism for the inspection of that committee. After being revised and completed in the committee, it was reconsidered by the whole Assembly, and appears to have been the subject of no small discussion in regard both to its method and matter. Every point of sacred truth which it contains, was submitted to the most careful examination and conscientious judgment; and every separate portion successively passed, before it was finally and solemnly sanctioned by the Assembly.

The Shorter Catechism, which was first completed, was presented to the House of Commons, and printed by their authority in November 1647; and in July 1648, after being repeatedly revised and simplified, seriously considered, and found agreeable to the Word of God, it was finally sanctioned by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. By various acts of Assembly, ministers are earnestly enjoined to instruct their people in the knowledge of the Catechisms; and Presbyteries are required to "take trial of all the ministers within their bounds," whether they be careful in this respect. It is recommended also to ministers, that, besides their ordinary work of catechising, they also preach catechetical doctrine, at such times and in such manner, as they shall find most conducive to the edification of their flocks. In conformity with these enactments, it was formerly a general practice among the ministers of the Church of Scotland to take one question of the Catechism, or more, as the subject of discourse, during some part of the time employed in public worship, and to preach catechetical doctrine from that portion; a practice which it would be well to revive, and to render as attractive and intelligible to the people as possible, as one of the most effectual means of presenting a full and connected view of Christian doctrine, and preventing the growth of those crude and erroneous notions, which are so apt to spring up from partial and superficial glimpses of revealed truth.

In the Reformed Protestant Churches of Holland, the Shorter Catechism is divided into fifty-two sections, one of which is prescribed as the regular subject of discourse during the afternoon service every Lord's Day, so that all the parts of the Catechism may be successively explained in the course of every year. All the Presbyterian denominations in Scotland, who have separated from the Established Church, not only retain this Shorter Catechism as a part of their standards, but hold it in the highest estimation, as an instrument of religious instruction among their people. The Presbyterian Dissenters in England were accustomed to testify the greatest regard for this little summary of Christian doctrine; and their provincial Synod in London, at one time published several directions for its being employed in catechising children and servants "on the Lord's Day in the afternoon before sermon, to the end that the whole congregation may receive benefit thereby." The Independents also, especially in England, have borne the strongest testimonies to its excellence; and the Wesleyan Methodists have embodied a considerable portion of its contents in one of their summaries of Scripture truth. Throughout the vast extent of the Christian Church in the United States of America, it is not only held in great estimation, but brought into general use in their schools, their pulpits, and their theological seminaries.

The merits of the Shorter Catechism may, therefore, be considered as sufficiently established, as indeed very generally acknowledged; and as neither requiring to be very specifically pointed out, or to be supported by any lengthened illustrations. Few treatises of any description have undergone more frequent and thorough dissections, in regard to its general structure and order—its particular terms and statements—its whole form and language. It has been analysed, examined, illustrated, applied in every conceivable way; and, in passing through all these various processes of decomposition and restoration, its substantial excellencies have not only suffered no diminution, but have been rendered more obvious and unquestionable than ever.

Its language is singularly simple and select, so as to prove that every word had been duly weighed and well considered as to its perfect accuracy, propriety, and import. This feature of its style, it has been justly observed, is the more remarkable, when it is considered, that the prevailing fault of theological writers in those times, and even of the men who were engaged in composing it, was a profusion of words, and a fondness for scholastic phrases. The words of the Catechism are indeed full of meaning, requiring to be diligently noted and duly opened up; but in themselves they are peculiarly precise, and suited to convey that meaning in the clearest and simplest strain of intellectual communication. This fulness of meaning has no connection with confusion of thought, or crowding together of too many ideas in one expression, but arises solely from the momentous nature of the truths announced; and it will not be easy to find an equal number of words, capable of conveying the same truths with similar precision of style and sentiment.

With regard to the truths which it does contain and express, there are two things worthy of observation, and which cannot be observed without admiration, namely, the distinct presentation of each of these truths by itself, and the comprehensive system which they form as a whole. Every answer in the Catechism contains a clear and compact statement in itself, standing out clear and intelligible in its own place, without any dependence, in regard to its meaning, on that which precedes or on that which follows; while the whole assemblage and arrangement of these separate statements forms, in a very limited compass, a body of Christian doctrine and duty so perfect and proportioned, that nothing essential is omitted, and nothing superfluous retained. Its words are both weighty and well ordered; and a single term is often found to provide an antidote against some erroneous tenet, or to present a leading feature of some precious truth. It is a string of goodly pearls, each of which is in itself a treasure, and the whole united, a mine of unsearchable riches.

It has sometimes been made an objection to the Shorter Catechism, that it is incomplete as a system of religious instruction, inasmuch as it contains so little history—so few references to the great facts and events connected with the work of man's redemption, or to the individual characters, whether as examples of good or evil, which are described in the Sacred Record. This objection proceeds upon an entire misapprehension of the original intention and specific use of the Catechism, namely, as at once an acknowledged standard and summary of Christian truth, adopted and authorised by the assembled representatives of the Protestant Churches in the three kingdoms, for the purpose of promoting union in religion and uniformity of worship. With regard to the mere histories and biographies recorded in Sacred Scripture, there were no disputes to be settled, no diversities of opinion to be reconciled. A mere epitome of the names and narratives, the events and eras of Scripture history, with respect to which all parties were agreed, and which it required no great combination of wisdom and piety to arrange, would have been a mere misapplication of the Assembly's time and labours, and a most meagre medium of religious instruction; while, on the other hand, a fuller explication of the divine dispensations of God's dealings towards nations and individuals, as registered in the Inspired History of his providence, accompanied with doctrinal deductions and practical applications, would have led to the production of a large commentary, in place of a lesser catechism. This useful mode of instruction, the Shorter Catechism neither provides nor precludes; but it sends forth a most salutary guide, and sets up a succession of the safest way-marks for the direction of all those, whether learners or teachers, who pursue the pleasing path of Bible history and biography.

But the chief excellences, for which the Shorter Catechism is so peculiarly distinguished, are these two, namely, the condensation of its matter, and the clearness of its arrangement.

1. To the condensation of its matter some reference has already been made, in noticing its single statements and its systematic fulness. But, besides that its single statements are so distinct, and compact, and compressed with meaning, and the union of these statements so complete and comprehensive as a system of Christian truth, the whole is comprised within such narrow bounds, as to bring the entire subject before the mind almost at a single glance, and, at the same time, to furnish a perfect class-book for farther expansion and application. It is at once a precious and portable miniature sketch of saving knowledge—"a mine of truth," as has been well expressed, "in an easily bought field."

2. In the clearness of its classification, and connected arrangement of its contents, it stands pre-eminent and unrivalled. It is not only, as already remarked, so comprehensive in its statements, as to contain every point of divine truth of essential importance; but it is, farther, so regular in its plan, as to present each of these truths in its proper place. In the words of one of its most intelligent and indefatigable expounders, it is "a noble frame-work, built by masterly hands."

In connection with such a simple structure, and within its limited boundaries, all the minuter points of truth and righteousness may be gradually brought together, as in the separate compartments of a well-finished and thoroughly furnished edifice; while, at the same time, it most effectually contributes to the better understanding of its several sections and separate truths, to keep in view this clear and connected arrangement of its contents. To present the mere ground-plan of this "noble frame-work," in its full extent and proper proportions, requires a space and form which the pages of the "CHRISTIAN HERALD" cannot supply; but we may endeavour, very briefly, to mark its general outlines and principal topics.

Its brief and emphatic introduction first embraces the substance of the whole treatise and the essential objects of man's knowledge, namely, the chief end and aim of his being, and the rule of direction for attaining that end; and, next, presents the division of these instructions or directions under two great heads, namely, matters of faith, or what we are taught to believe concerning God—and matters of duty, or what we are required to do in obedience to God.

I. What we are required to believe concerning God; concerning the nature of God, and the decrees of God.

God's nature: including his perfections, unity, and trinity.

God's decrees: their nature, and their execution in the works of creation and providence.

God's work of creation: making all things out of nothing, and making man in his own image

God's works of providence: his superintendance over all the creatures; his special acts towards man.

These special acts of Providence towards man, namely, the covenant of life and the covenant of grace.

The covenant of life: its failure on the part of man, and its fatal consequence to him, namely, his miserable state and sinful nature.

The covenant of grace: its fulfilment by the Divine Redeemer, its application by the Holy Spirit, and its benefits to the redeemed.

The ministrations of the Redeemer, or Mediator of this covenant: his two-fold nature, as God and man; his three offices of Prophet, Priest, and King; his two states of humiliation and exaltation, or what he did on earth, and what he is now doing in heaven.

The agency of the Holy Spirit in applying this redemption: the means which he employs, the work which he effects.

The benefits of this covenant: in the present life, at the hour of death, after the general resurrection.

II. What we are required to do in obedience to God.

The general rule of this obedience, namely, the whole revealed will of God; and the particular rules, namely, the precepts of the moral law, and the requirements under the Gospel dispensation.

The moral law: its abridged form in the ten commandments; the sum of these commandments, and the meaning of the several precepts; the inability of man to fulfil the law; the comparative guilt of transgressions, and the penalty resting upon all transgressors.

The requirements of the Gospel: faith in Christ, repentance unto life, the diligent use of the means of grace.

The ordinary means of grace: the Word, sacraments and prayer.

The Word: its efficacy, and the manner of using it.

The sacraments: their nature and efficacy, their number and names; their elements, meaning, and administration.

Prayer: its nature, directions for its exercise, and particularly the form of the Lord's Prayer, with the import of its several petitions.

It has been very justly and ingeniously remarked,* and it is worthy of being observed, that in this little manual of instruction there are, in fact, presented to us two separate views of divine truth, seen, so to speak, from different positions, and serving different purposes; but both closely connected together, and clearly illustrating one another. There is in the first, a speculative system of divinity, proposing the most high God as an object of contemplation to the mind, in regard to his essential attributes, and in the history of his doings in this world; and in the next, a practical directory, pointing to the heart and conscience, and guiding the conduct in the ways of God.

"Each division," says the respected writer to whom we refer, "may thus be turned to its own proper use. Suppose, for example, that I were asked in what book a clear outline of the Christian faith might be found and studied; I would say at once, In the first thirty-eight questions of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. But if I were asked for a practical guide to lead men to Christ, and train them to holiness; I would say, Begin at the thirty-ninth question, and be guided by those which follow, onward to the end."

This little collection of precious truths, both doctrinal and practical, is thus well calculated both for the instruction of the young and the solace of the aged. To the young, if correctly impressed upon their memories, and carefully explained to their understandings, it may prove a powerful instrument for preserving them from fatal errors in faith, and for recalling them from vicious courses in their practice. And to the aged Christians, † when disabled, by infirmities both of body and mind, from any active exertion of their faculties either in reading or reflection, the ready re-

† One aged and simple-minded Christian woman, well-known to the writer of these remarks, when nearly deprived of sight, but able to perform some little manual labour, used often to speak, with grateful acknowledgments to her early instructors, of the value, in her situation, of the Shorter Catechism, which she was accustomed, she said, to repeat daily, as her hands were employed at her humble task; "asking and answering herself." Vide Christian Herald, No. 127, p. 356, for a similar instance.

membrance of their early lessons from the Shorter Catechism has furnished suitable subjects of self-examination and soothing meditation in their solitary hours, and on their beds of languishing.

THE RELIGION OF THE RUSSIAN PEASANT. *

WITH all their equipages and decorations, this crowd of nobles, foreigners, and soldiers, in the gay Nefokol, is not so attractive as our humble friends in the sheepskins. To a stranger, the genuine new-caught Russian is worth all his civilized superiors in the empire. Wherever he may be seen, he is a most interesting subject for study; but nowhere more than in church. Follow him into the beautiful temple of the Virgin of Kasan, and you find him on his knees, repeating his prayers after the priest, with a fluency which nothing can arrest, and a devotion which nothing can distract. Pass him, or jostle him as you may, he is too deeply engaged with his pious work to take the least notice of you. It is always painful to be present, an unconcerned spectator, where a religious service is going forward in which the heart cannot join. We feel as if intruding on that which we have no right to witness, and seem to scoff without wishing to do so. In Russia, however, there is no occasion for feeling thus. Let the stranger take off his hat on entering, and he is no more looked at than one of the pillars; he disturbs nobody. We are here surrounded by splendour. The noble simplicity of the design—two long pillared aisles in the form of a cross—only renders the richness of the materials more conspicuous. From a floor of the costliest marble, the eye rises to a light and lofty dome, spangled with stars of gold, that twinkle from a sky of the deepest blue. There is neither gallery nor buttress to break the fine height. Even the dais, occupied by the priests, scarcely breaks the general outline; it is but a simple step or two, not far from the entrance. There they stand, in strong array, with long beards flowing over their robes of embroidered crimson, and wearing a lofty black hat, that gives yet more dignity to their stately forms. Their deep rich voices make the vaults ring, as they chant the prayers, aided by a band of bearded choristers, ranged beside singing-desks, within a side-railing. Great care being taken in training the singers, this part of the service is always exceedingly impressive; finer voices we have never heard. But the crowd of worshippers is the most interesting sight. Every person as he enters kisses the sacred picture near the door, or tries to reach that hanging on the wall,—to which later, as it is of more than ordinary sanctity, you may see parents raising their little infants, that they too may touch it with their lips. Of these effigies, the more sacred usually have the brow, the cheeks, and the arms covered with silver, the votive offering of the pious, whose gratitude to the saint whom he thus seeks to honour for deliverance from sickness or danger, has overcome his taste; for the appearance given to the picture by this tinsel covering is truly ludicrous. What makes them more hideous to the indifferent spectator, however, only gives them greater attraction in the eyes of the faithful. To these, accordingly, the people flock in greatest numbers. His salutation over, the peasant selects a place for himself on the floor, as near the priest as possible. There is a woman in one of the aisles, with a small table or basket before her, selling long slender tapers; and from her the more devout make a purchase, and, lighting it, set their offering on one of the little triangular frames of wood, planted among the pillars, and stuck all over with nails for attaching these gifts to. Though it be Sabbath, many workmen are busy polishing some steps with pumice, within a few feet of the officiating priests; but no one is distracted by the noise; the people come here to pray, not to look about them. The mutterings and prostrations of the worshippers are most singular. Some, on the outskirts of the assembly, may remain standing; but the greater part have their knees bent to the naked floor. At certain words, however, all, both those who were standing and those who kneel, strike their very foreheads on the earth, with great vehemence, uttering, at the same time, some words from the priest; and this again and again before the service is finished. Some poor old women are always the most conspicuous in these violent manœuvres; but all ages and classes, and both sexes, join with more or less ardour. At vespers, we have seen most respectably-dressed ladies going through the whole ceremony with great fury. In short, the mummery of their religion surpasses all that we had previously witnessed. There is nothing like it in Catholic countries; it can only be compared to the violence of some of the Hindus. One can scarcely describe the emotion which he feels on seeing a crowded assembly going through all these crossings, and attitudes, and genuflections, so strange and so outrageous. It is impossible not to be moved with sorrow for those who look upon such things as constituting religion. Whether this extreme attention to forms be accompanied with any real religious knowledge, is a question which few foreigners are qualified to decide. Judging, however, from what we were told by Russians themselves, we cannot hesitate to say, that with the lower orders in this country, religion is little better than superstition. Of the true nature of the Great Atonement, they are utterly ignorant; and even of the first principle of all religion, the Existence of a Supreme, they entertain the most imperfect notions. With the boor, God is only something higher than the emperor; they think not of him as an omnipotent spiritual Being, but as one residing they know not where, who will punish them for neglecting church and their prescribed forms, nearly in the same way as they would be punished for disobeying a mandate of the emperor. Of a future state, their notions are also very indefinite.

In short, as has often been said before now, "the Russian's religion consists in being able to make the sign of the cross." He is crossing himself all day long. When he first comes forth into the open air, in the morning, if no church be in sight from his own door, he listens for the first sound of some bell, then, turning towards it, crosses himself with great fervour, to insure a blessing on the undertakings of the day. He crosses himself before and after each meal. When you make a bargain with him, he crosses himself that it may proper. When his countryman spits upon him (as they do by way of anathema, when in anger with each other,) he meekly crosses himself, to avert the curse. When the peasant who is to drive you takes the reins in his hand, he crosses himself to keep away accidents; and every steeple he passes gets the same mark of respect. Sometimes the edifice thus saluted is so far off, that the stranger wonders at the quickness shown in discovering it, and is often at a loss to catch the distant hamlet where it stands. In like manner, the person sitting beside you in any public conveyance, crosses himself every time you start with new horses. What the old do thus frequently, the young of course imitate. If you give a child a piece of money, its little hand is up in a moment, to make the sign of the cross, by way of blessing and thanking you. Much of this crossing work may be seen at all hours, even in the streets; for whether in the city or in the country, no Russian ever passes a church without pausing when he comes opposite its centre, to make the sign of the cross, from brow to breast, and utter some pious ejaculation prescribed for the occasion. This operation may be seen going on incessantly, before every church of the capital; and on the most frequented walks there are certain small places, like shrines, with pictures and gilding in them, in front of which it is also performed. It is not alone the grave and the aged who pause at these places, but the giddy and the young. You have just seen some gray-haired general do it; but wait one minute,—a laughing band of youngsters is coming up. Now they are opposite the church or the shrine,—their mirth and their talk have ceased, each crosses himself devoutly, utters a prayer or two (you see his lips moving), then passes gravely on, the laugh and the jest being resumed only when they are some way off. So far is this crossing mania carried, that when a Russian enters your room, he cannot say "Good morning!" till he has crossed himself to the Saviour's picture. A man in any public way, such as an inn-keeper, must always have a picture hung in his own apartment, in addition to that in the public room, to which each Russian turns before he sits down to eat. While at breakfast at an inn one morning, in a small room off the public one, we were roused by the solemn chanting of a priest in his robes, whom we found, with his attendants, praying before the picture of our Saviour in the corner. Waiting to learn how the ceremony would close, we saw abundance of the usual signing; with the painted wooden crucifix in his hand, about a foot long, he made the sign of the cross towards each of the four corners, and withdrew. It appears that some of the priests have little to live by, beyond the offerings obtained from the people for these chantings and crossings before their sacred images, or for saying prayers in families on high holidays.

Another very remarkable part of the religion of the Russians is their respect for bells; and there is something so inexpressibly sweet in the sound of all we hear in this country, that we can almost forgive this superstition. The air resounds with them from morn to eve. Every church is furnished with several; and among these some are very expensive. They have not the deep, solemn sound of English bells, but a rich sweetness, never heard except here; and said, poetically, perhaps, to arise from the predominance of silver in their composition. They are not swung, as with us; as if this were deemed too rude a way of treating these venerated objects, it is merely the tongue that is moved. This is accomplished by tying a cord to the tapering point, and then pulling it forward or allowing it to sink back, so as to strike either side at pleasure. No sooner has the peasant caught the sound than his fingers are in motion to his forehead. This reverence, perhaps, begins even when they are in the hands of the founder. The child casts its mite into the melting mass, and the beggar his only alms; the bride gives her ornaments, and the princess sells her pearls: all are eager to aid in the pious work. Gold and silver are, in consequence, so profusely parted with on such occasions, that some of these bells have grown to be the monarchs of their tribe. Russia boasts of having the largest bells in the world. The day on which a bell is consecrated is always marked with great solemnity and rejoicing; and throughout the whole of its existence it joins in the joy and in the gloom of the flock over which it presides; for it is tolled on every occasion of sorrow or of gladness. Little wonder that these objects are so much beloved; for perhaps the happiest and most romantic associations of the Russian are linked with his village bells. In a land where there is so little bordering on romance, this trait of national character is not unwelcome; but if we attempt to ascertain what it is they worship in their bells, the result will be far from distinct. We could never learn whether the salute in passing a church be to the building or to the metal: that it proceeds from respect to Him with whose service they are connected, would be asserting too much of a people, with the great mass of whom religion, we fear, is nothing but ignorance.

THE STAYING OF THE SUN AND MOON IN THE VALLEY OF AJALON.

Stras the light morning wind on Gibeon's brow,
And sweeps along the silent vale below;
The eastern sun slow leaves th' empurpled main,
And steals in beauty o'er the Syrian plain;
Beneath his beams now yellow wave the fields,
And the deep wood its first faint verdure yields;—
Far down the vale the modest lily blooms,
And the rich rose her summer robe assumes;
The brawling torrent seeks its summer bed
Where the pale hare-bell waves her drooping head;
Now through the depth slow winds the silver stream,
And its hushed waters in the glad light gleam:
Lured by the stillness of the open glade,
The timid deer forsakes the leafy shade—
A moment stays to greet the sun's warm ray—
A moment lists, then swiftly bounds away,
And all again is still; save where, on high,
Some early wanderer from a sunnier sky,
In joy now wantons and now soars along,
And on the still air pours a flood of song.

The city, too—where midway on the hill
Dark cedar-groves the air with fragrance fill—
The silent city lies. In languid light
Are gleaming now her towers and turrets white;
High o'er the steep impend her frowning walls,
Her fair pavilions, and her marble halls:
See! a thick vapour from her watch-tower curls,
And to the wind her banner slow unfurls;
The watchman now begins his nightly round;
And from the city steals a low, deep, murmuring sound.

But, hark! from where dark Eglon fronts the main,
Borne on the winds across the level plain,
Comes martial music, like the distant hurrah
Of the unresting ocean—deep and dull;
Nearer it comes and nearer: 'tis the hum
Of war-hosts mustering to the rousing drum.
Swift, like a rolling flood, thy tribes advance—
Thy mountain tribes, O Moab! Gaily glance
Bright shield, and glittering spear, and flaming ear,
In all the proud magnificence of war;
And far and near, rock, valley, plain, and hill,
Lo! onward borne, thy myriad armies fill;
Aloft to heaven they raise their battle-cry,
Aloft to heaven their war-flags wave on high—
From their fixed basements shake the rocks around,
And the eternal hills repeat the pealing sound.

The shout has ceased, but its wild echo still Afar reverberates from hill to hill;
A moment now it falls—now wakes again—
Bursts like a thing embodied on the plain,
Till faintly heard where Hebron's towers arise,
In Jordan's mingled waves it sinks, and dies.

Behold the city's gates wide open flung!
Behold its heights with armed men are hung
'Tis Israel's anthem that the breezes bear—
'Tis Israel's banner floats upon the air;
Round them meridian splendour pours the sun,
Where slow leads on the prophet child of Nun.

Evening descends, but still along the vale
Wild rage the conflict and the clash of mail;
Still on, undaunted, pour the prophet's bands,
And, dauntless still, the vengeful foe withstands:
Moab's mowed ranks bend like the feeble reed;
Yet as they bend, still ranks on ranks succeed.
But, hark! a cry from Israel's foremost foes!
For heaven's wide arch with flaming terrors glows—
Hailstones and fire sweep through the gathering clouds,
And mar the might of Moab's thronging crowds:
" 'Tis Israel's God, 'tis Israel's God," they cry—
" Jehovah thunders from the awful sky!"
Ah! Moab, haste—not thine the conqueror's sword;
Ah! Moab, see the vengeance of the Lord!
Before His glance soon fades thy plumed array—
Thy bannered pomp, like snow, swift melts away;
Fall the rent rocks, as by the lightning riven,
And the unfathomed earth groans 'neath the wrath of Heaven;
Then, haste! for now thy chariot's rapid flight
Shield from the foe descending shades of night.

But, lo! apart from the wild battle's storm,
Raised on a bare, bleak rock, the prophet's form!
Forth to the towering heavens his arms are spread,
Whilst day's last radiance flickers round his head;
A golden band the prophet's mantle binds—
Stream his dark locks dishevelled to the winds;
The awe-struck hosts gaze from the plain below—
Now silent all—the friend beside the foe:
Powerless, the avenger's arm forgets its might,
And the swift chariot stays its rapid flight;
Faints Moab's heart; whilst o'er the silent dell,
From lips inspired, these awful accents swell,
" Stay, O thou sun, on Gibeon—in Ajalon's vale, Thou moon, stand still!"

The prophet's words prevail—
The sun and moon stand still. Disparting fly
Dark circling clouds, and shoot athwart the sky;
Heaven's orbs revealed with strange mixed lustre burn,
And day's departing beams back to the plains return.

Then bursts from earth to heaven the exulting cry,
" On, Israel, on!—for God and victory!"

"On, Israel, on! Gleams o'er the avenger's way God's mystic lamp, and lights him to the prey!"
On Moab's rapid steeds strange numbness steals,
Slow on their axles turn his chariot wheels;
And whilst around Death's raging arrows rain,
He shrieks for aid—for aid he shrieks in vain.

Long raged the battle; but ere morning bore
Her wonted breezes from far Jordan's shore,
From that vast armament that gallant lay
Beneath the sun, light, life, had passed away.
God's wrath swept o'er it; and along the plain Lies now one lonely heap of mingled slain,—
The sun and moon move on!

CARD.

THE GARDENS OF ANCIENT PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. JAMES HAMILTON,

MINISTER OF ROXBURGH CHURCH, EDINBURGH.

PART I.

THE following interesting article we extract from "The Edinburgh Academic Annual, for 1840."

We cannot read the sacred writings, without a conviction that the Hebrews were a people who delighted in flowers and green fields, in trees and forests, in orchards and gardens. The two hundred and fifty botanical terms occurring in the original of the Old Testament, are enough to prove this. No collection of classic authors of equal bulk, and not expressly treating on the subject, could furnish such a catalogue; for it must be remembered that all these terms occur incidentally in their poetry, history, and laws. Averse as they were to sculpture, and all representations which could possibly be perverted to the idolatrous use of graven images, they made an exception here. Flowers, both singly and in wreaths, with the fruit of the pomegranate, formed a conspicuous part of the golden ornaments of the temple.

When the Queen of Sheba came to behold the glory of Solomon, and to try him with hard questions, tradition records that one of her most ingenious puzzles was, a bouquet of artificial flowers, so true to nature that the eye could detect no difference. This she presented to the royal naturalist, along with a similar nosegay of garden flowers, and required him, without smelling them, to decide which was the work of nature, and which her own. That father of botany was so non-plussed, that he was obliged to refer the matter to the decision of a bee, which was buzzing through the apartment at the time, and which soon discovered that the queen's waxen flowers contained no honey.

Trees and flowers enhanced the enjoyment, or relieved the gloom of almost every scene in Jewish life. Like the streets of modern Ispahan, their cities were sometimes adorned and shaded by plane-trees growing beside the water-courses. Even in towns, the vine was trained along the walls of their houses, and as it twined round the balustrade of the outer staircase, was both a graceful and useful ornament. The courts of their houses usually rejoiced in the shade of some spreading sycamore or oak, and the open spaces in the areas of the public buildings were usually planted, except in the temple where idolatrous associations occasioned a special prohibition. Gardens, and the shelter sometimes of a single tree, were the most frequent places of retirement and devotion; and it was there that the rabbies loved to sit and deal out their wisdom to obsequious disciples. The very rusties had a taste for flowers, and, by a usage, of which the significance is not so obvious as the elegance, the grain newly heaped on the threshing-floor was crowned with lilies, or some equally graceful garland. The pathways of their conquerors, and heroes, and great men, were, on high occasions, strewed with flowers and the leaves of the palm. Their feasts were enlivened by the beauty and sweetened by the fragrance of flowers. Hence the apocryphal Solomon puts into the mouth of his voluptuary the truly Anacreontic ditty, "Come on, let us enjoy the good things that are present. Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered." This propensity followed them to the grave; and, as the modern Egyptians deck the tombs of their relatives with palm leaves and the fragrant origanum, and the inhabitants of Aleppo plant myrtles in their cemeteries; so, to plant or strew flowers upon them, seems to have been one way of "garnishing sepulchres" among the Jews. When Abraham bought the field at Machpelah for a burying-ground, besides the cave, special mention is made of the trees which surrounded it. And, whether or not it were by a common custom, the most interesting sepulchre on earth was in the garden of a Jew. And who does not recall that imagery from groves, and fields, and gardens, which sheds over the sacred poetry the glowing tints of Persian minstrelsy, and the fragrance of Arabian song? Not to quote the nobler, but well-known examples which the Psalms, and Canticles, and Prophecies supply, their uninspired authors will almost bear out the assertion. Thus, in the description of Wisdom by the son of Sirach, "I was exalted like a cedar in Lebanon, and as a cypress-tree upon the mountains of Hermon. I was erect like a palm-tree in Engedi, as a rose-plant in Jericho, like a fair olive in a pleasant field, and grew up as a plane-tree by the water. I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and asphaltus, and yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh, as galbanum and onyx, and fragrant storax, and as the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle. As the fir-tree I stretched out my branches, and my branches are the branches of honour and grace. As the vine brought I forth pleasant savour, and my flowers are the fruit of honour and riches." In similar taste, but perhaps with greater beauty, Simon the high priest is elsewhere described, "As the morning star in the midst of a cloud, as the rainbow lighted up among sunny clouds, as the flower of roses in the spring of the year, as lilies by the rivers of waters, and as the branches of the frankincense-tree in the time of summer, as a fair olive-tree budding forth fruit, and as a cypress-tree which groweth up to the clouds."

In its better days Palestine was "the garden of the Lord—a land of brooks of water, of fountains, and depths that spring out of valleys and hills—a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates—a land of oil-olive and barley." The iniquities of that land have dried up many of its fountains, blasted its vines, and withered its fig-trees; but the bee still murmurs on the fragrant cliffs of Carmel, and the black clusters of the olive yield their fatness in Gethsemane. The ruthless Maronites and Druses have not been able to exterminate the cedars of Lebanon; and at the fountain of Siloam the moss springs out of the wall, as did the "hyssop" in the days of Solomon. The almond-tree flourishes along the Jordan, and, like a canopy of silver, shines against the sky of a cloudless spring, even as when it first invited the youth of Judah to the fields and villages, and its snowy blossoms on leafless branches reminded the sumptuous monarch of approaching age. Sycamores grow by the way-side, as when Zaccheus climbed into one to catch a glimpse of the illustrious Stranger; and the Arabian pitches his tent beneath the Terebinth, like Abraham when he received his angel visitors at Mamre. Jericho was the city of palm-trees in the time of Moses,—with the leaves of the palm the jub-lant procession carpeted the pathway of their king as they conducted him to Jerusalem from Jericho—and probably most of us have seen dates from Jericho. The pine, cypress, and myrtle, still cast their shadow, though no feast of tabernacles return, whose bowers they once adorned. Sharon has not lost its rose; and near the Mount of Beatitudes we recognise the gorgeous amaryllis, the descendant of those very lilies to which the Divine Teacher pointed one autumn evening, eighteen hundred years ago, and bade his disciples "consider" them, with a feeling which the greatest botanist of his day (Smith) has characterised "as the highest honour ever done to the study of plants." Hasselquist (p. 134) was charmed with the jasmine of Palestine; another traveller speaks with rapture of the delicious odour which sprang at every step of his way from Jerusalem to Jaffa, when the long-looked-for rains had revived the rosemary, thyme, balm, and other aromatic herbs; and Maundrell understood the allusion of the prophet (Hosea xiv. 1), in the glen of Lebanon, where Canobin lies embosomed. This valley "is on both sides exceeding steep and high, clothed with fragrant greens from top to bottom, and every where refreshed with fountains, falling down from the rocks in pleasant cascades—the ingenious work of nature."

It usually happens, that, where nature has been bountiful, man is indolent. The husbandman of Jaffa scratches the sandy mould, throws in a handful of melon seed, and, till the heat of summer reminds him of his vegetable fountain, gives himself no concern about his crop. True, it requires no labour; but neither will he encumber himself with other harvests that need more. The Hedouin, who nestles among the ruins of Palmyra, surveys its long vistas of roofless columns, and mountain-heaps of broken architecture, without the most distant thought of imitating what magicians have done. When Mr Burchell landed at the Cape, and his floricultural compunctions were awakened by treading under every step some magnificent heath, or geranium, or aloe, the pride of an English conservatory, he was mortified to find in the gardens nothing but some pining samples of European botany. Native flowers are always weeds; and from the present flora of Palestine we cannot certainly infer the contents of its ancient gardens; nor from the beauties of its natural scenery, or the fertility of its soil, does it necessarily follow that its inhabitants displayed taste in their gardens, or possessed gardens at all.

So far as the eastern gardens of the present day may be expected to throw light on the subject, they do not lead us to hope for much. Damascus was one of the four paradises of the East, and still might be. A rill of water suffices, without other labour, to insure a return from trees, which, once planted, receive scarce any tending. But the disorderly medley within corresponds with the rudeness of the clay wall without. The most abject and improvident utilitarianism regulates the husbandry and horticulture of a Turk. At a distance, Damascus, with its tall minarets and shining domes, looks like a city of palaces in a vast wood. So glorious is the sight, that the spot is still pointed out where Mahomet first beheld it from afar, and turned away with the exclamation, "But one paradise is designed for man, and I am resolved not to have mine in this world." Had he ventured nearer, his frailty might have stood the trial. Those summer houses, which glitter so gaily in the distance, rear their sultry grandeur in flowerless orchards—not gardens—and the stream of the Barrady is diverted and finally dried up, in watering trees planted without taste, cultivated without skill, and yielding fruit with proportionate profit. To the accurate and observant Maundrell, we owe a minute account of the Emir Faccardine's garden at Beroot. It was almost entirely filled with orange trees. It was a quadrangle, divided into sixteen squares, four in a row, with walks between. All these walks were shaded by orange trees, on which the fruit hung thicker than he ever saw apples in England. The plats were bordered with stone, and intersected with stone gutters for conveying water over the garden, a little outlet supplying every two. On one side of the garden were two terrace walks, rising the one above the other, and shaded with an arbour and summer-houses at the end. Our traveller adds, "were this place under the cultivation of an English gardener, it is impossible any thing could be made more delightful. But these Hesperides were put to no better use, when he saw them, than to serve as a fold for sheep and goats; insomuch, that in many places they were up to the knees in dirt." Yet Faccardine's visit to Italy had enabled him to improve prodigiously on the gardens of this country, which are said to be "nothing else but a confused miscellany of trees jumbled together, without either knots, walks, arbours, or any thing of art or design, so that they seem like thickets rather than gardens." Nor is it a very flattering account which Dr Russell gives of the gardens of Aleppo. No care is bestowed in levelling the soil, and removing unsightly deformities. Patches of ground are sown or planted with melons, cucumbers, legumes, cotton, tobacco, clover, and barley, to be cut green for the horses, interspersed with which "are large plantations of cherry trees, plums and pomegranates, and sometimes groves, composed of the various fruit-trees that the country produces. All these trees are standards, and though sometimes planted in rows, they are for the most part crowded close together, with little regard to symmetry, forming wild and almost impenetrable thickets. But a more complete shade is met with in other parts of the grounds, formed by tufts of lofty trees, which, uniting their branches at top, give shelter to roses of different sorts, and to a profusion of wild aromatic herbs, which thus protected from the sun, long retain their fragrance. The flowers cultivated for sale contribute little to the ornament of the gardens, being neither displayed regularly in parterres, nor artfully scattered among the plantations."

Exactly similar were the gardens which Dr Shaw found in Bombay in the early part of last century, and which, in their productions, bear a close resemblance to those of ancient Palestine. "There is nothing laid out in them with method, beauty, or design; the whole being a medley only, or confusion of fruit trees, with beds or plantations of cabbages, turnips, beans, garvanços, &c., nay, sometimes of wheat and barley interspersed. Fine walks, parterres, and flower-plats, would be to these people the loss of so much profitable soil; as planting in order and regularity, the study of soils and composts, or the aiming at any new improvements, would be so many deviations from the practice of their ancestors, whose footsteps they follow with the utmost devotion and reverence."

From such accounts, which are confirmed by Pococke, Niebuhr, Clarke, and a multitude of modern travellers, it has been too hastily inferred, that the gardens of the early Jews could exhibit no display of taste or skill. From the productions of a modern garden in the East, we may very reasonably infer what herbs and trees grew in its ancient gardens; for the climate which encouraged or required the vine or the melon in former days is likely still to favour their growth, and make them objects of desire. But from the tawdry taste or indolence of modern Turks or Moors, we have no right to charge similar vices on the free and opulent possessors of ancient Palestine. We may have seen the garden of an old mansion converted into a potato-plot or a sheep-paddock; but it would certainly be unfair to judge of the horticultural skill of its ancient proprietors from the propensities of its modern possessors. The men who have filled up the fish ponds, and dilapidated the terraces of Solomon, are not likely to have preserved his landscape-gardening either.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCH TOWARDS THE WORLD: BEING THE SUBSTANCE OF

BY THE REV. JOHN WEIR,

Minister of the Presbyterian Church, Newry, Ireland.

“Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time.”—Col. iv. 5.

THE epistle which presents us with an important subject of meditation this evening, was originally addressed by the Apostle Paul to the Church at Colosse—a city of Asia Minor. Thither, “according to the dispensation of the grace of God,” “the word of the truth of the Gospel had come, as in all the world, and had brought forth fruit since the day they heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth.” Once these Colossian converts had been “alienated,” but now they were “reconciled through the body of Christ’s flesh through death,” that he might present them holy and unblameable in his sight. Once they had been idolaters, now they had “turned from dumb idols to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, even Jesus who delivered them from the wrath to come.” Once they had indulged in all those abominations, “for the which things sake the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience,” but now they “had been renewed in the spirit of their mind, and had put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.”

Here was a trophy of Sovereign grace! Here was a glorious and convincing proof, that He who had “spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly,” though now ascended to his throne, went forth with his apostles by the might of his Spirit, so that with nobler honours than those of the Roman general returning from the campaign of conquest with captive monarchs and soldiers in his train, they could exclaim, “Now, thanks be unto God who always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place!”

Our text is addressed to the Church of God in all ages, and it plainly teaches us that there are certain duties to be performed by the Church to the world, in order to win back the ungodly to that rightful allegiance which Jehovah claims.

In order, however, to appreciate the force of the passage, we shall, in humble dependence on the blessing of “the Lord the Spirit,” notice, First, The class of characters mentioned, “those that are without;” Second, The class of characters implied and addressed, “those that are within;” Third, The duties demanded of the latter class towards the former, “walk in wisdom towards them, redeeming the time.”

I. “Those that are without.” The language of the apostle is most graphic; it irresistibly carries us back to the hour of the fall when man was driven out from the presence of an angry God; and when he was taught by the cherubim and the flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life, that he was indeed “without.” The whole race was now shut out by sin from the paradise of God on earth, and from the nobler Eden above. But in that hour of dark despair, the first promise gave a faint yet cheering development of the wondrous plan whereby “the banished might not for ever be expelled.” They who believed its testimony thenceforth were “without” no more. These were “the sons of God,” the descendants of the holy Seth, the rest were the posterity of the impenitent fratricide Cain; and the distinction thus early established, strikingly illustrates the Saviour’s declaration to Nicodemus, “That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit.”

* The following Sermon was delivered in St Cuthbert’s Parish Church, Edinburgh, on the Evening of Sabbath, May 23, 1841. Mr Weir was one of the Deputation from the Irish Presbyterian Church to the General Assembly.

1. The text describes the Gentiles.—When we apply the description of the apostle to the world before the flood, corruption is implied, for “all flesh had corrupted their way before God,” and “the imaginations of man’s heart were only evil, and that continually.” And therefore, “it repented the Lord that he had made man; and he said, I will destroy man whom I have created from off the face of the earth.” When we trace the history of the world after the flood, tremendous guilt is implied in the destruction of the cities of the plain. In the very calling of Abraham, idolatry proclaims its fearful existence. He was summoned to “come out from his country and his kindred, unto a land which God would show him.” And for what purpose? plainly that he might be among them that were “without” no longer, and that, snapping every tie that bound him to his country and his home, he might escape the contaminating atmosphere of the Chaldean gods whom his own kindred “served beyond the flood.” And thus was it, my brethren, in Old Testament times, with the mass of mankind. Do you think of Egypt? She was the cradle of the sciences. Her magnificent ruins, her sculptured temples, and tombs, and her majestic pyramids—all tell of her intellectual power. Yet her inhabitants, “professing to be wise became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man, and to birds, and to four footed beasts and creeping things. They changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature, rather than the Creator, who is over all blessed for evermore.” Do you ask of Greece?

“The land where poets swept the lyre—
Where patriot warriors fought.”

Greece, where Socrates and Plato taught—where an Appelles traced on the canvas, the loveliness which his pencil immortalized,—and where a Praxiteles by his chisel invested the marble with all but the breathing beauty of life! There, all were “without;”—and in the blindness of their ignorance, and amid the multitude of their temples, the polished citizens of Athens erected an altar to "the unknown God." The youth of Greece might engage in agonistic contests at their celebrated "games," but they were never taught by their philosophers to "agonize to enter in at the strait gate." They might be trained to the art of fighting, but they knew nothing of "fighting the good fight of faith." They did rush with wing-footed speed to the goal, but they had no knowledge of "running with patience the Christian race, looking unto Jesus." Their ambition might be gratified by the fading crown of ivy, or of laurel, wreathed around their brows, but they were never fired by the holy ambition of winning "a crown of glory that fadeth not away." Finally, in looking to the Gentile nations of old, do you think of Rome, the mistress of the world, who brought all nations tributaries to her feet? She was ignorant of the sceptre of "a God of peace." She was drunk with human blood, and her depraved populace revelled in all licentiousness and cruelty. Thus was the Gentile world "without God and without hope;" and thus it is now with six hundred millions of our race, the inhabitants of China and Japan, of India and Central Asia, of Africa, and of the islands of the sea, save where Christian truth has penetrated and prevailed. Nay, the larger portion of the inhabitants of Europe, of Christendom itself, are "without." The masses in our own great cities to whom the Sabbath comes in vain, and not less the formalists and hypocritical professors, with which the visible Church itself abounds in this day of easy profession, these, all these, are in the eye of God "without." How dreadful is the thought! They are without the pale of the Church's light,—of the Church's peculiar privileges and provision,—of the Church's omnipotent protection,—and must, if grace prevent not, be for ever without the gates of the Church's final and eternal home.

2. The Jews must also be classed among "them that are without."—For two thousand years they were "within." For them God "made bare his arm" in bringing them forth from bondage; for them he provided "angel's food," and "water from the flinty rock;" and the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, their miraculous passage of the Jordan, their peaceful possession of Canaan—all proclaimed that "the eternal God was their refuge, and underneath them were the everlasting arms." "To them pertained the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises." Theirs "were the fathers; and of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." But when He came, they rejected and crucified the Lord of glory. As the awful result, their "house was left unto them desolate;" the army of Titus burnt their temple, rased their city walls, butchered more than a million of its inhabitants, and carried away the rest into slavery. Since then, Israel has been degraded and oppressed. It is one of the darkest stains on Popery, that throughout the middle ages she sanctioned the persecution of the Jews; and that, at this hour, in Italy and in Rome itself, she brands him as the companion of the dog. As a nation then, Israel is "without."—A veil is on their hearts; and the curse of "His blood," whom their fathers slew, rests heavily upon them.

"Tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast,
When shall ye see away, and be at rest?
The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave, Mankind his country, Israel but the grave!"

II. We come now to notice the class of characters here implied, and who are addressed by the apostle, "those that are within."

1. From the beginning of the world, till the birth of Christ, there was in every age a class of men emphatically "within."—Such was Abel, who offered of the firstlings of his flock in faith of the Great Atonement accomplished in "the fulness of the time." Such was Enoch, who "walked with God;" who, in an infidel and corrupt age, was "faithful among the faithless;" and who, in his translation to glory without tasting of the bitterness of death, proclaimed to men that verily there was a just God, who, while He punished his enemies, would recompense his righteous servants. Such, too, was Noah, the "preacher of righteousness;" Abraham, "the friend of God;" and just Lot, "that righteous man" who, "dwelling among" the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, "in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds." And need I remind you, that of this class were Moses, "the man of God;" and Caleb and Joshua, who "followed the Lord fully;" that such was "the band of men who went with Saul to Gibeath, whose heart God had touched;" that of this "holy seed," these "vessels unto honour" were Samuel and the prophets—David and his righteous descendants on Judah's throne—Jehosaphat, Asa, and Josiah—the seven thousand, in Elijah's day, who had "not bowed the knee to the image of Baal"—and that noble company, in the dark days of Malachi, who "feared the Lord, and spake often one to another?"

2. This class has been still more numerous since the incarnation of the Redeemer.—True, they were a "little flock" at first; for "He came to his own, and his own received him not." We behold this class in the eleven faithful apostles, who speak through the lips of Peter, saying, "Lord, to whom shall we go, but unto thee: thou hast the words of eternal life?" We see it increased in the one hundred and twenty who met in the upper room on the morning of the day of Pentecost—in the three thousand who were converted under Peter's sermon—in "the multitude of them that believed"—in "the great company of the priests obedient to the faith"—and in "such as should be saved" added daily to the Church. And with fresh accumulating power we behold the Church of Christ enlarging her boundaries, and "within" these receiving large accessions from the world "without." Behold the door of faith opened to the Gentiles by Peter, and the "Lord giving testimony to the word of his grace, when Philip speaks to the Ethiopian eunuch! Behold the bloody persecutor Saul himself arrested and brought "within"—his whole heart changed in a moment from pride to humility, from unbelief to faith, and from enmity to love! Follow him, as he goes forth as "a chosen vessel" throughout every part of the known world, and see what multitudes he is honoured to turn from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Add to his labours those of the other apostles and early evangelists of the Cross, and what do you find? At the end of the first century, a heathen historian testifies that the temples of the pagan gods were almost entirely deserted, and that the animals sold for sacrifice could scarcely find a purchaser! True, ten persecutions raged in succession, and multitudes fell like leaves before the blighting breeze of autumn; but the more the Church was oppressed, the more she multiplied and grew; and, at the end of the third century, Rome, pagan Rome, is overthrown, and Christianity becomes the established religion of the world!

A dark cloud, however, soon began to cover the moral heavens. The "great apostasy" speedily developed itself, and threw its pall over Europe for more than a thousand years. And yet, during that long period of sorrow and tears, there can be traced in the Cathari and Image Breakers, in the Waldenses and Albigenses, against whom Rome sent forth her bloody crusades—in the early Irish Church and the faithful Culdees, the class of whom we speak—those that are "within." And then comes the promise of enlargement in Wycliffe, "the morning star of the Reformation." Next Luther, and Calvin, and Cranmer, and Knox, men born for the crisis, each puts the silver trumpet to his lips, and lo! Christendom shakes off her fetters, and awakes from her slumbers! Then "the Lord gave the Word, and great was the company of them that published it." Since that time (with some melancholy periods of decline excepted), the Churches of the Reformation, "walking in the fear of the Lord and the comfort of the Holy Ghost, have been edified and multiplied." And what do we behold in the present age? The sensible diminution of the boundaries of Satan's empire, and "times of refreshing" over the whole earth "from the presence of the Lord." And, O! how joyful the thought, that these are but as the first droppings of the shower of Pentecostal effusion which prophecy encourages us to expect, and that soon, in answer to believing and united prayer, there will be "the sound of abundance of rain." The present is but the sowing of the seed—the future will be the springing of the plant; the present is but the formation of the bud—the future will be the expansion of the full-blown flower; the present is but the breaking of the dawn in the dappled and rosy east—the future will be the meridian splendour of the perfect day!

Dear brethren, permit me to put to you the solemn question, Have you reason to believe that you are among the "called, and chosen, and faithful"—that you are, indeed, among those that are "within?" Are you "within," as Noah and his family were within the ark? Are you "within," as the manslayer was within the gates of the city of refuge? Are you "within," as hewn out of the quarry of nature by the Great Architect the Spirit, and built as "lively stones" "upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone?" Are you "within," as branches abiding in the "True Vine," and bringing forth "the fruits of righteousness?" Are you "within," "entering in through the door, going in and out" under the care of the "Great Shepherd," and "finding pasture?" Are you "within," so as to enjoy the security of Him of whom it is written, "He dwelleth on high; his defence shall be the munition of rocks?" Do you know what it is to be "in Christ," washed in the fountain of his blood, covered with the garments of his righteousness, and made temples of the Holy Ghost? If so, then we hail you as "brethren beloved, partakers of the benefit." We would animate your love and hope, by pointing you to that blessed hour, when He who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth, shall say, with regard to you and all the ransomed of the Lord, "Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation, which keepeth the truth, may enter in! Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city!" There, with the glorious company of prophets, the goodly fellowship of apostles, the noble army of martyrs, with all the children of God—an innumerable multitude out of every language and tongue, and nation and people—you shall stand before the throne and before the Lamb, with white robes, and palms in your hands, and your voices shall swell the eternal hallelujah of praise! But, ere you pass from earth to heaven—before you mingle with the ransomed throng of the Church invisible above,—as members of the Church visible on earth my text demands of you the discharge of certain duties towards "the world that lieth in wickedness." I therefore proceed to consider,

III. The exhortation here addressed to you by the apostle, "Walk in wisdom towards them that are without, redeeming the time."

1. The disciples of Christ are to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, by shunning the society and discountenancing the practices of the ungodly.—How clearly does this appear from the words of Solomon, "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil, that is understanding?" Accordingly, we find Jehovah addressing his people, saying, "Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate; and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." "He that walketh with the wise, shall be wise; but the companion of fools shall be destroyed." "Have no fellowship," saith the apostle, "with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."

2. The disciples of Christ are called on, by the spirit of my text, to exhibit a consistent profession and a holy example before men.—Was it not thus with the primitive Churches, of whom the world without “took knowledge that they had been with Jesus?” Oh! what a glorious testimony to the reality of the apostolic authority of Paul, (which the Judaizing teachers denied,) when addressing the Corinthian Church he could use such language as this, “Ye are our epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men!” How happy the minister who can thus triumphantly put to shame all the arrogant claims of an exclusive “apostolic succession” doctrine, by pointing to the seals of his ministry, and to the evidence that God hath made him “an able minister of the New Testament,” by the consistency of the professions, and the holiness of the lives, of his people! Dear brethren, I ask you, can your pastors produce such evidence with regard to you? or, alas! are there some here to-night “who have a name to live, and are dead,” and to whom the language fearfully applies, “Many walk of whom I have now told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ?” I call upon all who, by a living faith, are indeed “within,” to walk in wisdom towards them that are “without,” by aiming at a standard of elevated piety. Beware of conformity to the world. Remembering the history of border ground, and its dangers, keep far within the territories of the Prince of Peace. “Let your light so shine before men that others seeing your good works, may glorify your Father who is in heaven.” “Do all things without murmurings and disputings, that ye may be the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation; shining as lights in the world, and holding forth” (as the lighthouse the beacon to the mariner on the dark and stormy sea) “the word of life.”

3. The disciples of Christ are called upon, by my text, to the active manifestation of Christian love “towards them that are without.”—It is this spirit which conquers the strong promptings of resentment and revenge, and which in the light of that cross where was exhibited the triumph of forgiveness, says to you, “Recompense to no man evil for evil.” It is this which sanctifies natural benevolence, and inspires with a god-like philanthropy. It was this that, filling the heart of a Howard, led him to sympathize with the sighing of the prisoner, and to “compare and collate the distresses of men in all countries.” It was this that animated the apostle to say, with a love of souls which the prospect of martyrdom could not quench, “Yea, and if I be offered” (poured out as a libation) “upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all!” And what but this has led to the activity and liberality which are the great characteristics of the present age? What but this has produced and sustained those great Societies which are sending forth the Bible in every dialect and language of the millions of mankind, and which are making England’s political influence and commercial greatness subservient to the preaching and the triumphs of the everlasting Gospel throughout the whole world? I recognise this spirit, and its blessed results, in all which has been attempted and accomplished for Gentile idolaters,—for the slaves of Mahommedan imposture,—for the blinded votaries of a superstition which usurps the Christian name,—and in whatever has been done, and is now doing, by the Protestant Churches of these lands for the salvation of the “lost sheep of the house of Israel.” I see its operation in the great enterprises of Home, and City, and Colonial Missions, and in the extension of the means of grace for the destitute masses of our own population. And in the existence of that spirit,—in the source from whence it has descended,—in the glorious consummation at which it aims,—I find a glorious pledge that the Church shall never cease from its active manifestation until the trumpet of jubilee shall be blown over a liberated and rejoicing world!

4. But prayer for the out-pouring of the Spirit is absolutely required, by the exhortation of my text.—And why? Because the Church is dependent on that Spirit in all her efforts for the good of “them that are without.” Without Him, the preacher may, with the very intenseness of compassionate concern, “persuade men, in Christ’s stead, to be reconciled unto God,” but there are no souls convinced of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, among the sinners to whom he appeals. Like Ezekiel among his impenitent countrymen, he will be “like the lovely song of one that bath a pleasant voice, and that playeth sweetly upon an instrument; for they hear his words and they do them not.” Without that Spirit, we may send our Missionaries to the heathen, but idolatry will remain unshaken as before; we may send our Bibles forth among the nations, but it will be but “the letter that killeth,” instead of “the Spirit that giveth life.” The Hindoo will continue to prefer his Shasters,—the Mussulman, his Koran,—the slave of the Popery, his Manual, and Lives of the pretended Saints. While we look with an eye of love upon Israel, “scattered and peeled,” not till the Spirit is given will “the veil that is on his heart, in the reading of the Old Testament, be taken away,” not till then, with Nathaniel, will he exclaim, “Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel.” I invite and entreat you, then, Christian brethren, to pray for a baptism of the Holy Ghost to descend upon a lost world. Not only separate yourselves from the children of disobedience,—not only exhibit before them the light and the loveliness of a holy example,—not only warn your blaspheming, or intemperate, or impure, or covetous neighbours, that “the end of these things is death;”—but add to all, and above all, “effectual fervent prayer” for the descent of the Spirit.

5. These duties towards the world must be performed with promptness, without delay, “re- deeming the time." Time has been lost in indolence, buy it back by active and untiring efforts for the good of men. The time that remains to you is short, and soon the golden opportunity for "serving your generation, by the will of God," shall have passed away for ever." As you have, therefore, opportunity, do good unto all men. Far from supposing that ministers alone can win souls to Christ, be up and active in your respective spheres, remembering that bright world where even Grace shall bestow her rewards with a discriminating hand,—where "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever!"

Finally. In the spirit of my text, I plead tonight in behalf of the interests of a church situated in a most densely inhabited and spiritually destitute locality.* When a Christian stranger visits your celebrated city, he feels that it must arrest all eyes, and charm all hearts. He sees one portion of it bringing back the historic and great national deeds of "hoar antiquity,"—the other exhibiting the triumph of the architectural skill and taste of modern times. Around all he beholds the fair and noble scenery which the God of nature has scattered with a lavish hand; but more charming than all these, to his eye, are the spires that point to heaven, and the temples in which "faithful men" declare "the whole counsel of God." For the funds of such a temple I ask your aid; and remembering the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," give liberally and cheerfully to this holy cause. And may God bless abundantly his Word, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen!

SELF-EXAMINATION.

THANK happy they! that enter now the court
Heaven opens in their bosoms. But, how rare!
Ah me! that magnanimity how rare!
What hero like the man who stands himself;
Who dares to meet his naked heart alone;
Who hears, intrepid, the full charge it brings,
Resolved to silence future murmurs there?
The coward flies; and, flying, is undone.

The coward flies;
Thinks, but thinks lightly; asks, but fears to know;
Asks, "What is truth?" with Pilate; and retires;
Dissolves the court, and mingles with the throng:
Asylum sad! from reason, hope, and heaven!

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

"Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?"—My fellow-sinner, I am to speak a last word to thee: I do it with affection for thy soul. I would ask, How do you mean to die? Is it as you are living,—careless, foolish, impenitent, scoffing? Would you die what you are, an impenitent and unpardoned sinner? Now, do not tell me that you mean to die like a Christian, if you will not begin to live like one. It will be a terrible thing to have to learn repentance, faith, conflict, devotedness, regeneration, sanctification, all within the space of a few short hours, amid weakness, faintness, pain, agony, and, it may be, delirium and stupor. I will not say that there never is such a thing as a death-bed repentance, or conversion; but I believe that it is no common thing, especially in cases where men have been secretly putting the whole matter off to that hour; for God knows that secret intention, and it grievously insults his mercy. It presents his creatures saying, "I know very well that I ought to repent, but I will not do it yet: I will take my fill of sin, I will give to God the last dregs of life." Now, what must God think of that language? Yet thus your heart speaks when you put off repentance to your death-bed. O it is with a heavy heart that ministers visit the death-beds of the ungodly! they are so afraid of deceiving, or giving false comfort; their only satisfaction is, to do what they can to warn, exhort, invite the dying sinner to come, ere too late, to Christ; then to pray with and for him; and then to leave the issue with the all-wise God. But, sinner, am I to leave thee as I found thee, with the soul in danger? There are some here who are on their way to glory. Are they and you presently to part, as by two opposite paths? O what shall I say to arouse thee? What can I say more, if the prospect of the soul lost, heaven lost, Christ rejected, cannot move thee? Has thy soul no feeling? Is it incapable of hope and fear, of love and gratitude, of desire and expectation? O what a thing is sin, which has hardened, blinded, sensualized, that heart, which, if given to God through Christ, might have been soft, tender, affectionate, and gentle! Sinner, I must leave thee. I suppose that I ought to threaten thee with hell; but thou hast hell begun. There is no heaven in thy heart; there is no foretaste of heaven's peace, and joy, and blessedness, in that wretched soul. Is there any? I will add no threat, thou art miserable enough already; my last words with thee shall not be a threat, but an invitation. I invite thee for the last time. Come yet, come now, as a guilty sinner, to Jesus Christ. Tell him how nearly thou hadst rejected him and salvation; ask for pardon through his name; accept the mercy which he so freely offers.—HAMBLETON.

Prayer.—Prayer is an all-efficient panoply, a treasure undiminished, a mine which never is exhausted, a sky unobscured by clouds, a haven unruffled by the storm; it is the root, the fountain, and the mother of a thousand, ten thousand blessings. I speak not of the prayer which is cold and feeble, and devoid of energy; I speak of that which is the child of a contrite spirit, the offspring of a soul converted, lost in a blaze of unutterable inspiration, and winged like lightning for the skies. When a Christian stretches forth his hands to pray, and invokes his God, in that moment he leaves behind him all terrestrial pursuits, and traverses on the wings of intellect the realms of light; he contemplates celestial objects only, and knows not of the present state of things during the period of his prayer, provided that prayer be breathed with fervency. Could we but pray with fervency, could we but pray with a soul resuscitated, a mind awakened, an understanding quickened, then were Satan to appear, he would instantly fly; were the gates of hell to yawn upon us, they would close again. Prayer is an haven to the shipwrecked mariner, an anchor to them that are sinking in the waves, a staff to the limbs that totter, a mine of jewels to the poor, a security to the rich, a healer of diseases, and a guardian of health. Prayer at once secures the continuance of our blessings, and dissipates the cloud of our calamities.—ST CHRYSOSTOM.

The Bible.—Consider what the Word of God does for a sinner. It illuminates the understanding, it warms the heart, it guides the steps, it strengthens the weak, it confirms the strong. The intellect is illuminated by truth, that the same truth may descend into the heart; so that we may not only see with the intellect, but, under the influence of the Spirit of God, feel with the heart its beauty and excellency. The Bible contains directions for the believer at all times, in all places, under whatever circumstances. We understand the doctrine only in exact proportion as we love the precept; and what endears the precept is, to see Jesus dying under the curse, that he might redeem us from the curse. Dwell on this: it forms a motive which, even here on earth, is far more glorious than that which lives in the bosom of an angel. Let this principle be established in the heart by the Holy Spirit, and we shall be artless as children; open as the day before God—as open as before man fell from his innocence. The work of Christ is to bring man back, that God may be enthroned in his affections.—HOWELS.

Tenderness of conscience.—A tender conscience is like the apple of a man's eye,—the least dust that gathers into it, affects it. There is no surer and better way to know whether our consciences are dead and stupid, than to observe what impression small sins make upon them; if we are not very careful to avoid all appearance of evil, and to shun whatever looks like sin; if we are not so much troubled at the vanity of our thoughts and words, at the rising up of sinful motions and desires in us, as we have been formerly, we may then conclude that our hearts are hardened, and our consciences are stupefying,—for a tender conscience will no more allow of small sins than of great sins.—BISHOP HOPKINS.

A CLOSING ADDRESS TO COMMUNICANTS ON A SACRAMENTAL SABBATH.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ALEXANDER,
Minister of Duntocher, Dumbartonshire.

FELLOW-COMMUNICANTS.—The solemn work of sitting down at a communion table, in obedience to our blessed and beloved Lord's dying command, and of there eating the bread, and drinking the wine, in commemoration of his wonderful love;—this solemn work being now over, I would crave your indulgence a little longer, while I briefly exhort you in a few words:—

Fellow-communicants, I know not whether you have now made a warrantable approach at the table of the Lord. God knoweth. This, however, I do know, that you have been engaged this day in most serious, most solemn work. You have been transacting business for eternity,—business which must affect your weal, or your woe for ever,—business which, ere long, must be brought forward and reviewed at the court of final judgment. It would be wise in you, therefore, to examine carefully and thoroughly into the business you have presently transacted, to see whether it will be profitable or unprofitable to you,—whether or not it will stand the searching scrutiny of the holy and righteous Judge,—the scrutiny of Him who scanneth the motives, and trieth the reins, and knoweth the hearts of the children of men. What have you been doing, then, this day, at the table of the Lord? I will tell you what you were doing, and what you did do. You made a covenant,—a covenant with Christ, or a covenant with your sins,—a covenant of life, or a covenant of death,—a covenant of salvation, or a covenant of condemnation. Yes, either of these two covenants, this day in this church, and at that table, you did make; and, moreover, you made it most solemnly,—you called heaven and earth to witness,—you summoned angels and men to bear you testimony,—you appealed to the God of truth himself for your sincerity,—yea, you ratified and confirmed your covenant with blood, even with the blood of the Cross. Now, communicants, which of these two covenants did you make? Do not evade the question. You cannot evade it. Evade it now, and it will meet you like a thunder-clap at judgment. Was it with Christ, or with your sins, you covenanted? Conscience! thou vicegerent of heaven in the human heart,—conscience! in the name of thy Maker, I call upon thee; in the name of the Omniscient God, I summon thee at this time to speak out and tell the truth. Was it with your sins, then, communicant,—was it with your sins you covenanted this day at the communion table? With your sins—was it? And so you were not contented simply with standing aloof and rejecting Christ, but you must come to his banqueting-house to insult him?—were not satisfied merely with keeping fast hold of your sins, but must step forward to this holy ordinance to strengthen your hold, and if possible to render the union and friendship between you and them more close, more endearing, and more imperishable?—not satisfied merely with trampling the blood of Christ under your feet, and thereby counting it an unholy thing, but must even come to his table to have that blood poured upon your head to curse you,—yea, to have it poured upon your sins, not indeed to wash them out, but to brighten them,—not to wipe them away, but to make them like scarlet, to render them red like crimson? This, unworthy communicant, this was your covenant, was it? Ashamed of your sins before men, you made a show of renouncing them; and honouring Christ before men, you made a show of embracing him; while before God you were not ashamed to hug your sins to your bosom, and to spurn and spit upon the Son of his love,—were not ashamed to cry out, Crucify him, crucify him, away with him, away with him—not this man, but my lusts and my sins—not this man, but Barabbas the robber. This, unworthy communicant, this is your covenant—the covenant you have this day solemnly ratified and confirmed. And what think you of it, now that its terms and its import have been explained and rehearsed in your hearing? Is your mind made up,—is your resolution taken—and are you prepared to abide by its consequences? Down, unworthy communicant, down upon your knees, lest the God of vengeance hurl a thunderbolt at your head, and strike you down in your sins. Down upon your knees, and dissolve your covenant with death, and break asunder your agreement with hell, and turn your back upon your sins. Down upon your knees, and lift up your eyes to heaven, and look up unto Him whom you have this day wounded and pierced, and cry out before him the helpless yet hopeful and mighty cry of faith, "Lord save me, or I perish." You are fast sinking amid the depths of your sins, like waves they are rolling over you, like floods of water they are encompassing you, like the boundless ocean they are about to swallow you up,—the ark of the covenant is receding further and further away from you,—the Spirit of God is ceasing to strive with you,—the day of grace is well-nigh done with you,—your case is dark and dreadful,—it is all but desperate,—all but hopeless. But there is hope. Down upon your knees, therefore, oh! down this night, this moment upon your knees, and cry out for mercy. "O Lord, thou Son of David, have mercy upon me." Care not who hears you, so be that God hears you. Cry out as if judgment were come, and the books were opened; cry out as if you already felt the devouring flames beginning to feed upon you; cry out as if already the echo of the weepings and the wailings of lost souls were falling upon your ear; cry out thus in faith; cry out thus believing, and yet there is mercy for thee, yet there is pardon for thee, yet there is salvation for thee; yea, though thou wert the very chiefest sinner that ever lived, still there is efficacy enough and virtue enough in the blood of the Lamb slain, to cleanse and save you from all your sins, for Christ himself doth say, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." And coming unto him, "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." And may God give you grace to come by faith unto this Almighty Saviour, that your sins may be washed away in his precious blood.

But, again, there are some among you, I would hope, who, instead of covenanting this day with your sins, have covenanted with Christ. Fellow-communicants! ye did well thus to renounce sin, and thus to renew and establish your covenant with your Lord. Ye did well to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan—get thee behind me, sin—get thee behind me, world—what have I any more to do with idols?" Ye did well to say, "Whom have I, O Lord, in the heavens but thee, and there is none upon all the earth that I can desire besides thee; my flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." Ye did well, communicants, in saying thus, and in covenanting thus. Ye have this day chosen the better part. God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost—the three-ones God—the Redeemer of Jacob—the Holy One of Israel—He, even he is the portion of your souls. And having such a portion, you shall lack no good thing; for the Lord God is a sun and shield, he will give grace and glory—grace here, and glory hereafter; yea, no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. You are poor indeed in yourselves; but having God the Father for your portion, he will enrich you with that favour which is life, and that loving-kindness which is better than life. You are indeed guilty sinners by nature; but having God the Son for your portion, he will bestow upon you all the unspeakable blessings of that salvation which he hath purchased with his blood.

You are surrounded, indeed, with many dangers, and encompassed about with great infirmities; but having God the Holy Ghost for your portion, he will lead you and guide you,—lead you by the still waters, and guide you to the green pastures of Zion; yea, he will conduct you in the paths of righteousness and peace. If Jehovah Jesus, therefore, be your portion, there is nothing you shall want. Whatsoever ye shall ask, believing, even that you shall receive. If he hath loved you, and given himself for you; what else is there he can withhold? If he hath loved you, and given himself to you; what greater blessing could he bestow? If he hath loved you, and given his Spirit to dwell in you; what richer gift could ye receive? Be satisfied, then, communicants, with your portion; for, ye have indeed got a goodly heritage. Ye have the Spirit testifying with your spirit that ye are the sons of God; and, if sons, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ. Heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ!—Astonishing! What! is the creature the heir of the Creator,—the heir of the universe? Yes, dear fellow-communicants, ye are the heirs of all things; heaven is yours, the earth is yours, and the fulness thereof; things present and things to come are yours, life is yours, and death itself is yours; for all things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's. Oh! what a rich, what a royal, what a noble inheritance. Enough, surely, to make a poor man rich; enough to make a sick man well; enough, one would even think, to make a sinner a saint. Communicants, it doth not now appear what you shall be; the men of the world know it not, they believe it not, they see it not; and, therefore, they may look down upon you and despise you, as they despised your Master of old; but, when your Elder Brother cometh the second time, then the mystery will be revealed, for he will tell of all the riches, and speak of all the dignity, and proclaim abroad all the glory, which he hath prepared and reserved for you at his Father's right hand;—yea, he shall present you with a throne, with a crown, with a kingdom, and, clothed in the robes of blessedness and beauty, you shall sit down with him in the new Jerusalem, and reign with him for ever and ever. But, communicants, though all things be yours, yet there is one exception,—there is one thing not yours, and that is yourself; ye are not your own, ye are Christ's. "The Lord's portion is his people, and Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Ye are Christ's, therefore, his property, his portion, his inheritance. He bought you with his blood, he hath redeemed you to himself. Take care, then, of Christ's property. Devote yourselves to his service. Give not yourselves up to the world, nor to sin, nor to the devil; but give yourselves up wholly to Christ, in thought, in word, and in deed. And ever remember, that they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts,—that they are a peculiar people, zealous of good works,—that they run on in the way of his commandments with alacrity and delight, and live at all times to the praise and the glory of his grace.

But once more, I would yet speak a word with another class of persons, and what I shall say, though I may say it strongly, still, you may rest assured, it shall not on that account be the less kind and affectionate. The class of persons to whom I allude are those who are not communicants,—those who never have obeyed,—who are stoutly determined, in spite of every warning, and in spite of every remonstrance, not to obey our Lord's last dying command,—"do this in remembrance of me." Fellow-sinners, for fellow-communicants I cannot call you, and fellow-Christians, I will not,—yea, dare not call you; for, by your own deliberate and voluntary act this day, you have declared yourselves to have not even the shadow of a title to the name: Fellow-sinners, then,—since that alone appropriately designates you,—why is it that you will not obey Christ's command, to show forth his death? You allow that it is a command of Christ, you allow that it is a command which was given under peculiar and solemn circumstances,—given on the night on which he was betrayed,—the night before he suffered and hung on the cross; you allow all this: Why, then, will you not obey it? why is it that ye communion seasons have now passed over your heads since we first came amongst you, and still you are daring and hard-hearted rebels to the King of Zion's dying command? I say daring rebels; for the King of Zion keepeth the key of hell, and can unlock the door of that flaming prison, and cast you into it at his pleasure. I say hard-hearted rebels; for you would not thus treat your minister. Were he to be summoned away into the land of spirits, and his body buried in some corner of our little kirkyard; and were he to make it his dying request to any of you, that you would annually pay a visit to his grave, and there drop a tear in remembrance of him, because he had often preached to you the Word of Life; we doubt not but you would kindly and cheerfully comply with his request. And why is it, then, that you treat Christ worse than you would treat even your minister? Why is it that you trample and tread upon his dying request? Has he no title, think you, no right, no business to issue his commands, and to exact your implicit and willing obedience? He made you, he upholds you, he preserves you, he gives you every breath you draw, and every comfort you enjoy. That you are not upon a bed of sickness at this moment; that you are not deaf, or dumb, or blind, or lame, or palsied, is simply because he is kind to you, and making goodness and mercy to follow you. Has he, therefore, no right to command you, and no claims upon your obedience? Why, then, will you not obey him, why do you disown his authority? He says expressly: "Do this in remembrance of me;" and you say as expressly: "No, we will not do it in remembrance of you. You may entreat us, you may beseech us, you may command us; you may send your messengers, your ambassadors, your ministers to us, and they may tell us what they please about your power and authority, and about your having the key of hell, and about your claims upon us, and our obligations to thee; still, we do not care about any or all of these things, we will not obey your command, we will not comply with your request, we will not eat bread and drink wine in remembrance of you; others around us may do it, but we will not. Our mind is made up, our resolution is taken, we shall not encompass the communion table." Fellow-sinners, this may not be the language of your mouths, but it is assuredly the language of your actions; and, think you that Christ will not take vengeance upon you for thus basely insulting his divine majesty? Yes, I tell you, when he cometh a second time in flaming fire to take vengeance upon his enemies, he will undoubtedly first take vengeance upon you. But again, I ask you, why will you not eat the bread and drink the wine in remembrance of Christ? It is a very easy,—it is a very simple task, to eat bread and drink wine. Nothing more easy than to sit down at that table, and partake of what is set before you. Why, then, will you not sit down? Ah! brethren, the reason is obvious; though the duty be easy,—though the task be simple, still, you do not love the master of the feast,—you hate him. Yes, you hate Christ, and therefore you do not commemorate him, but wish the very memory of him blotted out from the face of the earth; yea, and are doing what lieth in your power to blot it out; and, if every one were to act as you do, soon, very soon, the knowledge of the fact, that such a personage as Jesus Christ, was crucified in the land of Judea, would disappear, and vanish away, and be altogether forgotten. But, perhaps you say, you do not hate Christ, but love him. Why, then, will you not obey his command and commemorate his death? I will tell you why. You have a burden upon your back,—a weight upon your head; a weight so heavy,—a burden so vast, that you cannot come under it for a token of admission,—that you cannot rise up under it from your pew to enter the communion table. It has crushed you to your pew, it has pressed and borne you down to your seat during the whole of this solemn service, so that you could not move a foot in the direction of the blessed symbols of the broken body and the shed blood of Jesus. And this accursed burden you love, and love so heartily and so dearly, that nothing,—that not even the love of Christ, whom you say you love, (though verily you love him not, else your burden would drop off your back, and fall away into everlasting forgetfulness), that not even the love of Christ, nor the terrors of his law, nor the fear of his wrath, nor the dread of his hell, can induce you to part with it. And, my dear brethren, that vile, that filthy, that heavy burden, is the load of your sins and iniquities,—a load which, if you will not part with it now, will cling to you and cleave to you throughout eternity, and will sink you down and down for ever and for ever into the bottomless deep of the wrath of the Lamb. O brethren! dear brethren, be wise for your souls, and part with your sins and come to Christ. Dying in your present state, better far you had never been born; for dying in your present state, unfit, by your own confession, for sitting down at the table of the Lord upon earth, you must necessarily be unfit for sitting down at the table which is in heaven; and, therefore, dying in your present state, your final and fearful doom must be: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." Be wise, therefore,—Oh, be wise for eternity. This may be the last communion season you shall ever see. Before the next one comes round, you may have gone to give in your account. Oh, have mercy, therefore, upon yourselves,—have mercy upon your souls, and begin now,—this very day, to establish your peace with God through the blood of the Cross. So that, when death doth come to summon you away, he may not find you unprepared; but may find you washed and cleansed in the blood of Christ, and sanctified and made meet by the Spirit of Christ, for sitting down at that blessed and glorious table, which is in the temple above,—a table, that is ever full, and that shall never be withdrawn, and where you shall eat the bread of life, and drink the wine of everlasting gladness and joy. And now, brethren, in conclusion, I commend you all to God, and to the word of his grace. The Lord bless us, and keep us; the Lord make his face to shine upon us, and be gracious unto us; the Lord lift up his countenance upon us, and give us peace,—even that peace of God which passeth all understanding. Amen.

ON THE EXPOSITIONS OF THE SHORTER CATECHISM, AND METHODS OF TEACHING IT.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

THERE are few treatises, of any description (as remarked in a former communication), that have been made the subject of more minute dissection, and enlarged exposition, than the Shorter Catechism. It has been analysed and illustrated in all conceivable modes of examination; yet has its substantial excellence not only sustained no diminution, but rather been rendered more obvious and unquestionable, by its passing uninjured through so many processes of decomposition and recombination. Many of the larger works, however, which have appeared in the form of discourses illustrative of the Shorter Catechism, may be considered rather as popular systems of Christian theology, arranged in the order of the Catechism, and founded upon its statements, as their text-book, than as direct expositions of the Catechism itself. Of this description are, the fragment of such an exposition contained in the works of the Rev. Hugh Binning, entitled, "The Common Principles of the Christian Religion Clearly Proved, and Singularly Improved; or, a Practical Catechism," &c.;—"Sermons on the Shorter Catechism." In three vols. By the Rev. Thomas Boston, sen.;—"Lectures on the Shorter Catechism." By the Rev. Dr Esdaile;—"A Practical Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism; exhibiting a System of Theology in a Popular Form, and particularly adapted for Family Instruction." In two vols. By Dr Henry Belfrage. To these may be added, though more in a catechetical form than as a body of divinity, "The Assembly's Shorter Catechism, Explained by way of Question and Answer." By some Ministers of the Gospel,—and usually known by the name of "Fisher's Catechism." "A Concise System of Theology; or the Shorter Catechism Analysed and Explained, in a Series of Observations on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity." By A. S. Paterson. This work, which has been just published, is one of the most beautiful, complete, and accurate expositions of the Shorter Catechism, which has ever appeared. It is an invaluable manual for Sabbath School and family instruction, unfolding, as it does, the meaning of the Answer to each Question with a clearness and minuteness of detail, which we have never seen equalled in works of the kind. The scriptural quotations, which are numerous and apposite, greatly enhance the value of the volume.

These works, however excellent and useful, as exhibiting a system of theology in a popular form, for family instruction, can scarcely be regarded as expositions of the Shorter Catechism. They are works of a higher order, and a wider compass; and embrace many topics which are not found in the Catechism, and not fitted for that stage of elementary instruction in which it was designed to form the proper guide. They are, in fact, the Shorter Catechism rendered the Larger Catechism; and furnish much valuable instruction for those who have reached a more advanced period of life, or made considerable progress in Christian knowledge. Associated with the name of the Catechism, and arranged according to its order, they may be expected, on these grounds alone, independent of their own merits, to prove most interesting instructors to those who have already learned the words of the Catechism with some measure of understanding, and who love the recollection of its precious truths treasured in their memories. But, in place of aiding, they rather prove incumbrances, in teaching the Catechism to younger persons, and weaker capacities. The great difficulty, already experienced in teaching the Shorter Catechism, arises from the mass of solid matter compressed within its narrow limits, requiring to be separated into smaller portions, and set forth in more familiar forms of speech; but it only increases this difficulty, to present additional topics, and introduce deeper inquiries. Instead of any thing additional, there is need, rather, of something introductory to the Shorter Catechism. By introductory, we do not mean merely catechisms which may be taught previously to the Shorter Catechism, but such as may prove preparatory to the Shorter Catechism. There are various catechisms of this description; such as those by Willison, Watts, Brown, and Thomson. These are all good in their place, and upon their own plan. But they are not constructed upon the method of the Shorter Catechism; and, if it is designed to be indeed the standard and staple of religious instruction among the people, then all such catechisms are in some measure injurious to the easier learning and better understanding of its statements. There is always a disadvantage in varying the forms of elementary instruction in any branch of knowledge,—suppose geography, or grammar; and nothing could be more injudicious than to employ the elementary treatises of one author as preparatory for the more advanced books of another, in place of carrying the learner forward in one uniform plan and strain of instruction. The only catechism, with which we are acquainted, that can be considered as properly introductory to the Shorter Catechism, following the same plan, and employing similar expressions, yet so simplifying the answers as to serve the purpose of a previous exposition, is, “The Child’s Introduction to the Shorter Catechism;” by Mr Gall. It bears nearly the same relation to the Shorter Catechism that the Shorter does to the Larger; and these three,—the Introduction, the Shorter, and the Larger,—followed out in succession, form a complete course of instruction in Christian doctrine and duty.

But besides the benefit of something really introductory, rather than additional, to the Shorter Catechism, there is room for the use of works, on a limited scale, directly expository of what the Catechism actually contains. The most suitable works of this description, with which we are acquainted, are,—

“An Explicatory Catechism,” &c., by Thomas Vincent, originally published about the year 1670; a work which is not free from the fault of introducing additional matter, but which its author himself, therefore, judiciously recommends only as “useful to be read in private families, after examination in the Catechism itself.”

“The Assembly’s Shorter Catechism Explained,” &c., by David Soame, minister of Harborough in 1745, which has been recently republished by Peter Sinclair, Glasgow; a little treatise remarkable for the brevity and clearness of its expositions, and particularly for the precision and propriety with which the proofs from Scripture are adduced.

“A Brief Explication of the Shorter Catechism; by Alexander Mair,” minister of Forteviot; which was published after the death of the author, in 1752, and of which a new edition has been recently reprinted by Messrs Smith and Co., Mon-rose. This is a very clear, concise, and judicious exposition; and which may still be very confidently recommended as a valuable assistant in the instruction of youth, notwithstanding of some alleged inaccuracies in doctrinal statement; for which it may be sufficient to make the same claim for candid construction which the objector has advanced for another work, viz., “That particular expressions must be judged of by the spirit and strain of the whole performance.”

“A Brief Analysis of the Assembly’s Shorter Catechism, in the form of Question and Answer,” &c.; by N. Leitch, &c. The same work, with the Scriptures in full, and supplementary notes, which may be regarded as a key to the Analysis. These are truly excellent and appropriate expositions; clear and concise in their explanations of the Catechism, and closely confined to its statements.

“A Key to the Shorter Catechism, containing Catechetical Exercises, a Paraphrase, and a New and Regular Series of Proofs on Each Answer;” by James Gall, Edinburgh. And, by the same author,

“The Complete Shorter Catechism; divided into Twenty-five Sections. With a Minute Tabular Analysis.”

By the aid of these, and similar publications, and in consequence of the greater attention which has been directed to the subject by the increase of Sabbath schools, very important improvements have been made since the commencement of the present century, in the methods of conveying religious instruction to the young; and particularly in the mode of teaching the Shorter Catechism. Into these, however, we cannot be expected to enter very minutely in this Paper; and it is only a few general remarks that we are desirous of submitting to our readers.

At what age the Shorter Catechism should be put into the hands of young persons, is a distinct inquiry from the method of teaching it; but, at the same time, it is very obvious, that the method of teaching such a summary of Christian truth must in no small degree be regulated by the supposed previous progress and measure of capacity in the learner. It is not expressly enjoined by the Church to be taught to children, in the more limited sense of that term; and it may fairly be made a question, whether it ought to be employed as the first catechism. At the same time, there are many objections to a multiplicity of such elementary works; especially if it be considered as desirable to preserve a standard of Scripture truth, among our families, schools, and Churches, such as is contained in the statements of the Shorter Catechism. Our own earnest wish certainly is, that it should be regarded in general, and made in practice, as far as possible, if not the only, at least the principal catechism; and that all catechisms which may be used should have a direct reference to its contents, either as introductory or explanatory.

It has sometimes been suggested, and, indeed, is no uncommon practice, that historical catechisms (such as that of Isaac Watts), and other biographical questions on separate portions of Scripture, should be previously employed, as more suitable than doctrinal truth in the early instruction of children. Such catechisms do certainly interfere least with the style and substance of the Shorter Catechism; and such instruction is unquestionably peculiarly interesting and profitable, not only to the young, but to the more advanced learners of revealed truth. It is, in fact, the method adopted in the Sacred Page; and no instruction is so salutary, as that which brings most fully and frequently into view, not merely the language or the lessons of the Bible, but the actual events and examples, from which these lessons are deduced, and by which they are at once explained to our understandings and impressed upon our feelings. It may admit of a doubt, however, whether the use of historical and biographical catechisms be the best method of imparting such instruction. These catechisms impart, in fact, no religious instruction at all, unless accompanied by some doctrinal statements. Let us endeavour to explain our meaning by an example from one of the best of such catechisms. "Who was Cain?—Adam's eldest son, and he killed his brother Abel. Who was Isaac?—Abraham's son, according to God's promise. Who was Sarah?—Abraham's wife, and she was Isaac's mother." It is obvious, that no religious knowledge is gained by learning to repeat these names, unless they be connected with the narratives to which they refer, either by hearing these narratives from the mouth of the teacher, or by reading them in the page of Scripture. In place, then, of burdening the memories of children with a mere list of such names in a catechism, would it not be found a more easy and a more effectual method of conveying such instruction, to repeat or read at once, or to make the children read, the narratives themselves in the Bible; and then, by oral questioning, to impress upon their minds both the facts of the history and the lessons which they teach? This method of instruction has been excellently exemplified in such works as,— "The Scripture Teacher's Assistant," by Henry Althaus; "The Catechism on Luke," by Dr Thomson of Perth; "The Catechism on Matthew and John," by Mr Miller of Monikie; "The Bible Training," by Mr Lewis of Dundee; and the "Helps to Genesis," "The Gospels," "The Acts," especially the "First Step to the Old Testament History," and the "Help to the Life of Christ," by Mr Gall.

If any catechisms are to be used previous to the Shorter Catechism, and not immediately connected with it, we would always prefer those which are expressed nearly in the very language of Scripture, or which consist of pure Scripture sentences, as thus interfering least with the words and statements of the Catechism, such as the "Fifty Questions concerning the Leading Doctrines and Duties of the Gospel," now stereotyped by Mr Johnston, Edinburgh; and "The Beginner's Scripture Catechism," by N. Leitch.

But the most appropriate catechisms, in reference to the subsequent use of the Shorter Catechism, are such as, besides being properly previous, are also directly preparatory to the better understanding of that standard summary of Christian knowledge. Of this description, we have seen only one, namely, "The Child's Introduction to the Shorter Catechism," by Mr Gall, which is at once introductory and explanatory—opening up the answers in the Shorter Catechism in the simplest manner, by presenting the same truths in similar language, in the same order, and in shorter sentences. As the best explanation of its plan, to those who may not have seen it, we present a small specimen from the fourth page:—

What offices does Christ execute as our Saviour?—Christ is a Prophet, and a Priest, and a King to his people.

How is Christ a Prophet?—Christ is a Prophet in giving us the Bible, and in sending his Holy Spirit to make us understand and believe it.

How is Christ a Priest?—Christ is a Priest in having once offered himself a sacrifice for sin, and in praying for us now in heaven.

How is Christ a King?—Christ is a King in ruling his people, and defending them from their enemies.

But, if no such introductory catechism be employed, there ought at least to be some initiatory process observed. The mode too generally adopted in former times, and, perhaps, still too prevalent in many families, is merely to teach the child to commit the words of the Catechism correctly to memory, with the view of reserving any explanations as a future exercise, or in the hope that the meaning will be understood in the progress of years and the natural opening of the understanding. This method is at once injudicious and injurious;—injudicious, in adding to the difficulty of the task, by requiring the learner to fix in the memory what is not at the same time apprehended by the understanding; and injurious, as weakening the understanding itself, by thus, in a manner, suspending its exercise for a season. When this mode of instruction has been followed, the learner, as is well known, is apt to repeat the words of the Catechism, without affixing any idea to the sound, or attempting to reflect upon their meaning, even when the understanding is now capable of comprehending that meaning. Thus it is found to be the case, that this precious summary of sacred truth is carried about in many a mind like a treasure locked up in its casket, from which nothing is ever brought forth for use, and which is not opened at any time, even for the purpose of admiring its contents; and all this, not merely that no key was provided along with the gift, but that no idea is entertained by its possessor of the value and utility of the articles which it contains. In such circumstances, the best remedy for breaking the habit of uttering words, without reflecting on their meaning, is to require the individual (now able to understand, but not accustomed to exercise the understanding) not to repeat, but to read the Catechism; and to read it, if possible, as a book never seen before. In this way, by a few careful perusals of the Shorter Catechism, many young persons, nay, grown up men and women, without any aid from others, have discovered, with admiration and delight, how rich a store of Christian knowledge they possessed, formerly engraved on their memories, and now clearly discerned by their understandings. Indeed, such an exercise, simple as it may appear, might prove highly useful, even to persons of mature years and advanced knowledge. The occasional deliberate perusal of the Shorter Catechism, as a little tract or treatise, would present, at one glance, a salutary remembrance of the great scheme of Gospel truth and Christian duty, in all their vital principles and fair proportions, which may be too apt to be overlooked amidst the bustle of worldly business, or to be overwhelmed under the loads of human learning.

As the best initiatory process, whether with or without the use of any initiatory catechism, we would earnestly recommend the plan of conveying to the learner, by means of merely reading the Catechism, a general idea of the scheme of the whole work, as well as an apprehension of the meaning of any particular portion, before committing it to memory.* One great object of the Shorter Catechism is, to present a regular and connected, as well as a brief and compact, view of Christian doctrine and duty; and it greatly contributes to the right understanding, as well as easier remembering of the particular points, either of faith or practice, to take a clear and comprehensive survey of the whole schemes. It is only, as it were, a frame-work or skeleton that the Catechism provides, which requires to be filled up and fashioned in the course of instruction, to give it shape and beauty, and to be filled with the animating spirit of Scripture proof, to give it life and energy. Let the children, then, be first presented with a view of its entire structure and symmetry, by making them read it, and questioning them upon it, while they hold it in their hands; and, in like manner, let its separate portions and single statements be read and analysed, and rendered intelligible, before it be made a lesson for repetition. Let these separate portions and single statements, after being carefully learned and correctly repeated, be made a subject of cross questioning or examination, so as clearly to convey the meaning of every important word, and fully to draw out the doctrinal instructions or practical lessons which they teach. Let these instructions and lessons be illustrated and applied to the consciences and hearts of the learners, as not merely matters of knowledge, but rules of daily duty; and, last of all, let the doctrines and duties, thus explained and applied, be clearly connected with the passages of Scripture which are adduced as proofs from the Bible, that the power of Divine authority may accompany the truths as they are taught, and carry them at once to the heart and life, as the will of God and the way of salvation.

THE ORPHAN.

[From "Metrical Sketches. By an Operative,"* we extract the following verses.]

O LORD, my God, I come to thee,
With faltering voice, and bended knee,
In accents lowly, as the breath
That stills the ravish'd soul in death.
I, trembling, come before thy throne,
And place my trust in Thee alone.

My father's God, I come to Thee,
When darkness shrouds the earth and sea—
When all those little stars above
Are lit by Thee, thou God of love.
Beneath a load of care and grief,
In Thee, my God, I find relief.

When guardian angels o'er the deep,
Their sacred vigils nightly keep;
When o'er the soul of hopeful youth,
Are vision'd joys of love and truth.
Then, O, my God, with heavenly care,
Protect a lowly child of prayer.

Let friends forsake, and grief o'ercast,
And sorrow lay my bosom waste,
Let dark misfortune's blighting power,
On me her fest'ring vials pour.
When 'neath thine all-protecting care,
I'll calm my troubled soul in prayer.

When sickness lays my feverish head—
Where worldly joys in anguish fade—
Where prince and peasant, trembling own,
That bliss is found through Thee alone—
Be then of heavenly gifts my share,
Acceptance of an orphan's prayer.

Ere yet life's troubled race is run—
In death ere sinks my setting sun—
Oh, may my soul exulting prove,
The glories of thy boundless love.
Then heavenly joys with Thee to share,
I'll live and die a child of prayer.

THE LIFE OF CYPRIAN,

BISHOP OF CARTHAGE.

PART I.

ALTHOUGH the life of the illustrious martyr and prelate, was written by Pontius, his deacon, who had such ample opportunities of a full knowledge of the subject, the work in question is defective and unsatisfactory, being more occupied with the writer's own ideas and feelings, than the actions of his master which he had undertaken to record. This defect, however, is the less to be regretted, as the numerous letters of Cyprian are still extant, in which he gives a full picture of his sentiments, as well as of the events of his personal history. These epistles, collated with the narrative of the deacon, will be our guide in the following compendious narrative:—

Thascius Cœcilius Cyprian, was born in the city of Carthage, towards the end of the second century. The precise year of his birth is unknown, and also the name or station of his father; but, indeed, this obscurity, as we have already observed, does more or less overshadow the early history of most of the luminaries of the Primitive Church. According to Pontius, the early education of Cyprian was liberal, although he appears to have been little conversant with the theories of the metaphysical and ethical schools: this might be from his greater predilection for the study of oratory, in which he made such proficiency, that he publicly taught rhetoric at Carthage, and with high reputation. At this period his life was sufficiently splendid and luxurious, as he lived in great abundance, had a magnificent retinue, and never went abroad without a numerous throng of clients and retainers. Such was his course of life even till the approach of old age, when he was converted to Christianity by Cœcilius, a Presbyter of Carthage. From this circumstance, the grateful convert adopted the name of his teacher, a practice that seems to have been frequently followed by those who were turned from Paganism to Christianity. On account of the rapid proficiency which Cyprian made in the knowledge of divine things, it is probable that he had been acquainted with the doctrines of revelation before he was converted, either through a personal acquaintanceship with Christians, or from a perusal of their writings. But the proud and popular rhetorician was stopped by that doctrine which forms the very threshold of Christianity—the necessity of being born again. "How," he asked, "can I strip myself of what I was before, and, still retaining my personal identity, become a new creature? Nature and habit have closely entailed upon us the evils of humanity. How can he learn to be abstinent who has been accustomed to splendid and luxurious fare? How can he who has been used to purple and gold, and splendid attire, descend to homely clothing? Can the ambitious man be contented with obscurity, or the master of a throng of clients with solitude? Will he not still be haunted by his besetting allurements, and subjected to their mastery?" These questions he often asked himself while he was still in the midst of Pagan darkness, and upon a troubled sea of doubt and perplexity; and while he thought of his own besetting sins, he felt as if they were constitutional parts of his existence from which he could never be separated. But the heavenly light which at last vouchsafed to shine in upon him, quickly dispelled this darkness and doubt, and enabled him to comprehend the mystery, as well as to see the necessity, of regeneration. He now perceived, that what was born of the flesh was of the "earth, earthy;" while that which was born of the Spirit was of God. The fruits of these perceptions were soon manifested in the devotedness and self-denial of his conduct. He abandoned the pomps and vanities of his former state, that he might join a despised and persecuted people; he sold the greatest part of his estate, and distributed the money among the poor. The change also was as rapid as it was complete; so that, according to his biographer, he became almost a perfect Christian before he had fully learned the precepts of Christianity.

* "A System of Lessons," by the Rev. Dr Muir, recently published, is admirably calculated to assist parents and teachers in opening up such connected views of Gospel truth from the Catechism.

* Just published by J. Morrison, Alton.

After Cyprian had continued for a short time a catechumen, he was received into the Church by the sacrament of baptism; and not long afterwards, having gone through the subordinate offices, he was raised to the rank of Presbyter. In this capacity he secured the love and confidence of the brethren, so that on the death of Donatus, the Bishop of Carthage, the general voice, both of Presbyters and people, summoned him to the vacant dignity. This was only two years after his conversion from Paganism; and a nomination so unprecedented in the history of the Church, is a proof of the high Christian proficiency to which he had already attained. But the modesty of Cyprian shrank from so great a responsibility, and he humbly declined the offer. The people, however, were not to be so refused; his house was besieged, and his doors were watched to prevent his escape, so that he would have fled by the window, had it been possible. At length, after the multitudes had waited long, and trembled between hope and fear, Cyprian came out and signified his assent, which was received with the most lively tokens of satisfaction. Indeed, the nature of the episcopal office at this time, when the Church was at once assailed by enemies from without, and rent asunder by false friends within her walls, was such, that the exigencies of the case might well have made the boldest heart pause and tremble; and to illustrate the reluctance of Cyprian more thoroughly, we shall corroborate it with an example taken from the life of Gregory Thaumaturgus, his cotemporary. This illustrious father having finished his Christian studies and returned to Neocæsarea, his native town, was selected by Phœdimus, bishop of a neighbouring city, to be endowed with the episcopal office in that quarter. But Gregory, on learning this resolution, fled from his home to the neighbouring deserts, and shifted his place continually, that he might not be discovered. At length, Phœdimus had recourse to stratagem to arrest the fugitive. He assembled the congregation, and having gone through the worship, and usual solemnities, he declared that both himself and Gregory, though at present parted, stood equally in the presence of God; and after this, instead of the usual imposition of hands, he addressed his discourse to the absent recusant, in which he set him apart to God, and constituted him Bishop of Neocæsarea. The result of an election so unusual in the proceedings of the Church was, that although there were only seventeen Christians in the place when Gregory entered into office, this handful rapidly increased into a numerous congregation—nay, we are even told that, at his death, only seventeen Pagans were to be found in a city so great and populous.

Cyprian was appointed Bishop of Carthage, A. D. 248. The summary process of his conversion, and the rapidity with which he had passed from the lowest to the highest office in the Church, would have been perilous to many; and hence the propriety of the apostolic rule, in electing, "Not a novice; lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." But no such deterioration was perceptible in the bearing of Cyprian. His looks, instead of an expression of pride or asceticism, had still a due mixture of gravity and cheerfulness, so that it was doubtful whether he was more worthy of reverence or love; and although he had renounced his former splendour, his decent attire was free from the ostentation of penury. Although five Presbyters had protested against his exaltation, the first days of his entrance into office had been tranquil, and he proceeded with zeal to reform the corruptions that had crept into the African Church. But a season of trouble speedily succeeded, and the Decian persecution commenced, which raged through the Eastern and Western world, and threatened the extinction of the Christian name. It was during this period that Cyprian was proscribed by special edict, and all persons were warned against giving him shelter, while the popular outcry commanded him to be thrown to the lions. Cyprian thought, that if he continued to confront the public, he would only provoke the wrath of persecution more fiercely against his Church; and, as he also informs us, he was warned by a divine admonition to withdraw himself from the storm. This prudent proceeding, which some might rashly condemn, was more in accordance with Christian principle, than that headlong eagerness for martyrdom, which was so prevalent in the Church during the first three centuries. But although he was thus absent in the body from his people for two long years, he was present with them in the spirit; and thirty-eight letters which he wrote during this interval, attest his unwearied care of his Church, and the sympathy which he felt in their sufferings.

These sufferings, indeed, were neither few nor trivial. The African provinces, and especially Carthage, were exposed to the full brunt of persecution; and of the events that attended it the pastoral letters of Cyprian preserve a melancholy memorial. His people were scourged and beaten; they were racked, and scorched with fire; their flesh was torn off with burning pincers, or pierced through with spears; and sometimes more instruments of torture were employed than there were limbs to sustain them. They were spoiled of their goods, chained, and cast into prison; thrown to wild beasts, and burnt at the stake; and when these common methods of torture were exhausted, their enemies invented new, by which the death they grudged to their victims might be delayed to the utmost of human endurance. But in these epistles, also, we learn how much, in Carthage, the zeal of many had waxed cold. Indeed, Cyprian had regarded the sins of his people as the chief cause of these calamities; and he does not forget to lay open to them the crimes for which they were now exposed to so terrible a trial. Long peace had corrupted that purity of discipline which ought to prevail in a Christian Church. Covetousness had crept in among them, so that works of charity and mercy were neglected. Even their pastors and deacons had countenanced this decay of godliness, by engaging in secular pursuits, in which they deserted their duties and their flocks, to become usurers and money lenders. One and all, they had despised the Lord's correction, and therefore had these grievous calamities befallen them. These heavy charges were borne out by the conduct of multitudes during this season of trial and persecution. Many hurried to the forum, and offered sacrifice to the idols, as they were ordered; and such, indeed, was the press of these candidates for inglorious safety, that when the magistrates wished to postpone the ceremony until the next day, many of these wretches entreated that they might be allowed to testify their recantation before the evening had closed.

