MAN'S RELATION TO THE WORLDS OF MATTER AND SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. DAVID DICKSON, D.D.,

One of the Ministers of St Cuthbert's Parish, Edinburgh.

FROM what is stated in Scripture on the subject, we have every reason to believe that, of all the creatures of God, man alone is peculiarly connected both with this world and with the next; having his best interests united equally with the one as with the other. The thousand animated but irrational beings that roam or sport around us, have no existence beyond the period when their sentient life goes out; and all their enjoyments and interests perish for ever in the dust, to which their spirits no less than their bodies at that period descend. The angels—whether such of them as have retained their allegiance to their Creator, or those of them who "have not kept their first estate"—never had a habitation in the world in which we dwell; and, though created in time, from the moment of their creation they entered on a ceaseless eternity, unmarked, so far as we know, by any stated revolutions of years or ages. Our constitution, however, partakes of the quality of both these classes of beings. Like the inferior animals, we have sentient bodies; far surpassing theirs, indeed, in capacity and power, but still composed of the same material elements; subject to similar laws of disorganization or reproduction; and ready, like them, at the fiat of Him who breathed into our nostrils the breath of life, to return to the dust from which they originally sprang. Yet, like the angels, we possess an intellectual or spiritual nature also, endowed with the noblest faculties, capable of the sublimest contemplations, susceptible of the most exquisite pleasures or pains, formed to survive the dissolution not only of the mortal tabernacles in which they now reside, but of the whole material universe; and destined to exist in more than all their present capacities, and susceptibilities, and powers, throughout the circling periods of a changeless eternity.

It is this compound constitution of body and mind, accordingly, that forms the most distinguishing peculiarity both of our character and our condition. From it we receive our distinctive place in the scale of creation, as connecting dead and inactive matter with living and active spirit; presenting a continuous and unbroken chain of existences from the inert and motionless clod of the valley, up to the highest seraph who approaches nearest to the uncreated and infinite Parent and Ruler of them all: while, in consequence of the same constitution, we are personally and intimately related to both worlds, and have our most essential interests inseparably linked at once to the passing events of time, and the permanent arrangements of an eternal world.

But let us take a somewhat more detailed view of these facts, and think of the religious and moral influence which they ought to exert on our mind and conduct.

How admirable is the structure of our bodily frame, in all the variety of its parts and movements! The eye—how does it beam with intelligence, and bring into our mind increasing stores of delightful and varied information, alike interesting to our feelings and conducive to our happiness! The ear—how does it convey to us not only the sounds of alarm or of safety, the voice of affection, or the whispers of love, but the means of instruction for eternity as well as for time! Our senses of touch, and taste, and smell—how much do they also minister to our wants and our comforts; enabling us to enjoy the pressing hand of amity and friendship, to ward off danger, and to lay hold of support; imparting a double relish to the provision, whether richer or more homely, that nourishes or cheers us; giving us to inhale with delight the fragrant perfumes of the spring and summer, or the healthful air of the rising day, or warning us to avoid the atmosphere of the city or chamber, loaded with the poisonous vapours of disease and death! How wondrously delicate, besides, yet how wisely protected, must these organs and inlets of knowledge and enjoyment be, when the very slightest alteration in a single one of the ten thousand fibres and vessels of which they are composed, would in a moment derange them; either materially impeding, or weakening, or completely unhinging and destroying their functions. We are, indeed, as graciously preserved as we are "fearfully and wonderfully made."

Surely, then, they must be obstinately blind who can look on so goodly and admirable a fabric, and yet fail to recognise in it the workmanship of that all-wise and omnipotent Being who formed the heavens and created the earth, and who, as his own Word assures us, when he first raised the human frame out of the dust of the earth, called it not man, till he had breathed into it that living soul from heaven, which alone gives it the power of sensation, or the means of acting and being acted upon, as the instrument of an intelligent and immortal spirit. Nor, of all the wonders connected with this noble, though frail, vehicle of our intelligence and happiness, is that the least remarkable which is discovered in the undisputed control which our mind or will possesses over all its organs, when these are in a sound or healthy state. To every part of it, except what is wisely made independent of our will, we have only to say, "Do this," and it is done.

What an interesting and commanding object does this "human form divine" farther present, compared with the form of every other creature in this lower world! Combining every thing that is graceful and dignified, impressive and useful in almost every one of them, with a mind to which the instincts and sagacities of the whole of them scarcely approach nearer than the functions of the vegetable do to those of the animal tribes—a mind directing and governing it—investing it with not only a beauty but a power, to which hardly one of these have the least or most distant pretension—how does it raise its head towards the skies, while its foot treads on the earth, looking, and moving, and speaking, and acting, as the created lord and master of them all. This in itself, and viewed with reference to every thing beneath and around us, is indeed dignity and honour, and points us out as the first-born of God upon earth.

Yet, should we be proud of this distinction, or indulge in vanity when we think of it? Certainly not. We may, and we should, admire it as the workmanship of God; and in its whole combination of form, and structure, and capacities, we shall find, if we study these aright, new and continued causes both of venerating his wisdom, and praising his beneficence; but to be vain or proud of them, is to forget that we did not make or create ourselves; and it is equally to forget that our body, beauteous as it really is, no less than as it may appear to others, is still but animated matter, and that ere long it will sink into the bosom of the grave, and mix with its kindred elements.

Yes! it may and it should moderate the glorying of the weak-minded children of folly, who are vain of their outward form or beauty, to know and reflect that, separate from that soul or spirit which lives within them, and will never die, they have no pre-eminence above the beasts of the field, or the fowls of heaven. The substance of our bones and our flesh is the same with theirs. In a piece of marble, or even of chalk, there is, with but a very slight variation, the essence of the one; and the other is common to us with the lowest of the animals that move at our feet. We may learn a lesson of humiliation, therefore, in this respect, whenever we look at a bust of marble or of stucco, or even at the most disgusting of the beasts around us; for in regard to the elementary substances of which our bodies are composed, we partake of the same essential qualities, and are completely on a level with them both. Who, then, should boast of that which, when viewed in this light, is really so humiliating? And who should not anew adore the wisdom and power of that divine Artificer, who, out of the same original elements which enter into the structure of the most lifeless substance, or the meanest animal, has raised a form so noble and majestic as the body of man?

But take another step, and what becomes of this body? It is still, indeed, connected with the world of matter; but like it, is also passing away—stripped of all its beauty, stretched in utter helplessness in the arms of death, a loathsome carcass in the grave; inert and motionless as the clay by which it is surrounded, and with which it will soon be mixed; the prey of corruption, the food of worms, in a few years to be dissolved, and, so far as human eye could of itself perceive, to be as destitute of existence as if it had never been; undistinguished and undistinguishable from the dust or the soil in which it is decomposed, and apparently lost for ever. With the smiling infant, and the blooming youth—with the strength of manhood, and the charms that attract the gazer's eye in the opening or the maturity of life—with the brawny vigour of the sturdy peasant, and the delicate gracefulness of the most interesting fair—with the full and pampered body, and the fragile emaciated frame, whether in infancy, or youth, or manhood, or age—the result is the same, whenever the sentence of mortality goes forth against it, "Dust thou art, and to the dust thou shalt return."

And yet our body, though laid in the dust, is connected with the world to come; or rather, death may be regarded as dissolving our immediate connection with matter and time, for the very purpose of bringing us into a nearer connection with spirit and eternity.

It is true, that the very same bodies, as to the precise form and condition in which they were when laid in the tomb, will reappear no more; and perhaps the same elements which enter into their constitution now may never enter into them again; nevertheless, that the dead will be raised, when "the heavens and the earth are dissolved, in the great and terrible day of the Lord," is a fact which none will dispute who give credit to the Word of infallible Truth. There it is affirmed in language the most explicit and definite; and there also its certainty is attested by facts, the admission of which adds the demonstration of reality, as it were, to the truth which that language declares. Yes! "As Jesus died and rose again, so those also who fall asleep in Jesus, God will bring with him." Nay, "all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of man, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation."

Personal identity is not dependent on the identical sameness of the material particles of which our bodies are composed. There is no physical fact, indeed, more indisputable than this, that scarcely a single particle of matter is to be found in them now, that entered into their composition a few years ago; and yet, we have the most perfect conviction and consciousness that we are the identical persons who then thought, and moved, and acted in those very bodies, of which hardly an element remains exactly as it then was. So will it be with our resurrection bodies. They will be adapted to the spiritual, as those which we at present possess are to the material world. They will be fitted, if we "die in the Lord," for the noblest and purest services, and the most exquisite and transporting enjoyments, never to be subject to pain, or disease, or weariness any more; and to experience no change for ever, but that of increasing activity, and vigour, and pleasure, while eternity endures. "It is sown in weakness," says the apostle, "but it is raised in power. It is sown a natural," or material and earthly "body; but it is raised a spiritual," or heavenly "body."

But, ah! if men have lived to themselves and the world, and not unto God and Christ, and if death shall find them in this wretched and hopeless condition, their bodies will not, on that account, be the last tenements which their immortal spirits shall occupy. Their bodies also will be raised or reproduced at the resurrection, but only to their shame and dishonour—to have a new capacity of sustaining the most unutterable pain infused into them—to be made vessels of wrath, fit for enduring everlasting punishment—to have no remission from suffering, and no possibility of being annihilated, but to be tormented without end, "in the lake of fire, with the devil and his angels."

What an important, what a fearful, what an impressive, connection, then, have even our bodies as the instruments of present feeling and action, with the world to come, as well as with that which now is—with eternity no less than with time! "The world passeth away," and every thing peculiar to it will one day perish; and we, too, pass away—but, unlike it, our existence is permanent and imperishable, though we must soon go down like our fathers to the silence of the grave.

Wondrous and admirable, however, as is the constitution of our body, that of our mind surpasses it far. Without this spiritual principle, as has been already hinted, our bodies would be merely lifeless statues; or rather, they would not exist at all. We might have existed, besides, as intelligent and moral beings, although we had had no such bodies as our present ones; but without them we could not have been peculiarly connected with a present world. It is this spiritual portion of our nature, accordingly, that most immediately and essentially connects us with the world of spirits. It is this that especially assimilates our nature to that not of angels only, but of God himself.

And, with what astonishing capacities and powers is it endowed! It is not our material organs of sight, and hearing, and other senses, but our mind, that sees, and hears, and feels, and perceives by means of them. How acute and distinct are its sensations!—how accurate and minute its perceptions!—how important, and interesting, and invaluable, its faculties of memory, and imagination, and judgment or reasoning!—while conscience sits at the helm, and, like the deputy of Heaven within us, reminds us of the relation in which we stand to the God who made, and preserves, and hereafter will judge us. With what inconceivable rapidity, too, can we dart, in thought, from one region of the universe to another; look back to the period when creation was unknown, and forward to the era when redemption shall be completed; rise from the earth on which we tread, to the heaven of heavens, which no mortal sight can penetrate; place ourselves immediately as in the very presence of Him who filleth all in all, and, while yet confined to our tabernacles of clay, hold spiritual and purifying fellowship with him, in all the glories and interests of his transcendent, though at present only mentally contemplated and realized character, as not only the Father of our spirits, but the God of our salvation! How susceptible, also, of culture—how continually acquiring new accessions of ideas—how capable of ever-increasing expansion and enjoyment—are these heaven-born and heaven-aspiring faculties!

And should not all this teach, as it certainly tells us, that we were formed for far more exalted purposes than merely to hold converse with the material universe, to rest our happiness on the things of sense and time, to toil through life in the acquisition of intellectual knowledge only, in providing for the support of our animal existence, or in seeking our highest satisfactions in the society of men around us, in the delights of friendship, or even the endearments of love; and then to lose for ever, in the forgetfulness and inactivity of the grave, into which our bodies shall descend, every remembrance of the past, and consciousness of the present, and anticipation of the future?

The very mind which we thus possess will not allow us to believe that we have nothing else to do, as the creatures of God, than to "eat and drink, because to-morrow we shall die." On the very contrary, it irresistibly forces on us not only the conviction, but the consciousness, that the enjoyments of sense were never designed to satisfy the spiritual and noblest part of our nature; and that the spirit that is within us, stretching forward as it does, involuntarily and irrepressibly, towards an eternal world, was never intended to be confined to the limits of time, or to any, or even all, the events and enjoyments within them. We feel, that when our eyes shall be closed by death, on all that now engages our affections, our anxieties, and our pursuits, we shall still survive as conscious beings, enter on a new scene of real, though till then untried existence, and be either supremely happy or inconceivably miserable there: and revelation gives infallible certainty to this testimony of our mind to its own immortality; unequivocally declaring, that when our body returns to the dust as it was, our "spirit shall return unto God who gave it." "What," says the Apostle James, "is our life? It is even as a vapour; which appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." But though it disappears from under the visible horizon, flitting as a shadow, and scarcely leaving a vestige behind it, its substance, though concealed from the eye of sense, is neither destroyed nor lost. It lives, when the animation of the body is gone—it lives after death in the state of separate spirits; and when the resurrection comes, it will be reunited to such a body as will not be another's, but its own—constituting in this union the self-same and entire person that had lived, and felt, and acted in this world, and rendered altogether incapable of being disjoined or separated any more.

And surely there is much in these views of our relation to the world of spirits, that is fitted to arouse and impress us. Not to speak particularly of our character and condition as sinners, and of the relation which, in this aspect, we bear to God and eternity—is there nothing in our connection simply as the creatures of God, with another, a spiritual and everlasting world, that should awaken solicitude, and induce preparation for eternity? Can the deceitfulness of our heart be so deep, as that we shall be tempted by it really to believe, that our best interests are secured when we have obtained the means of present subsistence or enjoyment only, though the state of our minds be altogether unattended to, and futurity is not permitted, except on a few unavoidable occasions, to occupy our thoughts? Is it possible that we can satisfy ourselves with a few transient reflections on the uncertainty of time, and of all its objects and possessions, while we are still cleaving to these as our portion; or with an unimpressive persuasion of the immortality to which we are destined, while we are habitually living as if we were to have no existence beyond the grave? Can we do this, and yet delude ourselves with the belief, or even the hope, that all will be well with us when our present life has closed? or is it possible, that if we think not of God now, we can be prepared for entering his presence hereafter? that if we are insensible to his mercies, and unalarmed by his judgments, in this world, we can reasonably anticipate the experience of his favour, or even protection from his justice, in the world to come? or, that if we neglect the duties to him, to our neighbours, or to ourselves, which we know and feel to be binding on us, as his creatures and subjects, we can look forward without trembling and dismay to the moment when our deeds, whatever they have been, shall follow us into an eternal world?

If our body is the instrument of sin, it is only because it receives its impulse from our mind, of whose desires and passions it is the organ and the agent; and if our mind is at enmity with God, and his law and will, can death, should it summon us hence while this is our condition and character, be the signal of our release from the accusations of conscience, and the fear of an avenging Judge? Oh no!—it will only introduce the ungodly spirit into that state of everlasting retribution, where "the mercies of God are clean gone," and where "he will be favourable no more" for ever.

What, then, should our concern and solicitude now be, but, as taught by that Gospel of the grace of God, which alone publishes salvation and hope to our fallen world, to receive and believe its record as the record of heavenly and saving truth; by faith to lay hold of Christ, who is "the true God and eternal life;" in reliance on his grace, to sit loose to the enjoyments, while we resist the temptations, and conscientiously fulfil the duties of the present state; and to be labouring, with unremitting earnestness, to have our conversation in heaven, whence we also look for the Saviour;—that when this earthly house of our tabernacle is dissolved, we may indeed have a "building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

It is in the order of nature, and the declared appointment of God, that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

A FEW PASSING REFLECTIONS SUITED TO THE SEASON.

BY CHARLES MOIR, ESQ.

"Time flies: it is his melancholy task
To bring, and bear away, delusive hopes,
And reproduce the troubles he destroys;
But while his blindness thus is occupied,
Dismissing mortal I do thou serve the will
Of Time's eternal Master, and that peace,
Which the world wants, shall be for thee confirmed."
WOODSWORTH.

THERE are no reflections in this world so pleasant, and at the same time so profitable, as those which carry our thoughts beyond it. With this earth we associate only those things which speak of change and decay; with the other, all that is changeless and eternal. In this world we are continually reminded—by the lapse of time, by the marks of decay in the natural objects around us, by the death of friends, of the instability of earthly things, and how small the dependence which must be placed on all that meets us here. When the eye of faith, however, travels beyond the boundary that marks the seen from the unseen world, the mind, filled with the contemplation of its lasting enjoyments, and picturing to itself how surpassingly beautiful "the green pastures and still waters" of that fair country must be—which no revolution of seasons can affect, or the ravages of time mar its loveliness—the heart longs to throw off the load of care that oppresses it, and to be within its blessed precincts, and at rest. Such a desirable consummation, however, can only be attained by those who in this world have fought the good fight, and unscathed by temptation and trial, have kept the faith. For surely, if heaven is so desirable, it is worth all we can give up for it here.

The close of the old and the commencement of a new year is well suited for a reflection such as this. Another long period of time has passed over our heads. We have advanced one stage more on the journey of life. We look back on the year that is gone, and wonder how short it appears to us, and how fast it has sped into the past. It did not strike us, as its days, weeks, and months passed on, how soon it must come to an end. Truly, we did not mark

"How slowly, and how silently, Time Floats on his starry journey!"

The present was all to us; the past was for the time forgotten. But when we arrive at a resting-place, such as a season like this presents to us, we begin to meditate on the rapid march of time, and our own nearer proximity to the long night of the grave. More serious thoughts and duties, and better suited to our condition here than a short while before appeared necessary, may occur to us as unavoidable for the future, as we begin to scan the progress of the past year, what it has done for us, and how we have improved it.

When we sit down in the morning of the first day of the year, after we have pondered for a time over the Sacred Volume, for thus have we ever been accustomed to usher in that day, we naturally first turn our thoughts to the long period of time that has again gone over us, and how thankful we ought to be for the blessing of health of mind and body, with which we are graciously permitted to enter once more upon the duties of life. We then trace the principal events that have distinguished the season that has closed upon us; how many new friendships we have formed, and of these the past year has not been found wanting. Were these pages fitted for the theme, we could tell of friendships formed that we could wish and hope will only close with death. Yes; it may be our peculiar lot sometimes to meet with those whose amiability of character, whose frankness of manner, whose openness and warmth of heart, whose retiring and pious dispositions, will win our friendship more completely and unreservedly in a few weeks or months, and gain a more firm hold of our affections, than those who have been our close companions for years. These friendships were such; and, for the sake of those circumstances out of which they sprung, the past year must be ever dear to us.

From these, the forming of new attachments, we naturally recur to those ties that have been severed—the friends and companions we have lost. Every year adds to their numbers. Death is ever busy. It is chilling to the heart to think of those who, but a few months ago, were perhaps enjoying high health, and looking forward to a long career of usefulness, untimely cut down in the prime of their days; yet how many of us have to mourn such bereavements. How many at this season will recall some lost beloved form, as the merry group gathers round the Christmas hearth; and the tear will moisten the eye as the recollection recurs, that at a time of rejoicing such as this he was never found absent till now. But that reflection, sad though it may appear to be, and seemingly at variance with the happiness around, should the remembrance be associated with the recollection of piety and worth, will chasten, but not subdue, the heart. The memory of the good has nothing in common with sadness and despondency. We feel that the friend we loved is lost only for a season; we know that he is happy, and why should we grieve? We would not, if we could, recall him. This earth, we are certain, would be no fitting habitation for one who had passed into the skies, and tasted of the joys of heaven. Our hope and consolation must be in this, we have parted but for a time to meet again,—

"And though on earth the tear may start,
And darksome days be given,
Yet bliss awaits the holy heart,
When friends rejoin in heaven;
Where streams of joy glide ever on,
Around the Lord's eternal throne."

Such are a few of the reflections that this season is calculated to awaken. But there are others of a higher and more momentous nature, that should possess us at this time. How has the past year been spent? Have we, during its progress, been perfecting ourselves for the great change, that must one day, sooner or later, come over us, as it has done over those friends who have gone before? Are we wiser and better than when the year opened on us? This is a retrospect which, however painful to him who has frittered away and mispent the time that cannot be recalled, may yet be so far found useful as it teaches him to reflect, how foolish such conduct has been, and how much reason there is for all of us so to conduct ourselves, that there may be no matter for self-reproach left when we come to die. Let us only consider how frail a creature man is; how short his term of existence here, and will it not be matter of wonder, indeed, how any one dares to mispend the time we cannot call our own?

"Man's uncertain life
Is like a rain-drop hanging on the bough,
Amongst ten thousand of its sparkling kindred,
The remnants of some passing thunder shower,
Which have their moments, dropping one by one,
And which shall soonest lose its perilous hold
We cannot guess."

Such a thought may well form serious matter for reflection, in the most careless mind. Youth, health, or strength will not avail against the approach of death. The church-yard chronicles tell of the close of childhood's brief career; of youth cut down in its prime; of manhood yielding to the destroyer, as well as of the gathering of the grey hairs of the aged to the grave,

"Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O, Death!
Day is for mortal care,
Eve for glad meetings round the joyous hearth,
Night for the dreams of sleep, the voice of prayer,
But all for thee, thou Mightiest of the earth!"

As nothing can teach us when to look for death, it is but wise and prudent to be always prepared for its approach.

According then as the past year has been to us a season over which we have reason to rejoice or to grieve, so let us be moved to frame our resolutions for the future. Although no season is unsuited to this, yet of all others, the commencement of a new year is well fitted to begin the work of self-improvement, should we have fallen back, or loitered in the path of duty. Since time will still roll on, whether we are improving ourselves in heavenly things, or are culpably neglectful of our duty, let us be wise, and forgetting the trials of earth, aspire to the joys of heaven, always mindful of this, that "Time is the season fair of living well,

The path to glory, or the road to hell."

PSALM LXXX.

IMITATED FROM BUCHANAN.

[The following version of the 80th Psalm, is extracted from the "Edinburgh Literary Album," a work which contains a number of beautiful pieces, both in prose and verse.]*

GREAT Shepherd Thou of Israel's chosen race,
Who like a flock hast led them forth with care,
Whose glory shadowed the holy place,
When thou, in answer to thy people's prayer,
Gav'st out bright tokens of thy presence there :
O manifest that glory as of old ;
Cause them to see the brightness of thy face ;
Do thou thy power and majesty unfold,
And with thine out-stretched hand the bowed down uphold.

Oh that thou wouldst, in thy paternal love,
Cause on us now the light of life to shine,
Regard thy chosen ones from heaven above,
And give assurance that they still are thine !
Lord God Omnipotent ! doth wrath divine
Against us still unmitigated burn ?
Wilt thou no more a pitying ear incline,
Nor to thy flock with wonted favour turn,
But all their humble prayers in anger seem to spurn ?

Thou hast to us the bread of sorrow given ;
Tears is our bitter portion, day by day ;
And as we seem forsaken now of Heaven,
The Gentiles round have made of us a prey :
Our foes triumphantly the strife survey,
While they divide the spoil. Now, now arise !
To us the brightness of thy face display—
Thou who sendest out the armies of the skies,
And recompense at length thy people's injuries !

Lord, it was Thou that broughtest up a vine
From out of Egypt, and, with tender care,
Mad'st room before it ;—for thy hand divine
For the loved sapling did the soil prepare,
Nor Thou a single heathen branch wouldst spare,
But of their roots corrupt mad'st clear the ground,
Forthwith thy chosen vine implanted there,
For rich increase, a genial climate found ;
And its luxuriant shade soon filled the land around.

Yea, o'er the mountain tops it raised its head ;
Its boughs like stately cedar trees ascend ;
Far as the ocean's shore its branches spread,
And to Euphrates its young shoots extend.
But He who planted censureth to defend ;
Her hedges are broken down, and torn away—
Why wilt Thou, Lord, no more thy succour lend ?
Why leave unfenced thy cherished vine a prey,
That every vagrant band may it in ruins lay ?

* Edinburgh : Blackwood, 1840.

The wild boar tramples down and lays it waste ;
The wild fowl revel on its vintage fair ;
Each savage from the wood, in reckless haste,
Comes with destructive rage that will not spare ;
And dost Thou still, Almighty Lord, forbear ?
Let pity move Thee to look down once more
Thy solitary vineyard to repair !
Oh, grant what we so earnestly implore :
Behold the vine Thou rear'dst, and lov'dst so well before !

Look, we entreat Thee, on the branch that grew Invulnerably strong beneath thine eye :
It rose renowned in all the nations' view,
Because its guardian was the Lord Most High—
But now in dust our boasted honours lie ;
Devouring flames encompass us around ;
We're rooted up in wrath, all recklessly,
And the destroying axe's dismal sound Proclaims that righteous vengeance lays us with the ground.

Let the All-merciful, Eternal God,
Look on the Man to whom he conquest gave,
And take from us the fierce avenging rod
That threatens with an everlasting grave !
Behold the Mighty One, that's strong to save.
And reconcile thee to thy chosen race !
Oh ! raise us up, that we new life may have,
And see again the brightness of thy face,
And evermore rejoice in thy reviving grace !

NOTES ON EGYPT.

PART I.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER DUFF, D.D.,

One of the Church of Scotland's Missionaries to India.

ON Saturday afternoon, the 14th December, 1839, wearied and sickened with our accommodation and treatment on board the French Steamer, all were on deck, eager to catch the first glimpse of Egypt,—that land so fraught to the mythologist and antiquarian with fable, mystery and wonder,—that land so fraught to the Israelite and Christian with heart-stirring associations of Divine interposition and prophetic accomplishment. The declining sun shone with peculiar effulgence athwart a cloudless, pure, and bracing atmosphere ; while the gentle ripples of the "Great Sea" only broke into fairer beauty its ever-varying reflections of the beams of heaven. At length a shout of welcome gratulation was raised at the appearance, in the sharp clear line of the horizon, of a forest of well-defined top-masts. They were those of the combined Turco-Egyptian fleet, consisting in all of about sixty vessels of war, of different dimensions—from the Paaha's huge four-decker, downward—then riding safely in fraternal embrace in the harbour of Alexandria. In front appeared the summit of Pompey's column, composed of one entire block of red granite, right across the naval armament,—on the left, the bare sharp point of one of the obelisks, commonly designated "Cleopatra's Needles,"—on the right, the modern lighthouse, the poor and degenerated successor of that which was once ranked as one of the wonders of the world ;—all grotesquely blending with numberless windmills in rapid motion grinding corn for the fleet, and barracks, and dockyards, and minarets.

The island of Pharos originally stretched across the mouth of the great harbour, like an enormous breakwater, leaving a convenient passage open at either extremity. About half-way between the centre and the eastern point, the island was united with the mainland by means of an extensive artificial mound. This was the work of one of the Ptolemies, successors of Alexander. On both ends of the island the sea has now greatly encroached,—thus apparently widening the mouths of the two harbours separated by the intervening moat. But the encroachment has proved a dangerous one; for while the upper soil and loose materials have been swept away, a long low rocky reef almost level with the surface of the water has often deceived the mariner to his ruin; while the great harbour itself has in many parts been shallowed or choked up by deposits of the ballast of ships during the long period of Mohammadan misrule and barbarous negligence. Till within little more than twelve years ago, the once magnificent city of Alexandria had wholly disappeared; a few miserable dungeon-like edifices built along the mound and the island somewhat after the form of the letter T, continuing to bear, as if in derision, that celebrated name. Of late a new town has begun to be built, farther inland, out of the excavated ruins of the ancient city, the great square of which is chiefly occupied by those stately Consular fabrics over which wave the flags of all civilized nations. The whole has been surrounded by a wall, of sufficient strength to repel any sudden incursion from the wild Arabs of the desert. The present Pasha's palace stands at the western end of the island—constructed not for show but utility—where his favourite pastime is, to sit in his durbar and watch the ingress, the egress, and various other evolutions of the fleet.

Alexandria has now once more become the busy bustling scene of commercial enterprise and political intrigue. More than once have the destinies of the world, politically and religiously, quivered in the balance in that seat of empire and of faith. And now, after long centuries of utter inanition, like a phoenix from its ashes, it seems all of a sudden to have sprung up into reviviscence and pristine strength. The eyes of all nations seem now to be directed, and the energies of all nations to be concentrated towards that singular spot. What a contrast between the arsenals and the dockyards, and the fleets, and the Consular residences, and all the stirring activities which characterise the mean and insignificant Alexandria of our day—the grand focus of European politics—and the grim and desolate solitude which overspreads the site of the magnificent Alexandria of ancient times! A walk over that site was the most dreary and melancholy which it ever was the lot of the writer to encounter. Who, versed in the knowledge of antiquity at all, has not read with a feeling somewhat akin to the admiration of romance, of the luxurious emporium of universal commerce—the proud capital of the Ptolemies—the noble see of Athanasius?—with its parallel and transverse streets of unrivalled magnitude—adorned with a countless profusion of temples and palaces, theatres and public baths, libraries and museums, groves and schools of learning and philosophy? Where are all these now? Rather, where are the vestiges of them? So utterly despoiled did that devoted city become of its columns, pilasters, and obelisks of marble, porphyry and granite, for the embellishment of the metropolis of the world;—so upheaved and devastated by earthquake and conflagration;—so overrun and ransacked by the fierce legions of Rome, and the still fiercer legions of him who issued the memorable decree respecting the library of 700,000 volumes: “If these writings of the Greeks agree with the Koran, or book of God, they are useless, and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed;”—so upturned and pillaged for materials, wherewith to rear and adorn other cities in Egypt and the adjacent territories;—that, literally, not one stone has been left upon another, and scarcely one stone left anywhere at all! It is this totality of subversion and erasure which fills the mind with wondering reflection. It is nothing uncommon in all countries—once the seats of empire and dominion, to meet with ruins of temples, and palaces, and other public edifices, or even of whole cities. But it usually happens that so much remains to indicate the forms and proportions of the original structures as to stimulate the imagination to fill up the outlines, and thus draw away the mind from the painfulness of present desolation to revel amid the joyfulness of past beauty and grandeur. Or, it may happen that the remaining ruins exhibit such rare and fantastic shapes, or are mantled over so gracefully with such vegetable products of different growths and variegated hues, as to form the most striking and peculiar features in a landscape that kindles into fire the poetic muse. But it surely is an unwonted spectacle to traverse the site of one of the most extensive and magnificent of cities, and not to meet with aught, but a naked arid waste—no, not even with a speck of verdure or a shrub, and scarcely with a fragment of ruin upon the surface! The wearied eye being every where met with nothing but flat, or furrowed, or mounded masses of comminuted rubbish—mortar, and marble, and granite pounded into common dust or granulated sand, and driven about in clouds by the hot winds of the Lybian desert. So often has this minute rubbish been upturned for building materials that it is now difficult to find loose fragments of stone even at a considerable depth. Such an utter eversion and evanishment of a mighty city, we had not previously conceived as possible. Thus, it were no figure to say that it was swept with the besom of destruction. To the eye, to the feelings, the scene spoke aloud that it could have been visited by nothing less than the breath of Jehovah's displeasure—the withering blast of Divine retribution! We cannot, it is true, point so authoritatively, as in the case of many other ancient cities, to the proximate moral causes of an overthrow so disastrous. But this we assuredly do know, that the pride of wealth and power, the insolence of tyranny, the atheistic exclusion of the Supreme Sovereign from the counsels of earthly governments, the wilful rejection or corruption of Divine truth, and the persecution of God's peculiar people have, in the dispensation of a righteous Providence, ever been followed sooner or later, even in this world, with a terrible recompense of reward. And is there not enough, yea, more than enough, in the strangely varied and eventful history of Alexandria, to justify us in classing its fate and final doom in the same category with that of Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon, Nineveh and Babylon? Oh, that existing nations and cities, especially those of Christendom, were wise, that they would consider all this, and, by timeous repentance and submission to Him, who is the King of kings and Lord of lords, arrest the sentence of condemnation, and avert the dread catastrophe which threatens ere long to bury them in their own ruins!

The present route from Alexandria to Cairo, following as it does the windings of the Mahmoudi canal and the Nile, is extremely circuitous and often very tedious, occupying on an average from three to six days, though the direct distance does not exceed one hundred and fifty miles. Proceeding first, for fifty miles in an easterly direction, by the canal which turns into Alexandria the waters and the commerce of the Nile, we gladly left behind us the cheerless scenery of rubbish piles and burning sands,—passing the lake of Maræotis, whose banks, once celebrated for their vines, are now scorched by the breath of the desert into utter barrenness; and whose bosom, subsequently wellnigh drained and converted into corn-fields be-strewn with villages, was at the beginning of the present century, through the inevitable necessity of war, again submerged beneath the waves of the Mediterranean. From the canal itself nought is visible, save the excavated mud which has been thrown up on either side like one continued wall. The blue sky above, with its glorious sun by day and starry lamps by night; in other words, the scenery of the heavens alone could afford solace or delight. As far as regarded terrestrial scenery, beyond muddy water and naked mud banks, we might as well have been sailing along the bottom of a deep ditch. And to add to our consolation, it was soon found that our boat so abounded with vermin and insects, that it looked as if we carried along with us a goodly remnant of the plagues of Egypt.

Having arrived at the terminating basin of the canal, and crossed a narrow isthmus of a few hundred feet through the miserable village of Atfe, we at last cast our eyes on the western or Rossetta branch of the Nile. What Christian can behold that stream for the first time, without a rushing flow of emotions?—emotions, many of them of such sacred and mysterious awe that he can scarcely define them to himself? Was this, indeed, the very stream, on which once reposed, in unconscious slumber, in an humble “ark of bulrushes,” the infant Moses, who was destined to be the special legate of Jehovah to the proudest of monarchs, to be favoured with so glorious a vision of the “glory” of the great “I AM,” in the clefts of Sinai, and to appear in glorified form to the amazed disciples on the mount of transfiguration? Was this the very river which, once dyed with the blood of thousands of Hebrew innocents, was doomed, as if in righteous retribution on a remorseless race, to have its own cleansing and fertilizing waters “turned into blood,”—corrupting the land and famishing its inhabitants?

On our way up the Nile we constantly went on shore, and walked along the banks, not unfrequently making little incursions into the interior. This we were enabled to do without retarding our progress, as the wind often failed for a whole day, and the process of dragging the boat against the current was tardy in the extreme. No flat region can be more beautiful than Lower Egypt at that season of the year. The waters of the annual inundation had not only wholly withdrawn from the land, but half subsided in the channel of the river. Vast level plains spread out on all sides, having their carefully cultivated soil clad in the living green which distinguishes the first fresh blades of vegetable produce in the month of May in British climes—and their borders fringed with rows and their points of junction garnished with clumps and groves of date trees, palmyras, sycamores, and other evergreens. Thus for miles together it often presented the aspect of a beautiful well-dressed garden—without, however, any trace of that boundlessly prolific and spontaneous exuberance which characterises the plains of Bengal. The numberless trenches and canals for distributing the redundant waters of the river, and the many pieces of mechanism in busy play to supply the deficiencies, or perpetuate the effects of the inundation, at once announced the difference between the rain-flooded Delta of the Ganges, and the almost rainless Delta of the Nile.

Though few of the surrounding objects were really new to us after having sojourned in tropical climes, yet the absence of several years tended to throw somewhat of the freshness of novelty over the aspect and operations of an Egyptian landscape. But what pleased us most was the clear light often thereby thrown on the language and allusions of sacred writ. What does the very name of the river—Nile—import? It is a term which, in Arabic, Sanskrit and other oriental languages, signifies, dark blue, or black; and all agree that it has been significantly applied to the great river of Egypt, on account of the singularly black slime which it so copiously deposits. Now, does not this at once remind us of the Scriptural appellation of the river—Sihor or Sichor—an appellation the meaning of which is, black? “And now, what hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the waters of Sihor?” (Jer. ii. 18.) In like manner, the name of the country. After the Greeks and Romans, we call it Egypt—supposed to be a contraction for Aia-gyptos, the land of Gyptosor Kyptos, which doubtlessly exhibits the rudiment of Copt, the denomination still retained by the existing remnant of the old Egyptians. In the Bible it is designated “the land of Mitsraim or Misraim,” from Misraim; numbered in Gen. x. 6, as one of the sons of Ham, who was destined to colonize and enstamp with his own name that part of Africa, his father’s divinely allotted inheritance. The name often appears also in the Bible in its singular form, “Misor” or “Misr.” And can it but sound pleasantly in the ear of the Biblical student to hear the term, Misr, constantly dropping from the lips of the Arab fellahs and other native inhabitants, as the only name by which their own land is known to themselves? Another scriptural appellation of Egypt is “the land of Ham” or “Cham,” (Psalm cv. 23, 27, &c.) And is it not pleasant to remark that “Chamias,” the land of Ham or Cham, is the very name by which Egypt is still familiarly distinguished among the Coptic population?

A MOTHER'S CARE.

TO A LITTLE GIRL, ONE YEAR OLD.

BY MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

ONE little year hath o'er us past, with swift and noiseless wing,
Since first existence dawned for thee, thou rosy bud of spring!—
Since, like a fairy jewel on the coast of ocean thrown,
I hailed thee as a living gem, and blessed thee for mine own!

One year, and thou from infancy's unconscious dreams hast sprung,
To trace with wondering eyes the charms o'er wide creation flung;
To think and feel such childish thoughts, emotions fresh and free,
As none can tell—for none can know—but voiceless things like these.

There, on the velvet cushion placed, thy restless hands employ
To strew in broken fragments round thy latest favourite toy;
While I, in pensive silence, on thy sparkling features gaze,
And strive to read what promise there may shine of future days.

Alas! thou sunny idler on the shifting shore of time,
How soon will childhood rise to youth, and youth to age's prime!
When, like thy mother, thou shalt feel the joy it were to part
With all the fruits experience brings, to be what now thou art.

Yes! ardent souls like thine, my child, that, as I know full well,
Will love to soar to Fancy's realm, and court her syren spell,
Too swift will find Truth's solemn power to dash the gorgeous hue
With which romantic spirits clothe all earth, when life is new!

I know thou wilt have high desires, and dreams of purer bliss,
Than ever their fulfilment find in clouded worlds like this;
I know thine eyes will kindle oft with aspirations deep;
Whose meteor-light will vanish fast—whose end will be to weep.

Even such thy spirit's tone—if Heaven, all kind, prolong thy years—
A burst of sunshine now—and now a flood of bitter tears;
The morn' of rapturous hope—the night of disappointment keen;
The sorrow aye the darker, that the joy so bright hath been!

Oh! then, thou dear enthusiast one! how doubly plain my part—
To lead betimes to holier thought thy deeply fervid heart;
Even in thy being's earliest spring to raise thy generous love
To anchor all its tender power on things unseen, above.

The solemn trust is in my hand—I dare not disavow,
The colour of thy future life rests with my teaching now;
And He who fixed thy home with me His gracious pledge hath given,
To bless a mother's work and prayers to guide her lambs to heaven.

Ah! what avails it that we hold our children's interests dear,
If all our care be to secure their health and riches here?
A nobler end Affection boasts—to look beyond the skies,
And rear to everlasting bloom the flower that dies.

Such aim be mine—and thine, and thine each Christian mother born,
To seize the spirit's golden dawn, and sow the seed at morn;
Thus may the Saviour, who on earth the guileless children bless'd,
O'er treasures guide thro' storms of life to His eternal rest.

CHRIST MADE OF GOD TO HIS PEOPLE, WISDOM :
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. THOMAS GUTHRIE,
Minister of St John's Parish, Edinburgh.

"Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom."
1 COR. i. 30.

If we have a cause at stake which is opposed by very able and eloquent opponents, we meet them with the best advocate, and, to defend our cause, select the mightiest and most convincing speaker. The country sends forth not its weakest, but ablest, general to fight its battles. The deeper the stake, the more imminent the danger, the greater the struggle, the more fierce and formidable the enemy, the louder is heard the call, that our troops should be led on to battle by a master of the art of war; and that if there be consummate skill, veteran experience, and daring courage on the side of the enemy, these should be met by qualities, at the least, not inferior upon ours. We find no fault with this; yet the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, and the foolishness of this world is wisdom with God. We choose the most, God has often chosen the least, likely means to effect his object, and has run counter to all the dictates of human policy and wisdom. To confound the wise, he hath not chosen the wise, but the foolish, things of the world; to confound the things which are mighty, he hath not chosen the mighty, but the weak, things of the world; to confound things that are, he hath chosen things that are not—the low things of the world, and things which are despised. Whom, for example, would man have selected to deliver Israel from the land of Egypt, and striking their fetters from a nation's limbs, to let the slave go free? I judge, if we had had all men to choose from, we would have selected some friend of Pharaoh's—one in favour at court—a man skilled in the management of state affairs, and gifted with powers of speech and eloquence to mould the minds of other men to his own. It was not such a man that God selected. There was a man slow and rude in speech, who held the blood of these slaves in his veins; there was a man who had been reared in the palace of the Pharaohs, but who had given mortal offence by despising the honour, and, like a patriot, preferring rather to share in the disgrace of his countrymen, than be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter—a man, moreover, who, if he had not Egyptian blood upon his conscience, had it upon his hands, and was, at this time, skulking an outlaw among the mountains of Midian;—this was the very last man that we would have chosen; and yet this Moses was the very man whom God sent to say to the King of Egypt, "Let my people go." The man chosen to effect this great deliverance—to make this great demand—to require of Pharaoh the dismemberment of his kingdom—seemed of all men the most unsuitable; and thus, with the weak things of the world, God confounded the things which are mighty. Are mountains to be threshed?—he chooses a worm to thresh them. "Fear not," he says, "worm Jacob; thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff. Thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them: and thou shalt rejoice in the Lord, and shalt glory in the Holy One of Israel." And why did God make this selection?—why sent he not an armed veteran, but a stripling with sling and pebbles, against the champion of the Philistines?—why was a shepherd lad selected to beat this son of Anak?—obscure fishermen to convert the world,—men of no learning, to meet the most accomplished on the arena of debate—men who could speak no language but their own rude tongue, to be the missionaries of the Cross, and men who knew little else than how to shoot a net, or trim a sail, or steer a boat, to turn—their very enemies being judges—to turn the world upside down? Why God does this, and why he disposes and decrees that, it is not always easy to say: "His way is often in the sea, his paths in the mighty waters, and his footsteps unknown." But if there be mystery here, we have a key to open it—a line to thread the labyrinth. God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak to confound the mighty, the things that are not to confound them that are; "that," says Paul in the verse immediately preceding my text, "no flesh should glory in his presence." The warrior hangs in his own halls the sword, the shield, the banner, borne from the foe in battle. David gave the glory where it was due, and in the tabernacle of his God hung Goliath's sword, and by that act most emphatically said, "Not unto me, O Lord, not unto me, but unto thee, be the praise and the glory." Nor does Paul ever forget to give the glory where it is due, and to teach us that he who glorieth should glory in the Lord. In telling us what Christ is made to his people, he first tells us how he is made so; "of God," says he, "He is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption."

I. It is of God that Christ is made to us what he is.—The gratitude that is due to the Son is no less due to the Father; for Christ did not only give himself, but his Father gave him. And what Abraham said to Isaac God would do, when, in their ascent to the summit of Moriah, his son asked him, "My father, behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering?" God has done. That question went like a knife to the father's heart—it touched him to the quick; and yet, in the greatness of his faith, he answered, "My son, God will provide himself with a burnt-offering;" and so he did. And that victim, caught by its horns in the thicket, and laid on the altar from which Isaac was unbound, bled and died an emblem of the offering which God, in mercy, substituted in the room of man. Abraham unbound his son, and with the blood of a meaner victim dyed the knife of sacrifice; but how, on Calvary, was the process reversed! God loosed the mean victim, and placed a nobler one in its room. God unbound the sinner—the rebel—the vile, worthless, hell-deserving wretch, and bound not an angel, nor an archangel, nor a cherub, nor a seraph there; he had one Son, one only-begotten and well-beloved Son, and him he bound, there to bleed for you and me! "He spared not his own Son." "He commended his love to us, in that while we were sinners, he gave up his Son to die for us;" and therefore, as the gift—the matchless, melting, marvellous gift—of God, it is of God that "Christ is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." But there is another sense in which it is of God, Christ is made so. He that kindles the sun, that created the eye to see it—he that showered the manna on the desert sands—gave the appetite to desire, the taste to relish, and the power to digest it; and he not only in his Son provides a Saviour, but gives also in faith that power of receiving him, without which, Christ is to us neither wisdom, nor righteousness, nor sanctification, nor redemption. In place of redemption to many Christ shall become condemnation, and from that face, to his saints so lovely, they shall turn away their eyes in horror, and cry to the rocks, to give them a friendly burial;—in place of wisdom to some, Christ is foolishness; while some from the valley look up to the cross, others from the elevation of their own fancied righteousness look down upon it, and turn away from the stream of blood that flows from the fountains of Christ's wounded hands, and head, and feet, with those feelings which prompted the Syrian to say, as he turned his back on Jordan, "are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel." And to some instead of righteousness, Christ is a rock of offence. I never saw the beggar shivering in a winter's day, but he would gladly exchange his own foul rags for better and more decent attire; but the poor sinner clings to his own foul, filthy rags; nor will he be unclothed that he may be clothed upon. And why is Christ not thus rejected by all? why do some see in his cross the wisdom, and feel in it the power of God? why is he whom others refuse to take for the offering, so precious, that in place of not taking him without money, they would give all the world for Christ, and are willing to count father and mother, the wife of their bosom, the fruit of their body, their money, their characters, their liberty, their life itself, they are willing to count them all loss for him, and, as one said, through a very sea of fire to swim to Jesus,—this is not of man, nor of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God; it is the Spirit that thus sweetly draws them; it is of God, and God's grace that he is made to us what he is, the giving Christ is the Father's, and the drawing to Christ is the Father's too; and thus it is that the only Saviour who is to the Jew a stumbling-block, and to the Greek foolishness, is to them that are called, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God.

II. Christ is made unto us wisdom because it is through him that the Divine character is made known to men.—"Righteous Father," said our Saviour, "the world hath not known thee, but I have known thee; and they have known that thou hast sent me; and I have declared unto them thy name, and I will declare it." "For God," says the apostle, "who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." And where is there seen so much of God as in that blessed face, in the character, and suffering, and work, and offices of Christ? In that single book there is more made known of God, than in all books beside—in yon single cross there is a brighter and fuller manifestation of the Godhead, than in all his other works; and the peasant who has read his Bible, and read nothing else, knows a thousand times more of God, has more sublime, and just, and ennobling conceptions of the Divine character, than all the wisest and most accomplished sages of antiquity. Sin hung a dark thick veil between earth and heaven, God and man, and by the hands of Christ this veil has been rent in twain, the curtains have been drawn aside, and God hitherto unknown has been plainly revealed in him, and in his work; and in respect of his word, the vision of John has been fulfilled. John saw God sitting on his throne, and in his right hand he saw a book; the book was written within, but sealed without, with seven seals; proclamation was made, "Who is worthy to open the book and loose the seals thereof?" it rung through heaven, it sounded on earth, and was echoed back from hell, but no answer came, no man in heaven, nor on earth, nor under the earth, was found worthy to open the book; and John began to weep, "Weep not," said an elder, "Behold the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof." He advanced, he took the volume from the right hand of God, he broke the seals; and this book, written in heaven, for all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and unsealed upon the cross, for it bears the mark of a bloody hand, and it was by his sufferings that he prevailed to open it, this open little book which John saw the angel bring down from heaven, we owe to Christ. Sprinkled with his blood, the spell that bound it was dissolved; and by the same death he broke at once the seal of the grave and the seals that closed the book of the revelation of the nature and the knowledge of God. He hath revealed the Father, revealed him in his word, revealed him in his character, revealed him on his cross, and been made unto his people the highest wisdom according to his saying to Philip, "Philip, he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father also."

III. Christ is made wisdom to us because through him the way of salvation is made known. To know how to be saved is the highest wisdom, and till we have known that, other wisdom is only folly, and not only is much study a weariness of the flesh, but a waste of precious time. And, though it may be a nobler pursuit to acquire knowledge, than amass the gold that perisheth, still no philosophy will teach how to quench yon everlasting fire any more than gold will buy a seat in heaven; and it is just as true of the dying philosopher as of the dying miser, that he has laboured in vain, and spent his strength for nought; and that as the soul goes shrieking into a lost eternity, on the discoveries of the one, as well as on the coffers of the other, truth writes this stern and solemn sentence, Vanity, vanity, all is vanity. Just as the first book a man should read in the morning, is his Bible; the first thing a man should learn to be is a Christian; the first school he should go to is the school of Christ, then let him learn to be a statesman, a man of letters, or a man of science;—let him but learn to be wise for the world where he is to be for ever, and then he may set himself to study the stars that shine above, and the flowers that bloom around his path, and those mountains, and seas, and sun, and elements which themselves shall pass away to give place to a new and better heaven, and a new and better earth. They tell of a celebrated philosopher, who was so engrossed with the pursuit of knowledge, whose eyes and ears, and mind, were so shut to all that passed around him, that the city which he had defended by his skill was taken, the battle roared in the streets, and the enemy had entered his very chamber, and their swords were at his breast; and he just awoke from his reverie in time to die. And what was this philosopher but a fool? His study then ought to have been how to escape. The wisdom of highest value in a tempest, is how to steer and trim the reeling ship; in a parched and pathless desert, is to know the way to the water springs; in a city of the plague, is to know how to cure the mortal pestilence; and to a poor perishing sinner, is to know what he shall do to be saved. If my house is on fire, if the flames are flashing in my eye, and roaring in my ear, and the floor is burning hot beneath my feet; what I am then to study is not the nature of the element, but how to escape its devouring flames. If my bark is tossing on the stormy sea, what I am to study is not the philosophy of storms, the laws that rule the tides, or raise those mountain billows that have swept bulwark and boat away, my eye is to be on the beacon light, my hand upon the helm, and my study, till my bark rides on smoother waters, how to make yon harbour, and escape a watery grave. These are in temporal things, but a repetition of that greatest question that man ever asked of man—that scholar ever asked of master, "What shall I do to be saved?" Ignorant of that, we are ignorant of what it is most needful to know. If we know that, it matters little what we are ignorant of; if ignorant of that, it matters little what we know. And never did important question receive a plainer or more pointed answer, than when Paul turned him to the trembling jailor, and showing him the cross, replied, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

"Christ is made unto us wisdom," because he has opened and showed us the way of life; and, moreover, "made unto his people wisdom," because he gives them the wisdom to take it; and, what is better than being made wise to science, wise to letters, wise to books, or wise to the world—makes them "wise unto salvation." In all the world, there is no fool like a sinner; in all its asylums of raging, laughing, moping madness, there is no madman like him. To live in this world as if he were to live here for ever—to tread the grave as if he were never to lie in it—is there wisdom there? The horse may rush on the battle spears—he is a brute; but for a man, a reasonable man, to rush on the bosses of Jehovah's buckler—is there wisdom there? The insect spins round the candle, till, as in nearing circles it wheels by the fire, it scorches its silken wings, and drops into the flame; but for a man, in the round of his sin, to wheel round the fire of hell—is there wisdom there? To cling by a sinking ship, and bid the men in the life-boat go—to toss away the rope flung from the bank to save him;—in the face of an insulted and injured sovereign, when the hammer is sounding on the gallows tree, to fling his offered pardon—for the indulgence of a moment, to peril all eternity;—I say, if a man were to do with his money, his estate, his body, his life, what many a man does with his soul, the world would set him down as wholly bereft of reason. Let me ask, brethren, has Christ been made unto you wisdom?—wise now or not, you shall be wise some day; hell will accomplish what the cross did not do. But, oh, it is an awful thing, to the preciousness of Christ, to the value of the soul, to the littleness of time, to the greatness of eternity, to have our eyes never opened till they are opened in torment. Oh, that we were made wise to win souls to Christ, and you made wise unto salvation!

THE PRESENT AND PAST ASPECT OF THE LAKE OF GENNESARETH.

BY THE REV. J. A. WYLIE,

Dollar, Clackmannanshire.

It was long supposed that there was no road along the eastern shore—that the mountainous cliffs projected into the lake, so as to forbid all passage: Lindsay has shown that this is a mistake. "There is," says he, "as beautiful and easy a footpath along the whole eastern shore of the lake as across a meadow in England." Proceeding northwards, along the fine rich meadow which runs all the way between the mountains and the water's edge, nothing worthy of observation meets the eye till we come within a few miles of the head of the lake. Here the mountains, which had hitherto run on our right, fall back, and leave a large oblong valley between their base and the shore. In this valley rises a steep isolated hill, displaying on its top the ruins of a place of immense strength and great splendour—El Hossn. This, in all probability, is the city of the Gadarenes, where our Lord wrought the cure on the demoniac. The rocky sides of the mountain appear to have been scarped angularly, for defence; the summit is covered with grass and trees, among which are still to be seen the remains of a citadel, baths, wells, and granite columns; and on the brow of the hill stands a massive ancient gateway. The face of the mountain, on the south, contains numerous tombs—the same, in all probability, out of which came the man "possessed with the devil," who met Christ on his arrival in this part of the country. These are the only tombs on the east of the lake, near to the shore; and what strengthens the probability that they are the same with those which formed the dwelling of the demoniac, is the fact, that the high road from the Lake of Genesareth to the country on the east runs through the valley immediately below; a circumstance to which Matthew seems to refer when he states, that the fury of the possessed rendered them so dangerous "that no man might pass by that way." On the west, the mountain runs down in steep declivities to the sea—in all likelihood the "steep place" down which the herd of swine rushed violently, when the devils entered into them.

Passing on to the north, the fine rich meadow continues all the way to the head of the lake. We have now returned to the spot whence we set out; let us pause here for a little, and review our journey. We have gone round the lake without meeting a single human being, or a place of habitation, save the miserable town of Tiberias; we have traversed the fine plains, covered, in the time of Josephus, with palms, figs, and fruit trees of all kinds, and when there was a "happy contention of the seasons, as if every one of them laid claim to this country,"—and seen them producing only rank grass, thistles, and bushes; we have walked over the site of opulent cities, and have found only a broken column, or a mass of crumbling brick, to tell us of their former grandeur; we have looked up to the sides of the mountains, and had the heart saddened by their dull and withered aspect; we have examined the surface of the lake, without finding a single boat of any description upon its waters; we have listened for the voice of man, but a profound silence reigns every where—not broken, save, perchance, by the ripple of the wave upon the strand; we feel that the "land is empty,"—"that the Lord hath removed men far away, and there is a great forsaking in the midst of the earth." The following little picture, from Stephens, expresses this feeling completely: he was looking upon the lake from amid the ruins of Capernaum. "Not a habitation," says he, "not even an Arab's hut, is seen upon its banks; not a solitary boat upon its waters. A single pelican was floating at my feet, and, like myself, he was alone. He was so near me that I could have hit him with a stone; he was the only thing I saw that had life, and he seemed looking at me with wonder, and asking me why I still lingered in the desolate city."

Had we performed this journey eighteen hundred years ago, in the time of the Saviour, what a different scene would have met the eye! Then, our way would have lain amidst palaces, and cities, and towns, the seats of busy men—the royal Tiberias, the strong Magdala, the crag-built Gamala, and the doomed Capernaum, with her sisters, Chorazin and Bethsaida, and others equal in splendour, but whose names are now perished with their ruins. Here, too, we would have seen the magnificence of art rivalled by the beauty and richness of nature: the shore waving with luxuriant crops, or graced with groves of palm-trees and plantations of figs; the bottom of the mountains covered with gardens, and the higher slopes shaded with olives, or verdant with rich pastures; the surface of the lake, too, exhibiting a scene of life and animation, from the multitude of fishing-boats and merchant vessels on its waters, and passengers continually going and returning from the towns which stood upon its shores; the whole region vocal, moreover, with many happy sounds—the rush of its hundred rills, mingling with the song of birds and the lowing of cattle. But now all this joy and beauty are vanished, and nothing is to be seen save a lonely lake, reposing amid bare and melancholy hills.*

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

CAPTAIN JOHN PATON.

BY THE EDITOR.

THIS determined adherent of the good old principles of the Scottish Covenanters was born at Meadow-Head, in the parish of Fenwick, Ayrshire. In early life, and until he had almost reached mature years, he was chiefly employed in the peaceful occupations of agriculture. We have been unable to ascertain the peculiar circumstances which led him to quit the calm pursuits of his youth for the adventurous employment of a soldier. From whatever motives he left the plough and assumed the spear, he was found, at all events, ardently enlisted on the side of the Covenanters at the battle of Kilsyth, in 1645. On that disastrous day, Captain Paton acquitted himself with the most exemplary valour; and when the Covenanters were completely defeated, by Montrose, and forced to retreat, he encountered in his flight various bands of the enemy, whom he succeeded in so far intimidating, that he escaped uninjured beyond the reach of pursuit. Of the Covenanters above four thousand were killed on the spot, and their cause seemed to have received its death-blow. The Almighty, however, had better things in reserve for his persecuted remnant. General Leslie was detached from the army in England, and marched into Scotland to relieve the distressed sons of the Covenant. Montrose proudly advanced to meet him; and at Philiphaugh a desperate conflict ensued, which terminated in the triumph of the Covenanters, and the flight and ultimate execution of their deadly foe. Matters having now assumed a more favourable aspect for the Presbyterian party, Captain Paton returned home to Fenwick, with his friend and pastor Mr William Guthrie.

On different occasions the Captain found it necessary to take up arms in defence of the party whose principles he had espoused; and to his prowess the Presbyterians in Ayrshire were deeply indebted. And when Charles the First was beheaded, and Charles the Second pretended to espouse the cause of the Covenant in Scotland, Captain Paton joined the army which was raised in that country, to defend the Monarch and his kingdom against the usurpation of Cromwell. He entered England with Charles and the Scotch army, and was present at the battle of Worcester, which proved so fatal to the cause of the Monarch—dispersing his army, and sending him to wander as a fugitive on a foreign shore. Thus unsuccessful in their expedition, the Scotch army returned home; and Captain Paton, laying aside for a time the habiliments of a soldier, resumed his former avocations. Having rented the farm of Meadow-Head, on which he was born, he entered into the married state. His private and domestic character were truly exemplary. He was faithful in attendance upon divine ordinances, under the ministry of Mr William Guthrie, by whom he was persuaded to accept the office of an elder. This honourable office he filled, with great activity and usefulness, until, by the tyranny of the profligate Charles, the worthy minister of Fenwick was driven from his charge, and the yoke of Episcopacy was bound round the necks of an unwilling people by the powerful arm of law. It was now that Scotland rose as one man, and Captain Paton felt himself compelled once more to take the field in defence of the rights and liberties of his oppressed countrymen. Advancing at the head of a party of horse from Loudon, Fenwick, and other places in Ayrshire, he joined the Presbyterian army, who had collected to the number of two thousand men, and, proceeding to Lanark, they renewed the Covenant, and published a manifesto, in which they acknowledged their submission to the King, and demanded the re-establishment of the Presbyterian system and the reinstatement of the ejected ministers. Dalziel took the field to oppose them; and at length, although the army of the Covenanters had been reduced on their journey to scarcely a thousand men, they came to an engagement at Rullion-Green, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Pentland hills.

In the battle of Rullion-Green Captain Paton behaved with marked gallantry and courage. Dalziel, who knew sufficiently the singular prowess of the Captain, resolved personally to encounter him, thinking to take him prisoner. He advanced accordingly, and the pistols of each were discharged. Dalziel, however, was clad in mail, and the ball, which would have killed him, fell at his feet. On seeing this, Captain Paton suspecting the cause, took from his pocket some pieces of silver, which he had there for the purpose, and put one of them into his other pistol. This was not unobserved by Dalziel, who instantly retreated behind a soldier, and thus escaped being slain. The party which Paton headed were surrounded, and with the utmost dexterity he forced his way through the enemy, and although, by the command of Dalziel, he was closely pursued, he reached home in safety.

The advantage which the enemies of the Presbyterian cause gained in the rising at Pentland, encouraged them to treat the Covenanters with still greater severity than before. Taking refuge in the hills and fastnesses, they hid themselves from the fury of their persecutors. Captain Paton, like the rest of the oppressed remnant, was often compelled to leave his home on hearing of the approach of the enemy, and to seek shelter in the dens and caves of the earth. In these troublous times he and his friends were often to be seen in the open fields, or on some remote hill-side, worshipping the God of their fathers. With the sword in one hand, and the Bible in the other, they stood listening with the most insatiable eagerness to those blessed truths, for the maintenance of which they were ready to pour out their very heart's blood. These field-meetings, however, did not escape the notice of the enemy. Claverhouse and his bloody emissaries were despatched in all directions to scour the country. The Covenanters, men of stern resolution, and of indomitable zeal, encouraged by the victory which they gained at Drumclog, roused themselves anew to fight the battles of their country and their God. Their army, particularly in the west of Scotland, became strong and numerous; and among others, Captain Paton was vigorous and successful in collecting recruits for the good cause. Backed by a large body of horsemen from Fenwick and Galston, he joined the main body of the troops, and fought bravely in the famous battle of Bothwell-bridge, in which the intrepid heroes of the Covenant were unhappily defeated. That we may discern rightly the pure and scriptural motives by which the Covenanters were animated in thus contending, even unto death, we may quote the published declaration of one who was present, and took a part in the engagement at Bothwell-bridge. Speaking of the battle fought on that fatal day, John Stevenson remarks:—

“ I am not ashamed to own I was there; and do declare it was not a spirit of rebellion against the king and government that took me there, as that rising up is slanderously reported by many. That which moved us to join together, yea appear in arms, was the necessary defence of our lives, liberties, and religion; for it is well known how the enemies of God, and the enemies of our holy religion, did cut up the people as bread, and called not on his name; and wherever they met with honest ministers or private Christians, they either shot them, banished, or dragged them to prison; and for no other reason but because we worshipped the covenant God of our fathers, according to our conscience and in the way we judged was appointed of God. We would have taken cheerfully the spoiling of our goods, had not our enemies sought to lord it over our conscience, while we could not submit to them without incurring the displeasure of God. I own, many of us could not be edified by a set of men forced on us by the prelates. And it is well known how scandalous and immoral the generality of them were; and yet, for not joining in communion with men who were a scandal to the Christian religion, we were hunted like partridges upon the mountains, and exposed to the rage of the bloody soldiery, whose tender mercies we found to be cruelty; yea, when we complained of our grievances to those in power, in the most humble, dutiful, and loyal way, we were the more harassed and oppressed, as if our persecutors had a mind to show to the world, that they were entirely void of humanity. All which considered, it was no wonder we joined together for our common safety. And our uniting together was on the very principles on which our happy revolution was afterwards brought about, namely, the preserving ourselves and posterity from Popery, slavery, and arbitrary power."

Captain Paton's distinguished bravery on the melancholy occasion to which we have now referred, was followed by his promotion to the honour of Major, or as some accounts bear, of Colonel, but as he is uniformly mentioned under the title of Captain, we have preferred retaining it throughout the present Sketch. After the signal defeat at Bothwell the Captain returned home, but being declared by public proclamation a rebel, and a price being set upon his head, he was compelled to wander about as a fugitive in search of some secret hiding-place. On one occasion, a party of the enemy came upon him while he was quartered at Lochgoin, in the house of James Howie. With great difficulty, and in the most providential manner, he escaped. The details, however, are so minutely and graphically described in the Scots Worthies, that we make no apology for extracting the account:—

"The sufferers had watched all night, which was very stormy, by turns; and about day-break, the Captain, on account of his asthmatical disorder, went to the far end of the house for some rest. In the meanwhile, one George Woodburn went out to see if he could observe any, (but it seems he looked not very surely), and going to secret duty instead of this, from which he was but a little time returned, until, on a sudden, ere they were aware, Sergeant Rae came to the inner door of the house, and cried out, Dogs! I have found you. The four men took to the spence—James and John Howie happened to be then in the byre among the cattle. The wife of the house, one Isabel Howie, seeing none but the Sergeant, cried to them to take to the hills, and not be killed in the house. She took hold of Rae, as he was coming boldly forward to the door of the place in which they were, and ran him backward out of the outer door of the house, giving him such a hasty turn as made him lie on the ground. In the meanwhile, the Captain, being alarmed, got up, put on his shoes, though not very hastily, and they got all out; by which time the rest of the party was up. The Sergeant fired his gun at them; which, one John Kirkland, answered by the like with his. The bullet passed so near the Sergeant, that it took off the knot of hair on the side of his head. The whole crew being now alarmed, the Captain and the rest took the way for Eaglesham-muir, and they followed. Two of the men ran with the Captain, and other two stayed by turns and fired back on the enemy, the enemy firing on them likewise; but by reason of some wetness their guns had got in coming through the water, they were not so ready to fire, which helped the others to escape.

"After they had pursued them some time, John Kirkland turned about, and stooped down on his knee, and aimed so well, that he shot a Highland sergeant through the thigh, which made the front still stoop as they came forward, till they were again commanded to run. By this time the sufferers had gained some ground; and being come to the muirs of Eaglesham, the four men went to the heights, in view of the enemy, and caused the Captain, who was old and not able to run, take another way by himself. At last he got a mare upon the field, and took the liberty to mount her a little, that he might be more suddenly out of their reach. But ere he was aware, a party of dragoons going for Newmills was at hand; and what was more observable, he wanted his shoes, having cast them off before, and was riding on the beast's bare back; but he passed by them very slowly, and got off undiscovered; and at length gave the mare her liberty, which returned home, and went unto another of his lurking-places. All this happened on a Monday morning, and on the morrow these persecutors returned, and plundered the house, drove off their cattle, and left almost nothing remaining."

About the same time the Captain met with another deliverance. One of his children having died he was present at the interment, and a party of soldiers appeared, expecting to seize him in the church-yard. This, however, was in the good providence of God prevented, some of the company present at the funeral having persuaded him previously to retire. At length he was discovered. In the beginning of August 1684, he was apprehended by five soldiers in the house of Robert Howie, at Floack, in the parish of Mearns. He made no resistance, and requested his friends around him to refrain from making any exertions for his rescue. He was carried by the soldiers to Kilmarnock, thence to Ayr, then back again to Glasgow, and finally to Edinburgh.

His trial was not long delayed. He was brought before the High Court of Justiciary, and indicted for being with the rebels at Glasgow, and particularly at Bothwell. The Lords found the libel relevant, and on the ground of his own confession alone they brought him in guilty, and he was sentenced to be hanged at the Grassmarket of Edinburgh, on Wednesday the 23d of April 1684. On a petition to the Council he was respited till the 30th, and then till the 9th of May, when he suffered the execution of his sentence. It is said, that General Dalziel, who had a high personal respect for Captain Paton, obtained a reprieve for him from the king, which, however, having fallen into the hands of Bishop Paterson, was kept up by him until after the execution.

Captain Paton's behaviour on the scaffold was such as became a Christian, who was privileged to suffer in the cause of his Redeemer. His dying testimony, which he uttered with a calm, unflinching voice, will be read with interest, as displaying the noble and pious spirit by which he was animated. It is as follows:—

"DEAR FRIENDS AND SPECTATORS,—You are come here to look upon me, a dying man, and you need not expect that I shall say much, for I was never a great orator, or eloquent of tongue, though I may say as much to the commendation of God in Christ Jesus, as ever any poor sinner had to say. I have been as great a sinner as ever lived; strong corruptions, strong lusts, strong passions, a strong body of death, have prevailed against me; yea, I have been the chief of sinners. I may say, on retrospection of the past (though the world cannot charge me with any gross transgression this day, for which I bless the Lord), O, what omissions and commissions, what formality and hypocrisy, that even my duties have been my grief and fear, lest a holy God should, as well he might, make them my ditties! My misimproved time may be heavy upon my head, and cause of desertion; and especially my supplicating the council, which have, I think, laid their snares the closer to take away my life, though contrary to their own professed law. I desire to mourn for my giving ear to the counsels of flesh and blood, when I should have been consulting Heaven, and to reflect upon myself, though it lays my blood the closer to their door, and, I think, the blood of my wife and bairns. I think their supreme magistrate is not ignorant of many of their actings; but these Prelates will not be found free when our God makes an inquisition for blood. And now I am come here, desired of some indeed, who thirst for my life, though by others not desired. I bless the Lord, I am not come here as a thief or a murderer, and I am free of the blood of all men, and hate bloodshed, directly or indirectly. And now I am a poor sinner, and could never merit any thing but wrath, and have no righteousness of my own; all is Jesus Christ's, and his alone, and I have laid claim to his righteousness and his sufferings, by faith in Jesus Christ; through imputation they are mine, for I have accepted of his offer on his own terms, and sworn away myself to him many a time, to be at his disposal, both privately and publicly; and now I have put it upon him to ratify in heaven all that I have essayed to do on earth, and to do away all my imperfections and failings, and to stay my heart on him. I seek mercy for all my sins, and trust to get all my challenges and sins taken away by the blood and sufferings of Jesus and his righteousness; and that he shall see of the travail of his soul in me, and the Father's pleasure shall prosper in his hand. I bless the Lord that ever he led me out to behold any part of his power in the Gospel, in kirks, or fields, or any of his actings for his people in their straits. The Lord is with his people, while they are with him. We may set our seal to this, while they are united. O for a day of his power to cement this distempered age. It is sad to see his people falling out by the way, and of such a fiery spirit, when looking to be at one lodging at night; especially those who profess to stand by our glorious work of reformation and solemn engagements to God, and to keep clear of the sins of these times. O hold off extremities on both hands, and follow the example of our blessed Lord, and the cloud of witnesses mentioned in the 11th of Hebrews. Let your way be the good old path, the word of God and best times of the Church; for if it be not according to his word it is because there is no truth in it.

"Now, as to my interrogations, I was not clear to deny Pentland or Bothwell. They asked me how long I was there? I said eight days: and the assize had no more to sentence upon, for the advocate said he would not pursue for Pentland, by reason of an indemnity before the privy council. The council asked me, if I acknowledged authority? I said, all authority according to the Word of God. They charged me with many things, as if I had been rebel since the year 1640, and at Montrose's taking at Mauchline-muir. Lord, forgive them, they know not what they do.

"I adhere to the sweet Scriptures of truth, of the Old and New Testaments, and Gospel preached by a faithful sent ministry, whereby he many times communicated himself to the souls of his people, and to me in particular, both in the kirks, and since on the fields, and in the private meetings of his people for prayer and supplication to him. I adhere to our solemn Covenants, National and Solemn League, Acknowledgment of Sins and Engagement to Duties, which became national. I adhere to our Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, Causes of Wrath, and to all the testimonies given by his people formerly, and of late, either in fields or on scaffolds, these years bygone, in so far as they are agreeable to his word, the practice of our worthy Reformers, the holy true zeal, and according to his rule. I adhere to all our glorious work of Reformation. Now, I leave my testimony, as a dying man, against the horrid usurpation of our Lord's prerogative and crown right, I mean that supremacy, established by law in these lands, which is a manifest usurpation of his crown, for he is given by the Father to be head of the Church, 'and he is the head of the body, the Church: who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead: that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For it pleased the Father, that in him all fulness should dwell.' Col. i. 18, 19. Against Popery, Prelacy, and Erastianism, and all that depends upon that hierarchy, which is a yoke that neither we nor our fathers were able to bear, which the poor remnant is groaning under this day, by that horrid cruelty, rending their consciences by tests and bonds; taking away their substance and livelihoods, by fines and illegal exactions, plunderings and quarterings, and compelling them to sin, by hearing, joining, and complying with the malicious curates. 'Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites; for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in.' Matt. xxiii. 13. I leave my testimony against the indulgence, first and last, for I ever looked on it as a snare, and so I never looked upon them as a part of the hopeful remnant of the church; and now it is sad to see how some of them have joined, by their deeds or by their language, in the persecution of the poor remnant.

"Now, I would briefly address a word or two to three classes; but I think, if one would rise from the dead, he would not be heard by this generation, who are mad upon idols and this world. 1. Those who joined deliberately with the persecutors, in all their robberies and haling innocent souls to prison, death, and banishment. The Lord will not hold them guiltless; they may read what the Spirit of God hath recorded of them in Jude 11, and downward, and Obadiah's prophecy. 2. Those who seem to be more sober and knowing, yet, through a timorousness and fear, have joined with them in all their corrupt courses, for ease and their own things: do not think that these fig-leaves will cover you; it is a hazard to be mingled with the heathen, lest we learn of them their way. O Sirs, be zealous and repent; seek repentance from Christ—he purchased it with his blood; and do your first works, if ever there was any saving work on your souls; for he will come quickly; 'and who may abide the day of his coming?' O Sirs, the noble grace of repentance grows not in every field; many could not get it, though they sought it carefully with tears. O work while it is to-day; the night draweth on, and it may be very dark. 3. Those who have been most tender. And O who of us can say, that we have out of love to his glory singly followed him? Upon examination, I fear, we shall find it not so, but that we have come far short. I fear we shall not find him such as we would, nor he us such as he would. O we may say, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no place clean. None can cast a stone at another; we are all wounds, bruises, and defilements. We must put this work upon Him who is the fountain to wash foul souls, who 'breaks not the bruised reed, nor quenches the smoking flax.' Give Him much to do, for we have much to do for him. O that there were no rest in our bones, because of our sin! It is the Father's pleasure that he should see his seed, and the pleasure of the Lord prosper in his hand. O that he would make every one of us understand our errors, and unite us after the good old path, followed in the most pure times of our church, and unite us to our Lord Jesus Christ, by faith in his righteousness, by imputation and virtue of his suffering for sinners, and keep us there! There is no safety but at his back; and I beseech you, improve time—it is precious when rightly improved; 'for ye know not when the Master calleth, at midnight, or at cock-crowing.' Dear friends, the work of the day is great, and calls for more than ordinary exertion. O be oft at the throne, and give him no rest, to make sure your soul's interest. Seek pardon freely, and then he will come with peace; seek all the graces of his Spirit, the grace of love, the grace of holy fear and humility. O but there is much need of this and the promised Spirit!

"Now, I desire to salute you, dear friends in the Lord Jesus Christ, whether imprisoned, banished, widowed, and fatherless, or wandering and cast out, for Christ's sake and the Gospel's: the blessing of Christ's sufferings be with you all, strengthen, establish, support, and settle you; and the blessings of Him who was in the bush which, while it burnt, was not consumed, and my poor blessing be with you all. Now, as to my persecutors, I forgive all of them; instigators, reproachers, soldiers, privy council, justiciaries, apprehenders, in what they have done to me; but what they have done in despite against the image of God's name in me, who am a poor thing without that, it is not mine to forgive them; but I wish they would seek forgiveness of Him who hath it to give, and do no more wickedness.

"Now, I leave my poor sympathizing wife and six small children upon the Almighty Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, who hath promised to be 'a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow, and the orphan's stay:' be thou all in all unto them, O Lord. Now, the blessing of God and my poor blessing be with them. And my suit to thee is, that thou wouldst give them thy salvation. And now, farewell wife and children; farewell all friends and relations; farewell all worldly enjoyments; farewell sweet Scriptures, preaching, praying, reading, singing, and all other duties. Welcome Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. I desire to commit my soul to thee in well-doing. Lord, receive my Spirit!"

Thus died, as a martyr to the cause of true religion, and sound Presbyterian principles, one of that noble army of oppressed and persecuted men, who, while they approved themselves on earth as valiant soldiers of Jesus Christ, are now among those who have passed through great tribulation, and are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple.

Giving a name in Baptism.—It has become the custom to announce the name in baptizing. It is to be recollected, however, that this is no part of the ordinance, and that without any infringements of Scripture, we might baptize without mentioning any name at all. How very low ideas, then, must they have of the ordinance, who speak of this almost as if it were the principal point! There have been frequent instances of the parent saying to the minister, "I am come to ask you to give my child a name." What trifling with so solemn an ordinance. It is the parent himself that gives the name, the minister only tells what it is; and this abuse of the circumstance would be almost enough to make him refuse to mention the name at all. Parents ought to dwell on the essentials of the ordinance, and to consider the mentioning of the name as adventitious and subordinate. The nature of the names, however, which Christian parents give their children, is not altogether unimportant. The name is most certainly considered as a mark of respect, or a compliment, to the person from whom it is taken; there is therefore, to say the least, an impropriety in Christians giving the names of heathen gods and goddesses to their children. It was, and still is usual, with converted heathens, when baptized, to lay aside their heathen, and to assume a Christian name: why then should Christians impose heathen names on their offspring. No doubt it may be said with truth, that these names are intended out of respect to those connections, or friends, from whom they are immediately taken; but it is obvious that they tend to keep alive the memory of those who originally bore them, whose very names ought not to be taken up into our lips, or if mentioned at all, mentioned with abhorrence. We do not mean to bring any very great charge against those who err in this respect, as we are persuaded they do not intend evil: at the same time, the impropriety is undeniable, and if the names were wrong chosen at first, why perpetuate them, when the change is in general so easy?—REV. JAMES FOOT, A. M. (Lectures.)

Christ my all.—Christ must buy my wedding-garment, and redeem the inheritance which I have forfeited, and give his word for one the like of me.—RUTHERFORD.

Faithfulness in Hearing Prayer.—"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." Psal. xxxiv. 6. I never lost a prayer by God; even when David wanted faith, God wanted not faithfulness: "I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes; nevertheless thou hearest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee." God was faithful notwithstanding David's unbelief: "I said in my haste," &c., and he that believeth will not make haste; "nevertheless thou hearest." Unbelief itself cannot make the faithfulness of God of none effect. I conceive that of the apostle (2 Tim. ii. 13) to bear this sense, "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful, he cannot deny himself." It is not to be understood of a state of unbelief, but of an act of unbelief—not of a want of faith, but a want in faith; neither of which can render God unfaithful, who is engaged, not so much to our faith, as to his own faithfulness to himself, to hear the prayer of his troubled servants: "Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." Psal. l. 15.—T. CASE. (A Treatise on Affliction.)

He humbled himself.—Now, how cogent and persuasive is this! One so high, come down so low; one dwelling in inaccessible glory, manifested in the flesh—in the infirmity and weakness of it; to this very purpose, to repair the creation, to make up its breaches, to destroy sin, and save the sinner. What force is in this to persuade a soul that truly believes it, not to sin! For, may he think within himself, Shall I save that which Christ came to destroy? Shall I entertain and maintain that which he came to take away, and do what in me lies to frustrate the great end of his glorious and wonderful descent from heaven? Shall I join hands and associate with my lusts, and war for them which war against my soul, and against him that would save my soul?—BINNING.

THE ORIGIN AND AUTHORSHIP OF THE PARAPHRASES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,

Minister of Currie, Mid-Lothian.

ALTHOUGH the attention of the Church of Scotland had, from an early period, been frequently called to the propriety of enlarging and improving the Psalms, it was not till the year 1742 that the subject was vigorously taken up. Previous to that period, it had been the immemorial practice of the Presbyterian ministers to make the devotional parts of the service, which followed the exposition of Scripture, bear as closely as possible upon the train of thoughts which had been previously awakened in the minds of the congregation; and it was regretted by many that, as it was found both a suitable and a beneficial thing to recapitulate the leading topics which pervaded the discourse in the form of a concluding prayer, the means of preserving the same unity of sentiment and feeling also in that interesting department of worship which consists in praise, was still a desideratum. The Psalms, it was felt, while they constituted a most precious portion of the Word of God, and were so replete with references to all the varieties of a believer's experience, that they would ever, before all other poetical compositions of a devotional character, be the favourite vehicle for the effusions of piety, did not, with all their acknowledged excellencies, contain such clear and full exhibitions of Christian truth as were to be found in the pages of the New Testament writers; and it was thought that an important boon would be conferred on the public, and the cause of Christian edification greatly promoted, by translating, in a metrical form, several passages of Scripture, containing lively announcements of the grand blessings of the Gospel, and plain illustrations of Christian duty; in short, embodying generally such thoughts as a pious and judicious preacher would be likely to enlarge upon in his addresses from the pulpit, and expressed in that lively style which would tend to quicken and elevate the tone of devotional feeling, which his previous exhortation might be supposed to have begun. With a view to accomplish this desirable object, the Assembly of 1742 appointed a Committee, with full powers to adopt every means—either by receiving contributions of original pieces, or by a judicious selection from former collections of hymns—for providing the Christian people of Scotland with a sacred anthology; and when it is considered that that Committee, which continued in existence for about forty years, was successively reinforced by the addition of such men as Logan, the two Blairs, Dr Erskine, and other eminent contemporaries, whose correct judgment and fine taste have long commanded general admiration and respect, it was reasonable to hope that such a collection would be obtained through their united labours, as would both reflect credit upon the Church which employed their services, and provide their countrymen with a valuable treasure of sacred melodies. The first fruits of their exertions appeared in 1745, two years after their appointment, when a number of translations and Paraphrases, which had received their patient and final revision, were submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly—by whom they were ordered to be transmitted to Presbyteries, for the purpose of receiving amendments. While the work was in this preliminary stage, the Rebellion broke out, which, diverting the minds of men to other matters more immediately connected with the interests of the Church and country, interrupted for a time the farther progress of the Psalms; and it affords a curious illustration of the confusions consequent upon that memorable rising, that in many parts of the country the copies of this first revised impression which had been printed for distribution among the several Presbyteries, were either arrested or lost in the course of their travels during that period of civil commotion; insomuch, that the Assembly of 1749 were under the necessity of ordering the whole to be printed anew, and sent to the several Presbyteries, who were appointed to send up their opinion the following year. Meanwhile, those who were charged with the active preparation of the work did not relax their efforts, but continued adding to the specimens already given to the Church; for in 1751, we find an enlarged and newly revised edition submitted to the Assembly of that year, which resolved to take the same method as formerly, to secure its improvement, by inviting suggestions from every quarter; and "in the meantime recommend the said Psalmody to be used in private families." By encouraging the use of the metrical translation in private, it was naturally expected, that the minds of the people would be led to perceive its excellencies, and that the daily or occasional singing of the Paraphrases in family worship, for that venerable practice was then very common throughout the country, would pave the way for the easy and general introduction of them into the service of public worship. But this recommendation of the Assembly—wise and judicious as in any circumstances it would have been, for changes in the religious habits and observances of a people are not all at once or silently acquiesced in—had become absolutely necessary in consequence of the strong prejudices which in various parts of the country prevailed against the proposed innovation. Besides the difficulty of moving large bodies of men to any new thing—exemplified in this case from year to year by the negligence or backwardness of many Presbyteries to countenance or give any opinion on the subject; numbers of the clergy participated in the feelings of that portion of the people, who could not reconcile themselves to the idea of elevating any human compositions to a level with the sacred hymns of the sweet singer of Israel. Into those feelings of opposition there entered, as usual in similar cases, a variety of elements, some of them of an inferior and less respectable kind. The very idea of change disgusted many, and their dislike to the new translation was of a similar character, and originated in the same principles, as that of multitudes within our own memory to the new mode of singing, or the repeating tunes as they are called,—both illustrating the strong hold which the forms of national worship have taken of the Scottish mind, and showing that the national character is so strongly moulded by the simple genius of Presbytery, that the refinements and artificial graces of composition, either in Psalmody or sacred music, are entirely unsuitable and distasteful. Another element in creating the strong prejudices against the new Paraphrases was furnished by the form in which they first appeared. The original impression was printed on a few leaves, in the shape of a very small pamphlet, or stitched at the end of the Shorter Catechism; and this way of doing it up, giving it the air of an ephemeral production, had, it is well known, a prejudicial influence on not a few. The majority, however, who expressed their dislike to the introduction of the Paraphrases, rested their opposition on higher grounds. Besides the preference they naturally felt for the Psalms, whose homely style, and quaint and often rugged rhymes, were entwined with their tenderest and most venerable associations, they were of opinion, that in using a translation which, even amid the changes necessary in a metrical form, is distinguished by its extraordinary approach to literal faithfulness, they were adhering to the very words which the Spirit indited; and that the advantage derived from this belief, in strengthening and enlivening their devotional feelings, would be but poorly compensated by the gratification afforded to their taste and feelings by the attraction of smoother numbers, and more elegant language, when the sentiments flowed from an uninspired source. Impressions of this serious kind were not easily combated; and accordingly, from the united influence of all these causes upon the public mind, it was not till the year 1781 that the Paraphrases appeared as they now stand in our Bibles; and were appointed by the General Assembly of that time "to be used in public worship, and in congregations, where the minister finds it to edification." Long after this public sanction, however, many ministers would not allow them to be sung in their churches; and numbers, particularly of the older people, were accustomed, on the announcement of a Paraphrase from the pulpit, to refuse to join in the singing, or to leave the place of worship altogether! Those sentiments, however, except, perhaps, with a very few, have completely died away, and the almost universal suffrage of the Christian public has been long borne to the fact, that the selection of Translations and Paraphrases appointed to be used in our churches,—for beauty of sentiment, pathos of description, and a fine vein of scriptural simplicity and devotional feeling, is second to none in the English language.

The labour that was expended on the preparation of these Paraphrases, and the judgment and taste exercised in bringing them to their present state of correctness, it would not be easy to over-estimate. Every line, nay, every word, was made to pass through a strict ordeal before it was allowed to stand. Pieces which would have commanded admiration in a volume of poetry, were, on the very ground of their poetical excellencies, unfit for being admitted into the collection; and hence, one of the greatest difficulties encountered in forming it, arose from the necessity of avoiding or rejecting every sentiment, epithet, and mode of expression, which had any tendency to gratify the taste and engage the feelings, instead of moving the heart—which was either too elevated for common understandings, too particular for public congregations, or unsuitable to the sacred purposes of devotion. We shall subjoin, on parallel columns, one or two specimens, which will afford an opportunity of comparing the original with our version, and from which the reader will be able to form an opinion of the care and delicate taste bestowed by the compilers;—

WATTS.

Can a kind woman e'er forget
The infant of her womb?
And 'mongst a thousand tender thoughts
Her suckling have no room?
"Yet," saith the Lord, "should nature change,
And mothers monsters prove,
Zion still dwells upon the heart
Of everlasting love.
"Deep on the palms of both my hands
I have engrav'd her name;
My hands shall raise her ruined walls,
And build her broken frame!"

WATTS.

Behold the glories of the Lamb
Amidst his Father's throne;
Prepare new honours for his name,
And songs before unknown.
Let elders worship at his feet,
The Church adore around,
With vials full of odours sweet,
And harps of sweeter sound.
These are the prayers of the saints,
And these the hymns they raise,—
Jesus is kind to our complaints,
He loves to hear our praise.
Eternal Father, who shall look Into thy secret will?
Who but the Son shall take that book,
And open every seal?
Come, let us join our cheerful songs
With angels round the throne;
Ten thousand thousand are their tongues,
But all their joys are one.
"Worthy the Lamb that died," they cry,
"To be exalted thus:"
"Worthy the Lamb," our lips reply,
"For he was slain for us."
Jesus is worthy to receive
Honour and power divine;
And blessings more than we can give,
Be, Lord, for ever thine.
Thou hast redeem'd our souls with blood,
Hast set the prisoners free;
Hast made us kings and priests to God,
And we shall reign with thee.
Let all that dwell above the sky,
And air, and earth, and seas,
Conspire to lift thy glories high,
And speak thine endless praise.
The whole creation join in one,
To bless the sacred name
Of Him that sits upon the throne,
And to adore the Lamb.

DODDRIIDGE.

Father of peace, and God of love,
We own thy power to save,
That power by which our Shepherd rose
Victorious o'er the grave.
We triumph in that Shepherd's name,
Still watchful for our good;
Who brought th' eternal cov'nant down,
And sealed it with his blood.

OUR VERSION.

Can the fond mother e'er forget
The infant whom she bore?
And can its plaintive cries be heard,
Nor move compassion more?
She may forget; nature may fail
A parent's heart to move;
But Zion on my heart shall dwell
In everlasting love.
Full in my sight, upon my hands
I have engrav'd her name:
My hands shall build her ruin'd walls,
And raise her broken frame.

OUR VERSION.

Behold the glories of the Lamb
Amidst his Father's throne;
Prepare new honours for his name,
And songs before unknown.
Lo! elders worship at his feet;
The Church adores around,
With vials full of odours rich,
And harps of sweetest sound.
These odours are the prayers of saints,
These sounds the hymns they raise;
God bends his ear to their requests,
He loves to hear their praise.
Who shall the Father's record search,
And hidden things reveal?
Behold the Son that record takes,
And opens ev'ry seal!
Hark how th' adoring hosts above
With songs surround the throne!
Ten thousand thousand are their tongues;
But all their hearts are one.
Worthy the Lamb that died, they cry,
To be exalted thus;
Worthy the Lamb, let us reply,
For he was slain for us.
To him be pow'r divine ascrib'd,
And endless blessings paid;
Salvation, glory, joy, remain
For ever on his head!
Thou hast redeem'd us with thy blood,
And set the prisoners free;
Thou mad'st us kings and priests to God,
And we shall reign with thee.
From ev'ry kindred, ev'ry tongue,
Thou brought'st thy chosen race;
And distant lands and isles have shar'd
The riches of thy grace.
Let all that dwell above the sky,
Or on the earth below,
With fields, and floods, and ocean's shores,
To thee their homage show.
To Him who sits upon the throne,
The God whom we adore,
And to the Lamb that once was slain,
Be glory ever more.

OUR VERSION.

Father of peace, and God of love!
We own thy pow'r to save,
That pow'r by which our Shepherd rose
Victorious o'er the grave.
Him from the dead thou brought'st again,
When, by his sacred blood,
Confirm'd and seal'd for ever more,
Th' eternal cov'nant stood.

So may the Spirit seal my soul,
 And mould it to thy will,
 That my fond heart no more may stray,
 But keep thy cov'nant still.
 Still may we gain superior strength,
 And press with vigour on,
 Till full perfection crown our hopes,
 And fix us near thy throne.

LOGAN.

Behold! the Ambassador divine,
 Descending from above,
 To publish to mankind the law
 Of everlasting love!
 On him, in rich effusion pour'd,
 The heavenly dew descends;
 And truth divine he shall reveal,
 To earth's remotest ends.
 No trumpet-sound, at his approach,
 Shall strike the wondering ears;
 But still and gentle breathe the voice
 In which the God appears.
 By his kind hand the shaken reed
 Shall raise its falling frame;
 The dying embers shall revive,
 And kindle to a flame.
 The onward progress of his zeal
 Shall never know decline,
 Till foreign lands and distant isles
 Receive the law divine.
 He who spread forth the arch of heaven,
 And bade the planets roll,
 Who laid the basis of the earth,
 And formed the human soul,
 Thus saith the Lord, "Thee have I sent,
 A Prophet from the sky,
 Wide o'er the nations to proclaim
 The message from on high.
 "Before thy face the shades of death
 Shall take to sudden flight,
 The people who in darkness dwell
 Shall hail a glorious light;
 "The gates of brass shall sunder burst,
 The iron fetters fall;
 The promis'd jubilee of Heaven
 Appointed rise o'er all.
 "And, lo! presaging thy approach,
 The heathen temples shake,
 And, trembling in forsaken fanes,
 The fabled idols quake.
 "I am Jehovah: I am One:
 My name shall now be known;
 No idol shall usurp my praise,
 Nor mount into my throne."
 Lo, former scenes, predicted once,
 Conspicuous rise to view;
 And future scenes, predicted now,
 Shall be accomplish'd too.
 Now, sing a new song to the Lord!
 Let earth his praise resound;
 Ye who upon the ocean dwell,
 And fill the isles around.
 O city of the Lord, begin
 The universal song;
 And let the scattered villages
 The joyful notes prolong.
 Let Kedar's wilderness afar
 Lift up the lonely voice;
 And let the tenants of the rock
 With accent rude rejoice.

O may thy Spirit seal our souls,
 And mould them to thy will,
 That our weak hearts no more may stray,
 But keep thy precepts still;
 That to perfection's sacred height
 We nearer still may rise,
 And all we think, and all we do,
 Be pleasing in thine eyes.

OUR VERSION.

Behold my Servant! see him rise
 Exalted in my might!
 Him have I chosen, and in him
 I place supreme delight.
 On him, in rich effusion pour'd,
 My Spirit shall descend:
 My truths and judgments he shall show
 To earth's remotest end.
 Gentle and still shall be his voice,
 No threats from him proceed;
 The smoking flax he shall not quench,
 Nor break the bruised reed.
 The feeble spark to flames he'll raise;
 The weak will not despise;
 Judgment he shall bring forth to truth,
 And make the fallen rise.
 The progress of his zeal and pow'r
 Shall never know decline,
 Till foreign lands and distant isles
 Receive the law divine.
 He who erected heav'n's bright arch,
 And bade the planets roll,
 Who peopled all the climes of earth,
 And form'd the human soul,
 Thus saith the Lord, Thee have I rais'd,
 My Prophet thee install;
 In right I've rais'd thee, and in strength
 I'll succour whom I call.
 I will establish with the lands
 A covenant in thee,
 To give the Gentile nations light,
 And set the prisoners free:
 Asunder burst the gates of brass;
 The iron fetters fall;
 And gladsome light and liberty
 Are straight restor'd to all.
 I am the Lord, and by the name
 Of great JEHOVAH known;
 No idol shall usurp my praise,
 Nor mount into my throne.
 Lo! former scenes, predicted once,
 Conspicuous rise to view;
 And future scenes, predicted now,
 Shall be accomplish'd too.
 Sing to the Lord in joyful strains!
 Let earth his praise resound,
 Ye who upon the ocean dwell,
 And fill the isles around!
 O city of the Lord! begin
 The universal song;
 And let the scatter'd villages
 The cheerful notes prolong.
 Let Kedar's wilderness afar
 Lift up its lonely voice;
 And let the tenants of the rock
 With accents rude rejoice;
 Till 'midst the streams of distant lands
 The islands sound his praise;
 And all combin'd, with one accord,
 JEHOVAH's glories raise.

O from the streams of distant lands
Unto Jehovah sing !
And joyful from the mountain tops
Shout to the Lord the King !

Let all combined with one accord
Jehovah's glories raise,
Till in remotest bounds of earth
The nations sound his praise.

* Logan was, at one period of his life, one of the ministers of South Leith. He was a person of great accomplishments, and lectured on Universal History, before the establishment of the chair in the University.

† The Rev. William Cameron was minister of the parish of Kirknewton. This collection of Paraphrases is much indebted to Mr Cameron, who was a man of great taste and accomplishments, and who, from the specimens he gave to the world, appears to have had very excellent talents for versification.

‡ Blair, minister of Athelstaneford, East Lothian. He was a pious man and an excellent divine, whose poetical powers are well known from his celebrated poem, "The Grave."

§ Dr Blacklock, minister of Kirkcudbright. He was, in infancy, totally deprived of sight ; but, notwithstanding this infirmity, his blindness did not prevent his engaging with great ardour in literary pursuits. When presented to the parish of Kirkcudbright, his appointment met with strenuous opposition, on account of his blindness. He continued, with the aid of an assistant, to perform the duties of the parish, which he did with much zeal and ability. But the hostile feeling against him, occasioned by his blindness, never altogether abated ; and, in consequence, he retired in a few years, on a competent pension. He was of a lively imagination, and acquired considerable reputation as a poet.

¶ John Morrison, D. D., minister of Canisbay, in the county of Caithness, the most northern parish in Scotland, who was a contemporary and intimate acquaintance of Logan's. He was a native of Aberdeenshire, and was born about the year 1749. By the testimony of all who knew Dr Morrison, he is allowed to have possessed mental powers of the highest order. He was an excellent classical scholar, and an eloquent and accomplished preacher. Of his poetical talents, a very favourable opinion may be conceived from the Paraphrases written by him, which are certainly among the finest in the collection. Besides having a share in the authorship of some others, he is sole author of the 21st, 29th, and 30th. Several effusions of his youthful muse appeared in the Edinburgh Weekly Magazine, under the signature of Musæus. After being settled as a minister, he seems to have confined his attention entirely to the important

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. HENRY MÖWES,

LATE PASTOR OF ALTENHAUSEN AND IVENRODE, PRUSSIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

It was from Germany that the glorious light of the Reformation first issued forth, to dispel the darkness of Papal ignorance and superstition. That country was the seat of the desperate struggle in which a poor but pious monk made head against the power and influence, and wealth and learning, of his age—wielding simply, for their overthrow, “the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.” In process of time Luther died, but the truths which he had fearlessly proclaimed passed from district to district, and from kingdom to kingdom, and multitudes who had bowed submission to the “triple tyrant” threw off the galling yoke of spiritual thralldom, and became partakers of the light and liberty of the Protestant faith. Protestantism has since become powerful in the earth. During the latter half of the last, and in the earlier part of the present century, however, those parts of the Continent of Europe which at one period were blessed to a very great extent with the privileges of the Reformation, have, in the mysterious providence of God, been permitted to fall into errors equally pernicious with those of the Man of Sin—the errors of a cold and rationalizing infidelity. Under such an influence, true religion has been rapidly withering and decaying. The pulpit, the press, and the professor’s chair, have been alike made the vehicle of disseminating, in Germany, in Switzerland, and in France, the poisonous principles to which we now allude.

Of late years, however, symptoms of a better state of things have been beginning to manifest themselves. Infidelity is rapidly giving place to the doctrines of pure evangelical religion, and a spirit of practical piety; and of this return, among the Germans, more especially, to a purer faith, the subject of our present Sketch was, under God, one of the chief instruments. Trained in the school of affliction, he became at once an intelligent and a deeply experienced Christian—one who knew and loved the truth of God, as he felt a delight in imparting its soul-refreshing truths to his fellow-countrymen.

Henry Möwes was born, as the world would say, under an evil star; but we feel inclined to use no such language; we would rather say, that from his birth his was a hard, but, in the highest of all senses, a happy lot. Though deprived, at a very early age, of the care of his earthly parents—his father having died, and his mother having soon after re-married,—yet he became all the more conspicuously a child of Providence. When his “father and mother forsook him, the Lord took him up,” and put it into the heart of a kind uncle to adopt and educate the poor orphan boy. This benevolent man was a pastor in the neighbourhood of Magdeburg, in Prussia, the town where Henry had been born on the 25th of February 1793. The resources of his uncle were scanty, but the little that he had he freely shared with his youthful charge, and reared in this humble, but peaceful dwelling, Henry made rapid progress in the acquisition of knowledge. At length he bethought himself of studying for some profession. His taste was in favour of theology, but the slender income of his uncle was hardly adequate to defray the expenses of such a lengthened course of study as the Church required. He sometimes thought of the army, and for the toils and dangers of a soldier’s life, his bold and indomitable spirit peculiarly fitted him. In boyhood, indeed, he was remarkable for an ardour of temperament, and a quick fiery disposition, which was only subdued at a later period by Divine grace. The Almighty had much work in reserve for this keen irascible youth; and, therefore, by the kindness of Providence, Henry was guided past innumerable shoals and quicksands, and carried to that very position in life, where he would most effectually serve God in his day and generation.

It was decided that young Möwes should enter the University of Gottingen, and thither, accordingly, he proceeded along with a young friend—of the name of Charles Blume, to whom he was devotedly attached. At that time, Gottingen, like the other Universities of Germany, was suffering under the withering blight of Rationalism. Theology was professedly taught, but it was only in name: the reality of the science had almost totally disappeared. It was a system of philosophy—a mass of cold abstractions to which the students listened with the utmost indifference, as to statements in which they had no personal interest whatever. What wonder is it that Scriptural religion should have been utterly a stranger to the mind and to the heart of both teacher and scholar? Both were alike in darkness, and yet from these schools of learning, as they were called, issued a host of men, who from the pulpit of almost every parish in Germany, gave forth their deadly heresies to the ruin of the souls of thousands. “If the blind lead the blind, will they not both fall into the ditch?”

While Möwes was prosecuting his theological studies, the news reached Gottingen of Napoleon’s escape from Elba. The sensation was immediate and universal. The young men of the universities as well as the citizens at large—flew to arms. Among the foremost in volunteering his services on that occasion, was Henry Möwes; and not only did he join the ranks of the army, but he strove to animate his fellow-countrymen, by several spirit-stirring songs which he composed for the purpose. He and his friend Blume were present at the battle of Ligny. Before entering the field they partook, along with the other soldiers, of the Lord’s Supper, but without the slightest feeling in unison with that solemn ordinance. The two friends fought side by side, resolved to stand or fall together. The battle was keen and protracted. At length the Prussian general sounded a retreat. At that moment Blume fell, exclaiming, “Help me; I am wounded: do not leave me, Möwes.” The appeal was unnecessary; Henry stood by his friend, heedless of the battle which was raging around them. Three Prussian soldiers, as they retreated, offered to carry the wounded man across their guns to a place of safety. The offer was gladly accepted, and Möwes assisted to convey his friend from the scene of carnage and of death. They had not gone far, however, when a shower of bullets from the enemy warned them that their lives were in danger. Two of the soldiers fled, leaving poor Blume to the charge of his friend and the remaining soldier. One step more, and the helmet was struck from Möwes' head. The last soldier fled, and the two friends were left alone. Still the spirit of Möwes was undaunted. He listened only to the voice of friendship and humanity. Seizing the wounded man by the clothes, and begging him to hold fast by his arm, he dragged him along. Soon after a second ball pierced the unfortunate Blume, and he sunk upon the ground, imploring his friend to leave him. "Möwes," said he, "save thyself for thy king and thy country; I am lost." The request was complied with, but not without the most painful reluctance. All help he saw to be vain, and he yielded, therefore, to the dictates of self-preservation. Throughout the whole campaign, the young German student acquitted himself with singular bravery; and in the patient endurance of privations he was equally exemplary. Often stretched on the bare ground he lay exposed to the cold and the rain, and yet he maintained the utmost cheerfulness; nothing could subdue the ardour of his spirit. The following incident may interest our readers. We extract it from the published Memoir of Möwes,* which has recently appeared, and which we strongly recommend to our readers as full of events of singular interest.

"The division of cavalry to which Möwes belonged was commanded to take a battery in a village near Paris. The battery stood on the other side of the village, and the only street through which it could be approached lay entirely exposed to it. One division, almost shot to pieces, had given up the attempt when his was ordered to it. They marched up a street, crossing at right angles the one guarded by the battery. Scarcely had the enemy perceived them, when they received a charge of cartouche: they consulted what was to be done; it was resolved to storm the street, whatever it might cost. Möwes was one of the first to enter on the dangerous way. To their surprise, the enemy's battery was silent; the village lay behind them; for a moment they stood still to assemble. Only one officer and six men had ventured; the imminent danger had deterred the rest from advancing. This little corps now looked round on their situation; before them was the battery, on one side two regiments of French infantry, behind, a large house filled with the enemy, who fired incessantly. They must yield as prisoners, or die; they chose the latter, and resolved to sell their lives as dearly as possible. For greater security they placed themselves singly, at some distance from each other, and prepared for the death-struggle. But, remarkably enough, they were not attacked; only a single ball from the house was levelled at them. They saw an officer of rank, escorted by a trumpeter, coming from the enemy's infantry towards them. The officer waved his handkerchief, and the trumpeter sounded. Inexperienced in military affairs, they did not comprehend this movement, nor could they in their situation guess the intention of it. They only saw an attempt to take them prisoners, and chose the best marksman among them to take aim at the officer: their companion did as he was commanded; happily he missed his man, who immediately turned his horse. At a little distance he stood still again, and once more bent his way towards Möwes and his brave companions. They again shot at him, and the same manoeuvre was repeated, till one of them shouted, "He is a parliamentarian;" the officer replied, "I am." They then laid their arms aside, and awaited his arrival. He made himself known to them as General Guilleminot, who had been sent from the enemy's headquarters to negotiate with Prince Blucher. They followed him to the field-marshal, and the war was ended. The consequence of the negotiation was the entrance of the allied powers into Paris. These brave men owed their lives to the circumstance, that, exactly at the moment when they stormed the street, the command was given on the French side to leave off firing. Their own commanding officer had, from a hill on the same side of the village, remarked their gallant conduct, and adjudged to them the iron cross. Möwes had on a former occasion been distinguished by the Russian order of Saint George."

After the war was concluded, and peace proclaimed, young Möwes returned home; and, on his way to Prussia, he passed through Charleroi. Here he enjoyed the high satisfaction of again meeting his friend Blume, whom he had left on the field at Ligny. He had been brought among the wounded to Charleroi, and placed in a private house. The mistress of the house took a peculiar interest in the young man, and watched over him with the most tender assiduity. By the blessing of God, he soon recovered, and was able, in three months after the arrival of Möwes at Charleroi, to accompany him home to Prussia.

On reaching his native land once more, Möwes resolved to complete his studies for the ministry. With that view he attended for some time at the University of Halle. Here, as at Gottingen, the theology taught from the professor's chair was cold and lifeless—incapable of satisfying his ardent spirit. He had not yet become acquainted with Christianity in its practical influence and power, but he felt an earnest craving for a more spiritual system of religion than that which so extensively prevailed, both in and out of the German universities. At the close of his studies, accordingly, he came forth into the world an accomplished scholar, no doubt, but quite incapable of winning souls to Christ—because he himself had not yet been won to the Redeemer. Having left the University of Halle, he returned to Magdeburg, his native city, where he obtained a situation in the school in which he had been educated. He had not long, however, been occupied as a teacher of youth, when, in 1818, he entered into the office of the sacred ministry, and was appointed minister of Angern and Wenddorff. At this period he was united in marriage to the sister of his friend and early companion, Blume; a union which was blessed to their mutual comfort and spiritual advantage.

Möwes commenced his labours as a pastor with extraordinary energy. His own heart was yet a stranger to true, spiritual religion, but he was quite enthusiastic in all that regarded the external reformation of the people. The right conducting of a parish, therefore,—the proper working of the parochial machinery,—he entered into with the utmost ardour and activity. The schools occupied much of his care and attention; he instructed the teachers, and established meetings among them for mutual improvement. He sought to repress all disorderly conduct in his parish, and to encourage morality and good order among the people. To all appearance, in fact, he was one of the most exemplary and most efficient of parish ministers. But his was a mere outward activity and bustle; he had felt nothing of the power of religion in its saving and sanctifying efficacy, and he made no exertions, therefore, to bring his flock to the Cross. The result of his ministry may be readily anticipated. The parish assumed a very pleasing appearance to a mere superficial observer. The people were externally decent and moral, and attentive to the ordinances of religion; but as to all that is vital and experimental in godliness they were in total darkness. They might be thought to have a name to live, but in reality they were in a state of spiritual death. An entire change, at length came over the spirit of the young pastor. His was a mind of no common mould, and the tenacious grasp with which he seized on any new view which occurred to him, led him to ponder his past life and the death-like coldness and icy stillness of that system of theology in which he had been reared. He repaired with eagerness to the Sacred Oracles, as alone able to solve the perplexities by which he was beset. There he learned what he had never known before—the utter depravity and helplessness of man, and the grand, the only, source of pardon, peace, and eternal life. A new light shone upon his soul. He felt that he was lost and undone, and he cast himself at the foot of the cross, exclaiming, “Lord, save me, or I perish.” In this state of mind, it pleased God to reveal his Son in him; and from that time and onward, both as a Christian and a Christian pastor, he walked in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE days of old were days of might,
In forms of greatness moulded;
And flowers of heaven grew on the earth,
Within the Church unfolded—
For grace fell fast as summer dew,
And saints to giant stature grew.

But, one by one, the gifts are gone
That in the Church resided,
And gone the Spirit's living light,
That on her walls abided,
When by our shrines He came to dwell
In power and presence visible.

A blight hath pass'd upon the Church,
Her summer hath departed;
The chill of age is on her sons—
The cold and fearful-hearted;
And sad, amid neglect and scorn,
Our Mother sits and weeps forlorn.

Narrow, and narrower still each year,
The holy circle groweth;
And what the end of all shall be
Nor man nor angel knoweth;
And so we wait and watch in fear—
It may be that the Lord is near!

MASTER AND SERVANT.

AMIDST the many evils that prevail in the present state of society, there is one of a very serious nature, which cannot be too frequently brought under the notice of the public: I mean the inattention of masters to the spiritual concerns of their servants. This inattention has a most pernicious influence on all in this humble station, and especially on the young, who have but little knowledge of Divine truth, and whose religious principles are not yet established. Many parents in the lower walks of society are obliged to put their children to service in their young and tender years, and have it not always in their power to select such a situation for them as they would desire. It is painful to the Christian parent to part with his children in any circumstances; it is doubly painful for him to send them abroad into the wide world with a strong impression, that they will find “no man to care for their souls.” It is too frequently the lot even of those who have been brought up in the fear of the Lord, to enter the families of masters, who will cruelly neglect their spiritual interests. They will vigorously exact from their servants what is, indeed, most proper, the utmost faithfulness in their various employments; but they never instruct them to fear the Lord, and never remind them that they have a Master in heaven. It is, indeed, the heartless and unchristian notion of too many masters, that if they feed their servants, and pay them their wages, they have nothing more to do with them. They treat them, in short, as creatures who are merely concerned in the present state of existence.

The wholesome practice of assembling the whole household for family worship, twice a-day, is entirely banished from many rural districts of our once Christian land; catechising on the evening of the Lord's Day is neglected; much less are the young encouraged to read the Scriptures on the evenings of week-days. Too many of these unhappy children, of both sexes, are so engaged, as to be prevented from attending either church or Sabbath school; and the very remembrance of God and of religion is in danger of being banished from their minds, as they may not see the Bible in the hand of their master, or hear a pious sentiment from his lips, from one end of the year to the other. When the young and thoughtless are exposed to such an example as this, the result cannot fail to be disastrous. They are but too likely to forget the counsels and the example of godly parents, and conform themselves to the graceless and unholy practices that are constantly before their eyes. They will begin to neglect the Word of God, to omit secret prayer, to profane the Sabbath, and to imbibe a spirit of indifference or of positive dislike to all that is sacred. O how frequently do well-disposed parents find, to their unspeakable sorrow, when their children return, it may be at the end of a year's service, that they have forgotten all the little learning which they once possessed; and have, besides, contracted such a disrelish for reading, that it is difficult to persuade them to resume the labours of education! And, what is still worse, while they have ceased to address God in prayer, they have learned to blaspheme his holy name. O how many unhappy boys and girls may lay the ruin of their souls at the door of an unprincipled master or mistress! O that heads of families would take warning, and begin without delay to encourage their young servants to read the Scriptures, to be regular in their secret devotions, and to keep the Sabbath holy! Let them begin to treat their servants as rational creatures, who are possessed of never-dying souls, and who, while in their service, are as truly committed to their care as their own children.

The fruits of the unhappy training, referred to above, are seen in after life. When servants grow up in a habitual disregard of religious observances, and especially with low ideas of the sacredness of the Lord's Day, they will be very irregular in attending public worship, and will deem it perfectly allowable to visit their friends on that holy day; and thus they not only lose every serious impression that might have been made on their minds in the house of God, but contract unspeakable guilt by "thinking their own thoughts, and speaking their own words, and finding their own pleasures," on God's blessed Sabbath; not to mention the injury which they occasion to others, in leading them to mispend the precious hours that should be devoted to the service of their God and Saviour. Were masters as careful in looking after their servants on Sabbath as on week-days—were they as jealous of the honour of their Divine Master as they are of their own interests—this crying evil might be greatly diminished, if not altogether removed. Had masters a true reverence for the Sabbath as the Lord's Day, and a day, therefore, which is not at their disposal, they would not only give no encouragement to Sabbath visiting on the part of their servants, but they would refuse to take any one into their service who would not come bound neither to pay visits, nor to receive visitors on the day of sacred rest; and, to encourage their servants to enter into so reasonable an engagement, they would cheerfully agree, on their own part, to make the trifling sacrifice of allowing them, from time to time, to visit their friends on week-days. This is, indeed, all that any master or mistress can do without sin. To say to a servant, "I will allow you to visit your friends on Sunday," is just saying, I will authorise you to disobey God, or rather, I will compel you to violate the fourth commandment—seeing no other time will be given you for recreation but the Sabbath-day. Let masters reflect on the impiety towards God, and the injustice towards a fellow-creature involved in such conduct, and let them cease from giving to others a portion of time which does not belong to themselves. They will thus do their duty to God and their neighbour, and "hide a multitude of sins."

ISRAEL SELF-DESTROYED:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. JAMES FRENCH,
Minister of East Kilbride, Lanarkshire.

"O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself."—Hos. xiii. 9.

THE Gospel of our salvation serveth at once to humble and to exalt us. Like certain medicines for the body, it first opens and searches the wounds, which it is intended to heal. The former of these operations is as necessary as the latter, though far from being so pleasing. It is painful for us to reflect on our natural character and state, and from that very consideration some are prevented from accepting the Gospel for the remission of sins. They are afraid to look into themselves, lest they should discover what would mortify and alarm them. "They hate the light, and will not come unto the light, lest their deeds should be reproved." But it is certainly much wiser for us to submit to all the pain, which a reflection upon our past conduct may now occasion to us, while there is yet hope of deliverance, than to shut our eyes against real danger, and to flatter ourselves with a vain imagination of safety, saying,

"Peace, peace, when there is no peace." We are this day assembled for the special purpose of humbling ourselves before the Lord our Maker, in the prospect of the solemn sacrament of the Supper. I hope, therefore, through the blessing of God, it may not be unprofitable to the purpose of our present meeting, if I attempt to illustrate the important, though melancholy, truth delivered in our text, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." The words, you see, are addressed by God himself, not to the heathen, "who knew not God," nor were possessed of suitable means of knowing him, but to Israel, his chosen people, who possessed the most precious privileges, and who, particularly, had the law of God in their hands, which ought to have been "a light to their feet and a lamp to their paths." Yet, notwithstanding all their valuable privileges it is declared, even to them, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." This declaration contains two parts, which it may be proper to consider distinctly.

I. Israel is in a state of destruction and of misery.

II. He is himself the author of his own destruction.

I shall not now consume your time by illustrating the application of this heavy charge to the ancient Israel. I believe, none here present will dispute the application of it in that view. But it is of far more consequence for us to consider, whether the same charge may not be brought home to ourselves; that, if it should be so, we may be duly humbled on that account, and may, by the blessing of God upon our convictions, be persuaded to prize and to accept the remedy provided in the Gospel. Considering it then in that general view, not with regard to any particular nation or individual, but with regard to all mankind, I say,

First, They are in a state of destruction and of misery. And surely, one should think, we need not go far for a proof of that assertion. If the misery be real, it must be felt. It may be felt, however, and yet not be acknowledged. Men are often ashamed to confess their real feelings upon this subject. "While each man walks in a vain show, they vex themselves in vain. He heaps up wealth and doth not know who shall gather it." But I appeal to the experience of every man, whether this world be not in itself, independent of the Gospel, one continued scene of misery and woe? This at least is the testimony of Solomon concerning it, that "there is no profit under the sun, that all is vanity and vexation of spirit." "It is by the sweat of our brow that we must earn our bread," and when we have earned it, we have but little satisfaction in the enjoyment of it. But, besides the necessary and felt insufficiency of all earthly things to afford complete, or indeed any enjoyment, how many direct and positive ills molest human life? Is not "man born to trouble as the sparks fly upward?" To how many distresses and calamities are we continually subject, in our persons, in our substance, and in those who are dear to us? Is there a person, is there a situation in life, which is exempt from trouble of various kinds? Nay, even when all things around us are quiet, and give us no uneasiness, yet do we not find something within, which gnaws our vitals, and which makes us miserable? Many, indeed, there be, who say, "who will show us any good?" But where is the man who hath found that good? Where is the man who is satisfied with his condition, who desireth no more, who aspireth no higher? all seek after happiness; but happiness, like a vain shadow, flieth from their pursuit, and eludeth their most eager grasp. But, allowing that this life were freer from trouble than it really is; allowing, what no doubt is the truth, that some men have less trouble than others, yet death is an universal law. None can escape from his dominion, none can elude his grasp. He spareth neither rank, nor age, nor sex. The rich and the poor, the high and the low, the wise man and the fool, must equally fall by his all-conquering and undistinguishing hand. "There is no man that hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit, neither hath he power in the day of death; and there is no discharge in that war." These things have not failed to strike thinking men in all ages and nations, and to make a deep impression upon their minds. Neither is there any subject which hath more frequently exercised the thoughts nor employed the pen of the poet, and of the philosopher, and of the moralist, than the various distresses and calamities of human life, and particularly the universal dominion of death. Can it then be denied, that man is in a state of wretchedness and destruction? But whence ariseth that melancholy state of things? It is certain that it cannot be the natural state of things; as they are the workmanship of God, nothing can proceed from his hand, but what is "very good" for the purpose for which it was intended. The text suggests to us the answer to that question, which was the Second thing we proposed to consider, "O Israel," saith the great Jehovah, "thou hast destroyed thyself."—Not only is Israel destroyed, but he is his own destroyer. He hath himself entirely to blame for all the misery which hath come upon him. It is sin, that abominable thing which the Lord hates, that hath brought a curse upon this lower world, and hath inscribed upon it those characters of vanity and wretchedness, which it so obviously bears. "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now," by reason of human guilt. It is our sins that have brought death into the world, and all our woe. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; so death hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Misery, my brethren, is the necessary consequence of sin, both in the nature of things, and by the constitution of God. "The soul that sinneth shall die," is an irreversible decree of the divine government. Sooner shall heaven and earth pass away, sooner shall the mountains be removed and be cast into the midst of the sea, than that sentence be repealed. For indeed it doth not depend upon God to make the sinner miserable; for, as long as he continueth a sinner, he must be miserable in the very nature of things. He hugs in his bosom his own tormentor. You may as soon separate light and heat from the sun, as separate sin from misery. Can a man take fire into his bosom and his clothes not be burnt? Can he go upon hot coals and his feet not be burnt? But here still another question ariseth, Whence came sin into the world, a thing so opposite to the nature of God, and which tendeth so much to introduce confusion and disorder into his works? The Scriptures furnish us with an answer to that question also. There we are told, that man was created innocent, righteous, and happy, having the divine image stamped upon his soul, and being fully furnished with all that was requisite to make him completely blessed. The whole range of this earth was given him for his inheritance, and all the creatures it contains were made subject to his dominion. To complete his blessedness, he possessed the conscious favour of his Maker. The light of God's countenance was itself his most precious enjoyment, and served to improve the relish of all other enjoyments. One only restraint was put upon him amidst all this wealth, and that was prescribed as a small but reasonable test of subjection to his Maker; viz., that, being thus blessed in every possible respect, he should refrain from eating the fruit of a particular tree, which was pointed out to him, upon pain of death; for it was expressly declared, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Man transgressed the commandment and incurred the penalty. He virtually renounced subjection to his Maker, and so became miserable; became miserable in time, and incurred misery through eternity. Many unprofitable questions have been instituted upon this subject, respecting the decrees and purposes of infinite wisdom. Suffice it for us, however, to deplore the melancholy fact which cannot be disputed. It is vain for us curiously to pry into the counsels of the Almighty. We may and ought to rest in the general conclusion of the wisest of men; "Lo, this only have I found, that God made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions." "God made man upright;" that is, the species was created upright; he, from whom the race of men was to descend, and only he, was so created. "But they have sought out many inventions." The defection is general, nay, universal, from the dominion and authority of God. No single man cometh now into the world in a state of uprightness; for "man is born as a wild ass's colt," ignorant, stubborn, and obstinate in wickedness. It was the confession of the pious Psalmist, and surely we cannot decline making the same confession, "Behold, I am shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." Indeed, doth not the general history of mankind, as well as the particular experience of every individual, ratify that confession? It is a general principle in nature, that every thing partakes of the nature of its original. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; that which is born of the spirit is spirit." That which proceeds from impurity must itself be impure; and that only can be pure which hath a pure origin. "For who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one. Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet waters and bitter? Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive-berries? either a vine figs? So can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh." "What then is man, that he should be clean? or he that is born of a woman that he should be righteous? Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints! Yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight! How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water!" That reasoning is clear and convincing. But let us appeal to fact and experience, and see whether these do or do not confirm the argument. What is the history of every nation under heaven but a history of the crimes of men? Do we read of any one nation, whatever have been the privileges bestowed upon them from on high, who have yet served God perfectly in their generation? "Have they not all gone astray from the womb? Have they not together become unprofitable? There is none that hath done good; no, not one." Nay, have not those nations, who have advanced farthest in human science, been distinguished only by their swerving so much the farther from the ways of truth and of righteousness? As for Israel, who were more highly favoured than any nation, the text itself is immediately addressed to them; so there can be no doubt with respect to them, that they had "destroyed themselves."

But it is possible that large bodies of men may be very corrupt, and yet some few individuals may be found among them, who are of a different character. But is that indeed the case? Setting aside the consideration of nations, hath there ever appeared any single mere man who hath served God perfectly in his generation? Different degrees of corruption there may be in different men. But where was ever man found who was entirely without sin? who could lay his hand upon his heart and say, "I have made my heart pure, I am clean from sin?" On the contrary, do not the fairest characters owe our admiration of them only to our distance from them? On a nearer inspection, doth not their lustre fade, and do they not discover blemishes and imperfections, which greatly diminish our respect for them? Hath not that very circumstance given rise to the known proverb, Familiarity breeds contempt.

But, to bring the matter a little nearer us, let each of us put the question to his own breast, Canst thou plead exemption from that general corruption which hath universally infected the human race? Have "all flesh" besides "corrupted their ways?" And art thou the only exception? Is it not reasonable to presume, that that cannot be the case? and that, if we imagine it to be the case, the false imagination proceeds from some vile deceit lurking in our breast, and concealing the truth from our view? Thus, at least, thought Job: "If I say, I have no sin, mine own mouth shall condemn me; if I say, I am perfect, that also shall prove me perverse." Thus also thought the Apostle John: "If we say, we have no sin, we lie and do not the truth; if we say, we have no sin, we commit a very great sin; for we make God a liar, and his word is not in us." In judging with respect to ourselves, we must beware of forming our judgment by a false standard. We must not judge of ourselves in comparison with other men; for we may not have gone such great lengths in wickedness as they, and yet we may still be "far from righteousness." There may be circumstances in their case which may make their most heinous sins more tolerable than our smaller transgressions. Neither ought we to judge by the opinions which others entertain of us; for they look only on the outward appearance, and even of that can see but a small part, but cannot look upon the heart. The only standard by which we ought to form our judgment is the Law of God—that perfect rule of righteousness by which we shall be justified, and by which we shall be condemned. Now "What is written in the law? how readest thou?" Dost thou read this as "the first and great commandment, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength?" And canst thou indeed say, that thou hast acted fully up to that "first and great commandment?" Hast thou never at any time loved any thing else more than God? Hath he indeed been always supreme and unrivalled in thine affections? Hast thou at all times yielded an implicit and universal obedience to his commandments and submission to his will—not suffering thyself to be in any respect deficient either in gratitude for mercies received, or in resignation under trials endured? Thou readest also, that it is ranked as "the second commandment of the law," and declared to be "like unto the first, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Apply that, therefore, as a test to thine own conduct, and see whether or not thou hast completely fulfilled it. Hast thou, indeed, at all times borne that sincere and unfeigned good-will to thy neighbour which that commandment enjoins? Have malice and envy never found any place in thy breast? Hast thou never been angry with thy brother without a cause? Hast thou loved not only those who were kind and friendly to thee, but those also who have offended thee? Hast thou "loved even thine enemies?" Hast thou "blessed them that cursed thee, done good to them that hated thee, and prayed for them that despitefully used thee and persecuted thee?" Hath thy love been "without dissimulation?" Hast thou loved, "not in name only, but in deed and in truth?" Hast thou never "spoken evil against thy brother, nor slandered thine own mother's son?" Hast thou never withheld good from them to whom it was due? Have thine ear, and thy heart, and thy hand, been always open to the cry of the destitute? When it was in the power of thy hand to do it, hast thou always "delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him?" These, my brethren, are some of the questions by which we ought to try ourselves; and happy, indeed, should he be whose conscience should enable him to give a satisfactory answer. It doth not follow, however, that they whose conscience checks them not are not liable to the charge of transgression. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?" The young man in the Gospel answered, with great confidence, "All these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?" But our Lord soon repelled his presumption, and made manifest the secret deceitfulness of his heart. "Go then," said he, "and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow me, that thou mayest have treasure in heaven." "When the young man heard that," we are told, "he went away sorrowful, because he had great possessions."

But some one perhaps will say, True, indeed, I feel I am destroyed. I feel that I have offended against God and my neighbour, and that I am wholly unable to abide the test of the divine Law. But I cannot think myself chargeable with my own destruction. For have I not brought that corruption into the world with me? And how can I be chargeable with that which I have no power to prevent or to amend? In answer to that objection, let me beseech thee to consider what sort of inability it is thou art under to keep the law of God. Is it a natural, or only a moral, inability? Is it that thou hast not faculties wherewith to serve him? or is it that thou hast no inclination to employ those faculties which thou dost possess in his service? If the former be the case, thy excuse is just. If God doth indeed require that of thee which thou art under a natural inability to perform, in that case thou art not chargeable with guilt in any part of thy conduct. In that case, indeed, God would be—let us speak it with reverence—"an austere Master, reaping where he hath not sown, and gathering where he hath not strowed." But who will presume to say that? Who will charge the great Judge of all the earth with such a piece of injustice? Hast thou not an understanding, a will, and affections? Hast thou not a tongue, and hands, and feet? And what hindereth thee from employing those powers of thy mind, and those members of thy body, in the service of the Lord thy Maker, as well as in the service of other and worse masters? Art thou under any constraint to disobey God against thy will? or rather, doth not the consent of thy will go along with every offence thou committest? Dost thou not feel thy duty to be thy burden, and that it is the surest desire of thy heart, that the law of God were not in the way, that there were no threatening denounced against sin, that so thou mightst proceed in the commission of it without constraint or control? And canst thou plead it as an excuse for thy conduct that thou hast no inclination to serve God, that thy heart is estranged from him, and that it is wedded to another? Would such an excuse as that be admitted at any human bar? And dost thou imagine that it shall be admitted at the bar of Infinite Justice? Nay, but "out of thine own mouth shalt thou be condemned, thou wicked servant." Do not thine own heart and conscience condemn thee? When thou wilt allow them to speak, are not they thy bitterest accusers? Do they not sometimes, in spite of all thy devices to put them to silence, present to thy troubled mind the awful forebodings of future judgments? And, "if thine own heart condemn thee, how much more he who is greater than thy heart, and who knoweth all things." Besides, what advantage dost thou derive from it, although thou shouldst justify thyself, since that can never alter the nature of things, nor procure thee any release from that misery which thou hast brought upon thyself by thine iniquities? If thou art far from God, thou must perish, be the cause of thy distance from him what it will. Least of all can such excuses be sustained, when the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is taken into view, which, being a complete remedy for all our spiritual maladies, must take away every shadow of excuse for continuing in sin. It maketh excuses for the guilt of sin wholly unnecessary; because it proclaimeth pardon and reconciliation to the chief of sinners, if they will only believe in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God. It also leaveth us wholly inexcusable in the commission of sin; because it offereth effectual aid to enable us to resist it. Where then, O sinner, are all thy excuses for the commission of sin? Thou sayest, thou art unable to keep the law of God; here is ability provided for thee, if thou wilt only accept it. "Thou hast indeed destroyed thyself, but in me," saith the great God, "in me is thy help." Thou art indeed "insufficient of thyself to think any thing as of thyself; but thy sufficiency is of God." If thou reject the remedy, thou must be wholly inexcusable for so doing, and canst have no reason to complain, though thou be thyself also rejected of Him whom thou hast despised, and "whose counsel thou hast rejected against thyself." In particular, thou mayest no longer complain of thine inability to serve God, seeing that, when his grace was offered to be made sufficient for thee, thou hast utterly despised it. Thou hast said in effect unto the Lord, "I will not have thee to reign over me; depart from me, I desire not the knowledge of thy ways." But wilt ye indeed still resist the offer of divine grace? The Lord calleth, inviteth, beseecheth, and commandeth you to come unto him; and will ye indeed say unto him, We will not come unto thee, we will abide in our sins, however earnest thou mayst be to deliver us from them. We choose death rather than life—eternal misery rather than eternal happiness? Will ye indeed thus address the God of all grace? "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people, and unwise? Is he not thy Father, that hath bought thee? Hath he not made thee, and established thee?" Would to God that thou even now, in this thy day, wouldst mind the things which belong to thy peace; thou knowest not how soon they may be hid from thine eyes; but remember that if, after all, thou be destroyed, thy destruction cometh of thyself. "Nothing could have been done more for his vineyard, which the Lord hath not done in it; if, therefore, when he looketh that it should bring forth grapes, it bring forth wild grapes," in that case, "he will be just when he speaketh, and clear when he judgeth." In that case, none shall be able to offer any thing in arrest of judgment, when he shall not only pronounce, but execute, against the barren fig-tree that awful sentence, "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground."

Nor ought this subject to be wholly unprofitable even to those who have already believed on the name of the Son of God. Suffer not yourselves to forget whence ye were taken, nor the misery of that state from which ye have been delivered. "Look to the rock, whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit, whence ye were digged;" and, while ye rejoice in the blessings to which ye are now called, preserve, at the same time, an humbling sense of the baseness of your origin, that so ye may be "to the praise of the riches of divine grace in Christ Jesus." That which teacheth you humility, ought also to kindle the flame of gratitude in your hearts. When you reflect on the misery you have escaped, and contrast it with the happiness you now enjoy, what gratitude is not due to your God and Saviour! Once ye were "children of wrath, even as others;" but "now ye are washed, now ye are sanctified, now ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of the living God." Once ye "sat in darkness, and in the region and shadow of death;" but "now are ye light in the Lord. Walk as children of light, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Let these two kindred graces of humility and gratitude, accompany you to the solemn service now in view, "and ye shall find rest unto your souls." The spiritual food provided for you shall then be sweet unto your taste, and the banner of your Redeemer over you shall be love.

A MOTHER'S SOLILOQUY OVER HER CHILD, IMMEDIATELY AFTER ITS DECEASE.

BY WILLIAM FINDLAY.

THOU'RT gone, my little innocent,
I marked thy latest sigh.
Where is thy little spirit now?—
It surely hovers nigh;
For little can I see of death
About thy lovely form,—
Thine eye still seems to gaze on me:
Thy little bosom's warm.

A sweet smile plays around thy lip,
Which still retains its red;
Thy hair is glossy, as in life—
And yet, my child, thou'rt dead;
For, oh! thine eye is lustreless,
And pale, pale, is thy brow—
Thou seest not, thou heed'st not,
Thy tender mother now.

I bore thee with a mother's pains,
Yet with a mother's joy—
When first I saw thy smiling face
I kiased my darling boy;
And when upon thy beating breast
I felt thy breath warm glow,
I thought my lot a happy one—
But I'm bereaved now.

The bud was young, and promised fair;
For well I could destry
The opening of thy infant mind,
The quiet glance of thine eye;
And so, with fond maternal hope,
I scann'd life's future page—
I trusted thou hadst been the prop
Of my declining age.

But faith and hope their light must lend,
Though clouds around may lour;—
And with the thought console me,
In this dark and trying hour,
That though, my child, thy body lies
Beneath the cold green sod,
Thy spirit has ascended
To its "Father and its God."

That so, when the archangel comes,
My child, thou mayst arise,
And mix with the unnumbered throng
Ascending to the skies;
There to receive thy final doom,
And hear thy Judge decree,
If thou shalt be in happiness,
Or endless misery.

Effects of Faith.—The effect of strong faith in the righteousness of Christ, is honourable to the grace, holiness, and truth of God: in raising the believer above fear, above guilt, above the love of sin, the love of the world, the fear of death and judgment. He tries to doubt and cannot. Grace reigns. He looks to the law, his sins, his duties, his heart; and Christ hath the pre-eminence in justifying him. He tries to fear—he would suspect himself—he would think the blessing too great; but grace prevails. The blood and righteousness of Christ overcome; and he overcomes by them. He asks, "What shall I say to these things?" Less than this would leave me in condemnation; more I cannot enjoy. It exactly meets my condition; and is worthy the love, the wisdom, the justice and truth of God. If true, it is all I need; if false, I am still miserable: but if the Word of God decide, it is full of grace and truth; and I am filled with peace. A soul enjoying its justification, is spiritual in devotion, grateful for mercies, patient in tribulation, resigned under bereavements, zealous for the purity of the Gospel, diligent in promoting its reception, affectionate to Christ and his people. In such a soul, the doctrine of justification is full of the power and increase of God, in humility, purity, joyful hope and admiration of the work of the Saviour, the operation of the Spirit, and the reign of grace in the Father. The rich, in the enjoyment of this blessing, are secured from the snares of prosperity; doubly happy in their temporal blessings, and liberal to the church and the poor. The poor believer, exalted in the righteousness of Christ, enjoys his little earthly good with contentment, submission and gratitude; and becomes a blessing to his family, an example to the church, and faithful to his employer. It sanctifies his temper, fortifies him for trials, secures the improvement of his time, and renders his whole conversation becoming the Gospel.—REV. JOHN COOKE. (Select Remains.)

God's Providence.—I dare not expound His dealings as sorrow and unbelief often dictate to me. I look often with my bleared and blind eyes, to my Lord's cross; and when I look to the wrong side of the cross, I know that I miss a step, and slide.—RUTHERFORD.

Evil Speaking.—It is not good to speak evil of all whom we know bad; it is worse to judge evil of any, who may prove good. To speak ill upon knowledge, shows a want of charity; to speak ill upon suspicion, shows a want of honesty. I will not speak so bad as I know of many; I will not speak worse than I know of any. To know evil by others, and not speak it, is sometimes discretion; to speak evil by others, and not know it, is always dishonesty. He may be evil himself who speaks good of others upon knowledge, but he can never be good himself, who speaks evil of others upon suspicion.—WARWICK.

PART II.

IN reading the account of Moses' "ark of bulrushes daubed with slime," a British reader, judging by comparison with the products of his own soil, often thrills at the idea of extreme insecurity which the description is apt to present to his fancy. On the banks of the Nile his fears would be abated. There, the bulrushes grow at this day—thick, strong, tough reeds, fit when united to bear a man not less than an infant; and many of the native boats are still to be seen plastered over with no other substance than the glutinous slime of the Nile, instead of pitch and tar. In like manner, judging solely from home experience, the illiterate is often surprised and at a loss to conjecture what the process of brick-making alluded to in Exod. v. 7-18, can possibly be. On the banks of the Nile that process is still abundantly exemplified. The bricks are not first fashioned—piled up, and then subjected to a furnace heat as in our native country. No; straw, or stubble is collected in large quantities, cut or chopped into small pieces—intermingled with a large mass of the clayey slime to render it more tenacious; and lastly, when portions of this mixture have been separated and moulded into their destined shapes, they are spread out and exposed to harden in the sun. Sun-made bricks of this composition of straw and clay often become as enduring as granite rocks. In beholding ever and anon a solitary fisherman labouring with his hand-nets on the margin of the river, how significant appeared the rebellious and ungrateful murmuring of the Israelites in the wilderness: "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," (Numb. xi. 5.) Nor could we be less struck with the singular juxtaposition of the words which follow: "the cucumbers, the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic." For, turning towards the interior, it was apparent to the eye that Egypt land is not less productive than in days of yore, in these and other similar vegetable productions. Here too, was the stately "palm," the most juicy of all trees, reminding us of the beautiful similitude of the Psalmist, "the righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree, they shall bring forth in old age, they shall be fat and flourishing" (Psalm xli. 12-14); and the "pomegranate, the almond, and the olive," and scores of other products emblemized or consecrated in the parables and narratives of the Book of Life. How vividly, also, were these visible effects of the annual rising and overflowing of the Nile calculated to illustrate the bold imagery of the prophet, "Egypt riseth up like a flood, and his waters are moved like the rivers?" Jer. xli. 6.

The process of irrigation, every where exhibited, seemed to clothe with new significancy many passages of Scripture. A deep well is sunk close by the river's bank. By means of a narrow connecting channel, deepened in proportion as the river subsides, the well is constantly replenished. Above the sunken well or fountain is a vertical wheel, around which is made to revolve a series of from twenty to sixty earthen jars or pitchers with narrow necks. These, bound to two parallel ropes, as the wheels revolve, are made to descend with their open mouths towards the surface of the water. Therein they dip or plunge, and, when filled, ascend with their aqueous burden on the other side. On passing their zenith altitude, so to speak, they are again turned upside down, and discharge their contents into a large wooden trough or cistern, which, communicating with the main trunk of the small irrigating canals, maintain an uninterrupted supply through a thousand wide-spreading branches. Is it not from this peculiarly oriental process that the imagery in Eccles. xii. 6, has been taken?—when the Royal Preacher, under different emblems, so graphically portrays the dissolution of our earthly tabernacle?—when, as if with his eyes fixed on the piece of rude but important machinery, now described, he speaks of the "pitcher broken at the fountain and of the wheel broken at the cistern?" In the process of irrigation in a country like Egypt, suppose the "pitcher and the wheel" to be literally "broken at the cistern and fountain," what must follow? In many places it was our lot actually to witness a broken "wheel and pitcher"—broken and deserted, through neglect or oppression. What was the visible effect? Deprived of its moisture, and consequently of its vegetative powers, the land became an easy prey to the loose drifting sands of the desert. All annual and biennial products had disappeared. The spaces between the irrigating furrows were completely filled up. While even the more sturdy perennials, such as the sycamore, half-buried in wreaths and knolls of sand, began to exhibit a withered and drooping aspect. What a striking picture of the melancholy aspect of the human frame!—once mantled over with the verdure of youth and the multiplying fruitfulness of riper years—when the fountain of the heart, with its cistern, and wheel, and pitcher—its ventricles, tubes, veins, and arteries for the reception, propulsion, and distribution of that blood which is "the life of man;"—when all, all, emptied and broken, cease to discharge their life-sustaining functions! How felicitous beyond all previous conception did the graphic imagery of the sacred penman appear amid the broken wheels and broken pitchers which occasionally exhibited to the eye such death-like desolation, even on the banks of the Nile!

Again, the water, when raised, as already remarked, is made to flow in a central trench or canal. This canal is often artificially elevated several feet above the surrounding fields. From the sides of it are made to diverge numberless smaller transverse ridges parallel to each other, with a scooped or hollowed line running along the crest for the flow of the water. Across these again, and consequently intersecting them at right angles, a similar series of parallel ridges is formed—thus converting the whole field into a sort of mosaic or parterre of small square spaces; in all of which, if the husbandman wills, produce of different qualities may be reared, as he has the regulation of the needful supply of water absolutely in his own power. But why dwell so minutely on this process? The reason may be briefly stated. When the cultivator is to let in the necessary supply of water, on any one of the small squares in which the seed has been sown, how does he proceed? He walks alongside of the narrow ridge, and without any instrument in his hands, and without even bending down, he makes a small opening in it with his foot—when the desired quantity of water has poured in, he returns, and with his foot shuts it up again. Does not this process at once illustrate a passage in the Bible, which, to the natives of northern climes, must otherwise appear not only obscure but unintelligible? "Thou sowest thy seed, and waterest it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs." Deut. xi. 10.

All travellers in Egypt must be struck with the multitudes of dogs which prowl about in all directions, maintaining by night especially, a perpetual chorus of discord. Of these it is said that the French, during the invasion of Napoleon, killed thousands. But they were not long in multiplying and replenishing the land. If we suppose—and there is no want of verisimilitude in the supposition, that this domestic animal so superabounded in the days of old, what a new and unthought-of emphasis does it give to a memorable passage in Exodus? On that awful night—that night of darkness, distress, and horror, when the children of Israel were besought by the tyrant Pharaoh to march out in haste; what an image of the intensity of the panic, the universality of the consternation, is afforded to us, were, notwithstanding the bustle, noise and confusion inevitably consequent on the sudden uprising and departure of 600,000 men, besides women and children, and "a mixed multitude" of Egyptians and others; it could be said, that "not a dog moved his tongue against man or beast?"

One evening, in walking along the banks of the river, a large herd of cows and buffaloes was seen rushing into the shallow waters on the opposite side. Five or six herd-boys, following close behind, first waded a certain distance into the gentle current, and then nimbly leaped, each on the shoulders of a cow or buffalo, holding fast for awhile by the horns, and eventually standing upright, being able to maintain their balance without any subsidiary aid. As each individual of the herd got beyond its depth, it swam, the entire body being submerged, and nought visible above save the uplifted nostrils. When carried down, a considerable distance, by the rapidity of the middle stream, all, to the eye, seemed wholly to disappear, save the few slender and trifling forms of the herd-boys. At length, however, on reaching the farther bank they suddenly started up from the water, as if they had really emerged for the first time out of the river, and speedily began to graze on the meadow. By local association the incidents of Joseph's history were instantly revived on the tablets of memory. And when it was remembered that this was the very stream by which Pharaoh once dreamt he stood, what a freshness of colouring seemed thrown over the description,—“And behold, there came up out of the river seven well-favoured kine, and they fed in a meadow?” Gen. xli. 2.