In the meantime the bishop, from his solitude, continued to write both to the Christians of Carthage and Italy, exhorting them to persevere in their profession. The cry of their suffering rang hourly in his ears, and nothing but a sense of urgent, imperious duty, could have prevented him from stepping forth, to become a sharer in their sufferings. But indeed the feeling of the Church was opposed to such a step; for the Christians of Rome, who were anxious at this period about the concealment of Cyprian, expressed their hearty approbation of his keeping close, as he was a personage who could not be spared at such a crisis. The persecution still continued to rage at Carthage, and the number of the lapæd was so mournfully increased, that nothing but the steadfastness of those who continued faithful to the death could have cheered the heart of the bishop in his retirement. The fiery triad was at last abated by the death of Decius, and Cyprian returned to Carthage, A. D. 281. On his arrival, an important question of discipline engrossed all his care. Certain irregular practices which had crept into the Church during the early ages of persecution had now risen to a height, and threatened to become a fertile source of corruption. When those who had apostatized, from the fear of torture and death, were desirous to return to the communion of the Church, they applied to some Christian under sentence, for a letter of recommendation to the faithful; and, in consequence of these receipts, they were restored at once, without undergoing the necessary probation. A second class of timid Christians, called Libellatici, were they who purchased libels of security and exemption from the heathen magistrate, excusing them from offering sacrifice during the season of persecution. A third were the Sacrificati, men who had actually presented offerings to idols; thus publicly renouncing their faith. Cyprian convened a synod of the neighbouring bishops, to discuss these weighty affairs; and it was concluded that the lapæd should be treated according to the rules of Scripture; they were not to be denied all hope of restoration, lest they should fall into impenitence or despair, nor yet be readmitted without probationary trial. A due regard was to be had to the aggravating circumstances of their apostasy; so that while the Libellatici were to have a shorter period assigned to them, the Sacrificati were not to be restored until a long time had elapsed, and sufficient evidence been given of their repentance. It had been the custom, indeed, not to admit the latter to communion till the hour of death; but it was thought that men who were thus denied the cup of Christ would have no motive to accept the cup of martyrdom; and that now, when trials were multiplying, every encouragement should be given to the fallen, to confirm them anew, and fit them for resistance.

THE TEMPLE OF JUGGURNAUT.

MISS ROBERTS, in her "Scenes and Characteristics of Hindoestan," thus describes this celebrated monument of heathen idolatry:—

This celebrated temple is erected upon the sea coast of Orissa, in the district of Cuttack, the first Indian land which the passengers of a ship sailing direct from England to Calcutta espy. The dark and frowning pagoda, rising abruptly from a ridge of sand, forms a conspicuous object from the sea, its huge and shapeless mass, not unlike some ill-proportioned giant, affording a gloomy type of the hideous superstitions of the land. While gazing on this mighty Moloch, the mind is impressed with a strange awe; the bright and golden sunshine above, and the waving foliage below, only serve to deepen its horrors. It looks like a ~~small~~ ~~black~~ upon the fair face of nature—a frightful monument of man's success in marring the designs of his Creator. At Hurdwar, it is not only very possible to sympathize in the feelings of the multitudes, whose adoration is called forth by the bright river, one of the greatest blessings which the Almighty has bestowed upon the burning soil, but to go even farther, and lift up our thoughts, amidst the most beautiful scenes of nature, unto nature's God. At Juggernaut, there is nothing save unalloyed horror. Frightful idols, enclosed in an equally frightful shrine, and seen when viewed from the land to be surrounded by a waste of sand hills, revolt the mind, and give to superstition its most disgusting aspect; and the disagreeable impression, which a distant prospect excites, is increased, upon a nearer approach, to a scene associated with all that is most fearful and disgusting in religious error. Every known rule of architecture being set at defiance, it would be difficult, without the aid of the pencil, to convey any idea of the half-tower, half-pyramidal style of the great pagoda: it is built of a coarse red granite, brought from the southern parts of Cuttack, and covered with a rough coating of chaam. The tower containing the idols, which is two hundred feet high, and serves as a landmark to the mariner, stands in the centre of a quadrangle, enclosed by a high stone wall, extending six hundred and fifty feet on each side, and surrounded by minor edifices of nondescript shapes.

The magnitude of these buildings forms their sole claim to admiration; they are profusely decorated with sculpture, but so rudely carved as to afford no pleasure to the eye, the only object worthy of praise being a pillar of black stone, beautifully proportioned and finely designed, which has been brought from the black pagoda in the neighbourhood, and placed in front of the principal entrance. The outer gateway and the great portal of the temple are ascended by broad flights of steps, and the interior is described as being very curious and well worthy of inspection, a sight which, however, is very rarely enjoyed by Europeans. The Brahmins in attendance take care to exclude all profane footsteps; but it is said, upon the authority of Major Archer, that a young officer of a native corps, a peculiar favourite with the sepoys under his command, was at one time smuggled into the sanctuary by the connivance of the soldiers, who dyed his skin of the proper hue, dressed him in full costume, and painting the peculiar marks of their caste upon his forehead and nose, crowded round him upon all sides, and, thus secured from detection, brought him into the very presence of the idol. A distant view, notwithstanding the zeal of his conductors, was all that he obtained; and either there not being a great deal to attract his attention, or a sense of danger preventing him from feeling sufficiently at his ease to make many observations, the information acquired from his account was very scanty. He told his friends that he saw nothing but large courts and apartments for the priests.

The festival of the Rath Jatra takes place every year; but, as at Hurdwar, it increases in sanctity at peculiar periods, every third, sixth, and twelfth anniversary, the latter more particularly being considered of greater importance than those that intervene. The concourse of pilgrims is still exceedingly large; and numbers, as in former times, never return, leaving their bodies to fester on the neighbouring sands, victims to a horrible superstition, though not, as heretofore, sacrificed under the suicidal wheels of the cruel idol's car. Such immolations are becoming very unfrequent; but fatigue, hardship, want of food, and the various diseases brought on by exposure to the pestilential atmosphere of the rains, make fearful havoc among the miserable wretches who hasten onwards to the holy precincts of the temple, in the hope of obtaining a panacea for all their woes.

A favourite method of approach to Juggernaut, by those who have either great offences to expiate, or who are desirous of obtaining a more than ordinary portion of beatitude, is to measure the length of the whole way from some extraordinary distance. The pilgrim lies down, marks the spot which the extremity of his hands have touched, and rising, rests his feet upon the spot, and, again prostrating himself, repeats the same process. Five years are sometimes consumed in this manner, and, as the penance may be performed by proxy, it is often volunteered for a certain sum of money, the wages being most scrupulously earned by the person who undertakes the duty. In no part of the world is gold so all-powerful as in India. Upon the morning of an intended execution, a stranger appeared in the place of the criminal, and declaring that he had, for a certain consideration, agreed to suffer for the person who had made the bargain, seemed quite astonished to find any hesitation on the part of the authorities to execute the sentence, remonstrating with them upon the folly of their scruples, since he was ready and willing to perform his part. Fortunately for him he had not to deal with his own countrymen, who, provided that somebody died, would have cared very little whether it was the offender or his substitute.*

The great temple of Juggernaut was erected in the twelfth century, under the auspices of the chief minister of the rajah of the district. The idols have nothing to distinguish them save their size and their deformity; the principal one, Krishna, is intended as a mystic representation of the supreme power,—for the Hindoos are unanimous in declaring that they worship only one god, and that the images which they exhibit, and to which they pay the most reverential homage, are merely attributes of a deity pervading the whole of nature;—he is associated with the two other personages of the Hindoo triad, and every one of the idols particularly venerated by the numerous tribes and sects of Hindostan, obtains a shrine within the precincts of this huge temple, so that all castes may unite in celebrating the great festival with one accord. The installation of the great idol upon his car, or rath, and the procession attendant upon his triumphal march to a country residence about a mile and a-half distant, a journey which occupies three days, are performed with many ceremonies, though not all of a very respectful nature. Previous to this grand ovation, the images are taken from their altars to be bathed, and are then exhibited to public view upon an elevated terrace.

These gigantic busts, hideously ugly, and scarcely bearing the rudest lineaments of the human form, are seen mounted upon pedestals, the latter being concealed by muffing draperies. The hands, feet, and ears of the great idol are of gold, but these are kept in a box by themselves, and are only fastened into their sockets after Juggernaut has been safely deposited upon his car. While seated in state upon the terrace, a canopy, gay with cloths of various colours, is raised over the heads of the triad, and crowds of Brahmins are in attendance with pankajs and chowries, to beat off the flies. Occasionally, the sudden flash of a vivid fire-work sheds a momentary ray upon the horrid countenances of these Dagon, and in the next instant all is again involved in the indistinct gloom of an eastern twilight, dimly revealing the huge forms of the idols, and the eager gesticulations of their misguided votaries. The unwieldiness of Juggernaut and his companions, and the absence of the machinery necessary to effect their removal in a proper and decorous manner, occasions a scene which scandalizes European eyes, but which the natives, accustomed to the doctrine of expediency, survey without feeling that they are offering any indignity to the objects of their worship. The only method of transport which has been yet devised, is by means of ropes fastened round the necks and feet of these cumbersome images, which are thus dragged from their high places down the steps, and through the gateways of the temple, and are afterwards hauled up in the same manner up on the raths, without regard to mud or dust.

The car of Juggernaut is a monstrous vehicle, gigantic in its dimensions, and associated in the mind with images of horror; it is a sort of platform, forty-three feet in height and thirty-five feet square, moving upon sixteen wheels, each six feet and a-half in diameter: the ornaments with which it is decorated are by no means splendid, its principal attraction being a covering of striped and spangled broad cloth. The villagers of the neighbouring pergunnahs have their fields rent-free, upon the condition of attendance at the cars of the idols. This duty, at present esteemed a privilege, is not exclusively confined to those who are so well rewarded for its performance, but, before the whole ceremony concludes, the zeal of many of the devotees is so completely exhausted, that the raths would scarcely reach their destination were it not for the services which the Brahmins can command. It takes fifteen hundred men to put each of the cars of Juggernaut in motion, and, when the idols are fairly established in their places, the shouts and cries of the frenzied multitude are such as to lead us to fancy that the whole of Pandemonium had been let loose, an idea which is strengthened by the fiend-like figures of the Jogies, Gosains, and other religious mendicants, whose grim visages, lighted up with a frantic joy, give them a superhuman appearance, as they cheer on their insane followers to acts of horror. Though the ponderous wheels of Juggernaut no longer go crushing over the bodies of prostrate victims, the fury and excitement with which the assembled crowd rush to the car is absolutely appalling. In places of very inferior note, there is something frightful in the noisy lumbering progress of the cumbersome rath, surmounted by a hideous idol, dragged about in honour of the festival; but in the very heart and centre of this abominable superstition, the celebration becomes perfectly terrific, and the senses, over-wrought, faint and sicken at the view. The scenery of the place, its bare sands, the surging of the ocean in the distance, the drenching rains, damp gales, and sudden tempests of the fitful atmosphere, add to the wild horrors of this awful pageant. Each day the exhibition becomes more ghastly, as the wan victims of famine and disease drop exhausted around, making a golgotha of the unhallowed precincts.

The most sacred portion of the soil round the temple of Juggernaut extends to a circle of about eight miles, though the land is considered holy to a much greater distance; and the whole, during sickly seasons, may be said to be covered with the dead bodies of the pilgrims, who, unequal to encounter exposure to the inclemency of the weather, sink under accumulated hardships, to form a frightful banquet for carrion birds and beasts of prey. Most authorities agree, that the tax which was levied by the government upon the pilgrims to Juggernaut, here as well as at Allahabad, tended to diminish the number of persons resorting to the festival, and also the amount of suicides. Still a good deal of scandal was excited by the support of an establishment, by Christian rulers, of a stud of elephants, horses, and other equipments for the service of the idol; and the annual waste of life, though not occasioned by actual offerings to the blood-stained wheels of the demoniacal car, is nearly equally shocking, as the result of one of the most frightful delusions that ever spread its curse upon the human race.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Happiness to be found in Religion.—There is happiness in religion. But religious people are not always happy.

As long as life remains, its companion, sin, tarries too, and takes advantage of every incautious, slumbering moment, to give a parting wound. Nature's diseases and infirmities remain; and the spirit, winged for heaven, the back already turned, the foot already lifted from the earth, is assailed by a thousand arrows from beneath, to bring it down again. The flesh is touched, wings flutter, the strength fails—down and down again—still soaring, and still struggling upward, but still returning, as some fresh missile reaches it. The believer's happiness is a cup—but as he drinks it out, he must go to refill it where he had it first. He thirsts, and must go to the spring—he hungers, and must go to be fed—his supply of happiness is not within him. The first great source of comfort, is the Redeemer himself, besought in humble, fervent prayer: the Holy Scriptures are its richest stream, and are most eminently suited to impart it. There is no kind, no condition of sorrow, to which they do not address themselves. There is no possible circumstance of misery for which they do not suggest an adequate relief, or a suffering to which they do not administer a medicine. To cheer, to soothe, to strengthen—to shame our impatience, to allay our fears, to encourage our efforts, to unload our bosoms, to make us rejoice in the midst of sorrow, and triumph in the depths of despondency—what gentle remonstrances, what persuasive arguments, what powerful examples, what celestial promises! Very little indeed do they know of the importance of the Holy Scriptures, who do not go to them for happiness.—Miss C. Fry.

An All-seeing God.—If you believe that God is about your bed, and about your path, and spieth out all your ways, then take care not to do the least thing, nor to speak the least word, nor to indulge the least thought, which you have reason to think would offend him. Suppose that a messenger of God, an angel, were now standing at your right hand, and fixing his eyes upon you, would you not take care to abstain from every word or action that you knew would offend him? Yes, suppose one of your mortal fellow-servants, suppose only a holy man, stood by you, would you not be extremely anxious how you conducted yourself both in word and action? How much more cautious ought you to be when you know, not a holy man, not an angel of God, but God himself, the Holy One, is inspecting your heart, your tongue, your hand, every moment, and that he himself will surely call you to an account for all you think, speak, or act!—REV. GOD THE FOUNTAIN OF LIFE AND HAPPINESS:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. GEORGE ROMANES, A. M.,

Minister of the Scotch Church, St Francis, Upper Canada.

"For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light."—PSALM xxxvi. 9.

In this Discourse we intend to make some remarks on the view which the text presents of God as the Author of all existence and of all happiness, and the connection of the whole with the nature of the Christian dispensation.

I. God is the source of all existence: "With thee is the fountain of life."—By the fall the mind of man has been rendered indisposed, and, in some measure, unfit, to contemplate God as the Maker of the universe. We live in a world of second causes, and are surrounded by a vast assemblage of visible things. The soul, confined to a mortal body, and encompassed by a material world, is thus debarred, as if by a double wall, from the contemplation of the invisible state. Its corrupt and debased faculties are too feeble to overcome the obstruction; and hence, like a weak monarch, it sinks into apathy, and is entirely governed by its servants and ministers, the senses. A God who is unseen, unheard, and unfelt, is soon forgot; and, amidst the most stupendous examples of his power and wisdom hardly obtains the tribute of a single thought. Man beholds the world filled with ceaseless motion and perfect harmony, yet asks not whence do this motion and harmony proceed. He sees all nature full of life—he feels life beating in his own bosom, yet thinks not of Him in whom the whole universe lives and moves and has its being.

But from this guilty indifference Revelation calls upon us to awake. It tells us that the frame of the world, so massive and so substantial, is the production of a higher power; that it contains no power of self-existence, but depends every moment upon the mere good-will of Him by whom it was made. As the cloud remains suspended in the serene heaven, so does the universe repose, and, as it were, float in the immense essence of the Deity. In the text, by a fine metaphor, God is called the "Fountain of life,"—the broad and mighty stream of existence, through all its ages for ever flowing and sparkling from this inexhaustible source, this fountain-head of the universe.

There was a time, then, before this universe took its place among the fields of immensity. There was a time when the heavens and the earth, the land and the sea, the hosts of angels and the nations of men, the sun and the stars, the plants and the animals which adorn our fields, existed only in the ideas of the Divine mind. There was a time when, had one human being been allowed to gaze around him, he could have seen no object on which his eye might rest; he would have looked upon boundless vacancy, and his ear would have been oppressed with the awful stillness; for sight and sound were alike unknown.

Yet amid this immense void, which to our minds appears so mysterious and so frightful, was there no life and no happiness? There was the most perfect life, and the most sublime happiness, for then did He exist who is the Fountain of life, who enjoys that blessedness, in comparison of which all the joys of the creatures are as nothing. In the Divine bosom was contained that magazine of joy which was destined to bless for ever millions of immortal beings—that overflowing goodness which was to adorn the heaven with all its shining worlds, and fill the heaven of heavens with angels more glorious than the sun.

At length the fountain of life began to flow. First appeared those pure and holy beings, the morning stars of creation, the first-born of the Eternal Father. They had the high honour of being the first that beheld the beams of the Divine holiness and glory—the first that knew and loved the great Jehovah, and that rejoiced in the Lord their God. Happy and glorious beings! confined by no mortal body, they saw the Eternal One face to face, and at the very first moment of their existence they felt themselves to be in the bosom of the Deity.

But still all was invisible and silent—still nothing but mind occupied the expanse; therefore did the Fountain of life cause a new stream to flow, and exerted that power which the angels themselves could never have conceived, and which even we, who behold its effects, cannot comprehend—the creation of material and tangible things. At his command a thousand worlds took their stations in that immense space where before not one grain of sand existed, enriched with all the materials of happiness and all the decorations of beauty, waiting till the bountiful Jehovah should call into being new ranks of living creatures to admire their splendours, and taste their enjoyments.

Soon does our world overflow with an exuberance of life. Earth, air, and water, are filled with joyful multitudes of every name and kind, who penetrate every recess with their hosts, and throng all nature with moving legions. Some move in majesty and pride the monarchs of the desert, the fit companions of mountains and rivers; whilst the inferior tribes diminish at every downward stage of the scale, until they are lost in their minuteness, and their multitudes, in the air, or the water in which they rather seem to be dissolved than to exist. These know not their Maker,—for so bountiful is God, that he confers happiness on beings who can neither love, nor fear, nor worship their Creator,—who cannot even pay the homage of thankfulness and praise.

And, last of all, lest heaven and earth should seem too distinct and too independent, lest there might seem to be an impassable gulf between the visible and invisible worlds, man was formed that he might be the bond between the two great parts of the Divine empire, belonging partly to each, yet wholly to neither. Standing on the confines of both, he unites the visible and invisible, the material and the spiritual, the temporal and the eternal—the highest of earthly, but the lowest of heavenly natures. He may aspire to the employments and happiness of angels; yet he may say to the dust, "Thou art my mother; and to the worm, Thou art my sister." Thus, perhaps, presenting the most remarkable example in the whole universe of the power of advancement in glory and perfection.

The Fountain of life having thus filled the universe with every varied form of existence, and every possible degree of excellence, beheld with divine complacency the scene of beauty that lay around his throne. His goodness rejoiced in the contemplation of those endless ages of glory which so many myriads of immortals were destined to possess; the sublime happiness which was to endure and to augment through the progress of ten thousand centuries. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good."

This Divine Fountain is not only copious but eternal. Should it cease for one moment to exert its power, the whole creation would pass away, the stream of existence would run dry, and, like Jordan when arrested by the ark of the Lord, leave only an empty channel. Worlds would melt away, angels would faint and expire, the elements would vanish, the universe would hear appalled the sentence of death, and all would be again buried in eternal darkness. Strength and weakness, beauty and deformity, glory and meanness, would all be involved in the same ruin; the highest archangel would share the fate of the smallest insect, for with regard to the power of self-existence all creatures stand exactly on the same level—all are equally sustained by the power of the Almighty.

II. God is the source of all happiness: "In thy light shall we see light." Light is the well-known emblem of joy. "The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour." "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." It denotes that pure and holy happiness of which alone God is the Author, and of which light, the most refined of all material things, is the proper symbol. In the text, therefore, the Psalmist, in the name of all holy beings in earth and heaven, declares his confidence of their eternal happiness in the sunshine of the Divine countenance. For God is a Creator, only that he may be a benefactor; and he makes creatures only that he may make them happy. To confer happiness, then, is the second great prerogative of the Godhead. His first, is to be the Fountain of life; his second, to be the Fountain of light. The first of these no creature ever tried to assume,—for to create is plainly and palpably above the power of all inferior beings; but many have attempted to assume the second, and have endeavoured to procure happiness for themselves, and to acquire the power of dispensing it to others. Of this madness Satan set the first example in heaven, and Adam on the earth; with what success we well know, and would often do well to remember.

If we survey every source of enjoyment, we shall find that all its forms proceed directly from God. The pleasures of sin we leave entirely out of the question, for sinful pleasure is no more than disguised misery. At present we speak only of true and lawful enjoyments; even the lowest of these, the pleasures of our corporeal nature, are conferred by the Giver of all good. It was he who formed and put in motion that vast machine of nature that produces even the least and simplest of these. He makes the sun to rise, and the rain to fall; he covers the valleys with corn, and the hills with cattle; he provides the trees that yield their shelter, and the flowers that refresh us with their fragrances. All these marks of goodness and wisdom with which the world is filled are so many channels through which the Fountain of happiness dispenses enjoyment to the various ranks of his creatures. In themselves they have no efficacy; it is his blessing alone that gives them life and power; and if, in forgetfulness of this great truth, we seek for pleasure from different channels, or in different ways from those which he has presented, we find nothing but disappointment, vexation and punishment.

We shall now ascend a step higher, and contemplate the pleasures of the understanding and the mind. These also are imparted by God. He is the Author of truth, and of those faculties that take pleasure in the discovery of truth; he is the Author of all those beauties and harmonies in the universe, which form a deep mine of mental enjoyment, and the contemplation of which affords the most happy exercise of our mental powers. For the mind of man is never so happy as when employed in tracing the wisdom of God. "The works of the Lord are great; sought out they are of all that take pleasure in them." And our mental happiness becomes more intense, the more we raise our contemplation to divine and eternal things; for "Blessed is the man that doth meditate in the law of the Lord."

The highest degree of earthly happiness is that derived from our moral faculties. Of this God is especially the Author. He is the Author of conscience, which seems, as it were, a spark of his own holiness, and which fills the heart of the pious and the upright with celestial peace. He confers that health and beauty of the soul in which holiness consists, the proper movement and action of all the affections and passions, and the joyful obedience of the whole man to the law of God and of Christ.

Thus, all the true happiness that man can enjoy on earth proceeds directly from God. But when the Psalmist declares—"In thy light shall we see light"—it is obvious that he refers to a happiness far more exalted than any that the world can either furnish or behold. He refers to that time when the children of God shall come home to their Father's house, when all the veils shall be removed which now conceal their Father's face, and when, in a new paradise, new rivers of pleasure shall flow. He refers to that perfect day, in comparison of which all the glory of this world is darkness, when the ransomed of the Lord shall come to Zion with praise and everlasting joy. Then shall affliction, like a servant who has fulfilled his office and finished his work, be dismissed, never more to minister to the heirs of salvation; then death itself shall die, and sin be cast into the bottomless pit. Great as are the examples of the Divine goodness we now behold, it is confined and controlled by his wisdom and justice; it is now employed in removing all those obstacles that prevent its full display, and in preparing the way for its perfect triumphs. But then all foes being conquered, the trumpet of the eternal jubilee shall sound. Then shall begin that heavenly festival of which the Bible loves to speak, whose heralds and messengers shall be angels sent to the four corners of the world: the feast, whose banquet-hall shall be the third heaven; whose Master shall be God himself; where the company shall be patriarchs, and prophets, and apostles, and martyrs, and saints; where every seat shall be a throne, and every guest a crowned king; where the music shall be the golden harps of angels, and the light the ever-beaming countenance of God himself; where all shall be filled with the goodness of his house, and made to drink of the rivers of his pleasures. There shall the words of the Psalmist be accomplished: "In thy light shall we see light." "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." Or in the words of Isaiah, "The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

We have thus shown that God is the source of all existence and of all true happiness. We now proceed to show,

III. The connection of this subject with the dispensation of the Gospel.—Had the world remained in its primeval and perfect form, we might have closed our remarks. Had all the creatures of the Almighty continued holy, the affairs of the universe would have proceeded with the most plain and manifest harmony; and the concerns of its high government, although they might transcend our comprehension, would present no cause for anxiety or doubt. Every moral being, fulfilling the ends of his nature, would then have been led by gradual steps to the enjoyment of consummate happiness, and every current that flowed from the Fountain of life would have returned, untainted by corruption, pure and transparent to its divine source.

But the entrance of sin has caused a strange and dreadful confusion. Since this direful evil changes him, in whom it dwells, from a loyal and obedient child into an apostate and a rebel, it must, of course, produce a corresponding change in the conduct of God towards us, and a sad reverse in all our prospects and relations. This has called into existence a thousand known and unknown miseries. This has given rise to those awful words, evil and pain, fear and torment, despair and terror, death and hell. This is the parent of all those hateful spectres, which make life so wretched and death so terrible.

We shall now, therefore, inquire what were the feelings of man, in his holy state, with regard to his Maker and Benefactor. Beholding himself placed by the Divine hand amid a mighty universe, he would feel, with all the force of perfect conviction, that the first place in his esteem and regard was due to that great Being who had given him life and happiness. At this, the morning of his life, it would never even occur to his mind that any other being or object could be preferred to his Maker. He could never have believed, as many of his descendants seem to do, that all the objects the world contains were intended only as the materials of sin and as the instruments of rebellion. Therefore, from his glowing heart, and from his grateful lips, did the morning hymn of the earth rise to heaven, and every feeling was controlled by the holy law that was impressed upon his soul. The whole creation, whether the stupendous grandeur of the sky, or the luxuriant verdure of the earth, or the exulting happiness of animal life—all would lead his thoughts to the Source of existence, at once enlarging his knowledge and exalting his conceptions of the Divine glory and of the Divine goodness.

Thus would man regard God as the fountain of life; but he would also regard him as the fountain of happiness. He would, therefore, seek happiness only in that way in which God had prescribed. Sinful pleasure would be a thing unknown and unthought of by his mind. The pleasures that nature laid before him he would receive with thankfulness, and enjoy with innocence and temperance. His mental happiness would proceed from the employment of his noblest faculties on their noblest objects. His moral happiness would be of the purest and most exalted kind, and would form his dearest treasure, because it came most directly from the hand of his God. And his happiness was crowned by the high anticipation of the endless progress in glory and perfection for which his nature was formed, and to which the mercy and goodness of God enabled him to aspire.

Such were the feelings of man in his primeval state; but are such his feelings now? No; the whole picture must be reversed. He knows, indeed, that God is his Maker; but he knows this only to aggravate his sin, his contempt, and his rebellion. Sinful pleasure is loved and pursued, as if all else were unworthy of the name. Lawful pleasure is made unlawful by its excess, and all the bounties of God are perverted to the purposes of sin and the service of Satan. The mind forsakes its proper objects, and either grovels amid vanity, or runs wild amid the fancies of a false and a foolish philosophy. As for moral pleasure, it is but rarely enjoyed, and still less desired; and even the assurance of a world to come was soon lost, amid the increasing darkness of the human mind, as if man had madly resolved to sink more and more deeply into debasement, and to cast away from his mind every thing that was great and good.

In this debased and ruined state of our moral nature, does Christ interpose with his great salvation. It is the design of the Gospel to lead man to God, to restore his mind to its primeval state, and thus to fix his happiness on a firm and eternal foundation. The Gospel is just the way to make men happy, by making them holy; and to make them holy, by making them the obedient children of a reconciled God.

To accomplish this gracious end, the Gospel proposes two great ends—the one is to propitiate God, the other to renew man. To appease the King of the universe, who has been dishonoured by his rebellious creatures, is plainly the very first step in a work of mediation; for He is the fountain of life and happiness, and if his anger remain unappeased, the wretched victims of his vengeance must perish under his frown. Man, although he may deeply bewail his misery, and mourn for his fault, could find no favour in the sight of Him who cannot behold a sinful being but with abhorrence. He must wander through the world in hopeless misery; and all his attempts to regain the Divine favour must prove as abortive as those of Esau to regain the blessing, "who found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears."

This atonement, therefore, so indispensable to our welfare, Jesus Christ has made. He gave himself for us, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God. By Him the fountain of life and happiness is once more opened, and men are called upon, as freely as the angels of heaven, to drink of its pure and living streams. Divine wrath sheathes its sword, justice unbars the gates of heaven, and in the very centre of its glories appears the seat of mercy and the throne of grace.

But still there was only the half of the mighty work performed:—man must not only be redeemed, but renewed. The fountain must not only be opened, but he must be enabled to taste and to enjoy its sweetness. This also can be accomplished only by a divine power; for man is so debased by sin, that he cannot raise his eyes or his heart from the objects that surround him. Therefore the gift of the Holy Spirit was one of the chief articles in the covenant of redemption made between the Father and the Son; for in that great transaction, when Christ agreed to lay down his life, the Father also agreed that the Holy Spirit should be granted, to apply to the souls of mankind the blessings of redemption and the fruits of his purchase.

To the Holy Spirit, therefore, does Christ commit the second part of the work of redemption, to lead men to the fountain of life and happiness which he has opened; and this he accomplishes in the process of sanctification. He works in us repentance—that is, a profound shame and sorrow, because we have forsaken the fountain of living waters, and made to ourselves broken cisterns which can hold no water. He works in us faith, or the return of the soul to God by that way which he has appointed. He works in us fear, or a holy dread of losing the favour and friendship of God. He works in us love, or a high value for the Divine blessing, and a high esteem for the Divine perfections; and he works in us new obedience, which is the combined effect of all those feelings expressed in our actions and displayed in our lives.

In every part of his life, therefore, does the Christian show that he regards God as the only source of life and happiness. His whole conduct proceeds on the principle of true wisdom and true morals. He feels with perfect certainty that to serve any but his Maker, is sin—to seek happiness in any other is folly. How, then, does the Christian regard the universe as the monument of the Almighty power—the display of his perfections—the scene of his holy dealings? He sees that it rests on no foundation but the Divine will—that he and all the creatures around him are but one step from nothing—that therefore he has no more reason to boast, than the meanest reptile; for the Lord is the Maker of them all! All that he sees of grandeur and sublimity exalts his conceptions of the Creator—all that he beholds of minuteness and weakness subdues the feelings of pride, by reminding him of the essential meanness and poverty of the creature!

How does the Christian regard sinful pleasure? With horror, disgust, and contempt. With horror, because he sees the awful train of evils and miseries to which it leads,—the tears and the groans of a sad eternity; with disgust, because it shocks all the principles of his renewed nature, and is repugnant to the holy character of God,—for he sympathizes with all the feelings of the Divine mind; and with contempt, for he sees it to be a worthless and a hurtful thing, devoid alike of enjoyment and of hope. How, indeed, can that cause joy, which, instead of flowing from the Fountain of happiness, has its source in Satan, and its end in hell?

How does the Christian regard natural pleasure? As the gift of a good and gracious God,—the remains of the happiness of paradise. He is happy to enjoy, yet content to resign; he is not so ungrateful as to cast it away, yet he is not so foolish as to regard it as his chief portion; he receives it as one of the minor blessings of the covenant, but suffers it not to displace from his heart the weightier matters of the Gospel—pardon, and grace, and eternal glory.

How does the Christian regard the enjoyments of reason? As one of the most exalted kinds of happiness the earth affords. He can rejoice in the investigations of reason, the creations of fancy, and the efforts of genius,—in all that adorns, enriches, or refines the mind. His natural happiness is the most complete, because the most innocent; his mental happiness is most exalted, because refined by the elevation of his faculties, and the heavenly tendency of his soul.

But these are only the meaner sources of his joy. He rejoices chiefly in this, that his name is inscribed in the Book of Life, and that he is a partaker of the blessings of the covenant of grace. He rejoices to feel in his soul the first-fruits of heaven,—the peace and holiness the Gospel confers; he rejoices to feel that his heart is right towards God, that he has been led to regard him as the fountain of all his happiness, and to seek his face and favour as his best and noblest portion.

And, finally, he looks forward with high anticipations to the endless glory prepared for the people of God. These hopes diffuse through his soul a joy unspeakable. Like the vision of Jacob, they cheer the gloom of the night of sorrow, and dispel the darkness of the desert. He thinks with joy on that happy day when he shall leave for ever this visible scene, and enter the paradise above,—when his exulting spirit shall repose in the bosom of the eternal Father, and be for ever ravished with the contemplation of his glory.

We have thus seen that God is the source of all existence and of all happiness; we have seen the misery and ruin produced in the world by men's refusing to acknowledge these great truths; and we have shown how the Gospel removes this misery, by the instructions it conveys, and the remedy it provides. I would now, therefore, address a very few words to those who still reject this great salvation,—who will not return unto God, that they may have life,—who despise the promises of the Gospel, as well as the vengeance of the Law. Leave the poisoned stream of vain and sinful pleasure, and approach the holy fountain of eternal joy. Are you not yet enough vexed and wearied with your vain pursuits, where the profit is nothing,—where the pleasure is Satan's,—where the toil and the punishment alone are yours? O foolish men! who hath deceived you? who hath persuaded you that there is no happiness in the favour of God,—no delight in the blessedness of heaven? But remember this, that if you still reject the offers of the Gospel, you will receive a doom more tremendous still than banishment from the Fountain of life and happiness. You will receive upon your heads the combined curses of the Law and of the Gospel; you will be fixed for ever in a state where the prospect of death would be happiness,—where the hope of entire destruction would be hailed with as much eagerness as the wearied captive looks forward to his hour of repose. Man! dost thou know what it is to "fall into the hands of the living God?" "It is a fearful thing,"—how fearful no creature can tell; but if you repent not you will very soon feel its awful meaning, and, during all those sleepless ages of burning misery, bitterly bewail the madness that plunged you in the regions of eternal death.

But, my friends, no one compels you to remain in this awful state. To all, even the vilest and the worst, we do now most fully tender the offers of salvation. Heaven is still open,—the Gospel is still free; God is willing,—Christ is able; nothing in the whole extent of the universe can prevent your salvation except yourselves. Come, then, "let us return to the Lord our God, with contrite hearts; for with the Lord there is mercy, and with our God is plenteous redemption. Our God shall appear, and we shall rise with gladness in his sight. His coming shall be as dew upon the grass, and his voice as the songs of the morning. His favour is life, and his loving-kindness is better than life; for with thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light shall we see light."

THE CHRISTIAN INTERCEDING FOR HIS CHILD.

FAIN, O my child, I'd have thee know
The God whom angels love;
And teach thee feeble strains below,
Akin to theirs above.

O, when thy lisping tongue shall read
Of truths divinely sweet,
May'st thou, a little child indeed,
Sit down at Jesus' feet.

I'll move thine ear—I'll point thine eye,
But ah! the inward part—
Great God, the Spirit! hear the sigh
That trembles through my heart.

Break, with thy vital beam benign,
O'er all the mental wild!
Bright o'er the human chaos shine,
And sanctify my child.

PROTESTANTISM IN BELGIUM SINCE THE DAYS OF THE REFORMATION.

BY THE REV. ÆNEAS M. RATE.

PART I.

BELGIUM is one of those countries on the Continent which ought, at present, to be regarded by Christians in this land with very deep interest. It is a country in which the mass of the people are Roman Catholics—where the Romish priesthood act with more concentrated energy, and wield a more powerful sway, than perhaps in any other nation on continental Europe; while, nevertheless, liberty is granted by the Constitution to Protestants openly to proclaim the Gospel. It is interesting, as a land in which a Church, as yet young and feeble, has been already planted; and awakens the hope that, though exposed to the fiercest storms of persecution, which daily threaten to uproot it, it shall yet, through the fostering care of Providence and the descending dews of Divine influence, grow up to maturity, and yield fruit to the people. It derives an additional importance from the fact, that it presents a conspicuous stage, on which Popery, without that mask which it assumes in Protestant countries, exhibits its true character, just as it was, and is, and shall be, till the Lord shall consume the Man of Sin with the Spirit of his mouth, and destroy him by the brightness of his coming. We read the accounts of the early spread of the Reformation in this country; we there find the clearest evidences of that intense hatred of the Gospel, and of the people of God, which has characterised that Church which, in Holy Writ, is described as "drunk with the blood of the saints;" we find the Bible to have been proscribed as the most execrable of all volumes—the persons who dared to peruse its pages to have been accounted worthy of death; all the engines of atrocious and ingenious cruelty to have been employed to torture the bodies of men of whom the world was not worthy—slanders, insults, and reproaches, more sharp than the sword of the enemy or the dagger of the assassin, applied to wound their spirits—and when death ended their sorrows, the blackest infamy to have covered their graves. By such means, the star of the Reformation, which had begun to shine upon this benighted land, was turned into blood; and, after a time, scarce a ray of light was emitted, to irradiate that moral and intellectual gloom which Popery, in all ages, has found to be its only safe and congenial asylum. But three centuries have passed away, and that star has again begun to shine, although, as yet, with a feeble and tremulous light. It has, however, served to show that the character of the enemy of the truth of God remains, in all its leading features, unchanged; and that nothing is wanting in the present day, but the opportunities formerly enjoyed, to embolden the devotees of the Church of Rome to renew the horrors and persecutions of former ages.

Before communicating some facts in reference to the state of religion in Belgium, and the labours of the Belgian Evangelical Society, we shall state a few circumstances, principally drawn from the reports of the Society, regarding the progress which the truth had made in this country soon after the Reformation. This will tend to awaken in our minds an interest in the descendants of those men, who counted not their lives dear to them, so that they might testify their attachment to Christ, and finish their course with joy. The light which, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, broke forth with such splendour in Germany, and soon far and near over Europe, penetrated into the Netherlands, and illuminated for a time the provinces which now bear the name of Belgium. The Gospel was proclaimed, in its freedom and glory, in those towns, in which it has long since ceased to be heard; and flourishing Churches were formed, and rapidly extended, where the mass of the inhabitants are now given up to infidelity and idolatry. Ghent, and Tournay, and Mons, and other large towns, furnished their companies of martyrs, whose names and exploits are written in the Lamb's book of life, and who, for the cause of Christ, ascended the scaffold, or were burnt to ashes at the stake. The power of God was remarkably displayed in giving efficacy to the Word. Thousands were converted, and glorified God. The dungeon, the rack, the torturing fires, seemed for a while only to add boldness to those who survived; and Churches sprung up on every side. The thirst for the Word of God—now first opened to the multitude, after centuries of spiritual despotism, during which it had been sealed—was most intense; and it affords us a lively idea of the eagerness of the people to peruse it, that three folio copies of the Bible were suspended by iron chains to the pillars of the Town-House at Brussels, that there the inhabitants might have an opportunity of satiating their longings for the Word of Life. At this period, the religious history of Belgium acquires an additional interest, from the fact, that here was prepared and published the first translation of the New Testament into the English language. William Tyndale, educated at Oxford, afterwards removed to Cambridge, cordially embraced and boldly professed the doctrines then proclaimed with such power by Luther in Germany. Fearing that, by his open adherence to these doctrines, he might draw down vengeance upon the family with whom he resided, he abandoned his situation as tutor, and retired to the Continent. There he gave himself assiduously to the translation of the Word of God, for the benefit of his own countrymen, and published the English version of the New Testament in 1527. Such services as these to the cause of God could not fail to draw down upon him the peculiar wrath of the enemies of the Truth; and, though the storm was long in gathering, it burst upon him at last. In 1536, by the sentence of the Doctors of the Roman Catholic University of Louvain, he was condemned first to be strangled, afterwards to be burned; and the sentence was accordingly carried into execution.

Flanders, East and West, constitute that part of Belgium where, by universal acknowledgment, ignorance, bigotry, and superstition most extensively prevail. It is, also, that portion of the kingdom where Roman Catholics most abound; and the priests are most numerous, and exert the most powerful sway. Very different were its situation and prospects when the Reformation dawned upon it, with that splendour which gave promise of a glorious day. But the Spaniards, gloomy, bigoted, and unrelenting, who ever displayed the same spirit which built the walls, and filled with victims and with instruments of torture the dismal cells of the Inquisition, and which, on the distant coasts of South America, slaughtered thousands of harmless savages, under the influence of a fanatic zeal for the faith, carried on that system of cruelty, that at length, either by banishment, or terror, or death, silenced the servants of Christ. In East Flanders, a large portion of the religious population emigrated. When the town of Ghent capitulated, in the year 1584, the Duke of Parma, who commanded the Spanish army, gave permission to nine thousand families, who would not renounce the Gospel, to leave their own country. These all, accordingly, forsook their homes, their country, and their friends, and sought refuge in foreign lands, where, without danger or molestation, they might serve their God. But there were many who, from poverty and other causes, were not able to emigrate, but who yet remained firm in their allegiance to their Master; and, no longer permitted during the day to engage in the worship of God, were wont to retire, under the darkness, to solitary and secluded spots, where no human ear could hear their supplications. Some of the descendants of these devoted men, still retaining the principles of their fathers, are to be found, as at the village of St Maria Hoorbeke, in the vicinity of Oudenarde, where about two hundred and fifty Protestants reside. These, through the exertions of religious friends, or their descendants who had removed into Holland, were for a long period supplied with a Dutch minister, to whom the Dutch Government paid a salary; but, in the year 1803 the salary was withdrawn, on the ground that the Belgian Protestants now enjoyed the religious liberty guaranteed by the French Republic, so that from this period they ceased to have a minister. In West Flanders the adherents of Rome succeeded in yet more effectually crushing the rising reformation, and replacing Popery in the position which for a season it had lost. The Protestant ministers were silenced, the privileges of social worship were withdrawn; and, deprived of the means of grace, and overcome by the fear of man, the Protestants gradually lost the zeal and the devotedness by which they had been distinguished. Their children were then allowed to be educated at Roman Catholic schools (the only ones to which they had access), where their minds were imbued, from their earliest years, with the errors of Rome; and hence, when they grew up they renounced the profession of the truth. The same cause seems to have silently, but most effectually, undermined the principles and profession of Protestants in other parts of Europe, and emphatically teaches the important lesson, that if permanence and extension are to be given to the work of grace which is already so manifest in numerous parts of France, and of other countries, there is no human means more important than the multiplication in such districts of efficient Protestant schools. Even in West Flanders, however, there are still some traces to be found of the effects of the Reformation,—some faint glimmerings of the light which once shone so brightly over this benighted region. Many of the Roman Catholics remember with some degree of interest their old Protestant ancestors, and display a freedom from that embittered hatred of evangelical truth, and of all who hold it, which distinguishes the other adherents of the Church of Rome.

It is interesting, while reading the accounts of the Belgian Evangelical Society, to find that some of their agents have been planted in districts where the descendants of old Protestants have been found, and that there the Divine blessing has crowned their labours with success. One of the most important stations of the Society is at Mons, the capital of Hainault, a celebrated place during the time of the Reformation,—whose walls were besprinkled with the blood of Christian martyrs. There the flames of persecution long raged with peculiar violence, and the utmost efforts of cruelty and ingenuity were exerted, in order utterly to consume every remnant of the Protestant faith; but the Divine power was displayed in preserving his persecuted Church from utter destruction. A few there were who remained faithful to their heavenly Master, and transmitted the Gospel they valued to their children after them. To supply the spiritual wants of these, a Protestant service used to be celebrated at Mons by the chaplain of the garrison, previous to the Revolution; and sermons were steadily preached by a devoted servant of Christ, M. Devisme, who resided in the neighbouring village of Dour. Dour and Paturages are both stations closely adjoining Mons, and very near to each other; and both are pregnant with associations deeply interesting to every Christian mind. The Church of Dour is the oldest of the Churches of the district, and the parent of the other congregations; and there is no reason to doubt that it derives its descent from the times of the Reformation. About the middle of the sixteenth century a fierce persecution broke forth in this part of the country, and many families sought an asylum in foreign lands; but some still remained who had not bowed the knee to idols; for, as late as the year 1700, a number of persons in this very village refused to take an oath by which they should engage to yield conformity to the rites of the Church of Rome. Among those charged with contumacy, was a woman advanced in years, who never having been herself taught to read the Word, had become acquainted with many of the most precious passages by hearing her husband read to her. The devout Femelon, at that time visiting his diocese, came to Dour and conversed with this woman; who replied to all his questions by quoting verses of the Sacred Volume, and who especially repeated those precious words of the apostle, "There is now, therefore, no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." Touched and affected with what he saw and heard, the venerable archbishop gave her, in writing, a paper insuring to her protection from all molestation, and sent her away, saying, "My good woman, pray for me." About fifty years after this, a few of these Protestants began to assemble at the house of one of their number, for the worship of God; but the relentless spirit of Popery soon followed them there. The priests resolved, that the person who had the audacity to open his doors for Protestant worship should suffer death! Instruments of their own were employed to injure the image of a saint in a chapel near the village, and to accuse this man of being the author of the misdemeanour; in consequence of which he was condemned. Agreeably to the sentence, he was cast into a dungeon, and when the time for his imprisonment was ended, was led forth from his prison-house, that he might be mercilessly dragged through the city at the tail of a horse; and, in fine, was banished from his country. While travelling towards Holland, and only about nine miles from the town where he had been treated with such merciless severity, exhausted with fatigue, and worn out with suffering, he dropt down on the ground, and expired,—a martyr for the truth not less certainly than if he had died at the stake.

At this time the rage of the priests was fierce and inexorable, and by being directed against the Oracles of Truth, demonstrated that they were impelled by that lying spirit whose kingdom the Word is destined to overthrow. The Bible was every where searched out with unwearied activity, and when discovered, was committed to the flames. Those who possessed it were obliged to be incessantly on the watch, and to exert all their ingenuity to conceal the precious treasure from the view of their persecutors. Holes were made in the walls, or in the thatch of the houses, in which the Word of God was cautiously concealed; and when old buildings have been levelled with the dust, the worn and wasted leaves of the Bible, that had lain there for centuries, emphatically told their tale of the cruelties and persecutions of other ages. Unable in the day time to find a moment in which they might, with security, peruse the precious Volume, they retired to a distance from their cottages under the protecting shades of night, and, by the flickering glimmer of the lanthorn, sat down to peruse the Word of God. At other times, they travelled to the nearest towns where they could hear the Dutch and Swiss ministers proclaim to them the Gospel of Christ. On such occasions, when the populace recognised them, their fanatic zeal rose almost to madness, while they pursued them with opprobrious epithets, such as "Vagabonds," and "Heretics of Dour;" and assailed them with stones. An interesting anecdote, retained in a Flemish tract, called "Celestine; or the Blind Woman of Paturages," will afford us a lively and a just idea of the value which at this period was attached by the Protestants to the Word, and of the inveterate enmity of the Roman Catholics against it.

"In my youth," said the old Estrebeck (about one hundred and fifty years ago), "there was but one Bible in our neighbourhood, which was in the possession of a few Christians, who met secretly during the night to peruse its sacred contents, and to instruct and strengthen their souls. This Sacred Book was a source of terror to the Popish Priests, and to the faithful adherents of the Romish Church: they sought after the Sacred Volume with avidity, and searched every place where they thought it might be secreted. The village constable had received orders to go, with some of his emissaries, and carefully search every house where there were any hopes of finding it. This Bible was the property of four individuals, fathers of families, who were coal-miners. One day, their wives being from home, they were obliged, when going to their work, to leave their precious treasure in charge of a young girl about eight or nine years of age, who remained at home to take care of her little brother. These worthy people thought it desirable to hide their Bible in the bottom of the cradle, charging the little girl, at the same time, if any one should come during their absence, continually to rock the child, even if it should be asleep. The poor little girl, taught from her infancy to prize this inestimable treasure, strictly observed the orders which she had received when the persecutors entered. They began immediately to search every corner of the house, from top to bottom; but the object of their search was not to be found. Disappointed and discouraged, they were about to retire, when one of them observed that they had forgotten to look into the cradle. What was the poor little girl's distress on hearing these words, and the anguish of her mind when she saw the Holy Volume torn from her! But still it was nothing to that of the parents, when they returned from their labours in the evening, and learned their irreparable loss. Their grief was beyond expression; they wept aloud, crying out, 'Oh, dear Bible! precious book! what will become of us without thee! Better had it been for us that our cottages had been torn down, or devoured by the flames.' "

Notwithstanding the number of Protestants who had resided at Dour, it was not till the year 1784, when an act of toleration was passed by Joseph the Second, that they began to meet regularly for worship in a private room. Two years later, they applied to a devoted minister, Mr Devisme, to afford them religious instruction, which he promised to do, by paying them a visit once every three months—his numerous other ministerial avocations in the north of France, where he was wont to travel from place to place, preaching the Gospel to various bands of Protestants who had no pastor, not permitting him to see them oftener. For a considerable time this devoted minister seems to have pursued his labours without molestation; but, in the year 1789, while engaged at a Protestant service, he was seized, conveyed to the prison at Mons, in which he lay for forty-eight days, and was then liberated. The same treatment awaited him in the year 1802; but, after twenty-four hours' imprisonment, he was set at liberty. From that time till the year 1817, he continued to pursue his silent course of usefulness; at which time he was succeeded by his son, who still preaches the Gospel in the same place. Very near to Dour, is Paturages, another of the stations of the Belgian Evangelical Society; and a village, many of whose inhabitants are descendants of the persecuted Protestants of the Reformation. Here it is alleged, that, while the storm of persecution was fiercely raging, and many servants of Christ forsook their homes to depart to Christian lands, one individual took farewell of his native village singing the sorrowful strains of the 88th Psalm, while leaving behind him his wife and his children, who were resolved still to live in that land of idolatry and wickedness. Notwithstanding their descent and their early traditions, it would appear that true piety had almost entirely disappeared from among the inhabitants of Paturages, till some of them began to visit Dour, and to hear the Gospel proclaimed by the faithful servant of Christ of whom we have spoken. In 1785, Mr Devisme prevailed on the Protestants, who were willing to hear the Gospel, to have a service on the Sabbath-day in their own village. These meetings continued till the year 1820, when the younger Mr Devisme first began to visit them, and found them assembled, few in number, in the house of a poor blind woman. From that time they have increased in number, in knowledge, and in zeal. The Truth has also taken root in a neighbouring village of Labouverie, from which a few individuals were wont to go to Dour for instruction, and returned to awaken in their friends an interest in those truths which had poured light and consolation into their own souls.

Such facts as we have mentioned are deeply interesting, and at the same time peculiarly important. They establish the position, that there are in Belgium, as there are in France, and doubtless in many other parts of the Continent where the Protestant faith once took root, little bands of the descendants of the men who received the Gospel in the sixteenth century; who, amid surrounding darkness, have retained some sparks of truth; who remember with veneration their persecuted forefathers, and, were the opportunity only afforded, would gladly hear the Gospel. It shows that, owing to these circumstances, the Gospel might be proclaimed among them under peculiar advantages; that, in all probability, by many it would be cordially received; and that a little company of Christians might thus be formed, from whom the light might be made to shine forth and penetrate the surrounding Popish darkness. It is sad to think, that there are descendants of confessors and martyrs, cherishing the recollection of their heroic fortitude and Christian zeal, but cut off from all the means of grace and opportunities of religious instruction. With sorrow they send their children to the Popish schools,—having no other means of affording them instruction; they sigh over their silent Sabbaths, uncheered by the voice of the herald of mercy. Their hopes and desires are awakened when some colporteur passes by, and leaves them the precious Bible; and, without doubt, even now they are lifting up many an earnest prayer that some evangelist or pastor may at length, in the providence of God, be sent to visit them. Shall Christians in this country be altogether regardless of the spiritual destitution of men of this description on the Continent? Shall they do nothing at all to rekindle the lamp that once burned so brightly among them? Especially when a society has been formed which employs some faithful and devoted evangelists among this very class of people, and while God is blessing their labours in the conversion of many Roman Catholics, and the raising up new companies of Christians, who are glorifying God amid the fires of persecution, shall this Society, uncheered by the sympathies of their brethren in this favoured land, and unsupported by their aid, be allowed to fall to the ground?

THE JEWS; OR THE VOICE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT CONCERNING THEM.*

In these eventful times, when the Jews are becoming more and more an object of interest both to Church and State, indeed to the world at large, it seems desirable to meet every objection that may be urged against the endeavour to promote Christianity amongst them, and likewise to bring forward every scriptural argument that can be adduced in favour of this important duty. In many pious and benevolent minds there seems to have existed an almost superstitious dread of coming forward in their behalf, lest it should appear like an interference with the purposes of God towards that peculiar people: but, however miraculous their national conversion may be, still there has always been a remnant from amongst them returning into the fold; and we find that, throughout the New Testament as well as the Old, their claims are enforced. This is the point I wish clearly to establish.

It is a singular fact, that as the Jewish Church overlooked the Gentiles, although they were included in the writings of Moses and the Prophets, so the Christian Church has overlooked the Jews, although Christ and his Apostles continually refer to them.

From the writings of the Evangelists, who narrate the personal ministry of our Lord, the two following passages alone are sufficient;—the one in which our Lord asserts his own mission at that period, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel;" and the other in which He gives a commission to the apostles, "Go not amongst the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Luke, in his history of the Acts of the Apostles, informs us that it was to devout Jews who had come to the Great Festival that the glad tidings of Messiah's resurrection were first announced; and that multitudes of that nation, by the preaching of Peter, believed on the Saviour and were added to the Church. Thus was the door of faith first opened to the Jews; and though Paul was afterwards set apart as apostle to the Gentiles, yet we find him visiting the synagogues in every place, and gathering fruit from amongst the Jews.

In the Epistle to the Romans, the apostle, triumphing in the Gospel of Christ, declares it to be the "power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek;" and he states that their rejection is neither total nor final. Here our attention should be particularly directed to the following verses addressed to the Gentile Church:—"For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive-tree, how much more shall these which be natural branches be grafted into their own olive-tree?" "I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved. As it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

In the Epistle to the Corinthians, when announcing the great subject of the apostolic ministry, "We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness," Paul adds; "but to them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ is the power of God, and the wisdom of God." In the second Epistle to that Church, when speaking of the superiority of the Christian dispensation and of the blindness of the Jew, he yet holds out a hope that the heart of the Jew shall "turn to the Lord, and then the veil shall be taken away."

There seems to be a striking allusion here to the history of Moses ascending the mount unveiled, but when he descends from that mount the veil is on his face; so when the Jews shall again turn towards the God of their fathers, the veil of unbelief shall be taken from their hearts, and they shall with unveiled face behold the glory of the Lord.

In the Epistle to the Galatians, when urging the great doctrine of justification by faith alone, and insisting upon the liberty of the believing Gentiles, that they should not be compelled to live as do the Jews, he pronounces peace upon those Gentiles who were new created in Christ Jesus; and also upon the converted Jews, or "the Israel of God."

In the Epistle to the Ephesians he speaks of both Jew and Gentile as having "access through Christ, by one Spirit, unto the Father;" and expressly declares, that it was the great mystery of that age, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and partakers of God's promise in Christ by the Gospel.

In the Epistle to the Colossians Paul asserts that both "Jew and Greek are one in Christ;" and in the Thessalonians he speaks of the "Churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus."

We then come to the First Epistle to Timothy, in which Paul refers to his own conversion as "a pattern" or type "to them who should hereafter believe on Christ to life everlasting;"—none of whom could exceed him in their enmity to Christianity.

In the Epistle to Titus it is declared, that "the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men;" that is, to Gentiles as well as Jews.

Passing by the private letter to Philemon, we come to that addressed to the Hebrews; an epistle which ought to decide the question, as it is exclusively addressed to the house of Israel, and gloriously unfolds the priesthood of Messiah, as typified in the Levitical dispensation.

The Epistle of Peter, who was the apostle of the Circumcision, is written to converts from his own nation, "scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia." And he refers them, in his Second Epistle, to the great "promise" revealed to their prophet, Isaiah, that there would be "new heavens and a new earth," when "Jerusalem" would be "a rejoicing, and her people a joy."

James avowedly addresses his Epistle to the twelve tribes.

John says, in his First Epistle, writing as a Jew, and evidently addressing Jews, "We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

Leaving the short Epistle of Jude, which describes the apostasy of the latter times, and the second coming of the Lord to destroy that apostasy, we come to the Revelation to John. Now, I would ask if the Old Testament prophets perpetually referred to the Jews, and the New Testament apostles to the same, is it probable that this last book of Holy Writ should pass them by,—especially when it winds up all prophecy, with the fulfilment of which they are intimately connected? Surely, therefore, it must be inferred, that the "one hundred and forty-four thousand sealed from the twelve tribes" are converted Jews, and that the great "multitude, out of every tongue, and nation, and kindred, and people," are converted Gentiles; thus accomplishing the remarkable prophecy of Caiaphas, that "Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but that he should gather together in one the children of God which were scattered abroad."

Now, if it be satisfactorily proved that the Christian Scriptures never overlook the Jews, is it right in the Christian Church to overlook them?

For centuries the Jews were the Lord's peculiar people, first as a family, and then as a nation. Their law was written by the finger of God himself, and for the space of forty years he guided them through the trackless desert; by day in a pillar of cloud, and by night in a pillar of fire. He drove out the nations from before them, and brought them to the Promised Land. There he visited them with mercies and with judgments; but they continually rebelled against him, and finally filled up the measure of their iniquity by their rejection of the Messiah. Then, indeed, as a nation, they lost their civil and ecclesiastical privileges, but they were not cast off for ever. God had still purposes of mercy towards them; and thus he addresses the wild scions who were grafted in,— "For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy, through their unbelief, even so have these also now not believed that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy." Is there no meaning to be attached to these words? do they not imply that these natural branches are left as a legacy to our fostering care, who partake of the root and fatness of the Olive tree? And have we hitherto acted as faithful guardians of that people? Have we prayed for them? have we preached to them? have we set them a good example? as the trustees of the covenant, have we done our utmost to ameliorate their condition, subdue their prejudices, and enlighten their minds?

But there is yet another view of this subject to which our attention should be seriously drawn, because it may affect our interest not as individuals only, but as a Church and nation. In Sacred History we invariably find the truth of that prophetic declaration, "Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee." Nor am I sure that if the records of heaven could be read by us, whether the reason of many a scourge in modern times would not be discerned in the unalterable truth of this declaration. Not improbably we might find the oppression of the Jew on one column, and the judgment of the oppressor on the other. In support of this view of the subject we may refer to the history of individuals—we may refer to the history of nations.—Laban, the Syrian, received Jacob into his house and was forced to acknowledge that the Lord had blessed him for His servant's sake. Balaam, who enticed the Israelites to sin, was slain amongst the enemies of God. The widow of Sarepta's barrel of meal wasted not, neither did her cruise of oil fail, because in the time of famine she had fed the prephet Elijah;—whilst Jezebel the persecutor of that prophet came to an untimely end. Saul was permitted to spare the Kenites because they had showed kindness to the children of Israel. Egypt oppressed them and became the “basest of kingdoms.” Cyrus, the friend and protector of the Jews, had for his friend the God of Israel, who opened before him the “two-leaved gates,” and poured into his coffers the “hidden riches of secret places,” and this He did for “Jacob his servant’s sake and Israel his elect.” The Moabites and Ammonites were excluded from the congregation of the Lord, because they met them not with bread and water when they came forth out of Egypt. And Babylon who sat as a Queen was brought down to the dust, because she helped forward their affliction. With these instances before us, and others might be adduced, let it be borne in mind that the threatening has never been annulled nor the promise withdrawn. Too long have we lingered on Mount Ebal—denouncing the threatened judgment, it is high time that we ascend Mount Gerizim and proclaim the promised blessing. We have seen the withering effects of judgment, and may we not expect to see the renovating effects of the promise that “Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit?” Already the fig-tree is putting forth her green leaves, and summer may be nigh at hand. The voices of the prophets cry—“Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem. Awake, shake thyself from the dust, O captive daughter of Zion.” The voices of the apostles cry aloud as the voice of one man that, to them “pertain the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the Father’s, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all God blessed for evermore.”

Then if the Christian Church would discharge an important duty, and enjoy a high privilege, let her go forward in this work of mercy, afford every facility, remove every difficulty, and give every encouragement to the people of Israel. Let her execute the commission given to her, “Go through, go through the gates, cast up, cast up the high way, gather out the stones, lift up a standard to the people, behold the Lord hath proclaimed unto the ends of the earth.” Say ye to the daughter of Zion, “Behold, thy salvation cometh.” Oh! that our beloved country may be the favoured one to bring this acceptable present to the Lord of hosts. Oh! that our beloved Church may faithfully discharge her duty, and thus together bring to pass the apostolic declaration, that “Through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.”

HERE AND THERE.

Here, bliss is short, imperfect, insincere,
But total, absolute, and perfect there;
Here, time’s a moment, short our happiest state,—
There, infinite duration is our date;
Here, Satan tempts and troubles e’en the best,—
There, Satan’s power extends not to the blest.

In a weak and sinful body here we dwell,
But there, I quit this frail and sickly shell;
Here, my best thoughts are stain’d with guilt and fear,
But love and pardon will be perfect there;
Here, my best duties are desil’d with sin,—
There, all is ease without, and peace within;
Here, feeble faith supplies my only light,—
There, faith and hope are swallow’d up in sight;
Here, love of self my fairest work destroys,—
There, love of God shall perfect all my joys;
Here, things as in a glass are darkly shown,—
There, I shall know as clearly as I’m known.
Frail are the fairest flowers that bloom below,—
There, freshest palms on roots immortal grow;
Here, wants or cares perplex my anxious mind,
But spirits there a calm fruition find;
Here, disappointments my best schemes destroy,
There, those who sow’d in tears shall reap in joy;
Here, vanity is stamp’d on all below,—
Perfection there on every good shall grow;
Here, my fond heart is fasten’d on some friend,
Whose kindness may, whose life must, have an end,
But there no failure can I ever prove,—
God cannot disappoint, for “God is love;”
Here, Christ for sinners suffer’d, groan’d, and bled,
But there he reigns, the great triumphant Head;
Here, mock’d and scorn’d, he wore a crown of thorns,—
A crown of glory there his brow adorns;
Here, error clouds the will, and dims the sight,—
There, all is knowledge, purity, and light;
Here, so imperfect is the mortal state,
If blest myself, I mourn some others fate,—
At every human woe I here repine,—
The joy of ev’ry saint shall there be mine;
Here, if I lean, the world will pierce my heart,
But there that broken reed and I shall part;
Here, on no promis’d good can I depend,
But there, the “Rock of Ages” is my friend;
Here, if some sudden joy delight inspire,
The dread to lose it damps the rising fire,—
But there, whatever good the soul employ,
The thoughts that ’tis immortal crowns the joy.

HANNAH MORE.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MR JAMES MEIKLE,

SURGEON AT CARNWATH, LANARKSHIRE.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THIS excellent man and devoted Christian was born at Carnwath, a village in the upper part of Clydesdale, on the 19th of May 1730. His father, who was in rather indigent circumstances, practised as a surgeon in that village and the surrounding district; and burdened with a family of ten children, his income was scarcely adequate to their support. An expensive law-suit, besides, in which he became involved, reduced him to the necessity of incurring debts which bore heavily upon his spirits in his declining years.

James, the subject of our present Sketch, who was the fifth child, was of a delicate constitution in his early years, and he was so enfeebled, besides, by the diseases incident to childhood, that it was not till his ninth year that he was able to attend school. To the religious training of their children his parents paid peculiar attention; and one of the strongest impressions which he retained of the history of his infant years, was the care with which he had been trained to a habit of prayer. “I was taught to pray” he says, “and prayed when I knew not what prayer was; but now I would not give over prayer for the universe." It does not appear, however, that at the period to which this remark refers, he had been in the slightest degree impressed with the importance of divine things. That "folly is bound up in the heart of a child," was exemplified in him, as it is in vast multitudes, and it was not until he had arrived at years when reason and reflection begin to manifest themselves, that he evinced a decided inclination towards religion. About the age of thirteen or fourteen, when in most cases the "errors of youth" are most abundant, his mind was deeply interested in the things of God. He delighted in the perusal of the Sacred Volume, and in the exercise of secret prayer and religious meditation. The Sabbath was to him the happiest day of the week, and the sound of the Sabbath-bell was the sweetest music to his ear. While thus advancing in his regard for divine things, an event occurred in the family which appears to have been productive of much spiritual good to his soul. His eldest brother was cut off at the age of twenty-five, and though on his death-bed he gave evidence that he was not unprepared for the last enemy, the stroke was felt with intense severity by the whole family, and by none more than the interesting individual whose career we are now engaged in tracing.

This painful bereavement proved the means, under the blessing of the Spirit, of arousing James to a greater ardour in seeking the Lord. He was then in his seventeenth year, and he had a very strong desire to devote himself to the service of God in the work of the ministry. To the fulfilment of this wish, however, the reduced state of his father's means seemed to offer a serious obstacle. Yet he resolved, without delay, to commence his studies; and accordingly, in the beginning of the following winter he set off for Edinburgh, along with his mother. On his arrival in town, in a state of extreme penury, he engaged a private teacher, to assist him in his studies, who, after receiving his money, attended only for a few weeks, when he suddenly disappeared, without fulfilling his engagement. Thus frustrated in his favourite design, and not having sufficient money to procure another tutor, James returned to his father's house at Carnwath. For some time he indulged the hope of obtaining a bursary, but in this also he was disappointed: and, to add to his calamities, a law-suit in which the family were engaged was lost, and thus they were brought to a state of distressing poverty. Kind friends, however, were raised up, in the good providence of God, who, in the most delicate and considerate manner, relieved them from their difficulties.

At the beginning of the winter 1749, Mr Meikle, finding that all hope of studying for the Church must be surrendered, resolved to betake himself to the medical profession, not, however, as his ultimate object, but with the remote design of realizing a sufficient sum to enable him to make the necessary preparation for the sacred office. How long he studied medicine, and when he commenced practice as a surgeon, we have been unable to discover. He appears, however, to have practised several years in Carnwath prior to 1758. During all that time his heart was set upon the ministry. The medical profession was with him a mere secondary object. Still he laboured with such assiduity and conscientiousness in the arduous duties of a country surgeon, that he was emboldened to take the whole family, now in a state of extreme destitution, under his care. This, of course, involved him in very heavy expenses; and in the year 1753, he appears to have contracted considerable debt—a circumstance which preyed upon his mind, and gave rise to a temporary depression of spirits. He persevered, however, in the active discharge of his professional duties, and soon his affairs began to assume a more promising aspect. A dark cloud again obscured his prospects, and his pecuniary circumstances became so embarrassed, that in 1757 he came to the resolution of committing the management of his property to a friend, and entering the navy as a surgeon. At this time an offer was made to him to be surgeon to a ship which traded to the coast of Guinea. Preparations were accordingly made for his departure, and he had taken a farewell of many of his friends, when he was suddenly arrested at the instance of the holder of a bill, who was now his only creditor, all his other debts having been paid. This bill his agent had agreed to manage for him, having ample security for repayment in the property which was left behind; but the creditor took alarm at his going abroad, and affecting to distrust the agent who was to manage his affairs in his absence, laid him under arrest. Not a friend to whom he applied would either advance the money for him, or even become his surety. In this emergency, he was under the necessity of parting with the money which he had reserved for defraying the expenses of his journey to England, and thus he was compelled to remain at home. His feelings under this severe trial he thus describes in a meditation which he wrote on the occasion.

"How uncertain are our best-founded expectations from created things! Nothing seemingly more sure; the time when, the place where, and the manner how, designs were to be put in execution, being set by the agreement and concurrence of every one concerned! And yet, in the event, nothing more unsure! O irresistible Providence! How dost thou laugh at the folly of man, whose purblind eyes see nothing to change the face of things, till, by an unexpected revolution, and severe discipline, he is made to know his fallibility and blindness! O foolish heart of man, to be fond of this or that to excess! Thou seest the beginning of a matter, but not the end; thou beholdest the outer wheel of providence, but considerest not that there is an inner wheel, even a wheel in the middle of a wheel, which produces scenes unobserved before—scenes which finite wisdom never could invent.

"Perhaps the present disappointment, though great and unexpected, is a kind one, could I with patience wait and see the issue: and, beyond dispute, it is a just one; 'for shall not the righteous Judge of all the earth do right?'

"But is my disappointment in the most momentous things, or only in matters of inferior concern? Have I got a message from the court of Heaven, that there is no salvation for me there? no mercy at the throne? no peace to be expected from Him that sits thereon? No, no. Then what ails me? Is not eternal felicity secured, a noble panacea, and sufficient antidote against the heaviest misfortunes of a deceitful world? What avail a faithless flatterer, a falsifying friend, a violated promise, a mob of backbiters, disappointment of a place, a worldly loss, a broken purpose, a thwarted enterprise, expectation vain, and hope, though a long expectant, in the issue, bringing forth nothing but wind? What avail all these, in comparison of the everlasting interests of my immortal soul? But, if these afflictions make me miserable, shall I make myself more miserable still, by handling the coals that burn me, and reading over the register of my misfortunes, which will be forgot in eternity, as the waters that flow away? How, then, shall I antedate eternity, and anticipate the felicity of the world to come, but by forgetting my miseries in the triumph of faith?

“Moreover, these many turnings, and stupendous meanders of my life, are all squared by the straight line of the decree of God, with whom nothing is crooked. The seeming gaps of my lot are but the fulfilment of Heaven’s design concerning me, and my repeated disappointments are only the accomplishment of the counsel of God.

“But, seeing this is thy work, O God! the effect of thine ever-equal will, I ought not only to be dumb, but rejoice in it, and be glad in what thou hast wrought, however it appear to me, and wonder that thou shouldst concern thyself with me, so as to disappoint my ignorant designs (such may my schemes, plans, and enterprises be.) Hence I bless thee for all that befalls me, if I have not a sinful hand in it; and if I have, I plead for pardon through Christ’s meritorious name.

“Now, I rest, and am composed, and calmly wait on thee, resigned to Heaven’s determination in every thing concerning me in time, till I arrive at that better country, at that perfect state, where there is neither disappointment nor pain.”

These remarks show that though cast down, he was not in despair. The disappointment was great and the reflection was a bitter one, that not a friend had come forward to relieve him from his embarrassment. But he submitted to the will of Providence, and gave up thoughts in the meantime of leaving home. It was plain, however, that he must resort to some plan or other of bettering his circumstances, and therefore, he still entertained the idea of going to sea should a favourable opportunity present itself. In the end of the year (1757), such an opportunity occurred, and he resolved on entering the navy as a surgeon’s mate. He set out accordingly for Leith with the view of embarking for London; but as his trunk, through the negligence of the person who had charge of it, did not arrive before the sailing of the vessel, he was again disappointed; and as no other of the king’s ships was expected to sail for two months, he returned to Carnwath. On the month of March following, he was more successful. On reaching London he was examined by a medical board, and received an appointment from the Navy-Office, of second surgeon’s mate to the Portland, a fifty gun ship then lying at Plymouth. He set out on foot to join his ship; and as a Sabbath intervened in the course of his travels, he spent that day in meditation and prayer at a village within ten miles of Portsmouth. To one of Mr Meikle’s pious feelings and habits, the situation in which he was now placed on board a man-of-war, was peculiarly un congenial. His righteous soul was vexed with the immoral practices which prevailed around him. Profane swearing, drunkenness, debauchery, and an open disregard of the Lord’s Day, were a source of intense grief to him, so that to use his own strong language, “I was filled with vexation, grief, and, I might say, holy indignation, till my breast ached, and I was pained at my very heart.” It was not to be expected that he could remain silent at the sight of such abandoned wickedness. He reproved as he found opportunity; but even while he did so, he felt afraid for himself lest the habit of looking upon so much open villany should familiarize his mind to sin, and make him think too lightly of it. He looked up, however, all the more earnestly to that God who alone was able to keep him from falling. “Though the wicked,” he says, “gave me grief without, yet God comforted me and was the joy of my soul.”

Had it not been for the wickedness of his companions on board the Portland, the four years which Mr Meikle spent in that ship were on the whole not unpleasant. He retained throughout a continuance of good health; and although he was too often subjected to annoyance by the ungodliness of those around him, he never failed by the uniform consistency of his own character to command the respect of all. In a letter to his sister, he thus remarks, “Abstracting from their wickedness; and surely when we see transgressors we should be grieved, my situation is singularly happy; for there is not an officer on board but is ready to oblige me, and to do any thing to serve me.” Such is the natural effect of a holy and upright walk even upon the most profligate. They admire and respect even while they cannot imitate.

It is not always in situations of apparently the greatest outward ease and advantage that the Christian makes the most rapid advances in the divine life. On the contrary, it has been generally found, that where every thing around him appeared peculiarly likely to retard his progress, the Almighty has compensated for the loss of outward privileges by the private communications of his grace. Mr Meikle felt this, and accordingly, we find that every one of the meditations, both in “Solitude Sweetened”* and in the “Traveller,” were written at sea, in the midst of all that was fitted to discourage the soul in its aspirations after communion and fellowship with God. That we may see how this holy man spent his time on board ship, let us look to his own statement, under date July 7, 1758:—“Now the Scriptures were sweeter to me than ever; and the method I pursued was, in the morning, first to pray, lest any thing should disturb me afterwards; then to read one chapter in the Old, and another in the New Testament, and then a psalm in the metre version. At twelve o’clock I prayed again, and again at four. At night I read a chapter in both Testaments, and another psalm, and then prayed; which I postponed till the lights were put out, as then I was least disturbed. This I mention, not as matter of boasting, for my prayers may humble rather than elate me; but to signify how sweet I then found living near God to be, and to be in the exercise of commanded duty.” The Sabbath, in particular, was to him a day of holy joy. “I chose to mark how it fared with me on that day in particular, and always made my request to God the evening before, that it might be a good day to my soul.”

On one occasion, when the Portland was anchored before Leghorn, an event occurred which Mr Meikle was often wont to mention as a marked interposition of the Almighty in his behalf. It is thus narrated in his Life:—

“Several of the gentlemen belonging to the ship had formed a party, in order to visit the city of Pisa, which is not more than twelve miles distant, to entertain themselves with the sight of its famous hanging tower, and the other curiosities of the place. Mr Meikle, starting in the morning of the 12th of April, went on foot by himself, and enjoyed, he says, by the way, 'pleasant meditations on the love of Christ;' the rest followed on horseback. The afternoon was far advanced before they had sufficiently gratified their curiosity. In the evening Mr Meikle's companions returned, but he, being fatigued, and observing that the wind was foul, so that the fleet which the Portland was to convey could not sail, ventured imprudently to remain in Pisa. Early next morning, he set out for Leghorn; but the wind had changed during the night, and before he could reach the city, the fleet had weighed, and were several leagues on their way.

* We are glad to observe that the ~~second~~ edition of this invaluable work, in a neat and cheap form, has just been published, in Edinburgh.

"By this occurrence he was thrown into inconceivable perplexity. In a strange place, ignorant of the language, with no clothes except what were on his body, with little money in his pocket, without one personal acquaintance, and even few Englishmen being left in the place to take an interest in the distresses of their countryman; afraid, besides, of the fate of his papers and other property on board, of the loss of what was due to him on the ship's books, and of being detained long before he could find an opportunity of getting home,—what was to be done? In his distress he applied to the English consul; but every expedient suggested by him, and some others whom he consulted, failed.

"After thus spending the remainder of Friday and the whole of Saturday in fruitless contrivances how to extricate himself from the embarrassments of his situation, the Sabbath came, on which he resolved as much as possible to banish care, and to commit himself to God. It was his custom, when an enemy appeared, or when at any time he went ashore, to put his Bible in his pocket, that in any event he might not be deprived of the consolation which the perusal of it is calculated to afford; and on this occasion he remarks that he was so happy as to have along with him his dear companion, the Bible. Early on the morning, therefore, of the 15th of April, he retired to a forest, which lay a considerable way out of town on the road to Pisa, and spent the day in devotional exercises. He sung the 63d psalm,—a psalm written in a wilderness, which, says he, 'gave me great comfort in my wilderness.' He read the 102d psalm, which 'well suits the afflicted when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord.' He engaged repeatedly in prayer, and in meditation on God and the dispensations of his providence towards his people, and himself in particular. As the day advanced the wind sprung up, and it began to rain. He took shelter from the storm in the trunk of a hollow tree.

"After the rain ceased he drew nearer the city, and, reclining on a bank, wrote a few verses; but the wind still blowing high, the evening growing chill, and he himself becoming faint, for he had tasted nothing all that day but a draught of cold water, and eaten little the day before, he returned to the city. Calling at a house to which he was kindly invited, he had not sat long before information was brought him, that the English fleet had been driven back by contrary winds, and were arrived in the roads. Animated by this delightful, but unexpected intelligence of an event which so evidently marked the care of Providence, he made all possible haste towards the shore; but it was late, it blew hard, and it was morning before he could get aboard. As he rowed towards the ship, it fell calmer, the wind became fair, the signal for sailing was hoisted; and, within two hours after he entered the Portland, the fleet were under way, with a fair wind and a fresh gale.

"How ignorant are we of the gracious intention of events, of which, at the moment, we are disposed to complain! The wind which chilled him, and the rain which drove him for shelter into the trunk of a tree, were the instruments of his deliverance! 'This interposition of Providence for me,' he says, 'was astonishing; that God should send a contrary gust of wind out of his treasures, and turn a whole fleet out of their intended course for one poor worm! and, as soon as that end was accomplished, ordered a fair wind to blow, so that we were obliged to put back no more.' It appears to have struck even the thoughtless sailors with surprise; for they hailed him, as he approached the vessel, in their rough and irreligious manner, 'Come along, you praying d—l;' adding, that the winds would not permit them to leave Leghorn without him.

"His first care was to acknowledge God. 'I had pleasant reflections,' he says, 'on the sudden and sweet change which Providence had made in my circumstances. The other day I was in a forest in Italy, solitary, left behind, and friendless; but now in my own ship, and already many leagues advanced in our intended voyage.' Amidst the glow of gratitude which he felt for his deliverance, he wrote, April 16, the following lines:—

Awake, each grateful thought, and sing
The Lord's o'erturning hand;
For thee concern'd, th' Eternal King
See, and astonish'd stand!
Heaven's hosts might well exclaim his care,
Angelic every form;
Yet, strange! see him on earth prepare
His way to bless a storm!
At His command the billows swell—
The winds impetuous blow,
And veer about, and quick fulfil
His kind designs below.
I cannot praise thee as I should,—
With gratitude inspire;
I cannot praise thee as I would,— Accept the faint desire.
Thy kindness I will ne'er forget,
But ~~thine~~ astonish'd gaze,
And all my life on earth will set Apart to show thy praise."

THE GARDENS OF ANCIENT PALESTINE.

BY THE REV. JAMES HAMILTON,

MINISTER OF ROXBURGH CHURCH, EDINBURGH.

PART II.

BUT there is another way in which we may form a presumptive estimate of the degree of taste and skill displayed by the Hebrews in this department, viz., by inquiring what opportunities of improvement they enjoyed in their intercourse with other nations.

The Jews spent some centuries in Egypt, and from Mr Wilkinson's laborious researches amongst the hieroglyphics, the ancient Egyptians seem to have bestowed much pains, and taken great delight in planting. Houses of the better sort were approached by an avenue of trees; the court was usually planted, and a villa was not complete without its garden and orchard. Not only were flowers in pots and vases distributed through the apartments, but the building was intersected and surrounded with courts, in which grew flowers and trees. Many circumstances prove that the Egyptians possessed a taste for the art of gardening. Had the cucumbers and the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic, been their sole object, they would have been content to stick their plants into the ground, with regard to nothing but economy of space. A slight investigation shows that it was quite otherwise. Professor Rosellini's garden wants nothing but a few curve lines, and a greater variety of trees and flowers, in order to represent all that is essential to our modern ideas. Had mere utility been the object, the ponds would not have been adorned by the lotus, or bordered with green turf; nor would the fruit trees have been planted with so graceful an adjustment between regularity and variety; nor would any of the precious soil have been wasted on pretty but useless flowers. At their feasts, each guest was presented with a flower or nosegay; the goblet was crowned with a garland; and a vase of flowers, preserved fresh in water, formed the central ornament of the dinner-table. The country residence of a wealthy Egyptian made a near approach to modern sumptuousness. Here we have only to concern ourselves with its outward arrangements; but these were on a scale of elegance and comfort as great as the peculiarities of the climate and the state of the arts allowed. When Rameses stepped forth from his palace, he could saunter beneath an avenue of stately palms and sycamores, whilst the breeze of the river trembled through the light foliage of the one, and not a "drop" of tropic sunshine fell through the umbrella leaves of the other. If he went into his vineyard, he might walk under trellises, from whose roofs and sides the richest clusters depended, or through colonnades, where the vines twisted thyrus-wise round carved pillars or gilded props. If he passed thence into the wilderness of the park, he and his courtiers might try their skill in the favourite recreation of archery, or expend their arrows on the game which abounded in the thickets; or if the monarch chose, extended beneath the canopy of his pleasure-boat, he might angle for the fish with which not only the river, but every tank and canal were swarming; whilst his sweltering slaves along the shore dragged the vessel of their luxurious lord. Or, if he pleased, he might ascend the upper and airiest apartment of his kiosk, where, reclining on an ottoman, and quaffing the juice of his grandsire's vintage, or the wine of his own dates, he might listen to the timbrel and harp of the minstrels, whilst every breath of air that ascended through the open casements was faint with perfumes: the water-fowl gambolled on the pond; and the royal gardener's apprentices, the monkeys, played their antics in the pomegranates; and the labourers, waxing diligent with the day's decline, busily plied the shadoof, and filled with water the circular cavity at the root of the trees.

It is rather remarkable, that the Bible should contain no express allusion to the famous Hanging Gardens of Babylon; but we can entertain no doubt that the attention of the Jews must often have been drawn to this "wonder of the world," during their captivity of seventy years, and that when they returned to the land of olive-yards and vine-yards, they would carry with them the remembrance of it, and the tasteful emotions which an object so stupendous must have awakened. And as we believe that the recollection of Belshazzar's palace must have entered, as well as the ancient temple, into the contrast which drew tears from the old man's eyes at seeing the second temple at Jerusalem, so the royal gardens of Solomon, with their fences crumbled down, their conduits broken, and their vines run wild in the desolations of a long captivity, must have forced a melancholy comparison with

Those airy gardens, which yon palace vast Spread round, and to the morning air hang forth
Their golden fruits and dewy opening flowers;
While still the low mists creep in lazy folds
O'er the house-tops beneath.

MILMAN.

But from any thing which can now be collected, these gardens were rather a stupendous attempt at imitating a mountain-forest, than any thing to which modern usage would affix the name of garden. Diodorus Siculus, Josephus, and Q. Curtius, ascribe them to the uxorious complaisance of a Syriac king (probably Nebuchadnezzar), whose Median queen desiderated the mountains and forests of her native land in the swampy levels of Chaldee. Accordingly, the historians who mention the Babylonish garden, dwell only on its vast and magnificent features—the terraces, three hundred and fifty feet high, sustained on Cyclopean masonry of twenty feet in thickness, and crowned with trees fifty feet in height, and eight cubits in circumference. We know that flowers adorned it, but cannot wonder that the poetical historians, who laboured to convey to their admiring readers an impression of its grandeur, should have omitted to specify the minuter beauties of its detail. But from its slight of successive terraces, the Jews may have borrowed or improved the plan of cultivating their own mountainous territory, by reducing its slopes to a series of platforms; and the hydraulic apparatus which they found in use for the purposes of navigation, would supply models which they could not carry from Egypt, but which the rising grounds of Palestine rendered as needful, as its many streams made it available.

We have indications in Scripture of various enclosures which occasionally bear the more general name of garden. Among these were,—1. Grounds for the cultivation of the vine, or the olive, or any single species of fruit-tree; 2. Orchards for the cultivation of fruit-trees in general; 3. Kitchen gardens; 4. Flower gardens.

1. We once read of gennath egoz translated in the English version "garden of nuts," and by the Septuagint "garden of almonds." It is strange that so many expositors should have imagined these nuts to be hazels—when it is a question if, even as an exotic, the corylus avellana could exist in such a latitude. The produce of this garden may have been the chestnut or walnut, or more probably the almond of the Greek translators.

Olive-yards are often mentioned along with vineyards, and oil being nearly as essential as wine to such a climate, the Jews were fortunate in these rocky steeps with a warm soil which the olive loves.

But the vineyard was of these enclosures the chief. The best benediction which the dying patriarch could bestow on the father of the royal tribe was, that he should "bind his foal to the vine, and unto the choice vine his ass's colt—that he should wash his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes;" a blessing most appropriate to him whose godly inheritance included the vale of Eschol. Vineyards were sometimes on the plain, and to exclude foxes and other depredators, were enclosed by a fence of thorns, interspersed with roses and wild pomegranates, or by a wall of stone; but not unfrequently the shelving sides of their many hills were built up into terraces, and by their running exposure compensated for the increased elevation. It was usual to build stone walls across the vineyard for the support of the vines, a custom which seems to have been as early as the days of Jacob. Such a vineyard, from very early spring to the latest autumn, was the object of an assiduous labour; and if singing be always a sign of gladness, the occupation of a vine-dresser was the most mirthful of all employments. With a song he beguiled the hours, as he trained the tendrils and cleared away the superfluous leaves, to admit the sunshine to the new-formed clusters. With a song the vintage was gathered in; and with shouting, as well as singing, the vine-press was trodden. At stated seasons the festive companies of the Israelitish youth repaired with dancing and music to the vineyards, much in the same manner as the first of May was wont to be observed in England, but with this difference, that such celebrations among the Jews were religious solemnities. Besides the "cottage in the vineyard," the lonely post of observation to one who guarded it at the time of ripe grapes, the more sumptuous proprietors erected handsome structures, repeatedly mentioned as towers, and no doubt the equivalent of the Turkish kiosks. In these it would be pleasant for a people of light avocations and few amusements to while away the time, particularly at those sultry seasons which indispose for labour the most willing. If any breeze were stirring, the highest apartment of a tower on a hill-side would be sure to catch it; and when the fields around were scorched into clay, the green festoons depending from the walls or flung across the trellises, would be a grateful refreshment to more senses than the eye. And just as we see our grandees lionizing the harvest fields, we may believe that from these towers of luxury the wealthy possessors would take their share of what was the final and crowning joy of a Jewish harvest; and patronizingly, or in sympathy, participate in the delight of groups who gathered and bore away the luscious fruits to the vats where the carolling vintagers pressed the juice, and where all vied in the revelry, down to the solitary gleaner, who filled his basket, blessing in his heart the lawgiver. When now no cluster could be seen, even on the outmost bough, in their turn, and last of all, the cattle were admitted to browse upon the foliage.

2. It was a law among the Jews that they should not plant olives in vineyards, from which some have drawn the over-hasty inference, that every species of fruit-tree required its separate enclosures. We are apt to think that the law applied only to the bringing together the two great staples of Jewish cultivation—the tree that gave them oil, and that which gave them wine. For the symbolical purpose, the one restriction was sufficient; and the Jews were no more hindered from planting dates and pomegranates together, than they were prohibited from cultivating leeks and onions in the same enclosure. But the point is decided. For instance, it is incidentally said, "A man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard," a custom which is curiously verified by those Egyptian monuments where fruit-trees are introduced among the vines. And we have repeated examples of orchards, properly so called, where trees of many sorts were reared together. Thus, in the mournful recital of his unsatisfying recreations, the royal Preacher says, "I made me orchards and vineyards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits." How many varieties were cultivated by the Jews, we have not now the means of knowing; but the almond, apple or citron, chesnut, date, pomegranate, and fig, occupied an important place, in addition to the vine and olive already mentioned. But for the sake of a dense shade, the orchard often contained trees more valued for their foliage than their fruit—the oak, the sycamore, the myrtle, the box, and the mulberry.

3. The first time that we find a garden of herbs mentioned, is when the covetous Ahab set his heart upon the vineyard of Naboth. It was near to the palace, and therefore the king of Israel sought it that he might convert it into a garden of herbs—the vineyard of a subject being good enough to make a kitchen garden for a king. In every country, these enclosures are chiefly occupied with the vegetables which the peculiarities of the climate render desirable. And whilst the fields of the Hebrews were sown with wheat, barley, rye, millet, and lentiles, their culinary vegetables were, on the one hand, gourds, cucumbers, and melons; on the other, onions, leeks, and garlic—rice, anise, and cummin—mustard, cinnamon, and cassia; the former to allay their thirst and act as refrigerants, the latter to season their dishes and serve for tonics. Some of these were considered of sufficient importance to occupy a special enclosure; hence we read, for example, of a "garden of cucumbers." But in such cases the word field would be better adapted to our idiom. The analogous expression, "a garden of turnips," would sound strange to English ears.

4. Like the modern Turks and Persians, the Jews were fond of perfumes. Many of those most valued, neither grew spontaneously in their own land, nor could be reared by any art; but were, at great expense, imported from Arabia and the countries beyond. No sacrifice was complete without incense; clouds of which continually filled the temple. Their raiment was perfumed: hence blind Isaac, "smelling the fragrance of Jacob's raiment, blessed him, saying, Behold! the fragrance of my son is as the fragrance of a field which Jehovah hath blessed." And elsewhere, a bride is thus addressed—"All thy garments, out of ivory wardrobes, perfumed with myrrh, aloes, and cassia, delighted thee with their fragrance." The wealthy ceiled their houses with cedar, that they might be continually regaled with the "smell of Lebanon." The box of precious ointment poured on the head of a guest was a mark of a distinguished reception. And garlands of roses, in a land where they smell more sweetly than in Europe, encircled the heads of the banqueters. Accordingly, we are prepared to find odoriferous plants occupying the chief place in the flower garden of ancient Palestine. Thus, in the impassioned address of the bride of Solomon—

A garden art thou, filled with matchless sweets;
A garden wall'd, those matchless sweets to shield;
A spring inclosed, a fountain fresh and sealed;
A paradise of plants, where all unite
Dear to the smell, the palate, or the sight:
Of rich pomegranates that at random blow;
Cypress and nard, in fragrant gales that flow;
Nard, saffron, cinnamon, the dulcet air,
Deep through its canes the calamus prepares;
The scented aloes, and each shrub that showers
Gums from its veins, and spices from its flowers.
O pride of gardens! fount of endless sweets,
Well-spring of all in Lebanon that meets.

Song of Solomon by Goon.

From this, and parallel passages in the same Song, a goodly catalogue of garden flowers might be collected; of which it might be observed, that most of them are distinguished by their fragrance, and that few of them were natives of Palestine. Except frankincense, none of them were consecrated to religious uses.

It is to be remembered, however, that the gardens of which we have the most gorgeous descriptions in the Bible, were the gardens of one monarch; and as no succeeding king built such a temple as that of Solomon, or such a palace as the house of the forest of Lebanon,—so we cannot be sure that even kings, after his day, had taste or wealth enough to construct aqueducts, dig fish-ponds, and lay out pleasure gardens. We are unfortunate in possessing no direct information either as to the way in which these gardens were laid out—the disposition of the plants, and the economy of the parterres. The history has omitted these; and time, which has left the marks of terraces along the hills, has spared no vestige of the flower border. Nor is there any reason to believe that many of the Jews could afford, or cared to possess apart, all those various gardens which we have enumerated. Most would be content to have the orchard, herb garden, and flower plot, all in one; and it would depend on the judgment or resources of the owner, how far these, collectively, should preserve the excellencies of each. There are certain circumstances which make us suspect, that to many might be applicable the description, often quoted from Dr Chandler, of a Turkish governor's garden at Eleus. "We paid a piaster for seeing a very small spot of ground, walled in, and containing nothing except two vines, a fig, and a pomegranate tree, and a well of excellent water." The garden of Nathaniel might be no better than this; but such a garden let us not despise. It had shade, and verdure and fruit; and it had a fountain. To a Jew who had seen no better, it might be a paradise. For as Dr Russell has observed, with that good sense which is superior to an affected fastidiousness, concerning the gardens of Aleppo—"Inelegant as they may appear to the cultivated taste of an Englishman, they afford a voluptuous noontide retreat to the languid traveller. Even he, whose imagination can recall the enchanting scenery of Richmond or of Stow, may perhaps experience new pleasure in viewing the glistening pomegranates in full blossom. Revived by the freshening breeze, the purling of the brooks, and the verdure of the groves, his ear will catch the melody of the nightingale, delightful beyond what is heard in England; with conscious gratitude to Heaven, he will recline on the simple mat, bless the hospitable shelter, and perhaps, while indulging the pensive mood, he will hardly regret the absence of British refinement in gardening."

Owing to the density of the population, and the richness of the soil, a greater proportion of Palestine was occupied with gardens than of almost any land. This was particularly the case in the neighbourhood of towns. From the account of Josephus, the environs of Jerusalem were all laid out in gardens; and from the statement of the Rabbies, it would appear, that except a few gardens of roses, which had existed since the days of the prophets, there were none within the walls. For this a good reason is assigned in the putrefaction of heaps of weeds, and the bad smell of the manure—a reason which will be more fully appreciated, when it is known that the substance chiefly used for enriching the gardens, round the capital, was the blood which flowed away from the altars, and which, having been once dedicated to a sacred use, was procured by the gardeners on payment of some trivial offering. This objection was only applicable to economical gardens, and to these at certain seasons of the year.

Perhaps the greatest restraint on the horticultural taste and skill of the Hebrews, particularly in the latter days of their commonwealth, arose from the ridiculous interference of their doctors, scribes, or rabbies. This extended to all the minutest affairs of life, and was acquiesced in with abject submission. Every thing which should have been left to the discretion of the gardener, was eventually fixed down by the rules of this intermeddling casuistry. Thus, "Cut not down the palm that bears a cab of dates. And what of the olive that that should not be cut down? A. If it bear but the fourth part of a cab." And a rabbi adds, "My son Shibeah had not died, had he not cut down a fig-tree before the time." The fathers of the traditions discussed a multitude of such questions as the following—"How many vines make a vineyard? How should its vines be arranged? How long is it lawful to sow the same plot of ground with different seeds? In a field sown with different crops, what corner is due to the poor? And when corn is sown among olives, should the poor have a corner at all? Is it lawful to sow any thing within the wine-press?" But there was one question which especially divided all the schools—"What was to be done as to the tithing of a tree, which on the first month retained some of last year's fruit, and had put forth some of that year's produce?" For the answers of Rabbi Judan, Rabbi Jissa, Rabbi Zeira, Samuel Ben Abbe, and the decision of the schools of Shammai and Hillel, the reader must consult Dr Lightfoot.

CHRISTIAN AND ECCLESIASTICAL UNITY :

A DISCOURSE.*

BY THE REV. JAMES C. BURNS,

Minister of the Scotch Church, London Wall, London.

"Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one."—JOHN xvii. 20, 21.

OUR Lord had just offered a prayer similar to this, especially in behalf of the twelve, or rather the eleven disciples, whom he was about to leave—

* Preached in the Scotch Church, London Wall, London, on the 31st of April, 1841, at the opening of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England, in connection with the Church of Scotland.

that, when left alone in the world, exposed to its difficulties and hazards, they might be taken and kept under his Father's gracious protection; and, that as the fruit of their preservation by the Father, from the world's evils and snares, as one special benefit flowing to them from his intercession, and as comprehensive of all other promised and needed blessings, "they might be one,"—One, as fellow-partakers of the comfort and hope of the Gospel, and one, as fellow-apostles, in making known to men the doctrine of the grace of God, ver. 11. "Holy Father, keep through thine own name, those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are."

In the text, our Lord extends the scope of his supplication to Christians generally, to all those who should "in the ages to come," and in other parts of the world, "believe on him, through their word." Anticipating with certainty, that there should always be "a seed to serve him"—that his kingdom should spread, and his disciples be multiplied—"even while sun and moon endure," he enlarges his heart to embrace and intercede for them all,—before even one of them had a being, he loved them and prayed for them, leaving, as it were, a blank in his petition, that each successively might insert his own name; and the blessing which he supplicates on their behalf, as the crown at once of their dignity and their joy, as that which either included or would secure every other "good thing," is, that "they all may be one;" he represents this as the end for which he gives to them of the glory which his Father gave to him; and not only so, but as the end for which he himself received it, for which "it pleased the Father" that in his human person, "all the fulness of the Godhead should dwell bodily," ver. 23, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." Knowing well, as he did, the source of all the world's misery, even the departure of men from God as the common centre of attraction and cohesion, and their consequent separation from one another, each pursuing his own devious path; each a "lover of himself," and "seeking his own,"—he knew also what would prove its only effectual cure,—that the true life or happiness of men consisted in their being brought back to God, and by their reunion to him, being reunited to each other in the bonds of holy love,—that they would be happy, only in as far as they ceased to be isolated, or "selfishly confined," and were again "made one;" and, knowing this, he deemed no urgency of supplication too strong, no sacrifice, not even the sacrifice of himself, too costly, that it might be secured! "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me, through their word, that they all may be one," and "in the days of his flesh" says the apostle, (Heb. v. 7.) "he made supplication," for this among other benefits to flow out of his approaching sufferings, "with strong crying and tears."

The unity for which the Redeemer prays in behalf of his people, implies a previous union exiating among them, on which it is founded, out of which it flows. Their unity is the superstructure, of which their union is the basis. So it is represented by the apostle, when he speaks of their coming "in the unity of the faith, to a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ;" implying that their unity is equivalent to their perfection, to their attainment of a high degree of Christian character and excellence—whereas their union is inseparable from their being, as Christians at all!—And our Lord declares very distinctly in the text, wherein that union consists, "in their believing on him through the word" or testimony of his apostles. That is the common ground on which they meet,—which is broad enough to afford space for them all, and which is marked off by lines and landmarks, sufficiently distinct to admit of their mutual recognition. The object of their faith is one; the quality of their faith is one, and therefore they themselves are one. An apparent union may be produced by none thinking or believing at all, as well as by all thinking or believing alike; but "such an union," as Leighton well remarks, "is not produced by the active heat of the spirit, but is a confusion rather arising from the want of it: not a fusing together, but a freezing together, as cold congregates all bodies, how heterogeneous soever, sticks, stones, and water; whereas heat makes first a separation of different things, and then unites those that are of the same nature."

Believers then, being "one," one essentially, the Redeemer prays that they may be one visibly—that their essential unity may be carried out to all its legitimate fruits, and consequences—that it may be so visible, as that "the world" may see it, and seeing it, may be so impressed by the exhibition, as to be constrained to "believe," that is, to acknowledge, "that the Father had sent him" the Son; and by consequence, that what the Gospel testifies concerning him is true; that their "unity in the faith" may compel the world's assent to it.

Wherein, then, does this unity consist, and how is it attained? in other words, what is it for which Christ prays, and how is his prayer answered? In reply to these questions, we remark generally, that there is a two-fold sense in which the words may be regarded, either in reference to Christians individually, or, in reference to them as a body, visibly associated together in Church-fellowship; and to each of these views of the subject, allow me for a little to solicit your attention.