With such or similar objects constantly recurring—the enumeration of which might be greatly extended—objects of present and retrospective interest, time glided pleasantly away till we found ourselves landed at Boulaq, the river port of Cairo, distant about two miles. What fancy has not glowed with accounts of the unrivalled magnificence of Cairo?—Cairo, “the proud city of the Kaliph, the delight of the imagination, greatest among the great, whose splendor and opulence made the prophet smile?” And certainly there is one view of it which does look at once novel and superb; it is that from the rocky fortress so greatly strengthened and adorned by Yusuf or Saladin, the antagonist hero of the Crusades. The relative position of the fortress may be thus represented. Between Cairo and the sea, northward, the whole country is flat. Immediately contiguous to it on the south, commences the mountain chain of Makattan, an arid naked range of calcareous rock; which, at a varying, unequal distance, runs southward nearly parallel to the Nile, enclosing the eastern side of the valley as with an enormous perpendicular wall. On the abruptly terminating angular point of this lofty ridge, as it frowns in barrenness on the verdant Delta of the Nile, is built the citadel of the Kaliph, where are to be seen stupendous columns of red granite from ancient Memphis; the well of Saladin, about twelve feet square and three hundred feet deep, excavated in the solid rock down to the level of the Nile; the enclosure, where the last of the Mameluke Beys with hundreds of their followers, after having been invited by Mahomed Ali to a friendly feast, were treacherously and barbarously massacred; and, alongside of that fatal spot, the new mosque of Egyptian alabaster, now rearing at the expense of the Pasha, as if in atonement for his many crimes of cruelty and blood. From a salient angle of this citadel there is a panoramic view—embracing an uncommon assemblage of objects of singularly varied and blended interest. Immediately under and around its base are seen spreading out, on the one hand, the rains and aqueduct of Old Cairo; and on the other, the splendid tombs and mausoleums of the Kaliph;—with the walls, the turreted battlements, and the three hundred minarets of New Cairo lying between. On the west, chiefly between the city and the Nile, lie the gardens and palaces of the Pashas, Beys, and other Turkish nobles; then the “exulting the abounding river” itself—on the other side of which stretch out fields of emerald green, hemmed in, at the distance of ten or twelve miles, by the bleak line of sand and rock which terminates the Lybian Desert; the platform of which is surmounted by the great Pyramids of Ghizah. Turning to the south, the fertile vale is seen ascending towards Thebes; with the forest of palm trees, at no great distance, which enshrouds the ruins of Memphis, the city of the Pharaohs, and overshadows the spot that has been consecrated by the deliverance of the infant Moses; and, overlooking the whole, the pyramids of Sakhara, reared on a cape-like projection of the elevated range of the desert. Confronting the north, the boundless plain of the Delta expands before the spectator,—with the ruins of Heliopolis or On, the city of the sun—the city of the Patriarch Joseph's father-in-law, and famed as a seat of learning even in a land which was the cradle of philosophy and science: beyond these, the field and the solitary tree, under whose branches tradition represents Joseph and Mary as having reposed, when "they fled with the young child to Egypt," and which, as the recompense for such hospitable shelter, has been blessed with "miraculous longevity and eternal verdure;"—and, strangely interblended with all these and similar objects of antiquarian or sacred association, the present Pascha's polytechnic school, cotton manufactories, foundries, and powder-mills! To the east, opens up the great desert of the Red Sea, where the children of Israel once wandered under the guidance of the cloudy pillar—the chosen symbol of Jehovah's presence. In the whole world beside it would perhaps be difficult to find, spread out, from one point of view, so singularly diversified a combination of the great and the small, the noble and the vile, the stable and the frail, the rare and the common, the beautiful and the unsightly, the ancient and the modern, the sacred and the profane;—vast arched aqueducts and ditch-like canals, rich gardens and barren rubbish, verdant plains and desert wastes, living streams and naked rocks, minaretted mosques and tattered booths, palaces and tombs, pyramids and mud-huts, venerable relics of wisdom and obtrusive memorials of folly, marvellous remembrances of the forbearance and goodness of God, and striking monuments of the ambition and tyranny of man!

To the eye, viewing most of these objects externally and at a distance, the grand and the interesting may seem most to predominate. A closer inspection will usually serve to banish much of the illusion. Begin with the city of Cairo, the centre of the panoramic scene. From the elevated point of observation nought is discerned but the flat or ballustrated roofs of the houses, the cupolas and minarets of the mosques. Descend towards it, enter the interior, and its principal streets are soon found so tortuous and narrow as scarcely any where to admit a single wheeled vehicle passing, and often not more than a single donkey. The houses, shooting up many storeys in height, exhibit towards the streets little more than blank like prison-walls—save where, here and there, a grated aperture tends to confirm the suspicion that one is traversing a city of jails and condemned criminals. Far on high, a wooden framework is often made to strike out, so as almost or altogether to meet some similar projection on the opposite side, and thus to intercept the view of the blue vault of heaven overhead. And then, what incessant driving and beating of foot passengers with sticks from right to left, to make way for the turbaned Turk or the grotesquely-robed government officials, mounted on asses, mules, horses, or camels! What grimaces, noises, and vociferations on the part of jugglers, beggars, slaves, and fanatics! What brayings and screaming when the confined, unpaved substitutes for streets are fairly blocked up by towering camels or donkeys, so largely laden with reeds, or sticks, or cotton bags, as to threaten all passers-by with a thorough crushing against the wall! What lounging, smoking, and vagrant idleness in dingy dens misnamed shops, and bazaars, and marts of business! What swarms of noisome vermin every where, as if generated from the very dust! In a word, what a total absence of taste, and elegance, and comfort. What din and confusion, filth and smells, misery and squalid wretchedness! No one who has traversed the streets and suburbs of Cairo need wonder that it should be "a city of the plague." If the ancient Egyptians, in their personal, domestic, and civic habits, at all resembled the modern, what fresh significance does the spectacle of Grand Cairo shed on the multitudinous precepts and ordinances of the Levitical code, respecting cleanliness and ablution, altogether independent of their higher typical bearings in the progressive evolution of the Gospel dispensation? In the contrast of Cairo with any of the great Protestant cities of Christendom, we never felt more vividly before how much we are indebted to the religion of the Cross, not merely for the hope of a heaven of glory hereafter, but for those refined and ennobling sentiments which naturally issue in all that can adorn, beautify, or comfort the life that now is. But the mosques, with their minarets and crescents, are not they superb? To the taste and eyes of many they are. The outer walls, painted with alternated stripes of red and white, rising from bottom to top in parallel horizontal lines of a foot or two in breadth;—the dust-embrowned cupolas, minarets, and crescents, which look like a profusion of fanciful stucco-work or huge Chinese toys;—such fantastic figures and variegated hues have doubtless their attractions; but whether for the child or the man, the vulgar likings of demi-barbarism, or the noble aspirations of highest civilization, we leave it to others to determine. Of this we are satisfied, that, in point of real symmetry, elegance, and grandeur, there are a dozen cathedral churches in London alone incomparably superior to the finest mosque in Cairo. It could not well be otherwise. In all climes and in all ages—from the cavern and monolithic temples of Arabia Petraea, Bameean, and India, to the mosques of Cairo and Constantinople and the cathedrals of Christendom—there has been, there must be, a parallelism between the professed faith of a people and all the external symbols of that faith. In Mahammadanism, all is material, sensuous, and grovelling; hence the general poverty of conception and design, the meanness of proportion, the sheer unidealistic finery of ornament, and all the sense-regaling accessories so characteristic of a first-rate Mahammadan mosque. In Christianity, on the other hand, all is immaterial, spiritual, and sublime; hence, even amid abounding corruptions, the solemn grandeur of conception and design, the majestic stateliness of proportion, the emblematic richness of embellishment, and all the soul-elevating accompaniments of the Christian cathedral.

THE STATE OF RELIGION IN SCOTLAND AT THE REVOLUTION IN 1688.

BY THE REV. JOHN G. LORIMER,

Minister of St David's Parish, Glasgow

OUR readers will no doubt remember the very interesting series of Articles, which appeared in the pages of this Journal, on the History of the Protestant Church of France. These Articles our respected correspondent has been requested to publish in a separate form, and we are glad to perceive that in compliance with this request, a volume has appeared embodying besides the papers referred to, a very large quantity of additional matter, extending to nearly three-fourths of the entire work. We have seldom perused a volume with more unqualified satisfaction, than that which Mr Lorimer has now given to the public; and we make the following extract, as affording a favourable specimen of the accurate and highly important information which it contains in reference to the history of religion in Scotland, which the author carries on contemporaneously with the history of religion in France.*

Turning from Europe to this country—I refer particularly to Scotland—the consequences of the Revolution were most important. The Church of Scotland was established anew, and a thousand blessings, temporal and spiritual, followed in her train. We shall better appreciate these if we think, for a moment, of the moral and religious state of the country as the persecution left, and the Revolution found it. Though, during the reign of Charles II., there was much more of the operation of the Presbyterian Church than many imagine,—though there was only one parish (Salton) into which the English Liturgy was introduced, and the courts, with the exception of the General Assembly, discharged their usual functions, and the forms of Presbyterian worship were substantially observed, yet there was a vast change for the worse in the character of the great body of the people. However the party of the martyrs and their immediate friends may have been quickened and sanctified by the fires of the furnace, a relentless persecution of twenty-eight years' duration could not fail to be most injurious in a multitude of ways. There were many broken vows. Not a few in all ranks, particularly in the higher, had failed in the day of trial. In spite of solemn purposes and professions, they had abandoned their plighted faith. This must have been very prejudicial to their own moral feeling, and that of the country. Much, too, of the instruction which was communicated by the Presbyterian ministers was irregular and interrupted, under perpetual fear and restraint; while no small share of what was supplied by the ignorant and scandalous intruded curates was grossly erroneous,—at best rank Arminianism, if not Pelagianism, tending to Popery. The result was, that multitudes received no proper instruction at all, and that others were tempted to make a hasty profession, on an imperfectly prepared foundation. It is owing to these causes that, while Bishop Burnet bears witness to the amazing religious knowledge even of the "poor commonalty," their familiarity with the Scriptures, their ability to argue on disputed questions of principle, and their extemporaneous prayers, other writers relate how much ignorance prevailed not merely in the Highlands and Islands, which would not be very wonderful—but in parishes of the western Lowlands, where the persecution had been general and fierce. Thus, Hogg of Carnock, who was minister of Dalsersf, in Lanarkshire, immediately after the Revolution, in the "Memoirs of his Life and Times," states, in regard to that parish, that though the people made a large profession, many of them were grossly ignorant, and otherwise seriously defective. It is said, "Some few he found intelligent; yet many, of whom he had better thoughts, were very ignorant, having patched and kept up a sort of profession, without ever making it their business to learn. This obliged him to lay aside his former designs, and wholly to apply himself publicly and privately to teach them the plain ground of revealed truth, as it might please the Lord to direct and furnish him." He states, that while abroad in Holland he had been acquainted with not a few of the common people, who not only knew the principles of religion, but who were tolerably well versed in the controversial parts of theology, and that he had expected as much of his charge at Dalsarf; but that, though many of them made a great profession, he found them exceedingly ignorant; and that he records this without meaning to disparage those who feared the Lord, and who were docile and tractable. There can be little doubt that many other parishes were in the same predicament as Dalsarf. The result shows, that persecution, instead, as many imagine, of being uniformly a good to the Church of Christ, is often most injurious, and in ways which at first would not be thought of. The absence of regular instruction, and the temptations to a party profession, would just bring about the state of things over which the excellent Mr Hogg mourns; though after all, perhaps, his standard of attainment may have been a high one. The profligate example, too, of the Court party must have been very adverse. Their manners were formed upon the French Popish model, in which open debauchery, obscene stage plays, and gross Sabbath desecration, bore a prominent part. Indeed, it seems to have been their labour to run directly counter, in every possible way, to the stern morality of the Commonwealth. They were anxious not only to shun every trace of connection with the spirit and manners of Cromwell, but to proclaim their deadly hostility to them, though religion and morality, yea decency, should be sacrificed in making the proclamation. There is little doubt, too, that long-sighted priests encouraged such courses as the best mode of breaking the power of evangelical religion and the Presbyterian Church, and of preparing the way for the re-establishment of Popery, which they seem always to have kept in view. No religion is more suited to the taste of a profligate than the Popish; and the progress of the efforts of James affords melancholy proof, how speedily a nation, by a course of sin, may be ripened for the welcome of Popery, with its promise of easy absolutions. Taking these different causes into account, we need not wonder to be informed by Fletcher of Salton, a few years after the Revolution, that besides many wretchedly provided for, there were 200,000 persons—a fourth or fifth part of the entire population of Scotland—begging from door to door; that a large proportion of these were vagabonds, who lived without any regard to the laws either of God or of man—in the greatest crimes—oppressing the people—rioting in years of plenty—"men and women perpetually drunk, cursing, blaspheming, and fighting together." Such were their beggary and wretchedness, that two Acts of Parliament were passed, and four proclamations issued, to build houses of correction, and establish a system of poor's rate like that of England. A few years ago it was estimated that there were 55,000 persons in Scotland dependent on parochial relief, and 10,000 regular mendicants. Putting these together we have about a 40th part of the entire population in the character of paupers. How different the state of things in the days of Fletcher, when a fourth part were at once beggars and criminals! And what could be the grand cause of this, if not the persecution of the two unhappy Stuarts? It would be well for men to remember for what they are responsible in the generation which follows, as well as in that to which they directly belong.

Such was the miserable moral condition of Scotland at the Revolution; and great were her other difficulties, political and ecclesiastical. Some have spoken to the disparagement of Scotland, as compared with England, in the management of the Revolution. She has been represented as intolerant, and disposed unnecessarily to resort to arms, and so as indicating an inferior civilization; but supposing the charges well-founded—which we do not concede—it is to be remembered that the circumstances of the two countries were widely different, and fully explain the difference of feeling and conduct. Though there had been much oppression of the Presbyterians or Puritans of England in the reigns of Charles and James, yet it was not to be compared, in extent and severity, with the bloody persecution of Scotland; hence there had not been nearly the same amount of provocation. Indeed, Baxter and other Presbyterians had been labouring after a peaceful comprehension of the Puritans in the southern Establishment. Then the English Episcopal Church was not, like her Scottish sister, imbued with Popery; on the contrary, many of her sons had written nobly against the Church of Rome; and the people, as a whole, had deprived James of his crown for his attempts to establish Popery. There were no parties to come into collision in the south. It was otherwise in Scotland. Not only was there all the provocation which the memory of thirty years of bitter sufferings could supply, but the Episcopal party in Scotland still retained their Popish leanings. They not only did not use their exertions against Popery, but their Bishops, with two exceptions, sent the most adulatory address to James, after his design to establish Popery was quite notorious, merely because an adverse wind detained the Prince of Orange in Holland, and gave them the hope that James might not be disturbed. That James had a much greater number of friends, proportionally, in Scotland than in England,—that the Popish party regarded Scotland as their stronghold, partly from the remains of the feudal system in the north, and the almost inextinguishable loyalty of the people to their royal family, and chiefly from the Popery of some great families, and the semi-Popery of the Episcopal Church,—is evident from the fact, that the Popish Pretender, through the next sixty years, in his successive attempts upon Britain, almost always looked to Scotland as his great hope and confidence. It is plain, then, that it was a much more difficult matter to carry through the Revolution peacefully and satisfactorily in Scotland than in England. The first duty was to protect the Convention or Parliament in declaring that James had forfeited his title to the throne; and this was done, not by the regular troops, but by nearly 2000 Presbyterian volunteers, who were raised in a few days, and constituted the Cameronian regiments. Eight hundred were raised in one day, by the Earl of Angus, without beat of drum. The city of Glasgow, which was always distinguished for its Protestantism, on this occasion sent 500 men to Edinburgh. At an earlier day, in 1568, the same city sent out 600 young men to the battle of Langside,—a battle which decided that the Protestant principles of Regent Murray, and not the Popish government of his sister, Queen Mary, should prevail; and at a later day (1715), sent forth 500 men for sixty days, and offered to the Government of the day permanently to support them in behalf of the Protestant line of Brunswick, against the Popish Pretender. The conditions upon which the Presbyterians proffered their services, show at once their principles and the religious character of the struggle: "That all the officers of the regiment should be such as, in conscience and prudence, might, with cordial confidence, be submitted to and followed, such as had not served the enemy in destroying, nor had engaged, by oaths and tests, to destroy the cause now to be fought for and defended; but that they should be well affected, of approved fidelity, and of a sober conversation;—that the cause they were called to appear for was the defence of the king's majesty, in the defence of the nation, the recovery and preservation of the Protestant religion, in opposition to Popery, Prelacy, and arbitrary power, in all its branches and steps, until the government in Church and State be brought to the lustre and integrity established in the best and purest times." Colonel Blackadder, a gentleman of eminent piety, whose diary and letters have been published (from which the above extract is taken), was an officer of the regiment raised under Angus. It afterwards became the 26th regiment of foot, was distinguished in the Protestant wars of the Continent, under Marlborough, and for a long time was marked for the religious character of its origin.

Thus it appears, that it was the Church of Scotland which bore a leading part in carrying through the Revolution of 1688 in Scotland; and but for her influence, the Revolution, in all probability, could not have been accomplished. But though arms were taken up, let it not be supposed that any intolerance or persecution was practised. It was for defence, not aggression, that the Presbyterian volunteers enrolled themselves, and that many others took arms. A few weeks after the landing of the Prince of Orange, and before any ecclesiastical arrangements were made, there was some mobbing of Popish priests and places of worship, and the armed Presbyterians called upon the Episcopal curates quietly to leave the churches which they had so long usurped, or submit to forcible ejection; but even according to the testimony of Sir Walter Scott, there was no bloodshed, nothing that could be called persecution, in the sense to which Scotland had been so long accustomed to it. "Now," says he, in his "History of Scotland," "since these armed nonconformists had been, to use their own language, for nearly twenty years, proscribed, forfeited, miserably oppressed, given up as sheep to the slaughter, inter-communed, and interdicted of harbour or supply, comfort or communion, hunted and slain in the fields, in the cities imprisoned, tortured, executed to the death, or banished and sold as slaves;" "and as many of them avowed the same wild principles which were acted upon by the murderers of Archbishop Sharpe,—it might have been expected that a bloody retaliation would take place as soon as they had the power in their own hands. Yet it must be owned, that these stern Cameronians showed no degree of positive cruelty. They expelled the obnoxious curates with marks of riotous triumph, tore their gowns, and sometimes compelled them to march in a mock procession to the boundary of their parish. They plundered the private chapels of Catholics, and destroyed whatever they found belonging to their religion; but they evinced no desire of personal vengeance. Nor have I found that the clergy who were expelled in this memorable month of December 1688, although most of them were treated with rudeness and insult, were in any case killed or wounded in cold blood." What a contrast is the treatment thus candidly confessed, of the Presbyterians towards the Episcopalians, to the treatment of the Episcopalians towards the Presbyterians; and yet the Presbyterians constituted the vast majority of the country! Even in the cases of insult referred to, the deed was not, as with the Episcopal Church, the legalised deed of the Presbyterian Church or of the State, but an ebullition of the passion of the populace. What can account for this milder treatment, save the more widely diffused influence of Christian principle and views of toleration, far more enlightened than the Presbyterians of this period generally receive credit for entertaining?

CHRISTMAS.

It is the dead of night,
And o'er the silent plains the crescent moon
Sheds silver light, that not obscures the glow
Of thousand stars, nor more than half reveals
The shadowy forms of giant hills, that rise
Calm and majestic towards the dark blue sky.
See, where, upon a soft and gentle slope,

The moonlight rests, a simple band is seen
 Of shepherds watching o'er their silent flocks;
 Not silent as their charge: on holy themes
 The band of friends discourse, with voices low,
 Amid the deep solemnity of night.
 They speak of David's promised seed—the Son,
 The Royal Son, of Bethlehem's shepherd-king:—
 "The years of prophecy have run their course;
 The stranger's yoke is bound on Judah's land;
 And Judah's parting sceptre waits the Shiloh!
 Sure his eternal reign is near—his reign
 Of righteousness and peace!" But, see, yon star
 Brighter and brighter gleams with sudden glory!
 Lo, it descends; and, lo, the hills reflect
 The wondrous radiance! Mute and trembling stand
 Th' astonished shepherds. Now in the 'midst appears
 An outline clear—a living form; and now
 He stands revealed—an angel from the skies.
 He speaks! "Fear not; I come to bring from heaven Glad tidings of great joy—joy that shall be
 To you, and to all people; for this day
 Is born, in David's city, Him for whom Ye wait—a Saviour which is Christ the Lord!
 And this shall be a sign—ye shall behold him,
 Enwrapped in swaddling clothes, and lowly laid
 Within a manger!" When the herald ceased,
 A multitude of th' heavenly host brake forth
 In seraph song—

"Glory to God!
 All glory in the highest!
 Peace on earth!
 Good-will to men!"

Then straight they spread their plumes
 Of rainbow tint, and sought their native sky.
 Uprose the shepherds, nor their footsteps strayed,
 Till, at the feet of their new-born Redeemer,
 They breathed their fervent prayer. Then all around Judea's hills the tidings they proclaim
 Of Christ announced by messengers from heaven.

NOTES ON EGYPT.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER DUFF, D. D.,

PART III.

THE most absorbing object of attraction at present in Cairo is the celebrated magician, the fame of whose exploits has been made to ring through the cycle of European literature. To our regret, he was absent at the time of our sojourn; but, having conversed with many who had been witnesses of his performances, we feel warranted in making these the subject of special remark. The alleged feat, for which he is chiefly distinguished, is that of producing, in a magic mirror of ink, the image of any person, absent or dead. For this operation the only qualified person is a boy not arrived at the age of puberty, or an unmarried woman. In the boy or virgin's right hand the magic diagram is drawn, and ink poured into it. The magical apparatus consists of a chafing-dish with live charcoal, bits of paper on which are written incantations, frankincense and other aromatic drugs. After incantations and incense have been burned in the lustral fire till the room has been filled with smoke, painful at once to the visual and respiratory organs, and after repeated mutterings and incantations, the subject of the experiment is asked if he sees any thing in the ink. Should the process promise success, the reply is in the affirmative. Next follows, in answer to successive queries, a series of images—viz., a man sweeping with a broom, seven flags of different colours one after the other, tents and soldiers, a bull and sacrifice, the grand Sultan riding on a horse, alighting in his tent, and partaking of a cup of coffee. At this stage, when all these preliminaries are terminated, the visitor is asked to name any one, absent or dead, whose image he wishes to be exhibited in the mirror of ink to the eyes of the person holding it in the right hand. And then it is, that true images of individuals, said to be altogether unknown and unheard of by the operating magician and the subject of the operation, are alleged by respectable European authorities to have been really produced. This is the exploit which, of late years, has exercised the ingenuity of so many literary and scientific savans in Europe; many of whom have pronounced it mysterious and utterly inexplicable; while some have not scrupled to refer it to supernatural, and others, to subternatural or satanic agency.

On this latter subject, we would first remark, that the fact of the exploits being mysterious and inexplicable is, of itself, no proof whatever that it is either of a supernatural or of a subternatural character; else must the vast multitude of feats, performed in all ages by the "joculators, jugglers, or tregatours," of the east and of the west, and which have never been satisfactorily explained, be pronounced superhuman too! It is not many years since a Brahman at Madras was wont to exhibit the unwonted spectacle of sitting from twelve to forty minutes on the air, about four feet from the ground. He himself confessed it was a custom which, by ordinary but peculiar means, he had gradually acquired:—yet who has succeeded in unveiling the mystery? Then also must the huge aggregate of inexplicable phenomena, so devoutly believed in days of ignorance to have been the result of secret connection with the agencies of the invisible world; but which have since been amply accounted for by Sir David Brewster and others, on principles of natural magic, be still held to belong to the class of Divine or of satanic influences! The extraordinary phenomena manifested, during the sitting of the Commission appointed to survey the king's house at Woodstock after the death of Charles I., and which, at the time, were viewed by not a few of the learned, and universally by the unlearned, as the undoubted effects of supernatural powers, were at length fully ascertained to have proceeded from the ingenious contrivance and invention of "the memorable Joseph Collins of Oxford, who, having hired himself as Secretary (to the Commission), under the name of Giles Sharp, by knowing the private traps belonging to the house, and by the help of pulvis fulminans and other chemical preparations, and letting his fellow-servants into the scheme, carried on the deceit without discovery to the very last." The mere inexplicability, therefore, of any feat, however marvellous, is not enough to precipitate us upon the supernatural—as offering the only adequate solution. This were not to untie, but to cut, the Gordian knot—not to tread patiently in Baconian paths, but to rush blindly into the universal solvent of the dark ages—not to arouse the inductive energies of the soul to inquire, but, by the lazy whispers of credulity, to lull these energies asleep.

Is it that we doubt the existence of supernatural agency? God forbid. That such agency has been peatedly exerted, let Egypt land itself, the Red Sea, and the wilderness—let Judea, with its lakes and rivers, its mountains and plains, its cities and villages—let all of these together tell, how often the Lord of Nature exerted from all her elements a confession of his presence and supremacy. It is because of the intensity of our belief in such miraculous interpositions, that we are filled with holy jealousy, whenever these are, wittingly or unwittingly, confounded with the juggling tricks and cunning artifices of ingenious but deceiving men. The magician himself sometimes asserts that he operates under the influence of "good spirits." Now, good spirits act only according to the commission they receive from God. "Nec Deus interit nisi dignus vindice nodus," was the test proposed even by a Pagan. Among all the recorded miracles of Scripture, is there one which may not challenge the most rigorous application of such a test? Which of them, in their general or specific end, object, and design, was not worthy of the God of creation, of providence, and of grace? But what end, worthy of God, is answered by the alleged preternatural feat of the Egyptian magician? To have his own treasures replenished with the wages of his wonder-striking performance—and to gratify the aimless, if not lawless, curiosity of a few Europeans, who give no proof of having at heart the vital interests either of God or of man—is this an end worthy of the interposition of Deity? At other times, the magician seems to allege that he acts with the assistance of "evil spirits." Now, evil spirits can only act as they are permitted by God. Under the ordinary dispensation of Providence these are allowed, for purposes of trial and probation, to exert various agencies, which may be resisted and defeated by watchfulness, prayer, and other ordinary means of divine appointment. Under an extraordinary dispensation of Providence, these may, for other and higher ends, have liberty to put forth preternatural powers, which can only be resisted and defeated by the forthputting of other preternatural powers of resistless might. If ever such license was granted to wicked spirits at all, it doubtless was, when the great redemption of the Israelites from Egypt was to be achieved by Jehovah through his servant Moses; and the immeasurably greater redemption of a world of lost sinners was to be consummated on Calvary by a greater than Moses—even Him who was "Jehovah's fellow." If, on the former occasion, a more than ordinary latitude in aping true miracles was conceded to the foul spirits of darkness, was it not that—by means of the celebrated public confession extorted from the lips of their instruments, the magicians, "Surely the finger of God is there"—their own utter inferiority and helplessness might be visibly demonstrated in the eyes of Pharaoh, his lords and counsellors, and the whole body of the people?—was it not that, on so grand a stage as the city, which was at that time not the metropolis of Egypt merely, but the central seat of idolatry, the very throne of Satan's earthly dominion, Jehovah's absolute supremacy over the gods of heathenism, and all the "principalities and powers" of the invisible world, might be gloriously vindicated? If, on the latter occasion, an unwonted license was given to the same wicked demons to convulse the bodies and infuriate the spirits of men, was it not that—by the public confession of their subjection and final doom, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?"— emphatic demonstration might be afforded to the very senses of all around, that this was indeed the very "Seed of the woman," who was destined to "bruise the serpent's head."—that this was indeed the very personage whom prophets in every age had foretold, as "the mighty King," who would come into the world to "destroy the devil and his works;" and take unto himself the kingdom which had been so basely usurped, as well as the power and the dominions? And were not all these ends great and noble, wise and good?—ends every way worthy of Him, one chief part of whose design was to extirpate all error, and sin, and false dependences, that poor, sinful, deluded men might return, and learn to trust in Himself, who alone is the Fount of pardon and grace, holiness and peace, wisdom and happiness? Compare with ends so glorious, the only end which has ever yet been served by the alleged preternatural feats of the Egyptian magician—to wit, the replenishment of his own coffers, and the gratification of a few inquisitive Europeans! Surely reason must have wholly fled the breast of the man who can tolerate any hypothesis which necessarily involves or leads to such a comparison at all.

From such general considerations alone we could not for a moment hesitate in pronouncing the pretensions of the magician himself to the assistance of familiar spirits, whether good or bad,—pretensions which have sometimes been acceded to by others with an easiness, of credulity that reflects little credit on this boasted age of the march of intellect—wholly apocryphal. On his claims we could not hesitate to return the verdict, not simply "Not proven," but that of "Disproven." There are, however, considerations of a specific character which ought to arouse the vehement suspicions of even his most credulous admirers. 1st, What are those lustral fires, aromatic fumigations, written spells, mutterings and invocations, but the ordinary apparatus wherewith the juggling impostors of every age and clime have endeavoured, by intensely occupying more than one of the senses of the spectators, to render their tricks and artifices more difficult of detection? 2dly, Is it not a circumstance of prime importance, that all the antecedent images—brooms and flags, tents and soldiers, bulls and sacrifices, sultans and coffee—are, as to number and order of succession, in every experiment almost uniformly the same? This being the case, what boy or girl in all Cairo, likely to be subjected to the magical operations, may not previously become as familiar with the nature and succession of these expected images as the pretended familiar spirits themselves? 3dly, It is a fact, known and notorious to such of the permanent European residents as have been at pains deliberately to investigate the matter, that the magician has a multitude of willing agents in his confidence; that between these and the native attendants of any stranger of rank or consequence who might be desirous of witnessing the magical exploits, as well as the native servants of the hotel or other place of residence, a busy and constant intercourse has often been detected; and that particular boys, apparently selected at random and without any previous mutual understanding, have been shown to have been passing the street or purchasing articles in a neighbouring shop, under peculiar circumstances, which could leave room for no other conviction, than that they were there by preconcert and design, at the precise juncture of time when their ser-VICES would be required: all of which ascertained facts go the full length of proving that there is collusion, to at least a certain extent. 4thly, It has been admitted by Mr Lane, and other admiring eulogists of the magician, that his attempts have often failed. By European residents at Cairo who had been repeatedly present, and who, when not personally present, had ample opportunities of learning the result in other instances, we were positively assured, that the cases of total failure so greatly out-numbered those of real or apparent or partial success, that the former constituted the general rule—the latter, the rare or occasional exceptions! Nor is this all; there are other circumstances which tend to throw still farther light on the real character of the whole procedure. The instances of the apparent or partial success have usually occurred, as in the case of Mr Lane and others, when the character, habits, pursuits, studies, home connections, and topics of conversation of the visitors, have been more or less known to vigilant and intelligent natives around them; when the boy, or subject of the operation, has been secured through the instrumentality of some one directly or indirectly under the influence of the magician; or when the interpreter, or medium of communication between the parties, has been the magician's own hired servant. The instances of total failure, on the other hand, have usually occurred in cases where the inquiring party has been a new or unexpected visitor—and when both the boy and the interpreter have been provided by that party. We had long converse with a Christian youth of uncommon intelligence for his years, and of sterling integrity of principle, who had been purposely so selected; the magician himself, on examination, could not help pronouncing him, as to age, &c., a fit person. Full well did he know previously what preliminary images, flags, tents, and such like, ought to have appeared in the magic mirror of ink; but when duly interrogated, he was constrained to answer, that he saw nothing. The magician then declared that the sky had become unpropitious, and the experiment was suspended for a more favourable day. The day having arrived, the same youth again submitted to the operation—still he could see nothing. The sky had again become unpropitious; and when it was proposed a third time to repeat the experiment with the same youth, the magician peremptorily refused! The young man, however, added, in substance, the very weighty and important remark, that, his head having been kept so long over the chafing dish, in which were burnt the aromatic drugs, before any question was asked, he found a tendency to giddiness, and a sort of stupefying sensation growing so strongly upon him, that he felt almost resistlessly tempted to say, that he saw what he really did not see, in order to be the more speedily delivered from the magical pillory of torture. We had also long converse with one of the most enlightened Europeans, and certainly the best Arabic scholar in Cairo, who had often volunteered his services as interpreter, on very purpose to satisfy his own mind as to the facts of the case. He assured us, that he undertook the task under a decided leaning to the persuasion, that, if all the previously reported facts were really substantiated, without a clue to any collusion, or other modifying or explanatory circumstance, he could not well see how they could be accounted for, except by reference to preternatural agency. After repeated trials, his firm and unalterable conviction was, that, be the art or artifice what it may, it had upon the face of it indubitable signatures of a juggling imposture. Among these, he strongly asserted it as a fact, that many of the questions were leading ones—that many of them were put in the suggestive form, such as (instead of asking the youth, What do you see?) asking him, "Do you see a flag," &c.; and that many of them were moulded in an alternative form, so that, on the mere principle of guessing, the answer ought to be as often right as wrong. In this latter department of interrogation, the results were peculiarly decisive against the claims of the magician. No sooner was it detected by the shrewd interpreter than he resolved to subject it to an experimentum crucis. A certain personage was called for, really unknown to the magician, but well known to the principal visitor to be of uncommon stature. Instead of putting the question, as moulded by the arch-operator into somewhat of the usual form, (such as, Whether is he tall, or otherwise?—laying, it might be, a peculiar emphasis on the one word or the other, to guide the answer,) it was shaped in some such form as this, "Is he somewhat diminutive in stature, or exceedingly diminutive?" The reply was, "Exceedingly diminutive!" In like manner, another, distinguished for obesity, was made out to be as lean as an absolute starving! In short, the blunders were not only multiplied, but so uniform, and often so ludicrous, that at length the magician was heard to declare, that he would never more exhibit his art to any one, if the gentleman now referred to were made the interpreter.

Now, though there may be authenticated facts on record not explicable by any one of the data now furnished, we would gravely appeal to the reason and common sense of men, whether these data are not enough to cover the whole with more than the suspicion of deception?—whether they are not amply sufficient to demonstrate, that the feats of the Egyptian magician are in no way to be distinguished from the universally acknowledged tricks of legerdmain, and the delusive artifices which have been practised by other clever impostors, in different ages and in different climes? We, at least, have fully concluded in our own mind, that the wouder-exciting delusion of this modern pretender is in no wise to be exempted from the decision of Thomas Ady, given about two hundred years ago in his book entitled, "A Caudle in the Dark against Witches and Witchcraft." "The craft of juggling," says he, "to them that are not acquainted with it, breeds great admiration in the beholders, and seemeth to silly people to be miraculous; and yet, being known, is but deceit and roguery—so that the beholder cannot but blush and be ashamed to think he was so easily cozened, and did so much admire a ridiculous imposture."

ON REGENERATION.

BY J. GRANDPIERRE, DIRECTOR OF THE MISSIONARY INSTITUTION, PARIS.

Translated from the French.

PART I.

MORAL philosophy has aimed at the regulation of the manners and the reformation of the outward conduct of man; Christianity alone has undertaken to change him, to renew him. Beginning with the principle that man is born good, or at least admitting that, in spite of the sins and imperfections perceived in him, there is in his nature a principle of virtue, a root of sound morality which it is possible to cultivate and develope, and which, with care and perseverance, will bear the fruits which may be justly expected from it, moralists have confined themselves to the attempt to educate man as he is born, as he grows up in the midst of his fellows; and as they have never supposed that there is wanting in him an element of life, a spiritual and divine energy, without which his moral nature can but vegetate, and vainly strive after sanctification, they have hitherto spoken, and do yet speak, only of amelioration, of perfectibility! Christianity, which preaches the deep corruption of human nature, has alone the right to demand a radical regeneration of all who present themselves as candidates for the kingdom of heaven; Christianity, which reveals the moral character of God, and shows us in the person of Jesus Christ his adorable perfections, has the right to require that man shall be holy as God is holy; Christianity, which proposes to educate us, not for this world only, but for heaven, is consistent when she calls us to lead, even in this world, a heavenly life; Christianity, in fine, which opens to us such high destinies, cannot be accused of unfaithfulness to her promises and of demanding what cannot be accomplished: for the means she employs are proportioned to the magnitude of the work she has to fulfil— for, to carry us from earth to heaven, from one state of corruption to one of holiness, she announces to us, offers and gives to us, nothing less than the eternal Son of the Father, with the immensity of his love, the efficacy of his redemption, and the power of his Holy Spirit.

This is why the Gospel is continually telling us to be converted—that is, to quit the world's paths in which we are entangled, to take a route diametrically opposite; to awaken—that is, to arise from the state of spiritual death in which we are by nature plunged; to be born anew—that is to say, to undergo an entire change in our principles, our affections, our will, our life: and this is why it is said of him in whom this blessed spiritual change has taken place, not only that he is a creature modified, corrected, improved, but a creature changed—a new man; yet more, a creature morally remodelled, called a second time to living existence. “He that is in Christ is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.”

I pray God, my brethren, to give me to speak to you to-day on this matter with simplicity and love, but, at the same time, plainly and with freedom; for since the Saviour of the world has laid down regeneration as a condition indispensable to our entrance into heaven, declaring, that “except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,” how fatal might be an error, or even a misconception, on this capital point of Christian doctrine! Compose yourselves in the presence of the Lord, then, my brethren, while I talk to you of these things, and ask Him to accompany his Word in your hearts with the all-powerful efficacy of his Holy Spirit!

What is regeneration, or the new birth, or the new creation? for these expressions signify one and the same thing. Regeneration is an interior, spiritual, complete, supernatural change, operated by the grace of the Holy Spirit in the heart of a man converted to Jesus Christ. To communicate some knowledge of the matter to those who are yet ignorant of it, we might indeed, my brethren, confine ourselves to an explanation of each of the terms made use of in this definition. But the subject is so important, that it cannot be treated with too much precaution and care; and as there prevail in the world, upon this subject, so many erroneous notions, so many illusions, it may not be useless, previous to explaining in what regeneration consists, to say in what it does not consist, and so to contrast the work of man with the work of God. Thus will truth shine the brighter when opposed to error; and there may be afforded to some an opportunity for serious self-examination—for assuring themselves that they have not mistaken the appearance for the reality, the semblance of regeneration for regeneration itself.

First, then, let us say what regeneration is not.—It is not then, in the first place, that change which years bring along with them insensibly and in spite of us, or which may be occasioned by the circumstances in which the individual is placed. Each age has its quicksands and temptations. The general characteristics of youth are, ardour of the passions—love of pleasure—the spirit of independence—levity. Those of riper age are, a calculating spirit—the desire and the pursuit of riches—attachment to this world's goods. Old age regrets the years which have fled, never to return—thinks less of amassing more, than of enjoying what she has already acquired; loaded with infirmity, she is a prey to peevishness and impatience. In his passage through these three seasons of life, or even as he leaves a few more years behind him, man becomes changed—his tastes are modified—his character varies not a little. Particular events, too, exert a great influence on our moral being. If, for example, an unforeseen catastrophe has suddenly deprived you of your fortune, it is plain that, obliged to limit your expenses, you can no longer, as in the days of your prosperity, indulge your taste for luxury or the pleasures of the table; and if disease lay you for long years on a bed of suffering, you must, per force, live in solitude, and renounce the pursuit of the amusements of the world, or the idols of glory and ambition. It is then possible, that a man, reflecting on his own state, may find himself different at a certain age of life from what he was at another, without having, on that account, any title to rank among the regenerate. The change he has experienced springs only from the necessity of things; his will has had nothing to do with it; it is the offspring of revolving years; he has bent under the force of events; one passion has but made way for another; one idol has been put in the place of another: but the heart has not been changed—this is not Christian regeneration.

Next, do not confound the renewing by faith in the Gospel with the reform to which personal interest may in certain cases lead. Often does sin, even in this world, bring on results more or less serious; and, in one sense, it may be affirmed, that almost always the sinner punishes himself. But what is true of sin in general, is, above all, so of certain particular effects of the corruption of human nature. There are certain vicious habits, which, more remarkably than others, bear the seeds which are to produce bitter fruit; and the contemplation of the evils which vice engenders, may in certain circumstances determine the sinner to cure himself of habits from which he labours to be free, rather because they are hurtful, than because they are in themselves criminal. Thus, one man perceives that by habitually giving himself to evil speaking, he alienates from himself those whose affection he values, and brings on himself embarrassment and regret; he has felt the necessity of bridling his tongue. Another feels that his habits have a serious influence on his health and reputation, or compromise the existence of his fortune; he renounces them. In these cases, and in others similar, an exterior reformation has been induced; there has been a cessation, an interruption of the acts of sin; but the evil has not been attacked at its source, no principle of sanctification and virtue has been implanted in the soul; this is not Christian regeneration.

The thought of the judgements of God, awaking the sinner from his spiritual lethargy, may also lead him to regulate his conduct, and to seek morality in his actions. Seized at once by the idea of an avenging justice, which will render to each according to his works—it is not impossible, that the criminal may suspend his act of injustice, may cease his frauds, may restore the property which he has unrighteously obtained, and that the worldling, alarmed at having led a life useless to himself and to society, may seek better to employ his time to make himself useful—to busy himself with works of public charity. These salutary terrors, sometimes precede conversion; they lie generally on the way towards grace; but if the sinner rest in them; if love do not come in the place of fear; if peace of soul do not banish the terror of the judgments of God; if the spirit of filial confidence, succeeding to that of legal servitude, do not lead him to do the same things, not to obtain life, but to witness his gratitude and love to the God who has delivered him from death, the man is not yet converted, he lives under the law, but is not in the liberty of grace; this is not Christian regeneration.

Disgust with the world has more than once been the cause of a life of self-denial, which a superficial observer, a stranger to true Christianity, is apt to confound with Christian virtue. When all the joys of the world have been tried, and only vanity or bitterness found at the bottom of all; when, from all the pleasures which this earth can offer, has been demanded the secret of filling a heart whose repose and life are only to be found in God, and when every hope has ended in disappointment, the man returns into himself, doubts the possibility of man's being happy here below, falls into a practical scepticism, which is yet more terrible than speculative unbelief, renounces the pursuit of peace, because persuaded that it exists nowhere, not even in God, not even for the soul which seeks it in him. In this state of fatigue and oppression, the soul, disgusted with all takes interest in nothing; sees pass before her, in all their brilliancy, and with all their attractions, greatness, glory, pleasure, and is still unmoved; she does not ask to be charmed by them, were it but for a moment, for she knows by experience that they cannot do it; she believes in nothing, loves nothing; the realities of the invisible world and of holiness, no more than the futile joys of the worldling, truth no more than falsehood. Beholding a man of this character, disenchanted from the vanities of the age, leading an austere, and, perhaps, solitary life, you may be tempted to say, "What elevation of thought, what heroism of sentiment, what moderation, what wisdom, what philosophy!" But, could you read within, in the secrets of his heart, you would discover there a deep void, a gnawing chagrin. No hope, no peace, no love, no life,—is this Christian regeneration?

There are constitutional virtues which are born with us. The natural result of our organization, they grow and increase with us, they cost us no trouble, no effort; they constitute us what we are. Thus, we may have an instinctive cheerfulness, compassionateness, justice, shall I say, existing without love to God, independently, even, of any principle of morality. I suppose you to have sorely offended against a man, and many such are to be found, of a mild and gentle temper, that you have been unjust or ungrateful towards him, that to ingratitude and injustice you have, perhaps, added insult and outrage; calm and placid, he has not been moved. Another cannot see suffering, without being touched in the depths of his being; there is no grief, no misery which does not touch a cord in his soul and awake his sympathy. A third has an invincible repugnance to be guilty of the smallest fraud, the least obliquity, the slightest deviation from the rules of truth and justice; equivocation, falsehood, under whatever form, however veiled, are revolting, and rouse all his indignation. You justly give these men credit for such noble sentiments, they have a right to your esteem. But in presence of the moral law, and before the face of God, these virtues, if indeed they deserve the name, lose all their value, for they do not proceed from a principle of love to God, of love of holiness, or even of love for duty; they are the fruit neither of watching nor of care; their possessors never laboured to cultivate and develop them; in practising them they did but abandon themselves to the impulse of nature, and follow a species of instinct; and neither is this Christian regeneration.

Finally, there are virtues which are not the offspring of instinct, and which cannot be attributed to the motives of interest, to the search for worldly glory; to pride, to self-approbation, or to any other impure sentiment, but which seem to spring from a principle of morality deeply rooted in the soul. Real benevolence, the sense of duty, obedience to imperious and sacred obligations, a deep conviction of the dignity of human nature, elevated views of our lofty origin, and the grandeur of our destination, gratitude, devotedness, disinterestedness, all these noble affections, and many more, have a share, more or less, in many works performed by unregenerate men, to whom we cannot refuse our tribute of respect and esteem. But, we ask, why is it that these generous men, who have so many sympathies for all that is great and splendid, why is it that they experience no attraction, that they feel no leaning of heart towards Him, who is supremely amiable. Why do they love all, except Him from whom proceed all beauty, all grace, all nobleness, all virtue? Why do they coldly consent to do nothing for him, to render him no homage for the numberless favours with which his Providence has loaded them? That virtue, worthy of so much respect, often attained at the price of great sacrifices, but of which, God is neither the beginning nor the end, is not Christian regeneration

THE ORIGIN OF THE JESUITS.

It has often struck us, as a singular defect in our systems of education, that, while the attention of youth is sedulously directed to the histories of Greece and Rome, and other countries in which we can take only a very remote interest, no attempt should ever have been made, as far as we are aware, to impress upon the youthful mind the history of the Church of Christ, in which we all ought to feel a very deep and lively concern. That Church is a kingdom which rests on a secure basis; and while all the other kingdoms of this world shall, in the progress of time, totter and fall, it is destined to flourish in immortal youth while sun and moon endure. We are glad, therefore, to see that a prospect is now afforded of having the minds of young people stored with the important facts of Church History. The Volume,* from which we make the following quotation, is from the pen of an intelligent Christian lady; and, from the ability, impartiality, and accuracy with which it is written, we are disposed to regard it as an invaluable treasure to schools and families. Each of the chapters is accompanied with a series of questions, which renders the work of the instructor, in using the book, comparatively easy.

This society, which acknowledges for its founder Ignatius Loyola, a Spanish gentleman, far surpassed all the other monastic bodies in its attachment to the Romish see. Bound by a solemn oath to render the most implicit obedience to the pope, the interests of the church and the aggrandizement of the papal authority were with them synonymous terms. True religion is always the same, while the counterfeit changes with the spirit of the times, and adapts itself to the ever-varying opinions of mankind. The ancient monastic societies had now fallen into general discredit, even in Roman Catholic countries. Their ignorance of every thing except scholastic divinity, in an age when literature was eagerly cultivated, exposed them to contempt; and their voluntary poverty and professed humility no longer wore the appearance of superior piety, when it was known that they possessed immense revenues, and indulged in all the luxuries of life. The Jesuits abandoned the indolence and seclusion of the cloister, for the active pursuits of human society. They mingled in all occupations, and engaged in all professions, and in every path which led to fame they were among the most successful competitors. Their talents and acquisitions were not, however, intended to enlighten, but only to dazzle mankind, to extend the influence of their order, and to revive under a new form, the despotic authority of the Roman pontiff. No station was considered too humble, no path too adventurous, no opinion too bold, no measure too daring or criminal, if it promised to advance these ends. Their learning was employed to erect a system of casuistry, by which the plainest dictates of morality, and the most authoritative commands of religion, might be set aside when opposed to their purposes, and perjury and every crime be justified when it would advance them. The most indulgent of confessors, they accommodated themselves to the temper of their penitents; and those whom a rigorous penance might have disgusted, not only escaped punishment, but were encouraged to proceed in the same course by the palliatives which these masters in the art of sophistry furnished for their transgression. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that the consciences of the great were soon intrusted almost entirely to their keeping; every prince had a confessor, and that confessor was a Jesuit, who often managed by his address not only the spiritual concerns of the sovereign, but the temporal destinies and welfare of the nation.

It was not in Europe alone that their zeal was displayed. The discoveries and conquests of the Spaniards and Portuguese opened a new field to the ambition of the pontiffs, and the disciples of Loyola were ready to compass sea and land to make proselytes to their sway. The other orders excited by the spirit of emulation, prepared for similar enterprises. Asia, Africa, and America, were soon visited by a crowd of missionaries, who taught their converts to make the sign of the cross, to worship the Virgin, and to venerate the Roman pontiff as a sort of terrestrial deity. Where the pagan or heretical governments were powerful, these missionaries had recourse only to argument and persuasion; but when the reverse was the case, and they combated under the protection of Europeans, the weapons of their warfare were changed; compulsion became the order of the day, and those who resisted their arguments were obliged to yield to their power. The Inquisition stretched out its branches far and wide; the Spaniards established it in the New World, and the Portuguese carried it to the remote quarters of the Old. When the latter arrived in India, they were agreeably surprised to find upwards of a hundred Christian churches on the coast of Malabar; but they were soon offended at the purity and simplicity which characterised the worship of these Oriental Christians, and their refusal to acknowledge the authority of the Roman pontiff. They were still further displeased when they found that their church had for thirteen hundred years been governed by a regular succession of bishops, appointed by the Patriarch of Antioch. "These churches," said the Portuguese, "belong to the pope." "Who is the pope?" said the natives; "we never heard of him. We are of the true faith, whatever you from the West may be, for we come from the place where the followers of Christ were first called Christians." And when the image of the Virgin was offered to them, they exclaimed indignantly, "We are Christians, and not idolaters."

THE GOODNESS OF GOD IN THE LATE HARVEST: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. J. W. TAYLOR,
Minister of Grangemouth, Stirlingshire.

"Thou crownest the year with thy goodness."—
PSALM lxx. 12.

THIS very lovely song may be entitled a Psalm of Thanksgiving. From first to last it breathes the language of praise. The writer surveys the wide world, and every where does he find cause of gratitude. His harp had been consecrated to the service of the God of Israel; and when he takes it down from the wall of the Temple on which it hung, he devotes its first sounds to the praise of Him, whose dwelling-place was in Zion, and whose tabernacle was in Jerusalem. As the house of God is a place peculiarly adapted for paying thank-offerings to the Lord, so the manifestations of God, as a God of grace, form an ever-suitable introduction to his praise. The adoration of God as the hearer of prayer, as a sin-forgiving God, and as the portion and satisfaction of his people in the gracious communications which he makes to them in his holy temple, suggests subjects which, on devotional occasions, can never be inappropriate.

From the displays of God's kindness as a God of grace, the Psalmist's soul stretches away to displays of God's kindness in the protection which he affords. He singles out a case in which this protection is most visible,—the case of those who remain on the broad sea, and who have trading in great waters. To deepen the sense of God's kindness in the protection which he affords to those who are thus exposed, the sacred poet calls in the aids of the storm, and represents God as stilling the raging of the sea, and the noise of its waves. In pursuance of the same thought, his inspired mind carries him to the uttermost parts of the earth, where the fear-struck inhabitants behold, in the wild appearances of nature with which they are surrounded, tokens of God's terrible majesty. Yet, although all the elements are contending together, God's protection is apparent in making the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice over the trembling dwellers. From these scenes of terror, we are suddenly hurried into scenes of beauty and of bounty. The seed-time and the harvest are set before us in their varied loveliness, and the flowers and fruits of the field are made to bloom afresh in this song of gratitude. The figure employed in my text is highly poetical. The year is represented as wearing on her head a crown of greater worth than the purest gold,—a crown of plenty prepared by the goodness of God.

Let us, in dependence on divine aid, dwell for a little upon the scene suggested by these words, 1. "Crowning the year with goodness." 2. Contemplate the agency by which such a blessed result is brought about. 3. Make a practical application of the subject.

I. To reach the meaning of these words, "Crowning the year with goodness," you are not obliged to call in the aids of imagination, you have only to unlock the stores of memory. Call to mind the appearance which our own rich neighbourhood presented but a few months ago, and you will realize the full meaning of the phrase before us. In the mind of the most unthinking, some impression must remain of what we were then privileged to see and feel. Have you not the recollection of some day more glorious than the rest,—a day remarkable for its beauty even amid a succession of beautiful days,—when you walked in the fields and saw them ripening for the harvest; when here you saw grass growing for cattle, and rejoicing in its living verdure; when there you saw corn waving for the use of man, and rejoicing in its stately luxuriance,—the fine wheat, and the golden barley, and the blooming pea, vying with each other in abundance; when the silence of nature reigned around, broken only by the song of the lark, as it rose high in mid-air and poured forth its notes of gladness; or if a breath of wind passed by, bringing freshness on its wings, it awakened a rustling along the ripening crops, which in wisdom's ear, sounded like the gladness of the fields when they shout for joy, and when they sing? But there is much betwixt the ripening of the harvest and its ingathering. Even after the earth has been covered with fullness, the rotting rain and the shaking wind may destroy the hopes of the year. Harvest may come, but the weather of harvest may be withheld; the reaper's song may be changed into the voice of wailing, and the harvest may be made an heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow. This brings us a stage onward, and reminds us of the goodness of God to us in the season of reaping. The bottles of heaven were shut up, the winds of heaven were restrained, the sun smiled upon the cheerful scene, when the harvest-man reaped the corn and gathered the ears with his arms. One service more concludes the scene and completes the picture. The loaded wain gathered into the barn the treasures of the field, and on every hand the swelling barn-yards, gilded by the softened rays of a December sun, proclaim to the eye the fertility of the season, and form the diadem with which God has crowned the year.

The blessing of a land yielding her increase, with which we are this year gladdened, was one of the blessings which God promised to ancient Israel on condition of their obedience. It is a blessing which is widely felt, and which cannot be too highly appreciated. It is a source of personal comfort, for the heart is thereby filled with food and gladness; it spreads comfort over the family circle, and sends joy throughout a nation's population. Some of the darkest pictures which the pen ever drew, have been suggested by the corresponding judgment. Distress could not be painted in gloomier colours than those which Jeremiah employs to describe the condition of Palestine under a grievous famine. Judah is represented as mourning, and the land as languishing; her gates as black as the ground, and the cry of Jerusalem as going up to heaven. The nobles sent out their little ones for water, but they returned with empty vessels. The ground was chopt for want of rain; the ploughmen were ashamed and covered their heads. The hind calved in the field and forsook her young, because there was no grass; and the wild asses, tamed by hunger, did stand in the high places of the city, they snuffed up the wind like dragons, their eyes did fail because there was no grass. The children said to their mothers, Where is corn and wine when they swooned in the streets, and when their souls were poured out into their mothers' bosoms. Nature was sorely agonized with extreme agony when, under the pressure of want, it forgot its greatest aversions, and was fain to be filled with the supplies of the dunghill; when affection was deaf and maternal love became blind: and the noble lady, who through very delicacy, could not touch the castle with her foot, fed with delight upon the body of her child, and laid up what she left for another bloody feast.

What would have been our condition as a nation, if, instead of visiting us this year with plenty, God had visited us with a scanty crop? Through the failure of preceding years, our granaries were wellnigh empty; foreign produce could not supply our lack, trade was depressed, agitation was afloat, and discontent was beginning to speak in suppressed murmurs. All the elements of national convulsion were prepared, and the only thing awaiting to involve our land in tumult was some public distress. A year of scarcity would have consummated our evils. It would have overwhelmed us with the most calamitous of all national calamities—popular insurrection. But God has quieted the tumults of the people, by preventing them; and, by his goodness in the season, all these evils have been warded off. Our fears have been disappointed—our hopes have been exceeded. The poorest, by honest industry, may obtain a fulness of bread; and the rich, in the possession of peace, may enjoy what God has given them.

II. Let us consider the agency of God in the fertility of the season,—“Thou crownest the year with thy goodness.” I know nothing more calculated to teach man his entire dependence upon God, than the course of the seasons. Man may plough and sow, he may expend all the skill and labour of which he is capable; but, without God’s blessing, all man’s efforts will be fruitless. His skill, and his labour, and his anxiety, will not make a single grain to vegetate. The mighty power of God must interpose before, in the deadened seed, there can arise the principle of vegetable life. Who can penetrate into the secret processes of nature? Whose eye can detect the moment when new life enters the seed? What investigation can explain the step by which life and death are thus connected? If science cannot explain, far less can it produce the process. The enlivening of the seed is the work of Omnipotence. He was no inexpert advocate who, in contending with the Atheist, picked up a straw which lay at his feet, and proceeded from its contexture to demonstrate the existence and power of God. Every blade of grass, every stalk of corn, every trembling leaf, witnesses to God’s mighty power.

But, apart from the hidden process by which vegetable life is produced, you will easily perceive that there is a necessary combination of outward circumstances, over which man has no control. The softening shower must descend—the vivifying sun must shine. Rain and fair weather must be so balanced, as to work together for the desired result. An excess of rain would flood the field and rot the seed—an excess of sun would parch the ground, and would imprison the seed in the clay-bound soil. Who tempers these extremes? Is it man? No; he can only look on in helpless anxiety. It is the work of God to prepare the ground, to water its ridges, to make it soft with showers, and to excite its powers by the stimulating rays of the sun, and thus to bless its springing. The providence of God is equally visible in every subsequent stage of its growth. The power of God must be at work, to cause its continued, though silent, increase; the care of God must be at work, to restrain the blasting mildew and the shaking wind; and the wisdom of God must be at work, to combine the varied agencies which promote fertility.

Yet, although we are thus dependent upon God for the fertility of our seasons, such is the atheism of the human heart, that we are apt to forget this dependence. This is a charge to which our times are peculiarly liable. Our days are days of improvement. Men are stimulating their minds in the progress of discovery. They are searching with laudable curiosity into the causes of things, and are employing their ingenuity to increase the amount of human comfort. But with this spirit of inquiry there is associated a spirit of ungodliness. Every improvement which is made seems to loosen their connection with God. Every discovery seems to remove them a step farther from dependence upon God. Every second cause which is seen seems to blind their eyes regarding the great First Cause. Short-sighted race! Our vain wisdom and false philosophy make us forget that all secondary causes are of God’s appointment, and that he works as much by these as if the clouds were to open, and God’s agency was to be visibly displayed in all that befalls us. It is not long since the speculators boasted of the improvements in agricultural labour, and calculated with presumptuous certainty regarding the capabilities of the country, and the fulness which improvement would secure to the land. Providence never entered as an element into their calculations; this was a subject on which they never spared a thought, and of which, if they spoke, they spoke with a sneer. But Providence has vindicated its own importance. By the scantiness of the last three years, Providence has been shaking its rod over us; it has been reading us a lesson of wisdom, and if we are not dull disciples we may have been taught how little man’s skill and man’s industry can effect without God’s blessing. A cold and surly winter, a dropping or a boisterous autumn, will undo all man’s labour and destroy man’s hopes.

Is it not a cause of deep lamentation, and a standing evidence of the corruption of man’s heart, that the time when we are most apt to forget God, is just when God is most bountiful to us? It is not when God sends cleanness of teeth into our borders that the remembrance of God is banished from the mind. On the contrary, it is then that we are most ready to acknowledge our dependence upon him. Driven by stern necessity, we visit God in the time of trouble, and pour out our prayer unto him when his chastening is upon us. It is in the time of plenty when we wax rebellious and forgetful. It was when God of old made his people ride on the high places of the earth, that they might eat the increase of the fields, when he made them to suck honey out of the rock and oil out of the flinty rocks, butter of kine and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, that he brought this charge against them, "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxed fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness, thou hast forsaken God who made thee, and lightly esteemed the Rock of thy salvation." The fear of Agur was, lest he should be full and deny God, and say, Who is the Lord? It was when the prodigal was in his father's house, enjoying its fulness and its comforts, that he planned his departure—that he cherished insolent feelings and uttered insolent words. So true is it, that corn, wine, and oil steal away the soul!

It is to guard against these feelings and to cherish the opposite feelings of pious gratitude, that we are this night met. Breathes there a soul so blinded, as not to perceive God's hand in our present plenty, breathes there a soul so dead to generous feeling, as not to beat high in gratitude? We fear that this question when applied to fallen man, is more dictated by pride than by a right estimate of our own deceitful hearts. There is no doubt, every cause of gratitude in the plenty which is every where spread around us,—there is no want of goodness on the part of God; but may there not be, is there not generally, a lack of gratitude on the part of man? Plain though gratitude be as a duty, how seldom is that duty heartily fulfilled on the part of man? Gratitude is not the bare expression of the lips, it is a feeling formed in the deep recesses of the heart—out of the abundance of the heart does it speak. It is not a sudden burst of affection, like the sparkling of thorns under a pot, flaming forth with a flickering blaze, and then going out in darkness,—it is a steady passion. It is a regulation of the life. There is thanks-living as well as thanks-giving. It consists in an abiding sense of God's goodness, and in connecting all the varied manifestations of kindness which we daily experience with God's bounty. Can those of you then, be sincere in your gratitude this evening, who daily sit down to a full board prepared by God, and yet neglect to give him thanks? Can he who is forgetful or formal in thanks-giving for daily mercies, be sincere and hearty in the sacrifice of praise which we are met this night to offer up? When Christiana was brought to the house of the Interpreter, and was reminded of her duty by the use of similitudes, she was taken into a room, where was a hen with her chickens. One of the chickens went to the trough to drink, and every time it drank it lifted up its head and its eyes to heaven. The chicken was Christiana's remembrancer, and by the Interpreter she was instructed to do intelligently what the chicken did instinctively, and to lift up her heart with her eyes, and to thank the Father of lights for every blessing, whether common or special. Let daily mercies be acknowledged by daily thanks-giving, and then will we be taught to recognise God's hand in his more general bounty, and be prepared suitably to praise him.

III. The voice of God speaking to us by his providence, and speaking to us in his Word, cannot be misunderstood. Its language is—Receive with gratitude, and use with moderation, the blessings which my goodness has provided. Are there any before me who grudgingly, and with unreasonable parsimoniousness, use the good things which God has given them—who do not take to themselves, or give to others, a sufficiency of necessary comforts? Consider God's liberality, and stand rebuked. God has given these bounties, not to be hoarded up, but to be used. This is God's intention in providing them, and in bestowing them upon you; and you make the intention of God of none effect if you do not, with Christian liberality, use these gifts. You sin against your own body—you sin against the bodies of others.

Abstinence is not the evil against which caution is most needed—excess is the overflowing flood against which the standard must be raised. Those of you who abuse God's goodness, be wise, be taught, lest God be angry with you. Ye exclude temperance from the list of Christian graces—ye bless that which God doth curse—ye love that which God doth hate. Do not sow the seeds of disease in your body; do not impair the mind's activity, by making your belly your god; do not reduce yourselves below the level of the beasts that perish, by overthrowing reason from its seat; do not shame yourselves, by indulging until you speak with stammering tongues, and walk with unsteady step. God has been crowning the year with his goodness—you cover yourself with a curse, by converting God's good into evil.

In this year of plenty, brethren, imitate the example of Joseph. In the years of plenty he laid up for the years of dearth. Are wages good?—are provisions cheap? Lay up for the day of sickness, for the years of age. Why do we see so much poverty and wretchedness in the houses of many, when sickness overtakes them? Why are there so many who apply for admission on the poor-roll, and seek the scanty pittance which charity can afford? In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, improvidence is the cause. It is our duty, in the day of health, to provide for a day of sickness—in a day of plenty, to provide for a day of want. If we neglect this duty, Providence will punish us for our improvidence. O for a return of that spirit of honourable independence by which our land was once distinguished! Men then made provision for grey hairs and infirm years, and for laying their heads decently below the sod; and nothing but the sternest necessity would compel them to receive parochial aid. In this year of plenty, let there be established a saving-bank in every family—let a portion be laid up against coming scarcity.

We have been speaking of the ingathering of the fruits of the earth, of a joyful harvest—think of that harvest when we ourselves will be cut down by the sickle of Time, and will be gathered in. "The field is the world." Christ's "fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner, and he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Harken and be warned!—what cry of agony is that which falls upon the ear, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The duty of considering the course of God's providence.—The propriety of looking back on all the ways by which God has been leading us, may be evinced by the consideration, that the events of each man's life, like the more important events of history, can seldom be impartially considered, or even fully understood, at the time of their occurrence: they occasion such an agitation of mind, and call into play so many feelings and passions, that we are too apt to take a partial view of them, especially while as yet the ends for which these dispensations were sent are unknown, or at least have not been realized in our experience. It is after the stunning shock has passed away—after the storm of passion has subsided, and after we have begun to taste the fruits of such dispensations, that we are able on a calm, though it may be a pensive review of them, to see all the parts of this chequered drama in combination, and to mark the wisdom and kindness which adjusted them all in relation to some great and important end. Take one example as an illustration:—the head of a young and engaging family, actively engaged in honourable business for their support, may be stunned by the sudden failure of all his schemes, and may not be able at the time to discover any reason arising out of his past conduct, why he should be involved in one of the severest of all calamities, a hopeless bankruptcy; but perhaps these very children, whom he loves so fondly, are just at an age when, if he were to enjoy uninterrupted prosperity, they might be led away by the seducing gaieties and vanities of the world; and for their sakes, God, who knows what is best, sends this heavy stroke, that, being subjected in early life to privation, they may be endued with thoughtfulness, nerved with an independent and industrious spirit, and thus fitted hereafter for usefulness. All this may be unperceived at the time, but perhaps in the course of years, when that fond parent finds his children growing up with a chastened spirit, and entering life with bardy resolution, fitted by this very discipline for industry, economy, and prudence, and ultimately advanced, it may be, to stations for which an easier path might have unfitted them, he will have reason, in the gladness of his heart to say, "It was good for them that I was afflicted." So we ought to judge nothing before the time, but to look to the end of God's dispensations, for, says the apostle, "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy." (Jas. v. 11.) —REV. JAMES BUCHANAN. (Improvement of Affliction.)

Trouble the Lot of the Christian.—Many of our fellow-creatures, yea, many of his own dear children, have a rougher path appointed; some of the heirs of glory have scarcely bread to eat; some spend a great part of their lives in wearisome pain or pining sickness; some are disposed, by lowness of spirits, to such gloomy thoughts and black temptations, as deprive them of comfort in any outward situation of life. A little attention may presently lead our thoughts to cases which we must acknowledge much more distressing than our own. But in the worst, we see the Lord supports his people. If, like the bush which Moses saw, they appear to be in the midst of flames, like that bush, likewise, they are preserved unconsumed, because the Lord is there. Trouble is laid upon their loins; they go through fire and through water; but at length they are brought out into a wealthy place.—REV. JOHN NEWTON.

IMMORTALITY.

By WILLIAM ANDERSON, Esq.,

Author of "Landscape Lyrics," &c.

[The following Verses were suggested by the striking reply of a Protestant minister, who was about to proceed to Ireland, to labour among the deluded and ignorant Popish peasantry, and who, on being warned by a friend of the personal danger he thereby incurred, nobly answered, "I am immortal, till my work is done!"]

WHAT nerves the soldier in the field,
When foes are raging high?
What makes him proudly scorn to yield,
Though numbers round him die?
The faith that Heaven directs each ball,
The course that it shall run;—
'Tis that he knows he will not fall,
Until his work is done!

What makes the sailor on the wreck,
When storms are frowning near,
Bear up, with heart and form erect,
His bosom free from fear?
'Tis that he feels that God is by,
To shield him like a son;—
'Tis that he knows he will not die,
Until his work is done!

God holds the winds as by a rein,
Which still they must obey;
The ocean fierce he doth restrain,
By his all-guiding sway:
The hand that bears the planets high,
Upholds the fulgent sun,
Has fix'd the hour that all must die,
When their set work is done!

What arms the martyr, 'midst his fires,
To smile serene at death,
And his whole heart and soul inspires
With never-changing faith?—
Until the victor's crown is gain'd
The laurel wreath is won;
Th' oppressor's fury is restrain'd—
His work must first be done!

What leads Christ's servant still to dare
All dangers for his sake;
And with unshaken firmness bear
Ills that the boldest shake?
The trust that God is ever nigh,
To prosper what's begun;
To send a blessing from on high,
Upon his work when done!

And when the good fight he has fought,
His earthly struggles o'er,
He finds the recompense he sought,
Where grief is felt no more:
'Tis then he gains the appointed prize—
His triumph is begun;—
He lives immortal in the skies,
When all his work is done!

LEEKs.

By THE REV. WILLIAM PATRICK.

THIS word occurs only once in our English translation; but chatzir, the Hebrew word used by the sacred penman, although only once rendered leeks, is found in sixteen passages in the Hebrew Bible. The concomitant words, from a similar root, signify a court, town, or village, and also a trumpet, or to blow or sound a trumpet. In our English Bible, chatzir is generally translated grass, herb, hay; and only in Numbers (xi. 5) leeks, on the well-known occasion after the burning at Taberah, when the people lusted for flesh and loathed manna. The chatzir must obviously have been a savoury palatable plant, and very different from hay or grass; for it is associated, in the lusting memories of the sensual Israelites, with flesh, cucumbers, melons, onions, and garlic—all tasty, delicate, or substantial viands, which a whetted appetite would naturally long after. Their foolish and intemperate longings are faithfully recorded by Moses; and, to satisfy ungrateful Israel for the want of the leeks and other much relished luxuries of Egypt, quails are given, in wrath, as a relish to the tasteless manna, at Kibroth-hattaavah. From a similar radical word, signifying a trumpet, it is more than probable that the Hebrew chatzir signifies some hollow-leaved plant, such as the leek, getting broader at one end and tapering upwards. The whole, or nearly the whole, of the graminææ are hollow; but leeks, which are not of that tribe, are chiefly distinguished by their hollow trumpet-shaped leaves. The two silver trumpets, mentioned in the preceding chapter (Numbers x. 2), to be used for the calling of the assembly and the journeying of the camp, were to be of a "whole piece," and are always represented as tapering like the leaf of the common leek. The Allium family are of the class Hexandria, order Monogynia, and numbers no fewer than forty-five species. The Allium porrum, or leek, has a globose umbel, three-cusped stamina, petals with a rough keel, and a coated root. The leek, however, is a plant too well known to require description. For a very full explanation of the Hebrew chatzir, the reader is referred to "Celsius," part ii. page 263. In Numbers xi. 4, we are expressly told, that it was the "mixed multitude which was among them," i. e., the Israelites, that "fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?" Now, in Exodus xii. 36, we are assured, that when the Israelites left Egypt, and were journeying from Rameses to Succoth, "a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks and herds, even very much cattle." How then should the chosen race, with plenty of cattle of their own, long for the flesh-pots of Egypt? The explanation in the 17th chapter of Leviticus is scarcely satisfactory, as it seems to relate chiefly to the killing of cattle for sacrifices and the eating of blood. The only probable explanation to be given of this apparent discrepancy is, either that the word beshar, here rendered flesh, denotes only the flesh of fish, as it certainly does (Leviticus xi. 11), in the description of what sorts of fish may be eaten. All that have not "fins and scales," such as the eel, "shall be an abomination;" ye shall not "eat of their flesh." In Numbers xi. 5, this idea is also apparently supported in these words, "we remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely." All authors, ancient and modern, acknowledge the great abundance and delicious varieties of fish in Egypt; and it is well-known that the lake Tenis or Menzale, bordering on the land of Goshen, still abounds with fish, of which one author reckons upwards of seventy sorts. Diodorus Siculus informs us that, in his day (the fourth century), twenty-two kinds of fish were found in Lake Mœris, most of which, when taken, were salted with fossil salt brought from the African desert, probably from near Timbuctoo—sea-salt, and every thing belonging to the sea, being regarded in Egypt as an abomination. The fisheries in the Nile seem to have been free or open to the public; but those of the canals and of Lake Mœris were hereditary appendages attached to the crown; and, if Herodotus may be credited, this branch of revenue alone yielded a talent, or £193, 15s., per day, during the six months the waters flowed through the canal into the lake; and during the other six months, twenty mine, or £64: 11: 8d., per day; (and these handsome sums, Diodorus Siculus assures us, were appropriated by Lis Majesty to his Queen as her revenue, which, when added to that of the city Anthylla, must have been a gratuity of some value.) But if the flesh longed for, along with the leeks and onions, be supposed to have been that of kine, we may either imagine that all the cattle, except those necessary for sacrifices, had been cut off in the wilderness, or that during the hot season, in a sultry desert, flesh ceased to be palatable, and they longed for the cooling vegetables which accompanied their repasts in the land of Egypt. In Harmer's Observations, we are told, on the authority of De Vitriaco, that during the siege of Damietta in 1218, although the Egyptians had corn in abundance, some of the more delicate of them, like the longing Israelites, pined away and died for want of the leeks, garlic, onions, fish, birds, fruits, and herbs with which they were wont to regale themselves—a striking commentary on the passage before us. The idea of the chatzir being a plant of the lotus tribe, seems to rest on no other ground than mere conjecture.

 BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. HENRY MÖWES,

LATE PASTOR OF ALTEHAUSEN AND IVENRODE, PRUSSIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

THE conversion of Möwes to the faith of the Gospel is to be traced entirely, by the blessing of God's Spirit, to the workings of his own powerful mind. Constitutionally influenced by an ardent love of truth, he searched the Scriptures, with the view of arriving at a clear perception of the doctrine of Christ. Nor did he search in vain. He who had implanted in his soul a desire to be taught savingly and to profit, opened his understanding to understand and believe the statements of the Bible; and hence we find him remarking, on one occasion, "I know I have many persons to thank for different things, but it was God who led me to himself; my thanks for spiritual good are due to Him alone." Thus instructed by the Spirit of God, without the instrumentality of human teaching, his views of religious truth were derived solely from the Word of God; and to his mind, therefore, the simple authority of a text of Scripture carried stronger conviction than the most conclusive deductions of human reason. "Let God be true," was his prevailing sentiment, "though every man should prove a liar." His preaching, accordingly, was strictly scriptural. He delighted in rendering the Bible its own commentary; and what made his pulpit discourses peculiarly acceptable to the spiritually-minded portion of his hearers, was the rich vein of experimental religion by which they were uniformly pervaded. He spoke as a man who felt the power of the truth, and who lived habitually under its influence. There was nothing assumed, nothing overwrought in his manner; he bore, throughout, the aspect of a man of God.

The most strongly marked features in his Christian character were, a lively faith and an unshrinking courage; qualities which enabled him to discharge the more private functions of the pastoral office with peculiar success. In the domiciliary visits which he paid to his people, he spoke to them with a plainness, a simplicity, and a fervour, which, while it encouraged the followers of Christ, caused the thoughtless and irreligious to quail. Availing himself of the commonest incidents of every-day life, he directed their thoughts to subjects of far higher and more enduring interest. In private, he beautifully exemplified the practical power of the doctrines which he publicly taught. He thought as a Christian—he spoke as a Christian—he lived as a Christian. “A visit to the parsonage,” said one who enjoyed the privilege of occasional intercourse with this holy man, “was like a visit to the temple of God. I went to him the most gladly, when I most needed to be invigorated and refreshed, and never did I return disappointed.” Such a man was an unspeakable blessing to the parish which owned him as its pastor.

After labouring for four years in the charge to which he had been first appointed, Möwes was removed to a more enlarged sphere of usefulness, having been presented in 1822 to the pastoral cure of the united parishes of Altenhausen and Ivenrode. Deeply impressed with the importance of the trust committed to him, he entered upon his new duties with an earnest desire to prove himself a faithful minister of the Lord Jesus. The charge was laborious, but he had the comfort of seeing that he was not labouring in vain in the Lord. His ministry was remarkably acceptable, and many were led to a serious inquiry after a knowledge of the truth. For seven years did he discharge the duties of his parish, and enjoy the comforts of a peaceful home, with a mind full of holy tranquillity and unclouded happiness. Since he first entered upon the office of the ministry, he had never known grief. But such a state of matters was not likely to continue long. “Man is born to trouble” as necessarily “as the sparks fly upward.” Möwes was destined to feel the truth of this statement, to his painful experience. He was undoubtedly a branch of the true Vine—he was a fruit-bearing branch; but is it not said expressly by Him who has styled himself the Vine, “Every branch in me that beareth fruit, He (the Father) pruneth it, that it may bring forth more fruit?”

In the spring of 1828, a sadness came over the spirit of Möwes, caused by the death of his early friend and associate Charles Blume. The loss of one with whom he had been so long and so closely connected by the ties of friendship was deeply felt. He gave vent to his feelings in some touchingly pathetic hymns, which are scattered through his works. The loss, however, preyed upon his mind; his constitution became affected; and, towards autumn of the same year, he suffered from a violent cough and hoarseness. This, as he still continued to preach, was ere long followed by a severe affection of the lungs, which for a time endangered his valuable life. He himself despaired of his recovery; and the following lines, which he penned on the occasion, and which we quote from the highly interesting published Memoir, display the calm spiritual feeling with which he contemplated death:—

Have ye seen, O friends, that my eye is dim?
Have ye marked my falling breath?
Hark! to the strain of my farwell hymn,
Ere my voice is hushed in death.

When my soul departs to her Father's house,
And the faint voice no more ye hear,
Come! come! to the shadowy bed of death,
With the song I love to hear.

Sing to me of Him who has conquered death,
Who our life on the cross has won!
Sing forth with joy, that I sink to sleep
In song when life is done.

Stretched on a bed of suffering for several months, Möwes exhibited the most edifying patience and resignation. He received all as coming directly from the hand of a Father, and he learned even to glory in tribulation. He was willing to live, and he was equally willing to die. His delight on earth was in serving Christ, and his most ardent hope was to be with Christ in heaven. Towards the spring of 1829 he gradually recovered, and on one occasion he ventured to appear in the pulpit. The discourse which he delivered deeply impressed his hearers, but the labour was too much for his debilitated frame. At the close of the service, he descended from the pulpit; and, on reaching the parsonage, he threw himself down exhausted, and burst into tears of joy. The exertion caused a relapse of his disease, and he was again reduced to a very low state of body. His mind, however, retained its wonted vigour, and he bore up with Christian meekness under the smitings of his Father's rod. While thus suffering from bodily distress, he was called to endure a new trial, in the death of his mother-in-law, who had acted towards him as a kind and affectionate parent. His strength now visibly declined more and more rapidly; and at length, so lingering and protracted was his disease, and so little prospect did he entertain of ever being able to resume his pastoral duties, that, in the spring of 1830, he came to the resolution, painful though it was, of resigning all connection with his beloved parish. Before finally taking this step, he preached once more to his people, but with the greatest difficulty and with frequent expectoration of blood. At length he resigned his charge in the month of June; a successor was appointed, and solemnly, and in the presence of the congregation, he tendered into the young man's hands the charge of his attached people. “Feed thy flock and mine” was his short but emphatic exhortation, and the whole congregation were dissolved in tears. The act of resigning an office in which he so warmly delighted was inexpressibly painful; and, in a letter to a friend, we find him thus speaking of his feelings on the melancholy occasion:—

“O! the marble that represents a man is cold also; it tells not of that which has made the heart bleed: but even though this heart has bled, I cannot otherwise feel, and say, and pray, than, ‘Even so, Father, for so it seems good in thy sight.’ Now the Pastor Möwes is as good as dead. Dead! he shall speak yet once more, if God will, but it will only be a dying word from the lips of the departing. As a private man Möwes yet lives, but not as his friends would see him; he moves as a shadow—he eats and drinks as a sick man. There he stands as a reed—but all—my God be praised, even as if he had not appointed this.”

Möwes was now cast once more upon the providence of God, with a wife and four children. He received a retiring salary, but so small, as to be quite insufficient for the supply of their daily wants; and, although in such a state of bodily weakness as to require more than usual attention and care, he was subjected, from his limited income, to many privations, which added not a little to his distress. Though unable to take any charge as a minister, he acquired, in a short time, sufficient strength to look about him for some other employment. “I have resigned the office,” he said, “that my soul filled; the choice of another gives me very little anxiety.” And in a letter he thus writes, on the same subject:—

"I know not where such a man as I am can be placed; I have been accustomed to clerical and spiritual affairs exclusively. I have not troubled myself with the barren fields of the busy world. Man, the spirit of man, has engaged me, not his name or rank; and I would fain hold some office connected with the former, and be somewhere near my one great desire." In this case, others, who are more familiar with these things, will be best able to tell what will come the nearest to my wish. Labour, of whatever kind it may be, that my situation will demand, is not formidable to me; many, in whose word I dare to confide, have given me to understand that I handled the opened Gospel not wholly unworthily, but that, attempting high things, I so far succeeded, as that minds were strengthened and awakened, hearts raised and influenced; this (now I may indeed say so) is a proof that in a less arduous undertaking I should not wholly fail."

Expecting to obtain a situation through the influence of his relatives, Möwes resolved to leave Altenhausen, and settle in his native town. As the period approached for setting out on his journey to Magdeburg, the thought of bidding farewell to so many kind friends oppressed his spirit. The day before that which was fixed for his departure, many of his former parishioners crowded to the house, that they might see the face of their beloved pastor once more. The scene was very affecting—it was too much for his feeble frame. "So, then, all forsake me!" he exclaimed, and wept bitterly. The shock, it was feared by his friends, would prove fatal. During the night he was seized with a violent spasmodic affection of the chest; the whole frame was convulsed, and for five hours the symptoms were of the most alarming kind. Towards morning he rallied again, but a whole week elapsed before he was able to undertake his projected journey. At length, on the last day of August 1830, he left the scene of his pastoral duties, where he had enjoyed many refreshing tokens that he had not "laboured in vain, nor spent his strength for nought."

Our invalid probably expected, that a return to the scene of his early days would be decidedly beneficial to his health; but although he was not perceptibly injured by the fatigue of travelling, he made little progress towards recovery. The domestic comfort and happiness which he enjoyed no doubt tended to soothe and alleviate his distress of body; this, however, was only for a time. Scarcely had a few weeks passed away, after he had returned to Magdeburg, when the affectionate heart of Möwes was torn by the death of one of his children. He had three amiable girls, and one of them was cut down in the flower of youth and beauty. That a parent so kind-hearted and full of tenderness should feel deeply under a bereavement of this nature, we may easily conceive; and, from what has already been depicted of the character of Möwes, the reader will not be surprised in perusing the following beautiful sentiments from his pen, on the death of his beloved Eliza:—

"This event has now given me an opportunity of learning the full value of that salvation which we owe to the Prince of Life. Without him, I should be afraid for my beloved child—without him, I should be afraid for my wrung heart; but now distress and death have little to do with me. He revives the heavy-laden. You must not think that eyes filled with tears, seeking and not finding, testify against these words; nor yet the outbursts of sadness which at times overshadow the countenance. Though the sun stands fast in the heavens, there are often shadows on the earth; and though the light shines, drops of dew will hang on the leaves. O yes, it is a distress, even for the heart of faith, to learn, in a beloved child, that the life of man is like grass, which in the morning groweth up, and in the evening is cut down, and withereth. When man looks only at that which is before his eyes, what is it he sees? A horrible spectacle, desolation, the power of the densest darkness—of death. A stony heart might feel, and a withered one begin to bleed. Oh! mine could not divest itself of these human feelings, and it cannot yet. It beat with love for her who is gone home, and still does it; but this feeling is not pain—it is no sentiment of sorrow that I would be free from. It is not grief about what has happened, and my inability to prevent it. No! dear, dear as my Eliza is, I would have nothing otherwise. I am content with what my God has done. There is only wanting to me the sight of what I believe, and what I know with perfect certainty—because he who is the True has declared it to us. What, then, I now feel, is only an attractive power, which comes to me from her, whom God has united with me for an eternal life; an attraction from her heart to mine, which must yet wait till it shall have learned to give God the honour in all things. I have done so with regard to the death of my dear child—I have done so, weeping and praying by her death-bed and her grave. I am now reconciled to the thought that she is gone away. I seem, when I think of her, to have a new eye, by which I look through all clouds, even to the circle where, through the mercy of that God to whom I have so often commended her, she has taken her place."

Strong in faith, and firmly believing in the delightful doctrine of the communion of the saints, Möwes often realized the presence of his child, though now in heaven. He took a peculiar pleasure in thinking and speaking of her as still alive, and in pointing forward the rest of his children to that brighter and better world,

"Where death-divided friends shall meet,
To part no more for ever."

In accordance with this spirit and practice, he says, in a letter to a friend, "Hope for a beloved one who is gone home, is to me one of the most joyful of feelings; and I cannot conceive it possible for a man to have a dear friend in another world, without, when circumstances recall him, bringing him, as it were, into the circle, and speaking of him; and tarrying, even though it be with a swelling heart, long and gladly with him, in imagination." Animated by such feelings, he felt that, by the death of his dear Eliza, he had now an interest in heaven which he never felt before. The thought of joining the happy family in that joyful place was to him a sweetly encouraging prospect, and one which raised him above the joys and sorrows of this passing scene. Gladly would we have proceeded onward in detailing the history of this heavenly-minded man, but space warns us to delay the rest of our narrative till our next Number.

AN ADDRESS AND REMONSTRANCE ON THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SABBATH. DRAWN UP BY AUTHORITY OF THE PRESBYTERY OF LANARK.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN,—In the name and by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose ordained servants we are, to "watch for your souls, as those who must give an account;" and "that we may do it with joy, and not with grief," suffer the word of exhortation.

God spake from amid "the thunders and lightnings of Sinai," saying—"Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it."

Here Jehovah, in the most solemn manner, declares the appointment and obligation of the day of rest—the type of his own glorious complacency in the great work of creation,—and calls on man to enter into fellowship with the divine rest and joy. Man, by transgression, incurred the awful guilt of breaking God's rest in his holy workmanship; and to redeem the loss, and restore to both God and man the glorious privilege, "the Word became flesh," and suffered and died upon the cross. Thus the obligation and sacredness of the Sabbath, so far from being done away, were but the more solemnly enhanced; and only the time of its observance changed from the seventh to the first day of the week, in perpetual testimony of Christ's resurrection from the dead,—“the first-fruits of them that sleep”—the token of the more glorious finished and accepted work of redemption—the basis of new creation for ever: and this is the Christian Sabbath; and so "to continue till the end of the world." We, believing, enter into that rest; even through the privilege of a conscience pacified by the blood of Christ, and sanctified by the Spirit of grace.

As Jehovah thus instituted the Sabbath from the beginning to be a "sign" between him and his people for ever, and has constituted and set forth Jesus, in his finished work, as the alone meeting-place between ransomed souls and their God—so is the holy Sabbath the especial season, and the house of prayer the especial place, for fellowship with the Father of our spirits. Then and there, by eminence, God hath recorded his name, to meet with his people and bless them. Behold the promise—"If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord honourable; and shalt honour Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then thou shalt delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Hear the Church—"The Sabbath is to be sanctified by a holy resting all that day, even from such worldly employments and recreations as are lawful on other days; and spending the whole time in the public and private exercises of God's worship, except so much as is to be taken up in the works of necessity and mercy."

For be warned, dearly beloved—God is a holy and a jealous God, who will not give his glory to another, nor accept a divided heart and service at the hand of any man. God spake by Moses unto the children of Israel, saying, "Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between Me and you throughout all your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord, that doth sanctify you. Six days may work be done, but in the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord: whosoever doeth work on the Sabbath-day he shall surely be put to death." As Jehovah on the seventh day rested and was refreshed, so he gave his own solemn sanction to the prohibition from working, except in works of necessity and mercy, not only by his signal judgment on the daring transgressor, (Num. xv. 36,) but by the two striking facts, that not a stone was to be added even to the Tabernacle, nor was any manna rained from heaven on that day. While by this also warning those who neglect to be built up "living stones" into Jesus, and refuse to feed upon him as their soul's life, now; that no soul can be added to the house of God, which is the body of Christ, and no part be had of the bread of God, which is the living Christ, in the long Sabbath of eternity. Alas! to all such, soul-work hath ceased for ever; for thus we read, "And Moses said, Eat that to-day, for to-day is a Sabbath unto the Lord; to-day ye shall not find it in the field,"—the field is this world or age. "Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, in it there shall be none. And it came to pass, that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none." Ah! brethren, none can have Christ in heaven, who have not gathered and laid him up in their hearts upon earth.

But while, "knowing the terrors of the Lord," we thus solemnly warn, knowing also "the joy of the Lord," we would affectionately encourage you.—"Delight thyself also in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart." As "watchmen, set over the house of Israel, and lest your blood be required at our hands," we press the duty and obligation,—as affectionately desirous to have you, and willing to impart to you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own lives, because ye are dear unto us," we urge still more the beauty and blessedness of "remembering the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," and of "taking sweet counsel together, in walking to the house of God in company."

Then and there is the season and the place of ordained and especial response to the voice of your Father. Children, "seek ye my face." "Abba, Father! Thy face will we seek!" "The sacrifice of praise is the fruit of the lips." "I create (says God) the fruit of the lips"—by giving constant and ever-new occasion and theme, proclaiming each Sabbath in my sanctuary "peace, peace to him that is far off and to him that is nigh, and I will heal him." "But there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

Then and there, too, souls are bowed down, under a common burden of sin and sorrow, before the great throne of a pitying God, or taken and washed of the Word and Spirit, in the laver of Emmanuel's blood, or melted into forgiveness and brotherhood, as the fire of His love burns within and among them. And then and there are they soothed under their "depths" by "the grave sweet melody" of Psalms or lifted out of them by the tide of song, borne on from heart to heart, and upwards to the throne of God. Heaven opens; and they see "Jesus standing on the right hand of God."

And then and there are the infants of the Church dedicated to God—and as "the Lambs" of the flock, received to our faith and prayers and keeping "nurture"—in the covenant of holy baptism:—while there, "the season of the pass-over being now come," is spread, from time to time, the table of communion, at which sat our fathers, now "sleeping in Jesus," and where shall sit our children, when we are "gathered to our fathers"—that, as a warned, solemnized, and separated people, we may together "eat the Supper of the Lord"—high antepast of that "Table, which shall never, never be drawn!" "Surely God is in this place!" "There descends the blessing from on high—even life for ever more!" And "God in very deed dwells with man upon the earth!"

Thus does God's ordinance of the Sabbath and the sanctuary nourish, strengthen and extend the life and thankfulness it is so beautifully fitted to express; and thus it prepares for and assimilates to, the worship of the sanctuary above. There "his servants serve Him." And there is no rest there!—no cessation—no weariness—no imperfection—no interruption—no end! "And they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." "And the four living creatures said, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped Him, that liveth for ever and ever!"

It is, brethren, to a service so pure, affectionate, and heavenly, and not to any Pharisaical sanctimoniousness, that we rejoice to call you.

Deprive and rob not, then, your own souls, nor the souls of your children and households, dearly beloved, by the remissness of your authority, or the contagion of your evil example, of this "beauty of holiness"—the ordinance of the Sabbath and the sanctuary—God's greatest ordinance for the blessing of man upon the earth. Be witnesses for God against the spirit, maxims, and practice, in its manifold, open, and ever-increasing Sabbath desecrations and encroachments, by all classes, of a God-forgetting and wrath-provoking, because a Sabbath-breaking age. "God is no respecter of persons;" nor, in a matter so solemn as this, any more can we be. The court with its Sunday parade and music—the Privy-Council with its so frequent meetings on that day—ministers and statesmen with their party-conferences and entertainments—the man of the world "finding his pleasures"—the merchant in his counting-house—the man of business with his correspondence—the lawyer at his briefs—the medical practitioner careless of ordering his visits—the proprietor or manager of works "exacting all his labours"—the trader at his traffic—the farmer by inspection of his crops—the dealer, travelling with his cattle to, and from, markets—the shopman with his sales—the publican with his gains (gains, the price of souls!)—the idler listlessly strolling in fields and lanes—the gossip, male or female, making this a day especially of those “idle words,” of each of which “account must be given at the day of judgment”—the dissolute yet in their haunts—the drunkard and sensualist on their beds, unsobered and uncooled from their cups and revels overnight, or reaching far into the hours and breaking the stillness of the hallowed morn—ALL, ALL, by “turning away their feet from God’s holy Sabbath,” are “separating between their souls and their God,” and bringing down swift judgment on the land!

“Woe unto them, who say, what a weariness is it! And when will the Sabbath be gone, that we may sell corn, and set forth wheat?” Vain quest of gain! For thus saith the Lord. “Ye looked for much, and lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it. Why? saith the Lord of Hosts; because of my house which is waste (empty); and ye run every man unto his own house. Therefore the heaven over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit. And I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth; and upon man and upon cattle, and upon all the labour of the hands.” And, O, cannot God do this again?

Let, then, the voice of your petitions against it go forth to “the high places” of the land; telling your Queen to call on her people to “make Jehovah their fear and dread,” by keeping His Sabbaths and honouring His house; and “He will be” both her “sanctuary” and theirs—and let the voice of your cry against it ascend unto the ears of Jehovah Sabaoth; for thus is it written:—“I will gather them that are sorrowful for the solemn assembly; who are of thee; to whom the reproach of it was a burden.” Soon may that “day break, and the shadows flee away!” Then “violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls salvation, and thy gates praise. The sun shall no more be thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. The sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.” “Finally, brethren, pray for us.”

LINES

UPON SOWING THE SEED.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY, ESQ., SHEFFIELD.

[The following beautiful Lines never before published, we believe, have been kindly sent us by a friend.]

I.

Sow in the morn thy seed,
At e'en hold not thy hand,
To doubt or fear give thou no heed,
Broad-cast it o'er the land.

II.

Beside all waters sow,
The high-way furrows stock;
Drop it where thorns and thistles grow,
Scatter it on the rock.

III.

The good and fruitful ground,
Expect not here, or there,
O'er hill, and dale, in spots 'tis found,
Go, spread it every where.

IV.

Thou knowest not which shall thrive,
The late, or early sown;
Grace keeps the precious germs alive,
Whet and where ever strwn.

V.

And duly shall appear
In verdure, beauty, strength,
The tender blade, the stem, the ear,
And the full corn at length.

VI.

Thou shalt not sow in vain,
Cold, heat, and moist, and dry,
Shall foster and mature the grain
For garners in the sky.

VII.

Then, when the glorious end,
The day of God is come,
The angel-reapers shall descend,
And heaven shout Harvest home!

A VISIT TO THE SAMOA ISLANDS.

BEFORE submitting to our readers the following very interesting picture of a missionary station, it may be useful to state, that the islands here named are of the Navigator or Samoan groups; laid down in the map appended to Williams's “Missionary Enterprises” as considerably to the east of Tahiti. In November 1838, mention is made of an “infant Church of five members,” in the Island of Tutuila, where the Rev. Archibald Murray, a native of Roxburghshire, was the first settled missionary, under the London Missionary Society; and where, but three years before, the whole population was given to idolatry. The letter from which we are about to quote has just reached us from that now interesting spot, and furnishes lively evidence, if that were required, of the humanizing power of the Gospel. The writer does not belong to the mission, but sailed from Sydney in the missionary ship Camden, in company with three of the brethren; hoping to have his health confirmed by living for a time in that salubrious climate:—

Pango Pango Tutuila, March 16, 1840.

It was on Saturday, March 14, that we arrived here, having left Sydney 12th February. As we approached and sailed up the harbour, we were gradually surrounded by many canoes, and before we were anchored, the deck was covered by natives, all anxiously and affectionately greeting the “Mishingalies.” We were, however, the bearers of heavy tidings, and this cast a gloom on every heart, and brought a tear to almost every eye. The first canoe that reached us was guided by a middle-aged man, who, as soon as we were within hail, called out to our native teachers, inquiring for “Misi Williamü;”

and those who witnessed it will not forget the stunning and agonising effect which the news of his death produced. The man seemed at once unbinged—he dropped his paddle, and stooped his head and wept. We could not understand his words, but his gestures could not be misinterpreted. He accompanied us for some time, making various inquiries; but no smile enlightened his expressive countenance, and ever and anon he burst out into fresh cries and tears. Every one who came on board shook our hands heartily, many kissing them, and all pronouncing the word "Talofa," expressive of affectionate greeting; which we reciprocated with all our hearts. After a while we came on shore, to see Mrs Murray; Mr Murray being absent at Leone Bay, a station fifteen miles off, which he visits once in three weeks. As we passed up to THE HOUSE (par excellence), we observed the large erection formerly used for holding their savage dances, crowded with women, who were holding a prayer-meeting (it was Saturday night,) and filling the air with notes of praise, in place of their ferocious and abominable war-songs. Mrs Murray received us with Christian and joyous cordiality, though very much overcome by the sad intelligence, which had been already communicated to her. The first she heard of our approach was, that Mr Williams was coming, his ship was close at hand. This was hailed with a thrill of joy; but soon another native arrived, who gasped, "I can't speak!—I can't tell it you!" and at last gulped out, that Mr Williams was murdered. . . . We went on-board again at night, and returned at nine o'clock on Sabbath morning, to attend the native service; which was conducted by Matthew Ankin, who was originally a profligate runaway sailor, but, converted by Mr Murray's instrumentality, is now a valuable, ardent, and efficient auxiliary in the great cause.

The chapel is one hundred feet by twenty-seven, benched very thick, and capable of containing about a thousand people; for they fill every corner, passages and all, besides standing at the windows outside. The preacher was very earnest, and a more decorous and eagerly attentive congregation I never saw. Mrs Murray had told me before going in, that the Holy Spirit has of late been operating powerfully among the people. . . . You may imagine my feelings, when standing in the midst of reclaimed savages,—hearing them sing, with all their might, the praises of Jehovah; seeing them bow the head, and reverentially cover the face, and scarcely one wandering eye during prayer; and during sermon, seeming to devour the word as it dropt from the preacher's lips; while a woman would sob out, in spite of her efforts to repress it; and a man would wipe the unbidden tear from his swarthy cheek, so lately marked by all that could express a ferocious heart, but now meek, humble, and subdued. . . . We next had English service in the native chapel; conducted, I need not say how well, by Mr Harbutt, attended by our party, and almost all the sailors. Next came examination on the morning sermon, the Sabbath school, and then afternoon service; which was conducted by Mr Murray, who had been sent for, and arrived during the forenoon. He gave them some account of Mr Williams's death, which he compared to Stephen's; and the effect was overpowering. When he introduced the account of Mr Williams, sobs were heard among a few of the women, but evidently stifled; gradually they spread, till by the end of the sermon nearly all the tender sex were in tears, and the prayer was scarcely begun before Mr Murray's voice was drowned by similar manifestations on the part of the whole assembly. Mr Murray left the pulpit, but finding it vain to attempt to restore quiet, or quell the burst of feeling, the assembly was broken up.

Now, no doubt you are wondering what was the cause of all this, and thinking the Samoans must be very soft-hearted and susceptible, and the more so, when you hear that the people were little acquainted with Williams, who was only here twice on brief and flying visits. The reason is found in the power of divine grace. There has been a great revival here, and Mr Murray and his truly valuable wife adore, with grateful wonder, the work of God. Five months ago the Church consisted of thirty individuals, which itself was a large amount of fruit from three years' labour among untaught savages. Since then there has been a great shaking among the dry bones, and it has been said to many of them "Live." There are now two hundred baptized, and hundreds anxiously inquiring, so that they have to be kept back, lest their minister should be entirely overwhelmed. His plan is, to cause native teachers, who visit continually all the villages, to select those who seem most evidently under the power of divine grace, and then he receives, examines, and instructs. . . . The cause, then, of the violent emotion is this,—the people have been taught of the Spirit to value the Gospel, (many of them supremely,) and the mere thought, that Mr Williams was the first to bring it to their shores, and perished in doing the same for others, produces all this feeling. It is love of the truth, reflected back on him who brought the glad tidings. It is to me most delightful to know, that the distinction between real and professing Christians is clearly understood by the natives themselves. On this island there are four thousand three hundred inhabitants, three hundred of whom have not yet renounced idolatry. But even among these, the influence of Christianity is such, that they to a great extent abstain from many things on the Sabbath-day, such as cooking and fishing.* There are about one hundred in full communion, and eight hundred more, who would be, according to the Presbyterian mode of admission, besides seven hundred at Leone Bay. March 12.—O how I wish you could be present in church to see the fervour of the people, or any where to see their subdued affectionate countenances—those whose hands were deeply stained with blood and murder, washed and purified by the blood of Jesus! The men are the majority in the church—they were the first, as the women were much degraded and stupid; the members, however, are fast equalizing now. April 10.—Apui Bay, Upolu. Mr and Mrs Mills occupy this station, and no sooner had we arrived, than messengers were despatched to the various stations on this island to collect the brethren for a meeting. The sloop of war, "Favourite," which left Sydney to call at Rotuna, Tiana and Eriemango, for the purpose of seeing after the welfare of native teachers left on the two former, and recovering the remains of Mr Williams from the latter, had arrived the night before us, and saved us the painful task of breaking the sad news to Mr Williams' family. Mrs Williams has borne up exceedingly well. The first shock was awful to her, but, as she said to Mr Murray, she can now contemplate her husband as he is, and apart from the circumstances of his death. The general meeting was exceedingly interesting,—Captain Croker of the "Favourite," in the chair; (this captain has since lost his life, not by savages, but by a Welshman who has made himself a leader of savages.) Amongst other things, Mr and Mrs Hatyer are appointed to Leone Bay, Tutuila, and Mr Heath accepted the appointment of his brethren to carry out the plans of Mr Williams. This was a matter of great solemnity,—all seemed willing to risk their lives for their Saviour. Mr Heath was most suitable, as being robust, well informed about the islands, firm and free from anxiety about family, as his poor wife died some time ago. He accepted the office on three conditions, one of which was that, if he was cut off, another should take his place. Thus, do these men put their life in their hand, in the cause of God. It is easy to talk of the thing at a distance, but it assumes a stern reality when one visits the field and sees what is the nature of the work. Mr Williams's remains were interred on the 31st March, with much solemnity. The English service was read, and an address delivered both in English and Samoan. The concourse of people was immense. The sailors and marines from the man-of-war were on shore, and three rounds of musketry were discharged over the tomb. We have had the Lord's Supper twice here, and on other occasions have had some most interesting addresses from natives, especially from Teana; he is a superior, and most intelligent, and reflecting man. The value which the natives set on instruction was strongly attested by their eagerness to keep their missionaries. Even one of the native teachers was strongly opposed, when he offered himself to go to one of the new islands. There is so much need of labourers here, that they would hardly let me go to Tutuila, but wanted to lay violent hands on me, in favour of some new district. . . .

April 15, Tutuila.—Mr Murray has communicated with the teachers to know who of them were willing to go as teachers to New Caledonia, &c., and they retired to consider the matter with much coolness and solemnity. This morning, after much prayer and thought, they came forward and presented themselves as a body, expressing their perfect willingness to go to any place where it might be judged that they would do good to souls. Glorious fruit unto holiness! Glorious proof of the sincerity of their profession, and reality of their love! This is no hasty determination which will afterwards be repented of. Many of them have, indeed, long since offered themselves to this work. And it is no light sacrifice that they make. They leave their wives and children and dear friends; and you know how strong friendship is when Christian love is in the heart. Some of them leave all the influence of a chief, to become teachers of the Word, perhaps despised and persecuted; at least, for long looked upon as of a lower grade. The chief carries no outward badge of superiority, and so no strange people will pay him honour. They are willing to leave all for Christ's sake. Mr Murray selected five from their number, and we went down to the "Great House," to tell them who were chosen. There were about thirty of them, and the deepest solemnity on all faces. When the names were announced, they felt considerably, and one wept much that he was not allowed to go, so did the love of Christ constrain him. Oh! that our Scottish students and Scottish Churches could imbibe such a spirit; against how many will the men of the South "rise up in judgment," how many will they condemn! This afternoon two of the missionary teachers gave short addresses to the people, both most appropriate, beseeching to be constantly prayed for, and expressing, what rendered in English, is more than "I am willing to die," it is, "I am ready," or almost "I will be glad to die for the sake of Jesus." Pomare is one of these, he is the son of a former chief, but when a dispute arose as to the succession, although he had the decided claim, he gave it up to another, rather than raise disturbance, and not being sorry to be rid of a dignity which might have come in the way of his piety. Two of the teachers volunteered to go to the very place where Williams fell. This is not to be attempted at present as the natives are so savage.

Mr Murray, in a letter dated 16th April says, that he is getting the teachers ready to sail with Mr Heath. He says he feels as if parting with his own sons, and they are his own sons in the best of bonds. They want no salary, the love of Christ constrains them, and they get their food where they go. Pomare's going here is something like a nobleman in England taking a similar course. There are many people collecting to take leave of them, and, poor fellows, they say they wish they were fairly off, for their hearts get soft when others weep over them. We hope that the reflex influence on the people will be good. The office gains honour in the eyes of many when those whom they highly respect, engage in it.

ON REGENERATION.

BY J. GRANDPIERRÉ, DIRECTOR OF THE MISSIONARY INSTITUTION, PARIS.

Translated from the French.

PART II.

If all that we have described is not, what is Christian regeneration? Regeneration, as we have already said, is an inward change effected in the soul, before becoming sensible in the life and conduct: the heart, the seat of life within us, receives a new moral impulse, a new spiritual life; the principle of love to God is substituted for all other motives to action. To love God, to love nothing but him, to love all in him and for him—this is the sum of the Christian life. Before his conversion, the Christian did not think of God, or thought of him only occasionally, of necessity, without pleasure; now these thoughts are sweet to him, he seeks instead of fleeing them. The presence of his Creator is not disagreeable; he loves to have a regard to him in all that he does. He is grateful for the blessings he has received from him, and takes pleasure in acknowledging that all he possesses is held of his bounty. He has fellowship with God; formerly he knew not what it was to pray. He communes with his heavenly Father in the Bible; formerly it was to him a sealed book, which he did not read, or read only with weariness. He thinks of the future, he meditates on eternity, he hopes for heaven which is his home; formerly death and the life to come were for him but dark and unpleasant ideas, which only alarmed or disgusted him; and while, before his change, it was the world by which his soul was filled, attracted, moved, and influenced, what interests him now, what now above all delights him, is the love of his Saviour, the promises of the Gospel, the reign of God in the souls of men, the hope of eternal life. Regeneration, then, is an interior spiritual change; this is its first character.

Next, this new life penetrates the entire soul, influences all its faculties, renews its strength. The understanding is enlightened, the imagination is purified, the affections are regulated, the will is sanctified; and, as love to God is the prevailing sentiment, the powerful interest of the regenerate man, this new and holy affection impresses on the Christian life, as a whole and in all its details, a strong impulse, and inclines the heart to obey the law of God. He does not allow himself to choose among the commandments of his Creator; he does not choose from among the precepts of the moral law those which accord most with his inclinations, and the accomplishment of which demands the smallest sacrifice; he does not think that an amiable quality can excuse a vicious habit, a virtuous act redeem a sin, and that because he has acquired the reputation of fulfilling conscientiously certain duties, he is on that account at liberty to pass lightly over a crowd of other obligations equally sacred and obligatory. No; the Christian submits to the whole law, desires to accomplish the whole will of God, labours to root out from his heart every evil inclination, seeks to be clothed with every moral disposition, and to practise every good work enjoined by the Gospel. In this point, as in a host of others, his life offers a striking contrast to that of the unregenerate man. The latter obeys, in general, only when obedience costs him nothing, or but little; the Christian, on the contrary, loves difficulties, because he knows that it is chiefly in sacrifices that love is shown. He sees his duty in the self denial he submits to, in the contests in which he must engage, in the severe discipline which the Holy Spirit causes him to undergo, that he may remain faithful to his God; the faults peculiar to his character, the tendencies against which he has particularly to guard, principally demand his vigilance and prayer. The unregenerate man considers with satisfaction the duties he thinks he has fulfilled, forgetting those which he has failed to accomplish; the Christian, on the other hand, forgets the good he does, remembering only that which he has not done. He thinks less of his good actions than of his sins; he is less occupied with the advance he has already made than with the space which still divides him from the end to be attained; he sets himself no limit in this respect, or rather, he knows no other bounds than those placed by God, when he said, "Be ye holy, for I am holy; be ye perfect, as I am perfect." He strives towards perfection; he desires to obey in all, perfectly and for ever. Regeneration is a complete change influencing all the life; this is its second characteristic.

But we must guard against believing that this change is the first of the efforts of the child of God. He has doubtless prayed, he has sought the truth, he has inquired after the will of God, he has read his Word, he has hearkened to the preaching of the Gospel, he has considered the life of Christians, he has frequented their society; and, after once having savingly received the knowledge of the truth, he has co-operated with grace, he has been a fellow-worker with God. But, in spite of all this, he will tell you that this regeneration does not come from himself, that it is the gift of God, and the fruit of His grace. We have already acknowledged that man may, to a certain extent, reform his life, correct vicious habits, abstain from certain acts of sin, and even perform acts involving the exercise of the opposite virtues. But to change his heart is not in his power; to renew his affections is beyond his strength; to triumph over a depraved will is impossible for him. Love for God is the gift of God, and not the work of man. We receive it of him, but do not give it to ourselves; and that we may love God and holiness, hate evil and crucify self, combat sin and crucify lust—be, in a word, stronger than ourselves—a virtue superior to our own must be communicated from on high—a principle of divine life must animate us—heavenly power must descend into our soul—the Holy Spirit must dwell in our heart. Regeneration is an extraordinary supernatural change; this is its third characteristic.

Now, if you ask me how it is that this surprising transformation, this astonishing renewal, is effected in the Christian? I answer, There was a time, in which, like other men, he sought to palliate in his own eyes the enormity of his sins, and took pleasure in exaggerating the good which he performed; he reckoned, besides, upon a mercy which should both be indulgent to what he called weaknesses, and ready to reward his good works. But this lethargy did not continue for ever; the period in which he should awake arrived. The sinner saw himself no longer as he is in his own eyes, or in those of the world, but as he is in the eyes of God. The Divine Law has shown him that his imperfections are sins; his weaknesses violations of the law; his transgressions, crimes; has threatened him, on the part of the Holy of holies, with condemnation and death; has made to vibrate over his head and resound in his ears the thunders of Sinai; has poured terror into his heart and anguish into his soul. Mumbled, repentant, without resource in himself, without hope in any creature, lost, despairing, he drags himself a suppliant to the foot of the throne of mercy. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." Jesus then appears before him, Jesus the crucified, Jesus with his pierced hands and his crown of thorns, Jesus bruised for the salvation of sinners, Jesus with his merits—his pardon—his grace. This blessed Saviour has spoken peace to his soul, encouraged him to approach, offered him redemption and life. At the voice of love, the contrite heart took courage; it has been enlightened by a ray of the Sun of righteousness; has hoped, has believed, has received peace, has loved. From this moment dates a revolution in his whole being; gratitude has changed him; he is transported with joy, a joy unspeakable; he is filled with love; he feels that he owes his being to his Divine Liberator. And here remark how all within and without him has assumed a new aspect. He no longer speaks of merit and of recompense; faith has banished from his tongue expressions which seem to him only an absurd contradiction, not to say how injurious they are to God. For how should a pardoned criminal speak of ought else than of gratitude and love on his part—of grace, pardon, and mercy on that of his Benefactor? His works are not now to obtain salvation, but because he has obtained it; not to deserve heaven, but because heaven has been opened to him; not to escape condemnation, but because he feels that he is free from condemnation;—that is, he obeys as a child, and not as a mercenary; as a free man, not as a slave; from love, and not from duty alone; with joy, and not of constraint; because he is grateful, and not because he fears retribution. As to the sins which he committed before his conversion, he abhors them; and if he fall into them again, he sheds bitter tears and detests himself. As to the good works he formerly did, he does them still, but from far different motives; even his natural good qualities have shared in the regeneration of his whole being—not only in that their principle is changed, but in that they are regulated anew, love united to boldness in the profession of the truth, toleration towards others with fidelity in the service of God, external activity with the Christian life within, prudence with zeal, calmness with energy, sweetness with firmness, and so on for all the rest. What shall I say more? He is a new man; new in his affections, which are sanctified by the love of God; new in his hopes, which are those of a citizen of the heavenly Jerusalem; new in his will, which has been regenerated by the Holy Spirit; new in his conduct, which is regulated after the Word of God; new in his inner man, fed by the grace of Jesus Christ; new in his language, which is that of a citizen of the Canaan which is above; new in all, throughout, in all respects.

But, some one will, perhaps, ask here, Why this regeneration? Is it then so indispensable? and may not one rest satisfied with a less rigid virtue, without aspiring to so high a degree of holiness? I reply, in the first place, that the Christian life which is the fruit of regeneration, is not only an extraordinary expansion, not even the most eminent degree of the virtue of the world, but differs from it entirely. Between the highest human morality, and the most imperfect Christian regeneration, between a sage of the earth, grown hoary in the exercise of philanthropy, and of consummate experience, and a young child in grace, in whom the image of Christ is scarcely formed, there intervenes an abyss. One is of earth, the other of heaven; one has the spirit of the world, the other the Spirit of God; one has but modified his corrupt and carnal nature, the other has been renewed for life eternal.

I add, that it is not left to your choice, whether you shall or shall not be regenerate; this is not a question of inclination, of convenience, even of utility. You must be a new creature if you would inherit eternal life. Christ solemnly affirmed it when he said, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." But reason, the nature of things, common sense, proclaim together that of which we are assured by the Saviour of the world. Beyond the grave there is an abode where God dwells, and reigns in love and holiness: there no other law is known, but his supreme will, no other happiness than what is drawn from communion with the ever-blessed God, no other bond than that of charity, no other affection than that of Divine love, no other study than that of holiness, which is nothing else than likeness to God, the image of God in his creatures. That we may obtain admission to that abode, may live there and be happy there, we must know its laws, we must profess its spirit, and live the life of the blessed who people these celestial abodes. On this condition, and on this condition alone, we may have entrance to it; and thus there is nothing more true or more philosophical, than that word of Scripture, "without holiness none can see God." Thus, that you may, such as you now are, breathe the air of heaven without weariness and sadness; it must be that the saints, the blessed ones—the angels which inhabit it should cease to love God, assume your earthly affections, adopt your carnal tastes, in other words, it must be that God should change both them and himself. But since, while he remains what he is, the unchangeable God, he will and must love holiness, he will and must hate sin and pollution, man can hope for bliss, and obtain salvation only by being converted to God.

But supposing that this truth (I should rather say, this moral axiom), this fact of the incompatibility existing between the state of an unregenerate man and the enjoyment of the happiness of the future state, has struck you forcibly—has revealed to you your misery, and made you feel the necessity of the new birth; and that, under this conviction, you feel yourselves compelled to ask what you must do to attain so desirable a change, I answer, shortly:—Since you cannot of yourself effect this regeneration, have recourse to the assistance of God—implore his aid—pray for his Holy Spirit. But that your prayer may be heard, you must approach God by grace; and to approach him so, you must obtain pardon from him; and to obtain pardon, you must believe in Jesus Christ; for the Holy Spirit, the author of regeneration, is the gift of God, and God does not, God cannot, grant his grace to enemies, to rebels. Then, first be reconciled; that before all, you may have your peace with the Judge sealed at the foot of the Redeemer's cross, by the blood shed in Golgotha for your eternal salvation; and then the abyss which separates you from the Holy of Holies will be filled up; there will be communion between your soul and God, between God and your soul, and the Holy Spirit will dwell within you, to regenerate you to eternal life. Believe it on the word of God—on the promises of God—on the experience of all the faithful.

I conclude by a wish. Three solemn truths, my dear brethren, have been this day laid before you—the insufficiency of human reform to our salvation; the nature and absolute necessity of Christian regeneration; and the means of accomplishing this stupendous work, this work indispensable to your eternal happiness. I pray, then, that each among you, my dear hearers, who cannot, before God, bear witness to himself of his own regeneration, may return home deeply impressed with these sacred truths, and may say to himself, "It has been proved to me to-day, that I am not converted; it has been shown me, that I must be converted; the way of conversion has been pointed out to me! O my God, may I not give sleep to my eyelids, or repose to my body, till I have earnestly asked, and actually received from thee, that grace which alone can make me a 'new creature in Christ Jesus.'" Amen.

THE MOURNER.

By MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

Down to dust when thou wast hurried,
Early friend, in being's bloom,
One was left behind, who buried
All her heart's love in thy tomb.
Fairer form than thine was never Lowly laid in grassy bed;
Is its beauty past for ever—
Do I live, and art thou fled?

Other love hath sought to woo me
From the memory of thine own;
But its echo must pursue me,
Deathless still, tho' thou art gone.
Truer faith than thine was never Poured like dew on mortal head;
Is its ardour quenched for ever—
Do I live, and art thou fled?

Yes; from earth, and all its gladness,
Thou art past, and no return;
Yet my soul, tho' sick with sadness,
Mourns not as the hopeless mourn.
Holier trust than thine hath never Showered its peace on dying bed;
Faith, whose fruit is joy for ever,
Sinless, pure, where thou art fled!

Tho' thy form to dust is given,
Yet thou liv'st in glory free;
And my spirit lifts to heaven
All the love it bore for thee.
Oh! that it may fail me never,
Till I mingle with the dead,
Blessed hope!—to dwell for ever
In that land where thou art fled!

IN GOD IS OUR HELP:

A DISCOURSE.

By THE LATE REV. JAMES FRENCH,

Minister of East Kilbride, Lanarkshire.

"But in me is thine help."—Hos. xiii. 9.

THE representation which the Word of God gives of the natural state of the whole human race, is truly deplorable: "We have destroyed ourselves;" we have abused those blessings which were bestowed upon us at our creation; we have perverted those faculties, by which we were distinguished from all the other creatures around us, by which we were assimilated to the Divinity itself. Our wills and affections once attuned to all the exercises of pure devotion, being alienated from God, have renounced their allegiance to his rightful authority. The author of our being, once our best friend, and the source of our happiness and joy, has now become the object of our hatred, and is arrayed in all the terrors of a Judge.

And wherefore is it, O man, that the Spirit of God holdeth forth to thy view so very melancholy a picture of thy natural state? Is it with a view to upbraid thine ingratitude, and drive thee to despondency? Surely, if thou consult thine own conscience, and find that the picture is not less just, than it is melancholy, that will be the first suspicion which shall enter thy mind. But, oh! the height and depth, the breadth and length of the love of God, it passeth all understanding. He hath no such end in view. Like a skilful physician, he paints the loathsomeness of thy disease, only that he may persuade thee to accept an effectual remedy. The same Scriptures which have declared, "thou hast destroyed thyself," have also declared, that "in God is thy help." The same Scriptures which have declared thee, believer, to be a guilty, condemned criminal, have also declared, that thy sins are all washed away in the blood of the Lamb. The same Scriptures which have declared thee to be a polluted, corrupted sinner, have also declared, that "the grace of God is sufficient for thee," that "his strength is made perfect in thy weakness."

Those, my brethren, are the great and important truths which you are this day to contemplate, not with your understandings only, but with your outward senses; your eyes are to see, your ears to hear, and your hands to handle the good Word and bread of life. Can I then introduce this solemn service more properly, or in a manner better calculated to enliven your faith, and inflame your love, than by attempting in an humble dependence on Divine aid, to represent to you in a simple and concise manner, those glorious truths which you are this day to contemplate in visible and sensible symbol? "O Israel," saith the great God of heaven and of earth, "thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thine help."

This gracious declaration of the blessed God involves two truths, which I shall attempt to illustrate.—First, That in God is our only help, and that we have no other means of deliverance, but in him. Second, That he is an all-sufficient help, perfectly able to effect our deliverance from that state of guilt and misery in which we are involved by sin.

I. In God is our only help, and we have no other means of deliverance, but in him. This, my brethren, is by no means an unimportant circumstance; for that aversion from God which constitutes our guilt and misery, prompts us to seek relief any where else, rather than from him. Now that may be prudent, if there be any dependence to be had in those refuges in which we place our trust. But, if what I now assert be the truth, that in God is our only help, then it follows that every other refuge is false and deceitful, and our trusting in it is like "trusting in the staff of a broken reed, on which, if a man lean, it will go into his hand and pierce it."

Now, that in God is indeed our only help, is obvious from the single circumstance of his having interposed at all in our behalf. Infinite wisdom can do nothing unnecessary. Much less would it have interposed here, and by such extraordinary means, had not our case been altogether desperate. Had not that been the case, Almighty God would certainly have "spared his own Son, and not have delivered him up for us all." And that sentiment is confirmed by the concurring testimony of reason, and conscience, and the Word of God. The Word of God declareth, that "it is not possible for the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer to take away sin;" nay, that any other sacrifice or offering, than that which hath been actually made, could not have availed. Nor was it till those had been found ineffectual, that the Son of God himself undertook our cause, and said, "Lo, I come, in the volume of the book it is written of me, to do thy will I take delight, O my God, yea, thy law is within my heart."

It is most obvious, that we could not by any means accomplish our own deliverance. Destroy ourselves, indeed we might, for we have done so; but it is not in our power to effect our relief. We might, indeed, satisfy the justice of God, but it must be by suffering the pains of eternal death; and that is not redeeming our souls, but completing our destruction. Reason and conscience tell us, that no future repentance, although we were disposed to repent, can atone for the guilt of a single transgression. If the whole of our lives are due to God, if we are bound to employ all our faculties during every moment of our existence in his service, then the obedience of all the remaining part of our lives can never atone for the transgression of a single moment. For "whoso shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." But I am at present proceeding upon a false supposition, that we are disposed to repent and seek the favour of God; whereas the truth is, that we have not only broken the Divine law, and so exposed ourselves to condemnation, but are unwilling to return to our allegiance, or to be reconciled to our offended Judge. We have "sought out," not one, but "many inventions." Sin, being once admitted, hath pervaded our whole constitution, and we are become, not only enemies, but "enmity itself against God, and are not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." So that, even although repentance had been sufficient to atone for transgression; nay, although one single act of real, sincere, and substantial obedience had been sufficient to atone for a whole life of transgression, yet we are not of ourselves willing to give it.

It appears, then, from every view we can take of this subject, that "by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified in the sight of God;" for "the law worketh wrath," and "by the law is the knowledge of sin;" and "it is written, Cursed is every one, who continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." Some, indeed, have vainly imagined, that, though the demands of the moral law, were once, as they have now been represented, extensive and spiritual; yet, now, under the Gospel, those demands are abridged, and it is now satisfied with a sincere, though imperfect obedience. And is it, indeed, possible, my brethren, that that should actually be the case? Consider the nature of the moral law; where lieth the foundation of it?

Not like that of the ceremonial, and of those laws, which we observe take place in the natural world, in mere expediency and arbitrary will. No! the foundation of it lieth much deeper; it forms the very essence of God himself, and is founded in the eternal relations and dependencies of rational creatures. How is it possible then, that it should not be immutable as the Supreme author of it, and eternal as those relations, which it is appointed to unite and preserve? And doth not our Lord himself refute that vain imagination, when he saith, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets, I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For, verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no-wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."

You see, then, my brethren, from these observations, that we can do nothing towards relieving ourselves from that destruction and misery in which we are involved by sin. For, in the first place, it is not in our power, although we were willing; and then, in the second place, we are not willing, although it were in our power. But, I think, we may go a step farther, and say that it doth not appear to be competent for the highest order of created beings to make satisfaction for the sins of others. Every created being is bound by the law of his creation to devote his whole faculties, during every moment of his existence, to the service of Him who bestowed them. After, therefore, he hath done his utmost in the service of his Maker, it is impossible that what he doth should have any effect to absolve another; for, after all, he hath only discharged his own debt—he "hath done what it was his duty to do." Besides, no creature hath it in his power to lay down his life in behalf of another. His life is not his own; therefore he cannot lay it down, except at the call of Him who gave it.

Upon the whole, such are the circumstances into which we are fallen, that it is impossible they should be retrieved by any other means than those which God himself hath appointed. This our Redeemer himself expressly declareth, when he saith, "I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me, and my fury it upheld me." He declared the same thing, also, in the days of his flesh, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me." And to the same purpose the Apostle Peter, "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name given under heaven, or known among men, by which we can be saved, but the name of Jesus only." And the Apostle Paul saith, "Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

II. I proceed now to show, that God is an all-sufficient help, both able and willing to bring us relief.—You may, perhaps, be disposed to regard such an inquiry as trivial and unnecessary. "What," may you be apt to say, "is not God almighty? Is he not possessed of infinite power so that he can do whatever he pleaseth? Is he not a sovereign God, who doth what he will in the armies of heaven and amongst the inhabitants of the earth; whose hand none can stay, nor say unto him, What dost thou? And do you then propose to prove, that his power is sufficient to help us?"

Yes, my brethren, your expostulations might be reasonable and just, if we proposed to prove that God is able to effect any natural act whatever, however stupendous it might appear to us. If we proposed to prove that he is able to call thousands of worlds into existence in a single moment, and by the mere act of his will; or if we proposed to prove that he is able to relieve creatures merely wretched out of the lowest depths of misery; if we were about to prove any of those truths, we should, indeed, be as one that beatech the air; for those truths can be controverted by none who believe in the being and perfections of God. But, my brethren, our circumstances are such, that something else than mere power is necessary to bring us relief. The power of God is indeed unlimited; but it can never act in opposition to his other perfections. If it could, it would be weakness, not power. Now, in the present inquiry, we must consider that God is not only powerful, but just and holy; that we are not only wretched creatures, but guilty sinners: and, in that view, the power of God, instead of affording us any comfortable hope of relief, serveth only to confirm and increase our fears of eternal death. Nay, that is the case, even although we take his mercy into view, which is the only attribute of his nature which can afford us the least shadow of hope; for, as the power, so the mercy of God can never act in opposition to his other perfections. So that, unless a plan can be devised by which all those perfections may be illustrated at once, even the mercy of God itself must yield to the pleas of law and justice for our ruin and destruction. God must be just, though man should perish. Nay, even though God himself be ever so much inclined to mercy, yet the exercise of his mercy must be suspended until a complete satisfaction be made to justice.

Those observations are not mere conjecture; otherwise we might be justly charged with presumption in seeming to limit the conduct of the Most High. Although, even independent of Scripture, those observations seem to be founded in the soundest reason and in the best views of the Divine character which we can derive from the light of nature, yet they are also warranted by the express testimony of Scripture. In Romans iii. 25, 26, the Apostle Paul at once informs us of the circumstance which obstructed our salvation, and assures us of the removal of it. "God," saith he, "hath set forth Jesus Christ to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness, that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." The plain meaning of those words seems to be this, that if God had not devised that method of redemption, he could not have extended his mercy to sinners, without being unjust—without sacrificing one of the essential attributes of his nature; but now that he hath both devised and executed that scheme of redemption, his attributes remain unsullied, and he is enabled to extend his mercy to the world: "He is just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus."

Let us, then, take a short view of those circumstances which render the scheme of redemption, which God hath wrought for us by Jesus Christ, fully sufficient for all the purposes of our salvation. With that view let us consider the essential dignity of the person of our Redeemer. He is the eternal Son of God—"the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person"—the Son of his love, "who was in the form of God, and thought it not robbery to be equal with God"—the Being who framed heaven and earth, and all things that are therein—without whom was not any thing made that was made. He is "God over all, blessed for ever." He was ordained to the office of Mediator by the Father. "He glorified not himself to be made an High Priest, but he who said unto him, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." Neither was that office imposed upon him by constraint; he voluntarily presented himself to the arduous task, and said, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me; to do thy will I take delight, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart." And he executed the arduous task with the same alacrity with which he had undertaken it: "When the fullness of the time was come, he took upon him, not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham." He was introduced into the world, not in an exalted station of worldly dignity, by one of the queens of the earth. His mother was a mean woman, belonging to a despised village; and the Saviour of the world was born in a stable, and laid in a manger! Nor was the meanness of his birth in any degree compensated by the circumstances of his future life. On the contrary, it was aggravated by the contempt and reproach which were thrown upon him by those very men he came to save, although he demonstrated the truth of his divine mission, as well as of the gracious object of his mission, by exercising the power with which he was invested, in healing their bodily diseases and supplying their temporal wants. At last, he closed his life of ignominy and reproach by a cruel, shameful, and painful death; being not only crucified by his enemies, but betrayed by one, denied by another, and forsaken by all the few he could ever call his friends. Thus did "he bear our griefs and carry our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and by his stripes we are healed. The Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all." "He was made sin for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

But, had our blessed Lord remained under the power of death, his death would have profited us nothing. We should, in that case, have had no ground to depend upon him as our Saviour. He himself had foretold that he should rise again; if, therefore, he had not fulfilled his promise, "our faith had been vain, we had been yet in our sins." Besides, many parts of his office, as Mediator, remained to be executed after his resurrection. His death was not more necessary to atone for our sins, than his resurrection to apply the redemption he had purchased to the souls of his people; and blessed be his name, "as he died for our sins, so he rose again for our justification." He hath not only begun, but completed, the work of redemption. He hath thus given us complete evidence, that he was indeed sent of God—the "Messiah promised to the fathers." "He hath ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, receiving gifts for men, even for the rebellious and disobedient, that the Lord God might dwell amongst them." Now are we encouraged to believe that our Redeemer is able to fulfil all the gracious promises he hath made us in his Word. "It hath pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell." "He hath put all things under his feet, and given him to be Head over all things to the Church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." "From whom the whole body, fitly joined together and compacted, by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love."

Behold, then, my brethren, the stability of that foundation on which your faith and hope are built. Although you have destroyed yourselves, yet in God is your help. Those very attributes of the Divine nature from which you could expect the least, those very attributes of the Divine nature which seemed to threaten wrath and destruction, are to you the foundation of peace and salvation. "If any man sin, he hath an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous;" an Advocate, not an humble petitioner for mercy, but one who can demand the salvation of his people as matter of right—one who hath all the pleas of law and justice to support his claim—one who can demand it as the just recompense of his own obedience and suffering. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, hath condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." For "who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us."

But perhaps you are ready to doubt the certainty of the Divine promise; perhaps you are unable to overcome the obstinacy of infidelity in your hearts; or, it may be, the very extraordinary nature of the blessings conferred, the consciousness of your own unworthiness and meanness, compared with the awful majesty and purity of Almighty God, are ready to startle you, and to counteract all the evidence upon which your hope is founded. Surely, my brethren, such doubts are unreasonable; surely the mere promise of a God who cannot lie, ought, in all reason, to bear down every doubt or suspicion which it is possible can enter the mind: and yet your gracious Father hath condescended even to that case. He hath not contented himself with a simple promise, however just a foundation that might be for the most unreserved confidence; but "willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, he hath confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, ye might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before you."

And now, my brethren, what farther security can you demand, than that which God hath given you? Is not your redemption already purchased?—what remains for you, but to stretch forth your hand to receive it? Pretend not to excuse yourselves, by saying that you are sinners. That is just the reason which should induce you to come to Christ, who died that he might save sinners. "The whole," saith he, "have no need of the physician, but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Accordingly, his gracious invitation is free and unlimited. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come; and whosoever will, let him come, and take the water of life freely." Nay, for your further encouragement, he hath sometimes chosen the very chief of sinners as monuments of his grace, that none may give way to despair. An idolatrous Manasseh, an adulterous Mary Magdalene, and a persecuting Paul, have all been made partakers of that grace which they had either despised or persecuted.

But, you will say, how can I come to Christ? I feel no spiritual desires after him, my heart is averse from him, and he himself hath said, "No man cometh unto me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him." True, my brethren, but is not the Father, as well as the Son, willing to receive you? Hath he not given you the promise of his Spirit, to "help your infirmities, and to make intercession for you with groanings which cannot be uttered." Nay, if your convictions be real, they can proceed only from himself; and therefore, they are a token to you for good; and you may rest assured, that He who hath begun a good work in you, will not leave it unfinished, but will carry it forward unto the day of Jesus Christ.

And now, my brethren, let me beseech those who have accepted the grace of the Gospel, to consider the obligations they are under to "walk worthy of the high vocation wherewith they are called, and to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour," by holy lives and conversations. "Do we make void the law through faith? God forbid." Yea, we establish the law." The grace of God, manifested in the Gospel, is founded upon the supposition, that the "law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." Far, therefore, from weakening our obligations to obey, it sets them in a new and more striking light. It "teacheth us, that, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

"As, therefore, we have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so let us walk in him,"—in a dependence upon his grace, and in a conformity to his example; "for the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his; and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE REV. HENRY MÖWES,

LATE PASTOR OF ALTENHAUSEN AND IVERNODE, PRUSSIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART III.

IN the mysterious arrangements of an all-wise and overruling Providence, Möwes was now thrown, with his wife and family, upon the wide world, without the means of earning a livelihood. Weak in body, and poor in this world's goods, he was nevertheless rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom. "Life is a school," he wrote in a letter to a friend; "sacrifice and self-renunciation are the lessons the Master appoints; inward strength and tranquillity, the rewards which we shall receive when all is borne." Under the influence of reflections such as these, the afflicted saint maintained an unruffled serenity amid the numerous trials to which he was subjected. Not a day passed, at this period of his life, without severe bodily suffering, and his constitution was now reduced to a very low state. His personal distresses, however, did not engross his whole mind; he often thought of his beloved flock, from whom he was now separated, and he took a lively interest in all that concerned them.

While residing in Magdeburg, thus shut out from every opportunity of serving God in the Gospel of his Son, he made frequent exertions to procure a situation of some kind or other, which might be the means of supporting himself and his family. His endeavours, however, were fruitless. Often were his hopes raised, and as often were they doomed to terminate in bitter disappointment. He made application to Government, and to prepare himself for some public situation, he obtained employment, though without remuneration, in the office of one of the Government secretaries. But his heart was in his divine Master's work; he embraced every occasion, therefore, of spreading around him the savour of his Redeemer's name, holding forth the word of life by his whole conversation and conduct. At this time he contemplated publishing a volume of sermons on the Epistles, but this project was never accomplished. He became an active member of a theological society which was formed in Magdeburg; and he entered warmly into the business of the society which had been established in the town, in aid of foreign missions. In the social intercourse of private society Möwes remarkably excelled. The ease, the gracefulness, the rich piety of his conversation, endeared him to a large circle of friends, in whose hearts his memory is still embalmed. Nor was he an inattentive spectator of the political movements of the times. Early in 1831 he composed two lyrics, entitled, "The Songs of the Prussian,"—which were received and sung by his countrymen with great enthusiasm. These songs were composed under much pain and prostration of strength, but he looked forward to the spring, hoping that his strength would revive as the weather became milder. A journey to some distance was recommended; and in passing, he spent a day in Altenhausen, where he visited some of his friends and former parishioners; enjoying, in their society, a pleasure which refreshed his drooping spirits. He returned home to Magdeburg, however, without any material improvement in his health, and in June the most alarming symptoms began to appear. Towards autumn he rallied again. "I called for the deep," he says, in a letter dated 14th September, "God from above raised the sinking vessel, but otherwise than I had thought; when it was weak, then it was strengthened again; it had been almost stranded, but it now once more floated, and was borne onward, though slowly and wearily, over the sea of life."

The partial recovery to which the good man here adverts was but of short duration; it was only the gleam of sunshine which oft precedes the gathering storm. In October we find him once more at the gates of death. "His agony is great, very great," writes a friend; "yet is his couch of sickness a speaking witness that Christ has taken away the power of death." He was much reduced, by a serious expectoration of blood; and yet, in this season of suffering he composed two of his sweetest little hymns. The struggles of this trying period he thus describes, in a letter to a friend:—

"It was not a short, passing conflict between life and death, but a whole week, during which death tried all his power on me. He came in a fearful form to my couch, and caused a scene of horrors to pass before the eyes of my beloved friends. He had long before lost the sting which he naturally has, through Him who has given us the victory; and when his power is at the highest, secure under the banner of Him who rose again on the third day, I laugh at all he can do. But this time he attacked me with another sting, to prove my faith and truth; with wild and fearful sufferings, more intense and prolonged than I had before known. It was only an introduction to the events of the coming week, that after a quiet night, on the Sabbath of the harvest thanksgiving, while I was dressing, in order, if possible, to go to church, I felt the still approach of a fearful time—the last solemn hour of existence, as I thought. I feared I should scarcely have time to call my wife, to fall into her arms, and commend my spirit into the hand of my Father in heaven. She came, and another came; they had before them a dying man, from whom life was retreating, and who could only console them with the words of the Lord, 'I am the resurrection and the life.' But no! contrary to all expectation, he who was weakened to death was raised again, but raised to unimagined conflict. I go over this period with trembling—may you never know it in your own history—but by God's merciful help I have lived through it, and my soul, thereby refined, has, I hope, come out without loss. My spirit wrestled with all her strength to be free from the torturing body, and her prayers pierced through the clouds, even to the throne of God, to obtain the command for departure. I took leave of all: in comparatively calm hours, I arranged my little affairs: I was so happy, with my beloved wife on Saturday evening, to take the holy sacrament, in festal garments, the priestly dress, though, before the hour came, my eyes threatened every moment to close. I, however, lived to see the Sabbath, when A——, one of the preachers at the cathedral, from whom I had the evening before received the sacrament, a man full of evangelical faith, and a powerful preacher of the old genuine truth as contained in the Scriptures, made known my situation in public. Many friends in consequence assembled round my bed after the service, and they can bear a joyful testimony to the power of the Prince of Life, to the life that he gives, and the strength he imparts. After this period of suffering and labour, after these festive and joyful hours, I became better. God helped me, not as I expected, but as he would; helped me to earthly life, alleviated my pain, and at last removed it; gave me rest, and so far weakened my disease, that after the crisis it became really less, and had more appearance of being ultimately eradicated than it had for weeks and months previously; so that, if I am not mistaken, a real and visible step towards probable recovery is made."

After the severe attack which he so graphically and affectingly paints, Möwes enjoyed for some time comparative ease. His health visibly improved, and he was so free from pain, as to employ himself in composing "The Pastor of Andouse," the work by which he is chiefly known. This beautifully written religious tale was published in 1832, and very favourably received by the public. It is intended to exhibit the contrast between the Christian and the worldling in an hour of trial and sore persecution; and the scene is laid in France, at the period when Louis XIV. began to extirpate the Huguenots from his dominions.

In the course of the winter of 1831 and the spring of 1832, Möwes seemed to improve in health, and his friends began to entertain hopes of his recovery. Unexpected circumstances led him, in the month of July, to leave Magdeburg and return to Altenhausen, the scene of his former labours, and where he hoped to close his days. Here he employed himself for a time in deep research, with the view of commencing another tale, under the title of "Magdeburg under the Ban of the Empire, 1552." To this work, in addition to his other theological and literary pursuits, he devoted much of his time. Occasionally also, when his strength permitted, he officiated for his successor in the pulpit of Altenhausen. Thus time passed pleasantly, and not without profitable employment. But he was never altogether free from pain. He had several returns of expectoration of blood, which weakened him much. He seemed destined to be throughout a child of suffering, and through much tribulation to enter the kingdom of God.

The year 1833 opened somewhat favourably upon the distressed Möwes. But in the end of April he was seized with so severe an attack of spitting of blood, that his friends stood round his bed waiting for his apparently approaching dissolution. He himself thought that his end was near, and he arranged his temporal affairs, and took leave of his family, committing them to the care of the Almighty. The danger, however, passed away, and the good man was again raised from the bed of apparent death to the enjoyment of tolerable health. Expectations were still entertained by his family, that after recovering from such a severe shock he might yet be spared many days. Every day he increased in strength, and, indeed, he felt himself better than he had ever been since the commencement of his illness. He resumed his studies with vigour. On three successive Sabbaths he preached without sustaining any injury from the exertion. He indulged the hope that he might yet be able to resume the office of a pastor, in which he so much delighted. Nay, so steadily did he advance in increased vigour that he took steps for recovering the clerical office. On Christmas he was able to officiate in public, and after the festival his former friend and patron, the Count of Altenhausen unexpectedly entered the apartment, announcing that, by the determination of his majesty's cabinet he would speedily be reinstated in the pastoral office. The intelligence rejoiced the good man's heart and the hearts of all his friends.