1. In reference to believers individually (who, as we have seen, are already one in respect of every thing that pertains to salvation, who are related to one another by a tie which never can be broken, which connects them together for eternity), the unity which Christ supplicates in their behalf must evidently be something, which, however rare or difficult of attainment, yet flows naturally out of the relation thus subsisting between them, and which, accordingly, from this correspondence, is fitted to afford evidence that the relation does subsist, which at once proves their union, and adorns it; it must be something more than a mere idea, a phantom, beautiful and attractive, yet still a phantom, as many are prone to regard it; it must be something vital, substantial, practical;—and it is so, for,

1. It is a unity of judgment.—Believers are exhorted "to be of the same mind one toward another,"—"with one mind to strive together for the faith of the Gospel,"—"to speak the same thing,"—and "to be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment,"—and that which we are commanded to seek, is that for which Jesus prays.

It is not, of course, to be understood that on all subjects there ever can be agreement, among creatures whose minds are so differently constituted, and influenced as ours,—that any one mind should be perfectly united with any other; in that case, there would be wanting in the family of God, that beautiful variety which marks every other department of creation,—nor is it to be understood that even in regard to matters of religion, there is to be expected in this world, any thing like an unvarying uniformity of sentiment or feeling, (that indeed, though it were possible, were scarce to be desired), but only this much is to be understood by us, that, agreed as Christians are already in regard to those truths, the belief of which separates them from all the rest of the world "as a peculiar people,"—which intellectually constitutes their chief distinction—they ought to strive after a farther agreement in respect of those truths or doctrines which separate them from one another—they ought not to supersede the greater distinction by the less,—meeting as they do, on ground which is common and sacred, they ought to make that the centre, not only from which all their other opinions emanate, but towards which they all converge,—merging the lesser shades of difference, by which, when at a distance from it, they are distinguished, in that central light, where they all "see eye to eye," around which, in the midst of whose brightness, they are really one! "In as far as we have already attained," says the apostle, "let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing," and to this he encourages us by the assurance, that "if in any thing we be otherwise minded,"—if, after earnestly endeavouring to maintain unity up to the limit of our present knowledge, we should still find ourselves divided, "God will reveal even this unto us;"—the same uniting Spirit who has wrought an agreement thus far, will carry on his work yet farther;—having already accomplished so great a miracle, as to introduce amidst all the diversities of our minds, a great germinating principle of uniformity, he is able to make that principle triumph over those diversities, and cast them into the shade; he is able to do it, and he will, if we resist not his blessed influence, and refuse to be "led by him;" if we prefer not to "walk in the light of our own fire, or amid the sparks which ourselves have kindled."

2. There is a unity of affection also, without which the former would be of little worth. Believers are exhorted to be "of one spirit" as well as "of one mind;" the apostle, in writing to the Galatians, reminds them, that to them peculiarly as professing faith in the Gospel, the precept of the law is applicable, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" and the apostle exemplifies it himself when he says, evidently in the fulness of his heart, "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Attachment to a common object, no less than agreement in a common principle, greatly tends to the promotion of unity. Thus, if the affections of believers are all drawn in one direction—if their motion be steady and uniform towards Christ, attracted as by an unvarying law of gravitation, there will be little danger of collision between them, while moving in their respective orbits—there will be harmony and repose there, in the movements of the spiritual, as there is in those of the material economy—there will be cohesion as well as attraction; yea, there will be amalgamation or fusion of many into one, brought about by the operation of this divine alchemy of love. Love to the brethren is not only the evidence, but even the measure of our love to Christ. "He that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" He that hath not love enough within him for a man like himself, how can he love God, whose goodness, being above our knowledge, requireth transcendency in our love? This is an invariable rule.—He that loveth not a member of Christ, loveth not him; and he who groweth in his love to the brethren, groweth likewise in his love to Christ; "for" in the language of an old writer, "as there is the same proportion of one to five as there is of twenty to an hundred, though the number be far less; as the motion of the shadow upon the dial answereth exactly to that proportion of motion and distance which the sun hath in the firmament, though the sun goeth many millions of miles, when the shadow (it may be) moveth not the breadth of a hand; so, though our love to Christ ought to be a far more abundant love than to any of his members, yet certain it is, that the measure of our progress in brotherly love is precisely answerable to the growth of our love to Christ; and our love to Christ is as accurately measured by it as the progress of the sun in the heavens is measured by the dial.

3. There is a unity of practice, flowing out of those other two unities of which we have spoken, by which they are made visible,—by which the impression of which our Lord speaks is produced upon the world seeing it. Such a unity as was exemplified, in answer to his intercessory prayer, by the members of the primitive Church; such a unity as then presented to the world, the most noticeable feature of Christianity, in contrast with every other spectacle which the world had to exhibit; such a unity as by a similar outpouring of the Spirit of love from on high, there is nothing, in the present circumstances of believers, to prevent from being again substantially realized.

I cannot attempt, at present, so much as to enumerate the varied offices of Christian love to which believers are thus called; let me only notice three, of which frequent mention is made in Scripture, both in the way of precept and example, and the practical utility of which no Christian can fail to appreciate, viz., mutual intercourse among "them that fear the Lord," the "speaking one to another," and "taking sweet counsel together," respecting the things of God,—that by contact with one another they may cohere or unite more cordially than it is possible to do in a state of separation; condescension on the part of those who are more exalted in station, or influence, or attainment, to their brethren beneath them,— "minding not high things, but condescending to men of low estate;" mutual admonition, in respect of those errors, or tendencies to evil, which they may observe in each other's conduct,— "teaching, admonishing, provoking one another to love and good works,"—fellow-helpers in the way and work of the Lord; together with those manifold other more private acts and expressions of kindness which it were scarcely possible to make the subject of specific precept or exactment; but which the spirit of Christian love, when it is in living and healthful exercise, when the love of Christ is the motive, and the example of Christ the rule, is prompt to suggest and to stimulate. Instead of dwelling on these, let me rather notice, in a few sentences, before leaving this part of the subject, what are the means by which fruits so precious as these may be expected to be produced; in other words, how, so far as Christians themselves are concerned, the prayer of the Redeemer in their behalf may be expected to find an answer.

We have said, that it is not to be expected, even were it to be desired, that the time shall ever come when all minor denominational points of difference between them shall disappear,—were it so, they would lose the opportunity of manifesting that forbearance which is one special attribute and exercise of Christian love; and if so, it is plain that the attainment of Christian unity must not be left to depend on that contingency,—on the argumentative triumph of one party over another, in the walk of ecclesiastical rivalry or controversy. It is an attainment to be sought after in all circumstances,—to be sought after even in ours, when there seem to be so many lets and hindrances in its way, when "the armies of the Lord's host" seem to be more often ranged in hostility to each other, than in opposition to the common foe,—to be sought after by each Christian for himself, however it may be neglected or set at naught by others; for the attainment of which, no sacrifice of prejudice, of feeling, of habit, ought to be held too dear,—no sacrifice whatever, save that of vital, essential principle,—of "the faith," in any of its grand leading articles, "once delivered to the saints."

There are, especially, two means or expedients

which may be mentioned as fitted to conduce to this end; they are naturally suggested by what we have said of the basis on which all Christian unity rests, and they are, both specially pointed out in the Word of God. The one is, the cultivation of mutual love; and the other is, the striving to have a clear, certain, efficacious faith in the Gospel,—in the Gospel, as that term is understood by those for whom, as “believing in him through the word” of his servants, the Redeemer prays. These are both strikingly expressed by the apostle, when he tells the Colossians of the great conflict he had for them, and their brethren at Laodicea,—“that their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ.”

(1.) There is the being “knit,” or compacted “together in love,”—made, as it were, all of a piece; Christians loving each other, not merely on the common ground of natural brotherhood, or on the more limited ground of religious party or denomination, or on the uncertain ground of mere nominal Christianity, but on the special ground of brotherhood in Christ, so far as that is capable of being discerned; loving each other as members of the same spiritual family, as together “holding the Head.” It is easy to see how much this would contribute to the promotion of Christian unity; how it would infuse vigour into the whole spiritual system, as it were, every limb and member of the body being in immediate connection with the source of vital energy; how it would inspire Christians with holy courage and fortitude, by their knowing and feeling themselves not isolated and defenceless, but “knit together,” and therefore strong; how it would extinguish the unhalloved fire of natural passion or temper, as the beams of the sun are wont to put out every meaner flame; how it would oblige to acts of mutual friendship; how it would overcome prejudice, and enable us to distinguish between opinions and things we dislike, and the persons who hold or practise them; how it would restrain from mutual censure, and prompt to mutual concession; how it would soften and sweeten the whole tone of Christian intercourse and society! “Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.” Then,

(2.) There is the being possessed of a clear, intelligent, efficacious faith; the seeking to have a firm hold of the great substantial verities of the Gospel,—“a full assurance of understanding.” This, too, would go far towards the same end,—towards the uniting of all Christians in judgment, affection, and practice; for then we should feel those things to be truly great in which we unite; the centre of our union being no mere dogma of traditionary belief, or some point of outward, canonical observance, which has no value nor goodness in itself to recommend it, but a vital reality, which is capable of attracting, and binding to it, our hearts,—which we feel to be our life, our all. Then, too, we should be led to regard every thing else, in comparison, as minute and small, and so, to be more ready to hold together in those things about which we agree, than to contend about the things in which we differ. Then, moreover, our religion would cease to be, what it too often is, a matter of form, or habit, or official distinction only,—it would be a vital, energetic thing, and, in consequence, at once more grateful to God and more impressive and venerable before men; yea, then should we become willing to suffer, if need were, as well as to serve,—for we should feel that we had got hold of something worth the suffering for,—that by suffering we were identifying ourselves the more closely with the noble army of the martyrs, and with all the faithful who have gone before us,—that though our persons suffered, our principles would survive, and we should be contributing at once to the stability and the unity of that one holy catholic Church of Christ which cannot die.

O how desirable, dear brethren, were such a state of things as this!—how worthy the Redeemer’s intercession!—how worthy not only of our prayers, but of our united and zealous efforts!

How comfortable to believers themselves,—“that their hearts might be comforted,” says the apostle, or confirmed, or established, “being knit together in love,” established in the truth!—how honourable to the Saviour, as the visible fruit of “the travail of his soul,” the mutual love of his disciples being the product of his love to them!—how sure a pledge of the presence and favour of God, “the very God of peace,” and of the bestowment of every other blessing!—how sweet as a foretaste of heaven, and a preparation for its joy! “Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron’s beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments: as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for ever more.”*

II. But I hasten to notice the application of these principles, not only to Christians in their individual capacity, whether ministers or people, but to Christians associated together in Church fellowship, as we are, friends and brethren, who are here assembled; in regard to which, though it may appear to some the more appropriate part of the subject for an occasion like the present, it may perhaps suffice to state, in a few sentences, some of those views which, had time permitted, might have received a fuller illustration. And,

1. I remark, that since all Christians individually, are united in regard to that which constitutes Christianity, and pertains to salvation, it is clear, that no one branch of the visible Church of Christ is entitled to exclude or excommunicate another, or to arrogate to itself a spiritual supremacy over another. The points on which Churches, like individuals, agree, are vastly more important than those in which they differ: they have "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in them all;" and therefore, to make any point of external form or observance, the presence or the absence of any imaginary virtue, transmitted or acquired, essential to the being of a Church, as a Church of Christ, is to deny that to Christians in the mass, which is conceded to them in a state of separation, it is to make the means of more importance than the end—the machinery, so to speak, for communicating to men the knowledge of salvation, more important than salvation itself. "The visible Church," says our Confession of Faith, "which is also Catholic or universal under the Gospel (not confined to one nation, as before under the law) consists of all those throughout the world, that profess the true religion, together with their children, and is the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, the house and family of God; out of which there is no ordinary possibility of salvation."

* For a full and admirable illustration of this subject, see Howe’s Treatise on Christian Union, recently republished by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, M.A.

2. This, however, does not hinder our holding and maintaining, that there are some portions of the Church visible much more entitled to the distinctive name of "Churches of Christ" than others, yea, that there may be one more entitled to that distinction than any other; that one, therefore, warranting her members, if not to prescribe for others, at least decidedly to prefer for themselves. This cannot be doubted, if we admit that the Lord Jesus has laid down any pattern or rule at all, according to which the affairs of his house should be governed; still more, if we admit that there are in his Word the elements even of one great model to which he would have all Churches conformed, and to which, in the end, he will bring about a conformity in them all. "Particular Churches," says our Confession of Faith again, "which are members of the Church Catholic, are more or less pure, according as the doctrine of the Gospel is taught and embraced, ordinances administered, and public worship performed, more or less purely in them;" and, let me add, Christians are bound to consider this, not merely what concerns their own immediate edification, and that of their families, as members of the Church of Christ, but what concerns the good of their brethren—what is best for the spiritual well-being of a community, of a nation—what is most for the honour of the Church's Head, which is undoubtedly involved in the observance of whatsoever he has commanded in his Word. "For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, peace be within thee. Because of the house of the Lord our God, I will seek thy good."

8. It may not, therefore, seem either uncharitable or presumptuous to affirm it as our belief—capable as that belief is of the amplest vindication—that the Presbyterian form of Church government, which we profess, is that which appears to come nearest to the scriptural model, and so to afford the likeliest basis, and rallying point of union, around which, in purer and better times, other Churches may at length be found gathering; the basis of that unity, which all the world is to see. The grounds of this confidence, I cannot, of course, now even venture to glance at—only this remark may be permitted, that in support of it, a variety of consenting testimonies may be adduced, and these from the most opposite quarters; inasmuch as the separate and varied excellencies by which other communions are confessedly distinguished, meet and are combined in the constitution of the Presbyterian Church, to a greater extent than in any one of their number with which I am acquainted.

There are, for example, unquestionable advantages in Episcopacy or oversight, namely, in a vigilant and effective control being had over all the members and office-bearers of the Church—in the prompt and authoritative exercise of Church discipline; and that Presbytery secures, without the evils of an irresponsible, and therefore, what may and must occasionally prove, a despotic and injurious exercise of it.

There are again advantages, in Independency, in respect of the position which it gives to Christian congregations as such, and the closeness of the tie which it establishes between pastors and their flocks; and these Presbytery secures, by recognising the existence of mutual rights and responsibilities on the part of the teachers and the taught—the rulers and the ruled—by recognising clergy and people together as constituting the Church,*—avoiding, at the same time, the evils of disunion and disorder to which, from its very nature, that system is necessarily liable. And there are advantages in Wesleyan Methodism, in respect especially of its wise and well-ordered organization—by which it is capable of acting with unity, with vigour, with effect—by which each member of the body is identified with the body as a whole, in virtue of which, the decree pronounced on any subject by its great deliberative Assembly, through the mouth of its President or head, may fairly be regarded as expressing the sentiments, while it regulates the procedure, of the whole community; and those advantages Presbytery secures, in a manner very analogous, in her inferior and superior judicatories, crowned by her General Assembly, while it secures them, as we apprehend, in a more perfect and scriptural form, by admitting into her deliberations not only "the elders" who teach, but those who only rule

* In the National Covenant, subscribed by king, clergy, and people, in 1580, and again, with greater formality, in 1637, the following definition of the Church is given:—"The ministers of the blessed Evangel whom God of his mercy hath raised up, or hereafter shall raise, agreeing with them that then lived, in doctrine and administration of the sacraments; and the people, that professeth Christ as he is offered in the Evangel, and doth communicate with the holy sacraments according to the Confession of Faith, is the true and holy Kirke of Christ Jesus, within these realms." With this entirely agrees the present Confession of Faith of the Church of Scotland. See chap. 24th, 2d.

—the latter representing the feelings and interests of the Christian people, and consulting, along with their pastors, for the general good of the whole.

Then, again, it is the doctrine of one great division of the Christian Church, that the Church ought to be established and endowed by the State—that it is the duty of the State to give, and of the Church to receive, such establishment,—each party being therein responsible to Him who is “Lord of all;” while it is the doctrine of another great division of it, that the Church, being essentially independent and free, ought to have entire management of her own affairs—that she cannot part with any of those prerogatives which belong to her as a Church of Christ, without dishonour to her Divine Head—without virtually so far de-throning him from his supremacy; and these two branches of the Church Catholic are ranged in opposition to each other, because neither admits the possibility, nor appreciates the desirableness, of combining the two doctrines or principles into one, and making them work smoothly and harmoniously together as being, both of them, scriptural and true. This, the Presbyterian Church does—this, our venerable mother, the Church of Scotland, is now struggling, at the risk of her worldly all, practically to accomplish. She acknowledges the Lord Jesus in both the titles of Royalty, by which He is set forth in his Word, as “the King of nations,” and “the King of saints;” as “the Prince of the kings of the earth,” and as “the Head of his body, the Church,” that “in all things He may have the pre-eminence.” She cannot dispute His right to either of those distinctions; nor can she discern any necessary discord between them; nor, consequently, any reason why they should not be conceded and maintained by those to whom His cause has been intrusted—“who are set for the defence of the Gospel.”

On these grounds, and such as these, it is that we think ourselves warranted in affirming, that though Presbyterianism, as we now see it, may never be the ens form of government established throughout the world, the very Church of the Millennium,—yet, that all which is essential to it, is stamped with the impress of durability; and that in proportion as other Churches become more scriptural and more pure, they will the more closely approximate to her!

4. At all events, you will agree with me in thinking, that the occasion which has brought us together this day, affords an interesting illustration of the general doctrine which we have been attempting to expound.

The formation of this Synod, and its being subsequently received into close and friendly connection with the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland and Ireland—from both of which, I rejoice to say, there are representatives deputed to visit us on this occasion—was an act of enlightened Christian union.

The object of its formation was union—not to proselytize the members of other Churches, but to preserve and care for the members of our own—“that the dispersed, the outcasts of our Israel might be gathered into one.”

And the spirit, I cannot doubt, in which all its deliberations will be conducted, will be the spirit of union, of unity, of mutual love, and goodwill, together with a common desire to promote the spiritual interests of our fellow-countrymen, scattered abroad in this land; to seek, at once, the prosperity and the peace of Jerusalem, and the glory of the Redeemer's name! May the Holy Spirit of love, and wisdom, and zeal, be abundantly shed forth on our Assembly! May the Redeemer's prayer even now receive its answer, “that we all may be one!” Amen.

CONSOLATION.

CHILD of sorrow, lend thine ear,—

Turn, and thy deliverer see;

Jesus brings his ransom near,—

Tells thee it was paid for thee.

'Tis the precious stream that flow'd

From his hands, his feet, his side;

Then he made our peace with God,—

Justice then he satisfied.

Sins of deep and scarlet dye

Vanish where his blood is known;

Hellish foes in terror fly,

Conscious that their power is gone.

This will bring thee life and joy,

When 'tis sprinkled on thy heart;

Nothing shall thy peace destroy,—

Death resigns his poison'd dart.

Welcome, then, to Mercy's store,—

Mercy for the vilest free:

Trembling sinner, doubt no more,

Trust in him who died for thee.

But reflect, when turn'd to God,

What it cost to make thee clean;

Trample not on Jesus' blood,—

Love the Lord, and fear to sin.

HUM.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

“Thy will be done.”—It is just that it should be so; for who shall govern the world but He that made it? And yet we, poor creatures, repine when any thing crosses our hopes or designs. What strange unthoughtfulness! what presumption is this! It is of thy great mercy that any of us are sensible of this folly, and become willing to be governed by thee. With all my heart and soul, O God, I thank thee that, in all the changes and chances of this mortal life, I can look up to thee, and cheerfully resign my will to thine. It is the desire of my soul, and my humble petition, that I may always be ready and willing to submit to thy providence, that thou mayest order what thou judgest to be most convenient for me. I have trusted thee, O Father, with myself; my soul is in thy hand, which I verily believe thou wilt preserve to eternal happiness; my body, and all that belongs to it, are of much less value. I do therefore, with as great security and satisfaction, trust all I have to thee; hoping that thou wilt preserve me from all things hurtful, and lead me to all things profitable, to my salvation. I will love thee, O God; being satisfied that all things, however strange and irksome they appear, shall work together for good; those that do so. I know on whom I have believed; have a Saviour at my right hand, full of kindness, full of care, full of power; he has prayed for me, that his faith fail not; and by this faith I am persuaded, at neither tribulation, nor anguish, nor persecution, or famine, nor nakedness, nor peril, nor sword, nor death which I may fear, nor life which I may hope for, or things to come which I may apprehend, shall ever revail so far over me, as to make me not to resign my will entirely to thee. In a humble, quiet, and dutiful submission, let me faithfully run the race that is set before me, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who is now seated at thy right hand; to whom I most humbly beseech thee to bring me in thy good time; and for whatever shall fall out in the meantime, "Thy will be done."—BISHOP WILSON.

Different kinds of Professing Christians.—There are three sorts of men in the Church. First, those who know of Christ, and revolt from him: secondly, those who, according to their own vocation, diligently and zealously use those things which he has given them, to his glory, and the good of their neighbours; and, thirdly, those who are benumbed by indolence, and do no good. When the Lord shall come he will inflict righteous vengeance on the first; he will bless the second in proportion to the labours which they have sustained; and he will also punish the last as useless; even those who waste an indolent life in deliberation and speculation.—BEZA.

"I do set my bow in the cloud."—To the family of Noah the gathering of a cloud would be a fearful sight; barged with the thunder, the tempest, and the deluge, it would have seemed to prepare again all the elements of destruction for a guilty world. But the Lord, in his compassion and mercy, not only gave them his promise that he would not again bring a flood on the earth, to destroy all flesh, but he established also a token of that covenant, and he fixed his bow in the very elements of vengeance. By his ordinance, the elements of vengeance themselves must refract and reflect the glories of the Sun; they are made to divide the prismatic colours of light, and exhibit them in their distinct and native beauty, and the family of Noah are commanded to fix their eyes on the bow in the cloud, that all their fears may be dissipated. We are thus reminded of many interesting and important truths. We look to Calvary, and see the bow fixed in all its splendour upon the blackest clouds of the elements of vengeance; we see the glories of the Sun of Righteousness reflected here; we see there the attributes which meet in Jehovah, each resplendent in its own beauty and glory. The elements of vengeance, which burst in all their fury on the head of Messiah, exhibit to the eye of faith the bow of the Divine perfections meeting and harmonizing for the salvation of guilty man. There, "mercy and truth have met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other;" and thither is the believer continually to direct the eye of faith, that his fears may be ended, and hope and joy may dwell delightfully in his bosom.—HOWELL.

Death to the believer.—When God sends death as his messenger for the regenerate man, he meets him half way to heaven; for his conversation and affection is there before him. Death is never strange nor fearful unto him. Not strange, because he died daily; not fearful, because whilst he lived, he was dead, and his life was hid with Christ in God. To die therefore, is to him nothing else in effect, but to rest from his labour in this world, to go home to his Father's house, into the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company of angels, to the General Assembly and Church of the first-born, to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant. Whilst his body is sick, his mind is sound; for God maketh his bed in his sickness, and strengtheneth him with faith and patience, upon his bed of sorrow. And when he begins to enter into the way of all the world, he giveth, like Jacob, Moses and Joshua, to his children and friends, godly exhortations and counsels to serve the true God, to worship him truly all the days of their life. His blessed soul breatheth nothing but blessings, and such speeches as savour a sanctified spirit. As his outward man decayeth, so his inward man increaseth, and waxeth stronger; when the speech of his tongue faltereth, the sighs of his heart speak louder unto God; when the sight of his eyes faileth, the Holy Ghost illuminates him inwardly with abundance of spiritual light. His soul feareth not, but is bold to go out of the body, and to dwell with her Lord. He sigheth out with Paul, "I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ." And with David, "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God; my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." When shall I come and appear before God? He prayeth with the saints, "How long, oh, Lord, which art holy and true? Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." And when the appointed time of his dissolution is come, knowing that he is going to his Father and Redeemer in the peace of a good conscience and the assured persuasion of the forgiveness of all his sins in the blood of the Lamb, he sings with blessed old Simeon, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," and surrenders up his soul, as it were, with his own hands into the hands of his heavenly Father, saying with David, "Into thy hands, O Father, I commend my soul, for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth."—BAYLY. (Practices of Piety.)

The mercy of God.—The mercy of God is the first article of every man's creed; but the different manner of understanding and applying it makes an essential, infinite difference in the characters of men, and constitutes either religion or atheism.—ADAM.

My son, give me thine heart.—Though the love of God, wherever it exists, will unquestionably be visible in the fruits of holiness; yet these fruits, it must be remembered, are only its attendants. Thoughts and actions are proofs of our existence, but they are not our existence. And this distinction, though it may seem abstract, is of great practical importance; for man is so little disposed to love a being of perfect purity, that there is a strong disposition in our nature to evade the first and great commandment, under the notion of complying with it by general obedience. It is not necessary to investigate this error. God has called upon us to love him. He demands our hearts without reserve, without equivocation. It is at our peril if we refuse. And, oh! what insanity is it to endeavour to escape, by the subtleties of a false casuistry, from that blessed precept which bears with it our highest glory and happiness!—J. BOWDLER.

Godliness.—Godliness is the worshipping of God in the inward motions of the heart, and the outward actions of the life. Where the spring of the affections is clear, and the stream of the affections runs clear, there is true godliness. The Egyptians, of all fruits, would make choice of the peach to consecrate to their goddess; and they gave this reason for it,—Because the fruit thereof resembleth an heart, and the leaf the tongue. As they gave heart and tongue to the false god, we must to the true God. Heart-godliness pleases God, but life-godliness honours him most; the conjunction of both makes a complete Christian.—SWINOCK.

Serious admonitions.—Perhaps you presumptuously think yourself already a believer in Christ. Beware of the danger of having a form of godliness, without the power of it. Do not rest content with a dead faith, which can no more quicken and invigorate the soul, than a picture of fire can warm and revive the frozen limbs. Beware of listening to the specious pleas of self-righteousness, which disincite the heart to submit to the righteousness of God. Weigh seriously the design of God in giving us his revealed will. As the first and great command of the law requires of us to love God with supreme, unabated affection, so the first and chief command of the Gospel requires us fully to believe and honour the Lord Jesus Christ, as the only way of salvation. O consider the inevitable consequence of living and dying in impenitence and unbelief. The lying enemy may tell you, you shall not die; the busy scenes of the world may amuse you; some vague, unscriptural ideas of the mercy of God may buoy up your spirits; but set yourself to answer the solemn question: "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" Consider the deceitfulness of sin, and the emptiness and vanity of the world. O let the weighty and solemn warnings of God's word be laid to heart! Lend a willing ear to the sweet invitations of the glorious Gospel. There is but one refuge appointed to afford shelter from the storm, then hasten to it. The blood of Christ has virtue to cleanse, and the grace of Christ has power to save, all that come unto God by him. To whom then can you go, but to him, for eternal life?—REV. J. THORNTON.

THE KARAITE JEWS.

THE following account of an interesting and peculiar sect of the Hebrews is extracted from Elliot's "Travels in the three great Empires of Austria, Russia, and Turkey:"—

The Karaites take their name from the Hebrew word Kara, signifying Scripture, because they adhere exclusively to the letter of the Bible, rejecting the Talmud and the interpretations of the rabbies, on which the other Jews, called, by way of distinction, Talmudists, Rabbinites, Pharisaical Jews, and Sons of the Text, lay so much stress. This is the fundamental point of difference. They are said to hold some of the doctrines of the Sadducees, with whom they were probably identified, till these fell into gross errors, when such as retained the pure faith gave them the name of their chief, Sadok, and separated from them. Others, again, maintain, that they have handed down the heterodoxies of the Samaritans, and that they deny all Scripture except the Pentateuch. The assertion, however, is incorrect; and the charge probably originated in their keeping the rest of the Sacred Scriptures apart from the books of Moses, which are much used in their schools, in order that none may suffer unnecessarily from the carelessness of the boys. As they have no printed copies, each manuscript is of great value, and this precaution is indispensable; while, in order to secure a farther supply, every member of the synagogue is expected to transcribe the whole, or the greater part, of the Law at least once in his life; a work which the Karaites perform with much precision and beauty of penmanship. They possess Tartar Targums, or versions of the Old Testament in that language; which are regarded as objects of interest equally by themselves and by those versed in Biblical lore. The rabbies kindly showed us all their manuscripts, and complained that, as the society has been from time to time reduced by the departure of its members, several have been taken away, and their collection has accordingly suffered. Afterwards, they conducted us into their school, and exhibited the various books in which the youth are instructed in the Hebrew and Tartar languages.

From all we could ascertain, in personal conference with these sons of Israel, and with their neighbours, as well as from what is recorded concerning them, it appears that they hold the Jewish faith in much purity and simplicity; adhering so strictly to the letter of the Law, that, as their rabbi informed us, they allow no fire to be seen in their town on the Sabbath, neither for light, warmth, culinary purposes, nor even for smoking; though it is well known the Talmudists find little difficulty in evading the Levitical prohibition. Their morals are unusually blameless. At Odessa, where several hundreds of them are established as merchants, they enjoy a high character for honesty and general probity—forming a striking contrast to the Jews of other denominations. In Poland, the records of the police prove that no Karaites has been punished for an offence against the laws for four centuries; and in Galicia, the Government has exempted them, on account of their good conduct, from the imposts levied on other Hebrews, conferring on them, at the same time, all the privileges enjoyed by their Christian fellow-subjects.

Among the minor points of difference between the two Israelitish parties, are the Liturgy, the regulations of food, and the degrees of affinity that oppose marriage. Their civil laws also present some distinctive characters. The Karaites suffer polygamy; which, however, is not much practiced: and by them, as by the Rabbinites, affiance is considered as sacred as marriage; so that the means requisite to annul the one are equally necessary to set aside the other, except in the event of the death of the father of a girl betrothed when a minor, who is then allowed a voice in the matter, and may refuse to ratify her father's contract. The members of this tribe are not permitted to dispose of their estates, either by gift or testament, to the prejudice of the lawful heirs; nor to leave more to one child than to another. The following is the order in which succession to property is regulated:—1st, Sons; 2dly, Male descendants through the male line; 3dly, Daughters; 4thly, Daughters' children indiscriminately; 5thly, Father; 6thly, Paternal uncles; 7thly, Brother; 8thly, Mother. Illegitimate children are not excluded, provided the mother be a Karaites. A husband can never inherit from his wife; but it is lawful for her to resign to him a share of her dower.

The Rabbinites pretend that the schism (as they term it) of the Karaites cannot be traced beyond the year 750 of our era. These, on the contrary, maintain that, before the destruction of the first temple, they existed as a distinct sect, under the name of "The Company of the Son of Judah;" that it was only in later days that they were called Karaites, to distinguish them from the Rabbinites; and that their princes reigned over Egypt. According to some, their history is marked by three great epochs. 1st, The year 106 a.c., in which Simeon Ben Chetok, driven to Alexandria, to avoid the persecution directed by Alexander Jannæus against the wise men of his country, returned to Jerusalem after the danger was past, and began to disseminate his doctrines; 2dly, 750, A.D., when Aman was their chief at Babylon; 3dly, The year (in the fifteenth century) in which Héféliah Ben Don Davis went from Liabon to Constantinople in order to effect a coalition between the Karaites and Rabbinites; but, failing in his project, gave them a code of laws, which, with the Adareth (a moral work much esteemed among them), formed the basis of their institutions.

THE CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY.

EZEKIEL VIII.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

Minister of Currie, Mid-Lothian.

At the time when Ezekiel was favoured with this remarkable vision, he was residing in Mesopotamia, whither he had been carried into captivity with the king of Judah and the flower of his nobles, on the disastrous termination of the war, which wrested the crown from the brow of Jehoiachin, and crushed the independence of the Hebrew nation. Although several years had revolved since the arrival of those illustrious exiles in that distant land, and they had grown somewhat familiar with the language and manners of their Assyrian masters, the lapse of time had not, as might be supposed, reconciled their minds to their unhappy situation, nor abated the ardour of their patriotic attachment to the land of their fathers; and many a time, when wandering in solitary musing along the banks of the Chebar, or reclining in little groups beneath the tall willows that skirted its meandering course, they would fain have beguiled their tedium with some favourite Hebrew melody, their hearts misgave them—their fingers refused to trace the harmonious strings—they hung their harps in mute neglect on the luxuriant copsewood, and heaved the sigh of bitter sorrow when they remembered Zion. It was most natural that such emotions of regret should pervade in common the minds of all these companions in misfortune, even those of them who were strangers to the spirit of a true Israelite—who cared not for that which constituted the real glory of their country, and who were bound to it by no ties more sacred than those of birth and memory. But in others of them, adversity had produced a salutary and softening impression; and in them the intense longings after the land of their fathers were mingled with far higher and holier feelings—with humility for their national degeneracy, and pious acknowledgment of the just severity of God—with ardent wishes for the re-establishment of his pure worship, and a conviction, rendered more deep and painful by dear-bought experience, that never would that beloved land regain its wonted prosperity, nor the chosen people be restored to the blessings of freedom and independence, till there was a revival of the ancient purity of religion, and their countrymen should return, with common consent, to their covenant God. Under these views, the men of piety and prayer among them had been in the habit, for years, of privately repairing to the house of Ezekiel—whose high-toned piety, no less than his prophetic character, they looked up to with reverence—that, under his direction and with the sanction of his example, they might join in fervent supplication for an outpouring of the Spirit, which might lead to a happy reformation, and once more shed over the land that moral beauty which formerly distinguished it as the favoured region, whence emanated all the rays of true religion that relieved the gross darkness of the world's inhabitants.

It was at one of those interesting prayer-meetings, which had been held so often and so long without any prospect of brighter days, and when the faith and hopes of many were waxing dim and feeble, that Ezekiel, in presence of his friends, consisting of the exiled elders of Judah, was suddenly wrapt in mystic vision, and graciously shewn, for his own satisfaction, as well as that of his pious associates, the reasons of God's protracted controversy with Israel, and the sad necessity there was for still dealing hardly with them. Transported by the Spirit, not bodily indeed, nor by external force, but in imagination, to the city and temple of Jerusalem, he there saw, as plainly as if it had been with the eye of sense, atrocities going on within the precincts of the holy place—the perpetration of which in the very capital of Judea, the place which God had chosen to put his name there, afforded proof of the woful extent of national apostasy and corruption, and was sufficient to justify, both to the mind of the prophet and those of his pious friends, the severity of the Divine judgments on Israel, and the loud call there was for increasing, instead of putting a speedy end to, the dire calamities they had so long been suffering.

The first spectacle that caught his eye, as he perambulated in vision the outer court of the temple—that court where the people usually assembled to worship—was a colossal statue, probably of Baal, around which crowds of devotees were performing their frantic revelries, and whose forbidden ensigns were proudly blazoning on the walls and portals of His house, who had proclaimed himself a God jealous of His honour. Scarcely had the prophet recovered from his astonishment and horror at the open and undisguised idolatry of the multitude, in that sacred enclosure, when his celestial guide bade him turn another way, and he would see greater abominations. Leading him to that side of the court along which were ranged the houses of the priests, his conductor pointed to a mud-wall which, to screen themselves from observation, the apostate servants of the true God had raised; and in that wall was a small chink, by widening which he discovered a passage into a secret chamber, which was completely impervious to the rays of the sun,—but, which he found, on entering it, lighted up by a profusion of brilliant lamps. The sides of it were covered with numerous paintings of beasts and reptiles—the favourite deities of Egypt, and with their eyes intensely fixed on these decorations, was a conclave of seventy persons in the garb of priests—the exact number, and in all probability the very members of the Sanhedrim, who stood in the attitude of adoration, holding in their hands each a golden censer, containing all the costly and odoriferous materials, which the pomp and magnificence of the Egyptian ritual required. “There was every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel pourtrayed on the wall round about.” The scene described was wholly formed on the model of Egyptian worship; and every one who has read the works of Wilkinson, Belzoni, Richardson and others, will perceive the close resemblance that it bears to the outer walls—the sanctuaries—and the hieroglyphical figures that distinguished the ancient idolatry of Egypt. What were the strange and unsightly images engraven on the walls of this chamber discovered by Ezekiel, and that formed the objects of the profane reverence of these apostate councillors, may be known from the following metrical description which the late Mr Salt, long the British Consul in Egypt, has drawn of the gods worshipped by the ancient idolatrous inhabitants of that country. Those who have prosecuted their researches among the rubbish of the temples, he says, have found in the deeply sequestered chambers they were able to reach,

The wildest images, unheard of, strange,
That ever puzzled antiquarian's brain;
Genii with heads of birds, hawks, ibis, drakes,
Of lions, foxes, cats, fish, frogs and snakes,
Bulls, rams, and monkeys, hippopotami;
With knife in paw, suspended from the sky,
God's germinating men, and men turned gods,
Seated in honour with gilt crooks and rods;
Vast scarabe, globes by hands upheld,
From chaos springing, 'mid an endless field
Of forms grotesque, the sphinx, the crocodile,
And other reptiles from the slime of Nile.

In order to show the reader still farther, how exactly this inner chamber that Ezekiel saw, was constructed after the Egyptian fashion, we subjoin an extract from the work of another traveller, descriptive of the great temple of Edfou—one of the admired relics of antiquity, from which it will be seen that the degenerate priests of Jerusalem had borrowed the whole style of the edifice in which they were celebrating their hidden rites—its form—its entrance, as well as its pictorial ornaments on the walls, from their idolatrous neighbours of Egypt. “Considerably below the surface of the adjoining buildings,” says he, “my conductor pointed out to me a chink in an old wall, which, he told me, I should creep through on my hands and feet,—the aperture was not two feet and a half high, and scarcely three feet and a half broad; my companion had the courage to go first, thrusting in a lamp before him; I followed. The passage was so narrow that my mouth and nose were almost buried in the dust, and I was nearly suffocated. After proceeding about ten yards in utter darkness, the heat became excessive—the breathing was laborious—the perspiration poured down my face, and I would have given the world to have got out; but my companion, whose person I could not distinguish, though his voice was audible, called out to me to crawl a few feet farther, and that I should find plenty of room. I joined him at length, and had the inexpressible satisfaction of standing once more upon my feet. We found ourselves in a splendid apartment of great magnitude, adorned with an incredible profusion of sacred paintings and hieroglyphics.* In the dark recesses of such a chamber as this, which they entered like the traveller through a hole in the outer wall, and in which was painted to the eye, the grotesque and motley group of Egyptian divinities, were the chief men at Jerusalem actually employed when Ezekiel saw them. With minds highly excited by the dazzling splendour and the clouds of fragrant smoke that filled the apartment, the performers of those clandestine rites seem to have surpassed even the enthusiastic zeal of their ancestors, in the days of Moses, when, crowding around the pedestal of the golden calf, they rent the air with cries of “These be thy gods, O Israel!” Beneath a calmer exterior, the actors pointed out to Ezekiel concealed a stronger and more intense passion for idolatry. Every form of animal life, from the noblest quadruped to the most loathsome reptile that spawned in Egypt, received a share of their insane homage; and the most extraordinary feature of the scene was, that the individual who appeared to be the director of those foul mysteries, the master of ceremonies, was Jaazaniah, a descendant of that zealous scribe who had gained so much renown as the principal adviser of the good king Josiah, and whose family had for generations been regarded as the most illustrious, for piety, in the land. The presence of a scion of this venerated house in such a den of impurity, struck the prophet as an electric shock, and showed, better than all the other painful spectacles this chamber exhibited, to what a fearful extent idolatry had inundated the land.

We might have supposed it impossible for men to have sunk to a lower depth of superstition, than that of imitating the Egyptians in worshipping the monsters of the Nile, or the vegetable produce of their fields and gardens, had we not been informed that the prophet was directed to turn him yet again, and he would see greater abominations that they did. "Then he brought me to the gate of the Lord's house, which was toward the north: and behold there sat women weeping for Tammuz." This, the principal deity of the Phœnicians, and who was often called also by that people, Adoni, that is, My Lord, became afterwards famous in the Grecian mythology under the well-known name of Adonis, and the circumstance of his being selected for the subject of their most beautiful fictions by so many of the classic poets, is a sufficient proof of the great popular interest his name and ritual excited among the idolaters of the ancient world. It is said to have originated in a tragic adventure, which befell an intrepid and beautiful prince of Phœnicia, who was killed while hunting a wild boar by which that land was infested, and whose untimely death in the cause of his country was bewailed in an annual festival, held to commemorate the disastrous event. During the seven days that the festival lasted, the Phœnicians appeared to be a nation of mourners; and in every town and village a fictitious representation of Tammuz was got up for the occasion, and the whole population assembled to pour forth their unbounded sorrow for his hapless fate;—more especially at Byblos, in Syria, where a temple was erected to the honour of this national deity. A strange imposture was practised, to inflame the public lamentations. There was in this temple a gigantic statue of the god, the eyes of which were filled with lead; which, on fire being applied within, of course melted, and fell in big drops to the ground,—a signal for the loud wailings of the bystanders, whose eyes, in sympathetic imitation, were dissolved in tears. Conspicuous among the crowd, on such occasions, a band of mercenary females directed the orgies; and, in conformity with an ancient custom of bewailing the dead on anniversaries at the doors of houses, these took their station at the gate, with their faces directed northward,—as the sun was said to have been in that quarter of the heavens at the time when the death of Tammuz occurred. These violent efforts in mourning were always followed by scenes of the most licentious and revolting revelry, which, though not mentioned, are manifestly implied among the "greater abominations" that degraded this third group of idolaters.

Besides the hieroglyphics of Egypt and the orgies of Tammuz, there was another form of superstition still, which in Jerusalem, then almost wholly given to idolatry, had its distinguished patrons. "Turn thee yet again," said his celestial guide to the prophet, "and thou shalt see greater abominations than these." And he brought him "into the inner court of the Lord's house, and behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east." Perhaps, of all the varieties of superstition which had crept in among the Hebrews in that period of general decline, none displayed such flagrant dishonour to God as this; for as the most holy place was situated at the west end of the sanctuary, it was impossible for these twenty-five men to pay their homage to the rising sun without turning their backs directly on God, and the consecrated place of his residence; and accordingly, this fourth circle is introduced last, as if their employment formed the climax of abominations—the worst and most awful sign of the times.

Could stronger proofs be needed that the Lord had not forsaken Israel, but that he was driven from them? This was the lesson intended, and actually accomplished, by the vision. To the pious mind of the prophet, that secret apartment, those scenes of degrading idolatry, revealed a spectacle of unutterable horror. He saw that the highest and most influential persons who remained in the land of his fathers,—those who, by their rank and office, were the appointed guardians of the worship of the true God, had extensively caught the contagion of foreign manners; and that though the worship of God still continued the nominal religion of the land, and the fire was not yet entirely extinguished on the altar, the whole population, from the lowest up to the highest, observed it with gross hypocrisy,—had become almost universally infidels, and were advancing with rapid strides to the point when the land would be deluged in one overwhelming torrent, by the vices and crimes, as it already seemed to be by the principles, of idolatry. In these circumstances, the conviction was painfully impressed on his mind, that the dawn of better days for his country was a distant prospect. Idolatry, in every form, was incompatible with the constitution of the kingdom of Israel. And so long as it continued, all hope of seeing the glory and independence of Israel revived was gone. Even when partially embraced by the people, it had often blighted their national prosperity; and now that it was almost become the universal persuasion, the nation exhibited every symptom of sinking lower in the depths and the darkness of degeneracy, till the sun of Israel would for ever set. By this extraordinary vision, then, which made known to the prophet what was the actual state of things among his degenerate countrymen at home, he saw himself, and instructed the pious circle around him to see, a proof of the long-suffering and the just severity of God, in deferring to answer their fervent and long-continued prayers for the deliverance and the resurrection of their country.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MR JAMES MEIKLE,

SURGEON AT CAENWATH, LANARKSHIRE.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

Soon after the marked interposition narrated in the close of the first part of this Sketch, the Portland, the ship in which Mr Meikle sailed, was called to join Admiral Boscawen off Toulon, and continued cruising in the Mediterranean several months. In the course of that time an engagement took place with the French fleet, during which Mr Meikle was mercifully preserved in the midst of imminent dangers. At the close of the battle, the Portland, along with some other ships, being ordered home with the prisoners, he applied, immediately on his arrival at Spithead, to be discharged from the service. His application was refused, but he was promoted to the rank of first mate.

In the course of the next voyage, which was to the coast of France, Mr Meikle and his shipmates experienced two very remarkable providential escapes. They are thus briefly mentioned in his published life:—

The Portland, and five other ships of inferior force, were employed in watching a fleet of transports intended for the invasion of England, when the signal was made for an enemy. They slipped their cables and pursued, supposing the fleet they descried at a distance to be merchant-men or transports. Already they were within a few leagues of the enemy, when, to their confusion, they found that they were running into the middle of the Brest fleet, commanded by Marshal Confans. They attempted to flee, but with scarcely a hope of escaping. The Portland, which sailed very indifferently since she was last repaired, was within reach of the enemy's shot, and expecting every moment the order to strike, when a man, on the mast-head, announced a fleet bearing down before the wind. Signals appeared at the same instant flying on the French fleet, and in a little time they altered their course. It was the British fleet, under Hawke, which now hove in sight. Every heart on board the Portland was joy; she turned to join in the pursuit of her pursuers; and by the evening of that day (November 20, 1749), was gained one of the greatest naval victories which adorn the annals of Britain.

"The remains of the French fleet took shelter in the River Vilaine, and the Portland was stationed on the coast, along with some other ships, to prevent their escape. While on this station, they were assaulted by a dreadful tempest on the 1st of January 1760; and the ship drove. One anchor was broken off by the fluke, another through the middle of the stalk; but when they were almost on shore, and all on board expected to perish, the sheet anchor was let go, which brought the vessel up, so that she rode out the storm."

In the midst of these, and many other interpositions of the Almighty, Mr Meikle was deeply grieved at the hardness and insensibility of heart which prevailed around him. Again and again did he feel the peculiar force of the pathetic language of the Psalmist: "Rivers of waters run down mine eyes because men kept not thy laws." His own words are peculiarly striking,— "Whence shall I fetch floods of tears to weep over my senseless acquaintances, who are hastening to hell, yet believe it not?" Immediately after his return from the coast of France, Mr Meikle began to write an account of his religious views and feelings under the title of "A Secret Survey into the State of the Soul." Not contented with a constant habit of self-examination and mourning over the wickedness of his companions, he endeavoured to make himself useful to those who would listen to his instructions. Several boys belonging to the ship he took under his peculiar charge, teaching and admonishing them in a knowledge of Divine things. Some of the midshipmen also he prevailed upon to enter into a solemn engagement to abstain from the grosser vices, and endeavour to conduct themselves creditably for a brief period. Their resolutions, however, were in too many instances fleeting and transitory. Grieved at their constant outbreaks, Mr Meikle made repeated applications at this time (1760) to be discharged, but he was unhappily unsuccessful. He was now anxious to be relieved from the service, on several grounds. During the time he had spent at sea he had been enabled, by the blessing of God, to send home sufficient money to pay off all his debts, both those which he had left undischarged when he entered the navy, and those which had been contracted since his departure for the support of his aged mother, of whose decease he had lately before received information. This circumstance, combined with the evil influence and example to which he was exposed, rendered him desirous of returning home and fulfilling the great object which he still kept in view—that of studying for the Church. The next voyage of the Portland was to the island of St Helena, in the course of which Mr Meikle, besides the stated observance of his religious exercises, applied himself diligently to the study of the Hebrew language, and he had completed the reading of the Pentateuch before he returned to England. The scurvy and dysentery raged on board the ship, during the voyage home, to such a degree that they lost twenty-six men, and at one period had sixty-five sick. In such a state of matters Mr Meikle was exposed to great fatigue, in the discharge of his medical duty, but being mercifully preserved in health, he persevered unremittingly to the end of the voyage. On reaching home, the ship was ordered into dock, and Mr Meikle again applied to the navy-board for a discharge, but without success. A few months after, having, in the meantime, been on a short voyage to Lisbon, he renewed his application; and, to his inexpressible joy, obtained his request.

Having at length procured his discharge, Mr Meikle gladly left the ship and hastened to London, whence he sailed for Berwick, from which place he travelled on foot to Edinburgh; "which," says he, "when I saw, I thanked God, and took courage." On the 24th March 1762, he arrived at Carnwath, his native place. Here he felt, after the turmoil and trouble of a life at sea, that he had found a resting-place. In the midst of professing Christians, with ready access to the house of God, he enjoyed great refreshment and delight. On the Sabbath he regularly travelled to Biggar, eight miles from his residence, where he attended a Secession meeting-house in connection with the Burgher Synod.

Now, that he had settled at home, the desire revived of entering upon the study of theology; but, on consulting with several pious friends, and taking the matter into serious consideration, he came to the conclusion that it was his duty to abandon his original design, and to persevere in the profession, which he had so long and with such gratifying success pursued. He continued, accordingly, to practise as a country surgeon during the remainder of his life, employing his leisure time in promoting the interests of the Gospel by his writings. His business, as a medical man, rapidly increased, and the interest which he took in the spiritual as well as temporal welfare of his patients was quite in harmony with the whole bearing of his Christian character. "I desire," says he, "to bear my patients on my mind; they are my charge; and I always im-plure a blessing on the means: for the apparently dying I make supplications in secret." Thus honouring the Lord, he himself was honoured in return. He prospered in the world, and was respected and beloved by all who were capable of appreciating his character. No doubt, as was naturally to have been expected, the tongue of slander was occasionally let loose upon him, but as often did he realize the truth of the Divine promise—"He shall hide them in his pavilion from the strife of tongues."

The works which Mr Meikle prepared, both on board ship and during his residence at Carnwath, were numerous, both in poetry and prose, and those of them which have been published have attained great celebrity in the Christian world, more especially his "Solitude Sweetened," which has always been highly prized by devout minds. His whole writings are characterized by ardent piety, and that serious, and occasionally melancholy cast of thought which is usually relished by reflecting readers. Mr Meikle had been trained up in the school of affliction and adversity, and the result was, in the highest degree, favourable to his Christian progress. He was frequently in the habit of devoting a day, or a portion of a day, to solemn humiliation, self-examination, and prayer. In his observance of the Sabbath he was remarkably strict, making it his uniform practice to visit his patients, except in cases of urgent necessity, either before or after the hours of divine service.

Mr Meikle was peculiarly happy in the marriage relation. After the death of his sister, which occurred in 1770, he made it a matter of earnest prayer, that in his choice of a companion for life he might be directed to a woman who feared the Lord. He was married, accordingly, to the daughter of a farmer in his neighbourhood, whose piety and Christian worth were of a very high character. The happiness of this union was short-lived. Mrs Meikle, shortly after the birth of her first child, fell into bad health. This continued for some time; and, on the 17th of May 1781, they united together in supplications for the recovery of her health; and their resolution to do so is thus recorded in Mr Meikle's Journal:—

"On account of the long distress in our family, we desire to humble ourselves before God, and to justify the heavenly conduct; for we have sinned, and have had our hearts too little on our native country, too little on heavenly things. While we accept of chastisement from our heavenly Father, we desire to turn to him that smites us; and we humbly plead, 1. For patience till he remove his rod from us; 2. For the sanctified use of this affliction; 3. That he would be pleased to restore us to such a measure of health, that we may be enabled to attend on sacramental solemnities in the ensuing summer, and find his presence there; 4. That he would direct us to right means for recovery, and bless the means used; 5. That we may not rely too much on the means used, but look to Him alone; 6. That he may bless our child, and hold his hand about her; That he may give us his special presence in the time of our affliction, and make all tend to his glory and our good."

The health of this excellent woman rapidly declined; and, three weeks after she had been confined of her second child, she was cut off on the 11th October 1781. A few days after this melancholy bereavement, he thus writes:—

"This day my dear wife and I intended a private fast, but now she is removed by death, and I am left alone to mourn the loss of a religious companion. O to take God in place of all! O comfort me against grief on every side! I wish not to have a stupid insensibility of such a loss: I wish also not to rise up in rebellion against the conduct of Him who is Sovereign of all. I desire to lie low in the dust, and go softly, because thou hast done it.' And on the 25th he expresses himself in this manner:—'This day, in my solitude, and after the loss of a dear wife, a religious companion, I desire to take God for my God, and the God of my child; and I make a cheerful surrender of myself and my child to God. I roll her over on his divine protection; and though I too were to be called out of the world, I can commit her to him, the best of Parents and the best of Guardians, who is a Father of the fatherless. I wish to live only for his glory, and to his praise.' The same day, among the mercies which he acknowledges to the praise of God, he enumerates the following:—'That my dearest friend is gone to glory; that my child is in good health; that God, though he has afflicted, has not cast me off; that there is a fulness of grace and consolation in God for me;—that God has been pleased to connect me with a dear saint, and to bless us with the greatest peace and harmony in our married life, though he has seen fit to make it very short; but the thought is sweet, that she is gone to glory.'"

After continuing a widower upwards of four years, Mr Meikle again entered into the marriage state. Nothing remarkable appears to have occurred in his history during the brief remainder of his days. He walked closely and consistently with God; and such was the high estimation in which his Christian character was held, that he was ordained to the eldership in the Secession Congregation of Biggar in 1789. For ten years, he continued to discharge the sacred and important duties of this office with the utmost conscientiousness and fidelity.

At length the hour arrived when this man of God must be summoned from this earthly tabernacle to his home in the heavens. To him death was no strange or unexpected messenger. He had for years been familiarizing his mind with the thought of encountering the last enemy. So rapid was the transition at the last, that no details can be given of the death-bed scene. The memorial of his closing hours may be soon told. One day he was active in the duties of his worldly calling, and the next he had become an inhabitant of the heavenly mansions. On the 7th of December 1799, he quietly fell asleep in Jesus.

STATE OF RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN BELGIUM SINCE THE REVOLUTION OF 1830.

BY THE REV. ÆNEAS M. RATE.

PART II.

HAVING already given some brief notices of the progress which the Truth made in Belgium during the time of the Reformation—of the persecutions which speedily arrested its progress—and of the almost miraculous preservation of a few companies of professing Protestants, in whose minds remained some glimmering rays of spiritual light, down to our own day, I shall now give some information, of a more general nature, respecting its present condition—information drawn from letters and documents on which the fullest reliance may be placed. Belgium has had many changes since the days of the Reformation. In 1556, the sovereignty of the Netherlands was abdicated by Charles V. in favour of his son Philip, who inherited both this country, and also Spain. In 1684, Spain acknowledged the independence of the united provinces called Holland; but the chains of the ten Roman Catholic ones were only rivetted more firmly than ever. In 1748, these provinces were all ceded to Austria; but, in the year 1795, they fell under the power of France. Then it was that the principles which gave birth to the Revolution, and overturned the old principalities and thrones of Europe, were diffused in Belgium; and the two great currents of opinion, which have often since encountered one another with tremendous shocks, and which seem yet destined to meet in the future history of the Continent in frequent and awful collision, were clearly seen in this country. In 1814, Holland, whose liberties had been crushed, was delivered from the iron grasp of its oppressors; and Holland and Belgium were united into one kingdom, under the name of the kingdom of the Netherlands. From that period till the year 1830, Belgium was under the government of the King of Holland; but, diametrically opposed as the Dutch and Belgians were to one another in religion, in associations, in habits, and principles, no cordial union could be established between them. Nothing was wanting but some favourable circumstance to kindle the smouldering fires of hostility into an open and wide-spreading flame. Between 1814 and 1830, the period when the Revolution broke forth, and Belgium was established as an independent kingdom, it does not appear that the Gospel had made any considerable progress in that country. To such a height, at this time, did the jealousy of the Popish clergy arrive, that they alleged the very fact of the sovereign allowing Protestants to exist in the Belgian part of the kingdom as a proof that he designed to overturn the Roman Catholic faith; and it is alleged, as a striking demonstration of the impotence of the king, that when permission was solicited from him to allow a Bible Society to be established in the Belgian part of his dominions, he was obliged to decline—his chaplain assuring him that, if he gave it, it would cost him his throne. At that time, all the faithful ministers who were employed in preaching the Gospel to the inhabitants of this benighted land did not exceed the number of four or five, or about one to each million of people. One of these ministers was M. Merle D'Aubigné, who, silently and amid the greatest discouragements, was occupied in sowing that immortal seed, which, though cast into the soil in the stormy spring-time, at length grows up towards maturity and brings forth fruit to God. At the time of the Revolution, however, he left the country, to enter upon a yet more important and extensive field of labour; nor was his place supplied by a minister of similar knowledge or devotedness. Thus, at this recent period, scarce any inroads had been made upon this portion of the empire of the prince of darkness.

The inhabitants of Belgium, it may here be remarked, belong to two distinct classes—the Proper Belgians or Netherlanders, who inhabit Flanders, and speak the Flemish language; and the Walloons, who inhabit the southern parts of the country, and speak a corrupt kind of French. The former amount to about two millions and a-half, the latter to one million and a-half. The origin, the characters, the habits, as well as the languages of these classes, are altogether diverse. The Flemish are, for the most part, sluggish and apathetic, are fiercely bigoted, possess but little general knowledge or intelligence, and are very imperfectly instructed. The language, in connection with their hatred of every thing Dutch, seems effectually to have excluded foreign ideas and influences, and to have shut them up under the influence of their old prejudices. The other part of the population, from their proximity to France and their speaking the French language, have generally imbibed the principles and sentiments of their neighbours: are, in their political views, liberal; in their religious ones, infidel: but possess far more of general intelligence, and are much better educated, than the Flemish. These two parties, so opposed to each other in other respects, yet agreed in this, that they could not endure to yield subjection to the King of Holland; and, at a favourable conjuncture, cordially uniting their energies, they effected the Revolution, and, by the aid of foreign powers, established Leopold on the throne. As the elevation of Louis Philip to the French throne was the momentous era when liberty was given to Protestants to spread the faith in France, so the Revolution in Belgium led to a similar result in that country. The Roman Catholics, believing that if once the connection between them and Protestant Holland was severed, they would soon be able to crush every remnant of the Protestant faith, submitted to that clause of the charter which gives to Protestants the most ample liberty, without restriction or molestation, both to assert their own principles and to propagate their own faith. The introduction of this clause into the charter must be regarded by Christians as an event of no ordinary moment in the religious history of Belgium. A passage was thereby opened, by which the light might break into this old receptacle of Romish darkness and delusion. In consequence of that event, the fabric of superstition has already been shaken, and, through the blessing of God, may yet be overthrown.

Immediately after the Revolution, and in consequence of that event, Popery received a blow which, for a time at least, greatly weakened its power. Inspired by the antagonist spirit of liberalism, the people began to break loose from the mental and moral fetters by which for ages they had been bound; schools and colleges were opened, from which the influence and the instruction of the priests were entirely excluded; and a large proportion of the rising generation were growing up without any religious sentiments at all. It was not long, too, before the Roman Catholics must have perceived that the power they had so long wielded, for the purpose of crushing religious inquiry, and which they trusted would have been augmented by the Revolution, was in a great measure gone. He who "is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working," thus made the wrath of his enemies, intended for the destruction of his cause, to praise him, while the remainder of it he restrained. In 1833-4, a Roman Catholic abbé opened a place of worship in opposition to the clergy, and proceeded to preach against the errors and abuses of the Church of Rome, to read the mass in the vulgar tongue, and recommend the perusal of the Scriptures. Many were, through his labours, brought to open their eyes to the superstition and idolatries of their own Church; but their instructor, not being himself taught of God soon, fell into the abominations of Socinianism, and was deserted by the greater number of his former proselytes. In the latter part of the year 1834, the British and Foreign Bible Society directed their attention to Belgium; and in the following year, several small Bible associations were formed. From that period down to March last, eighty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-two copies of the Scriptures have been circulated in this country through the instrumentality of colporteurs and of Bible associations. It cannot be doubted, that by this means a spirit of inquiry has been awakened, a heavy blow has been inflicted on the power of the priests, and much knowledge of religious truth diffused in regions, which had for ages been involved in the thickest shades of Popish delusion. Owing to this, in connection with other causes, in the years 1836 and 1837, there began to be manifest in various quarters, an earnest desire for religious instruction, which led to the formation of the Evangelical Society of Belgium. Their first evangelist was stationed at the town of Genval, where a concern to hear the Word had been awakened through the instrumentality of a single copy of the Bible lent by a religious family about twenty years before. Afterwards they placed evangelists in six different stations, who have since laboured with unwearied assiduity amid the greatest persecutions and dangers; but with such success as has made it manifest to all that God has been with them.

Alarmed by these unwonted appearances, the Romish priesthood soon rallied and returned to the charge; and they have, since the commencement of aggressive labours on the part of Protestants, made the most persevering and determined efforts to reduce their countrymen to that spiritual bondage under which they so long lay. During the course of the conflicts between the supporters of the great opposing opinions, Popery has had ample opportunities for developing its real character, and it has been so developed as to leave no rational doubt, that, were those restraints removed which it deploras, it would have renewed the atrocities of bygone ages, and again drenched the soil of Belgium with blood. The intense hatred of the Word of God, to which we have referred, as characterizing Popery in Belgium during former ages, has revived in all its power; the individuals who have been employed circulating the Scriptures have awakened the furious hostility of the priests, who seem to feel that Popery and the Bible cannot exist together; and that before the silent might of the Word of God their own system of delusion is destined utterly to fall. In 1836 the Bishop of Bruges issued an ordinance prohibiting all the Roman Catholics from buying or receiving any of the Bibles sold by the colporteurs. In 1837 the Bishop of Ghent denounced, in the most violent terms, in his charge to the people, the circulators of the Bible. "Not content," says he, "with doing every thing to draw the people to the dance, and to the most disgusting sights of immorality and irreligion, in order to corrupt their hearts; but to be more sure of being able to seduce the faithful, as did their worthy models of the sixteenth century, with deplorable success, they distribute the Holy Scriptures translated into the vulgar tongue." In May 1840, one of the most eloquent of the Romish missionaries devoted three sermons, which were afterwards printed and widely circulated, to the object of assailing the distribution of the Scriptures, with a degree of bitterness, that could only with propriety have been directed against the most enormous crimes. Only two or three months ago the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Belgium directed nearly the whole of his annual charge against the circulation and the perusal of the Holy Scriptures. The outcry that was commenced against the distribution of the Word of God by the Bishop, has been re-echoed with redoubled violence by the priests, and from them transmitted to all the devotees of the Church among the people. One of the priests assured the people they had better give their children poison, than the books of the colporteurs; for while the one would only kill the body, the latter would kill the souls for ever; another bribed some of the people to call out, that the books were accursed books, and that those who read them would be damned; a third gave money to some persons to buy a Testament, and tear it in pieces, that others might be led to follow their example. At one time a Testament was dipped in turpentine and set on fire, and, elevated on a pole, carried in triumph through one of the towns of Belgium, while the colporteurs were pelted with stones; in other cases they were assailed with such ferocity, that it was necessary an armed force should interfere, to rescue them from impending destruction. Nor have the faithful evangelists of the Belgian Evangelical Society escaped persecution; on the contrary, from the moment they commenced their labours, down to the present time, they have been exposed to one continued succession of attacks. The blackest calumnies have been circulated to render them objects of universal abhorrence; the pulpits of Belgium have resounded with denunciations against them; the people have been commanded not to sell to them the necessaries of life, not to admit them into their houses, not to speak to them on pain of incurring the displeasure of the priests, or of ruining their souls. One of the evangelists was on one occasion awakened out of sleep, by hearing the noise of shots that had been fired into his windows, by the infuriated Romanists without; while at another time, for hours together he was kept awake by their midnight shouts and outcries. No sooner is a Roman Catholic converted to the Protestant faith than he becomes exposed to such ferocious and continued persecutions, as nothing but the power of Divine grace could enable him successfully to sustain; and short as has been the duration of the Society, it has furnished converts who have exhibited a heroic fortitude in enduring suffering, and manifested a noble courage in confessing Christ, that ought to call forth the admiration, and the deepest sympathy of every servant of the Lord.

While the whole Romish priesthood are thus actuated by the most violent feelings against the Protestants, it must be acknowledged that they seem to have acted with an energy—a perseverance, and even a sagacity in their attempts to overthrow Protestantism, which are worthy of a better cause. Finding that the Protestants gained numerous proselytes by the sale of Bibles and of tracts, they have set up a society in opposition, called "The Society for the Propagation of Good Books." Some of the publications of this Society are sold—some given away gratis—some are sued for the drawing-rooms of the rich—others for the cottages of the poor. For the publication and circulation of these volumes, they have a superabundance of funds; and it is confidently asserted, that immense sums of money are sent from Popish Belgium to Protestant countries for the spread of the Romish faith—a circumstance, which should rouse the followers of Christ in Britain to pour in their resources for the subversion of Popery in those countries, where its power has been shaken already. A single printer, it is said, employs more than three thousand reams of paper yearly, for the printing mass books, breviaries, and other Popish books. Jesuit missionaries are further employed, to travel from place to place, labouring to stir up the people against the evangelists and Bible distributors, to induce them to reject or destroy the Bibles, and by every artifice which Jesuitism can invent, and with that total disregard of truth by which it has ever been distinguished, to re-establish the power of the Church. One of the aims of the priests is, to bring the whole education of the country under their sway. They cannot but abhor that clause of the charter which allows all schools, which are not maintained by the Government, to be entirely free, as respects the instructions they communicate; and will, without doubt, seize the earliest opportunity of labouring to secure its repeal. The Jesuits alone have established four colleges,—at Brussels, at Namur, at Alost, and at Ghent. They have seen that, in order to influence the rising generation, they must bring up the children in the Roman Catholic faith; and hence have laboured with the most determined efforts to crush the Protestant schools. In common with the Roman Catholics in other countries, they are bending all their energies to the acquisition of political power. At the elections, the priests plunge into the conflict, and, accompanied with all the most devoted friends of the Romish faith, strain every nerve to secure the election of men resolved to labour for the ascendancy of the Church of Rome. Their growing power (and they already possess a powerful party among the representatives) has awakened the alarm of the liberals, who, though from no love to the truth, contemplate with satisfaction the success of the Protestants; and who are already predicting, that, ere long, the zeal of the priests will hurry them into such excesses as shall destroy their influence with the people, and bring about a great reaction. Thus the atmosphere is already surcharged with the elements of conflict, while the horizon is darkening with the signals of approaching storms. Amid the painful anticipations which such prospects are calculated to awaken, the mind turns with pleasure to the gleams of Gospel light falling on some portions of this country, which tend to awaken the hope, that the radiance of Divine truth may yet break through these clouds, and at once bring sunshine and calm to this distracted and benighted population. While Popery at present seems to be gathering strength, it is a political and not a moral power that it is gaining; the arms it is using are terror and denunciation, not persuasion and conviction. Its influence over the belief and the consciences of its devotees is manifestly and rapidly diminishing; and, perhaps, at the very time its strength, like the last convulsive efforts of a man engaged in a mortal struggle, seems to be the greatest, the hour of its overthrow is nearest at hand. Even now, a great number of its adherents, and many even of the priests, groan under the yoke they are obliged to wear, and were it not from the dread of injuring their worldly interests, would joyfully unite to break it asunder.

To oppose the wealth, the numbers, and the power which Popery arrays on its side, there is but a small and apparently insignificant band of the devoted servants of Christ. There are eight French Protestant ministers, paid by the State, who afford religious instruction to thirteen different congregations; but of these ministers, there are only four who know the truth; the rest, either Rationalists or Socinians, hate it with their whole hearts; and hence have determinedly opposed the Belgian Evangelical Society, and even exerted all their influence with Government for the purpose of inducing them, in contravention of the terms of the charter, to lay an arrest on their labours. There are just two additional Protestant ministers employed in instructing the native population, exclusive of the Society's agents; one of whom is Mr Panchaud of Brussels, a zealous and devoted servant of Christ, who is secretary to the Society, and to whom it has, we believe, been more indebted than to any other individual. The four clergymen who are favourable to the spread of the Gospel, are situated at a considerable distance from each other; their salaries are barely adequate for their own necessities, and their congregations have not, as yet, been distinguished for their missionary zeal, so that they can lend but little aid. Hence, nearly the whole burden of managing the Society's affairs, and taking all the steps necessary to procure funds for its support, falls on three or four individuals residing at Brussels. Should it finally fall to the ground, through the callousness of the friends of religion in this country (for the Protestants in Belgium itself are wholly unable to support it), a grievous calamity will have befallen the country, and the Romish priesthood on the Continent will triumph in its overthrow.

Before concluding this Paper, I would mention a few facts respecting the British population in Belgium. The number of these at Antwerp, Bruges, and Ostend, is said to be great; at Brussels alone it is estimated at six thousand; and it is a melancholy fact, that of this large number it is believed there will not be more than six hundred who regularly attend the house of God. The English clergy are paid by the Government.* Two of these reside at Brussels; one at Antwerp; one at Ghent, at Bruges, at Ostend, and Spa. These are in general distinguished by their conformity to the world, and we have not been able to learn that there is more than one of them who faithfully preaches the Gospel. This is deeply to be deplored, and is productive of the most melancholy consequences. No sooner do the British arrive at Brussels, or some of the other Belgian towns, than, assailed by the infidels on the one side, and Roman Catholics on the other, and seeing no faithful pastors ready to warn them of their dangers, they are carried away by the torrent of ungodliness. Some imbibe the principles of Voltaire; while others, as is said to have been the case with many at Bruges, adopt the tenets of the Popish population, and the whole mass plunge into the vortex of gaiety and dissipation. The profanation of the Sabbath in Brussels, in particular, is deplorable. No sooner does the sacred day dawn, than it is manifest that it is a day devoted to festivity, and not to the worship of God. As the day advances, and the evening comes, the tea gardens, the concerts, the ball-room, and the theatre, are thronged with the countless devotees of pleasure, and resound with the instruments of music or the voices of applause. Those who have the fear of God, usually, after spending a few days, in this place, hurry forward to some other town or city where they may find some of their countrymen, who preach the Gospel, and exhibit the power of religion. It is, however, greatly to be lamented, that a faithful and devoted minister, either Scotch or English, has not been placed in this great city,—one who, with the wisdom and talent which are necessary in such a situation, might lift up his voice against the prevailing worldliness of the place,—who might draw to the city, and retain there, a few individuals who might exhibit the religion of the Cross,—who might keep alive the religious impressions which some of the British may have carried with them from their own land,—who, moreover, might make known to his fellow-countrymen at home all the efforts that were made in Belgium to spread the Gospel, and by his statements and representations, might stir them up to lend their energetic aid. It is an encouraging circumstance, that when a faithful British minister has spent a few weeks at Brussels and preached there, the Church in which he has proclaimed the Gospel has been crowded with an interested and attentive congregation.

MAN RESTORED BY GRACE.

CHILD of Man, whose seed below
Must fulfil their race of woe!
Heir of want, and doubt, and pain,
Does thy fainting heart complain?
Oh! in thought, one night recall,
The night of grief in Herod's hall;
There I bore the vengeance due,
Freely bore it all for you.

Child of Dust, corruption's son,
By pride deceived, by pride undone,
Willing captive, yet be free,
Take my yoke, and learn of me;
I, of heav'n and earth the Lord,
God with God, the eternal Word,
I forsook my Father's side,
Toil'd and wept, and bled and died.

Child of Doubt, does fear surprise?—
Vexing thoughts within thee rise:
Wond'ring, murm'ring, dost thou gaze
On evil men and evil days?
Oh! if darkness round thee low'r,
Darker far my dying hour,
Which bade that fearful cry awake—
My God, my God, dost thou forsake?

Child of Sin, by guilt oppress'd,
Heaves at last thy throbbing breast?
Hast thou felt the mourner's part?
Fear'st thou now thy failing heart?
Bear thee on, beloved of God,
Tread the path thy Saviour trod;
He the tempter's power hath known,
He hath pour'd the garden green:

Child of Heav'n, by me restored,
Love thy Saviour, serve the Lord:
Seal'd with that mysterious name,
Bear thy cross, and scorn the shame;
Then, like me, thy conflict o'er,
Thou shalt rise to sleep no more;
Partner of my purchased throne,
One in joy, in glory one."

DEATH ABOLISHED, AND LIFE AND IMMORTALITY BROUGHT TO LIGHT:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM MALCOLM,

Minister of Leochel-Cushnie, Aberdeenshire.

"Our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."—2 TIM. i. 10.

"It is appointed unto all men once to die." "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return," is the sentence which has gone forth against fallen man. And numberless and impressive are the evidences that this sentence can neither be resisted nor reversed. The certainty of death is a point which admits of no difference of opinion. It is a fact—a melancholy fact—which is every day forcing itself upon our notice, and challenging our most solemn consideration. Oh yes! die we must; there is no discharge in that war. We have no power over the spirit, to retain the spirit. We must needs die. Wrapt in impenetrable secrecy is the hour of our death; "who can tell when it shall be?" Whether we shall be cut down in the bloom of youth, or whether we shall come to our grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season, is not given us to know. But it is fixed in the purpose of Him, without whom a sparrow falleth not to the ground. Our days are determined, the number of our months are with him; he hath appointed our bounds that we cannot pass; and for aught we can tell, the very next step we take in life may bring us to death, and to the house appointed for all living. At all events, the King of terrors, sooner or later, we must meet. He will neither be bribed by riches, nor awed by power, nor persuaded by eloquence, nor won by tears. Will he consent to delay his coming? When he passeth through the land will he not come nigh thy dwelling? Will he make a covenant with thee? Will he speak soft words unto thee? No—nor rank, nor age, nor sex, can bespeak his favour. The time is coming when, either suddenly, or by slow degrees, every one now present must go the way whence he shall not return. The hour is on the wing when we shall be laid on our death-bed, when the last breath shall be drawn, and the last pulse of life shall be still; when we shall be laid out in our grave-clothes, cold and insensible; when our distressed relatives shall steal, in speechless and in tearless agony, into the dead chamber, to lift the covering from the face, to gaze once more on the sadly altered features, and to grasp once more the hand which can no longer return the pressure; and when our mortal remains, removed at last, as they must be, from the presence of those who cannot yet think of parting with them, shall be laid in the narrow house, and say to corruption, "thou art my father, and to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister."

But is there nothing to relieve this melancholy picture? Nothing to brighten this gloomy prospect? Amid the desolation which death occasions, is there no resting-place for the downcast soul,—no voice to assuage the bitterness of sorrow? Yes, blessed be God, there is help, and there is hope for us. There is consolation, everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace, that "when our earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." "Our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death," and over the gloom of the grave hath poured the glorious light of life and immortality.

I. In the first place, "Our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death." This he hath done in that he hath put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. It was sin which "brought death into the world and all our woe." Had man never sinned, he had never tasted of death. Of this the Apostle assures us; "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." The same law which said to Adam, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" still says, "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" "cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." This law cannot be set aside. Its requirements cannot be dispensed with; its obligations are immutable as God who gave it. Hence it is that sin, the transgression of this law, is such an evil thing and bitter, and invests death, the wages of sin, with so much power over our fallen race.

Now, sin being the cause of death, he who should remove the cause, would, at the same time, destroy the effect. This our Saviour Jesus Christ has done. He has made an end of sin. Although he knew no sin, he was made sin for us. He substituted himself in our place. He stood in the breach between God and us. He arrested the uplifted arm of Omnipotence, saying, "On me let thine anger fall, on my head let thy wrath be spent; I will lay down my life that my people may be spared; I will die that they may live for ever." Accordingly, "He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities. The Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all." And, "He bare our sins in his own body on the tree." As our Surety he has given full satisfaction to the law of God. He fulfilled all its precepts, for he did no sin. He endured all its penalties, for "He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross;" "and brought in an everlasting righteousness for the justification of all who shall believe in his name."

And thus it is, that death is disarmed of its sting, for sin which was its sting is put away; and the law, which gave sin its strength, is fulfilled; and the sentence denounced against us is reversed, "for to them who are in Christ Jesus there is now no condemnation;" and God can now be just, and yet the justifier of them who believe in his Son. He can be at once a just God and yet a Saviour. Sin having received its wages in the death of our Substitute, the gift of God is now eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Of a truth, therefore, death is abolished. Its form remains, but its power to injure is gone. And so far from being an evil, it is now, to the believer, a positive advantage. To him it is not so much death, as a sleep—a resting from the toils and trials of his earthly pilgrimage. And so it is often represented in Scripture. When Jesus heard that Lazarus was dead, he said, "our friend Lazarus sleepeth." When Stephen was stoned to death, we are told that "he fell asleep." And the people of God are said at death to have "fallen asleep in Jesus." So that this last enemy has become a friend. This King of terrors is now an object, not of dread, but of desire. The believer, instead of being, through fear of death, all his lifetime subject to bondage, can now contemplate his approach with confidence and joy. He can smile at his coming shaft, and defy its point. He can even take him by the cold hand, and bid him welcome, singing, as he enters his dark abode, 'Oh death where is thy sting! Oh grave where is thy victory! Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

II. In the next place, "Our Saviour Jesus Christ hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."

To the Gentiles the doctrine of life and immortality was unknown. The subject, indeed, often engaged the thoughts of their philosophers. But even with them it was rather a speculation on which they exercised their ingenuity, than a principle which could either comfort the heart or influence the conduct. They knew that after having suffered from bodily disease, from disappointment in their various pursuits, from the loss of friends, and from the injustice of enemies, death would come at last, to close the scene of woe. But what death was, and what, if any thing, was to succeed it, they were utterly unable to discover.

Even the Jews had comparatively but an imperfect knowledge of the doctrine of immortality. To them, indeed, it was made known in some measure. But never could it be said to have been "brought to light," till the day-spring from on high visited our benighted world,—till our Saviour Jesus Christ rolled back the thick cloud which hung over futurity, and revealed to mortal view the glories and the blessedness of heaven. His Gospel tells us that death is not the end of man, that to those who are in him, it is only a passage from a world of sin and sorrow, to a world where sin shall have no more dominion over them—where the tear of sorrow never falls, and where the pang of separation is never felt. It tells us of One who, having himself tasted of death, brings us tidings of joy from the grave—who having himself entered that dismal prison-house, has burst its bars, and written on its walls, an inscription which makes the heart glad, and the flesh to rest in hope:—"I will ransom thee from death and from the power of the grave; O death I will be thy plagues, O grave I will be thy destruction." It brings to light a land of promise beyond the grave—a land peopled with the pious friends whom we have lost; and assures us, that if we be followers of them, even as they were of Christ, we also shall come to that land, to enjoy their society, and to share their bliss.

Still methinks I hear some mourner come from the grave's mouth of a much loved friend, complaining thus:—"Consolatory, indeed, is the doctrine of the text; and bright the anticipations which it leads us to cherish. But, alas! my bursting heart is still ready to cry out, and refuses to be comforted because my friends are not. Gladly would I receive the comfort, which I know, the doctrine is fitted to afford, and which, I believe, you are willing to convey. But the sad reality is ever obtruding itself, that the grave has closed over my fondest hopes,—that the friends who were dear to me as mine own soul, are now in the dust of death. Can I think that death is abolished, when I see him laying waste the fairest scenes, ruling with resistless sway over our devoted race, and dragging into his dark dominions his thousands and his tens of thousands? Can I think that death is abolished, when I behold him striking down on every side of me, the strong as well as the weak, the young as well as the old, the worthy as well as the wicked? To-day I see man rejoicing in his strength, his countenance blooming with health, his eye beaming with intelligence, his breast beating high with hope. Tomorrow I behold him stretched in his shroud, a cold, lifeless, insensate corpse. Now I see the young woman walking in her loveliness, the blush of modesty mantling on her cheek, her every movement kindling admiration, and her every action diffusing happiness around her. In a few days—it may be only a few hours—and behold! her beauty is consumed; her gracefulness is gone, and ghastliness has succeeded. She must be shrouded from the eye which loved and admired her the most; for ah! the hand of the Spoiler has been there. Can I persuade myself that death is abolished, when I see him entering and thinning, from day to day, the dear domestic circle, in which centred all my joys and all my hopes. Oh! I could have parted with any thing—with every thing else. Cheerfully would I have surrendered the riches, the luxuries, the distinctions of my lot. I would have counted as nothing the honours I had won, and the influence—nay, the reputation I had acquired. All, all should have been given up without a murmur, had the fell Destroyer only spared my friends—my friends, whose sympathy and affection would have supplied every loss, and lightened affliction of half its load. But he would neither pity nor spare. And can I think that his malignity is abated, or his power impaired, while I am groaning beneath the stroke which was dealt by his hand—a stroke which has deprived me of those in whom my very soul was bound up, and with whose existence mine seemed inseparably united."

But refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears, for thy friends—thy venerated parent—the child of thy hopes—the partner of thy bosom, shall come again from the land of the enemy. The prey shall be taken from the mighty, and the lawful captive shall be delivered. For our Saviour Jesus Christ has abolished death. We know it, for it was a part of his appointed work, to overcome death, and him that had the power of death,—to wrest from death the dominion which he had acquired over our sinful race,—to ransom us from death and from the power of the grave—this, this was a part of that work which was given him to do. Of that work, arduous and extensive as it was, he left no part unaccomplished, and, therefore, he has abolished death. When on the cross he exclaimed, "It is finished!" he announced the defeat of the last enemy. He has abolished death;—for when on the third day he rose from the dead, he gave his people a pledge, that, though in consequence of sin having reigned in their mortal bodies, they should go down to the grave and see corruption,—yet their corruptible should finally put on incorruption, and their mortal should finally put on immortality. He has abolished death;—for from the throne to which he ascended, leading captivity itself captive, he now proclaims to his people, "I am he who was dead, and am alive again, and behold I live for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death; and because I live ye shall live also. With these keys, which, as the Captain of your salvation, I took from the enemy whom you dread, I will open his prison doors, and will say to the prisoners, 'Go forth.'"

Ask not then, in the tone which betokens despair, "Can these dry bones live?" "Can the body which reluctantly I have consigned to the dust, be ever rescued from the dishonour of the grave?" Assuredly it shall. For the body of the believer, no less than his soul, is united to Christ; and in consequence of this union it can never perish. He will preserve it, and in due season awaken it from its refreshing slumbers, and fashion it like unto his own glorious body, and bless it with life that never ends. Think you it a thing incredible, that Christ should raise the dead? Is there any thing too hard for Him who made the worlds, and who has all power committed to Him in heaven and in earth? "Cannot the hand by which we were so fearfully and wonderfully made at first create us anew? Cannot He, whose eye saw our substance yet being imperfect, and in whose book all our members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them, cannot He give to that substance new form and new life? Have you forgotten what wonders of mercy and of might he performed in the days of his flesh? Need we remind you, how kindly and effectually his power was put forth in behalf of the widow's son of Nain? "When he came nigh to the gates of the city, behold there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow. And when he saw her, he had compassion on her, and said, weep not. And he came and touched the bier, and he said, young man, I say unto thee, arise. And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak, and he delivered him to his mother." Need we remind you, how the same compassion and power were manifested in the case of Jairus' daughter? Behold him entering the chamber where she was lying in the sleep of death. Regardless of the insolent scorn of them that stood by, he took her parents with him, for he would not leave them to mourn one moment longer than was necessary, and taking the damsel by the hand, he said unto her, "Arise." Soft was his touch, yet it imparted life; gentle was his voice, yet the dead heard it. "Straightway the damsel arose and walked." Recollect too, and let the recollection at once convince and comfort you, how the same voice recalled to life his friend Lazarus, who had been dead four days. "He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes, and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, loose him and let him go."

And, after all this, can you doubt either the power or the willingness of Jesus to raise to life the pious friends whom you have laid in the grave? His strength is the same as in the days of old. His arm is not shortened that it cannot save. And whom he loves he loves to the last. Precious in his sight is their death. "Their very dust is dear to him." He seals it unto the day of redemption, when he will acknowledge and claim it as his own. None shall be able to pluck it out of his hands; and he will raise it up at the last day.

In short, indissolubly linked to Christ as believers are by faith, no part of them can ever perish. Branches of him, the true Vine—members of him, the ever-living Head—they have an indestructible interest in all that is his. The victory which he achieved, is their victory. The kingdom which he won, is their rightful portion. Theirs, by a blood-bought title, is the glory into which he has now entered. When, at death, their souls, purified from every stain, pass immediately into his presence, to rejoice for ever in his love, their bodies, still united to him, lie down in the grave, as in a place of peaceful repose, where he still regards them, and claims them as part of his own mystical body; and from which, on the resurrection morning, he will call them forth to clothe them in the robe of undecaying beauty, and to conduct them to that incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance, which he purchased for them, when dying he abolished death, and brought life and immortality fully to light.

The subject, thus imperfectly discussed, is full of instruction, and it is fraught with comfort.—It is full of instruction.—It teaches us that to Christ alone we must look—that on Him alone we must lean for the rich blessings of which it speaks. It is our Saviour Jesus Christ alone who hath abolished death. It is his blood which cleanseth from sin, whose wages is death; it is his Gospel which hath brought life and immortality to light;—it is his merit which entitles to life everlasting;—it is his grace which makes meet for the heavenly inheritance;—his power it is which is to unbar the gates of the grave, and call forth the dead to life and liberty!

Is it not then a question of unspeakable moment, whether we belong to Christ? in other words, whether we believe in him? For to those only who believe shall the blessings he has purchased be conveyed. It is he who believeth that shall live, though he were dead; and when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, it is to take vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of his Son, to punish them with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; but it is at the same time to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe.

Do we then believe in Jesus Christ the Saviour? Are we allied to him? Are we become one with him through the vivifying and pervading power of faith, just as the branches are one with the vine into which they have been grafted. Do we regard him not only as the propitiation for sin, and the only sure foundation of happiness and hope? But do we receive and rest upon him alone for pardon, and sanctification, and peace to our souls? Is he to us the chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely? Is he all our salvation and all our desire?

Are we giving evidence of our connection with him and of our interest in him, by labouring to have the same mind in us which was also in him, and to walk even as he also walked? Are we proving that we are his, by purifying ourselves even as he is pure, keeping under the body, and bringing it into subjection to the obedience of him who bought it with the price of his own blood, and who is to raise it up at the last day, that he may take it with him to the realms of purity and bliss? Are we proving that we are Christ's, by submitting, as he did, to the appointments of heaven;—welcoming like him, the cup of suffering which comes from our heavenly Father's hand, saying; "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good; Not my will but thine be done: I was dumb and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord?" Let us thus examine ourselves whether we be in the faith, and so entitled to be numbered among those to whom our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel.

But the subject is also fraught with comfort.

We naturally recoil from the prospect of death.

Many as are the ills which embitter the life that now is, we are yet unwilling to leave it.—To have our purposes suddenly broken off;—to have no more a portion in any thing that is done under the sun;—to pass at once and for ever from the land of living men;—to be rudely torn from all that we love and value in life;—to lie down in the grave, with the cold earth for our covering, and the unsightly worm for our companion—this is a prospect at which nature shudders. But if we belong to Christ; if we are united to him by faith; if we are relying on his merits, and are conformed to his image; our hearts need not be troubled at the thoughts of death, neither need they be afraid. For as sure as the Gospel is the Word of the living God, there is life and immortality for us beyond the grave;—there awaits us in the presence of our God and Saviour, and in the society of angels and glorified spirits, a fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore. We may have no previous intimation of the approach of death; he may come to us at a time when we think not—he may come to us as a thief in the night. But what then? Jesus, in whom we believe, and whose image we bear, will not suffer our soul to be put to shame, nor our hope to perish. He will stand by us and sustain us in the last awful and agonizing struggle; and, that struggle o'er, he will waft our disembodied spirits to the mansions of our Father's house. Our bodies must indeed go down to the grave, and a long period may pass away before they are recalled from their gloomy abode. But in that abode, gloomy as it is, they are perfectly safe. Christ will keep that which we have committed to him against that day. And when that day dawns—the day which no night shall follow, he will call them forth from their narrow house, that he may conduct them in safety and in triumph to that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

And oh! is it not consolatory to know that death cannot separate for ever between us and the pious and beloved friends whose departure we bewail? Closed, indeed, is the eye which never looked on thee in anger, but the spirit which lighted that eye with sympathy, and joy, and hope, is now rejoicing before the throne of God. Cold is the hand, and stiffened in death, which ministered so readily to thy wants, and supported thee so kindly in thy weakness, but the spirit which prompted it to every tender office is mingling with the spirits of the just made perfect. Silent are the lips whose soothing accents so often quieted thy fears, but the spirit which animated them is singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb. The body is fast crumbling into its kindred dust, but the spirit is flourishing in youth immortal. What but this hope—the hope which is full of immortality—can sustain the afflicted who lie low in grief, and give ease to the heart that is bleeding in the dust? What but the assurance that our departed friends still live, and that we shall live with them, can support us amid the loneliness which their death has produced? It may yield us some comfort to have it in our power to perform to their immortal remains the last sad offices of affection—to close the eyes which had so often looked on us in sympathy and love, and the lips which never uttered the word that could give pain to our heart. We may find some relief in still fondly calling them our own—treasuring in our memories their expression of endearment, and keeping as the apple of our eye the tokens of their regard. It may allay, in some measure, the agony of grief, to rear the monument which records their worth, and to cherish the idea that when we die our dust and theirs shall mingle. But nought can inspire us with resignation under the melancholy bereavement, save the good hope through grace, that we shall see them again—that they have only gone before us to the house of our Father, that, though separated from us, they are now with Christ, which in so far as they are concerned, is far better, and that while their spirits have winged their way to the Paradise above, their bodies rest in their graves, in the sure and certain hope of a resurrection to life. Yes, this does reconcile us to our loss; this does impart a healing balm to the wounded spirit. For we shall see them again, and our hearts shall rejoice. We shall meet them, and we shall know them among the unnumbered multitude who surround the throne on high. And oh! the joy, the unutterable joy of that blessed moment, when, as they hold us to their pure and enraptured bosoms, we shall hear them exclaim, "We part no more—death has no more dominion over us. The inhabitants of this country never say that they are sick. In the city of our God no mourners are seen going about the streets. The days of our mourning are ended. Sorrow and sighing have fled for ever away."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

A new Heaven and a new Earth.—The huge sauroid fish was succeeded by the equally huge reptile,—the reptile by the bird,—the bird by the marsupial quadruped. And at length, after races higher in the scale of instinct had taken precedence in succession, the one of the other, the sagacious elephant appeared, as the lord of that latest creation which immediately preceded our own. How natural does the thought seem which suggested itself to the profound mind of Cuvier, when indulging in a similar review! Has the last scene in the series arisen, or has Deity expended his infinitude of resource, and reached the ultimate stage of progression at which perfection can arrive? The philosopher hesitated, and then decided in the negative, for he was too intimately acquainted with the works of the Omnipotent Creator to think of limiting his power; and he could, therefore, anticipate a coming period, in which man would have to resign his post of honour to some nobler and wiser creature,—the monarch of a better and happier world. How well it is to be permitted to indulge in the expansion of Cuvier's thought without sharing in the melancholy of Cuvier's feeling; to be enabled to look forward to the coming of a new heaven and a new earth, not in terror, but in hope; to be encouraged to believe in the system of unending progression, but to entertain no fear of the degradation or deposition of man! The adorable Monarch of the future, with all its unsummed perfection, has already passed into the heavens, flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone, and Enoch and Elias are there with him,—fit representatives of that dominant race, which no other race shall ever supplant or succeed, and to whose onward and upward march the deep echoes of eternity shall never cease to respond. HUGH MILLER.—(The Old Red Sandstone; or New Walks in an Old Field.)

The dealings of God with the believer.—At three remarkable seasons God is pleased to hold communion with his people. First, before affliction, to prepare them for it; as with Jacob, in that memorable night when his angry brother was marching against him; and with Paul, who was bid to be of good cheer, for as he had testified at Jerusalem, so he should at Rome. Again, in the time of affliction, to support them under it; as when Moses was mourning and going heavily under Israel's grievous idolatry, then God spake face to face with him, as a man speaketh unto his friend,—and he made his goodness to pass before him; so Stephen's face, from heart-felt joy, shone like an angel's amidst his foes, and near his death. And, thirdly, after some afflictive dispensations, and mournful providences; so the apostles, after they had been apprehended, examined, and severely threatened, are filled in an eminent manner with the Holy Ghost, while the place of their abode, as a symbol of the divine presence, is remarkably shaken.—MEIKLE. (Solitude Sweetened.) Ninth Edition, just published.

The privileges of the Christian.—How great and honourable is the privilege of a true believer! That he has neither wisdom nor strength in himself is no disadvantage; for he is connected with infinite wisdom and almighty power. Though weak as a worm, his arms are strengthened by the mighty God of Jacob, and all things become possible, yea easy to him, that occur within the compass of his proper duty and calling. The Lord whom he serves, engages to proportion his strength to his day, whether it be a day of service or of suffering; and, though he be fallible and short-sighted, exceeding liable to mistake and imposition, yet while he retains a sense that he is so, and with the simplicity of a child asks counsel and direction of the Lord, he seldom takes a wrong step, at least not in matters of consequence,—and even his inadvertencies are overruled for good. If he forgets his true state, and thinks himself to be something, he presently finds he is indeed nothing; but if he is content to be nothing, and to have nothing, he is sure to find a seasonable and abundant communication of all that he wants. Thus he lives, like Israel in the wilderness, upon mere bounty; but then it is a bounty unchangeable, unwearied, inexhaustible, and all-sufficient.—REV. J. NEWTON.

Draw nigh to God.—There is a drawing near to God in all the exercises of private devotion; every lifting up of the heart, and the expression of inward desire, is an approach to God. The tendency of sin is to alienate the heart, and destroy all desire after him: this is seen in the conduct of the prodigal, who left his father's house, and went into a far country: the tendency of grace is to bring us back, and bring us near. Coming to him is not only expressive of love and confidence, and of the going forth of the soul after God; but it includes the whole of religious worship. Those who worshipped at the altar, are described as "the comers thereunto;" and of believers, in reference to Christ as the foundation, it is said, "To whom coming," as unto a living stone. Our whole life should be a continued coming unto God by him. Duties should closely follow one another, like the successive products of the field, and even our ordinary concerns in life should be so conducted as to bring us nearer to the Lord. The great object of the Christian life is to maintain an habitual spirituality, to be in the fear of the Lord all the day long, as well as when we are in the immediate discharge of holy duties, that so our intercourse with heaven may be uninterrupted.—REV. B. BEDDOME.

THE LIFE OF CYPRIAN,

BISHOP OF CARTHAGE.

PART II.

The general persecution of the Christians during the reign of Decius was followed by that terrible plague in the reign of his successor, Gallus, that ravaged at once both the Eastern and the Western world; and of this heavy calamity the city of Carthage had no inferior share. Such, indeed, was the frightfulness of its ravages, that the Christians imagined that the end of the world was at hand. The houses were soon silent, or only filled with cries of lamentation; the streets were heaped with the bodies of the dead; and instead of burying them, the heathens fled even from the remains of their dearest friends and kindred, and left them to fester where they had thrown them. But in Carthage, as in Alexandria, the superiority of Christian principle was illustrated upon this trying occasion. Cyprian assembled his flock, and explained to them the duties of charity and mercy. It was not now that they were to limit their kindness, and do as others did, by confining it to their own party, but to extend it to heathens, and to publicans,—to overcome evil with good; and imitate the example of Him who causes the sun to rise, and the rain to descend, upon the just and the unjust. His heavenly appeal, delivered to the living in the midst of the dead, was effectual; those who were possessed of substance brought it out, to be distributed among the sufferers; and those who had nothing, cheerfully gave their personal labour, and toiled in the midst of contagion. What a silent but eloquent rebuke to the Gentiles, as well as a refutation of the calumnies they had heaped upon the Christians!—and yet it failed to convince them; for as soon as the pestilence had ceased, they referred it to the anger of the gods, excited by the prevalence of Christianity. This absurd accusation was promptly refuted by Cyprian, in a letter he addressed to Demetrius, the proconsul. He then traced the evil to its undeniable source,—the guilt of the world at large; and above all, to the virulence with which Christians had been persecuted, for no other crime than their love to God, and the purity and uprightness of their lives.

After these events an interval occurred, during which the Church was unvexed by foreign enemies; but while Cyprian improved the opportunity to reform the discipline of the African congregations, which had become more lax than those of Italy, he was also assailed with controversy, the chief of which was connected with infant baptism. Fidus, an African Bishop, had started the doctrine, that as infants were not circumcised under the Mosaic economy until the eighth day, therefore the same rule ought to be followed in the Christian Church, instead of baptizing them upon the third or fourth, as was frequently done. A Synod of sixty-six bishops was convoked upon this subject; and it was decided, through the representations of Cyprian, that it was unnecessary to defer so long the grace and mercy of God towards any, and much less those who were newly born into the world. Another debate afterwards occurred upon the propriety of administering baptism anew to those who had been baptized by heretics; a question that was agitated with great keenness both in the Asiatic and African Churches. In the Synod which was held by Cyprian upon this occasion, the necessity of rebaptism was approved of. But Stephen, Bishop of Rome, so bitterly resented the exertions of Cyprian upon this question, that he hurled at him the titles of "false Christ, pseudo-apostle, deceitful worker," and such other epithets—reproaches which, as the Bishop of Carthage knew nothing of an infallible popedom, produced, we may believe, no influence upon his sentiments. In fact, Cyprian turned sharply upon him of Rome, and charged him with injustice, indiscretion, impertinence, and peevish childlikeness, thereby showing that he did not even dream of the strange claims which were afterwards set up by the successors of the Apostle Peter. The same procedure against the Bishop of Rome was adopted by Firmilian, Bishop of Cesarea, who charged Stephen with reading the Church of Christ asunder by an audacious, insolent, and malignant spirit, which he had manifested in the expression of his hostility to their decrees. It is painful to be compelled to advert to the phraseology of good and holy men thus opposed to each other in matters of faith and discipline; but we merely allude to it in this place, to show, that the utmost equality still prevailed among the bishops of the Christian Church, and that the Papal assumptions of superiority had their origin in a later, and more corrupted period.

A change was now at hand in the external history of the Church. Valerian, the successor of Gallus, had cherished the Christians for three years with a degree of kindness which they had experienced from no former emperor; but after that period his sentiments were changed by his favourite Macrianus, a man given to magical studies, who was wont to murder children and new-born infants, that he might discover futurity in their entrails. This wretched juggler represented the Christians as an impious race who destroyed, by their spells, the prosperity of the emperor; and in an evil hour the latter listened to his suggestions. The consequence of this was, a persecution more relentless than even that of Decius, which commenced A. D. 257, and continued during the rest of Valerian's administration. At the commencement, Cyprian was summoned by Aspasius Paternus, the proconsul of Africa, to appear before him; and on his attendance, he was informed, that letters had been received from the emperor, commanding all who were of a foreign religion to worship according to the Roman rites. The proconsul now desired to be told what the bishop meant to do upon this occasion. "I am a Christian, and a bishop," replied Cyprian boldly; "and I acknowledge no other gods but one who made heaven and earth, and all that is therein. This is He whom we Christians serve, to whom we pray day and night for ourselves and for all men, and to whom we address ourselves for the happiness and prosperity of the emperor." "If you persevere in this disposition," cried the proconsul, "you will die the death of a malefactor." Cyprian answered, "That is a good disposition which fears God, and therefore it ought not to be changed." "It is the will of our Prince then," said Paternus, "that for the present you shall be exiled." "He is no exile," returned the bishop, "who has God in his heart, for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." "But before you go," said the proconsul, "inform me where are your Presbyters; they are said to be in this city." Cyprian here reminded the magistrate of the edicts of former emperors against those who betrayed or impeached the Christians, and added, "They ought not, therefore, to be discovered by me; and even yourselves do not approve of men who offer themselves voluntarily to you." Paternus threatened that he would extort the discovery by tortures; but the bishop declared, that torture would have no effect. The proconsul did not dare to proceed to extremities; it might be, that the high character of Cyprian for charity and benevolence, even among the idolaters, would have made an act of severity impolitic; he therefore contented himself with banishing the bishop to Carubis, a little town about fifty miles distant, situated by the sea, and opposite the island of Sicily. Here the place was pleasant, the air healthy, and his entertainment kind and courteous; and he was cheered by the frequent intercourse of Christians, who had free access to his society.

While Cyprian thus dwelt in security at Carubis, the persecution was heavy not only upon his own flock, but the African Church; and tidings were brought to him of the merciless orders of Valerian, which were, that bishops, presbyters, and deacons, should be forthwith put to death; that senators, and persons of distinction, should forfeit their rank and property, and, on persisting in Christianity, be beheaded; and, that matrons, after having their goods confiscated, should be driven into exile. He also understood that these harsh mandates were as harshly executed; and as there was reason to fear that he would be involved in the general ruin, several Christians of rank urged him to withdraw into concealment, and offered him a comfortable asylum. But the venerable bishop, according to the narrative of Pontius, had been forewarned by a dream that farther flight was useless, and that his martyrdom was about to be consummated. The particulars of this vision are the following:—As he was retiring to rest, there appeared to him a young man of gigantic stature, who seemed to lead him to the tribunal, and present him to the proconsul, at that time seated on the bench. The proconsul began to write busily in a book, and the young man, looking over his shoulder, watched every word; but not daring to speak, he secretly made a sign to Cyprian, by extending one of his palms, and making a stroke across it with the other hand—a silent intimation of a violent death. The history of the age abounds with such premonitions, but shall we, who live in seasons of peace and security, be justified in coldly rejecting them as delusions? At all events, Cyprian, who himself related this dream, believed that it was a warning of his approaching end, and he therefore prepared himself to meet it. At last, indeed, when he heard that the officers of justice were coming to carry him to Utica, he yielded to the importunity of his friends, and left Carubis; but it was only from his desire to suffer at Carthage, rather than any other place; for he was anxious that his people, who had enjoyed the labours of his life, should also be instructed by the example of his death. This he announced to them, in the last pastoral letter which he was permitted to address them; and this wish was soon gratified. Having concealed himself only until the new proconsul should arrive at Carthage, that event no sooner happened, than Cyprian returned to the city, and in spite of the earnest remonstrances of his friends, who urged him to retire, he took up his abode in his own garden, and calmly waited the event. He was apprehended by two officers who had arrived for the purpose; and, putting him in a chariot, and guarding him on either side, they conveyed him to Sextus, a small village about six miles from Carthage, to which the proconsul had retired on account of indisposition. This magistrate ordered that Cyprian should be carried back to the city for trial on the following day, which was done; and the tidings were soon spread abroad among the Christians that their bishop was in prison, and, on this account, great multitudes of the brethren, as well as many of the pagans, to whom he was endeared by his virtues, repaired to the spot, and watched during the whole night in the street. On the morning of the following day, Cyprian was conducted to the proconsular palace; and the magistrate having not yet come out, he was led aside to a retired place, until all should be in readiness for the trial. As the distance from the prison to the palace was considerable, the bishop, who was now old and infirm, was weary and covered with perspiration, upon which an officer, who had been formerly a Christian, came to him, and offered him fresh clothes. But Cyprian only answered, "Why should we cure complaints and sorrows that can last only for a day?" At length Galerius Maximus, the proconsul, ascended the judgment-seat, and the trial commenced. He demanded of the prisoner if his name was Thascius Cyprian? to which the latter assented. "Thascius Cyprian," said the proconsul, "who hast been bishop and father to men of an atheistic spirit, the sacred emperor commands thee to offer sacrifice. Be well advised, and do not throw away thy life." To this the prisoner boldly replied, "I am Cyprian, I am a Christian, and I cannot sacrifice to idols. Do thou as you are commanded. As for me, in so just a cause there is no need of hesitation." The proconsul was in great wrath at this decisive reply, and began to heap upon his victim all those charges which were common against Christian ministers at large. "You have been a long time," he said, "of this sacrilegious disposition; you have seduced multitudes into this infamous compact, and shown yourself an enemy to the gods and religion of Rome; you have proved yourself one whom the pious and religious emperors could never reduce to the observance of their sacred rites. Since, therefore, you are found to be the author and ringleader of so atrocious a crime, you shall be made an example to those whom you have seduced into your guilt, that order and obedience may be established in your blood." He then pronounced sentence in the following words:—"I will that Thascius Cyprian be beheaded." To this the martyr joyfully exclaimed:—"I heartily give thanks to Almighty God, who is thus pleased to release me from the chains of the body!" He was led away for execution environed by a troop of soldiers, while a multitude of the Christians fearlessly followed, many of them exclaiming, "Let us die with our holy bishop!" The procession, weeping and lamenting all the way, arrived at the place of execution, which was a field surrounded with trees, the branches of which were clustered with spectators, anxious to witness the event. Cyprian, on his arrival, began to strip himself; and first taking off his cloak, he folded it and laid it at his feet, and then, kneeling down, he commended his soul to God. He afterwards took off his inner garment, and remained standing in his shirt; and when the executioner approached, he ordered a gratuity of twenty-five small pieces of gold to be given to him. All being in readiness, Cyprian covered his eyes with his own hand, and received the fatal stroke, while his blood was caught, as a memorial, upon the linen cloths and napkins which the Christians had spread before him. They buried his body in the ground not far off; but at midnight, from fear of the Pagans, they returned with torches, and removed the martyr's remains, which they reinterred with due solemnity in the cemetery of Macrolus Candidus, the procurator. This important act of martyrdom occurred on the 14th of September A. D. 258.

The character of this truly Christian and apostolic bishop stands out in bold relief from the ecclesiastical history of the third century. Although his career commenced at a late period in life, yet he reached the goal, and obtained the crown; and notwithstanding the short period during which he held the episcopal office, his labours were abundant, not only in his own sphere, but throughout the Christian world, as is attested by his numerous epistles, and the synods at which he presided. In examining his intellectual character, through his numerous writings that have reached us, we find nothing of that philosophising spirit which so much distinguishes, and at the same time disfigures, the works of his cotemporaries. He was an eloquent orator, rather than a philosopher; and the clearness of his ideas, as well as the elegance of his style, were eminently fitted either to instruct or persuade. His private virtues, as they were evidenced in his life, were of a nature well fitted to recommend the faith in which they grew and flourished; so that he seems to have been a general favourite, beloved both by Christian and Pagan. In his public capacity, we have already noticed the modesty with which he shunned the office of a bishop, as well as the zeal and fidelity with which he discharged its duties, when he was constrained to accept it, and the discretion with which he avoided every extreme in his demeanour, and blended the courtesies and elegances of a refined life, with the purity and simplicity of the Christian character. So fondly was the remembrance of his worth cherished in Carthage, that two churches were erected as memorials of him, one of which was upon the place of his martyrdom, and the other upon the spot where his ashes reposed. But his most lasting monument is to be found in the records of the Christian Church at large, where his labours and worth are recorded in characters that shall never perish.

PASTORAL ADDRESS TO THE CONGREGATIONS IN THE TOWN OF ARBROATH ON THE OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN AND FRIENDS,—It is with unfeigned and heart-felt sorrow we have learned, in the course of our official inquiries, that the sin of Sabbath-breaking is on the increase in the town of Arbroath; and we entreat you to suffer from us, whom God hath appointed to watch over your souls, the word of exhortation, which we desire to speak in sincerity and in love. All our observation leads us to believe that the way in which the Sabbath is observed affords a correct idea of the state of vital religion; and when we learn that the desecration of that holy day is increasing, we cannot doubt, however humiliating and painful the conclusion may be, that there is amongst you a decay of godliness, whereof this sin is at once the indication and the result. Need we remind you, brethren, of the solemn injunction, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy?" We do not suppose you ignorant of such a plain and oft-repeated commandment of God, nor would we willingly believe you prepared openly to deny your obligation to keep it. It is the only one of the Ten Commandments, which God gave us as an everlasting rule of duty, which expressly sets forth its former claims to obedience. The children of Israel were not taught it for the first time from the mount; they were familiar with its obligations, and even then only instructed to remember it. And if you are acquainted, in any measure, with the history of God's dealings with his ancient people, whether as contained in the narrative of the events that befell them, or as expressed in the language of prophecy, you cannot have failed to perceive that the favour of God, or his righteous judgments, were especially and emphatically manifested according to the measure of their obedience to this commandment. But it is incumbent on you to remember that, in the history of the children of Israel, God has presented us with a pattern or type of the method of his dealing with any people. You are, therefore, taught to believe that, as in his Church of old, God visited the transgression of this commandment with his special displeasure, he will act in the same way with the Gentile Churches, if they fall into the same transgression.

We fear that, while generally the truth is admitted, that there is an incumbent obligation upon you to remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy, the heart, which is so cunning in its devices to reconcile a sense of duty with the actual disregard of it, has suggested in regard to this commandment, certain doubts, both as to the nature and extent of the obedience which it claims, and certain excuses for what you may regard as minor violations of its sanctity.

Our Church, in the Shorter Catechism, has given a very plain and scriptural statement of the extent of meaning embodied in the words, "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." The Catechism declares, that "the Sabbath is to be sanctified by a holy resting all that day, even from such worldly employments and recreations as are lawful on other days, and spending the whole time in the public and private exercises of God's worship, except so much as is to be taken up in the works of necessity and mercy." And with this agree the yet more searching words of the prophet,— "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day: and call the Sabbath a Delight; the holy of the Lord, Honourable: and shalt honour him; not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." You will observe, from this declaration of God's Word, what it is that you are enjoined to do on the Sabbath. You are not only to refrain from your ordinary employments, but from your worldly pleasures. You are required not only to rest, but to have your minds and hearts occupied and engrossed with those things which belong to your everlasting peace. Your hands are to be bound up from worldly labour—your tongue from worldly conversation—your hearts from earthly desires—your thoughts from earthly reflections. The obedience which the commandment claims, is the obedience of the whole soul. And were this obligation but felt and recognised by you, we would have no fear of your neglecting the public worship of God, the more private exercises of the family, the reading of the Word, and of those books which have been written to set forth and enforce the truths of the Word; for your minds would rejoice to lay hold of all these helps to holy contemplation, and the occupancy of the soul with heavenly affections. Make the experiment, if you will, but for one hour to sustain your soul at that pitch of elevation, in which, with all its faculties, it shall be absorbed with divine and heavenly musings, and you will find how abortive the effort is, and how necessary to employ with diligence and constancy those helps to devotional sentiment which public and private worship, and the reading of holy books, so abundantly furnish.

It is not possible, within the compass of our brief Address, to direct your attention to all the forms of Sabbath desecration which have been forced upon our notice. Suffer us to speak to you of two manifestations of the evil of which we complain, and which we earnestly desire to remedy. In the first place, we have learned with deep sorrow, that the holy rest of the Sabbath is broken to an alarming extent by the young who are under parental care. We exhort parents to keep their children under their own eye on the Sabbath. The criminal records of our country furnish very abundant and most melancholy proof of the frequency with which the desecration of the Sabbath, in youth, has led to the perpetration of the most heinous crimes in maturer years—crimes which had to be expiated by death, or banishment, or the lingering confinement of a prison. Such facts as these speak as with a living voice, and with greater power than any language we can employ, to the strongest instincts of a parent's heart. What parent could contemplate, without agony, the probability of his children perishing by the hand of the executioner, or being branded with infamy as criminals? Such a probability may not be near enough its realization to affect you with a proper sense of the danger to which Sabbath-breaking exposes your children. But there is one outstanding and undeniable truth to which these confessions of criminals point. It is this, that the sin of breaking the Sabbath is the never-failing and fruitful parent of other sins—that it leads on, as if by some dire necessity, to the commission of iniquities, which may terminate in ignominious punishment here, which is certain to issue in manifold miseries in this life, and, if unrepented of, endless woe in the life that is to come. We counsel parents to look at the actual and visible condition of the wicked even on earth, and ask themselves if they would not wish to save their children from a like condition? We solemnly believe they cannot do it, if they suffer their children to be Sabbath-breakers. Keep your children, then, beside you on Sabbath. Do not send them to the streets or to the fields for amusement. Take them with you to church. Be careful in instructing them at home. Send them, for farther instruction, to a Sabbath-school. Remember your accountability for them—your engagements, on their behalf, to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord: It may require much judgment and care to prevent your children from feeling the Sabbath to be a weariness. It is your duty, so far as possible, to prevent this. Vary the employment of your children. By having them with you at church, much of the day will be profitably spent. Habit will soon make their attendance at the sanctuary not only easy, but delightful. Give them some lesson to learn at home. Let it be easy, that they may scarcely, if at all, feel it a burden. Is their time not sufficiently occupied with this? You can employ them for a short time in reading. You can speak to them of God's wonderful providences. The Bible is full of subjects in which children may be made to feel an interest. You can tell them of the flood—of the destruction of Sodom—of God's judgments upon the wicked. You can tell them of Joseph—of Moses—of the holy Patriarchs—of God's mercies. You can excite their sympathies, above all, with the wonderful story of Christ's self-sacrificing love. Make the experiment; persevere in it. The reward is worth the labour. Do not draw your children to perdition, by the neglect of the holy lessons you have bound yourselves to intillcate.

Bear with us while we reason with you on another form of Sabbath desecration. We have learned that it is a common practice with many to spend some part of the Sabbath in walking excursions. The ordinary justification of this practice consists in some such pleading as this: that the hard working man, who is shut up in a mill or at his loom during the week, feels it necessary, for the preservation of his health, to betake himself to the fields on the Sabbath, that he may inhale the pure and fresh air, and recruit his exhausted strength, and that there is really nothing sinful in such a practice. Now, in the first place, we pray you to bring this apology to the test of observation and experience. We do not believe that nearly all the labouring classes of Arbroath take these Sabbath-day walks; you have therefore the opportunity of observing whether your apology be a sufficient one; you have but to notice whether there be any marked difference, in regard to the enjoyment of health, between those who take their weekly Sabbath walk and those who do not. We are not apprehensive as to the result of such an experiment. We are thoroughly persuaded, that the man who strictly keeps the Sabbath, who does not go beyond his own threshold on that day, save to attend the house of prayer, will be found in the enjoyment of as good health as he who makes it a weekly practice to take his short pleasure excursion. But we entreat you to observe for yourselves, and to abide by the result. Secondly, From all the information we have been able to gather from those best acquainted with the modes of preserving the health, we conclude that the Sabbath-day's excursion is that which is least of all likely to be attended with beneficial results. On that day you are freed from your daily and exhausting labour, and you breathe in your own homes a less tainted atmosphere. On other days you may be constrained to breathe the heated and noxious air of a mill, filled with a thousand ingredients deleterious to health; or you may, from morning to night, be bent over your loom, breathing an atmosphere almost equally polluted. It is when the injury is received that the remedy should be applied, and we are confident we speak the truth when we say, that were you, day by day, to spend an hour in walking, and breathing the free, pure air of heaven, you would labour with more vigour during the remaining hours, and at the end of the week you would have larger increase from your toil, and the excuse for Sabbath-day walks would be effectually and forever removed. It is surely worth while to make such an experiment. Will you try its effects? Thirdly, While we admit that there is nothing essentially sinful in walking abroad on Sabbath, and that the mind may, during such short excursions, be most profitably occupied with the contemplation of the wonderful works of the Lord, we would at the same time suggest, for your earnest consideration, a rule of duty which is repeatedly laid down in the New Testament. The apostle says, "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient." Now, even though it may be lawful for you to take your Sabbath walk, we are sure that it is in a high degree inexpedient. You cannot be ignorant of the shameful abuses attendant on this practice of Sabbath walking, how it is converted by many into an occasion of rioting, and excess, and wantonness, in so much that the most noxious vices which pervade society, among us, may be regarded as originating in this source. Now, if the apostle Paul, with his usual vehemence, declared that he would eat no meat while the world lasted, rather than present a stumbling-block to others, we put it to those who bear the name of Jesus, whether they ought not, for the sake of others, to form and set upon a like determined resolution in regard to Sabbath walking? It is not enough to be able to say that you do not yourselves break the Sabbath in these excursions, if thereby you cause others to offend who may not be so able to resist temptation as you are. "Whoso shall cause one of these little ones to offend that believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." Such a consideration as this ought to bear with especial force upon those belonging to the middle and upper classes of society, who have no such excuses to plead as the hard working artisan, and who are bound, by their very position in society, to present an example of all that is holy and good. We entreat all belonging to these classes, who indulge in Sabbath excursions, solemnly to consider the responsibility which lies upon them, and we put it to them, with all earnestness, whether they will dare longer to incur the hazard of causing others to offend, and thus be the means of bringing upon themselves swift destruction? We are persuaded that if the members of the Church were to set their faces as a flint against this practice, and leave the avowedly godless to indulge in it alone, the iniquity would soon be ashamed, and hide its head. And if such a result be even probable, we put it to you, whether, in all fairness, you are not chargeable with the guilt of directly promoting and encouraging the many sins to which Sabbath-breaking leads? We have learned, with deep sorrow, that there is likely to be presented to you a new temptation to Sabbath-breaking, by the opening of the Dundee and Arbroath railway, for the conveyance of the mail on the Lord's Day;* and we think it dutiful to warn you against availing yourselves of this new method of taking your Sabbath excursions. We have no doubt at all that the conveyance of the mail on Sabbath is a heinous sin, for which no plea of necessity can be urged; and we have just as little hesitation in declaring our solemn belief, that, by availing yourselves of the opportunity of its transference to take an excursion on the Sabbath, you become largely and directly partakers in the guilt. It is possible, were it not because of the evils to which it leads, that without sin you might take your Sabbath walk, but you cannot avail yourselves of such a mode of conveyance without, by your very act, declaring that you regard the commandment of God as a thing of nought, when it stands in the way of your own pleasure and convenience. You countenance, encourage, and sanction the monstrous traffic which the Sabbath mail originates, and become as guilty as those who order, and those who carry it. Fourthly, We fear that, in the consideration of those causes which affect the bodily health, too exclusive attention has been paid to those which are purely physical. It is quite true that a man cannot constantly breathe a tainted atmosphere, and enjoy good health, any more than he can preserve his bodily strength without an adequate supply of food; but it is just as true, on the other hand, that in the midst of all external means and appliances for the preservation of health, in the purest atmosphere, in the most salubrious climate, in temperance, and the enjoyment of healthful exercise, there are internal troubles which gnaw the vitals, waste the frame, and induce premature age and death. You may have read of the fearful ravages which passions of various kinds have almost immediately wrought upon the frame,—of the wasting effects of a settled purpose of revenge,—of sudden bursts of anger,—of extravagant joy,—of grey hairs induced in a single day, by the bitter anguish of grief. These are but the extreme and most marked effects of causes which are as constantly and powerfully working upon the bodily frame as any physical cause of which we have any knowledge. We speak of what must have come under your observation repeatedly. Mark the instructions which a physician gives for the treatment of a patient under wasting fever, or acute disease of any kind, and you will perceive that his chief confidence is placed in the feeble sufferer being kept easy in mind, free from irritation, and in perfect quiescence. Now, we are bold to say, that the man who keeps God's commandments, "who walks not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," is in possession of a more infallible specific for the preservation of health than can be elsewhere furnished; for he has that "great peace" which God has promised to those who love his law. His soul dwells at ease; and just as he who, in the solitary dungeon, awaits the day when the dread sentence of the law will be executed upon him, differs, in the healthful condition of his body, from him who, with unfettered limbs and buoyant heart, exults in the free air of heaven; so does the sinner, under the curse of the law, and the "fearful looking for of judgment,"—under the tossings of manifold unregulated passions,—differ in his bodily health from him who "knows in whom he has believed," and that there is no condemnation to them who believe in Jesus—who "possesses his soul in patience," and is unmoved by the storms which sweep over the earth,—the "anchor of whose soul entereth into that which is within the veil." It is refreshing and healthful to walk abroad on the green earth,—to gratify the eye with the varied forms of beauty and grandeur which it presents,—to have the ear filled with the harmony of its music, whether from the rustling breeze, the voice of birds, or the solemn sound of the ocean; but it is more healthful still to know the Sabbath as a "time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord,"—to have the heart attuned to heavenly music, and the eye of faith gratified with the contemplation of heavenly glories, and the hidden man of the heart strengthened with the bread of life.

* Happily, the Dundee and Arbroath Railway Company, at their annual meeting, held a few weeks after this Address was issued, adopted a resolution expressive of disapprobation of the opening of their railway on the Sabbath; and resolved to make application to the Post-Office authorities for exemption from carrying the mail on that day.

A SABBATH IN PARIS.

From the Record Newspaper we extract the following melancholy description of a Sabbath in Paris:—

Among the numberless and wide differences, so easy to point out, between French and English habits and customs, those relating to the Sabbath are certainly the most striking. I need not state what occurs on that day with you, as you know this better than myself; but here is a faithful sketch (and not a caricature) of a Sunday in Paris, Lyons, and, it may be said, in almost every town of France, and if in all particulars not exactly the same, the same spirit and feeling prevails everywhere.

The whole week preparations are made for the Sunday in the following manner:—Some get up a pleasure party for the theatre or ball in winter, or for an excursion into the country in summer; the more wise (according to the wisdom of the world), set aside the day to do some particular thing; for instance, the shop-keeper sells and buys on week-days, and devotes the Sunday to arrange his accounts; in a word, any thing not required to be done day by day, is reserved for the Sunday; such as concluding a bargain of importance, or to execute a work requiring particular care, putting the shop or warehouse to rights, repairing machines, &c. &c. Consequently, to some the Sunday brings with it so much to do, that it is not a day to be desired by them, as, for instance, the tailors, shoemakers, and all persons who supply articles of dress and ornament, are fully occupied on the Sunday morning to supply the things ordered during the week for the Sunday evening's entertainments. It is superfluous to state, that there are many of the working classes who reverse the order of working during the week, to rest on the Sabbath, but work on the Sabbath, and rest during the week. This is the case also with many theatres, shows, coffee-houses, &c.

I do not say that the Sunday is looked upon in public opinion as an ordinary day, a day of work; on the contrary, it is considered, above all, as a day of worldly feasting and enjoyment, and you may, therefore, suppose that to be working industriously on a Sunday is thought very praiseworthy; and I have often met manufacturers, men otherwise very respectable, who have observed to me, "I keep my people at work on the Sunday, to allow them to have more time in the week to give themselves up to pleasure." This is the general rule observed here for spending the Sunday, namely, to rise two hours later, to set about what has been reserved to be done on that day, and, owing to its being Sunday, not to hurry one's self, as laziness might then be indulged in, about mid-day to take some refreshment, to make one's toilet and go to the public promenades, places of entertainment, and theatres.

All thoughts of religion are so far from men's minds, that such as, contrary to their will, have neither work to do, or any amusement to go to, are a burden to themselves. This, the two following anecdotes of this week strongly exemplify.

An Englishman, with whom I am well acquainted, was telling a Frenchman that all labour in England was suspended on the Lord's Day. The latter, after a moment's consideration, replied, with much seriousness of manner, "It is all very well, but I am at a loss to understand how the English manage to pass such a long day, as there are no coffee-houses or theatres open." Again, the "Sidcle," this week, gave a long statement of the way the time was spent in a new establishment, intended for the admission of young men who were discharged from imprisonment for minor offences: and after it had shown how pleased they were with their employments, and the manner in which they were conducted, this Journal adds, "The only tedious day for these young men is the Sunday; because the work is then suspended. It is, they unanimously say, the only day they feel weary!"

All this requires no commentary, and I hope the two occurrences I have related are sufficient proof of what I had asserted.

You are perhaps surprised, that hitherto I have not mentioned religious worship among the Sunday occupations, if not of all the French, of some few at least. It is not forgetfulness on my part, but the number is so small that I did not think it needful to speak of it until after all the other subjects. The great majority abstain on that day, as on every other, from any religious act; and the very few who differ, are content, according to the usual expression, to "go and hear a mass." "To hear," is truly the proper word, and not to listen; to hear, and not to understand; to hear, and not to feel; a mass, but not the mass; for it is so arranged that this mass shall not interfere with work or amusement; you can go to it from five to twelve o'clock in the day, as you prefer. But better still: when a party of pleasure is made for a very early hour of the morning, if much concern is felt about the mass, the person so inclined determines on hearing it on the road; say, perhaps, in some village where the dance is to be, or in some hamlet which the sportsmen have fixed on as their place of meeting. Conscience is thus satisfied, for the mass is heard, and soon forgotten in worldly pleasures and amusements.

The idea that it is sinful to work on Sundays, is so removed from a Frenchman's mind, particularly in manufacturing towns, that to bestow praise on any one, the proverbial expression is,—"He is a horse, and works on feast days and Sundays."

THE BELGIAN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

BY THE REV. AENEAS M. RATE.

PART III.

THE former papers respecting Belgium will have shown that since the year 1830 a great door has been thrown wide open, in this benighted country, for the circulation of religious truth, and the proclamation of the Gospel; that Popery has received such a blow as it has not known since the days of the Reformation; and that the most cheering prospects are beginning to unfold themselves to the view of the people of God. It will also prepare us to enter with more interest into the following statement respecting the labours of the Evangelical Society, from its excellent and devoted secretary, Mr Panchaud:—

Station of Genval.—M. Vierne had to encounter very peculiar difficulties in the formation of the station of Genval, a village about twelve miles from Brussels, and three from the field of Waterloo. This station dates from 1837.

Several years before, a friend of the cause had distributed some copies of the Holy Scriptures in the neighbourhood, but no attempt was made to preach there, until Mr Vierne was settled at Genval. At first he had very few hearers, but it was not long before their number increased. The determined hatred of the Roman Catholic priest to the labours of Mr Vierne has made him his active and never-tiring opponent. No stone has been left unturned to oblige him to leave the village. Persons have been forbidden to supply his family with the common necessaries of life; workmen, to work for him; whilst many have been the efforts made to get Mr Vierne out of his house, in part of which Divine worship is celebrated. Higher rent has been offered for it; that failing, attempts were made to purchase it, so as to have the power of compelling him to quit.

In the midst of all this opposition, the Lord has been graciously pleased to enable him to continue his labours, and to give him to see some blessed fruits of the preaching of the Gospel. Two persons, a father and son, have been called to glory; and there are amongst the congregation eighteen others who know the grace of God in truth. Mr Vierne's occupations chiefly consist in visiting and preaching in the houses and fields. His labours extend to seven or eight villages around, in which he frequently holds meetings for prayer and reading of the Scriptures. The number of those who have decidedly come out from the Roman Catholic Church, and regularly follow his services at Genval, amounts to twenty-five persons. Others attend at times, but many have been prevented from attaching themselves to this congregation, from the priest's constantly preaching that Mr Vierne would only be able to continue amongst them for a short time. This has intimidated them, fearing that, should they join Mr Vierne's hearers, their situation would be worse after he left them. Others are prevented by interest, having been frequently threatened with loss of employment, or pecuniary assistance.

A very marked revival has taken place in this station. Between forty and fifty persons attend the meetings in some of the villages Mr Vierne visits; and he himself is much encouraged in his labours.

Station of Taintignies.—The evangelist, Mr Dupont, resides at Taintignies, a village about six miles from Tournay; and in which he has a chapel. The congregation is small, but those amongst them who know the Lord, are persons of piety and zeal. In leaving the Roman Catholic Church, they have embraced the Gospel with their whole heart. The work of Mr Dupont is that of an itinerant missionary; the circles of his labours includes eleven villages. He goes from place to place, and from house to house, preaching the truth in season and out of season. He has thus frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with persons who would not dare to enter a Protestant place of worship. A Sunday school is held at Taintignies, and one at Romay, a village about three miles distant, where there are still some remains of the glorious Reformation. Mr Dupont employs his leisure moments during the week in giving instruction to about twenty children in each place. He has also had to encounter much opposition; but his zeal is great, and he has been more than recompensed by the open door which the Lord has given him.

Station of Mons.—There has been a Protestant service at Mons for many years past. In the time of the Dutch Government, there was a chaplain to the troops in garrison, who regularly preached in Dutch, and the Rev. Mr Devisme in French. The town at that time provided a very fine and spacious building for the place of worship; but since the Revolution this church has been shut up, the authorities refusing to grant the use of it as formerly; consequently, Mr Devisme was obliged to preach in a private room. Living at Dour, about twelve miles distant, and having two other churches to serve, he could only visit Mons about once a month. At his request, an agent of the Society was sent there, and some time after, a place of worship hired. The congregation is not large, and is chiefly composed of Protestants; the Roman Catholics showing very great indifference about the services, and it is with considerable difficulty that any of them can be prevailed on to attend.

The necessity of placing a minister at Mons was plainly shown by the facts revealed to him when he first went there. For want of a resident minister, the Roman Catholic clergy were making rapid progress towards banishing Protestantism from the town. Some Protestants, in order to marry Roman Catholics, abjured their religion; whilst others, who still retained their name, permitted their children to be brought up in the Roman Catholic Church: thus nearly all the children of Roman Catholic mothers and Protestant fathers were educated in the religion of the former. Since the Society's agent was settled at Mons, seven of those children baptized in the Roman Catholic Church have received scriptural instruction. This station has been vacant since June, and the state of the Society's funds, during the last three months, has not encouraged the Committee to replace their agent, who has returned to his native country. Mons is again deprived of a resident minister, and the priests will have the same opportunities as they formerly had of drawing away the Protestants to their Church.

The agent's efforts to preach the Gospel were not confined to Mons; he preached alternately with Mr Maton and Mr Devisme, at Paturages and Labourverie. Nor was this the only field that was open to him. The Holy Scriptures have been abundantly distributed at Charleroy, through which a great inquiry and thirst after religious instruction have arisen in that locality. The inhabitants appear quite tired of the "cunningly devised fables" which have been so long taught them as the religion of Jesus Christ. There are several English iron-smelters in the neighbourhood, and their worship has been often attended by Roman Catholics, who have expressed their great regret at not being able to profit more by the instruction given, understanding but little of the language. Several interesting facts show the benefits which have resulted from the simple reading of the Scriptures, and the very earnest desire of many for a minister who would preach the Gospel to them. Some influential persons at Charleroy offered to procure a suitable place of worship, and also to aid with their purse. It was the intention of the Committee to have connected Mons and Charleroy together in one station, had their funds permitted them to have replaced Mr Kruger.

Station of Labourverie.—The Lord has showered down on this station some of his richest blessings. In the year 1836 the Rev. Mr Devisme first preached at Labourverie, in the house of a Roman Catholic widow, whose son has since devoted himself to the Christian ministry. He is probably the first Belgian that has done so since the Reformation. Before the time referred to, two or three persons used occasionally to attend the church at Paturages, a village about two miles off, where Mr Devisme regularly officiated every Wednesday, and twice every month on Sundays.

Immediately on hearing of Mr Devisme's first visit to Labourverie, a priest called on the widow, and employed every effort to induce her to refuse the room in future. The widow was firm, and replied, that she would rather lend it to Mr Devisme every week than every fortnight!—the period which he had fixed on for his regular visits. Through the abundance of his other labours, Mr Devisme was unable to accomplish his intentions, and he begged of the Committee to place an agent there. At first the minister at Mons undertook to evangelize the village, but the work increased so rapidly, and the opening appeared so important, that the Committee could not help listening to the request which Mr Devisme pressed on them. In November 1837 Mr Maton took up his residence at Labourverie. The number of services were immediately increased to three on the Lord's day, whilst each evening of the week was devoted to prayer-meetings at Labourverie, or in some of the neighbouring villages.

The Roman Catholic clergy, being irritated at the progress which the Gospel made, were very active in their efforts to counteract Mr Maton's labours. In order to stay his work, and to bring back into their fold the sheep drawn away by the heretics, as they called them, a company of Jesuits opened a mission at Paturages, and the surrounding villages. Their language in the pulpit was exceedingly violent against the Protestants; consigning them, and all who joined their worship, to everlasting destruction! The Lord so overruled their efforts to prevent the people from following the preaching of the Gospel, that they were the means of inducing new hearers to attend; and many persons purchased and read the Scriptures, who, before, had never thought of doing so. The cause has continued to gain ground ever since. The actual number of regular hearers is between seventy and eighty, and the chapel becoming too small, has just been enlarged. Mr Devisme and the Society's agent at Mons first administered the Lord's Supper in May 1839. Sixteen persons, who had all renounced the errors of Popery, partook of it. Mr Maton wrote, on that occasion, to the Committee: "Never did I pass,—I will go farther,—never did any Christian pass, a day more richly blessed. Tears fall in abundance. Our little church was full, and a crowd of Protestants and Roman Catholics were obliged to remain outside the door."

In November last, Mr Maton wrote that twelve others desired to be admitted to the Lord's Table.

The priests, as may be expected, throw every possible difficulty in the way, and neglect nothing that is calculated to intimidate persons from attending Mr Maton's services. A short time ago, one of them ordered the village schoolmaster not to receive a single child at the school, whose parents followed Mr Maton's preaching. This was a dreadful blow; the parents could not find time to teach their children themselves, for they are obliged to labour hard for their daily bread, consequently their children were deprived of instruction. Mr Maton repeatedly begged the Committee to open a school, but poverty imperiously obliged them to turn a deaf ear to the demand, although fully persuaded that a school was necessary.

On some friends visiting this country, the case was mentioned to them, and they were so much interested in the affliction of Mr Maton and his congregation, that they immediately undertook to pay the fitting up of a school-room, and its rent, with the salary of a master for one year. A member of the church of Paturages, himself once a Roman Catholic, has given up his usual occupations, for the purpose of devoting himself to this post. The school has been opened about three months, and already the number of scholars amounts to sixty, besides an adult class in the evenings, attended by a dozen persons.

Mr Maton has had "souls for his hire, as seals to his ministry." Several have already passed into glory, and many rejoice with him here, through the same Spirit. It often happens that, at interments, he has the opportunity of preaching Christ to one and two thousand persons; many have been then brought for the first time under the sound of the Gospel, who have afterwards continued regularly to attend the church.

Mr Maton also preaches at Paturages in turn with Mr Devisme. Here the converts have multiplied so fast, and have become so numerous, that after having been obliged by their numbers to change their place of worship three times, each new place becoming in its turn too small, they are now constrained to build another, not being able to find in the village a room sufficiently large. The congregation is composed of the labouring class; yet, walking by faith, they have determined to begin their new church. They set aside every week a portion of their hard-earned pittance to meet the expense of building, and they hope in twelve or eighteen months to be able to consecrate a house to the Lord.

Mr Devisme's labours were, at first, entirely confined to a village called Dour, but now his hearers are to be found in almost every village in the neighbourhood. He has ever been the zealous distributor of the Word of God. That Word has not returned unto Him void, but has accomplished that whereunto its Author has sent it. The little portion of the Gospel leaven has leavened the whole lump, and a more interesting field of labour cannot be found. "It is the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes."

Station of Liege.—Liege is a large manufacturing town, whose inhabitants are amongst the best educated and most liberal of Belgium. In 1838, some Jesuits visited a small village in the vicinity, where a very strong opposition was raised against their preaching.

A Bible colporteur, belonging to the Ghent Bible Society, visited the city, and sold an immense quantity of Scriptures. Ever since that period, there has been, at Liege and the environs, a steady demand for the Word of God, and several thousand copies have been sold.

Some friends, being deeply affected at the state of spiritual darkness which reigned in the town, and thinking the time was opportune for the opening of a place of worship, made an application to the Society for a minister—offering, at the same time, to give £40 towards the fitting up of a chapel. Mr Girod, who had been employed at Mons by the Society, was sent to Liege in June 1838. During the first six months of his labours, he held his services in a private room, and his hearers were confined to a very few persons.

He visited in their houses, those Roman Catholics who could not be prevailed on to attend the services, but who were willing to converse on the great truths of the Bible. After being for some time privately instructed, several declared they were ready to make an open profession of their faith. A room for public worship was then hired, which was soon filled by Roman Catholic hearers; and now, there are about eighty persons who have left the Roman Church to follow regularly the preaching of the Gospel, besides others who attend occasionally.

Mr Girod is enabled to count amongst his congregation many who give evidence of being "born again." In one of his letters he says, "The hand of the Lord is continually on our Church. We have no need now to write over the door, nor to advertise in the papers, 'Place of Worship'—the public become acquainted with us through our enemies. The war they wage against the Word of God does not produce the effects they desire. Our services are more numerous attended than ever; and within the last month we have had so many hearers, that we have been obliged to refuse admittance to several, the room being too small to contain them. This is the case more especially in the evenings. The people surround the door before the hour, and in a few minutes after it is opened the room is filled."

Although this degree of zeal has not lasted, there is a constant, numerous, and attentive congregation. At Christmas 1839, Mr Girod gave the Lord's Supper to twenty persons: the last time they partook of it, there were twenty-eight present at the table. It is pleasing to observe the missionary spirit which prevails amongst the members of this church; it may be truly said of them, "They preach the Word every where." Whatever may be their employment, they have their Testament with them, and boldly confess Christ before their friends and companions. They are the instruments which the Lord often employs to open a door for the introduction of the Gospel. Many of their friends will converse with them, who would fly from Mr Girod; and they have free entrance into houses, which would be carefully and closely shut against a minister. In many instances, where they have embraced the opportunities offered them of speaking on Divine truths, Mr Girod has been enabled to follow up their efforts, and his labours have been blessed in several cases.

Those who have decidedly joined themselves to this interesting congregation, have had to suffer severe persecution. It has followed them in every shape. One has been turned out of his employment; another has been cast off by his nearest relatives; another ill treated; others tempted and way-laid: but, blessed be the Lord, they have remained faithful. The answer of one is, "I would rather be ill and poor with the Gospel, than well and rich without it." Another replies, "Well, if I lose my customers for the sake of the Gospel, the Lord will not forsake me—he will send me others." Another says, "I have more joy now, in seeing the days of public worship arrive, than I had in my youth, in seeing the days of amusement." A person wished to bring a priest to visit one of the converts, for the purpose of inducing her to return to Catholicism: her answer was, "Let him come; I have only one word to say to him, and that is, It is a very deplorable thing that he should have kept me so many years in such ignorance, and it is time, at my age, to begin to know the Lord." Another, being called as a witness on a trial arising out of the persecution they have suffered, drew from his pocket a Testament, and placing it on the table, said to the magistrates, "It is on account of this Book we are persecuted; take it, and see if it contains any thing bad."

Mr Girod adds in one of his letters, "Thank God, the enemies of the Gospel meet with very little success. They appear quite astonished at the firmness my flock manifest, and that they cannot succeed in drawing them from us. Our adversaries say, 'If they are obstinate, it is because they have taken an oath that they will not return to our Church.' This speaks volumes.

Sixth Station.—The foregoing stations are all situated in that part of the country where the French language is spoken. Hitherto, the exertions of the Committee to establish a station in Flanders have been fruitless. The inhabitants of these parts are much more under the influence of the Roman clergy, and instruction is less general, whilst the greatest difficulty exists in finding ministers capable of preaching in Flemish. Holland is the only country that could have furnished them; but the state of political affairs, up to a very recent period, was such, as to prevent one of that nation from engaging in the work. A native of Holland, who, in 1839, had begun to preach in a village called Deynze, was obliged by the local authorities to quit the country. The Committee hope, that the Lord has now sent a minister who can preach in that language, in the person of a Roman Catholic priest. "Brought by different circumstances to study the Holy Scriptures," he says, "I saw my mass and ceremonies, like a heap of sand, fall to the ground; they crumbled into dust." He was recommended to the Committee by the Protestant minister at Antwerp: but wishing to know more of his experience and conversation, they sent him to the Theological College at Geneva, where he studied for about nine months, under the care of Mr Merle d'Aubigny and Mr Laharpe. These professors gave him a most excellent certificate on his leaving the college; and the Committee did not hesitate to make trial of him at Brussels, where he has preached with success for about three months. Had they the means of supporting a Flemish station in that town, it is more than probable he would have remained there. A clergyman of the Church of England, passing through Belgium, was desirous of placing a minister of the Gospel in a town which he named, offering to support him for three years, and to pay all the expenses of establishing a station, if the Committee could find a suitable person. Mr Van Maasyk appearing calculated for the work, a house has been hired, and he has entered on his labours with every prospect of success.

Infant School at Brussels.—The first school which the Society established was at Brussels. Admiral Duff, passing through that town in July 1837, brought the subject under the consideration of some friends, and followed his advice with such generous offers, that it was immediately agreed on to open an infant school, as soon as a mistress should be found. It was not long before a pious young woman presented herself for the situation. She was sent to London, where she studied, at the model school, the most approved method of infant teaching. In the month of August 1838, the school was opened, and was soon filled beyond the most sanguine expectations. The children were delighted with the method of instruction and the motherly kindness of the mistress. They receive a strictly scriptural education, and it is pleasing to hear the answers they give to questions put by those who visit the school. The number of scholars in daily attendance amounts to above eighty. Had the Committee the means of enlarging the school-room, the number would be still greater, above forty children having been refused admittance.

The priests have used their exertions to draw away the children, but they have only succeeded in a very few instances. Some of those taken away through their influence, when put to other schools, have been so unhappy, that the parents have been glad to bring them back again.

Boys' School at Brussels.—A boys' school has also been opened at Brussels; the number of scholars is twenty. Mr Bahler has been obliged to refuse a great many boys, as his school-room is small and the Committee could not incur the expense of enlarging it. As an instance of the desire of parents, and those Roman Catholics, to get their children into the schools, the following may be cited, and which took place not long since. A mother had returned with her child several times, in order to get it admitted; all that could be promised was, that its name should be put down on the books, to be received as vacancies occurred. These answers did not satisfy the father, who is a carpenter, and one day he sent his wife back again with the child, saying, it must be taken into the school, and he would make whatever benches or desks were wanted.

Boys' School at Dour.—A third school is at Dour, and dates from September 1838. It contains fifty children. It has had to contend with great opposition from the priests, who have employed their pulpits for the most violent attack on Mr Derbecque and his instructions. Mr Derbecque waited on the dean, who had particularly distinguished himself, and whose sermons had produced such an effect on the parents, that some would not permit their children to continue at the school.

Mr Derbecque presented him a Testament, saying, it was the foundation of his system of education, and begged him to point out what was wrong in it. The dean not replying to the schoolmaster's remarks in a satisfactory manner, confidence was restored in the minds of the parents, and the school ever since has gradually increased.

Boys' School at Labouverie.—A fourth school is situated at Labouverie. It has been opened only three months, and it is already attended by sixty children, besides a class of adults in the evening.

Only those who have seen the nature of the religious instruction given in Roman Catholic countries, can fully appreciate the value of evangelical schools. The Bible or Testament is never seen within the walls of a Roman Catholic school. If a child should possess either, and bring it with him, the priest immediately takes it away and consigns it to the fire. The young mind, instead of being directed to the truth for the formation of its judgment, is biased by the traditions of men. Being bent in the twig, how can it grow up a straight tree?

Tracts.—The number of stations and evangelists being so limited, the Committee have endeavoured to supply their want by the distribution of tracts,—that being the only means they have of reaching the great mass of the people. At the commencement of their labours, the Committee confined themselves to the distribution made by their agents and friends, but it was soon found that these efforts were not sufficient to penetrate into the heart of the country. In some parts there was neither agent nor friend to be met with, and those localities were left quite destitute of the Gospel. After mature consideration, a hawker, or as he is called, a colporteur of tracts, was engaged, who travels from town to town, from village to village, attends markets and fairs, and calls at the houses on his road. The person engaged is well qualified for his occupation. Formerly belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, he is fully acquainted with its ceremonies, superstitions, and doctrines; and the prejudices existing in the minds of Roman Catholics. Having been brought to a knowledge of those errors, he is enabled to point out the way by which he was led to see them; and he is mostly welcomed in his visits. Through his exertions many thousands of tracts have been introduced into houses, where it would otherwise have been utterly impossible to have preached the truth. On the high road, he addresses travellers on the great concerns of their souls. In houses, he reads, explains and exhorts, whenever he can gain the attention. When he enters an inn to take refreshment, or lodges in private houses, he profits by the circumstance to speak of Christ, and, before retiring to bed, has often opportunities of assembling the inmates around the Word of God, and sometimes of concluding the evening with prayer. His distributions amount to about a thousand copies a month, two-thirds of which he sells. The Committee have every reason to rejoice in this part of their labours, above fifty thousand tracts having been put into circulation. A proof that their work is not in vain, is, that the Roman Catholic clergy have been stirred up to combat the distribution of tracts, by the formation of a Society called "Society for the Propagation of Good Books." What is meant by good books is easily understood.

They give their publications at a very low price, and prepare them for every class of persons; the humble tract and book for the peasant, the more splendid and recherché for the drawing-room.

One of their latest publications is, "Three Sermons against the Reading of the Scriptures," preached in a church at Brussels, by a Jesuit, who from the pulpit called on all those who possessed the Bible sold by the Bible Society, to throw it into the fire. A Protestant minister published, in refutation of these sermons, two tracts, which have destroyed much of the unfavourable impression produced by them, and greatly facilitated the sale of the Scriptures. The Committee, approving of the above tracts, purchased and distributed six hundred copies.

The necessity for increased exertion in the sale of evangelical publications is very great, and the Committee ardently desire to open a shop in Brussels for the sale of religious works. They trust that ere long their wishes will be realized.

(Signed) ED. PANCHAUD, Secretary.

It is painful to relate that the Society, thus blessed of God, has been reduced to such pecuniary difficulties, as to render it probable they may ultimately be under the necessity of withdrawing some of their most devoted and successful agents. "At the end of 1840," says a letter from the secretary, "the Committee required ready money to carry on their labours to pay their minister and schoolmasters. They had none on hand, nor could any one in the Committee advance it; and they felt that, to continue as a Committee, was impossible. They decided that after the 31st of March, the Committee should be dissolved, and an agency appointed, who should endeavour to get friends in England, Holland, or elsewhere, to take on themselves the support of different stations. In several instances they have been successful. On the 31st of March an agency was formed of three members of the old Committee, of which I remained secretary. A general meeting of the agents was then called, on which the greatest unanimity prevailed: the agency was obliged to inform the agents that it was impossible for them to assure them all of their salaries, that one of the agents thought of giving up his post; but all entered into a resolution to join, as in a body, to do the work of evangelists in this benighted land, and to trust in the Lord for the rest. Those whose salaries were secured by the promises of friends, agreed to suffer a deduction in order to supply the wants of those who are not secured, should gifts and subscriptions fail to come in." The account goes on to state, that unless their wants are speedily supplied, some of their evangelists would soon be left without a penny. Thus, an instrument which God has already used for shaking the power of Popery in this idolatrous land, and which, if preserved, promises to be eminently useful in advancing his kingdom, is, for want of the support of Christians in other countries, in imminent danger of falling to the ground.

Contributions for this Society, as well as for the Evangelical Societies of Geneva and France, will be received by the treasurer and secretaries of the Edinburgh Continental Association.

THE NATURE AND ADVANTAGES OF PRIVATE SOCIAL MEETINGS FOR PRAYER:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM HAMILTON, D.D.,

Minister of Strathblane, Dumbartonshire.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."—ZECH. iv. 6.

WHEN this text was uttered, there was a great work to be performed on behalf of the Jewish nation. They were to be delivered from their captivity in Babylon—restored to the land of their fathers—where their city was to be rebuilt, and their temple raised from its ruins.

This work was important. Difficulties intervened to prevent its accomplishment. But the result was certain and infallible. Jehovah had spoken the word; and whatever obstacles might be interposed, he could easily triumph over the most formidable and insurmountable of them all.

The Jews possessed no national resources, and they were provided with no foreign alliances. Their emancipation could not be achieved by might nor by power. But they enjoyed an invisible Benefactor; and his strength was almighty, and his resources inexhaustible.

By introducing the Holy Ghost as the deliverer of the Jews, we are taught to regard the event before us as typical of another deliverance, more wide in its extent, and more lasting in its duration. If nothing but the return of the Jews from Babylon had been contemplated by God, this could have been achieved by the instrumentality of kings and conquerors and would have been ascribed to the agency of his providence. No reference whatever would have been made to the Holy Spirit. By introducing that Divine Agent, we are led to consider the text as referring to Gospel times, and to our own present duties and encouragements.

From the declaration in the text, we are necessarily compelled to remark,—First, That there is an important and difficult work before us. It is more than might and power can perform. Second, The accomplishment of this work is certain and infallible. It shall be secured by the Spirit of the Lord. Third, The means by which his agency is procured.

I. There is a work to be wrought, lying before us.—And what is that work? It is great and momentous. Such as never was undertaken on earth, heard of in heaven, nor witnessed in any province of immensity. The Church of the redeemed is to be built up. Rational immortals are to be delivered from the bondage of Satan—brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God—clothed with the righteousness of Immanuel—converted into the Divine image—and made temples of the Holy Ghost. The empire of darkness and vice is to be overthrown—the nations are to be subdued to the obedience of the faith—the kingdom of God is to be established among men, and the whole earth filled with his glory.

And is this a simple or easy undertaking? If nothing more were required in the conversion of a sinner, than merely to reform his life and polish his deportment—to enlighten his understanding, and form him to habits of benevolence and humanity; though difficult, still this might be a practicable enterprise. By long and laboured reiteration of the doctrines of Christianity, you might succeed in lodging a knowledge of our holy faith in the heads of the most obtuse; and, by patience and perseverance, you might open the hearts of the most hardened to emotions of generosity and kindness.

But when conversion is nothing less than the renovation of our nature—the restoration of the Divine image upon our souls—the surrender of all that we have and are to the glory of God, and the opening of our affections to receive the vast and unbounded fulness of redeeming mercy; the mind may be enlightened, the conduct may be reformed, the garb of profession may be thrown around the exterior, and the munificence of generosity may blaze in the eye of admiring multitudes, when all along the soul is in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. A clear head may consist with a hard heart, and a flaming profession may be employed to conceal the filth and rottenness of a spiritual sepulchre.

You may wash a blackamoor, but that will not change his colour. You may paint a piece of lead white or yellow, but you cannot alter its nature. And you may load a man with erudition, endow him with science, and adorn him with the decorations of legal morality; but, amidst the alterations and improvements he experiences, he is still carnal, and dead in trespasses and sins. In the pulpit, and at the Lord's Table, Judas would have been as much a child of wrath, as when bargaining with the high priests; and, when appearing among the sons of God, Satan was as much a devil as when seated in hell, and associating with his fallen companions. And till the heart be renewed by grace, and the soul made a habitation of God, through the Spirit; amidst all the beauties of virtue, amidst all the discoveries of philosophy, and all the splendours of science, the man is still a child of disobedience, and dead in trespasses and sins.

And is it an easy task to soften the hard heart? to purify the wayward affections? to renovate the depraved nature? You may make the attempt when you please; you may plead, argue, reason, entreat, remonstrate, and beseech; but few will attend to your pleadings and prayers. Few will give audience to your counsels. Few will ponder the meaning of your words. None will abandon their carelessness and carnality. All will practically say, that they have loved idols, and after them they will go. We have for ages had able and laborious ministers, who were labouring and striving to make known the wonders of redeeming mercy, and bring guilty sinners to the enjoyment of the great salvation. But after their most urgent and persevering exertions, they have been compelled to complain, "Lord, who hath believed our report?"

If we address ourselves to the task, in our own strength, we may just as soon raise the dead, or create a world, as turn a single sinner from the error of his ways, and save his soul from death.

The Jews, in Babylon, had no strength to contend with their conquerors. But they had no love to their bondage. They abhorred their slavery; and would gladly have co-operated with any benefactor who rose to give them liberty. But the sinner loves his bondage—glories in his shame—dreads emancipation—and hates his deliverer. But is the state of the sinner desperate? and the conversion of the world impossible?

II. The accomplishment of this work is certain and infallible.—Might and power may fail; but the Spirit of the Lord shall succeed. The condition of the Jews in Babylon was deplorable. The state of the world is dreadful. Sin has obtained the ascendancy. Confusion and misery have followed. The world lies in wickedness. The whole creation groans, and travails in pain. But are we utterly undone? and must we sit down in total despair? The God of heaven is upon our side. He has purposes of mercy in store for our guilty and ruined race. What mean his declarations, "I will put enmity betwixt thee and the woman?"—his saying to Abraham, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed?"—his engagement to his Son, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance?"—his assurance, that all the ends of the earth shall remember, and turn unto the Lord, and the whole world be filled with his glory? What is the plain and obvious meaning of these declarations, but that it is the purpose and determination of the Most High, that in his own time the reign of vice shall be overturned, the god of this world cast out, and the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, given to the people of the saints of the Most High? And is there fickleness with God? Has he said it, and will he not do it?

The Gospel contains ample provision for the conversion and salvation of all. The righteousness of Christ is perfect. His atonement is all-sufficient. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" Crowd your city with agents; fill the empire with ministers; cover the whole earth with heralds of the Cross; let a general interest be excited; and one intense and irresistible desire universally awakened among all the nations of the earth,—when should we be obliged to recal the messengers of mercy, and tell the trembling multitudes that their application is too late? that the efficacy of the sacrifice of Immanuel is exhausted, and the door of salvation is closed for ever? Let me traverse the length and breadth of the earth, and address men of every language and complexion, to each I must say, Jesus is able to save to the uttermost, and his blood cleanseth from all sin.

And what is the amount of the energies of the Holy Ghost? It is by his sacred agency that the blessings of salvation are applied to the sons of men—that the heart of stone is removed, and the heart of flesh implanted. And what is the amount of his might? He is partaker of all the fulness of the Godhead. He is one with the Father and Son, and possessed of all power in heaven and in earth. And, wielding at pleasure the elements of nature, and possessed of all the plenitude of divine power and perfection, is any thing too hard for him? He speaks, and it is done. He has already softened many a heart—cleansed many a soul—converted many a child of disobedience into a child of God, and an heir of heaven. Hereafter he will convert Jews and Gentiles—clear the earth of its pollutions—raise the dead, and bring all the children of Adam to judgment. And, when he has already given such proofs of his converting and transforming power, is it too hard for him now to bless the ordinances of grace; to clothe his word with authority; to break down the barriers of ignorance, superstition, and impiety; and make our wilderness like Eden, and our desert like the garden of the Lord? Are the hearts of men now possessed of greater obstinacy and refractoriness than those of former ages? Are the people of Scotland more alienated from the life and power of godliness than the Jews? or our congregations composed of more stubborn and unyielding materials than those of past generations? And, after the displays of saving power which he gave at Pentecost, on the streets of Jerusalem, and which, from time to time, he has repeated at Ayr, Irvine, Stewarton, Shotts, Kilayth, and Cambuslang, is he now unable to cope with Satan? to set the dry bones a-stirring; to lay hold on the hearts of all our congregations? and pour out his blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it?

In what He has already wrought, we have a specimen of what he is able and willing again to perform. Under his protection and guidance, we may boldly rush into the thickest of the foe, and boldly march on to the conquest of the world. Is the breeze too much for the massy fog? and the rising sun more than a match for the shades of darkness? What opposition, then, can all the hosts of impenitence and impiety array against the power and grace of the Eternal Spirit? Assemble all the murderers of the earth around me, if He speak the word, he can disarm their hostility, change foes into friends, charm every heart, and unite the whole into one holy band of happy, delighted subjects of his power and grace.

III. The means by which his agency is to be secured.—Were the Jews to be delivered, and their temple restored, without their own agency and co-operation? Were the walls of their city to be reared by miracle? or the remains of their tribes transported to Judea in the arms of angels? Without the Divine blessing, their own activity and exertions would have been utterly unavailing, and might have involved them in deeper misery and disgrace. "Without me, ye shall bow under the prisoners, and fall under the slain." Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. And unless the Lord prosper our undertakings, men of the greatest talents and most splendid attainments will be covered with shame, and filled with confusion. Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but without the Divine presence and blessing, they must labour for nought, and in vain.

But with his presence and blessing, the consequences are most sublime and delightful. Logs cannot travel; but fashion them into ships, furnish them with masts, and sails, and seamen, and they will fly before the favouring gale, and gallantly breast the angry billows. And though, in ourselves, the most weak, helpless, and inefficient of all his creatures; when God gives his approbation and blessing, he can infuse into exertions and efforts the most mighty energy and brilliant success. He can make one chase a thousand. He can make the worm Jacob thrash the mountains. Because the increase is from the Lord, does that warrant us to place ourselves in the attitude of indolence and apathy? allow us to fold our arms in ease, and sit down idle on the field of battle? Because God had undertaken the deliverance of the Jews, and the restoration of their city and temple, did that authorise them to neglect the means provided for their enlargement, and abide by their huts in Babylon, till they were transported by miracle to Palestine?

And because the salvation of congregations, and the conversion of the world are to be accomplished, not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord, does this allow us to overlook the means which God has placed in our hands, and under the presumptuous pretext of honouring his sovereignty, warrant us to neglect our duty? The more certain we are of his approbation and blessing, the greater encouragement we have to exert our energies; and the more we are assured of his readiness to crown our labours with success, the more imperatively are we required to put forth effort, and strain every nerve in his service. Though we possessed the might of angels, and the power of seraphim, the wealth of worlds, and the resources of creation, they could never be so honourably, so profitably, so gloriously employed as in his cause.

It is when this might and this power is exerted, that the Lord makes bare his own arm, and comes for our salvation. It is when the tithe is brought into his store-house, that he opens the windows of heaven, and pours out his blessing, that there is not room enough to receive it. It is when we have improved what we have, that more is given. It is when we have done justice to our advantages, and faithfully cultivated and exerted our privileges, that the Spirit of all grace goes beyond the reach of outward means, and appears in his own majesty and grandeur, and delights and astonishes us with the manifestations of his converting and saving grace. It was Paul who most painfully felt his own insufficiency, who abounded in labours more than all his brethren, and whose ministrations enjoyed the most signal success. They were our reformers and covenanters who were most indefatigable in the work of the Lord, whom their Master honoured with most extensively advancing his cause, and working the greatest deliverances in the earth.

And to the present hour, the most copious effusion of the Spirit is imparted, and the most glorious efforts of his energy are displayed, when we are most sedulous in the discharge of our duty, and put forth the most strenuous exertion of our might and power.

We must lay every rational means under requisition. We must maintain personal piety, family religion, educate the young, preach the Gospel, and ply our brethren with every measure calculated to rouse their attention, and lead them to serious and earnest preparation to meet the Lord. But above all, we must persist in fervent persevering prayer, and especially, in social prayer.

SONNETS ON SABBATH EVE.

By Mrs JANE C. SIMPSON.

I.

THE week's last day of motley toil is o'er—
The anxious term of business, care, and pain;
And now the gold clouds wait round evening's door,
Which shuts in summer's radiant peace again!
Ah me! how much of passion, folly, pride,
Of sin in every measure, form, and hue,
Have mingled in the world's tumultuous tide
Since last the bliss of Sabbath hours we knew!
How many idle words our lips have spoken,
(Perchance of causeless wrath to friends most dear),
How oft in thought and deed have all been broken
Those laws of love we say our souls revere!—
Another leaf for us this week hath given
Of condemnation in the Book of Heaven.

II.

But while six days and nights of evil flow
Thus o'er the wayward children of the sod,
What countless showers of blessings ever new Fall round our path from a long-suffering God!
Each morning's dawn, each evening's dewy close,
Found mercy's cup still flowing to the brim;
A Father's care still watchful even for those Who never raised one suppliant thought to Him
Man's sin—God's love—now in the mirror seen
Not of this week alone, but months and years,
So dark and multiplied the first hath been,
More wondrous far and bright the last appears!
Yet not till time is o'er, our souls shall know
How deep is human guilt—how rich God's grace below.

III.

The Sabbath comes!—upon its threshold now,
Even as on holy ground, our footsteps wait;
A few short hours, and thousand lips shall vow
Divine allegiance in the sacred gate;

And say, then, shall another week but find
Our hearts and lives yet cleaving to the dust,
Grasping earth's phantoms empty as the wind,
Still strangers to Heaven's high and holy trust?
On! let us pause, and weigh in solemn thought
Tho' near the appointed term of mortal rest,
How distant are these souls with sin o'er-fraught,
From that eternal rest that wraps the blest—
Thus ere again the hallowed day hath sped
God may His arm upraise and snatch us from the dead!

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Great and precious promises.—Let the promises of the most High produce in our minds the effect for which they were intended; the effect of encouraging and exciting us to a holy energy in his cause, and to a soldierly perseverance in our spiritual warfare, but let us recollect, in this our struggle, that the arms with which we fight, are not our own; that our most acceptable services are clogged with sin, and our firmest allegiance tainted with defection; and that in our seeming strength, as well as in our greatest weakness, our reliance can there only be grounded, whither the natural fears and gracious aspirations alike mount up for refuge, the cross of that victorious Saviour who hath tamed the strength of sin, and made the gate of death the entrance to immortality!—BISHOP HEBER.

Remember the rock whence ye have been hewn.—The saints in heaven, whose salvation is perfected, and beyond the reach of injury, look back on the sinfulness in which they were involved, but from which they were mercifully rescued, and employ the recollection of it to inflame the gratitude which animates their bosoms, and pours from their lips, as they sing, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood." And if the gratitude of the saints in heaven is kept alive, and increased by the remembrance of that redemption which they experienced here below, as well as by the communication of that felicity which they participate above, surely it becomes the saints upon earth to be mindful of the change which their spiritual circumstances have undergone—to compare their present comforts and safety with their past disquietudes and danger—to meditate on the guilt, the pollution, the fears, the distresses, the ruin from which they have been emancipated, no less than upon the rich consolations which they enjoy, and the precious hopes with which they are inspired; so that by the contrast they may be led to set a higher value on the salvation of the Gospel, have a stronger sense of the obligation to him who is the author of it, and sing with a warmer heart, and in a higher strain, the song of thanksgiving and praise, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever."—REV. DR THOMSON.

The way to get true riches.—Men generally wish to be rich. But what is the surest way of having such a wish gratified? Diligence is necessary, but not to be depended on; for without the blessing of the Lord on our labours, we may rise early, and sit late, and oppress our bodies with it, and our minds with anxious care, and after all continue in want; but the blessing of the Lord is that which alone makes a man rich. If it should not enrich him that enjoys it with gold, it will enrich him with what is far more precious—wisdom and grace. This blessing confers riches, and preserves them, without exposing to harassing cares, their natural and common attendants. When riches bring with them vexations and fears, we would be better without them.

Who would choose to lie on a golden bed with thorns spread under him, and thorns for his covering? But the blessing of the Lord is a hedge about all that a righteous man hath. His labours are pleasant, his gains safe. His portion is beyond the reach of danger, and his heart is preserved from vexation, in getting, or keeping, or using, or loving the world, because the Lord is his confidence.—REV. DR LAWSON.

Our elder brother in the heavens.—The fraternal relation between Christ and believers, implies a new alliance. The Saviour is related to his people as children of the same family, by assuming our nature, and appearing in the likeness of sinful flesh. This was indeed the commencement of his relation to them; he became their elder brother when he stepped down into the same nature, although infinitely distant from the dignity of his person as the eternal Son. In this act he gave the most admirable display of his love, wisdom, and grace, as the adoring confession of the apostle clearly proves. "And, without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh." It imparts unspeakable comfort to the people of God, that, "as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same;" the same human nature, though not in the same way, nor encumbered with the same infirmities as in every individual of his people. His sacred body was disfigured by no deformity, infested by no distemper, disabled by no pain, agitated by no unruly passion or affection; for he took not on him the person of any, but the nature common to all. But he did not take our nature, considered absolutely in itself, but as liable to sorrow and death; for as the younger brethren of God's family were subject to death, in common with the rest of Adam's fallen race, so he submitted to death, that he might destroy the works of the devil, and save them out of all distresses. He entered into as intimate an alliance with his brethren, as consisted with the infinite dignity of his person; he became our kinsman, to whom the right of redemption might belong; for he was bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, yet "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners."—REV. G. PAXTON.

Warnings.—Be careful to suppress every sin in the first motion. Dash Babylon's children, whilst they are young, against the stones. Tread betimes the cockatrice's egg, lest it break out into a serpent. Let sin be to thy heart a stranger, not a home-dweller. Take heed of falling oft into the same sin, lest the custom of sinning take away the conscience of sin. Suffer not thy mind to feed itself upon any imagination, which is either impossible for thee to do, or unprofitable if it be done; but rather think of the world's vanity, to condemn it; of death, to expect it; of judgment, to avoid it; of hell, to escape it; and of heaven, to desire it. Labour daily more and more to see thine own misery through unbelief, self-love, and wilful breaches of God's laws; and the necessity of God's mercy through the merits of Christ's passion; to be such that if thou wert demanded, What is the vilest creature upon earth? thy conscience may answer, "mine own self by reason of my great sins;" and if on the other hand thou wert asked, What thou esteemest the most precious thing in the world? thy heart might answer, "One drop of Christ's blood to wash away my sins."—BAYLY. (Practice of Piety.)

The believer's view of death.—To encounter death the faithful are prepared, both by their knowledge and experience. "They know in whom they have believed, and that he is able to keep that which they have committed unto him." They know that their Redeemer is the mighty God, and that part of the everlasting covenant between the Father and him insures their victory over the grave; for it is written, "Thy dead men shall live; with my dead body shall they arise." "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." These wonderful things of God's law being certified to them by the Holy Ghost, become the object of their admiration, the foundation of lively hope, and their richest treasure. Hence death grows familiar to their minds, as a translation to enjoy spiritual life in perfection, in the presence of their beloved, the sweetness of which they have imperfectly known already. Answers to their prayers, and a change of state in passing from darkness to light, from death to life, in their conversion, alters the visage of death, and its nature too. Instead of seizing upon them, to root them out of the earth, and pluck them out of their dwelling, it comes to exalt them to glory, and honour, and immortality.—REV. H. VENN.

Christ died.—The incarnation, and sufferings, and death of the Son of God, presents a series of events so astonishing, that imagination is baffled, and wonder itself is exhausted. Strange incident indeed, to be witnessed on earth and in heaven, that the Son of God is dead! Surely if at any time the seraphim of glory have paused on the wing, and the celestial harps been mute, it must have been when the Creator suffered death by the hands of his creatures—when the Prince of life yielded up the ghost—when the Lord of glory was committed to the tomb. This was humiliation indeed! Well might the earth tremble to its centre, when its upholder uttered his dying groan; and well might the sun be withdrawn into obscurity, when the incarnate God closed his eyes in the darkness of death! Be astonished, O heavens, and confounded, O earth! The eternal Son of the Most High takes not hold of the nature of angels, but of the seed of Abraham, is conceived and born of a woman, lives in a state of poverty and meanness, and closes his career on the accursed tree. True it is, surely, that Jesus was made lower than the angels.—REV. A. FISHER.

TWO CONVERTED ISRAELITES.

[The following Correspondence between Mr Moses Margoliouth, a baptized Hebrew in Liverpool, preparing for orders in the Church of England, and Mr Goldinger, a learned Jew of Warsaw, lately converted to the Christian faith, we gladly insert, as likely to interest our readers.]

Liverpool, 2d March 1840.

May the Prince of Peace send abundant peace and good will to my dearly beloved friend, Tobias Goldinger. May he be a shining light!

MY DEAR FRIEND,—There are not sufficient words in my tongue to declare the great joy I felt, when I saw in the Society's (for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews) monthly Intelligence, that thou wast brought under the wings of Jesus Christ, the giver of life to every living creature. I rejoiced, and was exceedingly glad in my heart, seeing God's infinite mercies towards us, that he did not bring down our strength into hell on account of unbelief. Wonderful and high are the ways of the Lord, as heaven is high above the earth. Would to God that these words were engraved upon our hearts as with a pen of iron. Oh, joy! oh, joy! Who would—I would—be able to see thee? Oh, would to God that I may be able to see thee! Oh, would to God that I may! Oh, that I had wings like a dove! for then I would fly to Warsaw, and there we would solace ourselves with the love of God in Christ, even over the sure mercies of David, in the everlasting covenant he made with us. Oh, how good and how pleasant it would be for brethren in Christ to live together! Though deprived of seeing thee personally, and of telling thee orally as much as I am able, still I determined not to suffer our acquaintance to be extinguished; therefore, with the works of my fingers I will bring before thy eyes the fruit of my mind, and from the deepest sincerity of my heart I lift up my hand to write to thee what I conceived in my meditation, when considering the greatness of the glory of God, that he removed the veil from our eyes, and brought us unto the way of life. But, woe is to me! when I remember the state of our brethren the children of Israel, who are scattered among the Gentiles in the four corners of the earth, and are still profaning the name of Jesus Christ, who shed his blood like water for all our sins, and they turned their necks to his Gospel, I would use the words of the prophet, "Woe, unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!" Isa. v. 20. How can we endure to see the evil that shall come unto our people, or how can we endure to see the destruction of our kindred? Alas, alas! Oh, who would give mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might cry day and night, without ceasing, for the calamity of the daughter of my people! Alas, the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers! Their pastors teach them to reject the Son of God. But Gentiles, who were "afar off," lift up now their hands to them, saying, "What man is he that desireth life," prepare thyself to meet thy God Jesus Christ, and he will open thine eyes. They do not grudge wealth and riches, "to send ambassadors by the sea," to gather the outcasts of Israel, who wander about forsaken. Alas! alas! would to God they considered and understood this, my beloved brother. "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest." I expect to hear these words from thee, as well. Oh! let us not rest, until the Lord, through his mercy, should destroy their rest, in order that they may find rest to their souls in Christ Jesus; and answer their prayers, which they pray every Saturday, "that redemption should draw nigh unto their souls, through the Son of Jesse the Bethlehemite;" and also, "that they may rejoice through the Man, the Son of Pharez." Hear me, I pray thee, though I am younger than thou, receive my exhortation;—preach the Gospel to our nation, wherever thou meetest them, without ceasing; and pray to the Father of all mercies, that he should be pleased to raise thee up some assistance to aid thee. O Lord! raise up from among the people of Israel themselves preachers of Jesus Christ. As for myself, I am thankful to the Lord, that he gave me his grace, to proclaim the righteousness of Jesus among many of the children of Israel; and pray that the Lord may strengthen us to continue to do so. I trust that speedily "they will look upon Him whom they have pierced," and they will acknowledge that he is their God. They have waited for Him: then they will know and understand that their leaders spoke falsely to them,—"they will say, with their prophet Jeremiah, that even their "great men have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds;" (v. 5); they have not kept his vineyard,—instead of grapes, they brought forth wild grapes. As the famous Hebrew poem describes them,—

These fools, their heart is turned away with folly;
They despise it, because they find no use in it;
They satisfy themselves they know, whilst they know not.
As a bat, walking about in darkness,
Smitten with blindness, and cannot look up to the sun,
Despises the light, to hide it from their eyes,
These are men who found no rest in multitudes of books:
Gathering precepts here and there, they spared not strength,—
They laboured to find their purpose with a great deal of trouble and fatigue;
But by the land-mark they stumbled, they turned back;
They wandered like a traveller not knowing the right way,
And as a staggering drunkard they reel to and fro.

O Lord, strengthen us to devote all our abilities to announce to them the Word of life while it is yet day, for "the night cometh, and no man can work;" and may he also strengthen us under trials. Oh! may we be able to say, with our brother Saul, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God;" and them, "Who will separate us from the love of Christ?" May the God of peace multiply peace and grace unto thee as long as thou shalt live upon this earth, is the sincere prayer of thy truly loving brother,

MOSES MARGOLLOUTH.

Warsaw, 23d April 1841.

To the beloved of my soul, son of my native town, who is pleasant to me; tender father,* a divider of the law, Moses Margolouth is his honourable name: may he be a shining light.

Thank God, life and peace are present with me. My dear friend, behold my answer to thy letter, with which thou hast honoured me on the 2d of March 1840. A thousand thanks to thee my beloved friend, that thou hast inquired after me by thy letter, for thou hast caused me exceeding great joy, especially upon my perceiving in it two important things. First, Thy great zeal for our Christian religion; and, second, That thou art continuing to love our brethren the house of Jacob, and thy delight is in preaching to them the good things of salvation: Alas! my beloved friend, how assuredly as thy heart and soul cries for them, so does mine. Alas, my flesh pains upon me, and my soul mourns within me also, when I remember that our brethren the house of Israel walk still in darkness. Woe, the Hebrews are like blind men groping at noonday; they have forsaken the fountain of the living water; and they have digged to themselves broken cisterns, viz., their teachers and pastors, as the words of the prophet are, "Many pastors have destroyed my vineyard, they have trodden my portion under foot; they have made my pleasant portion a desolate wilderness." Jer. xii. 10. Therefore my dear friend, if we have known the redeeming love of our God, which he has bountifully bestowed upon us; and if we have received the grace of our Redeemer the Lord Christ, let us hold fast this great salvation with integrity of heart. "Giving no offence in any thing that the ministry be not blamed, but in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses." * * * * "As poor, yet making many rich, as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." 2 Cor. vi. 3-10. See, my dear friend, the prayer in the form of a hymn, I composed in the German language, and thus let us pray with our whole heart :—

Consider my affliction, God, have mercy
And redeem me,
According to the greatness
Of thy paternal love.
Let me, Lord, by thy fatherly grace,
Find mercy :
For the sins
Blot out, FATHER, my guilt.
Wash me, Lord, from my leprosy
Then my sins
Are no more
Wash me continually more and more.
O, that thy Son (not the rod),
With His sacred blood,
Cleanse me
From stains that cover me.
Cast me, O my God, cast me not from thee :
Behold my crying :
Take not thy
HOLY SPIRIT from me.
Let sinners take my example—
Learn to forsake
Their ways,
And return back again to Thee.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with us all for ever. Amen.

I remain thy faithful friend, until my return to the dust.
T. W. GOLDING.

P. S.—I salute in the peace of God all believing brethren in the Lord Jesus Christ, and love Him, and praise His great name.

THE WALDENSES OF PIEDMONT,
BEFORE THE PERIOD OF THE REFORMATION.
PART I.

To the students of ecclesiastical history, few subjects are involved in such darkness and perplexity as the history of the Waldenses. The Church of Rome, that wrote the chronicles of the middle ages, was too deeply interested in the matter to have it otherwise; and, therefore, the origin, the creed, and the characters of this truly interesting race of early Christians have been so grievously misrepresented, that, if we were to receive the accounts of Papal writers, the Waldenses would appear a mere people of yesterday—a sect or heretics, corrupt in faith and perverse in practice; whom the earth had loathed, as well as the Church had extirpated. These accusations also were continued so loudly and so long, and asserted with such effrontery, that historians of a later day received them without question, and lent the sanction of their authority to so base a delusion. But, happily for the Church of God at large, as well as the bright example of a people of whom the world was not worthy, the voice of truth was at the same time lifted up, and, although it was but a "still, small voice," it pierced through the universal clamour, and reached the ears of posterity. The simple statements of the people themselves, as well as the calamities of their persecutors, have survived, and from these we learn the nature of their character and creed. And, if even these should be objected to, there is ample testimony, from Papal writers themselves, to show that the Waldenses are neither heretical in faith, nor flagitious in practice; but, on the contrary, a people who held fast by the Word of God, and endeavoured to conform their lives to the pure injunctions of the Gospel.

It will be necessary to specify a few of these misrepresentations, in order to understand more thoroughly the history of this calumniated people. What, then, was the origin of the Waldenses? It has ever been the interest of the Church of Rome to represent the principles of the Reformation as mere modern innovations, that they may the more triumphantly ask the Protestant, "Where was your Church before the days of Luther?" On this account, they assert that the Waldenses can be traced no farther back than the days of Peter Waldo, who flourished in the middle of the twelfth century; and that from him they derived their title, by which they are known in history. But the terms Waldenses, Vallenses, and Vaudois, are merely territorial appellations, meaning "inhabitants of the valley," applied to those who dwell in the valleys within the confines of Piedmont; as they were called in the south of France, Albigenses, from having their chief residence in that kingdom at Albi. Upon the same principle, they were sometimes called Lombards, Picards, Bulgarians, or Bohemians, according to the countries in which they resided. Frequently, too, they were named after their most distinguished teachers; and thus they have been successively termed Lollards, Josephites, Arnoldists, Berengarians, Henricians, and other such appellations. Sometimes a title was given them from their mode of life: and in this way they were called Fraticelli, from their brotherly affection for each other; Paterenians, from their frequent sufferings; and Passagenes, from their being driven from place to place by persecution. But these appellations were too harmless for the malignity of those who hated the Waldenses, and others were invented for the purpose of bringing them into general hatred and contempt. In Dauphiny, they were called Chaingards; and those who had passed beyond the Alps were called Tramontanes, a word equivalent to barbarians. They kept no day holy but the Sabbath; and, on this account, they were sometimes called Insabathas, as if they observed no Sabbath at all. In Germany, they were branded with the title of Gazares, meaning a people execrably wicked; and in Flanders, Turtpins, because their dwelling was with the wolves. In addition to these opprobrious names, charges were brought against them of the same foul character with which the heathens had been wont to asperse the primitive Christians. It was alleged, for instance, that the Waldenses practised a promiscuous intercourse of the sexes at their religious meetings, and laughed at the sanctions of marriage; that they were the enemies of all religious and civil order; and that to the abominations of the Adamites they added the heresies of the Gnostics, the Manicheans, or the Arians, just as malice or spleen might suggest the accusation. The answer which Jean Paul Perrin wrote to these charges, and addressed to Ladislaus, King of Hungary and Bohemia, exhibits, with the purity of the Waldensian creed, a singular picture of the malice and mistakes of its impugnors. We there find, that because they were unwilling to have their children baptized by Romish pastors, they were supposed to be enemies of baptism; because they forbade profane swearing in common discourse, they were said to be hostile to lawful oaths. Their rejection of the doctrine of the real presence in the eucharist, was stigmatized as a denial of the divinity of the Son of God; and their denial of the Pope's supremacy over all temporal princes, made them the branded as Manichees, who believed in an equal rule of two powers—the one of Evil, the other of Good. One other charge we shall only specify, out of fourteen, because it was a serious accusation in those days, although now it can scarcely be announced without a smile. It was, that the Waldenses were not only heretics, but sorcerers; and that those who retired from Lyons to the Alps became “besom-riders”—that is, persons who rode post through the air upon a broomstick. The simple Waldenses, with a strength of common sense that was far in advance of their age, and with a soundness of argument which their enemies were unable to gainsay, repelled this odious and absurd accusation. “How,” they said, “can a man revere the first commandment, and yet believe in the figments of astrology and the power of the planets? How can a Christian believe in the marvels of sorcerers, and thus attribute to the devil those powers that belong only to God?” All enchantment, spell, and conjuration, whether by word or by writing, they boldly declared to be nothing but delusions, and delusions of Satan to accomplish the perversion of souls.

The valleys of Piedmont seem to have been expressly fitted as a place of shelter for the ark of God, during those periods when all Europe resounded with war and national annihilation. Christianity was driven from churches and palaces by the onswEEP of the northern in vaders, or it lingered only to be perverted and debased. But amidst these tranquil recesses, which were as yet too humble and secluded to tempt the approach of the spoiler, a primitive race of men had dwelt, who had continued to worship God in simplicity, notwithstanding the prevalent deterioration. It has been asserted, indeed, that the Gospel had been maintained there in a state of comparative purity since the apostolic ages; and this testimony is borne out by the oldest of the Romish historians who has written of their sufferings, although, as might be expected, he terms their creed a pestilent heresy. In the several Papal Synods and Inquisitorial Courts, also, in which it was condemned, it is generally spoken of in bitter terms, as having been of long continuance—as being the earliest of all existing heresies—as having existed even so early as the fourth century, and stretched its ramifications into almost every country. The first notice, however, which we have of the Waldenses as a regular class of religionists, is from the history of Claude, Bishop of Turin. This eminent individual, who has been frequently honoured, and justly honoured, by historians with the title of the “First Protestant Reformer,” was a native of Spain, and in his youth was appointed one of the chaplains of Louis the Meek, King of France. This sovereign, anxious for the instruction of the Piedmontese, among whom the errors of image-worship had made fatal progress, constituted Claude, Bishop of Turin, in the year 817. As soon as the good man entered upon his pastoral charge, he commenced his labours with apostolic zeal and success, and, we are happy to add, with apostolic purity. His beginning was against the obnoxious images and pictures with which the churches were filled, and to which the people were wont to render idolatrous homage. It was in vain that they endeavoured to save these their favourite toys, by the sophisms which the Church of Rome has been so accustomed to urge in their behalf. They alleged, that they by no means believed in a divine power inherent in these images—that they only revered them in honour of the holy personages whom they were designed to represent. But the bishop sternly told them that if, after quitting the worship of devils, they still honoured the images of the saints, they had not yet quitted idolatry, but only changed the names of the objects. “Whether,” he added, “you paint upon a wall the effigies of Peter, or Paul, or those of Jupiter, Saturn, or Mercury, they are now neither gods, nor apostles, nor men; the name is altered, but the error remains. If men must be worshipped, the absurdity would be less in worshipping them while living, and when they are the image of God, rather than after they are dead, when they only resemble stocks and stones.” After these unanswerable arguments, he proceeded forthwith to destroy the obnoxious emblems. With the same ardour, also, he proceeded against relics, crosses, pilgrimages, and other trumpery, which had now accumulated to such an extent as almost wholly to shut out the light of heaven. The monks became wellnigh frantic at the destruction of their beloved idols, and reviled him as a heretic and blasphemer; and, in many cases, the common people were so incensed against their bishop, that his life was repeatedly menaced; but in spite of their hostility, his career was prosperous, and his end was in peace.

In studying the life of this early Reformer, and pastor of the Waldenses, we know not whether most to admire the intrepidity of his labours or the purity of his doctrines. It was not enough that he merely lopped off the excrescences of that upas-tree which was throwing its branches abroad, and dropping death among the nations; but he laid the axe to the root, by denying boldly the usurped supremacy of Rome, and asserting Jesus Christ to be the only Head of the Church: In the same spirit, he contraverted the authority of tradition, asserting the completeness of the revealed Word of God as the only rule of faith and practice. The worth of human observances in accomplishing our salvation, and upon which the Church of Rome erected such a vast superstructure, he boldly and constantly impugned; and endeavoured to teach, both in his sermons and writings, the great doctrine of justification by faith, as the apostle Paul had taught it. These important truths, that seemed so greatly to startle the ears of the sixteenth century, as innovations hitherto unheard of, were distinctly, impressively, and effectively announced by Claude, Bishop of Piedmont, in the ninth. For at least twenty years his ministry was continued among the secluded valleys of Piedmont; and its fruits are to be found in the multitudes that were converted to the faith, the Churches that were planted and organized, and the firmness with which the Waldenses adhered to the truths he had taught, amid the depression of universal darkness, and centuries of oppression and bloodshed.

THE MOUNTAINS OF GILEAD.

BY THE REV. J. A. WYLIE,

Dollor, Clackmannanshire.

THE following extract is taken from a very interesting work which has recently appeared from the pen of our respected correspondent, entitled, "The Modern Judea, Ammon, Moab, and Edom, compared with Ancient Prophecy."*

The range of Hermon terminates about three hours and a half (eleven miles) north of the Hieromax: about the same distance south of that river begins the range of Gilead. Rising on the southern border of Manasseh, the hills of this range traverse the ancient territory of the tribe of Gad, and terminate about six miles south of the river Jabbok. Their length, in a straight line, may be estimated at about twenty-five miles. Jacob, on his return from Padanaram, traversed these mountains; on their summit he was overtaken by his uncle Laban, who had pursued him with a hostile intention, but being forbidden of God in a dream, he refrained from doing him injury. The parties, on their meeting, entered into a friendly compact, and a heap of stones was raised on the summit of the hill in token of the transaction: and from that day the mountains were termed Galeed or Gilead—the mountains of the heap. Till the beginning of the present century, the territory of Gilead, and indeed the eastern possessions of Israel generally, were an "unknown land:" no one had crossed the Jordan, for the purpose of exploring the country lying beyond it, which, up to the time we have indicated, was generally believed to be a desert, and as such represented in our maps; judge then of the surprise of the traveller when, on entering this region for the first time, he found its fertile soil, and rich prospects, not surpassed, and scarcely equalled, by the finest parts of Samaria and Galilee. Around it is thrown a rampart of barren mountains, but these once passed, scenes of extraordinary beauty and grandeur disclose themselves to the eye, resembling rather what we might expect to meet in a long inhabited and highly cultivated country, than in this neglected land. As we shall not again return to the east of the Jordan, at least till we come to survey the fallen cities of Ammon and Moab, we shall be more minute and lengthened in our descriptions of this part of the country, than might seem to be necessary, for the mere purpose of illustrating the hills of Gilead. We are also to bear in mind, that the region of which we speak is beyond the limits of the Land of Promise, strictly considered, and that here, we are not to look for so evident traces of the curse, as in the country west of the Jordan, against which it was more emphatically denounced.

We had arrived on the level plains of Bashan, near the commencement of the Gilead range; let us now reverse the order in which we were proceeding, and supposing ourselves transported to a point on the Jordan, nearly as far south as Jericho, let us there begin our journey, and examine the country in our progress northwards. Leaving the Jordan then, and directing our course to the northeast, we begin our ascent over the hills which bound in that direction the plain of Jericho; having reached their top, we descend on the other side, by a rugged track which leads down into a deep glen. Traversing this glen, we again begin to ascend; a winding path leads us to the summit of a second and third range of barren mountains, and scarcely have we passed them, when we find ourselves on a level plain, not much inferior in height to the mountains themselves, and certainly eight hundred feet above the level of the Jordan. Here we are all at once surprised by the new character which the country assumes. "We are now in a land of extraordinary richness, abounding with the most beautiful prospects, clothed with thick forests, varied with verdant slopes, and possessing extensive plains of a fine red soil; now covered with thistles as the best proof of its fertility, and yielding in nothing to the celebrated plains of Zebulon and Esdraelon in Galilee and Samaria.

Still continuing our course, in a north-east direction, the fertile and beautiful aspect of the country not only continues but improves; the hills around are clothed with wild olives, oaks, and pine trees, while the little dells, which are amply furnished with water and pasturage, often contain an encampment of Arabs with their flocks. "The path," says Lindsay, "wound through thickets of the most luxuriant growth, and of every shade of verdure, frequently overshadowing the road, and diffusing a delicious coolness, though a delightful fresh breeze so allayed the heat that it was never oppressive; while the cooing of wood-pigeons, the calling of partridges—magnificent birds as large as pheasants,—the incessant hum of insects, and hiss of grasshoppers singing in the trees as happy as kings, after breakfasting on the dews of Mount Gilead—and the thought that gave zest to it all, that this was Mount Gilead, made up a full cup of enjoyment."

Pursuing our way through scenery of this description, we arrive at length on the banks of the Nahr-el-Zerka, the Jabbok of the Scriptures. On this very stream, Jacob and his company halted, nearly four thousand years ago, on their journey from Padanaram; and here the patriarch received the alarming intelligence of the approach of his brother Esau with four hundred men. Making such arrangements as the time admitted of, he sent his company over the brook; "and Jacob was left alone, and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day." We are now on the scene of this singular conflict, and anxious to learn the appearance, at this day, of so memorable a spot. The stream flows through a deep ravine, of wild and romantic beauty; in some places it looks as if a violent convulsion of nature had rent the mountain to afford a passage for the waters: the height of the cliffs is not less than five hundred feet, while the space between them is not greater than a hundred yards. The banks of the stream are so thickly wooded with oleander, and plane trees, wild olives, almonds, and tall waving reeds, that the water cannot be seen by looking down upon it from the cliff, though the murmur of its flow is distinctly heard, echoing through its long narrow channel. Winding paths lead down to the bottom, the cliffs in all parts too steep to allow the traveller to go directly down. "The river where we crossed it," says Buckingham, "was not more than ten yards wide; but it was deeper than the Jordan, and nearly as rapid; so that we had some difficulty in fording it. As it ran in a rocky bed its waters were clear, and we found their taste agreeable."

Crossing the Jabbok, we leave the country of the Amorites, of which this river formed the northern boundary, and enter the lands of Ogg, king of Bashan. The hills here are higher than those of the south of Zerkah; and the views with which the country abounds are equal in beauty and superior in grandeur to those through which we have already passed. Every winding of the path brings under the eye the most magnificent landscapes, lofty mountains, wooded slopes, well-watered meadows, while flocks and herds give animation to the picture. The fellahs (Arab husbandmen) who live in this part of Gilead cultivate some of the lands, and fields covered with corn now begin to make their appearance. Among the woods the oak is frequently met with, a circumstance that reminds us, that we are now approaching a region which of old was not less celebrated for its oaks than Lebanon was for its cedars. Going forward still in a north-east direction, the broken arches and tall columns of Gerasa rise before us; but we cannot stop at present to examine this site of departed splendour: we shall return to it when we come to speak of the cities of Israel. Leaving Gerasa, we pass on to examine the country to the north of it. The soil continues fertile, and the aspect of the landscape still as favourable: a few hours brings us to the village of Soof: and a little beyond it we enter a forest of oaks, which continues for four or five miles, when the country becomes clear of wood, and scenes of a park-like character open before us. Traversing this open region, the beautifully wooded country again returns—the remains, no doubt, of those forests of oak for which this region was once so celebrated. "It was forest scenery of the noblest character," says Lord Lindsay, "next to that of Old England, with which none that I ever saw can stand comparison." As we advance the wood gradually grows thinner, and we again emerge on an open country, covered with a fine green turf, lying neglected at present, but bearing marks of having been cultivated in former times, seeing the ancient enclosures of its fields are still visible. In this neighbourhood, too, we meet with the ruins of numerous towns. It is evident that many ages of barbarism and neglect have passed over the country, since the cities which once flourished on these sites fell into decay, for the ground they occupied is now covered with wood. The gloom and silence of the forest rest above the spot which, in ages long gone by, was the dwelling of gay and busy multitudes; and the traveller is made aware that he is on the site of a ruined city, by the large hewn blocks which peep up through the soil, the broken pottery strewed over its surface, and the fountains generally found in the neighbourhood. The broken pottery, always seen on such sites, is the first indication the traveller meets with that he is in the neighbourhood of some ancient ruin; these relics of the domestic utensils of the former inhabitants, point to times when a much higher civilisation, and a far greater degree of domestic refinement and comfort prevailed in these countries than any thing of the kind which is to be found there at this day. No similar vessels are used by the present inhabitants. The few modern villages which exist in Gilead are placed generally on the sites of the former cities. Their population is chiefly Mahomedan, with a few Christian families belonging to the Greek Church, as ignorant and superstitious as the Moslems themselves. The ground around is occupied with corn-fields and olive-yards, the signs of modern cultivation; while the memorials of past magnificence are seen in the wells of Roman construction, broken shafts of pillars, sarcophagi, holes hewn in the rocks for the reception of the dead, and other vestiges which time has spared. These remarks apply chiefly to the district of Adjeloon. It is now impossible to ascertain the exact limits of the land of Gilead; but there can be no doubt that the district we have named lay within these limits, one nearly in the centre of the country, and formed one of the most fertile and beautiful parts of the whole land.

Going forward from the point we have already indicated, and still keeping a northerly direction, the aspect of the country rapidly changes for the worse: the hills assume a bare and desolate appearance, the soil grows thinner, few patches are cultivated, or are fit for cultivation, and the dreariness of the prospect increases, till at last the hills sink into the plain. We may now consider ourselves as beyond the limits of the ancient Gilead, and again arrived on the low pasture grounds of Bashan—the broad plain we have already indicated, lying between the Hermon and the Gilead range, and existing in the country, though not in the maps.

This plain is less fertile than the hilly region we have just traversed. We are surprised to find it so, seeing it enjoyed in ancient times the character of a rich pastoral country. Its greater sterility at this moment is owing, perhaps, to the want of wood and water, in the absence of all cultivation. In Gilead there is almost no cultivation, it is true, but the mountains produce numerous streams, which irrigate the soil, and thus the hilly slopes and valleys are covered with a luxuriance of wild herbage, to which, together with its woods, all the beauty and richness of the prospect are owing; but there is nothing of this kind in the level plain on which we have now arrived: no mountain streams to produce a natural irrigation in the absence of man, and hence the aspect of greater barrenness. This plain appears to have comprised the ancient districts of Argob and Bashan: the former of which was, no doubt, situated on the north of the Jarmonk (Hieromax), and the latter on the south of that river, extending a short way, it is probable, into the hilly region adjoining. The whole of these countries, north of the river Arnon to mount Hermon, were conquered and taken possession of by Israel before they crossed the Jordan. "Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle; and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle," they came to Moses, and the princes of the congregation, and requested that a possession might be assigned to them in the rich pastures-lands on the east of the Jordan; their wish was granted: and here, amidst the hills of Gilead, and the fertile plains on the north and south of it, the two tribes and a half were located. In ancient times this part of the country appears to have nourished a race of men of gigantic stature; speaking of its conquest, Moses says, "Only Ogg, king of Bashan, remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bed-stead was a bed-stead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man:" and again, "all the region of Argob, with all Bashan, which was called the land of giants." When the Israelites conquered it, they found the country covered with numerous and strong towns: the district of Argob contained not fewer than three score cities, with "high walls," and "brazen gates," besides "unwalled towns a great many." The multitude of ruins with which it is covered at this day, shows that it was once thickly peopled, and continued to be so at an age long posterior to that of the conquest: and the mention which the Scripture makes of the bulls of Bashan proves, likewise, that it long retained its eminence as a rich pastoral country. The few spots under cultivation at present yield twenty-five times the seed sown. The whole plain, between the eastern shore of Tiberias and the termination of the Djebel-el-Heish, which Burckhardt considers as strictly the Argob of Scripture, is lying at this moment "uncultivated, and overgrown with a wild herb called khob, which camels and cows feed upon." A statement agreeing with the character which the Scriptures assign to it. Up to the hills we have just named (the El Heish), the soil of the plain is black; beyond this point it begins to be of the same red colour as the Hauran earth: here crops of wheat and barley are often seen. The following account is given by Elliot of this plain, who traversed the whole of it on his way from Damascus to the lake of Tiberias. "Pursuing our course through Jedoor, by some supposed to have been the country of the Gadarenes, the long chain of Bashan bounded our view on the south, till we reached Nowa, the ancient Neve. This, like Sanamein and several other towns and villages on the road, is a heap of ruins. Population seems to have decreased from thousands to hundreds, and from hundreds to decades: what were once cities of considerable magnitude are now wretched villages, and large towns have not a single tenant to perpetuate the memory of their name." "From Nova to Feek the road crosses a vast plain, destitute of cultivation and inhabitants. Nothing is seen but the ruins of tenantless villages and towns in every direction, with multitudes of hawks and herons occupying the spots deserted by man." Such is the present aspect of a district which, in the times of Israel, was not inferior in point of fertility to any of the countries on the east of the Jordan. "Bashan languisheth."

Not only was it foretold that the pastures of Bashan should languish, "the day of the Lord," said Isaiah, "shall be upon all the oaks of Bashan." The woods in the interior of Gilead, occurring in a deserted country, strike the traveller as magnificent, and remind him of scenes which he has witnessed nearer home; but with regard to the northern part of our route, which lay within the limits of the ancient Bashan, there is scarcely a tree to be seen: and even as to Adjeloan, where the oak still grows abundantly, neither the number nor the beauty of these trees is such as to entitle them to their ancient fame; we may now address them in the words of the prophet: "Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the forest of the vintage is come down."

With regard to the region we have now gone over, we have only one other remark to make. It lies, as we have already stated, beyond the limits of Palestine proper, and therefore the curse pointed against the Land of Promise is not to be understood as applying so particularly to this part of the country, as to that on the west of the Jordan; and at this day there is a marked difference between the two,—so far, at least, as regards all the countries north of the Arnon. This difference has been well described by Buckingham, with whose words we shall close our remarks on the Trans-Jordanic possessions of Israel. "The soil is so generally fertile as to be capable of producing almost any thing that is required; and while the valleys abound with corn-fields and olive grounds, the upland slopes of the hills are planted with vines, and the summits of the mountains are clothed with the trees of the coldest regions. The climate is really delightful: a clear deep blue sky, a pure air, a warm summer in the valleys and plains, a snowy winter on the mountain tops, with all the finest shades of gradation between these two extremes, furnish every variety of temperature and atmosphere that can be desired by man. The strongest proof that could be given of its salubrity, is the remarkable fact, that not one maimed, deformed, or sickly-looking person any where met our sight during the whole period of my being in this part of the country, though we saw new faces, and came in contact with great numbers of persons every day. Indeed this portion of the country included in the districts of Belkah and Adjeloan, on the east of the Jordan, is as superior to the Promised Land on the west of that stream, as the most romantic and beautiful parts of Devonshire are to the bleak hills and barren heaths of the adjoining county of Cornwall."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

ARCHIBALD, EARL OF ARGYLE.

BY THE EDITOR.

In a former Number we called the attention of our readers to a distinguished individual belonging to the noble family of Argyle, who suffered martyrdom in the cause of Christ and the Covenant. At an after period in the history of Scotland, when the restoration of Charles the Second plunged the adherents of the Covenant into all the horrors of a bloody persecution, another descendant of the same illustrious family was honoured with the martyr's crown.