Such were the cheering prospects with which Möwes entered upon the year 1834. He applied for the vacant parish of Weferlingen, but was disappointed. The military chaplain at Berlin received the benefice, and Möwes turned his eyes towards the chaplaincy which was thus rendered vacant. The most sanguine expectations were entertained by his friends that this application would be successful; but, alas! how uncertain are all the hopes of man!—while waiting in anxious suspense for the result of his suit, he was again seized with a severe attack of his former complaint. His distress, both of mind and body, was severe and overwhelming. His friends anxiously watched by the bedside, and ever and anon, to comfort them, the patient sufferer would repeat some consolatory passage of sacred Scripture. Thus, from Luther's version he would repeat the promise, "Out of six troubles I have saved thee, and in the seventh shall no evil befall thee;" adding, "He has said it to me who is the TRUE—six great troubles have passed over me, this is the last, then comes life." His feelings, on being brought out of this fiery furnace, may be learned from the following letter, dated 11th July:—

"DEAREST FRIEND!—Pray only with me, that God, if he will let me continue longer here, may at last find me worthy to be released from the fiery ordeal which I have undergone so long, and which during these last months has glowed with such intensity. I pray, pray constantly; I have done so for years; morning and evening, and often during the day, I turn my eyes filled with burning tears to heaven, but the chain that irritates my wounds, and bows me down, falls not off. But I cease not to pray, and my last breath shall offer the prayer, 'Deliver me from evil.' Pray, then, with me. You will conclude, from what has been accidentally written, how it is with my health. It has been better for a fortnight. I have risen from the depth into which my God had allowed me to sink, to show Satan and his legion whether, in extreme and long-continued need, I would leave my Rock and throw away my confidence, and after advancing some steps towards heaven, fall back again into despair. You know I have been led through many a dark valley, but the last was horrible as none before had been. Other men have often found something great in meeting the face of death in full consciousness, in speaking of it with tranquillity, and in greeting it with a serene countenance. Ah! this is easy for him who stands in the faith of the Son of God. A much more difficult problem, a much stronger trial, dearest A—, has just been mine. I can only say thus much in writing. In the dark valley through which I had then to pass, death was the radiating point of light; in my readiness to give my hand to this messenger in God's name from the other world, to follow him was something little, less than little. It is possible that my God, after I have tasted the dregs of such a cup, may mercifully remit it for the future. I have endured, and under the bitterest agony my soul has not taken her eye off Him who presented the cup to her:—but I shudder to look back."

At this time Möwes composed a beautiful lyric, entitled, "A Glance out of the Fiery Trial." This was the last piece which came from his pen. The respite which he enjoyed from suffering was brief; before the end of April, he was again seized with expectation of blood, which continued, with very little intermission, for a whole week. Although much reduced by this severe attack, he rallied, and was able in August to pay a visit to Magdeburg, where his strength rapidly increased; and he was so much encouraged by his sensibly returning strength, that he made application for the parish of Bahrendorf, which was then vacant. It pleased the Almighty, however, to cast him once more into the furnace of affliction; the bleeding returned during the second week of his stay at Magdeburg, and with such alarming symptoms, that he sent in haste for his beloved wife. On receiving the melancholy tidings she set out in haste, and on entering the room where he lay, tears of joy flowed down his cheeks, and he could only say, "Now I shall never again be separated from you, my dear wife—never till death." They returned without delay to Altenhausen. He became gradually more and more enfeebled; still he was full of holy resignation. "To die," he would exclaim, "is heavy, but yet death is beautiful." He was not altogether free from the suggestions of the Tempter, as he lay on his bed of death; but he was enabled to overcome, not in his own strength, but in the strength of his Lord and Master.

Occasionally, as his end drew near, the hopes of his friends were raised by alleviations of his disease. These, however, were but the faint flickerings of the lamp of life, as it was about to expire. At length, after frequent alternations of hope and fear, he felt that he was about to encounter the last enemy. His friend, the pastor of Altenhausen, was suddenly sent for. The dying man wished to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was administered to him with great solemnity, in the presence of his afflicted wife and family. The prayer which the good man offered up, when on the brink of eternity, will never be forgotten by those who were present, —the unction, the fervour, the holy earnestness with which he commended his soul into the hands of his Redeemer; nor the ardency with which he prayed for his wife and children, that the Almighty would prove himself "the Father of the fatherless," and "the widow's Judge." The service was refreshing to his heart, and he called upon those around him to lose no time in closing with Christ, as "all their salvation, and all their desire." He lived for a few days longer. In the meantime, official information arrived, that his Majesty had directed that Henry Möwes should either be appointed to the military chaplaincy at Berlin, or if he preferred it, to the parish of Bahrendorf. The dying saint received the intelligence with undisturbed tranquillity. "To Bahrendorf, then, or to my grave," was his calm reply. He gradually sunk, and as life ebbed, the feeble cry would be heard from his distressed soul, "My much-loved Lord, come!—wilt thou not come?" "My God, let it be the last time." The features now shrunk, the countenance assumed a ghastly paleness, the lips were livid, and the once bright eyes had lost their lustre; all betokening that the hour of death had come. The relatives stood around his bed, and, as he had formerly requested, they engaged in singing his favourite hymn, "Christ is my life." His wife then read the hymn commencing, "There is a peace at hand." The pastor, who had faithfully attended him in his last hours, now engaged in prayer. Möwes was evidently sensible to all that was passing. He survived for some hours, but lay almost motionless. "Dear Möwes," asked the pastor, "is our Saviour and God still your rod and staff in the valley of the shadow of death?" The expiring saint turned his head towards the inquirer, and feebly pressed his hand, in token of assent. This was his last effort; and in a few minutes his spirit took its flight to the mansions of the blessed.

Thus died, on the 13th October 1834, the truly holy and devoted Möwes. His remains were followed to the grave by many of his former parishioners, who still remembered the piety and apostolic zeal of their afflicted pastor. In less than a year after his decease, his eldest surviving daughter, Mary, was summoned from this vale of tears. After only three days' illness, she was cut down in the flower of her youth. Nor were her last hours without pleasing tokens that she had experienced the truth of the Divine declaration, "The promise is to you, and to your seed after you." She had, no doubt, been the child of many prayers, and these prayers were answered after he who offered them was gathered to his fathers. "Ah, I would go to my father," she exclaimed, during her brief but severe illness; "it must be lovely to be with the dear Saviour; but yet I am much too sinful: were I fit to be there, He would call me." And as the hour of her death drew near, she said, "Dear mother, I yet believe I shall go to my father; and though I have done much that is wrong, God will yet show me mercy; and I do so love Him!"

Surely, of all true believers, it may well be said, "Better," a thousand-fold "better, is the day of their death than the day of their birth." To them death is no longer the king of terrors; it is the messenger of peace. See then, O Christian, your high privilege; even "death is yours." He is not a conquering, but a conquered, foe; and as you grapple with him, let the triumphant song be yours, "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

I AM A CHRISTIAN—WHY ARE YOU AN INFIDEL?

PART I.

To the following interesting and ably-written Tract we would earnestly solicit the attention of our readers, as peculiarly seasonable at a time when infidelity is extending so alarmingly among the working classes, both of England and Scotland.

That I "have not followed cunningly devised fables," in receiving my Bible as the book of God, is the firm and growing conviction of my mind, after having examined its contents and evidences for more than thirty years. My own belief in this matter corresponds with that of thousands and tens of thousands of the most enlightened, humane, and benevolent of the human race. We receive the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as true, authentic, and divinely inspired; and we reject with earnestness the imputation, that our reason has been imposed upon, in paying this deference the most wonderful volume that has ever obtained circulation in our world. You are bound to believe that we are perfectly sincere in the faith which we thus repose in its contents; and if the judgment and information of Christians be not in general inferior to those of others of their neighbours around them, it will be but reasonable that you should weigh impartially what they have to advance in support of their settled belief.

The great question is—Are Christians justified in their belief, that the Bible is a revelation from God? and are they able to give a rational and satisfactory account of the hope that is in them? You will not be surprised, then, with my views, if I tell you that I consider them to be fully justified in receiving the Bible as a Divine book; and that I regard the reasons which they can assign for their faith such as will abide the solemn test of death and eternity.

Permit me, then, first, in self-justification, to tell you why I am a Christian; and then, secondly, for your benefit, to ask you, Why you are an infidel?

1. I am a Christian, because the Bible has verified its truth to my own heart.

I was not always a Christian. If, like you, I did not rank myself with sceptics and infidels, there was a time when I did not truly receive the Bible upon the authority of God, and when I did not act out its spirit and precepts; I did not feel its power on my heart, and therefore I had no impressive sense of its Divine origin. But since I read my Bible, and prayed to God to teach me its blessed truths, it has chased away the midnight darkness of my soul; it has poured the balm of peace into my troubled conscience; it has quenched the thirst of sin; it has hushed the tempest of the passions; it has changed the very current of my being; it has proved itself to be of God, by the mighty inward revolution of thought, taste, and feeling which it has produced. I am, therefore, constrained to be a Christian.

I must remind you, however, that the Bible never did this for me, till I submitted my mind to its authority, and made trial of its efficacy. Nor has any man a right to pronounce an unfavourable opinion upon the Bible, until he has carefully examined its contents, and tried the effect of an actual experiment of its influence on the heart. You know how you would spurn the vanity of the man who should venture to speak with contempt of any science or handicraft, of which he was utterly ignorant. Now, you are surely under obligation to act on the same principle in your mode of treating Christianity. The Bible says, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." 1 John

v. 10. It is a medicine for healing the spiritual malady of human nature; and he who applies it, is able rationally to determine that it is an effectual remedy.

2. I am a Christian, because wherever I see the Bible truly embraced, I perceive that it tends to the well-being of human nature.

Take any individual, family, or community, really governed by the Bible, and what do you witness? Do you not behold humility, justice, temperance, purity, benevolence, happiness? I see this. I see also, that no other religion produces such results; therefore, I am constrained to be a Christian.

3. I am a Christian, because my Bible is divinely adapted to my nature and my necessities.

Light is not more adapted to my organs of vision, the vital air is not more adapted to my lungs, than is the Bible to my moral nature and moral wants.

I find myself a being capable of knowing, contemplating, adoring, loving, and serving the great God; the Bible alone tells me how I may do so acceptably.

In reviewing my past life, and in looking within, something tells me that I have sinned, and awakens, at the same time, apprehensions as to the consequences; my Bible confirms the voice of conscience, and points me, a guilty sinner, to "the blood of the Lamb."

I survey those wonderful powers and faculties with which my Maker has endowed me; yet I perceive that one generation of human beings after another is doomed to mingle with the clouds of the valley; I ask myself, anxiously, is there no hereafter? no world of spirits? no state of existence beyond the empire of death? my Bible meets this difficulty, and tells me I shall live for ever.

I look on the graves of the departed, I anticipate the mortality of all who yet shall live, and I ask myself, Why, under the government of an infinitely benevolent Being, is there this wide-spreading desolation—this carnival of death? My Bible solves the otherwise impenetrable mystery; "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v. 12.

I look around me, and I often see the wicked triumphing, and the righteous sorrowful, oppressed, and neglected; and I ask myself, How can this be, when God is good, and wise, and holy, and omnipotent? I open my Bible, and there I learn, that this is a state of probation, and that a scene of rewards and punishments will succeed to it, in which Lazarus will be comforted, and Dives will be tormented. Seeing this adaptation, then, of the Bible to my moral wants and spiritual necessities, I am constrained to be a Christian.

4. I am a Christian, because I see the finger of God divinely attesting every part of the Sacred Volume.

If it be an imposture, can any one inform me when it was first palmed on the credulity of mankind?

If it be an imposture, how is it so little adapted to gratify the sinful propensities of human nature?

If it be an imposture, how is it so pure, and lofty, and godlike in its demands?

If it be an imposture, how has it been so wondrously preserved, in a world so hostile to its interests?

If it be an imposture, how has Omnipotence so often interposed to verify its claims?

If it be an imposture, how is it that Palestine, Idumea, Babylon, Egypt, Assyria, and Rome, are all, at the present moment, monuments, to the very letter, of the truth of its awful predictions?

If it be an imposture, how can we account for its early and signal triumphs over the temples and the religion of Paganism, when no arm of power interposed on behalf of its heralds, and when imprisonment and death awaited its converts?

If it be an imposture, how is it that the happiest states of society have been formed under its auspices; and that nations rise in the scale of civilization and humanity, as they yield themselves to its benign and purifying influence?

If it be an imposture, how is it that the greatest ornaments of human nature, those who have shed an imperishable lustre on the human race, have been Christians?

If it be an imposture, how is it that the most wonderful transformations our world has ever beheld have been wrought upon individual character by the mighty power of the Gospel of Christ?

If it be an imposture, how comes it to pass that the Bible, written by so many different persons, in so many different ages, is yet so consistent and harmonious in all its parts?

If it be an imposture, how is it that, in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, the imposture is further than ever it was from detection; and that the advocates and friends of Christianity are more numerous than at any former period since Jesus of Nazareth appeared in our world?

If it be an imposture, how is it that all other systems of religion are gradually sinking into decay, while Christianity is coming forth before the nations, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

In short, if it be an imposture, how is it that it answers to every just view of the blended rectitude and love of God? How is it that it realizes the best hopes of human nature? How is it that it is the best solace for mourners; the best mitigator of human woes; the best preserver against the vices and blandishments of the world; the best security of all the social virtues; the best conservator of the peace, sanctity, and happiness of families; and the best friend in the hour of dissolution, when all the visions of life have fled, and the anxious, foreboding spirit of man is about to take its flight into the unknown regions of the invisible world? With such considerations as these before my mind, I should regard it as folly, nay, as insanity itself, were I not to profess and to feel myself a Christian.

5. I am a Christian, because I must cling to my Bible, or abandon all hope whatsoever; I mean, all hope of a revelation from God—and with it, all hope of ever coming to know his will. If the Bible be not the voice of God, then has he never spoken from the thick darkness of his pavilion to his erring and sinful creatures.

Nothing but absolute imposture pervades all the Shasters and Vedas of the East; the doctrines of Confucius are in many instances absurd, in others corrupt and injurious; the Koran of Mohammed, except so far as it is borrowed from the Jewish Scriptures, is the unblushing license of impurity and bloodshed; while all "the dark places of the earth" are literally "full of the habitations of cruelty." Psal. lxxiv. 20.

If Christianity then, be not from heaven, no message of love and mercy has come from the Most High God; and nothing more can be known by man of his nature and perfections, than what may be ascertained from the course of nature around us.

But who can persuade any thoughtful man, that the infinitely benevolent Deity has made us what we are, and then left us without any rule by which to know his will? Who can convince such a man, that He who is love, and goodness, and purity, has condescended to tell his rational creatures nothing of these the essential attributes of his character?

Let me reject my Bible, and I am plunged at once into the dark abyss of doubt, perplexity, and even atheism itself. Let me embrace my Bible, and a still small voice falls upon my ear, "Despair not, thou child of the dust; I am Jehovah, thy God; I have redeemed thee at a price of infinite value; I have given the Son of my love for thy ransom; I have opened a pathway for thee to immortality; awake, then, from thy slumbers; arise, and take hold of the heavenly prize."

And how, with such evidence of the truth of Scripture before me, can I refuse to listen to this still small voice? Let me pause, and ask myself, what the Bible has done for me? It has poured the light of a heavenly day into my soul; it has given me a peace which I never knew before; it has said to the proud waves of my earthly passions, Peace, be still; it has purified the fountains of thought and affection in my heart; it has inspired me with new views, new desires, new aims, new aspirations after God and immortality.

And what has the Bible done for mankind at large? It has tamed the fierce savage of the desert; it has civilized and humanized, as well as christianized, the race; it has taught equity, purity, and beneficence; it has scattered blessings with a bountiful hand, wherever it has directed its course.

And how does the Bible meet me in all the exigencies of my twofold nature, of body and spirit? It tells me what I am, and whither I am going; it tells me that God "is, and that he is a rewarder of all them that diligently seek him." Heb. ix. 6. It tells me how to escape the pressure of guilt, and how to rise to the favour of God; it reveals the glories of immortality, and shows me how I may attain to them.

And what are the signets of a Divine origin impressed on this wondrous Book? See the miracles of almighty power on the sea, and on the dry land; in the heavens above, and on the earth beneath; on the living and on the dead, which have been wrought to confirm its life-giving message. Hear the voice of history and Providence, re-echoing the voice of its long-uttered predictions. Behold it conquering in its apparent weakness; and, with the fishermen of Galilee as its heralds, trampling on all the pride and pomp of pagan Rome. See it gaining its fairest, mightiest victories in the ranks of its bitterest foes and oppressors. See it surviving the predictions, sneers, and insinuations of Hobbes, Beingsbroke, Voltaire, Paine, and the whole race of sceptics and unbelievers; see it in the present day, going forth from the shores of Britain and America, to the very ends of the earth, carrying light, and life, and happiness with it wherever it penetrates; while in these blessed lands its converts are multiplying day by day, and many a bounding heart, and many a joyous family, are triumphing in the matchless liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free.

And am I, then, to part with my Christian hopes, thus borne out by the voice of reason, the voice of conscience, the voice of experience, the voice of history, the voice of fact, the voice of God? And if so, for what am I to relinquish them? For the dark chaos of sceptical doubt, and infidel jargon? for a license to live without law, and to die without hope? for the creed of a blasphemer, and the character of a pagan? for principles that would turn society into a scene of turbulence, revenge, dissoluteness, and bloodshed?

No such an exchange as this will ever be made by any wise or considerate man. To part with the greatest good for the greatest evil; to give up a reality for a nonentity; to quit hope for despair; to relinquish the pure Word of God, for the pestiferous trash of Paine, or the insane ravings of Owen, and others of the same unhappy school,—will never be the conduct of him who follows the dictates of a sound and enlightened reason. Pride, passion, or lust, may tempt a man to such an exchange, but calm reason and a good conscience never will.

DIVINING BY THE SCRIPTURES IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

BY THE REV. ROBERT JAMIESON,
Minister of Currie, Mid-Lothian.

MANY of our readers must have heard of the sortes Homericanæ, and the sortes Virgilianæ; and those who have not, will learn all that is worth being known concerning them in the fact, that in the days of Pagan antiquity, people were in the habit of regarding the favourite poets of their country in the light of oracles, from whose works they could draw omens of success, or counsels of direction in important or critical circumstances. In all ages, the ignorant have shown an insatiable curiosity to pry into the secrets of futurity; and among the many irrational and absurd methods which the heathens of old, who lived far away from Delphi, Ephesus, and other shrines of equal repute, fell upon to obtain satisfactory intelligence in cases of doubt or danger, one of the most approved was that of transferring their confidence,—where they had no access to the living servants of the gods,—to the literary remains of those who had distinguished themselves by their achievements in verse, and who, by their possession of that rare and envied talent, were believed to have enjoyed the special favour and inspiration of heaven. These appeals were made by the Greeks to Homer, and by the Romans to Virgil; and the way of consulting them was, for the inquirer, having first solemnly observed certain religious ceremonies, to open the book at random, and whatever page turned up, to consider the passage on which his eye alighted, as containing a divine intimation for his guidance. The origin of this strange superstition is traceable to the circumstance of the heathen priests being always in the habit of delivering their responses in verse, whence there arose a popular persuasion, eagerly encouraged by the proud pretensions of the writers themselves, that all poets were inspired. In those times

"The sacred name
Of poet and of prophet was the same,"

And the reason for the selection of Homer and Virgil, in preference to the rest of their poetical brethren, is to be sought for, not only in the unrivalled celebrity of those two bards who occupied the foremost niche in the temple of fame, but also in the circumstance, that in poems of such extent as the Iliad and Æneid, which comprise an almost infinite variety of maxims for human life—of observations on the characters and actions of men, as well as on scenes of external nature, there were few situations in which a reader could be placed, to which a lively imagination, especially when actuated by the passions of hope or fear, would not discover something analogous in passages of those admired compositions. The knowledge of a few instances in which such applications were verified by the event, would be sufficient, among a superstitious people, to inspire more general confidence, and to make those popular works be regarded as magazines of mystic information, open and accessible to all who duly approached them, either as to the good or bad success that would on the whole chequer every individual's life, or as to the conduct proper for him to observe in any particular emergency that happened. Examples of this kind of divination by the works of the poets are exceedingly numerous, and often met with in the histories of Greece and Rome; and the well known cases of Socrates, when lying in prison,—of Brutus on the eve of the battle of Philippi,—of the emperors Hadrian, Severus, and others, which will readily occur to the memory of the classical reader, afford undoubted proof that such implicit faith in the oracular authority of Homer and Virgil was not confined to the rude and uneducated classes of society, but influenced the minds of the greatest and most enlightened personages in the ancient world.

It was not to be expected that a practice, in favour of which the strongest prejudices of education and usage were enlisted, and in whose efficacy people of all ranks trusted with blind credulity, would be easily relinquished without an acquaintance with the principles and spirit of the Gospel, purser and more enlightened than was possessed by multitudes, who, in the latter part of the third century, assumed the name of Christians. Many who about that period came over from Paganism to swell the ranks of Christianity, retained a strong tincture of superstition; and among their former habits, to which, from unwillingness or inability to shake them off altogether, they tried to give a Christian direction, not the least fondly cherished was that of seeking for prognostics of their future fortune in the chance openings of some venerated volume. Whenever they felt anxious to know what course to pursue in particular circumstances,—whether the result of any undertaking was to be prosperous or the reverse, or to learn the character and conduct of those who were about to be placed over them, they resorted to this method of settling all doubts, and obtaining omens by which they might be guided in their proceedings. Homer and Virgil, indeed, were discarded for the Psalms of David, and the preliminary rites observed were more accordant than before with the usages of a Christian profession; but excepting these, there was little difference between the heathen and such Christians as practised this kind of divination, either in the manner or the views with which these auguries were consulted. There were two ways of taking them; one was, when the person who was anxious to have some intimation in his favour, prepared himself by a previous course of prayer, and fasting—longer or shorter according to his distress of mind, or the importance of the occasion; and then he set himself to open the Psalms—to which, to make assurance doubly sure, they sometimes added the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul—the first passage, in any of which, that caught his attention, was received as the solemn answer of heaven. The other, and simpler method was, for the inquirer to repair, on a set day to the Church, and by the first words of the Psalm which was singing at the moment of his entrance, to decide what he was to do, or what was to befall him. It is impossible to determine at what precise period this superstition was introduced into the Christian Church; but it appears to have been a common practice in the days of Augustine; and, indeed, that celebrated man himself seems to have been at one time a firm believer in its efficacy,—for when walking in his garden, in the utmost agony of mind, produced by remorse for his sinful and profligate conduct, and impelled by a voice which seemed once and again to say to him, “Take the book and read”—he took up a copy of the Scriptures that was lying on the table before him, and, having resolved to rest his case on the first sentence that struck his eye, he found that well-known passage, which being brought home to him by demonstration of the Spirit and with power, afterwards led to his remarkable conversion. At a subsequent period, when he had acquired more just and scriptural views, he publicly declared his disapproval of this use of Scripture. But even the great influence and authority of Augustine was not sufficient to put a stop to a practice, to which the growing ignorance and superstition of the times made the minds of men extremely prone; and though it may appear to us a mode of determining dark and difficult matters, equally absurd and impious, it continued to be followed by all classes of society, from the third to the fourteenth century, as a tried and certain plan of ascertaining the will of Providence.

It is almost incredible to what an extraordinary degree this superstition influenced the current of public and private affairs in the middle ages. There was not a single event, as we have already said, of any importance in the ordinary course of human life, in reference to which the Scriptures, contrary to their manifest design, were not appealed to, as a sure and infallible oracle, in all matters of secular interest. Gregory of Tours is the earliest historian who describes this divination as a prevailing practice in his time; and a circumstance which he mentions, as a critical occasion in his own life, affords him an opportunity of detailing the religious observances with which, in the earlier ages, it was gone about. He had long been the favourite minister of Queen Fredegonda; and information had reached him that a dangerous conspiracy had been formed, at the head of which was the Earl of Tours, to hurl him from power, by lowering him in the eyes of his royal mistress, and, if necessary, taking his life. Overwhelmed with apprehension of his danger, he retired in the greatest despondency to a closet, and took with him the Psalms of David, in the hope of deriving from it some direction, or some gleams of hope, in his distressed circumstances; “and great,” he adds, “was the comfort he found;” for, having spent some time in prayer, he opened the volume, and the first verse that met his eye, being the 53d of the 78th Psalm,—“He led them on safely, so that they feared not; but the sea overwhelmed their enemies;” he received it as a happy omen of his safety, and left his chamber with the light heart and elastic step of one who had obtained a sure and certain hope of triumph.

Gregory Nicephoras relates, that the Emperor Andronicus, having thrown into prison his nephew Constantine, who was convicted of having conspired against the life of his imperial uncle, deliberated long whether he ought to pardon the offender, or to punish him as his crimes deserved, and that he was at length determined towards the exercise of mercy by an appeal which he made to the Scriptures. On turning up the book of Psalms, the first passage he met with was the 14th verse of the 68th Psalm, “When the Almighty scattered kings in it.” “Persuaded,” says the historian, “by this passage, that although men are ignorant of the secret springs of Providence, and act independently of them, the quarrels and commotions that break out in the kingdoms of the world form a part of the Divine decrees, he resolved thenceforth on reconciliation with the rebellious prince.”

Another historian informs us, that the Emperor

Heraclius, after having obtained a series of signal victories over Cosroes, King of Persia, was at a great loss to know where he ought to fix his winter quarters, and that having caused a day of extraordinary fasting and prayer to be observed by his whole army, previous to his intended consultation, he solemnly took up the book of Psalms, in presence of his principal officers, and found a passage which determined him to winter in Albania.

A fourth writer mentions the case of a young lady, whom, contrary to her own inclinations, her family had determined to bestow in marriage on a rich and noble suitor. Having delayed her consent as long as she could, and finding it impossible to escape by ordinary means from a connection so odious to her, she at length informed her lover and her relations that she left the matter in the hands of God, and would cheerfully abide by the result of an appeal to the Sacred Volume. All parties having agreed to this, as a pious and commendable proposition, the Bible was opened, and the verse found being that passage in the Gospel where our Lord said, "Whosoever loveth his father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me," the lady exclaimed that the banns were thus forbid by Heaven, and forthwith devoted herself to a single life,—which, at the period referred to, was beginning to be held in great estimation.

A fifth historian relates, that the famous hermit, who having stationed himself on a high pillar, obtained the surname of Stylites, was called in his childhood by the name of Daniel, for the following reason. His parents having brought him to the parish minister to be baptized, wished the priest to give him a name, which that individual declining to do, it was proposed to ascertain what was the will of God, and the Scriptures being consequently turned up, the Volume opened at the beginning of the book of Daniel, which from that circumstance became the name of the child.

Nor was it only in the ordinary events of life that this practice of divining by the Scriptures was observed,—the same appeal was made to the Word of God, for guidance, on occasion of appointing to the highest offices of the Church. Thus, at a contested election in Orleans, when party spirit ran high, and the inhabitants were greatly divided in their choice of a successor to the vacant see, it was suggested that, in the difficult circumstances of the case, and as the likeliest way of restoring harmony and procuring universal concurrence in the appointment, the matter should be left to the decision of the scriptural lot. The proposition was immediately agreed to; and each candidate being, in turn, requested to try his fortune by opening the book of Psalms, none of them met with any passage that seemed to bear the most distant reference to the occasion, except one, who, reading this verse in the 65th Psalm,—"Blessed is the man whom thou choo-est, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts,"—was nominated in preference to all the rest, as being manifestly pointed out by this apposite passage to be the choice of Providence. On another occasion of a similar kind, it is mentioned in the Life of Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, when that prelate was presiding at an election for the see of Rochester, that the successful candidate obtained the appointment in consequence of his turning up this passage, "Bring the best robe, and put it on him."

Several other instances occur of individuals who, although their appointment was not objected to, yet, being so unfortunate as to have an unfavourable omen, were haunted with suspicion of disaster or of crime during the rest of their lives. A few cases may be mentioned,—one was that of a bishop, who, at his ordination, unexpectedly turned up that verse, in the Gospel of Mark, relating to John the Baptist, where it is said, "The king sent an executioner to prison, and beheaded him,"—an omen which overwhelmed the officiating minister, and led him to address the newly-elected bishop as one that was destined to die a premature and violent death. A second was that of a deacon, who, on opening the Bible, found the leaf wanting,—a circumstance which, among his superstitious countrymen, excited a general suspicion of there being some secret cause, some important qualification wanting, that unfitted him for the sacred office. And a third was that of a bishop who, having led a scandalously immoral life, was accused by his people, before a council, of a variety of crimes; which, said his accusers, we are constrained to expose and lay bare before the world, in accordance with the augury that was given at his ordination, and which was taken from this passage of the Gospel, "He left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked." Mark xiv. 52.

The other method which we mentioned as frequently followed in practising divination by the Scriptures was, when the person who wanted direction or comfort repaired to the church, determined to consider the first words of the Psalm that was singing at his entrance, as an intimation of the will of heaven. Examples without number might be given of this mode of consulting the Sacred Oracles. Clovis, when engaged in an expedition against Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and finding himself, on one occasion, in the near neighbourhood of the Church of Tours, despatched some of his principal officers, with instructions to attend most eagerly to the Psalm as they approached the threshold, in order that he might discover what kind of success his enterprise would be crowned with. On their return, the officers reported, that the first words they had heard, were from the 18th Psalm. "He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me;" and the happy intelligence being instantly communicated to the whole army, the air was rent with the joyful acclamations of the soldiers, impatient to be led to victory.

Were it not for swelling this Paper, it would be easy to add to this list of historical examples; but the reader has probably had enough of evidence to satisfy him as to the almost universal prevalence of this practice in the middle ages, which, being equally in the face of reason and religion, could never have been tolerated, but through the influence of the grossest ignorance and superstition. Nothing, indeed, can show more strikingly how much the human mind was then enslaved by the tyrant influence of an irrational custom, than that the best and wisest men sanctioned, for so long a period, a mode of experimenting which, in innumerable instances, must have been attended with the most serious evils. Characters, the most eminent for integrity and virtue, were thus placed at the mercy of chance, and the most groundless suspicions directed against them. There were many cases, too, of persons who, when an unfavourable or condemnatory passage unexpectedly turned up, studiously endeavoured to conceal the unlucky discovery, although the fact often transpired, to the great detriment of their reputation. Nay, it frequently happened that those unpropitious prognostics led to their own accomplishment, either by overwhelming the minds of the unfortunate inquirers with sorrow and despondency, or encouraging secret enemies in their machinations. In fine, besides the impiety of the practice, in wresting the words of Scripture, and violating the precept, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," its manifest tendency was to foster a spirit either of despair or presumption. Hence, decrees of Councils, prohibiting it, were repeatedly passed; but these were found ineffectual to put a stop to the evil. And, although the traces of its existence do become rarer as we approach the period of the Reformation; yet it has been said by writers of great authority, that it was very extensively practised, even in England, so late as the beginning of the eighteenth century.

I AM A CHRISTIAN—WHY ARE YOU AN INFIDEL?

PART II.

I HAVE thus, my friend, given you some, out of many, of my reasons for being a Christian, and openly avowing myself to be such; and now,

Let me urge you, as the child of doubt and unbelief, to tell me why you rank yourself with those who belong to the sceptics and infidels of the age.

Wherefore, then, I ask, do you doubt? How comes it to pass that you are an infidel? On what account do you choose to rank with your present associates?

How did that cloud of scepticism first begin to darken the horizon of your mind? Can you trace back your history, and say? Tell me, did not some wicked man cross your path, whose name you can remember, and whisper in your too willing ear, "The Bible is a fable, and Christianity is but the game of priests?"

Permit me to ask, if there was nothing in your moral habits, paving the way for your scepticism, and leading you secretly to wish that the Bible might not be true? Oh! tell me, did you not forsake truth, because, in the first instance, you had forsaken goodness?

Can you not remember how your gay and dissolute fellowships, your nightly carousals, your licentious indulgences, gradually blunted the edge of conscience, and the force of truth, till, like the fool mentioned in Scripture, you were ready to say, "There is no God?" Or, has the pride of the heart led you to scorn the humbling truths of the Gospel, so that you will not yield your mind to its evidences?

What now, I ask, rivets you to your unbelief? Is it the peace of mind, and the tranquillity of heart, that spring up so luxuriantly in the wilderness of doubt, and scepticism, and infidelity? Are you really happy? Does no invisible hand write your doom on the walls of your prayerless bed-chamber? Do you not sometimes think of the happy Christian that can read his Bible, and feel that its promises of pardon, and peace, and glory are all his? Is there no sincere, humble-minded Christian living, with whom you would be glad to exchange lots? Ah, my friend, you are not happy; you are only thoughtless, lulled, entangled, stupefied. The same causes which contributed to make you a sceptic, still retain you in hard bondage to its cheerless and desolating creed. You want license to evil; and the Bible will not give it you. You want to shun thoughts of your responsibility to God; and the Bible will not permit you. You want to think of death as the sleep of the soul; and the Bible tells you it is the gate of eternity. You want to feel that your passions are your own, and that you may indulge them with freedom; and the Bible tells you that you must "crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts," (Gal. v. 24,) or perish for ever in hell fire. You want to circumscribe the horizon of existence by the boundaries of the grave; and the Bible lifts up the veil of futurity, and shows you the abode of blessed spirits, and the regions of the lost.

Think again, my friend, and say if your scepticism is not far more the product of your inclinations than of your reason? Have you not become conscious of dislike to your Bible, because you have learned to reject its lofty lessons of truth, morality, and goodness?

But you say, "Many Christians are a disgrace to the Bible." We grant that many professed Christians are; but is it by yielding to Christianity that they thus disgrace it, or by neglecting to obey its precepts? You know the answer; it is unquestionably only by violating the spirit and demands of the Gospel, that any one can be otherwise than humane, upright, and pure.

But you say, "There are mysteries in Christianity that you cannot comprehend." And are there no mysteries, no incomprehensible truths, in deism itself? Do you believe in a First Great Cause of all existence? If you do, is it because you comprehend the idea of an uncaused cause, a self-existent and eternal Being, without beginning of days or end of years? Assuredly not; nothing can be more incomprehensible to a finite mind, than the very first principles of deism itself; namely, that there is a God, and that he is eternal, immutable, omnipresent, and omniscient.

Instead of rejecting your Bible, because it contains incomprehensible truths, you ought rather to presume that, if it be indeed the product of the Infinite Mind, it will exhibit that general feature which runs through all the other works of God, namely, mysteriousness, and elevation above the feeble soarings of a finite intellect. The Bible does contain truths which we are unable to comprehend; but, in doing so, it only harmonizes with the events of Providence and the course of nature. We see much occurring in the history of the world which is very mysterious and inexplicable; every object that meets the eye, whether in animate or inanimate nature, has in it characters of profound mystery to us. We know literally nothing of the essences of things; and shall we reject the Bible, then, attested as it is by such a cloud of witnesses, because it discloses doctrines respecting the nature and government of God, and the plan of redemption by the incarnation and death of Christ, which we may not be able fully to explain or reconcile with the misty surmises of our puny reason? As well might we say, that the sun does not shine upon our planet, because we do not know whether that glorious luminary is a solid mass of fire, or an opaque body surrounded by an atmosphere which emits light and heat to all parts of the solar system. As well might we deny the existence of life, because we are unable to explain its theory. As well might we conclude that there is no such thing as nature, because every single object it presents to our contemplation is to us a profound mystery. As well might a man turn sceptic as to his own existence, because one of the greatest of all mysteries is our own mental and corporeal economy.

Away, my friend, with this pretended dread of mystery, and say whether it is not rather the plain and simple parts of Scripture which are most offensive to you? Is it not true that your sinful heart revolts at the idea of being held responsible to God for your thoughts, words and actions? Yet, if God has made you what you are, and endowed you with such faculties; if in Him, too, you live, and move, and have your being, Acts xvii. 28, can any thing be more reasonable than that the Author of your being and the length of your days, should have made you responsible to him for the whole of your conduct, and more particularly for a calm, unprejudiced, and anxious examination of the discoveries of himself, which he has made to you, whether in nature, providence, or express revelation?

But you say, "There are contradictions in the Bible, which forbid you to embrace it as a discovery of the mind of God."

This I expressly and earnestly deny, when the Scriptures are fairly and legitimately interpreted. Seeming contradictions there may be, and doubtless are, in the Bible: but, if you are really anxious to have such difficulties removed out of the way, you have only to read the works of such men as Bishop Watson, and the Rev. Thomas Scott, in answer to Paine, in order to obtain full satisfaction in reference to all the absurd charges heaped by that truly unhappy man upon the writers of Scripture. You profess to spurn ignorance and prejudice; but how will you be able to escape the charge of both, if you allow yourself to retain unworthy opinions respecting certain parts of the Bible, which have been refuted, over and over again, and which you would be compelled to relinquish, if you would only take the trouble of informing yourself, and disabusing your mind of certain false notions which have been instilled into it by ignorant or designing men.

Allow me, as your sincere friend, to express my firm belief, as the result of much observation, that if you retire from evil counsellors, if you will separate yourself from all vicious society, if you will lay aside depraved habits, and sit down, thoughtfully, to read your Bible, you will speedily rise up from the interesting task, with the full conviction, that the Scriptures are the Word of God.

Is it too much, then, to ask of you, in entering upon this work, that you will put up a prayer to Almighty God, that, if the Bible be a revelation from Him, he would enable you, an erring creature, to ascertain the momentous fact? Nay, is it too much to press upon you, the duty of determining to know whether God has spoken to you in his Word? Rest assured, if such be your prayer, and such your determination, light will gradually break in upon your bewildered mind. The love of truth will spring up in your desolated heart; conscience will become tender in reference to sin and duty; feelings of penitence will steal over your spirit; the wisdom, goodness, and mercy of God will be seen in the revelation he has given; your need of a Saviour will be distinctly and impressively felt; the deep stain of guilt will be washed away by faith in the blood of the Saviour, whom you have blasphemed; and, like the doubting Thomas of old, you will exclaim, with a confiding heart, "My Lord and my God." John xx. 28.

Do not, I beseech you, throw aside with disdain this little tract, written with an anxious desire to promote your present and eternal welfare. Yield not to that species of silly pride and vanity, which would tempt you to conclude, that because you think differently on the subject of religion from others of your acquaintance, you are therefore possessed of greater acuteness and superior information.

Take heed lest you should provoke God, by your continued blasphemies, to abandon you to your own heart's lusts. Tremble lest that awful threatening should be accomplished in your person, "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you: Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me: for that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord: they would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof: Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices." Prov. i. 24-31.

Listen, then, I beseech you, to the warning voice of Heaven, "Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err." Prov. xix. 27. Break off the fellowship of unbelievers and wicked men. Fortify your mind in this determination, by calling to remembrance the evils which have accrued to you from your past unbelief and contempt of God. From what you know of the characters of infidels, endeavour to conceive of a state of society in which none but such persons were found to exist; think what a compound of selfishness, turbulence, and vicious indulgence, such a state of society would present! Having nothing to regulate and control its discordant elements, but the mere restraint of human laws, it would contain in its own bosom the elements of self-destruction, and would speedily annihilate itself by the force of those hideous vices which it had engendered.

"Combine," observes a great writer, "the frequent and familiar perpetration of atrocious deeds, with the dearth of great and generous actions, and you have the exact picture of that condition of society which completes the degradation of the species—the frightful contrast of dwarfish virtues and gigantic vices, where every thing good is mean and little, and every thing evil is rank and luxuriant: a dead and sickening uniformity prevails, broken only at intervals by volcanic eruptions of anarchy and crime."

THE LORD IS OUR REFUGE.

Oh! where for refuge should I flee,
When sins, and fears, and doubts assail!
Had not my Saviour died for me,
Too surely must my foes prevail!
Oh! where for refuge should I flee,
If Jesus had not died for me?

Beside that pure and holy Law,
Which God from Sinai's mount proclaim'd,
My spirit shrinks with sacred awe,
To find no single act unblam'd.
Then, where for refuge should I flee,
If Jesus had not died for me?

If I relied not on his power,
 To save my footsteps from the snare,
 The evil thoughts of every hour
 Might almost drive me to despair.
 Oh! where for refuge should I flee,
 If Jesus had not died for me?

Alone, while thinking on his love,
 My heart is thrill'd with the display;
 But when amidst the world I rove,
 These holy feelings die away.
 Oh! where for refuge should I flee,
 If Jesus had not died for me?

He died for me! and is it true,
 Am I by no false hopes deceived?
 The mighty consequence in view,
 Seems still too great to be believed.
 My debt is paid, and I am free,
 Because my Saviour died for me!

Forgive! oh, what a word of bliss,
 It seems my inmost heart to melt,
 Oh! how can mercy, such as this,
 Be duly praised, or duly felt?
 Oh! it will fill eternity,
 To tell His love who died for me!

Forgive! nay more, surprising grace,
 Adopted as a favour'd son;
 Foremost among a rebel race,
 Yet brought to stand before the throne!
 Oh! blest the hour which made us see
 That my dear Saviour died for me!

Yes! thou art worthy, dearest Lord,
 O'er every pulse of life to reign—
 Yes! thou art worthy, dearest Lord
 Of all my love—for thou wast slain!
 To set a guilty spirit free,
 My Saviour bled and died for me!

Oh! that this heart might ne'er forget
 The ardour of its present glow;
 Nor cease to recollect the debt
 Which to his unbought love I owe.
 Oh! that my constant theme might be
 My gracious Saviour died for me!

But while this heart's so full of sin,
 Th' impression must too swiftly fade;
 Oh! for some glorious distant scene,
 Where all his worth shall shine display'd
 And prompt, throughout eternity,
 Fresh love to Him who died for me!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MR DAVID DICKSON,

PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

BY THE EDITOR.

THIS eminent divine was born in Glasgow, about the year 1583. He was the only child of his parents, who were in respectable circumstances, his father having been very successful in business as a merchant. Great attention was paid in his childhood to David's religious training; and, indeed, he may be said from his very birth, to have been dedicated, like Samuel of old, to the service of the Lord. Being naturally endowed with excellent talents, he made rapid progress in his education, until, by a severe attack of illness, he was interrupted in his studies. It was in mercy, however, that the Almighty had sent his afflictive dispensation. No sooner was the young man raised from his bed of sickness, than his parents, filled with a sense of the Divine goodness, resolved anew, that their son should be devoted to the honourable office of a minister of the Lord Jesus. He was accordingly sent to Glasgow, that he might prosecute his studies with this view.

At the conclusion of his literary course, Mr Dickson had earned so high a reputation for extensive and varied acquirements, that, besides having the degree of Master of Arts conferred upon him, he was chosen a Regent or teacher of Philosophy in the College. This office he occupied for several years with high honour to himself, and great advantage to the young men who were committed to his care. Along with Boyd of Trochrig, Mr Blair, and other pious individuals at that time connected with the University, he endeavoured to combine a knowledge of religious truth with the secular learning which the students were employed in acquiring. The result was, that a spirit of piety was diffused in the College; and many issued from its walls, who became burning and shining lights in that dark and corrupt age.

Having completed the period which the General Assembly had decreed that regents should fulfil, Mr Dickson left the University; and having been licensed to preach the Gospel, he was ordained, in 1618, as minister of the parish of Irvine, where he laboured with much comfort, and with many tokens of the Divine approbation, for twenty-three years. It was in the memorable year of his ordination that the Perth Assembly passed the well-known Acts imposed upon them by the King and the Prelates, and thus recognised the most obnoxious of the forms of the Episcopal Church, as worthy of adoption by the Church of Scotland. The forms to which we refer were as follows:—1st, Kneeling at the Communion. 2d, Private Communion. 3d, Private Baptism. 4th, Observance of holidays. 5th, Confirmation of children. The passing of the Perth Acts, as they were familiarly termed, roused the Scottish Presbyterians to a more determined hostility than ever to the system of Prelacy which had been forced upon an unwilling Church. Many who had never examined the question before, now studied it with the greatest care and attention. Among others, Mr Dickson applied his vigorous mind to the subject of Episcopacy; and, by the blessing of God, he was led to entertain very strong views in favour of the Divine authority of Presbytery. The more he became acquainted with the various points involved in the controversy, so much the more opposed was he to the obnoxious Acts; and he resolved, more especially, after recovering from a dangerous illness with which he was attacked about this time, to make open avowal of his opinions in reference to Prelacy.

Mr Dickson's sentiments were not long in reaching high quarters; and, at the instance of Law, Archbishop of Glasgow, he was summoned to appear before the High Commission Court, on the 19th January 1622. This citation he readily obeyed, and on the appointed day he made his appearance at the bar of the Court. The summons having been read, he gave in a paper, firmly but yet respectfully declining the jurisdiction of the Court. An attempt was then made to persuade him to withdraw this paper. In answer, however, to the urgent requests made to him to take it up, he replied calmly, "I laid it not down for that end to take it up again." Spottiswood, Archbishop of St Andrews, asked if he was willing to subscribe the document, to which he readily responded in the affirmative. The paper was then read by the clerk, but scarcely had he finished two or three sentences, when Spottiswood, turning to Mr Dickson, burst forth into the most furious reproaches. "These men," he said with the utmost vehemence, "will speak of humility and meekness, and talk of the Spirit of God; but you are led by the spirit of the devil. There is more pride in you, I dare say, than in all the bishops in Scotland." This language, so unworthy of one who was sitting as a judge, was met by the accused with the most patient magnanimity. "I am not a rebel," he calmly replied, "I stand here as the King's subject; grant me the benefits of the law, and of a subject, and I crave no more." These words, uttered as they were with a manly firmness, which only the consciousness of innocence could have inspired, silenced the infuriated bishop. His brother, of Aberdeen, then commenced his interrogatories at the pannel. "Will you obey the King or not?" "I will obey the King in all things in the Lord," was Mr Dickson's instant reply. It was obvious to the Court, and Archbishop Law called their attention to it, that in using this language, the accused did not assert that he would yield unlimited obedience to the King; and accordingly the Bishop of Aberdeen pushed his inquiries still further. "May not the King give his authority that we have, to as many souters and tailors in Edinburgh, to sit and see whether ye be doing your duty or not?" In reply to this interrogatory, Mr Dickson referred the bishops to the paper which he had given in, denying the authority of the Civil Court in things sacred; and proving the truth of his opinions on this subject by quotations from Scripture. Spottiswood then broke out into the most opprobrious language. "The devil himself can quote Scripture," he exclaimed, and taunted the pannel with having a better knowledge of Aristotle than of the Bible. All this the amiable young minister bore with unruffled serenity, lifting up his eyes occasionally to heaven for grace to be faithful to his Master's cause. Throughout the whole examination he conducted himself with the most exemplary dignity and mildness. The mock trial at length closed, and by the decree of the High Commission Court, Mr Dickson was deprived of his ministry at Irvine, and banished to Turriff, in Aberdeenshire, to which place he was ordered to set out within twenty days. On hearing the sentence read, the young minister rose and addressing the bishops, said, "The will of the Lord be done; though ye cast me off, the Lord will take me up. Send me whither ye will, I hope my Master will go with me; and as he has been with me heretofore, He will be with me still, as with his own weak servant."

Mr Dickson gladly availed himself of the very limited period allowed him by the Court, and employed himself in almost daily preaching the Gospel. At the expiry of the twenty days, he was about to commence his journey to the north, but the Earl of Eglinton having applied to the Archbishop of Glasgow, he was permitted to preach for a time in the hall and courtyard of Eglinton Castle. The fame of the young minister of Irvine, thus early separated from his flock by the strong arm of law had spread far and wide, and thousands flocked from all quarters to hear him. These opportunities of doing good, however, were soon interrupted, for at the end of two months he was ordered without further delay to set out for the place of his banishment. During his stay in Turriff, Mr Dickson, with the full consent of the minister of the parish, still continued to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation with as much energy, and with as much frequency, as he had ever done while at Irvine. His friends and attached parishioners made many applications to have him reponed. Law, who had originated the persecution against him, declared his readiness to remove the sentence of banishment, provided the paper, declining the jurisdiction of the High Commission Court, were withdrawn. This, however, he positively refused to do. He would neither consent to withdraw the paper himself, nor to permit any of his friends to withdraw it. He was sent for to Glasgow, that his friends might, if possible, prevail upon him to make concessions; but, although in obedience to their wishes he undertook the journey, no entreaties could move him from his purpose. He returned to Turriff, resolved rather to suffer than to swerve from what he believed to be a sound scriptural principle.

Mr Dickson was much beloved by the people of Irvine, and they never ceased, assisted by the Earl of Eglinton, to importune Archbishop Law that their banished pastor might be restored to them. The haughty Prelate for some time resisted their urgent entreaties; at length, however, he yielded, and the beloved young minister was permitted, without any condition, to return to his anxious flock about the end of July 1623. His ministrations were accompanied with many evident tokens of the Divine approbation. Many were, through his instrumentality, aroused from spiritual insensibility and death, and made alive unto God through the Lord Jesus Christ. Seasons of refreshing from the Lord's presence were not unfrequent under his ministry, particularly at communion seasons. So highly were his labours prized, that many came from all the neighbouring parishes to hear him; and various instances were known of families coming from a distance to settle in the town of Irvine, that they might enjoy the privilege of his pastoral care. Amid all this popularity, however, he was enabled to maintain an humble, unaffected deportment; and, instead of boasting of his success, he was heard to declare that the vintage of Irvine in his time, was not equal to the mere gleanings of Ayr in Mr Welch's time.

As a preacher, Mr Dickson stood very high in the estimation, not of his own people alone, but of the country generally. And not more eminent were his pulpit talents, than was his tact in dealing with cases of Christian experience in private. Often, on Sabbath evenings, would a large hall in his house be crowded with persons wishing to consult him on the state of their souls; and to every one he spoke as the circumstances of their cases required. Every Monday being market-day in Irvine, he held a week-day service in the church, which was generally attended by a crowded audience, who hung upon his lips with the utmost avidity. The most prominent cases of conscience which were brought under his notice on the previous Sabbath evening were then solved, and suitable remarks made, for general edification. It was chiefly by those week-day services that the revival was brought about in the year 1630, which is well-known to have occurred under this worthy minister of Christ. On that occasion, many who had been sitting in darkness were made to see "a great light;" and many who had been merely formal professors, were aroused to seek after the possession of a real, a vital Christianity. That Satan should have endeavoured to mar this work of the Spirit, was to be expected; but many lived to evince the reality of their conversion, during that revival, by a long course of holy and consistent living.

At the period to which we have now arrived in Mr Dickson's history, Prelacy was carrying matters with a high hand, not only in Scotland, but in Ireland. Many of the godly ministers, such as Livingstone, Blair, and others, who had settled in the north of Ireland, were prevented from the exercise of their ministry by the influence of the Irish bishops; and compelled, by the force of persecution, to pass over into Scotland. With these faithful and devoted men Mr Dickson held frequent intercourse, and employed them to preach for him in his pulpit. This, of course, gave mortal offence to the Prelatic party in Scotland, and he was again summoned to answer for his conduct before the High Commission Court. It was too late, however; the power of the bishops in Scotland was on the wane, and they saw it to be their interest to stop short in a course of conduct which would, as it actually did, ere long bring their authority into contempt. To the deposition of the bishops, and the establishment of the Second Reformation in Scotland, which soon after occurred, Mr Dickson was in a great degree instrumental. It was he who prevailed on the Presbytery of Irvine to apply, in 1637, for the suspension of the Service-Book; and he was one of those who were deputed to urge upon the ministers and people in and around Aberdeen, to renew the Covenant. And in the following year he was proposed by some persons, previous to the meeting of the General Assembly at Glasgow, to fill the chair on that important occasion; and although the choice fell upon Mr Alexander Henderson, Mr Dickson took an active share in the proceedings. At the next Assembly, which met at Edinburgh in August 1639, he was almost unanimously chosen Moderator, and he discharged the duties of the office with the most marked discretion and impartiality. In the course of this Assembly he was invited to accept of a charge in Glasgow; but such was the resistance made to his removal by the Earl of Eglinton and his beloved parishioners at Irvine, that the General Assembly refused to sanction his translation.

After labouring for nearly two years longer among his attached people, he accepted of a call to the professorship of theology in the University of Glasgow. For this high office in the Church his eminent attainments as a divine singularly qualified him; and under his tuition many young men were trained up, who afterwards distinguished themselves by their erudition, piety, and usefulness. While thus engaged in discharging the laborious duties of his professorship, he preached also in the forenoon of the Sabbath in the High Church of the city. Mr Dickson now stood very high in the opinion of his brethren; he was accordingly employed in any matter of importance which concerned the public affairs of the Church. Thus, he was appointed by the Assembly to form one of a small committee, which was named for the purpose of executing a draft of the "Directory for Public Worship." He was also the author, conjunctly with Mr Durhame, of "The Sum of Saving Knowledge."

About the year 1650, Mr Dickson was translated from the chair of divinity in Glasgow to that in Edinburgh, where he taught theology with much benefit to the young students under his care. That his lectures were sound and scriptural, is evident from the published specimens which are still extant. The prelections which he delivered in Latin have been translated into English, and they certainly give a very favourable view of his mode of conveying instruction on theological subjects. In all the public affairs of the time, and in the hot controversy which was maintained between the Resolutions and Protesters, he took an active share, publishing several pamphlets in favour of the former party. In the laborious discharge of his duties, Mr Dickson continued until the Restoration of Charles the Second, when, for declining to take the oath of supremacy, he was, along with many others, driven from his charge. The melancholy events of that eventful period, and the eager determination with which the King sought to establish Episcopacy in Scotland, seem to have deeply impressed the mind of the good man, and seriously affected his health.

In December 1662 he was seized with a severe illness. Mr Livingstone, who visited him as he lay on his sick-bed, has left on record the memorable saying which the worthy professor of theology uttered in the solemn view of death. "I have taken all my good deeds, and all my bad deeds, and have cast them together in a heap before the Lord, and have fled from both to Jesus Christ, and in him I have sweet peace." Feeling that his end was near, he summoned his family to his bed-side; and having addressed a few words to each of them, concluded with solemnly pronouncing the apostolical blessing, after which he lifted up his hand and closed his own eyes, yielding up his soul without a struggle, into the hands of his Redeemer.

The works which this eminent divine has left behind him, are marked by great vigour of thought, and simplicity, and clearness of style. They are numerous, and many of them rare, but there are some of them, particularly his commentary on the Psalms, which we are glad to see reprinted. His commentaries on Matthew's Gospel and the Epistle to the Hebrews, well deserve to be also brought under the view of the public; but none of all his writings would we prefer to his "Therapeutica Sacra," or "Cases of Conscience Resolved."

THE CHARACTER AND TRANSLATION OF ENOCH: A DISCOURSE.

Preached in St Mary's Church, Dumfries, 27th December 1840, on occasion of the death of the Rev. Peter Thomson, one of the ministers of the parish.

BY THE REV. ROBERT CRAWFORD, Minister of Irongray, Dumfries-shire.

"And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him."—GEN. v. 24.

THERE are characters in the Sacred Volume, so familiar to us from childhood, and so endeared to us by the part which they acted, and the scenes through which they passed, that we almost forget their great antiquity. Though they trod "the undeluged earth"—though ages have rolled away since they appeared—though changes alike diversified and great have happened—though millions have lived and died; they stand as distinctly out before our view as if we had been personally conversant with them, and were recently parted from them. Yes, and when the memory of the unregenerate, however fascinating their genius, or illustrious their deeds, is forgotten, or rots, they (as the Word of God is diffused) will only be the more widely known; and when the earth and all things therein are burnt up, will be held in everlasting remembrance. Among these, Enoch, the seventh from Adam, holds a conspicuous place. In an age somewhat prior to his, "men began to call upon the name of the Lord,"—openly associated for his worship,—were distinguished for their enlightened and holy zeal. He caught the sacred fire—received "the morning star," and shone with peculiar radiance, flashing conviction on the minds of some—cheering others forward in the path of duty—and leaving those without excuse who continued to walk in darkness, and repented not to give God the glory.

While many gazed with admiration on his course; and not a few, perhaps, with envy and hatred, he suddenly disappeared—his light seemed to be quenched in night—he was eagerly sought for, and nowhere to be found. He was plucked by the hand of God from this lower sphere, and fixed in the heavenly one, there to shine for ever and ever, free from all disturbance, or waning, or setting. "And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him."

There are two things in these words deserving of our notice, and forming a theme for meditation, suited we think to the mournful circumstances in which we are now placed; first, The course; and then the departure or translation of this remarkable man. We shall endeavour, in humble reliance on the blessing of Christ and the working of his Spirit, to trace each of these—

I. His course. He walked with God.—What a testimony! so simple as to be intelligible to all; so full as to imply every thing good, and so high as to cast into the shade the most eloquent and impressive tribute of praise ever paid by man to man. The high rank to which the patriarch was raised, and the holy life which he led, are brought in the same instant vividly before us. We are not informed when he entered on his heavenly walk. There was doubtless a period in his history when he underwent a change,—when the spirit of holiness was imparted to him,—when he was brought into an intimate union with "the Lord our righteousness." Had he not welcomed the first dawn of Gospel light emanating from the promise, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent;" had he not believed the record which God had even then given of his Son, comparatively faint and obscure as that might be; had he not based his hopes of acceptance on Him who was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, the sentence of death would not have passed away from him—the enmity of his heart would have remained for ever unsubdued, constituting alike his guilt and his punishment. He would have walked as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their minds, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, and would have been an heir of wrath, even as others. We have reason to think that he began his walk with God in early life. He was comparatively young when God took him. He had not completed half the usual term of human existence. His eye, like that of Moses, when he died on Mount Nebo, within view of the promised land, was not dim, nor his natural force abated. And the lustre of his course was, unquestionably, all the more bright and attractive from beaming, as it did, through the freshness and ardour of youth. What sight upon earth more lovely—more edifying—more fitted to awe the unbelieving—to melt the obdurate—to win the prejudiced, than that of one consecrating his first and best days to the service of God, careless of ease, deaf to the voice of pleasure, indifferent to the praise or the censure of man, firm amid the current of idolatry, or infidelity, or profaneness, or profligacy. "Them that honour God" intent on magnifying Christ, whether by life or death; and yet oppressed with a sense of unworthiness—"he shall honour," by giving them a place and a name better than of sons and of daughters, even an everlasting name that shall not be cut off.

We have no difficulty in tracing the course of this godly man; in filling up under the guidance of the written Word the striking and interesting outline here presented to us by the inspired historian. We may clearly gather from his words that the patriarch maintained stated communion with God. There was, in his age, a fixed season for devotion. The Sabbath which began in paradise, survived the fall as a day of spiritual repose, a mean of sanctification, a pledge of peace, a type of heaven. There was a place, too, where God indicated his special presence in a way that Cain who was stained with the blood of his brother could not endure; and where he communed with his people, testifying his acceptance of their gifts, and fulfilling the desires of their hearts. And there was a mode of approaching unto God, prescribed by himself, without the due observance of which the worshipper could not please him.

"By faith," we read, "Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain." His was at once an acknowledgment of his guilt, an act of obedience to the revealed will of God, and an expression of desire for the continuance of his friendship, as well as of entire dependence for every blessing upon Him, who in the fulness of time was to give his life a ransom for many. We may be sure then, otherwise the testimony before us would never have been borne to him, that Enoch waited upon God in the way of his own appointment—that he counted the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable,—that he listened with deep interest to every intimation of the Divine will; and that he dwelt upon the precious promise given to our first parents; and was thereby inspired with peace, smitten with self-abasement, kindled into devotion, and brought near unto God, so as to be filled with his fulness. What manner of persons ought we to be in these last days, who profess to be in a state of reconciliation with God! The darkness is past, the true light now shines; the new and living way to the holiest of all is made manifest, the Spirit and the bride say, come. Alas, how dim is our vision, how faint our aspirations, how broken and joyless our communion! Would that we were all sensible of our wanderings, and doubtings, and sinful longings, and disposed to lift the earnest and plaintive cry of the Church. "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth; where thou feedest, and makest thy flock to rest at noon," for then the voice would be heard: "Go thy way by the footsteps of the flock,"—they may be seen by the still waters, through the green pastures, on the holy hill, near the house of prayer.

Still farther, we may infer from the testimony of the inspired historian that the patriarch acknowledged God in all his ways. When he awoke, and came to the right exercise of his faculties, he found himself still with God. His sense of the Divine presence, when strong, filled him with profound awe, and intense delight, and when less vivid, exerted a hallowing influence upon him, repressing proud thoughts, foolish talking, presumptuous planning, anxious care, immoderate enjoyment and excessive grief. He dreaded, we may be sure, the thought of being abandoned by God, or of being found in a state in which he could not unbosom himself in prayer or hear without alarm the call to appear before his Judge. He formed his plans, and prosecuted them with a distinct and solemn recognition of the overruling providence of God. When his path was smooth, and outward circumstances prosperous, he was lowly, and traced all to the good pleasure of God. When his way was cold and dark, and stormy, he leant more firmly on the Omnipotent arm which was underneath him, and pressed forward. His garments, like those of him who shall be remembered to all generations, were perfumed out of the ivory palaces. There was a heavenly fragrance about him, which clearly distinguished him from the gay or the sordid votary of the world. How far are we from such attainments, notwithstanding our superior advantages! With some, the omnipresence of God is a dark, unintelligible mystery; with others, a cold abstraction, and not a living principle; with comparatively few, an awful and interesting reality—a theme for adoring wonder and gratitude—a motive the most constraining to continued watchfulness—a strong tower, into which they can run and be safe. How apt are even the best to overlook the fact, that they are habitually under the inspection and control of him who is holy, him who is true, him who hath "the key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth;" and consequently, to walk with the world,—to please themselves,—to "sleep, as do others,"—to faint under, or despise the chastening of the Lord. "Lord, increase our faith,"—deepen and perpetuate a sense of thy gracious presence, so that we may act, enjoy, and suffer, as seeing thee, who art invisible.

And finally,—we may conclude, from what is here said of the patriarch, that he appeared on the side of the Lord, was devoted to his cause.—Beyond the pale of the Church, the mournful effects of the fall were then multiplying apace. The worship of God was abandoned, the gifts of Providence were abused, the restraints of conscience burst through, the feelings of compassion wellnigh extinguished, the tide of depravity was rolling onwards, and threatening to sweep away every thing holy and good. The patriarch did not witness all this unmoved; he raised the voice of warning, he shed the tears of pity, he pointed to the gathering storm; and as he beheld, from the mount of vision, with the light of heaven around him, first the waters of the deluge, and then, far away in the depths of futurity, the fires of the last day, proclaimed, "Behold, the Lord cometh, with ten thousands of his saints, (myriads of his holy ones,) to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all of their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed; and of the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have committed against Him." Are we witnesses for God? Do we honour him with our substance? Do we worship him in our families? Do we hold forth his word in our different spheres? Do we lift our testimony against the ungodliness of the world, in the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind? Do we seek the purity and peace of his Church, grieving when the cry of her watchmen is unheeded, or scorned, or stifled in death? Do we remember them who have had the rule over us; striving to treasure up their sayings, to follow their faith, to imitate their devotedness, to carry forward the objects dear to their hearts, dearer even than life? Do we anticipate with delight the time when the whole family of the redeemed shall be gathered together into one,—"no more sin, neither sorrow nor crying; neither any more pain?" Alas! how feeble the light we erect!—how fitful our zeal!—how frequent our defections and inconsistencies!—how weak our faith!—"the things that remain are ready to die." "Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts; look down from heaven, and behold and visit thy vine. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand; upon the Son of man, whom thou madest strong for thyself. So will not we go back from thee; quicken us, and we will call upon thy name; cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved."

II. Having traced the course of the patriarch, we would now advert, for a little, to his departure, or translation. "He was not; for God took him."—We know not whether he received an intimation of his approaching change, or whether there were any witnesses of the event; or how he was occupied when taken up into heaven—in prayer, or in talking, like Elijah, with a godly friend. The words of the inspired writer seem to intimate, that his removal was sudden and unexpected. The Church was greatly moved by the tidings; their attention was impressively called to the wonderful fact, and the result was, a deep and gladdening persuasion that God had received him to himself—that he was translated to glory without tasting of death. Earth had nothing of him; the same moment his soul was “made perfect in holiness” his body was invested with a new and undying form; both adapted to the exalted sphere in which they were to move. He entered into the glorious liberty of the sons of God; his happiness is complete, unbroken, eternal. Now, there are two aspects under which we may contemplate the translation of the patriarch; and the first is, as an instructive and consoling dispensation to the family of God upon earth. Prior to this event, believers must have known that all who “died in faith entered into rest,” and would be “for ever with the Lord.” As they could not be ignorant that the sentence of death, passed upon man in consequence of sin, involved more than the dissolution of the body, even the loss of that union with God which constitutes the life of the soul—exposure to his wrath—they would doubtless conclude that the promise of deliverance, through “the Seed of the woman,” however imperfect their conceptions of it might be, contained an adequate remedy for all the evils of the fall; in reference both to the soul and body, to time and to eternity. And when, by faith in the promise, they were quickened into life, freed from fear, imbued with love, lifted above the earth, and drawn towards heaven, they would have a witness within themselves to a state of future blessedness worth all the arguments in the world. What they wanted was an actual instance of victory over death,—that was supplied to them by the translation of Enoch; and consequently could not fail to confirm their hopes of passing immediately, when they died, into glory; and of being ultimately delivered even from the power of the grave.

O how thankful should we feel that we have an instance of victory over death, in comparison with which that of Enoch disappears, effected by One who “hewed his head, and gave up the ghost;” who trod the land of darkness alone, and that, too, with the load of our guilt upon him—under the curse. His victory involves that of all who are in him. They are not dead, though lying in the cold and wormy grave, but sleeping; and ere long the Redeemer will come and awake them out of their sleep. Jesus said unto Martha, “I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die.” “Wherefore comfort one another with these words.”

The second aspect under which we may contemplate the translation of the patriarch is, as a signal token of the divine regard to himself. He was saved the conflict with the last enemy. What that is, we cannot fully know till our own hour is come. They can give us an affecting conception of it, who have hung over the couch of a departing friend, and sought with affectionate assiduity to soothe his last hours. In some cases, the approach of death is so gradual, soft, and still, that he seems as if he were melting into pity—as if he were weary of human suffering—as if he were desirous to divest the task assigned to him of all that is revolting. In other cases, his approach is rapid, stern, and appalling. He seizes on the youngest, the most gifted, the most beloved, the most needed—and accomplishes his object in the midst of tossings, and pain, and wanderings, and tears, and exhaustion. From all this, Enoch was freed; he did not taste death in any form; his natural body was instantaneously changed into a spiritual one, and fitted for sustaining the intense and incessant devotion of his soul made perfect. One thing, however, is consoling, that though a different departure awaits the believer now, though he must walk through the dark valley, and be consigned to the narrow house—though his latter end bear sometimes a resemblance to a troubled dream—still the change to the disembodied spirit is all the more blissful. O how delightful will the rest of heaven be, after the weary wanderings, the afflictive scenes, and the awful close, of human life! The remembrance of the past will serve to enhance his blessedness, and to swell his song of gratitude and praise. “They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.” “Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.” Nor is this all: the patriarch was “taken away from the evil to come.” After his departure, the distinction between the Church and the world was broken down; iniquity, unrestrained and unashamed, reached an alarming height; “the earth was filled with violence, and God saw that the wickedness of man was great, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil, and that continual.” How painful to a pure and benevolent mind—the profanation of the name of God—the open desecration of his day—the contempt or abuse of his ordinances—the oppression and sensuality which pollute and embitter society—the unholy jarrings and the grievous scandals that corrupt and afflict the Church—the awful effects of sin in time and eternity! From the grief, agitation, and alarm, arising from any of these sources, the patriarch was delivered. There was nothing in the region to which he was conveyed to vex his holy soul; he was removed entirely and for ever beyond the reach of all that could damp his peace or cloud his happiness. For a frail and feverish being, he received “the blessing from on high, even life for evermore.”

In tracing the life and meditating on the translation of this godly man, I have had almost constantly in view the mournful event which I know is uppermost in your thoughts, and weighing heavily on the hearts of you all—the removal by death of your young, and gifted, and zealous, and much-loved pastor. He is not. He has finished his earthly course. He has been called early away. He is removed for ever from a sphere where he seemed destined to be an instrument of extensive and lasting good. His untimely end has spread an air of sadness over the community—impressed even the most hardened, and filled you to whom he was willing to impart, not the Gospel of God only, but also his own soul, with mourning, “every individual apart, and every family apart.” And there are others, not here, to whom he was known and endeared—the aged, the sick, the distressed, and the destitute—mingling their tears with those of the sorrowing relatives, and feeling like you that they have lost a friend. In early life, he was deprived of his father before he was conscious of the loss he had sustained, and was indebted mainly for the excellent training he received to his widowed mother. One fact connected with his childhood has been preserved, and is entitled to notice. He was struck on hearing that portion of the Word read which is embodied in the 64th Paraphrase, and which contains an ascription of glory to the Redeemer, as well as an announcement of his second coming and of the wailing that would thereby be produced among them that had pierced him. He put some appropriate questions to his parent relative to the illustrious personage whose love is there celebrated, and the striking event which is there portrayed, and wondering what these things meant, pondered them deeply in his heart. This anthem of praise, which called forth his earliest sympathies, formed the subject of the first discourse he ever preached in public, and seems to have been in unison with the pervading sentiment of his mind; and, may we not hope, it is now sung by him on high with untiring ardour and ineffable delight. He applied to the Presbytery of Edinburgh to be taken on trials; and after a strict examination, was licensed by them to preach the Gospel, in 1833, when he had reached his twenty-fourth year. He occupied since that period four successive spheres of usefulness, before entering on his last and, to him, most interesting charge. In every stage of his history, in the varied capacities in which he acted—when receiving the elements of his education in the parish school of his native place, or prosecuting his academical course, or preaching the Gospel of the grace of God, or visiting from house to house—we can trace the development and exercise of those qualities which shone so brightly towards the close of his life. He endeared himself so much to his first instructor, that he never lost sight of him, and often expressed the gratification he felt in finding the hopes he had entertained of him realized. He enjoyed and deserved the affectionate regard of those fathers and brethren in the ministry with whom he had more immediate connection. He found his way to the hearts of the people among whom he laboured, and that, too, not by fawning, or flattery, or unworthy condescension—for any thing mean, degrading, or insincere, he could not endure—but by his simplicity of purpose, his purity of character, his labours, watchings, and prayers. In Riccarton, where he acted for nearly a year as assistant, the congregation, on the death of their aged minister, unanimously petitioned that he might be appointed his successor; and tendered to him, on leaving them, such a sum in addition to his fixed salary as they thought was no more than an adequate remuneration for his services. He accepted part of this sum; and, with a freedom from selfishness which, considering his circumstances, is rarely equalled, requested that the remainder might be transferred to the family of the departed minister, and instantly withdrew, that his presence might not occasion any obstruction to the settlement of him who had been presented to the charge. In Dundee, where he was engaged as a missionary in the parish of St John's, his labours were so valued, that the able and excellent minister of the parish, at a meeting convened for the purpose, conveyed to him a tribute of his and the people's regard, and bore testimony to his unwearied zeal. In Bothkennar, where he was subsequently employed as assistant to the Rev. Mr Caw, the same affection was manifested towards him, and the same regret expressed at his departure. And since the pastoral relation was formed between him and you—within the course of the year now drawing to a close—you know that he consecrated all the energies of his cultivated mind, and all the warmth of his affectionate and sanctified heart, to the duties of his charge. How clearly he expounded, how faithfully he handled, how impressively he illustrated, how earnestly he applied the Word of God! In his discourses, there was no glare, no obscurity, no straining after effect, no attempt to dazzle or confound. He felt his own nothingness and unworthiness. He breathed a lowly and devotional spirit. He kept steadily in view the great end of his calling—the winning of souls to Christ. He commended himself by a plain, powerful, feeling manifestation of the truth to every man's conscience in the sight of God. And he was the same in his more retired hours as when the eye of the Church was upon him—in his private as in his public ministrations. He sought not yours, but you; your conversion—your sanctification—your peace—the well-being of your families—the advancement of the cause of Christ in your various spheres. Indifference to his own ease, and interest, and comfort, formed very prominent features in his character. The question with him was not how he could spare himself, but what he could do. On one occasion, if not on more, he rose from a sick-bed to fulfil an engagement with his young people—to carry forward some educational plan or benevolent enterprise he had put in operation. Yes; and when disease was ever and anon clouding his faculties, and the hand of death fast stealing on his outward frame, his thoughts were running on his work—his flock were constantly flitting before his view—he was busy addressing to you the words of instruction and consolation. After a sore conflict, he has entered into rest. God has taken him and planted him, we have good ground to hope, in a higher and holier sphere. He has ends to accomplish by his early removal which we cannot fathom—ends, perhaps, which could not be accomplished in the noontide of his career, and by a lifetime of laborious exertion. Never forget that your history is entwined with his. He has given in his account—how he preached and how he laboured; ere long you will have to give in yours—how you have received and how walked. While you think upon him and all that endeared him to you—while you frequently turn to the spot where he lies entombed—remember his doctrine, consider the end of his conversation—"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Bear in mind that there is nothing now connected with the charge from which he has been separated, on which he loves to dwell, save the fact, that some guilty wanderer has, through his ministrations, been brought back—some young hearer "added to the Lord"—some fainting disciple revived—some vigorous member animated to faithful contending—some aged pilgrim made more desirous "to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." Redeem the time. Walk with God in holy communion, and with one another in love. Take a frequent, enlarged, and longing view of the promised land. Keep the word of the patience of Christ, and he also will keep you from the hour of temptation that is coming upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth. Now, unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy—to the only wise God our Saviour be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever! Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Christian Watchfulness.—Vigilance is another field for the exercise of Christian diligence. A soldier, in a friendly country, may sustain no disadvantage though his watch-tower be unoccupied, but among enemies, such heedlessness would be ruinous; and hence, with the view of being prepared for circumstances of peril, armies in times of peace are trained, not merely to every variety of military evolution, but night and day have their sentinels posted, and required at their peril to perform their vigils. Watchfulness is equally necessary in a Christian soldier. The god of this world "goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." Amidst the bustle of business—the privacy of domestic life—the solitude of retirement—the devotional exercises of the closet, or of the sanctuary—he assails. Our words, deeds, thoughts, desires, and affections, present to him objects of attack. Thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, are his auxiliaries; and, from the day he entered paradise, he has been learning from experience the most accessible avenues to the human heart, where are traitors ready to plead and espouse his cause. In such circumstances our safety demands vigilance,—habitual remembrance of our liability to be assailed,—a thorough scrutiny into those parts of our moral constitution that are weakest and most defenceless,—a frequent survey of the temptations to which we are liable,—a constant wakefulness to the approach of the sins that do most easily beset us,—and to the considerations that should prompt us to resistance. Such wakefulness will often, ere temptation comes, enable us to anticipate it,—to assume an attitude of resistance; to call to mind the motives that should make us "steadfast, unmoveable," and to pour forth the ejaculation, "Lord strengthen me: turn the counsel of Abithophel into foolishness." Lot, from his watch-tower, might have described the consequences that were likely to result from living in Sodom; David, the bitter fruits he might have been sure of reaping from the indulgence of his passion; and the disciples, the circumstances of trial in which they were to be placed, when their Master was taken away from them. But Lot had sunk deep into worldliness. The monarch, who had so often led his armies to victory, allowed the ark, and Israel and Judah, to abide in tents, in the open field, while he remained at home, exercising little vigilance as it respected either the enemies of Israel, or the adversaries of his soul; and the disciples, full of self-confidence, not weakened even by the Saviour's admonition, "All ye shall be offended because of me this night," were surprised by temptation, and "all forsook him and fled." So it will be with us, if we do not habitually keep in mind, that we are in an enemy's country; that, till the battle is over, and the victory gained, we must calculate on assaillment, that our safety consists in maintaining a posture of defence, having the armour of God girt around us, acting like the Israelites in the days of Nehemiah, when "every one with his right hand wrought in the work, and with the other hand he held a weapon."—REV. J. MARSHALL. (Inward Revival.)

Know the plague of thy heart.—When a man is once sincerely humbled under God's mighty hand with sight of sin, and sense of Divine wrath, so that all his sins be as an heavy burden upon his heart, whereupon he thirsts for Christ's blood, far more eagerly, than the tired hart for the rivers of water, prizing it before the pleasures, wealth and glory of the whole world, and is as well willing to take upon him his sweet and easy yoke, for to please him in new obedience, as to partake of the merit of his passion for the pardon of his sin; or in a word, and shortlier thus—Though thou comest freshly out of an hell of heinous sins, and hitherto hast neither thought or spoke, or done any thing but abominably; yet, if now with true remorse thou groanest under them all, as an heavy burden, and longest sincerely for the Lord Jesus, and newness of life, thou art bound, ipso facto, as they say, immediately after that act, and unfeigned resolution of thy soul to take Christ himself, and all the promises of life as thine own for ever. All delays, demurs, exceptions, pretexts, standing out, scruples to the contrary, are dishonourable to God's mercies, disparagement to the promises, and derogatory to the truth and tender-heartedness of Jesus Christ. I take the ground for what I say, from that sweet invitation, Matt. ii. 28. As soon as we are poor in spirit, we are presently blessed. Matt. v. 3.—BOLTON. "Threifold Treatise," published 1634.

Hints to Married Persons.—Zacharias and Elizabeth "were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." A married couple are either both careless, or both pious, or the one of them is careless and the other is pious. How sad, in the eye of a Christian mind, the spectacle of a pair, who care neither for their own souls, nor the souls of each other! The world may smile on them in its most joyous mood, plenty may crown their board, health may sparkle in their faces, the voice of gaiety and mirth may resound in their dwelling, and they may be attached to each other with all the fondness of a creature's love; but, alas! they are alienated from the Author of their comforts, they have no joys which can stand the test of heaven's light, and in the midst of all their attachment to the best and most endearing love,—to Christian love they are total strangers. Ye unsanctified and worldly pairs, how can you look at those to whom you are bound by the closest earthly ties, and indebted for the most persevering and the kindest earthly attentions, how can you look at them without self-reproach and remorse, when you reflect that of their only solid interests, their soul's interests, their eternal interests, you are regardless, and that, if not by open and avowed attempts, at least by the tenor of your conduct, you are contributing to confirm them and sink them deeper and deeper in forgetfulness of God, in worldliness, in false peace, in spiritual lethargy? Ah, you cannot suppose that the blessing of Providence rests on your tabernacles; you cannot say that the comforts of Divine grace refresh your hearts. Where is there now with you that indescribable peace which is felt, where is that voice of rejoicing and of salvation which is heard, in the dwellings of the righteous? Where have you principles which will bear up and solace your minds when the dark hour of trouble shall come upon you? Where will you be able to find any views, or consolations, or prospects, to comfort you, when death shall come in between you, and bid you part? May the God of mercy turn your hearts aright to himself, and to each other, that, instead of being mutual snares, you may be mutual monitors, and be brought to live together as heirs of the grace of God, that your prayers be not hindered. When believers are unhappily connected with unbelieving partners, their situation is trying, but not hopeless. Let them cherish and manifest a spirit of love, dutifulness, prudence, and good temper. Let them be on the watch for likely means of doing their partners good, and let them never faint in bringing their case before God in their secret prayers. How glad will they be if these means prove successful!—and there is good reason to hope that they may. "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt not save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt not save thy wife?" Greatly blessed, indeed, is the conjugal relation, when both parties are righteous before God. Not all the society on earth can do so much for human happiness, as such an union is capable of effecting. One in interest, one in affection, one in God and in Christ, whether health and youth light up their countenance, or disease and years dim their eye and wither their bloom; whatever, in short, may befall them, every thing renders them more interesting to each other in life, and every thing is ripening them for the glory that is to be revealed. Well may we congratulate those who are in this condition; and well may they be encouraged to study to walk in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord blameless;—well may they, as long as God shall spare them together here, pass on cheerfully hand in hand; for far more blessed still they shall both be, where care and sorrow, and sin and separation, shall be unknown,—where "they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels in heaven."—REV. JAMES FOOTE. (Lectures on the Gospel according to Luke.)

I am too unworthy to sit down at the Lord's Table.—The fact is this, the more unworthy we feel ourselves, while we are striving to serve and to please God, the more fit we are to come to the Lord's Supper. A deep sense of our unworthiness is the very essence of that humility which all should possess when we partake of this holy ordinance. If we wait until we are worthy, we shall never come. God, who knows that we are sinners, invites us to come as such, that we may find our worthiness in Christ, who is "the end of the Law for righteousness to every one that believeth." The man who hesitates to approach the Lord's table for such a reason as that of which we are now speaking, is like a person who would say—"I am too poor to accept the gold that would enrich me; I am too sick to take the medicine that will restore me." The centurion, who is spoken of in Matt. viii. 8, was of a better mind than this; he felt that his deep conviction of his own unworthiness, whilst it infused a spirit of genuine humility into his prayer, was no valid reason why he should not appeal to the mercy of the Saviour to heal his servant. He knew that what Christ required was not merit, but faith—that what he should appeal to was not justice, but mercy; and thus, whilst we feel that we are altogether unworthy, we should never allow this to keep us back from this most comfortable sacrament, but should manifest that feeling in our language and deportment when we communicate.—THE REV. DANIEL BAGOT. (A Treatise on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.)

ON THE DEATH OF A MINISTER CUT OFF IN HIS USEFULNESS.

Go to the grave in all thy glorious prime,
In full activity of zeal and power;
A Christian cannot die before his time—
The Lord's appointment is the servant's hour.

Go to the grave; at noon from labour cease;
Rest on thy sheaves, thy harvest task is done;
Come from the heart of battle, and in peace
Soldier, go home—with thee the fight is won.

Go to the grave; though like a fallen tree,
At once with verdure, flowers, and fruitage crown'd,
Thy form may perish, and thine honours be Lost in the mouldering bosom of the ground;—

Go to the grave, which, faithful to its trust,
The germ of immortality shall keep;
While, safe as watch'd by cherubim, thy dust
Shall to the judgment-day in Jesus sleep.

Go to the grave, for there thy Saviour lay
In Death's embraces, ere He rose on high;
And all the ransom'd, by that narrow way,
Pass to eternal life beyond the sky.

Go to the grave:—no, take thy seat above
Be the pure spirit present with the Lord,
Where thou for faith and hope hast perfect love,
And open vision for the written Word.

MONTGOMERY.

THE CASE OF HAZAEL.

BY THE REV. GEORGE BURNS, D. D.,

Minister of Tweedsmuir, Peebles-shire.

SEE 2 KINGS viii. 7-16.

HAZAEI, one of the chief men of the Syrian Court, was sent by the King charged with an important message to Elisha, an illustrious prophet of God. Softened by the acuteness of disease, and under the influence of that temporary seriousness which is generally produced by the gloom of affliction, the King, though the determined enemy of "the man of God," was led to consult him concerning the issue of a distemper under which he laboured. Hazael, the messenger, appeared in the presence of the prophet in a most respectful attitude, and, presenting the costly gifts with which the King had intrusted him, he intimated the wish of his royal master in the humblest and most unassuming language. The answer returned by the prophet to the request of the King was expressed in the most delicate and apparently ambiguous terms; but the result of the conference too plainly intimated, that the throne of Syria would soon change its possessor. During the interview, Elisha darted a significant look on the countenance of Hazael, and anticipating, by a prophetic spirit, the scenes of oppression and bloodshed which would darken the future days of his life, on a sudden, the dignified aspect of the man of God assumed the mildness of condescending benevolence, his heart wrung with anguish, and he gave vent to his feelings in a flood of tears. Hazeel, unconscious of any thing in himself, or in the language which he had uttered, calculated to excite such emotions, with feelings of surprise and agitation, inquired into the causes which had produced this unexpected change in the prophet's appearance and manner. "And Hazeel said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their woman with child." The very thought of being the perpetrator of such execrable deeds made the spirit of Hazeel revolt with horror. In such detestation did he hold these acts of monstrous cruelty, that he could not for one moment harbour the thought, that a man could be so lost to every generous feeling by which the human is exalted above the brutal nature, as, in any circumstances, to be brought to commit them. "But what!" says he, "is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" The prophet of God, however, knew his heart better than he knew it himself, and foresaw that he would actually commit those atrocious deeds, the very name of which made him shudder.

In this short but striking narrative we behold an awful representation of the gradual and insidious progress of vice. No man becomes altogether abandoned at once; he is prepared by degrees for the last acts of enormity. The cloud which appeared small as a man's hand, gradually increases, till it blackens the whole horizon. Men, whose characters at one period could not be sullied even by the breath of calumny, become at length the finished pictures of depravity; and sensibilities, once so delicate as to shrink from the touch of vice, become at last hardened to insensibility, and prepared to succeed, "with no compunctious visitings of nature," atrocities of the most diabolical kind. Hazeel, who shuddered at the thought of committing murder and rapine, becomes the perpetrator of both, in their most malignant form.

In addition to the original propensity to evil in every human heart, there is either in the constitution of man, in the nature of vice, or in their mutual influence, such a tendency to repetition, that a succession of crimes seldom fails to accompany one sinful compliance. To deliver from urgent distress, an act of injustice has often been resorted to; but it has called for repetition in circumstances less distressing, and has ultimately become a common vice. The man whose schemes of fraud have succeeded in one instance, is incited to use them again, by the hope of similar success; and the infatuated being whose compliance has once been given to the call of temptation, becomes in future a slave to its propelling violence; and, like the insect entangled in its own web, every effort which he makes to procure his freedom only twines him closer, and renders emancipation more difficult. Witness David, who, by a delusive hope of saving himself from infamy, was led to imbrue his hands in blood; and Judas, who, by yielding to the calls of avarice, was led on to acts of the most diabolical hypocrisy, ingratitude, and treachery. The jaundiced eye contemplates every object through a vitiated medium, and were its decisions to be relied on, as of unquestionable accuracy, the most erroneous conclusions would be formed concerning the colour of external bodies. In like manner, the man who denies or overlooks the total corruption of human nature, contemplates sin with no feelings of detestation; because his judgment, being overspread with its defilement, takes partial views of its nature, and gives false decisions concerning its effects. He is not aware of the native bias of the will, and of the nature of those objects by which its movements may be directed, and therefore, giving full sway to its own inclinations, he leaves it uncontrolled by any higher influence. Imagining that all is well, if "his heart does not reproach him," "a deceived heart" frequently "turns him aside." Nay, before he is aware, lawless passions may have gained a fatal triumph over his better principles; the sparks of unhallowed fire, which lay concealed in his bosom, may have been kindled by the approach of surrounding temptation; the flame may be fanned by every successive gust of passion, and the deluded man, whilst dreaming only of security, may be overwhelmed with hopeless desolation. What can be conceived more natural, than that ignorance should be followed by delusion; and that those who are not aware of their danger should rush headlong on destruction? What can be more rational than the belief, that those who deny the total corruption of human nature should feel no solicitude about the dangers of temptation; that those who overlook the numerous artifices which passion devises, in order to gain its object, should frequently be off their guard, and consequently, led into the most fatal errors; and that those who are not aware of the succession of crimes to which one act of wickedness insensibly leads, should be carried along from one violation of the divine law to another, soothed in their indulgence by a feeble determination to stop in their career, or to reform their manners, and thus brought in the end to complete the character of depravity? When Hazeel addressed the prophet in these words, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" he was evidently a stranger to his own heart. He relied on it as an unerring guide, and imagined it a thing utterly beyond the reach of possibility that his feelings could so far betray him as to yield no resistance to the commission of crimes which he viewed in anticipation with feelings of horror. Deluded man! He was soon taught, by mournful experience, the treachery of the human heart, and the imbecility of the firmest resolutions.

Inadequate conceptions of the fascination of vice, in its different aspects and modes of operation, must tend in a very high degree to facilitate its progress over the affections and conduct of men. If a man is ignorant of the power which sin, in all its forms, has over his depraved heart; if he is not aware of the predominant passions of his soul, and the consequent influence of temptations specially addressed to them; or if his condition in life has been almost uniformly the same, and, consequently, has afforded him no opportunity of ascertaining those latent tendencies which a change of circumstances would detect and expose;—he will imagine himself proof against every assault of temptation, he will be assailed with no fears about his safety, even when his destruction is inevitable, and his blood will be chilled at the mention of crimes which he is about to perpetrate without one thrill of remorse. The hour of temptation is the hour of trial. That man who, in the calm season of retirement and of serious thought, trembles at the very appearance of evil, may, in the hour of temptation, fall an easy prey to the enemy, and become at last an awful monument of the ravages of temptation. Let us imagine for a moment that we contemplate a man destined to be deluded to his ruin by the fascination of vice. Having passed the former years of his life in the bosom of domestic peace and rural solitude, and having no adequate conceptions of the power of temptation, he imagines himself resolute against every encroachment of evil. He comes forth into the gay scenes of life, and is presented with allurements which, till now, he was not called to resist. Reflection being expelled by the enchantments of vice, and "the small still voice" of conscience being silenced by the calls of temptation, no resistance is opposed to the progress of evil. Mark the deluded man in this trying situation. One step must seal his triumph or his ruin. He pauses for a few moments, like the insect fluttering round the flame, but soon, like the same insect, he owes his destruction to the dazzling object. Witness Hazael, the King of Syria. When, in the calm moments of reflection, and in humbler circumstances of life, he placed before the view of his mind those deeds of monstrous cruelty which, according to the declaration of the prophet, were to disgrace his character and to cover his name with imperishable infamy, he shuddered at their enormity; but when his strongest passions came to be stimulated, when the circumstances of his life underwent a change, and when the attractive influence of vice happened to intervene, he hesitated not to commit them all. Thus, inadequate conceptions of the influence of sin tend to promote its progress; and thus are men brought, by a change in their condition, to perpetrate crimes concerning which they might lately have said, with Hazael, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?"

Let us beware then, of the beginnings of sin. We have seen that the progress of vice is gradual and insidious, and that the complete character of depravity is formed by slow and imperceptible degrees. Ask the murderer how he came to imbrue his hands in blood. He will tell you that it was by slow degrees. At first he indulged a selfish, peevish, and fretful humour. Habits insensibly grew upon him, and at length in an evil hour, passion rose superior to reflection, revenge fired his whole soul, and murder, attended with every complicated act of barbarity, was the fatal consequence. Take, in short, any character now infamous, and the history of his progress in guilt, were he to tell it you, would be the same. To what lengths we may be carried by yielding to temptation in a single instance, it is impossible for us to know; but of one thing we are certain, that it is easier to hold fast our integrity, than to recover it after it is gone. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye that are accustomed to do evil, learn to do well." Let the young who are as yet unhackneyed in the ways of vice, tremble for their virtue; let them guard every avenue to temptation; let them shrink with horror from the very appearance of evil.

In fine, "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." Among those who are now sunk in vice, or who have apostatized from the faith of the Gospel, are some whose circumstances were once as favourable, and whose prospects were once as flattering as ours can possibly be. Behold that emaciated form,—that clouded brow,—these trembling limbs! It is a fellow-creature; it is the sad spectacle which a being ruined by vice seldom fails to present. He came from the bosom of a parent's family, where he was accustomed to receive religious instruction, and to contemplate an example of piety. He had a conscience which smote him when he did evil; he had a cheek which used to redden with the blush of modesty; he had a heart which was open to every generous and devout impression. He came, however, into the busy scenes of life, met with thoughtless companions, was induced to join the jovial circle, and was soon initiated in all the arts of fashionable dissipation. Now, having made the tour of pleasure, the moments of reflection are arrived, and the gay scenes of life are fled for ever. From whence can he now derive consolation? Can he look with pleasure on creation around him? He is condemned by every orb of the firmament; he is arraigned by every beast of the field. Can his misery be alleviated by the approbation of his own mind? He is convicted by reason and by conscience, of having disregarded their most reasonable remonstrances; the remembrance of the past harrows up his soul, and the prospect of the future fills him with horror. "His own wickedness" now "corrects him, and his backslidings" now "reprove him." "What fruit has he in those things whereof he is now ashamed?" for the end of these things is death." But, why select for illustration an example of such dreadful profligacy? Let us look around us for a moment, and we cannot fail to behold many whose professions of religion were of the most glaring kind, and concerning the justness of whose pretensions to the character of Christians, it would have been reckoned an egregious breach of charity to have harboured a suspicion, who have either renounced their holy calling by open apostasy, or are so overspread with imperfections, as to injure the cause which they profess to support. Let those who imagine that their "mountain stands strong, and that they can never be moved;" instead of glorying in their own strength, or exulting over the failings of others, remember that they too, are surrounded with infirmities, that their own strength is only weakness, and that it is only "through Christ strengthening them, that they can do all things." "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." Implore with importunity and earnestness, that "grace of God, wherein ye may stand and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." "Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever, Amen."

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

No. IX.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D.D.,

Minister of Cramond, Mid-Lothian.

"These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."—JOHN xvi. 33.

THEY who are strangers to the power of godliness, and seeking their happiness from the world, are often prejudiced against a godly life, as if it were something gloomy, and unfriendly to joy. In answer to this objection,—they who have tasted that the Lord is gracious, can testify from their own experience, that the charge is false. On the contrary, the faith of the Gospel is the source of peace exalted, and everlasting joy,—a joy in comparison with which all other joys deserve not once to be named. It is the want of godliness, and not the possession of it, that leads to gloom, and sorrow, and despair. It is not asserted that a life of godliness is exempted from trial and trouble. Such an assertion would be at variance with Scripture, and with the experience of the people of God in all ages. This, however, may be asserted in strict accordance with truth, that the state of a Christian, under the heaviest pressure of affliction, is preferable by far to that of an ungodly man in the most favourable circumstances in which he can be placed. For the afflictions of the godly are the chastenings of their heavenly Father for their good; and though not for the present joyous, but grievous, they work out for them a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory. This is the view of the matter given us, in the portion of Scripture quoted at the head of this Paper. In it there are contained three important statements. First, That one great object of the discourse of which these words are a part, was that they might in Him enjoy true peace of mind. Second, That his disciples must lay their account with tribulation in this world. Third, That, under all their trials they might find a source of comfort from the consideration of his having overcome the world. It is to the second and third of these statements that our attention may be profitably directed for illustrating the experience of Christians when under trials and troubles.

It may be mentioned, first of all, here, that Christians have within themselves one of the chief sources of their troubles, and one that will not cease to annoy them so long as they are in this world. That is the sin that dwelleth in them. But, intending to treat of this case of Christian experience in a separate Paper, I pass over it at present, and go on to observe, that another source of trial and trouble to Christians, in this world, is from the temptations of the wicked one. He tried his utmost efforts against our Lord himself, while he sojourned on earth in our nature; and he ceases not to do what in him lies to defeat the purpose for which Christ came into the world. His first object is, if possible, to prevent men from coming to Christ, that they may be saved; and his second object is, to give all manner of annoyance to those who do believe in Christ, that, if he cannot pluck them out of Christ's hands, he may draw them into transgression and backsliding, and so bring scandal upon the Christian name. And he assaults us with greater hope of success than he could have in the case of our Lord. "The prince of this world cometh," said Christ, "and hath nothing in me." But when he comes to us, he expects to find something in us that will be favourable to his purpose; and if he knew where the weak side is, thither will he bend his strongest efforts. He watches for our halting, and is ready to avail himself of every favourable opportunity of making his assaults. And hence are there so many warnings given us in Scripture, to be on our guard against his artful devices, and to take to ourselves the whole armour of God, that we may quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one. It would far exceed the bounds to which I mean to confine myself at present, to mention all the various ways in which Satan attempts to shake the faith, and disturb the peace, of Christians. In many cases it may not be easy to distinguish the agency of Satan from the working of corruption in our hearts. And sometimes his assaults are most successful when his agency appears least; when his messenger is an ungodly person, it may be a friend or companion. There are some temptations again, that seem more evidently to emanate from Satan himself. As those are suggestions which lead men to question the being of God, or blasphemous thoughts coming suddenly into the minds of those who are seriously disposed, or the idea that all professions of religion are delusion, or that they have no interest in the favour of God, that the door of mercy is for ever shut against them, or an impulse strongly urging them to destroy themselves, and such like horrid suggestions. All such suggestions have so much of the venom of that old and crooked serpent, that they should be at once rejected with abhorrence; and the tempted should say in such cases, with our Lord when he was tempted, "Get thee behind me, Satan; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men." Now, it is a source of great annoyance to Christians to have such evil thoughts presented to them, even when, by the grace of God, they are enabled to cast them out and overcome them. But it is a source of much deeper distress to them, when, through want of watchfulness and neglect on their part, they are permitted to fall before temptation, and Satan gets a temporary advantage over them. But observe what encouragement Christ addresses to them, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." He hath also overcome the wicked one; and "in that he hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour those who are tempted." Here, then, Christians are taught where their strength lies. Christ, their Lord and Master, knows all the trials and temptations to which they are exposed, and he sympathizes with them, and he is near to give them help in the time of need. "My grace is sufficient for thee. My strength is made perfect in weakness." Christians have found it to be so in their experience, that when the enemy threatened to break in upon them, like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord lifted up a standard against him; that when they were weak (that is, in themselves), then they were strong (that is, in the Lord). Yea, even their falls, though a cause of bitter regret and deep humiliation, have been overruled for their good. They have been led, by means of them, to a deeper insight into the corruption of their own hearts, and to know something more of the wiles of Satan; they have been led to greater watchfulness and to greater earnestness in prayer, that God would not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able; and that, with every temptation, he would provide a way for their escape—that they may be able to bear it.

Again, Christians will have tribulation in this world from the reproaches and persecution of the ungodly. Thus it was eminently with the apostles, to whom the words quoted at the head of this Paper were originally addressed. Our Lord knew well to what severe trials they were soon to be exposed; and he had repeatedly warned them that, in becoming his disciples, they must lay their account with drawing down upon themselves the hatred of the world. "If they were of the world, the world would love its own; but because they were not of the world, and because he had chosen them out of the world, therefore the world hated them. "But blessed," said he, "are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." "And blessed," said he, "are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for so persecuted they the prophets that were before you. The disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord. If they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also; yea, the time cometh, when men shall think they do God service by putting you to death." These things he told them beforehand, that, when they came to pass according to what he had foretold, they might believe that he was what he had declared himself to be—the Son of God and the Saviour of sinners. But, as they were in a peculiar manner called to endure such trials, so they were in a peculiar manner strengthened to bear up under such trials. In later times, the mode of attack upon the followers of Christ by the ungodly has been changed. It is not so much conducted in the way of open attacks of violence, but more in the way of secret whispering and backbiting. But still the enmity of the world against the truth, and those who openly profess the truth, remains unchanged; and, should the materials which keep it down be removed, it would burst forth again into open violence. Christians, then, are still exposed, in one form or another, to the reproach of the Cross; and, although they are supported under it, they feel it keenly. Yea, our Lord himself experienced its bitterness: "The reproaches of them that reproached thee have fallen upon me. I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people. All they that see me laugh me to scorn. They shoot out the lip; they shake the head." But herein consists one great source of support to Christians, under all the reproaches to which they may be exposed for the sake of Christ—that they are treading in the steps in which their Lord and Master has gone before them; and may, therefore, rest assured of his sympathy, and his all-sustaining arm to support and to deliver.

There are various other sources of tribulation in this world, such as bodily affliction, the loss of near and dear relatives and friends, reverses in outward circumstances, and those fears to which even Christians may sometimes be exposed on the near approach of death. On these, it is not intended to dwell at present; but to speak more particularly of the consolation and support provided for Christians, under these and all other kinds of tribulations, in this world.

"Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." "Be of good cheer!" O how much is contained in these words! Had they been addressed to one in great perplexity or in deep distress, even by an earthly friend, they would have a soothing, encouraging, and animating effect upon the afflicted person. He would naturally conclude, that his friend was the bearer of good tidings; that he had something to communicate that was peculiarly adapted to his circumstances—something that would prove a balm of consolation to his wounded spirit; but how much more may we be assured of this, when we know that these words proceeded from the mouth of Him who "spoke as never man spake; who hath the tongue of the learned, and knows how to speak a word in season to them that are weary;" who came into this world for the very purpose of "comforting them that mourn, to bind up the broken-hearted, to appoint to them that mourn in Zion beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for grief, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;" when we know that they are the words of Him who is full of tender compassion, who will "not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax, till he bring forth judgment unto victory;" and who, while he is full of compassion, has all the means in his power of giving effectual support to the afflicted. When Christ, then, says, "Be of good cheer," that of itself, although he had said nothing more, might well make glad the hearts of those to whom it was addressed, and assure them that their mourning should be turned into joy.

But observe farther, that, for their more abundant consolation, he puts them in mind of the ground on which they might be of good cheer, in the midst of all their tribulations in this world. "Be ye of good cheer," saith he, "because I have overcome the world." This is a source of consolation to his people under tribulation, as it puts them in mind that Christ was himself exposed to the same tribulations, and thus they are to be animated by his example, to bear up under them as he did; because Christ having gone through the same trials, will assuredly sympathize with them; because his victory over the world is a pledge of their victory. It was their battle he was fighting, and it was as their Head that he overcame; and the living Head, having thus overcome, will not permit any of the members of his mystical body to be subdued by their enemies, but will effectually provide that they also shall overcome. And finally, Christ, having overcome the world, knows what grace and strength are needed for the combat; and having all fulness in himself, will assuredly communicate all that he knows to be needful for their consolation and support. When he says, then, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," it is in effect saying to them, "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be. My grace is sufficient for thee; my strength is perfected in weakness. Fear not, for I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, amen; and have the keys of hell and of death."

How truly blessed are they who, in believing on Christ, become partakers of the consolations of the Gospel! In the midst of all their trials and troubles, they have a peace and joy "which the world can neither give nor take away." They are sorrowing, it may be, yet always rejoicing; they may even "glory in tribulation; knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience, experience; and experience, hope: and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." And all that peace, and consolation, and joy, of which they are partakers in this world, is but the pledge and earnest of that perfect peace, and blessedness, and glory, which shall be their everlasting, unchangeable, and all-satisfying portion in the world to come. Blessed, surely, is the people who are in such a case; yea, "happy is the people whose God is the Lord!"

But, on the other hand, how sad is the case of those who are strangers to the consolations of the Gospel! Whither can they go for comfort and support, when under trial and trouble? All the streams of earthly comfort are muddy, as the source from which they spring. They are unsatisfactory, at the best; having a vanity and emptiness in them that cannot satisfy the wants and desires of the soul. They are held by a very uncertain tenure; none can have the certain assurance of the possession of them for any length of time; and what stamps vanity upon them all, is, that in a few years, at most, we must bid farewell to them all for ever. What is this world, and all its enjoyments, to a man on his death-bed? He sees it all vanishing away, as a dream of the night, or as a tale that has been told. They, then, who are seeking their comfort from this world only, must lay their account with many bitter disappointments, even now; and at death they must be miserable and hopeless. Their "gods are taken from them; and what have they more?"

NOTES OF THE LAST ILLNESS OF MRS HEMANS.

"For she was born beyond the stars to soar,
And kindling at the source of life, adore."

Our readers will no doubt feel a deep interest in the following account of the last hours of a distinguished poetess, which has recently appeared in the Evangelical Magazine, and which we gladly extract from the pages of that periodical.

It is peculiarly delightful to the intelligent and devout mind to learn, in any instance, that an individual possessed of superior acquirements, and pre-eminent talent, is under the influence of the grace of the Gospel, and that that individual enters eternity, reposing unlimited confidence in the love and atonement of the Redeemer; and when this person is one who exerts a commanding power over his age, as a writer, whether in prose or poetry, it is most refreshing to ascertain that the divinity of the Christian religion is recognised; that the claims of that religion are felt; that the preciousness of that religion is experienced; and that, in the dying hour, the supports of that religion are enjoyed.

Few writers of the age, it is obvious, have imparted so much pleasure to persons of cultivated minds, poetic taste and sensibility, in every district of the land, as the late Mrs Hemans; and in the productions of few female authors do we find more beautiful specimens of polished language, vigorous imagination, graceful, tender, and glowing thought. The versification of her poems, the imagery employed, the range of subjects, and the vivid and impressive manner in which her principal compositions are penned, combine to render her one of the most captivating and influential writers of the British empire. How delightful, then, is it for the Christian to be able to cherish the hope that, during her last illness, she was brought effectually to the Saviour, and that, when she expired, she died calmly and happily in the Lord,

——— "Soaring to the world
Of light, and fadeless joys above."

A few concise notes, to exemplify the correctness of these observations, may prove interesting and beneficial to every enlightened believer in Jesus who peruses these pages, and may augment the gratification of those who often read her exquisite poems—"A Domestic Scene," "The Graves of a Household," "The Better Land," "The Silent Multitude."

Shortly after her arrival in Ireland, where Mrs Hemans died, she was extremely unwell. When among the mountain scenery of the fine county of Wicklow, during a storm, she was struck by one beautiful effect on the hills: it was produced by a rainbow diving down into a gloomy mountain-pass, which it seemed really to flood with its coloured glory. "I could not help thinking," she remarked, "that it was like our religion piercing and carrying brightness into the depth of sorrow, and of the tomb." All the rest of the scene around that one illuminating spot was wrapt in the profoundest darkness.

During her last illness, Mrs Hemans delighted in the study of sacred literature, and particularly in the writings of some of our old and choice divines. This became her predominant taste, and it is mentioned respecting her, that the diligent and earnest perusal of the Holy Scriptures was a well-spring of daily and increasing comfort. She now contemplated her afflictions in the right manner, and through the only true and reconciling medium, "and that relief from sorrow and suffering, for which she had been apt to turn to the fictitious world of imagination, was now afforded her by calm and constant meditation on what alone can be called 'the things that are.'"

When the cholera was raging in Dublin, she wrote to a dear relative,—“To me there is something extremely solemn, something which at once awes and calms the spirit, instead of agitating it, in the presence of this viewless danger, between which and ourselves we cannot but feel that the only barrier is the mercy of God. I never felt so penetrated by the sense of an entire dependence upon Him, and though I adopt some necessary precautions on account of Charles (her son), my mind is in a state of entire serenity.”

While the work of decay was going on surely and progressively, with regard to the earthly tabernacle, the bright flame within continued to burn with a steady and holy light, and, at times, even to flash forth with more than wonted brightness. On one occasion she finely expresses herself, when there was a favourable change in her condition,—“Better far than these indications of recovery is the sweet religious peace which I feel gradually overshadowing me, with its dove-pinions, excluding all that would exclude thoughts of God.”

This gifted lady wrote, with peculiar beauty, on another occasion, "I wish I could convey to you the deep feelings of repose and thankfulness with which I lay, on Friday evening, gazing from my sofa upon a sunset-sky of the richest suffusions, silvery green and amber kindling into the most glorious tints of the burning rose. I felt its holy beauty sinking through my inmost being, with an influence drawing me nearer and nearer to God."

Her confidential attendant, a most interesting young female, devotedly attached to her mistress, expressed herself respecting her in the following delightful and impressive manner:—"It may well be said this was not her rest. She ever seemed to me as a wanderer from her heavenly Father's mansion, who knew too much of that home to seek a resting-place here. She often said to me, 'I feel like a tired child, wearied and longing to mingle with the pure in heart.' At other times she would say, 'I feel as if I were sitting with Mary at the feet of my Redeemer, hearing the music of his voice, and learning of him to be meek and lowly;' and then she would say, 'Oh, Anna, do not you love your kind Saviour? The plan of redemption was, indeed, a glorious one; humility was, indeed, the crowning work. I am like a quiet babe at his feet, and yet my spirit is full of his strength. When any body speaks of his love to me, I feel as if they spoke too slow; my spirit can mount alone with Him into those blissful realms with far more rapidity.'"

The sufferings of Mrs Hemans, prior to death, were most severe and agonising, but all were borne in the most uncomplaining manner. Never was her mind overshadowed by gloom: never would she allow those around her to speak of her condition as one deserving of commiseration. Her sister finely remarks, "The dark and silent chamber seemed illumined by light from above, and cheered with songs of angels, and she would say, that, in her intervals from pain, no poetry could express, nor imagination conceive, the visions of blessedness that fitted across her fancy, and made her waking hours more delightful than those even that were given to temporary repose."

At times her spirit would appear to be already half etherealized. Her mind would seem to be fraught with deep, and holy, and incommunicable thoughts, and she would entreat to be left perfectly alone, in stillness and darkness, to commune with her own heart, and reflect on the mercies of her Saviour. She continually spoke of the unutterable comfort which she derived from dwelling on the contemplation of the atonement, and stated that this alone was her rod and staff, when all earthly supports were failing.

In the heaviest affliction, she desired the assurance to be given to one of her friends, that the tenderness and affectionateness of the Redeemer's character, which they had often contemplated together, was a source, not merely of reliance, but of positive happiness, to her—

"The sweetness of her couch."

The powers of memory, for which Mrs Hemans had always been so remarkable, shone forth with increased brightness while her outward frame was so visibly decaying. She would lie for hours without speaking or moving, repeating to herself whole chapters of the Bible, and page after page of Milton and Wordsworth.

The conviction of the inestimable value of affliction, as the discipline of Heaven, was ever present to her mind, mingled with the deepest humility, the most entire resignation, an equal readiness to live or die, a saying with the whole heart, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord. Be it unto me according to thy word."

"I feel," she would say, "as if hovering between heaven and earth;" and she seemed so raised towards the sky, that all worldly things were obscured and diminished to her view, while the ineffable glories of eternity dawned upon it more and more brightly.

In her physician, Dr Croker, Mrs Hemans was wont to say, she had at once a physician and a pastor. He frequently read to her from a little book which she dearly loved, and which he had first made known to her—a selection from the works of Archbishop Leighton. The last time of her listening to it, she repeatedly exclaimed, "Beautiful! beautiful!" and, with her eyes upraised, she appeared occupied in communing with herself, and mentally praying.

When her spirit was nearly gone, she said to her darling Charles, and her faithful sister Anna, that she felt all at peace within her bosom. Her calmness continued unbroken till, at nine o'clock, on the evening of Saturday, May 16, 1835, her spirit passed away, without pain, or the endurance of a struggle, and the pleasing hope is cherished, was translated, through the mediation of her blessed Redeemer, to that uninterrupted "rest which remaineth for the people of God."

The remains of this gifted lady were deposited in a vault beneath St Anne's Church, in Dublin, almost close to the house where she died. A small tablet was placed above the spot where she lies, inscribed with her name, her age, and the date of her death, and with the following lines, from a dirge of her own:—

"Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit, rest thee now;
E'en while with us thy footsteps trode,
Ere seal was on thy brow.
Dust, to its narrow house beneath
Soul, to its place on high:
They that have seen thy look in death,
No more may fear to die."

THE PILGRIM'S SONG.

My rest is in heaven, my rest is not here,
Then why should I tremble when trials are near?
Be hushed, my dark spirit, the worst that can come
But shortens thy journey, and hastens these home.

It is not for me to be seeking my bliss,
Or building my hopes in a region like this;
I look for a city that hands have not piled,
I pant for a country by sin undefiled.

The thorn and the thistle around me may grow,
I would not lie down upon roses below;
I ask not a portion, I seek not a rest,
Till I find them for ever on Jesus's breast.

Afflictions may press me, they cannot destroy,
One glimpse of his love turns them all into joy;
And the bitterest tears, if he smile but on them,
Like dew in the sunshine, grow diamond and gem.

Let doubt, then, and danger, my progress oppose,
They only make heaven more sweet at the close;
Come joy or come sorrow, whate'er may befall,
An hour with my God will make up for them all.

A scrip on my back, and a staff in my hand,
I march on in haste through an enemy's land;
The road may be rough, but it cannot be long,
And I'll smooth it with hope, and cheer it with song.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

THE Third Volume of "Eastern Manners, Illustrative of the Old and New Testament,"* has just issued from the pen of our able and accomplished correspondent, Mr Jamieson of Currie. The extent of reading and research which the author brings to bear upon the elucidation of the Sacred Writings, is truly astonishing; and we think the present is equal, if not in some respects superior, to the two former volumes. The following we select as specimens of the work:—

I.—THE MYSTIC BOOK OF THE REVELATIONS.

The mystic book which John saw in the hand of Him that sat upon the throne, contained the revelations he was to write concerning the things that were hereafter to be; and to show the solemnity and truth of the matters comprised in it, it is represented as having been previously written and registered in heaven, and as being in the hand of God the Father, from whose wisdom and love the whole scheme of the divine government originated. (Rev. v. 1.) The description given of the form of this book is very peculiar,—totally unlike any way of doing up volumes with which we are acquainted; and in order to make it intelligible, we must remind the reader, that, according to the universal custom of the ancients, books were not formed of sheets of paper folded and cut into leaves as amongst us, but consisted of several pieces of parchment put together, so as to make one roll. In regard to the peculiar form of them, it is not difficult to conceive how a book might be folded up to a certain extent on a roller, and then sealed; after that another part might be partially rolled up and sealed, and so on, till the whole was wrapped round the wooden roller and sealed, by which means the opening of the first seal would only exhibit that part of the writing which belonged to it, and there would be no reading of the remainder till the second seal was broken, and so on. Imagine a map, which is usually wrapped round a piece of wood in the form of a cylinder, to be rolled once or twice round the timber, and then sealed. Imagine a second wrapping for the same number of times, and then the seal to be applied in the same way. Imagine a third, and a fourth wrapping to be made in succession, and the process to be repeated till there had been seven different wrappings,—each of them at the point you halted at stamped with a separate impression of a seal. Finally, imagine this map to be a book, and you will have a distinct idea of what John saw in vision, and how one seal might be broken, and the part to which it was attached unfolded and read, while the seals that fastened the other parts which were under, kept their contents in profound secrecy. By this structure of the volume, the whole of its matter, until the seals were broken, would be concealed; for as the writing was only on one side, the outer case of the scroll would afford no insight into what it contained; and when it is considered that those manuscript rolls were often fifty feet in length, it is evident that one of them would admit of several seals being interposed, and might contain also, within the parts so divided, a considerable portion of writing or paintings. The fastening by seven seals, which number was considered by the Jews and other Orientals as the emblem of perfection, indicated at once the great importance of the matter, and the deep obscurity in which the discoveries of this mystic book were enveloped, till a power adequate to open it should unseal the volume, and disclose the contents; and accordingly, although the seals have been broken, and the Divine purposes recorded by the revelations of John, no part of it has ever been clearly understood, till Providence, by the course of his dispensations, unfolds the deep mystery. The seals being fastened on each separate and successive part, betokened that the veil of obscurity rested not on one only, but on every part alike; and as no single part of the book could be read, till the seal affixed to that portion was unloosed, so the procedure of God at any future period of the Church must remain a dark and inexplicable problem, until the finger of Providence shall throw light on the page of revelation.

II.—THE SIXTH TRUMPET.

The sounding of the sixth angel, which was followed by a command to loose the four angels who had been bound near the Euphrates, refers to the conquests made by the numerous tribes residing on the east side of that river, who, uniting under Othman, extended their ravages to the westward, dispossessed the Saracens of their dominions, which had lasted for three hundred and ninety-one years; and, after taking Constantinople, succeeded in laying, upon the ruins of the Roman empire, the extensive foundations of the modern kingdom of Turkey. The ravaging armies of those new hordes consisted chiefly of cavalry, on which reliance was principally placed in the middle ages; and in numbers, discipline, and military prowess, they were greatly superior to the people whose supremacy they supplanted. The description given of the appearance of this warlike force is remarkable. The astonished eye of the prophet seems to have been favoured with the representation of a Turkish army drawn up in order of battle; and as, in those wars of conquest, that people were the first of modern nations who changed the art of war by the use of gunpowder and fire-arms, John, whose curiosity was greatly excited by the strange, and to him unintelligible battle scene, so unlike to any thing he had ever known or heard of, describes it under a variety of images, the nearest in resemblance that his experience suggested, and the most natural to occur to a person in his circumstances. 'I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breast-plates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke, and brimstone. By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths. For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails; for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.' (verse 17, 18.) It is evident that fire, brimstone, and jacinth, could not have been the materials of which the breast-plates were formed, inasmuch as the smoke, fire, and brimstone, would have destroyed the life of the wearer, and jacinth would have afforded but a poor and insufficient defence against the sword of an impetuous assailant. The expressions are employed to indicate the colour rather than the materials of their military dress; and it is remarkable that, throughout the whole history of the Turkish empire, down to the present day, the uniform of their soldiers has been a mixture of scarlet, blue, and yellow cloth. They rode on horses; and, rushing on the field, as John saw them, with tremendous impetuosity and noise, these horsemen presented a most formidable aspect; the more especially, as they drew behind them huge pieces of cannon, which were, for the first time, applied to the purposes of war, and to the terrible execution of which, the Turks owed much of their astonishing and rapid success. The artillery, in those days, were instruments of such prodigious dimensions, that one of them required thirty or more horses to drag them along. One of them is even said to have been capable of carrying three hundred pounds weight; and, to indicate their terrific power, they were generally surmounted, according to the taste of the fourteenth century, by the device of a lion's head. Pieces of ordnance of such gigantic size and weight, were employed in demolishing fortresses and walls of cities; and no less than fourteen of them were brought to play in the memorable siege which ended in the reduction of Constantinople. Moreover, those symbolical horses, unlike the natural horse, whose chief weapon of offense is the mouth, had power both in their mouth and in their tails, just as if they had had two heads. They could attack, and do the work of destruction in two different quarters at once, and were on that account a more formidable kind of force than ever had been employed in battle before. 'To form some idea of what the prophet saw,' says an esteemed writer, 'we must conceive of a train of artillery dragged by horses, whose riders were armed with carabines or muskets, which, when discharged over the heads of the horses, to the view of the prophet, who never saw nor heard of any thing in war like it, must have appeared as if the fire and smoke had proceeded out of their mouths. The cannon must have appeared as the tail, and the device or lion's head as the mouth of the tail; and, when discharged, the fire, smoke, and sulphur, must have appeared as if they had proceeded from the tail. But this is not the whole of what is intended by the figure. The Saracen locusts had tails, and stings in their tails, which is to be understood of the corrupt doctrines which they propagated; for the prophet which teacheth lies, he is the tail.' And, in the same sense, we must consider the figure in this prophecy: for the Turks propagated the same destructive system of opinions with the Saracens. Whatever country they subjected to their arms, the religion of Mohammed was instantly established in it. They were generally more violent and bloody in their measures for its propagation and establishment, than their predecessors. This false system of faith and worship is the spurious brood of the old serpent: and, when the tails of these symbolical locusts are said to have been like unto serpents, the figure is the more descriptive of that wicked system which it is intended to symbolize.*

LOST FRIENDS.

BY MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

"Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!"
MRS HERMAN.

SURELY if the question were put to any of us individually,—“Whence is your chief earthly happiness derived?” the spontaneous answer of every intelligent being would be, “from the companionship of our friends.” We may have authority over our fellow-men, we may have fame and distinction in our day and generation, we may have gold exhaustless at will, but if we have no kindred hearts to sympathize with our own, we are poor, we are powerless, we are lonely, we are miserable. The entire animal kingdom are linked indissolubly together in the bonds of social community; the very beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air are impelled by strong instinct to seek out, and assist, and love one another. But in man, the same principle is exemplified in a nobler manner, and in a far higher degree. The soul is unseen and eternal; and though we may amuse our fancy, and gratify our taste, and exhaust our intellect on the thousand trifles of mere temporal duration, on these we refuse to rest the full weight of our interest and affections. How can an immaterial essence yield its wildest throbbings of delight, its fondest expectations, its most deeply seated emotions, to things inanimate and cold, but of dust and clay? No! The deathless spirit of love within us demands an object for its exercise similar in deathless endurance. It cries aloud for congeniality of nature and of aim; and the only refuge we can find is in the haven of friendship. There we live, there we move, there we centre all the overwhelming and mysterious tide of our purest thoughts and tenderest feelings. There we embark, as one freighting a stately vessel with choicest merchandise, all the untold treasury of our heart's measureless affection; and like him whose bark has gone forth to meet the calm and the tempest, we tremble for every breath, we grow pale at every cloud, in feverish anxiety, and dread of the coming storm. But the comparison ends here. For what is the amount of the possessions which the merchant consigns to the winds and waves (even supposing it comprises all his worldly substance whatever?) The mere dross of earth. While the soul that surrenders itself freely to the wide ocean of confiding attachment, hazards on the issue of the voyage—a state more precious ineffably than either sea or air could ever redeem. For what can the world give in exchange for the smiles of kindred happiness, the tears of kindred sorrow, the flush of kindred hopes, the ardour of kindred pursuits, the rapture of kindred meetings, the agony of kindred partings, the long days of thoughtful solicitude, the restless nights of dull despondency, the whole height and depth, and length and breadth of that exhaustless mine of immaterial gold which is lavished at the shrine of our loves and friendships? Ah! it is, indeed, a solemn thing to love and to be loved. It is to shake off the coil of our earthly nature, and rise to an ethereal atmosphere, to dignify our poor humanity, and anticipate the privileges of the disembodied and beatified—The heart is a sacred trust; and into whose keeping we surrender it, and what objects we admit into its sanctuary—these are thoughts of vital moment, for life and death are often suspended on the event.

Every one has friends, and every one can sympathize with the joys and pains so indissolubly connected with affection's exercise. But, alas! if it be true that all of us have friends, I fear the fact is equally universal that all of us have had friends who are now lost to us for ever.

"There is no union here of hearts
That finds not here an end!"

How many bosoms in every corner of the globe are heaving every day with the ready response to this mournful sentiment! Is there one who has spent though but a few brief summers on the shore of time, upon whose mind the world, as it really is, is just beginning to dawn, who cannot already reckon some one or more friends whose countenance beamed upon his infant years, now dark in the dust of the grave? Scarcely have we passed the portals of our greenest youth, when we are startled to miss some of those dear companions who began their pilgrimage along with us. They may not have been taken from our own immediate household, and so the blank is the less felt. But hardly has the wheel of time made another revolution, than, perchance, the arrow is aimed closer—it strikes home to our very heart,—a father or a mother—a brother or a sister, or if none of these, at least a favourite playmate, it may be the inmate, too, of our own happy dwelling, is hurried away to the tomb, and a new strange weight falls on our soul; and our eyes are dim with incessant weeping. But youth is buoyant; and the spirit of youth revives after a time, and looks up once more and smiles through the mist of its dispersing tears. Gradually the shadow fades from the brow, and hope blooms again; and we embark with fresh ardour in the manifold pursuits of which earth is the busy theatre. The changes of life, however, are still around us, though we have little leisure and no inclination to consider them. Still they are there, working their sure and silent way, and preparing to burst upon us with all the more power that we have been regardless of them so long. Youth is on the wane, and maturity is at hand—the maturity of age and reason. And Providence, in an unlooked-for moment, suddenly infuses a portion of bitter among the sweets of our cup, and then we start as from a long dream of unprofitable delusion. Imagination's fairy and phantom train drop, as it were, in an instant, into the dust of reality; the beautiful sunshine of Hope pales its splendour before the graver star of Truth; a blight has fallen upon the soul, that paralyzes its warmest energies; the heart sickens with disappointment; life assumes a new aspect; and a deeper tone is given to every thing under the sky. In how many instances is not this change wrought upon us by the loss of friends! True, we may have suffered their loss before; but the removal of those dear to us when we are young, and the same bereavement when we are older, produces consequences widely different and tenfold more severe. In a brief space, almost as it would seem in the lapse of a few days, a change has passed upon our whole temper and character, which no other physical agency could possibly have effected. Yes; Death is the grand teacher, the mighty master, that disenchant's creation of its bright and fleeting colours, that tames the wildest fancy, that dashes down the proudest ambition, that solemnizes the giddiest, that softens the rudest, that humbles the loftiest, that subdues the gayest: and, oh! above and beyond all the rest, Death (as brought near to us in the persons of our friends) is the great sanctifier of affection, that hallows with adorable power the deep mystery of our spirits' love. We may give our hearts to the living as warmly, as devotedly, as constantly as we please; but it is only when the grave has closed over its object that the tenderness of our attachment bursts forth in all its unspeakable fullness; it is only when the gay picturings of hope are exchanged for the melancholy broodings of memory; it is only when we survive our friends in faint and weary solitude; it is only when we love the dead, that we know properly what love can feel.

Ah! reader, let me ask you, Have you suffered the loss of any who were very dear to you, and do you not sympathize with these sentiments? Have you a father or a mother, a son or a daughter, a brother, a sister, or a friend, whom once you cherished upon earth, now shut out for ever from your sight beneath the churchyard sod, and is there not a yearning of affection over that lost one in your spirit now, that never possessed it while the bloom of life was around him? But, perhaps, yours has been a bereavement of another sort. Parents and kindred are still all around you; but she, the gentle being who was the star of your youth, the bride affianced of your future career, has withered away from your path, like a flower cut down in the dewy light of the morning. Alas! the cloud of grief which envelopes you is indeed a heavy one, and yours are tears whose fountain cannot be dried; for never again can the blossoms of a new love spring forth from the ashes of what is faded and gone. This is no idle dream: it is a truth attested by melancholy experience. The heart may have many friendships, but only one love. Oh! then, let none, in the thoughtlessness of light-hearted youth, or the cold worldly-mindedness of maturer years, ever attempt to depreciate the power of affection's first impression. There never yet was a soul, ennobled by the stamp of genius, who did not rear, at some period of his early life, a beauteous temple of love and hope, whose foundation, though but in the dust, had its summit reaching to the very skies! To this temple, bright and imperishable amid the thousand ruins that surround it, how often does the eye of memory involuntarily turn, as to some long-lost golden vale, which the time-worn mariner shall revisit no more! And, though every year is removing his dismantled bark farther and farther from the enchanted beacon, the glory that lingers around it seems only to increase with the distance that separates him from it. But the subject is too sacred for farther comment—

" 'Tis of the things
That lie in the heart as in a monument,
Faded and holy, not to be disturbed."

It has often been to me the subject of wondering meditation, that in so many instances the dead should be so soon forgotten. Even the most loving and the best beloved, with whom we have lived for years in close and endearing companionship, how soon their loss ceases to grieve us—how soon their memories pass almost quite away! This year they are beside us, breathing, speaking, smiling, weeping along with us in all the unaffected sympathy of congenial hearts; the next, they are lifeless, perished, lost, buried for ever out of our sight in the dismal cemetery. Did we love them? Yes, verily; and with our whole souls. Often, when we have looked upon them in their health and bloom, have we thought how, deprived of their presence, existence would be a sunless blank; and keeping death and separation far out of view, have we not sickened at the bare idea of sorrow or disease overtaking them, even for an hour? Did we love them? O yes, and with a tenderness of which we were ourselves at times almost ashamed, and eager to hide it within the recesses of our own bosoms. We did love them deeply, fondly, faithfully; and yet, we behold them no more; their places are lone by our boards and our hearths, the grave has received its victims—but still we look, we talk, we hope, we fear, we grieve, and we rejoice, very nearly as of yore. We mourned them a while, their remembrance was green on our souls, and we daily watered its silent garden with the showers of bitter sadness; but gradually, imperceptibly, the sacred impression abated, other objects arose to divert the current of our thoughts, and ere we were aware of our strange apostasy, the blessed, the beloved dead, had passed away (shall I say?) into oblivion. Unfathomable heart of man!—mysterious arrangement of Omniscience!—that what we love to distraction in life, we should be able to consign to forgetfulness in death.

Let no one tell me this is an exaggerated picture—its truth is attested by the most ordinary observation; and though, doubtless, there are seasons when the thought of lost friends rushes, with intense and solemn power, upon the soul even of the least contemplative—hours sad and solitary, when every image of present enjoyment is merged in the broodings of an all-absorbing memory; yet still, in as far as regards the general tenor of our feelings, it is with living and tangible objects that we seek most to be associated; and while nothing can be more demonstrative than this, of the character of man as a social being, what an admirable example does it afford, besides, of the benevolence of the Creator! God has decreed that we must lose many of our friends; but he has also mercifully ordained, that time shall assuage the anguish of such bereavements; which, if continued in all its poignancy, would prey upon the vitals, and speedily terminate in our own decay. To mourn for a season is natural, but to mourn always with the same measure of wretchedness, has been wisely denied to the great mass of mankind. There are exceptions, undeniably, to this rule. There are beautiful spirits, to whom the affection of their friends is the very air they breathe; whose tender devotedness the grave of its idols only consecrates to greener fidelity. These are to be honoured and revered, for they are bright particular stars in the dark hemisphere of more selfish natures. Still, they are only the illustrious few, and while we admire their rare excellence, we can scarce desire that their numbers were multiplied.

" Friend after friend departs,—
Who hath not lost a friend?"

Not one; and if we turn for a moment from human to divine experience, we shall find, even there, additional evidence how transient are all mortal attachments. He who condescended of old to veil his heavenly glory beneath the guise of humanity, sought out his associates among men, and dignified, by his participation, the bonds of our social union. The Saviour had those dear to him, whom he lost, and whom he mourned. He chose John as his favourite disciple, whom he admitted to close and frequent companionship; to Martha and Mary he delighted to administer his counsel and consolation; he loved Lazarus—but Lazarus died, and "Jesus wept" at the sepulchre of his departed brother. Jesus wept,—the hand of death was upon his friend, and all the tenderness of his soul flowed forth spontaneous: and shall we, then, be ashamed of our tears, or refuse the ready tribute of sympathy to others, when any of those whom their affections embraced are carried to their long home? No; for it is not in vain that the Scripture says, that "the heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth." We will never forget the dead—we will never cease to grieve for them. God does not regard the melancholy mind with displeasure, for he knows that "by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better." "There is a sorrow of the world that tendeth to greater misery; but there is a godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation." Even such should be the tone of that sanctified melancholy with which our spirits cleave to our lost friends. Memory thus hallowed to the Christian bosom, becomes a noble and a profitable field for daily faithful meditation. In her hallowed retreats we shake off, as it were, the dust of our sluggish material frames, and feel our natures etherealized from the light and vain hopes of this earthly span; we long to be loosed from the weary bonds of our clay, and join that "innumerable company of the just made perfect," of which we trust our disembodied kindred now form a part. This is a holy ambition, let it animate and sustain us to the end. It is in very faithfulness that He hath afflicted us; it is the chastisement of a Father that we bear. Oh! then, let us not frustrate that grace which would make the loss of our dearest friends subservient to our unspeakable gain; so that at last, when the hour of our own departure comes, this testimony may be borne to us, by those who shall mourn for us,—“Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.”

ON THE GENERAL JUDGMENT:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE LATE REV. ANDREW BULLOCK, A. M.,
Minister of Tulliallan, Clackmannanshire.

“We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.”—2 COR. v. 10.

THE day of judgment is differently named in different parts of the Word of God. In one place it is called “that day,” by way of eminence, and to distinguish it from other days; in another it is termed “the last day,” because then the division and measurement of time by days shall cease; and in a third place, it is named “the great day,” from the overpowering splendour and dread solemnities by which it shall be ushered in, from the greatness of the number of those who shall then be judged, and from the infinite importance of the events which then shall take place, the trial of men and of angels, and the fixing of their everlasting destiny. Lastly, it is “called the day of the Lord,” for the Lord Jesus shall then visibly come in the clouds of heaven, to execute vengeance on his enemies, and to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe. Of the particular time when the day of judgment shall arrive, we know nothing whatever. “Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels that are in heaven, neither the Son (as man), but the Father himself only who hath put the times and seasons in his own power.” Of the manner in which we shall be judged, and of the solemnity and pomp by which judgment shall be conducted, and our sentence pronounced and executed, we know but little with exactness and precision. But though we are not informed, because it is unnecessary for us to know how the dead shall be raised up, and with what body they shall be clothed, how those who shall then be alive, and remaining, shall, along with the dead, be gathered together into one place, how each one of us shall individually give an account of himself before God previous to our being either acquitted or condemned by the Judge of all, though these, I say, are points on which our curiosity must remain unsatisfied, till the day come, when we ourselves shall be brought to the bar of Omnipotence, yet enough is revealed to us in the Word of God, to convince us that the day in which the world is to be judged shall be great and terrible, and attended by all the symbols of infinite power and awful majesty. We are told that the Lord himself shall then descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and they that are in their graves shall hear, and obey the call and come forth.

“I beheld,” says one inspired writer, who saw in prophetic vision the solemnities of the great day,—“I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued, and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened.” Another inspired writer, in similar circumstances, thus expresses himself: “I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened, and another book was opened which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works.”

In order to lead our thoughts to suitable and profitable meditation on this subject which so deeply affects our everlasting interests, let us consider—

I. The certainty of judgment. This is intimated by the expression “we must appear before the judgment-seat.” Other events may be more or less doubtful, and common it is for us in other matters to be disappointed in our hopes, as well as deceived as to our fears. How often are the calamities which we dread and view as just impending over our heads, as well as the blessings which we hope for, and desire, and regard as almost within our grasp, alike arrested in their course towards us! How often do they who set their hearts on riches labour in vain, and spend their strength for nought; or find their riches, after they have acquired them, take to themselves wings and flee away without their being able to prevent or even to account for it! In the season of health and of strength, when we think ourselves safe from danger, we may be attacked by sickness or cut off by death; and sometimes, too, the providence of God brings man back from the gates of the grave by a sudden and a strange deliverance.

The trials and the troubles to which we look forward with anxiety and alarm, and which we consider as nearly inevitable, may be made to pass from us. Our heavenly Father may either, by an unlooked-for interposition, shorten the day of conflict or may remove us by death before its arrival; and thus take us away in mercy from the evil which is to come.

The gathering clouds of affliction which are darkening our sky, and striking dismay into our souls, may in a moment vanish from our view, or they may be gradually dispersed, or may be made to burst in blessings on our heads. The obstacles which we view as insurmountable, and completely blocking up our path, may be rolled away by an unseen hand or an unexpected occurrence. Every thing, every event in human life is constantly subject to variation, and is deeply stamped with the characters of uncertainty and change. The colour, and features, and shape, and substance of our lot may be modified, or be totally changed by a thousand precarious contingencies which we cannot count upon, which we cannot provide against, which we cannot control. History, and observation, and experience show us the truth of this. How near were the Jews at one time to destruction! Their doom, both as to its time and its manner, was determined. The orders to kill, to destroy, to spoil, were already despatched to all the provinces in which they dwelt. Their enemies were gathering themselves together to cut off the whole nation in one day and by one stroke. Haman has his gallows erected for Mordecai. Deliverance seems far off, and ruin instantaneous and unavoidable. But on that night could not king Ahasuerus sleep, and he commanded the book of the Chronicles of the kingdom to be read. He perceives the obligations he lies under to Mordecai, and his heart smites him for his ingratitude in allowing them to remain so long forgotten and unrequited. Esther next day approaches the royal presence, and finds favour in the sight of the king, and is encouraged to present her petition in behalf of her countrymen. Then is the order to destroy the Jews reversed, Haman is hanged on the gallows which he had made for Mordecai, and Mordecai is advanced to honour in his room.

How many instances of a similar nature might easily be produced. None of us, in truth, can know the evil or the good that lies before him in life. It would be most presumptuous, as it is altogether impossible for us to pretend to predict with certainty, the end and issue of affairs, however penetrating our sagacity, however extensive our experience, however favourable the circumstances under which we form our opinions. The utmost we can attain to is probability, in a greater or less degree; and what is probability, but another name for uncertainty? But the day of judgment cannot be called a probable occurrence; it shall most assuredly come to pass—it is fixed, and fixed with a certainty over which human events can exercise no control, no influence whatever. All other events and occurrences shall themselves be controlled by, and shall terminate in, the transactions of that important day. If, my friends, judgment were not absolutely certain,—if there were any circumstances which might render it impossible, or unlikely to take place,—or if it were possible, from any cause, or on any grounds, to entertain the slightest doubt on the subject; then it might also be possible for us to form some excuse for ourselves, if we neglected to think on the day of judgment, and to prepare for its coming. And yet, methinks, the very possibility, not to say the likelihood, of our being one day summoned into the immediate presence of our Maker, if it did not make us sad, might at least make us serious, and lead us to endeavour that we might be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless. But how different is the reality of the case from the supposition which we have made! and how earnest ought to be the attention with which we should meditate on a day of future judgment!—how early and unwearied the preparation which we should make for its approach, when we reflect, that the trial of the world is already fixed upon with unalterable certainty,—that nothing can supersede the necessity of the trial itself,—that no events, or combination of events, can prevent or retard the approach of the particular day in which it shall be held; and that, as certainly as “it is appointed for all men once to die,” so certainly shall “after death be the judgment.” Let us, then, lay seriously to heart the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment, and that we must every one of us appear before God in judgment. Let us beware of saying in our hearts, “Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the creation of the world. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness,” neither will he be slack concerning the threatenings of his wrath. His everlasting faithfulness stands pledged to take final vengeance on his enemies, and to fulfil to his people the declarations in which he hath taught them to confide. The word of the Lord cannot be broken; the purposes of his heart never can be changed. His infinite wisdom has determined not merely the season, but the day, the hour, the moment, for the revelation of his righteous judgments; and his almighty power shall bring it to pass. And now, that “he commandeth all men every where to repent,” let us never forget the reason why he exhorts us to repentance—“Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained;” and not only has he declared to us this most interesting and awful truth, but “he hath given an assurance,” a proof of it beforehand, “unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.” And when the last sinner on earth shall have filled up the measure of his iniquity, and the last saint have been fitted for the inheritance in light, then shall the end come, then shall the dead be raised, and the living shall be changed; the future shall be determined by the past, and our conduct in time shall decide our condition through eternity. But besides the certainty of judgment, there is another thing, on which we should meditate with seriousness and awe, namely

II. The universality of its extent, comprehending the whole human race,—“We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.” Neither rank, nor wealth, nor worldly distinction, can make us so great as to be exempt from responsibility; nor can the most abject poverty, or the lowest insignificance, make us so little that we may hope we shall remain unknown and unnoticed, or be left out in the summons to stand before the tribunal of our Judge. The small and the great shall be there. Adam, the first, and the father of our race, with the remotest, the youngest of his descendants; the servant, and his master; the lordly possessor of the palace, and the humble tenant of the cottage; the haughty tyrant of a hundred provinces, and the slaves who once obeyed his nod, and trembled at his frown; the judges of the earth, along with those whom their sentences have either acquitted or condemned;—shall stand together on the same level, before Him who is the judge of all, and who shall judge a final and a righteous judgment. No wealth which we may possess, though it were the wealth of the whole world, no efforts which we may make, shall procure us a discharge from appearing at the bar. Were we to take the wings of the morning, and flee away to the uttermost ends of the sea, even there his hand would lay hold of us; were we to hide ourselves in dens and in caves of the earth, even there, too, his all-penetrating eye would detect us, thence his right hand would bring us forth. When the angel, with his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot upon the earth, shall have lifted up his hand to heaven, and have sworn by Him that liveth for ever and ever, that there shall be time no longer; and when the trumpet of the archangel shall have sounded its note of preparation; then all the living, from every region of the earth, shall gather themselves together; and the dead of all past ages shall rise and come forth from their graves, and shall hasten to the general doom. They shall come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south; from the crowded city, and from the lonely desert; from the hills, and from the valleys; from the islands, from the bowels of the earth, and from the bottom of the ocean—“for the sea shall give up the dead which are in it;” and they shall all stand before the tribunal of their Sovereign and impartial Judge. There you, my friends, and I, and all of us, must appear; there we shall meet with our father’s fathers, and with our children’s children; there we shall meet with those whom, by our friendly admonitions, our spiritual instructions, and our Christian department, we have been the honoured instruments of reclaiming from sin, and of turning to righteousness; and there, too, we shall meet with those whom we have encouraged in iniquity, and to whose ruin we have contributed, by our corrupting example and by our ungodly counsels,—and who, but for us, perhaps, might have found out, and might have followed to the end, the road that leads to heaven. And there, my friends, we must be judged, every one of us, according to the works which we have done, and the words which we have spoken; according to the means of grace which we have enjoyed, and the manner in which we have improved them; according to the talents given us, and the use we have put them to.

There, I shall have to answer for the doctrines I have taught you; and for the fidelity, the diligence, and the earnestness, with which I have taught them; and there you shall have to account for the heed you have given to the word which was spoken, and for the effect which it has produced on your heart within, and your conduct without. There it shall be asked of me, whether I have carefully and affectionately, as an approved watchman, lifted up my voice, and warned you to flee from the wrath to come? and of you, whether you have listened to the warning, and, moved with fear, have made haste to obey it? There it shall be asked of me, whether, as an ambassador of the Lord, I have declared unto you, that God in Christ was “reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses?” and of you, whether you have gladly closed with the gracious offers of reconciliation, or have treated them with indifference and contempt? Seeing, therefore, my brethren, such things shall take place, since we must all of us appear, each for himself, before the tribunal of our Judge, to receive his unerring and ultimate decision, how deeply does it concern each of us to be always and altogether prepared for that great and solemn event! How should this most interesting consideration impart double ardour to my zeal, and double energy to my diligence, in preaching the Word of Life! and how should it stimulate me to be “instant in season and out of season,” in holding forth to you the free offers of salvation through the blood of a crucified Redeemer, and in exhorting you to adorn his Gospel, after having professed to believe it, by a “life and conversation becoming godliness;” that thus, by the grace and the mercy of the Lord, I may so take heed to myself, and to the doctrine, as both to save myself and those that hear me; and at last be enabled to give in my account with joy! And should not the same consideration excite you, my friends, to give more diligent heed to the word spoken, and to beware lest ye receive it in vain; or at any time, or from any cause, let it slip; and to labour and to pray that the Gospel may prove to your souls “the savour of life unto life,” and not what it otherwise must unquestionably prove—“the savour of death unto death?” Yes, all of us must appear before the tribunal of Omnipotence; and though I have every reason to believe that many who are now present shall, at the great day, stand on the right hand of the judgment-seat, yet I should be chargeable with a credulity which would betray a criminal indifference for the welfare of your souls, if I did not fear, and if I did not express my fears, that within these walls there may be some who shall then stand upon the left. Who the individuals are, none of us can know, and none of us should presume to conjecture. Instead, therefore, of regarding this as a secondary consideration, only affecting our neighbours, let each of us bring the matter home to himself, by asking his own conscience, whether,

darkening our sky, and striking dismay into our souls, may in a moment vanish from our view, or they may be gradually dispersed, or may be made to burst in blessings on our heads. The obstacles which we view as insurmountable, and completely blocking up our path, may be rolled away by an unseen hand or an unexpected occurrence. Every thing, every event in human life is constantly subject to variation, and is deeply stamped with the characters of uncertainty and change. proved them; according to the talents given us, and the use we have put them to.