That Charles was a determined enemy to the Protestant faith was obvious; and if he ruled with despotic sway in England, he hunted down the poor Scotch Presbyterians with the most fierce and unrelenting hostility. The followers of Cargill and Cameron were not so easily subdued. Few in number though they were, and feeble in physical power compared with their enemies, they fought and fell in the cause of truth and righteousness. The firmness and unflinching determination of the persecuted remnant exasperated their enemies beyond all measure; and while they inflicted the most cruel tortures upon the most obscure individuals, who were bold enough to avow their attachment to the Covenant, nobles even of the highest rank did not escape their resentment. Among the most eminent of the latter stands the Earl of Argyle, whose brief career we are now about to sketch.

The hereditary attachment of this nobleman to the true Scottish Presbyterians was strong and decided. He felt as if the honour of his family were bound up with the success of their cause; and, while he followed their movements with the most intense interest, it was in the hour of their sorest trial that he boldly avowed the harmony of his principles with theirs. The adherents of Charles in the Scottish Parliament, desirous of purging the offices of the Crown of all enthusiasts, as they regarded the Presbyterians to be, proposed a self-contradictory test to be taken by every privy-councillor. The Earl of Argyle, among others, was required to sign it. He was ordered, accordingly, by one of the clerks of Council, to attend at Edinburgh on the 3d of November 1681, and to subscribe the test act. The Earl complained to the Duke of York that the time within which it was by act of Parliament to be signed was not yet expired. His remonstrances had no effect upon the Duke, who secretly wished to rid himself of so formidable an opponent to the fulfilment of his designs. On the day appointed, therefore, Argyle made his appearance, and in the presence of the Council uttered the following explanatory declaration:—"I have considered the test, and am desirous to give obedience as far as I can. I am confident the parliament never intended to impose contradictory oaths; therefore I think no man can explain it but for himself. Accordingly I take it in as far as it is consistent with itself and the Protestant religion: and I do declare, I mean not to bind up myself, in my station, and in a lawful way, to wish and endeavour any alteration I think to the advantage of the Church or State, not repugnant to the Protestant religion and my loyalty; and this I understand as a part of my oath." The oath was then administered and he took his seat as a privy-councillor.

The following day, the Earl waited upon the Duke of York, wishing to ascertain his views upon the manner in which he had subscribed the test. His Royal Highness openly declared himself dissatisfied with the exception which he had taken, and dismissed him with these words, "Well, it passed with you, but it shall pass with no other." This remark the Earl understood as indicating the Duke's acceptance of the subscription. But his Lordship was mistaken; a design was formed to prosecute him for treason, on the ground of the explanation which he had given. The same day, accordingly, he was called before the Council, to take the test a second time as a commissioner of the Treasury. The Earl offered to take the test, as he had already done, upon which he was requested to repeat the declaration he had made. Argyle, perceiving that there was a design to ensnare him, declined to comply with their wish; but at length, being urged by the Duke of York, he stated that, to prevent mistakes, the declaration had been committed to writing. It was then produced and read; and the Earl having been requested to withdraw, the Council deliberated for a little, and calling him in again, announced that they were by no means satisfied with his explanation, and that, therefore, they declared him unfit either to have a seat in the Council or to be a Commissioner of the Treasury. Next morning he waited on the Duke, and expressed his surprise that the explanation which he had thought it necessary to give, before taking the test, should have been regarded as a crime. The Duke replied, "As I have already told you, you have cheated yourself—you have taken the test." On hearing this, Argyle expressed a hope that the Duke was satisfied. After some conversation, the Duke charged him not to leave town till he saw him again.

In obedience to the Duke's commands, the Earl remained in town till next Council-day, when the Council ordered him to repair to the Castle of Edinburgh, and there to remain as a prisoner. Meanwhile, the advocate was ordered to commence a prosecution against him for treason, and notice of the design was sent to the king; but before the king's approbation of their proceedings had been received, an indictment was drawn up, and the Earl was summoned before the Lords of Justiciary on the 12th of December. The day of trial accordingly arrived, and the Earl having appeared in Court, an indictment was read, charging him with declaring against and defaming the act enjoining the test, by insinuating that the Parliament had imposed a contradictory oath, and that the said oath was inconsistent with the Protestant religion. These charges were very ably repelled by Sir George Lockhart and Sir John Dalrymple. Only five out of the six Lords of Justiciary were present at the close of the debate, Lord Nairn having been obliged to retire in consequence of the infirmities of old age. The Judges were equally divided; and Lord Queensberry, who presided, not wishing to give his casting vote, Lord Nairn was brought from his bed to the Court, that he might give his vote against the Earl. The following day the Lords pronounced their interlocutor, declaring the Earl's defences against perjury to be satisfactory, but not those against treason. The paper which the Earl had written out, containing his explanation of the test, was then produced in Court; and, after it was read, the jury withdrew, and in a short time brought in their verdict, finding the Earl guilty of treason, leasing-making, and leasing-telling, but not guilty of perjury. The trial being ended, an account of the proceedings was forwarded to the King. The Earl's friends felt assured that a design against his life was formed, and that it would meet with the King's sanction. As soon as the Earl ascertained this to be indeed the case, he left the castle in disguise, and escaped on Tuesday the 20th, the day before he was to have been sent to the common prison, preparatory to his execution.

Travelling under the disguised name of Mr Hope, the Earl, being joined, according to previous agreement, by Mr George Pringle of Torwoodlee, travelled to London; and, having remained in concealment there for a short time, he passed over into Holland. In his absence, accordingly, sentence of attainder was passed against him in Scotland. The Earl remained in Holland till the death of Charles the Second, in the beginning of 1685. That event, followed as it was by the accession of his deadly foe, the Duke of York, encouraged him to attempt the deliverance of his country from the tyranny under which it had so long groaned. With this view, he resolved to make a descent upon Scotland; and, at the same time, he prevailed upon the Duke of Monmouth to make a descent upon England. Argyle felt himself considerably embarrassed by the want of money; but, through the kindness of a rich lady in Amsterdam, his coffers were amply replenished. He set sail, accordingly, from Holland little more than a month after the King's death, and arrived in Scotland sanguine of success. His hopes, however, were disappointed; and, finding it difficult, or rather impracticable, to rally his friends, he endeavoured to escape, but he was seized by the enemy, and carried prisoner first to Glasgow, and thence to Edinburgh, where he was lodged in the Castle, and laid in irons. It was keenly debated whether he ought to be tried anew, or summarily executed on the sentence which had been pronounced against him in 1681. While this point was under discussion, a letter was received from the King, ordering him to be put to death within three days. In consequence of this letter, he was ordered to be beheaded next day, and his head to be fixed on the Tolbooth of Edinburgh. A sentence so summary might have struck terror into the mind of any individual, but the Earl received notice of it with the utmost calmness, declaring that he had more comfort and joy that day than he had felt on his escape formerly from the Castle. The day before his execution was the Sabbath, and he spent the whole of his time in religious exercises. No Presbyterian minister was allowed to attend him, but two Episcopalian ministers were ordered to visit him just before the hour of execution. These two ministers—Mr Annand, dean of Edinburgh, and Mr Lawrence Charteris—conducted themselves with the most becoming solemnity and propriety. The fatal hour arrived, and the Earl, mounting the scaffold with a firm step, and being permitted to address the spectators, spoke to the following effect:—

"Job tells us, 'Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble;' and I am a clear instance of it. I shall not now say any thing of my sentence or escape,—nor of the ground of my return;—that which I intend mainly to say now, is, to express my humble, and, I thank God, cheerful submission to His divine will, and my willingness to forgive all men, even my enemies. I know afflictions spring not out of the dust, are not only foretold, but promised to Christians, and are not only tolerable, but desirable; for God chastises his own, to refine and not ruin them, whatever the world thinks. I know many, like Hazeel, 2 Kings viii. 13, go to excesses they never thought they were capable of. Let rulers and others seriously read and weigh Prov. i. 20, &c.; 2 Chron. xxv. 6-16; Prov. xxiv. 10-12, and xxviii. 10; and Isa. lix. especially verse 15; and avoid what is bad, and follow what is good. For me, I hope, by God's strength, to join with Job xiii. 15, and the Psalmist, Psalm xxii. 4; and to trust, as Psalm cxlviii. 11; and shall pray, as Psalm, lxxiv. 19, &c; cxliii. 6, &c.; and Luke i. 74, 75; and shall hope, as Psalm xciv. 15. I do hereby forgive all that directly or indirectly have been the cause of my being brought to this place, and pray that God may forgive them,' &c.—When he had ended, he turned to the south side of the scaffold, and said, 'Gentlemen, I pray you do not misconstrue my behaviour this day. I freely forgive all men their wrongs and injuries done against me, as I desire to be forgiven of God.' Mr Annand repeated the words louder to the people, as he did when his Lordship spoke to the same purpose from the north side; and said, 'This nobleman dies a Protestant.' The Earl stepped forward again, and said, 'I die not only a Protestant, but with a heart-hatred of Popery, Prelacy, and all superstition whatsoever.' Having taken his leave of his friends, he at last kneeled down, and, embracing the maiden (the instrument for beheading), said, 'This is the mean to finish my sin and misery, and is my inlet to glory, for which I long.' Then he prayed a little within himself, thrice uttering these words, 'Lord Jesus, receive me into thy glory!' and lifting up his hand, which was the signal, the executioner did his work."

Thus died one of Scotland's noblest martyrs, the Earl of Argyle—a man not only of sound Protestant, but of sound Presbyterian principles, who shed his blood in the cause of truth and righteousness.

TO A DESPONDING CHRISTIAN.

By W. H. MADDEN, M.D.

CHRISTIAN! wherefore faintest thou?
 Warrior! why thus pale?
 Having fought so long, wilt now
 Like a coward fail?
 Look around thee, look around,
 Victory to thy car is bound!

Blind thou art, or thou would'st see,
 How'ring o'er the fight,
 Spirits of eternity,
 Cloth'd in garments white!
 Lo! their wings, outstretch'd above,
 Form a canopy of love!

See! they throng around thy head,
 Waves their golden hair;
 Heav'nly balm, about thee shed,
 Scents the fragrant air:
 Lo! they raise the crown on high,—
 Glorious prize of victory!

Fierce tho' foes may gather round,
 Dark their banners wave,
 Think, O think their rage is bound,—
 Christ the weak will save!
 Steel thy heart, and nerve thine arm,
 He will keep thee from all harm!

What if hellish arrows fly
 Thick as winter snow?
 Raise the shield of faith on high,—
 Down they pointless go!
 Let them rage and fume at will,
 Heav'nly bands are round thee still!

Come they yet again, the foe?
 Rolls the thunder loud?
 Look! the bright celestial bow
 Spans the threat'ning cloud!
 See! the radiant polar-star
 Lights the heavy gloom afar!

Christian soldier! rouse thy heart,
 Brace thine armour on!
 Trembling doubt and fear, depart!
 Weakness, hence!—begone!
 Christ hath bade thee stem the wave;
 Canst thou sink, with Him to save?

THE WALDENSES OF PIEDMONT, BEFORE THE PERIOD OF THE REFORMATION.

PART II.

WERE we to diverge at this point from the Piedmontese territories, and trace the history of those who have been usually classed under the generic name of Waldenses in other lands, we should have to traverse a large portion of Europe, and give a summary of ecclesiastical history for more than three hundred years,—during which, under the names of Paterenes, Catheri, Albigenses, and other titles, they were the victims of a merciless persecution. This portion, however, of their history would be more properly comprised under an account of the Albigenses, and the crusades of extermination that were waged against them at the instance of the Papal hierarchy. Our limits shall confine us to the Churches of the valleys of Piedmont, extending along the eastern foot of the Cottian Alps, which divide Italy from France, Switzerland, and Germany. The principal valleys were Aosta and Susa on the north, and Stura on the south; in the interior, Lucerna, Androgne, Rocciapiatta, Pramol, Perosa, and San Martino. These seclusions had remained inviolate, while the professors of the truth in other countries had been massacred by thousands, or driven into exile. The dukes of Savoy, indeed, had been repeatedly instigated by the Roman Pontiffs to commence a persecution against these recusant congregations; but, to their honour, they had hitherto resisted every entreaty; and although an attempt had been made to introduce the Inquisition into Piedmont, in the year 1252, the Piedmontese resisted the measure so successfully that it was abandoned. In consequence of this protection from their sovereigns, the crusading zeal of Popery against the evangelical Churches of Piedmont had hitherto been of a desultory character, and directed against individuals, rather than the community at large; but in the year 1400 the storm that had hitherto murmured in the distance, gathered over their heads, and burst in full violence. A party of Roman Catholics, dwelling in the neighbourhood of Pragela, attacked the Waldenses of that valley; and, that the onset might be more effective, it was made in the month of December, when the mountains were covered with snow, so that no attack could be apprehended at such a season. The persecutors surmounted every obstacle, and having seized the caves in which the Waldenses could have found safety, the latter were obliged to betake themselves to flight. They hurried towards the highest mountains of the Alps, with their wives and children, the mothers carrying their infants in the cradle, and leading by the hand their young ones who were able to walk; while their unimpeded pursuers chased them until night-fall, and slew multitudes of those who were delayed by weakness or parental affection. And a still worse fate remained for those fugitives who survived the massacre. When the darkness came on, they wandered in uncertainty among the pathless, snow-covered mountains, where the exhausted fall, or and themselves down to die; and when the morning appeared, eighty infants were found frozen to death,—and in many cases mothers were found dead, or expiring beside their offspring. This was a new event in the history of the Waldenses, who regarded it with astonishment, and talked of it, for many years afterwards, with horror and dread. Alas! they knew not that it was only the commencement of a fearful history, and that it merely heralded a series of tribulations and sufferings more terrible still to their children yet unborn.

A season of comparative tranquillity succeeded, until the Christians of the valleys were to experience the tender mercies of one who called himself the Father of Christendom. This was Innocent VIII., who, in 1487, issued a bull against the Waldenses of Lyons, and those of Piedmont. In this manifesto he stigmatized them as “sons of iniquity;”—“ensnarers of God’s sheep,”—people who had “damnablely risen up, under a feigned pretence of holiness,”—and many such odious appellations; after which, he gave Albert, his lieutenant, a commission to march against them, and “tread them under foot as venomous adders!” As an arm of flesh was necessary for such a purpose, the Papal lieutenant was enjoined, in the same bull, to raise and discipline an army of crusaders, with a grant to these holy warriors of a plenary indulgence, and remission of all their sins. The Papal drum did not sound in vain,—recruits were in plenty, of men who were willing to purchase heaven by turning earth into a hell; and Albert, at the head of an army wearing the red cross, and accompanied by the French king’s lieutenant, advanced to the valley of Loyse. The inhabitants took refuge in their caves, but these proved a hopeless shelter: burning wood was placed at the entrances, by which numbers were smothered to death; while those who endeavoured to escape were thrown headlong over the precipices, or massacred on the spot. In this manner three thousand were slaughtered; and so complete was the waste of life, that the valley had to be peopled with new inhabitants. After this exploit, Albert, at the head of eighteen thousand men, directed his march to the Piedmontese valleys, and divided his army into three bodies, that he might the more securely enclose his victims. Here he was also joined by numbers of the Piedmontese Roman Catholics, whom he allured to his standard with promises of paradise and plunder. But his forces were met gallantly in every direction by the Waldenses, who were chiefly armed with small wooden targets and cross-bows; and the invaders were driven from the mountain passes. While the conflict was going on, also, the women and children were seen in the distance, upon their knees, and, with hands lifted up to heaven, entreating that God would protect his people.

The Duke of Savoy (Philip VII.) was concerned at this invasion, more especially as these Waldenses had always been peaceable subjects; and he endeavoured to extend to them his protection from the persecutors. It was the fashion in these days, and even at a later and more enlightened period, to represent all who dissented from the Romish Church as monsters in bodily shape, as well as belief; and, therefore, the duke had been told that the children of these recusants were born with black throats, and covered with hair; and that they had four rows of teeth, and only one eye in the centre of their foreheads. In order to convince himself, therefore, of the fact, before he stirred in behalf of such questionable vassals, he caused several of their infants to be brought to him; after which he expressed his resolution to confirm these people in all the privileges which his other subjects enjoyed. But the Papal behests were too powerful to be contested by a third-rate sovereign. An Inquisition had been established in a convent near Pignerol; and there, as often as the Waldenses could be apprehended, they were tried, and delivered to the flames. Such continued to be the case till A.D. 1532, and the Waldenses were so greatly harassed by this species of warfare, that for several years they had been compelled to conduct their worship in private, from fear of their inquisitors. But they were conscious, at last, that such secret meetings were a dereliction of Christian principle, which requires an open confession to the truth; and on this account they resumed their public assemblies, at which their pastors preached openly and boldly. Thus they once more stood up as marks for persecution; and the Duke of Savoy, instigated or compelled by the Romish ecclesiastics, sent five hundred horse and foot, to compel the submission of the worshippers. The Waldenses were employed at their wonted labours when this armed force advanced towards their valleys; but, taking courage, they armed themselves with slings, and posted themselves in the passes of their mountains. With these rude instruments of warfare they plied the aggressors so successfully, that they put them to flight, after a severe slaughter. The duke, on hearing of this event, proclaimed the futility of a war against men whose position was so well defended by precipices and defiles; and he declared, that as every single skin of the Waldenses was to be purchased by at least a dozen belonging to his other subjects, the price was too costly. He therefore refused to send any more forces against them, and allowed the inquisitors to continue the work of conversion in their own fashion. Such was the history of the Churches of Piedmont until the illustrious Luther commenced his public ministry; an event which in common with their brethren of France and other countries, they hailed as a cause of triumph. At this important era it appears, from a history of the Waldensian churches, written by George Morel, that the number of those who professed their creed in the different countries of Europe amounted to eight hundred thousand souls—a reply of itself sufficient, if others were wanting, to the insulting query, “Where was your Church before the days of Luther?”

Before we proceed with the narrative of the farther trials and sufferings of this interesting people, it may be necessary to enter at some length into an exposition of their religious belief. It is gratifying to think that upon this important point we are not left either to vague conjecture, or an uncertain process of deduction from their personal history, to ascertain the nature of their creed. The following ancient Confession of Faith of the Waldenses, dated so early as the year 1120, will be perused with interest, as evincing the purity of their belief at so dark an era, and the fidelity with which they witnessed for the truth as it is in Jesus amidst the general apostasy:—

1. We believe, and firmly hold all that is contained in the twelve articles of the symbol, called the Apostles’ creed; accounting as heresy, whatever disagrees, or does not correspond with the aforesaid twelve articles.

2. We believe that there is one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

3. We acknowledge for the Holy Canonical Scriptures, the books of the Holy Bible; viz., [Then follows a list, the same as that of our Protestant Canon.] Here follow the apocryphal books which are not received of the Hebrews. But we read them (as Saint Jerome says, in his prologue to the Proverbs), for the edification of the people, not the confirmation of the doctrine of the Church. [Here follows an enumeration of the writings which our Protestant Church calls the Apocrypha.]

4. The aforesaid books, (that is the Canonical) teach this: That there is one God, Almighty, all-wise, and all-good, who has made all things by his goodness; for he created Adam in his own image, and likeness; but that by the envy of the devil, and the disobedience of the said Adam, sin has entered into the world; and that we are sinners in Adam, and by Adam

5. That Christ was promised to our fathers who received the Law, that so knowing by the law their sin, unrighteousness, and insufficiency, they might long for the coming of Christ, to make satisfaction for their sins, and fulfil the law by himself.

6. That Christ was born at the time ordained of God, the Father; that is to say, at the time when all iniquity abounded; and not for the sake of our good works, for all were sinners; but that he might show us grace and mercy, for the sake of his truth.

7. That Christ is our life, truth, peace, and righteousness; our Pastor, Advocate, Sacrifice, and Priest; who died for the salvation of all that believe, and who is risen for our justification.

8. In like manner we firmly hold, that there is no other Mediator and Advocate with God the Father, but Jesus Christ alone; and as for the Virgin Mary, that she was holy, humble, and full of grace; and this we also believe concerning all the other saints; viz., that being in heaven, they wait for the resurrection of their bodies at the day of judgment.

9. Also, we believe, that after this life there are only two places; the one for the saved, and the other for the damned, the which two places we call Paradise and hell; absolutely denying that purgatory, which was invented by Antichrist, and forged contrary to the truth.

10. Also we have always reckoned as an unspeakable abomination before God all those inventions of men; viz., the Festivals, Vigils of Saints, what is called Holy Water, abstinence from flesh upon certain days, and the like, but especially their Masses.

11. We reckon as an abomination, and as Antichristian, all those human inventions which are a trouble, or prejudice to the liberty of the Spirit.

12. We believe that the sacraments are signs of the holy thing, or visible forms of the invisible grace; accounting it good that the faithful should sometimes use the said signs or visible forms when it can be done. But we believe, and hold, that the faithful aforesaid may be saved without receiving these signs, if they have no place, nor any means to use them.

13. We acknowledge no sacraments but Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

14. We are bound to honour the secular powers by subjection, ready obedience, and payment of imposts.

Who, on perusing such a Confession of Faith, would still dare to assert, that Protestantism is but a thing of yesterday; and that its voice was never heard until it sounded from the halls of Wittenberg? When we pass from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, we still find them a people, who, in receiving their faith, had consulted not with flesh and blood, with Luther, or Melancthon, but had depended humbly and implicitly upon the oracles of God, and the teaching of the Holy Spirit. On the 12th of September 1532, a meeting of the pastors and heads of families of the churches in the valleys of Piedmont was held at Angrogne, and there the following articles were solemnly framed, read, approved, and sworn to by all present, as containing the sum of the doctrine which had been taught them from father to son, according to the Word of God. In the simple picture of ecclesiastical polity and Christian practice which it contains, they gave an ample refutation to the odious charges that were heaped upon them both in their religious and civil capacity.

Article 1. That Divine service cannot be performed but in spirit and in truth; because God is a spirit, and whoever addresses him must do it in spirit.

2. All those who have been, and shall be saved, have been elected of God before the foundation of the world.

3. It is impossible that those who are appointed to salvation shall not be saved.

4. Whoever upholds free-will, absolutely, denies predestination, and the grace of God.

5. No work is to be called good but that which God has commanded; and no work is bad, but that which he forbids.

6. A Christian may swear by the name of God, without contradiction to what is written in Matt. v. provided he who swears does not take the name of God in vain. Now, it is not in vain when the oath tends to God's glory, and the preservation of a man's neighbour. Moreover, one may swear before magistrates, because he who exercises the office of a magistrate, whether a believer or unbeliever, holds the power from God

7. Auricular confession is not enjoined of God; and it has been determined by the Holy Scriptures, that the true confession of a Christian is to confess to God alone, to whom belong honour and glory. There is another kind of confession, which is, when one reconciles himself to his neighbour, of which mention is made in Matthew, and James v. The third kind of confession is, when one having publicly offended, and with the knowledge of all, confesses and acknowledges publicly his offence.

8. We ought on the Lord's Day to cease from our works, as men zealous of the honour and glory of God; also out of charity towards our servants, and to apply ourselves to the hearing of the Word of God.

9. It is not lawful for a Christian to take revenge upon his enemy in any manner whatsoever.

10. A Christian may exercise the office of a magistrate over Christians.

11. There is no certain determination of time for any Christian fast; and it cannot be found in Scripture, that God has commanded and appointed any special days.

12. Marriage is not forbidden to any one, be his quality or condition what it may.

13. Whoever forbids marriage teaches a diabolical doctrine.

14. Whoever has not the gift of chastity is bound to marry.

15. The ministers of the Word of God ought not to remove from place to place, unless it be for some great benefit to the Church.

16. It is not contrary to the apostolic communion for ministers to possess some estate as their own property, for the subsistence of their families.

17. Touching the matter of the sacraments, it has been decided by the Holy Scriptures, that we have only two sacramental signs left us by Jesus Christ; the one being baptism, and the other the Eucharist; which last we receive to show that our perseverance in the faith is such as we promised when we were baptized, being little children; and also in remembrance of that great benefit conferred upon us by Jesus Christ, when he died for our redemption, and washed us with his precious blood.

MARY SITTING AT THE FEET OF JESUS.

AFTER THE MANNER OF HERBIC'S LINES "TO DAFODILS."

O FOR such love as Mary bore,
When placed at Jesus' feet!
Nor downy couch, nor lofty throne,
Could be so blest a seat.

Her eye
Was bent full earnestly Upon

Her Saviour's august brow;
And that lov'd face had ne'er before
Look'd half so bright as now.

For earth let others toil; God saith,
Her's was the better part;
She joy'd to hear sweet Wisdom's voice
Speak comfort to her heart.

If we Heaven's glorious things would see
No joys
Of fleeting kind must move;
But we must live, and look by faith,
To Him—the God of love!

THE NATURE AND ADVANTAGES OF PRIVATE SOCIAL MEETINGS FOR PRAYER:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM HAMILTON, D.D.,
Minister of Strathblane, Dumbartonshire.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."—Zech. iv. 6.

PRAYER-MEETINGS are small assemblies of Christians, for the purpose of promoting their mutual edification and comfort, by drawing nearer to God, strengthening the bonds which unite them to each other, and rendering themselves more useful in their day, and becoming more meet for heaven. These meetings are spent in praise and prayer, in reading the Scriptures, and conversing on the great truths which they contain, and applying them to the different duties and trials of life. It is the practice of these societies to spread before God any event peculiarly distressing in their own condition, or in the situation of their families, the congregations to which they belong, the nation, the Church of Christ, or the world at large; and to entreat that he would adapt the dispensations of his providence, and the communications of his grace, to their several exigencies. Their principal design is to promote the growth of grace in their own souls, to advance the interests of piety in their families and neighbourhoods and insure its diffusion through the earth, and its triumph among all nations.

And can it be necessary to insist upon the advantage and importance of these societies? No objects can be more sublime and interesting than those which these associations have in view; and their results are noble and delightful.

They have a beneficial effect upon our personal piety; the revival of religion in our country and its propagation throughout all the earth.

1. They are conducive to our personal piety. If, indeed, we wish for no more religion than what consists in forms and appearances; which requires us to go through outward duties and observances, but which leaves the heart cold, dull, and unaffected; which leaves us in a state of conformity to the world, destitute of nearness to the Most High, and strangers to the light of his countenance, and the joys of his salvation; we have no need to unite in these associations, and give ourselves to extraordinary prayer. It will be perfectly sufficient to keep up a form of devotion in secret, to go through a dry and lifeless round of family worship, and appear once or twice in our pew on Sabbath.

But if we dare not rely on outward observances; if we are terrified at the form without the power of godliness; if we tremble at the idea of having a name to live, while we are dead; if we long for fellowship with God, and are eager to come near unto him, even unto his seat, and there to order all our cause before him; if we delight in the light of his countenance, and long for the joys of his salvation; if we would wish to appropriate to ourselves the treasures of redeeming mercy, and clear up our own interest in the blessings of the great salvation—then these meetings are important and invaluable.

In them God permits us to draw near unto himself, and to fill our mouth with arguments; he allows us to pour out our hearts freely in his presence, and makes all his goodness pass before us. There he lays open all his treasures, and invites us to partake of all his rich and inexhaustible provisions. His resources are immense; but the whole are unfolded for our benefit, and laid open to our enjoyment and use. Here we may, in succession, take up every promise of his Word, and every engagement of his faithfulness and love; plead these in our prayers, and lodge them before his throne. All things are ours. He says, "Ask, and ye shall receive. If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that ye shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven. Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

How often, in these societies, has the God of all grace drawn near to the members in the kindness of his love; and, in the fulness of his saving power, spoken peace to their spirits, and sealed the tokens of his favour on their hearts! How often has the garment of mortality hung lightly around them—and their faith, entering into that which is within the veil, brought them near to the general assembly and Church of the first-born! They have stood on the verge of heaven, and enjoyed fellowship with the spirits of the just! They have found it good to be there! Their fellowship has been with the Father and the Son! They have seen the King in his beauty, and possessed some anticipation of the felicity and rapture of glorified immortals!

Now, if the substance be better than the shadow; if the reality be superior to the mere semblance and representation; if it be better to be encompassed with the riches of grace, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, than amused with the mere symbols of piety, while, in fact, we are left in the darkness of ignorance, and in all the starvation and wretchedness of a carnal and unconverted condition; then who can tell the grandeur of the worth of these associations, where the soul is carried beyond the stiffness and formality of mere external worship, into the very heart and substance of genuine devotion!

When we are labouring under the languor and fridity of our cold and dull observances, we often think that it would be well worth while to die, to get a sight of the services of heaven, and witness the warmth, elevation, and ardour of the inhabitants of heaven. They have no wanderings in their minds, nor any coldness in their affections. Their whole heart and soul are thrown into their work. They do some justice to the generosity and grace of Jesus, and give him some of the glory due unto his name!

Hark! how the adoring hosts above, &c.

Now, in these meetings, the first emotions of heaven have been felt; and there the faithful have gathered around them those principles and enjoyments which they have carried into the world of bliss, and will retain through eternity.

If we have proper views of religion, we will prefer a few moments of the Divine presence, to months and years of mere lifeless and formal service. We would rather possess the blessings promised in the Psalms, than have enjoyed the honour of writing them,—we would rather obtain nearness to God, than occupy a throne. During the effusion of the Holy Spirit in North America, there is more crowding to prayer meetings than to sermons. When we are meeting with God, we cannot leave off. "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Would you like, when the brief journey of life is closed, to enter into rest—to see God? to behold his glory, and be for ever filled and satisfied with his likeness?

Come, then, my people, enter into your chambers, and shut the doors about you. Here the cares and toils, the noise and clamour of a distracted and contentious world, are excluded. Here you enjoy days of heaven, and seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. For a time things seen and perishing are forgotten. The grand, and overpowering realities of eternity are seen and felt. The Lord is in the midst of you.—Is it not written, Then they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it? By beholding his matchless loveliness and infinite excellencies, your souls are charmed with his glories, and rivetted to his service. You exclaim, how great is his love! how unsearchable his goodness! You retire from the meeting transported with his kindness; and, oh! how enlarged and elevated are you in the duties of the family, and in the exercises of the closet.

When one who holds communion with the skies—
Has fill'd his urn where the pure waters rise,
And once more mingles with us meaner things:
'Tis even as if an angel shook his wings:
Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide,
And tells us where his treasure is supplied.

You go through the duties of life with the gentleness and dignity of the citizens of Zion. How come some men to live and converse more like angels than men? They are often in these meetings.

2. These meetings have a most beneficial influence on the state of religion in the congregations to which we belong.—How can they produce a beneficial effect upon the congregations to which we belong? By promoting Christian love and harmony. There is no discord in heaven. And why, because the happy inhabitants are not only perfectly holy, but constantly employed in the worship of the Most High? After kneeling humbly and fervently before the throne of mercy, our affections possess a greater warmth and tenderness for our fellow-worshippers. There is something so softening and harmonising in genuine devotion, that the hearts which have been often warmed and melted under its sublime and sacred influence, not only cleave to the Lord, but also remain united to each other? Whence the coldness, dryness, and distance, which prevail among believers? Because, when they meet, they spend more time in wrangling and contending, than in humble, earnest intercession. If we would pray more frequently and more fervently together, we would be less disposed to dispute and strive, and would love each other with greater tenderness and ardour.

Prayer-meetings are useful, because they have a most blessed influence upon ministers. Why is our ministry so barren and unprofitable, our own souls so languid and lifeless, and our congregations so dry and withered? Is it from the want of talent, or learning, or piety in the preachers? They are abundantly learned and able. They are evangelical and pious. But they are left to stand too much alone. They are not sufficiently backed and supported by the prayers of their people.

Their hearers are not united and persevering in prayer in their behalf. They will talk about spirituality of mind, and profess to long for a revival. But are they seeking a revival?—expecting a revival?—taking measures to secure a revival? No. They are really terrified for a revival. They would regard a revival as an object of alarm, and the effusion of the Holy Ghost as a deplorable calamity. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit would put an end to their levity and folly, their lukewarmness and formality. It would send them to their knees; compel them to spend days in fasting and supplication; oblige them to pray in earnest; to live near to God, and speak, and think, and act like men on the brink of eternity, and who feel the powers of the world to come. And could selfish and worldly men, who assume a profession of religion, merely to insure a respectability in the world, or their reputation in the Church, but not to give life to their souls, and form the joy and rejoicing of their hearts: could they endure such a life?

But would you like your ministers to be men full of faith and of the Holy Ghost? Would you like them to stand in the counsel of the Lord, and preach with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven? Then give yourselves to prayer, and multiply these praying associations. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Was not Elias a man of like passions with us? Look at the case of Abraham. And if the intercession of a solitary saint be so powerful, how mighty and irresistible would the united supplications of a congregation prove! If two of you shall agree on earth, as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven. Attend to the case of Daniel, and his three companions. At their request, God revealed the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and its meaning. The little praying band in the house of Mark, was more than a match for the Roman guards, the power of Caesar, and all the policy of hell. Mrs Talbot and her praying society at Reading succeeded in leading the God of all grace to mould the heart of Codagan after the image of Immanuel, and render him a champion of the cross.

A minister can almost tell when he is preaching to a prayerless congregation, by the deadness and languor on his spirit. But oh! when we are called on to address a praying people, we need not write our sermons. A pious patroness was so refreshed and edified by the preaching of a minister, whom she occasionally heard in his own church, that, in order to have the continual benefit of such rich and precious discourses, she presented him to her own parish when it became vacant. But to her grief and disappointment, she waited from Sabbath to Sabbath on his ministry, without finding that food which her soul loved. After mourning long in secret, she resolved to speak to the minister himself. "Ah, said he, I have lost my prayer-book." "Your prayer-book! I did not know that you used a prayer-book." "Yes. In the parish where I was, I had a praying people." Rally round these prayer-meetings, and you may render your ministers whatever you wish them. You would rejoice to hear such men as Whitefield, Luther, Knox—to have enjoyed the fellowship of Paul. But unite in praying societies for your ministers, and God can easily baptize them with the Holy Ghost. Whitefield, Luther, Knox, and Paul himself, possessed no more than the grace of God bestowed. And is his hand shortened that it cannot save? The residus of the Spirit is with him, and he can easily raise up other Whitefields and Luthers. These meetings have a blessed influence on our hearers. They compose the mind, solemnize the spirit, put the worshipper into an excellent frame for hearing. We cannot seriously pray for our minister, and yet despise, revile, and oppose him. Prayer binds us to employ every measure to secure the blessing which we implore.

It was after a night spent in prayer that the Holy Ghost was so abundantly poured out at Shotts. And if you would wish to see the congregations round you like well-watered gardens, give yourselves to prayer, and join these devotional societies. The Lord can easily set us as at the first, and restore us as at the beginning. He can bring back the days of Cambuslang and Kilsyth. He can water our weary heritage, and make our wilderness like Eden.

3. These meetings have a blessed effect on the propagation of the Gospel in the world.—The Lord is the hearer of prayer. He delights to answer his people's request. He meets him that rejoices, and works righteousness. While they call, he hears. Would you, then, like to see the tabernacle of God with men, and our land made Hephzibah and Beulah; because it is married unto the Lord, and because he delighteth in it? Then give yourselves to intercession, and multiply these praying associations. The scenes witnessed in America and Scotland in 1742 would be renewed, or exceeded. The Word would have free course, and be glorified. Its life-giving and soul-subduing influence would spread from family to family, from congregation to congregation, till it filled the length and breadth of the land. Would you like to see the prophecies fulfilled,—Antichrist overthrown, the isles waiting for the law of the Lord, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, Israel saved, and the whole world filled with the glory of the Lord? Then "ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth;" for the Lord will appear in his glory, and build up Zion, whenever his people take pleasure in her rubbish, and in her stones, and give themselves to prayer on her behalf.

But, alas! it is easier to fulfil every prophecy, and publish the Gospel through the world, than excite a general spirit of prayer among the professors of religion. Converting work is not wonderful in the eyes of the Lord; but it is wonderful to see numbers stirring themselves up to seek him, and taking hold of his strength. We have great need of united, persevering prayer. The world still lies in wickedness. The great majority of the nations have not heard of the name of Jesus; and among those which make a profession of Christianity, how few feel the life and power of godliness! Dare we say that the great body of the people are baptized with the Holy Ghost?—that they are seeking not “their own things, but the things that are Jesus Christ’s?”—that they are pressing into the kingdom of heaven, working the work of God, and determined to lay hold on eternal life? If this is the case, “what mean the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, that we hear?” Why is the sanctity of the Sabbath perpetually invaded,—one pious practice after another relinquished? Why do the men who leave our shores injure rather than advance religion? Why is it more difficult now to educate a heathen child in Christianity, in any town or parish in Scotland, than in a pagan country? Why are the spirituality and unction of professors declining? It is from no want of external means, nor any decline in the numbers or zeal of ministers. We have learning and eloquence, and theology and zeal, in greater abundance than in former years. But are our ministrations accompanied with that unction and power which crowned the labours of Welsh and Livingstone, of Dickson and Gray, of Macculloch and Robe, Whitefield and Wesley? Amidst all our earnestness and ardour, where is the life-giving Spirit? Where the scenes witnessed at Ayr and Irvine? The word was then with power. The people hearkened and heard for eternity. They came from their closets, and they returned to their closets, to weep and pray.

Prayer is now too much restrained. “We have not, because we ask not.” The Spirit is waiting to be gracious; but there are few who avail themselves of their privileges, and stir themselves up to take hold of his strength. We are not straitened in him, but in our own bowels. If we would give ourselves more to prayer, the results would be more animating and delightful. The revivals of Moulin and Arran were the fruits of much prayer. Mr Findlater of Glenlyon, and Mr Shaw of Bracadale, whose ministry was so successful, were men of uncommon prayer. Welsh, of Ayr, could not rest in his bed, from his prayerful solicitude about his people.

If you form yourselves into praying societies, who can tell the consequences? Will you say that it is not yet time to convert the world, and reform our nation? When would you say the graves are ripe for the resurrection? They are ready whenever Jesus chooses to exert his power. And the world is ready to receive the Gospel whenever the Holy Ghost pours out his blessing upon the preaching of the Word. Will you refuse to hasten on that blessed day, when the name of Jesus shall be raised above every name, and when all your brethren, whether Jews or Gentiles, shall be saved?

What an honour, to forward the triumphs of the Gospel! Would you have rejoiced to publish through the camp of Israel the erection of the brazen serpent, and tell the sick and dying of its virtues? Would you have been delighted to carry through the provinces of Babylon the decree of Cyrus, and proclaim liberty to the captive Jews? Oh! then, hasten to the aid of these praying associations, and unite your intercessions with the supplications of God’s people, for carrying on the work of the Lord. They have something nobler in view than national benefits, or temporal deliverance. You cannot create heaven, redeem sinners, nor replenish the Gospel with its sacred and invaluable treasure,—these are works infinitely beyond the reach of created power; but by bringing a sinner to the enjoyment of the great salvation, what do you actually perform? The man who opens the eyes of the blind, or unstops the ears of the deaf, renders them as great a service as if he had formed the light of the sun, or poured around them all the sounds of delight and harmony; and the man who knocks off the fetters of ignorance and vice, and introduces his neighbour into the knowledge of the Gospel, and the glorious liberty of the sons of God, renders him a service second in importance only to the paying of the ransom for his soul, crowding the Gospel with its blessings, and filling heaven with its glory! Light is of no value to a man without eyes, and sound is possessed of no advantage to him who is without ears,—and what is the use of all the wonders of redeeming mercy, and of all the riches of saving grace, to a man who neither knows God nor obeys the Gospel of his Son?

THE HOUSE OF THE INFIDEL; OR, THE PROGRESS OF INFIDELITY.

BY THE REV. THOMAS DIMMA, A.M.,

Minister of Queensferry, Linlithgowshire.

THE religion of the Cross has always been an object of attack and deep-rooted hatred to those who, with hearts unrenewed, and souls untouched, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, drink with unquenched avidity from those polluted fountains which, on every side, invite their wandering steps. They have nothing in common with the high and holy feelings it cherishes and brings to maturity; its pure and heavenly motives are not understood by them, and, therefore, they can never act on the principles it inculcates, and the doctrines it recommends. Pleasure cannot be taken in studying those heavenly truths which are opposed to all the wishes and desires of the unchanged soul; but all the natural tendencies of a corrupt and unsanctified heart are countenanced by the partialities, and strengthened by the fatal courses, which such men think it their duty to pursue.

The dark workings of human nature may lie long concealed under the unseemly mass with which it is overborne; but the restless, unsatisfied mind, is prosecuting in secret that dark and ruinous training which will speedily manifest in what way the past has been employed. Many an early impression must be eradicated, and many glimmerings of a better spirit extinguished. The first lessons of parental anxiety for the soul's welfare are gradually obliterated; first, with a gentle touch, from which the heart recoils; and then with the bold dash of a hand unconnected with compunctious feeling!

The Bible kept its place long, and its sacred pages imparted many an element of pure pleasure, in spite of the tendency unhappily inherent in the soul. It was perused, because it had been recommended as the Word of the living God, by those who, in happier moments than the present, were believed, as friends that could not deceive. It was revered as containing, in its hallowed pages, those blessed truths that solace the mind in affliction,—sweeten the hour of adversity, and draw around the closing hours of human existence that support that deprives the grave of its victory, and death of its sting. The Bible, too, had connected with it all the recollections impressed on the mind, of its having long taken its accustomed place on the family altar, and as having served for the heavenly food, which the morning and evening devotional exercises extracted from its hallowed pages. Honour was paid to the Bible, as suggesting to pastors, venerable and respected, the groundwork of those weekly instructions which were intended to train the soul for the higher joys of a glorious immortality. The Bible, which had formed the study of the good, the wise, and the learned, in every age, was considered too sacred to be touched with unhallowed hands. It had been the manual by day, and the meditation by night, of the most sublime intellects that ever adorned human nature; and through ages dark and foreboding, it had been the comforter of those who had no other than this and their God.

It would cost much to part with the hallowed recollections, and to eradicate all the early associations connected with this Sacred Volume; but, alas! when the enemy is allowed to exert his subtle wiles unnoticed, and when his first efforts are despised, the progress is awfully rapid that leads to the entire rejection of divine truth. The mind, formerly timid, changes its tones,—pride lends its powerful aid, and the idea of superior discernment is fondly cherished. The man of cautious step now assumes a bold and prominent bearing. Words once uttered in a whisper, are now put forth with the tones and emphasis of avowed superiority. And for what purpose is this done? To scoff at divine truth,—to sap its foundations,—to throw a firebrand into the midst of poor, sinful mortals, rejoicing they have a Bible to guide them,—to blight the tender sensibilities of early youth,—to root out the early impressions that prayer had been presented to hallow—a mother had watched over to strengthen; and to endeavour to persuade the aged, that the Bible may be safely laid aside, as a guide to the feeble, or as a solace to the departing soul!

But is such a course really pursued, and is it not rather the sound of groundless alarm, warning against an evil that does not exist, or guarding against a danger that does not threaten? Thus some would assert, and some would believe; but enter the dwelling of the Infidel, and mark his occupation. Now employed in composing those pestilential productions that the press is too ready to circulate; exulting over the page going forth to dispense the true light over a darkened world; musing over the havoc ready to be produced among the unsuspicious or ill-defended of a credulous generation; drinking in, with greedy delight, the accounts that reach him, of the gropings of anxious minds, labouring to come within the reach of the true light; and taking delight in anticipating the overthrow of long-received and warmly-cherished opinions.

In one corner lie the journals of avowed Infidelity, stamped on every page with the seal of the enemy of souls! Here, the candid philosophical inquirer, surrounded with his plausible sophistries—seeking the subversion of Divine truth. There, courting observation, the productions of the man who hath set himself down, with deliberation, to destroy the faith that hath comforted the closing moments of many a pious soul. Mark, in another quarter, the ephemeral productions of a bustling age, that fly thick as autumn leaves, resting at every door, suiting every capacity, concealed under the thin veil of allegory, disguised in fable, hidden in simple tale,—now assuming the tone of philosophy, the bold assertion of unblushing scepticism, or the wily twistings of that serpent's guile that introduced misery and wretchedness into our fallen world!

Here, all tastes are gratified—all capacities suited—and every purse consulted. The splendid volume, with ambitious page, now attracts; the poet tunes his lyre, not in praise of Him who came "from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah," but to cast a stigma on the manger of Bethlehem, and to blight with infectious breath—"the Desire of all nations." Here, the student is invited to confound himself among the pages, studiously obscure,—and there, to meet the unstable minds and ill-arranged thoughts of the young, lie the sybil leaves, requiring no gathering and no fitting to convey the deleterious poison of which they are the bearers.

But is the Bible not there also? the eye looks around in vain. It hath long been banished—loaded with ignominy—branded with opprobrious epithets—and viewed as the only remaining barrier that prevents the mind, now emancipated, from asserting the place she is destined to take up in the progress of a liberalized age, and about to be for ever exempted from the thralldom of a too long engulfing darkness! It is parted with, and no compunction felt; or the mind, wrought up with the frantic excitement of new-born light, assumes the bold bearing, of daring to rend asunder, and scatter to the winds, those Sacred Pages, which, for thousands of years, have excited the admiration, and cheered the mind, of the wisest and the best of the ages that are past. Or, it may be, glorying in his shame, telling, when a listener can be found, that the Bible, being unworthy of credit, and an unfit guide to the mind emancipated from the slavery under which it hath so long been held in ignoble chains, has met with the treatment it merits, in being applied to ignoble uses; and how, that now, bearing in his hand the torch of Truth, a crusade is commenced against the Sacred Volume,—and the appetite, for its destruction, not easily satiated, can tell of the havoc one hand has made, in subtracting copies of Scripture, with greedy haste, from the sacred store which pious care had provided for the millions yet unborn! Approach, and listen to the vain boast—what the daring hands of one would-be sage has accomplished in a warfare against Sacred Truth. It is wished to establish the fact.

that the cause of truth has been promoted, and the day of true illumination accelerated! And what is left to build upon till this day of coming regeneration arrives—while the lips give no utterance to prayer—while the deep searchings of an anxious soul are unknown—while the house of God is shut, and the ministrations at the altar are abandoned? O, what is there to keep man thus tossed in his frail bark on the dark ocean of uncertainty? There is, it is true, the bold avowal, that the Bible cannot be the Word of God,—that the Revelation of mercy, through the blood of Christ, is a fiction of the imagination,—that the soul may mingle with the ashes of the body in one undistinguished mass,—and, that beyond the present all is a dark unknown, through which none can penetrate,—and, that to enjoy the present, undisturbed by the terrors of a day of final reckoning, is the true wisdom of man!

Must this be taken as the cure for the earnest desire "to escape from the wrath to come," and the soothing draught, suited to the soul crying out—"What shall I do to be saved?" Must all the piety, worth, patience, forbearance, Christian devotedness of the wise and good, be considered as the empty displays, or the fateful dreams of a heated imagination? To listen to our Infidels—to drink in the ipse dixit of our philosophers—to be tainted by the venom of the polluted pages over which they muse, or to be moved by their bold avowments—such would be the result, and such the supports on which the mind, strong and healthy under its new intellectual training, would rest.

If silence be mistaken for conviction—if the downcast look, expressive of horror at bold assertions, be construed into acquiescence—and the solemn remark be viewed as the last public support of tenets now crumbling into the dust of forgetfulness,—mark the complacency resting on the brow of the Infidel, and the determination formed to prosecute the advantage now conceived to be secured.

The little, but select, happy society is now to be increased by another convert. True bias is found in such a course. Proud in the hour of victory, tender youth is assailed by the impious jest, or the perplexing doubt; active manhood is exposed to ribald sneers; and age is attacked, and pressed to bury for ever all Bible supports in the gloomy grave of daring scepticism! And who are the associates that Infidel philosophers, Socialists, and unbelievers, delight to call their own? Pass them in review, and mark them well. Here enters one whom dissipation has ruined, with weakened nerves and timid step, seeking a soporific draught to drown the uneasy risings of awakened conscience;—there, steps forward another, buried under ignorance, from which no effort is made to escape;—a third, uneasy under the restraints of affectionate parental solicitude. Notice the hasty step of him who hears of a system that suits the state of a disordered mind;—there moves one, with mind elated by the discoveries of a fancied panacea for all the ills of suffering, oppressed humanity; there, too, are found the Sabbath-breaker, and the poor wanderer, whose footsteps have never been directed to the house of God. The closet sends out its inmates, whom the voice of prayer hath not solemnised, and whose hearts the sacred page of Divine Truth has not hallowed. Infidelity, too, counts among its associates those ever whose cheeks the tear of penitence has never fallen, and whose hearts have never experienced a void that Christ alone can fill. The wise men of the day are there; the sceptical inquirer comes armed with doubts; and the man boldly defying the thunderings of Divine truth draws near. All are welcome. Unholy, unconverted, in bonded fellowship, are leagued in seeking to unseat the Divine Redeemer from his throne, and to sneer at the wisdom that has characterised the fervent piety and the deep devotedness of a past age!

Infidelity, however decked out, is a dreadful resort. Its dwelling, however pageanted, is the chamber of death. Its internal arrangements, however inviting, are the preludes of a poisonous banquet about to be served up. Its literature, the garbage of closets, which have sent forth their ephemeral leaves, blackened with deadly hate against the cause of Christ. Its conversation, the sickening dose of the unbeliever's cup, presented with a ready hand—or the insidious poison, imported from that land where the goddess of Reason was worshipped, and where Voltaire, armed with inveterate malice against Christianity, raised his impious voice to silence the angel announcement—"Peace on earth, and good-will to the children of men!"—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him."

Mark the dwelling, and shun it. Keep far away from the sound of invitations, however pressing. Enter not the abode where the Bible is denied a resting-place; and guard against the men that labour to convince others that the religion of Jesus is unworthy of the credence of those who are initiated into the unholy rites, that Infidelity boasts of as her own happy discovery.

Over the land an awful tide of unbelief is rolling. Men are exposed to the danger of breathing the pestilential atmosphere of the wily Sceptic or the daring Infidel. Youth, in its unsuspecting walks, is exposed to the danger of being entrapt by the lurking enemy, that counsels against the remembrance of the Creator. He that hath sought to see Jesus, and has enjoyed the privilege, is in the way of being told that the Christian's hopes are visionary, and that "the peace the world can neither give nor take away" is a vain delusion! There is dreadful activity on foot. The cause of evangelical Truth is hated by the votaries of Satan, and its extermination sought. Vain is the attempt! It rests on the Rock of Ages; against it the gates of hell shall never prevail!

God will send his Spirit to assist those that ask his aid, and will cherish with heavenly dew "the plant of renown" for the healing of the nations! Infidelity may boast of its conquests; but God's cause, strong in eternal truth, will increase and cover the world; while the flimsy pretensions of Infidel philosophy shall crumble into the dust of everlasting forgetfulness.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Christian's security.—Never were there times which inculcated more forcibly, than those in which we live, the wisdom of seeking a happiness beyond the reach of human vicissitudes. What striking lessons have we had of the precarious tenure of all sublunary possessions! Wealth, and power, and prosperity, how peculiarly transitory and uncertain! But religion dispenses her choicest cordials in the seasons of exigence, in poverty, in exile, in sickness, and in death. The essential superiority of that support which is derived from religion is less felt, at least is less apparent, when the Christian is in full possession of riches, and splendour, and rank, and all the gifts of nature and fortune. But when all these are swept away by the rude hand of time, or the rough blast of adversity, the true Christian stands, like the glory of the forest, erect and vigorous; stripped indeed of his summer foliage, but more than ever discovering to the observing eye the solid strength of substantial texture. —W. WILBERFORCE.

Justification and Sanctification inseparable.—The image of Deity is a blessing provided in the covenant of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. It is as necessary for man as the righteousness of Christ. God cannot confer one without the other: prize them both equally; view them as distinct blessings, yet necessarily united to each other. Both of them cost the Son of God his life.—HOWELS.

SOME OBSERVATIONS ON THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF THE REFORMATION.

BY THOMAS BROWN, ESQ.

AT an early period in the history of the Christian Church, corruptions began to be introduced, which gradually increased as time elapsed, and at length was formed that monstrous mass of heresy and false tradition—the Church of Rome. For several centuries that corrupt Church maintained undisturbed rule throughout the whole of Christendom.

What learning then existed was confined within the walls of convents and monasteries; and an erring and fallible mortal, decorated with a triple crown, regulated, under the guise of humility and sanctity, the destinies of the world. Corruption and vices of every description gradually introduced themselves into the palaces of the great Church dignitaries, as well as into the mysterious recesses of the lower orders of the clergy; and the plain, peaceful, sublime virtues exemplified by the first founders of the Christian religion gave way, in process of time, to views of worldly aggrandisement and priestly domination. While the Divine Founder of the Christian religion was “rejected and despised of men,” and had “not where to lay his head,” his representative on earth (which the Popes to this day style themselves) monopolized the wealth of a superstitious and credulous world, to minister to his own temporal luxuries; and had splendid palaces to resort to, where he reposed in the lap of indolence, priding himself on the dominion he had acquired over the minds of men,—and equally indifferent to their privations and sufferings, as well as to the vices and crimes which extended far and wide around the seat of spiritual authority. The cardinals, unlike the poor, humble fishermen of Galilee, divided with the pontiff the fruits of spoliation raised by their joint avarice and rapacity, and were surrounded in their magnificent dwellings with every luxury which human art could devise or the imagination refine upon. These evils having gradually acquired consistency and form, and the clergy organized a system calculated to extend and perpetuate their dominion over the minds of men, grew less fastidious and careful, as to the means employed to gain their ends—and thinking themselves impregnable within the strongholds they had erected, and confiding in the subserviency of mankind, to promote their views they partly drew up the veil which had hidden their artful machinations for so many centuries, and discovered to an astonished world how much man had allowed themselves to be deceived and imposed upon. Finding at last that the light of reason, and a spirit of investigation found an opening into the mysterious and gloomy recesses where they had hitherto deemed themselves most secure, they thought of keeping mankind in subjection and awe, by the rack and the torture, and poured forth into every country ministers devoted to their cause, and ready to execute, over their simple and unoffending victims, every species of cruelty which the most abandoned and the most unfeeling of the human species could possibly contrive. This spirit of persecution manifested itself at the early periods of the Reformation, when the abuses and corruptions of the court of Rome had risen to a height which it was not possible any longer to conceal. The first victim of their cruelty was John Huss, who began to preach the new tenets in Bohemia in 1400, and was burned alive at the Council of Constance in 1415, by order of Pope John XXIII.

At a later period, Pope Leo X., in order to raise money (as professedly avowed to build St Peter's church), made a regular trade of selling what were termed indulgences, or, in other words, permission to perpetrate any crime whatever, for which free pardon was given by the Pope, and the price was proportioned to the enormity of the offence. Before I proceed farther, however, with this part of my subject, it will be necessary to advert to the state of the North of Germany, destined, at a later period, to become the theatre of great events, and where the power of the Popes was first assailed by the bold, undaunted, and fearless efforts of the Reformers.

For some centuries before the Reformation, Germany, and particularly that part of it, was inhabited by hordes of barbarians, powerful as to their warlike spirit and numbers, and who were enveloped in the darkness of superstition and paganism. They bid defiance to the Roman power, and at no time submitted to its sway. These various nations gradually merged into some degree of order under different chieftains, or markgraves, and laid the foundation of the houses of Saxony, Walbeck, Bavaria, Misnia, Hohenzollern, the Teutonic Knights and others, who, at a subsequent period, submitted for a while to the rule of Charlemagne in 780. These states were severally engaged in constant warfare among themselves for five or six successive centuries, and came, according to the fortune of war, under the sway of the most powerful of the combatants, till very near the period of the Reformation, when a more civilized form of society prevailed; and the clouds of superstition, as well as the horrors of warfare, gave way to the blessings of security and peace. In 1415, the Emperor of Austria conferred the electoral dignity on Frederic of Hohenzollern accompanied with the donation of the state of Brandenburg. This and the neighbouring states became in the course of succeeding years, the seat of warfare, productive of those great events, which appertain more particularly to the subject now under our consideration.

The opening of the sixteenth century formed a remarkable epoch in the history of the world—a thirst for knowledge—a desire for information regarding the rights of men, both as to spiritual and temporal matters, manifested itself in a particular manner over that part of the Continent; and the human mind awakening from the torpor and lethargy in which it had, for ages, been held by the tyranny of the Church of Rome, blazed forth with renewed power and energy.

The unprincipled conduct of Leo X., as to the sale of indulgences (to which I have already alluded), excited the indignation of every reflecting mind, and this was increased to the highest degree, when Rome poured her emissaries into Saxony, where its exactions became intolerable. The right to raise money there by the sale of indulgences was farmed out and sold to the highest bidder, and the proceeds made a present of by Leo to his sister, to increase the already overgrown wealth of his family, thus setting all decency and the laws of justice and morality at defiance. Luther was the first of the great pioneers of the Reformation, who openly preached against the sale of these indulgences in 1516, for which he was excommunicated by the Pope in 1520. But he gloried in the justice of his cause, and stood undismayed amidst the dangers and the threatenings which surrounded him on all sides. In 1525 he renounced the monk's habit, and espoused Catherine de Bore, thus encouraging, by his example, other priests, condemned to celibacy by the rules of the Romish Church, to follow the dictates of reason and of nature. Several princes and rulers, attracted by the prospect of ecclesiastical spoliation, and dividing among themselves lands and property which the rapacity of the Church had monopolised for so many years, eagerly adopted the tenets and principles of the Reformed doctrines. The Elector of Saxony was the first to give the example; and the States of Hesse, Hanover, Suabia, the Palatinate, part of Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, and Silesia, soon afterwards adopted the new religion. Calvin appeared in France in 1533. Persecuted there, on account of the change in his opinions on matters of faith, he retired to Basle, where he published his Institutes.

In 1536 the town of Geneva entered the lists, and added new strength and influence to the cause of the Reformation. In 1539, Joachim II., Elector of Brandenburg, embraced the doctrines of Luther, and the Bishop of Brandenburg followed his example. Henry VIII. of England, having written against Luther, received from Pope Leo X. the title of "Defender of the Faith." However, as Henry could not persuade the haughty pontiff to annul his marriage with Catherine of Arragon, the King separated from her of his own authority. Clement VII., for this act of insubordination and disobedience to the holy See, excommunicated Henry, which induced him to adopt and promulgate the Reformed religion in England.

At this critical period in the history of Europe, the influence and authority of the See of Rome was giving way on all sides, and the power and ecclesiastical tyranny they had wielded over the minds of ignorant and credulous men for fifteen centuries, gradually disappeared before the voice of reason and common sense. Finding the threats and fulminations of the Vatican of no avail, they thought of keeping the world in awe by cruelty and force; and many reigning princes, influenced by the crafty policy of the Church, and still trembling under its authority, had the weakness to receive, and the cruelty to execute, orders from the Papal government, for the extermination of millions of unoffending individuals, who were either burned alive at the stake, tortured and immolated within the walls of the Inquisition, or hunted down at the point of the bayonet, by hired assassins for that purpose. Of the perpetration of these horrid atrocities, the massacre of St Bartholomew, the cruelties in the Austrian Netherlands, and, at a later period, the persecutions of the Protestants in the Palatinate subsequent to the revocation of the edict of Nantes, form most memorable and striking examples; and let it ever be remembered, that every one of these bloody and remorseless deeds were committed either by direct orders from the See of Rome, or connived at by that redoubtable tribunal. One thing is certain, that on all these occasions Tu Deus was celebrated at Rome—thus offering up thanks to a God of mercy and of peace for having committed acts which make humanity shudder, and which generations yet unborn will hardly believe to have been perpetrated. The Emperor Charles V. was at the head of the Popish party in Germany, when the war began in 1546, on account of the prevailing differences on matters of faith. It terminated by the peace of Passau. Nearly a century afterwards, the Protestant princes, interested in the preservation of their rights and territorial possessions, formed a confederation at Lauenburg, which involved Germany in a long war. It was terminated by the peace of Westphalia in 1648, which formed the basis of every subsequent negotiation, where either the temporal or spiritual interests of the parties were concerned. Exhausted Europe began to revive, after such long protracted struggles; the arts and sciences received more encouragement from the princes who had contended for mastery; and thus a prospect opened for suffering humanity, which the nations hailed with joyous anticipations.

Amidst the vicissitudes and changes appertaining to the Roman Catholic Church, which I have shortly been adverting to, its policy remains the same, its spiritual pride unsubdued, its thirst for worldly power and universal domination unaltered, and, as far as we can judge from the past, unalterable. If the See of Rome had the power, the horrors of the Inquisition would be revived in every country—the gibbet and the rack be in operation, to depress and subdue the energies of the human mind, and bring it again under the thralldom of ecclesiastical despotism. But these days, we trust, are for ever gone. The sword of persecution has returned to its scabbard; the funeral pile, raised up to consume human victims, exists no more; the instruments of torture are shown only as objects of curiosity; and the thunders of the Vatican, as well as the benedictions of the "most holy father," are unheeded and uncared for beyond the banks of the Tiber.

THOUGHTS ON CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

BY THE EDITOR.

THE individual responsibility of man is a subject fraught with interest, and one which is well worthy of engaging the attention of every reflecting mind. We must, each one of us, give an account of himself to God. All our talents, advantages, and opportunities of improvement must be weighed as in the balance of the sanctuary, and every man shall receive according to his deeds, whether they have been good, or whether they have been evil. Such a consideration as this lends an awful importance to every thought, and word, and action. It is written in the book of God's remembrance, and shall ultimately receive its corresponding reward or its corresponding punishment. It is a fact, indeed, laid down with undoubted certainty, in the Sacred Scriptures, that there is an intimate and most important connection between the present and a future life,—a connection affecting our happiness both in time and through eternity. In this view, our present stage of being must be regarded by us as the seed-time, which will be followed in due course by a harvest-time hereafter. "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Each individual's actions and feelings have thus an obvious bearing upon his happiness or misery.

And, moreover, every individual is operating upon every other individual; and not only has each his own peculiar sphere over which he communicates the influence, whether beneficial or otherwise, of his own example; but there is also a more extensive system with which he is as intimately, though not perhaps so obviously connected—a system, including the men of every age and of every clime. To these he communicates his own share, however minute, of peculiar opinions, and expressions, and habits, and customs. A little reflection will satisfy us as to the truth of this remark; and in illustration of it, select an individual from the humblest, and what are termed the most unimportant, classes of society. He has his own sphere, however limited, within which his own dispositions, and feelings, and habits are incessantly operating upon those around him. These peculiarities received from him by his relatives and associates, are communicated in turn to all within their sphere, for each individual is, as it were, the sun of his own system, and thus it is that every step we proceed, the problem of our moral responsibility becomes more intricate, until it exceeds the limits of our finite comprehensions. The idea is vast, but it is of awful importance; it teaches us how every man shall be judged—not as a mere isolated being, but as connected with the men of all ages and of all countries.

Let these remarks be duly weighed, and the Christian cannot fail to discern the reasonableness and propriety of "walking honestly towards them that are without." His character stands out as it were in bold relief from the multitude of his fellow-mortals around him, the majority of whom are impelled by motives and principles of action essentially different from his own. From the exalted station in society which the believer occupies as a "light of the world," he is too often an object of suspicion and jealousy to the inconsiderate and ungodly, and professing as he does, to feel the power of those doctrines which are "according to godliness," an argument is readily deduced from his occasional errors, by the enemies of the Cross, in vindication of their wickedness and contempt of the Gospel.

But while many superficial thinkers have been repelled from the walks of Christianity by this hollow reasoning, from the improper conduct of men, to the falsehood of statements which must ever be independent of all who profess them; it is consoling to reflect that the influence of a habitually devout, and regular, and consistent Christian deportment, is peculiarly attractive. Though our nature be undoubtedly corrupt, yet there is no man whose perception is so blunted, as not to admire the beautiful in moral character. There seems to be a charm in holiness which commands the reverence, and gains the esteem of all within the sphere of its exhibition; for when the Christian graces are habitually exercised in the daily intercourse of life, not only is the world constrained to admire them, but to admit that there is a reality in that transforming influence, which Christianity is alleged to operate. Thus it is, that by a view of the Christian character, presented under various aspects, some of the most determined enemies of our most holy faith have become its warmest and most decided friends.

There is a peculiar influence, however, which in every possible situation the believer exercises over those who are "without." When in his general deportment he evinces that he has been with Jesus, every opinion he utters, every action he performs, conveys a corresponding impression to the mind of the unbeliever, who hears the one or witnesses the other. It either impresses him with the superiority of the Christian character, or establishes him in his rooted contempt of the truth. It either attracts or it repels him, leading him to pause and consider his ways, or exciting him to a more quickened progress along the road that leadeth to destruction. The reflection is solemn, but its truth is undeniable. Professing Christians, by every word that escapes from their lips, and by every action, however apparently trivial, of their lives, exert a decided influence upon the world. Mind cannot act without influencing mind, either directly or indirectly. Intelligence, purpose, affection, are every moment either polluting or purifying the air we breathe, and to this noxious or healthful influence, every individual, and, more especially, every professing Christian, is accessory. Without the pale of true Christianity, one dark mass of moral pollution infests the atmosphere, like a pestilential vapour. Would to God we could affirm that within the circle in which Christians live and breathe, a clear, unpolluted atmosphere, at all times exerted its healthful and invigorating influence; but as long as they bear about with them a body of sin and death, an event so desirable cannot be expected. In proportion, however, be it ever remembered, to the extent of their inconsistency of character, in the same proportion are they engaged in promoting the cause of the Prince of darkness, and encouraging those who "are without," in their opposition to the truth. How melancholy the thought that they who ought to prove themselves the salt of the earth, should, instead of preserving the world from destruction, hasten even by one hour the completion of that process of moral corruption, which will at length draw down the wrath of God against "all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." Better were it, my Christian readers, infinitely better, that the name of Jesus never escaped from your lips, than that you should exhibit to the world a cold, heartless, inconsistent profession, which, instead of establishing, only unsettles the wavering; and instead of disarming, only confirms the unbeliever in a more hardy and determined resistance to the Gospel of Christ. You stand conspicuous in the world, as having openly declared yourselves on the Lord's side, and in every thing you are naturally expected to maintain a deportment in strict harmony with the principles you have professed. To your fellow-Christians you owe that love which is the invariable characteristic of those who have "passed from death unto life;" and to the unbelieving world around, you owe a decorous, and creditable, and consistent conduct. If you preserve not in your intercourse with those who are "without," that strict integrity of character, and purity of intention, and singleness of heart, which invariably command respect, you give occasion to the enemy to bring against you the charge of inconsistency, and even to blaspheme that holy name by the which you are called. What follower of Jesus, whose conscience is tender in respect of the slightest infringement upon the honour of his Lord, would not feel humbled to the dust at the idea that his conduct had given rise to such hardened impiety? If even the world's votaries, who scoff at religion, surpass you in the common virtues, and decencies, and charities of life, what are your boasted professions of religion, but the whitened coating of the sepulchre, "which within is full of rottenness and all uncleanness? Ah! it is impossible to describe the injury which hath been done in the world by inconsistent professors of the truth. How many weak Christians have, by their unhallowed influence, been led to stumble and fall? How many lukewarm professors of the Christian faith have they tended, by their example, to lull into indifference and spiritual slumber! How many tears have they wrung from the eyes of the true followers of Jesus! What vigour have they imparted to the unholly purpose!—what celerity to the melancholy progress of the sinner! Unjust in their dealings, false in their assertions, unfaithful to their engagements, slothful in their business, they disregard those pure and lofty motives which ought ever to actuate the believer in all the circumstances and relations of life. What wonder is it, then, should their character be an object of contempt in the view of every discerning man, and reprobate in the sight of the infinitely pure Jehovah? They endeavour, and too often succeed in their endeavours, to deceive their fellow-men; but God cannot be deceived. He will not be mocked, and the period is fast approaching when they shall stand finally at His judgment-seat.

Should any Christian who knows and who loves the Saviour, peruse these imperfect hints, we beseech him, if he regards the cause of God and of truth, to strive and pray that in all things he may "walk circumspectly." Remember that every step you take in life involves in it a high moral responsibility, affecting your happiness throughout eternal ages,—and not yours only, but the happiness of all within the reach of your influence. Be especially careful, that in all your dealings and intercourse with the world, the Christian graces may shine forth in their native brightness, lest you should tend, by the slightest inconsistency of conduct, to retard by one hour the return of a single soul to God, or confirm one sinner in his impenitence, and unbelief, and hardness of heart. Let the spirit of Christianity be visible in your whole deportment; let every letter of "the living epistle be known and read of all men;" and "let your light so shine, that others, seeing your good works, may glorify your Father who is in heaven." Then, and then only, will your Christian profession in the eyes of the world approve itself sincere, having its fruit evidently unto holiness,—and its end shall assuredly be everlasting life.

THE CREATION.

BY ANDREW PARK,

Author of "Blindness; or, the Second Sense Restored and Lost. A Poem," &c.

WHEN black-wing'd Chaos sat on regal throne,
In solemn grandeur, silent and alone,
God said, "Let there be light," and forth it shone!

The new-born Spheres celestial anthems sung,
Electric, to empyrean realms they sprung;
Rending the robes that wrapt primeval Night,
And fill'd the vaulted firmament with light!

Fix'd in the sky, dense vapour roll'd away,
And then the Sun, exulting, said, "'Tis Day!"
The Moon and Stars succeeding, calm and bright,
In virgin mildness whisper'd, "It is Night!"
The Hills and Valleys, bursting at His nod,
Assumed their shapes, and own'd the power of God!
The Worlds, before unform'd, now sprung to birth,
And one, in triumph, utter'd, "I am Earth!"

How radiant was the youthful Sunbeam then,
Though yet unsmiled on by the eyes of men!
With vivid and refulgent wings out-sprung,
It fled afar; on ancient Gloom it cast
A fatal fiery ray—he died at last;
And round a wondrous world new lustre shed!

Thus did the King of Day pursue in might
His glorious course thro' realms before unknown,
Until he met the gentle Queen of Night
And claim'd the heaven-born daughter as his own!
And though she sometimes veils from him her love,—
Conceals her vestal looks, her silvery smile,
And to her azure palace, far above,
Retires, and leaves her retinue a while,—
Soon weary of her solitude, again
She journeys forth to join her beauteous train!

So glory lit the lofty realms of Heaven,
And the round earth lay rolling in the arms
Of new created Light; and thus were given
To its young being myriads of charms:
While on a cloud, that skimm'd the viewless air,
Bright Angels flash'd their sun-refracting wings,
And, ravish'd with a sight so wondrous fair,
Dropp'd music from their harps' celestial strings;
And, as above the warm young world they stood,
Swell'd forth an holy anthem to the praise
Of Him who rules in righteousness always,
As, in His wisdom, He pronounced it "Good!"

ANGELS' ANTHEM.

Eternal Spirit, ever bright,
Too dazzling far for angel-eyes!
How shall thy host proclaim the might
With which thou govern'st Earth and Skies?
How shall seraphic forms proclaim
Thy will omnipotent above,
Or take into their lips thy name,
And not be all consum'd by love?

Infinite and omniscient Lord!

Thy fiat can create a world:
The Mountains tremble at thy word,—
The Seas are to their channels hurl'd!
Thou strewest Heaven with orbs of light,
For ever blissful, ever young;
And now hast drawn the veil from Night,
That round the sable monarch hung.

WILLIAM HUNTER;

A MARTYR OF THE MARYAN PERSECUTION.

THE account which follows, of a helpless victim of Popish cruelty and intolerance during the reign of the bloody Mary, we select from an interesting little work which has just appeared, under the title of "The Last Days of the Martyrs." By Andrew R. Bonar.*

William Hunter, a London apprentice, was, in the first year of Mary's reign, commanded by the priest of his parish (Coleman Street), to receive the communion at mass; and upon his refusal, was threatened to be brought before the Bishop of London. His master, who was a silk-weaver, apprehensive of the consequences of sheltering a heretic, ordered Hunter to leave the house. He accordingly went to Brentford, and resided for a short time with his father. Within a few weeks, Hunter having chanced to enter Brentford chapel, took up a Bible which lay on a desk, and began to read it aloud; but was interrupted by one Father Atwell, who came in and said, "What! meddlest thou with the Bible? Knowest thou what thou readest? and canst thou expound the Scriptures?" Hunter answered, "I take not upon me to expound the Scriptures; but finding the Bible here when I came, I read in it to my comfort." The bigoted priest said, "It has not been a merry world since the Bible came abroad in English." Hunter answered, "Say not so, for God's sake; for it is God's book, out of which every one that has grace may learn to know both what pleases God, and also what displeases him." The priest said, "Could we not tell before this time as well as now, how God was served?" Hunter answered, "No, not so well as we can now do, if we have his blessed Word amongst us still as we had. I pray God that we may have the blessed Bible among us continually." Atwell said, "I perceive your mind well enough: you are one of them that dislike the queen's laws, and therefore you came from London; you learned these ways at London; but you must turn over another leaf, or else you, and a greater number more heretics, will broil for this." "God give me grace that I may believe his Word, and confess his name, whatsoever come," said Hunter. "Confess His name," said Atwell; "no, no; ye will go to the devil all of you, and confess his name." The priest had no sooner said this, than he left the chapel in a great fury, saying, "I am not able to reason with thee, but I will fetch one who shall talk with thee, I warrant thee, thou heretic." And, leaving Hunter reading the Bible, he returned with the vicar of Southwell, who said, "Sirrah, who gave thee leave to read in the Bible, and to expound it?" Hunter answered, "I expound not the Scriptures, Sir, but read them for my comfort." "Why meddlest thou with them at all?" said the vicar; "it becomes not such as you to meddle with the Scriptures." Hunter replied, "I will read the Scriptures (God willing) while I live; and you ought not, Master Vicar, to discourage any man in that manner, but rather exhort men diligently to read the Scriptures, for your discharge and their own." The vicar answered, "It becomes thee well to tell me what I have to do! I see thou art an heretic by thy words." Hunter said, "I am no heretic for speaking the truth." The vicar said, "It is a queer world, when such as thou art shalt teach us what is the truth. Thou art meddling, Father Atwell tells me, with the sixth of John, in which thou mayest perceive how Christ saith, 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.'" Then Atwell said, "When you read it, I said that you might there understand how, in the sacrament of the altar, is Christ's very natural body and blood." "Ah," said the vicar, "what sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Believest thou not in it, and that the bread and wine is substantiated into the very body and blood of Christ?" Hunter replied, "I learn no such thing in the sixth of John; you understand Christ's words much like the carnal Capernaites, who thought that Christ would have given them his flesh to feed upon; which opinion our Saviour Christ corrected, when he said, 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life.'" "Now," said the vicar, "I have found thee out; now I see that thou art an heretic indeed, and that thou dost not believe in the sacrament of the altar." Hunter answered, "I would that you and I were now tied fast to a stake, to prove whether I or you would stand strongest to our faith." The vicar answered, "It shall not be so tried." "No," said Hunter, "for I think I know who would soonest recant; for I durst set my foot against yours, even to the death." "That we shall see," said the vicar, who, before he departed, threatened to make Hunter suffer for his opinions.

Immediately after, the vicar told Brown of the communication which he had held with Hunter; upon which Brown sent for Hunter's father, and the constable. Hunter, dreading the vicar's vengeance, fled from his father's house. When Hunter's father was brought before Master Brown, he immediately asked where his son was. His father answered, "If it please you, Sir, I know not." Justice Brown then said, "I will make thee tell where he is, and fetch him forth also, ere I have done with thee;" and he threatened the old man with imprisonment, unless he brought back his son. When the old man had ridden after him two or three days' journey, William met his father, and told him that he thought he was seeking for him. His father confessing it, wept sore, and said that Master Brown strictly charged him to bring him back; "but," said he, "I will return home again, and say I cannot find you." But William answered, "Father, I will go home with you, and save you harmless, whatever comes of it."

No sooner did Hunter reach home, than he was put into the stocks by the constables, who afterwards brought him to Brown. The justice having commanded the Bible to be brought, began to reason with Hunter, saying, "I hear say you are a Scripture man, and can reason on the sixth of John, and expound it as pleases you;" he then charged him with having made an exposition, when the vicar and he talked together. Hunter said, "He urged me to say as much as I did." "Well," said the justice, "as you can expound so well, how say you to the twenty-second of St Luke? Look here, for Christ saith, That the bread is his body." Hunter answered, "The text saith that Christ took bread, but not that he changed it into another substance, but gave that which he took, and brake that which he gave, which was bread, as is evident by the text; for otherwise, he should have had two bodies, to affirm which I see no reason."

Brown was very angry at this answer, took up the Bible, turned over the leaves, and then flung it down in fury. He said, "Thou naughty boy, wilt thou not take things as they are, but expound them as thou wilt? Does not Christ call the bread his body plainly, and thou wilt not believe that the bread is his body over the consecration? Thou goest about to make Christ a liar." Hunter answered, "I mean not so, Sir, but I mean rather more earnestly to search what is the mind of Christ in that holy institution, in which he commends to us the remembrance of his death, passion, resurrection, and coming again, saying 'This do in remembrance of me.' And though Christ call the bread his body, as he also says that he is a vine, a door, &c., yet is his body not turned into bread, any more than he is turned into a door or a vine: wherefore Christ called the bread his body by figure." Then Brown said, "Thou art a villain, indeed! wilt thou make Christ a liar still?" and became so enraged, that whenever Hunter attempted to speak, he interrupted him with scoffs and reproaches. Hunter then desired that he would either hear him patiently, or else dismiss him. Brown answered, "Indeed I will send thee tomorrow to my lord of London, and he shall have thee under examination."

Accordingly, having written this letter, he sent Hunter, under custody of a constable, to Bishop Bonner. The bishop said, "I understand, William Hunter, that you have had certain communications with the vicar, about the blessed sacrament of the altar, and that you could not agree; upon which Master Brown sent for thee to bring thee to the Catholic faith; if thou wilt be ruled by me, thou shalt have no harm for any thing that thou hast said or done in this matter." Hunter replied, "I am not fallen from the Catholic faith of Christ (I am sure), but do believe it, and confess it with all my heart." "Why," said the bishop, "how sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy saying, how that Christ's body is not in the sacrament of the altar, the same that was born of the Virgin Mary?" Hunter said, "My lord, I understand that Master Brown has certified you of the talk which he and I had together, and you know what I said to him, which, by God's help, I will not recant." Then the bishop said, "I think thou art ashamed to bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt." Hunter said, "My lord, if you will let me alone, and leave me to my conscience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or else with my master again; and so, if nobody will disquiet or trouble my conscience, I will keep my conscience to myself." The bishop said, "I am content, so that thou wilt go to the church, and receive and be shaven, and so continue a good Catholic Christian." "No," replied Hunter, "I will not do so for all the world." "Then," rejoined the bishop, "if you will not do so, I will make you sure enough, I warrant you." "Well," said Hunter, "you can do no more than God will permit you." The bishop then commanded his men to place Hunter in the stocks in his gatehouse, where he remained two days and nights, with only a crust of brown bread, and a cup of water.

After two days, the bishop came to the place where Hunter was confined, and finding the cup of water and the crust of bread lying untasted beside the stocks, he said to his servants, "Take him out of the stocks, and let him break his fast with you." He was released from the stocks, but was not permitted to eat with them, because he was a heretic. After breakfast the bishop demanding whether he would recant, Hunter answered, that he would never recant that which he had confessed before men, concerning his faith in Christ. The bishop said that he was no Christian, but that he denied the faith in which he had been baptized. Hunter answered, "I was baptized in the faith of the Holy Trinity, which I will not go from, God assisting me with his grace." The bishop then ordered him to be sent to the convict prison; and directed the keeper to load him with as many irons as he could bear. Having given these orders, he asked his age; and being told nineteen—"Well, you will be burned ere you be twenty years old, if you will not yield yourself better than you have done yet." Hunter answered, "God strengthen me in this truth."

Hunter lay for nine months in prison, during which he was five times summoned before the bishop. He was condemned on the 9th February, 1556; on which day his brother Robert was also present. The bishop asked if he would recant, and then remarking that he had confessed his belief that he received Christ's body spiritually, when he received the communion—"Dost thou mean that the bread is Christ's holy presence?" Hunter said, "I mean not so; but when I receive the holy communion rightly and worthily, I feed on Christ spiritually through faith in my soul, and am made partaker of all the benefits which Christ hath brought to all faithful believers, through his precious death, passion, and resurrection." The bishop said, "Thou wilt not believe that God can do any thing above man's capacity." "Yes," said Hunter, "I must needs believe that, for daily experience teaches all men that thing plainly; but our question is not what God can do, but what he will have us to learn in his holy supper." The bishop then said, that he saw no hope of bringing him to the Catholic faith, since he continued corrupt; he then sentenced him, after remaining in Newgate for a time, to be taken from thence to Brentford, "where thou shalt be burned." After the bishop had dealt with and condemned five other prisoners, he once more called for Hunter, and said, "If thou wilt yet recant, I will make thee a free man in the city, and give thee forty pounds in good money to set up thy trade with; or I will make thee steward of my house, and set thee in office, for I like thee well: thou hast wit enough, and I will prefer thee if thou recant." Hunter answered, "I thank you for your good offers; notwithstanding, my lord, if you cannot persuade my conscience by Scripture, I cannot find in my heart to turn from God for the love of the world; for I count all worldly things but 'loss and dung,' in respect of the love of Christ." The bishop said, "If thou diest in this mind, thou art condemned for ever." Hunter said, "God judgeth righteously, and justifieth them whom man condemneth unjustly."

After a month's farther confinement, Hunter was sent to Brentford. His father and mother visited him, and prayed heartily to God that he might continue steadfast: his mother said that she was glad to bear such a child, who could find in his heart to lose his life for Christ's name's sake. Hunter said to his mother, "For my little pain which I must suffer, which is but short, Christ hath promised me, mother, a crown of joy; may you not be glad of that, mother?" His mother, kneeling, said, "I pray God strengthen thee, my son, to the end; yea, I think thee as well bestowed as any child that I ever bare." At these words, Mr Highed took her in his arms, and said, "I rejoice to see you in this mind, and you also have good cause to rejoice." They then prayed for him, that as he had begun to confess Christ before men, he might so continue to the end. His father said, "I was afraid of nothing but that my son should have been killed in the prison, by hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him."

At day-break, preparations were made for the execution. The sheriff's son came to Hunter, and, taking his right hand, said, "William, be not afraid of these men who are here present with bows, bills, and weapons, prepared to bring you to the place where you shall be burned." He answered, "I thank God I am not afraid; for I have laid my account what it will cost me already." The sheriff's son was restrained from saying any more by his weeping. Hunter then "plucked up his gown," and went forward cheerfully, the sheriff's servant taking him by one hand, and his brother by another. He was met by his father on the way, who, in tears, said, "God be with thee, son William;" and William said, "God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort; for I hope we shall meet again, when we shall be happy." His father said, "I hope so, William." When he came to the stake, he knelt on a wet broom faggot, and read the 51st psalm, till he came to these words, "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." Then Mr Tyrill said, "Thou liest; for thou readest false, for the words are, 'A humble spirit.'" But Hunter said, "The translation saith, 'A contrite heart.'" Tyrill replied, "The translation is false; you translate books as you like yourselves, like heretics." "Well," said Hunter, "there is no great difference in these words." The sheriff said, "Here is a letter from the Queen; if thou wilt recant, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt be burnt." "No," answered he, "I will not recant, God willing." Hunter then went to the stake, stood upright, and was chained to it by a bailiff. Then Master Brown said, "There is not wood enough to burn a leg of him." Hunter said, "Good people, pray for me; and make speed and despatch me quickly: and pray for me while you see me alive, good people, and I will pray for you likewise." "Now," interrupted Brown, "pray for thee! I will pray no more for thee than I will pray for a dog." Hunter replied, "Now you have that which you sought for, and I pray God it be not laid to your charge in the last day; I forgive you." "I desire no forgiveness of thee," cried Brown. "Well, if God forgive you, I shall not require my blood at your hands." Hunter then perceiving that the priest would have showed him the book, said, "Away, thou false prophet! Beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations, lest you be partakers of their plagues." The priest said, "As thou burnest here, so shalt thou burn in hell." Hunter answered, "Thou liest, thou false prophet; away, thou false prophet, away." A gentleman present said, "I pray God have mercy upon his soul;" to which the people answered, "Amen, amen." When the fire was lighted, Hunter flung his psalter into his brother's hands, who said, "William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death." William answered, "I am not afraid." Then lifting up his hands to heaven, he said, "Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit;" and casting down his head again into the smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood to the praise of God.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SHORTER CATECHISM.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D. D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

THERE is an introduction or preface to the Shorter Catechism, which is deserving of very special notice. This introduction is contained in the first three questions; and it expresses, in a few comprehensive words, the subject and substance of the whole book. It presents for consideration, and as its own course of instruction, the objects of knowledge most important to man, namely, these two:—

I. The great end or purpose for which he was created; and,

II. The right rule of direction for attaining that end, or fulfilling that purpose.

Within the range of this brief classification, may be comprised all that is essential for man to know, and incumbent upon him to practise, as a rational and immortal being. These two things are clearly requisite in every pursuit; first, to have a distinct apprehension of the precise object in view, and next to discover the best way of prosecuting that object to a successful issue.

1. The first of these points, the precise and paramount object, which it behoves every man as a rational and immortal being to have continually in view, is taken up in the first question; and is declared to be twofold, namely, to glorify God and to enjoy God. There is here, indeed, strictly speaking, only one object presented, that is God. As the end of man's being, and the aim of his doings, he is directed to look to God, the Author of that being, and the spring of all that he is capable of doing. This constitutes at once the name and nature of all true religion in man, namely, godliness—a regard above all things to God—and a reference in all things to God. This principle of godliness has its foundation in the plainest dictates of right reason; it is “our reasonable service.” Here it is that our divine philosophy commences, with ascending at once to first principles, and fixing our spiritual eye upon the supreme cause of all things, and source of our own existence, and the fountain of all the good that we are capable of attaining; “all my springs are in thee.”

But, though there is thus only one object brought into view, there is a twofold view of that object presented to our notice. There is presented to us a view of God, in what regards both his claims upon us, and his intention towards us, a view of him as at once entitled to receive our entire obedience, and as willing to impart our proper blessedness—a view in short of our obligations to him, and of our expectations from him; or, in other words, a view of our duty and of our happiness; our duty to glorify God, and our happiness to enjoy God. The chief end of man is thus, in truth, but one, namely, to live unto God. The principal design for which man was created, and which therefore he is bound continually to aim after, is to live unto God, and to do this, first, in reference to God, in desiring and endeavouring to glorify the Divine name and perfections; and next, in reference to himself, in seeking thereby to find his own excellence and felicity.

In what this living unto God, so as both to glorify and enjoy him, more particularly consists, cannot now be unfolded or specified; because to unfold and specify these particulars forms the actual course of instruction contained in the Shorter Catechism. To enumerate more particularly, and to explain more fully the methods and means of glorifying and enjoying God, is the direct object of the succeeding questions and answers in this summary of Christian truth, and will come regularly under consideration as we notice, in order, its separate portions and statements. All that is necessary and proper at this stage of our progress, is to explain the general meaning of the terms which the Catechism here employs, in stating man's chief end, namely, glorifying and enjoying God; and the intimate connection which subsists between these twofold views of that end, namely, as thus including both his duty and happiness. His duty is to glorify God; his happiness is to enjoy God.

Man's duty is to glorify God. To glorify God does not mean to make any addition to God's essential glory and blessedness; to make him more glorious or blessed than he already is, and ever will be, independent of all beings. The first apprehension of the glory due to God from his creatures, is the thought of his inherent and incomprehensible glory; and the first practical impression of this thought on every soul, that begins to contemplate God in his own nature, is the overwhelming sense of our utter inability to add any thing to God's glory, or to do any thing deserving of his notice. “Can a man be profitable unto God?” “My goodness extendeth not to thee.” When any created being is called upon to glorify God, it is to declare or show forth that glory which already belongs to God, and which he must always possess. This, indeed, all his creatures do in a passive sense, and man himself among the rest; whether they intend to do so, or are capable of having any such intention or not. They necessarily glorify their great Creator, in all that concerns their wonderful formation and continued preservation in all the functions that they exercise, and in all the purposes that they serve. “The heavens declare the glory of God.” “All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord.” In this sense even they who live most regardless of God, and act in direct opposition to his will, are made instrumental in spite of themselves, in declaring his glory; and this they do by his long-suffering towards them in such rebellion, by his overruling all their evil for good, and even by their own destruction from his presence for ever. “Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee.” “Yea, even the wicked for the day of evil.”

But man is called to glorify God, actively and intentionally, to feel and cherish inwardly a devout sense of God's supreme excellence in himself, and to manifest this feeling outwardly in all that we say, or do, or aim after. “Fear God and give glory to him.” “He that offereth praise glorifieth me.” “I will bless thee while I live.” “I will lift up my hands in thy name.” To glorify God is to set up his will and submit to it in all things as our sovereign law; to worship and praise him aright, and above all beings; to desire to show forth in our lives the power of his grace in our hearts; to acknowledge him therefore in all our ways, and to keep all his commandments from a sentiment of reverence and love; and to labour to spread the knowledge of his will, and to promote the interests of his kingdom throughout the whole earth. “Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit.” “Whether therefore ye eat or drink or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.”

Man's happiness is to enjoy God. To enjoy God is to rest on him as our chief good, with a firm conviction of his excellence, and a full complacency in his will; to find our happiness, therefore, in the sense of his favour here on earth, and in the hope of his presence for ever in heaven. “The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance.” “My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.” Man is called thus to enjoy God immediately in the present life; even in temporal blessings, by receiving them as gifts from his hand, and using them agreeably to his will; and in spiritual blessings, by seeking the consolations of faith in his promises, communion with him in our spirits, and progress in his divine likeness. "Thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God in all that thou puttest thine hands unto." "O taste and see that the Lord is good." "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." But more especially is it the end and issue of all, the gracious purpose of God in our creation and redemption, the final aim of our faith, and hope, and perseverance in well-doing, that we may enjoy him fully in the heavenly world, throughout the ages of eternity: "In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand, there are pleasures for evermore." These twofold regards to God form in reality only one, as man's chief end and aim. They are both to be sought by looking to one object, that is God; they are both to be found in the same exercise of the soul towards God, in knowing, loving, and serving him. They are mutually the means of each other's attainment, and neither of them can be completed without the aid of the other. It is by glorifying God, that we enjoy God; by doing those things which declare his glory, that we experience our own true happiness—"Great peace have they that love thy law;" and it is, on the other hand, by enjoying God that we glorify God, by seeking and finding our happiness in him, and in what pleases him, that we declare his glory. "There be many that say, who will show us any good?" "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." These two are so intimately united, so interwoven, as it were, together, that they cannot be sought separately, or attained separately. To glorify God is the way to enjoy him, in the experience of his blessing, and the hope of his salvation; "them that honour me I will honour;" and to enjoy God, to be happy in his service here, and in his presence for ever, is the showing forth of his glory, and the source of endless praise to his name; "He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." This union of these two, as one and inseparable, is invariably preserved, and plainly placed before us, throughout the whole system of Divine truth. We not only find the doctrine uniformly taught, that the glorifying and enjoying of God constitute together the entire substance of man's excellence and enjoyment; but we find them in fact so closely conjoined almost in one sentence, and placed in a manner side by side, that we cannot look upon the one without seeing the other, or secure the one without finding the other in its company. We cannot set ourselves in truth to give glory to God, without receiving enjoyment; nor sincerely seek our enjoyment in God, without giving glory to his name. "The Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." "Blessed is every one that feareth the Lord, that walketh in his ways." "He that keepeth understanding shall find good." "Seek ye me and ye shall live." "To be spiritually minded is life and peace." "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." "All her paths are peace." "Light is shown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."

These two, then, form but one end, one and inseparable; and they are man's chief end—the principal design for which he was made, and must be his chief aim, first of all and most of all, to be sought after. Whatever other ends he may pursue, to this they must be viewed as subordinate, and to this they must be made subservient,—all done with a view to promote the great and chief end of glorifying and enjoying God, and done only in so far as is consistent with the advancement of that final result. "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability that God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ." "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

Recollect the sum of the whole matter. Here is at once a doctrinal truth declared, and a practical object proposed,—first, the principal design of God in our creation, was to show forth his glory and to satisfy us with his favour; and, second, the grand object which we ought, therefore, to propose to ourselves is, in every act of duty to glorify his name, and in every desire of happiness to seek his blessing.—How much precious truth is comprised in these few words, which form the first statement in the Shorter Catechism! They are words which we all very easily learn to repeat, but which we are apt to utter, without any intelligent reflection upon their momentous meaning, or any serious feeling of our personal interest in the matter; yet clearly do they convey a depth of instruction worthy to engage the meditation of the most enlightened mind, and calculated to arrest the attention of the most thoughtless heart. They have often, indeed, been made effectual to turn souls to God, and to bring the entire field of saving knowledge before the view of devout inquirers. It is recorded of a distinguished Christian lady,* that her first serious impressions of religion originated in her recollection, on a sick-bed, of the first question in the Shorter Catechism, and the deep conviction which followed, of her having utterly neglected to make the glorifying and enjoying of God her chief end in life.

Let each of us learn to make the same direct application of these words to our own case, and the same earnest inquiry as to our own chief end and aim in life. Are we living upon any plan, and with any object, that is suited to rational and immortal beings? Have we yet seen the plainest of all truths, namely, that we are God's property, and bound to glorify him in our bodies and in our spirits, which are his? Have we yet felt the surest of all convictions, namely, that in His favour is life, and the only source of happiness to our spiritual nature? Or, may it be said of any of us, that, in place of rendering to the blessed God the glory due to his name, we are living altogether without God in the world? Or, if accustomed to wear some form of godliness, are we yet strangers to its power, and acting much in the same way as we might do though there were no God in the world? How strangely foolish, how utterly vain the attempt to feed the immortal spirit upon ashes, and to send the hungry soul among the creatures, asking at every door, "Who will show us any good?" How much wiser and happier the course here pointed out, to betake ourselves at once to the rich supply of angels' food in our heavenly Father's house, presenting in one desire at his throne the sentiment of prayer and praise, in the language of the devout Psalmist, "Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee!" and with one breath, like the blessed Virgin rendering glory to his name, while we rejoice in our own good, "My soul doth magnify the Lord; my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

GRACE.

BY WILLIAM ANDERSON,

Author of "Landscapes Lyrics," &c.

COME, free-giv'n grace! source of all lasting peace;
My care-worn heart has wanted thee full long;
The charms of earthly joys and pleasures cease,
And fain I'd stray thy tranquil path among,
Where wither'd weeds and noxious odours strong
Come not, as here I find them rankly meet;
Give me thy pleasant ways and thy contentments sweet!

Contentments sweet are ever with thee still;
In the lone valley, where the streamlet flows;
On distant mountain, on the heath-clad hill;
Where springs the daisy, or where blooms the rose;
Even in the desert where no green thing grows;
'Mid trials of this world, whate'er they be,
Still peace, and joy, and truth accompany with thee.

With thee there is no darkness; thou dost show
The SUN OF GLORY shining in His might:
With thee there is no sadness; thou dost go
Into the grief-broke heart, and with the light
Of heavenly love mak'st it serene and bright:
Ah! who that can thy blessings call his own,
Would deem himself, with thee, forsaken or alone?

Alone! no, never! Jesus still is near;
Friendless we cannot be with Him our friend—
Our counsellor—although deserted here
By all who to that cherish'd name pretend—
His friendship, like himself, shall have no end;
And for our solace freely is bestow'd,
Trusting in him while here, the bounteous grace of God!

The grace of God softens the harden'd heart,
And makes it oft in gushing joy to sing;
As rod of Moses caused the rock to part,
And made the living waters forth to spring:
The grace of God serenest pleasures bring,
And leads the mind from carnal thoughts away
Into retirements sweet, in solitude to pray.

To pray!—blest privilege! For evermore
To pray and praise, and lift the soul above
This sordid earth, and, as a lark doth soar,
Ascend into the realms of truth and love,
Whence once the SPIRIT came in form of dove!
Thither, oh! thither would it wing its flight—
For ever "take its rest," there where there comes no night!

THE DANGER OF BREAKING THE LEAST OF THE COMMANDMENTS:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER HUMPHREY,

Minister of Fordyce, Aberdeenshire.

"Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."—
MATT. v. 19.

THAT spirit of slumber which was poured out upon the unbelieving Jews, we fear, has extended its benumbing influence over Christian society. Clear and precise as are the Gospel requirements, yet men have eyes to see, and they will not; and though Heaven's denuncements are terrible and pointed, too many, with ears to hear, will not hear them. Owing the Scriptures to be a divine revelation, and referring to them as an infallible rule of faith and practice, our conduct is often opposed to such assent and to such reference, and our secret persuasion not unfrequently belies our avowed belief. Let us seriously ponder our own thoughts, and bring to our recollection what our reserved sentiments were when weighing the standard of Gospel obedience—when reflecting upon the minuteness and the extent of its requirements—and when listening to the wrath of God revealed from heaven, and denounced against the ungodly—against all who shall break even the least of his commandments,—was there not, on such occasions, something whispering within us that this perfection of virtue, and this strictness of obedience, could not be absolutely necessary to salvation; and have you not then closed your musings, with a quiet persuasion that yours might be secured, even though you come considerably short of such a standard?

This mental reservation, common as it may be, is much to be regretted, as it cannot fail to spread a blighting influence over the whole moral and religious frame. It tends to lull the conscience into a fatal security—to diminish that caution and watchfulness, that energy and vigour, that holy jealousy over our conduct, and that ardent importunity at a throne of grace for spiritual influences, that are necessary to progress in holiness, and to that constant reaching forward towards the mark of our high calling.

In estimating human conduct, and the extent of moral guilt, men are too commonly guided by a deceitful rule, having a reference to those declarations from the strict line of duty that are not very pernicious to society in their immediate and apparent effects, that seem to involve little inconvenience in the ordinary intercourse of human life. They are apt to view them with not a very unfavourable eye, and to make small account of following them. They forget that, though there are sins of greater or less magnitude, accompanied with more or fewer aggravations; yet, in the sight of a pure and holy God, there is no small sin, as he cannot look upon iniquity without abhorring it. They forget that any sin, and every sin, how trivial soever they may deem it, is an act of rebellion against the Most High. It is putting his threatenings to defiance, and is consequently sufficient, in its demerit, to plunge the soul that practises it into the deepest misery. Whatever may be thought of these sentiments, or however hard they may press on that complacency with which we may have been accustomed to view our own conduct, because it has been free, perhaps, from acts of grosser vice; yet they are not rashly and causelessly obtruded—they directly and necessarily arise from the Word of God, "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, he shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven."

Could mankind be fairly roused to ponder with earnestness this divine assertion, I know nothing more calculated to dispel this spirit of slumber. It was uttered by One who, knowing the importance of obedience to God's commands, came to magnify the law by his own obedience—who, in his own person, fulfilled all its requirements, and who paid the dreadful penalty of all its violations,—by one who is to judge the world, and by whose award our admission into the kingdom of heaven, or our rejection therefrom, will finally be decided. With these words broad in our view, is it safe to confide in a general good character—to rely on the estimation which we bear in society—or to deem ourselves safe in the way of salvation, if not worse than others who are well thought of amongst men? May not all this be, while we are breaking one, or more perhaps, of these least commandments, which, our Saviour assures us, will exclude from the kingdom of heaven? Have we not, then, great cause to search our hearts in another manner, and try our ways by another rule? Ought we not to turn to the throne of grace, and sincerely desire to know the amount of our guilt, however heavy and appalling it may be, and to adopt the pertinent address, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting?"

When we take a minute view of human society, and carefully scrutinize the mutual intercourse of mankind in all its bearings, how little of the strictness of truth—of the scrupulosity of pure integrity—of attention to the minute claims of justice—and of that spirit of equity which does to others what we wish and expect from them—and of that ardent piety which refers all our principles and all our actions to the will of God as their motive, and to his glory as their end! How little of these do we discern, even in characters who rate high in moral estimation, and whose consciences seem insensible to the guilt of breaking these least commandments of God! In such a state of carnal security, we fear, thousands are posting fast to a ruined eternity, and will only awake, when too late, to a sense of their misery and guilt. Of such, it may be said, with truth, as was said before of the Pharisees, that publicans and harlots enter into the kingdom of heaven before them. They are aware of their guilt and of their danger. Their sins are so glaring, that even the thick veil of self-delusion cannot cover them from their sight. Their consciences whisper, every thinking moment, that without repentance, conversion, and an interest in the blood of atonement, they must be for ever undone. With such feelings and impressions, there are some hopes of conversion and repentance—some chance that, more fully awakened and more effectually aroused, they will flee for refuge from their guilt and from their misery to the Rock of Ages, and take shelter under that mantle of mercy which the Son of man extends over penitent sinners. But the secure offenders whom we have mentioned, not being aware of the guilt of breaking the least commandment of God, are likely to sin away their day of grace without repentance. They deem themselves whole; they see no need of a physician; and yet, alas! they are fast consuming, from the effects of a secret and insidious disease!

But the guilt of breaking one of the least commandments may extend beyond the sphere of the individual, and be communicated to society. The example of the transgressor may have a pernicious influence—it may mislead the weak and the ignorant—it may embolden the timid and the tender in conscience to venture beyond the line of religious and moral duty. Thus the unwary offender may not only incur the personal guilt of breaking the least of the commandments of God, but the accumulated guilt of causing his brother to offend. Thus the blood of others who have been misled by his example, may be required at his hands; and thus he may have to answer at the tribunal of Jesus, not only for breaking one of the least commands in his own person, but also for teaching others so to do. Need we wonder then that such a man should be called least in the kingdom of heaven!

In illustration of this subject, and in corroboration of the sentiments advanced, we may advert, for a moment, to the first transgression and its consequences. Would we not deem the prohibition not to eat of the fruit of a certain tree, one of the least of the commandments of God? And would we not be apt to suppose that no great mischief would follow from breaking it—no heinous guilt could be contracted from violating this prohibition? But was such the case? Mark the consequences, and let them answer. By violating this commandment, which has been ridiculed by the inconsiderate, and sneered at by the infidel, a guilt was contracted, which has overspread our nature, and an offence committed sufficient of itself to exclude all, who were contaminated with that guilt, from the kingdom of heaven. On the offenders a holy God could no longer look with an eye of complacency. The creatures whom he had made daringly contemned his authority, and thus, by an act, which many might suppose in itself trivial and insignificant, had contracted the most heinous guilt, and exposed themselves to the deepest misery.

Let us not be surprised at such consequences following from such an act. Let us not wonder at our Lord's declaration that he that shall break one of the least of these commandments shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven. The littleness of the requirement seems to heighten its transgression; the trivial advantage attained by the offence adds to its magnitude. It proves how little value we attach to the authority of God—at how low a price we estimate our own souls.

If the one offence of our first parents was followed with the mighty visitation recorded—if it blasted the bloom of paradise, and sent the offenders abroad into a barren and briery wilderness—if it deprived them of intercourse with heaven, and debarred them from tasting the fruit of the tree of life, and of immortality—if it exposed them to the frowns of an offended God, and subjected them to death and misery, if these consequences flowed from an act of disobedience, from one breach, what should each individual amongst us think of his own danger, whose life has been one continued habit of disobedience? If we be still in the hands of that God, who laid so heavy a condemnation on this one transgression, let us just think of our many transgressions, and that every hour we live multiplies the amount of them; and that, however, they may vanish from our own remembrance, they are still alive in the records of a Judge, whose eye and whose memory never fail. Let us compare our lives with the law of God, and we shall find that our sins are past reckoning. Let us take account of the habitual posture of our souls as a state of disrelish for the things that are above, and we shall find that our thoughts and our desires are ever running in one current of sinfulness; and, in the language of the Psalmist, "our transgressions have gone over our heads, and as a heavy burden are too heavy for us." In such a state of guilt; under such a load of iniquity, unless God himself point out a way to escape we must be immediately undone. If we betake not ourselves to his appointed way of reconciliation; if we refuse the overtures of Him who so visited the one offence with such mighty marks of his high displeasure, or, in other words, if we will not enter into peace through the offered Mediator, how much greater must the wrath be that abideth on us?

Now, let the sinner have his conscience awakened by such a contemplation, and there will be no rest whatever for his soul, till he find it in the Saviour. Let him learn, from God's dealings with the first Adam, what a God of holiness he himself has to deal with; and let him farther learn, from the history of the second Adam, that to manifest himself as a God of love, He had to bring in another righteousness in place of that from which man had so utterly fallen away. There was a faultless obedience rendered by Him of whom it is said, that he "fulfilled all righteousness;" there was a magnifying of the law by one in human form, who, up to the last jot and tittle, acquitted himself of all its obligations; there was a pure, lofty, and undefiled path, trodden by a holy and harmless Saviour, who gave not up his work upon earth till he could exclaim, "It is finished!"—and thus he hath wrought out for mankind a perfect righteousness. Now, in the Gospel of Jesus, the reward of this righteousness is offered to all; by rejecting that offer we expose ourselves to be tried by our own merits; or, by accepting it, to be treated according to the merits of him who "became sin for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Let us, then, advert, not to this or that transgression, but to our many sins, countless in number, and highly aggravated, and, from that appalling sight, let us press upon our minds, that there is no safety for such offenders, but in "the blood of sprinkling,"—that the righteousness of Jesus is our only "refuge from the tempest, and hiding-place from the storm,"—and, under that impression, let us neither "give sleep to our eyes, nor slumber to our eyelids," till we "win Christ, and be found in him," and be able to rejoice in the thought, that to those that are in him "there is no condemnation."

While we thus endeavour to rouse to a sense of danger, from a breach of the smallest command,—while we would impress upon your minds, that, as sinners, your only safety, your only means of escape, will be found in union and communion with Jesus, and arise from faith in his blood,—let it ever be remembered, that such a faith must, and will, maintain a presiding influence over your whole future character and conduct,—over both your inward and outward man. It will keep your consciences feelingly alive to all the requirements of the law, and make you shrink with fearful sensibility from every, the least deviation from the will of God: it will establish in your hearts a jealousy of the least appearance of evil, and produce a scrupulous avoidance of sin, in its least as well in its most aggravated forms. The genuine believer, "who walks not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," will aspire more and more after the fulfilling of the righteousness of the law; he will watch against every appearance of evil, and carefully guard against its approach, even in its minutest forms; to duty, in all its various ramifications, he will strive to adhere. Like Job, he will "hold fast his integrity," without the slightest taint, and never deliberately allow himself in that which he condemns; for he believes, and he is ever sensibly affected by that belief, "that whosoever shall break one of the least of these commandments, and teach men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

THE FRENCH CANADIAN MISSION.

FROM the "Commercial Messenger" published at Montreal, we extract the following account of a Mission which is well deserving of encouragement from the Christian community.

The French Canadians, whose evangelization is the object of the Society, are the descendants of natives of France, who settled in Canada (then called "la Nouvelle France") between its discovery by Cartier in 1535 and the capture of Quebec by the British in 1759. They are located on the rich lands lying along the banks of the St Lawrence and its tributaries, and may be safely reckoned at half a million of souls. The part of Lower Canada inhabited by them is called "the Seigniorial lands," from being still under the old feudal tenure, a system at least coeval with the seventeenth century in France, and pretty nearly the same as the old Norman system in England, which was abolished about the time of Charles II. The early population of Canada, though of the kind generally found in new countries.

* Several establishments of the descendants of the French settlers are still to be found in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, preserving the language, religion, and manners of their forefathers.

contained also a number of individuals of rank and learning, whom piety, rather than motives of temporal policy or interest, induced to settle in the Colony, and who devoted themselves with zeal to the support of the Roman Catholic religion and the conversion of the Indians. Indeed one of the most striking features in the history of Canada is the missionary spirit which the French people evinced in respect to the Colony, and the ample provision made for the support and propagation of religion among the settlers and aborigines. At an early period numbers of Jesuits, Recollects, and other ecclesiastics, male and female, settled in the country, and applied themselves to the establishment of seminaries for the instruction of the children of the colonists and Indians. Others travelled into the wilds of the forest, and sought to Christianize its fierce and wandering inhabitants, with a courage and devotion which no danger nor suffering could destroy. Nor were their labours altogether without avail, for occasionally they succeeded in bringing the red man to bury the hatchet of war for a time; but influences prevailed, which their imperfect system, although so zealously applied, could not overcome, and the fierce passions of savage nature broke out with redoubled fury, and swept away the traces of their peaceful toil.

The grants for the support of education and religion were of the most princely character; the island of Montreal, those extensive domains, now called the "Jesuits' Estates," and many of the most valuable portions of the country, were freely given. Nor was liberal aid of other kinds wanting, either from the parent country or from the colonists, to promote those objects, wisely felt to be of such vast importance in the founding of a new community. In addition to these grants, a provision was created by law, in the shape of a twenty-sixth of the grain raised, payable by the farmer to the priest of his parish, and which still remains, although only recoverable from those of the Roman Catholic faith.

As has been remarked, there were among the colonists not a few whose acquirements were of a superior description; indeed, a writer remarks that great attention was in general given to the choice of those who went to establish themselves in Canada, and that as respects the rank of the settlers, it was said that Canada had more of the ancient nobility than any other French Colony, and, perhaps, than all of them together. Such was the field (apart from the Indian tribes) which the Church of Rome had to occupy in that country.

Now, let us glance at the spiritual labourers in the vineyard. The most conspicuous were the Jesuits, that wonderful order of men, who, at the time of the settlement of Canada, were in the zenith of their power and activity. From their peculiar organization, none were more fitted to carry into successful operation that system from which they emanated, and for the propagation of which they gave their entire energies, braving for its advancement the fires of Japan on the east and the tomahawk of the savage on the west. In vain can Romanism now seek for more zealous agents than those her devoted servants, in whom the love of sect seemed to have crushed the feelings of nature, and the sympathies which actuate ordinary men.

To these were united the St Sulpiciens of Paris, besides friars and nuns, against whose private character there cannot, we believe, be brought those charges which have been frequently laid against their fraternity in other countries.

It is in this country, if any where, that we might look for the triumphant success of the Roman Catholic religion. Promulgated previous to the conquest by the agents now described, and by successors, superior as a body to the teachers of that faith in most other countries; with the most ample provision for the propagation of their system; with unbounded influence over the people among whom they laboured, and whose superstitious views have led them to regard their spiritual rulers as almost of a superhuman order; with a clear field also for their labours previous to the conquest,* and the fullest toleration and encouragement by the British Government since, we may well suppose, that if the advantages of Romanism were to be witnessed anywhere, they should be evident among the French Canadians.

The Church of Rome declares herself to be the only true, holy, and infallible Church of Christ upon earth, and in so doing proclaims to all men that within her pale, are alone to be found the true followers of the Gospel,—the salt of the earth,—and that peculiar people who are to be the light of the world, and in whose steps all are to follow.

From this consequence of her high pretensions she cannot escape. If she be the true Church, her followers must be superior to the members of all others; or the religion of Christ Jesus must be declared inferior to systems of error. The Christian religion was instituted by its Divine Author, not as a speculative theory, but as an unfailing means of reforming the world, and of advancing man in all those acquirements which are the elements of human greatness and happiness;—and if any system professing to be from heaven, after a fair trial, fails to produce upon society those results, it may be safely called a counterfeit, and ought therefore to be put down.

"By their fruits ye shall know them," was the test which the Saviour gave his followers by which to discover error either in individuals or systems; and by this Divine touchstone we will now examine the pretensions of the Church of Rome, so far as the fruits of her labours in this province will furnish us grounds.

One striking effect of the truth as it is in Jesus, is to enlighten the mind, raising its possessor above the prejudices and superstitions peculiar to ignorance. Is this the case with the French Catholic population of Canada? Is it to them we are to look for enlarged views on subjects even the most common-place?

Again the Gospel expands the heart, and in proportion to its reception, expels selfishness, leading even the avaricious not only to relieve, but to seek out the necessitous of every country and sect. Hence should our Roman Catholic brethren take the lead in every object for the prevention or relief of human suffering; head every subscription list which benevolence presents; and, in short, the name of Roman Catholic should be another term for charity and benevolence, and endear all hearts by its connection with deeds of love and mercy. This is a fair inference, but we find it not verified around us.

Again, the religion of Jesus, while it forbids the love of the world and its vain pursuits, requires that its professors be not slothful, nor deficient in knowledge of a description to increase their usefulness, or give them a just superiority over other men. It demands, at least, that its professors be not behind the age in which they live, but keep pace with it, in all things not opposed to its holy requirements.

Do the French Canadians exemplify this reasonable demand of that holy faith, which the Church of Rome claims alone to possess? We shall give only one extract from Lord Durham's Report, which is prefaced in that document by a compliment to the amiability and polite manners of the people, the justness of which we feel gratified in being able to confirm.

"They lack all enterprise, and have no notion of * Charlevoix in his history of Canada, after mentioning the arrival of several Jesuits and monks in 1635, says "that very soon after there was not a single Calvinist in the Colony." All had been expelled from the country.

improvement, and no desire for it. Their wants are few and easily satisfied. They have not advanced one step in civilization beyond the old Bretons who first set foot on the banks of the St Lawrence; and they are quite content to be stationary. Their utter ignorance of the theory and improved practice of agriculture is painfully witnessed in their cultivation of the banks of that noble river."

The requirements of religion are similar with respect to education, and here the Church of Rome has signally failed to sustain her pretensions. From the same source we copy a notice of the state of education among the French Canadians, painful to be read; the more so as it is true.

"Go where you will, nevertheless, you will scarcely find a trace of education among the peasantry. While the school-system was in force, there was a very inadequate provision of houses, and of those that once had existence, some are now in complete ruins, and others the subject of fierce litigation among the neighbouring inhabitants. The sight of these ruins or the tale of these disputes is all that remains of the past.

"I consulted several lawyers as to their experience in this matter, and they invariably told the same story. They agreed that there is hardly ever a prisoner, or a witness, or a petty jurymen who knows how to write; indeed, I have seen noticed in a Montreal paper a presentment by a grand jury, in which six out of the thirteen signatures were marks. I consulted one of the heads of the militia department, and he told me, with a play on the word, that the officers under him were generally very experienced marksmen. I saw several petitions from parishes, praying for the erection of small-cause courts; I hardly ever saw more than the petitioners' crosses to them; and it should be borne in mind, that these petitions must be signed by at least one hundred heads of families in the parish. It may be said that all these jurors, and militia officers, and petitioners, are of necessity grown up men, and that few could have reaped the benefit of the schools which were only established to any extent in 1829, at which time they were beyond the age of admission. I made, however, particular inquiries on all sides as to whether the rising generation were better instructed, but rarely was any distinction made in their favour. In the very few country places which I visited, I made a point of asking all the children I met whether they could write; the great majority could not write at all, and of those who said they could, now, I found, on pressing, to admit that they could only write their names."

And now, in conclusion, will Romanism come out triumphant with respect to the moral and religious state of her people? We understand by religion, not an observance of outward ceremonies, an attention to rules and forms, which are no more than its externals; but that state of heart in which love to God is a permanent, living principle, leading to a life of holiness and active benevolence. Are her members here, as every where, to be marked for purity of heart and life—for respect to God's holy name—for observance of the Lord's Day? Do their godly and self-denying lives shed around such an attractive light, that other denominations are constrained to acknowledge an undeniable superiority in their faith? To sum up—in all those qualities of mind or soul, connected with man's existence in this or a future state, which are the genuine result of the true faith, and must by unavoidable necessity flow from it—can Romanism claim the overwhelming, nay, almost infinite superiority? This must be her present condition in Canada, if her pretensions are well founded. If she can claim no higher standard of practice in her members than other Churches, then is her superiority only assumed; and if her followers are greatly below that standard, as we assert they are, then is her system one of error and deceit—her pretensions unfounded and blasphemous, and calculated to ruin the temporal and eternal interests of mankind. Christian, patriot, and philanthropist, Protestant or Romanist by profession, to your serious attention we submit these things! Do you wish the French Canadians to make advances in the things which belong to their happiness for both worlds? then must you deliver them from the system of Romanism, which, with all the advantages it possessed, has signally failed to elevate their condition, secure their best interests, and prevent them from falling into the temporal and spiritual degradation in which, in the estimation of the surrounding nations, they are sunk. You must give them a system founded on the Bible, and dependent, through the Divine blessing, on its entry into every home and heart. You must introduce among them, not the priest, who would contemptuously revile or sacrilegiously burn the blessed Book, but such humble and devoted men as this Society employs, who go with delight to open the pages so long sealed, and to pour into the glad ears of the Canadian people those invitations of the Gospel, in all their richness and simplicity, which a false system has either withheld, or utterly obscured with the additions of man's vain wisdom.

Having shown the deplorable results of Romanism in this country, we shall now advert to the efforts made by other Churches to instruct the people in evangelical truth. It is deeply melancholy to reflect that until later years there was a total absence of any thing like systematic effort to evangelize the Canadians since their connection with the British empire. The period which has elapsed since the conquest, an event which devolved a heavy responsibility on the British nation, has exhibited the formation of most of those mighty benevolent and religious associations that form monuments of the piety and zeal of a people whom the Almighty seems to have specially constituted one of his distinguished instruments for spreading his name abroad through the earth. Yet, alas! strange as it may seem, that important period has brought no spiritual advantages to a race whose claims were paramount to many others.

Instead of the messenger of the Gospel, the selfish and careless trader pursued his avocations, and often so conducted himself and his concerns, that the ignorant Canadian was induced rather to cling to his superstitions than to cast off all regard to religious duties, and live, as he did, a practical Atheist!

Within the last few years, however, efforts were made by a few individuals residing in Montreal and Quebec, to awaken the sympathy of their brethren in the faith in the United Empire, to contribute of their gold and silver, and to procure devoted missionaries from Switzerland or France, to proclaim the glad tidings of the Gospel among those who were perishing for lack of knowledge. A committee was formed in Edinburgh, principally through the instrumentality of our much respected Christian brother, Captain W. Anderson, R. A., of which Mr Robert Haldane, jun., was appointed secretary and treasurer. The catholic spirit of this committee, as stated in the following extract from their circular, is in striking similarity with our own; although, it may be remarked, there was no interchange of views between us, at the formation of this Society:—

"The object of the Edinburgh Committee is very simple; they desire to engage men of approved piety, without reference to names or party distinction, to preach and teach the unsearchable riches of Christ, to traverse the provinces as colporteurs, and to scatter the seed of the kingdom wherever they go."

Funds were soon collected by this committee, from friends in England and Ireland as well as in Edinburgh, and at length the prayers of his people were heard by the Lord of the harvest, who inclined the heart of an eminently pious and devoted Swiss minister, Mr Henri Olivier, then seeking for a change of climate, to proceed to Canada; and who, accompanied by his excellent wife, in the course of the year 1834, arrived at Montreal, and immediately entered upon the work of an evangelist.

There is every reason to believe that the Lord has blessed his servant to the salvation of souls, who have given the most satisfactory evidence, by the influence of the truth upon their hearts, that they have indeed been "chosen unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."

Early in 1835 he formed a Baptist Church at Montreal. In the fall of that year, a widow lady from the same quarter of Switzerland, and imbued with a like spirit (Madame Henrietta Feller), arrived in the country, and took up her residence with Mr Olivier in this city, and endeavoured by various means to carry the light of truth into the Canadian families, going from house to house, to sell, lend, read, and explain the Word of God.

Along with this zealous and pious lady arrived a young man, Mr Louis Rousay, sent out by the association of Churches in the Canton de Vaud. He had been employed in France as a colporteur by the Evangelical Society of Geneva for two years and a half; and laboured there in that character with activity and success. In 1834, desiring to prepare himself as a missionary, he entered into the Mission Institution of Lausanne. After quitting that institution he offered himself for Canada, learning that there were no workmen for this harvest. The success which God has granted to the labours of these his faithful servants is such, as to awaken feelings of lively gratitude to that God whom they have so energetically laboured to serve.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Description of a Christian.—The Christian sees the rise and fall of earthly potentates, and the convulsions of kingdoms, testifying of him who ruleth among the nations, and accrediting his word;—he experiences the conviction that the most delightful of all truth, the hope which perisheth not, is confirmed by the strongest of all testimony, that heaven itself hath ratified the peace which it hath proclaimed;—he rests assured that "prophecy came not of old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" and although he knows not the mode of the operations of the Spirit, he sees the demonstration of his power. And "taking heed thus unto the sure word of prophecy, until the day dawn and the day-star arise in his heart," the true believer learns, from the things that are past, the certainty of things that are to come hereafter; he rests not satisfied with a mere name that he liveth, while yet he may be dead, but, having obtained that "precious faith," the germ of immortality, which springeth up unto eternal life, he experiences the power of the world to come, and unites the practice with the profession of religion; he copies the zeal of those who spend their strength for that which is in vain, and their labour for that which profiteth not, but he directs it to the attainment of an incorruptible inheritance,—for he knows that his labour shall not be in vain while he yields obedience to that word which is the charter of his salvation, and which so unequivocally bears the seal and superscription of the King of kings.—REV. DR. KEITH.

The humiliation of Christ.—The history of Jesus' humiliation, whereby satisfaction was rendered to divine justice, is replete with details of the lowest debasement, and most excruciating sufferings. His humble birth—his persecuted infancy—his continued poverty during the whole of an arduous ministry—his incessant exposure to obloquy, as the son of a carpenter, a Nazarene, a friend of publicans and sinners, a deceiver of the people, a blasphemer and a sorcerer—his violent struggles with Satan—his contests with the bigoted rulers and cruel populace of Judea, who threatened to throw him headlong from a precipice—his public apprehension as a malefactor, through the perfidy of a traitor—his agony in the garden, when his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death—his desertion by the very friends whom he had tenderly cherished—his violent arraignment, and unjust trial—his buffetings by the very menials who surrounded him—his appearance before the judgment-seat of a heathen—his spiteful coronation—his mock honours, when with devil's malice they bowed the knee, and said, "Hail! king of the Jews!"—his suspension on the cross, where his bodily torments were only exceeded by the agony of his soul, racked by the withdrawal of his Father's countenance, and the malice of Satan—the suffering which was condensed in that "hour of the power of darkness," when he exclaimed, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"—and finally, his burial, in token of complete humiliation under the adversary of man—these are but the prominent features of his history; but what heart can dwell on them without emotion, or fail to acknowledge, that if, according to the Scriptures, this was the Son of God, verily he has offered a satisfaction more precious than language can express, or angel conceive?—REV. J. BUCHANAN.

Mind not high things.—Many who have mounted to great dignities, would have contented themselves with meaner, had they known their great dangers. Affect, therefore, competency rather than eminency, and in all thy will ever have an eye to God's will, lest thy self-action turn to thine own destruction. Happy is the man who, in this life, is least known of the world, so that he doth truly know God and himself! Whatsoever cross, therefore, thou hast to discontent thee, remember that it is less than thy sins have deserved. Count, therefore, Christ thy chiefest joy, and sin thy greatest grief; esteem no want to the want of grace, nor any loss to the loss of God's favour; and then the discontentment for outward means shall the less perplex thine inward mind; and as often as Satan shall offer any motion of discontentment to thy mind, remember St Paul's admonition, "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out."—BAYLY. (Practices of Piety.)

Christ is everlasting and unchangeable.—We may learn the dignity of our Lord, from all the intermediate changes of the world, between its creation and destruction. First, then, we may observe, that our Lord is everlasting. "They all shall wax old as doth a garment," but "thy years shall not fail." What garments are to a man, the universe, with all its most glorious objects and elements, is to the Lord. These his glorious garments, then, in time shall wax old; but he who hath life in himself, even as his Father hath life in himself, shall continue still glorious as he was in his own glory, before he formed them, and put them on. And he is not only everlasting, but unchangeable. "As a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same." He may indeed lay aside his vesture. But as a sovereign, when after the pomp of a public ceremonial he unrobes, when his crown and sceptre are deposited in their caskets, and his garments of state are folded and put away, is a sovereign still, so our Lord, when he puts off the earth and heavens like a vesture, shall be "still the same." "There are differences of administrations, but the same Lord." "Thou art the same," or, if we closely follow the original, "Thou art He:" He, the ancient of days, who speaks also by the mouth of Isaiah:

"even to your old age, I am He;" "yes, before the day was, I am He." "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof." Time's hurrying tide bears swift along our hopes, our joys, our vanities; ourselves, prone and struggling upon its waters. As we drive down upon the face of that gloomy stream, all our efforts seem vain, nothing is firm around, on whatever we lay hold, the same current is carrying it away, by which we ourselves are hurried on; till imminent danger forces from our souls the drowning cry, "Save, Lord, we perish." The Lord extends his hand, and sets our feet upon a rock. He is himself that rock. He makes us, perishable creatures as we are, partakers of his stability. The various objects are carried rapidly by us, but we are now upon solid ground. "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."—REV. T. BOYS.

The Crucifixion of Christ.—According to outward appearances in the estimation of an unthinking world, our Lord, when on the cross, was covered with ignominy; but in the eyes of all holy intelligences, his crucifixion afforded the brightest manifestation of dignity and glory. God the Father now looked down with infinite complacency, and beheld the radiance of all his perfections abiding forth with the most resplendent lustre. The price of man's redemption had been stipulated in the councils of eternity, and for the space of four thousand years, countless myriads of the human race had been received into heaven upon the promise of its payment. The price was now laid down, the reign of slavery was now abolished, and the claims of Satan were eternally silenced. Angels and archangels stooped down to pry into the mysteries of redemption, while the redeemed in heaven perceived, with ineffable delight, the glorious medium of their eternal felicity.—REV. J. RUSSEL.

LIFE OF DIONYSIUS.

BISHOP OF ALEXANDRIA.

PART I.

As Alexandria was one of the most populous and important of those capitals that belonged to the Roman empire, the attention of the first Christians was naturally directed towards it. Accordingly, the Gospel was first introduced there by the evangelist Mark; and it is probable that his labours were crowned with numerous conversions. The obscurity, however, in which the history of the formation and progress of the Alexandrian Church is involved is such, that we have no account of the early pastors by whom it was superintended. The first illustrious name which emerges from this obscurity is that of Pantænus, the catechist; who, after his conversion, still retained the title of a Stoic philosopher, although he taught Christianity publicly in Alexandria, and with great success. His pupil, Clement, commonly known by the name of Clement of Alexandria, succeeded him in the catechetical office. This last, being of the sect of the Eclectics, unfortunately conceived, that from the different schools of philosophy materials could be best collected for forming a basis on which Christianity should rest;—as if the Gospel were defective, and needed such aid! His course, however, both from his writings and his public labours, was bright and effective; and he was endeared to the Christian Church, not only by his learning and piety, but also by his modesty, gentleness, and humility. Clement was succeeded by Origen, his scholar; a person too eminent in the early Christian Church to require particular notice.

It is mournful to think, that our principal knowledge of the Alexandrian Church commences with the declension of its purity from the apostolic faith. This city, the Athens of the first six centuries, rivalled, if it did not excel, the ancient capital of Greece, in its love of learning, as well as intellectual frivolity; and every literary speculation, as well as every creed, flowed into it, as into its natural reservoir. Where curiosity was under such continual excitement, it was natural that philosophers should direct their attention to Christianity, so singular in its origin, as well as its revelations; and, as might have been expected, many studied to believe. The grandeur of its doctrines, the purity of its precepts, and the impregnable array of evidence by which its heaven-born character was attested, attracted or compelled assent; and large acquisitions of converts were made from the schools of learning and philosophy. But that total abandonment of self which the Gospel requires, was too much for the generality of these converts, and they brought with them many of those philosophical predilections, to decorate or strengthen the Church, which they should rather have thrown to the flames of the altar. Such was the case with the three eminent persons we have already named. But their errors in this matter, however culpable, were completely outdone by Ammonius Saccas, an eminent Alexandrian teacher. This man, under whom Origen unfortunately studied, had been a porter, (from whence he derived his surname,) but being possessed of a splendid and aspiring genius, he betook himself to the study of philosophy, in which he soon excelled all his contemporaries. It was his chief ambition to found a system; and this he accomplished by methodizing the principal tenets of the different philosophical sects into one whole, and pervading them with the spirit of the Platonic philosophy. It was thus that he gave form and consistency to what has been called the Eclectic school, which speedily eclipsed all others. He had been born and educated a Christian, and as he still continued in the Church, he endeavoured, in his teaching, to reconcile his theory with the doctrines of the Gospel. He therefore laboured to prove, that all creeds and all systems were fundamentally the same; and that the Jew, the Christian, and the Pagan, were of one and the same belief! He soon found followers in abundance; the most illustrious of whom were, Longinus, the distinguished critic, and Plotinus. The last of these, a man of immense activity, subtlety, and eloquence, became the chief apostle of his master, and preached the Eclectic Christianity with such success, in Persia, Rome, and Campania, that vast multitudes became converts to his doctrines.

It was thus, while Alexandria was becoming a fruitful source of corruption to the Churches throughout the world, that Dionysius, commonly surnamed Alexandrinus, to distinguish him from the Areopagite, and others of the same name, was called to the superintendence of the Egyptian Church. It has been supposed that he was born in the city of Alexandria, where his parents were possessed of wealth and elevated rank. As he was of pagan parentage, he was educated at first in the superstitions of the Gentiles; but, probably at an early period, he was converted to the faith of the

Christians, by a careful reading of their books, accompanied with frequent and anxious meditation. Dionysius having completed the youthful part of his education, became a pupil of Origen, who was at this time famous in Alexandria as a teacher of Christian philosophy. We cannot now ascertain the particulars of a considerable portion of the life of Dionysius at this period. All that we can learn is, that Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, having died A.D. 232, Heraclas the catechist, succeeded him; while Dionysius, at that time a presbyter, was promoted to the catechetical office. About sixteen years afterwards, Heraclas died, and Dionysius was elected in his room. The first years in which he held this important office seem to have been passed in comparative tranquillity, until Decius attained to the empire, and commenced that terrible persecution which was designed to annihilate the very name of Christianity. The fury with which it raged was beyond all former precedent; and in such a tremendous winnowing, an immense cloud of chaff was removed from the garner of the great Husbandman. The East and the West were equally pervaded with a spirit of pagan havoc and massacre. Alexandria was, of course, too conspicuous to escape the storm. Indeed, the persecution had commenced there a year before that of Decius, and while the emperor Philip was still alive, in consequence of a Gentile priest leading one of the religious dances, and singing songs, exciting the populace to revenge the cause of his gods. The mob immediately rose at the war-whoop, and began to evince their piety by torturing the Christians, many of whom they put to a painful and ignominious death. Among these, three instances are particularly mentioned. Having laid hands upon Metras, an aged Christian, they endeavoured to persuade him to blaspheme the Saviour; but finding their attempt unsuccessful, they beat him with clubs, pricked him in the face and eyes with sharp reeds, and afterwards led him out to the suburbs, where they stoned him to death. They then seized Quinta, a lady of rank, whom they carried to the temple, to compel her to worship their idol; but on her refusal, they dragged her by the feet through the streets of the city, over the sharp flints, pelted her with large stones, scourged her with whips, and then slew her. The third case is that of Apollonia, an aged virgin. She had all her teeth dashed out, and was going to be burnt alive; but after begging a short respite from her tormentors, she leaped of her own accord into the fire, and perished. The houses of the Christians throughout the city were broken open, and plundered of their contents; and a Christian, as soon as he appeared, was followed with the cry, "A way with him to the flames!" But all this was trivial compared with the havoc that prevailed when Decius ascended the imperial throne, and let loose the full fury of persecution. No age, rank, or character was spared; and the rack, the axe, and the flames, were in constant requisition. Multitudes of Christians fled from the city, to avoid the malignity of their enemies; but even, in this case, their lot was not more favourable. Many perished from hunger and thirst, from cold and from wild beasts; many fell into the hands of robbers, and many were taken by the wild Arabs and Saracens, who reduced them to a state of miserable slavery. Still, however, the cause of God did not fail to be glorified, not only by the constancy of the martyrs, but the effects their sufferings produced; of which Dionysius has recorded the following miraculous instance. One who was deemed a Christian, but was supposed ready to recant, was led, for that purpose, to the court; but at the door of the building, Ammon, Zeno, and the rest of the military guard, mocked him with hideous grinning, and the most ridiculous buffoonery. All of a sudden, however, and without any remonstrance being addressed to them, they marched into the open court, and professed themselves Christians! The judges were confounded at this startling change, and sat trembling, while the new converts expressed their readiness to undergo the usual penalties. Sentence was passed upon them, and they went to death as if to a military triumph; rejoicing in the testimony they were thus honoured in giving, and the glory which would redound to God by their conversion and sufferings.

While the flock was thus stricken, the shepherd could scarcely be overlooked; and as soon as Solimus, the prefect of Egypt, had received the persecuting orders of the emperor, he sent an officer in search of Dionysius. This zealous functionary explored, with great diligence, in every quarter except the very place where he would have been successful,—this was the house itself of the bishop, who quietly staid at home during four days, expecting hourly the arrival of the sergeant. "I speak in the presence of God, and he knows that I lie not," says Dionysius himself, in giving this singular account, in his epistle to Germanus. At length, being warned of God to depart, the good man, accompanied by his servants, and many of the brethren, left the house; but towards sunset, he fell into the hands of some soldiers. He was sentenced to be executed, after which he was led, by the centurion and the whole military band, to Taposiris, a small town between Alexandria and Canopus, for the purpose of being put to death. In the meantime, Timothy, one of his friends, unconscious of these events, arrived at the house where he was apprehended; but finding it empty, and a military guard at the door, he fled in great consternation after his beloved pastor. As he ran, he met with a peasant going to a wedding, to whom he gave a broken and confused account of the disaster that had happened. This peasant, as soon as he had joined the marriage party, related what he had heard; and the guests, whose heads were probably filled with wine, resolved to enliven their merriment by an immediate onslaught upon the soldiery. All rushed out upon this mad adventure, and advanced towards the guards, who, confounded by the sudden coming and terrible shouts of the revellers at such an hour of the night, abandoned their charge, and sought safety in flight. The freakish insurgents found Dionysius and his company lying upon couches; and supposing that they were robbers, he had gathered up his clothes, that were lying at hand, to give to them; but they ordered him to rise, and come with them immediately. He earnestly entreated them to be gone, and leave him; or at least, if they meant him a kindness, to behead him themselves, and thus anticipate the soldiers; but instead of listening to his requests, they raised him from the ground by force, and tried to drag him from the place. At length they left him, and returned to their unfinished revel; after which four of his presbyters and fellow-prisoners set him upon an unsaddled ass, and conveyed him into the Lybian Deserts, where he was concealed until the danger was past.

The death of Decius having ended this persecution, Dionysius was enabled to return to his charge: but here he found affairs involved in confusion. During the late troubles many had apostatised; and among these were several of the wealthy and honourable, who had shown that life was dearer to them than the truth, when the moment of trial approached. Of these, some renounced the Christian profession, while others (as Dionysius himself informs us), when they were commanded to sacrifice to the gods, trembled, and looked so terror-stricken and ghastly, that they were more like victims themselves, than persons who came to offer them; so that they were the laughing-stock of the idolaters who witnessed their panic. Most of these persons, upon his return, were desirous of being restored to the communion of the Church; but a difficulty arose upon the question, how far tolerance might be extended to the lapsed. Hitherto, ecclesiastical discipline had been sufficiently strict upon this subject, and those persons who had denied Christ in times of persecution were not readmitted until they had given public tokens of their repentance, and been subjected to a strict probation. But, as if this had not been enough, a schism had started up in the Church; and a party, called Novatians, maintained that no apostate member should be restored, let his penitence and urgency be what they might. Dionysius was very far from holding sentiments of such unchristian and unconstitutional severity, and remembering the precepts of Him who "willeth not the death of a sinner," as well as the example of the apostles and primitive martyrs, he opposed the sentiments of the Novatians, and evinced his eagerness to recall the lapsed, and receive the penitent. Upon this important head he wrote to Fabius, Bishop of Antioch, a man somewhat Novation in his opinions, to whom he mentioned the following anecdote; which, one would think, must have been more persuasive than a hundred abstract arguments:—

A member of the Alexandrian Church, named Serapion, an old man, who had led a blameless life, was induced, in a moment of weakness and fear during the late persecution, to offer sacrifice to the gods. But having repented of his crime, he applied to the brethren repeatedly to be restored to their communion. His supplications, however, were in vain; and being stricken with a mortal sickness, probably from his intense anguish, he remained three days speechless, and deprived of consciousness. On the fourth day, having enjoyed a momentary recovery, he ordered his grandchild to run to the house of one of the presbyters, with a request that the latter should come to restore him to the church. The presbyter was sick, and unable to move; but Dionysius, previous to his departure from the city, had given express orders that the lapsed who were dying should be restored, if they desired it, that they might be enabled to depart with a lively hope. It was now midnight, and the message was urgent, upon which the presbyter gave to the child a piece of the eucharist, directing him at his return to moisten it with water, and put it to the old man's lips. As soon as he arrived, Serapion, whose spirit seemed to have gone with the messenger, said, "Thou art come, my child: the presbyter could not come to me; but perform quickly what he commanded thee, and let me depart." The child followed the directions; and after Serapion had feebly swallowed the bread, by little and little, he expired.

As soon as Dionysius had surmounted this controversy, he was involved in another, which threatened the disruption of the Christian Church. This question was upon the necessity of rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretics, at the head of which were two venerable names—Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, and Stephen, bishop of Rome. Dionysius and many of the leaders of the Eastern Church espoused the opinion of Cyprian, upon the necessity of rebaptism in such cases. The sentiments of Dionysius, however, were distinguished by their gentleness and moderation; for, while he maintained the nullity of baptism when performed by a heretic, he saw no necessity, although others did, of rebaptizing restored apostates, who had already received the rite according to the principles of the orthodox Church. He did not, however, so dogmatically cleave to his own judgment, or become so keen a partisan, as to be inaccessible to conviction; on the contrary, he was willing to modify his sentiments, where the case was attended with peculiar circumstances. Of this, the following instance, which he submitted to the Bishop of Rome for advice, is a proof, as well as of the general modesty and tolerance of his character. An old man, who had been a member of the church for many years, being present at the baptism of several persons at which Dionysius officiated, was so struck with the questions and answers upon the occasion, that he could obtain no peace or rest. He came to the bishop weeping, and, falling down at his feet, he confessed himself the subject of a heretical baptism, so unlike that which he had lately witnessed, and so full of impieties and blasphemies. He also declared that he had no longer confidence to lift up his eyes to God, on account of having been initiated into the faith with such ceremonies, and prayed, therefore, that he might be baptized anew. But to this Dionysius did not dare to accede; and he told the man that his long communion with the Christian Church—his saying "Amen" so often to the thanks of the congregation—his frequent attendance at the table of the Lord, and stretching out his hand to receive the holy food—would make his admission anew by the other sacrament of baptism an act, perchance, of rashness or presumption. In the meantime, he told the applicant to be of good comfort, and continue to approach the Lord's Supper with a firm faith and a good conscience. All this, however, did not remove the other's scruples, so that he held back from the sacramental table, and could scarcely be persuaded to attend even the public prayers; upon which the good bishop, anxious to have the difficulty resolved, had recourse to the advice of his Roman brother. Of the answer returned by the latter, Eusebius, who has preserved the epistle of Dionysius, gives no account.

THE TABORITES; OR, THE FOLLOWERS OF HUSS IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

BY THE LATE REV. THOMAS M'CRIE, D.D.

PART I.

In a valuable volume, recently published, entitled, "The Miscellaneous Writings" of Dr M'Crie, the following account is given of a sect which arose at the dawn of the Reformation in Germany. An essay on a historical point of this nature, from the pen of the learned historian of Knox and Melville, will be read with deep interest.

About the commencement of the fifteenth century, some of the writings of the English proto-reformer, Wickliffe, were carried into Bohemia, by a gentleman of that country, who had studied at Oxford. These writings recommended themselves to many learned Bohemians, particularly in the University of Prague, who were struck with the force of truth, and the knowledge of Scripture, which they contained. Among these was John Huss, an eminent pastor in one of the churches of Prague, and rector of the university there. He did not adopt all the opinions of Wickliffe, and remained under the influence of several of the errors of the age, which that great man had been enabled to throw off; but he adopted the leading sentiment which was the polar star that directed Wickliffe in all his inquiries after truth, viz., the supreme authority and sufficiency of the Scriptures as the rule of faith. His doctrine, and his recommendation of the writings of Wickliffe, tended to open the eyes of many to the reigning abuses, and to lead others farther into the knowledge of the truth than himself. The fate of Huss is well known. Being summoned to appear before the Council at Constance, and refusing to abjure his opinions, he was, in pursuance of a decree of that Council, burned alive in 1415 (as well as his disciple, Jerome of Prague), notwithstanding the safe conduct which he had obtained from the Emperor Sigismund.

In the meantime, the knowledge of the truth was spreading in Bohemia. About the time that Huss set out for Constance, Jacobel de Mise, or James of Misa, began to preach publicly against the practice of withholding the cup from the laity in the sacrament of the Supper; and showed from Scripture, and the practice of the primitive Church, that the eucharist ought to be administered to all the communicants in both kinds or elements. Having written to John Huss upon this subject, he, in several letters, expressed his approbation of this sentiment, and also composed a treatise in his favour. Jacobel being supported by several other priests, and by the approbation of the people, carried his sentiment into practice; and the communion was dispensed in both kinds, in several churches in Prague. The practice spread quickly through the different provinces of the kingdom; and the people every where flocked to those ministers who administered the ordinance after the scriptural mode.

We may now inquire into the origin of the name of Taborites, which was given to the followers of Huss. "The Taborites," says Mosheim, "derived their name from a mountain well known in sacred history." Does the learned historian mean, that the mountain called Tabor in Scripture lay in Bohemia? or does he mean, that the persons alluded to were addicted to the use of Scripture names? This mistake is the more unaccountable, as a little before he had mentioned a circumstance, which plainly suggests the true origin of the name. Speaking of a mountain in which they held their religious meetings, he says, "This mountain they call Tabor, from the tents which they first erected there for their habitation." Those who wished to enjoy the communion as instituted by Christ, were obliged, as we shall see

Immediately, to repair to a mountain in the district of Bechin, where they erected a tent (or, as Mosheim says, tents), in which they celebrated divine worship. The Bohemian word Tabor signifies a tent. This name, therefore, they gave to the mountain; and hence they came to be known by the name of Taborites.

The account which L'Enfant gives of this matter is also inaccurate. In his history of the war of the Hussites, he says, that Ziska, their general, made choice of this mountain as a proper situation for a fortified city; that he ordered his people to erect tents in the places where they wished to have houses: from which circumstance, the mountain was called Tabor. In his history of the Council of Constance, however, a different account is given. He there says, that Nicholas of Hussinetz (not Ziska), being banished from Prague, repaired to the place afterwards called Tabor, and made it a place of resort and worship.

But the most credible and authentic account of this matter is given by Laurentius de Byzinius, in a journal which he wrote of the wars of the Hussites, and which L'Enfant does not appear to have consulted. He was Chancellor of Prague, and alive at the time of which he writes. His account is to the following purpose. The communion, under both kinds, met with great opposition in the district of Bechin. The curates and vicars drove all who befriended it out of their churches. Being deprived of divine service, some of the pastors conducted their flocks to a neighbouring mountain. There they erected a tent in the form of a chapel, in which they performed divine service, and administered the communion to the people in both elements. The service being ended, they took down the tent, returned to their houses, and called the mountain Tabor. This happened in the year 1419. Their brethren from other villages having heard of this, assembled with them, and proposed to encourage and strengthen one another, by meeting at the same place, and communicating together. "The report of these assemblies," says Byzinius, "having spread on all sides, they became every day more numerous. They came to Tabor, not only from the villages round about, but also from Prague, &c., and from many places in Moravia, some on foot, some on horseback; some from a religious view, to hear the Word of God, and communicate with their brethren; others from curiosity; and others with the design of acting as spies, and to seek something to speak against." The same author gives us a particular account of their manner of worship. The most learned and eloquent of their ministers began in the morning, by preaching the Word of God to the people, divided into different companies; on which occasion they censured boldly the avarice and pride of the clergy who oppressed them. Other priests received the confessions; and then others distributed the communion under both kinds, which service lasted from morning till mid-day. At mid-day, they partook of a sober repast which was prepared for them. The refreshment being finished, the priests rose and returned thanks; after which they marched in procession round the hill, singing psalms and hymns, and retired to their houses (says this author), without turning to the right hand or to the left, lest they should hurt the grass. So large were the assemblies, that on one day there were about forty-two thousand people present. Some lords prohibited their vassals from going to Tabor, under the penalty of death, and confiscation of their property; but they persisted in going at the risk of both.

When we consider the darkness in which the world was enveloped at the beginning of the fifteenth century, and the opposition against which the truth was obliged to struggle, we need not wonder that it was gradually and slowly unfolded. The Bohemian proto-martyr wrote from his prison, in Constance, to his friends in Bohemia, "That he had a strong desire to expose unto them all the abominations of Antichrist, that they might know and guard against them. But he trusted in the Lord, that he would raise up to them, after his death, pastors who, by His assistance, would discharge their duty more fully and successfully; who would bring to light all the impostures, crimes, errors, guile, pride, hypocrisy, and impurity of the Man of Sin, and not be drawn aside from the truth, either by promises or threatenings." The expectation of this confessor was not disappointed.

Some account has already been given of the restoration of the cup in the Lord's Supper, by the instrumentality of Jacobel de Misse,—of the general reception which this met with throughout Bohemia,—and of the crowds who assembled, particularly on the mountain which they called Tabor, to participate of the ordinance under both kinds, or elements. Still, however, the opinion of transubstantiation, the celebration of mass, and the practice of auricular confession, with other remains of Popery, were retained. But, having once begun to consult the Scriptures, and adopted them as the rule of their faith and practice, men could not long remain under the influence of these absurd and superstitious inventions. Accordingly, many of the Hussites, or Taborites, threw off these corruptions, and embraced the purity and simplicity of the Gospel.

This was the occasion of a great schism among the Hussites. Though all of them strenuously opposed the tyranny of the Court of Rome, and the corruption of the clergy, and zealously maintained the use of the cup in the Lord's Supper, yet a great part, timid, and prejudiced in favour of opinions and practices which had received the sanction of ages, and were every where submitted to, were averse to any farther reformation. A diversity of religious practice was introduced among them, and, after some time, the difference came to an open breach. Two parties were formed; the one of whom were called Calixtines, from their distinguishing tenet, which was pleading for the use of the chalice, or cup, in the Lord's Supper; the other retained the name of Taborites, which was formerly a name given to all the Hussites. The old city of Prague, the capital of Bohemia, with the principal nobility, adhered to the Calixtines; the inhabitants of New Prague, with those who dwelt at Tabor and the neighbourhood, were the principal supporters of the other party. This division was similar to that which, in the following century, separated Protestants into the two great bodies of Lutheran and Reformed.

They had all united in a solemn league to defend the communion under both kinds against the favourers of the Court of Rome and the Council of Constance, who, under the Emperor Sigismund, successor to Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia, threatened to subjugate them. Even after their ecclesiastical union was marred, both parties occasionally joined their arms in opposing the common enemy; but their religious differences often interrupted their outward peace; and, at last, the variances which they produced ruined their affairs, and completely subjected them to their adversaries.

The first public difference which appeared between them, was principally on a political ground. The nobles and magistrates of Prague consented to treat with the Emperor, who amused them by this until his forces were collected. This happened in 1419. Ziska, the valiant captain of the Taborites, refused to accede to this treaty, and left Prague in displeasure. He, however, returned to its defence, when besieged by the huge army which Sigismund had gathered together.

While the Taborites resided in Prague on this occasion, they performed divine service according to the mode which appeared to them most scriptural. Their ministers wore their beards like other men; they had not the shaven crowns of the Popish priests; and they were dressed in clothes of a grey or brown colour. They did not repeat the canonical hours. They performed worship sometimes in the open air, sometimes in private houses, avoiding the churches, either because they were dedicated to saints, or because they were profaned by images. They observed none of the ceremonies of the mass. Before communicating, the whole assembly, kneeling, repeated the Lord's Prayer. After this, the minister who was to officiate approached a table covered with white linen, upon which stood the bread and wine. The bread was cut or broken, for they did not use wafers. The wine was not in cups of gold or silver, which had been consecrated, but in vessels of pewter, wood, or stone. The minister pronounced, with a loud voice, and in the vulgar tongue, the words of consecration. This being finished, he caused the other ministers present and the people to communicate. They did not elevate the eucharist after consecration, and consequently did not adore it; nor did they keep any of it till next day.

This service, so simple, so novel, shocked the University and a great many of the priests in the city of Prague. They had banished the costly and superfluous ornaments of the services, but they retained all the other rites, and in particular used the canon of the mass. Zealous for the old ritual, they could not refrain from publicly exclaiming against the Taborites for their neglect of it. These, in their turn, blamed the Popish service as totally destitute of Scripture authority, and stigmatized those who stickled for it as Pharisees. The people mingled in the quarrel of their priests; one party approved the Calixtine rite, another preferred the Taborite. Some of the inhabitants refused to receive the communion from the hands of their priests, unless they laid aside their sacerdotal vestments; and the women, at the instigation of their husbands, hindered them from performing the service with their ornaments. It was in this manner that, in the year 1420, the sad division originated.

After the raising the siege of Prague, the Taborites presented to the city twelve articles, upon the acceptance of which, they engaged to defend it to their utmost ability; but threatening to leave it, if these were not complied with. These articles respected the punishment of notorious crimes, the restraint of luxury, the abolition of Pagan laws, the preaching of the Word, the regulation of the conduct of the clergy, the banishment of the faithless enemies of the truth, the abolition of monasteries, images, decorations in the service of God, and the extirpation of every antichristian plant. They concluded their demand with these words: "It is in the defence of these truths, dear brethren, that we have risked our property and our lives, and many of us have shed our blood. We are resolved, through Divine assistance, to maintain them, and we wish that you should agree with us in them: in this case you may depend upon our aid as long as we live." The people of the new city readily received these articles; those of the old demurred, and demanded time to consult with the doctors of the university, who rejected some of the articles. The magistrates, who were chiefly averse, were removed by the people to make way for the agreement; but their articles not being cordially adopted, the Taborites left the city.

THOUGHTS PREPARATORY TO READING OR HEARING THE SCRIPTURES.

"I will hear what God the Lord will speak."—PSALM lxxv. 8.

[From "Recollections of the Lakes, and other Poems."] ]

'Tis God's most holy Word—how may I best Receive that Word, "and inwardly digest?"
First let me ask my Saviour to impart
The hearing ear, the understanding heart;
Then let me duly marshal and control
Each varied faculty of mind and soul;
Let Reason know her part, nor try to soar
Where higher natures wonder and adore;
Let chaste'n'd Fancy fold her vagrant wings,
Nor dare to blend her wild imaginings
With that divinest Record;—let not Fear
Drop on the page one dark distrustful tear,—
That wondrous page, which, if beheld aright,
God's love reveals in characters of light.
But come, ye Christian graces—sisters three—
Firm Faith glad Hope, seraphic Charity;

And, like the cherubim that veil'd the shrine
Which erst contain'd the oracles divine,
Come ye, and in my bosom ever rest,
Guarding it still from influence unblest;
Then in a fitting spirit, reverent, meek,
Shall I receive what God the Lord will speak.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. CHARLES NISBET, D. D.,

LATE PRESIDENT OF DICKINSON COLLEGE, CARLISLE, AMERICA.

BY THE EDITOR.

THIS eminent and useful man was born in Haddington, on the 21st of January 1736. His parents, though highly respectable in character, were in rather humble circumstances. Still, both Charles and his elder brother, Andrew, who was afterwards minister of Garvald, in the Presbytery of Haddington, were educated not only in the ordinary branches of elementary instruction, but initiated, also, in the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages, with the view of being sent to college. The subject of our present Sketch, accordingly, was entered a student of the University of Edinburgh in 1752. During his academic course he maintained himself, and defrayed the whole expenses of his education, by employing himself in teaching privately. And while thus actively engaged in the tuition of others, he was far from inattentive to his own studies; on the contrary, he distinguished himself among his fellow-students by the extent and accuracy of his acquirements, in various departments of literature and philosophy. At the close of his literary career he was enrolled as a student of theology, under the late learned Dr Hamilton, Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh. During his attendance at the divinity hall he was employed in editing a popular periodical publication; which he managed with remarkable tact as well as talent. It was at this period that his mind became impressed with serious views. Hitherto he had looked forward to the work of the ministry simply as a useful and honourable profession; now he began to think of religion as a matter of personal interest. Two different acts of self-dedication to God were accordingly found among his papers, both of them bearing dates corresponding to the years of his theological course.

Having completed the appointed period of study, and been examined by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, Mr Nisbet was licensed to preach the Gospel on the 24th of September 1760, in the 24th year of his age. The first sermon which he preached in public was in the pulpit of the late eminent Dr Witherspoon, then one of the ministers of Paisley. For two years after receiving license he was employed in supplying a church in the Gorbals of Glasgow; but at the end of that period, on the recommendation of Dr Gillies of Glasgow, he received a call to Montrose, which he thought it his duty to accept. The necessary steps were then taken for his removal, and he was ordained to the office of the holy ministry, as assistant and successor to the Rev. John Cooper, one of the ministers of Montrose. The situation in which he was now placed was one of peculiar difficulty and responsibility. He acquitted himself, however, with great acceptance and success. Mr Cooper, in consequence of age and infirmities, was almost entirely laid aside from duty, and on Mr Nisbet, therefore, devolved the chief weight of the pastoral functions. These he discharged for ten years with the utmost diligence and conscientiousness, and at the end of that period, Mr Cooper having died, the young assistant became minister of the parish. About two years after he had removed from Glasgow to Montrose, Mr Nisbet was united in marriage with Miss Anne Tweedie, a daughter of Thomas Tweedie, Esq. of Quarter. On this happy occasion his intimate friend, Dr Beattie, of Marischal College, Aberdeen, the distinguished author of "The Minstrel," composed, and transmitted to him, a beautiful poem, which he styled "Epithalamium Montrosianum." This elegant mark of friendship has unfortunately been lost.

About the period of his marriage an event occurred which affords a very pleasing proof of the high estimation in which his talents and learning were held. The office of President of New Jersey College, in the United States of America, having become vacant, it was offered to the Rev. Dr Witherspoon, and as he was at that time unwilling to leave his native land, he recommended Mr Nisbet, as the fittest man of all his acquaintance to occupy the honourable situation. The trustees of the college, however, having repeated their request to Dr Witherspoon, he was prevailed upon to accept the office. It was highly honourable to Mr Nisbet, that though at that time only thirty-one years of age, he should have been recommended to a station so high and honourable. The truth is, he was a man of great acquirements; and such was the extent of his erudition, that he was proverbially called, among his acquaintances, "The Walking Library." And to a mind thus richly furnished, he added talents of a very high order, and dispositions so affable and kind, as to have rendered him accessible to the humblest of his flock. With a combination of such peculiar qualities, both of mind and heart, he was equally a favourite in public and in private. His pulpit ministrations were held in much estimation, and his pastoral visits were gladly welcomed by a grateful and attached people. His company was much courted, and whether in the literary or the religious circle, his conversation was highly prized.

During Mr Nisbet's incumbency at Montrose, the controversy arose in England between the admirers of Whitefield and those of Wesley. Several eminent divines in Scotland also took a share in the dispute; and among others, the learned minister of Montrose attacked the opinions of Wesley, as savouring, in his opinion, of Arminianism, and, therefore, opposed to the doctrines of free grace. He drew up an elaborate review of the system of Wesley; which, however, was not published until several years afterwards. Nor was he an inattentive or unconcerned spectator of the political commotions of the period. In the events of the American war he felt a lively interest. His principles and feelings led him to adopt the side of the Colonists,—a circumstance which rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to the Government of that day. No doubt the circumstance already narrated may have tended to give his sympathies a strong bias in favour of those who had taken up arms in defence of their country, even although they had thrown off their allegiance to Britain; but it was no slight blemish, indeed, in the character of this great and good man, that he mingled himself up to such an extent with merely political contentions. And it is not at all surprising that he should have given offence, in many cases where it was altogether unnecessary and uncalled for. The question of great public interest in which Mr Nisbet felt a lively interest, was the much-agitated topic of Church patronage, and on that subject his opinions were firm and decided. He convened a meeting on the subject in the parish church of Montrose, and drew up the resolutions which were passed, calling for the repeal of the act of Queen Anne, by which patronage was restored and confirmed in Scotland.

At the commencement of Princetown College, America, in the year 1783, the trustees of that institution, over which Dr Witherspoon so honourably presided, conferred on Mr Nisbet the degree of Doctor in Divinity. He was then in his forty-eighth year, and the title was regarded as well-merited on his part. He was now held in high estimation, indeed, as a learned and able minister of the New Testament.

About this period an event occurred which changed the whole aspect of Dr Nisbet's future life. Though he had formerly refused to accept of a situation in America, the time had now come when a similar offer was more likely to be well received. His friend, Dr Witherspoon, had for some years been settled in the United States, and the close correspondence which was still maintained between them, as well as the prepossessions which Dr Nisbet had long entertained in favour of that country, prepared him for the change which soon after took place. Soon after the close of the American revolutionary war, measures were taken for the establishment of a new college in the town of Carlisle, in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, one hundred and twenty miles west of Philadelphia. This institution, which received the name of Dickinson College, having been completed, the attention of the board of trustees was directed to Dr Nisbet, as the first President or Principal of their new college. This unanimous election to this office was communicated to him by his old friend Dr Rush, who failed not to urge upon him the most favourable view of the matter. For some time, however, he hesitated; and for a time, at least, chiefly by the instigation of his friends, he gave up all thoughts of leaving his native land. At length, however, the importunity of Dr Rush, and the other members of the board of trustees, prevailed, and he made preparations for resigning his charge, and bidding a long farewell to the land of his fathers. Much resistance was made by his friends to this ultimate decision, and by none more than Lord and Lady Leven, in whose friendship he felt a peculiar pleasure. But all was in vain; he was resolute and determined, and no argument or entreaty could have any influence over him.

Dr Nisbet sailed from Greenock with his family on the 23d of April 1785, and landed at Philadelphia on the 9th of June following. According to a previous arrangement, he took up his residence in the house of Dr Rush; where he and his family were treated with a hospitality which, as he himself says, in a letter written to Lord Buchan immediately after his arrival, "would do honour to any age or country." Early in July he set out for Carlisle, the place of his future residence. In entering upon his office, he delivered the only discourse which he ever allowed to be printed. It was founded on Acts vii. 22, "And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds." Scarcely had he commenced the arduous duties which now devolved upon him, when he and several members of his family were seized with a severe and protracted illness. For several months he was confined to the house, and so reduced in body as to be unfit for any exertion. Discouraged by this interruption to his labours at the outset, he sent in his resignation of his office to the board of trustees, and resolved to return to Scotland. This determination he communicated by letter to his old and steady friend, Lord Buchan. In his weak state of health it was judged inexpedient, by his medical advisers, that he should undertake a voyage across the Atlantic during winter, and, happily, before the return of spring he and his family were so much recruited, both in health and spirits, that they were easily persuaded to remain in their adopted country. Accordingly, on the 10th of May 1786, he was re-elected, unanimously, to the office which he had relinquished.

The intelligence soon reached Scotland of Dr Nisbet's purpose to return, and the following extract of a letter from Lady Leven shows the attachment of his former charge at Montrose, and their readiness to receive him again as their pastor:—

"Just when I was meditating a letter to you, yours of June 24th came to hand. Had I been in good health, I should not have been so long in acknowledging your letter without date, which I received about three or four weeks ago. It filled me with much surprise, considering its immediate predecessor, and that we had long looked for you, and daily expected your arrival on the Scotch coast. I had heard surmises, but none of them appeared such as could be depended on, till I had it from your own hand. Most wishfully your friends were expecting you, and the people at Montrose kept the church vacant till your not coming was almost certain. But perhaps you did not know of this. I trust that you have been directed to what is best, and most for promoting that interest which you wish to spread. I am sorry to find that your health has been again affected in the hot weather, and that your family are suffering by it. I shall be glad to learn that you are all better, and other particulars concerning them.

"I am much obliged to you for writing me so particularly concerning the state of religion. I fear you are prejudiced, and, therefore, do not do all the justice to the Methodists that many deserve who go under that designation. You know they were always in two parties. Those bearing the name of Mr Whitefield are orthodox, as I suppose, in all points. And, although some of Mr Wesley's are not so, yet, I am persuaded, they have done a great deal of good in reforming the lives and manners of thousands; and that Mr Wesley has been countenanced in his indefatigable labours by his Divine Master. To Him, according to his views, he has been a faithful servant for seventy years. He is now near ninety, still active and vigorous, and anxiously concerned, I truly believe, to do the will of his heavenly Father.

"I should be glad to learn more particulars concerning the 'Shakers,' being entirely ignorant of their history or tenets. I will be much obliged to you for writing frequently. I am sure you will hear much good of Mr Whitefield, and still find some of his disciples making a good figure. It is always a pleasure to me to hear any thing to his praise. You will have heard, perhaps, before this reaches you, of the great loss which the Church and the people of God have met with in the death of the precious Lady Glenorchy. I fear we shall never see her like again. But the subject is too copious. I must only give you the text, which you can enlarge upon better than I. She only left the scrawl of an unsigned will, in which she devised £5000 to the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in Scotland, and a like sum for pious uses in England. It is not ascertained whether or not Lady Southerland and her husband will fulfil her intentions; but I should suppose their doing so cannot be doubted. There is a good deal more devised for pious uses."

As soon as his health was confirmed, Dr Nisbet entered upon the duties of his office with the most energetic ardour. He began the preparation and delivery of four co-ordinate courses of lectures,—one on Logic, another on the Philosophy of Mind, a third on Moral Philosophy, and a fourth on Belles Lettres. These were all carried on at the same time, and with the greatest ease; the lecture of each successive day being for the most part written on the preceding evening. Besides these courses of lectures, this extraordinary man delivered, at the request of the students of theology, an extended course of prelections on Systematic Theology; probably the first on that subject ever prepared and delivered in the United States. At the close of this last course, which extended over little more than two years and two months, he delivered a short course on the Pastoral Office. In addition to all his labours as President of the college, he regularly preached in the Presbyterian church in Carlisle, alternately with the Rev. Dr Davidson, Vice-President of the college, and Pastor of the church. As a preacher, he was highly acceptable and popular.

Amidst all Dr Nisbet's labours, thus multiplied and useful, his friends in Scotland were, many of them, importunate for his return. Every year, however, tended to render him less disposed to withdraw from the important station to which he had been called. He still continued, indeed, to hold correspondence with some of his earliest acquaintances—among others, with Lord Burchan, Lady Leven, Dr Erskine of Edinburgh, Dr Beattie of Aberdeen, and Dr Martin of Monimail.

For several years before his death, Dr Nisbet continued, with undiminished activity and zeal, to prosecute the important duties of his office. He was not a little chagrined and disappointed, however, to find that his views and wishes were not seconded by the board of trustees. And not only did they thwart his plans for the benefit of the students, reducing the term of study to an unreasonably short period, but they reduced his salary to a sum quite inadequate to the support of his family. And not only so; his salary was miserably paid. Arrears were allowed to accumulate to such an extent, that at the time of his death they had reached the amount of four or five years' salary; and, at last, they were only recovered by a legal process.

The life of this learned and useful man was now drawing to a close. About the beginning of January 1804, he was seized with a severe cold, accompanied with fever and inflammation of the lungs. The disease made gradual, but steady progress. His sufferings were great, and yet they were endured with the most exemplary patience. In his last hours he spoke little, but that little betokened a peaceful mind. As he sunk into the sleep of death, these words were uttered by him with peculiar fervour, "Holy, holy, holy!" His death occurred on the 18th of January 1804, within three days of the completion of his sixty-eighth year.

The "Memoir of Dr Nisbet," which has recently appeared in New York, from the pen of Dr Miller of Princeton College, and from which the materials of the foregoing Sketch have been exclusively derived, is drawn up with the ability and good taste which characterise the talented author.

THE INTELLECTUAL STATE OF THE RABBINICAL JEWS.

In Dr M'Caul's valuable little work, entitled "Judaism and the Jews," the following account occurs, which will be perused with peculiar interest at the present time.

In this country, most people know only the outside of the Jewish nation. They see or hear only of two classes—rich Jews and poor Jews. When a rich Jew is named, they think of the fands; and at the mention of a poor Jew, oranges, pencils, old clothes, &c., are generally the associated ideas. The continental traveller soon makes a different classification. He finds, in a language of Christians, enlightened Jews, and bigots; or, in the phraseology of the Jews themselves, old-fashioned and new-fashioned Jews. The epithet bigot, in modern times so fearful, may deter many an one from inquiring farther concerning the class upon whom it is bestowed. But the quiet and impartial observer soon discovers that the term bigot, when applied to Jews, means nothing more dreadful than it often does when used among Christians. It simply signifies a man who thinks that his forefathers had some wit and knowledge too; and that wisdom is not one of the inventions of the nineteenth century. That which continental Gentiles call a bigoted Jew is, as the Jews rightly express it, an old-fashioned, or in other words, a Rabbinical Jew.

From the dispersion to the latter end of the last century, Rabbinism prevailed universally amongst the Jewish nation, with the exception of the one small sect of the Karaites. If asked to give a concise, yet adequate, idea of this system, I should say, it is Jewish Popery: just as Popery may be defined to be Gentile Rabbinism. Its distinguishing feature is, that it asserts the transmission of an oral or traditional law of equal authority with the written law of God, at the same time, that, like Popery, it resolves tradition into the present opinions of the existing Church. And, as this oral law is most minute in its details, and altogether immutable in its decisions, it has made the intellectual and moral state of all those who receive it almost stationary; so that a Rabbinical Jew of the present day, as he exists in Poland or Palestine, conveys a tolerably accurate idea of what the Jews were centuries ago. It is true that the variation of the national fortunes, and the rise of such men as Jarchi and Maimonides, has had considerable influence in modifying or directing the studies and dogmas of the people; but any one, who has had much opportunity of observation, will find a striking resemblance between the habits of mind described in the New Testament and those now general amongst the Rabbinical Jews. Acute, subtle, disputatious, with a profound love of learning, and an uncontrollable energy in the pursuit of knowledge—such is their general character. Any one who has travelled through Poland, and has known enough of Hebrew and Jewish to inquire into the state of the Jews, will readily admit that they are an educated and highly intellectual people. It is true that they are altogether ignorant of Greek and Latin literature, and consider it a sin to learn any modern language. But a nation which had a learned language besides the vernacular dialect, an extensive literature in that language, and which studied that learned language almost universally,—so that it is a rare thing to meet a Jew, however forlorn and destitute, who cannot read it fluently, and understand it at least a little,—such a nation must be regarded as an educated and intellectual people.

It is true they can make no pretension to Belles Lettres. The vernacular dialect of the Polish Jews is still what was formerly the language of the whole class of German Jews, and is now called Jewish. Half a century ago it was commonly called Jewish-German; but this latter term now signifies good German, printed in Jewish characters; whereas Jewish is ancient German, mixed up with Hebrew and Rabbinical; and, in Poland, with a small addition of Polish. All the theological terms are Hebrew or Rabbinical; many of the names of household implements, and not a few imprecations and terms of abuse, are Polish. It is not an uncommon thing to hear the three languages in one short sentence—as, iach geid die Heheimos umpoiyin, “I am going to water the cattle.” Heheimos (behemoth) is Hebrew; umpoiyin is of Polish extraction; the rest is German. This dialect, though very free from rules of grammar, and uncertain as to its orthography, possesses a tolerably extensive literature, which forms the lecture of the Jewesses and ammarazin or unlearned Jews. Prayers, poems, dramas, legends, commentaries, and extracts from the Rabbinical writings, have been published in this dialect. Athias also published the Old Testament complete in the Jewish character; but the language approximates so nearly to good German, that this translation has never become general in Poland. The New Testament, Pentateuch, Isaiah, Psalms, &c., have been published by the London Society in the Polish-Jewish dialect. The favourite book is R. Jacob’s “Commentary on the Pentateuch and Hapharoth,” or weekly portions of the prophets, usually known by the title “Taennorennah,” or the Weiber Chumash, the women’s Pentateuch. This book, which is a compilation of all that is absurd and marvellous in Rabbinical lore, furnishes the Sabbath reading for the female Jewish population; and shows, on every page, the low state of religious knowledge amongst the Rabbinical Jewesses. If the Biblical citations were taken away, it might be classed with “Tom Thumb,” or “Jack the Giant-killer.” As it stands, it appears to the Christian reader as the most inconceivable mixture of absurdity and gravity. But, after all, though the female part of the Jewish community be neglected, the Rabbinical Jews must still be regarded as an educated people. Double attention is bestowed upon the male children. Almost every Jewish boy learns to read and translate the five Books of Moses. If he be an orphan or poor, either the congregation or some benevolent individuals voluntarily supply the means. There was some years ago, in a town on the Continent, a Jewish tailor, who devoted all that he could save or spare to the one object of educating destitute children. He made it his business to seek for them, and paid a Melammed, or teacher, to instruct them. No doubt the Popish idea of the merit of good works, and the superstitious notion, that, if a child cannot repeat a certain prayer in the synagogue, the soul of the deceased parent remains in purgatory, have great influence in procuring the careful instruction of Jewish boys. But this does not affect the plain matter of fact, that the greatest reproach that can be cast upon a Rabbinical Jew is, that he neglects the education of his children. Poverty does not present the same bar that it does in this country. There are, amongst the Jews, whole hoets of Melammedim, or schoolmasters, whose terms are very low; and who, though poor themselves, are never hard upon their poor brethren touching the matter of payment. In the class above the very poor, some five or six fathers of families club together to pay a Melammed; and those who can at all afford it keep a private tutor in their own family. A Jew, with one-quarter of the means possessed by our middling trades-people, would be sure to have a private tutor. His wants and those of his family are few. The Jew is, in general, temperate, or rather abstemious. In fact, no nation indulges less in luxury, or practises self-denial more than the Jews. Their clothing, furniture, and food, are much plainer than that considered absolutely necessary by Christians in the same rank of life. They can, therefore, afford to expend more upon what they justly think more important—the education of their children. The traveller through Poland is often astonished at finding, in a miserable Jewish inn, which presents a picture of silt and wretchedness, a private tutor for the landlord’s children. Sometimes the salary is very small; but, amongst the respectable Jews, twenty ducats for the zman, or, season, is not unusual. There are two zmas, or seasons, in the year,—one from the feast of passover to that of tabernacles; the second, from the latter to the former festival.

At four or five years of age, the Jewish child begins to learn the Aleph Beth. As soon as he can read the Hebrew text with points, the work of translation commences. There is no learning of grammar. The Melammed teaches the translation at once. He pronounces the Hebrew word, and tells the meaning, and repeats a given portion in this way until the child knows it. Thus, without grammar or lexicon, without any reference to roots or conjugations, the Jewish children learn the language of their forefathers; and it is surprising to see the progress which they make in the course of a year. When the child can translate tolerably, he then begins the Pentateuch again, with the “Commentary” of R. Solomon Jarchi. The style of this commentator is concise, and often obscure. But the oral instruction clears away the difficulties. The Melammed repeats the words, giving the sense as before, and the child repeats after him until he has learned his task, which is for a week, either the whole weekly portion of the law, or a part of it, according to his abilities. When he has mastered Rashi, he begins the Talmud. At first, the oral method is used as before; but very soon the child is left to shift for himself; and usually, at ten years of age, he is able to make out the sense by the help of Jarchi’s “Commentary.” At thirteen he becomes a bar mitzvah, the son of the commandment, and is then responsible for his own sins, which, up to that time, the father has borne; and is expected to expound some difficult passage of the Talmud publicly in the synagogue. Of course, all Jewish children do not pursue these studies so far as the Talmud and its commentaries. The mass of the people are very poor, and many are, therefore, obliged to rest satisfied with a knowledge of the Pentateuch. Others stop at Rashi’s “Commentary.” Others exhibit no taste for learning. But still, after deducting all these classes, a greater proportion of Jewish children receive a learned education than amongst Christians. Poor youths of promise find a seminary and books in the Beth Hammedrash, or house of instruction, which exists in every large congregation, where the Rabbi presides and superintends the studies. They are supported by voluntary contribution, and wander about from one celebrated Rabbi to another in order to complete their studies; and, it must be added, every where find a home and a supply of the necessaries of life. One of the most pleasing traits in the Jewish character is the hospitality with which they treat all strangers of their nation, but particularly wandering students.

These poorer savants are provided for in various ways. Some get rich wives, as, amongst the Rabbinical Jews, learning ranks higher than wealth; and every father desires to have a learned, and as he thinks, therefore, a pious husband for his daughter. Others become Melammedim, readers in the synagogue, Shochet, or slaughterer; for this is a learned profession amongst the Jews. A slaughterer must be perfectly conversant with all the circumstances which make a beast clean or unclean. For this purpose, he must study the treatises on the Sh'chitah, which contain minute details as to comparative anatomy; nor can he exercise his art until he has been examined by a Rabbi, and has obtained a certificate of his competency. Rabbi, Melammed, Reader, and Shochet, are the learned professions amongst the Rabbinic Jews; and the existence of these offices has in every age insured a large number of educated men amongst them. Amongst the Jews, as well as amongst every other people, the ministers of religion have been the preservers of learning. Without them they must soon have sunk into absolute barbarism. The preservation of learning without religion is impossible. Wherever there are Jewish families, they must have a Shochet, or dispense altogether with animal food, as they dare not eat the meat slaughtered by a Gentile; and, as the Jews are greatly scattered, it follows of course that the number of Sochtim is very great. In small congregations, they also act as reader in the synagogue, and Rabbi. They must then possess a higher degree of learning, as the business of the Rabbi is not only to give instruction, but, with the assistance of two assessors, called judges, to settle disputes, to transact the business attendant on divorces, which are of frequent occurrence, and especially to solve cases of conscience, which are very numerous on account of the intricacy of the Rabbinic laws concerning clean and unclean food, &c.

The mere religious necessities of the people perpetuate a certain number of learned men. But, as learning is looked upon as the most meritorious of all acts, and is, according to the Rabbinical axiom, "equal to the fulfilment of all the other commandments," it is not confined to the officials of the synagogue. Many of the Jewish shopkeepers and trades-people possess a highly respectable degree of Jewish learning, and are quite at home on the subject of the controversy with Christians. Many more leave the management of the shop and all worldly business to their wives, and devote themselves exclusively to study. Many Christians will be ready to say, that all this study and diligence is much ado about nothing. The absurdities and superstitions of Rabbinism are better known than its real genius and spirit. The truth is, that, amidst all its follies and absurdities, Rabbinism possesses as many monuments of genius and intellect as any other system whatever. The Rabbinical writings are also well calculated to train and exercise the understanding. The mere circumstance that they all exist in Hebrew or Chaldee accustoms the Jewish mind at once to a learned language, and necessarily forces upon it some idea of philology. The Talmud, which may be looked upon as a vast congeries of canon law, abounding with the most subtle distinctions and disputations, sharpens the intellect to the utmost. The study of the Talmud has the same effect that the study of law generally has. But the Talmud does not monopolize the Jewish mind. Many devote themselves to the commentaries on the Scriptures, particularly to Jarchi, Aben-Ezra, and Kimchi. Any one who has ever looked into Rosenmüller's "Scholia" will see that these men are not to be despised; that, on the contrary, for acuteness and accurate knowledge of the Hebrew text, they have never been surpassed. Aben-Ezra's and Kimchi's "Expositions of the Psalms" often breathe a genuine devotional spirit. Even when they are in the wrong, as they often are, they are sure to instruct. Jarchi's "Commentary on the Song of Solomon," when compared with the attempts of modern German divines, exhibits Jewish good sense and piety in the most favourable point of view. Others read Nachmanides, Bechai, Alshech, Aberbanel, &c. Aberbanel appears at once as a man of first-rate intellect; and though a bitter enemy of Christianity, it is not possible to read a page of his commentaries without being struck with the perspicuity of his style, and the comprehensive range of his mind. Even a partial acquaintance with these authors is sufficient to inspire the most prejudiced with a profound respect for the Jewish nation, on account of their intense industry, profound Hebrew learning, and great talents. Other Jews, again, devote themselves to the Midrashim, Jalkut, Sobor, and the Kabbala. The readers of Maimonides form a class or school by themselves. They have generally a metaphysical and rationalist turn of mind; and if they cannot be called Rabbinic free-thinkers, they do certainly think more freely than most of their brethren, and are passionately fond of the words, philosopher and philosophy.

These are the usual channels into which Jewish thought is directed:—The Talmud and its compendiums, or Jewish canon law; which comprises a certain portion of the principles of political economy, ethics, and enough of astronomy to regulate their feasts and calendar, which depend upon the moon. Kabbala, or Theosophy. The Commentaries on the Scripture; which include philology, some portion of physics, in order to explain the Mosaic account of the creation, history, and chronology. Logics and metaphysics are found more or less in all, but particularly in the writings of Maimonides. Nor are the Jews of the present day students only. The Jewish printing presses at Slawata, Wilna, Lubin, Warsaw, and Cracow, send forth a number of new works every year. Indeed, whether we look at the Rabbinic Jews of ancient or modern times, we must admit that they are a people of no mean intellectual power. Let any one reflect on the Jewish history, and let him remember that, for nearly eighteen hundred years, they have been an outcast, wandering, persecuted, and oppressed people, and he will find it little short of a miracle that the Jews should have any literature at all. But, when he looks at the extent of that literature, its variety, and the noble monuments of industry, genius, and intellect, which it comprises, he must admit that there is, in the conformation of the Jewish mind, an innate love of learning, a native nobility, an irresistible elasticity of intellect, which has enabled them to bear up against the pressure of calamity and contempt which threatened to overwhelm them. Titus destroyed their city and temple, and Adrian put an end to every hope of political restoration; but neither could destroy the Jewish love of learning,—because it was inseparably connected with their religious wants. The homeless captives soon had flourishing schools of learning. The names of Jamnia and Tiberias, Nahardea, Sora, and Pumbeditha, still attest the power of the Jewish mind. The history of the Jews proves incontrovertibly, that as long as a nation retains a love for its religion, even though that religion have a considerable admixture of error, it can never sink into barbarism. The body may be led into captivity, but the power of religion will still preserve the mind unconquered and free.

THE DUTY OF THE BELIEVER TO CLEAVE UNTO THE LORD:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JOHN JOHNSTON,

Minister of Roxburgh Church, Edinburgh.

"He exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord."—ACTS xi. 33.

No scenes either in the natural or moral world can be contemplated without some feelings of anxiety and fear. However beautiful and pro-missing, they cannot be regarded with unmixed joy and satisfaction. The delight with which we behold the most splendid scenes in nature, or the most promising circumstances of social life, is ever accompanied with the fear of alteration or decay. When we look at the loveliness of nature during spring, the joy of the heart is damped by the fear of immature decay, and we dread lest autumn should not realize the promises of the early year. When the tree puts forth all the brilliance of its blossoms, we fear lest the fruit should fail. We cannot look at the blossoms of spring without an apprehension of the danger to which they are to be exposed, and a dread of the bleakness and desolation which may succeed the beauty we admire. It is with similar feelings of anxiety that we behold the promises of the moral world. However high may be our delight when we see the young and the inexperienced coming under the influence of that bitter discipline which is to guide them to virtue and happiness, it is ever tempered with some feelings of anxiety and fear; and, from our knowledge of that world on which they are entering, we tremble lest their principles and resolutions should be overborne, and dissipated amid the scenes of vanity and error into which they may be seduced. Even when we look at the general state of society, whatever may be the measure of improvement it may have reached, our knowledge of the changes incident to all that is human, leads us to fear lest the wisdom and order we admire should be succeeded by folly and confusion.

It was in this state of mind that Barnabas visited the converts at Antioch. Some of the servants of Christ who had been driven from Jerusalem, on occasion of the martyrdom of Stephen, had found their way to Antioch; and, undismayed by the scenes of persecution and blood from which they had just escaped, they proclaimed the doctrine of their Master, and offered salvation in his name. Their labours were crowned with signal success,—“The hand of the Lord was with them; and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord.” The temples of idolatry were forsaken; the idols were cast to the moles and to the bats; and the men of Antioch, who were the first that were called Christians, experiencing the influence of the truth, manifested its power in the integrity, benevolence, and purity of their conduct. Tidings of this decided triumph of the truth were speedily conveyed to the members of the original Church at Jerusalem, and soothed and enlivened their spirits under all the grief and heaviness which the work of persecution had produced. To confirm and establish these new converts in the better part which they had chosen, Barnabas was commissioned to visit them. There is not a more amiable character transmitted to us from Christian antiquity; and the scene presented to him, when he visited Antioch, was every way fitted to gratify and delight his holy and benevolent spirit. He saw “the grace of God,” the peace and tranquillity, the holiness and joy, which pervaded this infant society; and “he was glad,” because of the triumph of his Master’s name over all the prejudices and iniquities of heathenism, and the diffusion of wisdom and happiness among men who were perishing for lack of knowledge. But even this joy, of one who was “full of faith and of the holy Ghost,” was not without some measure of anxiety and fear. While he rejoiced at the evidence presented to him of the renovating power of the Gospel, he did not regard the converts at Antioch as placed beyond the reach of danger and standing in no need of warning and counsel. He rejoiced with trembling. While he rejoiced over the evidence which he saw of the power and influence of the truth, he knew that they had many dangers to encounter, many trials to meet, and hardships to endure; he could not pronounce them safe till their warfare should be accomplished; his “gladness” could not be perfect while they had corruptions to subdue and temptations to resist; and, therefore, while he congratulated the converts at Antioch, he tendered to them the word of admonition. Had no fears or apprehensions mingled with his gladness, he would not have found it necessary to utter the counsel in the text. “When he came and saw the grace of God he was glad;” but his gladness was not unalloyed with fear; and, therefore, as the means of preserving the scene of spiritual peace and comfort at which he had looked and rejoiced, “he exhorted them to cleave unto the Lord with full purpose of heart.” Whatever they had already known and felt of the good Word of life, no effort must be relaxed, no vigilance abated; they must still be on their watchtower; the weapons of their warfare must not be laid aside; their eye must ever be directed to the Captain of their salvation; with full purpose of heart they must cleave unto the Lord.

It is, my brethren, with similar feelings that every congregation of the faithful must be viewed, whatever be their attainments; and the same exhortation must be addressed to them till they have gained the last triumph over the corruptions of their own hearts, and have left behind them for ever all the allurements and temptations of the world. Wherever the apostles went to visit them who had received the Gospel, we find them, like Barnabas, engaged not so much in the work of congratulation as of warning and admonition. To confirm the souls of the believers, and to persuade them to continue in the grace of God, was their constant work. And to the same work will every faithful minister of the Lord Jesus feel himself constrained; for how glad soever he may be to see the effect of the grace of God among his people, he will ever look to them with a godly jealousy, and call upon them “to cleave unto the Lord.” Whatever advance they may have made in their Christian course, they are ever in danger, and need the counsel and exhortation of Barnabas; and if this advice be neglected, we have no security for their continued perseverance and ultimate triumph. This observation applies with singular propriety to the circumstances in which we are now met. A scene was exhibited in this house last Sabbath,* which we seemed warranted in regarding as a manifestation of "the grace of God," and which every devoted follower of Jesus must have been "glad" to witness. So many human travellers pausing in the journey of life to meditate on the love of Him who died for them—suspending all the cares and enjoyments of time to anticipate the glories of eternity—separating themselves from a world that lies in wickedness, and devoting themselves to the service of Christ—professing their attachment to their Lord, and vowing unshrinking fidelity to his cause,—this was a scene fitted to delight every enlightened mind, and to augment the gladness even of angels. But we cannot think of the scene that thus delighted and instructed us, without some serious apprehensions and deep solicitude. We fear lest the spiritual promises of last Sabbath should not be realized—lest the vows that were made should not be performed—lest the young should be betrayed by the attractions of pleasure, or the old led away by the pursuits of gain and the competitions of interest. We cannot reflect for a moment on the deceitfulness of the heart and the snares of the world, without "standing in doubt" of the most promising profession; and, therefore, instead of hailing you as safe, we must counsel you to "stand in awe." Like this son of consolation, when he visited the converts at Antioch, our joy must be tempered with anxiety; while we are "glad to see the grace of God," we must still "exhort you to cleave unto the Lord with full purpose of heart." This exhortation was not addressed to those who were strangers to Christianity; it was spoken to those who had made a profession of religion, and had felt and exhibited its power; and, therefore, I deem it the most important and appropriate which I can deliver to those who so lately sat at the table of the Lord, and devoted themselves to his service. Let me have your serious attention while I endeavour to explain and to enforce this important admonition.

The exhortation of Barnabas is in beautiful and consistent harmony with the counsels and admonitions which the other inspired servants of Christ addressed to the faithful. They never viewed the converts to the truth as having attained, or as being already perfect, but urged them to constant watchfulness, diligence and perseverance: and as the best and efficient means of maintaining a consistent and persevering profession, they uniformly inculcated a constant and affectionate regard to their Lord and Master. They knew that there was a fulness in Christ sufficient to meet and satisfy all the exigencies of their condition, and that their religious improvement and personal happiness could only be promoted and secured by maintaining a sacred and uninterrupted regard to the gracious Master whose name they bore. To abide in Christ—to walk in Christ—to look unto * This Discourse was preached on the Sabbath immediately after the disputation of the Lord's Supper.

Jesus,—to be rooted and built up in him, are the frequent exhortations given by the apostles to those whom they had brought to the knowledge of the truth, as the means of security against the enemies of their salvation, and of attaining the ultimate and glorious ends of their high calling. Coincident with these apostolical counsels is the exhortation which Barnabas gave to the Christians at Antioch. We are not, however, to conclude that he uttered no other words than those which are recorded here, that he gave no explanation or illustration of the counsel he addressed to them, and did not specify the instances in which they were to cleave unto the Lord. But while there is every reason to believe that Barnabas did amplify his exhortation, it would have been inconsistent with the necessary brevity of these sacred memoirs to have reported such amplification. There was, indeed, the less need for doing so, since from our knowledge of the relations in which the Lord Jesus stands to his people, we may easily ascertain the instances in which we are to "cleave unto him." Let us try, then, with all humility and diffidence, to fill up the outline of this memorable Discourse; and taking the New Testament for our guide, let us specify the relations in which we are "with full purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord."

1. May we not infer, that Barnabas exhorted the Christians at Antioch, and consequently, the followers of Jesus in every other place, to adhere to Christ as their Teacher. In this character the Lord Jesus was constantly exhibited by his apostles. Wherever they went they exposed and reprov'd the ignorance of a blinded world, and exhibited those views of the character of God, and of the condition and destination of man, which philosophy could never suggest, and which none but the followers of the divine Teacher could attain. But it was not enough that the people of Antioch had admitted the claims of Jesus, as a divinely commissioned Instructor, and embraced the views of divine truth which his servants had delivered,—they were exhorted to cherish these sentiments with cordial gratitude, to look to Jesus as their only Instructor, and to take his Word as their only unerring and infallible guide. The same cordial and implicit regard we must ever entertain for this "Teacher come from God." It is not enough that we admit, when called upon, the divinity of his mission, and the transcendent excellence of his doctrine: it is not thus that we cleave even to an earthly teacher, whom we admire and trust,—we are not satisfied with merely admitting the superiority of his genius, or acquiescing in the praise which an admiring world has bestowed,—we recur to him on every occasion for information and direction, and when he has left the world, his works become the theme of our constant admiration, and our daily study. And if this be the regard which the student of human science cherishes towards his instructor, with what higher ardour ought the disciple of Jesus to cling to that Teacher whose wisdom is infinite, and who guides his scholars to perfect knowledge. We have his doctrine transmitted to us, pure as it dropped from his holy lips, and he has promised to be present with us, to cause us to understand it. And shall we rest satisfied with an indolent admission of his lofty claims as a Teacher, and of the ineffable importance of his doctrine? No; let us come to this Record of Eternal Truth daily, and on our bended knees let us seek his Spirit to bring it home upon our hearts. The Teacher and his instructions are constantly within our reach: let us not make light of the invaluable privilege, but let us cleave to him as our Guide amid the varying scenes of time, and our only Conductor to the glories of eternal day. Let us prize his instructions "more than gold, yea, than much fine gold,"—we shall find them "sweeter than honey, and the honey comb,"—in the study of them we shall experience "a great reward."

2. When Barnabas gave this exhortation, may we not infer that he counselled them to cherish a grateful attachment to Jesus as their Saviour? It was, doubtless, not the least source of the joy of Barnabas, that he saw so many of the guilty family of man not merely renouncing the errors and absurdities of idolatry, but, convinced of their lost and condemned state by nature, and confiding for pardon and acceptance in the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God. When he saw so many "brands plucked from the burning," he "was glad;" but he taught them, that believing in the mercy secured by the Saviour's sacrifice was not an isolated act in the life of the Christian, but must be the constant habit of his mind. It was not enough that they had been convinced of sin, and had professed their acceptance of the offered mercy; his feeling of guiltiness must be continued through the whole of life, and application to "the blood of sprinkling" be their daily and habitual exercise. The same counsel, Christians, we now address to you. By your sitting down at the table of the Lord, and your participation of the memorials of his death and sacrifice, you confessed your sense of guilt and condemnation, and testified your implicit reliance on his atonement for pardon and eternal life; but this confession and this testimony will be of little value, if they extend not beyond the hour in which they were made. Your constant liability to fall, renders renewed application to the fountain of mercy necessary. While you continue frail, and imperfect, and erring creatures, you must ever need that pardon which flows from the Redeemer's cross; and therefore, to cleave unto him, as your Deliverer and Saviour, must be your daily employment, amid all the dangers and frailties of mortality. A sense of guilt, and application for pardon through the blood of the Lamb that was slain, are daily exercises of the faithful. This is cleaving unto the Lord; and to lose our sense of sinfulness, and intermit our applications for mercy, is to depart from him, and fall away. Let us, then, continue steadfast and immovable in our dependence on the mercy purchased by the Saviour's blood, and in free and grateful application for its promised exercise, and its needed blessings. "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." In short, to use the quaint but deeply significant statement of the old divines, "The Christian's life is a daily travelling between the sense of his own wants, and the fulness that is treasured up in Christ."

3. While Barnabas called upon the Christians of Antioch to cleave to Jesus as their Saviour, he must have exhorted them, at the same time, to yield him implicit and constant subjection, as their Lord. When the servants of Christ who first visited Antioch made known the doctrine and work of Jesus, they did not fail to proclaim his exaltation and glory. While they narrated the history of his humiliation, and told of his obedience unto death, even the death of the cross, and pointed out the merciful end for which he was humbled and crucified, they announced, at the same time, how highly God had exalted him, and showed the mighty design for which he has thus been honoured. They showed that "all power in heaven and in earth" is committed into his hands; that "he is Head over all things to the Church;" and "that at his name every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." But this worship and confession of Jesus as "Lord of all," was not to be a single act of life, and therefore Barnabas called upon them to honour and obey him as their Sovereign and Lord during all the days of their pilgrimage here, until they should be transmitted to that land where no sound is heard but the music of his name. And the same counsel we give to you. When we spoke at the communion table of the glory with which our risen and ascended Master is now invested, and told of the power he has over the universe, you acquiesced in the grateful statement, and your hearts responded to those anthems of praise which the bright intelligences of heaven lift up before him; but surely these feelings will not be dormant, till awakened and called forth by another commemoration of the death of Christ?—they will be associated with the most sacred affections of the heart; and while we daily cleave to Jesus as our Teacher and our Saviour, we will honour and obey him as our Lord. Think, I beseech you, of those doings in your behalf which you recorded last Sabbath with such glowing gratitude at his table, and you will perceive your constant obligation to obedience. He bought you with a price, rescued you from your enemies, delivered you from the curse and condemnation of sin, and raised you to the hope of everlasting glory; and has he not a claim on the lasting gratitude of your hearts, and the unbroken obedience of your lives? Let the homage we felt and professed at his table spread and increase through the whole of life. Let him have a throne in all our hearts, and an altar in all our dwellings; the honour of every talent, and the obedience of every day. Thus cleaving to Jesus as our Lord here below, we shall be fitted to join that happy family above who cease not day nor night to celebrate his praise, and to execute his high commands.

4. We may further add, that, in the exhortation of Barnabas, the Christians in Antioch were called to "cleave unto the Lord" as their Comforter and Helper in every season of difficulty and trial, of distress and sorrow. Of the various aspects in which the character of the Lord Jesus was presented to them, that of the Comforter of the disconsolate, the Succourer of the helpless, was not the least prominent. They were doubtless informed that they had "not an High Priest who could not be touched with the feeling of their infirmities, but was, in all points, tempted like as we are;" and, "in that he himself suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted." And, to deepen and preserve the view of the Master whom they professed to follow was the design of this exhortation of Barnabas. Instead of resting in an indolent admiration of the sympathy and benevolence of their Lord, they were to regard him as their only refuge in the day of trouble; and although they did not disdain the ordinary means of comfort or relief which Providence placed in their power, they regarded their Master's sympathy as their purest consolation, and his power as their permanent and unailing stay. And where, my friends, are we to find real and abiding comfort amid our manifold distresses, but in the unailing sympathy of our merciful High Priest? And where are we to find support for the duties and the warfare of life, but in him who has promised that his presence shall be always with us, and assured us that "his grace shall be sufficient for us, and his strength perfected in our weakness?" Ever cleave to him, then, as your Helper in duty, and your Comforter in every season of trouble. As you faint in the wilderness of life, instead of fleeing to the "broken cisterns" to which human pity may direct you, come to this "fountain of living waters," and you shall find rest unto your souls. Remembering daily the promises of divine succour which the Saviour has given, you will neither be discouraged nor enfeebled in the hour of duty, nor shall you faint in your Christian warfare. Whatever efforts you put forth, in duty or in suffering, remember that "it is neither by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord," that you can stand in the season of duty, or overcome in the day of trial.

It is thus that we are to cleave unto the Lord, as our Teacher, our Saviour, our Sovereign, our Helper and Comforter; but we cannot leave this subject without being again reminded that the very expression in the text apprises us of opposition, and warns us of difficulty. And who is there that knows not that many enemies are leagued against the Christian, to withdraw him from his Teacher, to shake his confidence in his Saviour, to diminish his allegiance to his Sovereign, and to cool his affection to his Comforter? "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," are arrayed to oppose his progress, and to lead him to make shipwreck of the faith. What, then, is the spirit in which he must cleave to his Teacher and Saviour, his Lord and Helper, in opposition to these enemies of his peace? He must do it, says this son of consolation, "with full purpose of heart." Here, my friends, lies the secret of the Christian's obedience, and the key to the Christian's triumph. Where the heart is engaged in any pursuit, difficulties vanish, and opposition is encountered in fearless intrepidity. And why should it be otherwise when the heart is engaged in the noblest pursuit to which created minds can be summoned? "Perfect love casteth out fear," and throws light on the darkest path of duty and of trial. "Purpose of heart," founded not in our own strength, but in the strength of the Lord of hosts, clears away difficulties, or, if the difficulties remain, their presence serves but to urge to greater vigour, and more strenuous exertions. In this spirit let us cleave to that gracious Lord, to whom, amid the blessed solemnities of a communion Sabbath, we devoted ourselves, soul, body, and spirit; for I am persuaded, where this decided "purpose of heart" prevails, and is sanctified "by the Spirit of the Lord," "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Amen.

THE JEWISH PILGRIM.

ARE these the ancient holy hills
Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
With glory not yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
O'er many a land and sea,
But still, oh promised Palestine,
My dreams have been of thee.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summers bright as they have been
When Israel's home was there;
Though o'er thee sword and time have past,
And Cross and Crescent shone,
And heavily the chain hath prest,
But thou art still our own!

Thine are the wandering race that go
Unblest through every land,
Whose blood hath stained the polar snow,
And quenched the desert sand;
And thine the homeless hearts that turn
From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fallen, and nations gone,
Before the march of time,
And where the ocean rolled alone
Are forests in their prime,
Since Gentile ploughshares marred the brow
Of Zion's holy hill,—
Where are the Roman eagles now?
Yet Judah wanders still.

And hath she wandered thus in vain
A pilgrim of the past?
No! long deferred her hope hath been,
But it shall come at last;

For in her wastes a voice I hear,
As from some prophet's urn—
It bids the nations build not there,
For Jacob shall return.

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem,
Thy pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvests home
In thy redeeming day;
But now, resigned in faith and trust,
I seek a nameless tomb,
At least beneath thy hallowed dust
O give the wanderer room!