There, I shall have to answer for the doctrines I have taught you; and for the fidelity, the diligence, and the earnestness, with which I have taught them; and there you shall have to account for the heed you have given to the word which was spoken, and for the effect which it has produced on your heart within, and your conduct without. There it shall be asked of me, whether I have carefully and affectionately, as an approved watchman, lifted up my voice, and warned you to flee from the wrath to come? and of you, whether you have listened to the warning, and, moved with fear, have made haste to obey it? There it shall be asked of me, whether, as an ambassador of the Lord, I have declared unto you, that God in Christ was “reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses?” and of you, whether you have gladly closed with the gracious offers of reconciliation, or have treated them with indifference and contempt? Seeing, therefore, my brethren, such things shall take place, since we must all of us appear, each for himself, before the tribunal of our Judge, to receive his unerring and ultimate decision, how deeply does it concern each of us to be always and altogether prepared for that great and solemn event! How should this most interesting consideration impart double ardour to my zeal, and double energy to my diligence, in preaching the Word of Life! and how should it stimulate me to be “instant in season and out of season,” in holding forth to you the free offers of salvation through the blood of a crucified Redeemer, and in exhorting you to adorn his Gospel, after having professed to believe it, by a “life and conversation becoming godliness;” that thus, by the grace and the mercy of the Lord, I may so take heed to myself, and to the doctrine, as both to save myself and those that hear me; and at last be enabled to give in my account with joy! And should not the same consideration excite you, my friends, to give more diligent heed to the word spoken, and to beware lest ye receive it in vain; or at any time, or from any cause, let it slip; and to labour and to pray that the Gospel may prove to your souls “the savour of life unto life,” and not what it otherwise must unquestionably prove—“the savour of death unto death?” Yes, all of us must appear before the tribunal of Omnipotence; and though I have every reason to believe that many who are now present shall, at the great day, stand on the right hand of the judgment-seat, yet I should be chargeable with a credulity which would betray a criminal indifference for the welfare of your souls, if I did not fear, and if I did not express my fears, that within these walls there may be some who shall then stand upon the left. Who the individuals are, none of us can know, and none of us should presume to conjecture. Instead, therefore, of regarding this as a secondary consideration, only affecting our neighbours, let each of us bring the matter home to himself, by asking his own conscience, whether,

if this hour he were summoned to judgment, he would be ranked with those whom the Judge would welcome as the "blessed of his Father;" or with those to whom he would say, in wrath, "Depart, ye cursed;" and if conscience should give us an answer that makes our hearts to fail us for fear, then let us consider what the thing itself must be, when so alarming is the thought of it. Let us think of the terror which shall seize our souls, when the day shall come, as come at last it must, in which the Son of Man shall appear in the clouds of heaven, and we shall be summoned to his overpowering presence; when the judgment shall be set, and the books shall be opened; when the Book of Life shall be read, and our name be wanting; when the Book of Condemnation shall be read, and our name be found written there; when our friends and neighbours shall be acquitted, and ourselves condemned; when we shall see the angels gathering together; as the elect of the Lord, our pious relations and parents, hitherto the objects of our care, but now become the objects of our envy—with whom we had lived under the same roof, and with whose hallowed dust our own dust had been mingled in the grave together, but who shall now be separated from us for ever, and leave us no more capable of being blessed by their prayers, or benefited by their example. Let us think of the deadly horror which shall overwhelm us, and the pangs of speechless agony which shall rend our bosoms, when we shall stand before our Judge, clothed in all the splendours of his unspotted holiness, and in all the terrors of his unalterable justice and his almighty power, with nothing about us but guilt; with nothing to procure us his favour, and nothing to shield us from his wrath; heaven above us, with its gates shut against our entrance,—hell beneath us, opening its mouth to devour us. Let us reflect on the happiness from which, if such be our condition, we shall be excluded; and let us reflect on the misery to which we shall be doomed—misery which no length of time shall terminate—which no comfort shall alleviate—which no hope shall soothe. Let us think seriously and deeply on these things; and when we have done so, then let us reflect, with gratitude and with joy, that the great and eventful day has not yet arrived. God is still waiting to be gracious, even to the chief of sinners; and if we seek the Lord in this the day of grace, we shall find mercy of him at the day of judgment. He is now commanding all men every where to repent, and inviting all men every where to be saved; and by what more powerful motive than this, that "he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead?" And if any of us, on that day, shall be found among the number of those who are condemned, it shall not be because Christ was unwilling to save us, but it shall be owing to this, that we were unwilling to be saved by him.

III. We come now to consider the character of our Judge. The Scriptures distinctly declare, that it is not God the Father, but Jesus Christ his Son, that shall be the Judge of the world, and that he shall exercise this office (in his character of Mediator) in a visible shape, and in his human nature. "The Father," we are told, "judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." "Verily, verily," saith Christ, "the hour is coming, when all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of man, and come forth; for the Father hath given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man." "God hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance to all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."

God thus has not only made known to us, in his Word, that Christ shall judge the world, but has also given us an unquestionable, palpable, and undoubted proof and pledge that he shall do so, by his resurrection from the dead. The resurrection of Christ proves this, not only because it establishes the truth of the doctrine which he taught, and the declarations which he uttered, that though his body was destroyed, yet in three days he should rise from the grave, and ascend to his Father, and should, after the lapse of ages, come in the clouds of heaven, with power and with great glory, as the Judge of all flesh—so that, from the one event having taken place, as he told us, we are convinced of the certainty of the other; but also, because his resurrection itself was the first step of his actual and visible advancement to that mediatorial government, of which the solemnities of the general judgment shall form the final and the triumphal close. It is, indeed, true, that God is called the Judge of all the earth; and it is said, that God shall judge the world in righteousness. But this is in perfect consistency with the usual language of Scripture, in which God is often said to do that himself which he executes by another. Thus, he is said in one passage to have created the world, while in another we are told that he created the world by Christ Jesus; or it may be said, that God is to be the Judge of the world, inasmuch as Christ, who shall judge it, is God himself, equal in power and glory to the Father. There appears to be a peculiar fitness and a propriety in Christ's sustaining the character, and discharging the office, of Judge of the human race. It was by Christ Jesus that the world was originally made—it was by him that it was saved after it had been lost—it is by him that its affairs are at present administered; and is it not, in a manner, requisite that the Creator, and Redeemer, and Governor, should be also the Judge of the world? Is there not a fitness, that the same person who had commenced and conducted the scheme of mediation, should also bring it to a close, by openly acquitting his faithful followers, and openly acknowledging and receiving them into glory, and treating them as those whom he delighted to honour? Is it not becoming that the human nature—the nature which had been humbled and which had suffered—should be also honoured and exalted; and that the man Christ Jesus, who, while on earth, was condemned by the sentence of his unrighteous judges, should be revealed from heaven, to their unspeakable confusion, invested with the ensigns, and exercising the prerogatives, of supreme and universal authority? Is there not a fitness in the Judge being of the same nature with those whose conduct he shall try, and whose destiny he shall fix? Is not the triumph over Satan thus rendered more complete, or, at least, more conspicuous? Is not the dignity of sovereign Judge, and the opportunity thereby afforded to Christ of honouring and rewarding his people, part of that joy which was set before him in the days of his humiliation, and which made him endure the cross and despise the shame? And is it not part of the glory to which the Father promised to exalt him, in recompense of his mediatorial exertions, that to him every knee should bow and every tongue confess?

This doctrine opens up to us a view of the last judgment, most consolatory to believers. There is something peculiarly solemn, something which impresses the mind with awe, in the thought of appearing before the Judge of all the earth, and hearing him pronounce the sentence by which our happiness or misery shall be determined, unalterably and for ever! Our hearts are apt to be in perplexity, and to be overwhelmed within us, when we seriously think of the time when in our flesh we shall see God—"when we shall behold him face to face, each of us for himself, and not for another." Nothing, however, is more powerfully fitted to dispel the fears, and to strengthen the hopes of believers, than the doctrine which we have been considering—nothing more powerfully fitted to make them even long for and hasten unto the coming of the great day. Why, then, O believers, should your souls be cast down, and why should they be disquieted within you, at the prospect of that day? He who then shall sustain the character of your Judge, is that same Jesus who is your Saviour—your elder brother—bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh. He who shall sit upon the great white throne is none other than He who suffered for your sins on the cross; to whom you have often poured out the wishes of your hearts, in the assurance of faith and in the confidence of prayer, and who hath often fulfilled your requests, and done for you abundantly above what you were able either to ask or think—manifesting himself to you in another manner than he does to the world—supplying your spiritual wants, helping all your spiritual infirmities—causing you to experience the sense of his gracious presence, and filling your minds with joy which is unspeakable, and which is full of glory. Did he not love you before the world began? Did he not love you with a love which the floods of Divine wrath were unable to extinguish? Has he not at all times been your Advocate with the Father; and will his heart change, or the purpose of his mercy alter then, when he can not merely intercede in your behalf, but himself pronounce your final acquittal, and bestow on you eternal redemption? Is Jesus not the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever? How, then, is it possible that the love which he has to you, as your Saviour, should find no place in his heart when he appears as your Judge? Having loved you once, will he not love you even to the end? Having loved you with a love which cost him his life, before he could buy you off from the curse of the law, will he refuse to acquit and exalt you, then, when your acquittal and exaltation shall cost him nothing? Having bequeathed peace to his followers, when his immediate presence should be no more with them, and having promised to them, as he has also promised to you, that though he was going to depart from them, yet he should come again, to admit them into the mansions of purity and glory which he was going to prepare for their reception,—can we think that when he does come again it will be to perform or to violate his promises?—will it be to fulfil your expectations, or to disappoint them for ever? Is it possible that Jesus, when seated on his throne as Judge, can condemn those for whom he laid down his life, as their Redeemer, on the cross; or that he will punish those for, whose pardon he shed his blood, and who shall stand before him clothed in the robes of his righteousness, and sprinkled with that precious blood? It was when he was in the very act of lifting up his hands, and blessing his people, that he was parted from them, and was carried up into heaven; and his recorded Word, which never can be broken, declares to us, that this same Jesus, which was taken up from his disciples into heaven, shall so come, in like manner as he was seen going into heaven. When, therefore, he comes the second time, it shall be only finally to save and eternally to bless his people—by delivering them from the power of the grave, by pardoning and acknowledging them as his friends before men and angels—by bestowing on them crowns of glory, and rewarding them with a kingdom that shall never be overthrown.

But what an alarming prospect does this view of the subject hold out to you who are sinners! What consternation shall overwhelm them when they shall behold, in the person of their Judge, that very Jesus who had purchased for them a salvation, for which his own life went as the cost, but which had been offered to them without money and without price; who, Sabbath after Sabbath, and year after year, had been warning them of their danger, and entreating them to flee from it, and to be sheltered under the covering of his mediation; but whose grace they had frustrated by their carelessness and hardness of heart, having lived regardless alike of the suggestions of his Holy Spirit, of the voice of his Providence, and the invitations of his Word; neither moved by the offers of his mercy, nor awed by the threatenings of his wrath—not al-of his duty to teach a school under the patronage of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge. For a time he continued to labour in this double office, which, however, he felt at length to be so laborious that he discontinued the teaching, and confined himself to the more strictly professional duties of the Mission. These he continued to discharge with the utmost conscientiousness, amid much discouragement and not a little faintness of heart. After labouring in the Mission for a year, he was invited to come to Edinburgh, by Dr Campbell of the Tolbooth Church, Secretary of the Society to whom his Mission belonged. Mr Findlater remained in town for three months, preaching frequently, especially in the Gaelic Chapel, where his services were peculiarly acceptable. From the interviews which Dr Campbell had with him, he formed a very high opinion of his principles and character; and he recommended him to the Society as a fit person to fill up the vacant Mission of Lochtayside, and on this recommendation he was unanimously appointed.

Before entering upon his new sphere of exertion, Mr Findlater paid a visit to his friends in Ross-shire, and spent a few weeks with his brother in Sutherlandshire. The Mission to which he had been nominated was in several points very interesting. A considerable excitement, on the subject of religion, had taken place in consequence of the labours of some itinerant missionaries, chiefly of the Independent and Baptist persuasions, who took occasion, while addressing the people, to speak slightly of the Church of Scotland, and endeavoured to diffuse among their hearers a distaste for her formularies and a contempt for her ministers. Such was the state of feeling in Lochtayside when the young missionary commenced his labours among the people of that district. At first, no doubt, though he appears to have been favourably received, he would be eyed, by some at least, with suspicion and jealousy. Such, however, was the amiableness of his disposition, the fervency of his piety, and the faithfulness of his preaching, that he soon won his way to their hearts, and ere long he was regarded with the warmest esteem and regard by all classes. It is said, that the very first sermon he preached at Ardeonaig was blessed in awakening a young woman to a sense of her need of a Saviour. Soon after, another instance of conversion occurred by his instrumentality. The person who was the subject of it had come from Comrie, under providential circumstances, to the district. The account is thus given in a letter contained in the Memoir of Mr Findlater recently published, and which we cordially recommend to our readers as one of the most interesting pieces of biography we have read for a long time. The narrative of conversion to which we allude is as follows:—

"This woman was, by the wonderful and gracious interpositions of divine Providence, brought in the following manner to hear the truth as it is in Jesus. Her husband, a native of Breadalbane, was formerly married, and his first wife was buried in the churchyard of Ardeonaig. By the second wife he had several children: a favourite child died, and the father was for burying the child in the grave of his first wife. The mother was for having it buried with her own kindred, in the parish of Comrie. The husband, however, prevailed, and had his daughter's remains interred at Ardeonaig. The first Sabbath after the funeral, the mother resolved to visit the grave of her beloved daughter, left Comrie early in the morning, without acquainting any one of her design. She walked along over the hill, arrived at her journey's end sometime before the people assembled to hear sermon, and lay for a long time over her daughter's grave, watering it with her tears; thus endeavouring to relieve her sorrowful heart, by giving full vent to her feelings. Before she was aware, however, being absorbed with grief, the people began to assemble for public worship, which was at that time performed in the churchyard. Against her inclination and intention, she had to sit down with the rest of the people assembling—being ashamed to be seen leaving the congregation. Mr Findlater entered the tent, and before he got half through with his discourse Mrs C.'s attention was so much arrested by his appearance—his manner—and the doctrine she heard, that, for a time, she forgot the object of her visit to Ardeonaig; but before he was done, she was so much overcome with a conviction of her own condition, as a lost sinner, that sorrow for the death of her daughter soon gave way to a concern of infinitely greater importance—the salvation of her own immortal soul: She came to weep over the grave of a beloved child; but ere she returned, she heard of a living Saviour—of Him who is the resurrection and the life. Like Lydia of old, her heart was opened to hear glad tidings of great joy. He who began the good work in her soul carried it on. She was not only reformed of sin, but also of righteousness."

In the district over which his labours extended, no fewer than two thousand souls were contained, and, as he regularly visited and catechized, it may easily be conceived that no slight exertion was required to overtake his arduous duties. His zeal and ardour met with considerable opposition, not only from the enemies of the truth, but from some Baptists, who were anxious to make proselytes to their peculiar opinions, and even prevailed on some of Mr Findlater's own converts to join their body and be re-baptized. Nothing, however, could discourage him from labouring, in season and out of season, to win souls to the Redeemer. He held four diets of catechizing weekly; and, in addition to the regular services of the Sabbath, he instituted an evening sermon, on the opposite side of the lake, for the benefit of those who had not an opportunity of attending church through the day. This service he continued during the summer and greater part of the harvest. He seldom left his charge, unless on sacramental occasions, where his assistance was required; and this was usually the case at Muthil and in the Gaelic Chapel at Edinburgh, in both of which places he was a great favourite. His hands were much strengthened in his ministerial work by the appointment of his early and excellent friend, Mr M'Gillivray, to the neighbouring Mission of Strathfillan. They were united in sentiment, and both of them ardently devoted to the great cause in which they were engaged.

ON THE SUPPOSED CONNECTION BETWIXT THE WAR IN SYRIA AND THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

BY THE REV. ROBERT BRYDON, Minister of Dunscore, Dumfries-shire.

FROM recent events in the East, to which the eyes of all Europe have been turned, the attention of the Christian public has been much and earnestly directed to the question of the restoration of the Jews. This question, indeed, is daily gathering interest—for many things in the signs of the times, concur to indicate that the great event cannot be far distant. But some opinions on the subject have been put forth, and proposals recommended, which are, perhaps, not fully warranted by the prophecies of Scripture. All Christians believe, that God, according to his faithful Word of promise, will restore the Israelites to Palestine in his own time and way. Now, it is pretty generally agreed that the time cannot be remote, but is the way revealed? And without entering upon the whole discussion, involved in this very interesting question, there is one most important part of it, on which I wish to offer a few observations, namely, "Are the Jews to be restored previous or subsequent to their conversion to Christianity?" Some months ago, a writer in the London Times, threw out the suggestion, that Syria and Jerusalem might be ceded to the people of Israel, by commercial arrangements—stating it as his conviction, that the Jewish nation are both able and willing to make the purchase, and that the matter might be advantageously settled on this financial ground, with Turkey and Egypt, by the intervention of the strong European powers as arbitrators and umpires.

By the change of affairs, indeed, which has subsequently taken place, Egypt will have no concern whatever in the disposal of Syria, or Palestine. But similar proposals have since been mooted in regard to the Porte. And Mr Haldane Stewart in his New Year's Address on Prayer, alludes to a proposed interference, on the part of the four powers, for persuading Turkey to colonize the Jews in Syria, and for insuring their independence there.

Now, such plans and measures, appear at first sight, a simple and ready way of bringing about God's predicted purpose of restoring Israel. But the great question is, whether it be really the way which God has chosen and revealed? For if so, then Israel is to be restored, not in consequence of embracing the Gospel, but in their present unconverted state,—and not by any signal and striking intervention of divine Providence in their behalf, but by the favour and negotiation of man, and that in a manner little calculated to attract the commanding attention and reverence of the world. But does the "sure word of prophecy" warrant us to believe, that it is thus by the mere favour and permission of the Gentiles, that the Jews are to be suffered to take quiet possession of their long lost country,—and that, without any reference to the removal of their unbelief, the grand cause of their former dispossession! Prophecy, I apprehend, will rather lead to the conclusion, that Palestine shall at the set time of God's purpose be violently wrested out of the hands of its Gentile possessors, who will strenuously resist the claims of the Jews, and oppose their return "with great fury," but be totally defeated and overthrown in the struggle. It is not the design of the Great Ruler among the nations, who fixes the bounds of men's habitation, giving the kingdoms of the earth to whomsoever he will,—it is not his Divine pleasure apparently, that his people Israel should pay a ransom to the Gentiles for that land which he gave to Abraham and to his seed for ever. But just as he took it from the Amorites of old, when the measure of their iniquity was full, so will he wrest it again, and for a like reason, out of the hand of the Turk, whose gloomy despotism is destined to be utterly overthrown. Canaan was at first assigned to the Israelites by a Divine grant. And although Jehovah suffered the heathen nations to pollute, and to lay it waste, planting their own idolatrous standards upon the holy hill of Zion, and treading down Jerusalem, the holy city, and the land of Judah, for a time,—although He suffered all this on account of Israel's sin, yet the Gentiles only did it to gratify their own lust of ambition, but they obtained no just right to "the portion of Jacob," and have no title to retain it when the Lord sees fit to bring back the captivity of Israel. And we are, moreover, expressly taught, that God will "trouble those nations that are gathered against Jerusalem, and that he will go forth and fight against them as when he fought in the day of battle;" probably referring to the signal destruction of the aboriginal inhabitants of Canaan in the days of Joshua, or to the miraculous ruin of the army of Sennacherib. It would appear, therefore, that Syria or Palestine shall not be purchased from the enemies of Israel, but as their ancestors took it by violence from God's people, so will God take it by violence from them at the time appointed, and give it to his people again. It belongs to Israel by Divine right, and the Turk only holds it by usurpation. And as he will not likely have the justice to cede it unconditionally, without money and without price, to its rightful owners; but, perhaps, harden his heart like the ancient Pharaoh, so God will drive him out as he drove out the Canaanite. And in support of this view the reader may consult the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel, and the twelfth and fourteenth of Zechariah.

But farther, the proposed arrangements by commercial treaty, or by political interference on the part of the great powers of Europe, for obtaining Syria from the Porte, must proceed on the principle that the Jews are at this moment, and in their present state, prepared for their predicted restoration. We apprehend, however, that their conversion is intended in the purpose of God, to precede their return. So long, we conceive, as they abide in their present blindness and unbelief, and do not repent of the awful sin of crucifying the Lord of glory, on account of which they were banished from Judea, and scattered among the heathen, God will not visit them to plant them again on the mountains of Israel. And this may be inferred from various passages of holy writ, but none is more clear than that most graphic and remarkable prediction of Moses, contained in the book of Deuteronomy. After a minute detail of all that should befall them for their sins, and which has been most exactly verified in history, the thirtieth chapter opens with these words—"And it shall come to pass when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee; and shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thy heart and with all thy soul, that then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee."

Thus, it seems plain that the return of the Jews to Palestine shall succeed their conversion, and shall be a consequence of it. The Divine power and providence shall not be interposed in their favour, till they shall seek unto the Lord their God and David their king—till they shall look in the deep relentings of penitence, to Him whom they have pierced; and shall mourn for the guilt and infatuation of their forefathers in rejecting and killing the Prince of life. It cannot surely be as unbelieving Jews, but as Israelites indeed, embracing and rejoicing in Christ as their long expected Messiah, the son of David, and also David's Lord, that they shall be re-established in Mount Zion. It was because of their unbelief and rejection of Jesus that they were cast off; and therefore their unbelief must surely be removed before they can be again received. The apostle to the Romans plainly declares, while comparing the Church of God to an olive tree, and speaking of Israel as the natural branches, that "because of unbelief they were broken off," and that "if they abide not still in unbelief they shall be grafted in again." It is only the Captain of salvation himself, even Jesus the New Testament Joshua, who can lead them a second time into possession of Canaan, and drive out their enemies from before them. But they must previously believe in, and submit to him, and range themselves under his standard, under the banner of the Cross, ere he will conduct them to victory. Just as of old, faith we apprehend is the principle by which the land must be conquered. Now as then, it is only by faith that the walls of Jericho shall fall down—that the towers and the fortresses of Islamism shall be overthrown, and all the power of the crescent melt away,—that the false prophet himself "shall come to his end and none shall help him." But if as of old, faith is the principle which is to lead back Israel to the land of their fathers,—and who can doubt it? then it is evident that the great event of their conversion must precede their restoration to Palestine, for the unconverted cannot put forth any genuine faith. And is it at all reasonable to suppose, that God will honour a nation of unbelievers, by settling them in the land of promise, while they are still resisting the Holy Ghost, and denying the Holy One and the Just? The heads and leaders of the nation at least, understood and believed God, when he brought them out of Egypt, and introduced them originally into the land he had sworn to their fathers to give them. And when we consider that their restoration to that land in these latter days is the great work by which God is to be sanctified in the eyes of the nations, it seems a very unlikely thing, indeed, that they should be restored in unbelief.

Far be it from us, however, to limit the power or wisdom of God. We allow that the question is not altogether unattended with difficulty. And we can conceive it possible, that God might bring back the captivity of Israel before converting them to Christianity, and as a means of their conversion. But for the reasons stated, we think this is not the actual purpose of God. We think it is not the way revealed in his Word—in which, it seems pretty clearly taught, that God will first turn their hearts unto himself, in the countries of their dispersion, and then turn their captivity in answer to their believing prayers. In short, we think these two things may be gathered from the prophecies of Scripture, namely, first, that it shall not be peaceably, and with the consent of those Gentiles who have so long trodden down Jerusalem under their feet, that the Jews shall obtain possession of it, for Gog and Magog are destined to fall with a great slaughter on the mountains of Israel; and secondly, that it shall not be while persisting in unbelief, but after the veil is taken away from their heart, and it shall be turned to the Lord, that he will restore his people to their own land. And hence, all who desire their restoration, should fervently pray, and use all other proper means for their conversion. Not only for their own sakes, and from principles of brotherly love and holy compassion, should Christians seek the good of Israel—but they should do it also, for the sake of the world at large, for the most blessed consequences are to result from their recall. Their fall and diminution proved the riches of the Gentiles, and how much more their fulness? The casting away of them was the reconciling of the world, and what then shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?

LENTILES.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM PATRICK.

THIS word occurs four times in our English translation, although mentioned by Cruden in his Concordance only twice. Both in the English and Hebrew it usually assumes a plural form, the seeds of this pulse being so small that they are never named, or thought of, or used as food, individually, but collectively. The words in the original are adaschim and amash. The original Hebrew idea is to be sought for in the radical adi, the mouth, the avenue by which the lentile, once the staff of life, finds its way to sustain and nourish the body, as in Psalms xxxiii. 7, and ciii. 5. Another radical (aded) signifies "support," as in Psalm xx. 8, so that we may justly conclude that the Hebrew adaschim alludes to some plant commonly used for food, as we now use wheat, oats, and pease. It also appears, from the Hebrew words adi and ade, that the adaschim was used as an ornament, or to deck and adorn the person, probably for beads or necklaces, as we now sometimes use the seeds of laburnum and other leguminous plants. It is with perfect propriety, therefore, that our translators have rendered the word "lentiles;" the seeds of which being ground into a meal or flour, and seethed or boiled, are used to make a pottage of the colour of chocolate. Travellers tell us that this sort of mess is still very common in the East, and, with a little mastic or suet added, forms a very agreeable repast. This was, no doubt, Esau's "red pottage" (Genesis xxv. 34), for which he sold his birth-right to satisfy the cravings of a pressing appetite. The Sacred Record tells us, that "Jacob sod pottage; and Esau came from the field, and he was faint. And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage: and Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles." During the time that David was employed in suppressing the rebellion of his son Absalom, some kind friends brought to him, in the wilderness, certain supplies of food for himself and friends, and among these lentiles are especially alluded to. The list of articles provided is curious (2 Sam. xvii. 28, 29): "Beds, basons, earthenware, wheat, barley, flour, parched corn, beans, lentiles, parched pulse, honey, butter, sheep, and cheese of kine." David also (2 Samuel xxiii. 11), in his last words, where he professes his faith in God's providence to be beyond sense or experience, in giving an account of his great men, mentions that Shammah defeated the Philistines, "who were gathered together in a troop, where was a piece of ground full of lentiles"—a strong proof that lentiles were sown by themselves as a distinct and separate crop, and not along with other grains, as we now sow vetches. In Ezekiel's (iv. 9) celebrated type of the siege, in which he indicated the time from the defection of Jeroboam to the captivity, and in showing the hardness of the famine, predicted by the provisions for the siege, he names "wheat, barley, beans, lentiles, millet, and fitches," which were to be baked up together and used instead of "barley bread"—thereby indicating that bread for common use was not usually made of such materials, but more commonly of barley. It has been supposed that the lentile is a species of the genus cicer, which has a rhomboid, turgid two-seeded legume—the seeds being called red cich or peason. The more probable opinion, however, is, that the Ervum lens of Linnæus, named by the English the flat-seeded tare or lentile, is the plant indicated. It is one of the leguminous tribe of plants, and has a long knotty legume or pod, columnar, obtuse, and protuberant with seeds. It is an annual plant, and the least of the pulse kind cultivated. It rises with weak stalks about eighteen inches high, with pinnate leaves at each joint, composed of several pairs of narrow leaflets. The seeds or pease are flat and round, and a little convex in the middle; they are sometimes used for soup, but in these days of mercantile enterprise and luxury, more frequently for cattle. The lentile of Virgil (Eclogue iii. 100), was probably the Ervum ervilia or official tare—the flour of the seeds being sometimes used in medicine abroad. In Dr Shaw's Travels (page 140, second edition), it will be seen that the natives of Barbary still make a pottage of a red colour, of lentiles boiled and stewed with oil and garlic—a mess similar to that for which Esau, thence called Edom, foolishly and wickedly sold his birth-right, which implied several peculiar and truly valuable privileges:—

1. Respect and a degree of authority; as is manifest from Gen. iv. 7; also xxxvii. 29, 37, and xlix. 3.
  2. A double portion; Deut. xxi. 7.
  3. A special blessing; Gen. xxvii. 4.
  4. Hereditary right to the priesthood; Numbers viii. 16, 17.
  5. A type of Christ; Exodus iv. 22.
- Hence, Esau is justly called profane (Heb. xii. 16), for despising such sacred and exalted privileges.

ON THE BURNING OF THE CHURCHES
AT DUNDEE, JANUARY 3, 1841.

THE hallow'd Pane is gone!
The ruins stand alone,
Like spectral shapes in ghostly dark array;
The beauteous Gothic pile,
The lofty pillar'd aisle,
The ancient sacred relics swept away;

Destruction paus'd not—on she came
 Career'd wildly in her chariot of flame !
 Terrific was that hour,
 When, from the lofty tower,
 The alarm-bells did sound. All stood in fear,
 While fiery clouds did flash,
 And pond'rous roofs did crash,
 And fearful sounds came thund'ring on the ear ;
 But when the flames nigh reach'd the skies,
 This cry burst from the throng—"Ye slumb'ring ones arise !"

This wild-like shout did sound,
 And shook the earth around ;
 It ceas'd *—above the scene there hover'd o'er
 A snow-white timid dove—
 Emblem of peace and love ;
 No rest it found—it fled—was seen no more,
 While desolation from the tomb
 Shut up the direful scene in dark funereal gloom !

Then old and young did weep—
 Their grief was sad and deep ;
 And loud arose the wild bereaved wail ;
 Oh ! on that fatal morn
 Many a heart was torn,
 And sounds of woe did fill the flowing gale ;
 For O we loved thee, hallow'd shrine—
 Thy walls were sacred all, and people that were thine.

Thou sacred house of pray'r,
 Our fathers worshipp'd there ;
 And in thy ruins we love thee—love thee still,
 Though, in God's awful ire,
 Thou art burn'd up with fire.
 O yet again our broken hearts shall thrill
 With grace proclaim'd, and Zion's song,
 In solemn notes, be heard thy lofty aisles among.

O God, when thus forlorn,
 In sackcloth sad we mourn,
 Soar we, by faith and hope, on wings of love,
 Afar to that blest land
 Where hymning seraphs stand,
 And harpers harp around thy throne above,
 And have eternally, on high,
 An house not made with hands—A TEMPLE IN THE SKY ! J. C. G..

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. ROBERT FINDLATER,
 MINISTER OF THE CHAPEL OF EASE, INVERNESS.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

IN May 1814 Mr Findlater was visited with a severe dispensation of Providence, in the loss of his venerable and pious father. The event made a deep impression on his mind ; but, if he grieved, it was a chastened grief, for such was the consistent and heavenly-minded course of him whose death he mourned, that he had no reason to sorrow as one who had no hope. On the contrary, he felt assured that his father had entered into rest—that blessed, peaceful, eternal rest, which remaineth for the people of God. Not many months

* * At this moment the scene was truly sublime. The assembled populace were driven back from the fire by the intensity of the heat, and looked on with mixed feelings of astonishment and apprehension. Exactly at that period of hesitation and dread, a circumstance occurred, trifling in itself, but strikingly poetical, which made a deep impression on the spectators. A snow-white pigeon, no doubt an inmate of the tower, flew around the burning edifices ; and, like the dove from the ark, could not find where to rest its foot in security. After several bewildered evolutions, the emblem of peace rested on the Steeple Church, latterly on a tree within the grounds, and eventually sought refuge in its wonted habitation—the tower.—Dumfries Courier.

after, in January 1816, he was bereaved of his affectionate mother, of whom he could say, with unhesitating confidence, "She is now happy, and put in possession of the inheritance of the saints in light." These heavy and successive trials seem to have had a salutary, quickening effect upon his mind. He laboured, if possible, more unweariedly than ever, and the results were, under the Divine blessing, of a very satisfactory nature. A thirsting for the Word, and a longing for the return of the Sabbath, began to be felt. The preacher seemed to be more fervent, and the people more attentive. Some persons who travelled from Glenlyon to Lawers were the first who exhibited symptoms of awakening. These were the first-fruits of a glorious harvest. The number of inquirers gradually increased. At length, a communion season in the autumn of 1816 was a time of peculiar refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The dew of the Spirit's influences descended in a copious shower. Mr Macdonald of Urquhart and Mr Russel of Muthil assisted Mr Findlater on that memorable occasion, and we cannot do better than give an account of this commencement of the revival in his own words :—

"Mr Russel preached an admirable English sermon on Thursday. Mr M'Donald preached after him. A more attentive congregation I never witnessed. All was attention and concern. The people kept quite quiet : but after Mr M'Donald was done, and the congregation dismissed, one young woman was so deeply affected she could not suppress her feelings. She was brought into my house. Mr M'D. spoke to her a little, and she got quiet. After taking a bit dinner we crossed the lake. A great number followed us ; and there was a similar general impression as in the forenoon. We also had an extra sermon on Friday evening on the other side, in the tent, as the church could not contain the people who assembled. Many were bathed in tears, and deeply affected with the word preached. Mr M'Gillivray joined us on Friday evening, and preached an excellent sermon on Saturday. But the Sabbath was the great day with us. The whole services were in the open air. I thought proper to give to Mr M'Donald the action sermon, to which he readily consented. It may be really said, he came to us in the fulness of the Gospel of peace. There was a vast congregation collected, reckoned between four thousand and five thousand ; for I spread the information far and wide. He preached two hours and twenty minutes from Isa. liv. 5,—'For thy Maker is thine husband.' I may say, during the whole sermon there was hardly a dry eye. Eagerness to attend to the word preached was depicted on every countenance, while tears were flowing very copiously, and literally watering the ground. The most hardened in the congregation seemed to bend as one man ; and I believe if ever the Holy Ghost was present in a solemn assembly it was there. Mr M'Donald himself seemed to be in raptures. There were several people who cried aloud ; but the general impression seemed to be, a universal melting under the word. The people of God themselves were as deeply affected as others ; and many have confessed they never witnessed such a scene. It will be a day remembered through the ages of eternity, as many, I trust, have enjoyed eternal good. There was no doubt joy in heaven on the occasion. I could compare it to nothing but the days of the apostles, after the day of Pentecost. I attempted to preach in the evening, from a sense of duty. Mr M'D. preached all day on Monday,—his colleague having given up his diet to him at breakfast,—from Luke xvi. 2,—'Give an account of thy stewardship.' It was no ways inferior to the last, though there were not so many who cried out. Several were pierced to the heart, and some came to speak to him after sermon. I have seen and conversed with some of them myself, and have every reason to believe that they are under the gracious operations of the Holy Spirit. Some of them probably I may never see or hear of in this world; but it is a glorious consideration, that real good is done in the conversion of sinners and in the edification of His people. Mr M'Donald's own soul was much refreshed; indeed, he could not conceal it, and took a parting look of the interesting spot with pleasing regret. I accompanied him on Tuesday to Dalnacardoch; and we often alluded to it. It must be peculiarly gratifying to him, as the work in a general way seems to stop in his own congregation; for there is not such a public impression as formerly at home. The Lord has honoured him much, and I trust will honour him more and more."

Not were the effects of the Spirit's working limited to that sacramental occasion. Immense multitudes flocked to hear Mr Findlater from the surrounding country, and scarcely a sermon was preached by him without being followed by tokens of the Divine approval. The whole district now was in a state of excitement; religion became the theme of general conversation, and there were few families without one, and some families two or three, professing a deep concern about the salvation of their souls. The work made gradual but quite perceptible progress, and the occasional visits of Mr M'Donald were blessed to the awakening of numbers, and the exciting of strong and deep impressions. This latter effect, however, was not limited to Mr M'Donald's ministrations—it pleased the Almighty to honour Mr Findlater with similar success. Thus, to quote an instance from the published Memoir:—

"On Mr M'Donald's return from Edinburgh by Breadalbane, he was expected to preach on the 23d November; and Mr Findlater circulated the information in the full expectation and dependence of his preaching. In consequence, however, of some accident Mr M'Donald met with, he was prevented from coming forward as expected. A large congregation assembled from several distant parishes. Mr Findlater's anxiety was great on Saturday and Sabbath morning, and though quite unprepared as to previous studies, he deemed it his duty and call in providence to go to the tent with no ordinary feelings, and preached to the large assemblage collected, from John, i. 29.—'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.' Such was the holy unction with which he spoke, and the deep interest manifested by the congregation, in the solemn truths delivered, and his truly pathetic address to the different classes of his hearers, that I never witnessed a more affecting scene. There was not so much of that crying aloud and agitation of the bodily frame, as had been sometimes felt and seen under Mr M'Donald's preaching; but the greater part of the congregation seemed to be melted into tears—a gentle sweet mourning heard in every corner. This day will be long held in traditional remembrance in Breadalbane—a day, the results of which will never be forgotten, and may not be ascertained till the great day will declare it. It was truly a time of reviving and refreshing to many from the presence of the Lord. God mercifully granted the latter as well as the former rain, and refreshed his heritage."

Considerable opposition was manifested to this remarkable outpouring of the Lord's Spirit. The darkness which prevailed around, and the determined hatred to evangelical religion, now became more apparent than ever. Mr Findlater was summoned by the Presbytery of Dunkeld, to answer to a very serious charge; but we shall give the details in his own language:—

"Next week, on my return from Muthil, I had an order from the Presbytery of Dunkeld to attend a meeting, called for the purpose of inquiring into certain reports unfavourable to the interests of religion, particularly in the Highlands of Perthshire, and connected with the Presbytery of Dunkeld. All the Highland ministers and missionaries on the Society, and the royal bounty, were called to appear, and we were all called upon to give an account of our respective charges. The unfavourable reports were: That many of the people in some places, and under the preaching of some individuals, were much agitated and convulsed,—things very much to the discredit of religion; that Mr M'Donald had preached in parishes without the request or consent of the ministers, and forced himself; that he exercised his ministry in a vagrant manner; that at last Sacrament here I had so many strangers assistants that the parish ministers were overlooked, and not permitted to open their mouths; that in compliment to one individual, the most of the service was in the English language, to the loss of the edification of the bulk of the congregation; that tokens had been given to several strangers, without lines of character, and to people who do not choose to communicate in their own parish churches. All these charges were pointedly and decidedly stated, and the burden of answering them lay on me, which I did the best way I could, and fully convinced the Presbytery they were all groundless. An overture, however, was made to the Presbytery, grounded on the decision of last Assembly, to report Mr M'Donald, as exercising his ministerial functions in a vagrant manner, and to be transmitted to next Assembly. This overture, however, was unanimously rejected. Thus the zeal of the Presbytery of Dunkeld has been roused to act in favour of the interests of religion now. May it be directed to a right end, and exercised in a proper manner! We must therefore be on our guard against any enthusiasm or fanaticism appearing among us, and were cautioned so by the Presbytery. I wrote Mr M'Donald last week giving him an account of the meeting, and asking him, if he goes to Edinburgh in May, to preach a Sabbath for me; which I hope he will find convenient to do."

It ought to be a subject of lively gratitude to God that such indifference to the cause of truth and righteousness is now scarcely to be found in any Presbytery of Scotland. The recent revivals with which the Lord has blessed various parts of our country, have been hailed, on the contrary, by many Presbyteries and Synods, and publicly acknowledged as grounds of holy thanksgiving to Him with whom alone is the residue of the Spirit.

The many encouraging instances of true conversion which occurred under Mr Findlater's ministry at Loch-tayside tended much to bear up his mind amid the arduous and toilsome labours for which his peculiar position called. He sought to discharge the work which the Almighty had set before him, as one who must ere long render an account; and, in doing so, he was preparing for another and a more extensive sphere of usefulness, to which, in the course of Providence, he was called. Having paid a visit to his friends in the north, he was urged to preach in the chapel of ease at Inverness, which was then vacant; and such was the favourable impression produced by his discourses, that he received a unanimous call from the managers. After earnest prayer for the Divine direction, and consulting with his friends, he agreed, though reluctantly, to accept the call. The honour which the Lord had put upon his ministry at Lochtayside, and the warm attachment of the people to him, rendered it a matter of considerable self-denial to leave his interesting charge; but, considering the unexpected, unanimous, and apparently providential manner in which the invitation was given to him, he did not think himself justified in refusing to comply with what appeared to be a call from his Master to labour in a different part of his vineyard.

On his new charge Mr Findlater entered in June 1821. It was a large and an important one, often exceeding eighteen hundred persons; especially in the forenoon Gaelic service. His reception was very gratifying, and every day he seemed to rise in their estimation. He did not forget, however, the flock which he had left, but regularly paid them a yearly visit—assisting at the sacrament, either at Killin, Lochtayside, or Glenlyon. With several of them he kept up a correspondence, and a number of them went to Inverness for some years, during the sacramental week in that town. His ministrations were highly prized, also, by his new flock. He laboured among them with an apostolic ardour, which commended him to their hearts as “a workman that needed not to be ashamed.” In various parishes, near the scene of his former labours, attempts were made by the people to have him brought among them, as their pastor. This was particularly the case in Killin, Comrie, and Moulin, where the parishioners almost unanimously petitioned in his favour, and though unsuccessful, their efforts sufficiently showed the high esteem in which he was held. He received pressing calls to either of two parishes, in Lewis and Sutherlandshire; but he did not feel it to be his duty to comply with either—more especially, as he was occupying a very large sphere of usefulness, and labouring among an increasingly attached people. He continued among them, “commending the truth to every man’s conscience, in the sight of God,” until it pleased God to bring his labours on earth to a close, and to summon him to the possession of his everlasting reward. The brief but affecting notice of the last days of this eminent servant of Christ, we extract from the published Memoir,* to which we are indebted for the materials of this imperfect Sketch; and we sincerely trust, that a work characterised by such warm, experimental piety, and written in a clear, perspicuous style, as well as containing so much interesting information as to the revival of religion in a large district of Perthshire, will meet with the encouragement from the public which it so well deserves. The narrative of Mr Findlater’s last illness and death is thus given by Mr Findlater’s brother, who is himself the author of the Memoir which we have thus been recommending:—

“In August 1832, he paid his annual visit to Breadalbane, and assisted at the sacrament at Glenlyon, on the 28th, and on Tuesday thereafter preached in Ardeonaig. During this visit, he felt his spirits a good deal refreshed, as he generally did on similar occasions; and it appears it was a source of joy and refreshing to a goodly number from different parts of the country, who cordially welcomed him as a messenger of good tidings. On his return home on the 31st he found that the mysterious and awful visitation of the cholera—which he always anticipated would, in its alarming and desolating course, visit Inverness—had broken out. The first decided cases appeared on the 24th. On the Sabbath following, the 2d September, he improved the visitation by preaching in the forenoon from Psalm cvi. 29, ‘Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions; and the plague brake in among them.’ In the afternoon, from Joel ii. 14, ‘Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind Him, even a meat-offering and a drink-offering unto the Lord your God’—subjects peculiarly appropriate. On the first appearance of this awful disease, and during its progress, the feelings excited in the minds of the inhabitants, and depicted in their countenances, none could adequately describe but those who were eye-witnesses. The common sympathies of our nature with those in affliction, and the ties and tender affections of friendship seemed, in some cases, to be totally cut asunder,—all seemed to be absorbed with their own individual cases. Several families fled to the country. Though rather timid and sensitive as to visiting the sick, in cases of contagious fevers, he deemed it his duty to remain at his post, publicly and privately exhorting his people to improve the visitation. Prayer-meetings were frequent in various quarters of the town, each night, in places and by persons of whom it could not be said that ‘prayers were wont to be made.’ He united with them, entering in some measure into the spirit as well as into the letter of the noble and patriotic resolution of Nehemiah, ‘Should such a man as I flee?’ as will be seen in the following extract of a letter which communicated to the writer his unlooked-for and much-lamented death. It was written by one of the managers of the chapel, whose friendship and fellowship with him whose death it records were endeared by more than earthly ties, and whose spirit is now rejoicing together with his.

* Inverness, 8th September 1832.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—I feel it a very distressing task to have to communicate to you the melancholy tidings of the death of your very dear brother, and our very dear friend. He returned to Inverness from Glenlyon by the Caledonian coach, on Friday night last, in his usual health and spirits, and preached two animated sermons on Sabbath—very applicable to our present situation—went about on Monday and Tuesday as usual, and attended a prayer-meeting with us on Tuesday evening, when he appeared to be deeply impressed in prayer. He was taken ill at three o’clock on Wednesday morning, since which time he was constantly attended by Doctor Bailie (late of India) and doctors Nicol and Fraser of this town; but their exertions were of no avail! Our valuable friend died at ten minutes to two o’clock (p. m.) yesterday, and was interred in the chapel yard burying-ground at one o’clock this afternoon. His death is an awful visitation to this town, and is the cause of much distress to all who knew him. The feeling of consternation in Inverness is indescribable!—every one expecting his own case to be the next—and I cannot but feel grateful to God, when I open my eyes in the morning without alarm. We have cause to rejoice that many among us are alive to it, and meet for prayer in every quarter of the town night after night. That the Lord may be gracious, and spare sinners until they are made acquainted with ‘His Son, which is life eternal,’ and that you and yours may be supported from Heaven under the present heavy trial, is my ardent prayer. I am, &c.

‘ALEXANDER M’KENZIE.’

Subsequent information from a friend also stated, that during his illness his mind was generally collected; yet that owing to the stupor and spasms that were symptoms of the disease, he often could hardly reflect, or connect a thought, but at intervals. His mind, however, was meekly submissive, and resigned to the will of Heaven, if it should please God that by this visitation he should be called hence. To a friend who mentioned to him he hoped he would recover, he replied, 'We are not warranted to expect miracles,—the over-rulings of the Almighty God are in accordance with the course of his Providence.' After some time he added, 'As a man, as a minister, I have had many comforts—on this however I would rest, He is a just God and a SAVIOUR.' To the doctor who came in soon after, and whom he immediately recognised, he said, 'I gave orders to keep me awake this night, if the stupor and sleep should continue.' The doctor remonstrating against this, he answered in his usual firm and decided manner, 'it is an awful thought—an immortal soul going into eternity, in a perpetual stupor of sleep!' To the Rev. Mr C— who also adopted the truly heroic resolution of Nchemiah, and whose affectionate and assiduous visits were so consolatory, he said after prayer, 'Tell my people—tell them, to make sure of an interest in Christ—that a death-bed is not the time!' The last words he was heard to utter distinctly, to a pious visitor, were, 'Now is the need of Christ!—how precious!' The fatal symptoms of the disease were now rapidly hastening his end. In a few hours he gently reclined his head, and his spirit was received by God who gave it! 'Precious indeed in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them.'"

MORAL AND DEVOTIONAL EFFECTS OF THE STUDY OF NATURAL HISTORY.*

IN treating of the mental effects of the study, and of the pleasures with which it is connected, I have endeavoured to enumerate the principal points—not to bring them forward in detail, and with all their fitting illustrations. In like manner, I shall now attempt to indicate the existence of many veins of precious metal, but not to work any one of them until the mine be exhausted. In one word, it shall be my object rather to suggest trains of thought, than to bring them forward at full length, or attempt to pursue their several ramifications.

It has been already observed, that natural history enlarges our sympathies with all the beings that have life; thus taking our thoughts from the circle of petty cares and selfish exertions which, in the race of worldly competition, is apt to narrow around us. By thus giving us an interest in things beyond ourselves, an interest uncontaminated by even the remotest prospect of gain or loss, it prevents SELF from assuming an undue preponderance as a motive to action, and predisposes the mind and affections to take part in what relates to the well-being of our fellow-creatures.

Its effect in this way is much increased by the habitual tenderness which it generates towards the inferior animals. Humanity to them becomes a constant and active principle of action; and it is scarcely possible that this feeling could exist in full developement, and corresponding activity, and be accompanied by cruelty to our fellow-creatures, or indifference to their suffering. Natural history, therefore, tends to render men humane. In a former place, I have noticed the cheerful and active frame of mind inseparable from this pursuit. If to this we add its unselfish and humane tendencies, it is obvious that the study, if pursued aright, is not without an important influence in cultivating qualities, both of head and heart, of high importance in the performance of our social duties as members of society.

When enumerating the intellectual effects and pleasures attendant on the pursuit, those arising from skill in the structure, and care in the preservation, of animals, were mentioned; but the mental effect is not limited to the production of a transient emotion of pleasure, it is the prelude of a long train of thought, and of the most grateful and reverential feeling towards the Great First Cause. The structural arrangements, admirable as they are, should never be regarded merely as examples of mechanical skill—as evidences of the operations of an Intelligence—as proofs of the existence of a God. They testify not only his existence, but his wisdom, his goodness, and his omnipotence, and should ever be studied with a direct and constant reference to them. The naturalist who, in this humble and truth-seeking spirit, explores the world around him, will ever feel what the poet has expressed—"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good—Almighty!"

If viewed in this light, the actions of the inferior animals become elevated into so many manifestations of the Almighty Intelligence from whom they derive their being. Hence Bennet says, in a brief but happy metaphor, "When I see an insect working at the construction of a nest or a cocoon, I am impressed with respect; because it seems to me that I am at a spectacle where the Supreme Artist is hid behind the curtain."

The instinctive actions of animals, for the nourishment, protection, or defence of their young, will, of course, be referred to HIM by whom such instincts were bestowed; but there are examples of Providential care even more striking—where the young, instead of being thrown on the care of a parent, are gifted for a time with certain organs, which are withdrawn when once the purpose for which they have been given is accomplished. Thus, along our rocky coasts we see the stones covered, for miles, with small white conical-shaped bodies, so minute and so numerous, that fifty of them may sometimes be counted in a superficial space of an inch square. What millions must there be in a few hundred yards! These are known by the name of acorn shells, or Balani, and remain immovably fixed to the rocks on which they are seen. But they were not always thus; in their young state they were diffused throughout the waters, not only by the aid of tides and currents, but also by a striking and beautiful arrangement, under which they became active agents in their own removal to new localities. On their exclusion from the ova, instead of being helpless and quiescent, they swam freely about, by means of organs well adapted for the purpose; and they enjoyed ample power of vision from two pedunculated eyes; at a certain period, they fastened themselves to the rock, lost for life the capability of changing their habitation, the density of their shelly covering increased, and the sense of sight, no longer requisite, was extinguished. "Thus an animal, originally natatory and locomotive, and provided with a distinct organ of sight, becomes permanently and immovably fixed, and its optic apparatus obliterated."

Who can read of these things and not be convinced that the study which supplies such evidence of the goodness and the superintending providence of God, must be in a high degree favourable to devotional feeling? This sentiment deepens in its intensity, if we examine the structure of some of the small marine animals, belonging, like these examples, to the invertebrate order. Instead of rigid and compact masses, of diminutive size, which we might suppose would be those best fitted to stand the warring of the angry elements, we find forms so transparent, so fragile, so abounding with delicate organs, that they at first sight would seem adapted only for summer seas and glassy waters; yet they live amid the tossing waves, and the species survive, from age to age, the fury of the ocean storms.

It is unnecessary to dwell on the fact, that when our attention is given to the minuter parts of creation, we find myriads of happy beings, making the solitary spots more populous than the most crowded cities; and, on the strong assurance it affords that HE "whose tender mercies are over all his works," will not withhold from man the support and protection which is so graciously extended to all the inferior animals. It may not, however, be out of place to remark, that, by a knowledge of the structure and functions of these creatures, of the plants which decorate our submarine rocks, and of those which clothe our isle with verdure, we learn to estimate the mighty and ever-active influences which are at work, both in the air and in the waters, to insure the continuance of the conditions on which their vitality depends. Imperfectly as the subject may, after all, be understood, enough is manifest to show the innumerable affinities which link together the great and the little, the near and the remote, and make the mind revert to HIM by whom so harmonious a system was arranged. "How much of God," says Channing, "may be seen in the structure of a single leaf; which, though so fragile as to tremble in every wind, yet holds connections and living communications with the earth, the air, the clouds, and the distant sun; and, through these sympathies with the universe—is itself a revelation of an Omnipotent Mind."

Before concluding this part of my subject, permit me to remark, that to endeavour to attain some knowledge of the world around us is a duty, inasmuch as all its animated tribes were called into existence by the same beneficent Providence from whom we derive our being. What God has been pleased to create, can never be unworthy of man to study; but the study should ever be prosecuted with a constant reference to the great Author of all. I am glad to fortify the opinions which I have here expressed by that of Archdeacon Paley, whose words may form an appropriate close. "In a moral view, I shall not, I believe, be contradicted when I say, that if one train of thinking be more desirable than another, it is that which regards the phenomena of nature with a constant reference to a supreme intelligent Author. To have made this the ruling, the habitual sentiment of our minds, is to have laid the foundation of every thing which is religious. The world thenceforth becomes a temple, and life itself one continued act of adoration."

THANK-OFFERING.

In every place, in every hour,
Whate'er my wayward lot may be;
In joy or grief, in sun or shower,
Father and Lord! I turn to Thee.

Thee, when the incense-breathing flowers
Pour forth the worship of the spring,
With the glad tenants of the bowers
My trembling accents strive to sing.

Thee, when upon the frozen strand
Winter, begirt with storms, descends;
Thee, Lord! I hail, whose gracious hand
O'er all a guardian care extends.

Thee, when the golden harvests yield
Their treasures to increase our store;
Thee, when through ether's gloomy field
The lightnings flash, the thunders roar;

Thee, when athwart the azure sky
Thy starry hosts their mazes lead,
And when thou sheddest from on high
Thy dewdrops on the flowery mead;

Thee, when my cup of bliss o'erflows—
Thee, when my heart's best joys are fled
Thee, when my breast exulting glows—
Thee, while I bend beside the dead;

Alike in joy and in distress,
Oh! let me trace Thy hand divine;
Righteous in chast'ning, prompt to bless,
Still, Father! may Thy will be mine.

DEATH A WARFARE:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. PETER COSENS,
Minister of Lauder, Berwickshire.

"And there is no discharge in that war."—
ECCLES. vii. 8.

DEATH, which dissolves the connection which now subsists between our souls and our bodies, has been usually exhibited under a variety of appalling images—as a monster devouring his prey with insatiable avidity, as a grim tyrant brandishing a fatal dart, as a pale conqueror riding in triumph, as a cruel enemy whom we must join in battle. These and similar personifications are to be traced to that instinctive dread of death which is deeply rooted in our natures, and which, for wise ends, has been planted in them by the hand of Him who made us. This dread of death, increased, as it generally is, by a sense of guilt, being a very painful feeling, it is not to be wondered at, that men, who are chiefly solicitous to enjoy present ease, should have recourse to various expedients, in order to banish from their minds the thought, and, with it, the dread, of the last enemy. And were serious reflection on this subject fitted to answer no other purpose than to haunt us with terror, we might be justified in excluding it from the sphere of our contemplation. But this cannot be alleged. On the contrary, by familiarizing ourselves to just and scriptural views of death, whilst our dread of it would be diminished, we should be effectually taught the most salutary lessons—moderation in our attachment to earthly pursuits and possessions, the preciousness of time, the necessity of watchfulness and prayer, as well as a conversation becoming the Gospel, and the transcendent importance of being animated by a well-grounded hope of eternal life. The sacred writers, accordingly, ever intent on promoting our best interests, often direct our attention to the solemnities of a dying hour, and urge us, by the most affecting motives, to delay not to make due preparation for its approach. Their warnings are enforced by the scenes which we so frequently witness—of man going to his long home, and the mourners going about the streets! And that we may be more fully roused to thoughtful meditation on our final change, who amongst us is not occasionally called to behold a beloved relative or friend conflicting with the king of terrors, and laid low by his dart? Then, especially, are we reminded of the saying of Solomon, in the text, that “there is no discharge in that war.”

In this Discourse, I propose to set before you the resemblance between death and war, the peculiar character of the war with death, and the means by which we may be fitted to engage in it with safety and success.

I. Death may justly be compared to war, in respect of its origin, the struggle which precedes it, and the consequences which follow in its train.

1. Death, like war, originates in sin.—The origin of war is correctly stated by the Apostle James. “From whence,” asks he, “come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, which war in your members?” We say not that war is universally unlawful; it may, on various occasions, be just and necessary—just, because necessary to repel the unprovoked aggressions of an insulting foe, and to preserve inviolate our civil and religious privileges, which ought to be dearer to us than life itself. Still it is true that war is to be traced to sin as its source—to the avarice and ambition, the jealousy and revenge, which predominate in the breasts, and sway the counsels, of one or other of the contending parties. Had kings, their ministers, and their subjects, in every age and in every land, instead of surrendering themselves to the maddening influence of selfish and malignant passions, steadily listened, as they ought to have done, to the voice of reason and of religion, war, it cannot be doubted, and all its atrocities, would have been unknown. In like manner, if we had continued free from sin, are we not warranted to conclude, that we should not have been assailed with the arrows of death? For it accords with every idea which we are taught to form of the justice and goodness of the Divine Being, that he never inflicts evil on any of his intelligent creatures, who are not chargeable with personal or imputed guilt. If, therefore, he hath permitted the evil of death to spread its ravages amongst the children of men, it must be because, having sinned against him, they deserve this punishment. But on this point we are not left to our own reasonings. It is settled in the records of that Revelation which God himself hath given us. Having made man at first upright, he was pleased to enter into a covenant with him—both for himself and for his posterity, of whom he was the representative—promising life as the reward of obedience, and denouncing death as the punishment of disobedience. “In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.” The threatening plainly implied, that if he had retained his innocence, he would not have died; that both he and his offspring would have been immortal, like the angels in heaven. But, in opposition to the strongest obligations, he transgressed the righteous law of his Creator; he consequently incurred the Divine displeasure, and thus became obnoxious to the stroke of death. Not that the sentence, in all its extent, was carried into execution as soon as he had offended; but, as moral disorder was immediately introduced into his soul, so the seeds of decay were sown in his body. In toil and sorrow, he was doomed to eat his bread all the days of his appointed time; and, at last, he returned to the dust from which he was taken. Thus, according to the Scriptures, “by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death hath passed upon all men, because all have sinned.”

Death, then, like war, must be traced to sin as its source to the sin of the first man, the natural and the federal head of his descendants—a sin which, considered in itself, and in all its circumstances, must be regarded as one of the most aggravated descriptions. This account appears to be strikingly confirmed by the death of infants. They have not sinned after the similitude of Adam’s transgression, being free from actual guilt; yet they die, as well as those who have grown old in iniquity. To suppose that they are cut off, and cut off sometimes by sufferings which awaken the tenderest pity in every feeling spectator, and yet that they are in every respect innocent and holy, is contrary to our most enlightened conceptions of the wisdom and benevolence of the Ruler of the world, who ever doeth that which is right. Why, then, are they visited with death? Because they sinned in Adam, and fell with him in his first transgression, and are, therefore, involved in its consequences. It is, accordingly, said by an inspired apostle, “In Adam all die.”

And whilst the sin of man, by the righteous judgment of God, thus opened the door to the introduction of death, it deserves to be remarked, that, in the case of many, death is brought on them by the direct operation of their own personal sins—their intemperance, licentiousness, and headstrong passions, which lodge them in untimely graves. Can we contemplate death, in its varied aspects, and not be impressed with a deep sense of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, the procuring cause of it, and of all our woe? This is, indeed, the greatest of evils. Let us hate it with a perfect hatred; desire, above all things, to be delivered from its punishment, and from its thralldom, in the way of Divine appointment, and resolutely withstand its assaults, as those of our worst foe.

2. Death may be represented as a war, in respect of the struggle which precedes it.—The modes in which death assails the children of men are, indeed, greatly diversified. Sometimes he inflicts the mortal blow without the slightest warning, and the conflict with him is no sooner begun than it is finished. Such cases, however, are comparatively rare. In general, he advances more gradually, and gives notice, more or less significant, of his approach, by sending before him, as harbingers, those various maladies which hover thick around him. With one or other of these his victims are doomed, for a longer or a shorter period, to struggle; nor is the struggle easily borne. We behold them smitten with acute or lingering disease, which nips the blossoms of health, wastes their frame, and confines them to beds of languishing and pain. The sight of woe deeply affects our hearts, and causes the tear of sympathetic sorrow to start from our eyes. Think what must be the feelings of the sufferers themselves, to whom wearisome nights are appointed—who long for change of posture, but it brings no relief—who, in plaintive accents, tell us of their exhausted strength, and burning heat, and grievous sores—and who, before death hath done its work, are sometimes convulsed with anguish. But this is only a part of the war in which they are involved. They sigh for the return of health, and flatter themselves, for a time, that this or that remedy will be blessed for its restoration. And now, bereaved of the hope of recovery, they see just before them the “house appointed for all living.” To many of them, the prospect is dark indeed. They must bid adieu to weeping relatives, and leave, it may be, an orphan family to the care of strangers; and, what is more alarming still, they must appear in the presence of that God whose laws, in the days of health, they habitually violated, and whose favour they set at nought. Anxiety, remorse, and terror agitate their inmost souls; or, if they should not be greatly oppressed by the recollection of flagrant transgression, and the anticipation of future misery, often do doubts and fears respecting their title to heavenly bliss hang heavy on their spirits, and deepen to their view the gloom of the grave.

We see their bodies shattered by disease, and we commiserate their condition; but could we look into their minds, and trace the feelings with which these are not seldom lacerated, our commiseration would be much more powerfully excited; and, surveying the whole circumstances of their state, we would be ready to exclaim, What war can be compared with theirs? In other wars, the pomp of battle, the tumult of action, the shouts of the brave, and the prospect of victory and promotion, tend to render the soldier insensible to the perils which surround him, and inspire him with enthusiastic fervour. But in the ordinary war with death, such excitements exist not. With this foe we must grapple, as solitary individuals weighed down with the languor and the pain of sickness; and we know that he must prevail. Most trying is the scene. Here, how often has the courage of those heroes, who have defied the dangers of the bloody field, utterly failed them!

3. Death may be considered as a war, on account of the consequences which follow in its train.—It cuts us off from this world. In this respect, it differs from most other wars; for although in these many may be slain, yet some generally outlive the havoc, and are permitted, in safety or but slightly wounded, to revisit their native home. But when our war with death is terminated, we shall no more return to the place which now knows us. Our connection with time is dissolved, and dissolved for ever. If we leave behind us those who loved us as their own souls—a partner united to us by ties of the tenderest affection, a parent whose declining years it was our delight to gladden, or children dependent on us for their daily bread, or friends who looked up to us for direction and aid in the journey of life—to them how piercing is the thought, that they shall see us no more on earth! They weep and are in bitterness, and for a season refuse to be comforted. What desolation, also, does death spread over our bodies, which we now so carefully cherish, and in the construction and preservation of which the Divine wisdom, power, and goodness shine forth with such conspicuous lustre! Deprived of the living principle, they must be consigned to the noisome grave, where they are soon reduced into their kindred elements. Our spirits, indeed, survive the shock of dissolution—over them death has no power; but they, too, experience a mighty change. Dislodged from their earthly tenements, they return unto God, from whom they came; and, according to the deeds done in the body, are doomed to dwell in the regions of darkness and despair, or admitted to the mansions of heavenly rest. Even to those who are received into those mansions of rest, death is an enemy, although it be their last enemy, and an enemy which shall be destroyed; for it detains their bodies, a constituent part of their natures, in a state of separation from their souls, and, till the morning of the resurrection, prevents their full fruition of celestial bliss.

Such are some of the disastrous consequences of death; and when you advert to these, as well as to its origin, and to the struggle by which it is usually preceded, are you not prepared to admit that it is, with peculiar propriety, compared to a war?

II. I direct your attention to the peculiar character of this war. It is, that “in it there is no discharge.”—In other wars, all are not compelled to engage. Many, by reason of infirmity, are unfit for military service; and, unless our country itself become the theatre of hostilities, the majority of the inhabitants are permitted to remain at home under their vine and fig-tree. And of those who embark in other wars, some may obtain a discharge; while others, by desertion, may be able to effect their escape. But “there is no discharge in the war” with death. From this, neither sex, nor age, nor wealth, nor rank, nor power, nor wisdom, nor goodness, can procure exemption. The young and the old, the rich and the poor, the mighty and the mean, the conqueror of many lands and those whom he has subjected to his sway, must, willingly or unwillingly, war with death and fall under its killing stroke. For "it is appointed unto men once to die;" and the appointment is fixed by the irreversible decree of Him who made us. Who, then, can elude the grasp of the universal destroyer? We may scrupulously shun the quarters of infectious disease—we may guard our health with the strictest vigilance—we may fly to more genial climes—we may follow the advice of the ablest physicians—we may pour forth our tears and our supplications; but, in spite of all our precautions and efforts, our war with the last enemy is inevitable. "There is no man who hath power to retain the spirit, neither hath he power in the day of death."

Where, accordingly, are all the former generations of men? All, levelled by the hand of death, have vanished from the present scene. And not more certain is it that we now live, than that the day is approaching when we must follow them into the land of forgetfulness. Nor from any of us can that day be very distant. "Threescore and ten, or fourscore years," bound the period of our mortal existence; and you, who are aged, can feelingly tell us with what imperceptible swiftness these glide away. But, respecting many of us, it is true that these years shall not be ours. Time, how uncertain! Some, in the morning of life, who but lately were vigorous in health, and who, with the ardour natural to youth, cherished the fond expectation of seeing many revolving seasons—where, now, are they? Cut down by the hand of death, they have no more a share in any thing that is done under the sun. What has befallen them may soon happen to us. We "know not what a day may bring forth." To-morrow, this night, we may be summoned to the mortal conflict. Of this, at least, we are sure, that to us "there is no discharge in that war."

Since, brethren, we must all, sooner or later, engage in that war, let the affecting consideration incite us to regard each other as fellow-sufferers, exposed to the same fearful perils—to lay aside those enmities which embitter private and social life—to do good unto all men, as we have opportunity—to soothe and succour those who are entering the lists with death—and, above all, to labour that we ourselves may be prepared for the combat.

III. This leads me to point out the means by which we may be fitted to engage in the war with death, with safety and success.—This part of the subject merits our deepest attention. For, if we must die, and if death transmit us to a state of unchangeable happiness or misery, of what importance is it that we should be fortified against the servile dread of this enemy, and so armed for encountering him, that he shall not be able to inflict on us any real injury! Many, in all ages, neither weary of the world nor insensible to future realities, have looked forward to death with calm composure, and have at last met it, in its most appalling shapes, with fearless intrepidity and even triumphant joy. How enviable their state of mind! By what means may it be ours? The only effectual instrument by which we can be fitted to engage in the war with death, is faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the sublime doctrines of his Gospel—that faith by which we cordially receive his instructions, rely on his obedience unto death, as the sole ground of our acceptance with God, and yield a willing subjection to his laws—which "purifieth the heart, worketh by love, and produceth in the life the peaceable fruits of righteousness." In various ways does this divine principle prepare us for warring with death. It secures to us the forgiveness of sin; it detaches our hearts from this world; it gives us an interest in the Divine promises of adequate support; and it inspires us with the well-grounded hope of immortal felicity.

1. Faith in Jesus delivers us from the fear of death, by securing to us the forgiveness of sin.—Sin is the sting of death. It not only brought death into the world, but it is that which gives to death its chief bitterness; for it is not the mere pain of dying which so much awakens terror in the breasts of the careless and the irreligious, as they approach their latter end; it is the prospect of something worse than death—it is conscious guilt galling them with remorse, and pointing their views to the judgment of the great day, and those dismal abodes "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Nor are their fears imaginary; sin, how lightly soever some may now think of it, is that abominable thing which God hateth; it is the transgression of his holy law; it spreads anarchy and misery through his creation; it is of all evils the most tremendous in itself, and the most pernicious in its consequences; and against it, therefore, the righteous Ruler of the universe hath denounced his heaviest displeasure. "Cursed," saith he, "is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." "The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment." These are the true sayings of God, who best knows what is the evil and demerit of sin, and who will not fail to execute his threatenings on the impenitent children of disobedience. Need we wonder, then, that they whose consciences tell them that they have lived in a state of alienation from him, and in the violation of one or other of his laws, should be filled with alarm when they think on their conflict with death, which shall terminate their period of trial, and bring them before the tribunal of judgment? By various artifices of their own devising, or suggested by the "father of lies," they may attempt to calm their distressing fears, and they may succeed, for a season, in speaking to themselves "peace, when there is no peace;" but certain it is, that never shall we possess solid tranquillity in the view of death, and never shall we meet it in safety till we be delivered from the coming wrath by the divine forgiveness of our sins. And how is this to be obtained? In one way, and in one way only—through a true and living faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Agreeably to divine appointment, he gave himself for our sins, substituting himself in our place; he fulfilled, in the perfect obedience of his life, the precept of the law which we had broken, and endured its penalty in his own body on the cross; he thus “magnified the law, and made it honourable,” and bath “brought in an everlasting righteousness,” for our justification. And to give us the most satisfying assurance of his entire approbation of what he did and suffered in our behalf, God raised him up from the dead, and exalted him to glory at his own right hand. Now, it is by faith in him, as “delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification;” coming unto him “weary and heavy laden;” looking unto him, as our all-sufficient and only Saviour, and drawing near unto the Father by him—that we receive a personal interest in the benefits of his mediation. Hence, it is expressly said, that “he who believeth in him shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life; and that, by him, all who believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses.” United to him by genuine faith, we are accordingly freed from condemnation; we have “redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sin;” and, though naturally afar off, we are brought nigh unto God, as our reconciled God and Father. In these happy circumstances, death can do us no essential harm; it cannot send us to the region of punishment, for our pardon is sealed; and therefore, strong in faith, we may anticipate its approach without heart-sinking dismay, and when it comes to call us hence, we may sing, “O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? The sting of Death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord!”

2. Faith in Jesus fits us for encountering death, by detaching our hearts from the world.—In consequence of our apostasy from God, all of us by nature are inordinately attached to the possessions and enjoyments of this present world. These occupy the highest place in our hearts, about these our thoughts are principally employed, and from these we seek our supreme felicity. Hence it is, that so many lend a deaf ear to the offers of a spiritual and eternal salvation, or delay to comply with these, till a future, and, as they imagine, more convenient season; and hence, too, it is, that death appears to them surrounded with terrific gloom. How, indeed, can it appear to them in more pleasing colours? Their best affections centre on the riches, honours, and pleasures of time,—these constitute their only portion; but from these death cuts them off for ever, while it introduces them into a land where no provision is made for their happiness—where, on the contrary, by their irreligious indifference and earthly-mindedness, they have “treasured up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgments of God.” With what cheerless hearts, then, with what boding terror, must they engage in war with their relentless foe! “O my soul, come not thou into their secret; with such, mine honour, be not thou united.”

Who does not perceive, that the less closely our affections are entwined about things seen and temporal, and the more ardently and steadily they are fixed on those things which are unseen and eternal, the less reluctant we shall be to leave the former behind us, and the more desirous we shall be to gain possession of the latter—and consequently, the better prepared we shall be to die in safety and with comfort? Now, “who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.” Faith in Jesus, and in his Word, teaches us to use this world so as not to abuse it; it makes us, indeed, diligent in the business of our secular callings, that we may “provide things honest in the sight of all men;” but it will not permit us to regard these as our chief good. It sets before us, in an impressive light, the unsatisfying nature and transitory duration of all earthly comforts, and continually reminds us that “the fashion of this world passeth away;” it renders the salvation of the soul, in our estimation, the one thing needful; it leads us to hold fellowship with God and with Christ, and to delight in those devotional exercises which tend to purify, spiritualize, and elevate our affections; it imparts to us joys of which he who partakes thirsts not after the polluted streams of earthly pleasure; and, as “the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen,” it directs our views beyond the grave to an inheritance “incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.” Thus does it wean our hearts from undue attachment to the world; and by reducing its value in our esteem, and exciting in us longing desires after celestial treasures, it strips death of his frightful visage, and disposes us to regard him, not so much as an enemy, but rather as a friend, commissioned to conduct us to our heavenly home.

3. Faith gives us an interest in the divine promises of adequate support in conflicting with death.—The promises of the Gospel are made to those only who believe in Jesus, its glorious Author, and study, in dependence on his grace, to live under its sanctifying influence. These are exceedingly great and precious, being admirably adapted to cheer them in the most trying situations; and in Christ they are “all yea, and in him amen.” Many of them are fulfilled to the believer, as he journeys through the wilderness; and they are also at hand to uphold him in his passage through “the swellings of Jordan.” “I,” saith Jehovah, “will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. As thy day is, so shall thy strength be. Fear not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the floods, they shall not overflow thee.” Such are some of the promises made to him when he is called to encounter death. The very belief of these is exhib-larating; but he derives more consolation than what a mere belief of them is fitted to afford,—reposing in them unshaken faith, he humbly yet fervently pleads, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ would accomplish them in his happy experience. Nor does he plead in vain. The grace which they hold forth is seasonably imparted to him; God is present with him of a truth, “teaching his fingers to fight, and his hands to war,” confirming his patience, nerving his courage, speaking peace to his soul, and sometimes filling him with joy unspeakable and full of glory.” This is no exaggerated description, for it has often been realized by believers during their last illness, and when falling under the power of death.

4. Faith fits us for engaging in the war with death, by inspiring us with the well-grounded hope of a blessed immortality.—Hope is the balm of human life; and hope also can sustain us when we enter the “valley of the shadow of death.” But there is a hope which maketh ashamed; such is the hope of the hypocrite—of the self-righteous, and of the heartless professor of godliness. The hope of these, rests on no solid basis; it will probably desert them at the last hour; or, if it should remain till they open their eyes in eternity, it will then for ever vanish, and leave them in the blackness of darkness. O, my brethren, let us beware of deluding ourselves with this groundless hope, and aspire after the solid hope of the Christian believer. His hope is built on the finished and accepted work of Immanuel, “for other foundations can no man lay;” and being sanctioned by conscious integrity, and progressive improvement in holiness, it shall never disappoint him. Such is the good hope which his faith implants, cherishes and matures in his breast.

Nor is it difficult to perceive that this must powerfully contribute to fortify him in his struggle with death. For what are the objects of his hopes as set before him in the Gospel? That, when absent from the body, he shall be present with the Lord, in that happy land, where there is no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, nor pain,—that his soul shall mingle with the spirits of the just made perfect—that he shall join the society of pious departed friends, to part no more—that he shall enjoy immediate communion with Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and with God, the Judge of all,—that, as Jesus died and rose again, so also them “who sleep in him will he bring with him.” The believer, therefore, looks forward to the day, when his body “sown in corruption, shall be raised in incorruption; sown in weakness, shall be raised in power; sown in dishonour, shall be raised in glory, fashioned like unto Christ’s own glorious body;” and when soul and body being purified from every imperfection, and joined in blissful union, he shall experience happiness suited to his enlarged capacities, without interruption and without an end. These are the hopes which his faith warrants him to cherish; and enlivened by these, need we wonder, that instead of shudder-ing at death, though nature may sometimes recoil from it, he should be disposed to hail its arrival, saying, “I have a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better?”

I have thus shown you, that death is a war—that it is a war in which there is no discharge, and that it is by means of a living faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who, “through death destroyed death, and him that had the power of death, even the devil,” that we can be prepared to meet death, as a vanquished foe. Are any of you destitute of this precious principle? Then are you without Christ, without God, and without hope; and continuing in your present state you must war with death, naked and defenceless; and pierced with his envenomed shafts, you must descend, polluted and guilty, into the chambers of the second death. Examine yourselves, whether ye be indeed in the faith; and try yourselves, I beseech you, by this infallible mark of Christian discipleship. Do you regard sin as your worst enemy, and wage with it incessant war? To this holy warfare, too, many even of professed believers, are utter strangers. They live on terms of amity with sin; or, if conscience should occasionally prompt them to resist its assaults, their efforts are feeble and desultory; they yield themselves to its control, and permit it to lead them captive at its pleasure. This is not, this cannot be, the case with those to whom the Gospel hath come in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. For, although sin still dwell in them, and struggle hard to regain its former dominion, yet they persevere in resolutely opposing it, in its varied forms; if it prevail against them, they are filled with shame and sorrow,—with redoubled energy, they renew the combat; and guided by the Captain of their salvation, and strong in his grace, they go on, conquering and to conquer. Let us, in this manner, war a good warfare with indwelling sin, habitually aiming at its utter destruction, and then we need not fear the war with death; and if we would war this good warfare, let us take to ourselves the whole armour of God, more especially the shield of faith, the helmet of hope, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, continuing instant in prayer.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Different degrees of Grace.—We must not think that every believer will attain to the same measure of grace. There is a measure appointed for every member or joint of this body; “and every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part.” Eph. iv. 16. God hath more ado with some than with others; there is more strength required in an arm or leg than in a finger or toe; and every one should be content with his measure, so far as not to fret or repine against God and his dispensations, that makes them but a finger, and not an arm of the body; and do their duty in their station, fighting against sin, according to the measure or grace dispensed to them of the Lord, and that faithfully and constantly; and not quarrel with God, that he maketh us not as free of temptations and corruptions as some others; for the captain must not be blamed for commanding some of his soldiers to this post where they never once see the enemy, and others to that post where they must continually fight. The soldier is here under command, and therefore must be quiet, and take his lot; so must the Christian reverence the Lord's dispensations, in ordering matters so as they shall never have one hour's quietness, while others have more rest and peace, and stand at their post fighting, resolving never to yield, but rather to cover the ground with their dead bodies, till the commander-in-chief think good to relieve them. Sure I am, as the only wise God hath distributed to every member of the body as he hath thought good, so it is the duty of every member to endeavour this holy submission to him, as to the measure of grace, considered as his free gift bestowed on them; and to be humbled for the grudgings of his heart, because God hath not given him more talents. And sure I am, though this submission make no great noise in the world, yet really this is one of the highest degrees of grace attainable here, and such an ornament of a meek and quiet spirit as is in the sight of God of great price; so that whoever have attained to this, have the very grace they seem to want, and more. Yet, lest this should be abused, let me add a word or two of caution, to qualify this submission.

1st. There must be with it a high prizing even of that degree of grace which they want. 2d. There must be a panting after grace, as it is God's image, and a conformity to him; and with so much singleness, as they may be in case to say, without the reproachings of their heart, they do not so much love holiness for heaven, as heaven for holiness. 3d. There must be an unceasingness in using all means, whereby the growth of grace may be promoted to this end, that they may be conformed to his image, rather than that they may be comforted. 4th. There must be also a deep humiliation for the want of that degree of grace they would have, as it importeth the want of so much conformity to him to whose image they are predestinated to be conformed; which will very well consist with this submission we are speaking of.—BROWN. (Christ the Way, the Truth, and the Life.)

"They drank of the Rock."—This is not a transient supply. The stream from Horeb ran in the wilderness constantly. Neither a burning sun nor a thirsty soil could dry it up, nor distance nor time lessen it. During eight and thirty years, it followed Israel in all their wanderings. At Kadesh, indeed, it failed,—why, we know not, but the miracle was again renewed, and the people still "drank of the rock that followed them," till they entered Canaan. Thus constant in its communication is the grace of Christ. It is lasting, as it is abundant. It took its rise in the eternal ages that are gone; it entered the world as soon as sin had made a way for it; it has ever since been flowing on like a mighty river, widening and deepening as it goes, and it will flow on as long as there is a mourner to be comforted, or a sinner to be cleansed. No draught can exhaust, nor cold arrest it. And in eternity the stream of grace shall not be lost; it will be seen in heaven a pure river of life, "making glad the city of our God," a sea of salvation, an ocean of blessedness.—REV. C. BRADLEY.

The Wonders of the Incarnation.—How astonishing, how gracious, and how instructive, the condescension of the Son of God, in being born, and that too in so abject circumstances! Who is this of whom we are speaking? Who is this of whom we learn such strange things? This is the Word of God, who in the beginning was with God, and who was God, by whom, and for whom all things were made; and this Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. He who created whatever exists without life, from the huge planet that rolls in the widest fields of space to the veriest atom that dances in the sunbeam, and whatever exists with life, from the noble seraph who adores before the celestial throne to the smallest insect that creeps in the dust: He by whom all things are upheld, and on whose shoulder rests the government of nature, of providence, and grace: He who sits on the throne of heaven, while its hosts adore him as worthy to receive blessing, and glory, and honour, and power. He descended from that lofty eminence to this low earth. He stooped to assume the form of a creature of his own hand. He became man, and was born of a woman! If such an one was to have been born at all, we should have supposed that it would have been in the noblest and wealthiest station of life; that his parents would have been royal; that his birth-place would have been a palace; that the room where he first drew the breath of life would have been a spacious, splendid, carpeted, gilded, and canopied apartment; that the first ladies of the land would have been contending for the honour and the pleasure of waiting on the heavenly Babe; that his clothing would have been the very finest which could be furnished; and that his cradle would have been a masterpiece of ingenious, and beautiful, and costly workmanship. But no. "Is not this the carpenter's son," said they, "and is not his mother called Mary; and his other connections, are they not all mean persons in the midst of us?" He was a root out of a dry ground; and when he came, there was no earthly splendour to attract the carnal eye, but, on the contrary, much poverty to repel it. Instead of being lodged in a palace, Joseph and Mary could not obtain admittance into an inn; undervalued and repulsed, they bent their weary steps to the stable;—and there Mary, having brought forth that Son on whose head the increasing blessings of ransomed millions of the human race are now multiplying, and will throughout eternity be multiplied, wrapped him in such plain clothes as she could furnish, and then cradled him in a manger! Was there ever any thing at all comparable to this? Let not familiarity with this history lessen its importance in our view. How astonishing the whole! The eternal Word became a helpless babe. He who "made the cloud a garment, and thick darkness a swaddling band for the sea," was himself wrapped in swaddling bands. Nay, "He whose are the cattle on a thousand hills, and all the flocks that graze the green earth,—he whose dwelling-place is the fairest mansion of heaven's brightness and blessedness,—he, when he was coming into the world, was refused admittance into the dwelling-place of human beings, was treated as if he had been on a level with the beasts of the stall,—in a word, (for what can be said or conceived half so affecting?) was born in a stable and laid in a manger!" Never let the wonders of this event lessen in our view. Never, when we think of it, let us cease to admire and adore.—REV. JAMES FOOTE. (Lectures on the Gospel according to Luke.)

ON THE CRIME OF THE SMITING EGYPTIAN, AND THE VINDICATION OF MOSES FOR SLAYING HIM.

BY THE REV. GEORGE A. SIMPSON,
Minister of Tyrie, Aberdeenshire.

PART I.

THOUGH MOSES was very meek above all the men which were upon the face of the earth, and though he almost uniformly exhibited such a temper, during the whole of the peculiarly trying circumstances in which he was so long and so critically placed; yet the very first recorded transaction of his public life would seem to militate against his possession of such a character. The circumstances attendant on his education, and his prospects in the world, were, indeed, hostile to the formation of such a temper, and to the fostering and maintenance of any principles of affection for his father's house. Bred up in the court of Pharaoh—adopted, through the generous affection of his benefactress,* into the monarch's family—vested with the usual rank, power, and influence of a favourite with one nearly allied to the reigning prince—accustomed to have every wish immediately gratified—taught, perhaps, to consider the advancement of his secular interest as the only proper pursuit of life—and alienated apparently, by his princely rank and prospects, as well as by the policy of Pharaoh and his councillors, from all connection with his humbled and proscribed kinsmen of Israel;—yet his heart, uncorrupted by the heartless indifference and selfish pursuits of a courtly life, or by the engrossing cares of worldly ambition, still cherished, still beat with the warmest affection for his brethren—still entered keenly into all their sorrows, and sought, through the exercise of sympathy, and by every possible and prudent method, to mitigate, though he could not effectually relieve, their oppressive burdens. Actuated by these principles and feelings of brotherly affection,—an inseparable accompaniment of a meek and generous temper, and one of its most pleasing, as well as most expressive and legitimate developments,—he had one day, when arrived at years of maturity, gone out, in his wonted manner, “to see his brethren, and to look upon their burdens;” and, in so doing, it is said (Exodus ii. 11, 12), “that he spied an Egyptian smiting a Hebrew, and that he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand,”—a proceeding seemingly altogether at variance with the character of the meekest of all men. It will, indeed, be no justification of Moses' conduct on this occasion to say, that the parties were engaged in a petty pugilistic broil, so customary among men, and especially among men of different tribes and nations, differing so much in their customs and manners as the Hebrews and Egyptians did—the latter accounting the shepherd Hebrews as an abomination in their sight. The Egyptian was exercising a too severe correctionary punishment on the Hebrew—a near kinsman, say some, of Moses—or in the exercise of his official capacity as one of the “taskmasters,” as he probably was, † he was inflicting a capricious or too * Josephus mentions, that this princess, whom he calls Thermuthis, having no child of her own, was so peculiarly struck with the singular beauty of Moses, and so delighted with the extraordinary endowments of his mind, and the great proficiency he was making in Egyptian literature (the Scriptures speak of his being “learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians”), as well as by his affectionate and generous disposition, that she not only adopted him for her son, but wished her father to appoint him for his successor; that, for this purpose, she one day, in a playful humour, brought the Hebrew boy into her father's presence, sportively saying, that “I have brought a child, who is of a divine form and of a generous mind; and as I have received him from the bounty of the river, in a wonderful manner, I have thought proper to adopt him for my son, and the heir of thy kingdom.” In the same playfulness of disposition, and to humour her affection for her founding child, the king tenderly embraced him, and sportively taking the crown from his own brow, placed it upon the head of the Hebrew boy. But the boy instantly cast the glittering, but burdensome, haube to the ground, and trampled it under his feet. This puerile action of Moses was regarded as an ill omen for the Egyptian kingdom, and excited the indignation of the scribe, who had formerly predicted that a Hebrew boy should be born who should one day bring the Egyptian dominion low, and asserting that this was the predicted “humbler of Egypt,” he attempted to kill Moses; but Thermuthis instantly snatched up her beloved protégé, and hurried away with him from the king's presence. Josephus, however, says that the king was not hasty to slay him; God himself, whose providence protected Moses, inclining the king to spare him; and that he was educated with great care.

† The traditions of the Jews put another construction on the origin of the conflict between the smiting Egyptian and the smitten Hebrew. They say, that this Hebrew had a beautiful wife called Thermuthis, and that the Egyptian had attempted to commit adultery with her, but that the Hebrew made every effort to defend the honour of his wife and family. This story, if true, would only heighten the guilt of the Egyptian, and render him more worthy of death. But we have no warrant from Scripture to say what were the original grounds of the contest, and we are not to credit the unauthenticated traditions of the Jews.

severe and unnecessary chastisement on this bondman of Pharaoh, on account of any real, or apparent, or imaginary negligence on his prescribed work, as he was labouring in the field afar off from his brethren, or from the rod and the eye of his taskmasters. It will not do, we say, to allege that such a corporeal chastisement, on whatever account given, could warrant the summary and most dreadful vengeance taken by Moses on the offending or even oppressing Egyptian; for surely some milder and equally effective measures might have been employed, by the meek Moses, to prevent the recurrence of such personal injuries, to rescue his countryman from the hands of his more powerful and conquering assailant, and to punish the vengeful tyrant, than the horrible one of slaughtering him. But the case is somewhat altered in its complexion, when it can be shown, and we hope to be able to show, by an appeal to the original, that the Egyptian, whether as only a private and obscure but quarrelsome individual, or whether as a petty but irritable and tyrannical official, proud of his little brief authority, was not only smiting with a view to inflict the usual correctionary chastisement of the task-master, but was actually murdering, or rather was attempting to murder, the weak and poor, the solitary, friendless, vanquished Israelite. Our translation, indeed, does not warrant, though it may ambiguously imply, such a construction of the conduct of the Egyptian; for it only charges him with the offence of “smiting”—a rather indefinite expression, which may infer the slightest personal injury, as well as the greatest bodily harm, the usual castigation of the truant, heedless schoolboy, or the lashing of the negligent slave, or the effusion of blood without any danger to the life, as well as the wounding to the deprivation of the life of the victim. But if we refer to the original, we shall find that the term translated “smiting,” admits not of any restricted indefinite construction in the case more immediately under review; for it is only a different term, in a different conjugation of the same Hebrew verb, afterwards translated “he slew.” The Hebrew verb nakah, from which both are taken, indeed, signifies to smite, to strike, to kill. It generally signifies the act of percussion, on whatever account, or by whatever means, the percussion is given; and it specially implies the smiting of man by man, either to their wounding or not, by any comparatively harmless instrument, or by any deadly weapon—such as a sword, a spear, &c.;* and it is employed in various senses in Scripture—as smiting by disease, by pestilence, by hail, by wild beasts, or other means of correction, judgment, and death. But here the question, as to the nature of the punishment or extent of injury contemplated, will not admit of the least ambiguity; because the attempt of Moses to conceal from the knowledge of men the ultimate issue of his interference in his countryman's cause, by the hiding of the Egyptian's body in the sand, evidently shows the fatal termination of the conflict in regard to the foreigner—in the smiting of him to the destruction

tery with her, but that the Hebrew made every effort to defend the honour of his wife and family. This story, if true, would only heighten the guilt of the Egyptian, and render him more worthy of death. But we have no warrant from Scripture to say what were the original grounds of the contest, and we are not to credit the unauthenticated traditions of the Jews.

* See Stockii Clavis, on the verb nakah.

of life—and hence justifies the translation of the verb, by “he slew;” and also by the malicious testimony of the angry and wrong-doing Hebrew on the second day, and by his designation of the act of Moses towards the Egyptian, by the employment of the expressive Hebrew verb harag, which simply and unequivocally signifies to kill—to destroy,—“Intendest thou to kill me, (halharegni,) as thou killest (haragta) the Egyptian?” and also by the admitted testimony of Moses himself, when, through fear of the vengeance of Pharaoh, he fled to the land of Midian. “Now when Pharaoh heard this, he sought to slay Moses; but Moses fled.” And surely, if the verb is to be taken in one sense, and in what sense we have just now seen; it is to be taken in the latter part or issue of the transaction; and it is so rendered most justly in our translation, we cannot conceive why, on any principles of sound criticism, (though it must be admitted, that by the construction and even poverty of the Hebrew language, the same Hebrew words are often to be taken in a different sense, even in the same sentence,) it should be construed in a different or less rigorous sense in the smiting of the Hebrew. Now, if the Hebrew verb is to be taken in its worst and most comprehensive sense, then it follows, that the mahkek, translated “smiting,” as belonging to that conjugation (pihel) which implies the diligent performance of the subject of action, must imply that the Egyptian was diligently employed in murdering the Hebrew; that he was obstinately bent on perpetrating the murderous deed; that nothing but absolute compulsion could prevent him from fulfilling his fell intention; and that, therefore, Moses was obliged to use that compulsion; and, as he imagined, could only save his countryman’s life, and probably, too, his own (if he was not actuated by other motives, as we shall soon see that he was actuated by other motives—even by a warrant from Heaven to act in a judicial capacity), by the slaughter of the inveterate and vengeful Egyptian. It may be said, could not Moses, after the failure of the mild and gentle methods of calm expostulation, no doubt employed by him on this, as in the second day’s transactions, and also by the weight and influence of his princely rank and power in Pharaoh’s house, at Pharaoh’s court, to turn the Egyptian from his meditated and attempted sanguinary purpose, have, with the same strength as conquered the Egyptian, or, if that had not been altogether sufficient, yet with the combined strength of the rescued Hebrew, whom he might call to his assistance, and who would willingly second him; have bound the Egyptian, and thus prevented him from exercising any farther violence against them both? Or could he not have carried him, as a murderous culprit, detected in the very act, to the nearest tribunal, delivered him over to the hands of justice, and permitted the law to execute its sentence upon him? But from the brevity and obscurity of the narrative, it is impossible to say in what actual state of personal strength the murderous assault had left the smitten Hebrew; or whether he was able to assist Moses in the defence of himself—for he would have to defend himself from the assault of the ferocious Egyptian; or in the capture of the manslayer—for though we know, from the circumstances of the interference of Moses, and of his treatment of the Egyptian becoming known, which it could only have been through the instrumentality of the Hebrew reporting it to his countrymen; for at the time there was no man in the field, as the narrative expressly intimates, save Moses, the Hebrew, and the Egyptian—he must have survived the fray; but it may be probable that he had been so severely beaten and wounded, as to be reduced to that degree of debility that he was incapable of lending the least aid to Moses in his own defence, or in the capture of the ruthless Egyptian. It is true, if he was indeed, as he may have been, though not very probably, the quarrelsome Hebrew who was found maltreating his brother Israelite on “the second day,” (if we are to interpret that as meaning on the morrow, which is not at all likely,) and to whom Moses addressed the expostulation, “Wherefore smitest” (the same Hebrew verb, but in a different sense) “thou thy fellow?” he must not have been severely wounded in the first contest; or must have speedily recovered his strength, and must at the time have been capable of lending aid to Moses, in conquering the common assailant of both. But though Moses had in obedience to a law, enacted in Egypt,—and, perhaps, prevalent there at the time, (a law, indeed, of all nations) as quoted by Diodorus Siculus: and referred to in Stackhouse’s “History of the Bible,” “that whoever saw his fellow-creature either killed by another, or violently assaulted, and did not apprehend the murderer, or rescue the oppressed, if he could; or, if he could not, made no information thereof to the magistrate; himself should be put to death,”—had captured, bound, and dragged the culprit before the legal tribunals of the land, what justice could be expected from, or what punishment would be awarded by, a set of judges from Pharaoh downwards to the pettiest magistrate in the state, when every official was, by the decree of the king, commanded to help in oppressing, and even exterminating, the sons of Israel? And besides, would not the Egyptian neutralize the evidence of Moses, and justify himself in the eyes of a jealous monarch and jealous magistracy, by pleading that he was only exercising a necessary correction, in the discharge of his duty as a taskmaster; and also by the malicious insinuation, that Moses was instigating his countryman to rebellion; and thus, turning the tables against his accuser, involve the prosecutor in death? The man, then, though guilty of the crime of murder, having committed it in his heart, being actuated by malice prepense, being obstinately determined to commit it, and being actually caught in the diligent and reckless attempt to commit it, yet would, under a partial, prejudiced, and corrupt magistracy, have escaped scathless and free, and been at liberty to satiate his increased malice and ire against his captors and accusers.

THE SWELLINGS OF THE JORDAN.

BY THE REV. J. A. WYLIE,

Dollar, Clackmannanshire.

ISSUING from the foot of Hermon, the Jordan pursues its course to the south, along the great valley of Syria, passing through the lakes Merom and Gennesareth, and emptying itself at last into the Dead Sea, whence it finds no outlet. As it proceeds onward, sometimes with a rapid motion and a murmuring noise, at other times with a smooth and silent flow, its stream, which is considerable at first, is greatly augmented by numerous rivulets, which descend from the hills of Galilee and Judea, on the one side, and from those of Gilead and Abarim, on the other; so that the volume of water which it daily rolls into the bitter ocean at its bottom is very great. Shaw computed its breadth, where it enters the Dead Sea, at thirty yards; its depth, at three; and, estimating the average rate of its flow at two miles an hour, he concluded that its daily discharge of water would amount to upwards of six millions of tons. As it nears the lake, its windings become more numerous; "as it were," says Sandys, "to delay his ill destinie."

The breadth of the valley through which it flows is here about fifteen miles, and the course of the stream is nearly in the middle of it; having, on the east, the plains of Moab, bounded by the range of Abarim; with Nebo looking over the valley. The plains on the west are still more desolate than those on the east, and are bounded by the high mountains of Judea. Approaching the Jordan, we come first to a shallow valley, of nearly a mile in breadth; descending into it, we find its bottom covered with long grass, tall reeds, oleanders, tamarisks, and low brushwood. Making our way through the thickest, we arrive at the stream, which we find flowing between banks of sand, "without bloom or verdure." From a height of perhaps fifteen feet, we look down on its clear and pure waters, and can distinctly perceive the pebbly bottom over which they roll. Its breadth, at any point where we may happen to visit it south of Jericho, will be found to be much the same as where it enters the Dead Sea—from eighty to a hundred feet. In January, when the river is at the lowest, its waters are found generally from ten to fifteen feet below their banks; but in May, when the snows begin to melt on Hermon, the stream overflows, and covers the whole of the lower valley, but never rises so high as to encroach on the upper plain. On these occasions, the panthers, tigers, and other beasts of prey which haunt its jungles, are dislodged by the stream; and the figure of the prophet may be seen verified—"A lion from the swelling of Jordan." The earlier travellers, who did not visit it at the proper season, were surprised at what they conceived its shrunk dimensions, and doubted whether the Jordan overflowed his banks, as he did of old times; but later visitors, having gone at the proper time for seeing the river in his ancient grandeur, have ascertained that the Jordan still observes his periodical overflowings. Professor Robinson visited the river on the 10th of May. "It was now the time of wheat harvest in the valley," says he, "and we found the river, as of old, overflowing the banks of its ordinary channel."

Three thousand years ago, the banks of the stream at this point were the scene of memorable events. An invisible hand held back its rolling flood, and while its waters were gathered in heaps above, "the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan," and the tribes passed over, and entered on the promised possessions. On this plain the bannered host assembled; and, as they gazed around on the teeming beauty and fertility of the region, they must have felt that all was, indeed, true which Jehovah had spoken regarding the "land flowing with milk and honey." Behind them was a noble river, which rolled its waters along their ancient channel, now that the "ransomed of the Lord" had passed over: on either hand was a vast plain, stretching out almost beyond the eye, laden with grain, for it was "the time of harvest:" in front was a range of olive-covered hills, and at their bottom were seen the towers and battlements of Jericho, gleaming through palm-trees. Here, too, at the beginning of the Gospel, events of great interest took place. At Beth-abarra, the house of passage, John began to baptize, and to proclaim to the multitudes who thronged the banks of the Jordan, from "all Judea and Galilee," "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world!" And it is probable, that at this spot Christ submitted to the rite of baptism, at the hands of his harbinger. In memory of these events, and from an idea that a greater degree of holiness attaches to this part of the river than to any other, it is annually visited, at the time of Easter, by all the pilgrims who happen to be in Jerusalem; and it is difficult to say, whether folly or superstition be more conspicuous in the scene that is here enacted.

The procession is composed of persons of all ages, sexes, and nations,—the lively Greek, the grave Oriental, the dark Copt, and the fair Russian. Every beast of burden in Jerusalem is pressed into the service—horses, asses, mules, and camels. The young and aged are carried in panniers, slung on either side of the beast of burden. Those who are unable to provide the means of conveyance are obliged to walk on foot; but, of all others, he is accounted the happiest person who performs this journey mounted on the bare backbone of a horse or donkey, "sharpened by a perpetual fast." The company generally amounts to five thousand. Mule-drivers, Arab soldiers, a few Frank travellers, and crowds of Moslems who go to deride the "infidels," swell the numbers, and enliven the appearance of the motley assemblage. Escorted by a powerful body of Turkish cavalry, they leave Jerusalem, wind slowly round the heights of Olivet, traverse the rugged pass through the eastern mountains, and arrive on the plain of Jericho at the hour of twilight. Here they encamp for the night. A starry vault is spread out over the plain, clear and calm; the waving summits of the mountains run along the horizon on either hand; but the grotesque scene exhibited on the bosom of the plain it is impossible to describe,—the braying of asses, the neighing of horses, the shout of revellers, the discharge of fire-arms, the screams of children, the sound of musical instruments. Such are the elements which compose this singular scene, whose thousand discordant noises are re-echoed by the surrounding mountains, while the plain gleams afar with the light of innumerable torches. Sleep visits few eyes among the vast multitude. At the earliest dawn, the encampment is broken up; and the pilgrims, putting themselves in order, commence the procession to the banks of the Jordan. Here a new scene ensues; the whole company undress, rush into the river, and those who are borne down by the crowd, or carried away by the force of the stream, are left to their fate. Some may be seen drinking the sacred waters, others pouring them on their head, others plunging below the surface—some standing praying, others assisting the aged to creep into the river, mothers immersing brawling infants; whilst along the banks rides the Turkish Governor with his suite, regarding with supreme contempt a scene which is not worthy of being beheld with any other feelings. The company return to the shore—their sins washed away, as they superstitiously believe; and their ablutions being over, the robe in which they were performed is carefully preserved, for the purpose of enveloping their bodies after death.

THE COVENANTERS' COMMUNION.

THE following graphic description of the dispensation of the Lord's Supper, as it was celebrated among the Covenanters in Scotland during the persecuting days of Charles the Second, is contained in a letter by the Rev. Mr Blackader, one of the ministers of the period, who was himself present on the occasion referred to:—

At the desire of several people in the Merse, Mr Blackader, and some other ministers, had resolved on a meeting in Tiviotdale, and day and place was fixed for keeping a communion; but from apprehensions of danger, this resolution was changed, as it was feared they might come to imminent hazard. It was agreed to delay it for a fortnight; and advertisement was sent to the people not to assemble. The report of the first appointment had spread throughout the country, and many were prepared to resort thither from distant and divers quarters. This change had occasioned great uncertainty: some had taken their journey to the Merse, willing to venture on a disappointment, rather than miss so good an occasion by sitting still. Mr Blackader was determined to go, seeing his stay would discourage others: and if kept back, they would blame him. He told them it was not likely the meeting would hold; yet, least any should take offence, he was content to take his venture with them. On Friday night he took horse, accompanied with a small body of attendants, and was joined by Mr John Dickson at the port, who rode with him eleven miles that night. Many people were on the road, setting forward to be in time for sermon on Saturday morning. Not a few west of Edinburgh, hearing the report of the delay, remained at home, and others returned on the way. Nobody was certain, either from far or near, till they reached the place; where they would all have been disappointed, if Providence had not ordered it better than human arrangement; for the earnest entreaties of the people had prevailed with Mr Welsh, in the same way as Mr Blackader, to venture at a hazard. And had it been delayed a day or two longer, it would have been utterly prevented, as the noise was spread, and the troops would have been dispersed to stop them.

Meantime the communion elements had been prepared, and the people of Tiviotdale advertised. Mr Welsh and Mr Riddle had reached the place on Saturday. When Mr Blackader arrived, he found a great assembly, and still gathering from all airts; which was a comfortable surprisal in this uncertainty; whereat they all marvelled, as a new proof of the Divine wisdom, wherewith the true Head of the Church did order and arrange his solemn occasions. The people from the east brought reports that caused great alarm. It was rumoured that the Earl of Hume, as ramp a youth as any in the country, intended to assault the meeting with his men and militia, and that parties of the regulars were coming to assist him. He had profanely threatened to make their horses drink the communion wine, and trample the sacred elements under foot. Most of the gentry there, and even the commonalty, were ill set.

Upon this we drew hastily together about seven or eight score of horse on the Saturday, and equipped with such furniture as they had. Plsquets of twelve or sixteen men were appointed to reconnoitre and ride towards the suspected parts. Single horsemen were despatched to greater distances, to view the country, and give warning in case of attack. The remainder of the horse were drawn round to be a defence at such distance as they might hear sermon, and be ready to act if need be. Every means was taken to compose the multitude from needless alarm, and prevent, in harmless defensive way, any affront that might be offered to so solemn and sacred a work. Though many of their own accord, had provided for their safety—and this was more necessary, when they had to stay three days together, sojourning by lions' dens and the mountains of leopards—yet none had come armed with hostile intentions.

We entered on the administration of the holy ordinance, committing it and ourselves to the invisible protection of the Lord of Hosts, in whose name we were met together. Our trust was in the arm of Jehovah, which was better than weapons of war, or the strength of hills. In the God of Jacob was our refuge, we knew that our cause would prosper;—that in his favour there was more security than in all the defences of art or of nature. The place where we convened was every way commodious, and seemed to have been formed on purpose. It was a green and pleasant haugh, fast by the water side. On either hand there was a spacious brae, in form of a half round, covered with delightful pasture, and rising with a gentle slope to a goodly height. Above us was the clear blue sky, for it was a sweet and calm Sabbath morning, promising to be indeed one of the days of the Son of Man. There was a solemnity in the place befitting the occasion, and elevating the whole soul to a pure and holy frame. The communion tables were spread on the green by the water, and around them the people had arranged themselves in decent order. But the far greater multitude sat on the brae-face, which was crowded from top to bottom, full as pleasant a sight as was ever seen of that sort. Each day, at the congregation's dismissing, the ministers, with their guards, and as many of the people as could, retired to their quarters in three several country towns, where they might be provided with necessaries for man and horse for payment.

Several of the yeomen refused to take money for their provisions, but cheerfully and abundantly invited both ministers and gentlemen each day at dismissing. The horsemen drew up in a body till the people left the place, and then marched in goodly array at a little distance, until all were safely lodged in their quarters; dividing themselves into three squadrons, one for each town where were their respective lodgments. Each party had its own commander. Watches were regularly set in empty barns, and other out-houses, where guards were placed during the night. Scouts were sent to look about, and get intelligence. In the morning, when the people returned to the meeting, the horsemen accompanied them: all the three parties met, a mile from the spot, and marched in a full body to the consecrated ground. The congregation being all fairly settled in their places, the guardsmen took their several stations as formerly.

These accidental volunteers seemed to have been the gift of Providence, and they secured the peace and quiet of the audience; for from Saturday morning, when the work began, until Monday afternoon, we suffered not the least affront or molestation from enemies, which appeared wonderful. At first there was some apprehension; but the people sat undisturbed and the whole was closed in as orderly a way as it had been in the time of Scotland's brightest noon. And truly, the spectacle of so many grave, composed, and devout faces, must have struck the adversaries with awe, and been more formidable than any outward ability of fierce looks and warlike array. We desired not the countenance of earthly kings; there was a spiritus, and divine Majesty shining on the work, and sensible evidence that the Great Master of assemblies was present in the midst. It was, indeed, the doing of the Lord, who covered us a table in the wilderness, in presence of our foes, and reared a pillar of glory between us and the enemy, like the fiery cloud of old, that separated between the camp of Israel and the Egyptians, encouraging to the one, but dark and terrible to the other. Though our vows were not offered within the courts of God's house, they wanted not sincerity of heart, which is better than the reverence of sanctuaries. Amidst the lonely mountains, we remembered the words of our Lord, that true worship was not peculiar to Jerusalem or Samaria; that the beauty of holiness consisted not in consecrated buildings, or material temples. We remembered the ark of the Israelites, which had sojourned for years in the desert, with no dwelling-place but the tabernacles of the plain. We thought of Abraham, and the ancient patriarchs, who laid their victims on the rocks for an altar, and burnt sweet incense under the shade of the green tree.

The ordinance of the last supper, that memorial of his dying love till his second coming, was signally countenanced; and backed with power and refreshing influence from above. Blessed be God, for he hath visited and confirmed his heritage when it was weary. In that day, Zion put on the beauty of Sharon and Carmel; the mountains broke forth into singing, and the desert place was made to bud and blossom as the rose. Few such days were seen in the desolate Church of Scotland, and few will ever witness the like. There was a rich and plentiful effusion of the Spirit shed abroad on many hearts. Their souls filled with heavenly transports, seemed to breathe in a diviner element, and to burn upwards, as with the fire of a pure and holy devotion. The ministers were visibly assisted to speak home to the conscience of the hearers. It seemed as if God had touched their lips with a live coal from his altar, for they who witnessed declared, they carried more like ambassadors from the court of heaven, than men cast in earthly mould.

The tables were served by some gentlemen and persons of the gravest deportment. None were admitted without tokens, as usual, which were distributed on the Saturday, but only to such as were known to some of the ministers, or persons of trust, to be free of public scandals. All the regular forms were gone through: the communicants entered at one end, and retired at the other,—a way being kept clear to take their seats again on the hill-side. Mr Welsh preached the action sermon, and served the first two tables, as he was ordinarily put to do on such occasions: the other four ministers, Mr Blackader, Mr Dickson, Mr Riddel, and Mr Rae, exhorted the rest in their turn: the table service was closed by Mr Welsh, with solemn thanksgiving—and solemn it was—and sweet and edifying to see the gravity and composure of all present, as well as all parts of the service. The communion was peaceably concluded; all the people heartily offering up their gratitude, and singing with a joyful noise to the Rock of their salvation. It was pleasant, as the night fell, to hear their melody swelling in full unison along the hill, the whole congregation joining with one accord, and praising God with the voice of psalms.

There were two long tables, and one short, across the head, with seats on each side. About a hundred sat at every table: there were sixteen in all, so that about three thousand two hundred communicated that day.

The afternoon sermon was preached by Mr Dickson, from Genesis xxii. 14; and verily might the name of the place be called Bethel, or Jehovah-jireh, where the Lord's power and presence was so signally manifested. After so thick and fearful a darkness had overshadowed the land, the light of his countenance had again shone through the cloud with dazzling brightness, and many there would remember the glory of that day. Well might the faith of the good old patriarch be contrasted with theirs on that occasion; they had come on a journey of three days into the wilderness to offer their sacrifice: they had come in doubt and perplexity as to the issue; but the God of Jacob had been their refuge and their strength, hiding them in his pavilion in the evil day. The whole of this solemn service was closed by Mr Blackader on Monday afternoon, from Isaiah liii. 10.

HE DIED FOR ME!

BY THE REV. JOHN DUFF,

Kirkintilloch, Dumbartonshire.

He died for me! Shall sin's foul stain
Pollute this guilty soul again?
Still shall I stray in error's maze—
My heart, my life, shall vice debase?
Ah! doomed to feel, while vital breath
Pervades this frame of sin and death,
The power which tempts my steps to stray,
Prone, devious, from the narrow way,
Frail, faithless, weak, in sin I'll know
While life endures, a constant foe.
But not unmatch'd is now thy skill,
O Sin—behold a stronger still!
Though great thy might and power be found,
Still grace Divine shall more abound.
In weakness, this be all my power,
My succour in temptation's hour;
Engraven on my heart shall be
The quickening truth—He died for me!

II.

He died for me! When on my ear
Falls the dread summons, all must hear;
When from this frail, scarce conscious clay,
Life's ebbing tide recedes away;
When round my dying couch in vain
Friends, kindred dear, their sorrows rain;
When 'mid the deep convulsive throes,
Announcing nature's final close;
Upon my soul, in that sad hour,
Come thoughts of deep and solemn power;
When rising fierce, her dart to fling,
Fell Sin prepares and Death his sting;
O then be mine a sure defence,
A shield more sure than innocence—
Emblazon'd on its front there be
The words of light—He died for me!

III.

He died for me! When o'er my head
Sounds the loud trump that wakes the dead;
When, 'neath the monumental stone,
Hastes limb to limb and bone to bone;
When rising slow my form uprears,
Scarce conscious from the sleep of years;
When 'mid the fierce continuous jar
Of nature's elemental war,
Upon my startled ear there flow
The wild extremes of joy and woe—
Faith's loud exulting shout elate,
Despair's wild shriek, portending fate;—

O strong upon my memory shine,
Unchanged by age, undimmed by time,
Bright truth, a refuge surer still
Than sheltering rock or covering hill;
The Rock of Ages may I see
My refuge then—He died for me!

IV.

He died for me! Since every fear,
And hope, and joy, are centred here;
Since thus, this solemn truth is fraught
With deep results, surpassing thought;
Since 'tis my stay while vital breath
Pervades this frame, my trust in death,
My refuge, on faith's pinions borne,
When dawns the resurrection morn;
Be now its quick'ning pow'r display'd—
Each thought, each act, let it pervade.
My Saviour's dying let me hear
That so his life may still appear;
The light, through ages doom'd to shine,
Be dimly now reveal'd in time,
That men, reflected thus may see
The living truth—He died for me!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. JAMES MITCHELL,

MINISTER OF THE SCOTCH CHURCH, WOOLER, NORTHUMBRIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THE excellent subject of our present Sketch was born at Strageath, in the beautiful valley of Strathearn, in Perthshire. His parents, though not affluent, moved in respectable society, and were much esteemed and loved by the whole neighbourhood. His father had received a liberal education, having been originally intended for the ministry, but, from some cause or other, he was diverted from his design and became a farmer. He was a man of sincere and devoted piety, of simple unaffected manners, of sterling integrity, and of a warm, affectionate heart. His partner in life, though not at the period of their marriage under the influence of religion, became afterwards decidedly pious; and she and her husband walked habitually as heirs together of the grace of life. To the education of their children in the knowledge of Divine truth they paid marked attention, and their efforts were, by the Divine blessing, followed with success.

Of the whole family, James was the favourite of his parents. Naturally of a delicate and feeble constitution, he was reared with peculiar tenderness. On several occasions, in the course of his early years, he was brought almost to the gates of death. This was more especially the case when under a severe attack of small-pox, which had wellnigh proved fatal; but, in answer to the ardent supplications of his pious father, the child was spared, and being so obviously a monument of God's preserving care and kindness, he was devoted by his parents to the service of God in the work of the ministry. The elements of his education were received at the parish school of Muthil, where he made considerable progress in the various branches of knowledge usually taught in these seminaries. From a manuscript autobiography which now lies before us, it does not appear that his mind had been the subject of converting grace until a later period than his mere boyish days. No doubt, he had been regular in his attendance on Divine ordinances, and entertained a high respect for religion, and occasionally he even felt serious impressions; but this goodness, however fair and lasting for a time, was as fleeting and transitory "as the morning cloud or the early dew, which soon goeth away." His own account of his religious history at this period is thus given, with the simplicity and candour which characterised his later years:—

"Prayer, I believe, in secret, was sometimes performed, and public ordinances even attended; but, ah! with what improper frames of mind! Stranger as I was to the object of worship and the medium of it, to the great God, and the great Advocate his only Son, my prayers consisted only in the language of the lip, or the prostration of the knee; and, in presenting my addresses at the throne of God, I wished more to please my father on earth than my Father in heaven. My attendance on ordinances was not the result of delight in them, but of mere form, or the dread of losing a good name. I wearied often of Divine services, especially of the length of them, and was happy when they drew towards a conclusion. The golden season I enjoyed I improved not, nor did I even hear the word preached with faith, love, or self-application. I perhaps read the Word of God on the Lord's Day, but when I read it, I was not impressed with a sense of its authority and truth; it was a sealed book to me—its precious doctrines were not felt, nor its promises and threatenings properly credited. The works of the great Creator—the lofty mountains, the beautiful plains, the magnificent arch of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars—often filled me with astonishment; but I rested in the effect, and never rose to the Cause. He who spake all things into existence, my Creator, my Supporter, and daily Benefactor—He who for me and my fellow-sinners had not spared his own Son—was not in all my thoughts."

From his early years, Mr Mitchell was fond of reading. The "Pilgrim's Progress" particularly attracted his attention; and though he was as yet unable to understand the meaning of the allegory, it made a deep impression upon his youthful mind. As his parents had dedicated him from childhood to the sacred office, he had no sooner completed his preparatory studies at the parish school, than he was sent to St Andrews University. It is always trying for a raw, inexperienced youth, who has never been previously absent from his father's roof, to be exposed to the snares and temptations of a college life. In this respect, however, Mr Mitchell was placed in peculiarly favourable circumstances, having not only enjoyed the privilege of a pious education and example, but, on reaching the scene of his studies, he was committed to the care of an elderly student, "a prudent and well respected lad," who acted towards him the part of a brother. Under the direction of this kind friend and companion, and encouraged by his success in procuring a bursary at the very outset of his career, he prosecuted his literary pursuits with great diligence and success. The summer he passed at home, occasionally making excursions to visit his friends in different parts of the country. At Strageath, he enjoyed the privilege of a public library, founded by Lord Madderty. The opportunities of obtaining solid information which were thus opened up to him he did not however embrace, but acquired a taste for light reading, which exercised a very injurious influence upon his mind. Study became irksome, and pleasure the chief object of his desire. He spent much of his time in the perusal of novels and dramatic compositions, and thus he soon lost all relish for the reading of more important works. The Bible was now entirely laid aside. Religious meditation was utterly neglected. Prayer became cold and formal, and was at length omitted. A spirit of pride and vain-glory took possession of his heart. He began to entertain the most extravagant opinion of his own talents and attainments, and to harbour the most flattering and delusive hopes of future greatness.

In this sinful state of mind, however, Mr Mitchell was not long permitted to remain. It pleased the Almighty to impress deeply upon him a passage from his own Word. The text suddenly suggested was an apposite one: "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." It was by this single verse of Scripture that the Spirit wrought effectually upon his heart. And while thus teaching him inwardly by his Spirit, God was also teaching him outwardly by his providence. His plans were one after another frustrated—his hopes disappointed—his prospects blasted. Still he struggled to rid himself of the feelings of remorse which were agitating his mind, by indulging in novel reading and other light amusements; but in vain. They always left him more wretched than before. The description of his agony and remorse we cannot refrain from giving in his own language, as contained in his unpublished autobiography:—

"I then felt an awful vacuity in my mind, which nothing but God could fill; and to him I was unhappily an entire stranger. I took many a sad and solitary walk, in which all around me appeared as a wilderness, and I envied every creature I saw as happier than myself. The bitter effects of imprudent conduct, culpable indolence, and neglected education, were daily before my eyes. My trials were great; but though they humbled me, and prevented many youthful irregularities, they did not change my heart. Disaffection to God and religion still reigned uncontrolled in the mind, and was outwardly manifested in the neglect of all the means of grace—of prayer, reading the Scriptures, and attendance on ordinances. The precious day of God I spent either at home or in idle walking. I was stricken more and more, and yet I revolted more and more. This had been a gloomy winter, nor did the summer prove much more comfortable. Home, where I had the endearing society of affectionate parents, brethren, and sisters, could not heal a broken spirit. Strathearn, at the command of God, wore almost as gloomy an aspect as St Andrews. The beauties of nature and the assiduities of friends palliated the evil, but could not cure it. For some days I would be tolerably comfortable; on other days, again, I would be dull and melancholy. My old acquaintance still kept at a distance, and this I considered as a great grievance. And while some of them, whom I esteemed as my inferiors in talents, natural and acquired, rose in life, and got into either schools or families, as for me every door to honour and preferment seemed every where to be shut. All applications for situations constantly proved abortive. Still I continued ignorant and irreligious, without hope and God in the world."

With a mind thus distracted, Mr Mitchell was still resolved to pursue his studies for the church. Though ill prepared to enter upon the acquisition of theological learning, he was too proud to resign a profession for which he had been destined from his childhood. He went accordingly to Glasgow, where he was enrolled a student in the Divinity Hall. Here he became an inmate in the house of a pious relative, in whose company he received much valuable instruction. He regularly attended church along with the family, and even sat down with them at the Lord's Table; but, amid all this outward profession of religion, he candidly confesses, "I then neither knew nor loved my blessed Saviour." His privileges in Glasgow had been so numerous and valuable, that we might have supposed he would have been impressed with the Divine goodness to him. But the account which he gives of himself, after he returned to his father's house, is melancholy, when we think of the opportunities of improvement which he had enjoyed. We quote his own words:—

"Though now a student of divinity, I had no claim to any thing but the name. I was an entire stranger to the piety, the studious habits, and good conduct of such. Whatever books I read, the Bible was none of them. On Sabbath I staid at home. Secret prayer I never performed; and so little studious was I of appearances, that I did not wait for my father's family worship, which was observed at night, but went to bed. In such circumstances, was there any hope of my ever turning serious? As I knew nothing about God, how could I seek after him? and, sinner as I was, how then could I look for mercy? or look for his grace, without which, I am sensible, I never could have returned to him? How low was I reduced by ignorance and sin! Can such a dry bone live? Not, would any that knew me say, without a miracle. But the dry bone has lived, and the miracle has been realized."

In process of time, it pleased Him, with whom is the residue of the Spirit, to arouse the thoughtless young man from the slumber of sin and death, and to breathe into his soul the breath of spiritual life. In some cases, the process of conversion is sudden and palpable; in others, it is gradual and imperceptible. Mr Mitchell was accustomed to date the period of his new birth from the summer of 1777. In his autobiography, he mentions his having been seized with a sudden impulse to engage in prayer, although for several years he had been a stranger to that ennobling exercise. He also records, about the same time, the occurrence of a vision, in some respects resembling that which appeared to the celebrated Colonel Gardiner, with this essential difference, however, that in the case of the pious soldier there was a firm belief in the reality of the vision; whereas, in Mr Mitchell's case, there was no such belief, but, on the contrary, he himself declares, that he "considered it, from first to last, as an impression on the imagination, though it was as strong and vivid as if it had been real." The result of the Spirit's working upon his mind was of the most beneficial description. Prayer became a constant and delightful employment. The Bible was his daily and hourly companion. The Sabbath was now to him a day of holy rest, and refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The perusal of the rich old divinity of former times afforded him peculiar pleasure. Boston on the Covenant of Grace, Willison's Economy of the Covenants, Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, and Wishart on the Divine Attributes, were the works to which he chiefly felt himself indebted for the views of Divine truth which enlightened and cheered his mind. But the book which, above all other human compositions, he highly prized at this period, and indeed throughout the whole of his future life, was the Shorter Catechism, which he justly regarded as an invaluable compend of Christian doctrine. Thus impressed with a knowledge of the great truths of Scripture, he engaged with an intelligent ardour of mind in the ordinances of religion. His attendance on the sanctuary was no meaningless service, but an enlightened act of worship; and, on sacramental occasions, he seated himself at the Lord's Table, partaking, with a lively faith and a warm devoted love, of Christ's body, which, to the believer, is meat indeed, and of that blood which is drink indeed.

For two years after his conversion Mr Mitchell "enjoyed," to use his own expression, "a kind of heaven upon earth." But such a state of feeling was not likely to continue long, unsuited as it is to the weakness and imperfection of our nature. Days of darkness and desolation of spirit at length came. All nature was as it were wrapt in gloom. He persevered in spiritual duties, but the energy, the life, the soul was gone. All was drudgery and an irksome task. Let us refer, however, to his own statements:—

"The Bible, once my favourite companion, was now a sealed book, and the house of God had lost its wonted attractions. My corruptions, which had been in a great degree subdued, now began to stir and to acquire somewhat of their lost ascendancy. My mind was filled with fears, and shocked with the apprehension of relapsing into my former ignorance and thoughtlessness. That awful passage in the 6th of the Hebrews excited the most painful irritation in my mind. I struggled hard to be what I was, but made no progress. My state was that of Paul, in the 7th of the Romans; "when I would do good, evil was present with me." I could not give up reading, meditation, and prayer; but I had no pleasure in them. Fasting also, in which I had enjoyed much of the presence of God, I had recourse to in vain. Like Sampson, I went forth to shake myself, as at other times; but I soon found, like him, that the Lord had departed from me. Satan was now permitted to assail me with his temptations. The Psalmist says, in the 104th Psalm, "The sun knoweth his going down: Thou makest darkness, and it is night, wherein all the beasts of the forest creep forth." And as the wild beasts creep forth when the natural sun sets, so, when the Sun of Righteousness sets, the lions of hell came forth against me. And now the main scope of their temptations was not only to lead me into sin, but to seduce me to error. Their first effort was, not to unfix in my mind the truth of Revelation, but to suggest doubts and surmises about the truth of its peculiar doctrines, such as the divinity of Christ, the sovereignty and power of the grace of God in conversion, the imputed righteousness of Christ, and the atonement, or about my personal interest in his salvation, and perseverance in a state of grace."

This struggle against the suggestions of the great enemy of souls, lasted for nearly two years, during which, he continued to pray ardently to Him, who alone could teach his hands to war, and his fingers to fight. Thus he was enabled by faith to "withstand the fiery darts of the wicked one, and having done all, to stand" firm and unmoved in the belief of the truth as it is in Jesus. From this state of darkness and doubt, and sore temptation, he gradually emerged, and once more the light of the Divine countenance shone upon his soul, never, however, with such brightness as he had once known and felt. He was now stirred up to greater activity in maintaining a close and consistent walk with God. At his instigation a prayer-meeting was formed among the pious neighbours, which he and his father attended weekly, and from which he derived much benefit.

In the winters of 1780-1-2, Mr Mitchell attended the Divinity Hall at Edinburgh under the professorship of Dr Hamilton. During his stay in the metropolis he became acquainted with several of the city ministers, and among the rest with the Rev. Dr Davidson, the worthy minister of the Tolbooth Parish. The language in which Mr Mitchell speaks of this eminent Christian minister in the autobiography to which we have so often referred, shows the high estimation in which he as well as all who ever enjoyed the privilege of Dr Davidson's friendship, have uniformly held him. His almost paternal kindness to those aspirants to the sacred office who were introduced to his notice, can never be effaced from the memory of those of them who still survive. To them the remembrance of that holy man will always be sweet. Mr Mitchell received from him many marks of attention; and through his influence, he obtained a situation as tutor in a family, which, under the blessing of the Almighty, laid the foundation of his future success in life. The family to which we refer, was that of Walter Scott, Esq., W.S., George Square, Edinburgh, the father of the celebrated baronet, whose genius has shed an unfading lustre around his name. The following description of Mr Scott and his household will be interesting to our readers, as showing the high religious privileges and pious example within the sphere of which Sir Walter Scott passed his early days. We quote from Mr Mitchell's manuscript autobiography:—

“ Mr Scott was a fine looking man, then a little past the meridian of life, of dignified yet agreeable manners. His business was extensive. He was a man of tried integrity, strict morals, and one that had a respect for religion and its ordinances. The church which the family attended was the Old Greyfriars, of which the celebrated Doctors Robertson and Erskine were ministers. Thither went Mr and Mrs Scott every Sabbath when well, attended by their fine young family of children, and their domestic servants,—a sight so amiable and exemplary as often to excite a glow of heart-felt satisfaction in my bosom. According to an established and laudable practice in the family, the children and servants were assembled on Sunday evenings in the drawing-room, and examined on the Church Catechism, and sermons they heard delivered during the course of the day, on which occasions I had to perform the part of chaplain, and to conclude with prayer. Mr Scott was a man of highly respectable character, of sound integrity, and good religious principle from his youth. When he first came to Edinburgh to follow out his profession, some of his school-fellows, who, like him, had come to reside in Edinburgh, attempted at first to unhinge his morals; but when they found him resolute and unshaken in his virtuous dispositions, they gave up the attempt, but instead of abandoning him altogether, they thought the more of him, and honoured him the more with their confidence and patronage, which is certainly a great inducement to young men in the outset of life, to act a similar part. After having heard of his inflexible adherence to the cause of virtue in his youth, and his regular attendance on the ordinances of religion in after life, we will not be surprised to be told, that he was one that bore a sacred regard for the Sabbath; nor will we be astonished at the following anecdote illustrative of it. An opulent farmer in East Lothian had employed Mr Scott as his agent in a cause depending before the Court of Session. Having a curiosity to see his papers, which were deposited in Mr Scott's hands, relative to the process, this worldly man came into Edinburgh on a Sunday to have an inspection of them. As there was no immediate necessity for this measure, Mr Scott asked the farmer if an ordinary day would not answer equally well? When the farmer was not willing to take this advice, but insisted on the production of his papers, Mr Scott delivered them up to him, saying, “ It was not his practice to engage in secular business on Sabbath, and that he would have no difficulty in Edinburgh to find some of his profession, who would have none of his scruples.” No wonder such a man was confided in, and greatly honoured in his profession. All the poor services I did in the family, were more than repaid by the comfort I enjoyed when in the family, the pecuniary remuneration I received, and particularly by his recommendation of me some time afterward to the magistrates and town-council of Montrose, in the event of the vacancy that took place on Dr Nesbitt's resignation of his charge as first minister, and his emigration to America. At that time his recommendation brought me on the carpet, and this, he said, was all he could do, as the settlement would ultimately hinge on a popular election.

“ Mrs Scott was a wife in every respect worthy of such a husband. Like her partner, she was then a little past the meridian of life, of a prepossessing appearance, and amiable manners, of a cultivated understanding, affectionate disposition, and fine taste, both able and disposed to soothe her husband's mind under the asperities of business, and to be a rich blessing to her numerous progeny. But what constituted her distinguishing ornament was, that she was sincerely religious. Some years previous to my entrance into the family, I understood from one of the servants, she had been under deep religious concern about her soul's salvation, which had ultimately issued in a conviction of the truth of Christianity, and in the enjoyment of its divine consolations. She liked Dr Erskine's sermons, but was not fond of Principal Robertson's, however rational, eloquent, and well composed; and, if other things had answered, would have gone when he preached, to have heard Dr Davidson.

“ Mrs Scott was a descendant of Dr Daniel Rutherford, a professor in the medical school of Edinburgh; and was one of those eminent men, who, by learning and professional skill, brought it to the high pitch of celebrity to which it has attained. This eminent man was an excellent linguist, and, according to the custom of the times, delivered his prelections to the students in Latin. Mrs Scott told me, that when prescribing to his patients, it was his custom to offer up at the same time, a prayer for the accompanying blessing of heaven. A laudable practice, in which I fear he has not been generally imitated by those of his profession.”

Mr Scott's family consisted of six children, all of whom were at home when Mr Mitchell entered the family, except the oldest, who was an officer in the army. Several traits of Sir Walter's character when a boy, are given in the autobiography, which we gladly extract:—

“ In all the excellencies, whether as to temper, conduct or talents, natural or acquired, which any of the children individually possessed, to Mr Walter, since the celebrated Sir Walter, must a decided pre-eminence be ascribed; though, like the rest of the children, placed under my tuition, the conducting of his education comparatively cost me but little trouble, being, by the quickness of his intellect, tenacity of memory, and diligent application to his studies, generally equal of himself to the acquisition of those books I or others prescribed to him; so that Mr Walter might be regarded, not as a pupil of mine, but as a friend and companion; and, I might add, as an assistant too, as by his example, and admonitions, he greatly strengthened my hands, and stimulated my other pupils to industry and good behaviour. I seldom had occasion all the time I was in the family, to find fault with him even for trifles, and only once to threaten serious castigation, of which he was no sooner aware, than he suddenly sprung up, threw his arms about my neck, and kissed me. It is hardly needful to say, that now the intended castigation was no longer thought of. By such generous, and noble conduct, my displeasure was in a minute converted into esteem and admiration. My soul melted into kindness, and I was ready to mingle my tears with his. Some anecdotes in reference to him, in that early period, and some interesting and useful conversations I had with him, deeply impressed my mind, and which the lapse of near half a century has not yet obliterated; and which, even at that time, afforded no doubtful pre-sage of his future greatness and celebrity.

"On my going into the family, as far as I can judge, he might be in his twelfth or thirteenth year—a boy in the Rector's (Dr Adams) class. However elevated above the rest of the boys in genius, though generally in the list of the duxes, he was seldom, as far as I recollect, the leader of the school. Nor need this be surprising, as it has been often observed, that boys of original genius have been far outstripped by those that were far inferior to themselves in the acquisition of dead languages. Dr Adams, celebrated for his knowledge of the Latin tongue, was deservedly held by Mr Walter in high admiration and regard.

"One forenoon, in coming from the High School, he said he wished to know my opinion as to his conduct in a matter he should state to me. When passing through the High School-yards, he found half-a-guinea on the ground. Instead of appropriating this to his own use, a sense of honesty led him to look around, and, on doing so, he espied a country man, whom he suspected to be the proprietor. Having asked the man if he had lost any thing, and he, on searching his pockets, said he had lost half-a-guinea, Mr Walter, with pleasure, presented him with his lost treasure. In this transaction, Mr Walter's ingenuity in finding out the true owner, and his integrity in restoring property, met my most cordial approbation. When in church, Mr Walter had more of a soporific tendency than the rest of my young charge. This seemed to be constitutional. He needed one or other of the family now and then to arouse him; and from this it might be inferred, he would cut a poor figure, on the Sabbath examinations, on the subject of the sermons. But what excited the admiration of the family was, that none of the children, however attentive, could answer as he did. The only way in which I could account for this was, that when he heard the text and divisions, his good sense, memory, and genius, supplied the thoughts which would occur to the preacher.

"On one occasion, in the dining-room, where, according to custom, he was reading some author in the time of relaxation from study, I asked him how he accounted for the superiority of knowledge he possessed above the rest of the family. His reply was to the effect, that some years before, he had been attacked by a swelling in one of his ankles, which confined him to the house, and prevented amusement and exercise, and which was the cause of his lameness; as under his ailment he could not romp with his brothers and the other young people, in the green in George Square, he found himself compelled to have recourse to some substitute for the juvenile amusements of his comrades, and this substitute was reading; so that to what he, no doubt, accounted a painful dispensation of Providence, he probably stood indebted for his future celebrity.

Mr Mitchell acted with the utmost conscientiousness in the discharge of his duties as tutor in Mr Scott's family, and not only while he was with them, but ever after, they continued to hold him in the highest respect and esteem.

THE PORTRAITURE OF AN AGED CHRISTIAN.
 A DISCOURSE.

[Preached in the Hope Street Church, Glasgow, for behoof of the Gaelic School Society.]

BY THE REV. ROBERT BURNS, D. D.

Minister of St George's Parish, Paisley.

"Mnason, an old disciple."—ACTS xxi. 16.

THIS is all that is recorded of the character of Mnason; but it implies much. The statement is comprehensive in its bearings, and it carries a charm along with it. Here is a venerable follower of the Lamb, accompanying on their labours of love, the apostles and evangelists of the Church; taking a deep and tender interest in their progress and success; and testifying the warmth of his Christian affection, by hospitably entertaining the brethren in Christ.

The language of Scripture is laconic. It conveys much meaning in few words. When of Enoch and of Noah, it is recorded that they "walked with God;" there is conveyed to the mind of every discerning reader, a most interesting view of the nature and effects of spiritual religion as implying the habits of amity and fellowship with God, and consistent devotedness to his service. When of Cornelius, it is said that he was a "devout man;" we recognise in the character, the elevated tone of piety to which religious truth is designed and fitted to exalt us. And when of "Mnason of Cyprus," it is noticed, that he was "a disciple," and "an old disciple," we immediately perceive in him, not only the common features of a true Christian, but those of a Christian far advanced in years and in grace.

Of his early history we know nothing; but there seems little doubt that he was among the "first-fruits of Cyprus unto Christ." It would appear that the Gospel was early known to some of the inhabitants of this island, for, in the fourth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, we read of one Joses, who was surnamed Barnabas, and a native of Cyprus, who was so powerfully influenced by the Gospel of Christ, as to give up all his possessions to purposes of piety and charity. It is not, indeed, likely that at such an early period as that now alluded to, the Gospel had been preached in the island of Cyprus; but it is surely probable, that Barnabas, from love to his brethren as well as love to Christ, would use his influence in promoting the spread of the Gospel among them. And we find it recorded in Acts xi. 19, "That they which were scattered abroad, upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch;" and some of those primitive missionaries "were men of Cyprus;" with whom it is said, "that the hand of the Lord was with them, and that a great number believed, and turned to the Lord." Cyprus was once adorned by many Christian Churches, and not a few spiritual temples were reared to the honour of him, who is the great Master-builder, who rears the temple, and who bears the glory of it. But, alas! Ichabod has long ago been inscribed in legible characters on the mouldering walls of the once stately edifice. The crescent has taken precedence of the cross. The withering blast of Mahometanism on the one hand, and Turkish despotism on the other, has swept along the surface of this once prosperous island, and hath rified it of all its charms. The name and forms of Christianity, even in its corrupted state, are scarcely to be traced. Religion and the inhabitants of Cyprus generally, are at present in a very low and degraded condition; and I fear that few "aged disciples" are now to be seen within its limits.

Our primary object in this discourse shall be, to trace the characteristic features of an aged disciple; and then to found on them an argument in favour of the Christian and patriotic design which has led us together.

Need I tell you what is meant by a "disciple," and a "disciple of Jesus." The word we know is significant of one who learns of a teacher—a scholar. It is applied in the Gospel history most frequently to denote the twelve apostles; but it is used in the Acts, and in the epistles, to signify any "follower of Jesus—any one who professed the faith of Christ." Those are properly termed "disciples," who have learned of Christ,—who, like Mary have "sat at his feet, and listened to his words,"—whose hearts, like that of Lydia, have been opened to attend to the things spoken of the Lord; who, like the jailor, have been led to cry out from their inmost soul, "What must I do to be saved?"—who, like Saul of Tarsus, have been found in the attitude of prayer; and whose character affords a just comment on his emphatic words, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

There is such a thing as a disciple in name, and a disciple in reality. You are disciples in name, when you are baptized, when you attend the house of God, when you approach the table of the Lord, and when you do not glaringly outrage your profession by deeds and by habits of revolting criminality. You become disciples in truth, as well as in name, when you are awakened to a sense of sin and of danger; when you flee to the blood of sprinkling, as the only means of deliverance from the wrath to come; when you mourn over and forsake your sins; when you devote yourselves wholly to the Lord, and "walk soberly, righteously, and godly in the world." "We are the true circumcision which worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh."

But what is, or rather, what ought to be, the characteristic features of an aged disciple? If he truly answers to the title, he will not only be old in years and in Christian profession, but "old" in a far higher and nobler sense—far advanced in the graces of the Christian character—matured in the school of Christ—venerable for spiritual attainments—exhibiting the fruits of genuine holiness in their matured and mellowed state—ripening step by step for a blessed and a glorious immortality.

I. An "old disciple" should be far advanced in spiritual knowledge. We read of a certain period in the millennial age of the church, when "the child shall die an hundred years old," i. e., when there shall be such a wonderful increase of spiritual knowledge and attainment in the Church, that such as are cut off in the morning and vigour of life shall exhibit all the matureness of information and of experience which we look for in men of the most advanced years. "Days," saith the wise man, "should speak, and the multitude of years should keep knowledge." It is painful to find so many professors of the faith, whose progress in knowledge bears such an insignificant proportion to their progress in years, and the extent of their religious advantages. They learn from their teachers and their parents in early life, the elementary principles of religion, and they acquire information sufficient to secure their admission to the sealing ordinances of grace; but they satisfy themselves with such scanty attainments. They consider the great object as thus gained; and engrossed from week to week, and from year to year, with the ceaseless round of worldly occupation; instead of adding to their original acquirements, they lessen by the want of diligent exercise, the limited stock of former years, and sink into the arms of a cold and stupid indifference. Ministers of the Gospel who have to do with the understandings and the consciences of men can, in the course of their pastoral dealings with their people, record many painful instances of spiritual ignorance in professors well advanced in years, and who have long enjoyed the advantages of an edifying and pious ministry. It is lamentable to think of such professors, not merely remaining stationary in their career, but actually receding in their course, and practically departing from the living God. The scene is deeply affecting, and the voice with which it speaks to all, is a heart-thrilling voice.

Now, what is the true explanation of this painful phenomenon? It is simply this, that such professors never deserved the name of "disciples" at all. They have assumed the form, but they were utterly destitute of the power of godliness; and therefore, though well stricken in years, they verify not the character of "aged disciples." If a man really believes the truth, he will make it the subject of his study. He will meditate on its varied departments by day and by night. He will familiarize himself with the sacred writings, and they will become the men of his counsel. He will use those helps which learned and pious men have provided in the shape of commentaries and explanatory remarks on the Scriptures; while he allows them not to darken or to enfeeble his impressions of the superlative value of the pure and simple word. He will take an interest in the progress of religious truth throughout the world, and will avail himself of all the facilities which his circumstances in life may afford, for enlarging his views, and adding to his stock of religious information. This man, when he has arrived at the maturity of years, will exhibit the enlarged intelligence of an "old disciple." His views have expanded with his progress in life, and his old age is cheered and solaced by the ample treasures of Divine science.

A young disciple is apt to become rather speculative in his views, and disputatious in his habits. This is one of the favourite wiles of the devil, to perplex the inexperienced, and to stumble the faint-hearted. Nevertheless as years advance, the views of religion which are assumed become more simple—more spiritual—more practical. Difficulties, which at one time perplexed the mind, gradually disappear; and the soul which has been nourished by heavenly truth, exhibits the health and the soundness of a prosperous spiritual vegetation.

II. An "old disciple" should be strong in faith.—In the earlier periods of the Christian life, the feelings are often strong and lively; the affections easily and ardently excited, and the whole character marked by a warmth and energy betokening the entrance on a new and happier state of being. This is just what might have been expected; for the discoveries of the Gospel when first presented to the mind, and exhibited in all their loveliness and glory, must have the effect of giving to it a most powerful excitement. The state of things thus alluded to, is pleasing; but there is an imminent danger of our confounding the warmth of an affection, with its real strength; ardour and liveliness of feeling, with the vigour of faith and stedfastness of attachment to the Redeemer. The liveliness of a Christian's feelings when not chastened and controlled by sound judgment, and an enlightened understanding, is very apt to hurry him into mistakes, and into acts of imprudence, detrimental both to personal religion, and to the general interests of godliness.

As a Christian then, advances in years, the liveliness of his original feelings may be lessened, while the strength of his principles has been greatly aggrandized; and he may learn from observation, and experience, not to be over-sanguine in his first anticipations. But this change in the state of his mind and in his character, may be rather favourable than otherwise to his personal religion. The reality of his love to his Redeemer may be strengthened and confirmed. His faith acquires a character of stability. His judgment is matured, and his general course of life will become more steady, consistent and uniform; in proportion as his views of religious truth become clearer and more comprehensive, we may expect that his faith will acquire additional strength, and that his confidence in God and in his promises will be less liable to interruption by disappointment and change.

If an "old disciple," then, is less lively and keen in his feelings, we have surely a right to expect that he will be at all events strong in faith; vigorous in his attachment to the Saviour; stedfast in his adherence to the hope of the Gospel. Doubts which once perplexed his mind will be removed. Temptations which once assailed him, too successfully, will have lost their fascinating and ensnaring influence. Having seen and felt the excellency of the Truth, and its suitability to his state, he will cleave to it with greater stedfastness than ever; and armed with the shield of faith, "he will be enabled to quench all the fiery darts of the adversary." With the great Apostle of the Gentiles will he be enabled from cordial and lengthened experience, to say, "I am crucified with Christ."

III. An "old disciple" should excel in practical experience.—There is a kind of experience of which some Christians make their boast, and on the extent of which depends their estimate of the reality and extent of personal religion—an experience which seems to consist chiefly in changes of frame and alternations of feeling. That there will be changes in the frames and feelings of a genuine believer, is true; but these changes are the results of such an endless variety of circumstances, that no very definite conclusion can be drawn from them either as to the prosperity or the decline of the spiritual life.

The experience to which we now allude, as what may be reasonably expected in an aged disciple, is of a totally different description. It is the result of what may be termed the practical application of Divine truth to the soul; and can be attained in its higher degrees by those only who have become, in some good measure, proficient in the school of Christ. A young disciple may have views of religious truth equally clear and correct with those of an aged believer, but his extent of personal experience may be much more limited. He knows and feels, for instance, that his heart is deceitful above all things; but he has not yet pondered the secrets of his heart, nor familiarized himself to its varied wiles. He knows and rejoices in the assurance, that by "grace he is saved;" but he has not yet attained to those overpowering views of the glorious grace of the Gospel, which the experience of Divine condescension and long-suffering, through a long course of years and of sin, is so well fitted to produce. He adores the providential care and kindness of Heaven; but what a mighty attainment in experience will he have made, when he is enabled to look back, through a long series of years, on the changes of life, the beneficence of a kind Father, and the lessons which both have combined to teach him!

We might go over the whole system of revealed truth, and show, in regard to each particular, the decided advantage which practical experience gives above abstract and speculative knowledge. Now, this advantage "an old disciple" ought to possess. He has long known the way of truth, and can declare, from personal conviction, that it is the way of happiness and of peace. He has long exercised faith in the grace of the Redeemer; and he can testify the suitable-ness, yea, the omnipotence of that grace, because he is himself a living illustration of the one and of the other. He has long mingled with, and observed mankind in, their varied aspects; and this knowledge of men and of things must give him a decided advantage over those who are guided by theory alone. This enlarged experience we reasonably expect in an aged disciple, and we likewise expect the practical fruits of it. We look for greater caution in the adoption of measures, and greater firmness in prosecuting them when adopted. We look for greater firmness in resisting temptation, greater abstraction in thought and affection from the world, and greater power over the passions of the heart. We have, also, a right to expect that "old disciples" will apply to a proper end these results of experience—that they will benefit the young and the thoughtless by their advice, their admonitions, and their example—that they will give every reasonable encouragement to youthful piety—and win, by the attractive loveliness of a heavenly walk.

IV. An "old disciple" should exhibit an example of cheerful piety.—Aged persons sometimes displease and discourage by a morose and unsocial humour. They are apt to frown with disdain on all the innocent relaxations and gaieties of youth; and, from long experience of the vanities of the world, to acquire a misanthropic temper of mind. Now, this ought to be assiduously guarded against by the aged disciple of Jesus. There are just two extremes in this matter, which ought to be avoided. There is the extreme of those who, in the vale of years and in the near prospect of eternity, retain all the thoughtlessness and all the frivolity of their younger years. Than this, nothing can be more unbecoming. There is a decent soberness, a serious gravity, which becomes an aged man, and which we naturally associate with his character and years. But there is also the extreme of gloomy and peevish moroseness—a state of mind far remote from the seriousness and the gravity which become the aged disciple. Let both of these extremes be avoided; and let aged disciples unite in their character the cheerfulness and the seriousness which become their station. When they look back on the world, and when they survey the general aspect of things around them, they have, indeed, much to render them sober and grave; but, when they look back on the past goodness of God to them and theirs, and forward to another and happier world, have they not much to cheer and to elate their minds? By seriousness, they will present a suitable check to the thoughtlessness and frivolity of youth; by cheerfulness, they will encourage the young, and recommend that heavenly "wisdom, whose ways are pleasantness and peace." In these respects, Barzillai of old presents an edifying example. (2 Sam. xix. 31.) While he excused himself from engaging in the rejoicings on occasion of David's triumphant return to his capital, he does not murmur at the general joy, but gives vent to the feelings of a grateful and a patriotic heart.

V. Lastly, "Old disciples," while they are indifferent to the world, should cherish the habit of spirituality and heavenliness of mind.—What can be more affecting, than to see an aged man clinging to the world with all the ardour of youth—plunging, or trying at least to plunge, into its amusements and pleasures—pursuing its business and its vanities—grasping at objects which are just taking their flight for ever—and fondly doating on a scene which is fast passing away? How painful to think, that a portion here, short and unsatisfying as it is, is all that he can look to! and that, when time ends, there is no eternity to count on with hope! Can this be the becoming character of an "old disciple?" No: he has gone through the world, and has mingled with its bustle; but he hath endeavoured to use this world as not to abuse it. He hath endeavoured to acquire a holy indifference to time and its concerns; and now, on the verge of eternity, he can resign his interest in all sublunary objects without a sigh. "I have done with them all; my relation to the world is at an end; my last will and testament is sealed; and I have no longer a portion in any thing under the sun. 'My heart and my flesh faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.'"

The practical inference which we design to draw from the subject is, the value of real religion, in its principles and in its spirit, as a provision for the exigencies of old age. This is an argument which all may understand, and which few do not feel. It rises out of the state of society, and of man as he is; and it comes home with a powerfully affecting energy to every heart. Do you ask me, What may be the most melancholy scene which the aspect of society presents in the ordinary intercourse of human beings? I would point to the state of that aged poor man who has few of the comforts of this world to cheer him, and with regard to whom the future is all darkness and gloom. The winter of life has arrived, and he shivers amid all its dreariness. His earlier friends are gone, and his once fascinating pleasures have long ago become distasteful. His family have been scattered over the earth, or they may have been cut off by the hand of death, or their bowels of compassion may no longer expand to the calls of tenderness. He feels himself to be a solitary wanderer in a world whose scenes have become strange to him, and to whose sympathies he, too, is a stranger. Within the precincts of his dreary apartment, he sits and broods in solitary wretchedness; and the memory of the past has no influence to cheer. Could he avail himself of spiritual resources, or did the anticipations of the future possess an elevating tendency, there would be, indeed, some delightful relief to the gloominess of the picture. But, alas! the light of heaven has not yet dawned upon his soul. The spiritual consolations of faith are to him equally a stranger with temporal comforts. The future—of which he is compelled, however reluctantly, to think—is wrapt in the dark mists of a gloomy uncertainty; and he can only exclaim, with a celebrated Roman Emperor (Adrian) on his death-bed, "O my poor, wandering, trembling, fluttering soul! whither art thou going? and to what unknown region art thou about to take thy flight?"

Can a scene of moral wretchedness be conceived more gloomy and disheartening than this? and where can you find an argument, from experience and from fact, that is more affectingly strong, in favour of the necessity and excellence of real religion? Its truths are the only subjects on which the mind of an aged man can rest with placid complacency. Its treasures of knowledge open up to him resources of constant delight, when all others are about to fail. Amid the scantiness of his temporal board, he finds a supply to the wants of nature in the rich feast which the favour of his God, the fellowship of Christian friends, and the good hope through grace, supplies. And in him the Christian paradox, as it is justly termed, is amply verified: "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, but making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things."

Those who have been accustomed to visit, on a tour of mercy, the streets, and lanes, and garrets of our crowded home-population, can paint the contrast that there is between the dreariness of the winter of age, when destitute of the resources of piety,—and when lighted and cheered by the grace of the Gospel. The stare of vacancy is exchanged for the sparkling eye of Christian sensibility; the dark chambers of a darkened and perverted mind are exchanged for those hallowed abodes on which heaven has shed its selectest radiance. And did the sons and the daughters of benevolence know the full value that is affixed, in the catalogue of the pilgrim's comforts, to the weekly or the occasional call of Christian sympathy and love, the calls, I am persuaded, would be still more frequent—the hallowed intercourse still more endeared.

The love which seeks to enlarge the real comforts of age, will not overlook, in its visits of mercy, those whose peculiar locality exposes them to still more painful deprivations. Amid the streets and lanes of our own cities and towns, the activity of our Christian agents may do much to lighten the pressure of the winter of age; but there are scenes of poverty which even "angels' visits" do not cheer—there are aged men and aged women, whose minds are shut up amid all the shades of religious ignorance; there are islands, and there are remote districts, seldom, if ever, visited by the "feet of those who bring good tidings of good, and who publish salvation;" there are cabins whose thresholds are never crossed by the messengers of peace, to whose inhabitants the Bible has not yet unfolded its ample treasures, and for the comfort of whose aged aires no spiritual provision has been made.

We are told by Dr Henderson, a truly Christian traveller and missionary, that in Iceland the long and dark nights of winter are pleasantly beguiled away by the capacity and the habit of reading, which is so general among the interesting inhabitants of that distant region; and the endeared familiarity of intercourse is cemented by the soothing salutations of aged piety—"The Lord bless thee;" to which the young are ever ready to respond, "Peace be unto thee." The gift which patriotism and piety have conferred on Iceland, we would wish to impart, in a still loftier measure, to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland; and in this "work of faith and labour of love," the Gaelic School Society of Edinburgh, with its auxiliaries, here and elsewhere, have for forty years successfully laboured; and many thousands of old and young have been taught to "read in their own tongue the wonderful works of God."

You admire the native scenery of northern and western Caledonia—her islands and her glens—her lofty mountains and her expansive lakes—oh! but there is a moral scenery that is still more beautiful; and the eye of Christian sensibility delights to linger amid the interesting economy of a Gaelic school. I enter one on the distant shores of Lochaber, and there is the goodly number of three score and ten, fathers and mothers with their children, listening to the instructions of an aged female, who had learned to appreciate, from experience, the blessings of religious knowledge. Her name, Margaret Sinclair, deserves a place in the "short and simple annals of the poor." I pass on to the school at Glencairn, in the parish of Kincardine, Ross-shire, and there, at the head of seventy scholars, of all ages, I descry the hoary head of the old veteran, (Iverach,) who in 1715 fought the battles of loyalty, and in 1815, just a century thereafter, began to learn the letters of the alphabet and whose progress was only arrested by the loss of sight, and, in the winter of 1816, by the grasp of death. At the threshold of another school, nearer to our own view, I see an aged woman of seventy-eight, leaning on crutches, and carrying her spelling-book in her hand. In the Report of the Society we mark this interesting notice:—"The great number of adults who attend the Gaelic schools is in the highest degree interesting and encouraging, and forms a peculiar feature in the system of teaching. Some of these poor people are so far advanced in life, that the committee have found it necessary, during the past year, to introduce a new article into their depository, namely, spectacles for the use of their schools. Such an appendage, it is believed, has never before been found necessary by an education society; but it serves to illustrate, in a very striking manner, the eagerness of our too long neglected countrymen to learn to read the Word of God in their native language." In all this there is a moral beauty, to delight the eye and the heart of the Christian observer; and the persons benefited by the privilege, are duly sensible of its value. "Among the more pious part of our Highland population, the schools of the Gaelic Society are known by the name of Sgoilean Chrìstid; that is to say, The Schools of Christ." They are schools for training up disciples; and the provision which they make for the winter of old age is a spiritual provision. "The handful of corn on the mountains shall shake like the cedars in Lebanon; and they that dwell in the wilderness shall rejoice." Almighty Redeemer!—we desire to make thy name to be remembered through all generations; therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

"I speak unto you, fathers,"—have you seriously thought on the characters which become aged disciples—which distinguish them, not from the mass of mankind only, but from the general company of the aged? Reflect seriously on the features which have been drawn, compare them with the Scriptures, and subject yourselves to the test of self-examination. Do you study to realize the feelings of dying men? The apostle "died daily;" and to Hezekiah the command is given, "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live." Are you ready to obey the summons? Are you "in Christ," and has Christ been "formed in you?" Do you accustom yourselves to a retrospect of the past? Israel, of old, was commanded to "remember all the way which the Lord their God led them these forty years in the wilderness." Deut. viii. 2. Come, aged friend, look back on the way by which God has led you. Trace his guidance, call to remembrance what he has done for you, and how often he has spoken to you in mercy and in judgment. Ask now, what good effect has the kindness and the judgments of God had upon your heart? Has his goodness led you to repentance; or have you despised the long-suffering forbearance of God? Despise it no longer; for there is a time "when the things which belong to our peace shall be for ever hid from our eyes?" Give glory to God, before he cause darkness, and "your feet stumble on the dark mountains."

Aged believer, are you standing in the attitude of hope and expectation? I congratulate you on your bright prospects. How do you feel,—not sorry for having been honest before God in your generation? Remember the noble testimony of good old Polycarp, when at the stake he was offered life on condition of abjuring the Saviour—"Four-score years," said he, "have I served Jesus of Nazareth, and he has ever proved a kind Master to me; how, then, shall I renounce my best of friends?" "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

"I speak unto you, young men,"—you have engaged in a good work, and your efforts to benefit others will not surely prove unfavourable to your own spiritual improvement; yet suffer the word of exhortation. In a world like this, there are many snares to beguile the unwary; and in a dense and crowded population, and in the centre of a great commercial metropolis like this, the difficulties are not lessened, the snares are not fewer in number, nor less dangerous in their character. Be steady to your principles, and cultivate a systematic and scriptural acquaintance with the whole scheme of divine truth. Cherish mutual love, guard against causes of difference, and live near to the Saviour. "Be diligent in business, and fervent in spirit; let not your good be evil spoken of; and wound not the Saviour in the house of his friends." Guard against the beginnings of evil; avoid the scenes and excitements to youthful folly. "Enter not into the way of the wicked; come not near it, turn from it, and pass away." To all within these walls would I address it, as an unquestionable truth, that a youth spent in folly, and a manhood in worldly and licentious indulgence, will issue, if death does not prevent, by realizing a scene still more awful, in a sorrowful and disreputable old age. A youth of piety, and maturer years consecrated to holy activity in the service of God and the Redeemer, will render old age venerable, death serene, and immortality glorious.

HYMN TO THE HOLY SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. JOHN GEMMEL, A. M.,
Minister of Fairley, Ayrshire.

SPiRIT! pour'd on Pentecost,
Paraclete, or Holy Ghost,
Whatsoe'er thy mystic name,
Shed in quivering tongues of flame,
Brooding over chaos deep,
Garnishing the heavenly steep,
Or by Jordan's sacred side,
When the heavens were open'd wide,
In the emblem of a dove,
Full of peace and full of love,
Resting on the Eternal Son,
Holy! uncreated One!

II.

Quickener! that dost rouse the dead,
At the gates of hell misled;
Breath of Life! thine aid impart—
Waken every slumbering heart;
Every grovelling soul refine
With thy power and grace divine:
While our little taper burns,
And another year returns,
And thy word to us is spoken,
And our hour-glass is unbroken,
And the blood within our veins,
Bid us shun eternal pains.

III.

Sanctifier! seal our hearts
With the truth thy Word imparts;
Every passion lull to sleep
That will not thy precepts keep;
Hallow every passing thought
Of our souls that Christ hath bought;
Sacred truths and themes instil,
And thy pleasure all fulfil;
There let Christ replace his throne,
And possess us for his own,
Till our bodies all shall be Temples to thy Deity!

IV.

Comforter! thy peace restore
Holy patriarchs felt before:
Brightest hope and faith returning,
And pure love with incense burning,
Evil thoughts and pains dispel,
With the sable troop of hell:
Cleans'd in Jesus' sacred blood,
And the water's mystic flood,

That proceeded from his side
When in darkest night he died,
In our souls thy graces glow,
Making earth a heaven below!

v.

Intercessor, Spirit! pray,
Teach our darken'd souls the way;
Prompting words and holy feeling,
And the mind of Christ revealing;
In us raise the pure desire,
Like the altar's quenchless fire,
Ever burning, pure, and bright,
Full of warmth, and full of light;
While, the heavenly veil within,
Our High Priest that died for sin,
With his glorious breastplate on,
Pleads before the eternal throne.

VI.

Everlasting Spirit! come,
Teach us life's imperfect sum:
All on earth is dark and drear,
Changeful as the changing year;
All is dark, without a ray,
Like one hideous Golgotha:
Breathe, oh! breathe; thine influence give:
Spirit! come, and we shall live;
Raise our souls from things of earth,
Subjects of a better birth,
And our song shall be of Thee,
Through a blest eternity!

ON THE CRIME OF THE SMITING EGYPTIAN, AND
THE VINDICATION OF MOSES FOR SLAYING HIM.

BY THE REV. GEORGE A. SIMPSON,
Minister of Tyrie, Aberdeenshire.

PART II.

Was Moses to be at once the accuser, the jury, judge, and executioner of the Egyptian? Some have alleged, that he was even then vested by a special commission from heaven, with extraordinary power or authority; "and they justify the action, extraordinary as it was, not by the common right of avenging the oppressed, which belongs not to private persons (Rom. xii. 19), but only by his divine and special vocation to be the ruler and deliverer of Israel; which call of his, however manifested, whether by his father, as Josephus says, or immediately to himself, was evident to his own conscience; and he gave this as a signal to make it evident to his people."—(See Poole's Annotations on the passage in question.) Let us examine into this statement, in order to ascertain whether it is borne out by facts and statements of Scripture, sufficient to furnish a triumphant justification of Moses' conduct. It is, indeed, to be observed, that the Scripture speaks only of his warrant to act as the ruler and defender of Israel being issued when he dwelt in Midian, and publicly proclaimed among the Israelites when he returned to Egypt, forty years after this transaction occurred. It is however to be carefully noted, that there are certain expressions in the original which would lead us to infer, that even at that time he was vested by heaven with special judicial power,—that he was authorised to act as the avenger of blood,—to punish a malicious and blood-thirsty malefactor; for the word translated "he slew," belongs to that conjugation (hiphil) which implies causation, and therefore Moses at the time must have caused it to be done, either from an actuating principle of malice and indignation, which is altogether contradictory to his recognised character for meekness, or, through a constraining and delegated power from heaven, he caused instant and summary punishment to be inflicted on the Egyptian, either by his own hands,* or by the retributive instrumentality of the nearly conquered Hebrew, causing the latter to be the minister and avenger of justice. And even in the latter case, it may still be said, in one sense, that "he slew him." And is not the hint drawn from the peculiar use of the Hebrew term, as denoting the principle or nature of Moses' action, in some measure corroborated by the expression of the conflicting and wrong-doing Israelite on "the second day," "who made thee a prince and a judge over us?"—an expression which may be made without much violence, if any, to a legitimate deduction, to imply that Moses was vested with a recognised authority, though the irritated Hebrew, like every other person placed in similar circumstances of wrong-doing, was unwilling to own a constituted authority, or ironically and tauntingly called it in question, and especially when he thought that he had Moses completely in his power, in consequence of having done an action which would expose him to the vengeance of Pharaoh. But however plausible and legitimate the hypothesis drawn from the construction we have put on the Hebrew terms may be, yet we may be certain that nothing but an express authority from heaven, or some dire imperious necessity, from whatever cause arising, could have induced a man of such notoriously mild, humane, and meek a temper as Moses afterwards showed himself to be, to imbrue his hands in the blood of his bitterest foe, if he could have otherwise prevented it, and yet secured the safety of himself, or of others. The plea of having dealt an accidentally mortal blow in self-defence, or even the necessity of self-defence, will not justify him, because, though he must have been fiercely assailed by the furious Egyptian, and his life placed in imminent jeopardy,—though he would require all his skill, activity, and prowess, to repel the onslaught of his assailant, yet the same dexterity and prowess which conquered and slew his antagonist, could have easily enabled him to smite, so as merely to disarm or disable him,—could have easily vanquished and bound him as a harmless captive, while his rank and position in Pharaoh's court, if he was then an inmate of the royal palace, would have effectually protected him from all future danger from the conquered Egyptian. Or, if Pharaoh had resented his interference in the cause of the oppressed Hebrews, as contradictory to the line of policy he had adopted towards the children of Israel, yet would not the intercession of his royal benefactress, whether she was the daughter of the Pharaoh then upon the throne, or whether she was any other near relative, have afforded the hopes of easily procuring his pardon, and rescuing him from the peril incurred by thwarting the measures of the monarch. But had he been acting under the authority of heaven as a judge and a ruler, why did he

* The Jews, in their love for the marvellous, give an easy solution to the difficulties attendant on the whole of this subject; for their priests (says Clemens Alexandrinus) declared that Moses slew the Egyptian with a word,—thus giving them a miracle to prove his mission, and so then he must be killed by him who is the Lord of life and death.—See Whitby's Annotations on Acts vii. 26.

not punish with equal severity the culpable and quarrelsome Hebrew, especially the man who was in the wrong, whom he saw on "the second day," smiting (still the same verb of the same conjugation, but in a different tense) his fellow? This man was to all appearance, though not altogether from the same motive, committing the same offence as the Egyptian had been doing, and equally deserved to die. But still Moses, so far as we can gather from the history, did not equally punish him as he had the former criminal. One would imagine that he would have undoubtedly inflicted the same summary punishment on the Hebrew culprit, if he had been commissioned by heaven to be a judge and a ruler over Israel at the time. But though no mitigating circumstances had occurred in the case of the latter culprit, and from the silence of the history we are not warranted to say that there were any mitigating circumstances, and, in fact, there never can be mitigating circumstances in the case of a deliberate murderer, yet might not Moses have been ordered by heaven,—if in the one case he had acted by the authority of heaven,—to leave in this case the culprit to the retributive justice of God, to be punished in due season, in God's own time and way. Perhaps, too, the horror of having shed blood even in self-defence, or in a judicial capacity, might have weighed with Moses in not again doing so, but induced him to try other measures to prevent the wrong-doing Hebrew from slaying his brother, to employ, as he did, on this occasion, as he had done on the former, the weight of affectionate and mild expostulations and remonstrances, seconded by the authority of his recognised rank and power, and by the remembrance of the former deed, and his consequent determined spirit to punish every deliberate murderous assault. His object was to prevent murder, and he would seem to have effectually done so. Had he indeed slain the Hebrew, he might have imagined that he would have weakened the effect of the evidence he gave, and intended to give, by the slaughter of the Egyptian, that he was to be the future ruler and deliverer of Israel. He would no doubt have vindicated his authority as a ruler and a judge, but could they have looked upon him as their deliverer? Worldly policy, therefore, though that could be no justification, might have prevented him from inflicting the same summary justice on the Hebrew. There is, indeed, one circumstance which, at first sight, would seem to militate, not merely against the character of Moses, as implying that he was actuated by the principles of worldly policy and prudence, and arguing that he could have easily spared the life of the Egyptian, but also against the supposition of his being then invested with judicial and executive power; for if he had been so invested, might it not be imagined, that he would have fearlessly and openly executed it, without any dread of prospective evil consequences to himself? It is said, "that he looked this way and that way, and when he saw no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand." But surely a due regard to the dictates of prudence is not incompatible with the right and efficient discharge of duty. Moses was undoubtedly actuated by the dictates of prudence; but it was a prudence which had respect, not so much perhaps to his own safety, as to the weal of his countrymen. He decided, by an open vindication of their wrongs, to hurry them into a rash and unsuccessful rebellion, and thus draw down upon them the still more oppressing and even exterminating vengeance of Pharaoh. He feared, that in openly capousing the cause of the afflicted Hebrews, he would be interdicted from all intercourse with them, and thus be prevented from secretly endeavouring to mitigate their burdens, by the performance of all those kind offices which sympathy and generosity know so well to do, and delight in doing in the most endearing, encouraging, and efficacious manner. He dreaded the useless periling of his life, by the open slaughter of one of the native subjects of the realm of Egypt, and thus placing himself under the ban of the empire, which he was assured would be instantly put in force against him. For he knew, if we may believe Josephus, that Pharaoh viewed him with a jealous eye, in consequence of a prophecy current among the Hebrews, and also among the Egyptians, a prophecy probably originating in some revelation made to Amram,* and laid hold of by the Egyptian priest to answer some sinister purpose of his own, that Moses was to be the future ruler and deliverer of Israel; and he was aware that Pharaoh would readily, and gladly avail himself of the occurrence of the slaughter of one of his native sub-

* Josephus mentions a dream of Amram, which he implies led to the faith of Moses. This species of revelation, (if vouchsafed to him), so common in the early ages of the world, would give birth to the surmise of the parents of Moses, that their infant child about to be born, was to be the future deliverer of Israel, and would lead them to adopt the dangerous line of conduct for his preservation in the full assurance of the realization in due time of the divine promises. And the miraculous preservation of Moses and his adoption into the family, and his careful education, for his future office, under the eye of the implacable enemy of the house of Israel, were a sort of corroboratory evidence to them of the care of heaven over their child, and of the accomplishment in due season of their anticipated and authorised hopes respecting him, and thus would keep alive their expectations, and cheer their minds under their long and complicated and oppressive burdens in the house of their bondage. A faith without a ground or object to rest upon is a nonentity, and would never be a subject of commendation by the Scripture: and as the faith of the parents of Moses is celebrated by the apostle in the 11th chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, we would infer, that some revelatory statement of some kind or other was made to them with regard to the fate and office of their infant son. It is, indeed, true, that they had no grounds or objects of their faith, the general promises of God, with respect to the deliverance of their nation, and they could calculate, that the predicted period of four hundred years was rapidly, though not very near, verging to its close. And every father and mother in Israel might hope, that they might be the happy parents of their destined deliverer. But still they must have been aware, that forty years were yet to elapse, (for wise and important purposes, though they could not foresee it, it was destined to extend to other forty years more.) And how could they calculate, that so long before its termination, they were to be the parents of the ruler and deliverer of their nation? And yet it is said of them, that they had faith—faith in what? a faith, according to the plain meaning of the apostle's words, not merely in the miraculous preservation of their child, but also in the reality of his future office. For it is evident, that the faith which the apostle celebrates, was that which actuated them, as well as Moses, to bear up in common with the other saints of God, under their allotted trials, but to the faithful and successful discharge of the duties of his public character and office. And hence we would infer, that they must have had some specific revelation or evidence of some kind or other, for the guidance and support of their faith in reference to his public character and office. These grounds or objects of their faith, they would unquestionably communicate, in the course of their permitted intercourse with him, when they were initiating him into all the elements of Hebrew lore, and training him up in the principles and promises of the holy religion, for the honourable discharge of his future important and interesting office. Reasoning on the same principles, we would also infer, that as his own faith is celebrated in the same 11th chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, he must have had some certain, or indefinite, revelation confirmatory of that vouchsafed to his parents, and carrying firm conviction to his mind, that he was to be the deliverer of Israel, and leading him to adopt the self-denying and high-minded resolution to abandon the court of Pharaoh, in order to identify himself with the people of God, and to enter on the immediate execution of that office for which he believed he had a divine commission. From the expressions, too, of the wrong doing Israelite "on the second day," we know that such a belief was current among his countrymen; and though that of itself can be no confirmation of the supposed fact, yet taken in conjunction with other evidences it may help to lead to the inference, that such an opinion may have originated in some authenticated revelation. In short, from the expressions of Scripture, and the deductions of reason upon them, we would infer that God had made it known that Moses had a divine commission at the time when he slew the smiting Egyptian.

jects, and that, too, of one of his officials, when in the supposed discharge of his duties as a task-master, and of the indication thus afforded of his wish and endeavour to excite the Israelites to rebellion, and thus deprive him of the benefit of their services, in building his treasure cities, and carrying on the public works for the embellishment and advantage of his kingdom, as a plausible and legal pretext for summarily cutting him off; and thus gratifying his jealousy,* indulging his avarice, extinguishing his fears, and justifying himself in the eyes of the Egyptian populace, with many of whom Moses might have been a favourite, in consequence of the splendid victories, if we may credit Josephus, he had gained over a neighbouring and hostile nation, or in consequence of his humane, generous, and popular manners. Such a construction Moses had every reason to believe would be put on his conduct; and such a fate he had every cause to dread, notwithstanding the powerful intercession that would be made in his favour by his adopting mother and benefactress—an intercession which had formerly secured him from peril, but which would now be utterly unavailing in his favour; and therefore Moses, not so much through any dastardly motives of fear for his own personal safety, not through any doubt of the actual reality of his commission, or of the propriety of shedding the blood of the murderous-intentioned Egyptian, but through motives of prudential and patriotic regard for the safety and weal of others, he availed himself of the opportunity furnished by the solitariness of the place, having no eye to detect him, but a friendly and a kinsman's eye, to execute the duties of his office as ruler and judge—to execute the sentence that “Who shall sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.”

The Saints in Heaven.—Temptation and sin have no place in those happy regions. These are the evils that belong to earth and hell; but within the gates of heaven nothing must enter that tempteth, nothing that defileth. It is the mixture of sinful thoughts and idle words, sinful actions and irregular affections, that makes our state of holiness so imperfect here below. We groan within ourselves, being burdened; we would be rid of these criminal weaknesses, these guilty attendants of our lives; but the spirits above are under a sweet necessity of being for ever holy; their natures have * Josephus says, that when Moses was nourished in Pharaoh's palace, he was appointed general of the army against the Ethiopians, and conquered them, when he married the king's daughter; because, out of affection for him, she had delivered up the city to him. But the Egyptians, after they had been preserved by him in the Ethiopian war, entertained a hatred towards him, and were very eager in compassing their evil designs against him, suspecting that he would take occasion, from his good success, to raise a sedition, and bring innovations into Egypt, and told the king that he ought to be slain. The king had also some intention of himself to the same purpose; and this as well out of envy at his glorious expedition at the head of his army, as out of fear of being brought low by him; and being instigated by the sacred scribes, he was ready to undertake to kill Moses. But when he had learned beforehand what plots there were against him, he went away privately; and because the public roads were watched, he took his flight through the desert, and where his enemies could not suspect he would travel; and though he was destitute of bread, he went on, and despatched that difficulty courageously.—(See Whiston's translation of Josephus.) Whatever truth there may have been in the general outlines of the story about Moses' military achievements and victories in the supposed Ethiopian expedition, and the consequent war, and ungenerous jealousy and resentment of Pharaoh and his subjects, yet we know that a variety of other causes contributed to excite the jealousy and fears of the Egyptian monarch and nation; and that it was in consequence of another action of Moses, even his open and decisive interference with the cruel line of policy adopted, for crushing the spirits and exterminating the nation of Israel, and his judicially punishing with death one of the officials of Pharaoh, that roused, at last, the vengeance of that monarch, and he was compelled to flee to the land of Midian.

put on perfection; the image of God is so far completed in them, that nothing contrary to the divine nature remains in all their frame; for they see God in all the fairest beauties of his holiness, and they adore and love. They behold him without a veil, and are changed into the same image from glory to glory.—REV. DA WARRS.

Faith.—In the experience of Christians, we find they too often show more regard to the actings of faith, than to the object of faith. This is an error in experience. The Scriptures principally direct our attention to the testimony of God—the report of God by his messengers—the record which he hath given of his Son. They testify of him, in his wonderful person, his perfect character, his mediatorial offices, his saving power, his great salvation, his faithful promises, his inconceivable love, his all-sufficient grace. They invite, exhort, entreat, and urge sinners to believe in him; and promise pardon, justification, holiness, peace, and eternal life to all that believe. They dwell rather on what we believe, than how we believe; the truth believed, rather than the manner of believing it. They make no promise to a “feigned faith,” a dead faith—that is, to a heart destitute of real faith; but to a believing unfeignedly, with the heart, in the Son of God. There are differences of this faith, both in degree and in effects, but the quality of the principle is the same. It is a “like precious faith” in all believers—in its object, warrant, kind, and effects. Instead, therefore, of making distinctions on the nature of faith, as to its actings, we shall be more profitably employed in considering the truth, the Gospel, the glad tidings of God; and, on the evidence of Revelation, endeavour, in dependence on the Holy Spirit, to believe “the faithful saying.” The truth, really believed, will produce its effects, corresponding to its own nature.—REV. JOHN COOKE. (Select Remains.)

The Love of God in Christ.—Herein is love, here is the highest expression of God's love to the creature, not only that ever was, but that ever can be made: for, in love only God acteth to the uttermost;—whatever his power hath done, it can do more: but for his love, it can go no higher: he hath no greater thing to give than his Christ. It is true, in giving us a being, and that in the noblest rank and order of creatures on earth,—herein was love; in feeding us all our life long, by his assiduous tender providence,—herein is love; in protecting us under his wings from innumerable dangers and mischiefs,—herein is love, much love; and yet set all this by his redeeming love in Christ, and it seems nothing. When we have said all, herein is the love of God, that he sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. This was free love to undeserving, to ill-deserving sinners. Preventing love; not that we loved him, but that he loved us. Just as an image in the glass that is imprinted there by the face looking into it, the image does not look back upon the face, except the face look forward upon the image, and in that, the image does seem to see the face, it is nothing else but that the face does see the image. O! the inexpressible glory of the love of God in Christ.—REV. J. FLAVEL.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

No. X.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D.D.,

Minister of Cramond, Mid-Lothian.

"These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full."—JOHN xv. 11.

THE last Paper referred to the experience of Christians under affliction, and it was then shown, that the case of a Christian under the severest pressure of affliction was preferable by far, to that of the ungodly man in the most favourable circumstances in which he may be placed. But if such be the advantage of the Christian over the ungodly man, when a Christian is under heavy trials, much more we may suppose that advantage will appear, when he is in favourable circumstances, and experiences much peace and joy in believing. And this, it is hoped, will be manifest in contemplating the experience of Christians when favoured with a season of rejoicing. And it is to this case of Christian experience, that the reader's attention is now requested. The perfection of their joy and blessedness is not, indeed, to be looked for in their present state. Here is their sowing time; and they may be called upon to go forth weeping, bearing precious seed. The harvest is the season of gladness, when they shall return with joy, bringing their sheaves along with them. But while, as has been shown, they must look for tribulation in this world, there are also seasons of joy granted them, even during the course of their journey through the wilderness, as refreshments by the way to strengthen for the fatigues of the journey, and as pledges and foretastes of that joy awaiting them in their Father's house in heaven. It is with a view of showing the experience of Christians, when they have seasons of joy even in this valley of tears, that the reader's attention is requested to the portion of Scripture quoted at the head of this Paper.

The things which Christ had said unto them refer to what is recorded in the preceding chapter, and to what is mentioned in the preceding verses of the 15th chapter. There our Lord compares himself to the vine, and his professing people to the branches. Those branches which continue barren, though apparently and by profession connected with the vine, were never truly ingrafted, and shall be cut off, as good for nothing but to be burnt. Those branches again, which are truly ingrafted into Christ, deriving sap from the vine, become fruitful. They shall not be cut off; but they may need pruning that they may bring forth more fruit. It is then in cleaving closely to Christ by faith, and feeding upon his fulness that Christians become fruitful. We tell them too, for their greater encouragement to abide in Him, that the love which he had for them was as the love wherewith the Father loved him. And if they kept his commandments, they should abide in his love. And these things were spoken to them for the purpose of furnishing them with a never-failing source of joy. And it was a joy of the purest kind, being the joy of their Lord, and as the love wherewith he loved them was the same love wherewith the Father loved him, so the joy inspired by this love was his own joy. And as the love wherewith he loved them was unchangeable; so the joy resulting from it was of an abiding nature. These things have I said unto you, that my joy might remain with you. And as Christ's love hath an extent in it that passeth knowledge, so the joy resulting from it will have a fulness in it to distinguish it from the joy of this world. And therefore does Christ say, "that your joy may be full."

I. Here it may be remarked, that the joy of Christians is derived from Christ. It hath pleased the Father, that all fulness should dwell in Christ. All the well-springs of peace, and comfort, and joy are in him. He is the consolation of Israel. He was anointed, as was foretold of him, to preach the Gospel to the poor. He was sent to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that were bound, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. The great design of his coming into this world, was to deliver them from the degrading bondage of sin and Satan, the fatal source of all sorrow, and to bring them into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and to bestow upon them all the blessings of salvation, which are of inestimable value, and which put gladness into the heart more than can be enjoyed in the greatest abundance of earthly good things. The riches of his grace are unsearchable; whatever it may be that can be most conducive to render us truly happy is to be found in Christ, and found in him in all unmeasurable fulness. O that all had the most enlarged conceptions of the glorious all-sufficiency, the inexhaustible fulness, and the admirable suitableness of the Lord Jesus Christ to all the diversified circumstances in which they may be placed, that he would be accounted infinitely precious, infinitely desirable, infinitely lovely. Now since the joy of Christians is thus derived from Christ; what exalted conceptions may be formed of a joy derived from such an abundant inexhaustible and ever-flowing fountain of all good.

II. It may be remarked, that as Christ is the inexhaustible fountain of all joy, so he communicates of his own joy to them that believe, by uniting them to himself, by the indwelling of his Spirit in their hearts. An indissoluble union is established between Christ and believers. He dwells in their hearts by faith; he is in them the hope of glory, and they are in him. They abide in him, being ingrafted in him as branches in the vine. The bond of this union on the part of Christ is his Spirit dwelling in them. And as the sap of the vine circulates through all the branches, giving them life and nourishment; so the Spirit of Christ in believers is a life-giving Spirit, that maintains the spiritual life in their souls. And this union is maintained on the part of Christians by faith. It is in believing the testimony which God hath given of his Son, that they receive Christ; and it is by faith that they abide in Christ, and place continual dependence upon him, and receive continually out of his fulness even grace for grace. This is the account of the matter given as by the Apostle Paul from his own experience. "I am crucified with Christ. Nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

III. It may be remarked, that Christ communicates his joy to believers in the way of their attendance on the means of grace. Thus, in their reading of the Scriptures, when the Spirit opens their understanding to understand him; and when he takes of the things of Christ to show them unto them, they are admitted to a rich entertainment. In contemplating especially the wonderful work of redemption as thus unfolded to them, they see in it from its commencement to its consummation, such rich displays of condescension, grace and love, as make glad their hearts, and in the contemplation of the exceeding great and precious promises of the Gospel, they find abundant sources of joy,—so that they may say with the Psalmist, "How sweet are thy words to my taste; yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth." Again, the joy of the Lord is communicated to them, when pouring out the desires of their hearts before God in prayer. The Spirit helps their infirmities in prayer, giving them enlargement of heart, awakening and cherishing high admiration, and lively gratitude, and delight and joy. Again, the joy of their Lord is communicated to them in their waiting upon God in the ordinances of his appointment. There God has promised to meet with his people, and to bless them according to what is promised. "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness; them that remember thee in thy ways; also, the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord to serve him and to love the name of the Lord to be his servants; every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant, even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer." There is much in the services of the sanctuary to make glad the hearts of God's people. They are glad when it is said to them, "Go ye up into the house of the Lord." And especially have they often experienced much joy in being admitted to commemorate the wonders of redeeming love at the Lord's table. There they have found that faith, and love, and joy were called forth into lively exercise,—so that they could say with the Church, "I sat under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste. He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love."

IV. I have to remark, that while all fulness of joy dwells in Christ, and while he is ever ready to communicate of that fulness, yet he does so in various measures, according to the diversified circumstances in which his people may be placed. On some occasions he is pleased to give what may be termed a high spring-tide of spiritual joy. And this was the case of Christian experience to which it was intended particularly to direct the reader's attention, and for which the remarks already made were intended to prepare the way. In such circumstances, they can enter into the experience of the Church, when she exclaimed, "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib," or willing people. She seems to have been suddenly visited with an overwhelming manifestation of Divine love; and thus has it been occasionally with the people of God in former and in later times. God seemed to open the windows of heaven, and to pour out a blessing, until there was not room to receive it. Their cup of spiritual joy was full and running over. Whether they were in the body, or out of the body, they could not tell; there seemed to be something of heaven let down into their souls. They saw an excellence, and splendour, and glory in heavenly objects, which they had never seen before. They could then say, "A day thus spent is better than a thousand," and "Is this after the manner of men, O Lord God?"

Such, we find from Scripture, has been occasionally the happy experience of God's people. Thus was it with Jacob, when on his journey to Padan-aram, and afterwards when he met with the angels at Mahanaim. Thus was it with David on various occasions, as we find recorded in the book of Psalms; and thus it seems to have been with Habakkuk (iii. 17-19). Under the New Testament, again, there are instances of the same kind, in the case of the Apostle Paul, when he was caught up to the third heavens; and in the case of the Apostle John, when he was favoured with heavenly visions in the isle of Patmos. And those who are acquainted with the history of the people of God in later times, particularly in seasons of peculiar trial, may recollect various instances of very signal manifestations of God's love to them, in which they were made "to rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory." It may be a suitable illustration of this subject, to mention two or three cases of this kind:—

1. That faithful servant of God, the celebrated Mr John Howe, well-known in the religious world by his published works, left in writing, on a blank leaf of his Bible, the following account of a striking manifestation of God's love to him, such as he had never before experienced, and which, indeed, he found it difficult to express in words:—"I had been preaching from 2 Cor. i. 12, 'For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.' On the morning after, I awoke out of a most ravishing and delightful dream, that a wonderful and copious shower of celestial rays from the lofty throne of the Divine Majesty did seem to dart upon my open and expanded breast; and I had often cause afterwards to reflect upon that signal pledge of special favour manifested to me on that noted memorable day, and with repeated and fresh satisfaction tasted the delights thereof. On another occasion, some years after that, I sensibly felt something of the same kind, through the adorable bounty of my God, and the most pleasant and comforting influence of the Holy Spirit, far surpassing the most expressive words that my thoughts can suggest. I then experienced an inexpressible melting of heart—tears gushing out for joy—that God should shed abroad his love so abundantly in the hearts of men, and that, for this purpose, my own heart should be so abundantly possessed by his blessed Spirit."

2. Mr Flavel, a well-known Christian minister, whose praise is also in the churches, when on a journey, was favoured with a signal manifestation of God's love. He fell into a heavenly meditation, wherein he had such tokens of the love of God, and his own interest in the Divine favour manifested to him, as greatly surpassed all the rational evidences ever he had; and he had been long a close walker with God, and an eminent preacher of the Gospel.

3. To mention only one other instance, relating to the experience of Mr Robert Fleming, author of a work, entitled "Christology." It shall be given in his own words. In a note accompanying it he says, "What I have written here was under a peculiar impression, of which I am to give no account, and perhaps cannot do any more than the Apostle Paul could of what he saw and heard (2 Cor. xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.); though I pretend not to such discoveries as he had." It is addressed to God his Saviour, and is in these words: "O my King and Lord, thine I am by innumerable ties, thine I am by self-dedication, and thine I am resolved to be for ever. Let others choose whom they please, I and my house are thine, and resolve to be for no other. Speak, Lord, for thy servant's eyes are upon thee, and his ears are open to thy calls. It is my soul's desire, thou knowest, to love thee more, and to serve thee better. I have no other end, in all my studies, labours, and watchings, but thy own service. May I attain to be so happy as to draw over more of my fellow-creatures to thee, in order to become likewise my fellow-servants. O that all men might see what I see in thee! O that they might enjoy thy presence, as I have done, and do even at this present time! O incomparably lovely, glorious, gracious, and condescending Lord, thou art all brightness, mildness, sweetness, and goodness! I adore, I admire, I love, I enjoy! But O my thoughts are swallowed up! My words leave me! Rapturous pleasure! Peace that passeth natural understanding! Joy inconceivable! Celestial vision! Am I in the body, or out of it? Be it as it will, I am still with thee! And O how happy is it to find myself thus with thee and in thee! Here is the centre! Here is the essence! Here is the fulness of true happiness, of solid satisfaction, of heavenly joy! I thank thee, O my dear God and Benefactor, for thyself; I thank thee for thine innumerable and gratuitous benefits; I thank thee for my Bible, and particularly for the New Testament; I thank thee for that measure of knowledge thereof which thou hast mercifully blest me with; I thank thee for answering my prayers, and assisting my endeavours, by carrying me on so far in this great work of 'Christology,' which thou thyself didst at first so remarkably excite and encourage me to undertake; I thank thee for the eminent manifestation of thy presence and love, by which thou hast so given me a renewed and eminent evidence and proof of thy approbation of these my labours, this 19th day of May 1707; and I thank thee, likewise, for that fair and sure prospect which I have had, in some measure, from my youth up to this day, and have now again confirmed in so wonderful a manner, that I shall enjoy thee uninterruptedly hereafter, in that happy state where I shall be capable to know thee better, to love thee more perfectly, to enjoy thee more closely, to praise thee more purely, and to serve thee more unweariedly, and that for ever, ever, ever. Amen."

Such signal manifestations of God's love are, comparatively speaking, of rare occurrence. But as they have been vouchsafed to some, so they may be still vouchsafed to others; and the more closely that Christians walk with God, they are in more favourable circumstances for receiving such manifestations. Even they, however, who have not experienced such manifestations themselves, should be thankful that God has granted them to others; for they give convincing evidence of the truth of the Gospel, and assist us in forming more enlarged conceptions of the blessedness awaiting the people of God, when they shall be admitted into his immediate presence, to behold his glory unveiled, to look upon his face in righteousness, and to be for ever satisfied with his likeness.

The improvement of this subject belongs, in the first place, to those who, in the kind providence of their God, have been favoured with seasons of spiritual joy; who can say, "O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me. Behold, God is my salvation; I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song, he also is become my salvation." What abundant grounds of thankfulness have all such! "O praise ye the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever;" and remember for what purpose such joy has been communicated to you. It is that you may run in the way of God's commandments with enlargement of heart. It is "that you may be stedfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord,—for as much as you know, in your own happy experience, that your labour is not in vain in the Lord;" and carefully avoid whatever would mar your spiritual joy. Walk humbly with God; set the Lord always before you; and grieve not the Holy Spirit, whereby you are sealed to the day of redemption.

In the second place, this subject is to be improved by those who are mourning over the weakness of their faith, the small amount of their attainments, the strength of their corruption, and that it is with them a day of small things. It is well that you should be deeply concerned, when the case is so with you. But, when you mourn over your sad case, you are called upon also to seek after deliverance. Make renewed application to the great Physician, who knows your case perfectly, and what is the suitable remedy. Rejoice that there is balm in Gilead—that there is a Physician there. Doubt not his ability and his willingness to heal your spiritual disease. Cast yourselves entirely upon his care and love. Only believe, and you shall be made whole. "Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God?"

In the third place, what shall be said to those who neither know spiritual joys, nor seek after them, but are seeking their happiness from the pursuits and pleasures of this world? Alas! you are seeking happiness where it is not to be found; you are pursuing the shadow instead of the substance; you are sowing to the wind, and you shall reap the whirlwind. Well may it be said to you, "Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not?" O that you would lay this matter seriously to heart, ere it be too late! Be assured, that there is only one way to be truly happy. All blessedness is treasured up in Christ. Cleave to Christ, and abide in him by faith; so shall you have durable riches, gold tried in the fire that you may be rich, treasures secured for you in heaven—you shall be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom!

THE LILY.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM PATRICK.

The lily and the rose are unquestionably the two prime favourites of Flora; and in heathen lore, as in modern literature, make almost as gallant a show in the choice imagery of the poet, as in the select assemblages of the florist in the embroidered garden and the rich parterre. It is almost impossible to dip to any extent into the classic page, without being regaled with the odour of their rich perfumes, or seeing them, with another favourite, the violet, flit in gorgeous phantasies before our eyes. The lily and the rose are, more especially, the chosen emblems of female beauty, innocence, and modesty; and are not always chosen to flatter, but sometimes to instruct.

The imaginations of the heathen poets, which will aid us in the illustration of many sacred allusions to this interesting plant, also heighten their descriptions of female modesty by the contrast between the lily and the rose. Thus Virgil (Æn., lib. xii.), in his description of Lavinia,—

"A crimson blush her beauteous face o'erspread,
Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red;
The driving colour, never at a stay,
Run here and there, and flush and fade away.
Delightful change! thus Indian ivy shows,
Which with the bordering paint of purple glows,
Or lilies damasked by the neighbouring rose."

Tibullus (Lib. iii., El. 4) has an equally rich and beautiful comparison,—

"Thus bright the scarlet amaranthus shines,
Which with the lily some fair maiden joins;
A hue like this, when tinged by autumn's pride,
Beddens the apple on the sunny side."

Another heathen poet, on a still bolder pinion, thus gives loose to his imagination,—

"So opening roses mixed with lilies glow,
So does the moon in her eclipses show."

In modern times, the lily has been universally received as the emblem of purity and modesty. Thus Barton,—

"Ye loftier lilies, bathed in morning dew,
Of purity and innocence renew
Each lovely thought."

Cotton, in addressing a beautiful and amiable female admiring these flowers, thus writes,—

"Lilies are, by plain direction,
Emblems of a double kind;
Emblems of thy fair complexion,
Emblems of thy fairer mind.
But, dear girl, both flowers and beauty
Blossom, fade, and die away;
Then pursue good sense and duty—
Evergreens that ne'er decay."

Thomson, taking a leaf from inspiration, thus attempts to "paint the lily, and to gild the rose"—

"Observe the rising lily's snowy grace:
Observe the various vegetable race:
They neither toll nor spin, but careless grow;
Yet see how warm they blush! how bright they glow!
What regal vestments can with them compare?
What king so shining, or what queen so fair?"

The Hebrew word for the lily is shoshannin, which, as Kimchi justly observes, is derived from another Hebrew word which signifies six. Leigh, in his "Critical Sacra," says it is thus applied to the lily, because it has six leaves. To speak more scientifically, and therefore precisely, and that the force of the remark may strike closer home, it may be observed, that the lily belongs to the Hexandria class of Linnæus, and, like many others of the same class, has six petals and six stamens; in fact, six in this flower is the chosen number—hence the derivation of its name from a Hebrew radical signifying six. It is possible that the Lilium candidum may be the flower occasionally alluded to by the sacred writers, which our translators render "lily of the valley" (Cant. ii. 1), as Pliny (Lib. xxi., c. 5), and others of the ancients, celebrate Syria for producing the finest plants of this species. It is also more than probable that some species of the Nymphaea, although of the Polyandria class in Hebrew, as in our own tongue, received the name of lilies. The Nymphaea nelumbo, in particular, which frequently differs from the other species by having a six-leaved calyx, like the Nymphaea lotus, was very common in Egypt, and, under the name of lotus, was a universal favourite, especially among the fair sex. It was worn by them in various forms, as an ornament of dress. Its petals were formed into necklaces, and were frequently carried about with them, in bud or blossom, in their hands, as we carry the violet, the lily, or the rose. It was more especially prized as an ornament in the fantastic head-dresses, as represented on the monuments—of which a specimen is given in the adjoining cut.

This prevailing passion of the Egyptian ladies for their national flower is frequently alluded to in the Song of Solomon. Thus, the daughter of Pharaoh declares, (Cant. ii. 16,) "My beloved is mine, and I am his; he feedeth among the lilies." These remarks may serve to throw light on the celebrated title of the 45th Psalm; a subject which has hitherto perplexed the Biblical critic. This beautiful and majestic piece of poetry is evidently an epithalamium, or marriage song, supposed to have been composed on the occasion of Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter. The title is singular—"To the chief musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil, a Song of Loves." The Hebrew word, "To the chief musician," is omitted in three MSS., and probably ought not to be inserted here, for the title seems to be perfect without it; Maschil, signifies "instruction;" and Jedidith, "a song of love." Some suppose Jedediah to be the name given to Solomon, 2 Sam. xii. 25; an alteration similar to the alteration in the title of the 7th Psalm, where Kish is rendered Cush. It is more probable, however, that Jedidith signifies, "of loves," or the "beloved ones;" or, by a slight change in the pointing, "the lovely or beloved girls." It is the word Shoshannim, however, which has chiefly puzzled the commentators. It is allowed on all hands to signify lilies, but they cannot conceive what lilies have to do with the subject-matter of the ode. This Psalm, as we have seen, was written as a nuptial ode, and was intended to be sung, as Dr Taylor justly remarks, in his "Illustrations of the Bible," by the female attendants of the Egyptian princess; and they are called "the lilies," a favourite poetical similitude, as we have seen, both in ancient and modern times, and they are so called, not merely by a poetic reference to the lotus lilies of the Nile, but by a direct allusion to their custom of making the lotus lily a conspicuous ornament of their head-dress. Shoshannim, then, instead of being the name of an unknown tune, or of a six-stringed instrument, as most of the commentators assert, is a poetic allusion at once to the country, the beauty, and the dress of the female choristers. In this Psalm, however, although Solomon be the type, a "greater than Solomon is here," viz., "The Lord our Righteousness." Genebrard himself, surely, would not grudge us the type, when it leads to so glorious a theme—even to King Messiah himself; his spiritual beauty and eloquence, his power and victories, his throne and sceptre, his righteousness and inauguration, his royal robes and glorious palace. The word lily, in a singular or plural form, occurs about sixteen times in the Sacred Volume. The plant mentioned by Virgil (Eclogue, ii. 45, x. 25; and G. iv. 131) is the Lilium candidum; the plant, as we have admitted, also frequently alluded to by the sacred writers. It is of the class Hexandria, order Monogynia. It has a large bulb, a round stout stem, about three feet high, with large white bell-shaped corollas. There are many varieties. The lotus is already described, under the title, "Bulrush." In this country the Convallaria maialis,

"The sweet lily of the vale
In woodland cells is found;
While whispering winds its sweets exhale,
And waft its fragrance round."

But what our translators have rendered "lily of the valley," (Cant. ii. 1,) is not our English flower of that name, but the lily already described. The Convallaria is also a beautiful and interesting plant, on which Hurdis thus moralizes:—

"To the curious eye
A little monitor presents her page
Of choice instruction, with her snowy bells—
The lily of the vale."

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE LORD BRUCE,

(SON OF THE EARL OF ELGIN,*)

"THE eldest branch of the first family among us, born to high title and extensive estates, who promised, by the beauty and nobleness of his mind, the amiableness and generosity of his dispositions, and the filial and fraternal tenderness of his heart, to grace the elevated rank and ample fortune to which he was heir, as well as to adorn and delight the domestic circle, has, after fifteen years of impaired bodily and intellectual energies, been committed to the silent tomb. But, oh! how comforting to his relatives, and how cheering to the Christian to know, that while 'the things which are seen,' fair and brilliant as they were in prospect, were receding from him, 'the things which are not seen,' in their far more dazzling splendour and richer blessedness, were, by his believably 'looking at them,' drawing near to, and brightening upon his view; that previous to his malady reaching its height, he was enabled, by grace, to afford many pleasing and satisfying tokens that 'he had chosen that better part, which should not be taken from him;' that he anticipated and acquiesced in the divine disposal concerning him; that he was willing to endure the whole extent of the affliction which appeared to be awaiting him, rather than in health sin against God; that his breathings were after holiness and forgiveness—vented, at times, in long-continued, audible, earnest prayer; and that, even amid the darkness which latterly shrouded his mind, in the temporary glimpses of light which broke through it, he was found recommending others, as he was no doubt himself seeking, 'to look unto Jesus,' and trust in him only. Brethren, surely in such a case his surviving relatives, while they sorrow, have cause 'not to sorrow as those who have no hope;' nay, may be bid to 'weep not,' but to say, 'It is well,' and to rejoice; and surely they should, as we trust they will, feel an animating motive to cleave unto Jesus, as all their desire and hope; to redeem the time, which is short and uncertain; and 'to be followers of them who through faith and patience are now inheriting the promises.' Let us, especially, see that this, and every other bereaving dispensation now occurring amongst us, and that the season at which we have arrived, do not pass away without improvement by ourselves."

A near relation of the deceased, and excellent judge of character, says, in reference to this description, "It is true, and I trust that glory is thereby given to God. My beloved —— would have shrunk from glory being given to himself. I never saw one in whom all high thoughts, worldly, intellectual, and spiritual, were so laid low; and I still feel too much his look of meek rebuke, to wish to exalt him. God did much in him—and He did much for him. In Canning's beautiful words, in his epitaph on his own son,—

"And since this world was not the world for thee,
Far from thy path removed, with anxious care,
Ambition, glory, gain, and pleasure's flowery snare;
Made earth's temptations pass thee harmless by,
And fixed in heaven thine unaverted eye."

ON THE CRIME OF THE SMITING EGYPTIAN, AND THE VINDICATION OF MOSES FOR SLAYING HIM.

BY THE REV. GEORGE A. SIMPSON,
Minister of Tyrie, Aberdeenshire.

PART III.

THE question as to the authority, and, consequently, the triumphant justification of Moses, is set at rest by the express testimony of the proto-martyr, Stephen, in his address to the Sanhedrim and assembled Jews, in reference to this very action, wherein he says, Acts vii. 25, "that he" (Moses) "supposed that" (by this action) "his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them,—but they understood not;" thus implying, that this action, done as it was as an express evidence of his being their appointed deliverer, must have been performed, as Moses felt it to be, to the satisfaction of his own conscience, under an express warrant from Heaven, in whatever way revealed, but most certainly revealed, investing him, even at that very time, with special, judicial, and executive powers; and therefore showing that what he did was not from any improper motives, but from a sense of duty and obedience to the command of the Sovereign Judge of all—the Supreme Disposer of life and death. We think that we can perceive many strong reasons for Moses's destined failure, by this action, in carrying conviction to the minds of his countrymen, of his being their appointed and promised deliverer and ruler. Had he not failed, he would probably have stirred them up into a premature, ill-concerted, and ruinous rebellion, and drawn down upon them all the crushing efforts of the armies of Pharaoh,* while their spirits were yet unshaken, and their strength yet unbroken, beneath the scourging and desolating plagues of Heaven; he would have interfered with those splendid manifestations of divine favour and grace towards the Israelites, when the Lord brought them, with an outstretched arm, from Egypt, and led them with the kindest care and watchfulness through their long and hazardous pilgrimage in the wilderness; and he would have deprived the people of God in every age of the animating and encouraging illustration and assurance of the mighty and gracious hand of Providence and grace working together, for good to all his servants in the days of trouble, perplexity, and danger; and he would have also deprived the world of those awful warnings against hardening the heart under the correctionary dealings of the Lord, furnished by the calamitous fate, and the dreadful judgments which overtook Pharaoh, and his unbelieving servants. He would have interfered with the necessary and disciplinary correction of the Israelites in righteousness and patience in the house of their bondage, and wanted himself that training in the house of affliction and of solitude, for the arduous duties, perils, and trials of his future office, as the leader, and judge, and deliverer of such a nation as Israel was. But though these and similar reasons may have rendered necessary the failure of Moses in carrying conviction at that identical time to the minds of his countrymen, yet they by no means militate against the idea of his

* If Moses was, as we know that he was, forty years of age when he slew the Egyptian, then his adopting another, allowing a difference of nearly twenty years between them, must have been verging fast to sixty, if not beyond that period; while her father, on the same calculations of disparity between the parent and daughter, must have reached the decrepit and burdensome fourscore; and accordingly, in the list, given in Stackhouse's History of the Bible, of the kings of Lower Egypt, we find one called Ramon Miamun—this very prince, who commenced his reign A. M. 2427, and who died A. M. 2493, thus reigning sixty-six years, and affording the probability of his having reached his eightieth year about the time that the transaction in question took place. This was a period of life when, oppressed by age and infirmities, the mind is apt to become very jealous and irritable—extremely tenacious of its secular offices—suspicious of, and vindictively disposed towards, every person likely to wrest from it the power which it wields with a feeble and tottering hand. This, if true, will also help to account for the sudden and vindictive determination of Pharaoh to cut off by a violent death, (as we know from Scripture that he attempted to do, for it is said that Pharaoh sought to kill him; and it is farther intimated to Moses, while dwelling in Midian, as an encouragement to go down to Egypt on his mission of deliverance to Israel, that all the men were dead which sought his life,) the man whom he had hitherto protected, whom he had visited with so many favours, and who was so dear to his daughter; for it is not at all likely that a man of such a fierce character as Pharaoh, who had, for political purposes, scrupled not to imbue his hands in the blood of a multitude of helpless and innocent children, would look with much horror and indignation on the slaughter, by any of his courtiers, of one of his native subjects, or visit with condign punishment the conduct of Moses in the case of the smiting Egyptian, if his suspicious and irritable mind had not been actuated by political motives—by the dread of seeing, in his dotting old age, the sceptre wrested from his hand, and the Egyptian dominion brought low, by the more vigorous and enterprising Hebrew leader, who had now, apparently, entered openly upon his office, and seemed determined, at every personal hazard, to avenge the wrongs and vindicate the liberties of his growing and persecuted countrymen.

being then invested with an actual commission. The evidence he then gave was indispensably necessary. He had no doubt given a plain and palpable demonstration,—a demonstration of the highest moral kind,—by his voluntary relinquishment, at a period of life when the mind is matured in wisdom and experience, and most capable of estimating the advantages of secular prosperity, and successfully prosecuting the schemes of ambition, of the pleasures, and honours, and advantages of a princely and courtly life, refusing to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter,—a demonstration, we say, of his determination to cast his lot for weal or for woe, with the people of God. But here was an evidence, perhaps more plain and palpable to the eyes of the populace, that he was determined to abide with them, to defend them and avenge their injuries on all besetting occasions, and under every possible risk of peril to himself. Here was a direct evidence of his entering upon the immediate execution of his office as a judge and deliverer, with which popular opinion, and prophetic promise, and express revelation, had invested him. And though he failed in then carrying full conviction to their minds, yet it could not fail to help to prepare their minds for his reception, when, forty years afterwards, he came from the mount of God, and from before the burning-bush, to assume with more efficiency the character and office of their ruler and deliverer, and to vindicate his pretensions by means of the mighty and numerous miracles which God caused him to work. We would, therefore, be disposed to say, that Moses was not mistaken as to the time for entering upon his office, but that from his want of foresight into the ways and designs of providence and grace, with respect both to himself and to the Israelites, he had miscalculated the immediate results ordained to flow from it. The commission, if we will be permitted to hazard a conjecture, and we hazard it with all due reverence, was only in a slumbering state, and in abeyance during the period of forty years. And when all things were fully ripe for its successful prosecution, it was re-issued, if we may so speak, with all the miraculous demonstration of Almighty power and grace, to inspire the faith, and to rouse the obedience of Moses and of the people. It must be acknowledged, that this failure operated strongly on the mind of Moses by temporarily shaking his faith, and occasioning distrust in the protection of Providence, and in the successful prosecution of his office as a deliverer; for Moses, like every other saint of God here below, was not perfect, and his faith was not yet able to rise superior to the seeming obstacles placed in his way for the purpose of its trial. It superinduced that culpable timidity of mind which induced him, through fear of the vengeance of Pharaoh, to desert his post, and to flee to the land of Midian. It helped to originate those repeated, unaccountable, and obstinate refusals, to undertake the office, when, from the burning bush, Jehovah ordered him to go down to Egypt, and deliver his people Israel. For he would seem expressly to allude to this as one of his reasons for declining the important and honourable commission. "Behold," says he, "they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice; for they will say the Lord hath not appeared unto thee." But his faith, when rekindled by the spirit of Him who spake from the burning bush, burned with a brighter and steadier flame, and inspired and animated him amidst all the fiery trials and perils of his future career and office. To all these arguments for the triumphant vindication of Moses, let us add those afforded by the reasoning of the apostle in the 11th chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, and by the character of that faith ascribed to him about this very time. He left the pleasures of Egypt, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and chose rather to suffer affliction with the children of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, for he had respect to the recompense of reward. And can it be supposed that he who had the faith, the fortitude, and the virtue to relinquish all the flattering prospects of worldly grandeur, opulence, and pleasure, for the sake of identifying himself with the helpless and persecuted people of God,—that he who feared God and not man,—who had forsaken the world for the service of the Lord, who steadily maintained a firm and operative faith in the fulfilment of the divine promises, and who looked forward for his reward, not to this world, but to the future recompense of reward,—that a man of such principles and views would do aught either for the preservation of his own life, or for the rescue of a suffering brother, but what he was warranted to do by the dictates of humanity and justice, or by the express authority of the Supreme Disposer of life and of death; or that the meek and humble Moses, whose heart bled for the woes of others, who was slow in retaliating injuries, but prompt in forgiving them,—whose meekness and whose other virtues were founded on, and were kept in constant exercise by faith and prayerful communion with the God whom he loved and feared, and served, and for whose glory and service he sacrificed all his flattering and princely prospects in Mirsain's land, would unnecessarily, barbarously, revengefully, imbrue his hands in the blood of any of the sons of man, whatever had been his offence against himself, and to whatever personal risks he might have been exposed? From hence, then, it will appear, if the strictures we have presumed to make on this part of the sacred narrative, and the views we have taken (and we have stated the case as fairly and impartially as we could, and as we deemed the original terms of the narrative would seem to warrant) of the conduct of Moses on the occasion be correct, that this extraordinary action of Moses can be triumphantly vindicated, not by the plea of self-defence, but by the express authority of God, constituting him a special and extraordinary magistrate and judge,—a deliverer of the people of God. The Egyptian was deliberately and obstinately determined (as the Hebrew term implies) to commit murder. He could only be prevented from perpetrating it, by means of some counteracting absolute compulsion. His crime was that of intentional, though he was not allowed to commit actual, murder. His offence, as being of an atrocious dye, was worthy of death. And as under a partial, prejudiced, and corrupt magistracy, such as then ruled in Egypt, the culprit would have escaped from his merited doom, Moses was specially instructed to execute Heaven's sentence, not only as a just punishment on the sanguinary intentioned culprit, and as a warning to others, but as a special evidence of his being the destined future ruler and deliverer of Israel,

And now, in conclusion, we would say, that in order to arrive at a proper judgment of any transaction, we ought to investigate as fairly and impartially as we can, into the nature and specialities of the case; that we ought never to condemn a man without the strongest evidence,—that we ought to sift out any palliating circumstances in his favour,—that we ought to put the most favourable and charitable construction on the sentiments, character, and conduct of others, especially when their general and recognised characters and conduct will help to elucidate any suspicious and mysterious transaction in which they may occasionally be engaged,—that we ought to beware of all those principles which would lead us, like the Egyptian or wrong-doing Hebrew, to the perpetration of similar crimes, nay, of any crime, which would expose us to merited punishment from men, and to the awful consequences of the retributive justice of God; but on the contrary, loving, as brethren, with pure and undissembled affection,—slow to anger, but quick in forgiveness,—forbearing one another, giving no cause of offence by word or by deed to any, and helping each other to bear their respective burdens, we should strive, as willing and humble instruments, to preserve, by every means in our power, the precious gift of life, and by the reciprocal interchange of good offices, to render that life as easy, instructive, and agreeable as our present circumstances will admit of. And, lastly, that we should diligently study the Scriptures, in order to find out their real meaning and spirit, for whatever tends to throw any light on them contributes to strengthen our faith in them,—to augment more and more our virtue,—to render the examples of the wicked more effective as a warning, by delineating their real character,—bringing more prominently into view the real principles on which they acted, and the real crimes of which they were guilty,—and by rendering the example of the saints more instructive and efficacious, by exhibiting the peculiar circumstances of temptation and of peril in which they were placed, by rendering us more cautious in imitating them, when they were evidently or even doubtfully wrong,—for the history of the saints was written (and that most impartially) for our warning, instruction, and godly edifying.

DEATH IN THE MIDST OF LIFE :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES ROBERTSON, A. M.,

Minister of Mid and South Yell, Shetland.

“Consider and hear me, O Lord my God: lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death.”—
PSALM xiii. 3.

It is highly probable that the Psalm of which our text constitutes a part, was penned by David at an early period of life; and from the expressive manner in which he alludes to his “enemy,” inquiring how long he was to be exalted over him, we are, moreover, inclined to think, that he had composed it, when removed to a distance from his kindred and country, under the persecution set on foot against him by his jealous and unrelenting adversary Saul, his predecessor on the throne of Israel. Be this as it may, it appears that he was under no ordinary distress of mind, arising from some adversity, into which he had fallen, through the instrumentality of a fellow-mortal. This is evident from what he says in the verse succeeding the text,—“Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him; and they that trouble me rejoice when I am moved.” Well did David know that adversity is uniformly attended with one of two results, namely, either a serious consideration of the causes which have brought down these inflictions, and a consequent turning unto God, or a reckless inattention to, and a hardened disregard of, the dealings of God’s providence, which eventually lead to an utter disregard of him here, and an eternal separation from his favour and presence hereafter. When the first of these is the result of our afflictions, we are warranted in viewing them as chastisements from the hand of our heavenly Father, intending thereby to recall his erring children to the path of duty. When the latter is the result of the adverse dispensations of Providence, they may be justly pronounced as infictive judgments, the precursors of that wrath, which, although now only foretold, will one day, in the sight of heaven, and before men, be poured out on all the workers of iniquity. The one proceeds from an attentive, a prayerful consideration of the ways of God’s providential dealings with us; the other is the result of our disregarding his gracious providence,—an impious saying, by our practice at least, “Who is the Almighty that we should fear him; and what profit shall we have if we pray unto him?”

It is from the last state of mind that the Psalmist prayed for deliverance, when he uttered the fervent ejaculations contained in our text. “Consider and hear me, O Lord my God: lighten mine eyes lest I sleep the sleep of death.” In which words we have these very important petitions:—

The first, that the Lord would condescend to make him the object of his most gracious consideration; the second, that the eyes of his spiritual understanding might be lightened; and the third, that he might not be permitted to sleep the sleep of death.

From the character of that holy, that pre-eminently distinguished man of God, we can have but little difficulty in supposing that these words were uttered under the most humble and heart-felt sense of unworthiness in the sight of that Almighty being, “Who chargeth his angels with folly, and in whose sight the heavens themselves are not pure.” Hence, he invokes the consideration of the Lord his God, not from any merit or deserving in himself,—not because he had known the path of life, and had carefully directed his steps within its narrow limits,—not because he had been an attentive observer of the general operations of the God of his salvation, or of his merciful dealings to himself in particular. No, Christians, on none of these does he ground his plea for the gracious consideration of Jehovah to be extended towards him; but from a sense of utter helplessness in the sight of God, and the need that he had to be enlightened as to the general bearings of God's providential dealings with his people, and more especially as to those adverse dispensations of his heavenly Father against which it was his own particular lot, at that time, to be called to struggle, he exclaims, "Consider and hear, O Lord my God." How blessed, then, are the days of adversity, when they bring with them such distrust in ourselves, and such unshaken confidence in the protection of God! For how ready are the generality of mankind, in the day of peace and prosperity, to conclude "that to-morrow shall be as this day and much more abundant;" and in utter forgetfulness of Him, from whom all their comforts flow, to look only to their own diligence, forecast, or sagacity, as all that is necessary to secure a continuance of that abundance with which they have been favoured? When the windows of heaven have been opened, to shower plenty into their garners, or to gladden their fields with that verdure, by which their flocks and their herds are increased, how ready are they to think but little of that unseen hand which has dealt so bountifully with them! How feebly, under such circumstances, does the tribute of praise ascend to their heavenly Benefactor! How seldom, and how sparingly, is their hand stretched out, as an evidence of their gratitude to heaven, with relief to the destitute among their fellow-men! Men are, in general, under these circumstances, too much taken up with the things of time, to think of any thing beyond the disposal of their goods, and to look no farther into futurity than to say to their soul, "Thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." What reason have all such, who have thus acted, and who have not yet had the sentence, "Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee," sent forth against them, to bless God in the day of their affliction, or reverse of fortune, that notwithstanding of past forgetfulness of God, their habitation is still in the land of the living and of hope,—that through Christ they have still access to a throne of grace, and that divine justice has not yet barred the door of mercy against them? With what fervour of soul ought all such to join in the petition of the Psalmist, "lighten mine eyes?"

This, however, is a petition which neither the man whose "portion is in this life," nor the nominal professor of religion, can see any necessity for offering. For it is a request in which is implied a concern for, and an interest in that for which the men of the world profess no solicitude, and in it is involved a confession, too humiliating to the proud and conceited self-righteous mind of him, on whose heart the Spirit of grace has not wrought a saving change, ever to be uttered by such an one with heart-felt solicitude. Teach only the former to see by what means he may secure an abundance of the "corn, the wine and the oil," with the other good things of this life, and all higher concerns are left to be sought after by others. Allow the latter to set himself forward as one having claim to a religious character before men, or to flatter his vanity by permitting him to proclaim himself "rich, and increased in goods," however "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked," he may be as to spiritual blessings, and he gains the end he has in view,—“A name to live.” Grant him this and he desires no more. But how different from this is the man, whose spiritual understanding has been enlightened to see his sin by nature, and his guilt by practice? The language of his heart is, "Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me. Ushered into life as an heir of wrath, I have been rescued by the unsearchable riches of Divine grace, from the power and dominion of Satan, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. When groping in spiritual darkness, the cheering, the life-giving light of the Sun of righteousness was made to dawn on my benighted soul. Walking by nature in the broad road which leadeth to destruction, I was led to see that narrow path which conducts to life. While thousands of my fellow-creatures, doing despite to the Spirit of grace, have been permitted to follow the devices and desires of their own wicked hearts, to frequent the haunts of dissipation, and to horde with the workers of iniquity, I have been plucked from the midst of them, like a brand from the burning, and have been privileged to join that happy, though often reviled company—the flock who, knowing that their rest is not here, are in search of that rest promised to the people of God." How earnestly does such an one pray for the aid of that heavenly light, to show him more clearly, and to direct him more steadily in that path, into which the grace of God has directed his steps; and by pursuing which, he humbly trusts, that under the guidance of his Divine leader, he shall be enabled to finish his earthly pilgrimage, in the confident hope of being one day called to sit down in the shadow of the everlasting light of God's gracious and reconciled countenance.

Yes, Christians, this is the great object for which the pilgrim of Zion prays that his eyes may be enlightened. Through the long vista of worldly cares, worldly sorrows, and worldly disappointments, which, either behind or before him, close on, or open up to his view, he sees the path which conducts to that city which hath foundations. Amidst all his trials and all his afflictions, he has not only light to see that the path of submission to God's will here is that which leads to glory hereafter, but, by trust in his Redeemer and faith in his promises, he is favoured with occasional glimpses of that celestial abode where stands the throne of God and the Lamb. Hence he is, by faith also, enabled to realize the day when he shall be privileged to become an inhabitant of that city, where revelation informs him, "there is no temple there; for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it,"—even that city, where "there shall be no more need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of the Lord shall lighten it, and the Lamb shall be the light thereof."

Having thus seen the propriety of the Psalmist's petition, that his eyes might be enlightened, let us consider the specific object he had in view in presenting it before the Lord his God, "Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death." By death here, we are not to consider the Psalmist as exclusively meaning that separation which takes place between the soul and the body, and when the latter shall return to that dust from whence it was taken, and the former shall appear before God who gave it. To confine the petition of David to this narrow range, would afford us but a very limited view of the devotional breathings of the "man according to God's own heart." By the phrase death, we are inclined to think that he is praying for deliverance from that spiritual death in which all, though naturally alive, are involved, on whose heart the Spirit of the living God has not wrought a saving work—thereby enlightening their minds to see their ruined state by nature, and that eternal separation from God to which a continuance in this state inevitably conducts. That this is the meaning of David's prayer, may be inferred from comparing it with a similar petition (Psalm cxliii. 7), where he says, "Hear me speedily, O Lord; my spirit faileth: hide not thy face from me, lest I be like them that go down to the pit."

Men, then, are by nature dead to God; and what an apostle says of the man who liveth in impure pleasures, is equally applicable to all who live the life that now is in a thoughtless disregard of God and of his providence, or in a habitual transgression of his commandments. In either case, they are dead while they live. And not only are they dead to God and the eternal interests of their own souls, but so completely has the god of this world blinded them to the perception of this their state, that the man who would awaken them to a sense of their danger runs no slight risk of incurring their displeasure.

As an illustration of this, behold the man who, to use the language of the worldling of old, "is doing well to himself;" who is early at his business, and late retires from it, thereby "adding house to house and field to field," while at the same time he neither knows nor acknowledges God in all his ways. Inform such a man that, amidst all his bustle, all his business, and all his acquisitions, he is dead to his best interests, or entreat him to use the prayer of the Psalmist, lest continuing in this state he should "sleep the sleep of death;" should he even hear the word of exhortation with some degree of patience, or should he listen to you with more attention than is generally bestowed by individuals of this class, he will not fail to speak of you as a visionary, or an enthusiast, or as one under a frenzy of religious excitement, whose principles, if carried into general practice, could not fail to unhinge or disorganize society, if not altogether destroy that freedom of thought and of action which alone can lead either to affluence or independence in life.

Or, behold yon thoughtless mortal, who day after day labours for a supply of the bread which perisheth in the using, whose fields are fertilized by the dews, and whose corn is ripened by the sun of heaven, and yet continues to live from day to day, and from year to year, without thinking of that unseen hand from whom these blessings flow; who daily partakes of that provision which the bounty of Him "who maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust," spreads upon his table, without ever craving a blessing on the creature comforts set before him, and neglecting to lift up his hands in thanksgiving to his bountiful Benefactor after having partaken of them,—how like is all this to that sleep of death with which David so earnestly prays that he may not be overtaken!

Again, when we view a master of a household, or a father of a family, seated with his dependants around him, "blessed in his basket and in his store," his children rejoicing in health and smiling in beauty—fresh and vigorous in youth, green as the plant of the olive—round about his table, do we not behold one indebted in no ordinary degree to the bounty of Heaven? But when we see a man, thus highly favoured of the Lord, neglecting in private to praise him for his bounty, or to bend the knee with his family in gratitude for their common mercies, what does this indicate? Death in the midst of life—a community of intelligent and accountable beings advancing to eternity, and who, under Christian discipline and with a Christian example set before them, might have been trained for enjoying glory, honour, and immortality; but now, alas! ripening for that day of wrath which awaits all "who know not God, and who obey not the Gospel of his Son."

Once more, when we see a man living, however respected according to the estimation of the world, how attentive soever he may exhibit himself to the duties of his station, and even to those claims which society demands of him; yet if we daily find him neglecting that great concern for which he had existence conferred upon him, namely, to glorify God here, in order that he may be qualified for enjoying him hereafter; what, allow me to ask, is the doom recorded against all such by the irreversible sentence of the living God? "Them that honour me, I will honour; and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed."

Did the law of God contain only a digest of duties to our neighbours, then the man who lives soberly and peaceably among, and conducts himself benevolently towards, his fellow-men, might cherish a lively hope of being made a partaker in the reward promised to obedience. But, unfortunately for all such partial observers of the law, our blessed Lord himself informs us, that the first and great commandment is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." Now, if all that heart, all that soul, and all that mind be employed in the service of the creature, which ought to have been dedicated to God the Creator, is there any evidence of spiritual life in such conduct? Men of this description may fancy that they stand high in the favour of God, because their conduct has not only been free from injury to their brethren of mankind, but has been spent in acts of benevolence towards them; while, in fact, having been influenced thereto, neither by a desire to advance the glory of God, nor from the love of him implanted in their hearts, the path of all such is as much as that of any of those to whom we have alluded—a way which seemeth good to a man in his own eyes, but the end thereof is death.

Now, fellow-Christians, these examples have been selected from that great section of mankind, who are culpable more for living in the omission of duty, than for daring violation of the law of God; and they have been thus selected, in order that your most considerate attention might be more readily bestowed on the question about to be proposed. If these are dead who only neglect to acknowledge God in his dealings towards them, or whose obedience is not based on love to his name for his redeeming grace and mercy, what can be said of those who openly profane or blaspheme his holy name, and by habitual iniquity defy the arm of the Omnipotent? Well, surely may we characterise the life of all such as a state of death, and for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

Trusting, from what has been advanced, that it has appeared to all who now hear me, and who take the Word of God for the standard of their faith and the rule of their practice, that there is such a thing as death in the midst of life, I would earnestly impress it on your minds, that ye too may be involved in this death, while in the full enjoyment of the life that now is, and surrounded with every comfort which renders a continuance therein desirable; for it is in this twofold state that every son and daughter of the human family are ushered into this world; nay, in this state all must continue, unless they have light vouchsafed to them to see their ruined state, as descendants of Adam, and grace to enable them to turn from it into that path of life opened up to them through Christ. Be entreated, therefore, to examine carefully into this important truth. Rest not in barely assenting thereto; endeavor to ascertain its particular bearings on each and all of your states as individuals. The time allowed for this important inquiry is both short and uncertain. Do not the circumstances under which we have, by the merciful forbearance of a gracious God, been permitted to assemble on this occasion, remind us that another year of our grace and probation has gone by—that we have all advanced another stage on that road which leads to eternity? Pause, therefore, for a moment, that ye may look back, in serious reflection, on that stage over which ye have so lately passed. As the Word of God informs us that there is such a state as death in the midst of life, so likewise, on the same authority are we assured that there is a present spiritual life, which all must experience before they can escape that eternal death, or enter on that everlasting life which is to come.

Are ye anxious, then, to know what your spiritual prospects are, in regard to that eternal state on which ye must soon be called to enter? Ye can easily ascertain the fact, by adverting to that path in which ye have walked in time past, that in which ye now are walking, or that in which ye intend for the future to tread. Has the broad way, frequented by the daring violator of God's law, the habitual despiser of his ordinances, or the thoughtless being who neither knows God nor acknowledges his providence, been that in which ye have walked in years past, or which ye are now frequenting? Or has it been that strait, that narrow way, in which are found the Redeemer's little flock, that peculiar people which he has purchased for himself, and who are distinguished from all others by their zeal for good works. If the former, then He whose name ye outwardly bear, has expressly informed you that your path leads to the gates of destruction. If, on the contrary, it be the latter, then, however despised you, and the few companions who accompany you, may be, on the same authority you are assured that it will conduct you to the mansions of glory. If that, then, is the way of death, and if this be the path of life,—and who can, nay, who dare to question what the Son of God has declared?—how incumbent a duty is it on us all to examine into our path, that we may thereby ascertain the end to which it leads! How applicable to each of us the petition of the Psalmist, "Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death!"

Consider, Christians, while, day after day, and year after year, friend after friend, and acquaintance after acquaintance, are passing from time to eternity, are we not thereby both forcibly and feelingly called to remember, that in a few days, or in a few years at most, we too must be called to bid farewell to this earthly scene, to put off this mortal tabernacle, and to enter on the awful realities of eternity. I beseech you to consider how short a space is often allowed to prepare for this awful change. Not to speak of those awful * visitations of Providence by which many, * Scarcely a year has passed, since the writer became connected with this parish, in which the inhabitants thereof have not had to mourn the loss of relatives, who perished when engaged in prosecuting their lawful occupations on the deep. In 1832, Mid and South Yell lost twenty-eight men, most of them in the prime of life, by whose removal nineteen widows, and upwards of fifty fatherless children, under fourteen years of age, were left in a state of utter destitution. During the past year four widows have been left, by similar misfortunes, with twenty-one children, all (except three) under fourteen years. Some of these families are in the most destitute circumstances, and all of them without subjects to supply the means of existence for twelve months, unless by the forbearance of those to whom they are indebted. Never was Christian benevolence interposed in behalf of more destitute objects than some of these four families are. May we not hope that a small sum may in this way be procured for them also?

Isaac Dayley, Esq., S.S.C., Royal Exchange, or Mr John Johnstone, 2, Hunter Square, Edinburgh, will receive and transmit to the Rev. James Robertson, any contributions kindly given for this benevolent object.

alas! of your friends and acquaintances have in a moment been swept from the land of the living, you have all seen that neither the bloom of beauty, the activity of youth, nor the vigorous arm of manhood, can either bribe or arrest the messenger of death. Under his influence, how soon is the ruddy countenance blanched into paleness! how speedily does the elastic form become torpid, and the most vigorous arm nerveless! With these warnings of mortality so recently before you, remember, O remember, Christians, that the time that now is, was afforded you to prepare for eternity, and that every day is misspent, a portion of which is not devoted to this paramount concern. Does your conscience tell you that many are the days, the months, or the years which have been thus misspent by you? Does it ever still more alarmingly whisper in your ear, that there is some reason to fear that the slumber, if not the sleep of death, hath overtaken you, even in the midst of life? If so, though ye cannot recall the past, be entreated to improve the future. Endeavour, from this day forward, so to live that death may not surprise you at unawares. Daily draw near to God; daily let an intercourse be maintained between God and your souls; daily live as if you were not to be permitted to behold another morning's sun to enlighten this earth. Endeavour to live thus, and the Sun of Righteousness will cause his spiritual light and life-giving beams to shine into your souls,—yea, will even enable you, by the eye of faith, to penetrate the vale of the shadow of death, and to behold that rod and that staff which he has provided against your passage through the great Jordan; so that, cheered by that light, and aided by that rod and staff, the swellings thereof shall not overflow you, but through these ye shall pass on in safety to that land of promise, where, under the light of God's reconciled countenance, ye shall be permitted to join in that song which ascends, through eternity, "to Him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb,"—even to Him who will then have completely redeemed you from sorrow, from sin, and from death; and who shall wipe away all tears from your eyes—for the former things shall have passed away.

L I F E.

LIFE! short and simple word, with meaning fraught
Beyond what human tongue can e'er unfold!
Mysterious boon! thy first and final cause
Stamps thee with deep and dread importance. Earth
Is not thine origin, nor genial clime,
Nor earth thine end. Thou spark from heaven sent,
A while to glimmer here, and then return,
In heaven's light eternally to blaze,
Or sink extinguished in eternal night;
Oh what momentous interests must hang
On our frail tenure of thee here! And where
Our lot may be, or in the lowly vale,
Or earth's high places, matters not, for soon
Must earth's distinctions cease, nor aught remain
Of earth's possessions, save attesting fruits
Of branches graff'd into the living Vine,
Or left in nature's desert unclaim'd:
But these must stand recorded in the book

Of God's remembrance, till the final day,
When He shall judge the world in righteousness,
And give to all according to their works.

And life, uncertain, frail, and fleeting life,
Is the allotted time assign'd by heaven,
To fix our state, and character, and doom,
For everlasting ages. Full in view
Are life, and good, and death, and evil set—
The blessing and the curse,—and warning given
To choose the good, and from the evil fly.
But deaf to warning, blind to beauty, dead
To love and gratitude, we turn away,
To seek in lying vanities our rest—
To sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind. Sure
The maniac revelling in fancied bliss,
Is wise, compared with reason's boasting son
Who calls it happiness that he enjoys,
Afar from God through Jesus reconciled;
While justice cries for vengeance, and her sword
Is seen suspended by a single hair,
Ready to fall on his devoted head.

And nature, in its best estate, can yield
No surer blessedness—no safer rest,
To Adam's race, since that dire overthrow,
Which captive led the human family,
As slaves to sin and Satan, bound in chains
Of darkness and of death, yet, strange to tell,
In love with bondage, pleased to underlie
The righteous wrath of Him whose smile is life,
And whose tremendous frown is more than death;
And dreaming still of happiness, and still Chasing the flying phantom, till at length
They sink engulf'd in everlasting woe.

Ah, poor humanity! such is thy state;
And such had ever been thy state forlorn,
Had not Eternal Love devised a plan
To bring again his banish'd, in a way,
Consistent with his holiness and truth:
Had not the Prince of Life himself come down
To work for us a perfect righteousness—
To bear our sins and sorrows on HIS cross,
To free the lawful captives doom'd to die,
To vanquish all the powers of death and hell
Combined against our peace—captive to lead
Captivity, and with new glory crown'd,
Triumphantly resume his ancient throne,
When, set at God's right hand, He ever reigns,
To bless his people whom He died to save.

Oh wonder far surpassing human thought,
The more explored the more amazing seen,
Even angels and archangels strive in vain
To fathom this mysterious depth of love;
While man, its favour'd object, little heeds
The heaven-transporting theme. O earth, awake!
Wake all thy darken'd tribes, and gath'ring come,
Behold the light of life which streams afar,
To guide thy dark and weary wand'ers home;
See, welcome and adore the Mighty One,
Who travell'd in his strength to rescue thee.
Let every one that hears proclaim aloud,
And publish from the mountain tops, the news
Of light, and life, and everlasting joy
To man, through Him who liveth, and was dead,
And lives for evermore, the great I AM.
O spirit of the living One descend,
Confirm the tidings—bear them home with power,
In light and faith, to every human soul.
Breathe on the slain, O breathe! that they may live
And stand a mighty host, in full array,
To fight Messiah's battles, and to bear
His standard to the farthest bounds of earth.

Oh, this is life indeed—all else below
Is only living death—but this shall last,
And grow and brighten through eternal years,
As nearer reaching the great source of life,

The glory of the undivided Three
Beams on the soul with lustre more intense,
And all its large capacities are fill'd,
To overflowing, from the living spring.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Harden not our hearts.—The metal of the human soul, so to speak, is like some material substances. If the force you lay upon it do not break it, or dissolve it, it will beat into hardness. If the moral argument by which it is plied now, do not so soften the mind as to carry and to overpower its purposes, then on another day the argument may be put forth, in terms as impressive, but it falls on a harder heart, and therefore with a more slender efficiency. You have resisted to-day, and by that resistance you have acquired a firmer metal of resistance against the power of every future warning that may be brought to bear upon you. You have stood your ground against the urgency of the most earnest admonition, and against the dreadfulness of the most terrifying menaces. On that ground you have fixed yourself more immovably than before; and though on some future day, the same spiritual thunder be made to play around you, it will not shake you out of the obtnacity of your determined rebellion.—REV. DR CHALMERS.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. JAMES MITCHELL,

MINISTER OF THE SCOTCH CHURCH, WOOLER, NORTHUMBERLAND.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

In the spring of 1783, Mr Mitchell made application, through Dr Davidson, to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, to be taken on trials; and, after the usual examination and delivering the appointed discourses, he was publicly licensed to preach the Gospel. Soon after this, while on a visit to some friends in Glasgow, he received a letter from Dr Hunter, the Professor of Divinity under whom he had latterly studied, containing the satisfactory announcement that he had recommended him to Lady Glenorchy at Barnton, to fill the office of chaplain to her Ladyship. His feelings on receiving this appointment will best be described in a quotation from his manuscript autobiography, which contains also a slight notice of Lady Glenorchy at that period:—

“To be chaplain to such a distinguished follower of the Redeemer as this, was a great honour and privilege bestowed upon me by Divine Providence. This was the light in which the matter appeared to me, and I could not but admire and adore my divine Saviour for this appointment; for though I had searched all Scotland over, I could not have found a situation more desirable, or more adapted to the comfort and improvement of a young preacher of the Gospel. Besides the advantage I had of being in such a family, by being placed within four miles of Edinburgh, I was within the reach of some of my intimate companions, and many of the most eminent ministers and private Christians of the Scottish Church. Might I not say the lines have fallen to me in pleasant places, and that, in this appointment, I had received another striking testimony to the truth of the promise already often alluded to, ‘Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all other things shall be added unto you.’ At my entrance into her Ladyship’s family, she was some time past the meridian of life, and had begun to experience some of those complaints which somewhat embittered the remaining part of life. But still she was in some degree able to superintend her domestic concerns, to enjoy society, and to make active exertions for the good of religion both at home and abroad. While this appointment of chaplain to Lady Glenorchy filled me with admiration and gratitude for the Divine goodness, it, at the same time, excited fear and suspicion as to my adequacy for efficiently and usefully performing the duties of the honourable situation to which I had been chosen. But, as was my usual way under the occurrence of difficulties, I betook myself to prayer and dependence on God; nor was I disappointed, but received those measures of courage, prudence, and grace, which such a situation required.”

The duties which Mr Mitchell was required to perform were quite in harmony with his professional views and feelings. Morning and evening he conducted family worship in the presence of the whole of her Ladyship’s establishment, and, in the course of reading a portion of Scripture on such occasions, he indulged in such expository remarks as occurred at the time. On Sabbath mornings also, he was expected to preach a sermon, and at that service the tenants and cottagers in the neighbourhood were invited to attend. The whole arrangements of the household, and the conversation at table, were such as became the eminent Christian character of the head of the family. She literally went about continually doing good; and, assisted and encouraged in all her plans of benevolence by Lady Harriet Hope, who then resided with her, she expended her time, her talents, and her fortune, in promoting the temporal and spiritual well-being of her fellow-creatures. To enjoy the society of such a consistent and devoted Christian, Mr Mitchell felt to be a privilege of no ordinary value; and the influence upon his mind and feelings could not fail, under the Divine blessing, to be of the most salutary kind. After remaining two years in this situation, he was invited to stand as a candidate for the Scotch Church in South Shields, Northumberland. His sermons gave complete satisfaction to the congregation, and he received an unanimous call to undertake the pastoral charge over them, which he readily accepted. While he resided in South Shields, he enjoyed much comfort; and often was afterwards accustomed to speak of it as one of the happiest periods of his life. He was laborious in his attentions to his people; and although his income was necessarily small, he refused to enlarge it by engaging in any other employment.

After remaining for two years in the uninterrupted exercise of his ministerial duties, Mr Mitchell paid a visit to his friends in Perthshire; and while on his way thither, he called, in passing through Edinburgh, on Mr Scott, in whose family, as we have already seen, he had resided as tutor. The second charge of the parish of Montrose was at that time vacant, and as Mr Scott was the law-agent of the Magistrates of that burgh, he offered to give his young friend a letter of recommendation, with a view to his preaching before the congregation. He did so, and Mr Mitchell preached two successive Sabbaths, with universal acceptance, and, as he afterwards found, to the conversion of two individuals. Before leaving Montrose, the Magistrates invited him to a public dinner, and conferred upon him the freedom of the town. He then visited his friends at Strageath, and returned to his charge at South

Shields, having little or no expectation of being appointed to the vacant charge at Montrose, there being no fewer than twelve candidates, and some of them men of great talent and influence. The canvass was a keen one. The list was reduced to four; and Mr Mitchell himself remarked to a friend of his, who was also one of the candidates, "They say that one of them is the Provost's man, another is the Magistrates' man, a third is the Kirk-Session's man, while they call me Providence's man, and to that arrangement I have no objection." The result, which was in his favour by a very respectable majority, was communicated to him by his kind friend Mr Scott, in a letter which breathes the most sincere respect and the most earnest solicitude for his success as a minister of Christ. He left South Shields, accordingly, to the deep grief of his little flock, by whom he was warmly beloved; and such was the confidence which they reposed in him, that they left the choice of his successor in his own hands—a trust which he discharged to their entire satisfaction.

The new situation on which Mr Mitchell now entered was one of serious responsibility, the parish being large and important, and the church built so as to contain upwards of two thousand people. He was received with great cordiality by the people, and during his stay among them, he endeavoured to approve himself in all things "a workman that needed not to be ashamed." In the early part of 1791, he was married to the only daughter of his colleague, the Rev. Mr Molleson, a lady who still survives, with her whole family, consisting of three sons and a daughter, to mourn the sore bereavement with which they have been visited. The year succeeding his marriage, the church of Montrose was rebuilt, and so enlarged as to accommodate nearly three thousand people. This, of course, called for greater bodily exertion both from Mr Mitchell and his worthy colleague, than ought ever to be demanded of any man; but, actuated as they were by an ardent love of souls, they rejoiced in the additional comfort which this arrangement afforded to the extensive parish in which they laboured. Mr Mitchell was indefatigable in his exertions for the benefit of his parishioners; and from the pulpit he spoke with such freedom and faithfulness, particularly in reference to the vices of the higher and more influential classes, that his preaching gave great offence. A lady of fortune at length addressed a letter to him on the subject, calling upon him to refrain from using such strong language in reprobating the stage, the card-table, and fashionable assemblies. His reply was calm, firm, and dignified. Did our space permit, we could have wished to insert the entire letter; but we cannot withhold from our readers the following extracts, as a specimen of the spirit in which it is written:—

"Several of the congregation have, I suppose, thought that I ought not to inveigh against such diversions. You are the first who has ventured deliberately to entreat me on the subject. But while my conviction of their sinfulness and danger remain, a compliance with your request, consistently with duty, cannot for a moment be thought of. I wish, indeed, much to please you, but not at the expense of truth and duty. This would be too dear a sacrifice. You, and others who have often had occasion to hear me, are well acquainted with my opinion of these amusements. As far, therefore, as you are concerned, farther admonitions may not be so needful. But are there not persons who are emigrating frequently from other places to this, in whose hearing I have never yet lifted up a testimony against these diversions? And are there not young persons, arriving from time to time at the exercise of reason and reflection, who have need to be warned by their pastor of their fascinating and dangerous influence?

"I am obliged to you for your concern for my respectability and usefulness, which you think are likely to be injured by my touching in my discourses on such ungrateful topics. It is surely the duty of any Christian to be concerned for the credit and success of ministers of religion in general, and particularly for the credit and success of the pastor of their own congregation; and these it ought to be their study to promote, by their countenance, their exertions, and their prayers. I have, however, no fear of my respectability, while I have the happiness to be found in the way of duty. My business is to preach what I believe to be truth, whether men will hear or forbear, and to leave consequences in the hands of my divine Master, who has the hearts of all men in his hands, and who, when I honestly serve him, will preserve for me, in the breasts of my hearers, that degree of esteem and regard which his glory and my comfort and usefulness may require. If I were to preach to please men, I would not be the servant of Christ; on the contrary, would I not be a vile sycophant, and deserve to lose any respectability I ever had in your eyes and in those of society? What though, in such a case, I were the more esteemed among men, if I sunk in the estimation of my own mind, and especially in the estimation of the omniscient Observer of our actions and conduct? If I lost my confidence toward God, how could I look up to him for his assistance and grace? and without these, either out of the pulpit or in it, I believe I would not acquit myself, in any degree, in a satisfactory manner. I cannot agree with you in thinking that want of success in preaching against these diversions amounts to a prohibition of preaching against them in future. We often declare the doctrines of Christianity, and yet our report by multitudes is still disbelieved. Are we, then, no longer to publish the important doctrines of revelation? We frequently have insisted on the righteous matters of the Law—we have repeatedly inveighed against theft, lying, swearing, drunkenness; and yet are there not swearers, liars, drunkards, and thieves among us? We deplore our want of success in inculcating the precepts of Christianity; but shall this be deemed a good reason for ceasing to inculcate these and other duties in future? An apostle says, 'I will not cease to put you in mind of the same things, though you know them already, and are established in the present truth;' and shall I fail to put you and others in mind of truths which I believe to be important—which, instead of being established in, you keenly oppose?

"Controversy I always disliked, and now dislike more than ever. It is a thorny field in which I have seldom been found, except when dragged into it. A part of my conduct, as a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, was attacked, and this made it necessary, especially when I could do it with a good conscience, to say something in my own vindication. Silence might have been interpreted into a confession of the weakness of my cause, or an alteration of my opinions. I by no means wished to irritate—to advance any thing inconsistent with truth or with the meekness of the Christian temper. I would much rather have Mrs — as my friend than my enemy, and your esteem much rather than your disapprobation. There are few that respect your great virtues more than I do. I consider you as a very respectable member of society, and wish not to shut my eyes against your distinguished benevolence and usefulness. If there is any defect in your character, perhaps it is on the score of piety and religion.

You are, I hope, a well-disposed lady; but I believe it is the wish of others, as well as mine, that you discovered a little more decidedness in your religious character. Be not offended with this freedom of advice; for it arises not from disrespect, but from a desire to render you, useful as you are at present, still more extensively useful."

The unshrinking fidelity which characterises these remarks, ran through the whole dealings of Mr Mitchell with his flock. He unhesitatingly reproved sin in whomsoever it was found. No rank, no condition in life, prevented him from conscientiously disburdening his own mind, and meekly, but firmly expostulating with those who were guilty of either departing from the truths, or of walking inconsistently with the precepts of the Gospel. In such a scrupulous and firmly upright frame of mind, he was not likely to be long without some cause of uneasiness. He had been only a short time at Montrose, accordingly, when an event occurred, which occasioned him considerable anxiety. A person of some influence, and at that time a magistrate of the town, had imbibed Socinian principles, and was actively engaged in propagating them. Mr Mitchell being Moderator of the kirk-session laid the matter before them, and it was agreed that the offender should be refused admission to the Lord's Table. The result was, that being deprived of Church privileges, he and his family left the Church of Scotland, and published a violent attack against Mr Mitchell and the kirk-session, extending to a tolerably sized volume. Mr Mitchell prepared a reply to this attack, but was advised not to publish it. The discontented magistrate formed a small Socinian congregation in the town, and procured a minister. In a very short time, however, the congregation was dispersed, and the place of worship was shut up. The originator of the sect gradually fell in respectability and in worldly wealth; and it was said of him, that he had declared that the sun of his prosperity had gone down from the hour when he began to deny his Lord.

Frequent cases of discipline occurred, which brought Mr Mitchell into considerable trouble. In the years 1792-3-4 particularly, he and his colleague had their righteous spirits vexed by the immoral practices and infidel opinions which prevailed among the humbler classes of the manufacturing population—the probable consequence of the French Revolution. The ministers of Montrose took occasion both in the pulpit and out of it, to testify against the then prevailing sentiments. This awakened the hatred of the adherents of these opinions, and sometimes they were exposed to rude treatment as they proceeded along the streets. Their exertions to stem the revolutionary torrent however, were unavailing. The heritors of the county seeing the alarming progress of the evil, held a meeting, at which they passed resolutions of a loyal and anti-revolutionary character. These resolutions were appointed to be read in all the churches throughout the county. But as they were entirely secular in their nature, the ministers of Montrose agreed to hold a meeting for the purpose on a week-day. The meeting took place, but it was so stormy, that although the resolutions were read, it was almost impossible to hear a single word of them. In addition to the spirit of rebellion which was thus manifested among the people, no little alarm was felt in consequence of the threatened invasion of the French. As it was thought to be not unlikely that they might attempt a landing in the Bay of Lunan, several regiments of soldiers besides volunteers were quartered in Montrose and its neighbourhood. This influx of military from all parts of the kingdom, had a very pernicious effect upon the morals of the resident population. Sabbath-breaking, more especially, became a very prevalent vice. This was a source of great grief to Mr Mitchell, and with a view to check the growing evil, he wrote an Essay on the Sanctification of the Sabbath, which, however, he did not publish for some years after it was written, when the sin had become so wide-spread, that he thought it would be wrong any longer to withhold his essay from the public.

On one occasion Mr Mitchell's conscientious scruples were likely to lead him into serious difficulties. As a junior member of the Presbytery of Brechin, it was expected that he would be called upon to preside in the settlement of a minister in a vacant parish contrary to the will of the people. This was opposed to the decided views which Mr Mitchell entertained on the subject of the pastoral relation. He came to the resolution, therefore, that sooner than he would take a part in the ordination, he would resign his charge. This, however, was happily prevented by another member of Presbytery being appointed to preside.

In the discharge of his numerous parochial duties Mr Mitchell was indefatigable. He visited the sick, instructed his people from house to house, held diets of visitation, and also of examination, and in every possible way he strove to promote the best interests of the flock over which the Holy Ghost had given him the oversight. To the young, he was remarkably attentive. He held a large Sunday-school on the evening of the Lord's Day, which he taught with the utmost regularity and diligence. Some pleasing fruits of his labours among the young, came afterwards to his knowledge. One instance may be mentioned. Some years after the period to which we have now arrived in the history of this faithful minister of Christ, he happened to be in London, and one day when walking on the wharf, a sailor lad came up to him, and with the tears trickling down his weather-beaten face, acknowledged the benefits which he had formerly derived from his instructions in the Sabbath-school at Montrose. Mr Mitchell took great pains also with the young communicants, instructing them for a long time before the communion.

After labouring for twelve years in his charge with exemplary ardour and diligence, his mind began to be deeply impressed with the difficulties which presented themselves, connected with matters of discipline. He felt convinced, that there were many who habitually sat down at the Lord's Table, while their character and conduct were such as called for their exclusion from the holy ordinance. The thought weighed heavily upon his mind, and he came to the conclusion, that the best plan would be for him to resign his charge. On consulting his friends, however, they persuaded him, that he ought to continue at his post—persevere in the discharge of duty, and leave the consequences to God. Following this advice, he remained for five years longer, when finding that matters were becoming worse instead of improving, and that he was only destroying his own peace of mind without doing the good which might be accomplished by another, he resolved to leave Montrose.

In forming the design of quitting the post which Providence had assigned him, Mr Mitchell underwent great anxiety of mind. In many respects Montrose was dear to him. He had laboured there for more than seventeen years with considerable success; he had formed many friendships among his beloved flock. He lived on terms of the warmest and most cordial amity with his esteemed colleague. Various urgent considerations, in short, called upon him to remain. But feeling that he could not, consistently with faith and a good conscience, retain his charge, he resolved to tender his resignation, and throw himself, his wife and family, upon the watchful care of an overruling Providence. After having fully made up his mind, he communicated his design to his respected colleague and father-in-law Mr Molleson, who received the painful intelligence with deep regret, but at the same time he concurred with Mr Mitchell in thinking, that, in the circumstances of the case, it was perhaps the only step he could take. On the Sabbath previous to his resignation Mr Mitchell preached from these words, in the 73d Psalm—"Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterwards receive me to glory." His people were ignorant of the coming event, but many of them were struck with the manner of the preacher, as well as with some expressions which fell from his lips. On the following day he tendered his resignation to the magistrates, and afterwards to the Presbytery. The sensation produced in the town by an event so sudden and unexpected was great. Day after day his house was thronged by visitors and friends urging him to stay. The provost waited upon him at the instance of the magistrates, and entreated him to withdraw his resignation, offering him an increase of stipend if the smallness of his income was the cause of leaving. The Presbytery appointed a deputation of their number, to deal with him on the subject. Nothing, however, could shake his resolution. He felt that it was his imperative duty to retire from Montrose, and give place to another who might be better adapted to grapple with the local difficulties of the situation.

The minute of the Presbytery of Brechin on accepting Mr Mitchell's demission, may here be inserted as showing the views which his brethren entertained, as to the sincerity of the motives by which he was actuated, and their own opinions in reference to the path of duty in such cases.

"The Presbytery of Brechin at their meeting on the 12th of December last, had given into them a letter from the Rev. Mr Mitchell, intimating his demission of his charge as second minister in this place. From the uncommon nature of the case, and from the great regard the Presbytery entertained for Mr Mitchell, they did not at that time receive his resignation, or appoint a vacancy to be declared, but allowed his letter meantime to lie on their table. They appointed a committee of their number to correspond upon the subject of his letter of demission, to endeavour to remove the doubts which he expressed, or the reason of his resignation, and to recover him to usefulness in this place. It may be proper here to observe in justice to Mr Mitchell and to ourselves, that the difficulties and doubts which he expressed did not regard either the doctrines or discipline of the Church of Scotland (for he expressly mentions his high esteem of both), but his difficulties regarded the exercise of discipline in his particular situation. He has also said repeatedly, that had he been in a private station, he would not have thought it his duty to leave communion with his congregation. This we mention to prevent misrepresentations. The committee then appointed by the Presbytery to correspond with Mr Mitchell, proceeded to the discharge of the duty intrusted to them. From their correspondence, which was read at length at last meeting on the 13th current, it appeared to the Presbytery, that they had done justice to the cause, and conducted the business in an able and satisfying manner—though without altering Mr Mitchell's resolution. The Presbytery, therefore, taking into view the importance of the charge in this populous town and parish, and that they had now done what duty appeared to dictate with regard to Mr Mitchell, resolved that without any delay the charge should be made void. Whilst they therefore give him credit for his sincerity, of which he has given proof in acting according to his convictions of duty, they are at the same time of opinion that the reason assigned by him is not sufficient. They are of opinion, that during the period of life a charge of this important nature is not to be abandoned, that though difficulties occur in the discharge of duty, (as they will occur more or less to us all), we are not to relinquish the post assigned us, but imploring direction from above, and acting for the best as the nature of the case may require, are to maintain our important stations. They farther think, that when ministers endeavour conscientiously to discharge their duty, they shall be approved as faithful servants even although the success which they desire may not crown their labours. That, by a prudent and steady exercise of discipline authorised by the New Testament, and directed by the standards and constitution of our Church, order is to be maintained, and the ordinances of Christ preserved from profanation; that every man is to be used for repressing vice and irreligion among us; and thus, though Israel be not gathered, yet, that those who watch for souls, and make proof of their ministry, shall be accepted at last of their great God and Master. Such are some of the topics upon which the answer of our committee insisted, and such are some of the leading objects at which we who continue in our situations would wish steadily to arrive. We, doubtless, live in an age of great degeneracy and lukewarmness in religious matters, and ministers who endeavour to discharge their duty may sometimes be treated with obloquy, and regarded as troublers in Israel; but we trust we have a good conscience, wishing to live honestly, and to follow the path prescribed in Scripture; and hoping, that while we faithfully warn you, and while we pass not over without concern those faults which are public, and inconsistent with a religious profession, we have delivered our own souls."

Having thus demitted his charge, Mr Mitchell and his family left Montrose in 1804, and set out for Edinburgh, trusting in the bountiful care and kindness of that God whose they were, and whom they sought conscientiously to serve.

ON THE NATURAL CAPABILITIES OF CANAAN, VIEWED IN REFERENCE TO ITS PAST AND PRESENT CONDITION.

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,

Minister of Monimail, Fifeshire.

In consequence of the country which was given by God to his people being so constantly associated in our minds with the miraculous events that were witnessed in it, we are apt to forget the natural causes that, under the guidance of Providence, have contributed both to its prosperity and to its desolation. A few remarks on the subject, therefore, may not be uninteresting or unimportant.

The aspect of the country is described as picturesque and beautiful, the surface being finely diversified by hill and dale. On the north, the lofty range of Lebanon raises its summits above the limit of perpetual snow; Carmel, Tabor, and Hermon, in the middle of the country, attain to a considerable elevation, and merit the title of mountains; and little hills abound on every side. The mountains are generally rocky, and frequently exhibit those romantic views which Alpine scenery alone supplies; while there are interspersed among them valleys and plains of every size and form. Some, like that of Eadraelon, are many miles in extent; others are only little dells embosomed in the hill. But though "the everlasting hills," that is, the permanent features of the country, continue the same as ever, the beauty of the scene is gone. The glory of Lebanon is departed—its cedars have vanished from the view; a few scattered clumps alone survive of all the forest that crowned its steep slopes. "It is ashamed, and hewn down; Sharon is like a wilderness; Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits." The little mounts are there; but they no longer rejoice in the green covering of the olive-leaf. The terrace-walk still tells of former industry and peace; but it no longer bears the luscious grape. The pomegranate and the fig are wild; there are no "clusters in Eschol," no "vineyards in Engedi;" "the new wine mourneth, the vine languisheth, and all the merry-hearted do sigh." Some of the valleys are still clothed with luxuriant pasture, and ornamented with a profusion of beautiful flowers, affording abundantly the appropriate food both of the cattle and of the bee, as in the days of old, when the promised possession was described by Jehovah "a land overflowing with milk and honey;" but the flocks and the herds are gone. The climate is healthy, and the soil is fertile; but the cities are "waste, without inhabitant;" there is none to sow the good seed, producing "some thirty-fold, some sixty, some an hundred;" the song of the reaper is hushed, and the merry shout of him that treadeth the grape can no longer be heard. Silence reigns amid the ruined walls, which once re-echoed the hum of bustling crowds; and desolation covers the plain, where happy thousands rejoiced in the bounty of their God.

Yet these are the favoured portions of the land; the greater part of it has fallen under a yet more grievous doom. Burning drought has drunk up the streams—"the heaven that is overhead is brass, the earth beneath is iron." Ruins of cities meet the eye of the incredulous traveller, and speak of former plenty, in places where now there is nothing but a barren and arid waste. Capernaum is no longer a haven for ships—a wide field of unproductive sand now stretches itself between its deserted quays and the margin of the shrunken sea. Jordan no more "overfloweth all his banks" in the time of harvest, and by his "swellings" rouses the lion from his lair; the diminished stream scarce covers the bottom of its rocky channel. The mineral treasures of the "hill country of Judea" are, in all probability, great; the Lord, indeed, promised that out of "the hills they might dig brass," and Damascus blades were wont to be in high esteem; but no miner now plies his subterranean toil, no cunning workman handles the forming tool.

Ichabod, Ichabod; the glory is departed, and Canaan groans beneath the curse of its God. "He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry, and drieth up all the rivers; Bashan languisheth, and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languisheth."

It is not enough, however, to mark the contrast between the present and the former condition of the Holy Land, or merely to refer to Jehovah's displeasure, as the original cause of the desolation that prevails; it is also useful to trace the intermediate steps and secondary causes by which the judgment has been wrought.

These causes are not difficult to discover; "the land mourneth, because of the wickedness of them that dwelt therein." Ever since the Jews rejected Christ, and cast off allegiance to their heavenly King, Judea has been the battle-field of nations. The exterminating war, which the Romans carried on against the remnant of Israel, has been succeeded by innumerable struggles between various contending parties. The wars more particularly carried on by the followers of Mahommed against the emperors of Constantinople were exceedingly bloody and destructive. It, moreover, deserves to be remarked, that the efforts even of those who sought the restoration of Zion's glory have hastened on its ruin, and the Crusaders from Europe, in endeavouring to deliver Jerusalem from the hand of the infidel, served but to render the country yet more desolate. Since it finally passed under the Turkish rule, the grinding despotism of the Grand Seignior, and the incursions of plundering hordes, have completed the work of destruction which the Roman armies under Titus began. The cities have been deserted, because their walls could not protect the citizens from the foe; the husbandman has ceased to plough his field, because the spoiler came and reaped the harvest; the shepherd has forsaken his fleecy charge, for the robber clothed himself with the wool. When hostile forces pass through a land, they almost invariably lay it waste, the inhabitants are slain with the sword, and the produce of the field is consumed by the fire. It has been thus with Judea. The village, the vineyard, and the grove, have perished together in the flame. The miserable fugitives that escaped from the earlier invaders, fled to the natural fastnesses of the mountains, and clearing a field in the recesses of the forest, for a time fancied themselves secure; but the enemy traced their steps, and the same desolating process has been again and again renewed, till plain, and hill, and mountain, are stripped of their wood. This barbarous procedure, this destruction of the leafy covering of the country, has dried up the streams, and made the once fruitful land a wilderness. It is a well-known and acknowledged fact, that a woodland country is always more abundantly supplied with water than one that is bare. The leaves and twigs of the trees, more particularly in the warmer climates of our globe, attract the evening dew, and sometimes make it descend in a shower beneath them, while there is not a drop falling around. And while trees in this manner attract moisture during the night, by sheltering the ground from the heat of the sun they prevent its escape by day. The clearing away of the forests, for example, in the British settlements in North America, has had a very evident effect in drying the soil. In the course of a few years, the settler, it is said, has sometimes found the stream that used to turn his mill, so diminished in volume, as to be scarcely more than sufficient for watering his herd. Now, if this be the case in a colder clime, in a land that still abounds in woods and lakes, how much more powerful must be the effects arising from the almost total destruction of fruit and forest tree, in a country like Judea, which is bounded by burning deserts both on the East and on the South. The dews of Hermon no longer refresh the thirsty blade, for Hermon is stripped of his forests, and "the top of Carmel is withered." The melting snows of Lebanon cannot fill the channel of Jordan, for there is no friendly leaf to shade them as they trickle down the mountain's side, and exposed to the beam of the summer's sun they are more than half absorbed ere they reach its base. The whole land is parched with drought, with the exception of the low and grassy hollows; because even "the early and latter rains" are dried up by the burning wind from the desert before they can saturate the hardened soil.—The hand of Providence clothed Canaan in verdure, and filled it with proofs of his bounty; the wickedness of man has marred its beauty, and made the paradise a waste.

In another point of view, that is, as a centre for commercial enterprise, Palestine possesses still greater natural capabilities. On the one side it is bounded by the Mediterranean, or "Great Sea," as it is termed in Scripture, by means of which an easy access is afforded to the south of Europe and north of Africa. Through the Black Sea, and rivers falling into it, the central parts of Europe, and a large portion of Asia, become accessible. On the south the former track of the Jordan affords a short and level path for the conveyance of merchandise from Arabia and Southern Africa. On the east, along the northern border of the Syrian desert, there is another easy, though somewhat circuitous route to Persia and India. We cannot, in short, take even a cursory glance at the map of the world, or pay the slightest attention to the position of Palestine in reference to other lands, without remarking the incomparable facilities it affords for commerce; and we cannot help wondering that its superiority in this respect should have been so seldom made the subject of observation.

In the time of Solomon, but never before or since, these natural advantages were appreciated and improved. God gave to him no mine of silver or of gold, and no miraculous gift of fragrant spices or precious stones; but he gave him wisdom, by which he was enabled to take advantage of the natural capabilities of his kingdom. He built Ezion-geber, on the shore of the Red Sea; and had a navy trading there, that brought from Africa ivory and gold; the caravans of Arabia brought him frankincense, spices, and balm; the merchantmen of Egypt came with horses, chariots, and fine linen, both for himself and for the kings around. To facilitate and protect his intercourse with the East, he built Palmyra, or "Tadmor in the wilderness," the magnificent ruins of which still attest its former greatness. And he entered into alliance with Hiram, king of Tyre, and shared with him the traffic of the Black Sea and Mediterranean. The natural fruits of this extended commerce were, almost inconceivable wealth. In one year, we are told, there were brought to him six hundred threescore and six talents of gold—a sum which was very nearly equal to five millions sterling; "besides that he had of the merchantman, and of the traffic of the spice merchants, and of all the kings of Arabia, and of the governors of the country. So King Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth, for riches and for wisdom. And the king made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars made he to be as the sycamore trees that are in the vale, for abundance."

This trade, however, was speedily stopped. Immediately after Solomon's death the ten tribes revolted from the dominion of his son, and the wars which they carried on against him effectually closed all intercourse with the West; Edom and Syria asserted a hostile independence, and destroyed the Indian trade; and Egypt, instead of sending her merchantmen with presents and peaceful wares, poured forth an armed band, to plunder and destroy. In after times, commercial leagues were attempted between the kings of Israel and Judah, in the vain expectation of re-establishing the former traffic; but the Lord frowned on the project, and they were compelled to abandon it. In the days of Herod the Great, commerce seems in some small degree to have revived; but since the children of Israel were driven from their home, none of the many nations that have had supremacy over Judea appear even to have thought of making a similar attempt. In the present day, "the highways lie waste, and the way-faring man ceaseth."

If we next examine into the condition of those to whom this now desolate land was given in possession, we find the low estate of Palestine but too faithful an emblem of their degradation, both temporal and spiritual. Because the Jews rejected the Prince of Life, when he came in the name of the Lord to save them, they are "cast off as a branch, and withered." They continue without a temple, and without an altar; without a king to govern or defend them; without a priest to offer sacrifices, or intercede in their behalf; and without a prophet to point the way to God. Disowned by Jehovah, they wander over the globe a despised and a persecuted race—they claim no country as their earthly home; and, alas! their spiritual condition is yet more to be deplored. A few unmeaning prayers, and a few superstitious rites, which scarce bear a resemblance to the ordinances given by God to their fathers, constitute the whole of their religious services. A mass of idle traditions, that have hidden from their eyes the truth of the Lord, forms the sum of their creed. They live without God, and, as those who have had the best opportunities of knowing have informed us, they almost universally die without hope. Their soul is desolate as the land of their fathers, and the fruits of faith are few and scanty, as is the increase of their field; for the Sun of Righteousness, that arose with healing in his wings, to cheer the soul of the faithful fathers, now scorches, in his hot displeasure, the heart of the faithless descendants; and the heavenly dew of divine grace, that refreshed the "Israelite indeed," lights not on him who rejects, in his pride, the offer of mercy.

If such be the miserable condition of the promised land, and if such be the yet more deplorable state of its former possessors, surely every rightly constituted mind must be struck with the fearful consequences of Jehovah's indignation; and every Christian heart must feel for the spiritual desolations of God's ancient people. Yet, may it not almost be said, No man careth for these things? Until these few years, there was scarce an effort made for the good of Israel; and even now, when various societies have been formed, with the object of promoting their conversion, and when the Church of Scotland has at last acknowledged their claim upon our sympathies, how little is done! Ah! why should we, by our neglect and scorn, add to the grief of those whom the Lord has wounded? By the Jews, in former times, the lively oracles were communicated to the nations; let us now endeavour in some measure to repay the obligation, by sending the Gospel to the out-cast remnant of Jacob.

A MOTHER'S LAMENT ON THE DEATH OF HER INFANT DAUGHTER.

I LOVED thee, daughter of my heart,
My child, I loved thee dearly;
And though we only met to part—
How sweetly!—how sincerely!
Nor life, nor death can sever
My soul from thine for ever.

Thy days, my little one, were few;—
An angel's morning visit,
That came and vanished with the dew:
'Twas here—'tis gone—where is it?
Yet didst thou leave behind thee
A clue for love to find thee.

The eye, the lip, the cheek, the brow,
The hands stretched forth in gladness,
All life, joy, rapture, beauty now—
Then dashed with infant-sadness;
Till, brightening by transition,
Returned the fairy vision.

Where are they now?—those smiles, those tears,
Thy mother's darling treasure?
She sees them still, and still she hears
Thy tones of pain or pleasure;
To her quick pulse revealing
Unutterable feeling.

Hushed in a moment on her breast,
Life at the well-spring drinking;
Then cradled on her lap to rest,
In rosy slumber sinking.

Thy dreams—no thought can guess them ;
And mine—no tongue express them.

For then this waking eye could see,
In many a vain vagary,
The things that never were to be—
Imaginations airy ;
Fond hopes that mothers cherish,
Like still-born babes to perish.

Mine perished on thy early bier ;
No,—changed to forms more glorious,
They flourish in a higher sphere,
O'er time and death victorious ;
Yet would these arms have chained thee,
And long from heaven detained thee.

Sarah ! my last, my youngest love,
The crown of every other !
Though thou art born in heaven above,
I am thine only mother ;
Nor will affection let me
Believe thou canst forget me.

Then (thou in heaven, and I on earth)
May this one hope delight us,
That thou wilt hail my second birth,
When death shall reunite us,
Where worlds no more can sever
Parent and child for ever.

MONTGOMERY.

THE BLIND WARRIOR OF RAIATEA.

"In my own church at Raiatea," says the late lamented Mr Williams, in his Narrative of Missionary Enterprises, "was an old blind warrior called Me. He had been the terror of all the inhabitants of Raiatea, and the neighbouring islands ; but in the last battle which was fought, before Christianity was embraced, he received a blow which destroyed his sight.

"A few years after my settlement at Raiatea, Me was brought under the influence of the Gospel, and when our church was formed, he was among the first members admitted. His diligence in attending the house of God was remarkable, whither he was guided by some kind friend, who would take one end of his stick while he held the other. The most respectable females in the settlement thought this no disgrace, and I have frequently seen principal chiefs, and the king himself, leading him in this way to chapel. Although blind, he attended our adult schools at six o'clock in the morning, and by repeating and carefully treasuring up what kind friends read to him, he obtained a great familiarity with the truths of the New Testament. And here I may observe, that the natives generally are exceedingly kind to blind and aged people, in reading to them portions of Scripture which they are desirous of retaining, and I do not know a more interesting scene than is presented at times in our adult schools. Here you will see a pious female, surrounded by three or four of her own sex, decrepit with age, to whom she is reading and explaining some important passages in the Word of God ;—there you may observe a principal chief or his wife engaged in the same way. In one place you would find a little boy, in another an interesting little girl, seated among old warriors, and either teaching them the alphabet, instructing them in spelling, or reading over some portions of Scripture. On the first Sabbath after my return I missed old Me ; and not receiving the hearty grasp of congratulation from him to which I was accustomed, I inquired of the deacons where he was, when they informed me that he was exceedingly ill, and not expected to recover. I determined, therefore, to visit him immediately. On reaching the place of his residence, I found him lying in a little hut, detached from the dwelling-house, and on entering it, I addressed him by saying, "Me, I am sorry to find you so ill." Recognising my voice, he exclaimed, "Is it you? Do I really hear your voice again before I die? I shall die happy now. I was afraid I should have died before your return." My first inquiry related to the manner in which he was supplied with food ; for in their heathen state, as soon as old or infirm persons became a burden on their friends, they were put to death in a most barbarous manner. Under the pretence of carrying the victim of their cruelty to a stream of water to bathe, his relations would hurl him into a hole previously dug for the purpose, and then throw a heap of stones upon the body. Even for a considerable time after Christianity was embraced, we found it necessary, when visiting the sick and afflicted, to make strict inquiry as to the attention they received. In reply to my question, Me stated that at times he suffered much from hunger. I said, "How so? You have your own plantations;" for, although blind, he was diligent in the cultivation of sweet potatoes and bananas. "Yes," he said, "but as soon as I was taken ill, the people with whom I lived seized my ground, and I am at times exceedingly in want." I asked him why he had not complained to the chief, or to some of the Christian brethren who visited him ; and his affecting reply was, "I feared lest the people should call me a talebearer, and speak evil of my religion ; and I thought I would rather suffer hunger or death than give them occasion to do so." I then inquired what brethren visited him in his affliction, to read and pray with him. Naming several, he added, "they do not come so often as I could wish, yet I am not lonely, for I have frequent visits from God :—God and I were talking when you came in." "Well," I said, "and what were you talking about?" "I was praying to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better," was his reply. Having intimated that I feared his sickness would terminate in death, I wished him to tell me what he thought of himself in the sight of God, and what was the foundation of his hope. "Oh!" he replied, "I have been in great trouble this morning, but I am happy now. I saw an immense mountain, with precipitous sides, up which I endeavoured to climb, but when I had attained a considerable height, I lost my hold and fell to the bottom. Exhausted with perplexity and fatigue, I went to a distance and sat down to weep, and while weeping, I saw a drop of blood fall upon that mountain, and in a moment it was dissolved." Wishing to obtain his own ideas of what had been presented to his imagination, I said, "This was certainly a strange sight ; what construction do you put upon it?" After expressing his surprise that I should be at a loss for the interpretation, he exclaimed, "That mountain was my sins, and the drop which fell upon it was one drop of the precious blood of Jesus, by which the mountain of my guilt must be melted away." I expressed my satisfaction at finding he had such an idea of the magnitude of his guilt, and such exalted views of the efficacy of the Saviour's blood, and that although the eyes of his body were blind, he could with the "eye of his heart" see such a glorious sight. He then went on to state, that the various sermons he had heard were now his companions in solitude, and the sources of his comfort in affliction. On saying, at the close of the interview, that I would go home and prepare some medicine for him, which might afford him ease, he replied, "I will drink it, because you say I must, but I shall not pray to be restored to health again, for my desire is to depart and be with Christ, which is far better than to remain longer in this sinful world." In my subsequent visits, I always found him happy and cheerful, longing to depart and be with Christ. This was constantly the burden of his prayer. I was with him when he breathed his last. During this interview, he quoted many precious passages of Scripture ; and having exclaimed with energy, "Oh death where is thy sting?" his voice faltered, his eyes became fixed, his hands dropped, and his spirit departed to be with that Saviour, one drop of whose blood had melted away the mountain of his guilt. Thus died poor old Me, the blind warrior of Raiatea. I retired from the overwhelming and interesting scene, praying as I went that my end might be like his."

AN ADDRESS AT THE COMMUNION TABLE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT M'INDOE,

Minister of Cowan Street Church, Kirhaldy, Fifeshire.

THAT, believing communicants, was an important inquiry proposed by our Saviour to one of his disciples—"Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" It was important, if we consider the glorious personage by whom it was proposed. He had a perfect right to demand an answer—he was altogether entitled to receive the affection which he sought. "He is white and ruddy—the chiefest among ten thousand; his head is as the most fine gold; his locks are bushy, and black as a raven; his eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of water; his cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers; his lips, like lilies, dropping sweet smelling myrrh; his hands are as gold rings set with the beryl; his countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars; his mouth is most sweet—yea, he is altogether lovely." It was important, if we consider the love which he has shown. He loved us from eternity, he loveth us still, and he will continue to love us for ever and ever. This inquiry was important, if we consider the person to whom it was made; it was to one who professed an attachment to the Saviour—it was to one who was zealous in the service of the Redeemer—it was to one who had acted as if he loved him not. It was important, from the time that the question was proposed; it was after the Saviour had been crucified and slain—it was after he had been committed to the silent tomb—it was after the vain hopes of his friends had ceased. It was important, in short, from the conclusions which it involved; if he loved him, he behoved to avow his esteem; if he loved him, he behoved to embark in the Saviour's cause; if he loved him, he behoved to observe the commands of his sovereign Lord.

The same question, then, communicants, he now proposes to you. Seated at these tables, ye profess to be his friends, and his inquiry is, "Son, daughter, lovest thou me?" Ye were considered as sinful, in the covenant of redemption; ye were helpless and hopeless, if left to yourselves; but he espoused your cause—he voluntarily engaged to become your surety. His offer was accepted, and mercy was shown—ye are saved in consideration of what he has done; and he now asks, in return, "Intending communicant, lovest thou me?" In consequence of your connection with our great progenitor, ye were involved in the effects of his fatal apostasy, the image of your Creator was effaced from your soul, his favour was forfeited, his wrath was incurred, death temporal and eternal was your inevitable doom; but he interposed in your behalf, the threatening was averted, the sentence was changed, and he now asks, in consideration of these things, "Believing communicant, lovest thou me?" By your actual transgressions you were obnoxious to wrath—you had aggravated your guilt, and sealed your condemnation; but pardon was procured by his obedience and death, your guilt was cancelled, your acquittal was pronounced, your restoration to favour and friendship secured, and he now asks you, in return, "Son, daughter, lovest thou me?" Ye were polluted and depraved by the defilement of sin, ye were unfit for communion with the saints on earth, ye were loathsome in the sight of God, and unprepared for the mansions of the blessed above; but sanctification was found, to render you holy; holy principles were implanted in your heart, gracious dispositions were given you; "ye were washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God;" ye were rendered qualified to hold communion with Jehovah on earth; ye shall in due time enjoy the fellowship of angels and redeemed men, in heaven; he now asks, then, "Communicant, lovest thou me?" Ye were in the bondage of Satan, and in the prison of sin; ye were led captive by the devil wherever he pleased; ye were slaves to your own passions; ye were the servants of your own lusts; but "he destroyed the works of the devil," he broke the fetters of sin, he conquered, he "spoiled principalities and powers," he subdued your corruptions, he captivated your affections, he "renewed you in the whole man, after the image of God," and he now asks, in return, "Believing communicant, lovest thou me?" Your understanding was darkened, your reason was vitiated, your will was corrupted, and your judgment depraved; but he enlightened your mind in the knowledge of Christ, he renewed your will, he persuaded and enabled you to embrace the Saviour, freely offered to you in the glorious Gospel; and, in consideration of these things, he now asks you, in return, "Intending communicant, lovest thou me?" Ye were destitute of clothing, but he cast his skirt over you; ye were weltering in your blood, but he said unto you, "Live;" ye were wretched and miserable, ye were poor, ye were blind; but he provided both the riches of grace and of glory—and is it wonderful that he should ask, "Believing communicant, lovest thou me?"

Ye have frequently fallen from your first love, ye have departed, and ye have continued away from God; but he has restored you again, he has enabled you to repent, he has invigorated your spirit, he has revived, he has strengthened your languishing graces, he has enabled you to run in the way of his commandments with enlargement of heart; and in return for such kindness he asks for your gratitude, he proposes the question, "Worthy communicant, lovest thou me?" The light of your heavenly Father's countenance has often been withdrawn, ye have frequently gone mourning without the light of the Sun, ye have wished that it were with you as in months past, and ye have frequently desired that ye might find your Lord; but he has seen you again, and caused your heart to rejoice; he has illuminated your darkness, the candle of the Lord has shone around your head—he has been graciously found, even when you sought him not; and, from such considerations, is he not entitled to ask, "Grateful communicant, lovest thou me?" Ye are surrounded by spiritual enemies, who lie in wait for your soul; you are in danger every moment to fall by their hand, and your heart fails you for fear at the thought of your fate; but he girds you with strength, he provides a defence, he removes you doubts, he dispels your fears, he hides you in his pavilion, and in the secret of his tent; and may he not, therefore, ask, "Trembling communicant, lovest thou me?" Ye have duties to perform, ye have temptations to resist, ye have trials to endure, ye have passions to subdue; but he strengthens you for all, he sustains you under all, he delivers you from all; and is he not entitled to inquire, "Humble communicant, lovest thou me?" In short, you have troubles to undergo, you have death to encounter, you have the grave to embrace, you have your Judge to meet, and you have an eternity to spend in the immediate presence of God; but he comforts you in distress, he will support you in the last struggle, he will preserve your precious dust, he will raise you from the dead, and openly acquit you at his dread tribunal, and he will disclose to you the realms of everlasting glory; then, well may he ask, "Believing communicant, lovest thou me?"

Is your answer, then, the same as that disciple's was? Do you lament that you are able to love him so little? Are you desirous to love him more than you have formerly done? Can you lay your hand upon your heart, and reply in these words, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee?" If these are your feelings—if this is your reply? then, that your desires may be strengthened—that your love may be increased, we shall put into your hands the memorials of our Lord's broken body and his shed blood.

AFTER COMMUNICATING.

That, believing communicants, was an important answer which was returned by the Apostle Peter to the question of the Saviour, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." The Saviour is the object of divine adoration and love. He is the omniscient Jehovah,—he searches the heart, and he knew whether or not the statement was true. If the apostle really loved him, he behoved to avow his attachment—to embark in his service, and to obey his laws.

The same answer, then, communicants, has now been given by you. Ye have openly professed that you are the Saviour's friends,—ye have virtually said that you love the Redeemer,—and ye have solemnly said that you will obey his commandments. The eyes of your understanding have been opened, to perceive the matchless excellencies of the Son of God,—he has become the desire and the delight of your soul; you wish you could express your affection as you ought. As partakers, then, of your joy, as helpers of your faith, we will assist you in those exercises in which you should now engage. The feelings of the spouse should be experienced by every heart, and in terms similar to those employed by her should these feelings be expressed. My beloved is white and ruddy, white in his divinity, ruddy in his humanity; he is the chiefest among ten thousand; His mouth is most sweet; yea, he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem. "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits." New desires, communicants, should now prevail in your breasts; new motives should excite you to obedience; new pursuits should now occupy your time; new objects should be proposed as the end of all your actions; new enjoyments should now delight your soul; and you should accompany the whole with sincere and ardent love to your dear Redeemer,—you should give him the best feelings of your heart, and the best services of your life. Love him, communicants, for what he is in himself, and for what he is to you, for all the honours he has conferred upon you—for all the hopes with which he has inspired you, and for all the promises which he has made, and will in due time fulfil. These are the exercises which your present situation implies, and these are the exercises in which, I trust, ye are now engaged.

Sin, communicants, represented in its proper colours, never fails to point out the awful consequences to which it leads; and, can you contemplate Him, who alone delivers from these without being filled with gratitude and love? No, you will call upon your soul and say, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits; who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies." The mind, enlightened in the knowledge of Christ, perceives the matchless glories of his character as God-man Mediator in two distinct natures and one divine person. It discovers the suitability of all his offices,—Prophet, Priest, and King,—to instruct us in the will of God—to satisfy Divine justice, and atone for our guilt—to reign over us, and to conquer all our spiritual enemies. It perceives the value of all his endearing relations. He is a Shepherd to feed, a Husband to protect us and discharge all our debt, and a Physician to heal all our spiritual maladies; to us, therefore, will he not be in reality precious? Yes, verily, he will; and in the overflowings of a grateful heart, we will with rapture exclaim, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." The renewed will has a pleasure in obeying the precepts of rectitude; and will you not listen to the words of Him who spake as never man spake? Yes; your language will be, "I esteem thy commandments, respecting all things to be right. Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth." The Holy Spirit also fills your mind with a sense of the greatness of the blessings to which you are now entitled; yea, he himself is the earnest of the purchased inheritance; and will not such an assurance of good things to come inspire the soul with gratitude and love? In short, by the personal inhabitation of the Spirit in your soul, the various graces of the heart are called forth into lively exercise; and, under his gracious influences and operations, you will individually exclaim, "My beloved is mine, and I am his. Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love."

Let the love of Christ constrain you, then, communicants, to love him in return. His name is ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love him. Remember his love more than wine. Love him because he first loved you. Let your prayer for each other be, that you may be able to comprehend, with all saints, what is the length and breadth, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye may be filled with all the fulness of God. Desire to enjoy renewed manifestations of Christ's love to your soul; he has promised to see you again, and to cause your heart to rejoice. Under the influence of these manifestations, you will be prepared to forsake all and follow him. Nay, you will "desire ever to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." Until this period arrive, then, walk in love, as Christ also hath loved you. Testify the reality of your love, by rendering unto God the gratitude of your hearts and the services of your life. Let men take knowledge of you that you have been with Jesus on the holy mount. When you descend from it, and mingle with the world, let the face of your conversation and of your conduct shine, "that others, seeing your good works, may be led to glorify your Father who is in heaven." Let your whole intercourse in society manifest that you are born from above; that your conversation is in heaven, from whence ye look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; and that your fellowship with God here is but preparing you for the more perfect enjoyment of him hereafter, and for sitting down at that table which shall never be drawn!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. JAMES MITCHELL,

MINISTER OF THE SCOTCH CHURCH, WOOLER, NORTHUMBRLAND.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART III.

ON reaching Edinburgh, Mr Mitchell received a letter from the magistrates of Montrose, stating, that they intended to delay for six months filling up the vacant charge, in hope that he would return; and at the end of that period they kindly transmitted to him the half-year's stipend. Many of his old friends in Edinburgh, for instance, Dr Hunter, Dr Davidson, and Mr Black, paid him the utmost attention, and endeavoured to devise some means of turning his ministerial gifts to account. At length they established, for his benefit, a Sabbath evening lecture in St Cuthbert's Chapel (now Buccleuch Church), which was for some time supported and patronized by some of the leading pious people in town. One of the most active in this matter was the late Mr Taylor Smith, bookseller in Edinburgh; who, having enjoyed the benefit of Mr Mitchell's ministrations in Montrose, felt a deep interest in all his movements, and was desirous to do every thing in his power to promote the comfort of one who, he felt, had made no small sacrifice for conscience' sake. Soon after Mr Mitchell came to Edinburgh, a respectable Relief congregation in Glasgow sent him an invitation to become their pastor, but this kind offer he declined; stating, that though, from conscientious motives, he had left his charge at Montrose, he had not left the Church of Scotland. Having paid a short visit to London, he now settled in Edinburgh, and employed himself chiefly in taking the charge of boarders. The late William Murray, Esq. of Polmaise, placed two of his sons under his charge; several young men were sent to him from Montrose, and other places; so that in a short time he and his family were far better provided for, in a worldly point of view, than ever they had been before. His time was profitably spent in superintending the education of the young men, while he regularly officiated at the Sabbath evening lecture, and often assisted the city clergy. This was his mode of life for some years. At length he was very desirous again to return to a settled charge, as a minister. Some of his friends, knowing his anxiety on this point, recommended him to stand candidate for a chapel in London, in connection with the Church of Scotland. He went, accordingly, and preached with such acceptance that the elders and a number of the most pious persons in the congregation, came to the resolution of calling him as their pastor. It happened, however, that while he was in London, on that occasion, application was made to him to baptize the child of a person who was not a communicant; this he refused to do, and gave such offence by his refusal, as well as by some reflections which he had thrown out in private, on the prevalent custom, among some professing Christians, of having dinner parties on Sabbath, that, though still supported by the pious part of the congregation, he was not elected. While in London at that time, he enjoyed the privilege of spending a few hours at the house of the Rev. John Newton, who was then far advanced in life, and fast ripening for his heavenly reward.