LIFE OF DIONYSIUS,

BISHOP OF ALEXANDRIA.

PART II.

AFTER some time spent in such disputations as those to which we adverted in the First Part of this Article, the reign of Gallus, the successor of Decius, occurred, who followed in the steps of his predecessors by a persecution of the Christians. Even this calamity was light, however, in comparison with that which succeeded under the reign of Valerian. This emperor persecuted the Christians with such intense rancour, that Dionysius erroneously believed him to be the beast spoken of in the Revelations, to whom was given a "mouth speaking great things and blasphemies, and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." Had the good bishop lived a few centuries later, and been allowed to retain the sentiments of his own day, he would have found this fearful hydra, under a very different form, and sitting in the chair of one of his own brethren, who dreamt as little as himself of such a strange fulfilment. But the triumph of Valerian was closed, after three years of persecution, by a terrible defeat he sustained from the Persians, in which he was taken prisoner, and used as a footstool by Sapor, his insulting conqueror, when he mounted his horse. The commencement of this storm is characteristic of the age and its heathen rulers. Valerian, who had been at first tolerant, and even kind to the Christians, and whose household contained many of their persuasion, was induced to believe, from the superstitious arguments of an Egyptian magician, that they practised mischievous spells and conjurations, by which they counteracted his prosperity—a representation founded, perhaps, upon the well-known power of the Christians in expelling demons from the possessed. The persecution, thus commenced, extended to Alexandria, where the brethren were commanded by Æmilian, the Prefect, to practise the rites of Gentile worship, and offer sacrifices to the gods. But to this requisition the answer of Dionysius was brief and express. "We must obey God," he said, "rather than men: we must worship the true God, and none but him; and from this resolution I shall not swerve, nor ever cease to be a Christian." The prefect expatiated upon the great clemency of the emperor in tolerating them, if they would only act agreeably to nature, and adore the guardian gods of the empire; to which the bishop replied, "Every one worships those whom he supposes to be gods; but as for us, we adore and serve that one God who created the world, who gave dominion to the emperors, and to whom we offer up daily prayers for the safety and prosperity of the empire." "But if He is a god," rejoined the governor, "no one hinders you to worship him along with those who are truly gods, since all men own them to be so." Arguments would have been useless with such a reasoner, and therefore Dionysius briefly replied, "We cannot worship any other." "I see," said Æmilian, "that you are a foolish, ungrateful people, whom the kindness of the emperor cannot move; therefore you shall no longer stay in this city, but be sent to Cephro, in Lybia, to which I banish you according to his orders. Neither shall you, nor any of your sect, be permitted to hold your meetings or frequent your cemeteries; and whosoever attempts it, it shall be at his peril, and he shall be punished in a manner suitable to his crime. Away, then, to the place allotted for you!" Although Dionysius was sick, the sentence was instantly executed, without allowing him to provide for the journey. To Cephro he accordingly went, a dismal tract of the Lybian Desert; but in this unpromising region, he was cheered, not only by Christian society, but opportunities of continuing his ministry, which were blessed to the souls of many. "In Cephro," he says, in one of his epistles preserved by Eusebius, "a great congregation assembled with us, some of whom were brethren that followed us from Alexandria, and some from other parts of Egypt; and there God opened to us a door to preach his word. At first, indeed, we were persecuted, and pelted with stones; but afterwards there were of the heathens not a few who forsook their idols, and were converted to God."

The malignity of the bishop's persecutors was not to be satisfied that he should find a resting place even at Cephro; and he and his followers were ordered by Æmilianus to repair to Colythius, in the prefecture of Mærotis, where particular villages were allotted for their residence. He was commanded also to reside near the highway, that he might be still within the governor's grasp, should it be thought necessary to apprehend him. Dionysius repaired to his new place of exile with a heavy heart, for he had heard that it was a region inhabited by evil men, and exposed to the incursions of robbers. But for this feeling he afterwards blamed himself, when he saw the design of Providence in his removal. His ministry at Cephro had been fulfilled; and as Colythius lay nearer to Alexandria than the former, multitudes of the brethren repaired to him from the metropolis, until they formed congregations that dwelt together in unity. During this interval, the persecution raged with full vigour in Alexandria, as the Christians still continued to assemble for worship, notwithstanding the menaces of the governor and the absence of their bishop. Confiscations, proscriptions, bereavement of goods, civil degradation from rank and office—these, as usual, were the lightest calamities which the faithful were obliged to endure: the scourge, the fire, and the sword, were in constant operation; and their victims were selected without distinction of age, or rank, or sex. The captivity of Valerian to the Persians, and the accession of Gallienus his son (A. D. 259), at length terminated this period of massacre, and Dionysius was permitted to return from banishment.

It appears, however, that the flock of Alexandria and their pastor, were not to enjoy an interval of repose; persecution was succeeded by war, and war by pestilence. Æmiliana, the prefect, having raised the standard of rebellion against Galienus, was besieged in the Egyptian capital; and the city was reduced to great distress, not only by the enemy from without, but by factious that contended within the walls. In consequence of this event, Dionysius was forced to retire, and the siege was carried on so closely, that he was unable to visit his congregations. Æmilianus was at length apprehended, and put to death; and immediately upon the return of peace, there came such a terrible pestilence that, as in the days of Moses, when the first-born were stricken, "there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead." "And I wish," adds Dionysius, "that there were but one in every house!" Christians as well as idolaters fell in heaps, and indiscriminately; but the different conduct of the two parties was an emphatic illustration of the spirit of their respective creeds. We cannot do better than give it in the impressive words of Dionysius himself. "Indeed, many of our brethren, through their surpassing love and fraternal kindness, neglecting themselves, and firmly clinging to one another, did visit without any timid precautions those who were infected—ministering to them for the sake of Christ, healing them, or cheerfully dying with them—infesting themselves with the maladies of others, attracting the disease from their neighbours to themselves, and voluntarily extracting the infection out of them by transferring it to their own bodies. Thus many who had cured and restored others brought death upon themselves. In this manner died the best of our brethren, some of whom were priests, and others deacons, cheerfully rendering up their lives, so that this kind of death which was endured on account of piety, and a steadfast faith, may be accounted not less glorious than Martyrdom itself. They took up the dead bodies of the saint; in their open hands, and into their bosoms; they closed their eyes, and shut their mouths; they carried them upon their shoulders, and buried them; they kept close to them, embraced them, washed them, and adorned them carefully in their clothes. And soon after, they had the same good offices performed for themselves; for those who survived, continually walked in the steps of their predecessors. But the practice of the Gentiles was opposite to this. Those who began to be infected they drove from their houses; they fled from those who were most dear to them; they deserted those who lay half-dead upon the high-ways, and cast forth the bodies of the dead unburied; for they shunned, in every way, that union with them in death, which they were yet unable to avoid let them strive as they might."

When this dreadful visitation was succeeded by health and tranquillity, the gentle spirit of Dionysius was involved in the troubles of controversy, one Sabellius a Lybian, having started several dangerous notions respecting the Trinity. The doctrine of this person was, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit were but one substance, and one person, under three different names—that a certain energy only proceeding from the Father was united to the Son, and that the Holy Spirit was but a portion of the everlasting Father. Dionysius encountered, and ably refuted, this modified system of Unitarianism; but in consequence of having expressed himself in strong language, he was unjustly accused of having fallen into opposite errors, and errors as dangerous as those which he sought to controvert. Immediately after this controversy, he was obliged to commence another, against the Millenarians. An opinion had been for a long time prevalent, that Christ was to descend from heaven in his bodily presence, and reign upon the earth for a thousand years: and although the writings of Origen had given a powerful shock to the system, it was attempted to be revived by Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, who wrote a book against the Allegorists, as he contemptuously termed those who gave the reign a spiritual and figurative interpretation. Nepos was now dead; but his opinions were making great progress in the district of Arsinoe, where his disciples, discarding the other writings of prophets, evangelists, and apostles, fixed their attention upon the Millenium alone, as the only subject worthy of attention and belief. On this account, whole congregations belonging to the Egyptian Church were ripe for schism, when Dionysius addressed himself to remedy the evil. He called the heads of the party together, to a public discussion; and a debate of three days was the consequence, in which he bore testimony to their steadfastness and love of truth, as well as their acuteness, modesty, and gentleness. Such debaters were open to conviction; and the result was, that they renounced their opinions, and expressed their love and gratitude for those who had refuted them. Would that modern Millenarians were equally gentle, and equally open to conviction! The last controversy in which Dionysius was engaged was with Paul of Samosata, the Bishop of Antioch. This man, who combined in his own person the offices of Christian bishop, and civil judge, and whose brain seems to have been turned by vanity and wealth, propounded the most mischievous doctrines upon the mystery of the Trinity. He taught, that there was but one person in the Godhead; that Christ was born a mere man; and that the Son and the Holy Ghost exist in God, in the same manner as the faculties of reason and activity do in man, and not otherwise. His mode of teaching also was as absurd and unchristian as his doctrines were impious; for not contented with a modest pulpit, he caused a lofty throne to be erected in the church, and a place which he called a secretum, according to the fashion of civil tribunals, with curtains hung before it. In preaching also, he was wont to smite upon his thigh, stamp loudly with his feet on the bench, and dart a frown, or even discharge a rebuke at those who did not applaud his periods, in the manner of spectators at a theatre. In these harangues he was wont to villify and sneer at his predecessors, and the most eminent personages of the Church, and magnify himself above all others. The hymns also which were usually sung in honour of Christ, he superseded with others in praise of himself, which were chanted at the Easter solemnity, by his female followers, to the great horror and astonishment of those who listened. These public irregularities, as well as gross vices in his private conduct, were added to his pernicious heresies, and loudly called for punishment; and the Eastern bishops accordingly proclaimed a Synod to be held at Antioch, which Dionysius was invited to attend. But the last fight of this faithful servant of God had been fought; for on account of age, and his numerous infirmities, he was unable to repair thither. But he did what he could, by transmitting letters, in which he testified against the evils complained of; and in writing to the Church of Antioch, he showed his sense of the crimes of its bishop, by abstaining from sending him even the customary salutation. It was not long after the meeting of this Synod that Dionysius died—died in peace, and in the bosom of his people by a natural death, although his life had been so exposed to trouble and persecution. This happened A. D. 265, after he had been seventeen years bishop of Alexandria. It is to be regretted that, of his numerous writings, we have only a few letters preserved by Eusebius, which clearly evince his amiable character and apostolic spirit: but his image can be still more distinctly traced in the persecutions which he underwent for the cause of Christ, and his active labours in defence of pure and undefiled religion.

ON THE INSECURITY AND THE DANGER OF PARTIAL REFORMATIONS IN RELIGION.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BUCHANAN,

Minister of the Second Secession Church, Dalkeith.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF MATT. XII. 43-45.

"When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return unto my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation."

In these words our Lord gave a sad account of the general condition of the Jewish nation, and of the fearful judgments which were about to fall upon them. And the event, in a remarkable manner, verified the description and the prophecy. We need not, however, confine the solemn warning to that people only. What is here said is but too applicable to many persons still under the dispensation of the Gospel. We have here an affecting representation of the sad state of those who, after partial reformation, return with avidity to their former evil ways. Few passages of Scripture, therefore, have in them a deeper practical interest than the one before us. This is, in an eminent sense, written for our learning and for our admonition.

I. Our Lord here took his illustration from the state of those unhappy persons who were possessed by wicked spirits. That there were really such possessions, in which wicked spirits exercised an uncontrolled sway over the bodies and the minds of their wretched victims, the evangelical history leaves us no ground to doubt. And it would appear that they were permitted to take place, to a considerable degree, at that period, for wise and holy ends—for manifesting the malignity and power of wicked spirits, and for illustrating the power and the grace of Him who came into the world "to destroy the works of the devil." Surely there is nothing in the Scripture account of these possessions which can be considered as impossible or incredible. To what lengths would not apostate spirits be disposed to go, if they were permitted, in disordering the minds and the bodies of men, and in throwing all the affairs of mankind into unutterable confusion? That they were permitted to go certain lengths, may be accounted for, in perfect consistency with the restraining providence of a holy God, and his gracious designs towards men. As instances of the nature to which our Lord referred were not uncommon in that age, and had often come under the observation of his hearers, the meaning of his illustration would be the more obvious to them.

Now, our Lord here represented an unclean or wicked spirit, who had possession of some unhappy person, as leaving his habitation for a season. When unclean spirits were cast out by Christ, the cure was complete and final—they were permitted no more to enter in. But in the case here supposed, the wicked spirit removed of his own accord, or as influenced by means which did not, however, preclude his return. He is then represented by our Lord, to whom all the secrets of the invisible world were manifest, as wandering "through dry places, seeking rest, and finding none." The dry places may denote places unvisited with the refreshing influences of the Word of God. There the unclean spirit roamed about, seeking rest to himself in the gratification of his disposition to do all the mischief possible, yet still a stranger to repose; or seeking some other individual into whom he might enter, and over whom he might exercise the same unlimited power, without being permitted, however, to enter into any other. He then resolved to return to his former house whence he had come out, if haply he might again obtain admission into it; and he found it "empty, swept, and garnished"—swept and garnished, indeed, but still empty, and presenting no insuperable barrier to his readmission. Upon this discovery, "he goeth and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first." The lucid interval—the season of comparative composure—would thus be followed by one of more ungovernable madness and more aggravated wretchedness.

Our Lord's description, then, accorded with appearances which his hearers had not unfrequently witnessed, and accounted for them. They would, therefore, be able to apprehend clearly his meaning, in its more immediate and literal sense. But what would be their surprise, and what would be, it is likely, their indignation, when he expressly applied this very description to their own condition, in a moral or spiritual sense?—when he told them that this was a fit representation of what that generation in general were, and of what they would become,—“Even so shall it be also to this wicked generation?”

II. And all this was indeed fulfilled in that generation. Satan was at first compelled, in some measure to resign his hold of it, in consequence of the powerful means which were brought to bear upon it. The ministry of John the Baptist caused a very general sensation—produced considerable convictions of sin, and professions of repentance. The ministry of Christ himself occasioned a very general awakening and expectation; and the ministry of the apostles, by which the work was followed up, was accompanied with the most signal attestations of the Spirit of God. Thus many persons among all classes were converted, and even among the priests a great number were obedient to the faith. Satan then seemed to be just about to lose his hold of that nation—and as one compelled to seek for other quarters, he went out to dry places, away from the influences of the Gospel. But even there the Gospel followed him, and left him no rest, in the undisturbed possession of the Gentile world. He then thought of returning to his former house, from which he had gone forth, and renewing his influences over the Jewish nation. And on making the attempt, he found the house empty. Notwithstanding all that had been done—all the stir occasioned—all the appearances assumed, Christ had not been received by the far greater part of the nation. Though the house was swept and garnished, it was empty, and there was nothing to prevent his taking renewed possession of the nation as such. And this he did with sevenfold malignant influence, and hurried them on to such excesses in wickedness and opposition to the Gospel, as brought upon them "wrath to the uttermost."

How remarkably, then, were our Lord's warning words fulfilled; and here we have the true state of that people laid open, and the occasion of their terrible overthrow. As the punishment of their sin in not receiving the Gospel, which came to them with such convincing evidence of its truth, Satan was permitted to take full possession of them. Thus all manner of fearful excesses became prevalent among them, till their city, and temple, and national state were completely overthrown. Under the same fearful influence, does that people still remain, as manifested in their determined opposition to the Gospel, and their horrid daring blasphemies against the Christ of God. But however sad the condition is, under which they have so long laboured, there is yet hope concerning them. Their remarkable preservation as a distinct people, amidst such singular circumstances, manifests designs of Divine mercy towards them. The testimony of Scripture to this effect is also most express. The time will assuredly come, and even now it seems to be fast approaching, when the unclean spirit shall be cast out to enter into them no more. The veil shall be taken from their minds, their hearts shall be effectually turned to the Lord, "and all Israel shall be saved."

III. Although the words before us were spoken by our Lord of the Jewish nation more immediately, yet they admit of an important application to many individuals under the dispensation of the Gospel. And it much becomes us, to mark this application of them. With this special design are they here recorded—for all inspired Scripture is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness." What took place on a large scale with that generation or nation, may take place on a lesser scale with individuals; and no doubt does take place, with not a few, wherever the Gospel is faithfully declared. Persons may be brought under some considerable convictions, as the Jews were by the preaching of John, of Jesus, and of the apostles—they may be aroused and alarmed—a partial, and what may appear a great, reformation may be effected. Thus Satan may seem to be expelled,—but if Christ is not truly received into the heart—if the truth is not honestly and unreservedly entertained—if the house is really empty, though swept and garnished, Satan will return, and will take renewed possession, and rule with greater and more malignant influence than ever. Then the person will be apt to become sevenfold more wicked than he was before—to laugh at the things at which he had trembled—to go to more daring lengths in sin than any on which he had ventured aforetime. Such instances of sad apostasy after partial and promising reformations, have often taken place, and they fall under the description in the words before us. We find the Apostle Peter referring to such instances, with an evident allusion to the words of Christ. "For if," said he, "after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning." For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them. But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again: and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

We may suppose another case which may fall under the same general description, and which is, perhaps, of more frequent occurrence, and certainly of no less dangerous a nature. The person who is the subject of conviction and of partial reformation may become a mere plausible professor; he may rest in his convictions and external reformation, and imagine that he is truly religious. But Satan has still access to his heart, and possession of it, and may even exercise a more powerful and a more dangerous influence over him than ever, by means of formality, hypocrisy, and self-righteousness. O, these affecting considerations should make us look narrowly into our hearts, and to beware of stifling convictions—and returning to abandoned evil courses—and resisting the Spirit of God—and resting in a form of religion, when Christ is not truly received, and the heart is not truly turned to God.

It must be evident that there is nothing in the warning statement before us, which militates against the doctrine of the final perseverance of true believers. This precious doctrine is rather confirmed and vindicated here. If Satan resumes possession of the heart, it is because he finds it empty, though swept and garnished. But we may be fully assured that if Christ dwell in the heart by faith, he will keep possession of that heart; and Satan will never be able to resume his usurped dominion. If the truth is obeyed from the heart, that person shall no more be the servant of sin,—there may be, there must be a conflict while the present life continues, but the blessed result is infallibly secured. What we should, therefore, aim after is to have the heart so occupied with the presence and grace of Christ, that it may be effectually fortified against all Satan's and the world's temptations. Let us say with the Psalmist, "Behold thou desirest truth in the inward parts; and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom." "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me." "Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe; and I will have respect unto thy statutes continually."

THE TABORITES; OR, THE FOLLOWERS OF HUSS IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

BY THE LATE REV. THOMAS M'CRIE, D.D.

PART II.

It may be proper now to take a view of the doctrinal articles held by the Taborites, in distinction from the Calixtines. It is the more necessary to inquire into these, as they have been misrepresented by many writers. The principles of the Calixtines are easily ascertained. They demanded that the Word of God should be explained to the people in a perspicuous manner; that the sacrament of the Supper should be dispensed in both kinds; that the clergy, instead of bestowing all their attention on the acquisition of wealth, should occupy themselves about their proper business, and be ambitious of living like the holy apostles; and that transgressions of a heinous kind, or mortal sin, should be punished. They represented many things in divine institutions as left to the regulation of human prudence, and thought that the institutions of the holy doctors were to be observed, when not expressly contrary to Scripture. The opinions of the Taborites have not, however, been so clearly stated. L'Enfant gives an account of an assembly composed of both parties, in which Peter de Maldonowitz read thirty-one articles as the opinions of the Taborites. But it is evident that many of these were disowned by them; and the historian affords us no rule by which to distinguish those which were imputed, from those which are real, or those which were held by all, from such as were entertained only by a few. "Some Taborites," says he, "defended them all. Others, more moderate, excepted certain articles which they allowed to be pernicious, and said were falsely imputed to them. At the Council of Constance," said one of their number, "they charged us with only forty heretical articles, and you load us with more than seventy. They demanded copies of the articles, that they might have it in their power to answer them."

Nor does the account which Mosheim gives, do justice to the Taborites. "They not only insisted," says he, "upon reducing the religion of Jesus to its primitive simplicity, but required also, that the system of ecclesiastical government should be reformed in the same manner, the authority of the Pope destroyed, the form of divine worship changed; they demanded, in a word, the erection of a new church, a new hierarchy, in which Christ alone should reign, and all things should be carried on by a divine direction and impulse. In maintaining these extravagant demands, the principal doctors among the Taborites, such as Martin Loquis, a Moravian, and his followers, went so far, as to flatter themselves with the chimerical notion, that Christ would descend in person upon earth, armed with fire and sword, to extirpate heresy, and purify the Church from its multiplied corruptions." This is very inaccurate. "They required," indeed, "that the system of ecclesiastical government should be reformed, the authority of the Pope destroyed, and the form of divine worship changed;" but was not all this implied in "reducing the religion of Jesus to its primitive simplicity," which the historian does not blame? Were these "extravagant demands?" Were they not the same which were afterwards successfully repeated at the period of the Reformation? "The new hierarchy in which Christ alone should reign, and all things be carried on by a divine direction and impulse," was a sentiment entertained by a few of the Taborites, not by all. It is equally injurious to them to say, "that the principal doctors among the Taborites flattered themselves with the chimerical notion that Christ would descend in person upon earth, armed with fire and sword," &c. Mosheim also imputes to the Taborites in general, the bloody maxims mentioned by him in the note. In short, it does not appear that the learned historian had duly attended to the diary of Byzinius, which he justly praises, and which L'Enfant certainly had not seen.

Byzinius, Chancellor of Prague at the time of which he writes, and a Calixtine, enables us to distinguish between the sentiments common to all the Taborites, and those which were maintained only by some of them. The following were the sentiments of the body: 1. "The faithful ought not to receive and believe as catholic truths what the fathers have written, but only that which is clearly contained in the canonical books of the Bible." 2. "Whoever studies the liberal arts, and takes the degrees of Bachelor, Master or Doctor, is a vain man, a pagan, and sins against the Gospel of Christ." Beausobre has observed on this article, that it refers to the scholastic learning and sophistry of that time; and that the School, and the masters of the School, succeeded to the synagogue and the Pharisees against whom our Lord witnessed. 3. "It is not necessary to keep any degree of the fathers, any human rite, or tradition." 4. "Chrism, holy oil, extreme unction, the custom of consecrating all things, sacerdotal vestments, &c., ought to be abolished." This article explains the preceding. 5. "Children ought not to be exercised before baptism; nor are god-fathers or god-mothers necessary." 6. "All missals, rituals, religious ornaments, ought to be removed and burned." 7. "Auricular confession ought not to be observed." In the discipline of the Taborites, however, public confession was exacted for public offences. 8. "The fasts of Lent, and others, introduced by men, ought not to be kept." 9. "The faithful are not bound to keep any festival but the Lord's Day." 10. "Every priest who officiates with the tonsure, the surplice, &c., or who says mass according to the accustomed rite, ought to be despised as the apocalyptic harlot." 11. "It is not permitted to evangelical priests to enjoy temporal possessions." 12. "There is no purgatory: It is useless and senseless to perform good works for the relief of the dead." 13. "Prayer to departed saints favours of heresy or idolatry." Such were the opinions first entertained by the Taborites. Some things they may have carried too far. This is common at the beginning of a reformation, where men, in avoiding one extreme, are ready to fall into another; but still, as one has said, extreme for extreme, that of the Taborites was infinitely preferable to that of the Church of Rome.

Let us now hear the sentiments which are attributed by Byzinius, not to all, but to some of the Taborites. The following is a summary of them: "That at the consummation of that age, Jesus Christ should come secretly as a thief, and restore his kingdom; that this should not be an appearance of grace, but of vengeance, and of retribution upon his adversaries by fire and sword; that at that period, every one of the faithful, even every ecclesiastic, would be bound to draw his sword, and shed the blood of the enemies of Christ's law; that all cities, towns, and villages would be destroyed and burned, except five cities, in which the faithful would take refuge; that the Taborites were the angels whom God has sent to cause the faithful to withdraw themselves from the places devoted to destruction, and that they were the army which the Lord had sent to purge his kingdom from all scandals, and to execute divine vengeance upon the nations that were enemies to the law of Jesus Christ; that, at the conclusion of this work, Christ would descend personally from heaven, in a visible manner, to take possession of his kingdom upon earth, and shall hold a great feast upon the mountains, as his marriage-feast with the Church; that after this coming of Christ, which shall precede the last judgment, there shall be no kings, nor princes, nor prelates, nor exactors, nor tribute; that there shall be no persecution of the saints, no sin, nor scandal, nor abomination; that there shall be no need of preaching, nor sacraments, nor temple, because the Lord Almighty shall then be himself the temple of his people; that, when Christ has appeared in a visible manner, all those who are dead in Christ shall be raised, and shall come first with him—to judge the quick and the dead; after which, all the elect who are alive in all parts of the earth, shall be caught up in the clouds; and that this would arrive in a few years, so that some of those who were then alive, should see the risen saints, and among the rest, John Huss, because God would hasten it for the elect's sake."

Such is the prophetic system ascribed to some of the Taborites, and which began to be preached by certain priests among them about the year 1420. Beausobre observes, that we have this account from their enemies, and is of opinion, that many things in it are exaggerated and misrepresented, if not falsely imputed to them. He thinks that they were of the same sentiments with the Millenarians. In his examination of the account, he has, doubtless, pointed out inconsistencies which render some parts of it suspicious. But it is unnecessary to enter into particulars. We know that in latter times, when men have been enabled to throw off errors, and led to examine the Scriptures, there have arisen persons who have given way to delusions and dangerous extremes, particularly from an incautious and presumptuous interpretation of the prophecies. But these sentiments were not embraced nor favoured by the body of the Taborites. Accordingly, in a Synod held by them in 1422, they drew up a number of articles, in which, among other things, they condemned the disorders committed during the war by the licentious soldiery; and in particular, disavowed the impertinent applications which certain priests made of the words of Scripture, to authorise this license.

Different conferences were held between the Calixtines and Taborites, with a view of bringing about a reconciliation; but they were broken off without gaining the end. In one of these, at Berne, in 1428, they disputed, not only on the seven sacraments, but on predestination, free-will, and justification. The historian does not inform us what were the particular sentiments entertained by the Taborites on these last points; but it is highly probable that they were the same with those which were afterwards adopted by the Reformed Churches. The Eucharist was the principal subject of another conference. The Calixtines did not differ from the Roman Church on this article, except in two things:—they administered it under both elements, and they gave it to infants. The last part of their practice they founded upon the words of our Lord, John vi. 53. In this the Taborites opposed them. The Council of Basil, which met about this time, devised means for suppressing Hussitism, and their agents inflamed the differences between the Taborites and Calixtines.

At last, in a Synod which assembled at Kuttenberg in the year 1442, the Taborites, by common consent, drew up a confession of their faith. This confession may be seen at large in L'Enfant's history. It contains, in general, the same view of Divine truth which was afterwards exhibited in the Confessions of the Protestant Churches. After the suppression of the Taborites, which was effected soon after this, the standard of truth was upheld by a secession which was made from the Calixtines in the year 1457. Those who separated joined themselves to the remnant of the Taborites. Terrified by the destruction of the latter, and the rancour with which they were persecuted, they changed their name, and assumed that of Bohemian brethren. Churches composed of these continued to exist at the time of the Reformation, and entered into a correspondence with Luther, Melancthon, and other Reformers.

Soon after the separation above mentioned, they published a confession of their faith; and afterwards, on occasion of various misrepresentations, they presented at different times to the emperor, and other princes, four other confessions, before Luther made his appearance. All of these exhibited the same doctrine with the original confession of the Taborites.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

LORD HARRINGTON.*

JOHN, LORD HARRINGTON, born in 1591, was the eldest son of Lord and Lady Harrington, to whom King James I. committed the education of his daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, who was afterwards married to Frederick, Prince-Elector Palatine, and who was grandmother to George I. of England. Lord and Lady Harrington were persons eminent for prudence and piety, who carefully educated their son both in religion and learning. This excellent young nobleman was duly thankful to his parents for the care and honour received from them, and returned honour to them again with advantage. Possessing superior natural endowments, combined with assiduous application, he soon acquired a considerable stock of useful learning. He had an intimate acquaintance with Latin and Greek, together with the French, Italian, and Spanish languages; and was well read in logic, philosophy, and mathematics. He made a good progress in the theoretic part of the military art and navigation, so that he wanted nothing but practice to make him perfect in both. Such was the extent of his knowledge in religious matters, that there was scarcely any question that could be propounded to him on these subjects, to which he could not give a judicious and ready answer.

Being thus well grounded in religion and learning at home, his noble father sent him to travel abroad in France and Italy, that, by observation and experience, he might improve that knowledge which he had before gained; and, as a guide and tutor for him in his travels, he provided one Mr Tovey, a learned and religious man, and formerly the head master of the free school at Coventry. It would seem, however, that the sound religion and holy zeal of this pious nobleman and his tutor, being taken notice of by the Jesuits, they took their opportunity to administer a slow working poison to them; that seeing they had no hopes of corrupting their minds, they might destroy their bodies, and bring them to the grave. Mr Tovey, being aged, became a speedier victim, and died presently after his return to England. But Lord Harrington, being young and vigorous, survived its effects somewhat longer, though it is said to have hastened his death, and brought him to a premature grave.

He was distinguished for sobriety and purity. He was never heard to utter any thing unbecoming, which was the more remarkable, considering that he was in the warmth of youth, living in the court, and had been a traveller into those countries where young persons have been often corrupted. To preserve the purity of his mind, he avoided all ensnaring company, and cultivated the society of men of learning and talents. Besides, he was very temperate in his diet; frequent in fasting; and hated idleness and much sleep. In the night, when he lay awake, to prevent the intrusion of improper thoughts, he exercised his mind with heavenly meditations.

His justice, so far as he had occasion to show it, was very exemplary. He dealt honourably and honestly with every body he had to deal with. And whereas his father had contracted great debts, by his prince-like house-keeping, and other public and private occasions, he was very solicitous for the discharge of the same, giving power to his executrix to sell part or all his land, if need were, therewith speedily to discharge the creditors. And being asked, when the writing was drawn up, whether he assented to it, he answered,—‘Yea, with all my heart; for my honour and my honesty are my nearest heirs.’

But the splendour of his religion outshone all his other accomplishments. This appeared both by his private and public exercises of piety, which were rare in a young man, and still more rare in a young nobleman; and indeed seldom found in so eminent a degree in any man. He usually rose every morning about four or five o'clock, seldom sleeping above six hours at a time. When he first waked, his constant care was to set his heart in order; and, with the view of maintaining a pious frame of mind all the day, offering his first thoughts to God. Being up, he read a chapter out of the Holy Scriptures; he then went with his servants to prayer; and afterwards spent about an hour in reading some pious treatise, to increase his knowledge and enliven his affections. He read over Calvin's Institutions, and Roger's Treatise, which were his two last books. Before dinner and supper, he had a psalm, chapter, and prayer in his family, and prayer after supper: and besides these social exercises, he engaged in secret prayer in his closet, after which he applied himself to some serious study for three or four hours together, unless interrupted by special business. The rest of the morning he spent in conversing with his friends, riding, or some useful recreation, till dinner-time. Thus he avoided idleness, and prevented those temptations which arise from it. Immediately after dinner he retired into his study to meditate on the sermons he had lately heard; and if prevented by any occurrence at one time, he embraced the first opportunity that offered. Even in his travels by sea or land he was often thus employed. The remainder of the afternoon he spent in business, study of history, the art of war, mathematics, and navigation, in which he attained to a great measure of perfection. After supper he prayed with his servants, and then withdrew to his study, where he spent some time in reviewing his actions through the day. He was one of the first, according to Fuller, who began the pious fashion of a diary, wherein he registered, not the injuries of others done to him, but his own failings and infirmities towards his divine Master: and surveying his failings, he humbled himself to God for them; and noted in a private character, for his own use, what he wished concealed from the knowledge of others. He then betook himself to rest; and to prevent evil thoughts before sleep, a person that waited on him in his chamber read a chapter or two to him out of the Holy Scriptures. This practice he continued for four years before his death.

Lord Harrington was a most religious observer of the Lord's Day; and though he had a household chaplain, he attended the public assemblies twice a day. If he was at any time at a distance from a place of public worship, he would ride many miles rather than want an opportunity to hear the preaching of the Word. Immediately after sermon, he used to retire by himself for about half an hour to meditate, and apply what he had heard to his own soul. In the evening he caused two of his servants, who had taken notes of the discourses, to repeat the sermons in his family before supper,—and so retentive was his memory, that he could usually repeat more than they had written. He then wrote them down in his book, and prayed with his family. By way of preparation for the Sabbath, this young nobleman used to review his conduct during the preceding week, and humbled himself for his sins, and gratefully acknowledged the mercies of God bestowed upon him. He rose early on Sabbath mornings, and while dressing, he used to repeat to his servants those sermons he had heard the Lord's Day before. He received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper monthly; and, in the view of observing this holy ordinance, he kept a private fast the preceding day. At this time he read over his diary for the past month, and spent the whole day in prayer, meditation, and self-examination, observing what progress he had made in piety, and what victory he had gained over his corruptions. On the morning before he received the sacrament, he read the eleventh chapter of 1st Corinthians, which contains the institution of the Lord's Supper; and to his servants who were to communicate with him, he read a little treatise, containing directions for the right manner of communicating. Besides these monthly fasts, he kept many other days of afflicting his soul, on various occasions. He was remarkably attentive in hearing the Word of God read and preached, and conducted himself when in the house of God with great reverence, as knowing that the greatest of men are infinitely below Him, who is King of kings, and Lord of lords. To avoid ostentation, or the appearance of it, in his private duties, he never admitted any one either to his prayers, or repetition of his sermons in his family, but only friends who were very intimate with him.

He further manifested the sincerity of his religion by his love to all that were truly godly, especially to laborious and faithful ministers; as also by his mercy and charity to the pious poor. After his return from his travels, as an expression of gratitude to God, he gave yearly, by the hand of a private friend, twenty pounds to the poor; and the second Sabbath after he landed in England, having spent the day before with his tutor, Mr Tovey, in prayer, fasting, and thanksgiving, he heard the Word, received the sacrament, and gave five pounds to the poor of that parish. He gave also forty pounds to be bestowed on poor ministers, and other Christians, for the relief of their necessities, besides the sums he gave when walking or travelling abroad. In addition to these occasional charities, he gave a tenth of his income, which was a thousand pounds, to pious and charitable uses. As the crowning ornament of all, this pious nobleman was distinguished for humility.

From the commencement of his last illness, he apprehended that death would be the result, and accordingly prepared himself for its approach. He was frequent in serious meditations, prayed often for himself, and requested others to pray for him. He acknowledged his sins, and expressed his faith, and an undoubted hope of salvation by Jesus Christ; intimating with much cheerfulness, that he feared not death, in whatever manner it came. He uttered many heavenly speeches, desiring to be dissolved and to be at home with God his Father; stating, not above two hours before his death, that he still felt the assured comforts and joys of his salvation by Christ. When death approached, he breathed forth these devout aspirations:—'O thou, my joy! O, my God! when shall I be with thee?' And then sweetly and quietly resigned his spirit unto God, in 1613, aged twenty-two years. Fuller observes, that this young nobleman did not count himself privileged from being good by being great. And speaking of the termination of his short but Christian race, he adds, 'He lived out all his days in the appointment of Divine Providence; not half of them according to the course of nature, not half a quarter of them according to the hopes and desires of the lovers and honourers of virtue in this nation, especially of the society of Sidney College, Cambridge, whereunto he was a most bountiful benefactor.'

JOY IN HEAVEN.

[For I reckon that the sufferings of this present life are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed.]

TELL me not of that narrow bed,
'Tis sad and drear to me;
Tell me not of the peaceful dead,
And their sleep from remembrance free;
But tell me of their living rest,
Far, far from this earthly scene;
And tell me, too, of Jesus' breast,
The place on which they lean.

Tell me not of the darksome tomb,
And the quick corrupting clay;
The last sad moments' shadowing gloom,
The soul's untrodden way;
But let me hear of those seats on high,
And the holy, holy, throng;
Of the palm, and crown, and victory,
And the Archangel's song.

Oh! tell me of those laurel'd choirs,
That are hymning before the throne;
The harmonies of their golden lyres,
And symphonies here unknown;
And the Saviour's face without a veil
Amid his native skies,—
This shall cheer the heart when the cheek grows pale
With glory's sweet surprize.

ANNA.

THE SCRIPTURES OF TRUTH, AND THE THINGS WHICH THEY PRINCIPALLY TEACH.

BY THE REV. JAMES BREWSTER, D.D.,

Minister of Craig, Forfarshire.

SUPPOSING it to be indeed our heart's desire and purpose to fulfil the great end of our creation, by glorifying and enjoying God; a very necessary inquiry immediately arises, viz., How is all this to be done? How shall I learn the way of glorifying that God of whom I am so ignorant, and of preparing to enjoy his favour of which I am so unworthy? To supply an answer to this natural inquiry, is the design of the next statement in the Shorter Catechism. "The Word of God, which is contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, is the only rule to direct us how we may glorify and enjoy him."

Next to the knowledge of what is our chief end, the most important instruction is the way of attaining that end. This knowledge man is not able to discover for himself.—"It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps;" and it is not supplied from any of the objects in nature around him. Whatever notions he may gather from the visible works of creation, or from his own reasoning and reflection, in regard to the existence and the natural perfections of God, he cannot find out the way of rightly glorifying God and enjoying his favour: This is manifest, both from every man's own consciousness, that he has no such knowledge; and from the whole history of man over the face of the earth. However wise in other respects, they have proved themselves to be ignorant and foolish concerning God and his worship: "Their foolish heart was darkened; they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four footed beasts, and creeping things;" and they sought to procure his favour by services altogether abhorrent to his nature and will. They needed, therefore, a rule for their direction, and they have themselves declared their need of it: "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?" "What must I do to be saved?" This rule God hath graciously given—a rule to direct us how we may glorify and enjoy him: "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good."

This rule is his own Word: "The Word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart—that is, the word of faith which we preach." That rule of direction is not a dark sign or symbol, but clear as a word distinctly spoken, so that it may be truly said to all to whom it comes; "he that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Nor is it merely as a word spoken, capable of being heard and understood, but it comes as a word from the mouth of God, bearing his authority and requiring to be received with the utmost reverence: "it came not by the will of man," or the reason of man, "but holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Neither is it merely a word spoken from one man to another, and handed down from one generation to another, so as to be in danger of being changed, forgotten, or finally lost and incapable of being recovered; but it is a work written, a sure record, the Scriptures of truth; not only originally inspired by the Spirit of God, but daily preserved by the special Providence of God: "I have written the great things of my law." These writings are generally called the Bible, that is, the Book,—the Book by way of eminence—the Book of God, the most precious, therefore, of all books—the most worthy to be preserved and to be published or spread throughout the world.

Farther still, this rule of direction is not only a word written, and forming a book of knowledge or information; but it is a solemn grant or conveyance of the blessings which it makes known. It consists of two portions, called testaments or covenants, as containing the will of God for our salvation or final inheritance; and as confirmed by the death of Christ the Great Testator, both the purchaser and bestower of that inheritance. The first, originally written in Hebrew, as being the language of the Jews, is called the Old Testament; both because it is in fact the first in point of time—having been completed nearly five hundred years before the commencement of the other—and because it was only a preparatory dispensation, designed to become old or to pass away. The second, written in Greek, as being the language most generally used among the nations at that period, is called the New Testament; both because it is the more recent revelation of the will of God, and a dispensation of grace which is designed to continue to the end of the world. "God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his own Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things." "Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

These Scriptures or Writings of the Old and New Testaments, acknowledged and proved by a great variety of reasons and testimonies, to be all given by the inspiration of God, are on this ground alone to be regarded as not only a good rule, or as our best rule; but as the only rule to direct us how to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever. There is no other rule, which has or can have any authority as a law or standard, to which we can refer or appeal as our guide in the way of life and peace: "To whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life." "Neither is there salvation in any other." "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." These Scriptures are a perfect rule, containing all things, which God deemed necessary to declare his own glory, and to secure man's salvation: all directions required for these ends are either expressly given in the words of Scripture, or may be drawn from them by fair and necessary inference. "Thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus;" and by their instruction, "the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." These Scriptures are also a rule sufficiently clear and plain, so that every one, by the use of ordinary means, may be enabled, from one part of the Divine Word or another, to understand all that is necessary to be believed and observed, in order to salvation: "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."

"The Scriptures principally teach, what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man."

It is most important to observe what the Scriptures profess properly and principally to do, viz., to direct man how to attain the end of his creation. They do not come to us as a full revelation of God to all his creatures. They do not profess to tell us all that may be known of God by the higher order of spiritual beings, or all that he hath done in other worlds. They are a rule of direction to man; and reveal only what man is concerned to know: "Unto you, O men, I call; and my voice is to the sons of men."

"The Scriptures principally teach what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man." Nor do they teach all that man might possibly know or be able to do, but only all that is necessary for enabling him to attain his chief end. "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus the Son of God is the Christ; and that believing ye might have life through his name." They do, indeed, make various references to other beings, and touch slightly on various subjects, which we do not thoroughly comprehend; and which either can not be possibly understood with our present limited faculties, or which would not be useful for us to know in our present fallen state; but they do plainly and principally teach all things necessary for our salvation. They do also contain many things in the history of God's dealings with nations and individuals, which, though all equally true, and all useful in the progress of God's dispensations, yet are not equally important at all times, and equally necessary for all to know; but the chief things which they teach, and which they principally inculcate, in preference to all other instructions, are, the things which it is essential for man to believe as truths concerning God, or to fulfil as duties which are required of God. Under these two heads may be comprised the principal points of Scripture teaching; and under these two divisions the statements of the Shorter Catechism are arranged, 1st, Doctrines or things to be believed; and, 2d, Duties or things to be done. The nature and grounds of this faith or belief, the nature and reasons of these duties, will come afterwards to be considered in their place. Let us here only observe:—

1. What are the things which it properly belongs to us to know, and which it principally behoves us to learn, viz., Those things which the Scriptures plainly and principally teach. Not the secret things which God conceals, nor the deep things which our own nature withholds; but the things which are revealed. Even from those things which we see but darkly, we may learn a humble sense of our own insufficiency, and more earnest application for divine teaching; but we are especially concerned to give heed to the things principally taught, "the weightier matters," the great points of faith and practice, "the will of God for our salvation." "Hold fast the form of sound words in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus." "War a good warfare, holding faith and a good conscience."

2. What is the natural as well as scriptural order of such knowledge?—First to know about God, and then study to serve him; to believe the things revealed concerning his glorious nature, and then live to his glory; to welcome the way of peace with him in our souls, and then prepare to enjoy his favour for ever. "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

3. How close the connection which subsists between these two great branches of saving knowledge, matters of belief, and matters of practice.—They are both embraced in the rule which God hath given for our direction, and are therefore equally important: "Repent ye, and believe the Gospel." They are both taught there as principal things, and are therefore equally necessary: "Without faith it is impossible to please him,—without holiness no man shall see the Lord." They have a mutual relation to each other, and, wherever they are genuine, will be found united together. Faith, if a living plant, will bear the fruit of obedience; and obedience acceptable to God, must spring from faith, as its root. "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing. They are, in fact, so inseparably associated, and so entirely intermingled, that any attempt to take the one without the other proves fatal to both, and utterly destroys their essential properties; like the elements of the air we breathe, they are, when united, the fuel of life, but, when separated, the poison of death. "Faith without works is dead;" "yet not of works, lest any man should boast." "If ye love me, keep my commandments. He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

God hath not left us in ignorance of the way in which we may attain the great end of our creation, but hath given us a rule of direction; and we are called to adore without ceasing his infinite goodness, both in making us capable of so exalted an attainment, and in furnishing us with the means of securing it as our eternal portion. "Through the tender mercy of our God, the day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace."

Let us see, then, that we avail ourselves to the utmost of this sure, supreme, and sacred Guide, which shineth as the light in a dark place; and that we be not ourselves walking in darkness, even while the light is with us,—that we be not shutting our eyes against the very light of heaven, shining around our path, or refusing to take with us that "lamp unto our feet" which the God of our life hath placed within our reach. More particularly, let us,

1. Reverence the supreme authority of God's Word.—It is a word of direction, a word behind us, saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it;" and that word spoken from heaven. It is the voice of the Highest sent forth, and that "a mighty voice," full of majesty,—"a voice" which once shook the earth, and yet once more shall shake not the earth only, but also heaven." "Thus saith the Lord,"—"The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it,"—is its own manner of addressing us. Let us see that we turn not away from Him "who speaketh from heaven;" but that we receive it, "not as the word of man, but (as it is, in truth) the Word of God."

2. Prize the written Word, the Sacred Record, the Book of God.—Our rule is not merely a word, but a writing,—not a sound, but a scripture; or rather, it is both in one, as it has been called by men, in their simple apprehension of language rendered visible, "A speaking book." With this speaking book in our hands, we have indeed committed unto us the "oracles of God;" and can go to it when we please, as to his holy place, to ask his counsel, and receive his response. We enjoy the privilege of the most favoured saints of old, and we may draw near to this speaking book, that the Lord may speak to us "face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend," as a father to his children.

3. Rejoice in our possessing the whole of God's revealed will to man.—Even a little portion of that blessed book has been justly esteemed precious, and found profitable, as a guide to life eternal. Even one of its words, like a heavenly seed dropped into the soul of man, and there quickened by the Spirit of life, hath in due time sprang up, and taken root, and brought forth fruit to perfection. How valuable, then, our privilege, of holding in our hands, not merely a few of these life-giving words, but all that the Lord hath spoken! not merely a fragment of the blessed book, as an indulgence from some human teacher, but all that is contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments!—so that we may sit down in our closets, and there bring to our remembrance all the words of grace and truth, which have been spoken by prophets, apostles, and evangelists, by angels from heaven, and by the Lord himself, for our salvation.

4. Look to that Lord himself to open to us his own Scriptures.—He reveals the will of God, both by his Word and Spirit; and he promises that Spirit to them that ask him. While he places before our eyes his own written rule of direction by the hand of his providence, he is himself ready at our side, to guide us unto all the truth that it contains. Let us not fear to lift our eyes to so gracious a Teacher at our hand; and let us feel how utterly we are without excuse, if, in these circumstances, we fail to learn the way of attaining the great end of our creation, viz., of "glorifying God, and enjoying him for ever."

ON THE NATURE AND NECESSITY OF THE OFFICE OF RULING ELDER.

THE importance which has of late been attached to the office of an Elder in the Church of Scotland, seemed to call for a work on the nature and functions of this ecclesiastical office-bearer. Such a desideratum has been very ably supplied by the Rev. J. G. Lorimer of St David's Parish, Glasgow. From the valuable work of our esteemed correspondent we make the following extract on a point of peculiar interest at the present time.

Having established the authority of the office of Ruling Elder alike from the testimony of the Word of God, and the practice of the Christian Church in primitive and subsequent times, we now naturally come to inquire into the NATURE of the office. We have found that there is an office of rule distinct from that of the minister in the Church of Christ. What is its nature?

First of all, then, it is not a civil office. It has nothing to do with the possession or administration of civil power—that is the province of the civil magistrate. The office, strictly and exclusively, belongs to the Church. It regards the inspection, discipline, and government of the members of the Church, and that by moral, not civil means. The elder does not discharge his duty by punishing church offenders, where necessary, with civil pains and penalties. No. All that he has to do is, in conjunction with the minister and other members of session, to admonish, warn, reprove, suspend, and, last of all, cut off from the communion of the Church. His power extends no farther. In the history of the Christian Church, church-officers have sometimes, yea often, gone beyond this. In the Church of Rome, which is Prelatical, and does not recognise the office of the Ruling Elder at all, it has been common to deliver over church offenders from the ecclesiastical to the civil arm—to the punishments of the Inquisition. And even in our own Church, particularly in early times, when the civil power was very weak, and the country was in a rough and lawless condition, church offenders were visited with civil pains and penalties by the session; such as fines and corporal inflictions. But however natural the procedure may have been in the peculiar circumstances in which the Church was placed for a season, the principle is indefensible. The weapons of the Church are not carnal—they are spiritual; they consist of moral discipline, and this is the universal practice of the Church of Scotland at the present day. By a recent act of the General Assembly, no money is received, even for the poor, from those who have been the subjects of church censure, lest it should seem as if she were dealing in civil penalties, and also lest any should imagine that, like the Church of Rome, she compounded with men for their sins in consideration of pecuniary acknowledgments.

As to the civil magistrate punishing men for breaches of the law of God—such as offences against the first table, blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking—that is another matter, and proceeds upon other grounds. It is the doing of the State, not of the Church, and because such offences are breaches of the law of the State, and thence injurious to its interests; while, at the same time, they happen also to be breaches of the law of the Church, which is founded on the Word of God: thus a man might be punished both by the Church and the State for the same crime. The one might excommunicate him from her pale—the other visit him with a heavy fine. But the two authorities are distinct. This is manifest from the fact, that the Church might, and often does, inflict censure where the civil or criminal law sees nothing to blame. The office of the Ruling Elder, then, is not civil. It is strictly ecclesiastical. It deals with ecclesiastical offences, and restrains and punishes them in an ecclesiastical way; and it rewards and encourages the faithful members of the Church also by spiritual, not temporal means—by the diligent discharge of duty, and the prayers and approbation of the good.

But, farther, the office of the Ruling Elder is not only ecclesiastical—it is spiritual in its nature. Though an office within the Church, it might have been occupied with temporal matters belonging to the Church; such as its finance, and the maintenance of the poor. But, No. It is not identical with the office of the deacon. In practice they may have been conjoined in Scotland and some other Presbyterian countries, but in Scripture the offices are distinct; and it is desirable, as much as possible, to keep them distinct in practice. The union is attended with various evils, fitted to defeat the ends of the eldership as a spiritual office. At the same time, from the paucity of persons able and willing to discharge the duties of both offices separately, they are frequently united.

And since, then, the office of elder is neither civil, nor affects temporal matters, what is its nature? It is, as I have said, strictly and exclusively, spiritual. It is designed to aid the pastor in the inspection, guidance, and government of the flock, and to promote the edification of all classes connected with the congregation—the young, by seeing that they are religiously educated—the careless, by seeing that they are warned—candidates for admission, by seeing that they are well qualified—offenders against the rules of the Church, by seeing that they are dealt with by admonition, suspension, or exclusion—the infirm and the sick, by seeing that they are visited—mourners, by seeing that they are encouraged. Where (as in an Established church), in addition to the congregation, there is a territorial division, comprehending many individuals, who are estranged from all Christian churches and communions, growing up in ungodliness, it is the duty of elders, as of ministers, to use all the means in their power to reach and reclaim them, as by schools—week-day and Sabbath—and also district visitations. While the elder, as his name intimates, has his appropriate place in the rule or government of the Church—as a member of its Sessions, Synods, and, it may be, General Assemblies—these may be regarded as his more public duties, but he has, like the minister, various private duties, all bearing on the same end—the furtherance of the moral and religious good; in other words, the instruction and edification of the different classes and characters composing the Christian congregation with which he is connected. I need scarcely add, that, in order to the successful discharge of the duties of the office, it is necessary to have some time to spare, and it is necessary also to cultivate some acquaintance with the congregation in which it is exercised.

And now, having explained the nature of the office of the Ruling Elder, let me briefly advert to the ABSOLUTE NECESSITY of such an office in the Christian Church. All who have just views of Christianity and of the Christian Church will allow that discipline is indispensable—that religious ordinances, such as Baptism and the Lord's Supper, cannot, without mockery and profanation, be granted to all indiscriminately, whatever their character. All will allow that none should be recognised as members of the Christian Church save those who make a creditable profession; and that to attain this knowledge demands some time and care. Hence it is obvious that the whole management of the discipline of the Church cannot be committed to the hands of one individual, and he the minister. His own peculiar duties, public and private, even in a small congregation, are far too many and onerous to admit of his suitably attending to them all, and the whole discipline of the congregation besides. Hence it is that, where left to the minister alone, as in the Church of England, there is really no discipline. It is not a very pleasant, though a very important employment, to inspect morals, and, where necessary, reprove. Accordingly the duty is neglected, and the very office ultimately disappears.

Independently of the want of time and ability to rule a whole church or parish alone, it is not desirable that so much power should be intrusted to a single individual. Even good men are liable to many mistakes and prejudices, and to be misled by a few injudicious friends. How serious a thing to commit the examination, trial, and acquittal or condemnation of character—in ecclesiastical affairs—to a single individual, without any appeal from his judgment! The very possession of such despotic power would be most injurious to the character of the minister himself, and also of his flock. It would nourish pride and ambition on the one hand, and slavish submission on the other. This has been remarkably verified in the history of the Christian Church. As soon as men departed from the Scriptural and apostolic order of having Ruling Elders in each congregation, the pride and ambition of the clergy, as a distinct order, obtained free scope, and favoured by other adverse influences, at length became the mightiest engine of tyranny which the world ever saw, while the so-called Christian people crouched under them as the most abject slaves. In short, the real character and ends of the Christian Church were destroyed. Had it not been for the abandonment of the primitive and Presbyterian order of the Church, the world might—we may safely say would—have been spared much of the usurpation and corruption of the Church of Rome.

It is plain, then, that a single individual, however able or excellent, cannot administer aright the government of the church. All history has proved this; and then it is to be remembered, that all ministers are not able and excellent. We see, then, the necessity of the pastor being at once assisted and checked by others—and they responsible persons—associated with him. And now the question arises, Who shall these others be? The Congregationalists or Independents say that the whole members of the Church, young and old, male and female, should bear a part in the government, and, moreover, that there should be no appeal from their judgment, each congregation being independent in itself; but this plan is exposed to insuperable objections. Many persons, though possessed of sufficient knowledge and character to be admissible, with propriety, to church privileges, are totally unfit, from their education, and temper, and habits of thinking, and situation in life, for administering so delicate a matter as the government and discipline of the Church of Christ. Think of new converts, in some cases, as in the South Seas, constituting the great majority of the congregation, with their imperfect views and newly acquired ideas, becoming at once rulers in the Church, to inspect, admonish, reprove, excommunicate others, and receiving as much power as the gravest, most aged, and experienced members! What can be expected to arise out of such a state of things but confusion in the first instance, and then endless divisions and parties? Accordingly this, in a great degree, is the history of such congregations. Humanly speaking, it is only a remarkable outpouring of the Spirit which can prevent the result.

And it would be still more the history, were the professed principles of the Independent body carried out; but this is not the case—they cannot, in fact, be acted on to any great extent. From the unpleasantness of the employment, or other causes, a large body of the members do not regularly or steadily bear a part in the administration of the government of the Church, and the exercise of discipline. Consequently these fall into the hands of a few, who may be said really to become the Ruling Elders—but, with this disadvantage, that they are not a recognised or responsible party more than others. Their judgments may be upset without appeal, as often as a sufficient number of the members remain to outvote them. Moreover, the persons who in this way fall into the possession of ecclesiastical power, are not composed, as in Presbyterian churches, of the men most noted for character, and prudence, and habits of business, but very often of the self-confident, the ambitious, the rash, in short, the very persons whose temperament specially unfits them for church rule. These are the persons who are most fond of government, and who are most regular and persevering in their attendance, and so become the rulers.

In remarkable harmony with what might have been expected, I believe it is no secret that, in many Independent congregations, both in this and other countries, there is a private committee of the most prudent and able men, who prepare business for the larger body—the Church; in other words—real congregational principles are found to be impracticable. The committee substantially become the eldership, and Independent churches are ruled only by having recourse to the principles of Presbyterian ones. It would not avail to repose the whole power in the pastor, and allow him to consult with friends in case of discipline. Not only would this not meet all the duties of the Ruling Elder, but, being optional, some pastors would consult, others would not. Those with whom they consulted would feel no official responsibility, and very frequently and naturally they would consist of one or two attached friends, who would not run counter to the pastor's known views and likings, and hence, the footing on which the government and discipline of the church would rest, would be as unsatisfactory as ever.

There is no real remedy for these various and opposite evils but the eldership of the Presbyterian church—a body of men of approved qualification, invested with a distinct office in the government of the church. And is the appointment of such a body of men more than might have been expected? Surely the Redeemer, who showed such condescension and love to His people, would never leave them in so important a matter as the relationship of church members—a prey to clerical despotism on the one hand, or of confusion, leading to tyranny, on the other. Surely he would make some provision for their being ruled in a comfortable, affectionate, and edifying manner. To adopt the strong language of Dr Owen, when speaking of Ruling Elders:—"It is evident that neither the purity, nor the order, nor the beauty or glory of the Church of Christ, nor the reputation of His own majesty and authority in the government of them, can long be preserved without a multiplicity of elders in them according to the proportion of the respectable members, for their rule and guidance; and for want hereof have the churches of old and of late either degenerated into anarchy and confusion—(their self-rule being managed with vain disputes and janglings unto their division and ruin)—or else giving up themselves to the dominance of some prelatical teachers to rule them at their pleasure, which proved the bane and poison of all primitive churches, and they will, and must do so, in the neglect of this order (namely, of Ruling Elder), for the future."

THE BELIEVER BOUGHT WITH A PRICE :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. THOMAS SHERRIFF,

Minister of the united Parishes of Fala and Soutra, Mid-Lothian.

"For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."—1 Cor. vi. 20.

MEN, being the creatures of God's hand, and the objects of his daily providence, are by right his property. He has a possession in them by right of creation, which nothing can destroy or set aside,—he can do with them whatsoever seemeth good in his sight. But the relation of men to God may be considered in two points of view. They are connected with the Creator and Preserver of all things in the same way as are the other parts of animated nature; and they are connected with him as moral and accountable creatures,—as creatures who have been placed under certain rules, by which their thoughts, their words, and their actions, should all be regulated. This latter connection has been destroyed by men's disobedience to the divine law. They have said, they will not have God to rule over them. While they remain, therefore, the inalienable property of the sole Proprietor of the universe in one point, they, in another, have become the subjects or the slaves of sin. While they are deriving support and nourishment from the Giver of "every good and every perfect gift," they are by nature living in the service of the destroyer of the human race; and thus proving that they, as moral beings, are entirely alienated from God, and that he has no right whatever over them, as the Governor of their moral actions. Men, being thus removed from the possession of their rightful Proprietor, would have remained for ever the subjects of the evil government into which they had entered, and would have had to endure all the misery which a state of sin entails in time and throughout eternity, had not means been appointed, in divine goodness, for emancipating them from sin, and for saving them from its final consequences. But God, in the plenitude of his love, devised and accomplished a scheme of mercy, through which we who were sinners, and under the sentence of his righteous condemnation, might be delivered from sin, brought into his favour, and made the sharers of all his gracious benefits. He hath "bought us with a price," and being thus bought, it becometh us to "glorify him in our bodies, and in our spirits, which are his."

In our speaking from these words, we shall, in the first place, consider from what those who are interested in Christ are bought; in the second place, consider by what they are bought; and, in the third place, show the effects which our being thus purchased ought to have on our lives.

I. In the first place, then, we shall consider from what those who are interested in Christ are bought.—All men by nature are sold under sin,—they, by the original transgression of Adam, have become debased in their nature,—they have become unfit for the right observance of those laws under which they were placed, and by which every part of their moral conduct was required to be regulated. The principle in them from which obedience to the divine law can be rendered has become perverted in its nature, and ineffectual in them to produce those pure and holy services which, as creatures in the image of God, they were required to perform. Instead of living under the influence of the divine law, and acting according to its requirements, their affections are alienated from God, and every thing they do is at variance with his pure and holy will. Men, in their naturally depraved state, cannot render a single acceptable service in the sight of the Lord. Their thoughts and their actions all bear the stamp of imperfection; and they appear, in the all-seeing eye of Heaven, as far from that purity in which men, as the subjects of God's government, were constituted to live. By reason of this depravity of nature, and constant departure in practice from the dictates of the divine law, there is much evil existing in the condition of men. They are liable to many cares, and to much suffering, in this life; they are the subjects of death, without the possibility of escaping its power; and they are exposed to the inflictions of the divine wrath, in the world to come, to that degree of severity which their sins deserve. In short, we, by our transgression, have lost the favour of God, and have rendered ourselves the objects of his sore displeasure; and we are entirely disqualified for regaining this favour by all our own efforts, or of warding off the evil consequences arising from our having incurred the divine displeasure. But by a scheme of mercy which originated with God, out of love for our race, and which was carried forward to perfection by his almighty power, there are means provided by which we are again brought into union with the divine nature, and thus made the partakers of all those blessings which this high connection is calculated to secure. In this scheme there are means provided for arresting men in their progress of wickedness, and for causing them to turn unto the Lord, from whom they had departed. Men, by a power which divine goodness has prepared, are checked in their course of departure from God, and caused to turn towards him, with full purpose of, and an earnest endeavour after, new obedience. At this change of direction, there is a new heart imparted to them, by which they are enabled to love the Lord, and to engage in his service with delight. In the emphatic language of Scripture, they are said to be born anew,—to be brought from darkness to light,—from death unto life. Whereas formerly they were dormant in regard to their condition by nature, and entirely alienated in their affections from their Creator and bountiful Benefactor; but by this effect of the Spirit of regeneration upon them, they are made alive to their true state, as fallen creatures, and are rendered susceptible of entertaining other and more congenial views of God than heretofore they did, and of loving him more in sincerity and in truth. And with this radical change in believers, there is a permanent inclination given towards God in all the powers and principles of their souls. Their motives do not now incline them to the willing commission of sin, but rather to a constant resistance of its power. Although, at times, they may be borne down by its impetuous torrent, and for an instant carried along by its overwhelming force; yet, by the position into which they have been bent by the Spirit of sanctification, they soon recover their heavenward direction. Christians have to carry on a constant struggle with sin, and at times, by a misuse or a neglect of the means with which they have to combat, they may be overcome and checked in their course; but by a return to the right use of these means of grace, they will be enabled to recover themselves, and to advance against every opposition which may arise to obstruct their progress in the path of holy obedience. They will unquestionably advance from one degree of perfection to another, till they arrive at the measure of perfect beings; for in this they may be confident, that "he who hath begun a good work in them, will carry it onwards to completion."

At this change, too, believers are brought into a different position in their relation to God. Instead of their being under this condemning sentence, and being far removed from the kindly influences of his grace, they now stand as justified in his sight, and qualified for the gradual reception of the many spiritual blessings which he is ever ready to bestow upon the children of his love. The iniquity with which they stood chargeable, and which would have been their eternal ruin, has all been blotted from the book of God's remembrance, and they have been rendered the objects of Divine regard, by a righteousness wherewith they have been made righteous in the eye of heaven. They are no more the children of disobedience, and liable to the severities of Divine wrath; but God hath become to them a Father, and they are his sons and daughters, with the Lord Almighty. They are no longer exposed to the fear of those portending ills which haunt the sinner's mind in looking forward to death, judgment, and eternity; but, being made children of God, they have instilled into their minds the lively hope of being the heirs of all the blessings (both here and hereafter) which have been assigned over, as an inalienable right, to those who hold this high relation.

From these statements, it will appear that those who believe to the saving of their souls, are brought back, as it were, from the power of sin and from under the evil consequences of their disobedience to the law of God.

II. We shall now, in the second place, consider by what believers are bought.—We have already remarked, that all men are by right the inalienable property of God, the same as all the other creatures of his power. But, as moral beings, they have alienated themselves from his service, and consequently they have lost his favour. They have sold themselves to the power of sin and Satan, and are no more subject to the Divine government. God, therefore, that he might have a people from among the children of men who should show forth his glory, and thus arrive at the end for which they were created and made, devised and matured the plan of salvation, by which they are redeemed from that bondage under which by sin they were held. He entered into a covenant with the eternal Son—the equal of the Father—in which there was a condition that he was to satisfy the claims of Divine justice for all who would be saved. The Messiah was to make his soul a propitiatory sacrifice for sin, in consequence of which he was to see a seed which should prolong their days. He was to satisfy the law for them, in a way the most appropriate for the evincement of the perfections of God, and the most effectual for the accomplishment of that great moral change which the nature of man required, in order to his being fitted for the reception and enjoyment of the Divine blessing, in time and through eternity. The reality of the existence of this covenant was made known, in some measure, to our first parents immediately on their departure from the service of the Lord; and, to enable them to look forward to its full development, with a lively faith of being made partakers of its benefits, the rite of expiatory sacrifice was instituted, which they were commanded to observe. It was by the shedding of blood alone that the remission of sins could be obtained; and as Divine wisdom saw fit that the blood by which men were to be purified should not be shed until after many preparatory steps had been accomplished, he appointed a typical ordinance, to keep the attention of the Old Testament saints directed steadily to that great price which, in the fulness of time, would be given for their redemption. Although, in the purposes of God, the sacrifice for sin was made from the foundation of the world; yet salvation was not completed in a way level to our capacities of understanding, until the period that life and immortality were brought to light by the revelation of Jesus who was the Christ. He, when the world was fully matured for his reception, united his divine with human nature, and put himself under the law whose precepts we had broken, and in this relation he fulfilled the demands of justice for us, and offered himself a sacrifice to make an atonement for our guilt. We were living under the dominion of sin, and held in abject slavery by those debasing principles which, at our fall, had been established in our nature; and the Lord Jesus, in order to redeem us from this evil dominion, paid the costly price of his own blood. He suffered in our stead the punishment which our guilt had incurred, that we might receive the for-givenness of God, and be brought into his favour. He made himself an offering for our sin, that we might be emancipated from its power, and restored to that freedom in which we might advance to heavenly bliss. "We are not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." The price paid for our purchase from sin, therefore, is no less than the blood of the only begotten Son of God, whose value far transcends the range of our comprehensions. It is through this price of infinite amount that Christians are restored to their rightful proprietor, and again made the partakers of the many blessings which those enjoy who are the subjects of his moral government. Through this price, God has obtained an inalienable property in all who believe in the Lord Jesus to the saving of their souls; and by this peculiarity of possession in them, he constitutes them to be the temples of his Spirit, which ever abides in them, and works in them, "both to will and to do according to his good pleasure."

III. This leads us, in the third place, to consider the effects which our being purchased to God ought to have upon our lives.—Our text says, we are to "glorify God in our bodies, and in our spirits, which are God's." The way in which the glory of God is shown forth by his intelligent creatures, is by their fulfilling exactly the purposes for which they were created and made. The way in which this glory should be exhibited by men became obscured by their disobedience to the Divine law, and the power of making it manifest in their lives was entirely destroyed. But, as they have been purchased back by their Creator to himself at such a costly price, one of the great effects produced in men by this change of possession, is the turning of them from dead works to the service of the living God. At this change, the way in which God's glory may be advanced by them is in some measure laid open to their view, and the power by which they may progressively go on in this glorious career is communicated to them and upheld within them. In their being brought into a union with the Saviour, the Spirit of regeneration has been imparted to them, to enlighten their minds and to assist them onward through all the gradations of moral improvement, until they arrive at the stature of perfect beings in Christ Jesus. Christians should ever consider themselves the temples of the living God. They should consider that his Spirit has taken up his abode within them, and that it is ever ready to assist their efforts, to subdue sin, and to promote in them all those fruits of righteousness which are to the praise and glory of God. How careful, therefore, ought those to be in whom this Spirit dwells, to avoid the very appearance of evil, and to show forth in all their conduct that purity which will evince that they are under the influence of that Spirit, which is sent to convince the world of sin, and to turn men to righteousness and true holiness! Every external action which we perform should bear the character of that heavenly power which resides within us, and thus exhibit, in all its lustre, the glory which by the work of redemption we are fitted to show forth. As we are the habitations of the Spirit of God, so we should watch diligently that none of those doings appear in our lives, which will make it manifest that we are, in any measure, under the power of the flesh. We should bear in mind that, whenever we fail in our attendance to the duties which the law of God requires, or violate any of its precepts, we are frustrating the Divine purposes—we are detracting from the honour of Him who hath purchased us at the high price of our Saviour's blood. If we give our members up for an instant to be the instruments of unrighteousness, we are counteracting the effects of the Spirit of regeneration—we are alienating ourselves from Him into whose service we have been brought; and we are, so far as our influence goes, throwing a shade around that glory which has been made so conspicuous in the work of man's redemption. It might be asked by one unacquainted with human nature, whether it were possible that those who have been redeemed at such a high ransom, and who have the Spirit of God dwelling within them, could give way to the commission of any thing derogating from the Divine glory? whether they could allow themselves to commit those sins, to subdue which Christ suffered and died; but, as we have many melancholy proofs of the seeming anomaly, we cannot call in question its truth. How often do we see those, who, according to human estimation, stand highest among the sons of God, doing what is in direct opposition to the will of their Father who is in heaven, and putting the Lord that bought them to open shame. Seeing that such imperfections prevail even among the purest of our race, how much ought all professors of Christianity to strive in all things to adorn the doctrine of our Lord and Saviour, and to watch and pray that they may not be tempted; and that, when their purity is assailed, they may be strengthened so as to be able to overcome.

Those who are thus bought are not only to glorify God by observing the Divine law in their outward conduct, but they are to glorify him in all the movements of their souls. It is not enough that Christians are unblameable in their external actions, but the internal operations of their minds must vibrate in unison with the Divine will, in order to promote the glory of God. In the scheme of salvation his hatred for sin is shown forth in a most conspicuous manner, those therefore who have been redeemed with the precious blood of Christ will not rest satisfied that they refrain from outward and open violation of the Divine law; but in order to glorify God aright, they will cherish in their spirits a hatred for this evil, the object of Divine aversion, and they will strive to suppress every thought which is not consistent with the purity of him into whose possession they have been bought. The Spirit of God has become associated with their spirits—His presence is ever with them in public life, or in the secrets of retirement; being therefore continually in the company of such a holy being, one who cannot wink at the slightest appearance of sin for a moment, it will be their sincere desire and their constant effort so to purify their spirits, that they may be the fit companions of one who is altogether holy, and who can give no countenance to wicked suggestions of any kind. When they know that their souls are in the company of the Spirit of God, how anxious will they be to suppress pride, hatred, covetous desires, or lascivious inclinations, or any other evil appetite or wicked passion by which the mind of man is liable to be affected. Those who are truly united to God in love, will feel ashamed at the very appearance of any of these sinful propensities in their hearts. They know that these are the fruits of the flesh—that they are the things which detract from the glory and honour of their Lord; and as they have now, at such a high purchase, become the property of God, and been made the companions of the Divine Spirit, they are determined to avoid every thought which is at variance to the purity of his nature.

Those who have been bought with the Saviour's blood will also strive to glorify God, by their acquiescence in his purposes, and by their submission to his will in all things. They know that though they are redeemed unto God, and held by him as an inalienable possession, yet they are not completely freed from the influence of those evil principles which formerly had the sole dominion over them, nor are they yet put into the full enjoyment of all those blessings to which they are the heirs. There is a process of refining through which they are appointed to pass before being thoroughly fitted for entering on the glories which are prepared for them in a future state of existence. They are as probationers here under the care of the Spirit of sanctification, preparing for the services of the heavenly inheritance, and for the company with whom they will have to associate in that holy place. All the ways of God, therefore, will be viewed by them as appointed to carry them forward to perfection, and to qualify them fully for filling those high stations which they are destined to occupy. They will consider every dispensation of Providence, however injurious to their present comfort, as a means, in the hand of their heavenly Father, for promoting in them the benevolent purposes of his will. Out of all the perplexities and seeming ills with which they are surrounded in this life, they will rest assured, that God will cause to evolve that good for them which will terminate in their everlasting felicity. Instead, therefore, of those who are the redeemed of the Lord murmuring at his ways and plans of providence, it will be their solicitude to discover the end for which these are sent, and cordially to comply with them,—and where his dispensations are surrounded with impenetrable darkness, they will, from a conviction of his goodness, humbly submit with a firm confidence in his love. They know that this is not their resting-place—that here they have no continuing city, nor fixed abode, but that they are travelling onward to purity and the dwellings of perpetual peace; and they know also, that in this journey they are under the guidance of one who cannot err from the path wherein they ought to go. Whatever difficulties, therefore, or perils they may have to pass through, they carefully avoid calling in question the wisdom of their conductor, or allowing a doubt to arise in their minds of his unlimited goodness, or of his unchangeable love. They have every confidence in his character, and they resign themselves to his will, by which confidence and submission they glorify God in their spirits, which are his.

Those who are bought with the precious blood of Christ glorify God also, by their engaging in those acts of pious devotion which he hath appointed for his people to observe, in order to their advancement in holiness and growth in grace. They will delight to pray to God, which is the appointed way for holding converse with him, and of obtaining from him those supplies of grace of which they stand in need. They will delight to praise him with the voice of thankfulness. This is an exercise which men, as the creatures of God's power, and the partakers of his bounty, ought continually to celebrate to his glory. But how much more ought those to perform it, who, along with the gifts of his providence, are made the partakers of his grace and the heirs of his salvation. They will delight to read his Word, that they may become fully acquainted with his will, in order to render obedience unto it; and that they may learn his character in order to admire his excellencies, and to imitate his perfections. They will delight to assemble in his sanctuary, and to engage in all the exercises of this holy place, in order to have their knowledge advanced, their love to God increased, and to unite with the people in ascribing honour and glory to his name.

By your attending to these statements, my friends, of the way in which God is to be glorified by those who have been bought by the precious blood of Christ, you will be enabled to form some idea whether you are living so as to advance the Divine glory, and thus determine whether you are among the number of those who will be saved. I would not say that every man who is interested in Christ can say to a certainty that he is bought with his precious blood, but this I would say, that those who are living in the daily violation of the Divine law, and who feel no desire within them to show forth the glory of God in their bodies and in their spirits, I would say that these individuals are yet in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity,—that they are not yet the property of God in the sense which our text considers those who have been bought with a price,—that they have not yet laid hold on the offers of salvation as they are held out in the word of reconciliation. Whosoever has been bought from sin will begin to show that he is sensible of the liberty to which he is restored. He may not be able to take the full advantage of his freedom all at once, but the spirit of a free man will gradually grow up in him, and it will evince itself by degrees in his actions, his dispositions, his enjoyments, and his pursuits. In short, whoever has been purchased by the blood of Christ will show that he is gradually becoming assimilated to him in all his imitable perfections, and that he is preparing for the full enjoyment of his pure presence in a world to come. May we all be aspiring to this perfection, that our end may be everlasting peace. Amen.

MIDSUMMER NIGHTS.

BY MISS H. B. M'DONALD.

THE summer eves! the summer eves!
Whose loveliness such magic weaves
O'er earth and heaven, to make them seem Like things etherealized in dream.
While we see the glory gleams above,
And seas that sleep as calm as love,
And rocky shade that round them goes,
Like darkness guarding their repose.

And the far, far hills, whose deepening line
Doth on the gorgeous west recline,
Like earthly glooms, when they are by,
But heightening Heaven's radiance:
And the moonbeams that their gushings pour,
Like dreams o'er every sleeping flower;
And the low pervading sounds that come
Like music from some fairy home.

The summer eves! the summer eves!
Oh! what a web of sweet thought weaves
Its magic round the heart, as we Beneath their beauty resting be;
While we gaze upon that brooding smile
That beameth over, all the while,
As from a father's eyes that keep
Rapt vigil o'er his children's sleep.

And think of that diviner shore,
Where passions, heat, and day-toils o'er,
Our rapture and repose we prove,
In the smile of this rewarding love.
To gaze upon that silent sky,
And think of the peace that beyond doth lie;
To watch the unfading stars, and see
Reflections of eternity!

To view the silent caves, where sink
The wandering winds in sleep, and think
Of the troubled soul that findeth rest,
Whereat the weary dwelleth blest;
And oh! in that unfading light
Which glads the summer noon of night;
Doth it not raise all thought to where
Nor night, nor sorrow shall be there.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Word of God.—The Word of God! Have we thoroughly weighed the import of this expression? Have we felt all that it conveys? I fear not. We can read it without feeling that it is God who speaks,—that our eternal welfare is the subject,—that it is the Sword of the Spirit, who alone can give it saving power and efficacy. We can read it without trembling at it, and without self-application, and without prayer. We can read it merely for the gratification of curiosity. We can search it for arguments to support some favourite opinions, and we can close it again without ever dreaming, that the eye of God is upon us while we are reading His Word, and that our heart should be the better for what we read. And we can frame theories too, and devise rules by which we may determine, when that volume which comes to us as "all given by inspiration of God," really speaks the word of God, and when it exhibits only the wisdom of man. And is it when read in this way, that the Word of God will become to us the fountain of life, and the well of salvation? Alas! No.—REV. MARCUS DODS.

Salvation by grace.—God can save us only by his own power, for his glory, merely in a way of grace and favour, solely by Christ,—to the end we may love, adore, and praise him; and yet the wish and will of man, notwithstanding the peculiar discoveries of the Christian religion, and the fullest conviction of infinite defect, is, to be independent and self-saved.—ADAM.

THE WALDENSES OF PIEDMONT,
FROM THE REFORMATION TO THEIR BANISHMENT
IN 1687,
PART I.

WHEN Luther first conceived the daring idea of exploring the foundation of Papal authority, and afterwards proceeded to assail the mass of errors that had been piled upon it, the lion-hearted Reformer felt as if, like the Tishbite, he stood alone. He seems to have been ignorant that, in other countries than his own Germany, there were prophets of the Lord who had escaped the persecutions of Jezebel, and thousands of worshippers who had not bowed the knee to Baal; and that all his ideas, which successively flashed upon him like new discoveries, had been anticipated, and organized into system, by numerous Churches and communities, whole ages before he commenced his career. Such is the nature of discovery in general; men of kindred intellects in different parts of the world, arrive, unknown to each other, at the same conclusions; and each thinks himself the honoured individual for whom the revelation was reserved. He had heard, indeed, during his days of darkness, of the Fratres Picardi,—under which name the Waldenses were known in Germany; and as the accounts which he received of them were a tissue of falsehood and absurdity, he had heard of them merely to loathe and despise them: but when the Sun of Righteousness had risen upon his soul, and enabled him to see objects clearly, he soon learned to recant the prejudices of his youth. "I found among them," he writes, "one great and marvellous thing, scarcely ever so much as heard of in the Pope's Church, viz., that, laying aside 'the doctrines of men,' so far as they were able, they 'meditated on the law of the Lord day and night;' and that they were skilled and ready in Scripture." After having mentioned the literary deficiencies under which the Waldenses had laboured, in consequence of their poverty, and the improvement in that respect which had now taken place among them in consequence of the wider diffusion of books and learning, he shows his earnest desire of brotherhood with these Christians in the following words:—"We ought to give fervent thanks to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to the riches of his glory, has commanded the light of his Word to shine out of darkness; thereby to destroy death in us, and restore life. And we ought to rejoice, also, both for their sakes and our own, that we, who were ourselves also at a distance, upon throwing down that partition wall of jealousy whereby we appeared heretic to each other, are now made near, and reduced together into one sheep-fold, under that one Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, who is blessed for ever." A similar attestation was borne in their behalf by the amiable, gentle-hearted Melancthon; and in addressing the Waldenses of Bohemia, through one of their pastors, he uses the following characteristic language:—"Since we are agreed upon the chief articles of the Christian faith, let us mutually embrace each other in love, as no difference in rites and ceremonies should disunite our minds. The apostle Paul speaks frequently concerning ceremonies, and forbids Christians to disagree on account of their variety, although the world quarrels vehemently about ceremonies. Indeed, I do not dislike that more severe system of exercise or discipline which prevails in your churches: I would to God it were a little more severely observed also in our own." How gratifying it must have been to these two illustrious Reformers, while they were waging a conflict so arduous, and apparently so hopeless, to think that the Church, although faint and feeble, was still standing upon the mountain of supplication; and that faithful men stood on either side, to stay up her prayerful hands, while the combat in the cause of the Lord of hosts was fluctuating upon the plain!

During the commencement of the Reformation in Germany, events were there transacted upon so grand a scale, that little notice was attracted to the humble valley of Piedmont, and the churches were enabled to meet and worship there in security and peace. But the wrath of a relentless and indefatigable foe had been kindled by these recent events, and the persecutions of the Waldenses in France and Calabria were to be extended to the evangelical Piedmontese. In 1536, Francis I., King of France, conquered Piedmont, and being instigated by Paul III., who then occupied the Papal throne, to root out the heresy of the valleys, this sovereign caused many of these innocent people to be burnt alive; and when they addressed him with petitions, he sternly answered, that he had not put the Lutherans to death in all other parts of France, to tolerate a reserve of heretics in the Alps. They were also commanded, upon pain of death, to dismiss their pastors, and receive mass-priests in their room: to which they heroically replied, that they could not obey, as such orders were contrary to the laws of God. After this, Francis had too busy and eventful a life to superintend the persecution in person, but he delegated the task to inquisitors, who evinced no lack of diligence upon such an occasion. One anecdote of this persecution is worthy of notice. Saint Julien, the inquisitorial president, in a progress through Perosa and Pignerol, summoned at the latter place a poor rustic, and commanded him to have his infant rebaptized according to the ceremonial of the Romish Church. The peasant begged to be allowed a short interval for prayer before he returned an answer, which was granted; and on rising from his knees, when his devotions were ended, he said, that he was willing to have the child rebaptized, if the president would give him a note under his hand, agreeing to take upon himself and all his posterity the consequences of the deed, and answer for it at the day of judgment. This stunning proposal was too much even for an inquisitor. Saint Julien thought he had enough to answer for upon his own account, and the man was dismissed without farther demand.

During the ascendancy of France in Savoy, this inquisitorial persecution was continued, wherein several eminent pastors, as well as many of the common people, perished in the flames; but in 1550 Piedmont was restored to Philibert Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, at the general peace. On recovering this portion of his dual territories, he was beset by the monks of Pignerol, to extirpate the men of the valleys with fire and sword, and bestow their possessions upon the neighbouring garrisons. Upon this, the menaced people addressed the prince with a memorial, in which they gave a summary of their faith, and an account of their practice, to show that they were neither detestable nor dangerous; and requested an open meeting, where they might answer their impugnors, and test their doctrines by the authority of the Word of God. But the monks contemplated a different kind of controversy; for in 1560, the Count de la Trinité was sent against the recusants, with a strong military force, who fell upon the village of Angrogne. The warlike events of this singular campaign were like a personification of the combat between David and Goliath. While the Count was ravaging Angrogne, two hundred peasants, armed only with slings, advanced against his troops, consisting of twelve hundred disciplined soldiers, and completely put them to the route. A second attempt was then made; but the assailants were again foiled, with the loss of seventy men, while only three of the Waldenses fell. Stung by this disgrace, the Count, whose army was raised by reinforcements from Spain to seven thousand men, advanced, with the purpose of putting all the Waldenses to the sword; but the latter, knowing their vast inferiority, fell back, with their wives and children, upon their natural ramparts among the mountains. A desperate four days' conflict ensued, in which the assailants endeavoured to force the mountain passes; but every effort they could make was repulsed, and at the expense of a severe slaughter among the officers and soldiers. On the fifth day a still more furious onset was made, at three different points, with the reserves, which consisted of Spanish troops, at this period incontestibly the best soldiers in Europe; but, after a desperate struggle, they found they could make no impression upon the mountaineers, or gain a single step in advance. The Count again urged them to the charge, but the soldiers wavered, halted, and refused to proceed; upon which, the Waldenses becoming the assailants in turn, rushed down upon them, put them to flight, and chased them as far as the valley of Angrogne. These were new and startling events in the chivalrous records of Europe. A numerous, gallant, and skilful soldiery had been discomfited by a handful of peasants,—men utterly unskilled in war, and indifferent to military fame: the lance and the sword had been powerless, and helmet and cuirass had been pierced or shattered by pebbles from the shepherds' slings: peaceful priests, who were the chief leaders of the Waldenses during these successive conflicts, had been suddenly inspired with a skill, energy, and promptitude, that baffled the science and tactics of the veteran leaders opposed to them; and with a loss of only fifteen men, they had slain nine hundred of the enemy. Who would resolve such wonderful success into mere natural causes, or deny that the overruling hand of God was there?

The indomitable courage of the Waldenses on this occasion struck their enemies with awe; and the Duke of Savoy, instead of prosecuting the war, was willing to agree to terms. To this he was probably incited by his Duchess, who was suspected of a leaning to the persecuted creed. The deputies of the churches were accordingly sent to Turin, the capital of Savoy; and here a victory was gained to their cause which we gladly relate, in preference to details of military prowess, because it was one which their prowess could scarcely have achieved. When the rustic delegates arrived at court, one Chaussincourt, an usher to the Duchess, addressed them in terms of unmeasured insolence. "Miserable wretches," he said, "how dare you appear before your sovereign, to treat with him, after having taken up arms against him? or with what pretence can you contradict his religion, which is countenanced by the whole world; or argue with a prince who has the counsel of so many learned doctors, while you are but wretched, paltry shepherds, ignorant of every thing? Fools, can you expect any thing but the gallows, as the end of this ill-advised journey?" "Sir," said one of the deputies, mildly, "we are bold to approach our prince, because his goodness has encouraged us; and as for our resistance, it has been lawful, because we were compelled, and God justified it by his wonders. As for the wretchedness with which you reproach us, God himself has blessed it, to show that he does not need the great things of the world to accomplish great events. In respect to our counsels, those which we receive from his Spirit are wise enough; those hearts which he animates are sufficiently brave, and those arms which he strengthens cannot want strength. We are ignorant, it is true, and therefore we aim at no other eloquence than to pray in faith. As to the death with which you have threatened us, the word and honour of our prince are more dear to us than our lives; but even death itself cannot in the least dismay those who have the fear of God engraven in their hearts." This answer, this "soft answer," did indeed "turn away wrath;" and it did far more than this, for the proud and courtly Chaussincourt was so deeply moved by it, that he became a Protestant!

By an edict which was granted by the Duke of Savoy, the evangelical communities of Piedmont had their safety guaranteed, and their immunities declared inviolate. But this was merely a delusive calm; for only four years after (A. D. 1565), a new edict was issued, commanding every subject of the Duke to conform to the Church of Rome, or quit the country in two months. On this occasion, an eloquent advocate interposed in behalf of the Waldenses of Piedmont, in the person of the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, who addressed a long and most impressive letter to the Duke of Savoy upon the iniquity and impolicy of such a measure; but of this valuable document we can only afford the following brief extract. After showing the groundlessness and absurdity of those reports that represented the men of the valleys as traitors, who plotted to deliver up their fortresses to the enemies of Savoy, the Elector added, "Let your Highness know that there is a God in heaven, who not only beholds and sees the actions, but also tries the hearts and reins of men, and to whom all things are naked and open. Let your Highness beware of a wilful fighting against God, and of persecuting Christ in his members; for although he may bear it for a little, to try the patience of his saints, yet, in the end, he will chastise the persecutors of his Church and people with horrible punishments. Let not your Highness suffer yourself to be abused by the persuasions of the Papists, who possibly may promise you the kingdom of heaven and eternal life, as a reward for banishing, imprisoning, and exterminating these Huguenots (for so they style good Christians), by whatever means or instruments; for, assuredly, atrocities and calumnies are not the highway to heaven—no, there must be some other way found out. Nay, your Highness may easily see what success the last forty years of persecution have had. You may see what the fires, swords, gibbets, prisons, tortures, and banishments have profited those who call themselves Catholics, either in Germany, England, France, or Scotland. No, there is no need of the power, or authority, or severity of men in matters of religion, as the histories both of the Jews and the primitive Church sufficiently testify; where we find, that those who have afflicted, banished, and delivered up the Christians to death, have been so far from having gained any thing by such measures, that, on the contrary, they have increased their number, whereby it has become a proverb among them, that 'The ashes of the martyrs are the seed of the Christian Church.' In this, the Church resembles the palm-tree, which raises itself the more it is depressed. This your Highness may easily observe, if you will be pleased but to open your eyes; yea, I entreat you to understand and consider that the Christian religion may be persuaded, but not forced." The unanswerable arguments and eloquent appeals of this epistle, corroborated as they also were by similar applications from other Protestant princes of Germany, were for the time effectual; so that, until 1571, the valleys enjoyed a season of safety and tranquillity, when their Duke, having joined a Catholic league of persecution, began to menace his Waldenses with new severities. But from this he was restrained by his amiable Duchess; and, on the following year, the horrors of the massacre of Saint Bartholomew so effectually opened his eyes to the nature of religious persecution, that he continued to protect the Waldenses till his death, which took place A. D. 1580. He was succeeded by his son, Charles Emanuel; and, upon this occasion, the Papal party had once more recourse to their old arts of stirring up a war of extirpation against the Waldenses of Piedmont. But they were still baffled, in consequence of the moderation and justice of the new sovereign; and when deputies from the Waldenses waited upon him, to express their fidelity to his government and entreat his favour, he returned this gratifying answer: "Be but faithful to me, and I shall be sure to be a good prince, nay, a father to you. And as for your liberty of conscience, and the exercises of your religion, I shall be so far from innovating against those liberties which you have hitherto enjoyed, that if any offer to molest you, have recourse to me, and I shall effectually relieve and protect you." This reply, so worthy of a sovereign, was spoken in the presence of the whole court; and such was its decisive character, that none dared to oppose it, so that the Waldenses were left in peace.

During the foregoing years of quiet, the Christians of the valleys, notwithstanding their claims to equal rights, had been tolerated, rather than recognised, by law. The safety they enjoyed had depended upon fortuitous circumstances; and their tranquillity, even at the best, had been enjoyed under the sword of Rome, which was suspended over their heads by a single hair. But even this poor measure of enjoyment was grudged them; and in 1601, a circumstance occurred, in which they might read the real insecurity of their tenure. In the mutations of politics, Charles Emanuel had seized upon the Marquisate of Saluces, separated from Piedmont, on the north side, only by a single mountain; and this rich territorial acquisition, which had previously belonged to France, possessed eight flourishing churches of evangelical worshippers, who had fraternized for centuries with the brethren of Piedmont. The Duke of Savoy—instigated, it would appear, by the grand political Moloch of territorial incorporation—resolved to weld this new portion into the mass of his old dominion; and for this purpose the operations of the furnace and the hammer were called into requisition. The Salucean Waldenses must conform to the established religion; and they were ordered to appear, individually, before the magistrates within fifteen days, and choose the alternative of embracing Popery or banishment. The simple men, who knew nothing of politics, were unable to believe that the good disposition of Charles Emanuel could have become so wonderfully perverted, and, believing that the mandate was either a forgery or a false alarm, they abode in their houses and pursued their daily avocations. But a locust-cloud of inquisitorial monks suddenly alighted among them; every dwelling was immediately subjected to an ecclesiastical scrutiny; and the result was, that five hundred families were proscribed "at one fell swoop," and driven into exile. By this process the churches in the marquisate of Saluces were completely broken up and scattered to the winds; and as the exiles wandered forth into the wide world, Pope Clement VIII. took care, by his edicts and intrigues, that they should find no rest for the sole of their foot. In this act of dispersion, a perfidious stroke of cunning was exhibited, which was, no doubt, thought justified by the successful result. As the Waldenses had now acquired a formidable name in warfare, which their enemies had been taught to respect, it was thought advisable to separate those of Saluces from each other, and overcome them in detail. It was first, therefore, pretended that only the men of the plain were to be dispossessed, while those of the mountains were to be untouched; and while the latter felt it to be their duty to remain quiet while they were unharmed, the work of persecution was successfully accomplished below; after which, the mountaineers were visited in their turn, and expelled with equal facility.

THE PRETENSIONS OF MODERN INFIDELITY TESTED BY FACTS.

BY THE REV. J. G. LORIMER,

Minister of St David's Parish, Glasgow.

PART I.

WHEN we consider what is the nature of true Christianity, and the benefits it has conferred upon the world; how it has raised the female sex, one-half the species, from the lowest social degradation; how it has promoted literature and freedom, and purified morals; how, from being the religion of one who was a poor despised Jew, it has moved onward till it has become the religion of the most lightened, powerful, free, and civilized nations on the earth, distinguished in science and art: when it is remembered what systems of darkness, and superstition, and cruelty, and blood it has successfully encountered and overthrown in its progress; what hopes it has awakened respecting the future; how many death-beds it has irradiated and gladdened;—it might be expected that Christianity would be universally hailed as the benefactor of mankind, and that men would as soon think of attempting to blot out the sun from the firmament as desire to deny its claims, or check its advancement. But, strange to say, in almost all ages, there have been not a few who have denied its Divine authority, and proved its bitter enemies, treating it as if it were the foe of human happiness; and, what increases the surprise, some men of superior intellect and attainments have not unfrequently been the most prominent in this unhappy class.

In all departments, in literature and science, in views of education and civil government and national happiness, we meet with the principles of unbelief, often unknown to those who hold and propagate them; while in prints and regular publications, and public meetings and lectures, we find abundant evidence that many of the poor and hard-working class, who especially need the consolations and hopes of true religion, have abandoned themselves to infidel teaching, and are bringing up their children according to the same miserable model.

This prevalence of Infidelity is most affecting, and the guilt of those who listen to its temptations is serious and aggravated indeed. But it is well to remember that it does not come by chance, nor is it any matter of real surprise to the friends of revelation. If the Bible speak true, this world is fallen and apostate; and if so, then it is not to be expected that the holy principles or the imperative claims of Christianity can be relished. Scripture expressly prophesies that a class of men will oppose and reject its authority even to the end. Did such opponents not appear in the persons and character of Infidels, the Scripture would not be true; the evidence of prophecy would here be invalidated.

In noticing the pretensions of Infidelity at the present day, we observe that it puts itself forward in various important aspects and characters. Formerly, it was contented to be associated with the quiet speculations of literary or scientific men. Religion was thought a good thing for the body of the people; necessary at once for their restraint and comfort. Infidelity made no claims to general or exclusive usefulness. But now the case is altered, and unbelievers stand forward, contending that religion is the great evil in society, and that they are the great friends of knowledge, of freedom, and of social happiness! These pretensions it is desirable now to consider.

I. According to Infidels, Christianity is the enemy of knowledge, and they are its devoted advocates. That some men professing Christianity are opposed to knowledge, may be true; but this does not affect the honour of true Christianity. She is not responsible for the errors and sins of mere nominal adherents. In her own nature, and according to her genuine operation upon her real disciples, she is the grand friend and advocate of all true knowledge. She has nothing to fear; on the contrary, she has much to hope from it. Not only has there ever been a crowd of the most learned men who have made a fair profession of Christianity, thus showing that there is no inconsistency between the two; but there is every reason to believe that, apart from true religion, the great body of a people will never be educated. While education advances religion, true religion is the direct promoter of education. It promotes it when men are impressed with the conviction that the Bible is the Word of God, and contains the knowledge of the only way to eternal life, and that, as a matter of duty, it must be daily read; it does so when parents are impressed with these things, so that they will make exertions and sacrifices that their children may be able to peruse the Scriptures; and when this is gained, and habits of reading formed, the young will naturally turn to other departments of knowledge also. The grand impulse, however, towards a universal education, is a sense of the value and imperative claims of the Bible, as a revelation from Heaven. What have been the countries of most education and knowledge? Where have the people been most universally instructed? They are those countries where Christianity has been most prevalent. Witness Switzerland, Holland, Great Britain, and New England. What party at the present day has done, or is doing most for popular education? Who are making the greatest sacrifices of trouble and money, rearing the greatest number of schools, &c.? The answer must be, It is the religious party, under the influence of Christianity. Infidelity boasts of its love of knowledge and education; but what has it accomplished on this field? What sacrifices has it made? What schools has it reared? What comparison could it bear with the educational services of Christianity? The unbelievers of France may have expended large sums of money in their contest with Christianity, and in the diffusion of their Infidelity; but what have they actually expended for the benefit of the great body of the people—to educate their families, and make them useful in society? If their claim to being the friends of knowledge be well founded, they should be able easily to refer to cases of illustrious service. But there are no such cases; and while Infidelity so miserably fails as a substantial supporter of knowledge and education, it is Christianity which is the active, and unwearied, and self-denying promoter of the cause of knowledge among all classes of society. Consider the large amount raised annually in Great Britain for the education of the children of the poor. In addition to pecuniary efforts, about a million and a quarter of Sunday-school children are taught by gratuitous teachers. What has Infidelity done in the same way, and in the same space of time, in any country under heaven? The truth is, that whatever may be her boasting, she is a stranger to the best, and, indeed, the only motives to persuade one to diffuse abroad the blessings of education. So much for the claims of Infidelity in comparison with those of Christianity, in the matter of knowledge, and the love and diffusion of it.

May we not add, among the proofs how little Infidelity is animated by the sincere and candid love of knowledge, that Infidels themselves have discovered the most perverse ignorance in their treatment of Christianity? Could they have done this, at least to the extent with which they are chargeable, had they possessed the least love of true knowledge? Dr Beattie, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Aberdeen, who wrote well on the Evidences of Christianity, and was repeatedly brought into contact with unbelievers, remarks, "From several conversations, which it has been my chance to have with unbelievers, I have learned that ignorance of the nature of our religion, and a disinclination to study both it and its conclusions, are to be reckoned among the chief causes of Infidelity." It would not be so wonderful that this should hold true of a few desperate partisans: such persons are to be found among all classes. But it appears conspicuously among the very leaders and patrons of unbelief, who boast of their literature and love of knowledge. The ignorance of Voltaire is almost incredible, especially respecting the Old Testament. Gibbon, so remarkable for his learning, does not seem, so far as one can gather from his Memoirs and Diary, to have ever read any judicious exposition or able defence of Christianity. We need wonder less at his conversion to Popery, and reconversion, and ultimate termination in Infidelity. Hume, in a letter to Dr Blair, a literary friend, says, "I have long since done with all inquiries on such (religious) subjects, and am become incapable of instruction; though I own no one is more capable of conveying it than yourself." Does this state of mind argue the presence of any real love of knowledge? It is stated, on the authority of Dr Samuel Johnson, well known for his scrupulous veracity, that Hume acknowledged to a clergyman in the diocese of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament through with attention. Is this candour, or love of truth? And yet Hume wrote against the Scripture miracles, and endeavoured to show that a miracle does not admit of proof! As to Paine, any one who has read his work will be at a loss to decide, whether ignorance or malice predominate most in its pages. He acknowledges that he determined to write against Christianity, and then procured a Bible and a Testament, that he might know what he should write against. If such were the ignorance and want of candour of the champions, what may we believe is the state of things among men of the same sentiments, of inferior note? Had literature or science been treated in the same way as Christianity, where would have been their success and prosperity? Does not such unfair treatment of revelation indicate that the opposition proceeds, not from want of evidence, but from the fact that there is too much evidence to allow the guilty heart to remain at peace? Therefore does the Infidel endeavour to get rid of the subject by reckless unprincipled resistance.