Being thus disappointed in the purpose of his visit to London, Mr Mitchell returned to Edinburgh, and continued for some time faithfully to discharge the duties of the calling in which he had been employed by Providence. In this he had been remarkably prospered, but when the studies of the young men originally put under his charge were completed, and no others seemed to apply in their place, the same kind Father that had hitherto so remarkably watched over the interests of his faithful and conscientious servant, once more interposed in his behalf. On the recommendation of his pious friend, Dr Hunter, he stood candidate for a vacant chapel in Wooler, Northumberland, in connection with the Established Church of Scotland. He was successful; and, with the exception of only two dissentients, he was the unanimous choice of the people. The idea was quite refreshing to his mind, of being again employed as pastor of a congregation, not in the corrupt atmosphere of a large town, but in a retired, rural district, where, in quietness and peace, he might pursue the even tenor of his way. He had no reason to regret, indeed, the time which he had spent in keeping boarders, though the employment was by no means so agreeable, in many respects, as he could have wished. But to some of the young men, at least, his labours were evidently blessed. One young gentleman, in particular, who had been for some time under his charge, went abroad, and although the influence of evil company was the means of dragging him into the vortex of the world's vanities, he was afterwards seized with a lingering illness, which, by God's blessing, brought him to a better mind. The good seed that had been sown in his heart, by the instructions of his parents and Mr Mitchell, sprung up, and, watered by the blessing of the Spirit, brought forth fruit many days after it had been sown.

Mr Mitchell had now been four years in Edinburgh, and, during that time, he had acquired many kind friends whom it was no slight regret to leave, but anxious to be employed anew in his great Master's work, he set out for Wooler in 1808, and was received by his new charge with the utmost cordiality. The managers and principal people connected with the congregation, were chiefly eminent agriculturists, having extensive farms, men of intelligence, and many of them men of piety and solid worth. The great mass of the congregation, however, belonged to the humbler walks of life, being employed as shepherds, farm servants, and labourers. Some of the people walked a distance of eight or nine miles to attend chapel every Sabbath. The new pastor was introduced to his flock by the Rev. Henry Grey, then of Stenton, now of St Mary's, Edinburgh.

A few years after Mr Mitchell had entered upon his charge at Wooler, it was found necessary to erect a new chapel, and he accordingly undertook a journey throughout various parts of Scotland and England for the purpose of collecting subscriptions to aid in erecting the building. In this tour he was very successful, and in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other large towns, he collected a sum of money which far exceeded his anticipations. The neighbouring congregations also aided in the good work, and the Episcopalians also, both ministers and people, by whom Mr Mitchell was much respected, were not behind in lending their assistance. The following year he set out for London to procure additional subscriptions. On the road, one of his fellow-travellers was a nun, who proposed in a short time to take the veil. Some of her fellow-passengers remonstrated with her on the folly of adopting such a course of life. She turned to Mr Mitchell, and said, "Sir, I perceive you are a clergyman, and therefore, I appeal to you if, while so many give themselves to the world, one poor sister may not be allowed to give herself to the Lord?" The reply of the good man was judicious and forcible, "I have no hesitation in saying that you are wrong in that resolution, of shutting yourself in seclusion. The Lord does not require you to throw yourself away in such a manner. On the contrary, he requires you to use the talents he himself has given you, and to do good to your fellow-creatures in the station of life to which God in his Providence may call you." The young woman was silenced. In London, Mr Mitchell met with the most flattering success in his undertaking. Though he was only there a very short time, he collected £127. From Rowland Hill he received a liberal subscription, although, as that excellent though eccentric man remarked, "he had been crying 'ould clothes' in the pulpit the Sabbath before," having been pleading for a clothing society. The late Mr Wilberforce, also, was one of the subscribers. This tour, however satisfactory, did not realize a sum sufficient to build the chapel. He completed it, however, by another journey through some parts of Scotland which he had not already visited.

At length the new chapel was built, much to the satisfaction of both congregation and pastor. It was opened by the Rev. John Hunter of Swinton, now of Edinburgh, and the Rev. George Cupples of Legerwood, now of Stirling, both of whom preached excellent and appropriate discourses. Having now effected the great object, which for several years he had so anxiously sought to accomplish, Mr Mitchell set himself with unwearied zeal to promote the cause of Christ among his people; and during the whole of the twenty-one years which he spent at Wooler, no man could have laboured in the ministerial work with more diligence and scriptural simplicity of aim than he did. His heart was warmly engaged in his Master's service. In his public preaching, and in his private visiting, Christ was the grand theme of his discourse. Two, and sometimes three days in the week were devoted to domiciliary visiting; and as many of his congregation were widely scattered, he was often subjected to great bodily fatigue on such occasions. But he felt a peculiar delight in private intercourse with the members of his little flock. No time was lost in worldly talk, but the great business for which he had come under their roof was almost immediately apparent. At Wooler, as at Montrose, the young occupied a great share of his attention, and for their benefit he established a Sabbath school and also a library. He held a prayer-meeting in the session-house of the chapel every month, which was well attended, and peculiarly blessed of God.

Mr Mitchell took a warm interest in the cause of Missions both at home and abroad, and often pressed the subject upon the attention of his people. In matters of discipline, as may easily be supposed from the previous history of the man, he was remarkably strict. Nothing could make him flinch from the plain path of duty in such cases. His visits to the sick were highly prized. He spoke with such meekness, affection, and tenderness, that his words came home with peculiar force to the heart. To the poor he was compassionate and charitable. His whole character, in short, was marked by the simplicity and Christian sincerity of a man of God.

— In the spring of the year 1830 Mr Mitchell's health, which had been almost uniformly good throughout a long life, began to decline. He was seized with a slight stroke of apoplexy in the pulpit, and feeling that his memory had been impaired by the shock, he was desirous at that time of having an assistant and successor appointed, who might efficiently discharge the pastoral duties. The elders and congregation, however, advised him to delay for a time, as in all probability he would speedily recover his wonted health and strength. Mr Mitchell was too conscientious to be easily dissuaded from doing what he considered a sacred duty; and, accordingly, he persevered in urging the matter upon the session, and in a short time the Rev. James Bryce of Stamfordham was chosen as co-pastor with Mr Mitchell. In this field of labour Mr Bryce continued for five years, during which time Mr Mitchell preached occasionally, and visited those of his people who were within reach. But a second shock of apoplexy weakened him still more, and rendered him capable of doing less duty than ever. Still he persevered, endeavouring, while strength permitted, to acquit himself as a faithful minister of Christ.

Mr Bryce, Mr Mitchell's colleague, having received a call to succeed the late Dr Kidd, in Gilcomston Church, Aberdeen, it became necessary to find another person to occupy his place. This occasioned Mr Mitchell some anxiety; but at length, after having heard several candidates, the congregation elected the Rev. Thomas Gray, a preacher of the Gospel from Aberdeen, and Mr Mitchell had the satisfaction of seeing matters fully arranged before he was called to leave his beloved flock. The good man's end was now fast approaching. The last Sabbath he appeared in the pulpit, he preached from these words of our Lord to Peter, "But whom say ye that I am? And Peter answered and said,

"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." In the conclusion of the discourse, he made a very striking appeal to his people on the necessity of each one putting to himself the question which our Lord addressed to Peter. Many of the people were deeply impressed, under the feeling that these were perhaps the last words which they might hear from his lips. He never again spoke in public, except in a short exposition at the prayer-meeting which was held a few days after. On returning from the prayer-meeting, he remarked to one of the family that he was going to study another sermon, and on being asked the subject, he replied, "Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better." That desire was speedily fulfilled in his own experience. The next morning he was laid on a bed of severe sickness, and called to enter the wilderness of affliction, where he was mightily supported by those consolations wherewith he himself had comforted others. As his breathing was much affected, he was not able to converse much; but what he did say betokened that calm composure and heavenly serenity dwelt within. He was often observed to be in deep meditation and earnest prayer. These words would sometimes escape from his lips, "I long for thy salvation, O God. My work on earth is now over. I desire to be at home, at my heavenly Father's house." He often spoke of seeing the King in his beauty, and the good land that is afar off.

The Bible had always been precious to him, but it was peculiarly so in his dying hours. As long as he was able to read, it was his constant companion, and he often drew from its valuable stores sweet food for meditation. He seemed to be quite sensible that death was at hand. "The struggle will soon be over," he would say; "I wish to be home." His partner and family he confidently committed to the care of that God who had hitherto wrought so remarkably in their behalf. On being asked, one morning, whether his breathing was easier? he exclaimed, in an apparent ecstasy of delight, "O, I will soon breathe in a purer atmosphere." He often repeated portions of the Psalms. One of Watts' Hymns he wished to be read to him:—

"How can I sink with such a prop
As my eternal God,
Who bears the earth's huge pillars up,
And spreads the heavens abroad?"

"How can I die when Jesus lives,
Who rose and left the dead?
Pardon and grace my soul receives,
From mine exalted Head."

About a fortnight before Mr Mitchell's death, Mr Gray, assistant and successor, entered upon his duties; and, before going to church on the first Sabbath, the dying man took him by the hand, and with the utmost solemnity and earnestness bid him "be strong and of good courage." "I have always found my Master's work sweet and pleasant," said he, "and I can recommend it to you." In the end of that week he became much worse, and was able to speak very little. The last night he had upon earth was a night of great suffering. But never did a murmur escape from his lips. He was always thankful for the smallest mark of kindness. He lay calm and peaceful, waiting for his change. The last word he was heard to utter was the name of Jesus, that blessed name, which had ever been to him as ointment poured forth. Next forenoon he fell asleep in Jesus, 20th October 1835. "Precious, in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints."

THE DESIRABLENESS OF GOD'S HOUSE:

A DISCOURSE.

[Preached at the opening of the new church at Goldrum, Dunfermline, on the 9th November 1840.]

BY THE REV. PETER CHALMERS, A. M.,

One of the Ministers of Dunfermline, Fifeshire.

"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts,"—&c. PSALM LXXXIV. 1-5.

It cannot fail to have struck every attentive reader of the compositions of David, that a warm attachment to the house of God was a prominent feature of his character. It meets us in every page of his poetic effusions, as well as in all the historic accounts of him. Nor was it exhibited merely in the high delight which he felt, when actually engaged in the public service of God; but in the ardent wish which he entertained never to be deprived of the opportunity of waiting upon it, the distress which he experienced when for a season he was prevented from attending it, and his longing desires to be restored to the privilege. "One thing," said he elsewhere, "have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple. For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me." Although much occupied as a commander and a King, he found time for the observance of religious ordinances, and he esteemed this the one thing, in which he found his chief happiness, and in which he wished to be employed all his life; not literally every moment of his being, but frequently and regularly, as the times appointed required, or opportunity offered, that he might meditate on the Divine perfections, seek to know the Divine will, and ask Divine blessings, as well as receive the consolation and protection which he often so much needed. How pathetically, too, does he long for the privilege, when debarred from it, by the persecution of his enemies, the unnatural rebellion of his family, or the faithless desertion of his friends: "O my God, my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, wherein no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. When shall I come and appear before God? My tears have been my meat, day and night, while they continually say unto me, where is thy God? When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me; for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with the multitudes that kept holy day. O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead me, let them guide me into thy holy hill, and into thy tabernacle." Nay, whenever he thinks of his favourite subject, especially at a distance from the scene of it, his very heart burns with transport at the thought, venting itself in such language of admiration and desire, as is contained in the text: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God." He even envied the songsters their privilege and enjoyments, in being permitted to construct their nests, and rear their young without disturbance in the buildings around the sanctuary, although not on the very altars, which were consecrated by a special ceremony to the service of Jehovah, and before which, the priests were continually serving, while he was driven from the place of his repose, wandering upon the mountains of Israel. For he adds, "Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars,"—or the sacred edifices around them, "O Lord of hosts, my king and my God. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee. A day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." And similar to this have been the feeling and experience of good men in every age, in regard to the place, where God's honour dwelleth. All, in whom gracious impressions have been wrought, have set their affections upon the house of God, and while they have known no satisfaction equal to that of a frequent and constant resort to it, they have known no sorrow comparable to the being for a length of time detained from it. Alas! that this feeling should be so rare, and that so many should so little value the house of God, and rather seek their delight and their comfort any where else. But let us rejoice, that there are still not a few who find it to be good for them to wait upon the Lord in his ordinances, and to encourage others in doing so. Let us rejoice that while it was said by the Jews of old, even of a Roman centurion to his praise, "He loveth our nation, and has built for us a synagogue," there are amongst ourselves a goodly number who love the people of our land, and in token of doing so, erect for them edifices in which they may worship the God of their fathers, and learn the heavenly lessons, which are to make them wise unto salvation. In the following Discourse, all that I propose is, shortly to inquire into the foundation, or source of those pleasurable feelings with which the people of God repair to his sanctuary, and which cause them to esteem it amiable or lovely, and to seek after it with earnest desire.

I. It is because they regard it, as the Psalmist here terms it, "the tabernacle, the court, or the house of the Lord." "How amiable," says he, "are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house." In so styling the sanctuary, however, the least informed among you must be aware that it is the language merely of accommodation which is used. God is a Spirit, and can have no particular local residence. "He dwelleth not in temples made with hands, for the heaven of heavens cannot contain him." But still he condescends to give special manifestations of himself, and of his favour, at particular seasons, and in particular places. One memorable instance of this occurred in the experience of the patriarch Jacob. Having, after the fatigues of a long journey, while travelling from Beersheba to Haran, reposed himself on the naked earth, with only a few hard stones for his pillow, and the blue heaven for his canopy, he received during his sleep in a dream a striking emblematic representation of the Divine presence and protection, which drew from him, on awaking, this solemn expression of his enraptured feelings: "Surely, the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." He recognised the undeniable tokens of God's special presence, even in that wild and sequestered desert, although previous to the vision he had been unconscious of it. So it is with many, in less extraordinary circumstances, in our own day. They are often, indeed, always in God's presence, and yet know it not, give it no heed. A sentiment of reverential awe thrilled through the breast of the ravished patriarch at the thought of the striking scene which had been presented to him; and he farther exclaimed, "How dreadful, or awful, is this place! This is none other than the house of God, this is the gate of heaven." There was no building there except a simple stone or pillow, and yet this he likened to the residence of the Divine Majesty, and the entrance into the mansions of the Eternal; God having vouchsafed to him at it so impressive a demonstration of his immediate and favourable presence.

This is the first occasion on which we find the expression, "house of the Lord," employed in Scripture, and it at once shows the reason of its application, and the feelings which the consideration of it is fitted and was designed to awaken. Its use becomes frequent in the subsequent part of the Jewish history. It was applied both to the tabernacle and to the temple, and in each did the Almighty promise to meet, and to commune with his people from above the mercy-seat, as he did by the visible symbol of the Shechinah, or cloud of glory between the cherubim. "I will bring them to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer." When Solomon had finished the dedication of the temple, the Lord appeared unto him, and said, "Now mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attend unto the prayer that is made in this place. For now have I chosen and sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever, and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually." "In the time of trouble," says David, "he shall hide me in his pavilion, in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me." The appearances made, and blessings granted to the ancient saints in the sanctuary, were no doubt in a great measure extraordinary, peculiar to the dispensation under which they lived, and therefore, not to be expected by us. Yet we have the divine authority for believing, that God still draws near to his people in another manner than he does to the world in the assemblies of the saints, really and spiritually, although with no external sign, to accept their devotions, and render profitable the reading and hearing of his word. For he declared by the mouth of Moses—"In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and bless thee," and says his Apostle James, "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." Christ, too, who in human form appeared to his servants of old, with intimations of the favourable divine reception of their religious exercises, and special revelations of the Divine will to them, as to Manoaah and his wife, when he received their burnt and meat offering, and ascended in the flame which went up toward heaven from the altar; and to Gideon, when he consumed his present of flesh and cakes with fire, as a mark of accepting it, and then departed out of his sight, has assured us, that "wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them," no doubt, spiritually, "to bless them," as their Saviour and Friend.

And to the fulfilment of these promises the people of God have borne testimony in all ages, tracing, as they have often had occasion to do, their clear views, their serious feelings, and their holy purposes, to their attendance on the courts of the Lord. The eyes of their understanding have there often seen the King in his beauty; and "there has flown unto them," as it were, "one of the seraphim, having a live coal in his hand, taken with the tongs from off the altar, and he has laid it on their mouth," and communicated to them an impression "that their iniquity is taken away, and their sin purged." The Lord has revealed his glory to them, not, indeed, in visible tokens, but on the inward tablet of their hearts. He has been amongst them with his Spirit and grace, when they have congregationally sought him. "He has blessed them, when they have chosen him, and caused them to approach unto him, that they may dwell in his courts; and they have been satisfied with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple." "He has heard their cry, and helped them." Need we wonder, then, that they, as well as he, "should love the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and should count "a day in his courts better than a thousand" spent any where else.

This recognition of the sanctuary as the house of the Lord, and the place where his honour dwells, if accompanied by a conviction of his being our reconciled God and Father in Christ, and by a particular reference to him, a feeling of his presence and eye to his glory, at the time of holding communion with him, cannot but communicate the highest pleasure. Where there is an entire want of this recognition and conviction, there can be none of this pleasure felt; and where there is an absence of this realizing sense of the Divine presence at the period of worship, it must be but imperfectly, if at all, felt. But where there are both—where there is an impression that we are drawing near to a Being whose favour we enjoy, and to whose image we are in some measure conformed, and long to be still more so, and who is fully in our minds and upon our hearts at these moments—we cannot but have the warmest emotions of delight, both from the character of the Being with whom we hold intercourse, as so amiable and kind, and from the affections which that intercourse calls into exercise—gratitude, love, trust, hope, and the like.

The same circumstance must also be a great means of securing constancy of attendance upon the sanctuary. For making a distinct acknowledgment of the Almighty in this, as in all their duties, regarding him as enjoining and promising to bless their entrance into his courts, his people are not characterised by that irregular and unfrequent assembling of themselves together with the saints, which marks the conduct of those who go to church without any direct reference to God at all, either to his will as prescribing, or to his glory as promoted by it, but from the influence of custom, into the reasons of which they have never inquired, or from a wish to be like their neighbours, and to maintain general respectability of character, or from curiosity not of a laudable kind, and who accordingly absent themselves whenever personal convenience, or inclination, or worldly concerns interfere. And while the former will, from good motives, regularly wait upon the weekly and ordinary services of the sanctuary, they will avail themselves of other suitable seasons of worship, as they occur. They will not esteem such waiting upon God a wearisomeness to the flesh; for the exercises in which they engage are in harmony with all their prevailing principles, feelings, tastes, and habits; which leads me to notice,

II. That the well-disposed, like the Psalmist, will consider the tabernacles of the Lord amiable, and long for the opportunity of attending them, if for a season detained from them, on account of the sublime, profitable, and agreeable services to which they are there called. They are there, as David elsewhere says, "to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple," and here says, "to praise him." The holiness and the goodness of God are styled, in Scripture, his "beauty;" and the study and contemplation of these and the other excellencies of his nature, the inquiring into his will by searching his Word and by supplication, and the offering to him praise, together with the administration and keeping of the sacraments, form the leading occupations of the house of God—to each of which we shall shortly advert.

And to begin with praise.—The Psalmist says, at the 4th verse of this Psalm, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee;" and at the 6th verse of the 27th Psalm, "I will offer in his tabernacles sacrifices of joy: I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord." We are required "to make a joyful noise unto the Lord, and to come into his presence with singing;" and we are told that "it is good to sing praise to our God, for it is pleasant, and praise is comely." The soul is hereby not only raised in worship of its Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer, proclaiming the beauty or glory of his perfections, and of all his wondrous and gracious dealings, but it gives vent to all its varied feelings of reverence, fear, gratitude, love, hope, and joy, in a manner more solemn and impressive than can otherwise be attained. The language of poetry, accompanied with all the charms of well-chosen and well-conducted music, is the most becoming, improving, and delightful vehicle of devotional sentiment; and the more numerous the voices which chaunt, in harmonious strains, the same hymn of praise, the more powerful and hallowing the effect. It is impossible to conceive a grander and more elevating scene, than a large assembly of pious worshippers, animated by the same views, spirit, and prospects, breathing out, as with one heart, the joint expression of their homage and allegiance to the greatest and best of Beings, in the notes of some familiar and favourite air. Sympathy deepens the solemnity, carrying the stream of devotional expression and feeling from voice to voice, and from soul to soul, till each individual worshipper comes, as it were, to concentrate in himself the separate sentiments of all. Hearts but little accustomed to pious impulses, are moved by so impressive an exercise, and made to beat, now with the throbbings of fearful forebodings, then with the thrillings of pleasing hope—now to melt with the softenings of conscious guilt, then to glow with the joyful anticipations of pardoning mercy. It is when contemplating this noble service, and themselves contributing to it, that the people of God—especially under peculiar circumstances or animating associations, as were our forefathers on the mountain side or in the lowly valley, persecuted by their enemies—at times feel their souls, in a manner, lifted above the fleeting scenes of this mortal state, and transported into the very realms of bliss. And why should it be otherwise, when we know that this is the principal, the favourite, employment of the heavenly host, and disembodied spirits of the perfected just? "for they sing a new song, and proclaim with a loud voice, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever." With such hosannahs the arches of the celestial sanctuary continually ring. Yes; it is in this most sublime, soul-stirring exercise, that they, whose hearts are in heaven while their bodies are still clogged with the earthliness of humanity, experience their highest gratification; so that, even in this respect, well may they "long for the courts of the Lord."

Again, in the sanctuary, we address prayer to the Almighty. When God promised blessings to his ancient people, he said, "Yet, for all this, I will be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them;" and he says, by the mouth of his prophet, "I will make them joyful in my house of prayer, for mine house shall be called a house of prayer for all people." To this special purpose was the temple of old dedicated. There the people were to assemble, to pour out their joint requests for the supply of their common wants—to supplicate victory over their enemies, and recovery of the Divine favour, when their rebellions had provoked him to suffer them to be defeated—to seek safety for their persons and their properties from the ravages of drought, of famine, of pestilence, or any other calamity—to implore pardon for all their sins, assured that they would find it, if they confessed and forsook them. To the same needful and desirable ends, are the places of Christian congregations set apart. In these we, in company, adore the power and the goodness of our heavenly Father—the one assuring us of his ability, the other of his willingness, to fulfil our desires. In these, we unite in giving thanks, at the remembrance of his bounty in providence, and of his grace in redemption. In these, we together acknowledge, in lowly prostration of soul, our manifold sins and imperfections, humbling ourselves under the might and the purity of the Divine nature; and, at the same time, implore, through faith in the atoning merits of the Redeemer, that mercy which we in common need, and which delights in pardoning the guilty, and that influence of the Holy Spirit, which can alone enlighten, purify, strengthen, and comfort the fallen soul. In these, we meet to crave all our public and national blessings; security to the throne and constitution; health, happiness, and guidance, to our sovereign; wisdom and the fear of God to her counsellors, and all rulers; defence, extension, improvement, and permanence, to our Zion; freedom and protection of worship to all classes of the community; prosperity to trade and manufactures; liberty, peace and plenty, to the whole inhabitants; quiet and comfort to our homes. In these, we join all the sincere worshippers of God and of the Lamb in supplicating the wide diffusion of the reign of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, at home and afar off. How be-seeming and exalting the service! What more becoming the professing servants of the Lord, who have such a fellowship of wants, infirmities, trespasses, corruptions, crosses, disappointments, sorrows, privileges, consolations, mercies, and hopes, than thus to express them in common to their common Benefactor and Friend! How are all the perfections of Deity thus magnified!—how are all the pride and glory of man thus humbled! How are we thus brought to feel the vastness of Divine Majesty!—the absoluteness of human dependence! And how calculated is it to inflame every pious, and to enliven every benevolent, affection! Surely, then, every seriously disposed person must esteem and long for the house of God, as a house of prayer.

Farther, we should value and desire it, as a place of religious instruction. There the Law of old was read and expounded; "the priests' lips were to keep knowledge, and the people were to seek the Law at his mouth." And so it is still; God has been pleased not only to appoint at first, but to continue, an order of men by whom the message of salvation shall, from time to time, be proclaimed to mankind, and urged upon their acceptance. We are His ambassadors, invested with the ministry of reconciliation, ordained "to beseech you, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God." "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord." We have no opinions of our own to impose upon your faith, no commands of our own to enforce upon your obedience; all that we teach or enjoin we exhort you to try by "the law and by the testimony;" and to receive or reject, according as it agrees or differs with this heavenly standard.

It is not ourselves, but our great Master, whom we wish to present to your notice and regard; and in speaking of him, we are to remind you of his three-fold offices: of Christ, or the Anointed, the Messiah, the divinely appointed messenger of God—stating to you the evidences of his heavenly mission, for the confirmation of your faith; Jesus, as the Saviour, the Joshua of the latter days, unfolding to you, in all its bearings, the revealed plan of redemption, which he wrought out by his incarnation, life, and death, for a fallen world, in order to woo you from the broad path, which leads to destruction; into the narrow way, which conducts to eternal happiness; and of Lord, Master, or King,—explaining, illustrating, and enforcing his laws, in all their spirituality of meaning and extent of obligation, that you may become to him, through the help of the Spirit, "a peculiar people, zealous of good works; that you may be sanctified wholly, and your whole spirit, soul, and body, may be preserved blameless unto his second coming;" and all this, "as your servants for Jesus' sake, not seeking our own profit, but the profit of many of you, that you may be saved."

It is true, the ministers of religion may not communicate to you any new information; but if they remind you of what you already know, but which you are apt to forget, amid the hurry of business, the enticements of pleasure, and the urgency of domestic cares; if they bring familiar truths, at regular intervals, seasonably to your remembrance, exhibiting them to you perhaps in lights in which you did not before contemplate them, and in a manner suited to all the varieties of your characters and wants; if they admonish you of dangers to which you are constantly exposed, but which you are likely to under-rate; if they fortify you against opposition and temptations which you may meet with in your Christian course, but may not be sufficiently armed to encounter; if they help to deepen your serious impressions, to enliven your religious affections and confirm your holy purposes, to moderate your anxiety about this world, and to increase your concern about the world to come; if they dispense to you comfort under sorrows which may be depressing you, and arouse in you salutary fears where you may be imagining all is security and peace; if they warn you against neglecting, and excite you to attend to the great salvation; if they are thus the instruments of conversion to some, and of spiritual quickening to others, they surely spend not their strength, and claim not your hearing, in vain.

And may I not appeal to many now present, who have found it good for them to listen to the instructing, exhorting, reproving, warning, entreating, soothing, cheering voice of the messenger of God—who can attest, from your own experience, that the preaching of the Cross, although to others "foolishness," has proved to you "the power and the wisdom of God for your salvation;" that, by what the world terms the "foolishness of such preaching," you through faith have been saved, and are now "rejoicing in the Lord, and abounding in hope." And are you not ready to exclaim, on the recollection of these improving and refreshing moments, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!" and acknowledge that "a day in God's house is better than a thousand" any where else?

Once more: we should esteem the tabernacle or house of God, amiable, and delight in repairing to it, on account of the celebration of the holy sacraments. There we are brought into outward covenant with God, by means of the communication to us of its signs and seals, by our admission into the visible Church in infancy, through baptism—and our subsequent confirmation of the professions and engagements of our parents in our behalf at that period, by our personal observance of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In this last most interesting and impressive ordinance we voluntarily dedicate ourselves to the service of Him who redeemed us by his precious blood; who sanctifies, strengthens, and consoles us by his Divine Spirit; and who is now preparing for us mansions in his Father's kingdom, and us for these mansions. At this holy repast we meet with the Lord, whom our souls love; we commemorate, under the significant emblems of bread and wine, the solemn pledges of his grace; we testify our acknowledgment of him, in all his mediatorial offices; we receive from him refreshment to our weary and heavy laden spirits; we hear him announcing to us, by the voice of his ministers, "Son, or daughter, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee. My grace is sufficient for thee; my strength shall be perfected in thy weakness." We vow an unshaken and entire allegiance to his service; we embrace our fellow-communicants in the bonds of a common charity—regarding them equally with ourselves, the children of the same Father, and the heirs of the same inheritance. Honourable and transporting service, doubtless, to all the sincere worshippers of God and lovers of the Saviour!—calculated to awaken all that is dignifying, and to repress all that is debasing, in our nature. Surely, then, this is an additional reason why we should cherish the feeling and adopt the exercise of the Psalmist, in the text; accounting the tabernacles of the Lord amiable, longing for his courts, and pronouncing them blessed, or happy, who dwell in, or regularly frequent, his house.

By all the considerations, then, my brethren, which have been advanced, suggested by the text, of the sanctuary being the house of the Lord, the residence which he has appointed for himself, and in which he has promised specially to meet with his people, and of the nature of the services there engaged in—praise, prayer, preaching of the Word, and administration of the sacraments—let me beseech you highly to value, regularly to wait on, and diligently to improve the public ordinances of religion, to regard them as means of grace, and to seek the grace of the means. And let this especially be the case with the dwellers in this particular locality, now that another fabric, in which the worship of the Most High God is to be maintained, has been completed and opened among you. With you, whatever may be the case with others, there can be no pretext for not attending the house of God, seeing that all, even in the most ordinary circumstances, can have admission to it, with their whole families, on terms fully within their reach; while, from such as are very destitute, nothing will be demanded. Is it, then, my friends, too much to expect, nay, to ask, that many who reside in this district will show their sense of the value of the boon conferred on them—of a commodious, comfortable, unburdened church, in which the Gospel will be faithfully and regularly preached to them—by their attendance on it, and by their endeavour, with prayer for the aid of Heaven, that it may accomplish in them and theirs, and in all the families of the vicinity, all its desired temporal, and spiritual, and eternal benefits, that glorious things may be spoken of it—that of this portion of Zion it may be said, "This and that man was born in her, and the Highest himself shall establish her, that the Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there."

THE MERCY-SEAT.

WHEN storms of wrath around us roll,
And judgments shake the affrighted soul,
Where shall we find a sure retreat?—
What refuge but the mercy-seat?

When Satan strives our hearts to gain,
And says our hope in Christ is vain,
Oh! let us seek our Saviour's feet,
And bend before the mercy-seat.

We trust not in the heart sincere,
We plead no penitential tear,
But we believe the promise sweet,
That bids us seek the mercy-seat.

Should He our hope at first deny,
Nor seem to hear our anxious cry,
Oh! still the fervent prayer repeat
To Him who fills the mercy-seat.

Though mixed with earth and sin they rise,
Our feeble prayers shall reach the skies;
Acceptable as incense sweet,
On the blood sprinkled mercy-seat.

Eternal life will God bestow,
Where sin no more our souls shall know;
Our ransomed spirits then shall meet
In heaven, around His mercy-seat.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Hear the voice of God.—God, my friends, has been speaking to you for some years past, in the stagnation of trade, in the straits and embarrassments into which many have been brought, and the consequent want and misery of the labouring part of the population. The sin to which you are exposed, is covetousness, and "covetousness is idolatry;" a black and hateful sin in the sight of Jehovah. "Woe to him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house, that he may set his nest on high, that he may be delivered from the power of evil." At the time of the Reformation, many churches, through the zeal of our forefathers, were destroyed on account of idolatrous images which they contained; and had they been able thereby, wholly to extirpate the delusions of the Man of Sin, we should have held the loss of the churches as but the small dust of the balance, compared with the gain of sound Protestant doctrine and practice. But alas! the worship paid to senseless images, is only transferred by many to the gold and the silver. Many devoted worshippers of Mammon have seats in the house of God. Many who profess to know the "love of the Father," love the "world" with all their "heart and soul." Ought not you, my friends, to take the destruction of our holy houses of prayer, as a very solemn warning? Your commerce has been blighted, and ye have not repented. God's hand has now been stretched out on your churches, and will ye remain insensible still? Oh beware, lest your plagues be multiplied! I am not singular in the belief that, if this warning is despised, God will speak again to us in a way we think not of. His quiver is full, and he may send upon us "the evil arrows of famine, which shall be for our destruction;" and he may break the staff of bread. He may give pestilential disease a commission to destroy; He may send plague upon plague, until our hearts are broken and humbled, and we are brought to give him the glory. We have long been highly favoured with Gospel privileges, and we are therefore sinning with our eyes open; and if God arise to punish us, "He will be clear when he judges," and our "judgment will be just." After all that is "come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass," seeing that thou our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast given us such deliverance as this, should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations? wouldst thou not be angry with us till thou hadst consumed us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping.—REV. DAVID ARNOT. (Two Sermons on the Destruction by Fire of Three Churches in Dundee.)

CURSORY REMINISCENCES OF THE CONTINENT—FRANCE.

By D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. I.

IN passing from England into France, the steamers from London to Boulogne, have very much superseded those from Dover to Calais; the greater length of the sea voyage being compensated by avoiding the expense of travelling to Dover, and being preyed upon by the hotel-keepers there, whose avarice has long been cheating itself by frightening people away. The long dull journey from the coast to Paris, is also shortened by not having to travel over the distance from Calais to Boulogne. Not to do more than mention the passage from Brighton to Dieppe, that from Southampton to Hâvre is becoming more and more popular, and when the railway from London on the English side, shall have its counterpart from Hâvre to Paris on that of France, we may expect that that line will almost quite supersede every other. At present it has many recommendations to the tourist. There are numberless points of resemblance and of contrast, which mutually give interest to each other, in comparing the Seine with Southampton water, and the towns and other striking objects connected with each. In point of natural features, the two estuaries strongly resemble each other, but in all other points, the contrast is absolutely bewildering, and we seem not only to enter a different country, but to go back into a different age,—so fresh, lively, and modern, does every thing appear in Hampshire and the Isle of Wight; so worn, dingy, and antique, is the general aspect of Hâvre, Honfleur, &c. A new way of passing from shore to shore, has been attempted by Rye and St. Valery on the Somme, and as this materially shortens the land journey on the French side, it might become popular, but for the rapacity of the English innkeepers at Rye, which, according to our experience, cost as much in one day as St Valery did in three. This multiplication of the points of contact between England and France, becomes extremely interesting, when we remember how many of our countrymen have both the power and the will, by distributing tracts and otherwise, to stir the lees of superstition, make frivolity thoughtful, and suggest doubts to infidelity of all being so false in Christianity as it imagines it to be. Of this, we may yet give several proofs which have fallen under our own eye.

Contrasted with this country, France appears replete with wreck and ruin, and this impression, which strikes us as soon as we enter its northern towns, is only deepened as we pass from contemplating their gaunt antiquated buildings, old and ill repaired churches, crumbling fortifications, and deserted chateaux, to the intellectual and moral condition of the people. The mind as well as the soil is found encumbered with heaps of old materials, the remains of Pagan and Popish superstitions; of classical, gothic, and romantic literature; of ancient and middle-age learning and philosophy, and all the passions, and luxuries, and vices of ancient Greece and Rome, in their declining and corrupted state. The grandeur of old France, like that of ancient Rome, is represented only in decaying monuments, either utterly useless, or put to uses that degrade them; and new France, young France, or revolutionary France, for it rejoices in all these names, except in Paris, seems to have nothing to show of its own, but smartly dressed soldiers and policemen, and wretched imitations of old aristocratical finery in restaurants and coffee-houses, with marble tables, mirrored walls, and shabby plate and porcelain. The tumid and hollow magnificence of the empire seems to have subsided very rapidly into lean and shrivelled mediocrity. The grandeur and renown of universal empire have vanished, but the rottenness that lay at the heart of that magnificent gourd of rapid growth, remains behind. The people gloat on the pomp and circumstance of war, and this passion, without procuring for them a single advantage, makes honest industry and sober morality distasteful. Even the passionate love they have for their country's glory, begets no noble individual aspirations or valuable habits. It withdraws them, indeed, from the devotedness to their own persons, homes, and families, which, in Britain, is carried too often to idolatry, but it substitutes nothing in its stead, save a restless craving for political excitement and time-destroying habits of gossiping and reading newspapers. Add to this, that the idleness of the soldiers, when not on duty, from the general officer to the drummer-boy, seems to lead all other classes into idle ways of spending time, or to encourage them in these. The army in France, be it remembered, bears an enormously larger portion to the mass of the population, than the soldiers in Great Britain do to the rest of the population here.

The old buildings of France suggest many interesting historical reflections. The ancient Gauls, under Roman tutelage, became a highly civilized people. Never, perhaps, even to this day, were the advantages of their fine soil and climate so fully brought out. The Gospel was preached among them; they received it, but it was only to corrupt it; and their glory departed, just as that of their foster-mother, Italy, had done. Never was nationality more completely annihilated than that, such as it was, which the ancient Gauls, as Roman provinces, could once boast. A new people, or rather several new nations, rushed in, and reducing the corruptly civilised inhabitants to a state of vassalage, formed a new and more complex state of society, in which fresh vigour and rough energy distinguished the conquerors who constituted themselves the aristocracy, while learning and skill in the useful and ornamental arts, continued to distinguish the lower orders. The Church of Christ, which had long been established among the vanquished, corrupt as she was, helped to communicate to the barbarous Franks, Burgundians, and other invaders, the civilization of the race they had been sent by God to chastise; and by their natural sympathies with their fellow-sufferers, the slaves, the clergy prepared that class for the improved condition into which it rose on the conquest of the country, by proud and haughty, yet slavery-detesting barons. These barons who, with their families, formed at last a very numerous caste, called the noblesse, could not be held guilty of corrupting Christianity, for they received it in a corrupt state, and probably the Popedom never had greater dupes than barbarians who, in adopting what they thought Christianity, merely changed one form of superstition for another. But at length their time of responsibility arrived. The Reformers were the first to preach the pure Gospel to the noblesse and gentilshommes of France; and had the latter embraced it, and as they had ample power to do, had they placed the crown and government of France on a pure Christian foundation, never would God have frowned on them to this day. But many took part against the Reformation, though, the decided majority appears to have embraced it. Even of the latter, however, many compromised their profession by the immorality of their lives, and all, in accepting the edict of Nantes, showed that they could consent to the Word of God being bound, and to the preaching of the Gospel being limited, for the sake of a perfidious peace. The security and repose thus purchased, as it flowed from one great national and ecclesiastical compromise, seemed to become the prolific mother of individual acts of the same kind, until the sifting times that preceded and attended the Revocation of the edict came, and broke up and dispersed the whole fabric of a Gospel Church in France. Can we shut our eyes to the fact, that when the Reformation was first preached to the aristocracy of France, it was as La Noue describes it, the finest and most numerous nobility in Europe; that it retained its dignity and power, as long as even only a part of it stood up for the defence of the Gospel; but that it declined from the period of the permitted establishment of Popery, in 1598, as the national religion of France, and of the Reformed Church merely as a tolerated sect; and that from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes downwards, it continued to lose in numbers, dignity, power, and wealth, until, as an old and hated abuse, it received its death-blow from the infidel revolutionists of 1792? Refusing to come to the help of the Lord at the close of the sixteenth century, with the devoted zeal which might then have made France a Protestant state and country, the nobility neither lived nor died as the first Condé and de Coligny had done, but one after another, even of the Protestants among them, meanly allowed themselves to yield to the hopes and fears employed to bring them back to Rome. They thenceforth dwindled away into the mere shadowy phantoms of those powerful aristocrats who, in former times, had looked on the kings of France as their equals. But it fared no better with the men who, as kings, now began to engross all governmental power in that country. What the ancient noblesse could have effected only by a revolution, Henry IV., and still more, Louis the XIV., might have done in the regular exercise of their kingly functions. They did it not—nay, they helped to extinguish the light that still illuminated many parts of France. And where is now that once haughty monarchy, and the family that, for two centuries, monstrously abused its power? Gone with the sinning aristocracy out of which it sprang, and which it crushed, only to be crushed itself by the revolutionary mob of the capital,—that capital which they had first made the peculiar domain of Popery, and then helped to demoralize into that of infidelity and atheism. Not one of the many governments which, during the last fifty years, have sprung from the revolution, has owned Christ, and fearful has been the fate of almost all of them. Louis Philippe has now reigned ten years. The Gospel, notwithstanding all the lets and hindrances it meets, chiefly from things and persons which the king can little control, has never had so much free course in France; no, not even when the Reformed Churches had two thousand instead of four hundred ministers. The two thousand were confined to particular spots; they had hardly any power to preach the Gospel at large, such as the four hundred are now to a great extent enjoying; and may we not ascribe to this the fact, that Louis Philippe seems to have a charmed life? Henry IV., was severely wounded by his first, and mortally stabbed by his second, assassin; but the present king of France has escaped unscathed from the deliberate attempts of many. Would that his patronage of the Gospel were more enlightened, more extensive, and more sincere!

The stranger who looks round on the still extant ecclesiastical buildings of France, finds not a single such monument rising up as a reflection on the doctrines of grace. No old Protestant place of worship—no, not even a Jansenist chapel or monastery, remains to say, that it was either in consequence of, or in spite of, the doctrines of grace, that France has been so convulsed, and her people so misguided, maddened, and corrupted. Would it not appear, that to save them from this shame, now seen falling with its entire weight on the Roman Catholic buildings retained by those who hated those doctrines in every shape, Divine Providence had ordained the timely destruction of the Reformed Churches? Thus, what was an act of insolent triumph on the part of the Jesuits and their partisans, has recoiled upon themselves. Their buildings, and theirs alone, can be taunted by the bitter sneer, that they belonged to a system which, in spite of immense wealth, and innumerable adherents, could not arrest the revolution when it came, and which, now that that convulsion is past, and when it might appeal, if it could, to the national gratitude to be taken into favour again, is almost as much despised and detested as ever. But not one old church of the Reformed stands out in grim desolation before the public eye, put to no use or to some ignoble use, and proclaiming, that the very people to which it used to dispense its lessons and ordinances, the children whom it baptized and educated, the worshippers over whose souls it watched, had forsaken it, to become the disciples of atheistic philosophers, the dupes of mock patriots, or the tools of wholesale murderers of the human race. Their demolition has saved them from all such sneers; whereas these Roman Catholic buildings, by outliving the institutions for which they were built, seem to survive, only that they may proclaim the impotency of the doctrines they were intended to propagate. On the other hand, the Protestant doctrines are, by the very facts of the violent demolition of the temples in which they were preached, and the expulsion or suppression of their professors, made to appear to all who know their history, as belonging to a system which might have done good, had it been but allowed to exist, and which cannot be fairly associated with either the evils which the Revolution was introduced to cure, or with those which it has brought in its train. Whether, therefore, we find the doctrines of the Gospel preached to a handful of Protestants, met, as at Rouen, in an old Roman Catholic Church, no longer used, because no longer needed as such, or in a new chapel, it has a novelty, yet not a revolutionary novelty about it. The philosopher may enter, and he finds none of the associations which make the old regime so hateful to many, either in its doctrines or its worship, and yet it is the old primitive Gospel, no new-fangled infidel novelty that he finds there. This in the present condition of France, is a most encouraging circumstance to all who are interested in the propagation of the Gospel in that country.

ON FELLOWSHIP MEETINGS.*

BY THE LATE REV. JOHN GEDDES,

Minister of St Andrew's Parish, Glasgow.

THE three chief exercises in Christian fellowship, are, praise, prayer, and reading the Holy Scriptures,—to each of which exercises I shall now briefly turn your attention.

I. Of PRAISE.—Let the psalm or paraphrase be selected as much as possible in accordance with the particular subject of conference, or special occasion or circumstances of the meeting. Let the subject of praise become afterwards the subject of prayer—a help and a guide to devotion—a simple and ready opportunity to acquire both ease and variety in the form of address to God. The language of the apostle, in regard to this exercise, is appropriate—"What is it then? I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." He speaks, too, of "singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord." And again, of "singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." Nor are the feelings and language of the Psalmist less appropriate, when in an elevation of spirit, he says, "Sing praises to God; sing praises: sing praises unto our King; sing praises. For God is King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding."—Whether, therefore, the psalm be principally of praise, or of thanksgiving, or of petition, or of precept, or of judgment upon the enemies of the Lord, or of complaint, endeavour in your praises, as in all other parts of your fellowship, to aim at the glory of God—your mutual edification—and the fervent exercise of grace in your hearts.

II. Of PRAYER.—This includes two things—the gift and the grace of prayer. The gift may be without the grace; but the grace is never without some measure of the gift; and the grace well exercised, will undoubtedly increase the gift. Fellowship meetings are designed and calculated to improve both; but the grace of prayer is first to be sought. Join the disciples in saying, "Lord, teach us to pray;" and strive to distinguish between the gift and the grace. Do not despise any whose gift may be small, but whose grace is great. Contemn not the smallness of grace, but thank God for its reality; and pray to him to make it eminent, as well as real. Remember always what prayer is—the offering up of the desires of the heart. Endeavour to understand clearly the meaning of praying in the name of Christ, and by the Spirit. Seek that faith which apprehends Christ, prays in his name, and prevails, as the Spirit of grace. Never suppose that you have the grace of prayer, unless you pray regularly in secret—unless you habitually and with sincerity obey the precept of the Lord Jesus Christ in regard to this duty:—"When thou prayest thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet; and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret: and thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be ye not therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him."

Seeking first the grace of prayer, exercise this grace; and having the right beginning in grace, go on to possess and improve the gift. It will profit you, and comfort you, in personal, secret meditation, and prayer. It will be a means of usefulness and comfort to others. It will be valuable in the family—in the Sabbath-school—and in the church. The association of which you are members, is designed as a nursery for both the grace and the gift of prayer. Distinguish the parts of prayer: adoration, confession, peti- tion, and thanksgiving. Prefer scriptural expression, under each and all of these parts. Make yourselves familiar with some examples under each. "Henry's Method of Prayer" is excellent, in the rich variety of specimens which it contains. Observe method in prayer: not always the same method, but method, so as to avoid confusion and vain repetition—the use of words without meaning or real fervour of spirit. Never pray, without asking help in prayer: asking it either secretly or openly, and seeking to say, Amen, both in faith and in desire.

III. OF READING THE SCRIPTURES.—This ought to be done as a daily duty, and with daily prayer. In reference to your meeting, you ought to remember and consider beforehand the particular subject. This belongs in part to all, but especially to him who takes the lead in this exercise. Let me recommend particularly, consideration of the context and marginal references upon the verse to be explained and applied. None can know, without trial, how much light this will often throw upon a verse, and verify the saying, that "Scripture best interprets Scripture."

IV. AS GENERAL DIRECTIONS.—Keep in mind the importance of having the spiritual sense exercised, to discover both good and evil; and in points both of judgment and of practice, to distinguish well between truth and error—sin and duty; that the reproof of the apostle may not be applicable to you:—"For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat." "Be ready always to admire the grace which ye see in others." Condescend in all affection to those, whose warmth of piety will often be found to excel even quickness of natural talent, in discovering what is most precious in Gospel truth. Believe that the Spirit can teach the meek, guide the humble, and conduct the obedient into much truth, which will be hidden from the self-conceited, and those who are puffed up by the knowledge which edifieth not. Cherish a spirit of sincerity, inoffensiveness, Christian affability, and affection, one towards another. Let it be the main object of your conference, both to do good and to receive good—to sharpen one another in the discernment of truth—and to stimulate one another in the conscientious discharge of duty. Be humble. Do not presume beyond your gifts and calling. Do not think more highly of yourselves than ye ought to think. Be willing to learn of all. Be not too confident in matters of mere opinion, where good men have agreed to differ. But be of one mind in the first principles of the oracles of God; and be ready to speak of them with knowledge, with kindness, with firmness, with seriousness, with spiritual devotion, and with godly fear. Avoid controversy. Attend to what is doctrinal with a practical spirit; and connect godliness with doctrine. Do not separate what God hath joined in privilege and duty, in faith and works, in principle and profession, in form and in power of godliness. Look and see Christ every where throughout the Sacred Volume; and pray that what is testified regarding him, from beginning to end, may dwell in you richly. Be not hasty to speak. In honour prefer one another. Keep the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of perfectness and peace. Love God, and love one another, with a pure heart, fervently. Observing these, and such things, of which you have oft been admonished, and which ye yourselves must know as dutiful and becoming, your meetings will be for the better, and not for the worse. Out of meeting, however, as well as in it, you must seek to know and to do "whatsoever things are true, honest, just, and pure, lovely, and of good report." In personal and in relative obligations, you must beware especially of either occasional or habitual neglect of any one known duty. You must avoid all which you know or suspect to be sinful. You must abstain from the appearance of evil. You must resist sin of every kind and of every degree. You must, if possible, avoid, and always resist temptation. Think no sin and no duty small. "A small duty omitted leads to a great sin; and little sins are great in their tendency." Make not the rich but the good your companions. Walk with the wise. Shun evil communications. Give none occasion to the enemy to blaspheme. In all your intercourse with the world, study to be sincere and without offence. Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers. Be not rash in making vows. Deliberate seriously. Perform your promises. Though you swear to your hurt, do not change or be unfaithful. Carry with you into your family, and among your friends—into your business, and into the world, the remembrance always of your profession of religion in the fellowship meeting. Believe not in after-life the sincerity of your present naming of the name of Christ. Depart away from all iniquity. From youth to age love God—love your neighbour. Maintain purity. Serve your generation, according to God's will. Follow on to know the Lord, and to cleave to him with full purpose of heart. Let not your mind or conscience be defiled. Esteem all God's precepts concerning all things to be right. Go on to perfection.

And now, in conclusion, I encourage you to continue in prayer—to pray for the church and its ministers—for the sick and the afflicted—for the weak and the feeble—for the distressed and the tempted—for the backslider, and for the unruly and disobedient—for sinners and for saints. For Zion's sake, and for your friends' and brethren's sake, do not hold your peace. Till the sun of life go down, maintain for one another the honourable office of Aaron and of Hur, when they stood by Moses. Pray like Jacob. Wrestle, and by wrestling prevail. Pray down and live down whatsoever is opposed to God—to his will—to his glory—to your good—and to the welfare of immortal souls. And, day by day, and week by week—month by month, and year by year—keep fellowship with God, and with his suppliants. Let nought but death part you and prayer. Live here the life of prayer, and ye shall live hereafter the life of praise.—And now, may the Lord bless you and keep you. May the Lord make his face shine upon you, and be gracious unto you. May the Lord lift up his countenance upon you, and give you peace. Amen and amen.

THE OBLIGATION OF FEMALES TO ASSIST IN THE DIFFUSION OF CHRISTIANITY.

By A CLERGYMAN'S WIDOW.

It has been so often reiterated as to have become one of the trite observations which may scarcely be uttered to the ear of taste, that woman is specially indebted to Christianity—that to it the females of this country owe their position in society, with the numberless advantages which result from it; and the cultivation of mind which is now their portion—a cultivation generally diffused among them, not confined to a few extraordinary individuals, as it was in even the most polished nations of heathen antiquity. Yet, trite and common-place as this truth has now become, it is but too little remembered with the gratitude which it ought to awaken, and the conduct which ought to be the result of a profound impression of it. The woman of cultivated intellect and refined manners considers herself justly entitled to the place she holds in society; and perhaps would never dream of acknowledging that she owes it to any thing besides her own merits. It is quite true, that such a situation is her right; but it is Christianity which has given her the possession of that which rightfully belongs to her, and which has bestowed upon her the means of being fitted for the station she occupies. It would seem almost an insult, to tell a polished and intelligent woman, possessed not merely of beauty and rank, but of wit, and accomplishments, and extensive information, that, but for the prevalence of the religion of Jesus Christ, she would in all probability have been as the servile, slave-like inhabitant of the forest wigwam; or as the babe-destroying mother of far distant islands; or at best as the fair and jewelled, but listless captive of an Eastern prison, treated by her haughty lord as a being without a soul. The idea is abhorrent to her pride, and repulsive to every feeling; yet it is not on that account the less consistent with truth. If it be, as it most certainly is, a truth, surely she owes to Christianity, or rather to its Author, a debt which she can never repay, and of which the devotedness of her whole life is not too much to express her acknowledgment. If she be a Christian in heart, not merely in name, if she has accepted the precious salvation which the Gospel offers, she will feel that, even had no additional temporal blessing been bestowed upon her, the spiritual treasures of which Christianity has put her in possession are such as to call forth a gratitude which shall induce her to consecrate all her energies to the service of Him who has redeemed her from sin and wretchedness, even at the cost of his blood. This is a consideration which presses upon all who have found the blessings of Christ's salvation; but the female sex have, in addition to it, the obligation arising from their having been raised from the lowest debasement to their proper rank and their rightful privileges, in the present life; therefore, a still deeper devotedness to the service of Christ may justly be expected of them than of the other sex. Is it in reality so? Do females in a Christian country generally feel their unspeakable obligation to express their gratitude to their Lord and Benefactor, by making his glory the sole object of their lives? Let the wasted time, the frivolous pursuits, the alienated affections, of the great majority of women, answer the solemn question. To what are their lives for the most part devoted, but to the various forms of "busy idleness,"—dress, useless accomplishments, and gaiety,—or to the better, but still selfish, enjoyment of domestic comfort, and in a few instances, to the pursuit of literature—pursuits and enjoyments, lawful in themselves, but rendered too frequently sinful, by being made the supreme object of life. Even those who are Christians indeed, feel too little the ties which bind them to the service of their Redeemer, and often extend their endeavours to promote the spread of his Gospel little beyond the precincts of their own family, if, indeed, they do not stop at communicating to their children alone the truths of Christianity, embracing not even the servants who are placed beneath their roof. That a mother, who feels the love of Christ, should refrain from speaking of that love to her children, is surely impossible; but it is to be feared that many Christians go no farther. The spirit of the Gospel, indeed, requires that a woman should avoid publicity and ostentation in her endeavours to do good, but there is a very wide sphere in which she may exert herself in perfect accordance with her feminine character. In the sending of missionaries to the heathen, in the distribution of the Word of God and of religious books and tracts, in visiting the sick and the poor, and in instructing the young, she may find ample occupation for her time and talents. These employments have, indeed, been sometimes brought into disrepute by the mistaken zeal of injudicious females, who have neglected the duties of home to busy themselves in what they call religious duties, or by the ostentatious bustle of members of what has been not inaptly denominated the world of religious dissipation, who have sought to acquire a reputation for piety and active benevolence by exhibiting themselves in every scene of public exertion. The first concern of every Christian woman is doubtless at home; and it is by discharging aright the various duties which lie within that sacred sphere that, in the first instance, she ought to seek to glorify her Redeemer by a life and conversation becoming his Gospel. She must neglect nothing which is connected with the real good of her own family, in order to be useful abroad, but must study to promote the true interest of her family circle, by performing her proper part, whether as the head or as one of the subordinate members of the family. Thus will she best advance the cause of Christ among those in whose welfare she is most deeply interested.

But there are few females, perhaps there are none, who must confine their efforts to their own household. There are comparatively few who have not a mite to spare for the great purposes of the Gospel to those who are ignorant of its life-giving truths; and in the majority of instances where limited resources are pleaded as an excuse for withholding the boon, it is owing to the fault, not the misfortune, of the individual who pleads with transport at the thought, venting itself in such language of admiration and desire, as is contained in the text: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God." He even envied the songsters their privilege and enjoyments, in being permitted to construct their nests, and rear their young without disturbance in the buildings around the sanctuary, although not on the very altars, which were consecrated by a special ceremony to the service of Jehovah, and before which, the priests were continually serving, while he was driven from the place of his repose, wandering upon the mountains of Israel. For he adds, "Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars,"—or the sacred edifices around them, "O Lord of hosts, my king and my God. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee. A day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." And similar to this have been the feeling and experience of good men in every age, in regard to the place, where God's honour dwelleth. All, in whom gracious impressions have been wrought, have set their affections upon the house of God, and while they have known no satisfaction equal to that of a frequent and constant resort to it, they have known no sorrow comparable to the being for a length of time detained from it. Alas! that this feeling should be so rare, and that so many should so little value the house of God, and rather seek their delight and their comfort any where else. But let us rejoice, that there are still not a few who find it to be good for them to wait upon the Lord in his ordinances, and to encourage others in doing so. Let us rejoice that while it was said by the Jews of old, even of a Roman centurion to his praise, "He loveth our nation, and has built for us a synagogue," there are amongst ourselves a goodly number who love the people of our land, and in token of doing so, erect for them edifices in which they may worship the God of their fathers, and learn the heavenly lessons, which are to make them wise unto salvation. In the following Discourse, all that I propose is, shortly to inquire into the foundation, or source of those pleasurable feelings with which the people of God repair to his sanctuary, and which cause them to esteem it amiable or lovely, and to seek after it with earnest desire.

I. It is because they regard it, as the Psalmist here terms it, "the tabernacle, the court, or the house of the Lord." "How amiable," says he, "are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house." In so styling the sanctuary, however, the least informed among you must be aware that it is the language merely of accommodation which is used. God is a Spirit, and can have no particular local residence. "He dwelleth not in temples made with hands, for the heaven of heavens cannot contain him." But still he condescends to give special manifestations of himself, and of his favour, at particular seasons, and in particular places. One memorable instance of this occurred in the experience of the patriarch Jacob. Having, after the fatigues of a long journey, while travelling from Beersheba to Haran, reposed himself on the naked earth, with only a few hard stones for his pillow, and the blue heaven for his canopy, he received during his sleep in a dream a striking emblematic representation of the Divine presence and protection, which drew from him, on awaking, this solemn expression of his enraptured feelings: "Surely, the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." He recognised the undeniable tokens of God's special presence, even in that wild and sequestered desert, although previous to the vision he had been unconscious of it. So it is with many, in less extraordinary circumstances, in our own day. They are often, indeed, always in God's presence, and yet know it not, give it no heed. A sentiment of reverential awe thrilled through the breast of the ravished patriarch at the thought of the striking scene which had been presented to him; and he farther exclaimed, "How dreadful, or awful, is this place! This is none other than the house of God, this is the gate of heaven." There was no building there except a simple stone or pillow, and yet this he likened to the residence of the Divine Majesty, and the entrance into the mansions of the Eternal; God having vouchsafed to him at it so impressive a demonstration of his immediate and favourable presence.

This is the first occasion on which we find the expression, "house of the Lord," employed in Scripture, and it at once shows the reason of its application, and the feelings which the consideration of it is fitted and was designed to awaken. Its use becomes frequent in the subsequent part of the Jewish history. It was applied both to the tabernacle and to the temple, and in each did the Almighty promise to meet, and to commune with his people from above the mercy-seat, as he did by the visible symbol of the Shechinah, or cloud of glory between the cherubim. "I will bring them to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer." When Solomon had finished the dedication of the temple, the Lord appeared unto him, and said, "Now mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attent unto the prayer that is made in this place. For now have I chosen and sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever, and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually." "In the time of trouble," says David, "he shall hide me in his pavilion, in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me." The appearances made, and blessings granted to the ancient saints in the sanctuary, were no doubt in a great measure extraordinary, peculiar to the dispensation under which they lived, and therefore, not to be expected by us. Yet we have the divine authority for believing, that God still draws near to his people in another manner than he does to the world in the assemblies of the saints, really and spiritually, although with no external sign, to accept their devotions, and render profitable the reading and hearing of his word. For he declared by the mouth of Moses—"In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and bless thee," and says his Apostle James, "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." Christ, too, who in human form appeared to his servants of old, with intimations of the favourable divine reception of their religious exercises, and special revelations of the Divine will to them, as to Manoaah and his wife, when he received their burnt and meat offering, and ascended in the flame which went up toward heaven from the altar; and to Gideon, when he consumed his present of flesh and cakes with fire, as a mark of accepting it, and then departed out of his sight, has assured us, that "wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them," no doubt, spiritually, "to bless them," as their Saviour and Friend.

And to the fulfilment of these promises the people of God have borne testimony in all ages, tracing, as they have often had occasion to do, their clear views, their serious feelings, and their holy purposes, to their attendance on the courts of the Lord. The eyes of their understanding have there often seen the King in his beauty; and "there has flown unto them," as it were, "one of the seraphim, having a live coal in his hand, taken with the tongs from off the altar, and he has laid it on their mouth," and communicated to them an impression "that their iniquity is taken away, and their sin purged." The Lord has revealed his glory to them, not, indeed, in visible tokens, but on the inward tablet of their hearts. He has been amongst them with his Spirit and grace, when they have congregationally sought him. "He has blessed them, when they have chosen him, and caused them to approach unto him, that they may dwell in his courts; and they have been satisfied with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple." "He has heard their cry, and helped them." Need we wonder, then, that they, as well as he, "should love the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and should count "a day in his courts better than a thousand" spent any where else.

This recognition of the sanctuary as the house of the Lord, and the place where his honour dwells, if accompanied by a conviction of his being our reconciled God and Father in Christ, and by a particular reference to him, a feeling of his presence and eye to his glory, at the time of holding communion with him, cannot but communicate the highest pleasure. Where there is an entire want of this recognition and conviction, there can be none of this pleasure felt; and where there is an absence of this realizing sense of the Divine presence at the period of worship, it must be but imperfectly, if at all, felt. But where there are both—where there is an impression that we are drawing near to a Being whose favour we enjoy, and to whose image we are in some measure conformed, and long to be still more so, and who is fully in our minds and upon our hearts at these moments—we cannot but have the warmest emotions of delight, both from the character of the Being with whom we hold intercourse, as so amiable and kind, and from the affections which that intercourse calls into exercise—gratitude, love, trust, hope, and the like.

The same circumstance must also be a great means of securing constancy of attendance upon the sanctuary. For making a distinct acknowledgment of the Almighty in this, as in all their duties, regarding him as enjoining and promising to bless their entrance into his courts, his people are not characterised by that irregular and unfrequent assembling of themselves together with the saints, which marks the conduct of those who go to church without any direct reference to God at all, either to his will as prescribing, or to his glory as promoted by it, but from the influence of custom, into the reasons of which they have never inquired, or from a wish to be like their neighbours, and to maintain general respectability of character, or from curiosity not of a laudable kind, and who accordingly absent themselves whenever personal convenience, or inclination, or worldly concerns interfere. And while the former will, from good motives, regularly wait upon the weekly and ordinary services of the sanctuary, they will avail themselves of other suitable seasons of worship, as they occur. They will not esteem such waiting upon God a wearisomeness to the flesh; for the exercises in which they engage are in harmony with all their prevailing principles, feelings, tastes, and habits; which leads me to notice,

II. That the well-disposed, like the Psalmist, will consider the tabernacles of the Lord amiable, and long for the opportunity of attending them, if for a season detained from them, on account of the sublime, profitable, and agreeable services to which they are there called. They are there, as David elsewhere says, "to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple," and here says, "to praise him." The holiness and the goodness of God are styled, in Scripture, his "beauty;" and the study and contemplation of these and the other excellencies of his nature, the inquiring into his will by searching his Word and by supplication, and the offering to him praise, together with the administration and keeping of the sacraments, form the leading occupations of the house of God—to each of which we shall shortly advert.

And to begin with praise.—The Psalmist says, at the 4th verse of this Psalm, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee;" and at the 6th verse of the 27th Psalm, "I will offer in his tabernacles sacrifices of joy: I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord." We are required "to make a joyful noise unto the Lord, and to come into his presence with singing;" and we are told that "it is good to sing

praise to our God, for it is pleasant, and praise is comely." The soul is hereby not only raised in worship of its Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer, proclaiming the beauty or glory of his perfections, and of all his wondrous and gracious dealings, but it gives vent to all its varied feelings of reverence, fear, gratitude, love, hope, and joy, in a manner more solemn and impressive than can otherwise be attained. The language of poetry, accompanied with all the charms of well-chosen and well-conducted music, is the most becoming, improving, and delightful vehicle of devotional sentiment; and the more numerous the voices which chaunt, in harmonious strains, the same hymn of praise, the more powerful and hallowing the effect. It is impossible to conceive a grander and more elevating scene, than a large assembly of pious worshippers, animated by the same views, spirit, and prospects, breathing out, as with one heart, the joint expression of their homage and allegiance to the greatest and best of Beings, in the notes of some familiar and favourite air. Sympathy deepens the solemnity, carrying the stream of devotional expression and feeling from voice to voice, and from soul to soul, till each individual worshipper comes, as it were, to concentrate in himself the separate sentiments of all. Hearts but little accustomed to pious impulses, are moved by so impressive an exercise, and made to beat, now with the throbbings of fearful forebodings, then with the thrillings of pleasing hope—now to melt with the softenings of conscious guilt, then to glow with the joyful anticipations of pardoning mercy. It is when contemplating this noble service, and themselves contributing to it, that the people of God—especially under peculiar circumstances or animating associations, as were our forefathers on the mountain side or in the lowly valley, persecuted by their enemies—at times feel their souls, in a manner, lifted above the fleeting scenes of this mortal state, and transported into the very realms of bliss. And why should it be otherwise, when we know that this is the principal, the favourite, employment of the heavenly host, and disembodied spirits of the perfected just? "for they sing a new song, and proclaim with a loud voice, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever." With such hosannahs the arches of the celestial sanctuary continually ring. Yes; it is in this most sublime, soul-stirring exercise, that they, whose hearts are in heaven while their bodies are still clogged with the earthliness of humanity, experience their highest gratification; so that, even in this respect, well may they "long for the courts of the Lord."

Again, in the sanctuary, we address prayer to the Almighty. When God promised blessings to his ancient people, he said, "Yet, for all this, I will be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them;" and he says, by the mouth of his prophet, "I will make them joyful in my house of prayer, for mine house shall be called a house of prayer for all people." To this special purpose was the temple of old dedicated. There the people were to assemble, to pour out their joint requests for the supply of their common wants—to supplicate victory over their enemies, and recovery of the Divine favour, when their rebellions had provoked him to suffer them to be defeated—to seek safety for their persons and their properties from the ravages of drought, of famine, of pestilence, or any other calamity—to implore pardon for all their sins, assured that they would find it, if they confessed and forsook them. To the same needful and desirable ends, are the places of Christian congregations set apart. In these we, in company, adore the power and the goodness of our heavenly Father—the one assuring us of his ability, the other of his willingness, to fulfil our desires. In these, we unite in giving thanks, at the remembrance of his bounty in providence, and of his grace in redemption. In these, we together acknowledge, in lowly prostration of soul, our manifold sins and imperfections, humbling ourselves under the might and the purity of the Divine nature; and, at the same time, implore, through faith in the atoning merits of the Redeemer, that mercy which we in common need, and which delights in pardoning the guilty, and that influence of the Holy Spirit, which can alone enlighten, purify, strengthen, and comfort the fallen soul. In these, we meet to crave all our public and national blessings; security to the throne and constitution; health, happiness, and guidance, to our sovereign; wisdom and the fear of God to her counsellors, and all rulers; defence, extension, improvement, and permanence, to our Zion; freedom and protection of worship to all classes of the community; prosperity to trade and manufactures; liberty, peace and plenty, to the whole inhabitants; quiet and comfort to our homes. In these, we join all the sincere worshippers of God and of the Lamb in supplicating the wide diffusion of the reign of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, at home and afar off. How be-seeming and exalting the service! What more becoming the professing servants of the Lord, who have such a fellowship of wants, infirmities, trespasses, corruptions, crosses, disappointments, sorrows, privileges, consolations, mercies, and hopes, than thus to express them in common to their common Benefactor and Friend! How are all the perfections of Deity thus magnified!—how are all the pride and glory of man thus humbled! How are we thus brought to feel the vastness of Divine Majesty!—the absoluteness of human dependence! And how calculated is it to inflame every pious, and to enliven every benevolent, affection! Surely, then, every seriously disposed person must esteem and long for the house of God, as a house of prayer.

Farther, we should value and desire it, as a place of religious instruction. There the Law of old was read and expounded; "the priests' lips were to keep knowledge, and the people were to seek the Law at his mouth." And so it is still; God has been pleased not only to appoint at first, but to continue, an order of men by whom the message of salvation shall, from time to time, be proclaimed to mankind, and urged upon their acceptance. We are His ambassadors, invested with the ministry of reconciliation, ordained "to beseech you, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God." "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord." We have no opinions of our own to impose upon your faith, no commands of our own to enforce upon your obedience; all that we teach or enjoin we exhort you to try by "the law and by the testimony;" and to receive or reject, according as it agrees or differs with this heavenly standard.

It is not ourselves, but our great Master, whom we wish to present to your notice and regard; and in speaking of him, we are to remind you of his three-fold offices: of Christ, or the Anointed, the Messiah, the divinely appointed messenger of God—stating to you the evidences of his heavenly mission, for the confirmation of your faith; Jesus, as the Saviour, the Joshua of the latter days, unfolding to you, in all its bearings, the revealed plan of redemption, which he wrought out by his incarnation, life, and death, for a fallen world, in order to woo you from the broad path, which leads to destruction; into the narrow way, which conducts to eternal happiness; and of Lord, Master, or King,—explaining, illustrating, and enforcing his laws, in all their spirituality of meaning and extent of obligation, that you may become to him, through the help of the Spirit, "a peculiar people, zealous of good works; that you may be sanctified wholly, and your whole spirit, soul, and body, may be preserved blameless unto his second coming;" and all this, "as your servants for Jesus' sake, not seeking our own profit, but the profit of many of you, that you may be saved."

It is true, the ministers of religion may not communicate to you any new information; but if they remind you of what you already know, but which you are apt to forget, amid the hurry of business, the enticements of pleasure, and the urgency of domestic cares; if they bring familiar truths, at regular intervals, seasonably to your remembrance, exhibiting them to you perhaps in lights in which you did not before contemplate them, and in a manner suited to all the varieties of your characters and wants; if they admonish you of dangers to which you are constantly exposed, but which you are likely to under-rate; if they fortify you against opposition and temptations which you may meet with in your Christian course, but may not be sufficiently armed to encounter; if they help to deepen your serious impressions, to enliven your religious affections and confirm your holy purposes, to moderate your anxiety about this world, and to increase your concern about the world to come; if they dispense to you comfort under sorrows which may be depressing you, and arouse in you salutary fears where you may be imagining all is security and peace; if they warn you against neglecting, and excite you to attend to the great salvation; if they are thus the instruments of conversion to some, and of spiritual quickening to others, they surely spend not their strength, and claim not your hearing, in vain.

And may I not appeal to many now present, who have found it good for them to listen to the instructing, exhorting, reproving, warning, entreating, soothing, cheering voice of the messenger of God—who can attest, from your own experience, that the preaching of the Cross, although to others "foolishness," has proved to you "the power and the wisdom of God for your salvation;" that, by what the world terms the "foolishness of such preaching," you through faith have been saved, and are now "rejoicing in the Lord, and abounding in hope." And are you not ready to exclaim, on the recollection of these improving and refreshing moments, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!" and acknowledge that "a day in God's house is better than a thousand" any where else?

Once more: we should esteem the tabernacle or house of God, amiable, and delight in repairing to it, on account of the celebration of the holy sacraments. There we are brought into outward covenant with God, by means of the communication to us of its signs and seals, by our admission into the visible Church in infancy, through baptism—and our subsequent confirmation of the professions and engagements of our parents in our behalf at that period, by our personal observance of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In this last most interesting and impressive ordinance we voluntarily dedicate ourselves to the service of Him who redeemed us by his precious blood; who sanctifies, strengthens, and consoles us by his Divine Spirit; and who is now preparing for us mansions in his Father's kingdom, and us for these mansions. At this holy repast we meet with the Lord, whom our souls love; we commemorate, under the significant emblems of bread and wine, the solemn pledges of his grace; we testify our acknowledgment of him, in all his mediatorial offices; we receive from him refreshment to our weary and heavy laden spirits; we hear him announcing to us, by the voice of his ministers, "Son, or daughter, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee. My grace is sufficient for thee; my strength shall be perfected in thy weakness." We vow an unshaken and entire allegiance to his service; we embrace our fellow-communicants in the bonds of a common charity—regarding them equally with ourselves, the children of the same Father, and the heirs of the same inheritance. Honourable and transporting service, doubtless, to all the sincere worshippers of God and lovers of the Saviour!—calculated to awaken all that is dignifying, and to repress all that is debasing, in our nature. Surely, then, this is an additional reason why we should cherish the feeling and adopt the exercise of the Psalmist, and preparing a pamphlet, entitled, "The Essence of the True Vedam." A few months after, he was joined by Mr Schmid, who had been his colleague at Madras. This event was to him a source of peculiar comfort; more especially, as he was exposed to difficulties of a very unpleasant nature. An officer of the corps stationed at Pallamcotta had received from him a number of Tamul and Telugu tracts, for distribution among the sepoys of his company. This gave offence to the commanding officer, who recalled the tracts, and returned them to Mr Rhenius, with an official note, requesting him henceforth to discontinue the distribution of tracts among the soldiers, as being contrary to the regulations of the service. Not being aware of any such regulations, Mr Rhenius requested a sight of them, but was refused. Thus was he excluded from a field of usefulness which seemed to be very promising. Another difficulty soon arose, connected with the question of caste. This has at all times proved one of the most powerful obstacles to the progress of Christianity in India. The form in which it presented itself to Mr Rhenius and his colleague is thus detailed in the Memoir:—

"The missionaries had early formed the plan of a seminary under their immediate superintendence, in which youths might be prepared for employment as catechists or evangelists to their countrymen; and most of the lads chosen for this new seminary were the children of members of congregations belonging to the Gospel Propagation Society. After commencing with six or seven of the Sudra caste two or three months before, there came, on the 21st June, thirteen boys from the country, of whom two were Sudras and eight were Shanars, the lowest grade of the Sudras, and three Parias, or no-caste boys. Mr Rhenius was present at the first meal they were all to partake of, and grace being said, they sat down, with the exception of the Sudras. When these were asked the reason for not seating themselves, they said they could not sit down because the other boys were there. As there was no time for disputing, Mr Rhenius simply said, that whoever wished not to be considered a heathen, should sit down forthwith and commence. The eldest sat, the rest followed his example, and the meal was discussed. In the evening, after prayers, the boys were particularly addressed on the subject of caste, when the Sudras said, with tears, that if they were to eat with the Shanars and Parias, that is to say, in sight of them, they would be cast out by their relations. The next morning the Sudra boys did not breakfast, and they went also without dinner, because they were not allowed to dine at a different hour. Again Mr Rhenius expostulated with them, but to no purpose. The parents, too, were inflexible. They pleaded that a wall might be made to separate the one caste from the other; and when so much was yielded to them as to allow the caste boys "to hide themselves from view, as much as they pleased, by mats," even this would not suffice. At length, Mr Rhenius declared the boys could not remain in the seminary, for here the distinctions of caste could not be observed. They therefore dispersed, and for the present the seminary was discontinued."

This event was painful to Mr Rhenius, and he lost no time in giving a statement of the whole details to the corresponding Committee at Madras. While engaged in this conflict about caste, however, he received some very gratifying letters from Prussia; and among others, a letter from his Majesty Frederic William III., to whom he had forwarded a brief account of the progress of missionary operations in South India. The king's letter is as follows:—

"I was peculiarly pleased on receiving, together with your letter dated Sept. 21st, 1818, the copies of the New Testament in the Tamul and Telugu languages, and the interesting account of missions: from which I perceive that, in your endeavours to obey the command of the Saviour to spread the Gospel, you find yourself rewarded by a blessed success. With pleasure, therefore, do I substantiate the interest I take in it, by informing you that I have assigned a continual contribution for the support of the missionary seminary in this place; and I have caused the accompanying medal to be transmitted to you as a memento of me."

(Signed) "FREDERIC WILLIAM."

The seminary which had been broken up on account of caste, was gradually re-established, and within fifteen months it contained twenty-four young men of different castes; who were carefully trained, by Messrs. Schmid and Rhenius, as schoolmasters and catechists. For many years Mr Rhenius spent two hours every day in the seminary giving instruction on various branches of knowledge. This, however, was only one of the many avocations which engaged the time and attention of this apostolic missionary. Besides preaching and teaching, writing tracts and books, and making missionary tours in the district, he devoted his energies to the great work of translating the Scriptures into Tamul. This was a work which required much time and patient study, and it is scarcely to be wondered at, that, although he finished the New Testament, he should have left the Old incomplete at his death.

It is well known, that the late King of Prussia indulged the earnest desire of uniting the two Protestant Churches established by law in that country. Had it been possible to have effected an amicable adjustment of the differences which exist between the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches, the project was, no doubt, in every point of view desirable. The question, of course, excited great interest in Prussia; and, as might naturally be expected, from the love which he bore to his father-land, Mr Rhenius felt a lively concern in a matter which so deeply involved the interests of religion among his countrymen. He accordingly ventured to address a letter to the king, giving, at full length, the views which he entertained on the agitated question, and urging rather a unity of heart than a uniformity in external worship. It was with great regret, therefore, that in later years he learned the painful circumstances connected with the attempt to force the desired uniformity. These circumstances we detailed at length in a previous volume of this Work, and although we are quite aware that the statements which we then made, founded on what we considered authentic documents, have given great offence to some influential persons connected with the Prussian Government, we must, with all deference, adhere to the opinions which were then offered, until an authoritative statement of a contrary nature shall, as has been promised, be forthcoming.

As the number of converts from heathenism to Christianity increased, the missionaries considered it necessary to form separate Christian settlements. At first the plan met with great opposition; but, in process of time, these villages or congregations spread themselves over the Tinnevely district. By an arrangement of this kind, the converted natives were collected together in one place, and could thus be more readily instructed; while they enjoyed the additional advantage of being separated from the evil example and influence of their heathen neighbours.

THE OFFERING OF ISAAC :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER CHRISTISON,
Minister of Foulden, Berwickshire.

"And Isaac said, Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering? And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering."—Gen. xxii. 7, 8.

ON a retrospect to the 4th verse of this chapter, we meet with the arrival of Abraham at the foot of the mountain, upon which, in obedience to the command of God, he is to offer Isaac in sacrifice. Here, the narrative goes on to acquaint us, he leaves his attendants, takes the fire and a knife in his hand, and lays on his son the wood of the burnt-offering. During these preparations, and even after the resumption of his journey, he maintains a thoughtful silence—the mood natural to man between the conception and the execution of an enterprise of painful and commanding interest. But Isaac is at no loss to conclude that the termination of their journey is at hand, and, ignorant that he himself is the destined victim, and considering that they are at a distance from home, and without the means of sacrifice, he inquires, "Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering? And Abraham says, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering."

The incident, which goes by the name of the offering of Isaac, possesses, in almost all its parts, a typical character. Abraham, as presented in it to our notice, is a type at once of God, when "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him for us all;" and of the man, to whom the call of duty is never addressed, but it meets with the response, "Behold, here I am;" and who is ready, should it be the Divine pleasure, to make the greatest and most unlooked-for sacrifice. In like manner, Isaac, as he appears in this transaction, is symbolical of our Saviour. For, as Isaac makes no resistance to the decree, which appoints that he shall be offered in sacrifice; so, when it is proposed in the counsels of heaven that Jesus shall, in our nature and stead, die for sin, in the same moment he says, "Lo, I come; in the volume of the book it is written of me; I delight to do thy will, O my God." Isaac climbs the hill, upon which he is to suffer, bearing the wood, amid the conflagration of which he is to be consumed: Jesus toils towards Calvary under the weight of the cross. Isaac is laid bound on the altar: the hands and feet of Jesus are nailed to the tree. But, checking the inclination to trace the symbolical nature, which pervades nearly every thing connected with the offering of Isaac, I would limit myself to the typical sense, in which it appears to me that the text may be viewed.

I. For when Isaac inquires, under the circumstances noticed at the outset of this Discourse, "Where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" may it not be considered as a representation of the perplexity of man, when, with the light of nature alone, he has sought a sacrifice of efficacy for the remission of sin? Whether we peruse the history of ages, which are long since gone by; or we profit by the spirit of enterprise, by which modern days have been distinguished, and which has left no habitable part of the earth unvisited; every where, and in every time, we meet with vicarious sacrifices—that is, with the infliction of death as an act of worship, in the hope that the punishment, which is due to the sinner in his own person, may be transferred to his victim. Go to the valley of Hinnom in the reign of Manasseh; listen to the momentary screams of the infants, whom their parents have just flung into the flames, as an offering to Moloch; and, while you turn away from the hateful scene, reflect that it affords an example of the impression among the ancient heathen, that "without the shedding of blood"—of the blood most dear to us—"is no remission."

But it may be said, that the worshippers of Moloch were in a state of the utmost barbarism and corruption. Be it so. Go, then, to Rome, in the day in which she has reached her height of glory and refinement: see a hundred victims falling, as one sacrifice, under the knife of her priests; and, while the ground beneath you is noisome with gore, know that among the most civilized, as well as the rudest of heathen antiquity, the conviction was mooted, that "without the shedding of blood, is no remission." But, alas! similar testimonies are to be met with in our own time; for the blessed day is yet distant, when the high places of heathenism shall be every where overthrown, and "the word of the Lord have a free course, and be glorified" with a circuit ample as that of the material sun.

The inhabitant of one dark corner of the earth, where patriarchal simplicity still reigns, approaches his God with the blood of the firstling of his flock; while the citizen of a different and a more civilized, but as to spiritual matters equally benighted, clime, prostrates himself on the highway, in order that he may be crushed with the wheel of the gigantic car in which his idol is borne along in periodic and glorious procession; thus showing that, in modern as in ancient times, it is the impression of the natural man, that "without shedding of blood, is no remission." But whether, in times of old, the apostate Israelite caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom, or the Roman presented his hecatomb, for a vicarious sacrifice; whether the heathen of the present day propitiates his deity with the firstling of his flock, or with the same view is, by his own act, crushed by the wheel of the chariot in which his idol is enthroned; was not, and is not, the inquiry of the natural man, "where is the lamb for a peace-offering," as much at a stand as ever? What reason was there to conceive it possible that "the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin?" Where was the relation between the victim and the sinner whom it represented? and what proportion in value was there between its death and the object to be accomplished? Though Lebanon had been stripped of her "goodly cedars," and "the cattle upon a thousand hills" had been rendered mute, in order that they might furnish the wood and the victim of one mighty sacrifice, could even this have been of sufficient value towards the expiation of sin? Could it have been accepted in heaven, and yet the moral government of God upheld, and his hatred against iniquity duly declared? But it is superfluous to reason upon the inadequacy of every sacrifice which the heathen could, and can, devise for the expiation of their guilt. What firm and permanent satisfaction could they feel, while they ever left the altar, like Cain, unblest with any token from above that respect had been had to their offering? St Paul informs us, that our Lord "was raised again for our justification;" under which, besides other things, is implied, that by his resurrection, the efficacy of his death, the satisfaction of Divine justice was declared to the world.

If, therefore, notwithstanding the many and most remarkable proofs which were given down to the moment when Jesus expired upon the cross, that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," if it was still necessary that he should visibly ascend from the tomb, in order that our faith in the success of our sacrifice might be complete; what confidence would the heathen have in his offering for sin—an offering, at best, of no natural virtue for the production of such an effect—an offering of his own device—an offering to the acceptance of which no testimony was borne from heaven?

In short, the sacrifices of the pagan would have been ever attended by the same result, as those of the prophets, who contended with Elijah, and who called on the name of their idol "from morning even until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us! but there was no voice, nor any that answered:" and the man, unenlightened by the Gospel, has ever retired from the performances of sacrifice, without having made any advance in the inquiry, "where is a lamb for a sin-offering?"

Thus have I been led by the words of the text, "where is a lamb for a burnt-offering," to speak of the perplexity of all (and the term all includes the whole heathen world), who, under the direction of their unassisted reason, have sought a sacrifice of efficacy for the remission of sins. But there were some in every period of the Mosaic dispensation, who nobly rose above this perplexity, and confided in the interposition of God for the redemption of the world.

II. May not their expectation be suggested to us by the words of Abraham, "My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." How "mercy and truth were to meet together," in other words, how God was to be at once just and gracious in his ways towards a sinful world, is a difficulty, of which we have always had the solution, and which, therefore, we may be apt to regard as of no very formidable nature; but which in truth is such, that, unless God had been pleased "to speak of it, at sundry times, and in divers manners, unto the fathers," they must have been uncheered by the faintest prospect of the mode in which propitiation was to be made for iniquity. But the light which was so much wanted, was also freely imparted. No sooner had man fallen, than he received the promise of restoration; and for ages afterwards, through the inspiration of God, prophets announced, and poets sung of the Messiah's advent with such distinctness, that we are prone to fall into the dream that they describe a past, instead of a far-off, occurrence. And, in order that the prospect of redemption might be kept alive, and rendered more definite among the chosen people, God was pleased to appoint a number of sacrifices, which should be typical of the death of our Lord; and of which the most solemn and significant was the offering for sin, presented in the name of the whole Jewish nation, on the great day of the annual expiation.

This typical character of the legal sacrifices, and especially of the sin-offering, is traced at length in the Epistle to the Hebrews. "The first covenant had ordinances of divine services, and a worldly sanctuary. There was a tabernacle made; the first wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the show-bread; which is called the sanctuary. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; which had the ark of the covenant, and over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat. Now, the priest went always into the first tabernacle; but into the second went the high-priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people: The Holy Ghost thus signifying," (the apostle is now to explain the import of these institutions) "that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present. But Christ being come a High-Priest of good things to come, by his own blood entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. Not into the holy place made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us: Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; but now once hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many. The bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high-priest for sin, are burnt without the camp. Wherefore Jesus, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, "suffered without the gate."

It is true that the institutions by which the Messiah was prefigured, as well as the predictions in which he was directly announced, were grossly misunderstood by the Jews in general; who, therefore, were as much in the dark as the Gentiles, with respect to the mode in which sin was to be expiated. Yet there were some at every stage of the ancient economy, to whom the law and the prophets did not in vain speak of the Saviour's coming. Thus, we are informed by the writer to the Hebrews, that "by faith," that is, through the belief and the correct interpretation of the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent, "Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain;" and that he, and many after him, "died in faith, not having received the promise," or blessings promised, "but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them." In like manner, Jesus declared unto his disciples, "Verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them;" and of Abraham, in particular, he remarks, that the patriarch "rejoiced to see the day" in which the Messiah was to be manifested; "and he saw it, and was glad." Neither would I omit the notice of an incident which occurred at the presentation in the Temple: "Anna, the prophetess, coming in that instant, gave thanks unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem." We can form no adequate idea of the feelings with which the holy and enlightened under the old dispensation looked forward to the advent of the Saviour. If there are worldly occurrences, amid the contemplated approach of which we lose the faculty of sleep, and the sun seems to stand still in the midst of heaven, what must have been the feelings of Abraham, while his prescient spirit dwelt on the greatest event which was to happen in the flight of time—the redemption of the world through the cross of Jesus? The mother who knows that the crisis is at hand which is to determine whether the sickness of her child is to be unto death or life; the voyager, whose vessel has been cast at midnight upon an unknown coast, and by whom his own sufferings are unfeared, and the roar of the waters, and the wailing of his companions in misery are unheard, amidst the intenceness with which he watches for the morning;—these, it seems to me, are faint emblems of the longing with which the rise of the Sun of Righteousness would be anticipated. St Paul has a most remarkable image to express the effects which the hope of redemption produced; he speaks of men, through it, "groaning and travailing together." But perhaps we shall arrive at the best conception of the feelings of such as lived before the manifestation of Jesus, but had some knowledge and expectation of that event, if we advert to the ecstasy of those whose faith on this subject was turned into vision. Listen to the strains in which Zacharias expresses his gratitude,—“Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began.” Listen, again, to the beautiful and predictive ejaculation of Simeon, made on the first presentation of our Saviour, and while he folded the infant in his arms,—“Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel.” From the study of the law and the prophets, from attention to the signs of the times, and from supernatural intimations, Simeon had concluded that the advent was to happen in his day; and, under this expectation, he had cheerfully borne the evils of protracted life. Having seen the Saviour, and the world having no longer any attraction for him, he welcomes the peaceful approach of death; but then, in the genuine, expansive spirit of the Gospel, he is not so wrapt up in his own happiness, but that he celebrates the blessed fruits with which, alike to Jew and Gentile, the coming of Jesus was to be attended.

It is time that, from attending to the spiritual condition of others, we now pass to the consideration of our own. We live in the times neither of ignorance nor of expectation with respect to the propitiation to be made for sin. We, indeed, are laden with iniquity; but the language of perplexity, “Where is the lamb for an offering?” and the language of devout trust, “God will provide himself a lamb for an offering,” are alike inapplicable to us. In this respect we are all “the children of light,”—and how great is that light! The Lamb on which we rely for a ransom was no arbitrary selection of man; but the provision of God. Jesus was not, like other vicarious sacrifices, an involuntary victim; but, with his own most cordial concurrence, “was bruised for our iniquities.” As he was the incarnate Son of God, there was in his blood a propitiatory virtue of infinite value; representing “mercy and truth, righteousness and peace,” in harmonious union; and embracing in efficacy men of every period, and of every clime. And finally, our faith leans on a risen Redeemer; that is, on a sacrifice the acceptance of which has been testified, by the reappearance of Him who made it from the tomb. “Behold the Lamb of God; which taketh away the sin of the world!” “No man taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myself; I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it again.” “God sent his only begotten Son into the world, to be the propitiation for our sins. Such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as the high priests of the Law, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's; for this he did once, when he offered up himself. Him hath God raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." Such is the Christian expiation.

In conclusion, let us advert to the instruction to be received from the consideration of times and nations which, in a religious view, have been far less favourably situated than the age and country in which our lot has been cast. Let it, then, be a correction of, and a counterpoise to, the apathy which is so apt to steal on us, with respect to advantages of which we have never known the want. From the oppressive sacrifices of the Jew and Gentile, let us learn our obligations to that "one offering which Jesus has made for sin, and by which he has for ever perfected them which are sanctified." When, on the one hand, we see the heathen inextricably bewildered in his search after an expiation for sin, let us be assured, that in similar circumstances we, too, must have walked on in darkness; let us rejoice that a happier lot has fallen to us, and that we are "children of the day;" and let us hail the period when all men shall come to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. When, on the other hand, we see the devout Israelite waiting for redemption, and rejoicing that he saw it afar off, let us bless God that, on this most vital point, we have never burned with the fever of suspense; and let us be very careful indeed, lest we, to whom salvation is come, feel less delight than they who were gladdened by its dim and distant vision.—Amen.

EARLY PIETY.

Lord, teach a little child to pray,
Thy grace betimes impart,
And grant thy Holy Spirit may
Renew my infant heart.

A helpless creature I was born,
And from the womb I strayed;
I must be wretched and forlorn
Without thy mercy's aid.

But Christ can all my sins forgive,
And wash away their stain,
And fit my soul with Him to live,
And in his kingdom reign.

To Him let little children come,
For He hath said they may;
His bosom then shall be their home—
Their tears He'll wipe away.

For all who early seek his face
Shall surely taste his love;
Jesus shall guide them by his grace,
To dwell with Him above.

A TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE REV. PETER THOMSON, MINISTER OF ST MARY'S CHURCH, DUMFRIES.

[Extracted from a Dumfries Newspaper.]

We recollect few events that have of late produced a stronger impression of the uncertain tenure of human life, or elicited a more general and sincere feeling of regret, than the sudden death of this respected young clergyman. All scenes of mortality are appalling enough; but when death seems to discharge his arrows at a venture, and carry suddenly to the dark mansions of the grave those who were endeared to us by the most interesting associations, and whose well-remembered faces seem still to rise before us, the impression is solemn indeed. Well, then, may we conceive the deep-seated grief with which the trustees and congregation of St Mary's are mourning the loss of their faithful and affectionate pastor, whose sun has truly gone down at noon—who has fallen a victim to a malignant fever in the ninth month of his ministry, while just entering on a promising career of ministerial usefulness. From the peculiarly interesting duties of the clerical profession, and the nameless little offices of kindness which a clergyman is daily called upon to perform, his death, if he has been a good man, is apt, in any circumstances, to be felt as a bereavement. If he is advanced in years, even though we have been long looking forward to the eventful change, we cannot but drop a tear to the memory of the good old man who sprinkled on our brow the water of baptism, and gave us the first token of admission to the sacrament of the Supper. But the death of the young clergyman, whose persuasive advice and soothing consolation we calculated would, for many a long year, constitute him the family friend, is apt to be felt by his congregation as an event altogether overpowering. Most sincerely, therefore, do we sympathize with the congregation of St Mary's in the loss they have recently sustained in the death of Mr Thomson; more especially, as, from all we have seen and heard of him, we had been led to form the most favourable estimate of his character, both as a man and a minister of the Gospel. We had, indeed, no acquaintance with him till settled in Dumfries as minister of St Mary's, and are, therefore, not entitled to speak of his earlier history from personal knowledge; but, from what his college acquaintances had informed us of his gentle and unaffected manners, piety, conscientiousness, and moral worth, diligent application to his theological studies, and the success attending his labours as assistant at Riccarton,* and missionary in Dundee, we were quite prepared to think well of him, and we are perfectly sure every member of St Mary's congregation will concur with us that he was willing to spend and be spent in his Master's service. Though we had not the pleasure of being one of his most intimate acquaintances, we soon saw enough to convince us that he was a truly estimable young man, and worthy of high esteem for his work's sake. He had about him no forward self-sufficiency, no assumed gravity, no affected self-righteous superiority. Sincerely pious, pure in morals, plain in manners, kind in heart, you saw at once what he was, and treated him as worthy of your confidence and love. He was most solicitous to bring his congregation and his parish under a good system of religious discipline; and, by the institution of Sabbath-schools and preaching-stations, was apparently in the fair way of accomplishing much good. He seemed, indeed, never weary of well-doing, but was constantly going about, day after day, discharging the ministry he had received, and taking account of his flock. In the work of visiting from house to house he seemed to excel, and so gained upon the affections of the people, that we are not sure but he was as great a favourite with them in the closet as in the pulpit. But, indeed, as an illustrious divine has said, the clergyman who goes to a poor man's house goes to his heart. We have understood, however, that, notwithstanding his growing popularity, the deep feeling of ministerial responsibility was taking such a firm hold of Mr Thomson's mind, as to occasion great anxiety and materially to affect his bodily health. Too many devoted young men, we fear, thus fall victims in the cause over which their Master has appointed them. Mr Thomson was, in all respects, giving general satisfaction to his people; and though they were not requiring of him exertions which his physical frame was unable to undergo; it is much to be regretted that, to benefit them, his own health should have been to any extent the sacrifice. He has at last found rest in the grave. We trust that those for whom he laboured with so great fidelity will often repair to that grave, and there ponder on his kindly ministrations among them. He is dead, but his exhortations and advices will, we trust, continue to speak to them for many a long year. Of Mr Thomson's appearances in the pulpit we had also a highly favourable opinion. Neither his manner nor voice certainly were good, and with strangers were at first felt to be disagreeable; but with his regular hearers this feeling soon passed away, and the peculiar cadence in his voice, perhaps from its association with single-hearted sincerity, became to them positively pleasing. We always thought highly of his prayers, as at once simple, comprehensive, and devout. His lectures and discourses, without having about them any pretensions to original thought, were at once edifying and instructive. He seemed to be most felicitous in the choice of his subjects, and in his illustrations equally so. He was, obviously, a most respectable scholar, had studied theology as a science, was intimately acquainted with the works of several of the old divines—with quotations from whom, and the fathers, he occasionally, to the delight and gratification of his hearers, garnished his own discourses. Indeed, he was fast rising into popularity with all classes of his congregation—a most difficult attainment certainly to a mixed audience, but one for which he seemed peculiarly fitted; and of all the candidates, he was soon felt to be best fitted for the charge. Alas! his career of usefulness in the Christian vineyard has been early brought to a close. Mental anxiety, combined with physical exhaustion, had, we apprehend, predisposed him to the attack of the malignant fever that brought him to a premature grave. He has left a widowed mother and an affectionate sister to bewail his decease. May the mother be soothed with the hope that her son is not "lost, but gone before!" May the sister put her trust in the Almighty Being, who sticketh closer than a brother! May the bereaved congregation that, even in the delirium of fever, was ever uppermost in his thoughts, and the burden of his prayers,* ere long be blessed by the great Head of the Church with a faithful, devoted, and worthy successor, to carry on the good work he had so auspiciously begun!

* We regret exceedingly that, through some misapprehension, an erroneous statement occurs in the Sketch of Mr Thomson's life, which forms the concluding part of Mr Crawford's Sermon, inserted some weeks ago in our pages. We are requested to state, on authority, that Mr Thomson did not return any money which he received while at Riccarton, or for ministering there, to the family of the late minister, whose circumstances rendered such kindness altogether unnecessary.—Ep. of the S. C. H.

PART IV.

THE PYRAMIDS.

WHO has not at times been so overcome by accounts of the "Eternal Pyramids," as to desire to be left alone to lose himself in a reverie of contemplation and wonder? We have read of travellers, who, when they first beheld these enormous piles indenting their forms on the clear blue sky, declared that for some time they "remained motionless"—that, on recovering from the primary sensation, their "enthusiasm amounted almost to madness, and they shouted applause to the magnificent spectacle!" We were therefore prepared, and really expected to be astonished. Soon after the dawn of a glorious morn, while passing the point where the Delta commences, a few miles below Cairo, by the separation of the stream into its two main branches, we first beheld, at a considerable distance to the right, the peaks of the two great Pyramids of Ghizeh shooting up, Parnassus-like, from an apparently common body. As we approached more nearly opposite, the gap or opening between them began to widen and descend, till at last they presented themselves from base to summit as two distinct and independent fabrics. There being nothing in two sharp peaks, shining like fiery wedges in the full radiance of the rising sun, to excite unwonted surprise, we still waited in earnest expectation of the uprising of a sensation of deepest wonder. At length the naked base of the Libyan rock appeared; upon it the great Pyramids stood out fully disclosed to view:—and yet no emotion whatever of the anticipated astonishment! On the contrary, we felt an almost resistless propensity to give way to that opposite emotion of derision and contempt which is ever apt to spring up, when it is discovered or imagined that one has been made the unconscious dupe of trick and delusive artifice. We neither experienced, nor could experience any feeling or sentiment of wonder whatsoever. Disappointed at our own disappointment, we could only be astonished to think what others, standing where we were, and placed as strangers in precisely similar circumstances, could possibly have found to be astonished at. What could be the cause of so unexpected a result? It seemed to be this. From the vast breadth of the base, compared with the altitude of the rapidly tapering summit, and from the entire absence of adjacent objects of known dimensions, whereby to measure them, the elevation appeared to the eye, at the distance of a few miles, exceedingly diminutive. Many glass-works in Great Britain, at about the same distance, have struck our eyes as being alike lofty and magnificent. Then, again, their embrowned sun-burnt aspect so much resembled the sterile sand of the desert; they looked so plain, so bare, so smooth, so meaningless from top to bottom—without doorway, or window, or arch, or colonnade, or turret, or spire, or dome, or gilded pinnacle, or any other wonted external symbol which could convey an impression of wisdom, skill, or design; beauty, proportion, or utility—that an isolated fragment of rock, or conical mound of earth, or artificial cairn of stones on the crest of a mountain ridge, has often attracted and far more powerfully rivetted our attention.

Nevertheless, it was impossible to follow the first impulse, and abruptly turn away from monuments which have excited the admiration of every Egyptian traveller from Herodotus to Belzoni, and of every Egyptian conqueror from Alexander to Napoleon—monuments, which have been alternately represented as royal sepulchres, astronomical observatories, or fire-temples—monuments, therefore, whose construction, form, and internal repositories, might well be supposed capable of revealing a few of the secrets of primitive art, somewhat of the progress of early science, and not a little of the character and migrations of the most ancient elemental and mythologic worship. Hence we determined on a closer inspection. Accordingly, accompanied with a few friends, we started from Cairo about noon; passed the palace and pleasure grounds of Ibrahim Pasha, bestud with canals and ponds, too often, at that season, mere reservoirs of stagnant greenish water, and trees powdered over with perpetual dust; crossed the river close by the island of Rhodah, in which is preserved the famous Nilometer or instrument for marking the progress and height of the annual inundation, and the loamy surface of which, under the direction of two Scotsmen, in the service of the Pasha, has been converted into the most beautiful garden in Egypt; and, finally, towards evening reached the Pyramids of Ghizeh, on the elevated ridge of the rocky boundary of the Libyan Desert, distant about ten miles from Grand Cairo. In traversing the seven or eight miles of fertile field between the river and the sterile margin of the desert, these mighty pyramidal piles were throughout full in view. Yet to the eye they seemed to undergo no change. When actually within a few hundred yards of us, they did not seem one whit larger than they appeared from the citadel of Cairo. The most enthusiastic admirer of the Pyramids amongst us—who constantly raved about them in somewhat of the spirit and style of romance, and who to the last fully expected to be overwhelmed with a sense of the wonderful and sublime as he approached them—was now forced, in the bitterness of regret, to exclaim, "Well, I must confess that I am sadly disappointed." And so singular was the optical illusion as to their real size, that it was not till we came up to the very base of the Great Pyramid, walked round it, measuring the number of paces and keeping an account of the time;—it was not till we handled the large blocks, averaging three or four feet square, of regular super-imposed layers of which the pile was composed, and looking up, saw them gradually diminish into the size of bricks, and finally dwindle away into the size of marble balls;—it was not till we had undergone the real toil and labour of the ascent, and standing on the summit, saw how the largest tumuli beneath had shrunk into mole-hills;—it was not till after all this personal experience, that, moving a few paces from the base and casting our eyes fixedly along the steep acclivity, we were in any proportionate degree impressed with a sense of its real magnitude.

As the interior must be visited by torchlight, we resolved, though the shadows of evening had closed around us, to enter the great Pyramid. With the assistance of some attendant Arabs, we reached the opening at the north side, at the elevation of forty feet above the base, resembling the mouth of a cave scooped out of the solid rock. In a bending and painfully constrained attitude we proceeded along the low, narrow, and cheerless passages—in directions, ascending, descending, or horizontal—half suffocated with dust, smoke and heat. We then visited the principal chambers—usually styled, the king's and queen's. In none of these, with the exception of a single sarcophagus, is aught to be found but bare and blackened walls—the largest not exceeding eighteen feet in height, eighteen in breadth, and thirty-six in length. Is this all which can be exhibited by the interior of a pile which some of its admirers have pronounced "the most sublime, most wonderful, and most stupendous of all fabrics"—"the most ancient and yet most mighty monument of man's power and pride?"—was the first involuntary exclamation, when, restored to the natural upright posture, and fixed in the centre of the king's chamber, we looked round on its emptied sarcophagus and dark naked wall! Why, there is not in the British empire a single mine of any note that may not boast of passages and chambers, which display vastly more skill, ingenuity, and even taste in the excavation of them! To stand in the centre of the great Pyramid and in the centre of St Paul's;—what a contrast! The emotions generated in the former position are as mean and Tartarean, as those generated in the latter are celestial and sublime.

Wearied, fatigued, and disappointed, we retired to enjoy, if possible, two or three hours' slumber in one of the smaller tombs quarried out of the face of the contiguous rock—thus converting into a chamber of real repose for the living, that which three thousand years ago was designed as the abode of imaginary repose for the dead, and causing a receptacle, which embodied in its professed design, the sentiment of an ignorant superstitious age, to resound for once with the reading of the word of life, and the voice of prayer and praise to Jehovah, Lord of Hosts!

By break of day we hastened from our rocky dormitory to the apex of the Great Pyramid, and there witnessed the first rays of the sun, as they glittered over the domes and minarets of Cairo. The general view, making allowance for our relative position on the opposite side of the vale, was much the same as from the citadel of Saladin. In the one, as well as the other, the desert—the desert—was the universal boundary!—the desert, so happily symbolized, as "an immense ocean of sand, like the real ocean with its flux and reflux; its caravans which cleave it like navies; its dromedaries which furrow it like boats; and its simoons which agitate it like hurricanes." The narrow valley of the Nile winded through this ocean of savage harca-ness, like a living stream of beauty and fertility. Between it and its desert boundary there was not contrast merely, but contrast so violent as to produce a painful sense of the incongruous or unnatural. The inquiry was forced upon us, How came fields of such emerald green to be so fringed and inwoven with the waste howling wilderness, that between fertility the most charming, and sterility the most frightful, there is not any where the measurable fraction of a single footstep? In other lands, the rich verdure of the mead, and noble majesty of the forest, are imperceptibly succeeded by the more stunted yet not unpleasant copse and herbage of the upland moor or rising acclivity,—and these again by the ferns, and the lichens, and the mosses which delight to feather the brow of the mountain, before it is surmounted by its naked cloud-capp'd peak. But here, between loveliness the most exuberant and deformity the most barren, there is no transition at all. The feeling excited by so singular a juxtaposition was somewhat akin—comparing small things with great, to that which must be experienced were one to behold the still gorgeous heart of the richest Cashmerian shawl in close contact and inseparable union with a broad and ample border, now all tawdry and tattered, discoloured and bespattered with mud!

As to the Pyramid itself, after having walked round it, surveyed it from every point of view, explored the interior, and stood on the summit, the only impression which we could derive from it, was that of magnitude—mere magnitude—the magnitude of so vast an artificial accumulation of inert matter. Stationed on that proud summit on which, doubtless, once stood Herodotus, the father of History, and Alexander, the Conqueror of the world, and many a sage and hero since, some of whose names are roughly graven on the uppermost flags, in order to immortalize their arduous visit—the spontaneous musings of our inner man could not but run in a somewhat moralizing channel. Is this, thought we, the very pile which has been often pronounced “the greatest and most indestructible monument of human power?” As to its alleged indestructibility, whether relative or absolute, that is an idle and fallacious boast. Some of the more ancient Pyramids to the south have now been actually turned into masses of dust and rubbish. And this one, perhaps the most modern of them all, exhibits the most indubitable symptoms of gradual decay. The steps, of a foot or a foot and a half wide, formed by the receding tiers or layers of calcareous stone in the upward ascent, are every where mouldering into decay;—and this too, in a climate like that of Egypt, where there is neither rain nor frost! so that, from the steps being partly worn away, and partly blocked up with the crumbling materials from above, the ascent, except along one or two tracks which are kept clear of loosened fragments, is no longer practicable. What then becomes of man's vain boast of indestructibility? Even when favoured with the most unvarying climate in the world, the great Pyramid proves by its scarred and shattered sides, that it is no more proof against ultimate dissolution than frail man himself. And if it had been reared either in India, with its deluges of rain and subsequent burning heat; or in Britain, with its melting snows and subsequent hardening frost, it would assuredly have been rent into pieces, or turned into a pile of ruins, ages ago! As to its magnitude, that, compared with most other works of man, is incontestible. But then, even in this respect, is it not rivalled by the great wall of China, which, with its massy towers, stretches uninterruptedly across valleys, and rivers, and mountains to the extent of fifteen hundred miles! or, by the great Canal of China, which, for six hundred miles, has been forced through the mightiest obstacles, often considerably raised by the most stupendous walls and embankments above the level of lakes and marshes which it is made to traverse, and finally opening into the Yellow Sea with a breadth of a thousand feet! And if, in point of mere magnitude, it is rivalled, if not out-rivalled by other products of human power, how utterly poor and insignificant, compared with the works of God! Compare in point of magnitude, this greatest of the Pyramids with Ben Nevis of the Grampians, Mount Blanc of the Alps, Chimborazo of the Andes, Dhwalagiri of the Himalaya!—with the terrestrial globe itself!—with sun, moon, and stars! In the comparison, or rather contrast, surely man's vauntful pride ought for once to be changed into adoring humility. And then, what is man's power at best, but the communicated ability of piling up a heap of stones from pre-existing matter? Contrast this with the underived creative power which summoned into being man himself, and the matter on which he operates, out of the barren womb of nothing!—and surely, on the topmost height of the greatest of the Pyramids, where infidelity has often found an argument to exalt man at the expense of the Creator; surely there, beyond all other spots, may new and decisive and cumulative arguments be found for exalting the Creator over the prostrated pretensions of his vain, and feeble, and sinful creature—man!

Again, is this, thought we, the very pile which has been often pronounced one of the mightiest monuments of “mechanical genius and architectural skill?” Why, as a manifestation of those attributes of superior intelligence, it no more admits of being compared with the dome of St Paul's, than the latter with the spangled vault of heaven! Here, there is nothing whatever to show that aught was to be solved, save the simple problem: In what form may the largest possible aggregate of square stones be piled up in one nearly solid mass, so as to prove most stable—resisting alike the encroachments of man and the inroads of the elements? Such, all but demonstrably, having been the sole problem, the conception of some species of the Pyramidal form was inevitable. Set a child to raise the highest and most stable pile with its wooden bricks, and it stumbles almost instinctively on the general form of a Pyramid. Compare, then, in point of expansive reach and power, the mind of the architect which conceived the form of the great Pyramid and its few dark narrow passages and dungeon-like chambers, with the mind of him who conceived the ideal model of St Paul's, including an almost boundless multiplicity and yet noble harmony in the adaptations, proportions, and uses of all its parts! Compare the mechanical genius necessary for the execution of the one and of the other. In constructing the dome of St Paul's, the raising of the solid materials to so great a height, was that part of the operation which demanded by far the least display of the requisite architectural or designing skill. In constructing a pyramid, the raising of stones, of from two to four feet square, along the solid and immovable side of the inclined plane supplied on every side by the portion previously fabricated, demanded not merely the highest, but almost the only display of the requisite architectural and designing skill. In the former case, mere brute force could achieve little or nothing:—in the latter case, mere brute force, assisted by the simplest and the rudest of mechanical agencies;—the lever, the inclined plane, and the pulley, was really all which could be required. But why attempt to reduce the Pyramids to their proper level, by a comparison with transcendently nobler monuments of man's designing intelligence? Behold at their very base, how they are confronted and out-rivalled by the instinct of an insect. There, rise the hillocky nests of the lion-ant, which, after careful examination, led a celebrated naturalist to exclaim, "All the architecture, magnificence and expense that shine in the excellent pyramids, cannot give a contemplator of nature such high ideas as are excited by the art of these little creatures." And if even in one of the minutest of dumb irrational the great Creator can plant so admirable an instinct—out-rivalling the top-most flower of human invention—oh, how ought vain man to shrink into his own inherent nothingness, in view of the inexhaustible resources of creative intelligence!

Once more, Is this, thought we, the greatest of those very piles which have for ages filled the world with learned dissertations respecting their origin and design? Who, then, could well escape the gregarious tendency to follow the leaders in the realm of literature? But yesterday our mind was brimful of theories on the subject. Where are these now? Alas, for the Ithuriel touch of experience! they are wholly vanished. What fanciful chimeras have not ingenious imaginative men been led to substitute for sober realities? At one time, have these been represented as "disguised fortresses" for the concealment of treasure; or "oracular shrines," for the exhibition of "acoustic phenomena" and other priestly jugglery. At another, they have risen into magnificent fire-temples or astronomical observatories. Then followed the elaborated dissertation on the wealth, the hierophancy, the mythology, or the science of the ancient world. What laborious trifling! That these were ever treasure-citadels or caverns for priestly trickeries, is utterly unfounded in history, and wholly contradicted by the form and structure of the fabrics themselves. That they could ever have been designed for fire-altars or astronomical edifices, involves a visible physical impossibility. On either of these latter suppositions, the summits must have been uniformly flat and uniformly accessible. Now, the direct contrary of this is the real fact. When finished, all the Pyramids terminated in a sharp culminating point or apex; and some of them so terminate to this day. And those which do not, such as the Great Pyramid, bear evidence that their tops have been violently dislocated and thrown down. Moreover, when finished, the entire surface of the receding steps was covered over with a smooth casing of flat stone-slabs. The casing of some of them, in whole or in part, such as that of the upper quarter of the Second Pyramid, close at hand, is still perfectly entire, and its apex sharp-pointed. So that unless the fire-worshippers and the astronomers of those days could climb up like lizards;

or, like the fabled geni of the middle ages, could con-
 sociate, as on the point of a needle, these peaks were physically unfitted for any of their operations! Whence, then, the origin of such fanciful hypotheses at all? One of the chief reasons for supposing them to have been fire-temples is, their pyramidal form, which somewhat resembles that of burning flame! By indulgence in such or similar fancies, how many strange ends have these Pyramids been made to serve! We have read of their having been designed to represent the soul, which is of "a fiery nature, and adherent to the body as a Pyramid doth to the basis, or as fire doth to the fuel;"—or, the great cycle of thirty-six thousand years; since a Pyramid, "the top of it standing fixed, and the base being moved about, would describe a circle, and the whole body of it a cone;"—or, the nature of things; because, "as a Pyramid, having its beginning from a point at the top, is by degrees dilated on all parts, so the nature of all things proceeding from one fountain and beginning, viz., from God the chief workmaster, is diffused into various kinds and species, all which it conjoins to that beginning and point, from whence every thing issues and flows;"—or the "first and most simple of mathematical bodies;"—or "the mysteries of pyramidal numbers;"—or "the emission of rays from luminous bodies;"—or "the emanation of sensible species from their objects!" But where are such frivolous far-fetched fancies to terminate? The truth is, that the pyramidal form must have been chosen, for the simplest and best of all reasons, viz., that, owing to its gradual contraction from the very bottom towards the top, and consequent decrease of its own down-bearing weight, as well as diminished liability to cracks and rents, this form is by far the most stable and permanent. As to the supposed astronomical design, one of the principal reasons for the opinion is founded on the direction of the sides, which happen to be turned towards the four cardinal points! If a ground of argument so utterly futile be admitted, there is not an illiterate mountaineer in the Highlands of Scotland who might not be proved an accomplished astronomer, and his cottage an astronomical observatory—since, if he has a freedom of choice, he is sure to erect his hut fronting the sun at right angles, when on the meridian of noon—the sides of his humble abode being thus as exactly turned towards the four cardinal points, as the Pyramids of Egypt! Besides, is it not one main object of the astronomer to secure, if possible, a clear unobstructed horizon? Now here, on the top of the Great Pyramid, a considerable portion of the sky is most gratuitously shut out of view by the second and other smaller ones. How much more must large portions of the heavens be concealed from the summits of the smaller, even if accessible, by the needless intervention of the larger? Altogether, there is not only no probable evidence in favour, but very positive evidence in disproof, of the Hierophantic, Sabian, Astronomical, and other similar supposed origin and ends of the Pyramids.

A TRADITION OF THE TIMES OF THE MARTYRS.

BY THE LATE REV. EDWARD IRVING, A. M.

THESE is nothing, my dear friend, for which I envy former times more than for this, that their information was conveyed from one to another so much by word of mouth, and so little by written letters and printed books. For though the report might chance to take a fashion and a mould from the character of the reporter, still it was the fashion and the mould of a living, feeling, acting man; a friend, haply a father, haply a venerable ancestor, haply the living chronicler of the country round. The information thus acquired lives embalmed in the most precious associations which bind youth to age—inexperienced ignorant youth—to wise and narrative old age. And to my heart, much exercised in early years with such traditional memorials of the pious fathers of our brave and religious land, I know not whether it be more pleasant to look back upon the ready good-will, the heartfelt gladness, with which the venerable sires and mothers of our dales consented to open the mystery of past times—the story of ruined halls, the fates of decayed families, the hardships and mortal trials of persecuted saints and martyrs; or to remember the deep hold which their words took, and the awful impression which they made, upon us whom they favoured with their tale. Of the many traditions which I have thus received, I select for your use one of the most pious and instructive, as well as the most romantic and poetical. For that, while I prize you as a poet, I esteem you as an upright and worthy man.* Now, I have such a reverence for the traditions of past times, that you may depend upon my faith as a Christian man and a minister, that I have invented nothing, and altered nothing, in what I am about to relate, whether as to the manner of my receiving the story, or as to the story itself.

A branch of my mother's family who lived in Nithsdale, and whom you knew well as distinguished amongst the clergy of that district for faithfulness, had cultivated the most intimate brotherhood with another family, likewise of the Scottish clergy, who, when the father died, betook themselves to Glasgow, where the blessing of God continued to rest upon the widow and the fatherless. When about to repair to that city, to serve our distinguished countryman, my dear and honoured master, Dr Chalmers, I received a charge from my mother's aunt, now with the Lord, not to fail to pay my respects to the old lady and her children, of whom I had seen the only daughter, when on a visit to our part of the country. Thus intrusted with the precious charge of an old and faithful family friendship, and with this also for my only introduction, I proceeded to the house of the old lady, and inquired for her daughter. The servant who admitted me, mistaking my inquiry as if it had been for the old lady herself, showed me into a large apartment; and deeming, I suppose, that I was well acquainted with her mistress, she shut the door and went away. When I looked around, expecting some one to come forward to receive me, I saw no one but a venerable old woman, seated at the further end of the room, who neither spoke nor removed from her seat, but sat still looking at her work, as if the door had not opened, and no one had entered; of which, indeed, I afterwards found she was not conscious, from her great infirmity of deafness. I had, therefore, time to observe and contemplate the very picturesque and touching figure which was before me. She sat at her spinning-wheel, all dressed in black velvet, with a pure white cap upon her head, an ancient plaited ruff about her neck, and white ruffles round her wrists, from under which appeared her withered hands, busily employed in drawing the thread, which her eyesight was too feeble to discern. For, as I had now drawn near, I observed that her spinning-wheel was of the upright construction, having no heck, but a moveable eye which was carried along the pirn by a heart-motion. She afterwards told me that it had been constructed on purpose to accommodate her blindness, under the direction of her son, a gentleman in high office in London: for she had so much difficulty in reading, and was so dull of hearing, that it was a great relief to her solitude to employ herself with a spinning-wheel, which also preserved her habits of early industry, and made her feel that she was not altogether useless in the world. I felt too much reverence for this venerable relic of a former generation that was now before me, to stand by curiously perusing, though I was too much impressed immediately to speak, besides feeling a little embarrassed how I should make my approach to a stranger for whom I instinctively felt so much reverence, and with whom I might find it so difficult to communicate. Having approached close up to her person, which remained still unmoved, I bent down my head to her ear, and spoke to her in a loud and slow voice, telling her not to be alarmed at the sight of a stranger, of whose presence she seemed to be utterly unconscious, for that I was the friend of one near and dear to her. I know not whether it was from her being accustomed to be thus approached and spoken to, in consequence of her infirmity of sight and hearing, but she was less surprised than I had expected, and relieved me from my embarrassment by desiring me to sit down beside her; so I sat down, and told her of her ancient and true friends, whose remembrances and respects, thus delivered, she seemed highly to prize; and as I had touched upon a chord which was very sweet to her memory, she began to talk of her departed husband, and of my departed grand-uncle, who had been long co-presbyters and fast brethren, and had together fought the battles of the Kirk. I loved the theme, and love it still; and, finding what a clear memory and fine feeling of ancient time she was endowed withal, I was delighted to follow her narratives, as she ascended from age to age, so far as her memory could reach. When she found that I had so much pleasure in her recollections of former times, she said that she would tell me a story of a still older date, which her father had oft told her, and in which he was not a little concerned. So, pushing her wheel a little away from her, and turning her face round towards me, for hitherto, for the convenience of my speaking into her ear, she had looked towards her wheel, she began and told me the following history, of which I took a faithful record in my memory, and have oft told it since to pious and well-disposed people, though never till this hour have I committed any part of it to paper. I shall not attempt to recall her manner or expressions, but simply recall the very remarkable events of Divine Providence which she related to me.

After the restoration of Charles the Second, when the Presbyterian clergy of Scotland were required to conform to the moderate Episcopacy which he sought to introduce, the faithful ministers of the Kirk were contented, with their wives and children, to forego house and hall, and to tear themselves from their godly people, rather than suffer the civil power to bring guilt upon its own head, and wrath upon the land, by daring, like Uzziah, to enter into the sanctuary of the Church, and intermeddle with its government and discipline. The first who suffered in this contending for Christ's royal office in his house, was James Guthrie, professor of divinity in the University of Edinburgh. He was the first of that time who was honoured with the martyr's crown; and having witnessed his good confession unto the death, his head, according to the barbarous custom of those evil days, was placed upon a pole over one of the ports of the city of Edinburgh, called the West Port, which lies immediately under the guns of the Castle, and looks towards the south and west, the quarter of Scotland where the Church ever rallied her distressed affairs. And, at the same time, a proclamation was made at the Cross, and other high places of the city, forbidding any one, under peril of instant destruction from the Castle, to remove that head of a rebel and traitor to the king. The body was given to his sorrowful kindred, amongst whom was a youth, his nephew, of great piety and devotedness to the good cause of Christ and his Church, of strong, and deep, and tender affection to his uncle, in whose house he had lived, and under whose care he had studied until he was now ripe for the ministerial office, and might ere this have been planted in the vineyard, but for the high and odious hand with which ungodly power and prelatical pride were carrying it in every quarter of poor suffering Scotland. This youth, his heart big with grief to see his uncle's headless trunk, vowed a vow in the presence of God and his own conscience, that he would, in spite of wicked men, take down from the ignominious gate his uncle's reverend head, and bury it beside his body. Full of this purpose, and without communicating it to any one, he went his way, at high noon, and climbed the city wall, and from beneath the guns of the Castle, in broad daylight, he took down his uncle's head, wrapped it in a linen napkin, and carried it away with him; whether overawing by his intrepidity the garrison, or by his speed outstripping them, or whether protected by the people, or favoured by the special providence of God, my venerable narrator staid not to tell; but as he vowed he was honoured to perform, and in the same grave was the martyr's head buried with his body. Soon was it noised abroad what this devoted and fearless youth had done, who, regardless of his life, was disposed to walk abroad and at large as usual, and abide whatever revenge and violence might be permitted to do against him. But his kindred, and the steadfast friends of the distressed Church, perceiving from this heroic and holy act what such a youth might live to perform, set themselves by all means to conceal him from the public search, which was set on foot, and to save him from the high price which was placed upon his head. Finding this to be almost impossible, in the hotness of the search which the lord provost, zealous in the cause of prelacy, whereof he was a partisan, had set on foot, they sought to convey him beyond seas. This was not difficult at that time, when Scotland had become too hot for the people of the Lord to abide in, and many of her nobles and gentlemen found it better to leave their lands and habitations, and follow their religion in foreign parts, than by following it at home, to suffer fines, forfeitures, imprisonment, and death. These noble witnesses, by exile, for that cause for which the ministers and the people witnessed by death, were glad to find pious scholars or ministers who would accompany them as chaplains to their households and tutors to their children, and the name of Guthrie had already risen to such distinction in the service of Christ, and of his Church, that little difficulty was found in obtaining for the proscribed youth honourable shelter and occupation in a foreign land. But here, said the venerable matron, I should have told you that young Guthrie was knit to Edinburgh by a tie which made it more after his heart to abide in the face of threatening death, than to accept the protection of any noble family or the shelter of a foreign land. For the providence of God, to give in this youth a notable example of true faith as well as of high devotion, had fast knit his heart to a maiden of good degree and fervent piety, as the sequel of this sad history will prove, being no other than the only daughter of the lord provost of the city, who with such zeal and bitterness was seeking her lover's life. To this true love religion had been the guide and minister, as she was destined to prove the comforter; for the soul of this young maiden had been touched by the grace of God, and, abhorring the legal doctrines of the curates, she cast in her lot with the persecuted saints, and in the hiding-places from the wrath of man, where they worshipped God with their lives in their right hand, these two hearts grew together, as it were, under the immediate eye and influence of the Holy Spirit; and now that they were knit together in the bands of faithful love, they were called upon to sacrifice their dearest affections to the will of God. She, knowing her father's zeal and speed to serve the cruel edicts of the reigning powers, was not only content to part with the proscribed youth, but anxious to hasten his escape from the danger to which he was continually exposed from her father's diligent search; and he, though very loath to leave his heart's desire under the sole authority of a father who sought his life and persecuted the saints of God, was fain at length to yield to the remonstrances of all his friends, and become an exile from his native land. Yet did these pious lovers not part from each other until they had plighted their mutual truth to be for one another while they were spared upon this earth, and to fulfil that vow by holy wedlock, if Providence should bless them to meet in better days. And so they parted, never to meet again in this world of suffering and sorrow.

All this passed unknown to her father, and, indeed, hardly known to herself; for the events of the uncle's martyrdom, and the nephew's piety and proscription, had awakened the maiden's heart to the knowledge of an affection whose strength she had not dreamed of; and all at once, setting her father, whom next to God she honoured, in direct hostility to him whom more than all men she loved; there was neither time nor room, nor even possibility, to give heed to any other thought, than how she might prevent the man whom most she honoured from slaying the man whom most she loved. Fearful predicament for one so young and uncounselled, but a more fearful predicament was reserved for her.

She was her father's only child, and he was a widower; so that all his affections and hopes centred in her alone. Her fear of God made her mind beautiful, and her walk and conversation as becometh godliness. Her father, also, bore himself tenderly towards her predilections for the persecuted preachers, thinking thereby the more easily to win her over to his views; not finding in his heart to exercise harsh authority over such a child. Sore, sore was her heart as she thought on her exiled lover and her affectionate father, who lay in her heart together, and yet she must not speak their names together; than which there is no trial more severe to a true and tender mind. To sit beside her father, night after night, and not dare mention the name of him over whom she brooded the livelong day, was both a great trial, and seemed likewise to her pure conscience as a great deception. But aye she hoped for better days, and found her refuge in faith and trust upon a good and gracious Providence. But Providence, though good and gracious unto all who put their trust therein, is oft pleased to try the people of the Lord, and make them perfect through suffering, —which truly befell this faithful but much tried lady.

Her father, seeing the hopes of his family centred in his only daughter, naturally longed to see her united to some honourable and worthy man; which, above all things, she feared and sought to prevent, well knowing that the man to whom she had betrothed herself could not be he. Her father's official rank and good estate made her hand to be sought by young men of high family, with whom he would have been glad to see her united; but her own disinclination, to the cause of which he must remain a stranger, continually stood in the way, until at length what at the first he respected as a woman's right, he came at length to treat as a child's perverseness; and being accustomed to obedience, as the companion and colleague of arbitrary men, leagued in the bad resolution of bowing a nation's will from the service of God, he was tender upon the point of his authority, especially over a child whom he had so cherished in his bosom. At length, when his patience was well-nigh worn out, the eldest son of a noble family paid his court to the betrothed maiden, and her father resolved that he should not be gainsayed. When she saw that there was no escape from her father's stern and obstinate purpose, she resolved to lay before him the secret of her heart. Terrible was the struggle, for she dreaded her father's wrath; and yet at times she would hope from a father's kindness. But when he heard that she had given her affections to the man who had defied his authority and set at nought the proclamation of the State, his wrath knew no bounds. His dignity as chief magistrate, which had been braved by that young man; his religion, which had been contended against by him and his fathers; his prospect of allying his family to the nobles of the land; and, above all, the joy of heart which he had set upon his beautiful, his obedient, and his only child, arose together in his mind, and made him sternly resolve that she should not have for a husband the man of her own choice. It was in vain she pleaded a woman's right to remain unmarried if she pleased; it was in vain she pleaded a Christian woman's duty, not to violate her faith, nor yet to give her hand to one, while her will remained another's. When she found her father unrelenting, and that he would oblige her, upon her obedience, to marry the man of his choice, she felt that she had a duty to perform likewise unto him whom he would make her husband. But whether God would, in her case, teach unto all young maidens a lesson how they betrothed themselves without their fathers' consent, or whether he would show to betrothed maidens an example of true heartedness and faithfulness to their plighted troth, it was so ordered that this pious and dutiful child should find both a hard-hearted father and a hard-hearted husband, who vainly thought that their after kindness would atone for their present cruelty. But, alas! it fared to her and them as she had told them beforehand, that they were mingling poison in their cup, and together, a father and a husband, compassing her death. O that this tale of sorrow might prevent such deeds of stern authority and unrelenting wilfulness! This young woman, who had borne a lover's peril of death, and a lover's exile from his land, and hidden her sorrows in her breast, without a witness, through the strength of her faith, could not bear the unnatural state in which she now found herself placed, but pined away, without an earthly comforter, and without an earthly friend. Resignation to the will of God, and a conscience void of offence, bore her spirits up, and supported her constitution for the space of twelve months only, when she died, without a disease, of a blighted and withered heart; yet not until she had brought into this world of sorrow an infant daughter, to whom she left this legacy, written with her dying hand:—"I bequeath my infant daughter, so long as she is spared in this world, to the care of William Guthrie, if ever he should return to his native land; and I give him a charge before God, to bring up my child in the faith of her mother, for which I die a martyr, as he lives a banished man."

This, all this misery, had passed unknown to her faithful lover, who had no means of intercourse with his own land, and least of all with that house in it from which his death-warrant had issued, and vigilant search gone out against him. But shortly after these were consummated, a full opportunity was given to him and every brave-hearted exile, to take share in that great demonstration which was made by William of Orange for the Protestant cause in Britain. Without delay, William Guthrie hastened to Edinburgh, where all the faithful sufferers for the truth were now overwhelmed with joy. But for him, alas! there awaited in that place only sorrow upon sorrow. Sorrow, they say, will in a night cover the head of youth with the snows of age; sorrow, they say, will at once loose the silver cord of life, and break the golden pitcher at the fountain; and surely hardly less wonderful was the change wrought on William Guthrie's heart, which grew cold to the land of his fathers, and indifferent to the Church for which his fathers had suffered so much. For in his absence also, his cousin or brother, I wot not which, the persecuted minister of Fenwick, and the author of the "Trial of the Saving Interest in Christ," with other principal works of practical godliness, had been violently ejected from his parish, and died of sorrow for the suffering Church. Wherefore the youth said he would turn his back upon the cruel land for ever, and with his staff go forth and seek more genial heavens. They sought to divert his grief, but it was in vain. They sought to stir him up to exercise his high gift and calling of a minister, but it was in vain. His faculties were all absorbed in the greatness of his grief, and the vigour of his heart was gone. One thing only bound him to that cruel city—the charge he had received of the infant child, whom God spared only for a short season after his arrival, and then removed to himself. Upon this, true to his purpose, he took his staff in his hand and turned his face towards England, which hath often yielded shelter since, to many a Scotchman tossed in his own land with envious and cruel tempests, and by the way he turned in to the town of Dumfries, being desirous to take solemn leave of some of his kindred before leaving his native land for ever. His friends soon saw of what disease he was pining, and being men of feeling, they gave themselves to comfort and heal him. Being also men truly devoted to the Church, they grieved that one who had proved himself so faithful and true should thus be lost from her service. They meditated, therefore, how they might win him back unto God and to his duty, from this selfish grief which had overclouded all his judgment. But wisely hiding their intent, they seemed only to protract his visit by friendly and familiar attentions, taking him from place to place, to show him the monuments of those who, in the much persecuted dale of the Nith, had sealed their testimony with their blood; skillfully seeking to awaken the devotion of the martyr, that it might contend with the sorrow of the broken-hearted lover. And from day to day, as thus they endeavoured to solace and divert his grief, they would point out to him how, now that the Church had gotten rest, she was threatened with a hardly less grievous evil, arising out of the want of well-educated and well-principled ministers, who had been mostly cut off by martyrdom, imprisonment, or exile. And as they spake to him of these things, they would gently, as he could bear, press upon him their grief and disappointment that he, who was fitted by his learning and devotedness to be an example and a help to many, should thus surrender himself to unavailing grief, and forsake the Church which his fathers had loved unto the death. And being now removed from Edinburgh, the scene of his sufferings, the seat of business, and bustle, and hard-hearted men, and dwelling amongst the quiet scenes and noble recollections of his country, he felt a calm and repose of soul which made it pleasant to abide amongst his friends.

Now, in the neighbourhood of Dumfries, there is a parish called Irongray, and in the remote parts of this parish, is a sequestered hollow amongst the hills, looking towards the south and west, whence least danger came, but on every other side surrounded with summits which command the whole of Nithsdale, the foot of Annandale, and a great part of Galloway. In this hollow are to be seen at this day, nearly as they were used, tables and seats cut out of stone, at which the persecuted people of the country were wont to assemble from the face of their enemies, and meet their pastors, who came forth from their caves and dens of the earth to administer to them the precious memorials of the dying love of our Lord; for which they are called, to this day, the communion tables of Irongray. And as they were filled by one company after another, some were stationed upon the summits round about to keep watch against the approach of their persecutors. To these communion tables of Irongray would William Guthrie wander forth and meditate upon the days of old; and then there would come over his heart a questioning of his backwardness and opposition to the work of the Lord, like the voice which spake to Elias in the cleft of the rock of Sinai, saying, "What doest thou here, Elias?" Now, it so happened at that time, that the faithful people of Irongray were without a pastor, and God was preparing to give them one according to his own mind. Little wist William Guthrie why God permitted that darkening of His glory, and hiding of His face, in his soul. Little knew he for what end God had loosened him from Edinburgh, and from Angus, the seat of his fathers, driven him from his station, and "tossed him like a ball into a wide country." Little thought he wherefore he was turned aside from his heedless course, and drawn and kept for a season at Dumfries.

The people of Irongray, as I said, were, in the south, like the people of Fenwick in the west, a home and a rallying place unto the distressed of the Lord; and if aught under heaven, or in the Providence of God, could hallow a spot, which may not be until Jerusalem be rebuilt, and his feet stand upon the Mount of Olives, then would these communion tables of stone, from which so many saints, famishing saints, were fed with heavenly food, have hallowed the parish of Irongray. But though there may not be any consecrated places under this dispensation, there is a Providence, be assured, which extendeth itself even to the places where worthy and zealous acts have been done for the testimony of God and of his Christ. And in no way was this faithfulness, unto a well-deserving and much-enduring parish, shown more, than in that providence which drew this much tried and faithful youth to their borders. Haply moved thereto, and guided by the friends of the youth, who longed for his stay, the heads of the parish came and entreated him to become their pastor, offering him all affection and duty. Whereupon our worthy was much pressed in spirit, and sorely straitened how he should refuse, or how he should accept the entreaties of the people; and then it was that his heart said, "What art thou, foolish man, who settest thyself up against the providence of God? Hast thou suffered like Job, or like any of the cloud of witnesses? wilt thou leave that land unto which thou hast received thy commission to preach the Gospel? What would she thou mournest advise thee to do in this strait? How wouldst thou most honour and best please her whom thou believest to be a saint of God? Would it not be in caring for those with whom she preferred to cast in her lot, and unto whose society she bequeathed her child?" And thus, after sore strugglings between the righteousness of duty and the inclination of grief, between the obedience of the Head of the Church, and the idolatry of a departed saint, whom he loved as his own soul, he surrendered himself to the call of the heads of the parish, and was ordained over the flock. Yet, so far as nature was concerned, there was a blank in his heart which he preferred should remain a blank, rather than seek the fellowship of any other woman. Year passed over year, and found him mourning; for thirty years he continued to deny himself the greatest comfort and joy of human life, though drawn thereto by a true and tender heart, but after this long separation unto the memory of her who proved herself so faithful unto him, he at length yielded to the affections of the living and married a wife. "Of which marriage," said the venerable old mother who told me the history, "I am the fruit."

Such was the history of her father; after hearing which, you may well believe, my dear friend, I was little disposed to listen to any thing besides. My desire for traditions was swallowed up in deep sympathy with the wonderful narrative which I had heard; and I felt disposed to withdraw to my own reflections. But the worthy and venerable woman would not suffer me to depart until she had taken me to her own little apartment and shown me a small picture, but whether of her father or of her husband, who was minister of the neighbouring parish of Kirkmahoe, I cannot now recall to my remembrance. She also showed me the Bible on which she was wont to read, and told me it had been the Bible of a queen of England. I took my leave; and not many weeks after, I followed her body to the grave: so that this story, if it contain any moral instruction, may be said to be expired by the dying lips of one of the mothers of the Kirk of Scotland. Farewell, my dear friend! May the Lord make us worthy of our sires!

GOD OUR LEADER.

GUIDE us, O Thou great Jehovah!
Pilgrims through this barren land;
We are weak, but Thou art mighty,
Hold us with thy powerful hand;
Bread of heaven, feed us till we want no more.

Open thou the living fountain,
Whence the healing waters flow;
Let the fiery cloudy pillar
Lead us all our journey through;
Strong Deliverer, be thou still our strength and shield.

When we tread the verge of Jordan,
Bid our anxious fears subside:
Bear us through the swelling torrent—
Land us safe on Canaan's side:
Songs of praises we will ever give to Thee.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. C. T. E. RHENIUS, MISSIONARY IN SOUTH INDIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

In the beginning of 1824 Mr Rhenius, with part of his family, left Pallamcotta, on a visit to Madras; and he took occasion, at the same time, to pass over to Ceylon, where he felt much interested in the proceedings of the missionaries; who, though belonging to three different sects, were labouring with the utmost harmony in the Redeemer's cause. To a large and liberal mind such a sight was singularly pleasing. He returned home refreshed and invigorated, resolved to cherish more and more that truly catholic spirit which breathes in the prayer of the Redeemer, "That they all may be one." When he reached Madras, on his way to Pallamcotta, he had several meetings with the Translation Committee, in reference to his translation of Matthew's Gospel into Tamul. The General Committee, however, found fault with some passages, as being different from the English version. Both Mr Rhenius and the Translation Committee agreed in thinking that the originals ought to be the standard by which a translation was to be tested, and not any mere modern version, however excellent. This opinion is undoubtedly correct, and it is surprising that any body of men should ever have maintained a contrary doctrine. Unwilling, however, to retard the publication, Mr Rhenius left the matter entirely in the hands of the Committee.

.. We have already mentioned, that the King of Prussia, in consequence of a letter from Mr Rhenius, had been led to take a warm interest in the progress of the Gospel in foreign lands; and, to show the interest which he took in the good cause, he gave a sum of money for the support of a missionary student at the institution in Berlin. The individual whom his Majesty selected was one who has since distinguished himself as a most laborious and successful missionary to the Chinese. It is almost unnecessary to mention the name of the Rev. Charles Gutzlaff. For several years he maintained a correspondence with Mr Rhenius, whom he ever looked upon as the instrument in the hand of God of fulfilling his wish to become a missionary to the heathen.

It is a remarkable peculiarity in the mental character of the natives of India, that they excel in every thing connected with numbers and figures. Of this there have been many very remarkable instances. The following came under the observation of Mr Rhenius:—

"I lately witnessed a very remarkable instance of retentive memory in a young Brahman from Rannad. Three days ago a gentleman had written a sentence in English, (and the Brahman does not know English,) containing about thirty syllables. Each syllable was numbered; those numbers the Brahman was told, together with its syllable, skipping from three to twenty; and from twenty to six, and so forth. When all the syllables had been given, he could repeat the whole English sentence, word after word. We now wrote him a large English sentence, containing sixty-nine syllables, which were told him, not by words, but by syllables. Whilst this was going on, I wrote down a sentence in Hebrew, of fourteen syllables, intending to repeat it to him when he finished the former; but he proposed they should be given whilst the other was. I did so. The English and Hebrew syllables were told him alternately. Whilst this was going, he said he would repeat the sentence which had been given him three days ago. This he was asked, and he had not yet forgotten it. When the Hebrew was finished, he repeated the sentence, as if he was reading it out of a book. When the English sentence was finished, he repeated that also. This certainly indicated extraordinary retentiveness of memory. He ascribed it to a dream he had when a boy of nine years, since which he has been able to do such, and more wonderful things, with his memory. It shows, at least, the amazing power of the intellect; and we may justly conclude how great will be its expansion when it shall be freed from its earthly fetters. This faculty also is to the Creator's praise; and I endeavoured to impress this upon the young man's mind, warning him not to rely on the gift so as to think himself a favourite of Heaven, or on account of it entitled to bliss."

It has long been a subject of lamentation among Christians, that the British Government should openly and avowedly countenance idolatry in India. Of late years matters, in this respect, have been decidedly improving; and Mr Rhenius rejoiced in the step which Mr Monro, the collector of the Tinnevely district, had taken in advance of the Government at home, by discontinuing the practice of forcing men to draw the idol-car at the great festivals. This local regulation had a beneficial tendency, in leading the natives more readily to consider the claims of Christianity. To this happy effect Mr Rhenius thus alludes, in a statement of the progress of Christianity in the district which he and his colleague, Mr Schmid, forwarded to the Church Missionary Society, at the close of the year 1825:—

"Christian knowledge was thus spread throughout the country, and in about three months after, our young men were sent out as evangelists to the villages in which congregations had arisen, amounting to no fewer than ninety. This number has increased, and now (at the close of September) there are one hundred and twenty-five places, in which more than one thousand families are under Christian instruction.

"In bringing about such a change in men's minds, it would appear that the following causes have co-operated:—1st, The preaching of Christianity; 2d, The distribution of tracts; 3d, The intercourse of the heathen with the native Christians of the Tanjore mission; 4th, The attention which was given to the grievances of the Christians, both by ourselves and by the magistrate; 5th, The deliverance from various tasks which the people had to perform at the idolatrous festivals; 6th, The comparative order, cleanliness, and perhaps also prosperity, to which our Arullur congregation in particular was brought, in consequence of Christian instruction; 7th, The calamities of the times, such as cholera.

"The native Christians have hitherto received no favour, unless it be a favour to be regarded and protected as well as the heathen community. This was not the case in former years; and the heathen may possibly think it a peculiar favour now shown to the Christians by Mr Monro and the other gentlemen, when their grievances are duly attended to and relieved, and when they are restored to their rights and property, although all this is no more than justice.

"Thus have we come to a very interesting period. We would lean upon an Almighty arm for help, to give us understanding and wisdom, that we may advise, and guide, and instruct these congregations aright; so that their affections may be drawn closer to their Redeemer, and they may thus be enabled to overcome all the temptations and distresses of this life, and to mortify their evil passions."

Early in the year 1826, the foundation of a church within the mission-premises was laid. This erection was found to be necessary, in consequence of the increase of the congregation; and subscriptions were readily obtained from all quarters. While Mr Rhenius was rejoicing in the success with which the great Head of the Church was thus crowning his labours, his heart was saddened by the melancholy intelligence of the death of Bishop Heber. The excellent and devoted prelate was expected to arrive at Tinnevely, but, in the inscrutable dealings of divine Providence, he was not permitted to come farther than Trichinopoly, where he was cut off in the midst of his usefulness. The remarks of Mr Rhenius on this event are well worth transcribing, as displaying the fine spirit by which he was animated:—

"In reflecting on the death of this good man, I could not help thinking, in addition to the usual thoughts on similar occasions, that we put too much confidence in men, in those principally who are of high station in the world, as if by them, and not by meaner instruments, the Lord's cause could prosper. But the Scripture and this event both say, 'Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils.' Many have so expressed themselves as if the prosperity of the Gospel cause centred in the bishop. This ought not to be. I humbly think, that we should not have been visited by such heavy strokes did we but give up the spirit of party, and embrace every servant of Christ, of whatever denomination, as our fellow-labourer, and mutually exchange our services, according to the spirit of the Gospel; allowing others to differ without putting them, either privately or publicly, at a distance from us. In this I think we, as Churchmen, have hitherto failed. We have looked on Dissenters as not belonging to us,—as persons with whom we could not unite: we have thought that our Church ought to be chief in the land, our form should be every where adopted; and with all our profession, by way of compliment, that we have no objection to the labours of our Dissenting brethren, we still secretly wished they were not here at all, or at least that they should submit to us in our various opinions. Now, all this is not the spirit of Christ. Even supposing them to be really the weaker party, if we acknowledge them to be Christ's servants, why not embrace them as such, and labour together with them? Why stand on ceremony with them? Why hesitate to let them preach in our churches, and to preach in theirs? The Lord, I think, by passing events such as this, when he removes our most promising fellow-labourers, one after another, would teach us to get wiser, and yield more freely to the liberal, loving, humble spirit of the Gospel. May I improve it thus!"

We have already adverted to Mr Rhenius's views in regard to the principles on which a translation should be made, and differing, as these did, from the views of the Translation Committee, to whom his Tamul version of the New Testament had been referred, he thought it right to give his opinions to the world. He published, accordingly, a pamphlet, entitled, "An Essay on the Principles of Translating the Holy Scriptures; with Critical Remarks on Various Passages, particularly in reference to the Tamul Language." The principles laid down in this little tract are so excellent that we quote them readily, as forming admirable hints to all who are engaged in translating the Scriptures:—

"1. That the translation ought to be made from the original languages, and not merely from another version.

"2. The translation ought to be literal; but the idiom, both of the originals, and of the language into which they are translated, should be carefully attended to.

"3. In countries where there is so great a difference between the language of the learned and of the unlearned, as among the Hindus, the translation of the Bible ought to be made neither according to the style of the one, nor to that of the other; but the middle path should be kept between the two.

"4. Passages which have been obscurely or incorrectly rendered in former translations, should not be so rendered in new versions, if their sense can be more clearly made out upon just evidence."

The progress of the Tinnevely mission, under Mr Rhenius and his colleagues, was a source of heartfelt joy to Christians, both in India and at home. Individuals, however, were not wanting who attempted to throw out the most ungenerous aspersions upon the labours of these single-hearted missionaries. The editors of certain periodicals in Bengal, more especially, busied themselves in publishing unfounded statements in reference to the affairs of the mission. At length Mr Rhenius drew up a paper in reply to these calumnies, addressed to the Rev. Deocar Schmid, Calcutta. In the course of this paper some valuable remarks occur, which we would gladly quote, did our space permit; but we cannot refrain from giving a place to the following paragraph, showing the baneful influence which the shameful countenance given by the British Government to idolatry in India has upon the progress of Christianity among the natives. Mr Rhenius thus writes:—

"That the Brahmans and Sudras do not so readily come forward to profess Christianity, may, besides the barrier of caste before mentioned, be also accounted for in another way. In our conversations with them, they frequently ask, 'Why, then, does the Company maintain our idolatry, by annually giving us so much money for our feasts, and the maintenance of idols and their temples?' On this point the lower castes are not so much interested as the higher. Well may the heathen be surprised that a Christian Government, who have it among their Divine commands 'to flee from idolatry,' should thus maintain and uphold that abomination. And does this not prove a barrier to the acceptance of Christianity? We ardently wish that the time may come when our otherwise excellent Government will leave idolatry entirely to itself."

The paper from which this extract is made was transmitted to Calcutta, to be published in one or other of the religious periodicals; and, shortly after, Mr Rhenius wrote to the Corresponding Committee at Madras, stating the fact of their having prepared such a statement, and announcing that the manuscript would be sent for the perusal of the Committee. To their surprise, a letter arrived from the Committee, expressing their decided disapproval of what the missionaries had done, and requesting that, if it were possible, the publication of the document might be stopped. To this unexpected letter of rebuke, the missionaries made a firm but respectful reply. It was, no doubt, true that a regulation had been passed by the Committee, to the effect that no tract or pamphlet should be published by the missionaries, without the previous sanction of the Committee. But it ought to have been borne in mind, that against that regulation Mr Rhenius and his colleagues had from the beginning protested, for reasons which they had fully stated. As no objection had been offered to this protest, the missionaries were under the impression that the old rule was given up. In these circumstances, it is not at all surprising that Mr Rhenius, and his colleague Mr Schmid, conscious that they had acted from the best of motives, should have felt deeply the haughty and imperious language in which the letter of the Committee was couched.

The success which, by the Divine blessing, attended the labours of Mr Rhenius was truly refreshing to his heart. Much opposition was, no doubt, manifested by the heathen, but the instances of conversion, which were occasionally occurring, tended to strengthen his hands and encourage him in the good work. In his Journal for August 1828, the following interesting account is given of the last hours of a heathen convert:—

"This week, received information of the death of Stephen, who has for eight or nine years walked consistently as a Christian, labouring in his humble sphere to do all the good in his power. Though an adult he was unable to read, but learned by degrees, and recommended Christianity to others, both by his conduct and good conversation, enduring many afflictions from the heathen for Christ's sake. He was appointed, pro tempore, to go to a distant village in the north, to teach a number of heathens who had asked for instruction. There he caught the fever, which never left him. Many means were tried, but in vain. A few weeks ago he went to T—, and on the morning of the 22d he was called to join the blessed above. His brother Titus writes thus concerning the event:—"This day my elder brother, Stephen, died joyfully, believing in the Lord. When, before his death, his wife and friends were very sorrowful and weeping, he said, "You need not sorrow and weep for me. Neither my place nor rest is in this world. God has not made us for this world. Will you send me away, not with joy but with grief? Will you be the occasion of hindering and grieving me? and will you not leave me to pray to my Saviour, in whom I trust in this hour of death? Oh, let me alone!" and then he lifted up his eyes and prayed. He spoke often in similar language. On the day of his death, I asked him whether he would not take the medicine. He replied, "I shall shortly depart hence, therefore I need no medicine." When the last hour drew near, he called the people who were occupied about the house, saying, "Are you still busy? Come, I am going. Be you in readiness. Oh, my brother, my brother, my brother!" Then folding his hands, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and thus fell asleep."

In the absence of a regular chaplain at Pallamcotta, Messrs Rhenius and Schmid were requested by the Archdeacon of Madras to undertake the duties of that office. This speedily involved them in considerable difficulties. An officer of the corps stationed at the place applied to Mr Rhenius to baptize his illegitimate child, born of a Roman Catholic woman. This, of course, the conscientious missionary declined doing, until the father of the child expressed his contrition, and either married the wretched woman, or ceased to live in wickedness. The officer persisted in demanding baptism for his child. Mr Rhenius wrote to the Archdeacon for advice, when he was informed, in reply, that "except the father be excommunicated under the higher excommunication, the Church does not consider him a heathen man; and even then, his child does not forfeit the privileges of his descent, but himself alone." Such being the doctrine of the Church of England, in connection with which Mr Rhenius was officiating as acting chaplain, he had no alternative but to resign the office, which he accordingly did in the most respectful terms, and his resignation was accepted. Thus freed from the discharge of duties which involved much that was irksome, and, in fact, unprofitable, he found ample scope for his energies in the increased work of the mission. In the statement which he and his colleague drew up at the close of 1829, the number of baptized converts is represented as no fewer than nine hundred and eighty-four; and all those "under Christian instruction," as upwards of six thousand; and the number of the pupils attending their forty-three schools, as one thousand and eighty-four. When we take into account the persecutions from the heathen, the difficulties of caste, and many other obstacles to the progress of the Truth, we feel that this result was truly encouraging, and the missionaries had good reason to "thank God, and take courage." It is interesting to peruse the language in which Mr Robinson, then Archdeacon of Madras, expresses the effect which the labours of Mr Rhenius produced upon his mind. In describing a tour through a part of the Presidency, he thus writes:—

"While the people were assembling in the chapel, I had an opportunity of witnessing Mr Rhenius's method of addressing the heathen; we were walking round the splendid cloisters of the great pagoda of Varunnen, and were followed by many hundreds. His lively and perfectly native mode of address, as well as the fluency of his language, attracts them wonderfully. The Brahmans crowded around him with eagerness, and, as we stopped occasionally at an angle of the building, a question led to a remonstrance upon the folly of this stupendous idolatry, thus convicted and exposed by their own replies; till his remarks assumed gradually the form of a more general discourse, addressed to the multitude around, while the pillars, the sides of the tank, and the pavement of the cloister, were covered with eager listeners, who were hushed into the most breathless silence. He is bold, impressive, vivid, cheerful in his whole appearance, happy in his illustrations, and a master not only of their language, but of their feelings and views."

And not only did Mr Rhenius exert himself, with the most indefatigable industry and zeal, for the spiritual interests of the natives—wherever he could promote their temporal comfort, he spared no labour. In 1832, accordingly, when the district was visited with the accumulated calamities of drouth and famine, and the prevalence of cholera, we find him doing his utmost to alleviate the common distress. Under the severe pressure of duties to which he was thus subjected, it was no small relief to his mind that, although he had been for a time deprived of the assistance of Mr Schmid, who had removed for his health to the Nilgherries, he was now somewhat relieved by the arrival of two colleagues from Europe, and the addition of an ordained native missionary from a northern mission.

REPENTANCE:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN LONGMUIR, A. M., Minister of Mariners' Church, Aberdeen.

"But showed, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."—ACTS xvi. 20.

THE preacher who undertakes to discourse on repentance, labours under two disadvantages; for who considers himself ignorant of this doctrine, and what unrenewed heart does not shrink from this duty? But we consider the man who has not yet repented as really ignorant of this doctrine, and his aversion to this duty forms a reason for our more earnestly pressing it home to his conscience; and, in making this attempt, may the Holy Spirit render the preaching of the Word effectual to salvation!

Engaged in this great attempt, we follow in the steps of all those by whom God has been pleased to reveal his will to men. For by all the prophets, God testified against Israel, that they should turn from their evil ways, and keep his commandments. John, the connecting link between the prophets and the apostles, commenced his ministry in the wilderness, with "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." And when John was silenced in prison, and the King of prophets and apostles appeared, "he began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and afterwards declared, that he "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." When he was about to return to heaven, he commissioned his apostles to preach repentance and remission of sins, in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem; and after he had taken his place at the right hand of the Majesty on high, he was pleased to add another to their number, who tells us, in our text, that, in obedience to the heavenly vision, "he showed both to the Jews and Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."

Should it be asked, Who are the proper subjects of repentance? we would answer, Neither the angels in heaven, nor men in a state of innocence—for the tear of repentance never stains the cheek of holiness; nor those guilty spirits reserved in chains of darkness to the great judgment—for there can be no repentance where there is no love in the offender, and no hope of mercy in the offended. Sinners on earth, therefore, who have been cheered with the hope of forgiveness through the atoning blood of a crucified Redeemer, are the only proper subjects of genuine repentance.

I. These things being premised, we proceed to observe that, in true repentance there must be—

1. A conviction of sin; for it is contrary to nature to speak of men repenting before they are convinced of sin. But it is not every kind of conviction that leadeth to repentance; for, while there are many that confess that they are sinners, like the rest of the human race, yet they are still allied to those fools that make a mock of sin, and roll it as a sweet morsel under their tongue. But the convicted sinner considers sin as a most tremendous evil, and the only thing that God hates. He believes that it has brought the wrath of God upon his guilty head, and he dreads that it will associate him with unclean spirits in their everlasting woe. But these considerations by no means constitute the whole of a correct view of sin; for such views were entertained by Ahab, when dreadful calamities, both personal and relative, were denounced against him by the man of God. Conscience sanctioned the verdict, and imagination foresaw the wrath of God about to descend upon himself, and the dogs of the city and the fowls of the air ready to devour his hapless offspring. Then did he rend his clothes, cover his body with sackcloth, fast, and walk softly as a subject of genuine repentance; yet, after all this, we find him listening to false prophets, and perishing in that battle from which Micaiah had in vain endeavoured to dissuade him. Although, therefore, his repentance was sincere as far as it went, yet it wanted much to constitute it such a repentance as needeth not to be repented of. For the true penitent does not confine his attention merely to the awful consequences of sin; he sees sin itself as exceeding sinful, because it has been committed against the God who created him, and the Redeemer that purchased him with his precious blood, whose commandments he was doubly bound to obey, in testimony not only of his allegiance, but also of his love. Now, it was in this love that the repentance of Ahab was deficient; for he did not repent because he had offended God, but because he had incurred his wrath, and therefore his repentance was nothing more than that worldly sorrow that worketh death. It was this love that rendered the repentance of her that washed her

Saviour's feet with her tears so different from that of Israel's wicked King; and it was this love that led David, not to bewail the effects of his sin upon himself, but to exclaim before his God, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight;" and it is just when we thus view sin as done against God, that we have some adequate view of its heinous nature.

2. But the sinner thus convicted, will condemn himself. When natural conscience convicts a man of sin, he immediately shows his relationship to the first transgressor, by endeavouring to palliate his crimes; and he often pleads the strength of his corrupt passions in extenuation of his guilt, instead of seeing that they form a part of it. But the man whom the Spirit of grace convicts, neither pleads any extenuating circumstance, nor even desires to justify himself. Although he may not have been chargeable with outward violations of the Divine law, yet he sees that his observance of it did not proceed from love, and he is horrified at finding that his mind has been, in reality, enmity against God. It was under this feeling that David condemned himself, that God might be justified when he spoke and clear when he judged; and thus every one, who is truly convicted of sin, will be ready to confess that he is the chief of sinners, and to acknowledge that it would be just in God to appoint him his portion among the workers of iniquity.

3. But the true penitent will not only condemn himself, he will also be filled with sorrow on account of his sin. According to the very constitution of our nature, the heart experiences the bitterest remorse, when we are convinced of having offended our kindest Friend. This sorrow arises from the penitent's looking back on his past transgressions, the aggravations by which some of them are distinguished, and the length of time during which he has been yielding to an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God, and thus frustrating the very end for which he was created. But we must here distinguish the sorrow that accompanies a counterfeit repentance from that which flows from a broken and contrite heart. Look at that man stretched upon a miserable sick-bed. He has injured his constitution by drunkenness; he has lost his character in society; he has been dismissed from his employment; he has brought himself and his family to beggary; and now he has fallen an easy victim to disease. You speak to him of his sin; he bitterly feels the truth, and the tears of sorrow roll down his emaciated cheek. Here, then, is heart-felt sorrow for sin, and you readily conclude that the man is truly penitent. Soon after, however, you find that he has recovered his health, and that he has turned "like the dog to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." You are perplexed by these things, and know not how true repentance can be distinguished. To aid you in this, let us consider what of sin it was that occasioned the drunkard's sorrow. It was the effects of his sin—disgrace, beggary, and disease. He never sorrowed for sin as rebellion against God, as putting the Saviour to an open shame, and as grieving the Holy Ghost. He never said, with David, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight;" nor, with Ephraim, "After that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh: I was ashamed, yea, even confounded, because I did bear the reproach of my youth." He never felt what the apostle calls a godly sorrow, that worketh repentance to salvation, not to be repented of.

4. But when a man has thus been made sorry after a godly manner, he will also hate sin with a perfect hatred. Can we contemplate what has so much offended God and degraded ourselves, and not be filled with detestation of it? Shall we cast a "longing, lingering look behind," as on some beloved object with which we reluctantly part? As well may you think that the wounded Israelite in the desert, even when he knew that a remedy was provided, would have needlessly cast himself in the way of the fiery serpents, and not, on the contrary, have fled from them, and hated the very appearance of their murderous race. Thus the true penitent hates sin, as an abominable thing in the sight of God, and, instead of lingering as near its confines as possible, without actually setting foot on forbidden ground, he flees the appearance of evil, and shuns with abhorrence the polluted haunts of vice.

II. But when we have obtained such views, and when we entertain such feelings, we will not rest satisfied with merely ceasing to do evil. This would bring us into the dangerous state of the lukewarm—the state of a vessel missing the stay. She neither sails upon the one tack nor the other, but is in danger of being heaved by the swell, or drifted by the wind, on all the horrors of a lee shore. Our text adds, that the apostle showed men to "turn to God." Thus we see religion is not intended to bring us into a neutral state. We must not only "cease to do evil," but "learn to do well;" not only "cast off the works of darkness," but "put on the armour of light," and "turn from the power of Satan unto God." "The time past of our lives may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles." "Let us now return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon us, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Let us say, with Ephraim, "What have I to do any more with idols?" and with the prodigal, "I will arise and go to my father." It was sin that separated between God and the sinner; but that sin has been cast into the depths of the sea, and he that was once afar off, is brought nigh by the blood of Christ.

When the penitent returns to God, his first act is to confess the guilt of his wandering in his own ways; for confession is the natural language of true repentance. Thus, when Job was convinced of the corruption of his own heart, he said, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes." In the same manner, David says, "I acknowledge my transgression, and my sin is ever before me." Daniel also says, "O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, because we have sinned against thee," and the language of the returning prodigal has always been adopted by the repentant sinner; "Father, I have sinned against thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." This language bespeaks a disposition to make reparation, if possible, for the injury done, or the insult offered, and expresses what the apostle calls repentance towards God; for the great evil of sin consists in its alienating our hearts from him, and in leading us into opposition to his holy will, and therefore this turning to God implies our acknowledging him to be our lawful Sovereign, and our determination, through grace, to love and serve him with all our mind and strength.

III. But Paul not only showed men that they "should repent, and turn unto God," but also that they should "do works meet for repentance." If a real change has been produced in the nature of the vine, it will no longer bring forth wild grapes, but be "filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God." The mind of the penitent has been so far made partaker of a Divine nature, that he turns his feet unto God's commandments, and his heart has been so far filled with love to his Redeemer, that, in testimony of his love, he keeps his sayings. It is thus that ye shall know the truly penitent by their fruits. Emotions may be deep and yet prove but transient; tears may be copious, and yet be soon dried up; and the apparent goodness of false repentance will be like the morning cloud and the early dew; whilst the path of the just is as the shining light. Agreeably to our text, we find John, when he saw many of the Scribes and Pharisees coming to his baptism, exhorting them to "bring forth fruits meet for repentance;" and as a practical illustration, we would remind you of the fruits brought forth by Zaccheus on the day that salvation came to his house; he stood forth and said, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken any thing from any man, by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." It is thus that the penitent returns to his duty which he has neglected; his renewed mind subjects his passions to its legitimate authority against which they had rebelled. He puts away all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, and perfects holiness in the fear of God; and thus he proves himself to be one of Christ's peculiar people who are zealous of those good works which God hath before ordained, that they should walk in them.

Let us now, in conclusion, present a few remarks naturally suggested by what has been advanced in this Discourse. We remark then,

1. That we may go a great length in repentance, shall not go far enough. This point has already been illustrated by the case of Ahab and it might be farther confirmed by that of Judas. In him we find sorrow for the consequences of his treachery—a full confession of his guilt—his besetting sin so far overcome, that he threw down the pieces of silver he had so dearly purchased, and an anguish of spirit so great, that rather than endure it, he rushed into the presence of his Judge, not only chargeable with the blood of Jesus, but also with his own. How important is it then, that we should be able to discriminate a counterfeit repentance from a true! A man may be convinced of sin by natural conscience, and mourn over its effects, as did profane Esau; he may confess it, as did Judas; he may, under the pressure of affliction, abandon it, as mariners cast their cargo overboard in a storm; he may hate it, as the sensualist does, when suffering under the effects of a debauch; he may make strong promises of amendment as Pharaoh did to Moses; Saul to David, and many upon sick-beds,—only to be forgotten. But such a man has never seen sin as rebellion against God, as putting the Saviour to shame, and grieving the Holy Ghost; he never confessed it before the footstool of God, freely and particularly; he had no hatred to it, when he seemed to forsake it; and consequently he never truly repented and turned to God.

2. Repentance is absolutely necessary to salvation—not as a price for the inheritance of the saints, but as a part of the saving operation of the Spirit on our souls; for it was after Ephraim was turned that he repented. Our Saviour showed its necessity, when he told the Jews, in alluding to those who were buried in the ruins of the tower of Siloam, and those Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices; that unless they repented, they should all likewise perish. Repentance lies at the very threshold of the kingdom of heaven; for if a man has not repented, it is because he has never seen the exceeding sinfulness of sin; and if he has not seen this, he has never seen his need of a Saviour; and if he has never seen this need, he has never applied to him, and if he has never made this application, he has not received salvation. Or, if a man has not such views of sin, as would lead him to repentance; it is evident he will continue in the practice of sin or the love of it; consequently he is still an enemy to God, and a stranger to holiness, and has no meetness for the inheritance of all them that are sanctified. Or, once more, if a man is not grieved at having offended his beneficent Creator, and shamed his merciful Redeemer, then he is in no disposition to be reconciled to God, and so to be restored to his favour, and adopted into his family. Hence, we may see not only the necessity of this grace, but also the propriety with which it is called repentance to salvation.

3. Repentance is not a plant that springs up naturally in the human breast. It is the gift of God, purchased by Jesus Christ, and applied by the Holy Ghost. These doctrines are clearly taught in Holy Writ. Thus, when Peter had given an account of his interview with Cornelius, his auditors said, "Then hath God, also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life;" our Saviour is exalted for the very purpose of giving repentance and forgiveness of sins; and it was after the outpouring of the Spirit of grace that Zechariah represents sinners, in every station, as mourning at the sight of Him whom their sins had pierced, "as one mourneth for an only child." Hence we see that repentance is one of those invaluable gifts that Jesus obtained for the rebellious—to whom it is peculiarly suitable.

Now, this view of repentance ought to convince us, that very fatal effects may result from a man's refusing to accept this precious gift when it is offered to him. Suppose a friend offers us a valuable gift, which he knows is absolutely necessary for our welfare, and we unceremoniously refuse it—such ungrateful conduct must grieve and offend our affectionate friend. Suppose, farther, that the time arrives when we feel our need, and see the value of the rejected gift; might we not justly dread, were we now to ask it, that our insulted friend would spurn our petition and refuse our request? Oh! my friends, the application is dreadful; but did you never read, "Because ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof, I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh?" or, that Jesus would say, not to a few, but to many, when seeking to enter into the kingdom of heaven, "I never knew you, depart from me, all ye that work iniquity?"

Hence, also, we may see the folly of men's saying, that they can repent when they please, and the awful delusion of deferring repentance to a death-bed. What is this but saying, that they will serve the devil through the day, and come in the evening of life and ask the wages of a labourer in the Lord's vineyard—that it will be easier to root up sin when it has become a gnarled oak, than when it is a tender sapling; or to melt the heart, after it has been long hardening under the deceitfulness of sin? Such men act as wisely as the mariner who would defer removing his stranded vessel from the beach, although he knows that every hour she is making a deeper and deeper bed in the sand, to extricate her from which may at last baffle his most strenuous efforts. The man who says he can repent when he pleases, says, in effect, that he can give life to the dead, or create his heart anew, and put a right spirit within him. But this is beyond the power of any creature; it is the part of the Holy Ghost to take repentance and the remission of sins, as things of Christ, and show them to the sinner, that Jesus may be glorified; but such a man grieves that Spirit, yea, is in danger of quenching Him, by his continuance in sin, and rejection of repentance, when offered for his acceptance.

But let no one infer, that, because repentance is the gift of God, he can therefore do nothing to obtain it. Has Jesus been exalted to give repentance? Then, what can more evidently be our duty than to go and ask it? God has put the very prayer into our mouth. Take with you words, and say unto Him, "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously; so shall we render the calves of our lips." Has he promised to give a new heart, and to put a right spirit within us? Then, David has taught us how to turn this promise into a prayer, when he says, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." Has he promised the Holy Ghost to them that ask him? Then, what ought we to do, but ask him in the prayer of faith. And need I add, that the whole Bible teems with encouragement to repentance? God has solemnly sworn, that he has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live:" and is not this evident, from the length of time that God has spared many of us, that "his goodness may lead us to repentance?"

Lastly,—In reply to the question, When should you repent? we would ask, When should you receive a gift, but when it is offered?—when should you perform a duty, but when it is commanded? And if you are not aware that you are commanded to repent, and that you have been adding the breach of this commandment to the rest of your iniquity, then, hear these words,— "The times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men every where to repent." We would ask, further, How much time have ye for repentance,—for we trust you have seen that it consists in something more than saying, Lord, have mercy upon me? "Those that defer repentance to a death-bed," says old Bunyan, "are not over-wise; such men would have been loath, might they have had a week to run twenty miles for their life, to have deferred that journey to the end of that week."

And now, my friends, this invaluable gift has once more been offered to you—who is prepared to reject it? This indispensable duty has once more been pointed out—who is resolved to neglect it? God's command to repent has been thrown across the sinner's path—who will first trample it under his feet? Does the impenitent sinner know "that the wrath of God abideth on him," and that, ere another Sabbath, it may plunge him into "the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone?" Oh! then, let me entreat you, as one who, together with yourselves, must give an account of our meeting on this occasion, repent, turn to God, and do "works meet for repentance;" then shall those holy angels that now hover in the midst of us return to heaven with the tidings of repentant sinners; and a more rapturous strain of thanksgiving will be poured forth to Him who has been exalted to give repentance and remission of sins.—Amen.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Preaching Christ.—To preach Christ is to exhibit him in the greatness and perfection of his work. It is to hold up the active obedience of Christ as constituting the righteousness of the believer, on the ground of which he stands fully, freely, and eternally accepted of God. It is to respond to the declarations of the inspired apostle,—“By him all that believe are justified from all things.” And, again, “As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.” And yet, again, “He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.” This righteousness includes the whole of Christ's obedience to the preceptive part of the Divine Law. He died as the substitute of his people. All that the broken law of God demanded of them, he, as their representative, gave. It insisted upon infinite holiness, perfect rectitude, and implicit obedience; Christ, in the place and in behalf of his elect, presented it. And, because of the infinite dignity of his person, because he was God as he was man, he was able to give to the law every jot and tittle that it demanded; investing it with a glory which it never had, even when it first issued from the throne of the Majesty on high. This obedience of Christ—not his essential holiness, for that is incommunicable—becomes virtually the obedience of his people; imputed to them in the same manner, precisely as their sins were imputed to him. He bore not the essential guilt of his people, as they receive not the essential holiness of Christ. But there is a laying of their sins to the account of Jesus, and, in return, there is a laying of his righteousness to the account of his people. In no other sense can we possibly understand the apostle, when using the language just quoted, “He hath made him sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.”—REV. OCTAVIUS WINSLOW. (Christ, the Theme of the Missionary.)

The unchangeable love of God to his people.—It is one mercy, and a sure mercy, that our state does not depend upon our frames. Whether we are in a storm, or in a calm, the good pilot is always and equally with us. His care and his love are unchangeable, and his righteousness (the blessed and only ground of our hope) always invariably the same. You may safely trust Him in the dark; but it is probable that, when the hour of your departure actually arrives, you will find your prayers answered, and that he will manifestly stand by you and strengthen you, to set your seal to his faithfulness and goodness with your departing breath. He who has so often shown you how little you can do without Him, may take occasion then to show both to you and to others, what He can do in you; but, whatever your passage may be, a safe arrival at the haven of rest will make rich amends for all. Methinks those are the most happy, who are nearest their expected change.—REV. JOHN NEWTON. (Twenty-five Letters hitherto unpublished.)

The Christian's view of the World.—Happy only the man, who knows the world by knowing his God, his

Bible, and himself: he shall know the world to purpose. The philosopher sees the world passing away; but he sees it with a pang: he sees it with regret: there is so much taken from his happiness; “I lose my eyes, my teeth, my hearing, my health, my vigour:” and he grows peevish and fretful. But the Christian sees it pass with a calm and solid satisfaction: “Here,” says he, “I see a dying world passing away: yet I faint not; for, though my outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. I have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. I am waiting for this abode. I am not disappointed, to hear that life is but a hand-breadth: I know it. You tell me that my tabernacle is to be taken down: I know that I should be crushed before the moth.”—REV. R. CECIL.

ON THE PRINCIPLE OF CHRISTIAN MORALITY.

BY M. A. VINET, PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF LAUSANNE.

Translated from the French.

“I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.”—ROMANS xii. 1.

A SHORT time ago, my brethren, one of those fugitive journals, destined to afford daily excitement to public curiosity, entertained its readers with the review of a new work, which is fitted, in the opinion of the critic, to alarm all the friends of sound morality. This dangerous work gives expression to a thought which, in the judgment of the reviewer, shows how pernicious is the doctrine, and, perhaps, the intention of the author. The idea to which we refer is, that all the efforts of man cannot obtain salvation for him, and that there is nothing which he can do to merit it. You will ask of me, my brethren, what that book is which is so bitterly criticised. I do not know it; it is not even named; but it might be the Gospel. For the Gospel also declares, that man is not saved by his works; that the gift of salvation is entirely free; and that it cometh “neither of him that runneth, nor of him that willeth, but of God that showeth mercy.” And as the Gospel lays down no other mode of salvation, it follows clearly, that no other mode which we could adopt could conduct us to salvation, not even the greatest effort that we might put forth, to accomplish the will of God. This is the doctrine in all its native simplicity. What shall we say, my brethren, to the men who censure these doctrines, and yet call themselves Christians? It would be sufficient, perhaps, to reduce them to silence, if we could show them that the doctrines at which they are offended are the very doctrines of the Gospel, and that eighteen hundred years have elapsed since the Church professed and proclaimed them as fundamental truths. But as, besides their great ignorance of the contents of the Gospel, these inconsiderate critics betray a melancholy want of reflection and of sound philosophy, it may be proper to examine the question, as a simple idea, as a pure theory, by the light of reason alone. This is what we are about to undertake; and we hope to show that it is not only reasonable and moral, but that it is the only doctrine consistent with reason and with sound morality. And, first, let us state plainly the difficulty which is proposed to us. A doctrine, we are told, which teaches that there is nothing to be done in order to merit salvation—a doctrine which denies the necessity of good works—is directly contradictory to the idea of morality; for morality is the science of duty, and in the doctrine that is objected to there is no place for duty. Farther, this doctrine is opposed to the Gospel; for in all its pages the Gospel recommends good works, and this doctrine excludes them. Let us note the objection, my brethren; and to those who would address it to us, let us, in turn, address a few questions.

If there is a religious morality, that is to say, a system of duties having the Creator for their object, is it not true that there must be some moving principle in us to lead us to the practice of these duties? This is granted. Can there be no other moving principle than either of these two—selfishness and devotedness? No; it is not possible to conceive a third. Ah! well; to these two moving principles correspond the two which we are about to examine.

According to the first of these systems, every man comes into the world with certain faculties, and obligations which correspond to them, and the expectation of a destiny proportioned to the manner in which he has employed these faculties and fulfilled these obligations. There is a covenant, an agreement—there is a reciprocal engagement between God and him: man promises obedience, and God promises happiness. The man who shall do good will be rewarded, the man who shall do evil will be punished. There is enough here to make us practise all our duties.

Selfishness is, then, according to the first system, the moving principle that is proposed to us—a selfishness, undoubtedly, very elevated and noble, but, after all, a motive terminating in self. Now, who does not see, at the first glance, how insufficient and defective is this moving principle? It plainly introduces into morality a foreign element, we may even say a hostile element, since virtue is essentially the sacrifice of self. This motive is far from exhibiting, at first view, all its dangerous effects; but let it act, and soon it shall have destroyed all morality—soon it will make us know that consequences give their whole value to our actions—that the precise profit or loss imparts to them their essential character. Goodness is no longer good in itself—it is only good in so far as it secures happiness; vice also is no longer vice in itself—it is only vice in so far as it exposes to misery. We have only to attach promises to vice, and it will become virtue; threatening to virtue, and it will become vice; and yet, if morality is not an empty name, it is impossible but that virtue detached from its hopes must be something, and vice detached from its dangers must be something also. Nor is this all. We must not forget that we are concerned with a religious morality—with duties of which God is the object; but the first of all these duties, in fact the only one, is love. The law is only fulfilled by love. Now, selfishness carried to its farthest extent, selfishness the most improved, never will rise to love. We may calculate our actions, we may calculate our outward blessings; we may, from selfishness, feed the poor, and give our bodies to be burned; but we cannot, by calculation, resolve to love; just as we cannot, by the friction of two pieces of ice, elicit the slightest spark of fire.

Disgusted with this wholly selfish morality, other minds have dreamt of another system. They have absolutely excluded selfishness, and have pretended to cultivate virtue for its own sake. Is not virtue, they say, independently altogether of the benefits which result from it, worthy of receiving all our homage and of engaging all our thoughts? Does God, who is the supreme truth, the supreme bounty, the supreme goodness, require to encourage us by promises, to frighten us by threatenings, in order to obtain our obedience? We ought, in serving him, to blush at yielding to other impulses than those which result from his own perfections. Ah! well, my brethren, which of us will dare to say that these men are not in the right? Who will not cordially subscribe to this elevated system? But, on the other hand, who will realize it? It is a beautiful, a noble, a true system. It has only one defect—it is impracticable. Away with reasonings, then, and let facts speak for themselves. Where are those who serve God from pure love? What do I say? Where are those who love God? Let us not deceive ourselves. Those fugitive emotions which we experience from the thought of the Creator, or the sight of his wonderful works—those superficial impressions, to which, after all, so many hearts are strangers,—all this is not love. If we only love God when we are delighted in yielding up to him our thoughts, our affections, our wishes, our whole life; if we only love God when our will is lost in his; if we only love God when to offend him appears to us the greatest of evils, the only evil, and to please him the only happiness; if we only love God when our heart puts between the creature and him the same distance as he has himself put; answer, ye who listen to me, who is it that loves him? True, the worldly man often enough exclaims, I love God undoubtedly, and who does not love him? But nothing displays better the blindness of our hearts, than such a rash assertion. He who begins to love God is the first to be alarmed at his indifference to God. We love God! Ah! let us not be hasty in making such a statement. When we shall have for him the hundredth part of the affection that we have for a parent, for a friend, for an earthly benefactor, it will be time, perhaps, to say that we love him. Till then let us keep silence, and be humbled to the dust. And if we do not love him, what becomes of that disinterested morality which we did right in choosing? what becomes of that pure system of which we were so proud?

It is true that there are in the world, men who have undertaken to serve God. They have said that he had a right to be served; they have felt inwardly the obligation of consecrating their life to him. But in what has that attempt terminated, if not in proving to them that in fact they did not love God? The worldling, the thoughtless man may tell you with confidence that he loves God; but go and ask those persons labouring and heavy laden, who are dragging behind them with effort and difficulty the long chain of the precepts of the law; go and ask them if they have this love in their heart. Ah! it is not of love that they will speak to you, but of fear, that is to say, of self-interest. They will speak to you of the majesty of the divine law, of its inviolability, of its threatenings. They will tell you that their sins are a burden greater than they can bear. They will tell you, that instead of the Father whom they have sought, they found only a master and a judge, and that his wrath has veiled from them his goodness, and that fear has left no place for love; and that before they can love they must hope.

Take notice, my dear hearers; Before they love, I say, they must hope. And this is precisely the system of the Gospel; it remains for us to unfold it.

You have seen that selfishness is not worthy of occupying the place of a motive for our moral conduct. You have seen, on the other hand, that an obedience founded on love alone, finds no place in the heart of the natural man. We experience here, then, a double difficulty; we must discard selfishness, we must produce love; but how shall we discard selfishness, and how shall we produce love? It is the part of the Gospel to give an answer to these two questions.

"Do this and you shall live," say the most of moralists, and even the Scriptures of the Old Testament. That is, if we keep in view the spirituality, the perfection of the law, do what is impossible, and you shall live; do what is impossible, if you do not wish to perish.

It was necessary, indeed, my brethren, that such a morality should be taught in the world; it was necessary that God should cause it to be preached under the ancient economy; it is necessary even in our day that it should be preached among those who resist the Gospel, in order that we might appreciate the ransom from the debt, and the remedy from the evil. It is necessary that those who reject Jesus Christ should learn how far they are from accomplishing the law, and how much need they have that another should satisfy it in their stead. In this way the law, or morality, is truly a schoolmaster that leads to Christ.

But to the man whom the consciousness of his sins, and of his weakness, has led to Christ, there begins another system, another morality. The law had said, "Do these things and you shall live;" the Gospel says, "You live, therefore do these things:" In one word, in ordinary morality obedience precedes salvation; in the morality of the Gospel salvation precedes and gives rise to obedience.

Observe, my brethren, this simple transposition has solved every difficulty. We did not know what to do with selfishness, nor where to place love. Selfishness and love, however, both of them find a place, in this system; but in a new order, and in a new relation. Shall I venture to say it, the Gospel frees us from our selfishness, by satisfying it, exhausts it by yielding every thing to it; the Gospel destroys selfishness, by banishing it entirely at the first outset. In the Gospel the largest share is given to selfishness, or rather it does not receive its share only, for it receives every thing, all that can fill the capacity of the heart of men and of angels; eternal life, salvation, happiness in the largest, the most complete acceptation of the word. The Gospel begins by declaring to us that we are saved not by works, but independently of our works, before our works. It comforts us thereby under the intolerable burden which the obligations and terror of the law impose upon us. It sets our hearts at ease and at liberty. And what use does it make of this liberty? It is here that the beauty of the evangelical system is seen. Rejoicing in deliverance from our fears, happy in our freedom, peaceful in regard to the future; but especially admitted now to contemplate God, in the complete manifestation of his love, feeling confidence in God whose goodness is without repentance, in short, overcome by gratitude, the believer is filled with the desire of doing all for him who hath first loved him, and given himself for him. "He loveth much because he hath been forgiven much." Will he neglect the law? On the contrary, it will become dearer and more sacred to him; but he will obey it in a different spirit, as the law of a loving father and a Saviour; he will recognise it as perfect, as sweeter than honey, as restoring the soul; he will feel it to be his delight; he will practise it from duty, no doubt, but also from taste, from inclination, nay, very soon from instinct; and the more he will cultivate it, the more the sweet enjoyments arising from it will endear it to his soul. It will be no longer necessary to say to him, In the name of your eternal interests, in the name of the terrors of judgment, "do this and you shall live," for his eternal interests have been provided for, and the sentence which condemned him has been nailed to the cross; but we will say to him, Persevere in the good works unto which you have been created in Christ Jesus. You have been purchased at a great price; glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are his; or as the apostle says, "I beseech you by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

Undoubtedly, my brethren, this fulness of confidence, this triumphant assurance, is not to the same degree imparted to all Christians; and if several possess it from the first moment of their conversion, others appear to arrive at it only by a slow and laborious progress. But never forget that to all those to whom the holy Spirit has given faith in the compassionate sacrifice of the Saviour, God is assuredly love. They know, they feel themselves beloved; they acknowledge that the designs of God towards them are salvation and peace; and this conviction, which makes God appear to their soul in another aspect than he doth to the world, fills them also with different dispositions from those of the world. They love that God who has loved them individually and closely, and love becomes the principle of their moral life; besides, the Gospel, indefatigable in declaring to them that their works cannot save them, casting them incessantly upon the doctrine of salvation by grace, drives them constantly towards Divine love, and forces all their thoughts to be concentrated upon this grand object—the mercy of the Lord. With these persuasions, with this constant tendency of the mind, it is impossible that the life should not become a life devoted to God.

These Christians, then, form no exception to the principle laid down.

But this is not all: the soul which believes firmly that the blood of the new testament has been shed for it, cannot admit that He who has enabled it to believe, has imparted a gift illusory and vain; it cannot deny the faithfulness of God. And if sometimes the feeling of its own unworthiness, the consciousness of the law in the members warring against the law in the mind, the sight of so much deplorable infidelity in the very bosom of the Church, may, for a moment, obscure its hopes, these same things make it recur with a double fervour to Him who, finding nothing that is acceptable in his sight, has willed to save us by the faith which he himself gives. Do not demand sternly from a Christian under such impressions that triumphant assurance which the Lord has not made the privilege of all believers; he has it not, perhaps, but he loves; he has renounced his own merits, he expects nothing from himself, and all from his Father. I ask you if he is not acting in the spirit of the Gospel? I ask you if, when he obeys from love, without hope in himself, without mercenary and sordid views,—I ask you if, in such circumstances, he can be said to be a stranger to that principle of morality of which we have attempted to establish the superiority?

It is true that the Gospel itself speaks of a reward, of a prize, of a crown. Truth is one, but truth may have two different aspects. It is quite true that faith produces love, that love produces obedience—and that, too, an obedience which does not calculate; but it is true, also, that the works of such an obedience are good works; that such works lead to happiness as a necessary consequence, that God has only willed, and can only will, the restoration of man, with the design of rendering him happy; and that under this relation the Gospel speaks, in the name of God, of a reward and a crown. We find here, then, under the same truth, two ideas, not contradictory, but co-relative ideas—faith given gratuitously, and the fruits of faith rewarded; the believer, not labouring for the reward, but God treating him as if he deserved a reward. Salvation thus precedes obedience, because the cross, the means of salvation, has preceded the works of the believer; and in another sense, that is, only in the order of time, obedience precedes salvation, because the full enjoyment of the blessings promised to the believer begins only after he has finished his work. There is, then, no contradiction, but a mutual harmony, among the different declarations of the Gospel; and all the passages that occur, referring to the rewards of the believer, cannot shake the vital principle of the Gospel, viz., that obedience is the fruit of salvation, and that the believer obeys not in order to be saved, but because he is saved. In short, what need have we, what necessity is there, for confounding all these ideas, when the facts speak so strongly? Search out, among the professors of Christianity, those to whom Christianity is a real, living, efficacious principle—those who have taken the Gospel as their guide, and who apply it with fidelity to their conduct. Since their works are apparent, ask of them to tell you the principle from which their works originate. There is not one who will not reply to you, "I obey, because I love; I love, because God has pardoned me." My brethren, though the ordinary morality, I mean that which rejects the doctrine of the atonement, were capable of producing the same effects, the same works as flow from evangelical morality, the latter would, nevertheless, have a marked superiority to the former; for, as a modern writer has judiciously remarked, virtue in the one, is only the means; in the other, it is the end. In the one, God is served as a means of happiness; in the other, he is adored for himself. In the one, we cannot rid ourselves of mercenary views; in the other, we obey only a generous and pure impulse. In the one, there is a servile dread; in the other, there is a filial fear. In the one, there is selfishness, and, consequently, slavery; in the other, all is love—that is liberty.

After these reflections, it will be easy to appreciate the remarks that we have offered in the beginning of this discourse. You may judge if that is an immoral doctrine, which teaches that all our efforts cannot obtain salvation for us, and that there is nothing to be done in order to merit it. You are aware, now, that this doctrine is a doctrine of love, and of love in two senses—at once a compassionate love on the part of God, and a grateful love on the part of man. This is not a mercantile transaction, it is a free covenant between God, who first loved us, and us, who love him on account of his love. What! is duty less sacred to us, because we love him who imposes and enjoins it? What! is the law less known to us, because we know him better who has given it to us? What! do we hate sin less, because its expiation has cost the purest blood in the universe? What! shall we feel less bound to obey, because we know the whole extent of the love of the Father? A doctrine which doubles the force of all duties, the energy of all precepts, the power of all motives—is that an immoral doctrine, or is it not rather, as we said at the commencement, the best, the only good morality?

This doctrine, which they represent to us in the nineteenth century as a startling paradox, is the same that all true Christians have professed since the coming of Jesus Christ—the morality of Paul and of John, the morality of Fenelon and of Pascal, the morality of Newton and Oberlin—Christian morality. They speak to you, in your churches, of salvation by faith; and you recognise the meaning of the expression. Ah! well, this morality is nothing more than salvation by faith, or the cure of the soul by confidence in the divine mercy. And to what point does not this carry back the doctrine? Even under the Old Testament dispensation, the faithful among the Jews lived by this faith in the free compassion of the Saviour. Passing from one generation to another, you see them all drink of the same spiritual Rock, which is Christ; you see Moses preferring the reproach of Christ to the pleasures of Egypt; you see this divine promise casting its consoling and pure light upon the dark pathway of our first parents, as they left the shady bowers of paradise. It is this morality for which, during four thousand years, God prepared corrupt and fallen humanity; it is this morality of which the death of Christ has brought to light the noble foundation, hid for a long time in darkness; it is the morality of humanity which can support no other. Oh! if there is among you, my dear hearers, a single individual who remains far from the Gospel, cherishing prejudices similar to those of which we have been speaking, let him study, we beseech him, this system of the Gospel; and after having admired its beauty, its suitability, its harmony, let him inquire at himself, if it could have been an invention of man,—let him inquire if there is not here more than system—if there is not here a mighty supernatural fact, the grandest in all the history of the universe. Let the Cross become to him a reality; Jesus Christ, a Saviour; the Gospel, good news—an authentic message from the Lord; and let him adopt this morality of faith and of love—the only system of morality worthy of God, suited to our wants, and capable of regenerating us.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

No. XI.

BY THE REV. GEORGE MUIRHEAD, D. D.,

Minister of Cramond, Mid-Lothian.

"For I delight in the Law of God after the inward man: but I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vii. 22–25.

A VARIETY of cases of Christian experience have now been set before the reader, arising out of the diversified circumstances in which Christians may be placed. It remains to close the series, by directing his attention to the experience of Christians in the immediate prospect of death. This will be the subject of the twelfth and last Paper. But the series would still be incomplete, were the reader's attention not directed to a case of Christian experience which is not peculiar to any one stage of the Christian's progress, nor arises out of any particular circumstances in which some are placed, and others not; but which, from a Christian's first entrance in the way of life, accompanies him, and never leaves him, while he is in this world—I mean, the contest which must be carried on with the sin that dwells in the heart. This case the Apostle Paul has unfolded to us from his own experience, in that portion of Scripture quoted at the head of this Paper. It is unquestionably a case of great importance, in which all are deeply interested; for it is not a matter that concerns a Christian merely at his entrance on the way of life, nor at one particular stage of his progress, nor is it merely at the close of his earthly pilgrimage, that there will be annoyance from this quarter; but from the commencement, on through every stage of his progress, to the close of his pilgrimage must this contest be maintained. It is not a case peculiar to a few, but includes all—young and old, weak and strong. It is upon the continual maintaining of this combat with the power of sin, that the comfort, the peace, and the progress of Christians do, in a great measure, depend. So long as this contest is vigorously maintained, the Christian's peace and comfort abound, and he renews his strength; but when, through his neglect, the power of sin is permitted to gain a victory over him, then his soul is troubled, his comfort is interrupted, and the power of godliness languishes and decays. It is intended, then, to contemplate this case, as unfolded to us in the experience of the Apostle Paul, and to consider some of the instructions which may be suggested from this case of Christian experience. May the Lord thereby "search us, and know our hearts; try us, and know our thoughts; and see what wicked way there is in us, and lead us in the way everlasting."

1. In describing the features of this case, it may be remarked, in the first place, that the Apostle Paul set a high value upon the Law of God,—“I delight in the Law of God, after the inward man.” Here we learn something of the blessed state of those who are renewed by the grace of God. He was pleased with the Law of God; he saw in it the “beauty of holiness,” the reflected image of God's glorious holiness; he was persuaded that the perfection of moral excellence consisted in being conformed to this Law in heart and life; he did not wish the Law to be in any respect different from what it was—he was perfectly satisfied with it, as God had given it; he was disposed to meditate on this Law day and night. And such has been the experience of the people of God in all ages. “O how love I thy Law!” said David; “it is my meditation all the day.” But with others it is not so. It cannot be said with truth of any unconverted sinner, that he delights in the Law of God. He is a stranger to the beauty of holiness; his heart inwardly revolts from the purity and perfection of God's Law; his judgment may, in some measure, be convinced of the reasonableness of God's Law, but his heart does not love the Law. It is too strict for him; he would wish the rigour of its requirements abated. The obedience that he gives to it is with a grudge—from fear, and not from love. His obedience is, of course, very defective, even in its form, and the principle from which it proceeds is wrong. It is the peculiar privilege of the people of God, to know, to love, and to delight in God's Law. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful: but his delight is in the Law of the Lord; and in his Law doth he meditate day and night." It is given as a mark of the godly man, that the Law of God is in his heart; and therefore none of his steps shall slide. There is a correspondence between the renewed heart and the Law of God; and that love to the Law that is in the heart when renewed, will powerfully constrain to the obedience of the Law, and will assist in contending with the power of sin. When a man engages in a work willingly, he goes on comfortably, and makes progress; but if the work be in opposition to the bent of his heart, it goes on heavily. And thus is it with the feeble attempts that are made by the unconverted to resist the power of sin. It is a work in which they do not engage heartily, and therefore it comes to nothing. But in the case of Christians, when they contend with the power of sin, their affections are on the side of holiness; and the greater their delight in the Law of God, the greater will be their hatred of sin, which is opposed to the Law: and the more vigorous will be their efforts in striving against sin.

2. Another feature in the apostle's experience, as recorded by himself, was the contending of the principle of grace in him in opposition to the power of sin. There was "a law in his members warring against the law of his mind;" and as this law of sin, on the one hand, was active in seeking to bring his soul under subjection, so, on the other hand, there was another law of his mind, whereby he was enabled to resist the power of sin. The apostle suffered not this law of sin to reign in him. If sin was active in attempting to usurp authority over him, grace was not less active in holding out against the assaults of so formidable an enemy—resisting the influence of sin, and subduing its power. To this contest he repeatedly refers. Thus, saith he, "Therefore we run, not uncertainly; so fight we, not as those who beat the air. But I keep under my body, and keep it in subjection, lest by any means, when I have preached the Gospel to others, I myself should be a castaway." And it was in the review of this spiritual warfare in which he had been engaged, and the victory which God had given him over the power of sin, and over all his spiritual enemies, that he could say, in the close of his mortal life, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will bestow on me on that day; and not on me only, but on all who love his appearing." And such is the experience of the people of God. In entering upon the Christian life, they enter upon this warfare; and the life of faith consists eminently in continually maintaining this contest with the power of sin that dwelleth in them. It is not so with the unconverted. They have no principle in them strong enough effectually to resist the power of sin. Nor have they the inclination to resist the power of sin, if they could. There may be in them occasionally a struggle between conscience and the sin that dwelleth in them; and that, more especially, when they are tempted to some great and aggravated transgression. But the contest is but feeble, and, in the issue, sin generally prevails. And as to contending with the power of sin in the heart, they know nothing of the matter. All, then, who would consistently maintain the Christian profession, must continually maintain this spiritual warfare. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye by the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live."

3. Another feature in the apostle's experience, was his deep regret when, at any time, sin gained an advantage over him. This he expresses in these affecting terms, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" While, as has been shown, the apostle was active in opposing sin, he found, after all his fortitude, and firmness, and watchfulness, that sin did occasionally gain a victory over him; and this was to him a source of much sorrow. Alas! might he think within himself, how deep is the corruption of my heart! How unable am I, in my own strength, to contend with so formidable an enemy! I am ready to be betrayed at every turn. I am, indeed, encompassed with a body of sin and death. I have much need to look out for help, for I cannot deliver myself. Sin was the great source of his fears, and the quarter from which he apprehended danger. With regard to afflictions, he could say, that "he counted them not worthy to be compared to the glory that would be revealed." But the annoyance he experienced, from the continual working of sin in his heart, was worst of all, and made him cry out for deliverance. And thus it is with all who are renewed in the spirit of their minds. Here is the cause of their deepest distress. It occasions them their most painful trials; it is the heaviest burden they have to bear—under which they groan, desiring to be delivered. It is not so with the unconverted. We do not find them complaining of the heavy burden of sin. It seems to lie lightly upon them. They may, indeed, have sorrow because of the consequences of sin; and, when under serious impressions, they may be heard lamenting that they had not been more attentive to duty, and acknowledging that, had they hearkened to the voice of instruction, they would not have been in that perplexity and disquietude in which they now find themselves to be. But still there may be a love to sin in the heart. They have not yet got to the root of the evil. There must be the enlightening of the Spirit, that they may see sin in its true light—may see it as the abominable thing that the Lord hateth—may see all the heinousness and degradation that is in it—and what baseness and ingratitude there is in it to God and the Saviour—and that its direct tendency is misery and ruin!

4. Another distinguishing feature in the apostle's experience was, the animating hope that he entertained of support under this conflict, and of complete and final deliverance from sin, through the Lord Jesus Christ. "I thank God, through Jesus Christ." When we hear the apostle pouring out that bitter complaint, "O wretched man that I am," if he had said nothing more, we might have supposed him to be in a hopeless state. But, from what follows, we are not left to conclude that he was without good hope, through grace. When he looked only to himself, indeed, the prospect was dark. But when he looked out of himself to Christ—when he considered his glorious all-sufficiency, his inexhaustible fulness, and his being ever ready to supply all his need—his gloom was dispelled, a dawn of hope arose upon him, and his mourning was turned into joy and thanksgiving: "I thank God, through Jesus Christ." And thus is it with believers, in maintaining the combat with the power of sin that dwelleth in them. They are animated with the hope that this enemy shall not be permitted finally to triumph over them; for Christ hath undertaken their cause, "and his grace shall be sufficient for them, and his strength perfected in weakness." But it is not so with the unconverted. They are not in circumstances to entertain so animating a hope. The obtaining a deliverance from sin is not to them so much an object of desire, provided they could, by any way, have the hope of being delivered from the consequences of sin. This is all that they want, that thus they may live more at their ease. Satan also will be ready to delude them with the vain hope of getting to heaven at last, though they still live in the love of sin. But they consider not that deliverance from the love and from the power of sin is an essential part of the salvation of the Gospel; and that unless they desire deliverance from sin itself, unless they hate sin and love holiness, they have just ground to find that they have neither part nor lot in the blessings of the Gospel. It is the hope of obtaining deliverance from sin, that animates Christians in contending with the power of sin. They rest assured that sin shall not be permitted to have dominion over them; and that, finally they shall be made "more than conquerors over sin and all their enemies, through him who loved them."

(1.) In considering the improvement to be made of the subject that has been treated of, let us first of all take up a bitter lamentation over the fatal apostasy of man from his original state of innocence. Well may we all exclaim with the apostle, O wretched men that we are! How miserable the state into which we have fallen! It is a state of alienation from God, the Fountain of all good. It is a state of degradation, that should fill us with shame and sorrow. If, by the grace of God, we have been brought to an affecting discovery of our fallen state, we will certainly be filled with the deepest regret, and the most heartfelt sorrow, so as to lead us to cry out, "O that our head were waters, and our eyes were a fountain of tears, that we might weep day and night" for our transgressions, and for all their aggravations. Especially will we mourn over that root of all evil, the sin of our nature, the sin that dwelleth in us. Nor will we be grieved only for ourselves, we will be grieved also for the case of others. "Rivers of waters," said the Psalmist, "run down mine eyes, because men keep not thy law." We will lament the deplorable state of those who are still living under the power and dominion of sin. How sad and wretched is their condition, and it is the more to be deplored, that they are little aware of it themselves, and may be boasting of their freedom, while they are the bondsmen of corruption and the slaves of Satan. They are forsaking their own mercies, rejecting the counsel of God against themselves, and counting themselves unworthy of eternal life.

(2.) From this subject, we may have a lesson of thankfulness for the salvation revealed in the Gospel, by which alone we can cherish the hope of deliverance from the degrading bondage of sin and Satan, and of being brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. If, in the contemplation of this subject, we see ground of humiliation, in the thought of our living naturally under the degradation of a state of sin, we may learn, that in the contemplation of this subject, we have also ground of thanksgiving and praise. And this is the order in God's gracious covenant, that we should first of all be laid low in the dust before God, under the consciousness of having ruined ourselves by sin; and then should have a new song put into our mouths, even praise to the God of our salvation. He wounds that he may heal, he kills that he may make alive, he shows them their own vile nature, that they may be sensible of their need of a Saviour, and then brings them to the great Physician to be cured of their deadly disease, and compasses them about with songs of deliverance. When we look only to ourselves, we see what may well lay us low before God in dust and ashes, and were we to look no farther, we would be altogether without hope. But we are encouraged to look to Christ, and we shall be saved. Behold then the amazing love of God to sinners of mankind, in not sparing his own dear Son, to save them from the guilt and power of sin, and to purify them unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. In proportion to our impressions of the degradation, and misery, and wretchedness of a state of sin, will be our sense of the inestimable value of the salvation of the Gospel. If we have been led, like the Apostle Paul, under the intolerable burden of sin to cry out, "O wretched men that we are, who shall deliver us?" then, with what shouts of praise and thanksgiving will we be disposed to embrace the salvation of the Gospel, and to say with the same apostle, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord," and "thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift."

(3.) I only mention one other lesson of instruction suggested by this subject, namely, that since, as we have seen, this warfare with the power of sin must be maintained so long as we are in this world, Christians may thereby be the more reconciled to the shortness of human life, and may even have in them a longing desire after the time of their release from this body of sin and death. Let the men of this world wish for long life here, and dread the approach of death, for this life is all their portion. At death the hope of the hypocrite shall perish. But such views do not become those, whose conversation is in heaven, whose treasures are there, and who hope at death to be with Christ, which is far better. Even Christians, I am aware, may have reasons for wishing the time of their life prolonged here, in submission to the will of God. They may wish to receive time to set their house in order, to see their children established in the world, and to see more of what God will do for his Church on earth. Perhaps, however, there may be found mingled with such causes an overfond attachment to this world. Now, it becomes Christians, for the honour of their Master, to advance his cause in the world, and for their own comfort, to overcome all such attachment to this world as would make them unwilling to leave it at the call of God. Let Christians be especially concerned to be assured that they are cleaving closely to Christ, and have committed all their immortal interests into his hands; then are they, in some measure, prepared for all events; then may they say with aged Simeon, when he held Christ in his arms, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

PAPAL PERSECUTION IN FRANCE.

THE following painful account of the deeds of atrocity and violence perpetrated upon the poor French Protestants in the days of Papal Supremacy, is extracted from a work of great interest, which has just appeared entitled "The Suppression of the Reformation in France." By D. D. Scott, Esq. It consists chiefly of translations of authentic documents, written at the period when the events, which they describe, happened.

On Saturday, the 18th of August 1685, the intendant of Upper Guyenne residing at Montauban, having sent for the leading Protestants of that city, represented to them that they could not fail to know that the king desired that all his subjects should become Roman Catholics, for which reason he exhorted them, for his part, to conform to that religion, and enjoined them to hold a meeting and deliberate thereupon. Some present then answered for all, that there was no need of meeting, as every man ought to examine for himself, and give a reason for his faith. The day following, being the 19th, the intendant enjoined them anew to meet at the consular house, where they should be left undisturbed from noon to six o'clock; they met accordingly, and unanimously resolved that they would live and die in their religion. Several of those present being deputed to carry their declaration to the intendant, their spokesman began as follows: "My Lord, we know that we are threatened with great violence." . . . "Stop," said the intendant, "no violence." The Protestant continued as he had begun; "whatever violence we may have to suffer." . . . But the intendant interrupting him anew, said, "I command you to abstain from such language." The speaker therefore confined himself to a few words, stating that it had been resolved that they would remain firm in their attachment to the reformed religion. On the day following, being the 20th, the battalion of la Fere, composed of twenty companies, entered the city, and continued to be followed by other troops. These poor people believing that there was a settled design to ruin them, had already taken certain measures to assist in meeting this trial. Several purses had been made up by subscription for the relief of those who, it was expected, would be most oppressed, and they had resolved to have all things in common. Now they were treated as follows:—

In execution of the designs projected against them, the troops were quartered in a certain district of the city, but sentries were placed to prevent communication from one district to another, and the city gates were also guarded, so as to prevent all escape. The billets being delivered, the horse and foot began to commit all kinds of hostile acts and cruelties, such as the devil only is capable of suggesting to barbarous and reprobate souls. Furniture was broken, mirrors smashed, wine, corn, and other necessary provisions brought out and wasted. What furniture the soldiers did not break, such as bed-hangings, linens, silver-plate, and such like, were taken to the market-place, where the Jesuits bought them from the soldiers, and told the Roman Catholics to do the same. The very houses of those who showed particular firmness were sold; and, altogether, it was computed that in four or five days, the losses of the reformed of that city amounted to above a million. Some soldiers asked for as much as three hundred crowns to enjoy themselves with, and several Protestants gave as much as ten pistoles for the same purpose. Meanwhile, the personal outrages they committed were horrible. To detail them all would be found impossible, and we can state only what we have been able to learn. Four soldiers carried a woman to a church, but as she continually cried out that she would not abjure her religion, they left her at the door, after violently ill-treating her. A tailor, called le Bearnois, was bound and dragged to a guard-house, where he was beaten all night by the soldiers, but notwithstanding this violence, remained constant. The troopers billeted on M. Solignac, a very wealthy merchant, took their horses into a large room, containing ten thousand livres worth of furniture. The master of the house was then obliged to turn the spit, and while he was doing so, fuel was heaped on the fire so unmercifully, that his arm was half burnt by the heat. A man passing through Montauban, saw one of the poor inhabitants beaten with sticks, to force him to go to mass; the poor martyr calling out that he never could endure doing that, and beseeching them rather to kill him. The barons de Causade and de la Motte were sent off to Cahors, as it was feared that their constancy and piety might give confidence to the people. M. d'Alliez, one of the gentils-hommes of Montauban, though arrived at a venerable old age, was so maltreated that it was thought he would die in consequence. M. de Garisson, another of the most considerable persons in the city, and an intimate friend of the intendant, went and threw himself at the latter's feet, imploring his protection, and conjuring him to deliver him from the hands of the soldiers, so that his conscience might be at rest, telling him too, that he might take all his property, worth about a million, in return for the favour he craved. The intendant, far from being shaken, ordered his friend to be treated worse than others, and dragged away. The means most generally employed in tormenting this poor people, and which hell only could have invented, were for several of the strongest soldiers, or troopers, to seize a man and keep him moving day and night in a room, tickling him incessantly, and bandying him from one to the other, without the smallest respite, and giving neither meat, nor drink, nor sleep, for three days and nights together. On the poor man becoming quite exhausted, they would throw him on a bed, and there continue to tickle and torment him; after which they would walk him about, still tickling or switching him with rods to keep him awake. When one party became tired, another commenced afresh. By this shocking treatment, employed in Bearn and elsewhere, several persons lost their senses, and others have become half idiots. Such as had no other resource, have abandoned their property, their wives, children, and aged relations, to the mercy of these barbarous and ferocious troops.

The same arts of inhuman violence have been committed at Negreplise, a town near Montauban. There the soldiers committed the most inconceivable outrages. Isaac Favin, a burghess, was hung up by the arm-pits, and tormented with pincers for a whole night, his constancy remaining unshaken. The wife of a person called Rouffion, a carpenter, was dragged to church by the soldiers, and died on the steps of the church door. A large fire was kindled round a child of about ten years of age, who cried continually, "My God, help me," and when they saw him make up his mind to die, and on the point of being burnt, he was withdrawn.

The towns of Caussade, Red Ville, St Anthodin, and others, in Upper Guyenne, have suffered the same treatment, and the same has been the lot of Bergerac and several other towns of Lower Guyenne. The troops were then sent to Castres, to commit the same barbarities there, and no doubt they will thus go on, from town to town, unless it please God to have compassion on his people. It may easily be believed that this horrible persecution, combined with the artifices employed to disguise the Church of Rome, and to persuade Protestants that they will be allowed to serve God as before, has made many weak persons give way, or leads them to give the lie with their mouth to their own hearts, in the hope of returning as soon as an occasion shall occur. They would even have those who by such diabolical methods have been compelled to blaspheme and abjure their religion, themselves to be the persecutors and executioners of their wives and children, for they are told that if within three days they do not oblige them to follow their example, that will be effected by overwhelming them with soldiers. Who, after that, can doubt that these wretched troops are the emissaries of hell, now putting forth its last efforts? We are assured that the clergy have resolved on the destruction of the Protestants of France by the same methods that are now employed, and that previous to their dissolution, they informed the king that a seizure ought to be made of all children of fourteen years and under; that these would comprise the half at least of the population attached to the reformed religion; that the troops would oblige almost all the remainder to change; that as for those who might resist, their property should be taken from them, and given to such of their relations as shall have abjured their religion, and that should any remain after that, they could form only a handful, who might easily be chased out of the kingdom, by allowing the Roman Catholics to hunt them down. The various measures craved by the assembly of the clergy from the king, for completing the destruction of the Protestants, sufficiently indicated what sort of spirit animated these gentlemen; and at this day bishops may be seen, who, putting themselves at the head of dragoons, or by way of preparation beforehand for their arrival, proclaim to these poor people, that they must abjure their religion, otherwise they will be abandoned to the fury of these ferocious beasts. One may judge now whether the spirit of God, or that of the Devil, presided at the late meeting of these gentlemen, and whether the Church of Rome bears the character of the true church, or of an antichristian church. O great God! who from thy holy throne, beholdest all the outrages inflicted on thy people, hasten thou to our relief. Great God, whose compassions are infinite, suffer thyself to be moved at our extreme desolation. Though men are insensible to our griefs, though they are deaf to our cries, and groans, and supplications, let thy compassions be moved in our favour. Great God, in whose cause we endure so many tribulations, and who knowest our innocence, our weakness, the fury of our enemies, and the small help we find in the world, if thou pity us not, we perish! Thou it is, who art our rock, our God, our Father, our Deliverer. We put our whole confidence on Thee alone; let us never be put to confusion, for in Thee do we hope. Hasten Lord to our help, who art our deliverance.

DEATH OF AN INFANT IN ITS MOTHER'S ARMS.

HE slumbers long, sweet mother,
Upon thy gentle breast,
Thou'rt weary now with watching,
Sweet mother, go to rest;
There seems no pain to stir him,
The peril sure is past;
For see, his soft hand clasped in thine,
He heeds not storm nor blast.

Why dost thou gaze so wildly?
Why strain thy strong embrace?
Unlock thy fearful clasping,
And let me see his face,
So down that mother laid him,
In her agony of care,
And kissed that cold and marble brow
With calm and fix'd despair.

O weep! there's holy healing
In every gushing tear,
Nor question thus that beauteous clay,—
The angel is not here:
No shut of rose at even-tide
Was with a peace so deep;
As thus thy youngest, fairest one,
Sank down in dove-like sleep.

Where best he loved to hide him,
In that dear sheltering spot,
Just there his tender spirit pass'd—
Pass'd, and she knew it not.
His fond lip never trembled,
Nor sigh'd the parting breath,
When strangely, for his nectar'd draught
He drank the cup of death.

Full was thy lot of blessing,
To charm his cradle hours,
To touch his sparkling fount of thought,
And breathe his breath of flowers,
And take the daily lesson,
From the smile that breathed so free
Of what in holier, brighter realms,
The pure in heart must be.

Nor more thy twilight musing
May with his image shine,
When in that lonely hour of love
He laid his cheek to thine:
So still and so confiding
That cherish'd babe would be,
So like a sinless guest from heaven,
And yet a part of thee.

But now his blessed portion
Is o'er the cloud to soar,
And spread a never-wearied wing
Where sorrows are no more,
With cherubim and seraphim
To tread th' ethereal plain;
High honour hath it been to thee
To swell that glorious train.

NOTES ON EGYPT.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER DUFF, D. D.,

PART V.

WHAT could have been the real origin and end of the Pyramids? Formerly, we felt a priori repugnance in admitting the plain unvarnished statement of Herodotus, who represents them as sepulchral monuments, reared by the pride and vanity and superstition of tyrant monarchs—deeming the account, if not incredible, at least wholly unworthy of the boasted wisdom of Egypt. Standing, however, where we now do, it seems impossible to doubt, that, of all others, the account of the Grecian historian is the truest and the best. The desire of perpetuating one's name and memory by monumental piles has prevailed in all countries and in all ages. In the case of many of the great men of the earth this desire has often risen into a sort of rage, or predominant passion, for whose gratification the wealth of provinces, and the might of kingdoms has scarcely sufficed. In Egypt, from the earliest times, owing to the prevalent doctrine of its people, respecting transmigration and the absolute necessity of preserving the body undecayed, in order to its after re-inhabitation by the former departed spirit, this animating passion became epidemic and national. While the great, accordingly, had their towering mausoleums above ground, the multitude must have their well-excavated and well-walled pits and vaults, and catacombs beneath. But, in Egypt, the alluvial soil is far too limited in quantity, and far too precious in quality, to be occupied to the vast extent which the execution of such works might demand. Hence, doubtless it is, that, throughout the entire length of Egypt, the principal repositories for the dead are found behind or opposite to the ancient cities, upon the margin of the utterly unproductive and boundless desert of Libya, which constitutes the western boundary of the valley, sometimes terminating in a gradual undulating sandy descent, and sometimes stretching along in an abrupt precipitous wall, or shooting out into a bluff rocky promontory of two or three hundred feet in height. Now, it is in the very midst of these sacred repositories of mummy pits and catacombs, that the three great clusters of pyramids are still to be seen. There is abundant evidence that one of the earliest streams of emigration passed into Africa by the straits of Babelmandel—that a portion of it, settling at Thebes, made it the capital of a great empire—and that, as it descended the fertile vale, the seat of empire was successively changed, till the last purely Egyptian dynasty became extinct at Memphis. Accordingly, from Thebes downwards there are many smaller pyramids or tumuli. The first great cluster is at Dashur, between twenty and thirty miles above Cairo. These are universally allowed to be the rudest and least perfect of the principal groups. The next cluster is on the elevated platform immediately behind the site of Memphis; and manifests signs of improved architectural skill. The last, and greatest, and most perfect of the whole is that on the loftiest of which we now stand, exactly confronting Cairo, the acknowledged site of the Egyptian Babylon, founded by Cambyzes. What then are these huge structures? Standing where we now do, the question seems scarcely to admit of reasoning at all. There is an intense feeling, and we cannot help it; there is, in spite of ourselves, an overwhelming sensation, that they are sepulchral monuments and nothing more. Wherever we turn, what do our eyes behold? Close to the very base of these mighty fabrics, and around them for miles in all directions, are numberless subterranean excavations, pits, or catacombs, in which have been discovered sarcophagi and piles of the embalmed dead. Around them, in all directions, are numberless supernal edifices, mounds, or tumuli, in which, when opened, have been found bones, and fragments of wooden cases, and banded mummies. And in any of the pyramids which have been explored, what has ever yet been found except some vaulted chambers, a sarcophagus, and a few mouldering bones? Altogether, it seems utterly impossible to stand here, surrounded by such an endless variety of indisputable memorials of the dead,—differing not less in size than in form and structure,—without being resistlessly impressed with the conviction that we are really standing in the centre of a vast Necropolis, or city of the dead—as resistlessly impressed with that conviction, as if encompassed by the monuments of the largest church-yard in Christendom; and that these towering pyramidal piles are only the most gigantic of ten thousand clustering mausoleums. Instead, therefore, of any longer regarding them as monuments of “hidden wisdom, mystery and wonder,”—methinks the only real mystery and wonder is, that men of sense should, for ages, have insisted on forcing sparkles of some rare wisdom out of masses which doggedly refuse to testify to aught save the delusive hopes of superstition, the extravagant pride of the tyrant, and the galling submission of the slave.

But what are these furrows around the great Sphinx? What these hollow perforated stones at the mouth of the mummy pits? What these masses of rubbish beneath the openings of the two great pyramids? Ah! These ought to teach us a memorable lesson. They are the surviving witnesses of a zeal the most fervent—a perseverance the most enduring; the zeal of antiquarian research; the perseverance of men, who, exiling themselves from their native homes and all the comforts and enjoyments of civilized society, spent days, and months, and years—not in ascetic indolence, but in the most indefatigable activity, amid the gloomy solitude of caves, and catacombs, and pyramidal vaults, where the oppressiveness of the heat, and the impurity of a confined atmosphere often affected their corporeal system, even to the bursting of veins and arteries! All for what?—for the discovery of a dark passage or sepulchral vault—a stone coffin or mouldering mummy! And yet, an applauding world, glistening with joy, dignifies the spirit which animated these adventurers, as that of the noblest and most heroic enthusiasm! Oh! the short-sighted misjudging partiality of man! Should any of the citizens of Zion, fraught with the fervour of a divine benevolence, resolve to submit to even a similar amount of self-sacrifice, when bent on the God-like enterprise of attempting the recovery of lost souls—each one of which in real preciousness would, in the balance of the sanctuary, outweigh all the pyramids, yea, and the great globe itself which sustains them;—the spirit by which they are actuated must be stigmatized as that of a “senseless fanaticism!” Verily, there is a day coming, when the most heedless of a scoffing race shall be compelled to acknowledge that the redemption of one lost soul would have been an object of importance infinitely transcending the revelation of all the mysteries, not of Egypt alone, but of the whole physical universe!

From the pyramids of Ghizeh, skirting along the margin of the desert, we proceeded in a southerly direction to those of Sakharah, distant about eight or nine miles. These two, as already remarked, are in the very centre of numberless tombs and mummy pits, constituting the great cemetery of ancient Memphis. One of the pyramids is in a state of total dilapidation, being now a shapeless mass of stones and crumbling materials. Another, on one of its sides, presents an aspect similar to that exhibited by the alip of a forest on the slope of a hill. A third consists of half a dozen diminishing platforms, not unlike the ordinary representation of the tower of Babel. Here we saw some of the mummy pits which had been opened by Mr Wilkinson and others; the painted walls of which exhibit representations of ancient figures, costumes, and instruments, in colours as fresh and vivid as if the pencil of the artist had only crossed them yesterday. We also witnessed numbers of Arabs busily engaged in excavating other pits, for the sake of extricating the mummies, which have now become one of the most profitable marketable commodities in the land of Egypt. Never, perhaps, has the vanity of the human heart met with a more decisive humbling; or the folly of superstition with a more signal exposure. What anxious labour, what profuse expenditure lavished on the embalming of the dead body, and on the fabricating of conditoria for its reception till the expiry of the cycle of three thousand years of transmigration, after which it was believed that the disembodied spirit should return to repossess and reanimate its former identical tenement! The cycle of transmigration has now, in the case of millions of the embalmed dead, run its course. But what human spirits have ever yet returned? Or, should they now return, where are the perfectly preserved bodies to receive them? Omnipotence requires not that the human frame should retain its substantial form in order to a resurrection. That Power, which could at first summon the dust to assume a form of such wondrous symmetry and beauty, can again command

* This is the ordinary representation of the ancient Egyptian doctrine. But Servius, in his comment on Virgil's Æneid, attempts to show that the Egyptians, “skilful in wisdom, kept their dead embalmed so much the longer, to the end that the soul might for a long while continue and be obnoxious to the body, lest it should quickly pass to another;—while, on the contrary, the Romans burnt their dead, that “the soul might suddenly return into the generality, that is, into its own nature.” Hence, in order that “the body might not, either by putrefaction be reduced to dust, out of which it was taken; or by fire be converted into ashes; they invented curious compositions, besides the entombing them in stately reconditoria (such as catacombs and pyramids), thereby to preserve them from rotteness, and to make them eternal.” According to this representation, not less than the other, how utterly confounded has the wisdom of Egypt become!—how utterly blasted its hopes!—by the ruthless pillage of its sepulchres, and the widespread destruction of their slumbering tenants!

the same scattered dust to mould itself into a form vastly more glorious. Ignorant of Jehovah's power, the ancient Egyptians fondly believed that the perfect preservation of the material form was essential to its ultimate spiritual reanimation. How cruelly have their hopes been mocked! Hundreds of the most sacred repositories of their dead have been sold to the highest bidder, for the very purpose of being ransacked, and wholly rifled of their contents! Yea, to consummate the ignominy, mummy flesh is now constantly sold as a peculiar species of merchandise destined for a very peculiar use! It seems that in the master-pieces of Titian, the founder of the brilliant but sensuous school of colours in painting, there is one species of brown tint, which it had baffled all his successors to imitate. But the notable discovery has now been made, that, by means of a portion of mummy flesh, an imitation may be produced;—which, in point of fact, has so far succeeded, that hundreds of paintings are annually disposed of, as genuine products of that celebrated artist. How little could it have entered into the imaginations of the ancient embalmers of Egypt to conceive, that, instead of preserving a tabernacle of clay for its after re-possession by the returning soul, they were only expending toil, anxiety, and wealth, in preparing materials for a few unprincipled Italian painters of the nineteenth century, to enable them successfully to practise a gainful but nefarious imposition!

In descending from the dreary heights of Sakharah to the valley immediately below, we were struck with the singular appearance of a long strip of marshy ground between the base of the Libyan ridge and the flat plain beyond. It looked as if it had been scooped out and hollowed. Its entire aspect irresistibly made us stop and cry out, “Surely that must be the deserted bed of a lake or river.” Instantly it came to our remembrance, that between Memphis and the Libyan range, there was once an artificial lake which communicated with the Nile—the celebrated Acherusia of Diodorus. On passing this deep channel, it became palpable to the eye of sense that, when the lake existed, the bodies of the dead from Memphis, must have been ferried over, most probably by an established ferry-man, and at a regulated hire, to be interred in the general Necropolis, on the heights above. Now, as the Greeks, by the confession of Herodotus and other writers of their own, borrowed the main part of their mythology from Egypt, and the Romans from the Greeks, how could we resist the inference, that, from the very scene then before our eyes, originated all the fables of the Greek and Roman poets relative to the dark Stygian lake—to Charon, his ferry-boat and “obolus” hire? And the inference seemed conclusive, when the eye, at a single glance, now embraced the elevated plains of the pyramids and the mummies in all their naked and desolate horrors as if scathed and blasted by some consuming fire, with the beauteous groves and plains, spreading out from their base beyond the flood, then clad in living green. It seemed to us the very reality which primarily gave rise to the mythologic scenery so powerfully painted in the sixth book of the Æneid, when the poet expatiates on the “dark and turbid waters of Acheron,” with its “horror-striking banks,” encompassing the region of “doleful shades;” and the “green vale,” with its “grassy sward,” in which were found the abodes of the blessed. But, O, how unlike that bright realm, of which the poetic region of "eternal spring and never-withering flowers" is but the gross material type!

With no ordinary emotion did we approach and traverse the site of ancient Memphis;—Memphis, once introduced by name in our received version; "Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them," Hosea ix. 6. Memphis, often referred to by other prophets under the designation of Noph; "The princes of Noph are deceived, they have also seduced Egypt," Isaiah xix. 13. Memphis, the capital of the Pharaohs—the seat of the Magi or wise men who were the counsellors of kings—the place of Joseph's unmerited disgrace and subsequent glorious exaltation—the school where Moses became learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians—the scene of the most stupendous miracles—the witness of the vindication of Jehovah's supremacy over the idols of Egypt, and the powers and principalities of darkness! Oh, how changed from the day when Egypt's proud monarch presumed to defy the great "I AM," saying, "I will not let the people go!" For several miles together, nought is visible now, save heaps of pounded rubbish, interspersed with clumps of palm trees!

This utter annihilation of a city so interwoven with the texture of Sacred History, naturally led the mind to revert with admiration to the singular fulfilment of Scripture prophecies—prophecies, uttered at a time when Egypt outshone all other lands in the pomp and glory of her wisdom, her princes, her cities, her canals, her rivers, and her idols.

"Where are thy wise men?"—asks the prophet Isaiah—"Where are they?" Where are thy wise men? Where are they?—may Echo now mournfully respond from every corner of a land whence all wisdom hath fled, and the very remembrance of it hath perished. The wisdom of its priests and people has, to adopt the emphatic language of a modern writer, given place to "the decrepitude and imbecility of a second childhood. No native can now decipher a single inscription in the sacred character; but foreigners from the extremity of Western Europe must be called in, to diainter the monuments, and to unravel the hieroglyphic records of the past."

"I will set fire in Egypt," saith the Spirit of the Lord by the Prophet Ezekiel, "and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted." All the ancient cities of Egypt, without one exception, are now wasted—so wasted, as to be without an inhabitant. Some of them exhibit nought but the promiscuous confusion of broken columns, and shattered edifices. The traces of others have become so strangely obliterated, that the precise spot where they stood is still a matter of debate among antiquarians. Many of them have disappeared altogether amid the sands of the desert.

"I will make the rivers (of Egypt) dry," saith the Lord. How many lakes, canals and large branches of the Nile itself have, in upper Egypt, been literally dried up and choked with sand! And in lower Egypt, of the seven mouths of the Nile, five of which were natural and two artificial, is it not memorable that the two latter are the only ones, which remain as free outlets of the mighty stream?—and that the five former are now so obstructed, as to be either wholly dried up, or converted into stagnant marshes?

"I will make the land of Egypt desolate, in the midst of the countries that are desolate." And is it not matter of historic fact, that many an immense and flourishing district along the whole extent of Egypt has become irretrievably desolate? the once fertile fields being now turned into a burning desert? Yea, as the necessary consequence of such desolation, is it not also matter of historic fact, that a territory which formerly supplied the necessaries and luxuries of life to upwards of seven millions, can now very inadequately support a third part of that number? Nor is the progress of desolation yet ended. Through the repressive energies of a merciless tyranny, the work of destruction is advancing apace—and in many places advancing rapidly and irretraceably.

"I will also destroy the idols, and will cause their images to cease out of Noph," (Memphis.) Where are now the once famed idles and images of Egypt? Egypt, the very birth-place and cradle of the leading mythologies and idolatries of antiquity? They are hid in the burning sands, buried beneath the rubbish of ruins, strewn in mutilated and dishonoured fragments upon the surface, or transported to replenish the museums, and the galleries of every metropolis in Europe with idle curiosities

"The pomp of her strength shall cease," continues the prophet; "the pride of her power shall come down. I will sell the lands into the hands of the wicked; it shall be a base kingdom, the basest of the kingdoms; and there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt." How singularly minute the verification of every part of this most remarkable prophecy! Where now is the pomp of Egypt's ancient strength—the pride of her ancient power? all, all sepulchred in the dust which covers her temples and palaces, and stupendous monuments. The only visible remaining relic of the "pomp and pride" of royal Memphis, is the huge bust of the colossal statue of Sesostris, erected by himself, with several others in front of the temple of Vulcan. It was the practice of this proud conqueror to rear pillars in every subjugated province, invariably bearing the daringly presumptuous inscription, "Sesostris, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, subdued this country by his arms." Now, as if to verify to the very senses of posterity the faithfulness of His word, who declares, that he "will stain the pride of all glory," the most gigantic representation of the heathen himself, now lies amid the ruins of his own capital—lies shattered and mutilated in the most humiliating of all postures, even in a deep trench, with its face fast stuck in the mud! And what mere human sagacity could possibly have foreseen, or what stretch of mere human hardihood could possibly have hazarded the remaining parts of the prediction?—and that too, at a time when Egypt to human eye appeared the greatest and most flourishing, as well as to human estimate the most stable and permanent, of all earthly kingdoms? Yet, is it not the undisputed and indisputable testimony of all history that, since the days of the prophets, Egypt has been overrun by successive races of foreign conquerors, and literally sold into the hands of wicked oppressors? that, since the days of the prophets, there never has been, even amid innumerable scenes of anarchy and change, a single native prince of the land of Egypt? Nor is this all. The insults, indig-

nicities, cruelties, and miseries to which the wretched inhabitants have almost uninterruptedly, throughout the long period of two thousand years, passively submitted, almost exceed credibility. So entirely extinct has the spirit of liberty and independence become, that in the present moment, even in the lowest depths of their woe, they never dream of the rise and formation of a native government. No; so crushed have their souls become, that they seem utterly incapable of entertaining a sentiment which has been cherished by the crouching Greek, the degenerate Italian, the submissive Hindu, and the fettered Negro. At this moment, those who have most freely mingled with them, and know their mind best, positively assure us, that the height of their ambition, the loftiest aspiration of their shrivelled souls, is, that God, in his providence, may be pleased to permit some other foreign power of a milder character to assume the sceptre; prepared to reckon it the greatest privilege, should only a whip of rods be substituted in place of the present fiercely brandished scourge of scorpions. Thus truly and literally has Egypt gradually become not only "base," but "the basest of the kingdoms."

Here, as every where else, how can the humble but enlightened soul more wisely terminate its inquiries into the ways of Providence, than in the simple yet sublime language of the holy apostle?—"Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

ZION'S DESOLATIONS CONTEMPLATED AND IMPROVED:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. THOMAS DOIG, A.M.,
Minister of Torryburn, Fifeshire.

"For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim, because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate; the foxes walk upon it," &c.—LAM. v. 17-21.

JEREMIAH, from whose Lamentations these words are selected, has been often characterised as "the weeping prophet." The style of his writings is remarkable for its plaintiveness, and for the sorrowful spirit which it breathes. He had seen Jerusalem in all its glory, and he had lived to be a witness of its desolation. Spared amidst the slaughter consequent upon the taking of the city, and left behind when his countrymen were carried into captivity, he sat down amongst the ruins and wept. There, in all probability, were penned his pathetic Lamentations—the outpourings of a soul overflowing with the purest patriotism and the most ardent piety.

These, unless devoid of all feeling, it is impossible for us to peruse without being deeply affected; nor, in the perusal of them, will the Lord's people fail to perceive much which, while fitted, on the one hand, to humble them, is calculated, on the other, to impart to them the richest comfort and the most precious instruction. Thus it is in that portion of the book which it is now proposed to make the subject of discourse;—in which is set before us, 1st, A distressing experience; 2d, A reviving sentiment; 3d, A holy expostulation; and, 4th, An earnest prayer. "For this," says the prophet, "our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim, because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate; the foxes walk upon it. Thou, O Lord, remainest for ever; thy throne from generation to generation. Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us so long time? Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned; renew our days as of old."

I. In our text there is presented to us a distressing experience: "For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim, because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate; the foxes walk upon it."—Often, in former days, had the prophet looked upon the spot that now met his view; but a sad and melancholy change had come over it. All that had constituted its glory was gone—its ruins only remained; and the wild beasts of the field had begun to make it their dwelling-place. The spectacle which Mount Zion thus exhibited was necessarily fitted both to agitate and afflict a pious and patriotic soul. There, had stood the temple of the living God; and there, through the medium of the visible symbol of his presence, God had condescended to converse with man. There, those sacrifices had been offered which he had declared to be pleasing in his sight; and thence were to spring those blessings which would one day restore to the people of every land that communion with the Father of mercies which they had lost by the fall. These, the circumstances with which Zion was associated, had led the Psalmist to regard it as "the joy of the whole earth;" and, now that all was turned to desolation, who can wonder that the prophet should have wept—that his heart should have been faint, and his eyes dim—and that the most distressing of all feelings should have oppressed him? God had visited his own holy habitation in anger. Because of the transgressions of his people, he had afflicted them; because of their forgetfulness of his mercies, he had forsaken them; because of their abuse of his ordinances, he had carried them away captive. They had had their day of grace; but they had refused to improve that day. The means of grace had, in consequence, been withdrawn; and, instead of the sunshine of God's countenance, a cloud of darkness covered the sanctuary.

If such a state of things occasioned to the prophet a feeling of the deepest distress, similar must be the experience of the Lord's people, when any portion of the Church is visited with tokens of the divine displeasure. Even were such visitations to be viewed in the light merely of a trial of the faith and patience of the saints, still in themselves they behoved to be associated with a painful experience. Sin is the original cause of all trouble and sorrow. Sins, by us unrepented of—sins, forgotten it may be by us, but not forgotten by God—these, undoubtedly, as affording cause of humiliation, grief, and bitterness, are to be considered in connection with the removal of the light of the divine countenance; and if we cast our eyes abroad on any portion of the visible Church, if we look either at its past history or present condition, where can we take our station, and say that difficulties, or trials, or threatenings of judgment, are being made manifest, without being constrained to acknowledge that there are sins to be accounted for, and for which a fearful reckoning may be demanded? Who can tell whether such visitations may not be the beginning of a day of darkness that is to continue—of a removal of the light of God's countenance, to be followed by no gracious return—of a departure of God from a people whom he has "given over to a reprobate mind," and left to "wonder and perish?" And if he should thus depart from any portion of his vineyard, which, because of unfruitfulness, he has abandoned to an enduring curse, who may describe the distress which such a judgment is fitted to create? "My bowels are troubled, mine heart is turned within me, mine eyes do fail with tears,"—these were the sentiments of the prophet, even although he knew that, in due time, the Lord would "arise, and have mercy upon Zion." What, then, would his emotions have been, if he had thought that God had for ever forsaken his sanctuary! An apprehension like this must unquestionably be associated with the deepest possible distress. When God thus departs from a people, all is gone that might have sanctified and saved them. His Word, which might have nourished them, is withdrawn; and they are left to languish and die. His Spirit, that might have convinced and converted them, is withdrawn; and they perish as outcasts from his love. His blessing, which might have revived them, is withdrawn; and the mark of his curse is imprinted on their forehead. His candle, which might have given them light, is withdrawn; and the darkness of death surrounds them. His grace, which might have protected them, is withdrawn; and they are seized by their enemies, and hurried to destruction and despair.

In connection, however, with the distressing experience of the prophet, we are introduced by him,

II. To a reviving sentiment: "Thou, O Lord," says he, "remainest for ever; thy throne from generation to generation."—When the walls of Zion were broken down, and Zion's temple was levelled with the dust; when the streets of Jerusalem were desolate, and her gates were burned with fire; when Judah had gone into captivity, and her children "sat down by the rivers of Babylon, and wept;"—they who, in the day of her distress, had cried, "Raze it! Raze it to the foundation thereof!" imagined that her name was utterly lost and gone. They looked upon the outward appearance; but they forgot to look beyond it. They had beheld the seeming ruin of a people whom the Lord had declared to be his chosen inheritance; but they forgot that it was the Lord's doing, to chastise them for their sins, and, by afflicting them, to recall them from their backslidings. They forgot that "the Lord remaineth for ever, and his throne from generation to generation." They understood not his purposes; they knew not the manner of his providential dispensations. They overlooked his promises, which are all "yea and amen." They considered not his counsels, which "are of old, even from everlasting;" and with which a demonstration of his glory is associated that will employ the praises of eternity.

But the prophet, amidst the very tears that were shed by him over the fallen fortunes of Jerusalem, could fix his thoughts upon One who is ever the same; and his spirit was revived in consequence. And thus have God's people in all ages been sustained. The Lord, as it regards his own cause, may hide his face; but it will only be for a season. He may remove his candle from one corner of the earth; but it will be to plant it in another—he will not suffer it to be extinguished. Under the proud walls of Babylon he preserved his Church, as he had done within Judah's hallowed sanctuary. He may remove his Church from one land to another, but he will not remove it from off the face of the earth; and there is a day approaching, when, in accordance with his own purposes, and in fulfilment of his own promises, he will make his glory universally known, and "all nations shall call him blessed." Here, under every trial, and amidst the most calamitous visitations, it is the privilege of his believing people to rest. "The Lord reigneth, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations." And this is his promise, in illustration of his purposes, "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee; neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."

However mysterious and trying the doings of God, as the Supreme Governor of the universe, may at times seem to be, there is a covenant relation in which he stands towards his people, that cannot be annulled. As his own existence and purposes are eternal and unchangeable, so is that provision which he has made for his Church, and for a continued succession of believers, who shall know his name, and rejoice in his salvation. Each generation, accordingly, as it has passed away, has furnished a demonstration of the fact, that "the house of God, the Church of the living God," is established on "the Rock of ages." The company, indeed, composing it has often been small; but its existence as a company has never failed. It has often been persecuted and oppressed, and has seemingly, at times, been on the eve of extinction; yet it has endured. States and empires have risen and flourished, and declined and disappeared; but, amidst the ruin and desolation that have thus ensued, a people have been preserved, devoted to the Lord. The languages of the nations have changed, and many a tongue, once spoken by millions, is now unknown; but there has at all times been a language in which the praises of God were celebrated. "The name of the Lord," as "a strong tower to his people," has continued to be known and trusted in, and it will be known and trusted in for ever.

Our views, however, are not to be confined to a mere inert acknowledgment of the supremacy of God, and of the unchanging character of his government; for,

III. Along with the reviving sentiment, which, in connection with his distressing experience, took possession of the prophet's soul, he proceeds to adopt the language of holy expostulation: "Wherefore," he exclaims, "dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us so long time?"—The prophet foresaw that the captivity would be of long continuance—that, many years to come, Zion would be desolate. It looked, in these circumstances, as if the Lord had abandoned his people to irrecoverable ruin—as if the heathen had achieved a lasting triumph—as if the way of truth were in danger of being lost, and the covenant of God of being broken. In a continuance of the calamity which had come upon Jerusalem, the honour of God's own cause seemed involved. Animated, therefore, with a holy zeal for the glory of God as associated with the prosperity of his Church, the prophet asks whether it could be that God would afford no sign of his returning favour, which might reanimate the hopes of his afflicted people, and keep them from fainting under the reproach of their enemies? We are not, indeed, at liberty to arraign the doings of the Lord, as if, in any circumstances, these were unrighteous. Even when his hand is felt to be heaviest upon us, it becomes us submissively to say, "Good is the will of the Lord."

Yet, while we may not arraign the rectitude of his doings, nor infer that he will finally cast off even the meanest of his saints,—because this would be to impeach his truth, and to distrust his loving-kindness, we may, nevertheless, in a spirit of deep humility, inquire wherefore he is contending with us, and wherefore he is contending, when he does thus contend, with the Church which he has "purchased with his own blood." A knowledge of the reason of these his mysterious doings may, in many respects, be desirable both to humble and to prove us, and to impress us with sentiments which accord with his mind and will.

On this principle the believer feels it to be alike his duty and his privilege, in the day whether of his own or of the Church's calamity, to draw near to God, and, as a child to a father, to pour out his soul before him. Nor, in thus presenting himself at the throne of grace, is it easy to say how far at times he may not be at liberty to go. If we look into Scripture, we find instances of eminent saints venturing on some occasions, shall I say it, even to expostulate with God? Thus did the father of the faithful, when made acquainted with the impending doom of Sodom. "Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked?" he exclaimed, "That be far from thee, to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked that be far from thee: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" We are in a manner surprised, when we read the narrative of his pleading on this occasion. It is more than prayer; it is expostulation. Yet the sentiments which he breathed were not those of unhallowed presumption; for he bowed with the deepest reverence before God when he addressed him. It was that enlargement of soul, which they only know, who, in the strength of a living faith, have long walked with the Most High as their Father and their Friend. And similar, accordingly, at times has been the experience of the saints in after ages. Thus, for instance, it was with Luther in that most eventful of all passages in his history, when his enemies who had gathered around him on every side, thought they had swallowed him up,—when the proudest of earth's potentates sat in judgment over him,—when the papacy had written out the sentence which doomed him to death, and which doomed the Reformation to destruction along with him. In these distressing circumstances, when, to the eye of man, the cause of truth seemed on the eve of perishing, he was overheard in an agony of soul to exclaim, "O God, Almighty God everlasting! if I am to depend on any strength of this world, all is over; the knell is struck; sentence is gone forth. O God! O God! O thou my God, help me against the wisdom of this world: the work is not mine, but thine. I have no business here. I would gladly spend my days in happiness and peace. But the cause is thine; and it is righteous and everlasting. O Lord, help me. O faithful and unchangeable God, I lean not upon man. My God, my God, dost thou not hear: my God, art thou no longer living? Nay, thou canst not die: Thou dost but hide thyself. My God, where art thou? The cause is holy; it is thine own. I will not let thee go; no, nor yet for all eternity."

These and others of his expressions on this eventful occasion which I might have quoted, remind us impressively of the manner in which he viewed his case as associated with the manifestation of God's purposes towards his Church and people. It was this that so moved him. It was this that so agitated his soul as to lead him, so to speak, to expostulate with God. And it appears to have been on a somewhat similar principle, and with somewhat similar feelings, that, with reference to the experience and prospects of Zion, the prophet in our text exclaims, "Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us so long time?"

In a state of things like that we have been adverting to, we are necessarily reminded of the utter vanity of all human resources. We feel that to God alone we can look for help and deliverance. And the consciousness that this is alike our duty and our privilege will lead us to commend unto God at the footstool of his throne that which we know to be God's own cause. This, accordingly, is what the prophet does. For,

IV. He gives expression to his sentiments in the language of earnest prayer. "Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord," he exclaims, "and we shall be turned: renew our days as of old."—The manner in which this petition is expressed is worthy of our special notice, inasmuch as it recognises the cause of the sad calamity that gave occasion to it. The desire on the part of the suppliants that they might be turned unto the Lord, implies that they, in the first instance, had forsaken him; that, if they had been seemingly cast off, it was because they had previously declined from the path of commanded duty. God does not withdraw the communications of his favour, as if he took pleasure in the affliction of his people, but because he sees it meet to chastise them for their sins. Nor, blessed be his name, will he keep at a distance from them any longer than is necessary to answer the design for which he has afflicted them. If thoroughly humbled, repentant, and believing, they implore the restoration of the tokens of his love, they will not be left to implore this in vain. "Weeping may endure for a night; but joy cometh in the morning."

There is often, however, a sad reluctance on their part to make a full and unreserved confession of their guilt. They find it difficult to persuade themselves, either of the number, or of the extent of their backslidings. They fail, in consequence, to turn unto him with their whole heart and soul. Hence the manner of the prophet's prayer, "Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned."

God's grace is necessary to impart the very disposition, in connection with which, although not as the procuring cause, the return of God's favour may be enjoyed. But for that sanctified use of the captivity, which God only by his Spirit could give, Judah in her affliction would have gone farther than ever from the Lord. Without his renovating and reviving grace, Babylon would have been the grave of the Church; and the hope of Israel would there have been buried for ever. It was God by his Holy Spirit, that made the captive Jews, during the period of their exile, so to see the evil of idolatry, that ever after, they were cured of their leaning to this their besetting sin. And when he had thus turned them unto himself, he opened in due season a way for their deliverance, and planted them once more upon Mount Zion. For this the believing remnant amongst them had earnestly prayed; and their prayers were graciously answered.

There is much, then, in this part of the prophet's prayer, that is fitted to convey very precious instruction, in seasons, whether of outward spiritual calamity, or of inward spiritual distress. And, as on the one hand, it cannot be well with us until the Lord revisit us in mercy, so on the other, we cannot look for such a gracious visitation, unless we have been brought to see our exceeding sinfulness, and, confessing and bewailing our declensions, we seek with our whole heart and soul to return unto him.

Similar is the light, in which it becomes us to regard the next clause of the prayer in our text, "Renew our days as of old;" when a desire is expressed for a spiritual renovation, like that which had gladdened the Church, when, in ancient times, the Lord had evidently delighted over her for good. Many and glorious had been the manifestations of his favour to Zion "in the times of old,"—and the thought of these must have come home to the prophet in a most affecting manner, now that he looked upon the ruins of the sanctuary. A sense of present destitution and desertion when sanctified, will lead to a just appreciation of the mercies that have been withdrawn. We feel, in consequence, what we have lost by our transgressions; while, at the same time, we are reminded of what God may do, and of what he often has done for his people, when he is pleased to regard them graciously. We are thus induced to "covet earnestly the best gifts," and to plead for a return of the Divine favour which may fulfil the amplex of our wishes, and satisfy our largest desires. There is nothing too hard for the Lord. He, who afflicts his people for their sins, can heal their every wound, and enable them to wipe away their every tear. He can give them "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." He can "satisfy them with marrow and fatness," and not only fill their cup of blessing, but make it to "run over." Nor is there any thing which he sees to be for the good of his people, which he is not ready to grant in answer to believing, earnest prayer.

There may be amongst you those who are in spiritual distress, and whom the Lord is evidently chastising for their sins; and there may be of the Lord's people amongst you, who feel that they are "cast down," and who are afraid of being "utterly destroyed." And where is your hope? If you look to yourselves, you must despair; for you are without any strength of your own. But it is both your duty and privilege to look away from yourselves, and to look unto him who is the Lord, the Redeemer of his people. He is the same "yesterday, to-day and for ever." His loving-kindness faileth not; his mercy endureth from age to age. To him, in the day of your distress, you must look; for with him only is deliverance to be found. Nay more; it is even your privilege to ask, wherefore he is contending with you, and why, in the course of his dealings with you, you have been brought so low? And, at all events, let it be your prayer—the prayer of "a broken and contrite heart,"—that the Lord may turn you unto himself, and restore unto you the joy of his salvation. Nor be unmindful of present mercies, but be careful to improve them, lest God should, in judgment, remove them far away from you. And, alas! are there not multitudes, who, instead of seeking to improve their privileges, are guilty of habitually slighting and abusing them; "And shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord?" Consider, I beseech you, how it is, in these respects with yourselves. Do you prize, and study to profit, under the ordinary means of grace : These are the gift of God ; and it is these which, by the Divine blessing, are fitted to make you "wise unto salvation." Without a diligent use of these, you have no reason to expect that other, or more extraordinary means, will be blessed to your souls. Your curiosity may be excited—your ears may be tickled—your sympathies may be awakened—or an impression of terror may at the time come over you. But all will be found to be "as the morning cloud, or the early dew, that vanish away." It is not by means of highly-seasoned meats, that the body is nourished. It is not thus that health is promoted. It is the plain, regular diet, that imparts vigour and nourishment. And so it is in regard to that, which, by the Divine blessing, is associated with the well-being of the soul. What use then, I ask, have you made, and are now making of the ordinary means of grace ? For this, a very solemn reckoning is awaiting you. Be careful, to improve these your mercies, lest the day come when, deprived of the enjoyment of them, you will look and long for them in vain.

THE HAPPY LAND.

There is a happy land,
Far, far away,
Where saints in glory stand,
Bright, bright as day.
Oh ! how they sweetly sing,
Worthy is our Saviour King ;
Loud let his praises ring—
Praise, praise for aye.
Come to this happy land,
Come, come away ;
Why will ye doubting stand—
Why still delay ?
Oh ! we shall happy be,
When from sin and sorrow free ;
Lord, we shall live with thee—
Blest, blest for aye.
Bright, in that happy land,
Beams every eye ;
Kept by a Father's hand,
Love cannot die.
On, then, to glory run—
Be a crown and kingdom won ;
And bright above the sun
We reign for aye.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

In Christ all fulness dwells.—There is still in Christ a fulness of redundancy, notwithstanding all that he has expended. It were blasphemous to think that Christ should be a penny the poorer by all that he has laid out for the relief of all those who have their dependence upon him. It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell ; not stay or abide a night or a day, and away ; but should dwell. The sun has not the less light for filling the stars with light. A fountain has not the less for filling the lesser vessels. There is in Christ the fulness of a fountain. The everlasting fountain pours out water abundantly, and yet remains full. Why the Lord Jesus is such an overflowing fountain, he fills all, and yet remains full. Christ has the greatest worth and wealth in him. As the worth and value of many pieces of silver is in one piece of gold ; so all the petty excellencies scattered abroad in the creature, are united in Christ ; yea, all the whole volume of perfections, which is spread through heaven and earth, is epitomized in him.—REV. T. BROOKES.

The meekness of the suffering Saviour.—How was he wounded, who heals every disease ; how was he crowned with thorns, who crowns his martyrs with unfading garlands ; how was he stripped naked, who clothes the fields with flowers, and all the world with robes, and the whole globe with the canopy of heaven, and the dead with immortality ; how was he fed with gall and vinegar, who reaches out to his people the fruits of paradise, and the cup of salvation ! And when, at the crucifixion, the heavens were confounded, and the earth trembled, and the sun, that he might not behold the villany of the Jews, withdrew his shining, and left the world in darkness, still the blessed Jesus said nothing, and betrayed no emotion of anger ; but endured, without murmuring, all that earth and hell could lay upon him, till he had put the last stroke to the finished picture of perfect patience, and prayed for his murderers, whom he has been, ever since, and is now, ready to receive, upon their repentance, not only to pardon, but to a participation of the glories of his kingdom.—BISHOP HORNE.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE LATE REV. T. C. E. RHENIUS, MISSIONARY IN SOUTH INDIA.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART III.

FOR some time previous to the period at which we have now arrived in the history of this devoted missionary, the reader cannot fail to have perceived that discordant feelings and opinions were entertained, on various points, by the Committee of the Church Missionary Society on the one hand, and Mr Rhenius and his colleague Mr Schmid, on the other. The smouldering flame at length burst forth. A letter was received from the Committee, complaining that the missionaries were forming their converts into communities on the Lutheran model. The accusation was altogether without foundation. The missionaries, though employed by the Church Missionary Society, were themselves ministers of the Lutheran Church of Prussia, and it was not surely to be expected that, if their catechists objected to English ordination, as they actually did, they were to press it upon them. Nor indeed, did the Committee, in their first communication on the subject, profess to have formed any such expectation. But the demands which they made seem to involve them in a charge of proselytism, not to Christianity, but to a sect. We quote from the spirited reply of Mr Rhenius to the Committee's accusation :—

"I cannot agree with your sentiment, that missionaries who have been the instruments in the hand of God to raise up congregations from among the heathen, should thenceforth have nothing more to say respecting the formal settlement of them as Christian communities. I do not maintain that the Society should have no share in this matter ; but I think they should regard it as a concern of minor importance, and trust that those who have been enabled by Divine grace to do the one, will also be enabled to do the other, and provide the people with the means necessary for their farther instruction and edification. This is not my opinion only ; but several bishops of the Church of England herself have expressed themselves to the same effect. Bishop Burnet, for instance, says, 'Since I look upon the sacramental actions as the highest of sacred perfor-

manes, I cannot but acknowledge those who are empowered for them, must be of the highest office in the Church.' I think, therefore, that the Committee need not be so much opposed to our ordaining the native catechists, as if the Church of Christ would suffer thereby, or as if we had no scriptural right to do so. By their opposition, they plainly show that they have another interest besides that of the Church of Christ, contrary to their own frequent declarations in their publications. How different this from the apostle's catholic spirit, when he said, 'Notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice!'

"I am grieved to write to you thus, because nothing is farther from my thoughts than a desire to hurt your feelings, or to appear disrespectful to the Society. I trust they will receive what I have said as coming from a heart that sincerely endeavours to love the simple truth as it is in Jesus. This Word of Truth is my foundation; its promotion my design; and its maintenance my duty."

In the close of this letter, Mr Rhenius proposed three things:—that he should be allowed to return to Europe; that he should retire to Madras, where he might devote himself exclusively to the work of translation, in connection with the mission; or that, without quitting his station, he should attach himself at once to another missionary society. The concluding paragraph is as follows:—

"That you may be fully informed of my sentiments on the subject of the Church (as I have always dealt frankly and unreservedly with the Committee), I beg leave herewith to send a copy of my review of a small book, entitled 'The Church, her Daughters and Handmaidens,' &c., which the Rev. Mr Harper lately published, and of which he requested me to write a review."

Of the three proposals made to the Committee, they seem to have assented to the first; and Mr Rhenius, accordingly, resolved to go to England. He was prevented, however, from carrying this resolution into effect, by a letter from the Committee, stating that, from the change which had taken place in their members and constitution, his voyage to England would be unnecessary. In the midst of this disagreeable correspondence, he was unexpectedly refreshed by a visit from the celebrated Mr (now Dr) Wolf, who was travelling through India. This zealous missionary to the Jews made a short stay at Pallamcotta, but he remained long enough to form a very high opinion of Mr Rhenius's character as a Christian and a missionary. In his Journal, accordingly, we find him speaking of Mr Rhenius thus:—"The greatest missionary, I believe, who has ever appeared since the time of the apostles; more enterprising, more bold, and more talented than even Schwartz himself." Such a testimony from such a quarter is no mean tribute to the excellence of the man who is the subject of it; and we can only regret, that the Society by whom he was employed should have been so far led away by a narrow spirit of sectarianism, as to have dispensed with his invaluable services. But to proceed with the history of this unhappy dispute. Mr Rhenius, we have seen, entertained serious thoughts of visiting England, with the view of laying the whole circumstances of his case before the Committee in London. But as the Madras Committee dissuaded him from leaving India, and seemed not very anxious to press the ordination question upon him, he thought it was his duty to go on with his work, without insisting on an immediate adjustment of that question. For a time, accordingly, peace was restored, and our missionary set himself to his laborious duties, with his wonted devotedness and apostolic singleness of heart. Scarcely had a few months elapsed, however, when annoyances arose from a different quarter. Bishop Wilson had made a tour to the south, and in a charge to the clergy, which he published soon after, the following strange passage occurs:—"I discovered a system at work in the extreme south (province of Tinnevely), in direct opposition to our Protestant Episcopal Church—a system so ruinous, in my judgment, to the holiness and peace of the new converts, as to threaten a subversion among them of Christianity itself." The burden of this grave accusation was, that the missionaries were not adhering strictly and in all points to the forms of the Church of England—an offence which, in the eyes of the worthy Bishop, was of no light nature. Mr Tucker, the Secretary of the Madras Corresponding Committee, on the other hand, having inspected the affairs of the mission at Tinnevely, was quite delighted with what he saw and heard; and in the introduction to a report, which soon after appeared in a religious periodical in Madras, he expresses himself in the strongest terms in speaking of the manner in which the mission was conducted. At this juncture, the Madras Committee resolved to address a letter to Bishop Wilson, vindicating their missionary from the charges so rashly made. This resolution is dated 22d April 1835; and, on the 18th of May, Mr Rhenius received from Mr Tucker the resolution of the Home Committee, by which his connection with the Church Missionary Society was dissolved, on the ground of his having published a pamphlet, which they considered as inconsistent with the principles and constitution of the Church of England. The following is the resolution:—

"The Committee learn, with the deepest regret and distress, the publication in India by Mr Rhenius of his tract, entitled a 'Review,' &c., impugning, as it does, the government, ritual, formularies, and discipline of that Church with which he stood connected as a missionary of this Society; and that afflicting as it is to them to dissolve their connection with one whom, on many grounds, they highly honour and esteem, yet they feel bound, in consistency, as attached members of the Church of England, to take this very painful step, and to declare that the missionary relation which has hitherto subsisted between the Society and Mr Rhenius is at an end."

On receiving this announcement, Mr Rhenius sent for all the catechists, and acquainted them with the Committee's resolution, at the same time putting the question, Whether they were willing to adhere to the Society or to him? After some discussion and explanation, they declared their resolution to abide with him as hitherto, and to live in faith on the Lord's care. Mr Rhenius and his colleagues, accordingly, were now separated from the Society under whose auspices they had laboured since their arrival in India. Mr Tucker came to Pallamcotta, for the purpose of holding a conference on the subject, and Mr Rhenius addressed the following letter to him, as Secretary to the Madras Committee:—

"MY DEAR BROTHER,—Having received from you the Home Committee's resolution of 15th February 1835, dissolving my connection with the Society, in consequence of my publishing my Review of Mr Harper's book on the Church, I herewith declare,

"That as the dissolution involves my departure from Tinnevely, where the Lord's blessing has so long rested, and is still resting, upon my humble labours, as the Committee well know, and have repeatedly declared with joy and gratitude to God—I cannot but consider their resolution unjust towards me, and injurious to this mission; more particularly, as they have no other cause for it than simply my publishing the Review, in answer to the request of a chaplain who was then a member of the Madras Committee. The Home Committee have, these many years, been well aware that I hold the sentiments on Church forms contained in that Review, and that the mission here was conducted in accordance with those sentiments. If they were wrong, and hurtful to the cause of Christ, the Committee ought to have dissolved our connection long ago: as they did not do so, it is plain they did not consider them hurtful to the cause of Christ. The mere publication, therefore, of those sentiments cannot, in my humble opinion, amount to so serious a fault as to deserve a dissolution of my connection with the Society. May not a minister of the Gospel honestly avow his principles in ecclesiastical matters as well in public as in private; especially when he is called upon to do so by a member of the Committee? Has he no liberty to declare errors in Church matters, wherever he finds them? In publishing that Review, I had no intention whatever to stir up angry passions—to set the Church of England community against me, or to excite the Church Missionary Society to dissolve my connection with them; but simply to show that the assertions made in Mr Harper's book were not in accordance with the Holy Scriptures, as far as I know them;—and thus, honestly and calmly to investigate those subjects which had so often been the cause of disquietude between the Committee and myself. Since, however, the result has been such as I did not contemplate, I heartily deplore the publication of the Review.

"I fully concede that the Society have a strong claim on Tinnevely—the property is theirs;—but as for the congregations, I think I have as strong a claim on them as the Society have, if not a greater. I intended, therefore, to abide with the catechists and congregations at any rate; because the tie existing between them and me cannot easily be broken. But, understanding that you will still maintain a mission establishment here, I have for the sake of peace given up my intention, notwithstanding the earnest solicitations of the catechists; for I see that my remaining would only produce strife and contention—an evil by all means to be prevented if possible. I am, therefore, preparing to leave Tinnevely for Madras, where I shall consider farther what to do. One great object with me will be to carry on the work of translation with redoubled vigour, and to be useful in the publication of other religious books in Tamul, for the benefit of India.

"As to my successors in Tinnevely, I heartily pray that the Lord Jesus may bless them, and make the seed we have sown, and the plants we have planted, to grow and flourish under their care and labour.

"I beg to express my best thanks to the Home Committee, and to the Madras Committee, for the provision they have kindly made for me and my family for the present.

"The Lord in mercy soon heal these divisions, and deliver his Church from all differences, and the causes of them! May he soon pour out the gifts of his Spirit upon his people, that all may be one, as the Father and Christ are one—'that all may be perfect in one,' to the glory of his name!

"Notwithstanding the dissolution of our connection, painful as it is, I shall still cherish a high regard and affection for the Society; and, pray that the Lord's blessing may follow their labours, carried on according to his Holy Word, and in his Spirit.—And thus believe me, ever yours affectionately in Christ Jesus,

"C. RHENIUS.

In accordance with the views stated in this letter, Mr Rhenius adopted the step, unwise as it appears to us, of leaving Tinnevely, and thus breaking up his connection with the people among whom he had laboured with such efficiency and success. The Church Missionary Society, although they had an undoubted right to part with their official servants whenever they chose, had no right to demand Mr Rhenius's departure from his station. They had no possible claim upon any thing but the property of the mission. The catechists, native converts, and all who chose to abide by Mr Rhenius, had it in their power to do so if they chose. But, to avoid any altercation or misconstruction of his motives, he resolved to leave his post and set out for Madras. He took his departure, accordingly, on the 19th of June; and was speedily followed by his colleagues, Messrs Schaffter, Müller, and Lechler, along with several catechists. On their arrival at the presidency, they resolved to form a new mission; and Arcot, about sixty miles west from Madras, was fixed upon as their head-quarters. Before proceeding thither, Tamul letters, signed by forty-three catechists, arrived from Tinnevely, calling upon them to return. On holding a consultation with their friends, they decided to decline the invitation in the meantime. They set out, therefore, for Arcot, where they commenced their missionary proceedings. But, in a few weeks, another letter came from Pallamcotta, signed by seventy-seven catechists and others, requesting Mr Rhenius to return. He set out for Madras, to consult with his Christian friends and brethren on the subject; and, after much prayer and deliberation, we find him giving vent to his feelings in these words in his Journal:—

"It strikes me more and more, that I did wrong in leaving Tinnevely. We, in a manner, sanctioned the injustice of the act of the Society. The separating me from my churches for no proper cause, was an unjust act. In Tinnevely the Lord gave us, in various ways, to understand that we ought not to leave it. We left, however, in order to avoid strife and contention between opposition missions. But peace has not been obtained; and the congregations and catechists have called on us to return: they have written the same to the Committee, and openly declared their dissatisfaction. All things considered, it appears to me my duty to proceed to Pallamcotta immediately.

"My three brethren hesitate as to the propriety of their returning with me. They will, therefore, wait here till they hear from me from Pallamcotta. Great has been the conflict in my mind. But the Lord has heard my prayer in relieving me from my doubts, and giving me a feeling of assurance that I ought to go."

Mr Rhenius, entertaining such sentiments and feelings, returned to Pallamcotta; and his colleagues remained at Arcot for a time, but at length joined him in originating and conducting the "German Evangelical Mission." The return of Mr Rhenius to Tinnevely was the signal for a renewal of the conflict. The Madras Corresponding Committee put forth a pamphlet, entreating his friends to persuade him to remove to Arcot, or any where else. A paper warfare now commenced, which continued for some time. Paraphlets and newspaper paragraphs appeared in abundance, and every attempt was made to prevail upon him to leave Tinnevely. But all was in vain. He and his colleagues remained, and dedicated themselves to the great work which they had undertaken. The chapter of the published Memoir of Mr Rhenius, in which his son vindicates his father's conduct in the whole of the dispute which we have been briefly noticing, is able, candid, and on the whole impartial. That the Society exceeded their powers in the demands which they made, every careful reader of the Memoir cannot fail to perceive. Their conduct was high-handed in the extreme, and their attempt to claim a patrimonial right in the whole Tinnevely district was utterly unreasonable and absurd. "The people," as Mr Rhenius well remarked, "are not the property of the Society, or of any man: it is their sacred right, as well as that of all other men, to choose their pastor or pastors. The Society had no right to deprive the people of their long-known and loved teachers, nor us of the fruit of our labours."

The footing on which the German missionaries at Tinnevely was now placed, was one which required the exercise of much faith, and a simple dependence upon the Almighty. Nor was their confidence fruitless. Contributions poured in from all quarters; and although a sum amounting to between two and three thousand pounds was required for the support of the mission, their resources were always sufficiently ample. The mission soon assumed a very flourishing aspect. In the close of 1836, we find it stated that no fewer than seventy-six schools were in operation, containing two thousand five hundred and eighty-three scholars. While thus labouring with unwearied assiduity in the peculiar duties of his office, Mr Rhenius found time to prepare and publish a "Grammar of the Tamul Language," which is held in high estimation by Oriental scholars. His harassing toils and exertions, as might have been expected, were not long in affecting his bodily constitution. The mental anxiety and physical labour to which he was subjected, suddenly and prematurely brought his labours to a close. In May 1838 he laboured under a severe indisposition, which, however, excited no alarm in the minds of his family and friends; and it was not until three weeks before his death, that he was under the necessity of laying aside his labours, and betaking himself to quiet and rest. Just before his illness, he had finished "The Summary of Divinity in Tamul," a book intended particularly for the use of the catechists. Till within ten days of his death he sat with his family as usual, and only a few hours before it he was busy about his Master's work. The following brief sketch of his illness and death may be interesting:—

"On the 12th May, he commenced a letter to a friend in Europe; but did not live to conclude it. He now ceased from his regular occupation, and although he sat up every day, even till that of his death, he contented himself with occasionally giving some unimportant directions in the mission. His last act in the service of his Lord was signing some notes to the residents of the station, asking for subscriptions to the Madras Auxiliary Bible Society. This he did on the morning of the day of his death. During his illness, he frequently had the 14th chapter of St John read to him, and portions of the epistles to Timothy and the Colossians. Four or five days before his death, he admitted into his room all the seminary boys, desired them to pray that if it were the will of God he might be restored to health, and reminded them of the words, 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.' There was during the three weeks preceding his death a constant dry heat about his head and neck. The whole time of his illness he suffered no pain: he complained only of a drowsy feeling, and a kind of heaviness in the head. For some time, the remedies employed appeared to be useful; but on Sunday, the 3d of June, the symptoms of determination of blood became worse. On that day and the following, bleeding by leeches was resorted to as before, and all was done to induce moisture and coolness about the head and neck; but in vain. On the morning of the 5th he appeared, indeed, to feel better; but about half-past two in the afternoon, the symptoms suddenly became very urgent. He was quite restless, and already it seemed as though his last moments were come. It was a mercy that during these trying hours, and for a week preceding his death, there was a medical friend in the house—a surgeon attached to the Travencore mission; and it was a consolation to us to think that all the means possible would be used. The medical aid of the station was also obtained; but all in vain. A little after five, the apoplectic fit came on, and about half-past seven o'clock he ceased to breathe.

"The nature of the attack did not admit of his speaking much, during the last hours, to any around him. The evening before his departure, he derived great comfort from the 23d Psalm, which he desired to be read to him; and, on the afternoon of the 5th, before he became insensible, when asked whether he felt the presence of God, he faintly said 'Yes,' and already joy indescribable brightened his countenance. Several words and sentences escaped his lips, while he was in the delirious state. He was heard to say the German for the words 'my beloved Lord,' and to speak of 'the remainder of life.' Also, while in the state of restlessness he sat upon the bed for a few minutes, when the fear was expressed to him that he was going to leave us, he replied, 'We must have patience—patience.' He expired amid the sobs and tears, not only of his family and friends, but of many natives, Christian and heathen, who collected at the doors as soon as they heard of his dangerous condition.

"While in health, he is remembered several times to have expressed a wish that, when his end drew near, he might be taken away unexpectedly. It was but natural that a man of his usual health and activity should recoil at the thought of lingering pain or comparative idleness. And the event has been according to his desires. Suddenly was he deprived of sensibility, and it was solemn to witness the gradual sinking of his earthly frame. He quietly fell asleep in Jesus."

Thus died one of the most devoted and successful of modern missionaries; and we sincerely trust the Memoir by his son, of which we have given a rapid and necessarily imperfect Sketch, will be warmly received, as it well deserves, by the Christian public. It is a work which does great credit to the biographer; and, considering the very near relation in which he stood to the subject of the work, we have no hesitation in saying, that he has produced a Memoir which is well fitted to take its place with the most interesting biographies of the day.

THE DEATH-BEDS OF INFIDELS AND CHRISTIANS CONTRASTED.

In the present day when Infidelity is so lamentably prevalent, we would call attention to the following extract, exhibiting as it does, a strikingly contrasted view of the power of the respective systems of Infidelity and Christianity to support their votaries in a dying hour. It forms a small portion of a work* which deserves to be extensively circulated, and may be found useful as a counteractive to the Infidel books and tracts which are so industriously pressed upon the attention of the public, particularly in Manufacturing districts of the country.

There is something awfully real in death; levity and indifference are most unseemly at that moment. Who can leave all he has loved on earth; who can have the ties rent asunder which made life precious; who can enter on a new state of which he has no experimental knowledge, without the most solemn reflections, unless conscience has been previously hardened by unbelief? This, is generally the moment for confession and truth; the real sentiments of the soul are exposed. The motives for concealment, evasion, or pretended indifference, cease to exist; and the expiring tongue declares the fears or hopes, the miseries or joys of the departing spirit. This, then, is the time for the trial of those systems on which we have reared our hopes of salvation. If our theory will not support us then, it is worthless, because the hour of death is the period in our history in which we need most support and consolation. Well, the systems of Infidelity and the doctrines of Christianity have both been tested at that moment; let us see with what result.

Some Infidels have manifested the greatest insensibility and presumption in their last hours; as if they were either utterly callous to every thing which relates to them as accountable creatures, or were daring the Almighty to his face after labouring to subvert his authority. When Hobbes drew near to death, he declared, "I am about to take a leap in the dark;" and the last sensible words that he uttered were, "I shall be glad to find a hole to creep out of the world at." And although Rousseau had pretended to doubt the very existence of God, and lived in unbridled licentiousness and vice, he presumptuously claimed the favour of his Creator, expiring with the most impious appeal ever made to the Divine Being. A short time before he departed, he said to his wife or mistress, "Ah! my dear, how happy a thing it is to die when one has no reason for remorse or self-reproach!" And then, addressing himself to the Almighty, he said, "Eternal Being! the soul that I am going to give thee back is as pure at this moment as it was when it proceeded from thee; render it partaker of thy felicity!" Nature, conscience, the slightest moral feeling, compel one to declare that such states of mind are exceedingly unfit for a death-bed.

How opposite to this the seriousness and humility of the judicious Hooker; a man far superior to both in all the powers of his mind as well as in all the moral and religious endowments of the heart. His last words were, "I have lived to see this world is made up of perturbation, and I have been long preparing to leave it, and have been gathering comfort for the dreadful hour of making up my account with God, which I now apprehend to be near; and though I have by his grace loved him in my youth, and feared him in mine age, and laboured to have a conscience void of offence to him and to all men, yet if thou, Lord, be extreme to mark what I have done amiss, who can abide it? And therefore where I have failed, Lord, show mercy to me; for I plead not my righteousness, but the forgiveness of my unrighteousness, for His merit who died to purchase a pardon for penitent sinners."

Other Infidels have exhibited the utmost trifling in the awful hour, as if dying were the most unimportant event in their history. Hume, when near his end, amused himself by joking about Charon and his crazy boat, and being carried over the fabled Styx by the ferryman of hell. Levity and satire occupied his discourse, while trifling dissipation, even games at whist, filled the intervals. The retouching of his infidel writings was his employment, and his essay on suicide,—in which he encourages a profane and irreligious age to this last miserable act of presumption and despair,—was finished on his death-bed. In this frame he dies. What an overacted part! What a frightful unconcern! What an unnatural contempt of that dissolution of the mortal frame which sin has induced, and which carries the soul before the tribunal of God! Is this the hero of your natural religion? Is this the man, whose cold-blooded scepticism was only equalled by the disgusting licentiousness of his moral code; who overturns all testimony with one hand, and all virtue with the other? Yes, the brand of the Almighty did not appear more visible in the judicial obduracy of Pharaoh, than in the infidel being given up to the levity of such a death-bed. Dr Johnson observes upon this impenitent death-bed scene:—"Hume owned he had never read the New Testament with attention. Here, then, was a man who had been at no pains to inquire into the truth of religion, and had continually turned his mind the other way. It was not to be expected that the prospect of a death-bed should alter his way of thinking, unless God should send an angel to set him right."

Come with me to the death-bed of Payson, a man whose intellect and integrity far excelled Hume's. See him tortured with convulsions and racked with pain,—yet fearless, humble, resigned, joyful, and even triumphant. To some young men whom he invited to visit him he said, "My young friends, you will all one day be obliged to embark on the same voyage on which I am just embarking; and as it has been my special employment during my past life to recommend to you a pilot to guide you through this voyage, I wish to tell you what a precious pilot he is, that you may be induced to choose him for yours. I feel desirous that you might see that the religion I have preached can support me in death. You know that I have many ties which bind me to earth,—a family to which I am strongly attached, and the people, whom I love almost as well; but the other world acts like a magnet, and draws my heart away from this. Death comes every night and stands by my bedside in the form of terrible convulsions, every one of which threatens to separate the soul from the body. These continue to grow worse and worse, until every bone is almost dissolved with pain, leaving me with the certainty that I shall have it all to endure again the next night. Yet while my body is thus tortured, the soul is perfectly—perfectly happy and peaceful—more happy than I can possibly express to you. I lie here and feel these convulsions extending higher and higher, without the least uneasiness; but my soul is filled with joy unspeakable. I seem to revive in a flood of glory which God pours down upon me. And I know, I know that my happiness is but begun; I cannot doubt that it will last for ever. And now, is all this a delusion? Is it a delusion which can fill the soul to overflowing with joy in such circumstances? If so, it is surely a delusion better than any reality; but no, it is not a delusion; I feel that it is not. I do not merely know that I shall enjoy all this—I enjoy it now.

"My young friends, were I master of the whole world, what could it do for me like this? Were all its wealth at my feet, and all its inhabitants striving to make me happy, what could they do for me? Nothing! nothing! Now, all this happiness I trace back to the religion which I have preached, and to the time when that great change took place in my heart, which I have often told you is necessary to salvation; and now I tell you again, that without this change you cannot, no, you cannot, see the kingdom of God. And now, standing as I do on the ridge which separates the two worlds; feeling what intense happiness or misery the soul is capable of sustaining, judging of your capacities by my own, and believing that those capacities will be filled to the very brim with joy or wretchedness for ever; can it be wondered at that my heart yearns over you, my children, that you may choose life and not death? Is it to be wondered at, that I long to present every one of you with a full cup of happiness, and see you drink it; that I long to have you make the same choice which I made, and from which springs all my happiness?"

"A young man just about to leave this world, exclaimed, 'The battle's fought! the battle's fought! the battle's fought! but the victory is lost for ever!' But I can say, The battle's fought, and victory is won!—the victory is won for ever! I am going to bathe in an ocean of purity, and benevolence, and happiness to all eternity. And now, my children, let me bless you; not with the blessing of a poor, feeble dying man, but with the blessing of the infinite God. The grace of God, and the love of Christ, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with all and each one of you for ever and ever! Amen."

At one time he was heard to break forth in the following soliloquy:—"What an assemblage of motives to holiness does the Gospel present! I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a redeemed sinner, a pardoned rebel, all through grace, and by the most wonderful means which infinite wisdom could devise. I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a temple of God, and surely I ought to be pure and holy. I am a Christian. What then? I am a child of God, and ought to be filled with filial love, reverence, joy, and gratitude. I am a Christian. What then? Why I am a disciple of Christ, and must imitate him who was meek and lowly in heart, and pleased not himself. I am a Christian. What then? Why I am an heir of heaven, and hastening to the abodes of the blessed, to join the full choir of glorified ones, in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb; and surely I ought to learn that song on earth."

A few days before his death some of the choir belonging to the congregation came, for the purpose of singing, for his gratification, some of the songs of Zion. He selected the one commencing

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace," &c.

My hearers, which death would you choose—that of Hume or Payson? Remember, then, that Infidelity led to the former, and Christianity to the latter.

Nor has it been uncommon for Infidels in their last moments to exhibit regret and despair. Behold the champion of Infidelity, whom revolutionary France delighted to honour! What were the last days of Voltaire? He had been crowned with glory amidst the acclamations of an infatuated assembly in the theatre, and in his return thence was visited by the messenger of death, who inflicted his fatal blow. D'Alembert, Diderot, and Marmontel hastened to support his last moments, but were only witnesses to their mutual ignominy, as well as to his own. Often would he curse them, and exclaim, "Retire! It is you that have brought me to my present state! Begone! I could have done without you all, but you could not exist without me. And what a wretched glory have you procured me!" To appease the distraction of his conscience, he wrote to the Abbé Gaultier, entreating him to visit him, and in a few days thereafter he penned the following declaration:—

"I, the underwritten, declare, that for these four days past, having been afflicted with a vomiting of blood, at the age of eighty-four, and not having been able to drag myself to the church—the Rev. the Rector of St Sulpice having been pleased to add to his good works that of sending to me the Abbé Gaultier, a priest, I confessed to him,—and if it please God to dispose of me, I die in the holy Catholic Church, in which I was born; hoping that the Divine mercy will deign to pardon all my faults. If ever I have scandalised the Church, I ask pardon of God and of the Church. March the 2d, 1778.

"Signed, VOLTAIRE, in the presence of the Abbé Mignot, my nephew, and the Marquis de Villeveille, my friend."

Alternately he blasphemed and supplicated God, and in plaintive accents he would frequently cry out, "O Christ! O Jesus Christ!" as if he saw the sentence with which he had subscribed his epistles in fiery letters before him. The Marshal de Richelieu, his companion in infidelity, flew from the bedside, declaring it to be a sight too terrible to be sustained. Dr Tronchain, thunder-struck, retired, declaring that the death of the impious man was terrible indeed, and the furies of Orestes could give but a faint idea of those of Voltaire. And the nurse who attended him, being many years afterwards requested to wait on a sick Protestant gentleman, refused, till she was assured he was not a philosopher; declaring that, if he were, she would on no account incur the danger of witnessing such a scene as she had been compelled to do at the death of Voltaire. Thus you see rage, remorse, reproach, and blasphemy, accompanying and characterising the long agony of the dying Infidel.

The last moments of Paine were equally awful and distressing. When his infidel companions said to him, "You have lived like a man—we hope you will die like one;" he observed to one near him, "You see, sir, what miserable comforters I have." He declared, on one occasion, "that if ever the devil had an agent upon earth, he had been one." "There was," says Dr Manley, his physician, "something remarkable in his conduct about this period, (which comprises about two weeks immediately preceding his death,) particularly when we reflect that Thomas Paine was the author of 'The Age of Reason.' He would call out during his paroxysms of distress, without intermission, 'O Lord, help me! God, help me! Jesus Christ, help me! O Lord, help me!'—repeating the same expressions, without any, the least variation, in a tone of voice that would alarm the house. This conduct induced me to think that he had abandoned his former opinions; and I was more inclined to that belief, when I understood from his nurse, who is a very serious, and, I believe, pious woman, that he would inquire, when he saw her engaged with a book, what she was reading; being answered, and at the same time asked whether she should read aloud, he assented, and would give particular attention." But when his physician repeatedly pressed him to confess his guilt and errors, and asked him, "Do you believe; or, let me qualify the question, do you wish to believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God?" After a pause of some minutes, he sullenly answered, "I have no wish to believe on that subject." Dr Manley remarks, "For my own part, I believe, that had not Thomas Paine been such a distinguished infidel, he would have left less equivocal evidences of a change of opinion." The woman whom he had seduced from her husband and children in France, lamented to a friend who visited Paine in his departing moments,— "For this man I have given up my family and friends, my property and my religion; judge, then, of my distress, when he tells me that the principles he has taught will not bear me out."

At nearly the same age with Voltaire died the venerable John Eliot, the apostle of the Indians. A strong constitution, untiring zeal, ardent love to Jesus Christ, and the most tender compassion for the souls of men, had enabled him to endure the most remarkable privations and excessive fatigue, in endeavouring to enlighten the poor Indians in the knowledge of a Saviour, and turn them from Satan to God. After a life of extensive usefulness, he approached the grave—but with no terrors. Seeing Mr Walter, his assistant in the ministry, come to him, and fearing that, by praying that his life might be spared, he would detain him in this vale of tears, he said, "Brother, thou art welcome to my very soul. Pray retire to thy study for me, and give me leave to be gone." Having been asked how he did, he answered, "Alas! I have lost every thing. My understanding leaves me—my memory fails me—my utterance fails me; but I thank God my charity holds out still. I find that rather grow, than fail." Referring to the object which lay so near his heart, the propagation of the Gospel among the Indians, he said, "The Lord revive and prosper his work, and grant that it may live when I am dead. It is a work in which I have been much and long engaged. But what was the word I spoke last? I recall that word. My doings!—alas! they have been poor, and small, and lean doings; and I will be the man who will cast the first stone at them all." Among the last expressions that were heard to drop from his lips were those emphatic words, "WELCOME JOY!" Thus, after a long, useful, and honourable course, full of days and rich in faith, the holy and indefatigable Eliot entered into his rest in the eighty-sixth year of his age.

Take a different scene. Hear the venerable Polycarp, standing before his accusers. The proconsul said to him, "Blaspheme and defy Christ, and I will let thee go." Polycarp answered, "Fourscore and six years have I served him, neither hath he ever offended me in any thing; and how can I revile my King, which hath thus kept me?" When he was condemned to be burnt, the executioners were about to nail him to the stake; "Nay," said he, "suffer me to remain as I am. He that gave me patience to endure this fire, will give me also an immovable mind to persevere within this fiery pile without your fastening my body." When the executioner had tied his hands, Polycarp lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, "O Father of thy well-beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ, through whom we have known thee; O God of the angels and powers, and every living creature, and of all just men who live in thy presence; I thank thee that thou hast graciously vouchsafed, this day, and this hour, to allot me a portion among the number of martyrs, among the people of Christ, unto the resurrection of everlasting life, both of body and soul, in the incorruption of the Holy Ghost, among whom I shall be received in thy sight this day."

Can any one doubt that "the hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness?" Survey the deaths of these four hoary-headed men,—Voltaire and Paine, Eliot and Polycarp,—and say which are the sentiments worthy to be embraced; those which the former two, when living, propagated, but cursed in their dying hours; or those which the latter published with inexpressible joy during a long and useful existence, and triumphed in believing, in the very article of death? I know your answer. The God of all grace preserve you from an Infidel's life and death, and enable you to live a Christian's life; that the prayer now issuing from thousands of hearts in this assembly may be realized in your experience, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

MUCH in sorrow, much in woe,
Onward, Christians! onward go!
Fight the fight, and, worn with strife,
Steep with tears the bread of life.

Onward Christians! onward go!
Join the war, and face the foe;
Shrink not, much doth yet remain—
Dreary is the long campaign.

Shrink not, Christians; will ye yield—
Will ye quit the battle-field?
Will ye thus desert and leave
Him who died your souls to save?

Onward, Christians, to the fight,
Soon shall end this weary night;
Think, when tempted to complain,
"If we suffer, we shall reign."

Christians! do not thus deplore
What ye leave, but look before;
What are country—parents—wife,
To the soul's eternal life?

Soon the day-star shall arise,
Gladdening every Christian's eyes;
It shall cheer the thorny road,
That leads to happiness and God.

THE CRUELITIES AND BARBARITIES OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

BY THE EDITOR.

THAT the abolition of the slave trade, and the emancipation of the slaves in the British Colonies have tended to raise our country much higher in the scale of civilized nations cannot be doubted. It was a noble spectacle to behold Britain cordially sacrificing twenty millions of money, that the negro slaves in all her colonial possessions might enjoy the privileges and blessings of freedom. Often had the cry been raised by the Christian people against this melancholy blot in our country's name; but blessed be God, through the prayers and the exertions of many long years, the foul stain has been washed away, and we can now exult in the thought, that as far as we are concerned, slavery is abolished not in one colony only, but throughout the whole extent of the British possessions. It is not to be imagined, however, that the abolition of slavery is to be regarded as on that account complete. Far, very far from it. Multitudes of human beings are still torn from their country, their kindred and their homes, and consigned to hopeless, cruel, and irremediable slavery. The attention of the community has been of late called to this appalling fact by the publication of the able, enlightened, and interesting work of Sir Thomas Buxton—a book which contains so much valuable information on the subject, that it deserves to be extensively circulated, and its statements attentively perused and pondered by every humane and reflecting mind. There is something deeply touching in the very opening statement of the work. "My first proposition," says the excellent and philanthropic author, "is, that upwards of fifteen hundred thousand human beings are annually conveyed from Africa across the Atlantic, and sold as slaves." Had such an assertion been made on any other authority than that of Sir Thomas Buxton, we could have scarcely been inclined to give it credit. But it is amply supported by careful calculations founded on authentic documents. It is no rash, unwarranted statement. And if so, ought we not to blush for poor sinful humanity? On the Spaniards and Portuguese rests the fearful responsibility of this horrid crime, or, at least under the flags of these nations is the crime perpetrated. But it is some consolation to reflect, that from such an appalling sin Britain is now free. It has not only shaken itself free from all direct participation in the slave trade, but it has solemnly protested against its being carried on by other nations, and such is the moral influence of our country's example, that could the consent of France and America be obtained, the slave trade would be universally declared piracy and treated accordingly.