II. Another of the pretensions of Infidelity at the present day is, that it is the great friend and advocate of freedom, while Christianity is said to be opposed to it. This pretence will be found as vain as the preceding. That some systems, calling themselves Christian, have been associated with priestcraft and civil despotism—particularly the Church of Rome—is what no one acquainted with the history of the world will deny, and far less an enlightened Christian. In this he sees a fulfilment of prophecy, and so a confirmation of the Divine truth of his holy faith; but nothing can be more unfair than to make true Christianity responsible for the spirit and the deeds of Popery—a spirit and deeds which she denounces and abhors. How would Deists like to be made responsible for the conduct of Pagans or of Atheists? We must look to the nature of true Christianity, as unfolded in the Scriptures, and in the genuine history of its operation; and, tried by this standard, we shall find her the warmest friend, and most successful supporter of freedom, civil and religious. The great commandment is, to love our neighbour up to the same measure and degree in which we love ourselves. The picture of Christian love exhibited in 1 Cor. xiii., the tenderness which is repeatedly recommended in behalf of the scruples of less informed brethren, are all inconsistent with the selfishness of despotism, and lie at the root of the generosity of true freedom. And, bating the atrocities of Popery, what has been the history of Christianity but the history of human liberty? The humanity inspired by the Gospel, and a sense of the value of the soul of man, led to the abolition of slavery, which previously had been almost universal. Compare Protestant Christendom with Paganism, ancient or modern—is there any real comparison in point of civil freedom? Nay more, turn to the grand struggles for freedom throughout Christendom in modern times—who were the men who made the noblest sacrifices—who spent and endured most? Were they the scholar, the man of literature, the philosopher? No. Had they been the only supporters, the cause of freedom would have perished. It was religious men of all ranks—men deeply imbued with Christianity—who wrought out the liberties of Europe. Nay, what is very striking, it could be proved from the history of Britain, that every increase of liberty was preceded by an increase of religious knowledge and feeling; in short, that Christianity was the parent of British liberties. Turning to Scotland, who needs to be reminded that it was to the Christian men of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, that it is indebted for its present free constitution? What Infidel or Pagan can point to such sacrifices in behalf of freedom as they cheerfully endured? Where are the martyrs of Infidelity? Yea, where would have been the liberty which Infidels now so often abuse, had it not been for the men whom they profess to scorn?

Unbelievers often taunt Christians with their persecutions, and tell us how tolerant the ancient Pagans were, and how tolerant they are. The animosity and violence which have prevailed among Christians are indeed much to be deplored,—nothing can be more opposite to the spirit of the Gospel; but if the Church of Rome, and those parties whom she more immediately infected with her spirit, be left out of the account (and in justice they must be so from any estimate of the operation of genuine Christianity), the sum of persecution which can be laid to the score of Christians is very much abridged. It is, however, a gross historical error to imagine that the ancient heathen were tolerant towards Christianity. On the contrary, they persecuted its adherents with the most unrelenting cruelty; and Roman emperors, eminent for literature, and for mildness in every other respect, were among the foremost of the persecutors. Jerome states, that the Roman emperors of the first three centuries were estimated, in that space of time, to have cut off not less than one million eight hundred and twenty thousand Christians. Of course, the brunt of the persecution was confined to, comparatively speaking, a few years, which makes the result the more appalling.

With regard, again, to the tolerant character of modern infidelity, the claim is equally unfounded. There is nothing in its principles to teach men generosity, to regard the rights and privileges of others. Its spirit is essentially selfish; a consistent infidel has no motive to show respect or kindness to others; and what, then, can he be but selfish, and, in the same degree, where he has power, overbearing and despotic? These statements are borne out by facts. Have leading infidels been eminent for their love of liberty? They may, in some cases, have been employed as instruments in the providence of God, in sapping and hastening the overthrow of the superstitions of Popery; but what were the principles to which they gave utterance in doing so, and what was the system which they substituted in the room of Popery? Did they breathe of true freedom? Far from it. Rousseau, immediately after denouncing persecution in a letter to D'Alembert, thus speaks of fanaticism, which many would describe by the more honourable name of true religion:—

“Fanaticism is not an error, but a blind, a senseless fury, which reason can never keep within bounds. The only way to hinder it from spreading, is to restrain those who broach it. In vain is it to demonstrate to madmen that they are deceived by their leaders; still will they be as eager as ever to follow them. I see but one way to stop its progress, and that is, to combat it with its own weapons. Little does it avail either to reason or convince. You must lay aside philosophy, shut your books, take up the sword and punish the knaves.”

Why should religious men, fanatics though they be in the estimation of Rousseau, be persecuted at all, and that upon principle? If they are so miserable as the infidel represents them, that is the stronger reason why they should be pitied. How would the infidel have liked had Christians thought that scepticism was a species of fanaticism?

cism, which could be restrained only by taking up the sword and punishing the knaves, and had begun by applying it to Rousseau himself?

Voltaire, it is well known, instead of sympathizing, as every lover of freedom ought to have done, with the persecuted Protestants of France, denounces them as "weak and obstinate men," because they suffered so much, rather than give way to the usurpations of the Church of Rome. Hume, it is equally well known, in his History of England, uniformly takes the side of the oppressor, and does all that lies in his power to blacken and misrepresent the character of the persecuted, though to them we are in a great degree indebted, under God, for our civil and religious liberties. Does this indicate any thing like an alliance between infidelity and the love of freedom? With regard to Gibbon, again, in spirit and character he was intensely selfish. An able writer, who has examined his Diary and Journals with care, declares, that "from the beginning to the end of his life, there is not one noble, generous sentiment expressed." As to Paine, who does not know that, in his own spirit and conduct, he was an utter stranger to true toleration? What are the terms in which he speaks of Christian men, and especially Christian teachers? Are they not those of unmeasured abuse and violence? Does he not incessantly impute the worst motives to them? And what does this indicate? Does it indicate the presence of that toleration and liberty of which he speaks so much? If Christians are so ignorant, superstitious, and deceived as he represents them to be, he should feel for them the deeper compassion. Is this his spirit, or his tone? Does he not rather show the temper of the persecutor?

Impressive facts proclaim, that infidelity, so far from being tolerant, is intensely persecuting. It is not unknown to the student of history, that many of the most atrocious persecutors in the Church of Rome were infidels under the guise of ecclesiastics. They persecuted the saints of God to the death, for not believing what they themselves did not believe. And when infidelity actually came forth from its concealment, and appeared openly at the head of the government of France, what was the character which it manifested to the world? One would have expected that, after all its outcry about toleration and freedom, it would have been remarkable for the tenderness, ability, and success, with which it upheld the cause of liberty, bearing with the ignorant, and protecting the weak; but what is the fact? It stood forth as the very demon of persecution, under the name of freedom, and persecuted not only the Roman Catholics, but the Protestants,—in short, Christianity; shutting up the churches, abolishing the sacraments and Sabbath, with a virulence and blood-thirstiness hitherto unknown in the history of the world. The French Infidels, while denouncing the Gospel as cruel, butchered two millions of the people of that unhappy country in seven short years. The Pagan emperors of Rome could boast of nothing like this; and yet Infidels would have us to believe that they are tolerant, and the only true friends of freedom. Let them not only disown and abominate the conduct of their brethren of France, but change their own tempers and dispositions when speaking of Christianity and Christians, before they expect to receive any credit for such idle assertions. Subjoined is a statement of the numbers who fell by the hands of the Infidels, from the work of one of themselves. Prudhomme gives the following Table:—

GUILLOTINED BY SENTENCES OF THE REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL.
Nobility, of both sexes, . . . . .	2,028
Wives of labourers and artisans, . .	1,467
Priests, . . . . .	1,135
Religieuses, . . . . .	350
Common persons, . . . . .	13,623
	18,603
Women died of premature childbirth, .	3,748
Women killed in La Vendee, . . . .	15,000
Children do. do. . . . .	22,000
Men do. do. . . . .	900,000
Victims at Nantes, . . . . .	32,000
Killed at Leon, . . . . .	31,000
	1,003,748
	1,022,351

Of course the loss of life, as a whole, was far greater than these figures describe; twenty thousand persons are estimated to have died of famine; and in ten years, not less than three millions perished in France alone,—eight hundred thousand by civil war. During the Convention, the guillotine struck off one thousand heads per day. The reader will now be able to judge with what truth Infidelity can claim to be the great pillar of freedom, and to represent Christianity as the friend of despotism. The claim is not only not true, but it is the very reverse of the truth.

THE EXECUTION OF LORD WARRISTON.

FROM Aikman's "Annals of the Persecution in Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution," now in course of publication; we select the following interesting scene, from one of the darkest periods in our ecclesiastical history:—

Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston, had been forfeited and condemned by parliament when Argyle and Guthrie were arraigned, but escaping to the Continent, had remained concealed in Holland and Germany, chiefly at Hamburg, till, most unadvisedly, in the latter end of 1662, he ventured to France. Notice of this having been carried to London, the king, who bore him a personal hatred for his free admonitions when in Scotland, sent over secretly a confidential spy, known by the name of "Crooked Murray," to trace him out and bring him to Britain. By watching Lady Warriston, Murray soon discovered her lord's retreat at Rouen in Normandy, and had him seized while engaged in the act of secret prayer. He then applied to the magistrates, and, showing them the king's commission, desired that they would allow him to carry his victim a prisoner to England. The magistrates, uncertain how to act, committed Warriston to close custody and sent to the French king for instructions. When the question was debated in council, the greater part were for respecting the rights of hospitality, and not giving up his lordship till some better reasons were shown than had yet been given; but Louis, who was extremely desirous to oblige Charles, and sympathized cordially in his antipathies against the Protestant religion and liberty, ordered him to be delivered to the messenger, who carried him to London and lodged him in the Tower in the month of January 1663. While the parliament was sitting in June, he was sent to Scotland with a letter from the king, ordering him "to be proceeded against according to law and justice," and landed at Leith on the 8th, whence, next day, he was brought bareheaded to the tolbooth of Edinburgh. Neither his wife, children, nor any other friend, were permitted to see him, except in presence of the keeper or guard, and that only for an hour, or at farthest two at a time, betwixt eight o'clock in the morning and eight at night. Here he was detained till July 8th, when, no more trial being deemed necessary, he was brought before parliament to receive judgment. His appearance on this occasion was humiliating to the pride of human genius, debilitated through excessive blood-letting and the deleterious drugs that had been administered to him by his physicians, the faculties of his soul partook of the imbecility of his body, and, on the spot where his eloquence had in former days commanded breathless attention, he could scarcely now utter one coherent sentence. The prelates basely derided his mental aberrations, but many of the other members compassionated the intellectual ruin of one who had shone among the foremost in the brightest days of Scotland's parliamentary annals. When the question was put, whether the time of his execution should be then fixed or delayed? a majority seemed inclined to spare his life, which Lauderdale observing, rose, and, contrary to all usage or propriety, in a furious speech, insisted upon the sentence being carried into immediate effect; the submissive legislators acquiesced, and he was doomed to be hanged at the cross of Edinburgh on the 22d of the same month, and his head fixed upon the Nether Bow Port, beside Mr Guthrie's.

Mr James Kirkton, author of the "History of the Church of Scotland," who visited him, says—"I spake with him in prison, and though he was sometimes under great heaviness, yet he told me he could never doubt his own salvation, he had so often seen God's face in the house of prayer." As he approached his end, he grew more composed; and, on the night previous to his execution, having been favoured with a few hours' profound and refreshing sleep, he awoke in the full possession of his vigorous powers, his memory returned, and he experienced in an extraordinary degree the strong consolations of the Gospel, expressing his assurance of being clothed with a white robe, and having a new song of praise put into his lips, even salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb!

Before noon, he dined with great cheerfulness, hoping to sup in heaven, and drink of the blood of the vine fresh and new in his Father's kingdom. After spending some time in secret prayer, he left the prison about two o'clock, attended by his friends in mourning, full of holy confidence and courage, but perfectly composed and serene. As he proceeded to the cross, where a high gibbet was erected, he repeatedly requested the prayers of the people; and there being some disturbance on the street when he ascended the scaffold, he said with great composure—"I entreat you, quiet yourselves a little, till this dying man deliver his last words among you," and requested them not to be offended that he used a paper to refresh his memory, being so much wasted by long sickness and the malice of physicians. He then read audibly, first from the one side and then from the other, a short speech that he had hurriedly written—what he had composed at length and intended for his testimony having been taken from him. It commenced with a general confession of his sins and shortcomings in prosecuting the best pieces of work and service to the Lord and to his generation, and that through temptation he had been carried to so great a length, in compliance with the late usurpers, after having so seriously and frequently made professions of aversion to their way; "for all which," he added, "as I seek God's mercy in Christ Jesus, so I desire that the Lord's mercy may, from my example, be the more stirred up to watch and pray that they enter not into temptation."

He then bare record to the glory of God's free grace and of his reconciled mercy through Christ Jesus—left "an honest testimony to the whole covenanted work of reformation"—and expressed his lively expectation of God's gracious and wonderful renewing and reviving all his former great interests in these nations, particularly Scotland—yea, dear Scotland! He recommended his poor afflicted wife and children to the choicest blessings of God and the prayers and favours of his servants—prayed for repentance and forgiveness to his enemies—for the king, and blessings upon him and his posterity, that they might be surrounded with good and faithful councillors, and follow holy and wise councils to the glory of God and the welfare of the people. He concluded by committing himself, soul and body, his relations, friends, the sympathizing and suffering witnesses of the Lord, to his choice mercies and service in earth and heaven, in time and through eternity:—"All which suits, with all others which he hath at any time by his Spirit moved and assisted me to make, and put up according to his will, I leave before the throne, and upon the Father's merciful bowels, the Son's mediating merits, and the Holy Spirit's compassionating groans, for now and for ever!"

After he had finished reading, he prayed with the greatest fervour and humility, thus beginning his supplication—"Abba! Abba! Father, Father, accept this thy poor sinful servant, coming unto thee through the merits of Jesus Christ." Then he took leave of his friends, and again, at the foot of the ladder, prayed in a perfect rapture, being now near the end of that sweet work he had been so much employed about, and felt so much sweetness in through life. No ministers were allowed to be with him, but his God abundantly supplied his every want. On account of his weakness, he required help to ascend the ladder. Having reached the top, he cried with a loud voice—"I beseech you all who are the people of God not to scorn at suffering for the interest of Christ, or stumble at anything of this kind falling out in these days. Be encouraged to suffer for him, for I assure you, in the name of the Lord, he will bear your charges!" This he repeated again while the rope was putting about his neck, forcibly adding—"The Lord hath graciously comforted me." Then asking the executioner if he was ready to do his office, and being answered that he was, he gave the signal, and was turned off, crying—"Pray! pray! praise! praise!" His death was almost without a struggle.

Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston, was an early, zealous, and distinguished covenanter, and bore a conspicuous part in all the remarkable transactions of the times, from 1638 till the Restoration. The only blemish which his enemies could affix to his character was, what he himself lamented, his accepting office under the usurpers, after having previously so violently opposed this in others, when yet every prospect of restoring the Stuart family seemed hopeless, and when numbers of his countrymen and of his judges themselves had submitted to a tolerant commonwealth, that did not burden the conscience with unnecessary oaths, or require any compliances which might not, in the circumstances of the case, have been considered venial, if not justifiable. His talents for business were of the first order. His eloquence was ready, and his judgment clear. He was prompt and intrepid in action, and adhered steadily to his Presbyterian principles, notwithstanding his officiating under a liberal government of a different persuasion—conduct we now allow to be not incompatible with integrity. His piety was ardent, and, amid a life of incessant activity, he managed to spare a larger portion of time for private devotion than many of more sequestered habits. He habitually lived near to God, and died in the full assurance of hope.

AFFLICTION OF THE JEWS.

Why are Judah's sons afflicted?

Why is Israel still a slave?

Has it not been long predicted

That the Lord would Zion save?

Why are Salem's walls forsaken,

Once the dwelling of the just?

Will her watchmen not awaken,

And arouse her slumbering dust?

Why do heathen, proud oppressors,

Rule her sons with iron hand?

Why are Gentiles now possessors

Of her long neglected land?

Go, and trace the sacred story,

There we read the awful cause,—

They have slain the Lord of Glory,—

They have trampled on his law.

Ask ye, now, why this affliction

Burst upon them like a flood?—

By Messiah's crucifixion,—

They are guilty of his blood.

THE WALDENSES OF PIEDMONT.

FROM THE REFORMATION TO THEIR BANISHMENT
IN 1687.

PART II.

THE Piedmontese were now to be assailed by the persecutor; and from 1601 to 1637, they were incessantly exposed to vexations, exactions, and persecutions; after which, a season of repose occurred for thirteen years. But in 1650, the violence of the gathered storm began to burst, in consequence of the establishment of a council at Turin for the propagation of the Romish faith and the extinction of heresy. Spies were sent by this tribunal into the peaceful valleys, to sow, if possible, dissension among the brethren—to allure the weak with bribes—to tempt young men with Popish brides—and to practise every method of fraud and allurement by which the cause of true religion might be weakened, and its adherents seduced. Violence was also added to artifice. Congregations were deprived of their pastors, and mothers were bereaved of their infants, who were to be reared up in the faith of Rome; and multitudes of both sexes, who were cited to appear before the judges of Turin, never returned to tell the dark secrets of their prison-house. But even these processes were of too mild and dilatory a character for their relentless enemies; and accordingly, in the month of January 1655, Andrew Gastaldo, a doctor of the civil law, and "Conservator General of the Holy Faith," published a tremendous decree, commonly known by the title of "the order of Gastaldo." In this manifesto, all persons, of whatever degree, in Lucerna, Lucernetta, San Giovanni, La Torre, Bubbiana, Fenile, Campiglione, Bricherasia, and San Secundo, were ordered to depart within three days after the proclamation, under pain of confiscation and death, unless they gave in their adhesion to the Romish Church. It was also enacted, that mass should be celebrated in all those places to which they were ordered by their sovereign to retire; and that death should be the penalty inflicted upon every person who molested the Popish missionaries by word or deed, or dissuaded any of their brethren from turning to the Church of Rome. To enhance the severity of this sentence of banishment, the inclemency of an Alpine winter was at the height; and when thousands of families forsook their homes, and wandered forth amidst a frozen, snow-covered desolation, their enemies broke into their houses, and plundered them of all they contained. And even this, too, was light, compared with the sufferings that followed. The soldiers who were sent to enforce the decree became frantic in their excesses, and torture and massacre in every form succeeded the milder inflictions of pillage. In one place, they tortured an hundred and fifty women and children—dashing out the brains of some against the rocks, and chopping off the heads of others. This was only one specimen among many; but the various and frightful modes of death that were devised by the tormentors for their victims, and which were inflicted in the light of day, were such as might have made the heavens tremble, or the sun go backward in his course. Will it be believed that, on some occasions, the rabid appetite of revenge among the persecutors could not be satiated without the banquet of the cannibal? We write no oratorical metaphor, but a literal and well-attested fact! The hunt was keen among the mountains, and there the fugitives could be tracked by the blood-stained snow that had been impressed by their lacerated feet. The amount of the slain in this persecution is estimated at more than six thousand—a fearful slaughter, when we take into account the comparative smallness of the population among whom it happened. We gladly hasten from such a hideous subject, to listen for relief to that prophet-like, eloquent voice, which was lifted up upon the occasion, and which will find an echo through all time, while it proclaims the glory of the martyrs, and the shame of their persecutors:—

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold;
E'en them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipp'd stocks and stones,
Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that roll'd
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their gore
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyr'd blood and ashes sow
O'er all th' Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundred-fold, who having learn'd thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian woe."

But a more formidable instrument than even the harp of Milton was wellnigh awakened upon this important occasion. The sword of Cromwell rattled in its sheath; but Savoy was beyond the reach of his arm. But what he could he did, and he did it with all his heart. He appointed a day of fasting and prayer, in behalf of the Protestants of Piedmont; he commenced a public subscription for their relief, and headed the list with a donation of two thousand pounds from his own purse; he wrote to the French King, and to the Protestant states of Europe, to interest them in behalf of the persecuted people; and he dispatched an envoy to the Duke of Savoy, requesting him to recall Gastaldo, and restore his exiled subjects to their homes. The very name of the Protector was enough at any time to throw Cardinal Mazarine, the premier of France, into an ague-fit of terror; and the court of Savoy, therefore, was not very likely to set it at nought. A smooth answer containing many promises was returned to Cromwell's application; but the influence of the Jesuits was strong at Turin, and to such men promises were only valuable as opportunities to show their adroitness in eluding them. Gastaldo was still continued in his odious office, and the exiles were not recalled. The affair was then taken up by the Swiss Cantons, which, from their neighbourhood to Savoy, could interfere with the prospect of success; and, in consequence of their application, a treaty was ratified, in which every concession was apparently granted, and the expatriated returned to their homes. But the treaty was clogged with so many restrictions, and filled with such numerous evasions, that it was nothing worth; and it was aptly termed by Cromwell himself, "a more concealed course of hostility under the disguise of peace." Again, therefore, he addressed letters to the King of France, and the evangelical Cantons of Switzerland in 1656. What might have been the result of these, it is impossible to conjecture, for in the latter part of the same year the Protector died, and in him the Piedmontese churches lost their strongest and most effective advocate. It is at this point that Sir Samuel Morland, whom Cromwell sent as his envoy to Piedmont, and whose history of these churches we have closely consulted in the foregoing account, takes leave of the subject, with the following mournful picture of the condition of the people:—"I am forced to leave them where I found them, among the potsherds, with sackcloth and ashes spread under them, and lifting up their voice with weeping, in the words of Job, when he was in the depth of his misery and anguish; 'Have pity on us, have pity on us, O ye our friends, for the hand of God hath touched us!' To this very hour they hunger and thirst, and are naked, and buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place. To this very day they labour under most heavy burdens, which are laid upon their shoulders by those rigid task-masters of the Church of Rome. To this very day the enemies of the truth plough, and make long furrows upon the backs of these poor creatures, by forbidding all manner of traffic, or commerce for their sustenance; by robbing them of their goods and estates; by driving them in a most savage manner from their ancient houses and habitations, and forcing them to sell their birth-right for a mess of pottage; by banishing their ministers, who are the shepherds of the flocks, that so the wolves may the better come in, and devour the sheep; by ravishing their young women and maidens, yea, by murdering many innocent souls as they pass along the highways about their private occasions; by cruel mockings and revilings; by continual menacings, and threats of another massacre, if possible, seven-fold more bloody than the former. What shall I say? those very valleys where they inhabit at this day are, by the indefatigable industry of their Popish adversaries, made no other than a prison or dungeon, to which the fort of La Torre serves as a door, where they may let in when they please a troop of murderers, utterly to destroy and exterminate these poor, silly wretches. To all this I must add, that notwithstanding all those large supplies which have been hitherto sent them either from England or foreign states, yet, so great is the number of those hungry creatures, and so grievous are the oppressions of their Popish enemies, who lie in wait to bereave them of whatsoever is given them, and snatch at every morsel of meat that goes into their mouths, that, verily, some of them are at this very day ready, ever and anon, to eat their own flesh for want of bread."

This miserable state of things continued till the year 1672, when a war broke out between the Duke of Savoy and the republic of Genoa, in which the latter enjoyed a career of splendid successes. In this crisis, the Protestants nobly belied the accusations of their maligners; for instead of joining the enemy, or even remaining neutral, they came forward of their own accord to the Duke's assistance. Their generous and gallant aid completely turned the scale; the Genoese were defeated in turn, and such was the gratitude of the Duke for their services, that in a letter of thanks which he addressed to the congregations of the valleys, he assured them of his continual gratitude and protection. The sovereign faithfully kept his promise, so that until his death, which happened A. D. 1675, the churches in Piedmont had rest and prosperity. Even after his death, also, his Duchess continued to protect them; but on the accession of Victor Amadeus II., the valleys were once more to be swept with desolation; and in 1686 a proclamation was published, ordering every Protestant church and chapel to be destroyed, and commanding every person professing the Protestant faith to abjure his creed within fifteen days, under penalty of death or banishment. All infants, also, born among them from that date, were to be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, under the penalty of their fathers being condemned to the galleys. The astonished victims remonstrated against this injustice, and their plea was aided by several of the Protestant states of Europe; but all was in vain; the Duke, incited by the King of France, proceeded to execute the merciless decree, upon which the unfortunate Protestants of Piedmont flew to arms in their own defence. Their numbers had been so wasted, that not more than 2500 could be mustered capable of military service; and yet this small band repeatedly defeated the united forces of France and Savoy that were sent to reduce them. But the conflict was too unequal to continue, and after a heroic struggle the men of the valleys were overborne, and almost buried under the numbers of the invaders, while their hamlets, and homes, and peaceful families, were visited with such atrocities, as could only be paralleled by those of 1655. More than three thousand perished on this occasion, by torture or the sword; fourteen thousand were imprisoned; and whole flocks of helpless children were torn from their parents, and carried away, to be educated in that creed against which their fathers had testified to the death. And such was the fate of those who were imprisoned, that they had good cause to envy the happier lot of their brave brethren who perished in the field, or even on the scuffold; for so great was the severity of their confinement, that at the end of six months, only three thousand survived. For this poor remnant supplications were poured in from the Protestant states, and Victor Amadeus did not dare to refuse, but his tender mercies released the captives in the middle of winter, and upon the condition, that they should banish themselves forthwith and for ever from Piedmont. Such was the command announced to a band of sufferers, sick, and attenuated almost to skeletons by imprisonment and horrible privations; and at five o'clock in the evening of the same day, they were obliged to commence a march of four or five hundred miles. The ground during that midnight pilgrimage was strewn with bodies, for at least an hundred and fifty had perished; and on the next morning, when the exiles saw a tempest gathering and darkening upon the summit of Mount Cenis, they implored the officer who superintended their expulsion to suffer them to halt, until it had passed away. But he was more merciless than the tempest, and he compelled them to march forward, in consequence of which eighty-six more were overwhelmed, and buried beneath the snow. The survivors at last reached Geneva; but many of them reached it only to die, exhausted by sickness and fatigue. Little more than two thousand thus reached the Swiss and Genevese territories, where they were received with Christian sympathy and hospitality by those who shared with them in the same light of the Gospel. Victor Amadeus had thus recklessly thrown away the brightest gem of his ducal coronet, at the suggestions of his blind guides and a merciless superstition; after which he proceeded to fill the depopulated valleys with Roman Catholic inhabitants, and to man the forts with French and Piedmontese soldiers. And now the triumph of the enemy was complete, for they thought they had rooted out heresy from the land for ever, and that the people who had cherished it were fallen beyond recovery. Fools, and blind!—they knew not that the scattered remnant would soon return with a terrible retribution, and would again raise up the fallen cause, which at present was broken and trodden under foot. But a deed so surpassing all human calculation, will be more fitly described in the eventful life of Henri Arnaud, that pious and intrepid champion whom Providence raised up, like a second Jephtha or Gideon, to accomplish so marvellous a work.

* The subscription amounted in a few days to £38,241, 1s 6d.—a magnificent amount, especially when we remember the superior value of such a sum in the seventeenth century.

JESUS SLEEPING IN THE STORM :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DANIEL BAGOT, B. D.,

Minister of St James's Episcopal Chapel, Edinburgh.

“ And when he was entered into a ship, his disciples followed him. And, behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, inasmuch that the ship was covered with the waves: but he was asleep,” &c.—
MATT. viii. 23-27.

THE eighth chapter of St Matthew's Gospel has been called the chapter of miracles; and a very slight perusal of it will show that this is a most appropriate designation. It relates some of the most amazing works of mercy and of power that were performed by the Saviour while he was on earth, and which prove that he was invested with ability, not only to heal those that were sick, but also to control the powers and principalities of darkness, and to regulate and command the inanimate elements of nature. Well may we exclaim with his disciples, on reading this portion of the history of Christ,—“ What manner of man is this !”

We propose, in dependence upon the divine blessing, to offer some practical reflections upon that portion of this chapter which relates the miracle of his calming the turbulence of the storm; and in doing so, shall proceed in our meditations from point to point, in the order in which they occur in the sacred history. May the Spirit of wisdom and of a sound mind guide us in these contemplations!

The first circumstance which naturally attracts our attention, is the situation in which the disciples are here represented to have been. They were in a boat, into which they had followed the Saviour. We are told, in the 18th verse, that Jesus had commanded them to prepare this vessel, which was probably an open fishing-boat with sails, in order that he might cross over the Sea of Tiberias to the opposite coast. How often does God, in his providence, lead his people to become the artificers of those very circumstances which afterwards give occasion to the trial of their faith! Yet the path of obedience, though it may lead to danger and to trial, will ultimately be found to be the path of safety. On this occasion the disciples had double proof of their being in the path of obedience, both in Jesus having directed them to prepare the boat, and in his having been the first to enter it himself. It is well for the Christian, when he finds himself involved in critical and perilous circumstances, to know that he has not recklessly brought himself into such a condition, by walking in a way of his own devising.

In the course of their voyage they are assailed by a storm,—“ And, behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, inasmuch that the ship was covered with the waves.” How mysterious are the ways of God! How differently does he frequently act from what human reason would prescribe! We might have thought that Jesus, who must have foreseen this storm, would not have led his people into danger; or, that when he had determined to sail over in the boat to the opposite land, he would have prevented the winds from rising, and secured for himself and his disciples a smooth and tranquil sea. But this is, in reality, the reasoning of unbelief. Whenever the Saviour brings his Church or his people into what they call danger, it is for the purpose of magnifying his love and his mercy towards them. How full of useful instruction to the afflicted Christian is this account of the disciples in the tempest! It presents him with a symbolic picture of the Christian's life, which is incessantly liable to storms:

for in the world he must have tribulation. It teaches him that even the presence of his Saviour does not afford security against trial, but that those who are the closest followers of Christ are even more liable to afflictions than others. It teaches him this consoling truth, that Jesus never commands his people to enter upon a course of duty where trials and disasters meet them, without accompanying them with his kind and gracious protection; for in the afflictions of his people he is afflicted, and the Angel of his presence saves them. He did not send the disciples to brave the dangers of so severe a tempest by themselves, whilst he remained, regardless of their safety, on the land; but he was the first to enter the boat. Who would not gladly welcome the tempest or the trial which affords occasion for receiving peculiar pledges of his Redeemer's mercy? for his mercy never appears in so strong a light as when it guards and comforts us in the midst of dangers, which we in ourselves have no power to avoid. Yes! the loving-kindness of Jesus, though always sweet to the believer, is most of all so in the hour of peril; nor do the soothing accents of his paternal mercy ever sound with so much melody, as when they are heard in contrast with the tumultuous waves of earthly trouble and distress!

The storm which took place on this occasion was probably excited by Satan, who is "the prince of the power of the air." He may have considered that this was a favourable opportunity for endeavouring to destroy, by one common ruin, the Saviour of the world and his chosen messengers of the Gospel, and thus to frustrate and extinguish that great enterprise of redeeming mercy which Jesus had come into the world to achieve. But how powerless is Satan, when he presumes to enter into conflict with the King of kings! One word from Him who is omnipotent to save is enough to crush his dark designs, and disappoint his best concerted plans.

Notwithstanding the terrific character of the storm by which the vessel was assailed, yet it is added,—and short though the sentence be, it should have occupied a distinct and separate verse,—“He was asleep.” This declaration affords a decisive proof of the reality of our blessed Saviour's physical nature,—that he was compassed with infirmities, and subject to all the sinless weaknesses of humanity. By some, likewise, it has been looked upon as a proof of the tranquillity of his conscience, and the holiness of his character. There is certainly nothing which excites and quickens inward accusations of guilt so powerfully as a storm at sea; but Jesus had no guilt to alarm him; he was holy, innocent, and pure; and he could have slept as soundly on the brink of hell, within the malignant glance of devils, as in some calm seclusion on the Mount of Olives, where angels would have watched his couch! Yet his sleep on this occasion was the sleep of real fatigue. Think of what had been his engagements on land. Seldom had his humanity been so occupied, within so short a space, as the visible and active instrument of exerting and displaying the energies of his Godhead. If our nature is so liable to exhaustion and fatigue, by even a short occupation in labours that rise not above the level of its own peculiar powers, how must “the man, Christ Jesus,” have felt the pressure of weariness, after having so intensely laboured in working out so many manifestations of the Godhead that dwelt within him. This is the only place in our Saviour's life in which it is said that he was asleep, and is just the very occasion on which we might have supposed that he should have remained awake. But Jesus sometimes sleeps in order to try the faith of his disciples, and to lead them to feel their constant need of his watchful care. He sometimes withdraws himself from his Church, so that they are led to exclaim, “Hath God forgotten to be gracious? hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?” The Christian, however, should feel assured that he can never be placed in any emergency in which the prayers that he addresses to his compassionate Saviour cannot obtain relief, although he may appear to have hid his countenance from him for a time.

We are next informed that the disciples, overwhelmed with fear on account of the danger by which they were surrounded, “came to Jesus and awoke him, saying, Lord save us; we perish.” Danger always impels those who have any belief in the power of God to prayer; and too many there are who never pray, except when they are under the influence of terror or alarm. Yet it is well, even then, to have recourse to the power and mercy of God, who will always attend to the petitions of those who cry to him, in humility and faith, for succour. The disciples were convinced of the danger in which they were, and sensible that they had no other resource to fly to, they appeal to Christ to save them. Thus do trials and temptations become a blessing, when they lead us to look unto Jesus, and say, “Lord save us.” Let every sinner learn from this to fly to Christ as the refuge that is set before him in the Gospel. He is equally accessible to every one that cometh unto him by faith, as he was to the disciples in the ship, and equally ready to exert his power for their deliverance. What the sinner wants, in order to excite him to appeal in prayer to Christ, is to feel his lost and perishing condition, for a conviction of his spiritual danger must lie at the foundation of prayer.

But observe how Jesus acted—“He saith unto them, why are ye fearful? O ye of little faith! Then he arose and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm.” Here we have an account of two addresses of Christ, delivered at the same time, but very different in their nature; the one, a mild remonstrance to his fearful disciples; the other, an irresistible command to the winds and the sea: the one full of condescending love, the other full of unbending power; the one evincing him to be the God of grace, the other proving that he is the God of nature. The address to his disciples takes precedence of the other, because he was anxious to show, as soon as possible, the groundlessness of their fears. They should have remembered who was in the boat with them, that it was he who had recently displayed such miraculous power in behalf of others, who was declared to be the beloved Son of God, over whose safety the angels were constantly and intently watching; and they should have reflected upon the many previous pledges which he had given them of his loving-kindness and tender mercy, all tending to show that he would never have led them into such danger as they apprehended. And though they saw Jesus asleep, yet they should have remembered that his Godhead nature neither "slumbereth nor sleepeth." In fact, they had no real ground for fear so long as Christ was with them, whether waking or sleeping; but such is the weakness of our sinful nature, that our faith is always liable to give way under the influence of any thing external that causes the slightest apprehension or alarm.

We have here an evidence that fear is always a proof of our having little faith. It is only when the Christian has that clear and strong faith in the protecting love of God which leads him to say—"God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble," that he can add—"therefore will we not fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." Both fear and little faith are caused by a want of sufficient persuasion of the Saviour's power. Satan is ever ready to take advantage of every external occurrence which may afford him a suitable opportunity for discharging the fiery darts of fear against the believer, but Faith is the shield with which these are to be repelled or quenched; it is therefore necessary that this shield should be, as it were, large enough to cover and protect the entire person.

We must, however, infer from the disciples having prayed to Christ for succour, that they had faith in his power. The deficiency of their faith lay in their not perceiving that he could have kept them as safely in the midst of the tempest, as by the removing of it. And what a beautiful exhibition does this scene present to us of the meekness and disinterested condescension of Jesus! He does not rebuke and censure his disciples for needlessly interrupting his repose, but mildly and affectionately expostulates with them for a want of that full confidence in his power, which would have contributed to their own sense of safety and peace of mind! Nor does his concern for their infirmities allow him to rest satisfied with a mere remonstrance as to the groundlessness of their alarm, but he puts forth his almighty energy to remove the storm, and tranquillize the sea. How frequently is the loving-kindness of God towards his children manifested in this way. When the storms of trial which are sent for their good, so terrify and alarm them, that under their pressure they almost make shipwreck of their faith, he withdraws them in mercy, because "he knoweth our frame; and remembereth that we are but dust." We should always, however, recollect that God is as able to save his people in the midst of trials, as by removing them. The prophet, exercising a fulness of faith in the power and mercy of God, was just as safe in the lions' den, as when he was liberated.

As soon as Jesus had mildly remonstrated with his disciples for their little faith, and for their fear, he rebuked the storm and the sea, and produced an instantaneous calm. This only required that he should speak, and it was done; for he who created all things possessed absolute power and authority over the works of his hands. Generally after a storm the sea rises and frets for a time, but in this instance the calm produced by the command of Christ was immediate and complete, and thus the miracle was the greater. Whenever Jesus removes a trial, he does so effectually. In the instance before us "a great tempest is" succeeded by "a great calm." Thus the consolations of his grace are proportioned to the previous distresses of his people. What must have been the feelings of the disciples in reference to the groundlessness of their fears, when they saw the tranquillity that ensued on the Saviour's uttering his voice; they must indeed have felt as many of the Lord's people have frequent occasion to feel, that the storm which leads them to see their own weakness, and their Redeemer's power, must have been intended for their good.

And observe the exclamation which they uttered under the influence of that wonder which so remarkable a miracle produced—The men marvelled, saying, "what manner of man is this;" or rather, "how great is this person, that even the winds and the sea obey him." This was the first miracle of the kind which they had ever witnessed. Hitherto the Saviour's power had been chiefly displayed in healing the sick, but in this instance he manifested his possession of authority over the elements of nature, and thus he showed himself to be nature's God. This exclamation came with peculiar force from the disciples, who had most of them been acquainted with the nature of storms and the dangers of the sea, but who had never seen a tempest so suddenly lulled before. The power which Christ had just displayed of controlling inanimate nature, which had no will with which to acquiesce in his commands, proved his possession of an ability of a much higher order than what they had ever witnessed before. It is an attribute of God to "still the noise of the seas, and the noise of their waves;" and, therefore, when Jesus exhibited these manifest indications of the Deity that dwelt within him, they naturally felt astonished and amazed. The more we see of Christ, the more shall we admire him, and exclaim, "how great is this person!"

What a striking illustration we have in this stupendous miracle, of the power which Christ employs in tranquillizing the agitations of a disturbed conscience. As soon as He, who is the Prince of peace, gives the word of command, so soon a peace which passeth all understanding ensues, and the soul of the sinner enjoys a calm, to which it had previously been a stranger. Thus, also, does he allay the turmoil of human affairs, and reduces into a state of quietness and repose, those commotions which are calculated to disturb the peace and prosperity of his Church. The raging of the sea, and the tumult of the people, are alike obedient to his omnipotent control.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. JOHN ADAM,
MINISTER OF FALKIRK.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

It is pleasant to recall the memory of the worthies of other days. Many of the best and the holiest men have gone down to the grave without leaving behind them, upon earth, any lasting traces of their existence, but their record is on high, and on the great day, their deeds of piety and benevolence, now forgotten here, shall be brought forward, in the sight of an assembled universe, as evidences of their love and devotedness to the Redeemer, and the joyful invitation shall be heard issuing from the throne of the Eternal, "Well done good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord." The benefits which they conferred upon their fellow-men may be forgotten by an ungrateful world, but, "God is not unrighteous to forget their work and labour of love," and they shall feel, throughout eternal ages, the truth of the Divine declarations, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me." "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

The devoted minister of Christ whose career we are about to sketch, is one of those who, in so far as man is concerned, has almost passed into oblivion. The traditions concerning him are dim and distant, but still enough may be discovered to convince us that he lived not in vain, but was instrumental, both as a Christian and a Christian minister, in diffusing the savour of the Lord Jesus all around him. In reference to his birth-place, parentage, and early history, we have been unable, after the most careful inquiries, to discover the slightest information. From a comparison of dates, however, it would appear that he had been born at a very early period of the last century. After having passed through the usual curriculum of study he was licensed to preach the Gospel, and from the information which has been obligingly furnished by Mr Wallace, the present excellent minister of Dalrymple in Ayrshire, it would appear that by the free election of the residing heritors, elders, and heads of families, Mr Adam was chosen minister of that parish. There is no mention of a presentation, but the records of the Kirk-session bear that, on the 8th September 1726, at a meeting appointed by the Presbytery to moderate in a call, the roll of the parish, first of the heritors, then of the elders being called, they declared, by vote, their election of Mr John Adam to be their minister; and the heads of families did, by their unanimous consent, declare their willingness thereto. A call was accordingly produced and signed by the meeting, and a committee appointed to present the same to the Presbytery of Ayr for their approbation and concurrence. The Presbytery offered no objections to this unanimous call of the people, and on the 15th February 1727, Mr Adam was ordained minister of Dalrymple. Mr John Fultoun, minister at Monkton, preached on the occasion from Matt. x. 16, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves."

The young minister of Dalrymple seems to have been much beloved by his people, but shortly after his induction into the parish a circumstance arose which gave him, no doubt, considerable uneasiness. The well known case of Professor Simpson, who was accused of heresy, being before the Church Courts, Mr Adam, at a meeting of Synod, had given his vote, in all probability, for the suspension of the heretical Professor. His conduct, in the matter, gave great offence to some of his people; and from the account given in the Kirk-session records of Dalrymple, it appears that two of the elders absented themselves from the meetings of Session for four months. They returned, however, in July 1739, after the process against Professor Simpson was settled by the General Assembly; and on resuming their seats in the Kirk-session, they were asked the cause of their absence. They appear to have declined making any reply, both at that and several subsequent meetings. At length, however, they assigned as an explanation of their conduct, "that they had taken offence at the part which the minister acted at the Presbytery, in relation to the process against Professor Simpson; but were now satisfied that their offence was groundless, being taken up upon hearsay, into which they had not duly inquired, and that they had been too rash and inconsiderate in their judgment, for which their sin, and the offence they thereby gave, they were heartily sorry, and resolved, through the grace of God, to be more circumspect and orderly in time coming."

Though nearly a century has elapsed since Mr Adam left the parish of Dalrymple, we are informed, by the present worthy incumbent, that "the name of Mr Adam is still held in affectionate remembrance." He was a faithful, diligent, and beloved pastor. A short time after he became minister of Dalrymple he was united in marriage to Janet, daughter of Mr Harry Osburn, minister of the Gospel at Tarbolton. The ceremony was celebrated at Hamilton by Mr Harry Adam, minister at Clackmannan. Whether the last-mentioned minister was a brother or a cousin, or indeed any near relative at all, to the subject of our present Sketch, we have failed to ascertain. The union thus formed was the source of a numerous family, amounting to no fewer than ten children. In 1740, however, it pleased the Almighty to visit the good man with a most distressing calamity. The small-pox having broke out in the family, five of them died within two months. On the 20th November 1740 their eldest son, and first-born, was cut off, at the interesting age of nine years and ten months; on the 5th December, their second daughter, at nearly two years of age; on the 26th December, their third son, in the seventh year of his age; on the 10th January 1741, their fourth son, in the fifth year of his age; and, on the 19th January, their fifth son, in his fourth year.

Such an overwhelming affliction must have made a deep impression on the bereaved and disconsolate parents. The hand of God was laid heavy upon them; but though they were called to mourn, they would, doubtless, "be still, and know that he was God." At this distant period nothing can be ascertained as to the exercise of their minds under this sore and sudden trial; but their pious friends hastened to mingle their tears with those of the weeping mourners. Among others, Mr Stevenson, an elder in the parish of Straiton, proprietor of Nether Barbeth, addressed to him a very beautiful letter of sympathy and condolence on the melancholy bereavement. Mr Stevenson's memory is still cherished in the parish where he resided, as that of a man of fervent piety and sterling worth. The letter alluded to, is uniformly to be found in the same tract with Mr Adam's "Dying Words," though it is obvious that, as Mr Stevenson died eleven years before Mr Adam, the dying experience must have been written by another individual,—probably by Dr Stevenson, a pious and eminent medical practitioner in Edinburgh at that time. The tract in question is rarely to be found, but we have been kindly favoured with a copy by our esteemed and respected friend, Mr Burns of Kileyth,—to whom, indeed, we are chiefly indebted for the materials of the present Sketch. We extract Mr Stevenson's letter to Mr Adam, on the death of his children, in its entire form:—

"REV. AND DEAR SIR,—I remember I was a stranger in the land of Egypt, and I know something of the heart of a stranger; I humbly, therefore, desire to cast in my small mite of Christian sympathy with you and your kind spouse, under that, no doubt, afflicting dispensation, the death of your dear children. You will readily grant that I have drunk deeper in that cup than you have yet done, having only, of seven pleasant children, one little girl left, having laid in their graves three sons and three daughters, all of them of an endearing age,—four of them between fifteen and twenty years of age. But the cup that our heavenly Father hath given us, shall we not drink it? That God who sets the solitary in families like a flock, and diminishes them at his pleasure, gave us children like to olive plants about our tables. How ready are we to say, in our prosperity, 'We shall not be moved, we shall die in our nests, our seed and offspring shall be powerful upon the earth, and be blessed among the generation of the upright,'—useful servants of their generation, and nourishers of our old age! But we have laid them in the grave, these lately pleasant bodies, to say to corruption, 'Thou art my father; and to the worms, My sister and brother:' and with them we have buried a great part of our worldly comforts, hopes, and projects. O what a dark veil death and the grave cast over all human glory! it cannot descend after them into the dust. There are kings and counsellors of the earth, who built desolate places for themselves; and princes, who filled their houses with gold and silver. 'There the wicked cease from troubling, there the weary be at rest, there the prisoners rest together,—they hear not the voice of the oppressor; the small and great are there.' We return from the grave to our houses: there, perhaps, we meet a 'Rachel, weeping for her children, refusing to be comforted, because they are not;' here, an empty cot; there, an empty bed. We sit down at our tables, these pleasant plants are amissing; the wind hath passed over these flowers, and they are gone; those beautiful lambs, that used to play through our houses and fields, and sweetly divert us with their familiar conversations and loving embraces, we see them no more,—death has taken them from our bosom; and no doubt, some fears as to their eternal state, and reflections as to our duty towards them, may complete this melancholy scene. But let us not dwell too much upon such like thoughts, lest a wounded spirit, like a sharp knife, cut the thin sheath of our frail bodies, and disable us, in body or mind, from our duty to God or man; but especially, let us beware of any hard thoughts of God, but still acknowledge that he is righteous, and that in faithfulness he hath afflicted us. Let us turn our complaints upon ourselves, and say,—'We have sinned, and what shall we do unto thee?' and, 'Wherein we have done foolishly, we will do so no more.' It becomes us to say, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away, and blessed be his name. Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and not evil also? Let him do as seemeth him good;' and, 'Good is the will of the Lord.' But we are called 'not to sorrow as those that have no hope;' and to the true Israelite, within the bonds of God's covenant, a brighter side of the land may appear, and we may justly 'rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.' Let us, then, enter into our closets, the proper place for giving vent to our lawful passions, and where, to my experience, I have found the greatest relief, and having offered up the sacrifice of a moderate sorrow and contrition, especially for sin, which brought death into the world, let us, upon the wings of faith, visit the heavenly glory, and with faith's eye see the blessedness of the dead in Christ from henceforth, and the good of God's chosen, and rejoice in their joy, and triumph with his inheritance. Let us then view our dead relations and children, concerning whom we have good grounds of hope, in the goodness of God to man, from all eternity chosen of the Father, redeemed by the Son, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit. Let us view them in the covenant promises,—'I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed;' in Christ's invitation to come to him, 'for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' Let us view them by us dedicated unto God, ingrafted into Christ, and sealed unto eternal life, by baptism. Let us view these olive plants, transplanted from the stormy, barren soil of this world, into the heavenly paradise, and flourishing in the courts of the new Jerusalem above. Let us view these pleasant lambs eating the fruit of the tree of life, and drinking of the water of the river of life, that flows from beneath the throne of God and of the Lamb. Let us view them in the bosom of the good Shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep, and 'carries the lambs in his bosom.' Let us view them in Abraham's bosom;—and why not in the bosom of their more immediate parents and relations, now in heaven? Let us view, not only their angels, who ministered to them here on earth, and carried their souls to glory, but even themselves, beholding the face of their heavenly Father, admiring and 'worshipping Him that sitteth upon the throne, and the Lamb for ever and ever,' and 'following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth,'—the virgins not polluted with the gross pollutions of this world, nor 'guile found in their mouth,' having their 'robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb.' Let us view them coming to judgment, their bodies spiritual, immortal, incorruptible, and 'made like unto Christ's glorious body,' joyfully reunited to their souls, 'satisfied with his likeness,' 'openly acknowledged and acquitted in the day of judgment, and made perfectly blessed in the full enjoyment of God to all eternity.' True, many of these descriptions of the heavenly glory are metaphorical, but so much the more does the wisdom and condescension of God appear, for how otherwise could we have any conceptions of these things in our present state and capacity, but that glory infinitely transcends all metaphors, and is a glory yet to be revealed, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.

But unbelief in the heart may be ready to object, that these are great and mysterious things, difficult to be believed and hoped for, by poor sinful mortals: true, they are great, but not too great to be the displays of the glory of God, and they confound all the mere natural, rational, and moral schemes in the world, and could never have been, as to a great part of them, known or believed, without that light and assistance of that Word and Spirit of God, that hath brought life and immortality to light, and is the Sun that enlightens the spiritual world. It is true, a great many of the invisible things of God are clearly manifested by the things that are seen, even his eternal power and Godhead, and that the light of nature and reason doth condemn the world for the want of a faith and practice suitable to the evidence it affords. But let not us, to whom God hath made light to arise, separate what God hath joined together, that is, his word and his works. Doth not his glorious perfections equally shine in both? Do they not reciprocally illustrate one another? And a wonderful analogy and likeness between the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace, teaches us many of the fundamental and difficult doctrines of our Christian faith; and have we not the resurrection of the dead taught us every morning we arise from sleep, and every spring when vegetative nature has been dead through the winter, and a great many animals and insects? Are we not taught the immortality of the soul, and its acting in a separate state, by our dreams? The spirit, in its imaginations, no doubt, runs through the universe, it hears, sees, feels, and exercises all the bodily senses; it grieves, loves, joys, and exercises all the faculties of the mind, when the body lies in a dead sleep, and all in such a manner, as our reason now no more can comprehend, than we can do that of a real separate state; and so of many other things. Is not all nature adapted to teach us God and spiritual things, and continually improved by the Divine oracles for that end; every employment, merchandise, husbandry, building, sowing, digging; every member of our bodies, hands, feet, eyes, do illustrate the Divine perfections and operations. But the mysteries of God's Word are to be admired and adored as well as those of his works, and reserved till the day-spring from on high arise upon us; and no doubt many of them will remain mysteries through all eternity. Let us bless God that we have necessary things to be believed and done, in order to salvation, so plain. Let us be far from doubting God's love, or receiving his grace in vain, that bringeth salvation, and hath appeared to all men, both Jews and Gentiles, teaching us to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, &c., and so keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our God in Jesus Christ, unto eternal life. I fear I have been too tedious, and darkened counsel by words without knowledge; but seeing our Lord commands us to comfort one another with these words, I have laid before you these few hints, hoping they will receive a favourable reception, construction, and correction, being offered by a willing mind, and according to what man hath. May the chief Comforter come unto you, and abide with you. May he bring meat out of the eater, and sweetness of this strong trial. May he bless you, your spouse, and remaining children; preserve, enable, and comfort you all in his service while here, and at last receive you into his heavenly glory. I am," &c.

The singular beauty and interest of this production will at once be recognised by every pious reader. A fine vein of rich thought and fervent devotion runs through it, which commend it to our esteem, as coming from the pen of one deeply learned in the school of Christ.

FOLLOWING CHRIST.

JESUS, my all, to heaven is gone,
He whom I place my hopes upon;
His track I see, and I'll pursue
The narrow way, till him I view.

The way the holy prophets went,
The road that leads from banishment;
The King's highway of holiness
I'll go; for all his paths are peace.

This is the way I long have sought,
And mourn'd because I found it not;
My grief, my burden, long has been,
Because I could not cease from sin.

The more I strove against its power,
I sinn'd and stumbled but the more;
Till late I heard my Saviour say,
"Come hither, soul, for I'm the way."

Lo, glad I come, and thou, dear Lord,
Shalt take me to thee as I am;
Nothing but sin I thee can give,
Nothing but love do I receive.

Now will I tell poor sinners round
What a dear Saviour I have found;
I'll point to thy redeeming blood,
And say,—“Behold the way to God!”

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Is any Man afflicted? let him pray.—Who doubteth but God did mitigate the heaviness of Joseph, although he sent not hasty deliverance in his long imprisonment; and that as he gave him favour in the sight of the jailer, so inwardly also he gave him consolation in spirit? Wherein he utterly repels the desire of the flesh, for the petition of the spirit always is, that we may attain to the true felicity, whereunto we must needs enter by tribulation and the final death, which the nature of man ever abhors, and therefore the flesh, under the cross, and at the sight of death, calls and thirsts for hasty deliverance. But God who alone knows what is expedient for us, sometimes prolongs the deliverance of his chosen, and sometimes permits them to drink, before the maturity of age, the bitter cup of bodily death, that thereby they may receive medicine and cure from all infirmity. For who doubts that John the Baptist desired to have seen the days of Jesus Christ more, and to have been longer in conversation with him? Or that Stephen would not have laboured more days in preaching Christ's Gospel, whom, nevertheless, he suffered speedily to taste of this general sentence? And, though we see therefore no apparent help to ourselves nor yet to others who are afflicted, let us not cease to call, thinking that our prayers are vain. For whatsoever come of our bodies, God shall give unspeakable comfort to the spirit, and shall turn all to our good beyond our own expectation.—JOHN KNOX.

Saving Faith.—Every other faith but that which apprehends Christ as a purifier, as well as our atonement and righteousness, is false and hypocritical.—ADAM.

The blessed effects of Christianity.—When subjected to the multifarious ills which flesh is heir to, what is there to uphold our spirit, but the discoveries and the prospects that are unfolded to us by revelation! What, for this purpose, can be compared with the belief, that every thing here below is under the management of infinite wisdom and goodness, and that there is an immortality of bliss awaiting us in another world? If this conviction be taken away, what is it that we can have recourse to, on which the mind may patiently and safely repose in the season of adversity? Where is the balm which I may apply with effect to my wounded heart, after I have rejected the aid of the Almighty Physician? Impose upon me whatever hardship you please; give me nothing but the bread of sorrow to eat; take from me the friends in whom I had placed my confidence; lay me in the cold hut of poverty, and on the thorny bed of disease; set death before me in all its terrors; do all this, only let me trust in my Saviour, and pillow my head on the bosom of Omnipotence, and I will fear no evil; I will rise superior to affliction; I will rejoice in my tribulation. But let infidelity interpose between God and my soul, and draw its impenetrable veil over a future state of existence, and limit all my trust to the creatures of a day, and all my expectations to a few years, as uncertain as they are short, and how shall I bear up, with fortitude or with cheerfulness, under the burden of distress? or where shall I find one drop of consolation to put into the bitter draught which has been given me to drink? I look over the whole range of this wilderness in which I dwell, but I see not one covert from the storm, nor one leaf for the healing of my soul, nor one cup of cold water to refresh me in the weariness and the faintness of my pilgrimage.—REV. DR THOMSON.

A MINISTER'S LETTER TO HIS PEOPLE.

By THE REV. WILLIAM REID,

Minister of Chapelshaws Parish, Dundee.

MY BELOVED FLOCK,—The objects of my unceasing care and of my prayers, for whom I ought to travail, as in birth, till Christ be formed in you the hope of glory,—these are indeed perilous times that we live in; “for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy; heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof,”—almost Christians. They say they have repented and believed in Christ, while their every-day practice gives the lie to such a statement. They know not that they are sinners, nor yet the emptiness of worldly things as a portion to the soul, nor the awful eternity of misery they are flying into, as fast as the wings of time can carry them, while in that state. But what do you more than others, my dear people? They at times read the Bible, say prayers, go to church, sit down at the Lord's table,—and what do you more than they? Do let your consciences give a faithful answer to these questions now put.

First, then, Have you in reality been born again? Has God taken away the hard and stony heart from you, and given you a new heart, and made you partakers of a holy and divine nature,—“renewed you in the whole man, after his own image, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness,”—thereby to know divine things savingly? Are your wills in some measure right with God's will,—your desires and affections holy, and going out after God, as the alone portion of your souls? If so, your souls will naturally move from sin to holiness, from creatures to God. There will be an eye to see spiritual objects, and an ear to hear God's voice in his Word, and a taste and relish for divine things,—yes, an hunger and thirst for them. This holy leaven of grace will leaven your whole souls. Christ, who now sees our hearts, and is in a very little time to be our Judge, says, “Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.” Are you born again?

Secondly, Have you been united to Christ, the living and glorified Head of his people, by the Holy Ghost? If so, Christ is yours, and you are his; he is your Head, and you are his members. You are one in spirit, one in law, and, in a measure, one in lot with him; but “he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit.” 1 Cor. vi. 17. He dwells in you, by his Word, and Spirit, and grace; and you in him, by living faith; and from this union there is daily communion with him, in all his offices, as Prophet, Priest, and King to his people. In his ordinances, and in all the procedure of his holy providence, he speaks to you; and you again to him by the prayer of faith; and you live in him, and on him, and for him. “Now, if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” “And if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: all old things have passed away, behold, all things are become new.” Rom. viii. 9; 2 Cor. v. 17. Oh! are these things so with you, or are you deceiving your own souls? Let your consciences, my dear people, faithfully answer this question.

Thirdly, Are you growing in all grace? “Those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God.” They grow in every grace “till they come to the stature of the fullness of perfect men in Christ.” So we read of “little children,” of “young men,” and of “fathers in Christ.” To which do you belong? or is it so that you belong to none of them? And if so, you are yet dead in sin, and belong to the family of the wicked One. Dreadful state, indeed! And “be sure your sins will find you out.”

And, Lastly, Do you, my dear brethren, as heads of families, pray much for and with your families? Are you training up your children for eternity, in “the nurture and admonition of the Lord,”—giving them an example of the life and power of vital godliness? If you do not now go with them and for them to the throne of grace, O how shall you meet them at the throne of judgment? O think on these things! and may Jehovah give you understanding. For “what shall it profit a man, though he should gain the whole world, and lose his soul?”

A WORD TO THE CHILDREN.

My dear little children, Christ says, “I love them that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me.” Seek you the Lord, then, while he may be found; call upon him while he is near. He says, “Suffer little children to come unto me, for my kingdom is made up of little children.” Christ says, “To-day to-day!” “If you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.” Satan says, “To-morrow, to-morrow! It is yet too soon to seek Christ!” Choose you, then, this day, which you will serve. Seek the new heart from Christ first, and then all other things will be added unto you. Be kind and dutiful to your parents. Daily read a portion of the Bible, with David's prayer,—“Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law!” and let it be every day a part of your prayer, “Lord, teach us to pray!” Let only such as know and love Christ be your companions. “Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy:” do not speak about worldly things,—seek not the vain pleasures of this world on that day. Be always, forenoon and afternoon, in the house of God; and in the evening, think over and pray over what you have heard. Christ says, “Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors. For whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord; but he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul. All they that hate me love death.” Prov. viii. 34-36.

And may “the great Shepherd of the sheep,” who “gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom,” draw you out of “the fearful pit and miry day" of a natural state, and "create in you the clean heart; and renew in you the right spirit," and thereby make you his now, "and you shall be his in that day when he maketh up his jewels." This, my beloved flock, is the earnest prayer of your souls' well-wisher and Pastor.

FAMILY MONITOR.

The minister of this parish is of opinion, that he cannot better, at this time, discharge the duty of family visitation, than by presenting to the heads of families under his pastoral oversight and charge, and for their serious and frequent consideration, the following extracts from the "Act and Recommendation concerning Ministerial Visitation of Families." General Assembly, 1788:—

In order that this duty may not be discharged "in a slight and overly manner," it was unanimously recommended, and is as a family monitor to all,—

"1. After the minister has got an account of the persons dwelling in the family, he may speak to them all in general of the necessity of regeneration, and the advantages of serious religion and godliness, of piety towards God, and justice and charity towards man.

"2. And next more particularly to the servants, of their duty to fear and serve God, and to be dutiful, faithful, and obedient servants, and of the promises made to such, commending to them the reading of the Scriptures as they can, and prayer in secret, and love and concord among themselves; and, in particular, a holy care of sanctifying the Lord's Day.

"3. The minister may apply his discourse to the children, as they are capable, with affectionate seriousness, showing them the advantage of knowing, loving, seeking, and serving God, and remembering their Creator and Redeemer in the days of their youth, and honouring their parents; and to mind them how they were dedicate to God in baptism; and when of age and fit, and after due instruction of the nature of the covenant of grace, and the seals thereof, to excite them to engage themselves personally to the Lord, and to desire, and prepare for, and take the first opportunity they can of partaking of the Lord's Supper; to be especially careful how they communicate at first, much depending thereon (and such of the servants as are young, are to be exhorted hereto in like manner); exciting them also to daily reading of the Scriptures, and to secret prayer, and sanctifying the Lord's Day.

"After the minister has spoken to servants and children, he should speak privately to the master and mistress of the family, about their personal duty toward God, and the care of their own souls' salvation, and their obligation to promote religion and the worship of God in their family, and to restrain and punish vice and encourage piety, and to be careful that they and their house serve the Lord and sanctify the Lord's Day; and, after this, it may be fit to exhort masters to take care that God be worshipped daily in the family by prayer and praise, and reading of the Scriptures.

"Secondly, Concerning the behaviour and conversation of the servants, and their duty towards God and man, and how they attend the worship of God in the family, how they attend the public worship on the Lord's Day, and how they behave after sermons, if any of them be piously inclined, if they make conscience of secret prayer, and reading the Scriptures.

"Thirdly, If there be catechizing and instructing the ignorant and weak, if due care be taken in educating the children, and particularly if they be put timely to school, and how they profit thereat, and how the Lord's Day is spent after sermons in the family, and in secret,—in all which, the minister may mix suitable directions, encouragements, and admonitions, as he shall see cause, and most for edification.

"5. It may be useful to inquire who have Bibles, and to encourage them who are able to get a Bible of their own, and to make diligent and religious use thereof, and to commend to parents and masters of families to have the Confession of Faith, Catechisms, and other good books, for instruction in faith and manners.

"6. Communicants may be excited to remember and pay their vows to the Lord.

"7. Seeing there is need for all this of much prudence, zeal for God, and love to souls, and affectionate seriousness, all this should be carried on with dependence on God, and fervent prayer to him, both before a minister set forth for such work, and with the visited, as there shall be access to, and opportunity for it."

ACT OF ASSEMBLY.

The General Assembly, after mature deliberation, doth approve the following Rules and Directions for cherishing piety, and preventing division and schism; doth appoint ministers and ruling elders in each congregation, to take special care that these directions be observed and followed: as likewise that Presbyteries and Provincial Synods inquire and make trial whether the said directions be duly observed in their bounds, and to reprove or censure, according to the quality of the offence, such as shall be found to be reprobable of censurable therein. And, to the end that these directions may not be rendered ineffectual and unprofitable among some, through the usual neglect of the very substance of the duty of family worship, the Assembly doth farther require and appoint ministers and ruling elders to make diligent search and inquiry, in the congregations committed to their charge respectively, whether there be among them any family or families which use to neglect this necessary duty; and if any such family be found, the head of the family is to be first admonished privately to amend his fault; and, in case of his continuing therein, he is to be gravely and sadly reprov'd by the session; after which reproof, if he be found still to neglect family worship, let him be, for his obstinacy in such an offence, suspended and debarred from the Lord's Supper, as being justly esteemed unworthy to communicate therein, till he amend.

DIRECTIONS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

1. And first, for secret worship. It is most necessary that every one apart, and by himself, be given to prayer and meditation, the unspeakable benefit whereof is best known to them who are exercised therein,—this being the mean whereby, in a special way, communion with God is entertained, and right preparation for all other duties obtained; and, therefore, it becometh not only pastors, within their several charges, to press persons of all sorts to perform this duty, morning and evening, and at other occasions, but also it is incumbent on the head of every family to have a care that both themselves, and all within their charge, be daily diligent herein.

2. The ordinary duties comprehended under the exercise of piety, which should be in families, when they are convened to that effect, are these.—First, prayer and praises performed with a special reference, as well to the public condition of the Kirk of God in this kingdom, as to the present case of the family, and every member thereof. Next, reading of the Scriptures, with catechizing in a plain way, that the understanding of the simpler may be the better enabled to profit under the public ordinances, and they made more capable to understand the Scriptures when they are read; together with godly conferences, tending to the edification of all the members in the most holy faith; as also admonition and rebuke, upon just reasons, from those who have authority in the family.

3. The Holy Scriptures should be read ordinarily in the family; and it is commendable, that thereafter they confer, and by way of conference make some good use of what hath been read and heard,—as, for example, if any sin be reproved in the Word read, use may be made thereof to make all the family circumspect and watchful against the same; or, if any judgment be threatened, or mentioned to have been inflicted, in that portion of Scripture which is read, use may be made to make all the family fear, lest the same or a worse judgment befall them, unless they beware of the sin that procured it; and, finally, if any duty be required or comfort held forth in a promise, use may be made to employ Christ for strength to enable them for doing the commanded duty, and to apply the offered comfort: In all which, the master of the family is to have the chief hand; and any member of the family may propose a question or doubt for solution.

4. The head of the family is to take care that none of the family be withdrawn from any part of family worship; and, seeing the ordinary performance of all the parts of family worship belong properly to the head of the family, the minister is to stir up such as are lazy, and train up such as are weak, to a fitness to these exercises.

5. On the Lord's Day, after every one of the family apart, and the whole family together, have sought the Lord, in whose hands the preparation of men's hearts is, to fit them for public worship, and to bless to them the public ordinances, the master of the family ought to take care that all within his charge repair to the public worship, that he and they may join with the rest of the congregation; and the public worship being finished, after prayer, he should take an account what they have heard, and thereafter to spend the rest of the time which they may spare in catechising, and in spiritual conferences upon the Word of God; or else, going apart, they ought to apply themselves to reading, meditation, and secret prayer, that they may confirm and increase their communion with God; and so the profit which they found in the public ordinances may be cherished and promised, and they more edified unto eternal life.

EXHORTATION.

Read often the 3d chapter of John, and the 2d and 6th chapters of the Ephesians. Keep in memory the "Shorter Catechism,"—an excellent summary of "What the Scriptures principally teach what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man." Willison's "Sacramental Catechism," Mead's "Almost Christian," and Guthrie's "Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ," are also earnestly recommended.

"And this is His commandment, That we should believe on the name of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment."—1 John iii. 23.

"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scriptures hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."—John vii. 37, 38.

"And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares: for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."—Luke xxi. 34-36.

"The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."—Numb. vi. 24-26.

"O, Sirs! it is no trifles or jesting matters that the Gospel speaks of. I must needs profess to you, that, when I have the most serious thoughts of these things myself, I am ready to marvel that such amazing matters do not overwhelm the souls of men—that the greatness of the subject doth not so overwhelm our understandings and affections as even to drive men beside themselves, but that God hath always somewhat allayed it by the distance,—much more that men should be so stupid as to make light of them. O, Lord! that men did but know what everlasting glory and everlasting torments are, would they then hear as they do? Would they read and think of these things as they do? I profess I have been ready to wonder when I have heard such weighty things delivered, how people can forbear crying out in the congregation,—much more, how can they rest till they have gone to their ministers, and learned what they should do to be saved, that this great business might be put out of doubt. O, that heaven and hell should work no more on men! O, that everlastingness should work no more! O, how can you forbear, when you are alone, to think with yourselves what it is to be everlastingly in joy or in torment! I wonder that such thoughts do not break your sleep, and that they come not in your mind when you are about your labour! I wonder how you can almost do any thing else!—How you can have any quietness in your minds!—How you can eat or drink, or rest, till you have got some ground of everlasting consolations! Is that a man or a corpse that is not affected with matters of this moment—that can be readier to sleep than to tremble, when he heareth how he must stand at the bar of God—that can follow his worldly business, and make nothing of the great business of salvation or damnation, and that when they know it is hard at hand? Truly, Sirs, when I think of the weight of the matter, I wonder at the very best of God's saints upon earth that they are no better, and do no more in so weighty a case. I wonder at those whom the world accounteth more holy than needs, and scorns for making too much ado, that they can put off Christ and their souls with so little—that they pour not out their souls in every supplication—that they are not more taken up with God—that their thoughts are not more serious in preparation for their account. I wonder that they are not a hundred times more strict in their lives—more laborious and unwearied in striving for the crown than they are."

My dear people,—It is the earnest desire of your minister, that you and yours may be saved by Jehovah Jesus with an everlasting salvation, and that you would read the above excellent directions at least once a-week, and especially upon the evenings of the Lord's Day. O! do retire to your closets—"Examine yourselves whether you be in the faith; prove your own selves; know you not your own selves, how that Jesus is in you, except ye be reprobates?" O! do think seriously on these three awful subjects—Death, Judgment, and Eternity. Where will you and your dear children be in less than ninety years after this? An eternal heaven, and, if not, an eternal hell, will receive every one of our immortal never-dying souls. O! then, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation? Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless; which is the earnest prayer of

THE PRETENSIONS OF MODERN INFIDELITY TESTED BY FACTS.

BY THE REV. J. G. LORIMER,

Minister of St David's Parish, Glasgow.

PART II.

THERE is still another pretension which we must shortly consider; and it is this,—That Infidelity conducts to human happiness and perfection. It is well known that there is a class of speculators, many of whom avow no hostility to Revelation, who dream that, by the spread of general knowledge, the improvement of arts and sciences, and well-poised political institutions, our race, apart from religion, may be conducted to a state of perfection and happiness on earth. Of course, this theory proceeds upon a denial of the most obvious truths of revelation, such as the depravity of man. It may, therefore, justly be called Infidel in its character, whether men are aware of it or not. Of the good which such influences as those to which we have referred may be able to work out for the race of man, we do not pretend to judge. It is very probable that in some respects they would improve his outward condition; but we hold that Infidelity, whatever character it may assume, is utterly inadequate to meet the circumstances and the wants of man, and therefore can never lead him to that happiness of which it boasts. We shall show that the most eminent Infidels, so far from being happy in their own minds, have been miserable; and that the only certain approximation which is made to happiness in this world, is through the medium of genuine Christianity. We have seen that Infidelity is neither the friend of knowledge nor the friend of freedom,—that its influence is hostile to both. It is obvious that this must stand very much in the way of that millennium of bliss of which it speaks. We have seen how selfish some of the most distinguished unbelievers were,—that they had no motives to be generous. Now, it is in the exercise of the more generous dispositions, those which point to the welfare of others, that our true happiness lies. So far, then, Infidelity leaves men strangers to abiding enjoyment; but let us refer to particular cases. The following is Voltaire's view of human life. Does it argue the presence of happiness? Does it point to the perfection of man?

"Who," says Voltaire, "can without horror consider the whole world as the empire of destruction? It abounds with wonders; it also abounds with victims. It is a vast field of carnage and contagion. Every species is without pity pursued and torn to pieces through the earth, and air, and water. In man there is more wretchedness than in all the other animals put together. He loves life, and yet he knows that he must die. If he enjoys transient good, he suffers various evils, and is at last devoured by worms. This knowledge is his fatal prerogative; other animals have it not. He spends the transient moments of his existence in diffusing the miseries which he suffers,—in cutting the throats of his fellow-creatures for pay,—in cheating and being cheated,—in serving that he might command,—and in repenting of all he does. The bulk of mankind are nothing more than a crowd of wretches, equally criminal and unfortunate; and the globe contains rather carcasses than men. I tremble at the review of the dreadful picture, to find that it contains a complaint against Providence itself,—and I WISH I HAD NEVER BEEN BORN."

What a contrast is this view of human life, to that entertained by Halyburton, an eminent professor of theology at St Andrews. He says,—

"I shall shortly get a very different sight of God from what I have ever had, and shall be made meet to praise him for ever. Oh! the thoughts of an incarnate Deity are sweet! Oh! how I wonder at myself, that I do not love him more!—that I do not admire him more! What a wonder that I can enjoy such composure under all my bodily pains, and in the view of death itself! What a mercy that, having the use of my reason, I can declare his goodness to my soul! I long for his salvation. I bless his name,—I have found him, and die rejoicing in him. O blessed be God that I was born! O that I was where he is! I have a father and mother, and ten brothers and sisters in heaven, and I shall be the eleventh. Oh! there is a telling in this providence, and I shall be telling it for ever! If there be such a glory in his conduct toward me now, what will it be to see the Lamb in the midst of the throne! BLESSED BE GOD THAT EVER I WAS BORN."

These are not peculiar cases. Turn to the experience of Hume. We do not refer to the affected merriment of his death-scene, and its real misery and awfulness, (a death-scene of infidelity which the nurse, who witnessed it, declared she would on no consideration attend again,) but to his own state of mind, as declared in his "Treatise on Human Nature," between thirty and forty years before his death, when he was in full health and vigour. He says,—“When I look abroad, I see on every side dispute, contradiction, anger, calumny, and detraction; when I turn my eye inward, I find nothing but doubt and ignorance. All the world conspires to oppose and contradict me; though such is my weakness, I feel my opinions loosen and fall off of themselves when unsupported by the approbation of others. Every step I take, is with hesitation, and every new reflection makes me dread an error and absurdity in my reasoning; for with what confidence can I enter on such bold enterprises, when, besides those numberless infirmities peculiar to myself, I find so many that are common to human nature? The intense view of manifold contradictions, the infirmities in human reason, have so worked upon my brain, that I am ready to reject all belief and reasoning, and can look upon no opinion even as more likely and more probable than another. Where am I, or what? From what causes do I derive my existence, and to what condition shall I return? Whose favour shall I court, and whose anger shall I dread? What beings surround me, and on whom have I any influence, or who have any influence on me? I am confounded by all these questions, and begin to fancy myself in the most deplorable condition imaginable: environed with the deepest darkness, and utterly deprived of the use of every member and faculty.”

It is unnecessary to remind the reader of the degraded life of Paine, or of his wretched death; but two sentences may be quoted from a letter of Franklin to his brother infidel, on reading in manuscript the "Age of Reason." This letter is little known, and unbelievers have denied its authority; but its genuineness has recently been established beyond all question. Franklin's remarks are: "I would advise you not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person." "If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it."

Here the sagacious but sceptical Franklin confesses infidelity to be a tiger, a description which the scenes of the first French revolution afterwards showed to be fearfully correct. He acknowledges also its inability to restrain wickedness. What prospect, then, does unbelief hold out of conducting to the perfection of our race?

The "Age of Reason" reminds us of the Goddess of Reason, the unhappy profligate young woman who, in France, consented to be publicly recognised as the personification of infidelity. Surely she should be a picture of happiness, an emblem of the glories of infidelity when universal. The following is the account of her, taken from the Paris papers of August 1, 1817:—

"Died, within these few days, in the hospital for pauper lunatics at Salpetriere, where she had lived unpitied and unknown for many years, the famous Theroigne de Mericourt, (the Goddess of Reason,) the most remarkable of the heroines of the revolution. She, who was taught publicly to blaspheme her Creator, and to dishonour her sex, (for she appeared in public nearly naked,) was for the last twenty years of her miserable life subject to the greatest of human calamities—the deprivation of reason. She repented very severely of her horrible crimes, and her few lucid intervals were filled up by the most heart-rending lamentations. She died at the age of fifty-seven."

Righteous was the moral retribution of heaven—the Goddess of Reason for twenty years bereft of reason!

We might quote the last words of the chief of the utilitarian school, Jeremy Bentham, who is said to have belonged to the same unhappy class of infidels. Shortly before his death, he said to one of his disciples who was watching over him, "I feel that I am dying; our care must be to minimize the pain. Do not let any of the servants come into the room, and keep away the youths; it will be distressing to them, and they can be of no service. Yet I must not be alone. You will remain with me, and you alone; and then we shall have reduced the pain to the least possible amount." Would the Christian, in such circumstances, say that the chief care was to diminish the pain, and to keep his family from him? Would it not rather be to glorify God by meekly bearing the appointed suffering? and would it not be his earnest desire to see his children, and to give them those counsels which, with the Divine blessing, might bring them to the same eternal blessedness which stretched out before him?

These illustrations, which might have been much enlarged, shall be concluded by noticing the case of Lord Byron, and contrasting it with the case of Henry Martyn, the late eminent Christian missionary to Persia. Both were men of first-rate talents and accomplishments, and both were called to the experience of the severest trials. The one was an infidel, the other was a decided Christian. Let us see their respective states of feeling. On the death of one of his early friends, Byron thus writes:—

"My friends fall around me, and I shall be left a lonely tree before I am withered. I have no resource but my own reflections; and they present no prospect here or hereafter, except the selfish satisfaction of surviving my betters. I am indeed most wretched."

On another occasion, he gives a more comprehensive view of the state of his mind:—

"Why, at the very height of desire and human happiness—worldly, amorous, ambitious, or even avaricious—does there mingle a certain sense of doubt and sorrow, a fear of what is to come, a doubt of what is? If it were not for hope, what would the future be? A hell! As for the past, what predominates in memory? Hopes baffled! From whatever place we commence, we know where it must all end; and yet what good is there in knowing it? It does not make men wiser or better. If I were to live my life over again, I do not know what I would change in my life unless it were for, not to have lived at all. All history and experience, and the rest, teach us that good and evil are pretty equally balanced in this existence, and that what is most to be desired is, an easy passage out of it. What can it give us but years? and these have little of good but their ending."

How different the feeling of Martyn! On receiving information of the death of one most dear to him, he says,—

"Can it be that she has been lying so many months in the cold grave? O, my gracious God, what should I do without thee! There is nothing in the world for which I could wish to live, except it may please God to appoint me some work to do. O thou incomprehensibly glorious Saviour, what hast thou done to alleviate the sorrows of life!"

On another occasion, he writes:—

"My life is of little consequence, whether I finish the Persian New Testament or not. I look back with pity on myself, when I attach so much importance to my life and labour. The more I see of my own works, I am the more ashamed of them; for coarseness and clumsiness mar all the works of man. I am sick when I look at the wisdom of man; but am relieved by reflecting that we have a city whose builder and maker is God. The least of his works is refreshing. A dried leaf, or a straw, makes me feel in good company; and complacency and admiration take the place of disgust. What a momentary duration is the life of man! Men pass away as soon as they begin to exist. Well, let the moments pass,—

'They wait us sooner o'er
This life's tempestuous sea:
Soon we shall reach the peaceful shore
Of bliss eternally.'

The last record from his dying hand was in these words—"I sat in the orchard, and thought with sweet comfort and peace of my God—in solitude my company, my Friend, my Comforter."

The examples given have been taken not from inferior men; but from the most noted of their class. Suppose that all men were Infidels, that society was entirely made up of such persons as Voltaire, Hume, Paine, and Byron, would its general happiness be advanced? should we be making an approximation to social perfection? Should we not rather be decidedly frustrating the hope of both? It is, comparatively speaking, the small number of Infidels, and their conformity to Christian usages and institutions where they do exist, which render them tolerable. On the other hand, suppose that true Christianity were universal, that the world were filled with such men as Halyburton or Martyn, who can doubt that the happiness of society would be greatly promoted?

It is vain to urge the unhappy and immoral lives, and wretched deaths of many professed Christians. These things will not prove infidelity to be the source either of personal or social happiness. The important point to mark is, that where Christians are wretched, as regards their comfort and hope, this is owing either to their not really being Christians, or to their falling far short of their rights and privileges as Christians. In no case is it owing to Christianity, but to the want of it. Whereas, in the case of unbelievers, their disquietude and wretchedness can be traced directly to their infidelity, and so it is justly held responsible for them.

While we have thus endeavoured to expose the false claims of modern infidelity to the character of the friend of knowledge, the friend of freedom, and the friend of social happiness, we have been indirectly recommending Christianity, by proving her to be the true friend of all these great interests. Let the reader consider that it is not enough to study and be satisfied with the evidences of the Divine authority of the Scriptures. A man may be convinced, from various external and other marks, that a letter has come from above, and yet be quite indifferent or hostile to the contents of that letter: He may receive the letter as from God, and still perish in his sins. It is indispensable that he receive the contents of the letter into his heart, so as to influence and regulate his life, as well as the outward letter into his hands; and this can be attained only through the grace of the Holy Spirit. By nature we are all Infidels, even those whose character is most respectable before men. Nay, we are strongly inclined to atheism. The fool, that is, the natural, the irreligious man, hath said in his heart, No God!—I wish there were no God! How is it that men can be delivered out of the guilt and misery of this condition? Obviously by nothing good or meritorious. Of their own, they have nothing of this kind to plead. They are aggravated sinners, and a single sin entails death. Blessed be God! a Divine remedy has been provided, and is proclaimed in the Bible. God's own Son has died as the surety and substitute of sinners; and now, whosoever, (no matter how guilty,) renouncing himself, ventures and rests his entire salvation on the Lord Jesus Christ, shall not perish; but have eternal life. This is the Gospel, the glad tidings of great joy which the Scriptures, from first to last, proclaim; and, received into the heart, they will draw all appropriate dispositions and tempers, and all needed blessings, consolations, and hopes along with them. Such has been the happy experience of multitudes in every age. Let every reader, then, remember that it is through the faith of the Gospel, as a message of mercy to his own soul as a sinner, applied by the Spirit, that he can alone attain to the most conclusive of all proofs that the Bible is Divine, even the proof of a personal experience, the proof of its marvellous adaptation to his circumstances and necessities, at once bestowing peace, and purity, and hope; and let him therefore pray to the Father of lights while he reads his Word. And let Christians not be contented to know the truth for themselves: let them be zealous and unwearied in spreading it abroad among others. The enemies of revelation are active; let not its friends be remiss. "Truth is great, and will prevail;" but in a fallen world it will only do so if appropriate means are perseveringly applied.

LINES

WRITTEN ON A SURVEY OF THE HEAVENS, IN THE MORNING, BEFORE DAYBREAK.

YE many-twinkling stars, who yet do hold
Your brilliant places in the sable vault
Of night's dominions!—Planets and central orbs
Of other systems; big as the burning sun
Which lights this nether globe, yet to our eye
Small as the glow-worm's lamp!—To you I raise
My lowly orisons, while, all bewildered,
My vision strays o'er your ethereal hosts;
Too vast, too boundless for our narrow mind,
Warped with low prejudices, to unfold
And sagely comprehend. Thence higher soaring,
Through ye I raise my solemn thoughts to him,
The mighty Founder of this wondrous maze,
The great Creator; him, who now sublime,
Wrapped in the solitary amplitude
Of boundless space, above the rolling spheres,
Sits on his silent throne, and meditates.
Th' angelic hosts, in their inferior heaven,
Hymn to the golden harps his praise sublime,
Repeating loud, "The Lord our God is great,"
In varied harmonies: the glorious sounds
Roll o'er the air serene. Th' Æolian spheres,
Harping along their viewless boundaries,
Catch the full note, and cry, "The Lord is great,"
Responding to the Seraphim. O'er all,
From orb to orb, to the remotest verge
Of the created world, the sound is borne,
Till the whole universe is full of him.

O! 'tis this heavenly harmony which now
In fancy strikes upon my listening ear,
And thrills my inmost soul. It bids me smile
On the vain world, and all its bustling cares,
And gives a shadowy glimpse of future bliss.
O! what is man, when at ambition's height,
What e'en are kings, when balanced in the scale
Of these stupendous worlds! Almighty God!
Thou, the dread Author of these wondrous works!
Say, canst thou cast on me, poor passing worm,
One look of kind benevolence?—Thou canst;
For thou art full of universal love,
And in thy boundless goodness wilt impart
Thy beams as well to me as to the proud,
The pageant insects of a glittering hour!

O! when reflecting on these truths sublime,
How insignificant do all the joys,
The gauds, and honours of the world appear!
How vain, ambition! Why has my wakeful lamp Outwatched the slow-paced night!—Why on the page,

The schoolman's laboured page, have I employed
The hours devoted by the world to rest,
And needful to recruit exhausted nature?
Say, can the voice of narrow fame repay
The loss of health?—or can the hope of glory
Lend a new throb unto my languid heart,
Cool, even now, my feverish aching brow,
Relume the fires of this deep-sunken eye,
Or paint new colours on this pallid cheek?
Say, foolish one, can that unbodied fame,
For which thou barterest health and happiness,
Say, can it soothe the slumbers of the grave—
Give a new zest to bliss, or chase the pangs
Of everlasting punishment condign?
Alas! how vain are mortal man's desires!
How fruitless his pursuits! Eternal God,
Guide thou my footsteps in the way of truth;
And oh, assist me so to live on earth,
That I may die in peace, and claim a place
In thy high dwelling. All but this is folly,
The vain illusions of deceitful life.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. JOHN ADAM,

MINISTER OF FALKIRK.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

SHORTLY after the bereavement to which we adverted in the First Part of this Article, Mr Adam was invited by a call from the parish of Falkirk, to leave his charge at Dalrymple. To this he was himself decidedly averse, and he joined with his people in resisting the transportation before the Presbytery of Ayr. Their resistance was for a time successful, the Presbytery having resolved to continue Mr Adam in his present charge. The parishioners of Falkirk, however, who had been for some years without a minister, carried the matter before the Commission of the General Assembly. Mr Harry Home, afterwards Lord Kames, appeared as counsel for the Earl of Kilmarnock, and other heritors of Falkirk, who prosecuted the translation. It was objected that the Commission could not take up the case, as it had not been before the Synod, but this was overruled without a vote. The case was then ably argued, and the Commission unanimously agreed to transport Mr Adam to Falkirk. On the 6th of May 1744, accordingly, he preached his farewell sermon at Dalrymple, from Acts xx. 32; having lectured in the forenoon on the preceding part of the same chapter. Between the time of his leaving Dalrymple, and settling at Falkirk, he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly. During the session of Assembly at which Mr Adam presided, the most important case was that of Mr Leechman, Professor of Divinity at Glasgow, who was accused of heresy on the subject of prayer. A committee was appointed to examine the sermon in which the alleged heresy was contained, and they having heard the explanations of the Professor were satisfied. The report of the Committee was sustained by the Assembly without a vote. That Mr Adam discharged the duties of Moderator to the entire satisfaction of the court, is obvious from the circumstance, that only four years after, he was again proposed to fill the chair, but the vote having been taken, the decision of the house was found to be in favour of Dr George Wishart, then one of the ministers of the Tron Church, Edinburgh.

From the Kirk-session records of Falkirk, we learn that Mr Adam was admitted and received minister of that parish, "unanimously by the heritors and elders," on Wednesday the 30th May 1744. We found no mention of a presentation when he was settled at Dalrymple. Neither do we find any allusion to a presentation in his settlement at Falkirk. The following is a detailed account of the proceedings on the latter occasion:—

"On October 26, 1743, there was given in to the Presbytery, 'a petition signed by the Right Hon. the Earl of Kilmarnock, the Right Hon. the Lords Napier and Boyd, and other heritors, and four elders in the parish of Falkirk, setting forth that the heritors, elders, and others concerned in calling of a minister seemed to be unanimously resolved to give a call to the Rev. Mr John Adam, minister of the Gospel at Dalrymple;' and craving the Presbytery to meet at Falkirk, to moderate in a call to him. The Presbytery resolved 'unanimously to proceed in the usual method for settling a minister in that parish;' and to show what 'the usual method' was, adjourned to meet at Falkirk on Nov. 23d, 'in order to moderate in a call for some fit person to be minister of the Gospel at Falkirk.' When they met, accordingly 'the Rev. Mr John Adam, minister at Dalrymple, was named to be put upon the leet, by the heritors and elders present; and it being proposed, that if any person had any other man in view, that he would be pleased to name him in order to his being put upon the leet, no other person was named;' so that Mr Adam was 'unanimously elected by all the heritors, elders, and heads of families present.'"

During his incumbency at Falkirk, a period extending to nearly thirteen years, Mr Adam seems to have been actively employed in the discharge of his parochial duties; but his attendance on the meetings of the Presbytery appears to have been rather infrequent, and he was generally absent from the half-yearly diets for prayer and privy censures. The following circumstance would require explanation:—At a Presbyterial visitation of Falkirk, it is represented by the member who was set to examine the Session records, and the eleemosynar's books, that large sums had been paid from the poor's fund for schoolmaster's salary, and repair of church and steeple. It is admitted by Mr Adam. The Presbytery record their high disapproval of this, and require the report to be put in writing by the visitor, and answered in writing by Mr Adam at next meeting. But the matter just drops out of sight, and we hear no more of it.

A curious thing, as to settlements, happened in Mr Adam's time. A Mr James Watson had been presented to Torphichen by Lord Torphichen, and called by a considerable number, but opposed by the majority. After two or three years' delay, the Presbytery were ordered by the Assembly to settle Mr Watson, on September 22, 1750. This order was intimated to them. Lord T.'s agent again brought it before them at their meeting on August 22d, Mr Adam being Moderator, who was enjoined as Moderator to preside at the ordination. The question was put to the members seriatim, whether they would go and execute this order. Five professed their willingness, one declined to answer the question; but the majority, with Mr Adam, declared themselves not clear in conscience to go; and so without coming to any finding at all, they quietly adjourn to October 3d. The matter was again brought before the Assembly, and Watson was settled at Torphichen, by a Committee of Assembly, in the absence of the Presbytery, on May 30, 1751.

Mr Adam was one of the leading men, on what has been usually termed the popular side of the Church; and Mr Morren, in his valuable work—"Annals of the General Assembly," states it as his opinion, that he (Mr Adam) had a principal share in drawing up the "Manifesto of the popular party," in the case of the forced settlement at Inverkeithing.

For some years before his death Mr Adam was in a declining state of health; and in the course of his illness, when he found that death was approaching, he preached to his people at Falkirk a farewell sermon, which was very solemn; and the congregation were in tears. He was much beloved and respected, so much so, that he was generally resorted to by his parishioners as arbiter in cases of disputes, and such was the awe in which they stood of him, that disorderly persons on the streets instantly dispersed at his approach.

The following account of the death-bed experience of this eminent man, we find in a tract, which, as we have already said, was probably drawn up by Dr Stevenson:—

"On Friday, 28th February 1754, I went to see the Rev. Mr Adam of Falkirk, who for some time past had been in a languishing way, and was generally thought to be dying. I found him somewhat better than what he had been for some weeks before, and the symptoms appeared more favourable, which gave yet some hopes of his recovery. After a hearty welcome, and the warmest expressions of kindness, he gave a sufficient account of the disease, and the hopes that were entertained of his getting the better of it: I expressed the sincerest joy for such comfortable hopes. I indeed thought his death, at this time, would be the most awful instance of divine displeasure, and almost an irreparable loss to the interest of religion amongst us. He, with a venerable composure and endearing smile, ornaments indeed peculiar to himself, cheerfully answered, 'It is all one to me whether I live or die. Since the beginning of this illness I have had such a sweet composure of mind, through the gracious communications of divine grace, that my will is entirely resigned to the will of God, being persuaded that it is best and wisest for me: and I could not for a world, if put to my choice, whether to live or die, as I would not know how to choose.' He repeated the expression of an eminent minister who when a-dying, upon a neighbouring minister's inquiring after his welfare, answered, 'I am not well, man.' But do you think you are dying? He answered, 'I care not whether or not; for one thing I know, if I die, I shall be with God; and if I live, God will be with me.' 'I see,' says Mr Adam, 'it is not only the privilege of believers humbly to plead, but their duty boldly to claim their interest in the Divine favour, asserting their title to the unsearchable riches of adorable grace, in the rich communications of gracious influences, and precious spiritual, and heavenly blessings. I bless God for his infinite distinguishing mercy and grace, in the rich communications of his love to my soul, since confined to this bed of languishing. I have felt more heavenly intercourse during this illness, than in most of my life hitherto; and, indeed, I have it to remark, to the praise of sovereign grace, that in all the afflictions I ever met with, either on myself or on my family, God has most graciously vouchsafed his favour, and made it the sweetest time of my life. I lie on this bed in perfect ease of body, neither sick nor pained, and in the most composed state of mind, entirely resigned to the Divine will as to life or death—every way as well pleased to die as to live. This indifference to live flows not from any peevish discontent with the world; I have had no reason to take the pet at it; no, I have had agreeable relations, and the most comfortable condition; and, indeed, a smile of Providence has attended me through my whole life: but a sense of the Divine love, and the joyful hopes of the glory to be revealed in the other world, quite reconcile my mind to death, and make me welcome the stroke. I see nothing terrible in the summons. My Redeemer has unstinged death, or the tyrant, and has changed his very nature, from a messenger of wrath to a messenger of peace, so that with the apostle I can triumph and say, 'O Death, where is thy sting! O Grave, where is thy victory!' Within these twelve months, my merciful God and Father in Christ has, in wonderful condescension, vouchsafed to me the light of his countenance, and shone upon the Word, by the influence of his Spirit, opening in a new and striking light the mysteries of his grace, in these adorable riches, and important and exact suitableness to the wants of my soul, and giving me such insight into the import of many places of Scripture, in which they are displayed in all their glories, that many times I have been overpowered with the sweetness, and amazed at the sovereignty of them. O adorable, rich, free grace! my alone plea, my sure hope, all my desire, and all my salvation! How unspeakably sweet have these Scriptures been to me since confined to this bed, Heb. vi. 14, connected with Heb. iv. 14! And, indeed, it is the very tendency and design of the whole dispensation of grace to raise the soul to the highest pitch of assurance, that it may have a strong consolation, and attain unto a firm unshaken confidence, and a special persuasion of the Divine favour and love. Why is trusting in God, and in the Redeemer, so often recommended in Scripture, but just this, a firm confidence and constant dependence on his grace promised in the Gospel, with a comfortable persuasion that it is all-sufficient, and shall certainly be bestowed for the purpose of securing the good work begun, and perfecting it in the heavenly glory hereafter. O how much do I feel the propriety and importance of the apostle's expression, 'Give all diligence to make your calling and election sure.' Nothing but an assured confidence in the Divine favour and grace can support the soul in the solemn and immediate views of appearing before the Judge of all; but it is precious faith that bears up the soul, and makes it triumph in the nearest prospect of grappling with the king of terrors. 'Thanks be unto God, who gives us the victory,' always 'through Jesus Christ our Lord.' A lively faith in the Son of God fully unfolds the meaning, and gives the best sensations, of these hopes and expectations, groans and desires of Christians, recorded 2 Cor. iv. 6-14, and such an hope, as an anchor of my soul, sure and steadfast, and enters into that within the veil. This confident hope of eternal life is very consistent with the deepest sense of my own unworthiness, sinfulness, and demerit; nay, the clearer and more affecting views I have of the sinfulness of my nature, and deceitfulness of my heart, the higher does my esteem rise of the unsearchable depths, sovereign freedom, and efficacy of divine grace. Though the old man be not wholly put off, yet 'the new man is renewed day by day.' 'He is faithful who hath promised.' I can trust in his word, and am sure of the happy accomplishment. It is indeed a high dishonour to God to be ever doubting of his grace. He has allowed 'strong consolation to those who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope which is set before us;' we should be content with nothing less, but look on this attainment as the highest point of our gracious communion with Christ; we may with boldness plead it as our due, in virtue of Christ's right, who hath purchased it for us. O what a glorious view is this! How full of strong consolations, above all thought and expressions! Christ hath not only made it our privilege, but our duty, to assert our interest in his love, with a holy boldness. I know not any thing that can yield such a ravishing pleasure to the soul, and that in the very arms of death, as this 'rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God.' This pleasure I felt, and this sweetness I have tasted, when delighting in this glorious plan of grace, in which the infinite excellences of God so brightly shine forth, as cannot be conceived or expressed by the minds or tongues of men or angels: indeed, the time that these have been employed has been delightful, above and beyond all power of language and thought. The amiable and triumphant death of my worthy brother, dear Mr Wardrop, left such an impression on my mind, that nothing can ever erase. I never saw such a heaven upon earth, nor indeed ever expect to see such a sight, till we meet before the throne. I cannot say with certainty what my God intends to do with me, as to the event of this wasting illness, but I have often thought since I turned bad, it looked very like as if he was to cut me off; for this reason, that in infinite condescension he has, by his Holy Spirit, for these twelve months past given me such clear views and sweet discoveries of the method of grace, and mystery of redemption, and opened up the Scriptures in a light I never saw them in before; so that I have been taught the truth, and discerned the depths of adorable love and grace, in many passages of Sacred Writ, that were in a manner hid from me before. And in confirmation of this, it is worthy to remark, that for some time past, the good man scarce ever, in praying or preaching, touched upon such particular subjects, but his heart swelled to such warmth and ardour, that the tears gushed from his eyes, so that he could scarcely speak. 'And under such saying and enlivening views, I have been enabled cordially and cheerfully to close with this glorious method of grace, as 'all my salvation, and all my desire.' In consequence of which, I have been 'filled with all joy and peace in believing,' and felt such a calm resignation to the Divine will, that I am content truly to be at his disposal, and to say in all things, 'Thy will be done.' No doubts now disquiet my mind, nor clouds darken my prospect,—a calm tranquillity, or serene peace, now fills my heart, and the comfortable hopes of a glorious immortality gladden my soul; and all this obtained in the way of believing, even by faith in the complete obedience, meritorious death, and prevalent intercession of my gracious Redeemer; from whence I have also derived the gracious operations of his Spirit, working in me these graces that will be perfected in glory;—I say, the frequent reviewing of this makes me think, that in his sovereign goodness and most undeserved love, he has been just lighting up these delightful views and prospects, as so many torches to light my faith through the dark vale. It is true, he may, in his sovereignty, allow me yet to be clouded; but one thing I am sure and certain of, if it should be so, the temptation must come from the devil, and I hope I shall be able to overcome it; for I am sure I have had such evidence of the Divine love, in the sweetest intercourse of late, that I can entertain no doubt, but what he has begun he will perfect in the day of Christ. This account of the frame of my mind, and my good hope through grace, I think it my duty to communicate to the praise of Divine grace, and as an evidence that God yet dwells with men upon earth. 'Come hear all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul." Thus far the transcript, to which such hints are added, and reflections made.