But to descend to particulars. Sir T. Buxton calculates, that no fewer than one hundred and fifty thousand slaves are annually landed in Brazil, sixty thousand, at a low calculation, in Cuba, seven thousand in Porto Rico, and in the Texas fifteen thousand. This is exclusive of the large supply required for the United States of America and other places, and it will at once appear from a consideration of these numbers, that, when the slaves exported from Africa, annually, are rated at one hundred and fifty thousand only, the calculation must in all probability be very far below the point; and in fact others rate it much higher. Thus Captain M'Lean, Governor of Cape Coast Castle, who has had ample opportunities of acquiring accurate information, estimates the amount of slaves annually exported from Africa at two hundred thousand, and this is even below the amount which may be derived from a consideration of the quantity of goods exported for the slave trade, which would go to raise the number from two hundred thousand to two hundred and fifty thousand.

And yet this is not all. Besides those which are stowed away in vessels and carried across the Atlantic, there is an immense trade in slaves, which is conducted for the supply of the Mohammedan markets of Morocco, Tunis, Tripoli, Egypt, Turkey, Persia, Arabia, and the borders of Asia. The number annually drained off from the East coast of Africa for this trade alone, is rated at a very low estimate at thirty thousand, but in all probability it is nearer fifty thousand, and the northern or desert portion of the same trade reaches twenty thousand.

The sum total then of this horrid calculation is, that instead of one hundred and fifty thousand, with which we set out, a more minute consideration and computation would go to show, that no fewer than THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND HUMAN BEINGS are annually separated from all the enjoyments and the endearments of home, and doomed to endure the awful horrors of slavery.

The statements of Sir T. Buxton are enough to make the blood run cold. But the mere arithmetic of the question gives a very faint view of the evils of slavery. The cruelties and savage barbarities connected with the trade increase tenfold the horror which we feel in considering this painful subject. To a few details on this point we solicit the attention of our readers. Denham, the African traveller, calculated that probably double the number of those actually taken in the slave expeditions perished during the seizure. To give some idea of one of these men-hunts, we quote the following, which Sir Thomas Buxton gives from the work of Count de Laborde:—

"The expedition consisted of four hundred Egyptian soldiers, one hundred Bedouin cavalry, and twelve village chiefs, with peasants carrying provisions. On arriving at their destination, which they generally contrive to do before dawn, the cavalry wheel round the mountain, and by a skilful movement form themselves into a semicircle on one side, whilst the infantry enclose it on the other. The negroes, whose sleep is so profound that they seldom have time to provide for their safety, are thus completely entrapped. At sunrise the troops commence operations, by opening a fire on the mountain with musketry and cannon; immediately the heads of the wretched mountaineers may be seen in all directions, among the rocks and trees, as they gradually retreat, dragging after them the young and infirm. Four detachments, armed with bayonets, are then despatched up the mountain in pursuit of the fugitives, whilst a continual fire is kept up from the musketry and cannon below; which are loaded only with powder, as their object is rather to dismay than to murder the inhabitants. The more courageous natives, however, make a stand by the mouths of the caves, dug for security against their enemies. They throw their long poisoned javelins, covering themselves with their shields, while their wives and children stand by them and encourage them with their voices; but when the head of the family is killed, they surrender without a murmur. When struck by a ball, the negro, ignorant of the nature of the wound, may generally be seen rubbing it with earth till he falls through loss of blood. The less courageous fly with their families to the caves, whence the hunters expel them, by firing pepper into the hole. The negroes, almost blinded and suffocated, run into the snares previously prepared, and are put in irons. If, after the firing, no one makes his appearance, the hunters conclude that the mothers have killed their children, and the husbands their wives and themselves. When the negroes are taken, their strong attachment to their families and lands is apparent. They refuse to stir, some clinging to the trees with all their strength, while others embrace their wives and children so closely that it is necessary to separate them with the sword; or they are bound to a horse, and are dragged over brambles and rocks until they reach the foot of the mountain, bruised, bloody, and disfigured. If they still continue obstinate, they are put to death.

"Each detachment, having captured its share of the spoil, returns to the main body, and is succeeded by others, until the mountain, "de battue en battue," is depopulated. If, from the strength of the position, or the obstinacy of the resistance, the first assault is unsuccessful, the general adopts the inhuman expedient of reducing them by thirst. This is easily effected, by encamping above the springs at the foot of the mountain, and thus cutting off their only supply of water. The miserable negroes often endure this siege for a week; and may be seen gnawing the bark of trees, to extract a little moisture, till at length they are compelled to exchange their country, liberty, and families, for a drop of water. They every day approach nearer, and retreat on seeing the soldiers, until the temptation of the water shown them becomes too strong to be resisted. At length they submit to have the manacles fastened on their hands, and a heavy fork suspended to their necks, which they are obliged to lift at every step.

"The march from Nuba mountains to Obeid is short. From thence they are sent to Cairo. There the Pasha distributes them as he thinks proper. The aged, infirm, and wounded, are given to the Bedouins, who are the most merciless of masters, and exact their due of hard labour with a severity proportioned to the probable short duration of the lives of their unhappy victims."

The picture so graphically delineated in this quotation may enable the reader to form some conception of the wasteful expenditure of human life, caused by the act of capturing the slaves. And when seized, they are subjected to such harsh treatment, that multitudes perish in the course of their march to the coast. By Mungo Park we are informed, that "the slaves are commonly secured by putting the right leg of one and the left leg of another into the same pair of fetters. By supporting the fetters with a string, they can walk, though very slowly. Every four slaves are likewise fastened together by the neck, with a strong pair of twisted thongs; and in the night an additional pair of fetters is put on their hands, and sometimes a light iron chain passed around their necks." Besides the painful mode in which they are thus secured, they travel sometimes from morning to night without tasting a morsel of food. The accounts which travellers give of the distressing privations and toils which slaves endure, in their journeyings from the interior to the coast, are truly heart-rending. The following is the simple narrative of a female slave at Cairo, describing the journey across the Desert to Siout:—

"We had a long, long journey, and we suffered very much. We had not food enough to eat; and sometimes we had no drink at all, and our thirst was terrible. When we stopped, almost dying for want of water, they killed a camel, and gave us his blood to drink. But the camels themselves could not get on; and then they were killed, and we had their flesh for meat, and their blood for water. Some of the people were too weak to get on, and so they were left in the desert to die. The Fellahs were some of them good people, and when we were tired allowed us to ride upon the camels; but there were many who would never let the negroes ride, but forced them always to walk, always over the sand. But when we had been days without water, many dropped down, and were left upon the sand; so that, when we got to the end of our journey, numbers of those that had been with us were with us no longer."

From such treatment, it is plain that many slaves must be unable to survive the journey to the coast; and accordingly, by the calculations of a German author, we learn that probably five-twelfths of the slaves captured die on the road; and of those who reach the place of embarkation, not a few perish during their detention on the coast before they are embarked. As an instance of this, we may quote from Sir T. Buxton's invaluable work a letter addressed by Captain Cook to the editor of the "Standard," dated 16th July 1838:—

"The fact which I am now about to state occurred in August 1837, and came under my own observation, and to all of which I am ready to bear testimony on oath, if required. Slaves to the number of two hundred and fifty, or thereabouts, male and female, adults and children, were brought in canoes from Senna, a Portuguese settlement at some distance in the interior of Africa, to be sold at Quillimane, there being at that time several slavers lying in the river. These unfortunate beings were consigned to a person holding a high civil appointment under the Portuguese Government—the collector of customs. These poor creatures were from a part of the country where it is said that the natives make bad slaves; consequently, and as there was abundance of human flesh in the market, they did not meet with a ready sale. The wretch to whom they were consigned actually refused them sustenance of any kind. Often have I been compelled to witness the melancholy spectacle of from twelve to twenty of my fellow-creatures, without distinction of age or sex, chained together, with a heavy iron chain round the neck, wandering about the town in quest of food to satisfy the cravings of nature, picking up bones and garbage of every description from the dung-heaps, snails from the fields, and frogs from the ditches; and, when the tide receded, collecting the shell-fish that were left on the bank of the river, or sitting round a fire roasting and eagerly devouring the sea-weed.

"Again and again have I seen one or more of these poor creatures when unable, from sickness, to walk, crawling on their hands and knees, accompanying the gang to which they were chained when they went in search of their daily food, . . . for one could not move without the whole. In consequence of this treatment, they soon became so emaciated that the slave-dealers would not purchase them on any terms; in this state, horrid as it must appear, the greater part were left to perish, without food, medicine, or clothing; for the little piece of coarse cotton cloth, worn by a few of the females, did not deserve the name, and could answer no other purpose than to lodge the vermin with which they were covered. Their bones protruding through the skin, they presented the appearance of living skeletons, lingering amidst hunger and disease, till death, their best friend, released most of them at once from suffering and bondage."

But the cruelties of the Middle Passage exceed all that has been yet described in this Paper. The trade in slaves being illegal, the utmost secrecy is necessary, and therefore the slaves are packed closely together, like bales of goods, with scarcely sufficient height to hold themselves up when in a sitting posture. In these circumstances, without the necessary supply of fresh air, and with a very insufficient quantity of food and drink, these unhappy victims of European cupidity die in great numbers; and, of the survivors, many of them jump overboard to get quit of their misery. The general estimate, indeed, is that nearly one-third are lost on the passage from Africa to South America and the West Indies. And even in the case of those slave ships which have been captured, it has been found that from one-sixth to one-half of the whole number perish before they can be landed at Sierra Leone, while the survivors are generally in a miserable state of weakness and debility. Should the slave vessel, however, escape being captured, and succeed in landing the slaves at their place of destination, it has been calculated that nearly one-fifth of those so landed die in the seasoning. The result, then, of this fearful computation is, that the number of lives sacrificed by the system, bears to the number of slaves available to the planter, the proportion of seven to three.

That a trade which is so directly sinful, so atrociously cruel, and accompanied besides with such a fearful loss of human lives, should still be carried on to a greater extent, perhaps, than at any former period of its history, is scarcely credible. But the fact, however startling, is nevertheless true. Under the protection chiefly of the Portuguese flag, this shameful traffic is conducted with undiminished, nay, with increased, activity. This curse of Africa, which stands in the way of the Christianization, and enlightenment, and civilization of that country, still, after all the efforts which have been made to bring it to an end, continues to rage with unmitigated fury. To use the words of our author, "It suppresses all other trade, creates endless insecurity, kindles perpetual war—banishes commerce, knowledge, social improvement, and above all, Christianity, from one quarter of the globe, and from a hundred millions of mankind;" or to quote the language of one whose memory we fondly cherish:—"Slavery is the very Upas tree of the moral world, beneath whose pestiferous shade all intelligence languishes, and all virtue dies."

The rapid sketch which we have thus attempted to give of the horrors of slavery must necessarily be very imperfect. But it must not be forgotten that we have not been delineating a condition of matters which no longer exists. The evil, in all its enormity, is still prevailing. At this very moment, there are TWENTY THOUSAND HUMAN BEINGS crossing the Atlantic, bound fast in the fetters of slavery. And must we believe that this horrid trade will never cease? Must the cry of the oppressed never fall from the earth? Is there no remedy to be found?

To the various replies which may be made to those questions, we propose to dedicate another Paper.

A LETTER ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY ON COMING OF AGE.

MY DEAR LADY E.—As you have attained a period of life, in which it may be said to you in a peculiar manner, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve," having reached the age when, in the term of the gay world, young ladies are expected to "come out," I cannot refrain from addressing you on a subject of such deep and lasting importance; for, on the choice you now make, my dear girl, may depend the welfare of your undying soul. I would have you remark, that there are but two masters that souls can serve in this world, viz., God and Mammon. Consequently, there can be but two classes of servants. First, They who devote themselves to the service of God—who "have chosen the better part, which can never be taken away"—who "count all things but loss and dung, that they may win Christ and be found in him." Second, There are those who openly serve their master the devil, such as murderers, thieves, liars, drunkards, unclean persons, and such like, who, it is evident to all men, are on the high road to perdition. Besides there are many who are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, who spend their substance, their time, and talents, in the service of the prince of this world. These last may be amiable and useful members of society, they may be regular in their attendance on the outward means of grace; may give something out of their abundance to various charities, from a natural feeling of humanity, or it may be a lurking hope thereby to purchase the favour of Heaven; but their lives and conversation give evidence in whose service their hearts are engaged—even on the day which is set apart for the spiritual service of the God of heaven, their converse is regarding their sports, their dress, their equipages, &c. It may sound harsh to class such with the openly wicked—would to God I could do otherwise; but I find that St Paul does so in 1st Timothy; indeed, the whole tenor of Scripture does the same, so that the case of the latter is as truly deplorable as that of the former, perhaps more so, in that they are not so likely to be brought to see their danger as the openly profane. I am convinced that Satan holds more willing captives by the silken cords of pleasure, than by the iron bands of vice and crime, and that if vice kills its thousands, vain pleasure kills its ten thousands. But there is yet a large class of society, who are striving to do what our Saviour tells us is utterly impossible, viz., to serve both God and mammon. Having some perception of the importance of the things which are unseen and eternal, their consciences will not allow them to live altogether unmindful of them, so they make a sort of compromise with God, that they will be very devout at times, so that they may be very careless and gay at other times. The devil is well pleased to have it so, for he knows that God will not accept of a divided heart; and so long as they do not make a total surrender of themselves to God, the more religious they seem to be, Satan is but throwing more meshes around them by making them more pleased with themselves, and thus bringing them to think that they are serving the Lord, whilst they are all the time but as blind captives. Ah, this is a grand device of the enemy of souls, and proves fatal to many; were the eyes of their minds but opened to see who was their real master, they would be startled, and would rush into the arms of Jesus, cost what sacrifice it might. Now I am afraid lest you should be drawn along with this half-and-half class; many of your companions have entered the gay world, and are whirling round in a vortex of fashionable amusements; they are doubtless anxious that you should join them in killing instead of redeeming time, and they will call you singular, precise, stiff, and unsociable if you do not run with them to the same excess of riot and dissipation; but is it not better to be one of the few, who are travelling Zionwards, than one of the multitude who are thronging the way to destruction? Have the Lord's people not been a "peculiar people" since the beginning of time—something in them unlike their worldly neighbours? They have different pursuits, different pleasures, different motives of acting, as an old author remarks, "when others are taking their pleasure, a Christian will be taking pains." When the inhabitants of the old world were eating, and drinking, and living in pleasure, looking no farther than present enjoyment, Noah was engaged in preparing for futurity. Also Moses, we are told, chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Now it does not appear that these Egyptian pleasures were more sinful than pleasures now-a-days; but their sinfulness had just consisted in their preventing him from serving the true and living God. You may be ready to say, What! may we not then enjoy this present world while we are in it? Yes, my friend, but only in so far as it is not prejudicial to the interests of our immortal souls, or inconsistent with our character as Christians. Then comes a question which has caused much discussion in the world—how far may we indulge?

how far may we venture and not be injured? which I will answer, by proposing another,—do men strive how near the fire they may go and not be burned? do they not rather avoid danger as much as possible? and ought we not to give more heed to our immortal souls, than men do to their perishing bodies? Thus it is said in Proverbs, "Avoid it, pass not by it; turn from it and pass away." The more our vanity and self-love is gratified in company, the more pleasant will it be to our natural feelings; it is just in proportion as a young lady has been caressed, admired or flattered at a party she may have attended, that she will reckon it pleasant or otherwise, and in such a case the more pleasant it is, the more dangerous. Knowing the weakness of our corrupt nature, and the strength and cunning of our spiritual adversary, we have little need to give him any advantage over us, for when the evil day comes, it will be found that our utmost vigilance and circumspection have been required, "having done all to stand." Can we expect that the Lord will answer our petition to be delivered from evil, if we rush headlong into what we cannot help feeling, is "temptation?" Doubtless some minds may be so constituted as to suffer less from contact with the world than others, but I believe none can escape altogether unscathed; it is the experience of this, that has led eminent Christians in all ages to come out from the world and be separate from it; and is it not presumptuous in young soldiers of Christ to suppose that they shall be able to stand the attacks of the enemy on his own vantage-ground, better than the veterans of the army could do? But supposing you were proof against every assault of the foe, that you had a coat of mail which screened you from his darts, so that instead of piercing you, they fell harmlessly to the ground, would it be kind in you to lead others into danger by your example, when you knew they were not so prepared to meet it? See how careful St Paul is, lest he should do any thing to cause a weak brother to stumble for whom Christ died—he is ready to give up even the necessaries of life, to "eat no flesh while the world lasteth," how much more then would he not have given up the seducing gratifications of worldly pleasure whereby so many souls are lured to their ruin? And, remember, my dear E., that whatever influence your rank and station in society may give you, it is just an instrument put into your hands by the Lord wherewith you may exercise either a beneficial, or a prejudicial effect, and for the use of which you will be accountable. Some urge that our Saviour was not a recluse, we read of his eating and drinking at the house of his friends, and we need not be stricter than he was. We have need to be more watchful than he was, with reverence be it spoken—in that he had no lust whereby he could have been tempted as we have; but let us examine his blessed steps, and we will but find him going into company to supply the necessary wants of his human body, whilst at the same time he was about his Father's business,—carrying on his gracious designs for the good of souls. We do not hear of his patronizing midnight assemblies or any companies, whose avowed object is to pander to the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, "and the pride of life."

If you study the Scriptures, as I trust you will do prayerfully, you will find many of his injunctions, as well as injunctions of the apostles, bearing out the line of conduct which I have been endeavouring to recommend, viz.—to devote yourself to the service of God. I would now remark some special reasons why you ought to do so. First, You are pre-engaged to God. You are aware that while as yet you knew not your right hand from your left, your father devoted you to the service of your heavenly Master, promising that you should be taught to renounce the service of the devil, and the vain pomps of this world; and as I trust that the vows which he then solemnly imposed on himself, have been religiously performed, your mind will be more easily inclined to that choice which your esteemed Lady L., and all your Christian friends will rejoice to see you adopt. Again, you have very lately made a dedication of yourself in public to the Lord Jesus, by seating yourself at his holy table; thereby ratifying, by your own free will and consent, the engagement which your father had contracted for you in your infancy, and professing, in the most solemn manner, to devote your body and soul unto the Lord, which is your reasonable service. Ah! remember it is no light thing to break an engagement with the God of heaven; "better not to vow, than having vowed, not to perform." How many are there who profess much love and devotion at such times, and yet in their every day's conduct and conversation deny Him! Some, too, of whom we had hoped better things, allow their names to swell the lists of the prince of this world's votaries, in the public newspapers. As the Author of our existence, the Lord has a right to expect our service. As our Redeemer, when we had "sold ourselves under sin," did the Lord "send forth his well-beloved Son, to redeem us from the curse of the Law, by being made a curse for us." And, oh! ought not such marvellous loving-kindness to call forth our eternal obligations to love and serve him; for "we are not our own, we are bought with a price—even the precious blood of the Lamb." Perhaps you may think that I am attaching undue importance to the services of sinful mortals in the cause of the great Jehovah. Now, I know that He who has "ten thousand times ten thousand ministering spirits" waiting around the throne, to do his behest, has no need of our poor, imperfect services—so imperfect, indeed, and sinful as of themselves to condemn us, if not purified in the blood of Christ, for "our righteousness is but as filthy rags," in his pure eyes; yet the Lord is pleased to work by means for the extension of his kingdom in the world, and the labours and prayers of those who have been "accepted in the Beloved," the Lord is pleased to bless for this end. Although the Lord is quite independent of his creatures' services (if we serve him, he is not the better; or if we serve him not, he is not the worse), will it be all the same in the end to us, which Master we serve? Ah! no, "the wages of sin is death," eternal death; that is the devil's wages; "but the gift of God is eternal life." I beg you to remark, it is not the "wages" of God, but the "gift" of God—"not of works, lest any man should boast—by the deeds of the Law shall no flesh living be justified;" and although we have merited nothing at the hand of God but our own wages, eternal death, yet the Lord will give the wages of Christ to all such as are in Christ Jesus; then will they be constrained, by his love to them, to do something for his glory. Ah! that constraining love of Christ is a powerful stimulus to exertion; and "God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love;" and if it be a life of greater self-denial than the worldling's now, "there is fulness of joy laid up at the right hand of God" for them, in glory. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." Having endeavoured to describe the blessedness of those who have the Lord for their Master and Friend, and the ultimate misery of such as devote themselves to the service of "the devil, the world, and the flesh," I would just remark, that, even in this life, there is an indescribable joy and satisfaction in the ways of righteousness. It would seem, when Christians tamper with worldly pleasure, that their pleasure in God is not sufficient; but if there is a lack that needs to be supplied, it is not in God, but in their own hearts. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, indeed." The "yoke of Christ is easy, and his burden light;" but, on the contrary, the devil is a hard taskmaster, and no real joy or satisfaction is to be found in his service. Solomon had opportunity above all that ever lived, in making a fair trial whether or no the things of time could afford satisfying pleasure, possessing every thing in perfection and in great abundance; yet hear his testimony—"Vanity of vanities," saith he, "all is vanity!"

Although I fear that I have long ere now exhausted your patience, I cannot leave the subject without taking a retrospect view of it. If its keenest votaries cannot but allow, that, even in life, the world is an unsatisfying portion, of what value is it to be reckoned on a death-bed? What can your gay, thoughtless companions do for you then? Will you then reckon the days and nights well spent, that were spent in vanity? I lately heard of a rich nobleman who offered his physician his whole fortune, if he would ensure him a few more hours of life! He had then learned something of the value of time, when it was to be for him no longer. Do you think, if the few hours he so earnestly wished had been granted him, he would have spent them at a ball, or the play-house? I trow not. Again,—how may we suppose "the spirits of the just, made perfect," will regard the fashionable modes of spending time? Ah! they are not uninterested spectators. I think they will regard with an eye of the deepest compassion the multitudes of gay, thoughtless souls, sporting unprepared on the brink of the bottomless pit, ready every moment to drop in,—in fact, numbers dropping in,—and the rest careless and inconsiderate as before; and on the contrary, does not the Lord Jesus tell us of the joy there is in heaven when one sinner is brought to repentance, and timely preparation for eternity? But what value do you think lost souls in hell put upon time? Ah! it is past comprehension. Worlds, millions of worlds, would be reckoned little, if they could purchase a single hour for prayer and repentance, if so be they might escape from that place of torment "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Let us, then, my dearest E., "give all diligence to make our calling and election sure;" and redeem precious time, while it is yet our own, by "flying for refuge to the hope set before us" in the blessed Gospel. That the Lord may incline you, by the Holy Spirit, now to offer yourself, soul and body, to your gracious Redeemer, and, being "accepted in the Beloved," (for who ever were refused that offered themselves?) that he would enable you to "glorify him with your body and spirit, which are his," is the earnest wish and sincere prayer of your affectionate friend.

REVIVAL OF THE LORD'S WORK :

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JAMES GLEN, A. M.,

Minister of Benholme, Kincardineshire.

"O Lord, I have heard thy speech, and was afraid: O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy."—HAB. iii. 2.

THE prophet from whose writings these words are taken is supposed to have been cotemporary with Jeremiah. He would, therefore, discharge the duties of his high office during the latter part of the reign of Josiah, and during the troublous period that intervened between the death of that monarch and the commencement of the Babylonish Captivity. It will tend to elucidate the passage before us, if we consider, for a moment, the situation of the kingdom of Judah at the probable date of this book; and if we briefly allude to the "burden" which the inspired writer saw.

I. Josiah, during whose reign it is most likely that this prophecy was written, was one of the most virtuous and pious of the kings of Judah. He began in early life to seek God; and in him the promise was remarkably fulfilled, "They that seek me early shall find me." He was distinguished alike for his personal religion, and for his enlightened and disinterested zeal to revive the pure worship of God among his subjects. He was a reformer of the highest and most illustrious order. He accounted it a small matter to effect a political reformation, and to redress a few civil grievances, under which some of his subjects groaned. He regarded this as but an inconsiderable part of what was required of him, as the king and the father of his people. He looked abroad upon his kingdom not merely with the eye of a patriot, but with the eye of a man of piety; not merely as a man who felt for the wrongs of his countrymen, but as a man who was concerned for the honour of his God. It grieved him much, to think that many, even in the Land of Promise, had lost their freedom, and were sunk below the level of free-born Israelites; but it grieved him more, to think that they had lost their religion, and were thus stripped of what was their most inestimable privilege, and their highest glory; and it grieved him most of all to think how Jehovah was dishonoured and insulted by the blinded superstition and the degrading idolatry of his chosen people. He saw, in the general aspect of the times,—in the degeneracy, and impiety, and profligacy that prevailed,—that the whole nation had forfeited the favour and protection of God, and lay exposed to his sorest judgments; not judgments falling out, as it were, accidentally, in the gradual progress of events, but judgments plainly foretold in the Law of Moses, and daily repeated by living prophets as the just and inevitable punishment of a national apostasy from the pure worship of God. Viewing, on the one hand, his people thus sunk in idolatry, and all its accompanying vices; and, on the other, the judgments of God as ready to overtake them, he saw that nothing could save the country but a religious reformation. And in the history of this admirable prince, as recorded in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, you will find how promptly, how vigorously, and how wisely he commenced and prosecuted the religious reformation which he had planned. Moved at once with zeal for the glory of God, and with concern for the welfare of his beloved country, he was not ashamed to take the lead in this noble enterprise. Knowing that he was embarked in the cause of God and truth, he was resolute and uncompromising in the measures which he adopted; and therefore, with a boldness and decision of character that do him unspeakable honour, he swept away the whole system of idolatry, and all its abominations. He spared no vestige or relic of that legalized superstition which was becoming more inveterate in its hold of the affections of the people, and more deadly in its influence on their spiritual concerns, in proportion to the duration of its gloomy reign; and which, indeed, at the period referred to, seemed to have seated itself so deeply and so universally in the hearts of all ranks of society as to bid defiance to the most wholesome and energetic remedies of the most undaunted reformer.

Josiah, however, was not to be discouraged, even by great and numerous difficulties; nor would he allow himself to be scared from his righteous purpose by the outcry of interested priests, by the anathemas of hireling prophets, or by the insults and menaces of furious and lawless mobs. He learned, from the book of the Law, which was recovered in his reign, what God required of them as his chosen people; and he saw in the history of the past, and in the principles and practice of the existing generation, how deeply, as a nation and as individuals, they had revolted from the God of heaven. He read, in the same inspired record, the alarming threatenings pronounced against them by that God who changeth not, if they should corrupt their way, and sink into a state of idolatry; and he could not for a moment shut his eyes against the mournful fact, that the condition had been violated, that the displeasure of God had been incurred, and that his threatenings were ready to take effect on a nation of wilful and obstinate transgressors. But he saw, in the same faithful record, bright and cheering intimations of returning mercy on the part of Jehovah, in a season of repentance and humiliation. And no sooner was all this perceived, than his resolution was taken. He did not, therefore, with a timid and time-serving spirit, begin to calculate whether he might safely depend on a suspension of impending judgment for a few years longer, or whether he should at once, in the strength of God, and in dependence on his blessing, adopt that course which the Law of Moses prescribed as the only means of averting the infliction of divine vengeance, and of recovering the favour and blessing of their offended God. He saw at once, in the book of the Law, and in the signs of the times, that there was no room for delay; and he perceived equally clearly, from the desperate nature of the case, that half measures would not remedy an evil of such magnitude, and of so long continuance; he therefore laid the axe to the root of the tree,—and, with a holy and heroic zeal, he traversed the length and breadth of the land, that he might be a personal witness of the utter destruction of every monument of idolatry. And he was not satisfied with sweeping away what was evil—he had something essentially good to establish in its room; and, accordingly, he restored the worship of God to its original simplicity, and beauty, and purity. This was well done—this was paying that respect to God and his religion to which they are entitled; and this salutary reformation will hand down the name of Josiah till the end of time, as one of the greatest benefactors of the Jewish nation.

But alas! “the sin of Judah was written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond,” and could not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. That infatuated people had been storing up for themselves “wrath against the day of wrath” for many generations; and the daring impiety and unexampled barbarities of Manasseh, the grandfather of Josiah, filled up the measure of their iniquity. The sentence of righteous vengeance had gone forth, and could not be recalled; and although there was now a memorable reformation, still it was but partial and temporary. It was reluctant and counterfeit on the part of many of the people; as was evinced by their speedy return to idolatrous practices after the untimely death of the distinguished reformer.

II. Such was the state of the kingdom of Judah at the date of this prophecy. Let us next attend to “the burden” which the prophet saw, and to the solemn impression which it produced on his mind. It was intimated to him, that the decree of God was unalterable, and that the day of visitation was at hand; and the very people are named who should be the instrument of God’s righteous judgments on treacherous Judah. Thus we read in 1st chapter, “Lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that bitter and hasty nation, which shall march through the breadth of the land, to possess the dwelling-places that are not theirs.” Here the prophet was made acquainted with the purpose of God respecting the captivity of the Jews; he therefore abruptly commences the “prayer,” or meditation, contained in this chapter, in these words, “O Lord, I have heard thy speech, and was afraid.” As if he had said—I have heard the proclamation of thy righteous judgments, which hang over our guilty land; I have heard of the devastation of my country, and of the captivity of my countrymen; I have heard of the proud insults and of the impious mockery of a fierce invader; I have heard that our land shall be desolate, for the sins of them that dwell therein; I have heard that our holy city shall be a wilderness—that Zion shall be a wilderness—that Jerusalem shall be a desolation; I have heard that “our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, shall be burnt up with fire, and that all our pleasant things shall be laid waste.” I have heard all this, and was afraid—for “we are a sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, and ripe for judgment.” “I was afraid;” for it is the voice of God—God arising to plead his controversy with a rebellious people; and when he judgeth, he shall overcome. Who may stand up, if once he be angry?

III. Let us now advert to the exercise in which the prophet engaged, in the certain anticipation of national calamity. It was the exercise of prayer. And the substance of this prayer, recorded in our text, consists of three petitions, each of which shall be noticed in its order:—

1. Although the prophet, as he tells us at the 16th verse, “trembled” at the utterance of that voice which is full of majesty; although his “lips quivered,” and were unable to make any reply; and although “rottenness entered his bones,” under a sense of his vileness in the presence of the holy Jehovah,—yet he did not give way to unavailing lamentations. He betook himself to a more appropriate and a profitable exercise—he applied himself to the throne of grace, as a humble and earnest suppliant. Although the condition of his countrymen was dangerous, and their banishment inevitable, yet so long as a remnant was preserved, their case was not desperate. And, although he might not pray for their continuance in the land of promise, yet with the feeling of a true Israelite, he would follow them with his prayers into the land of banishment. If he could not obtain what his own wishes would have suggested, he would ask what it was consistent with the will of God to bestow. If he could not see his friends reformed and regenerated in their native country, he would plead for their conversion in a foreign land. “O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years.” And this is the first of the three petitions included in this verse. It is an earnest supplication for the revival of God’s work of grace, in the hearts of his people, in the time of outward distress. Do this “in the midst of the years;” that is, during the seventy years of captivity. As if he had said; let not that mournful period—that “time of Jacob’s trouble,” pass away unimproved. While the hearts of the captives are melted with sorrow; while their harps hang silent upon the willows; and while their faltering tongue refuses to sing the songs of Zion; let that season of solitude and sadness be spent in holy meditation and importunate prayer. While these melancholy years pass heavily along, let the work of repentance commence; let the tears of godly sorrow flow; and let the power of thy grace, O merciful Jehovah, melt the hard heart, renew the stubborn will, and renovate the whole character. And whatever be the privations of the outcasts of Israel, whatever the pressure of their distress, and whatever the intensity of their grief, let not thy work stand still. It is now slighted, and almost forgotten. But in the years of captivity let it be revived and make rapid progress. “Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children.” “Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old:” so that when the Lord shall turn again the captivity of Zion, there may be many spiritually enlightened, and holy men to hail the joyful day, and to bend their steps to their beloved land, shouting as they go—“Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us.” “The Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad.”

2. The prophet adds a second petition, still with a reference to the time of captivity. “In the midst of the years make known.” Make known thy character, and perfection, and grace, during the years of captivity, to those who are now estranged from thee. If they were unmindful of thee in the time of prosperity; in the day of adversity let them consider. If they abused their religious privileges in the time of peace and tranquillity; when thy judgments are in the earth let them learn righteousness. Make thy faithfulness known as a God still in covenant with them—as still willing to be reconciled to them—as still willing to restore them to their forfeited inheritance. Make thyself known to the remnant of thy chosen people, as the only living and true God, that, “in the midst of the years” of their desolation, they may for ever be cured of the prevailing and ruinous sin of idolatry; so that in due time they may return to Zion with weeping and supplications, saying, “Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant not to be forgotten.” Make thyself known to those who lead us captive as the God of heaven, and as the God of Israel, that they may fear thy name and show favour to thy heritage; that they may let the oppressed go free, and become themselves the servants of Jehovah.

3. And observe again, with what wisdom and propriety the prophet adds a third petition; “In wrath remember mercy.” Wrath is incurred, judgment is threatened, the sword is unsheathed, and vengeance must be inflicted. But see how the man of God perseveres in prayer. If judgment may not be altogether averted, let it be mitigated. Our iniquities testify against us, and we cannot escape punishment. We must bear the indignation of the Lord, in submitting to slavery in a foreign land, and in being deprived of the soul-refreshing ordinances of religion. But, gracious Father, “in wrath remember mercy.” “Correct us, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring us to nothing.” “Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory: where is thy zeal and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me? are they restrained? Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer; thy name is from everlasting. O Lord, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways, and hardened our heart from thy fear? Return for thy servants' sake, the tribes of thine inheritance. The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while: our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary. We are thine; thou never bearest rule over them; they were not called by thy name. Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence!"

It were easy to prove that all the petitions in this prayer were literally and remarkably fulfilled. But we must not enter into a lengthened illustration of the subject. Suffice it to make a few hasty remarks. In Psalm 137, we find a most affecting reference to the prevailing sentiments and emotions that filled the hearts of the captives in Babylon. Any one who reads attentively this most pathetic portion of Scripture, will see the picture of a people, "accepting the punishment of their sins;" of a people deeply humbled, duly sensible of the value of their lost privileges, and piously refusing to profane "the songs of Zion," by singing them at the bidding of their proud oppressors; and expressing at the same time the most devoted attachment to the holy city. "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." Here we may learn that adversity, with the blessing from on high, was beginning to exert a beneficial influence on the minds of the Jewish captives.

Although they were deprived of the high privileges which they enjoyed in their native land, they still were favoured with the means which God most frequently employs, for awakening the careless, for enlightening the ignorant, and for converting the ungodly. They had the discipline of God's providence, and access to spiritual instruction. While their hearts were subdued with the rod of fatherly correction, they had the holy example of Daniel and his three friends before their eyes; and they were daily plied with the instructive signs, and with the solemn and powerful appeals of the prophet Ezekiel. The unbending religious principle of these servants of Jehovah, which made them willing to yield their bodies to the flames, or to be torn in pieces by wild beasts—conduct in which they were remarkably countenanced by the God whom they served, and which drew even from heathen princes, expressions of the warmest admiration, and confessions of the overruling providence of the Most High—could not fail, with the Divine blessing, to put forth a salutary influence on the minds of their own countrymen. And although many, it is to be feared, gave no heed to the preaching of Ezekiel, yet, as the Word of God never returns to him void, we are safe, in concluding that his pious and zealous ministrations could not have been altogether in vain. And that there was a revival of religion during the captivity, may be proved from the grateful and devout sentiments of the captives in the announcement of their enlargement. "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing; then said they among the heathen, The Lord hath done great things for them. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

We find a confirmation of the same fact, in the character of those who returned from Babylon. Read the pages of Jeremiah, which describe his contentings with the Jews on the eve of the captivity, and you find yourselves in the midst of a rebellious and godless people, who were proof alike against the warnings of providence, and the threatenings and promises of Jehovah. Read the pages of Ezra, at the close of the captivity, and you find yourselves among a different class of people—a people greatly softened and subdued, and eager to restore the worship of God after the model of the purest times of their history. God had, in the words of Ezra, granted them "a little reviving;" and their first care on their return to Palestine was, to rebuild the temple which was lying in ruins. See a most affecting narrative of their zealous efforts in the cause of religion in the third chapter of Ezra.

And finally, as a decisive proof that the prayer of the prophet had received a gracious answer during the captivity, we find, that the Jews were henceforward cured of what may be called their hereditary and besetting sin—the degrading and God-dishonouring sin of idolatry. Behold here the efficacy and the fruit of prayer! The petition is brief, "revive thy work." The result is mighty and extensive. It affects the spiritual condition of a whole nation. God is still the hearer of prayer. "Pray" then, "without ceasing." "Ask, and ye shall receive."

The second part of the prophet's prayer was not less clearly answered. "In the midst of the years make known." And was not much made known to Ezekiel, by the Spirit of prophecy, during the captivity? And were not his heavenly visions faithfully communicated by him to his countrymen? Did he not tell the captives in Babylon, on various occasions, what was passing among their brethren who were left in Palestine? And was he not commissioned, while he dwelt in a foreign land, to utter many predictions which have not received their accomplishment?—predictions, the fulfilment of which will usher in the mightiest revolutions that the world ever beheld—the restoration of the Jews to their lost inheritance, and the final overthrow of all the Church's enemies!

Was not much made known to Daniel, "in the midst of the years," when he was enabled to interpret dreams of the most momentous import, and when himself beheld visions of a similar nature, and of equal importance to coming ages? Who is not acquainted with his prophetic descriptions of the four great earthly monarchies, and of the spiritual kingdom that was to succeed them;—the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which was to dash in pieces all its predecessors, and itself to become a great mountain, which should ultimately fill the whole earth? Had any such vision as this been seen by the mightiest of the prophets in the land of Israel? Certainly not. And yet this magnificent view of the designs of heaven was “made known” to Daniel on the banks of Euphrates. Again, was not much made known to this prophet, when he was enabled to read and interpret the portentous hand-writing on the wall of the gorgeous banquet-room, and to tell the sacrilegious prince his impending fate? Was not much made known to him when he foretold (chap. xi. of his book) a long series of coming events, with a minuteness and accuracy that have not been excelled by the narrative of the literal historian? And who can help concluding that this part of the prayer received its most remarkable answer, in what was made known to Daniel before the close of the captivity, respecting the advent of the Messiah? Daniel was a man of research and a man of prayer. He “understood by books” that the years of captivity had nearly elapsed, and he set himself to seek God with fasting and supplication. And, in answer at once to his own prayers, and to a petition which had long been recorded in heaven, the precise time when “Messiah the Prince” should be manifested, was disclosed to him. Behold, again, the efficacy and the fruit of prayer! Here we behold it bringing down from heaven the most precious information to the children of men.

We need not occupy much of your time in proving that the third part of the prayer was as remarkably answered as the other two. “In wrath, remember mercy.” God was executing the fierceness of his wrath against the people who had “deeply revolted” from him, when he gave them up to the will of a cruel and arbitrary tyrant. But in the day of wrath he “remembered mercy.” In every circumstance that tended to mitigate the rigour of their bondage—and there were many such—and in the grace which he imparted to render the painful discipline to which they were subjected conducive to their reformation and conversion, he was fulfilling the prayer of the prophet. And when the appointed time had come, he made the most signal display of his mercy, in putting it into the heart of Cyrus to “proclaim liberty to the captives,” to restore the sacred vessels of the Lord’s house, and to afford every facility to the exiles to return to the land of their fathers.

From this remarkable passage of Scripture, thus expounded and illustrated, many important practical lessons may be drawn. We will state a few of them as briefly as possible. We may learn, for example, that sin incurs the displeasure of God as the moral Governor of the universe; and that, although sentence against evil works may not, through the forbearance of God, be executed speedily, yet, unless a timely repentance prevent, judgment must, sooner or later, overtake ungodly nations, communities, and individuals;—that prayer to God, and especially prayer for a revival of religion, is the sure and only way of averting the judgments of God; or, if this may not be, of at least mitigating their severity, shortening their duration, and preparing for a joyful season of returning mercy;—that the extension of religious knowledge—the knowledge of God, and of the way of salvation by Jesus Christ—is the only rational and legitimate means, under God, for effecting a national reformation;—that the hand of God must be distinctly recognised, and his grace entirely relied on, in every genuine revival of religion, which, as is intimated in our text, is emphatically the work of God—“Revive thy work;”—that God must be implored to give his sanctifying blessing along with the circulation of scriptural truth—“Make known”—give saving knowledge through the internal illumination of thy Holy Spirit;—that they are the best friends of their country and of their kind, who at once pray for a revival of religion, and use the divinely appointed means for effecting this blessed work; because, in this way the glory of God is promoted, crime and suffering are prevented, and the present happiness and eternal salvation of men are secured;—that the covenanted mercy of God is the only foundation of every plea in behalf of our apostate race—“In wrath, remember mercy;”—that it is the glory of God to exercise this attribute in answer to the prayer of faith, and that all who wish well to the prosperity of Zion should take encouragement from the gracious answer which was given to the prayer before us, in the case of the captive Jews;—that while Jehovah is the supreme Governor of the universe, RELIGION is his great work in the world, and that in which the children of men ought to be most deeply concerned;—that, as men are originally dead in trespasses and sins, they are ever prone, at all stages of their spiritual history, to relapse into a state of drowsiness and formality, and that it is the prerogative of God to revive his work in their hearts;—and that, from the history of God’s ancient people, it is abundantly obvious, that such a work is the true source at once of national safety and of national greatness;—that, while political partisans are pursuing their selfish purposes, and short-sighted statesmen adding one measure of expediency to another, as a cure for a nation’s ills, the man of piety, like the Prophet Habakkuk, is found at the throne of grace, imploring the merciful interposition of Him who has the hearts of all men in his hand, and, as the rivers of water, can turn them whither he will;—and, finally, that it is the path of duty marked out by God in his infallible Word for a Church or nation, in the time of trouble, to beseech God, above all things, to send a time of reviving and refreshing from his presence. Then only may we expect that difficulties and distractions will disappear, and that peace and prosperity, in every sense of the words, shall universally prevail.

All these inferences are plainly deducible from our text. And it ought to operate as a powerful encouragement to the friends of pure religion, to act upon the practical lessons which are here inculcated, that God is, as it were, anticipating the largest expectations of the faithful, in sending seasons of awakening and reviving to various corners of our land, while there were but few to pray for them. He is thus, we doubt not, pointing the eye of his children to the work in which he would have them to engage in the day of trial and adversity. The language of Providence in this instance can hardly be misinterpreted. Let the Church be purified as well as enlarged and defended. Let its members be sound-hearted and devoted Christians. Let personal religion be cultivated, and the Church will stand. Let vital godliness prevail, and the Church is invincible. Ye, then, that make mention of the Lord, "keep not silence; and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." Amen.

TRUE ENJOYMENT.

O PLEASURE, thine aspect is bright,
And sweet is the sound of thy voice:
I saw thee, I heard thee, with heedless delight,
And made thee my earliest choice!
Youth urged me with ardour along,
Health freshened the air with his breath,
Prosperity gladdened my ears with her song,
And Glory displayed his bright wreath;
Joy's river flowed smooth—on its margin there stood
Young Rapture inviting; I plunged in the flood!

How grateful the waves were at first,
As, fearless, I laved in the stream!
But lo! a wild hurricane over me burst—
I awoke from my perilous dream.
What terrors had gathered around!
What horrors of darkness unknown!
The train that ensnared me no longer was found—
Heaven's smile was exchanged for a frown!
The scenes of delight I had viewed were no more—
The music was drowned in the hurricane's roar!

Some guardian, invisible hand,
Bore me up on the treacherous tide:
Deserted I lay on the desolate strand,
With Misery crouched at my side.
Rude, rude was her hated embrace;
I struggled in vain to get free:
Save Danger and Ruin, no form could I trace Flames only, red flames, could I see,
Ascending, approaching, their prey to devour;
I shrunk—but my limbs were divested of power!

Dark, dark was the tempest without;
Keen, keen was the torture within;
By the terrors of hell I was compassed about—
I felt them already begin.
Despair was advancing, to gnaw
The spring of my spirit away;
Each flash to my sight placed the curse of the Law
And my sins in their dreadful array;

Fear shook me, Astonishment sat on my eye,
While Conscience extorted the heart-rending sigh.

When lo! in that moment of fear,
Broke mildly Hope's tremulous ray;
The accents of Mercy fell soft on my ear,
And thus seem'd the seraph to say:—
"Look, look to thy crucified Lord!
See where He lies bleeding for thee!
Hark!—Come, I will save thee!—believe on His word,
Flee, flee to the Refuge—O flee!"
I heard, I obeyed—for His love drew me on;
I clung to His cross—and my terrors were gone!

O sweet was the peace He bestowed!
O pure were the raptures I knew!
My blood-ransomed spirit with gratitude glow'd—
To serve Him, to obey Him, I flew:
All, all I had once longed to gain
Was now but accounted as dross;
Earth's riches, and honours, and pleasures—how vain!
I gloried alone in the cross!
For Jesus alone it was pleasure to live—
My life for His sake I was ready to give.

That life I at length shall resign,
And a better receive at His hand;
He will raise me, to shine in His image divine,—
With Him in His glory to stand!
Already the gloom is withdrawn,
Already has Misery fled,
Already the day is beginning to dawn,
And the crown is approaching my head:
I shall see Him, and dwell with Him—ever shall see,
For ever shall dwell, dearest Saviour, with thee!

Religion!—I make thee my choice;
Thine aspect to me is more bright,
Far sweeter to me is the sound of thy voice,
Than ever was earthly delight:
Repentance may stand at thy side,
Affliction may walk in thy train,
But Faith, at thy bidding, my footsteps shall guide,
And Hope my faint spirit sustain;
And Charity—love which for ever shall glow—
Shall fill me with rapture earth cannot bestow.

THE DEATH OF ADMIRAL COLIGNY.

THE history of the French Protestant Church has been for a long time almost lost sight of in this country, and we are glad to perceive, that a subject so important has of late been attracting a deep, and, we trust, a growing interest throughout the Christian community. The number of works, indeed, relating to Christianity in France, which are constantly issuing from the press in both ends of the island, is a striking evidence that the attention of the public is beginning to be aroused in behalf of the poor persecuted Huguenots. Their history is one continued series of privations, and distresses, and accumulated trials; and the remarkable instances of patience and meekness under suffering which we meet with in perusing the blood-stained page, give to the narrative of Huguenot persecution a peculiar interest, which cannot fail to charm every careful and attentive reader. On the trials of the French Protestants we are delighted with a work which has just appeared, under the title of "The Countess D'Auvergne; or, Sufferings of the French Protestants." This little book details, from history, the leading and more distinguished events of the period to which it refers; and though by some it may be regarded as bearing the aspect of an imaginary narrative, the accomplished authoress, Mrs Ponsonby, informs us, that "the illustrations, and the various incidents which chequer the lot of the subjects of her narrative, are not to be considered as fictitious or imaginary." The work is written with singular taste and beauty. We select the following brief extract, as likely to interest our readers. After describing, in a truly graphic style, the heart-rending details of the Bartholomew massacre, the authoress thus proceeds:—

Amid the mighty massacre, the mind can scarcely pause to contemplate the fate of suffering individuals on this fearful night; yet, however awful and afflictive in itself, it affords a faint relief from the horrors of the scene, to linger for a moment over the fate of illustrious individuals who perished in the massacre.

Among the first victims to fury and treachery, was the noble, the brave, the venerable, the generous, but, alas! the too confiding, Admiral de Coligny. To secure his destruction, the Duke of Guise, at a very early period, hurried the troops to the Admiral's abode. Accordingly, accompanied by a number of the nobles, and a multitude of soldiers, he hastened to the palace where the Admiral resided, which he surrounded by his military bands. They forcibly entered the gate of the court, which was kept by the guards of the King of Navarre; and these, with many others, they barbarously murdered.

But the courage of the Duke and his noble associates began to fail at the dark deed of blood which yet lay before them; and they shrunk from inflicting the fatal blow themselves. Perhaps they were awed by its deep atrocity, or afraid to face their venerable victim—or, perhaps, they trembled in the sight of Heaven. Whatever were their feelings,—the fears, or the silent up-braidings of their conscience,—they dared not venture further than the court below; but, remaining there, they despatched a band of ruffians to the Admiral's apartments.

The unfortunate Coligny, hearing the tumult, the clashing of swords, and the dying groans of his slaughtered servants, started from his couch, and now—when, alas! too late—suspected some dark, deceitful tragedy. A sense of deep injury—of horror at the outrage apparently contemplated;—a sudden apprehension of danger to himself, and a powerful impression of his own approaching doom, rushed into his mind, and roused a conflict of agitated feeling.

Yet, even at this moment of awful suspense, when a painful death seemed rapidly approaching, his courage did not fail—his great mind quailed not before the dreadful prospect. The principles of piety which reigned within his soul, enabled him with calmness to meet the sudden summons, and the energies of faith powerfully and sweetly sustained him in the awful conflict.

He calmly knelt down by the side of his couch, and looking towards heaven, and clasping his hands in the attitude of prayer, he poured out his soul in deep, devout, and imploring supplication.

A few moments passed—moments of strange and mingled emotion—moments of awful and unutterable solemnity to the humble and adoring suppliant at the throne—when Cornaton, one of his faithful attendants, rushed into his apartment, with a countenance of awful anxiety and horror.

"We are gone! my Lord!" he wildly exclaimed—"we are gone!—we are betrayed! God calls us to himself! The house has been forced, and no means remain for resistance or escape!"

The Admiral instantly arose from his knees, evincing by the dignity and calmness of his countenance, the consoling, strengthening, and elevating influences of his devout and holy exercise. He mildly replied to the frantic exclamation,

"Well! Cornaton, I am ready! Let it come; I have long been prepared. As for you, my faithful attendants, save yourselves the best way you can, for you cannot save my life. I commend my soul to the mercy of my God!"—

At this moment the murderers burst into the apartment, and advancing towards the Admiral, the leader of the band furiously demanded,

"Art thou the Admiral de Coligny?"

"I AM," he replied, with inexpressible composure, with a dignity and grace of ineffable benignity that awed them to silence, and stayed for a moment their murderous design. He then added, in accents solemn and impressive, "Young man! Reverence these my grey hairs, my wounds, and my infirmities! But, do what thou wilt, thou canst only shorten my poor afflicted life but a very few days——"

These words were scarcely uttered, when the murderous assailant, mastering his momentary feelings of compunction, plunged his sword, with the fury of a fiend, into the breast of the brave Coligny, who fell to the ground, without a struggle or a groan, and expired beneath the daggers, the insults, and the curses of the coward and the furious demons of destruction.

The lifeless form of the unfortunate Coligny was precipitated into the court of the palace, where it was instantly surrounded by the eager crowd below, who surveyed the mangled form with satisfaction and delight. Wounds and blood had altered the appearance of the Admiral so much, that none who had known him could recognise him now.

But when the Duke of Guise, in the joy and triumph of gratified revenge, wiped the blood from his face, his venerable features were distinctly recognised. Though many marks of violence marred his noble countenance, yet its former aspect might still be clearly seen. The stillness and paleness of death which rested over it, seemed but the smile and the placid look of life which in former days arrayed it. His eyes, indeed, at whose piercing glance his mightiest foes had trembled, were now for ever sealed—and the tongue that had been used to counsel or command, was now for ever hushed—and the sage and fearless spirit, that had swayed the mightiest destinies, was now for ever fled.

But his lofty brow, though mangled and disfigured—and his hoary locks, though clotted with his gore—and his noble countenance, though covered with the image and the paleness of death, fully evinced the features of the brave but unfortunate Coligny.

Being now completely satisfied with the Admiral's identity, the joy of his murderers was undisguised and boundless.

"Now I recognise him!" exclaimed the Duke of Guise, regarding the countenance of his lifeless foe with a savage exultation. "Now I really know him. It is indeed the same! It is he himself! It is—it is the cursed Coligny!"

Having said this, he leaped upon his horse, and with the direful fleetness of some savage bloodhound, which has been roused to madness by the sight and scent of blood, he flew throughout the city, wherever the massacre raged in hottest fury—galloped through the streets, followed by a band of noble attendants, encouraging the soldiers to deeds of horrid carnage.

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Prayer and Faith.—Beware how you confide in your own strength. Remember Peter's fall. Your safety lies in prayer. Live near to God, and draw continual supplies of grace and strength from the fulness that is in Christ, your living head. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

Faith realizes things unseen, and raises the soul above the trials and temptations of this sinful world. Especially dwell much upon believing views of the cross of Christ. Faith is never more efficacious than when exercised towards a dying Saviour. As the wounded Israelites obtained health by looking at the serpent on the pole; so the Christian obtains strength against sin, and victory over the world, by looking with the eye of faith at his Saviour on the cross. Well might St Paul say, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ;" when he could add, "by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Let his determination, brethren, be yours, and yours also shall be his experience.—REV. G. HODSON.

THE LAST HOURS OF A YOUNG CHRISTIAN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM PATERSON.

DID you ever see a Christian die? If you have, did you not feel that you were in a scene of privilege? Were you not ready, as you looked on your departing friend, and saw the faith, the love, the meekness, the resignation, the hope, which he manifested, to exclaim, "It is good to be here," what but the cross of Christ can support us in the trying hour of dissolution? and, oh, how wonderful is its power—making the scene of death like the very gate of heaven, and enabling the dying disciple, not only to bid a calm adieu to the world, and all he held dear in it, but to "rejoice in hope of the glory of God," and to "long to be with Christ, which is far better." "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Come with me, you who have never witnessed such a sight, and see a Christian die. Come with me, ye young ones, for it is to the death-bed of a young Christian that I would lead you. Come, ye careless ones, for you too will ere long be laid upon a dying bed. And come ye Christians also, and see how happy ye may die. Come all, and come saying, "Holy Spirit, teach us to be followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises."

It was a young disciple—a lamb of Christ's flock, that lay upon her dying bed. After having passed, and within the short space of three months, through many scenes of severe suffering both by sea and land, by the good hand of her God she was at length brought to a quiet resting-place, and to the care and attention of affectionate friends, truly thankful that her feeble frame was no more to be tossed about. She had been arrested in her progress to a foreign land, and brought back to die in the land of her fathers. And oh, how blessed a death was hers. Wonderful, delightful to behold, were her fortitude and hope amid the saddest preludes of dissolution. After a fit of consumptive coughing, she could utter such language as this—"My sufferings are nothing compared with what I deserve, and with what my beloved Saviour endured for me. They will soon be at an end. This tabernacle is dissolving—this body is consuming as a rotten thing, as a garment that is moth-eaten: but this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality." Yes, and her humility seemed to deepen, and her faith to strengthen, and her fortitude to rise, and her hope to brighten, as the wasting and dissolving of her fair but frail tabernacle advanced. The Gospel of Jesus was the spring of all. It was her sanctifier and her solace; and her whole manner showed the light and peace it gave to her heart. In its spirit, she prayed; in its patience, she suffered; in its grace, she trusted; and in its hope, she died. While her friends stood weeping around her bed of languishing, she bade them be resigned; for she was resigned herself; she bade them be comforted, for she was happy; and while she knew that they must mourn, she bade them mourn not as those who have no hope, for she felt that she was going to Him who had redeemed her, who was her beloved and her Friend, who would be their Saviour too, and through whose merit and blood they might all meet again never more to be separated, in his own heavenly kingdom, where "there is no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, nor any more pain, for the former things shall have for ever passed away." She longed for heaven, and felt that the best that earth could offer was nothing to the presence of her God and Saviour. And when the lamp of life was glimmering in the socket, and when with her expiring breath, she was calling on her Redeemer to come and take her to himself, it could easily be seen, and oh, how delightful in the trying hour to behold it, that she heard the voice of her Beloved, saying to her, "Rise up my love, my fair one, and come away."

"She came to the Cross when her young cheek was blooming,
And raised to the Lord the bright glance of her eye;
And when o'er its beauty death's darkness was glooming,
The Cross did uphold her—the Saviour was nigh."

During the few latter months of her brief career, she had passed through much "tribulation;" but she had "washed her robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," and all her sufferings are for ever ended. She is now before the throne of God, and will serve him, and enjoy him day and night in his temple for ever. She had passed through "fire and through water, but she is now in a wealthy place." She has taken her seat among the ranks of the blood-redeemed hosts on high, she has put on the crown of immortality, she has bidden an eternal adieu to every evil, and has entered on a life of everlasting and unalloyed felicity. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

O what comfort to bereaved friends arises from such a dying scene as we have attempted to describe! Should this simple narrative meet the eye of any who are mourning the loss of beloved relatives, who manifested, like the subject of the foregoing Sketch, the precious token of the life of God—the blessed evidences of an interest in Jesus, of an humble faith, of a new heart, and of a chastened hope, we bid them, with ourselves, be comforted; for it is our happiness to "mourn not as those who have no hope." Our friends have fallen asleep in Jesus; and "they who sleep in Jesus, God will bring with him."

"They are not lost, but gone before."

Be it ours to follow them to that better land at which they have arrived—the heavenly Canaan. The same faith that carried them through Jordan's flood will carry us; and we will meet and dwell together in the good land beyond it—"and there shall be no night there."

ON THE GREAT ENDS OF THE MINISTERIAL OFFICE.

BY THE REV. W. WALLACE DUNCAN,
Minister of Cleish, Kinross-shire.

THE history of the Christian Church from the third century to the present day, exhibits melancholy evidence of the tendency which prevails in all ages, to lose sight of the real scope and design of the ministerial office. How frequently has this blessed ordinance of God, for the good of souls, been prostituted to the worst purposes,—how frequently has it been employed as a means of advancing the low ends of worldly ambition and earthly aggrandisement! Do we not behold men calling themselves the successors of the apostles, nay, the vicegerents of Christ on earth—the popes, and the cardinals, and the priests of Papal Rome, assuming the pomp of more than regal state, lording it over God's heritage, claiming for themselves the power not of the keys only, but also of the sword, and in the name of the meek and lowly Jesus, perpetrating deeds whose enormity can scarcely find a parallel in the darkest pages of unbaptized infidelity, ignorance and crime?

But it is not necessary to look to Antichrist for an exemplification of the manner in which the ministerial office may be desecrated. It might be invidious to refer too particularly to past events, but it is impossible to deny that, even in Protestant churches, whether Established or Voluntary, Episcopalian or Presbyterian, this most sacred relation between a pastor and people has been too often consummated without due regard to the infinitely important and only true ends which it is intended to subserve. It may well be questioned if mere worldly considerations, of various kinds, have not in too many instances been allowed more weight in the appointment of ministers to the pastoral charge and in the acceptance of the same, than, to say the least, is due.

Now the great point to be determined in this matter is, what did the great Head of the Church design by the appointment of the ministerial office? And, accordingly, we proceed to observe, that He intended it to be instrumental:—

First, In converting sinners; secondly, In feeding and superintending his Church; and, thirdly, In comforting the distressed. That these are considered by our Church to be the great end, of this sacred office, or ordinance as it may be called, is abundantly evident from the fact, that, previous to admission, every minister is obliged to answer the following solemn question:—“Are not zeal for the honour and glory of God, love to our Lord Jesus Christ, and a desire of being instrumental in edifying and saving souls, your great motives and chief inducements to enter into the function of the holy ministry, and not any selfish views, or worldly designs and interests?”

1. The Supreme and only Head of the Church, designed the ministerial office to be instrumental in converting sinners.—It is with a view to this that Paul calls it “the ministry of reconciliation;” and that, in the exercise of this ministry, he says, “Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.” The whole human race is by nature at war with God. The heart is a total stranger to all that is holy—it hates the light; all its propensities are towards sin, and that continually, until the Word of God has been brought to bear upon it with effect. Burning with love to fallen man, Jesus became himself a minister of Gospel truth. As the “Angel of the everlasting covenant,” he came “to seek and to save that which was lost.” So long as he remained on earth, he called upon all men to repent, and to believe in him as the Messiah; and, when about to ascend to heaven, after having accomplished the work which his Father had given him to do, he left with his apostles this commission, “Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations.” True to his character as the Good Shepherd, he provided for the necessities of his lost sheep, by appointing certain persons, whose duty it was to call the wanderers back into the fold. And this is exactly what we find all the apostles bending their whole energies—compassing sea and land—using every means with unwearied zeal and perseverance—to effect. Fearless of the consequences to themselves, they ceased not, day and night, to warn, to reprove, to rebuke, and to entreat sinners to turn from their evil ways. They set before them “blessing and cursing,” and strove to bring them “from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.”

2. The holy ministry is designed as a means of feeding and tending the flock.—When Jesus was about to leave his disciples, he said to Simon Peter, “Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs. He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He said unto him, Feed my sheep. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because He said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto Him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep.” Again, we find the Apostle Paul addressing those to whom the spiritual interests of the Church at Miletus were committed, in the following words: “Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.” It was not enough that men were converted—they required to be strengthened in the faith. It was not enough that they were brought into the right way—they required to be continually warned of the danger of returning to the wrong way, and to be helped to persevere. It was not enough that the sheep were restored to the fold from which they had strayed—it was necessary that under-shepherds should be appointed to watch over them, and to lead them into green pastures, where they might always enjoy abundance of nourishing food, and by the still waters, at which they might always quench their thirst.

3. Another great and important design of the ministerial office is, “to comfort the distressed.” “The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me,” said our blessed Saviour, through the Prophet Isaiah, “because he hath anointed me to comfort those that mourn”—“to give the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.” And the same heavenly duty is required of every one whom He has appointed to labour in holy things. Nor is there any part of his work in which the faithful minister of the Gospel takes more sincere delight, than the soothing of the troubled conscience and the binding up of broken hearts. Never does he feel so thoroughly convinced that “he that desires the office of a bishop desireth a good work,” and that its origin is indeed divine. And, in order that he may be the better fitted for this duty, of which, as well as of mercy, it may truly be said that it is twice blessed, it often pleases God to visit his ministering servant with peculiarly sore trials in the first instance, and afterwards to soothe and to comfort him with such sweet, such rich, and such abundant consolation, that he is constrained to adopt the language of the apostle, “Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ. And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer; or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.” 2 Cor. i. 3-6.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE MOST NOBLE ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, MARQUIS OF ARGYLE.

BY THE EDITOR.

THERE is no family among the Scottish nobles to which the cause of Christ in Scotland stands more deeply indebted, than to the house of Argyle. In the days of hottest persecution, when the love of multitudes waxed cold, and many deserted and disowned the Protestant interests, in the family of Argyle some of the staunchest adherents of the Reformation principles are to be found. The individual whose eventful history we are about to sketch bears the high distinction of being one of the Scottish martyrs, and one whose courage never quailed in the hour of danger and of death.

This illustrious Christian nobleman was born in the year 1598. He was educated carefully in the principles of the Reformation, and early imbued with an ardent and enthusiastic admiration of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. During the life of his father, who died about the year 1637, he appears to have taken no prominent part in the public proceedings of his time, whether in ecclesiastical or civil matters; but, towards the dawn of the Second Reformation, we find him coming forward as not only the supporter, but the leader, of the friends of Presbyterianism. A short time before this, indeed, he employed his influence in behalf of the celebrated Samuel Rutherford, who was summoned before a High Commission Court, held at Wigton in 1636, for refusing to conform to the demands of Prelacy. His efforts on this occasion were ineffectual, but they evinced, at all events, the strong interest which he took in the Presbyterian cause; and, in gratitude to the pious nobleman, Rutherford, in one of his well-known “Letters,” says, “I shall pray for him and his house while I live. It is his honour to open his mouth in the streets for his wronged and oppressed Master Christ Jesus.” And not only did he intercede for the worthy minister of Anwoth; he exerted himself in favour of several others at the same period, and was, under God, the instrument of procuring the mitigation of their sentences.

In the famous General Assembly convened at Glasgow in 1638, Argyle was present from the commencement of its proceedings. At first, the Covenanters were somewhat doubtful as to the sincerity and warmth of his attachment to their principles, from the apparent ambiguity of his words and actions; but, before their meeting terminated, they felt, and gave thanks to God for it, that they had not a firmer friend than Argyle in the whole ranks of Scottish nobility. The magnanimity of his conduct was remarkably displayed at the critical moment when Hamilton, the King's Commissioner, declared his intention to withdraw himself from the Assembly. While the meeting was in a state of deep excitement, Argyle rose from his seat and craved to be heard before the Commissioner would leave the house. All eyes were turned upon the nobleman with intense anxiety. His opinions had thus far appeared to favour the Bishops, or at least he had taken no decided part in the proceedings against them, and the Covenanters naturally feared that now he was about to avow an attachment to Episcopacy. He began by stating that he had attended the Assembly in obedience to his Majesty's commands—that he had endeavoured to act a candid and impartial part—that he had neither flattered the King nor inflamed the people; but he was not ashamed to declare, notwithstanding the assertions to the contrary made by his Grace the Commissioner, that the present was a lawful Assembly, and, having himself subscribed the Covenant, he wished that nothing should be done contrary to the true sense of that solemn deed. The same sentiments were then avowed by several others of the nobles present, and the Commissioner, with the utmost indignation, dissolved the Assembly in the name of the King, and took his departure. Argyle having been nominated as one of the assessors to the Commissioner, thought it his duty to leave the house along with him, under the impression that, when his Grace dissolved the Assembly, the only right in virtue of which he, not being a regular member, had a seat in it, thereby ceased. Too upright and honourable, however, to be the mere tool of a tyrannical and crafty monarch, and sympathizing warmly in the views and feelings of the Covenanters, he returned the following day to the Assembly, when the Moderator earnestly entreated him that, though he was no member of the Court, he would, from his regard for the Church, be pleased to countenance their proceedings. This his Lordship promised, and, by his presence and encouragement, he strengthened the hands of the Presbyterian party. By this step, however, he lost the favour of the King, which he had for some time enjoyed; but neither a monarch's smile nor a monarch's frown could deter the upright nobleman from discharging his duty to his country and the Church. In the proceedings of that famous Assembly he felt a lively interest. At his request the explication of the Confession of Faith or Covenant was taken into consideration, that it might be fully understood whether the members had subscribed and sworn that document in the same sense in which he and others had done. A Committee was appointed in reference to this subject, and Argyle was requested to attend its meetings, which he did most punctually. At this Committee, which consisted of ministers who, according to Baillie, "were not the fittest," the question under deliberation, which was one of great importance, was gravely and seriously considered whether, in subscribing the National Covenant, an individual was to be considered as abjuring Episcopacy, as understood in the year 1580. This was the sense in which Argyle had understood the document when he appended his name to it, and he was naturally anxious to ascertain whether the same impression prevailed in the minds of the other Covenanters. Being anxious to bring the matter to a bearing, he urged the subject again upon the attention of the Assembly, when the report of the Committee was called for, and Lord Loudon stated the result of their labours, which went to show, from the records of the Church, that Episcopacy was totally incompatible with the doctrine and discipline of the Church, as it was professed and established in the years 1580 and 1581. The Earl of Argyle, on hearing the report, and the passages by which it was supported, declared his complete satisfaction, and candidly acknowledged that all his doubts, if he had any, were completely set at rest. The Moderator then put the question, and, with the exception of Mr Robert Baillie, who hesitated, the Assembly agreed that, by the Confession as it was professed in 1580, Episcopacy is abjured, and ought to be removed out of this Church. In conformity with this principle, the bishops were deposed and excommunicated, and the Presbyterian form of Church government was recognised as the established form of ecclesiastical administration in Scotland.

In the concluding address, which the Moderator delivered at the close of the proceedings of this famous Assembly, Mr Henderson spoke of the noble part which Argyle had acted, in coming forward at such a crisis; and stated, that although he wished his Lordship had joined them sooner, he hoped God had reserved him for the best time, and that He would honour him here and hereafter. Thus directly referred to, and mentioned in such honourable terms, his Lordship addressed the Assembly in the following manly and truly Christian speech:—

"Since it hath pleased you, Moderator, to mention my name, you give me occasion to thank you for putting so favourable a construction on my carriage; and whereas you wish I had joined with you sooner, truly, it was not want of affection to the good of religion and my own country which detained me, but a desire and hope, that by staying with the Court I might have been able to bring about a redress of grievances: and when I saw that I could not stay longer, without proving unfaithful to my God and my country, I thought good to do as I have done. And now, since I am up, one thing I would remind you of, who have been purging the Church of corruptions and evil instruments, and that is, that ye would learn a lesson at their expense. I remember I told some of them, upon one occasion, that pride and avarice are two evils which have wrought much woe to the Church of Christ; and as they are grievous faults in any man, they are especially so in Churchmen. I repeat it with reverence of their learning, and I hope every man here shall walk by the square and rule which is now set before him, observing duty—1st, To superiors; 2d, To equals; and, 3d, To inferiors. Touching our duty to superiors, there need be nothing added to what hath been wisely said by the Moderator; only, let us all beware, since we are freed of many yokes of bondage, not to abuse our Christian liberty; for this were to make our profession evil spoken of. Next, concerning our equals: There is a case much spoken of in this Church, and that is, the power of ruling elders; some ministers apprehending it to be a curbing of their power. Truly, it may be that some elders be not so wise as need were; and if any such strive to make use of their power, otherwise than for the good of the Church, they may be sure of their judgment. If ought of that sort fall out, let it not breed a distemper in the Church; but, as unity ought to be the endeavour of us all, let neighbouring parishes or Presbyteries meet together for settling the same, that no dissension of this kind come to a height; otherwise it may do much evil to the Church of God. And thirdly, for inferiors: I hope ministers will study to discharge their duty to their flocks, and that people will have a due regard to those who are set over them, to watch for their souls; and not think, that because they want bishops they may live as they will. And if all of us shall thus deport ourselves, and go on constantly in the defence of our religion, and of the authority of our royal master, although our gracious sovereign do not every thing at first as we would wish, yet time may work many things; and I pray that his Majesty may reign long and prosperously over us."

* This speech we quote in full from Stevenson's "History of the Church and State of Scotland," of which we are glad to see that a reprint has been published, at a very cheap rate, in Edinburgh. It is a book which has been long appreciated by the learned, but now that a work of such excellence is brought within the reach of the public generally, no minister, no elder, no true-hearted son of the Church ought to be without a copy.

At the close of this speech, the Moderator returned thanks to Argyle, and craved pardon for bringing forward his name so openly.

Having now cast in his lot with the Covenanters, he took an active share in the steps which they were compelled to adopt. The King, enraged at the strong measures which had been passed at the Glasgow Assembly, resolved with a large army to invade Scotland. This compelled the Presbyterians to take arms in their defence; and the main body of their forces having marched towards the English borders under the command of General Leslie, the Earl of Argyle directed his chief attention to the north, and by his peculiar wisdom and prudence, he succeeded in preserving peace in the Highlands and Islands. To secure this the more effectually, he summoned a meeting of the noblemen and gentlemen of the north to assemble in Perth, where measures were concerted for preventing the northern districts from being disturbed. Argyle then proceeded to the West Highlands, where he was equally successful in maintaining peace. His having espoused the cause of the Covenanters, soon became known at court, and Charles transmitted a despatch, demanding his immediate attendance in London. He excused himself, however, from obeying the King's summons, on the ground that family arrangements required him to remain in Scotland; and at the same time, he took occasion to avow his view of the Glasgow Assembly's proceedings. The Earl's reply enraged the King, and he sent a still more imperative demand for his immediate appearance at court to answer for his conduct. Argyle, however, returned a respectful answer, declining to leave Scotland, on the ground that the disturbed state of the country required his presence. An invasion was in fact hourly expected; and Argyle joined with the general Committee of the Covenanters, in making preparations to repel the English. He himself raised a ~~company~~ of four hundred men, which he afterwards increased to nine hundred, maintained solely at his own expense. With these he guarded the west coast, and was successful in taking the castle of Brodiek in Arran.

In the whole proceedings of the Covenanters, this distinguished nobleman took a leading part; and during the eventful struggles to which his countrymen were subjected, he never failed to appear in defence of the civil and religious liberties of his native land. When Charles the First was beheaded, Argyle was one of the first to support the claims of his son to fill the throne, and the young monarch felt for a time, that he was under deep obligations to so faithful and devoted an adherent as the Marquis undoubtedly was; but when the godly nobleman ventured to reprove the King for some instance of immoral conduct, the profligate monarch forgot all his past kindness, and became his decided enemy. At the coronation of the Second Charles, which took place at Scoone, Argyle placed the crown upon his head, and, although he afterwards seemed to yield to the usurped authority of Cromwell, no sooner had the Restoration taken place, than he hurried to London, to congratulate Charles on his return to the throne of his fathers. The treacherous King heard of his arrival, and instead of welcoming one who had so warmly supported him in former times, he ordered him to be apprehended and conveyed to the Tower, where he was confined for several months, after which he was sent down to Scotland to be tried before the Scottish Parliament. On landing at Leith, he was conducted to Edinburgh Castle, where he remained till the day of trial came.

On the 13th of February 1661, Argyle was brought forward for trial on a charge of high treason. The prosecution was conducted by Sir John Fletcher, the King's advocate. The Marquis requested to be heard for a little, before the indictment was read. This, however, was refused; but after the indictment, which consisted of fourteen articles, had been read, he was permitted to address the court, which he did at great length, declaring his readiness to prove his innocence. At first the Parliament fixed on the 27th of February, for hearing his defence, but at his request it was delayed till the 5th of March. On the day appointed, accordingly, he appeared, and delivered a very affecting speech, protesting his innocence, and throwing himself upon the King's mercy. Again and again, he was placed at the bar, but no confession of guilt could be extracted. He uniformly declared in the most solemn manner, that in all his conduct he had been actuated by a simple desire to serve his God, his king, and his country. At length witnesses were adduced, and depositions taken, and the mock trial having been completed, he was brought into court to receive sentence. He reminded them of the practice of the Emperor Theodosius, who enacted that the sentence of death should not be executed till thirty days after it was passed; and he added, "I crave but ten, that the King may be acquainted with it." This reasonable request was refused, and the sentence was pronounced:—"That he was found guilty of high treason, and adjudged to be executed to the death as a traitor, his head to be severed from his body, at the cross of Edinburgh, on Monday the 27th instant, and affixed on the same place where the Marquis of Montrose's head formerly was, and his arms torn before the Parliament at the cross." The godly Marquis listened with the utmost calmness and composure, and after the sounding of trumpets which followed the reading of the sentence had ceased, he said, "I had the honour to set the crown on the King's head, and now he hastens me to a better crown than his own." And addressing the Commissioner and Parliament, he added, "You have the indemnity of an earthly king among your hands, and have denied me a share in that; but you cannot hinder me from the indemnity of the King of kings; and shortly you must be before his tribunal. I pray he mete not out such measure to you as you have done to me, when you are called to an account for all your actings, and this amongst the rest."

After his sentence, he was ordered to the common prison, where his excellent lady was waiting for him. Upon seeing her, he said, "They have given me till Monday to be with you, my dear, therefore let us make for it." She, embracing him, wept bitterly, and said, "The Lord will require it—the Lord will require it;" which drew tears from all in the room. But being himself composed, he said, "Forbear, forbear. I pity them; they know not what they are doing. They may shut me in where they please, but they cannot shut God out from me. For my part, I am as content to be here as in the Castle, and as content in the Castle as in the Tower of London, and as content there as when at liberty; and I hope to be as content on the scaffold as any of them all." He added, he remembered a scripture cited by an honest minister to him while in the Castle, which he intended to put in practice, "When Ziklag was taken and burnt, the people spake of stoning David, but he encouraged himself in the Lord."

He spent all his short time, till Monday, with the greatest serenity and cheerfulness, and in the proper exercise of a dying Christian. To some ministers who were permitted to attend him, he said, "That shortly they would envy him, who was got before them;" and added, "Remember, that I tell you, my skill fails me, if you who are ministers will not either suffer much or sin much; for though you go along with these men in part, if you do not in all things, you are but where you were, and so must suffer; and if you go not at all with them, you must but suffer."

During the short interval which elapsed between his sentence and his execution, the Marquis enjoyed much spiritual communion and intercourse with his God. On the Sabbath evening his lady took her leave of him, and Mr David Dickson, his valued friend, spent the night in prison with him. On Monday morning he awoke from a calm and peaceful sleep, and proceeded to arrange his affairs before the hour of execution. While thus engaged, in the presence of a number of his friends, he broke forth into these words:—"I thought to have concealed the Lord's goodness, but it will not do. I am now ordering my affairs, and God is sealing my charter to a better inheritance, and just now saying to me, 'Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.'"

As the execution was not to take place till one o'clock, he spent some time in writing a letter to the King; and having dined, he retired for meditation and prayer. Mr George Hutcheson came to attend him in his last moments, and on opening the door of his Lordship's chamber he asked, "What cheer, my Lord?" The Marquis instantly replied, "Good cheer, Sir; the Lord hath again confirmed and said to me from heaven, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee.'" On saying this he burst into tears. The thought of the Divine goodness seemed to affect him deeply. "I think his kindness overcomes me," he exclaimed; "but God is good to me, that he let not out too much of it here, for he knows I could not bear it. Get my cloak, and let us go." He then knelt down, and having prayed for divine strength to bear him up in this solemn crisis, he calmly took leave of a few of his friends; and, advancing towards the door, he said, "I could die like a Roman, but I choose rather to die like a Christian. Come away, gentlemen, he that goes first, goes cleanliest." Before leaving the prison, he bade a solemn farewell to his fellow-prisoner, Mr James Guthrie; who addressed him in these words, at parting:—"My Lord, God hath been with you, he is with you, and will be with you: and such is my respect for your Lordship, that if I were not under sentence of death myself, I would cheerfully die for your Lordship." The mournful procession now moved along from the Castle, passing down the street to the cross, and on reaching the fatal spot, the Marquis mounted the scaffold with great serenity and firmness. Mr Hutcheson prayed, and, permission being granted, the noble martyr addressed the surrounding multitude nearly as follows:—

"I come not here to justify myself, but the Lord, who is holy in all his ways, righteous in all his works: holy and blessed is his name. Neither come I to condemn others. I bless the Lord, I forgive all men; and desire to be forgiven of the Lord myself. Let the will of the Lord be done, that is all I desire. I was real and cordial in my desires to bring the King home, and in my endeavours for him when he was home, and had no correspondence with the adversaries' army, nor any of them, when his Majesty was in Scotland; nor had I any hand in his late Majesty's murder. I shall not speak much to these things for which I am condemned, lest I seem to condemn others. It is well known it is only for compliance—which was the epidemical fault of the nation; I wish the Lord to pardon them. I say no more—but God hath laid engagements on Scotland. We are tied by covenants to religion and reformation; those who were then unborn are yet engaged; and it passeth the power of all the magistrates under heaven to absolve from the oath of God. These times are like to be either very sinning or suffering times; and let Christians make their choice. There is a sad dilemma in the business—sin or suffer; and surely he that will choose the better part will choose to suffer; others, that will choose to sin, will not escape suffering. They shall suffer, but perhaps not as I do (pointing to the maiden), but worse. Mine is but temporal, theirs shall be eternal. When I shall be singing, they shall be howling. Beware, therefore, of sin, whatever you are aware of, especially in such times. And hence my condition is such now, as, when I am gone, will be seen not to be as many imagined. I wish, as the Lord hath pardoned me, so may he pardon them, for this and other things, and what they have done to me may never meet them in their accounts. I have no more to say, but to beg the Lord, that when I go away, he would bless every one that stayeth behind."

At the close of this touching address, Mr Hamilton prayed; and the Marquis having himself engaged in devotion, took leave of all his friends around him. As he approached the maiden, or instrument of death, Mr

Hutcheson endeavoured to support his faith, and the martyr replied, with firmness, "You know, Mr Hutcheson, what I said to you in the chamber. I am not afraid to be surprised with fear." Saying this, he knelt down, and having committed his soul into the hands of the Redeemer, he laid his head upon the block; and giving the signal, his head was in a moment severed from his body. His head was fixed on the west end of the Tolbooth, and his body was conveyed to the Isle of Bute, where it was buried in the churchyard of Kilmun.

Thus perished one of the most distinguished Christian and patriotic noblemen of whom Scotland can boast. He was the leader of the Covenanters; and by the sagacity of his counsels, as well as by the purity of his principles, and the ardour of his zeal, he was one of the most effective agents in carrying forward the work of the second Reformation.

THE MARTYR.

THE pile was reared—with quick and broken step
They hurried him along. The victim seemed
As one who heeded not the wrath of man;
But viewed with recklessness the bitter taunts,
The buffetings and mockings of a world
O'errun with guilt, and sunk in wretchedness.
Upward he gazed—his countenance composed,
Bespoke the silent rapture of his soul,
Which seemed to have a foretaste of the joys
Reserved for him in heaven; and even a smile
Played sweetly o'er his features,—contrast strange
To all the dark and fiendish looks around!
I heard him breathe a prayer—which, when observed,
His executioners in wonder gazed,
And paused till it had ceased. It was his last
And mightiest aspiration—full of faith,
And holy confidence in Him who once
In frail humanity sojourned awhile,
Suffered and died—a mighty sacrifice!
He prayed for all mankind—but most for those
Who held the truth in righteousness and love,—
The little flock, their Father's special care.
Aye, and a tear did glisten in his eye,
As he made mention of their wanderings,
And of their being scattered to and fro,
Exiled and driven from the haunts of men,
By persecution sore. Their enemies,
And his, he pleaded for, and asked from Heaven
A blessing and a pardon for them all.
And then, as if like Stephen, he had seen
The heavens opened, and the Son of Man
Standing in glory to receive him there,
"Jesus, receive my spirit!" he exclaimed,
And said no more; but oh! who can describe
The looks of horror and insatiate rage,
That sat on every countenance, when he,
The object of their fury, was no more!
When far beyond their ken his spirit fled,
And soared exultingly—while nought on earth
Was left behind but its frail tenement,
Pale, cold, and motionless, with eyes that looked Unceasingly to Heaven, and seemed to say,
"Yonder the Martyr to his rest is gone!"

RECENT OPERATIONS OF THE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY OF FRANCE.

BY THE REV. ÆNEAS RATE.

As an association has already been formed in Edinburgh for the purpose of aiding our Protestant brethren on the Continent, it may be well to afford our readers some of the most recent intelligence that has arrived, respecting one of the Evangelical Societies to which it is intended to render assistance. The accounts which have been received respecting the operations and successes of the Evangelical Society of France, whose Committee and head-quarters are at Paris, have latterly become more and more interesting and important, and are calculated to deepen our concern for the spread of religion among our French neighbours, and to lead to more earnest prayers and more energetic efforts for the advancement of God's kingdom among them.

It is very evident, that the Evangelical Society has already done much for the spread of true religion in a country which, for many years, exhibited one of the most extraordinary and portentous spectacles that the world has ever witnessed—a mighty and a numerous nation living without a God. It has planted the Gospel in many of the largest towns and most dense populations of the country; rekindling the light that before and during the French Revolution was almost wholly extinguished. It has commissioned its humble, but devoted, colporteurs to go forth over the land, and sow it with the seed of divine truth; and thousands of copies of the Word of God have been circulated, and are now silently but powerfully doing their work; and are destined, after a while, to yield a rich harvest of Christian knowledge, and holy conduct. It has sent forth its pious teachers to rear up the rising generation in that knowledge of the character and the will of God, and of the value and the prospects of the immortal spirit, to the utter absence of which, during the dismal reign of infidelity, the almost insurmountable evils and calamities which French legislators and moralists now deplore are chiefly to be ascribed. It has, in many instances, infused new vigour into the Protestant Reformed Church; rousing some of the pastors out of the lethargy into which they had sunk; raising up, in the most important places, new congregations, with devoted ministers, which have afterwards been united with the Consistories, and strengthened the hands of the faithful band who bore testimony to the truth; and finally, leading the good men in the Church to break that hollow truce which had been allowed to subsist between them and those ministers of the same Consistories, whose heresies proclaimed them to be the enemies of the cross of Christ. Whatever objections may be advanced to such societies as that of France, and whatever imperfections there may be in their administration, they are, perhaps, in the existing state of things, the instruments most likely to advance the cause of God, both in that country and in other parts of the Continent. Being in no respect under the control of the Consistories, the majority of whose ministers are unhappily the enemies of the truth, they can at once send their agents into the very heart of the parishes of Arian, Socinian, and Neologian ministers, there to lift up their voices against the heresies which these ministers proclaim; and they can also, when there are devoted pastors standing alone in any of the Consistories, send to their aid those evangelists, or teachers, or colporteurs, who may most effectually assist them in stemming the torrent of infidelity, and iniquity.

A few facts will show how much the cause of religion generally, and the French Reformed Church in particular, have been indebted to the labours of this valuable Society. The town of Amiens is situated in a department containing upwards of half a million of souls, and is the most populous and influential place in that department. In this most important position the Society have at length succeeded in planting the banner of the Cross. A place of worship has been erected, and was lately opened. The President of the neighbouring Consistory prayed and preached on the occasion to a numerous assemblage, who listened with the profoundest interest; and a faithful and devoted pastor, who has occasionally visited and preached to the people, will henceforward labour steadily among them. Other accounts state, that the Church at Troyes, where the Society, at great expense, had succeeded in planting the Gospel, has at length, on the application of the municipality, been introduced by Government into the number of churches salaried by the State, and been annexed to the Consistory of Meaux; while its former devoted pastor, M. Gerber, has been permitted to retain his situation. Troyes also is the most important town in another of the departments—that of Aube; a province which formerly abounded with devoted Protestants, but who were driven from their homes, and scattered in distant lands, when the fierce persecutions arose which immediately succeeded the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Another important station is that of Blois, the chief town in a department containing two hundred and thirty-five thousand seven hundred and fifty souls, hitherto utterly destitute of the Gospel; a territory in which, at the time of the Reformation, the doctrines of the Cross were faithfully proclaimed, and whose soil was afterwards drenched with the best blood of many a Protestant martyr, slain for the testimony of Jesus. The pastors of the Consistory of Orleans had urged the Society to send one of their agents to labour in this place. A pious individual, residing in the town, had offered two thousand four hundred francs to assist in supporting an agent; and thirty-four Protestant families, who were inhabitants, had expressed their earnest desire to obtain regular religious instruction, and their readiness to make personal sacrifice in order to assist in maintaining a minister. The Society, though deeply embarrassed, felt themselves constrained to listen to this urgent application; and, preparatory to sending a more important agent, had, at the request of the Consistory, commissioned one of their colporteurs to go among the people, and prepare them for the regular dispensation of the Word. Thus important and commanding positions are, from time to time, being seized; the glad tidings are becoming more widely proclaimed; devoted ministers are receiving fresh accessions to their numbers; the lamp of Divine Truth is beginning to be lighted anew, in regions whose dense spiritual gloom for a lengthened period no radiance darting from the Word of God has been known to illuminate.

Many and deeply interesting narratives might be extracted from the Reports of the Society, tending to show that the Spirit of God is not withheld from the field of their labours. We extract a recent one, respecting an individual of respectable family and independent property, whose mind had, at one time, been awakened to some sense of the value of his soul, and who, in order to bring tranquillity to his alarmed conscience, had renounced his profession, and devoted himself to all the austerities imposed by the Romish religion, but in vain. "He met, however," says the narrative, "with a Bible; he read it with avidity. The constant study of this blessed book detached him from the errors of his faith; still, one thing withheld him from feeling the influence of the discoveries of the Gospel—he did not see the Gospel he read in the Bible believed or practised by those around him. He was led to conclude, that the Christian system, though beautiful, was not divine; for if it were divine, he should find the Church of Jesus somewhere. Systematic incredulity was the consequence of this reasoning. While in this unhappy state of mind, a tract, distributed by me, fell into his hands; it contained an exposition of Evangelical truth, and when he read it, he could not but feel, that it presented the creed taught by the Spirit of God in his Word. He inquired where this religion was professed, and was directed to our chapel. He came; was struck and affected by all he saw and heard. During three weeks he had no repose night or day. He wept, he prayed, he read. This dreadful struggle, however, terminated in a conviction, that he had received grace to believe in Christ as his Saviour; and since that moment, he has continued to grow in the knowledge and love of God. Sunday last, he joined in communion with our Church, and has since returned to his native town, prepared to become a valuable missionary far beyond his own locality. Previously he had distributed a great number of tracts and copies of the Scriptures." Many, doubtless, are there in this benighted country, who, like the individual alluded to, have found, that all the mortifications of Popery could not yield repose to an agitated conscience, but, having discovered none around them who were living exemplifications of the power of the Gospel, have concluded all religion to be a delusion and a cheat. Had there been faithful pastors and devoted Christians within the reach of such persons, they might then have cordially welcomed the Gospel, and have now been zealously labouring to bring sinners to Christ.

One very powerful motive to render aid to such societies arises from the benefit which is likely, through their operations, to accrue to our own countrymen in foreign lands. Many of these now reside permanently in France; others spend two or three years there, with their families. A large number reside for a few months in one or other of the principal towns; no inconsiderable proportion of these are noblemen and gentlemen of superior education and property,—the very persons most likely to exert a powerful influence on their own countrymen, when they return to Britain. And what has been the consequence of their sojourn in the neighbouring country? They have returned to their own homes, to transplant the vices of France into the British soil—to desecrate the Sabbath—to indulge in gross licentiousness—to abandon the sturdy integrity of Britain for the lax principles of the Continent—to become the rest of their lives scoffers at sacred things. It is vain to imagine, that these evils can be remedied otherwise than to a very limited extent, by sending out British pastors to attend to the spiritual interests of their countrymen, for the number of them must always be very limited. But, by providing the principal towns with devoted French Protestant pastors, we shall be wielding a powerful instrument, for bringing many of our own countrymen to the knowledge of the Saviour. When far from their own homes, they will hear the truths they were wont to listen to in their own land—will contemplate examples of piety, that will convince them that there is a reality in religion, and will obtain an antidote to that poison, which would otherwise prove fatal to their principles and their happiness. In like manner, British females, who have sojourned in the French cities, may come back to their country, not to exhibit the fickleness and the frivolities of the French capital, but to display the meek and chastened virtues of the genuine followers of Christ. Of the benefit which has resulted to some of our countrywomen from the labours of a French pastor, we have the following interesting narrative. It is extracted from a letter of a minister, whose labours had been blessed to several British ladies:—"A lady," says he, "who had been a stranger to the Gospel, and whom no one had been able to prevail upon to hear it, came to B—— for about a month. She resolved to attend the chapel. The discourse she heard was upon the text, 'Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold upon eternal life.' It affected her most powerfully; she learnt that she had never attached to religion the importance that belonged to it, and that it was high time for her seriously to occupy her attention with the concerns of her soul. From that time till the hour of her departure, she regularly attended our religious meetings. Every thing about her indicated a person whose heart the truth had reached, and who feels the need, not only of hearing, but also of receiving the Gospel. The day preceding her departure she bid me farewell; and as I spoke to her some words of exhortation, she was dissolved in tears, and said to me,—'It is with pain that I leave you, I never heard the Gospel before I came here. It is you who have preached it to me for the first time; I hope that I shall never forget the things which I have heard in this place.' I spoke to you in my letter in the month of August, of a Roman Catholic lady, Mrs M——, who, at that time, was well disposed. The few details I gave were of a nature to represent her to you as a converted person. I add to-day, that her conduct and her progress have not disappointed the hopes which we then conceived respecting her. We have beheld her advance with rapid strides in knowledge, but especially in piety, in the love of God, and in communion with him; the Divine truths which rejoiced and sanctified her heart formed the constant theme of her conversation. To redeem the time had become at once her anxious desire and her endeavour. Thus she embraced every opportunity of bearing witness for the truth, when she found herself in the company of persons who had not felt its power, and strove to draw their attention to the things which, to her own soul, had become a source of profit and of consolation. The influence of the grace of God upon her had become so manifest, that it was impossible not to perceive it. I have often heard her say, with an expression of joy mingled with astonishment and gratitude—'It was ordained then, that, conducted by an invisible hand, I should traverse the seas, and come here to find the pearl of great price.' 'In crossing the sea,' said she to me on another occasion, 'we saw ourselves on the very brink of destruction. The whole crew were in consternation, and I myself was half dead with terror; and if God had at once called me to enter into that eternity, from which I was only separated by a slender plank, what had become of me, who was then without the knowledge of the Saviour. But God, concerning whom I had the vaguest conceptions, took pity upon me since he conducted me hither, in order that he might reveal himself to my soul. Oh, I can never sufficiently bless his compassion towards me!' She has since left this town to revisit England, from which she is about to sail for the colony of the Cape. At parting, she said to me with deep emotion, 'My dear Sir, you are the instrument which God has employed to bring me to the knowledge of himself; and although I leave you, probably for ever upon this earth, the remembrance of your name will always be dear to me. On your part, pray for me, and never forget her who can call herself your daughter in the faith.'

The Reports of the Society make it manifest, that in many parts of the country there exists among the people a state of mind remarkably favourable to the reception of the truth. Genuine Christians are found scattered here and there among the population, who already manifest a lively zeal for the spread of the Gospel, and who, were a faithful pastor settled among them, might render the most efficient aid. Nominal Protestants are found sometimes in considerable numbers, who lament that they have no minister of their own to instruct them in the principles of the faith; but who, if left to themselves a little longer, will, together with their children, abandon the profession of their forefathers, and become devoted children of the Roman Catholic Church. The following passages from a letter written by a minister who had lately made a missionary tour through some parts of Lorraine, will exemplify what we have stated. The writer mentions that he had arrived at L——, a village of which the mayor was favourably disposed towards the Gospel and the colporteurs; had met with a cordial reception; and had waited in a cottage for the arrival of a friend who resided in these parts, and whom he had apprized of his coming. He thus proceeds:—"As he (viz., his friend) had only just received my letter, he had not been able to invite any one to the meeting. Notwithstanding this, and although the village is composed of habitations at a considerable distance from one another, he was able to assemble an audience of sixty persons. The house which we occupied being too small to contain them, I proposed to the auditory that we should conduct our worship in the open air. I placed myself in the centre. At my right, were the men; a little farther distant, were the children. On a chair before me was placed the Bible and a collection of tracts. At the foot of the hill I had remarked a cross, with the following inscription, 'O Cross, my only confidence, hail!' This beautiful thought led me to speak on Galatians vi. 14-16, so as to unfold the blessings of the Cross, not of that which is formed of wood or of stone, but of that by which the power of God has been manifested unto salvation. I was listened to with profound attention by all, and received the benedictions of most of my hearers. A distribution of tracts, accompanied with exhortations, followed the service, which appeared to make a deep impression upon my audience. In the evening I again addressed them, on John x. 9. Blessed be God for this. M. G——, his wife, and mother, were powerfully affected. Oh, how did I feel on this occasion the truth of those words of our Saviour! Luke x. 5, 6. Yes, the peace of the Saviour had entered with us into this house, and into the midst of these mountains, and it has remained there; for they urged me to return to them as early as possible. M. G—— was earnestly desirous to receive a quantity of our books for circulation. The next day we took farewell of our hosts, both of whom had tears in their eyes, and were scarcely able to utter a word. We directed our course to S——, conversing by the way concerning the great things which the Lord might yet accomplish in this country, judging by the first-fruits which he had permitted us to taste. We arrived at our destination three hours after noon. As I had but a few moments at my disposal, I employed them in conversing with the Rev. Mr J——. He was greatly delighted with what I related to him respecting the work of God in this part of Lorraine. He authorised me to make use of his name, his authority, his friendship, whenever there was need. He is ready to second me by all the means which God shall place at his disposal."

After having spoken of other villages which he had visited, and in which he had received the most fraternal welcome, he proceeds:—"The countries which I am about to traverse contain a population of about two hundred and thirty thousand souls, scattered over four hundred and eight communes and an innumerable multitude of farms. From the nature of the districts, which I have attentively examined, six principal points and centres of regular preaching will, as I think, form the most advantageous field for my labours. At A—— there is a converted Roman Catholic teacher. At L——, there is a young convert who, with the noblest devotion, has dedicated himself to the work of instructing the poor inhabitants of this country. These two dear brethren, with whom I have corresponded for some years, will have the opportunity of being employed in the work of evangelization, with the prospect of success. Through the medium of the Protestants disseminated through many of the communes, and the number of whom every year very sensibly increases, your agent will obtain free access to thousands of Roman Catholics. All the Protestants whom I have visited have testified the regret they have felt in being deprived of every means of edification, and of being under the necessity of sending their children to the Roman Catholic schools. Many of them, for want of proper religious instruction, gradually become Roman Catholics. I think, finally, that the districts which I have just mentioned, from the disposition of their inhabitants, and the prospects they afford of the spread of the Gospel, ought to engage the attention of the Committee; for, in that circuit, I have especially remarked a great eagerness to hear the good news, and have myself received some touching proofs of it, both in conversation with individuals and at the religious meetings."

This statement only affords a specimen of what exists in many parts of France. Other accounts represent the most urgent applications for evangelists or other agents, both from pastors and from people—from Protestants, and even from Roman Catholics. But the poverty of the mass of French Christians, their comparatively small number, and the many infant stations and congregations that are dependent on extrinsic support, render it totally impossible that the Evangelical Society should satisfy all or even the principal parts of the applications for aid. The Christians in Switzerland, upon whom the Spirit of God has been especially poured forth, are exerting themselves with extraordinary energy to supply the spiritual need of their neighbours, but their limited resources are of necessity wholly insufficient. There is no other country on the Continent where vital religion extensively flourishes, and where the missionary spirit is in full exercise. It is from Great Britain alone that effectual aid can be expected; and if she refuses her powerful assistance, thousands now longing for the Gospel must go down to their graves without hearing it, and opportunities of diffusing the truth, which have not been known since the days of bloody religious persecution and martyrdom, shall have passed away unimproved.

ADIEU.

Nor as the worldling bids farewell,
When earthly wishes bound his view;
Whose but the Christian's tongue can tell
The fulness of that word, "Adieu."
Cling to thy Uncreated Friend,
To Jesus the Supremely True;
And O! thy welfare I commend
To Him, while I pronounce "Adieu."

PRAYER FOR THE INCREASE OF FAITH:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. PETER COSENS,
Minister of Lauder, Berwickshire.

"And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith."—LUKE xvii. 5.

IN the preceding verses of this chapter, Jesus charges his disciples to beware of offending or ensnaring any of his followers; and if a brother should trespass against them, to rebuke and to forgive him. On their steady obedience to these salutary injunctions, not only their own comfort, but the honour of their divine Master, and the success of his Gospel, then in its infancy, and assailed by the powers of earth and hell, essentially depended. With the importance of his precepts the apostles seem to have been deeply impressed; and, at the same time, knowing that these were opposed to the selfish and depraved propensities of the human heart, they felt how difficult it was to comply with them, and uniformly to exhibit a blameless and charitable behaviour. In these circumstances, what did they do? Persuaded that Christ was fully qualified to perfect strength in their weakness, they came before him in the attitude of humble suppliants, and said unto him, "Lord, increase our faith." As if they had said, "We would act agreeably to thy commands; but since we are so feeble in ourselves, and so prone to yield to temptation, we plead that Thou, who hast access to our minds, and whose condescending regard we have so often experienced, wouldst strengthen us, by increasing our faith in God, in thyself, and in the interesting discoveries of thy will, that thus we may be fitted for glorifying Thee, and discharging the duties to which we are called." Such appears to be the general import of the petition in the text. And if this was presented by the favoured apostles, who daily heard the gracious words proceeding from the Saviour's lips, witnessed the stupendous exhibitions of his almighty power, and were themselves endowed with miraculous gifts, does it not become us frequently and importunately to urge it at the throne of grace? Certain it is, that by his genuine followers no prayer is perhaps more generally offered, than the one before us; and if any of us have never been prompted to make it, or a prayer similar to it, our own, we have just reason to fear that we are still strangers to the sentiments and spirit of those who know his name, and desire to live devoted to his service.

In the following Discourse, I propose to show you what this prayer presupposes, what are the feelings and views by which it was dictated, and what will be the conduct of those by whom it is offered in sincerity.

I. This prayer presupposes that we are already partakers of true faith.—We ask not an increase of any good thing of which we are entirely destitute—we first seek to obtain the thing itself; and it is only when we possess it, in a certain degree, that we can with propriety seek that it may be increased. Do we, then, with intelligence and sincerity say, "Lord, increase our faith?" The petition obviously implies that we have faith—that we are genuine believers. Such, doubtless, were those apostles by whom this petition was originally preferred; and such also are real Christians, by whom only it can be appropriately addressed to the Hearer of prayer. The degrees of their faith may be greatly diversified, but the principle itself exists in every one of them.

Thus, they not only admit, on satisfactory evidence, that the Bible is given by the inspiration of God; they are solicitous to know, and knowing, they believe, the great truths which it unfolds. Agreeably to its declarations, they believe that God is, and is possessed of all excellence and perfection; that he hath given them a law, holy, just, and good, to which they are bound, by every tie, to yield unreserved obedience; and that he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, and assign to every individual of our race, according to his works, the rewards or punishments of eternity. They believe that, as "all have sinned and come short of his glory," they themselves are verily guilty before him; that, being transgressors in "thought, word, and deed," they are justly obnoxious to the curse of his violated law; and that, by no exertions of their own, can they set themselves free, either from the threatened penalty or the felt dominion of their sins, and thus recommend themselves to his favour. And believing these things, so as to be roused by means of them to right apprehensions of their perishing condition—prompting them to ask, "What must we do to be saved?"—they also receive the record given by God of his Son, believing that Jesus, the "brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person," agreeably to Divine appointment, assumed our nature, with all its innocent infirmities; that, being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; that, by his obedience unto death, he hath made complete atonement for the sins of his people, and procured the influences of the Holy Spirit, by which they may be renewed and sanctified; that, being delivered for our offences, he was raised again for our justification; and that, exalted to the right hand of the Majesty on high, and ever living to make intercession for them, he is able to save unto the uttermost all who come unto God by him.

To these precious truths, which constitute the substance of the Gospel, they yield a ready and cordial assent. Nor, believing these, do they, like merely nominal professors, cease to make any farther efforts to secure their salvation. Their faith brings them to Christ, in the way of humble and serious personal application, for an interest in his saving grace. They may, indeed, contemplating their transgressions in their number, aggravations, and demerit, and partially enlightened in the knowledge of the scheme of redeeming mercy, entertain, for a season, doubts and fears respecting the willingness of Jesus to receive them; but, encouraged by the free and unfettered offers of his Gospel, and by the affectionate earnestness with which he presses these on the acceptance of the chief of sinners, they "look unto him, that they may be saved; they desire that they may be found in him, not having their own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of him;" and they habitually draw near to God, in his name, pleading his merits as the sole ground on which they build their hope of forgiveness, reconciliation, and eternal life. And, while they thus rely on him as their great High Priest, they also surrender themselves to him as their Lord and King, that he may make them his willing and obedient people. Their faith, therefore, is never dead, being alone. It is a living principle, commencing in them a process of spiritual purification, which, as it advances, cleanses them more and more from the defilements of sin, progressively assimilates them to the Divine image, in righteousness and true holiness, and leads them to seek, by a patient continuance in well-doing, for glory, honour, and immortality.

Such is the faith which is essential to all real Christians—the faith which, by uniting them to the Saviour, secures to them an interest in the benefits of his redemption. Is this implanted in your hearts? I ask not whether you, as yet, possess strong faith, but whether you have faith at all? If you have it, then to you Christ will be precious. You cannot live in the allowed neglect of known duty and commission of known sin, or regard with careless indifference the means of grace, or rest contented with the progress which you have made, or seem to have made, in wisdom's ways. By these plain scriptural marks, judge whether you have that faith in Christ, and the truth as it is in him, without which no man can be a Christian, even of the lowest order. And if you possess this faith, though it may be only like the "grain of mustard seed," be thankful, for it is unspeakably precious; at the same time, be not satisfied with it as it now is, but say, "Lord, increase our faith."

II. This leads me to show you what are the feelings and views by which this prayer is dictated.

1. The Christian, who offers up this prayer, is conscious of the weakness of his faith.—As no man will labour to improve his health, who knows or thinks that it is sound and vigorous, so no less evident is it that we shall not seek an increase of faith, if we imagine that it is already sufficiently strong. Many, in fact, do imagine that their faith needs little or no confirmation. They allege that they feel no doubts respecting the truth of the Gospel; that they seldom or never permitted doubts on this subject to enter their minds; or that, if they did once yield to these, they are now dissipated by the effulgence of external and internal evidence by which the Divine authority of the Gospel is attested. Their faith in this being fully settled, why, ask they, need we pray that it may be "increased?" In reply, we would say, that they who are disposed to put such a question, are most probably utter strangers to that faith which receives the Lord Jesus Christ in all his offices, and which has annexed to it the promise of eternal salvation. For, what is the specific object of their faith? It is, that the Gospel is a Divine revelation. But if it extend no farther, in what respects does their faith differ from the faith of devils? for these believe this truth. They believe more than this—they believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and believing, they tremble. And, like that of apostate spirits, may not their faith be what it is, whilst they remain in a state of hostility against the High and Holy One,—under the dominion of those guilty passions which, if cherished till they die, must exclude them from the everlasting habitations of the just? Their faith, such as it is, may not need to be increased; but it must be very different from what it is, before they can have any valid claim to the character of genuine Christians.

These, indeed, like the former, believe that the Gospel is the offspring of heavenly wisdom; but they believe what the former do not. They believe the Gospel itself—the deeply interesting facts, and doctrines, and promises, and threatenings which it announces, so far as they know them; and they believe them, anxiously desirous to appropriate to themselves the instruction, warning, comfort, and incitement to holy living with which these are fraught. Now, it is chiefly in reference to these vital truths, which are the grand objects of saving faith, that most of them need to have their faith increased; for, as there are "young men and fathers, so also there are babes in Christ."

The faith of the former may be strong; but that of the latter, who constitute a very numerous class, is generally weak, so that to them we may apply the words of our Lord, addressed to certain of his primitive disciples, "O ye of little faith!" Nor can it be doubted that, in consequence of the prevalence of temptation, the "young men," and even the "fathers," will feel and bewail the manifold deficiencies of their faith. Certain it is, that, with a sense of the weakness of your faith, you, who offer up this prayer in sincerity, are and must be impressed. You know that, if your faith were what it ought to be, the truths which it embraces would exert a far deeper and more permanent influence on your tempers, conversation, and conduct than they generally do. Thus you believe that God is every where present, beholding the evil and the good, and that He who arrays the lilies of the field, and feeds the fowls of heaven, will much more provide for you; but, while such is your belief, you can sometimes speak and act as if he were afar off, draw near to him in devotional exercises with cold formality, question the unceasing tenderness of his paternal care, and feel dissatisfied with his providential arrangements. You believe that he "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; and that, with him also he will freely give us all things." But, believing this, how faint often are your impressions of the amazing love of God, who thus spared not his own Son, as well as of the abominable nature of sin, to expiate the guilt of which he delivered him up! and with what dark suspicions are you, from time to time, disquieted, lest your strength should not be proportioned to your day of duty or of suffering! You believe that soon you must die, and enter the land of spirits, and give account to the Judge of all; but, alas! admitting, as you do, these awakening truths, you know that you are, for the most part, too closely attached to the present scene of things, and therefore remiss in making suitable preparation for your departure hence. In this way, you feel that your faith is still but feeble; and, from painful consciousness of this, you are prompted to supplicate, "Lord, increase our faith."

2. The Christian who presents this prayer, is impressed with a sense of the importance of having his faith increased.—Prayer is the offering up of our desires unto God, for things agreeable to his will. In the earnestness of desire its essence consists. But we will not, with all our hearts, desire to obtain any blessing, which we deem insignificant in itself, or unnecessary to us. It is only when we have just apprehensions of its magnitude and utility, that we shall earnestly long to secure it. Thus, do we pray, in the spirit of the penitent publican, "God be merciful to me, a sinner,"—we do so, because, alive to our unworthiness and guilt, we regard the forgiveness of our sins, as a boon of inestimable value. In like manner, why does the Christian implore, that the Lord would increase his faith? but, because, while he feels its weakness, he is, at the same time, impressed with a sense of the importance of having it increased and confirmed.

Now, various considerations, to which I can only briefly advert, serve to deepen this impression on his mind. He knows, for instance, that an increase of faith is requisite to qualify him for successfully prosecuting his spiritual warfare. Sin, though subdued, is not destroyed within him; it still exists in his heart, and frequently struggles hard to regain its ascendancy over him; and formidable in itself, it is aided in its operations by the world in which he lives, and by the principalities and powers of darkness. With these combined enemies of his salvation, he must maintain a perpetual and vigorous conflict, if he would not fall under their dominion, and fall to rise no more. But, how shall he be enabled to repel their assaults? Without a firm and unwavering faith, his efforts will be languid, desultory, and unavailing. Why, accordingly, is he sometimes surprised and vanquished by his spiritual enemies? The chief reason is, that, though he disbelieve not the divine word, his belief of its truths is not so vivid and strong as it ought to be. For did he steadily believe its declarations and promises, and, believing these, habitually realize the presence of God, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the solemn scenes of eternity, he would watch and strive against sin, as his deadliest foes, rise superior to worldly allurements and terrors, and advance, under the Captain of his salvation, "conquering, and to conquer." Hence, faith is represented in Scripture, as the instrument by which God "purifieth the heart—as the victory which overcometh the world—as the shield by which we shall be able to quench the fiery darts of the wicked."

Nor, is an increase of faith less necessary to the Christian's progressive improvement in the diversified virtues of the divine life. It is his desire to "grow in grace," in love to God, and charity to men, in meekness and temperance, in humility and heavenly-mindedness—that he may make his calling and election sure, and adorn the doctrine of God, his Saviour. But in these it is not possible that he can grow, unless he not only have faith, but have it in lively exercise. Thus, if his love to God abound, it is because he believes the love which God hath to him, and hath manifested toward him in the gift of his Son; or, if his humility be deepened, it is, because he believes, that he has nothing which he has not received and nothing which he has not more or less misimproved; or, if patience have in him its perfect work, it is because he believes that he has an enduring portion laid up for him in heaven. Faith is, therefore, the radical grace; and in proportion to its strength, will be the vigour of all the other graces which beautify the Christian character.

What but this also can render us willing to perform those self-denying and difficult duties to which we may, and must be frequently called? It was by "faith, that Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac; and it was by faith that Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of Egypt." Strong, indeed, must have been their faith; and strong, too, must be the faith of every one of us, who, in obedience to the Divine will, would uniformly "deny himself, take up his cross, and follow Christ, both through good and through bad report."

Most requisite, in fine, is lively faith to our enjoyment of solid comfort, especially in the trying situations of life, when bereaved by an overwhelming stroke of those who were near and dear to us, when visited with painful sickness, or when called to walk through the valley of the shadow of death. Without this, cheerless and desolate, indeed, must be our hearts! Whereas, enlivened and sustained by its influence, embracing the promise of a faithful God, who hath said, that he will "not fail us," knowing that the Saviour in whom we have trusted is able to keep that which we have committed to him against the great day, and looking forward in the exercise of good hope to the glories of eternity, we can "in patience possess our souls, can say, the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord, can rejoice in tribulation," and even in our struggle with the last enemy, may sing the song of triumph, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus, regarding strong faith, as essential to success in his spiritual warfare, to his growth in grace, to his cheerful performance of duty, and to his experience of strong and permanent consolation, need we wonder, that the Christian should be impressed with its importance, and that impressed with its importance he should plead, that the "Lord would increase his faith?"

3. This prayer implies a conviction in you, who offer it, that it is the work of the Lord to increase your faith—a work which he is able and willing to perform.—What, but such a conviction should prompt you to apply to him, that you may obtain this blessing? If you could secure it by your own efforts, why should you have recourse unto Him? Prayer is the language of helplessness. When, therefore, you pray, "Lord, increase our faith," your prayer, if presented in sincerity, evidently implies, that you are thoroughly convinced that you are unable by your own unaided energies to increase it, and that its increase must be derived from the Lord.

Your conviction rests on the most solid foundation. Genuine faith, both in its first formation, and in its subsequent development, is the offspring of Divine influence. For, although the truths of revelation be clearly unfolded, and established by the most satisfactory evidence, yet so darkened naturally are our understandings, and perverted are our judgments by prejudice, and earthly and sinful affections, that we will not admit them into "good and honest hearts," till we be, in some measure, enlightened and renewed by Divine grace. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Faith is, accordingly, exhibited as the gift of God. "To you," says Paul, in his epistle to the Philippians, "it is given in the behalf of Christ to believe on his name." And what is the language of the Saviour himself? "No man," declares he "can come to me, unless the Father, who hath sent me, draw him." Now, as it is God who thus produces faith in the hearts of Christians, so it is he who nourishes it, and renders it the living spring of new obedience, and of genuine peace. Hence, the apostle supplicated the Lord in behalf of the Thessalonian converts, that "He would perfect that which was lacking in their faith, and that he would fulfil in them the work of faith with power." Did its continued existence and growth depend entirely on ourselves, assailed, as it is, by so many temptations, from within and without, it would soon wither and die. It is "He who hath begun in us a good work, who must carry it on, till it be completed at the day of Christ." Of this we are fully convinced; and therefore we pray, "Lord, increase our faith."

And what ample encouragement have we habitually to offer up this prayer! The Lord, who at first gave us faith, is able to increase it; he hath increased it in thousands and tens of thousands in all ages; and conducted them by means of it, through dangers and death, to the land of heavenly rest. And he is as willing, as he is able, to increase it in all his people. He prayed for Peter, that this faith might not fail; and will he not, in answer to your fervent petitions, enlighten, enlarge, and establish your faith? "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened; for if ye being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them who ask him—that Spirit, by whose teaching and influences, the eyes of your understandings being enlightened, you shall know what is the hope of God's calling, and what are the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power toward them who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ Jesus, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places."

Let consciousness, then, of the weakness of your faith—a sense of the importance of having it increased, and a rooted conviction, that it is the doing of the Lord to increase it, incite you fervently to implore, that he would increase your faith; and doubt not, that, sooner or later, your prayer shall be graciously heard and answered.

III. I now proceed to show you, what will be the conduct of those who offer this prayer in sincerity.—Will they be satisfied with merely praying that their faith may be increased? No. They are aware, that prayer for any Divine blessing is intended, not to supersede the necessity of vigorous and unremitting endeavours, on their parts, to secure it, but rather to stimulate them to exert these with renovated ardour. They pray, that God would not permit them to be tempted to sin, or, that he would support and deliver them, when tempted; but, while this is their prayer, they feel that they are laid under the strongest obligations to flee from temptation, or if, in the path of duty, it should assail them, strenuously to resist its influence. They pray, that their Father in heaven would give them their daily bread; but, while this is their prayer, they know that it is their imperious duty, wisely and industriously to use every lawful method for the purpose of obtaining food convenient for them. In like manner, when they pray—"Lord, increase our faith," instead of being contented with simply offering up this petition, they go on earnestly to apply their minds to the prosecution of those means, by which their faith may be more and more invigorated. Indeed, it is only in the use of all the appointed means that the Lord is pleased to increase their faith; and should they neglect these, they have no reason to expect that he will lend a favourable ear to the voice of their supplications.

What, then, are some of those subsidiary means by which your faith may be increased, and which you who unfeignedly offer up this prayer will be disposed to employ?

One of these means is watchfulness against every thing which tends to weaken your faith. Suppose that your health were enfeebled by disease, and that you were solicitous to have it recruited, you would carefully shun whatever you knew was fitted to prevent or retard the accomplishment of your wishes. And, alive to the weakness of your faith, can you earnestly implore that the Lord would increase it, whilst you hesitate not to cherish those tempers, to listen to those communications, and to do those things, which inevitably tend to impair its energy? No. Your prayer will, and must, be accompanied with strict vigilance against these and similar evils. Guard, then, I beseech you, against the indulgence of a worldly spirit. This, how lightly soever some may be apt to regard it, is extremely injurious to the growth of faith. For, rivetting our attention to things seen and temporal, it withdraws it from those things which are unseen and eternal; it cools our attachment to the great objects of Christian faith; it disturbs or suspends our communion with God, by which the life of faith is maintained in the soul; and it engenders in us many foolish and hurtful passions, which serve to obscure our perception of the excellencies, the glory, and even the meaning of Divine truth. In consequence, accordingly, of their overweening attachment to earthly riches, honours, and pleasures, how many have subjected their faith to the perils of shipwreck? Most necessary, therefore, is it, that we take heed to the apostolical admonition, "love not the world, neither the things that are in the world."

Shun also intimate fellowship with unbelieving men. These will not scruple to disparage the sublime mysteries of the Gospel, nay, to represent the Gospel as a cunningly devised fable. Their plausible discourse, their sly insinuations, their sarcastic raillery, cannot fail to exert a pernicious influence on the minds of the young, and of those who are weak in the faith, leading them to treat the most important truths of the Bible as points of doubtful disputation, and at last to question, it may be, the authority of the Bible itself. Let not such persons be your chosen companions. You may occasionally meet with them; but hold with them no unnecessary intercourse. Frequent rather the society of those who delight to expatiate on the concerns of their souls and eternity, and who, by their judicious counsels and holy example, may animate you in the "work of faith and labour of love."

Watch especially against the prevalence of known and presumptuous sin. By yielding to this, you shall "grieve the Holy Spirit of God," without whose continued influence you can make no proficiency in faith or any other Christian grace. Beware, therefore, of tampering with temptation. "Keep your hearts with all diligence; abstain from the appearance of evil; and cease not to exercise yourselves in having consciences void of offence toward God and man."

Again: if you would obtain increasing faith, aspire after a more distinct and comprehensive knowledge of Scriptural truth. What is faith, but the belief of this truth. This, however, we cannot believe till we know it. We cannot believe in Christ, unless we know who he is, what he hath done and suffered for us, and for what end he laid down his life. Of these elementary points the real Christian cannot be entirely ignorant; but his knowledge even of these, and of the other essential doctrines of the Cross, may be confused and contracted; while with various evangelical truths, highly salutary, he may be totally unacquainted. Now, it is scarcely possible that the faith of such a Christian can be strong. It has no broad basis on which to rest; it may, therefore, be made to bend before "every wind of doctrine," and every blast of temptation. That you, then, may be "rooted and grounded in the faith," seek to acquire more clear, expanded, and impressive views of the verities of the Gospel, in their evidence, their import, their harmony, and their practical application. For this purpose, "search the Scriptures" with humble docility; listen to the preaching of the Word with attention and candour; meditate often and devoutly on what you read and hear; and strive, from week to week, to be better acquainted with "the things which belong to your peace:" and thus, with the enlargement of your spiritual knowledge, your faith will become more enlightened, more steady, more assured, and more efficacious. I shall only add, that if, in answer to prayer, you would obtain increasing faith, you must habitually wait on the Lord in all his ordinances; exercise faith in him, from day to day—in his atoning sacrifice—in the fulness of his grace, treasured up in him for the supply of your spiritual needs—and in those precious promises which he hath given to quicken and uphold you, amid the varying scenes of your pilgrimage; and, above all things, be careful to live agreeably to the faith which you already possess—remembering the repeated saying of our Lord, "To him who hath" (who improveth what he hath), "more shall be given."

Such are the means which you, who conscientiously present the prayer in the text, will not cease to employ; and by combining the diligent and persevering use of these means with earnest and importunate prayer, your faith in Christ, and in the discoveries of his Word, will grow, and may grow exceedingly; you will thus have the witness in yourselves, that his Gospel is "the power of God;" you will be "filled with joy and peace in believing;" and you will be animated to go in the way of the divine commandments, "from strength to strength, till you receive the end of your faith—even the salvation of your souls."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Death a Sleep.—So ample and sufficient are the preparatory measures which Christ has taken for the final extinction of death, that he speaks of it in terms of comparative disparagement and indifference. So effectually is it disarmed and mutilated, and so completely at the disposal of Christ, that he speaks of it already as if it were not.—"Whosoever believeth in me, shall never die. If a man keep my sayings, he shall never taste of death—he shall never see death." In accordance with these representations, he has given to the state of death the soft and tranquillizing name of sleep. This use of the term, indeed, was not unknown to Jewish saints; but, as applied by them to death, it denoted chiefly the silence, darkness, and inactivity of the grave. The Greeks, too, had long been accustomed to speak of death in the softest terms: the dead they often spoke of as the departed—the worn out; and called their burial-grounds "dormitories," or sleeping places. But this arose partly from the dislike they felt to allude to a gloomy and unwelcome subject, and partly from a wish to propitiate the deceased, of whom they stood in considerable dread. How superior the sense in which Jesus employed the term sleep! They used it as a figure, but he turned it into a reality; they uttered it from fear, but he made it the language of hope and of faith. He used it with the highest authority, for he was about to awaken one of the sleepers from his sleep; and however protracted the slumbers of his people may be, he knew that they are all finally to hear his voice, and to come forth.—HARRIS. (The Great Teacher.)

The Church a Missionary Body.—When we speak of the Church taking in her own hands the work of spreading the Gospel, through the instrumentality of missions, we refer, of course, to the Church in its sectional character. What we especially plead for is, that each distinct and independent Christian body should resolve itself into a missionary society, form its own board, select its own men, designate their field of labour, and sustain them while engaged in the work. The advantages connected with this plan would be immense. The probabilities of selecting and sending out unqualified men would be far less; they would be individuals whose piety, spirituality, natural and acquired attainments, the Church from whose bosom they were selected would have had a proper opportunity of judg-

ng. They would be tried men—men possessing the entire confidence of the body choosing them. The reflex influence, too, of this plan upon such a Missionary Church, would be most favourable to the cause and true spirit of missions. An interest would at once be established in each distinct Church of a deep, permanent, and diffusive character. The germ of missions would be planted there, which would continue to grow and expand until its fibres had entwined themselves around every individual member of the body; the precious leaven would diffuse itself through the entire mass. Another advantage accruing to such a Church from this plan would be, the establishing of a constant and delightful intercourse between it and the heathen world, through the correspondence of its missionaries. This regular and systematic transmission of intelligence bearing upon the increase or depression of Christ's kingdom, would afford a constant supply of nourishment to the missionary spirit already in existence, affording material and motive to increased action and prayer. This, in its turn, would exert a salutary influence upon the piety of the Church, increasing its spirituality, deepening its holiness, drawing out and sanctifying its sympathies, concentrating its energies, and binding the whole body more closely together as one holy brotherhood. For, what exerts a more holy influence upon a Church, and what cements and knits it more closely together, than combined action and expansive sympathy for a ruined world? Were the Christians now harbouring dissensions and divisions among themselves, weakening and wasting their moral energies in idle and unholy disputes, to wake up to the claims of six hundred millions of heathen, and to a sense of their own peculiar and untransferable obligations to God and to those perishing heathen, O how soon would every division be healed, and all evil-speaking and malice be done away—merged, lost sight of, and forgotten, in one common, all-absorbing, and all-pervading sympathy for the calling in of a redeemed Church unto Christ.—REV. OCTAVIUS WINSLOW. (Christ, the Theme of the Missionary.)

The perpetuity of Christ's Church.—The world in which we live is a world of change. The face of nature is ever varying its appearance. We have the regular vicissitude of day and night; the ebbing and flowing of the tide; the revolution of the seasons. The trees are now covered with leaves,—now laden with fruit,—now clad in snow. The generations of men follow each other in quick succession. The earth and its works shall be burned up. Nor has religion, as to its outward form, been exempted from that law which pertains to all things created. The Jewish dispensation, though divinely appointed, having served its purpose, and waxen old, gave way to the Christian; and a time shall come when the Christian dispensation shall be abolished, “when tongues shall cease, and prophets shall fail, and knowledge shall vanish away,” and when there shall be no occasion for faith or hope. Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure. Jesus said to Peter, “Upon this rock will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.” Persecution may assail it in various ways; false doctrine may seem to shake its foundation; and the dissensions among its members may threaten its overthrow. It may exist in the form of an establishment, or otherwise; but we are sure that Christ will have “a seed to serve him while the moon endures.” The true Church consists of genuine Christians in every age and country, and of every denomination. They are the temple in which he dwells by his Spirit, and in whose hearts and lives is offered up to him spiritual worship. They know that while “all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man is as the flower of the field, the word of the Lord endureth for ever.” And while churches are destroyed, and ministers laid in the dust, that Jesus Christ “is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” They “come now to the general assembly and church of the first-born, that is written in heaven;” and hereafter they shall be admitted into that Church which John beheld in vision, who tells us, that he saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it.—REV. CHARLES ADIE, D.D. (Two Sermons on the Destruction by Fire of Three Churches in Dundee.)

The long-suffering of Christ.—The recall of a backsliding Christian presents a more affecting view of the forbearance and mercy of the Saviour, than even the first drawing of a rebellious sinner to himself. It is more difficult to forgive the offences of a friend upon whom we have lavished affection and benefits, than to overlook the coldness of a stranger or the indignation of an avowed enemy. When a believer returns for a season to the world he has abjured, and in its pleasures or its sins forgets the commands of his King and the love of his Redeemer, oh, what glory and grace does he despise—what love does he set at naught! He knows what the love of Christ is, and yet he forgets it; he has received from him inestimable benefits, and yet his ungrateful heart has waxed cold towards his glorious benefactor. Well, then, might Christ withdraw his alighted love—well might his Benefactor withhold for the future all the supplies of his benevolence! But the ways of God are not as our ways. He exclaims, “Return, ye backsliding children;” and his word comes with power. The penitent is brought back to the Cross which he had despised, weeping at the sight of Him whom his ingratitude has pierced, and experiencing again that love which his fickle heart had for a while disowned. Marvellous grace! Blessed Jesus, whom thou lovest, thou lovest to the end! But it is not after great declensions alone that this forgiving mercy is displayed. The daily walk of every believer bears witness to the forbearance of the Saviour. What earthly friend could so often forgive a cold look and an averted eye in his chosen and beloved one, as Christ forgives in each of his people similar demonstrations of indifference and forgetfulness? Oh! the heartless devotions, the forgetful hours, the languid service, which the Redeemer daily blots out from the book of remembrance—blots out with his own atoning blood! Be ashamed, my soul; mourn and weep for these thy sins. Remember how Christ hath loved thee with an everlasting love; not a day, not an hour, art thou absent from his heart: he is “the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” Adored be the long-suffering, the unchangeable kindness, which ever, when thou hast wandered from him, hath restored thy soul, and led thee again in the paths of righteousness, even for his own name's sake! Saviour, whose affection is so unalterable, bind my fickle heart to thyself; fill it with love, kindled from that holy flame which many waters could not quench, neither could the floods of fiercest suffering drown it,—love which shall not quiver nor expire, but burn on brighter and brighter through eternity!—(Original.)

THE LITERATURE OF THE JEWS IN SPAIN.

A WORK has recently appeared under the title of “Sephardim; or the History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal.” By James Finn. It contains much interesting information, and may be regarded as forming a valuable addition to the books in reference to the Jews, which have of late issued from the press. The following extract is well worth perusal:—

“The age of Maimonides, Aben Ezra, and Kimhi, is remarkable as forming a crisis in Jewish learning and Rabbinical religion; and this seems a convenient place for examining each of these more fully than can be done in the course of narrating events. The people had possessed an order of learned men for uncounted past ages, with a literature only exceeded in bulk by that of the associated countries of Christendom regarded as one body; and the Talmud says, 'Every one that is bound to learn, is bound to teach.' Therefore, every occurring period must be under a considerable influence of by-gone time; but, according to the uniform experience of mankind, there was required a national preparation of some centuries to obtain its greatest scholars. A large proportion of their literature consists, as might be expected, of comments on Scripture, elucidations of the Talmud, and legal decisions. To a people under the peculiar dispensation to which they believed themselves still subject, these must and ought to form the body of their learning. The errors of their fundamental doctrines were still perpetuated, but their religious writings between the seventh and the thirteenth centuries displayed a degree of research and talent far superior to those of the Christian Church of the same period. They were particularly distinguished by their attention to grammatical improvement of language for its own sake; no people have ever surpassed the Spanish Jews in the refinement of their grammars, the accuracy of their lexicons, or the perfection manifest in their standard editions of esteemed books. Hebrew literature has at all times maintained a rigid gravity, as if the talent of language were a donation which involves too deep a responsibility in its use to be in anywise trifled with; and as if the very alphabet which God condescended to employ upon the tables of stone were a benefit too sacred for levity to approach. Most Asiatic nations are sober in their discourse, but pre-eminently so the Jews: they were a serious people when at home, and their later writers have constantly abstained from topics which do not, in their opinion, lead to happiness here and hereafter. In this we see a wide contrast to the prevalent habits of Christendom. The Jews were ever a reading and a writing people, but their books have no enervating tendency. Fairies, ghosts, genii, and that disregard of heavenly providence and struggling virtue which forms the staple of modern novels, are all unknown within the pale of the Hebrew alphabet. True it is, that grievous mistakes and follies have found their way into Jewish writings, but they were believed by their authors to be serious truth. When they trifled with the Bible, they were gravely deluded; and when they touched upon unearthly contemplations, their objects were burning seraphs and ministering angels. The inherent spirit of Hebrew instruction, is that of all Eastern people, didactic from father to son, from teacher to pupil; not inquisitive, which is the characteristic feature of the old Grecian, and of the modern inductive wisdom—looking ever backwards, it hangs upon the past. Whatever earlier sages have written on the mind, or morals, or divine worship, must be the best; so that a comprehensive recollection of proverbs, adages, and poems, supplies the place of individual research. This arises from the patriarchal reverence for age, and the preponderance which all Orientals assign to speculative over ratiocinative studies; yet it is certain that since the sealing of prophecy, and their mingling with the nations at large, there has been no time in which there were not Jews equal to the Gentiles of their respective centuries in the practical business of life, and what are called utilitarian sciences; in these they have often led the way, for long before the birth of Baconian aphorism, 'Knowledge is power,' they had read in their sacred text, that 'a wise man is strong,' and had proved its veracity. In history there have been Judaic chronicles compiled in the fifteenth century, but there has never been a repetition of Josephus; yet what had Jews to relate but that very monotony of suffering which particularly deadens the intellect and fancy? How long subjected to the ever-gnawing vulture upon the rock? During, indeed, the Arabic dominion they had some breathing time, but historical compilation appears to have been scarcely thought of by any people in the feudal ages. Besides, they felt that they were aliens; and, buoyed up by the hope of a speedy restoration, the Jews seem to have regarded their temporary expatriation as scarcely worth recording. In the composition of poetry an epic is certainly unknown; but they excelled in the rhythmical verse by which the Arabs enchanted their neighbours—only applied to sacred and noble themes. They superadded the use of metrical feet in their poetry, and we may conclude favourably for their endeavours, from the facts—1st, That their poets were numerous, and held in high consideration, 2d, That they were stimulated by the vicinity of the Arabs, with whom they kept up a competition. How have the Jews conferred benefits on Europe in general by their studies? At a time when the Greek language and its whole valuable literature lay buried to the Western nations, the Hebrews were reading in their own language several works of Aristotle, Plato, Ptolemy, Apollonius, Hippocrates, Galen, and Euclid, derived from the Arabic of the Moors, who had conveyed them from Greece and Egypt, and in common with these, they wrote upon them dissertations and controversial arguments. Hence the old classics were actively disseminated among the Latin colleges of Christendom. However, it is to be observed that neither by Jews nor Arabs were the Greek poets and historians read. The genius of Homer, Thucydides, and Xenophon, would find no sympathy in an Oriental constitution of mind, or idea of political government. Pure science has in all ages thriven well beneath a despot; but not so the 'Song of Harmodius,' or the narrative of the Ten Thousand. Of mathematics, the Jews held the principal chairs in the Mohammodan colleges of Cordova and Seville; but, unlike the latter people, they brought themselves into contact with Christian society, and spreading themselves into various countries, they taught the geometry, the algebra, the logic, and the chemistry of Spain, in the universities of Oxford and Paris, while Christian students from all parts of Europe repaired to Andalusia for such instruction. And then astronomy, Chaldean science, in this they were teachers of the Moors. * * *

The original impulse given to the Jews by the consciousness of being the first possessors of a written law has been so deeply fixed, as never to have deserted them under the severest privations. With all the disadvantages of Rabbism, they still prized the books of the Bible above all worldly treasures; and although it has long been the fashion of Christian scholars (better versed in Latin decretals, or in the writings of Greek and Latin heathens, than in the language of Moses and the Prophets) to despise the literature of the Rabbis with which they are generally unacquainted, or merely to pick out passages for the purpose of controversy; yet those who are competent to judge their works as a literature, are the most ready to acknowledge that these have been exceedingly underrated. The great influence which Jews obtained, despite a universal jealousy, will testify to the amount of their book-learning more distinctly than declamatory assertions can do for or against it."

THE DECLINE AND PRESENT CONDITION OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN ENGLAND.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES THOMSON,

Late Minister of the Scotch Church, North Shields, and now of Wick, Calthness-shire.

THE Presbyterian Church of England has lain long in a disjointed, broken, fragmentary condition. There has been but little intercourse, and less sympathy, between the different congregations. Few, feeble, and far between have been, for many years, the efforts to lift up the standard of our distinctive principles. Our scriptural government and discipline have extensively passed into abeyance. Little has remained, in some instances, but the mere name of Presbyterianism; and even that venerable designation has, in not a few cases, been repudiated for some one more fashionable or more philosophical.

The consequences of this culpable conduct, the blame of which is attachable chiefly to the ministry, have been such as any one at all acquainted with ecclesiastical history might have easily foreseen and predicted. Presbyterianism, as to both its doctrines and its scriptural peculiarities of discipline and government, completely faded away from many parts of the land where it had once been extensive and influential; and even in those districts in which it still existed, its existence was but of a consumptive character, depending more for continuance on accessions from without than on its own innate constitutional vigour.

But this extensive decay has not been the sorest evil which, from this source, has resulted to English Presbyterianism. Various bodies of other communions have obtained possession of churches which have been built, and of endowments which have been founded, by godly Presbyterians for the maintenance of the Gospel. The Unitarian Independents, the more extensively to lay hold of, and the more firmly to retain the Presbyterian endowments, have appropriated to themselves the Presbyterian name, and thus, over the greater part of England, have brought discredit on that venerable designation. To the south of the Tees, Presbyterianism and Socinianism are, in the estimation of almost every one, convertible terms. Trinitarian Independents have also shown themselves not to be deficient in such cupidity, nor in the finesse by which it may be gratified.

It is of the very greatest importance to ascertain the causes of this remarkable and deplorable decline of Presbyterianism. The grinding persecutions to which Presbyterians were subjected by Cromwell, an Independent, and by the faithless Episcopalians, under the Stuarts, prevented them from erecting the platform of their scriptural polity, and familiarized many to the more attainable, plastic, and accommodating institutions of Congregationalism.

The very nature of this form of ecclesiastical polity may be given as another cause. Presbyterianism—though, no doubt, adapted to human nature, as every Divine institution unquestionably must be—is yet not a form of Church government which men will naturally choose. It is adapted to reform, not to please, human nature. There is in it both too much and too little of governmental character, too much and too little distinction of order, too much of ruling required, and yet too little power conferred upon the rulers, ever to render it generally, much less universally, palatable. Those who love power, will naturally prefer Prelacy; those who hate authority, Independency. Presbyterianism, by placing all the pastors of the Church on the same level, and by forbidding them to be lords, in any sense, over God's heritage, affords no scope to clerical pride or ambition on the one hand, or to the indulgence of a servile, inert, implicitly confiding submission on the other. By associating churches, and placing the government of them, not in the hands of one individual, but in a body corporate, composed not of ministers exclusively, but of ministers and elders in equal proportions, and with equal gubernatorial authority, not of a legislative, but only of a ministerial nature, Presbyterianism stands opposed to despotism, whether it be despotism over a diocese or despotism over a congregation, the despotism of ministers over their people or of people over their ministers. Men generally may love power and liberty in the things of this present world, but the greater part are heartily content that others both think and act for them in matters relating to religion and the world to come. All such persons will prefer, as circumstances may modify their taste, either Papal, Diocesan, or Congregational, to Presbyterial Episcopacy. Presbyterianism will not permit a minister, how strong soever his desire or great his ability to rule over a congregation, to do so; neither will it allow such of the people as may be disposed, to rule over the minister. It scripturally subordinates the minister to his ministerial brethren, and the people to those who have the rule over them in the Lord; and thus, how much soever it may be adapted to the condition, it certainly is not palatable to the wishes of fallen humanity. Presbyterianism is part and parcel of the Cross, and must, in part, partake of the offence of the Cross.

Another cause to which the decline of English Presbyterianism must, in a great measure, be ascribed, was that remarkable declension of the Universal Church in faith, spirituality, and godliness, which commenced in the earlier portion, and continued throughout the remainder, of the last century. Under the blasting influence of this spiritual mildew, the Presbyterian Church suffered severely. Not to specify the Churches of foreign languages, innumerable errors and disorders crept into the Presbyterian Church of America, and spread their corruptive influence through that body, till, not many years ago, they nearly brought about its utter dissolution. Arianism corroded the very vitals of the Irish Presbyterian Church. Arminianism, Erastianism, and even heresies worse than these, with their concomitant disorders and latitudinarianism, came in like a flood upon the Church of Scotland, so that in all probability it would have broken up had it not been compressed, and kept together by the circumstances of its position. The Secessional Churches in Scotland did not escape.

The Presbyterian Church in England suffered in various ways under this terrible visitation. Presbyterians began to look upon forms of Church government as not of Divine institution, they regarded them as merely human expedients for the preservation of order; and that, therefore, a Church might be just as rightly constituted under one form as under another; they talked, indeed, of Episcopalianism's being adapted to rich and gorgeous England, and of Presbyterianism's being adapted to poor and homely Scotland. The necessary consequence of this miserable delusion was, that the strictness of discipline gave way; Presbyterianism came to be branded as stiff, rigid, puritanical and unaccommodating; and numbers of the Churches lapsed into Independency, and thence sank into Socinianism. By many Churches which did not go the whole length of this declension, alliances and agreements were entered into with Congregationalists, which but opened a door for admission into the congregations of the more acceptable doctrines of the latter, who broke the pactions as soon as they saw that this purpose had been sufficiently served. Seldom were pains taken any where to instruct the people in the counsel of God, respecting the form and government of the Church. Every thing relating to such matters was rather, indeed, studiously kept out of sight. The result was inevitable,—the people became ignorant of the subject, and as indifferent to it as they were ignorant of it. The consequence was, that the framework of Presbyterianism was, in many places, gradually and utterly dissolved; and congregation after congregation passed into other communions without even an effort being made to retain them.

Farther, although it has, perhaps, in late years been the means under God, of preserving the remnant of English Presbyterianism in existence, that almost all the ministers have latterly been chosen from among the licentiates of the Church of Scotland, even this has not been without many counterbalancing disadvantages. Those licentiates naturally brought along with them strong predilections for their native Church and country. These predilections they often imprudently manifested. Brought up under the wing, and perceiving the many comfortable advantages, of an establishment, they were sometimes in danger of looking down with contempt upon the Presbyterian Churches in England as inferior institutions, forgetful that, according to their own principles, all the churches and ministers of Christ are of equal dignity, and that, if there is any difference, it lies on the side of those who are called upon to bear up the standard of truth in the least advantageous circumstances. Residence as a minister in this country, was often regarded as a species of exile. Incessant endeavours were made, sometimes not of the most honourable description, to obtain livings in Scotland. Their own Churches were frequently neglected. Efforts were not made to cause their principles to take root in the compartment of the vineyard assigned to them for cultivation. These things the people saw, and the Presbyterian Church suffered accordingly. During the latter portion of the last century, but little pains were taken by the Church of Scotland to make her students acquainted, either with the scriptural grounds on which her constitutional principles and laws are founded, or even with her constitution and laws themselves. The consequence was, that her probationers often came hither in very considerable ignorance of what as professed Presbyterians they ought to have known. Sometimes, if their zeal for Presbyterianism was great, they tried, in utter inadvertence to the circumstantial differences between an established, and an unestablished Church, to impart wholesale into this country, not only every post and every pin, but even every little adventitious adjunct of the Presbyterian platform, which had been erected in Scotland. But more frequently they disregarded altogether the Presbyterial arrangements, which they found existing in England, and trampled under foot the very principles of their own Church the moment they stepped across the geographical limits, within which those principles could be enforced by the penalties of civil law. It was a favourite maxim with many, that English Presbyteries are mere voluntary associations, which may be joined or separated from, obeyed or disobeyed, at convenience or caprice. This justified the utmost laxity of conduct; and by Scottish licentiatees such utter contempt was often evinced for what, they had avowed, was, in their belief, founded upon, and agreeable to the Word of God, as brought discredit upon the Presbyterian name, and greatly weakened its influence. The un-presbyterial conduct of probationers, ministers, and even Presbyteries of the Scottish Church, was, in times past, among the sorest evils that English Presbyterianism had to contend with.

Such, I am convinced, were the chief causes which, in the latter portion of the last century and in the beginning of the present, produced that extensive decline of Presbyterianism in England which we must all lament. But, better days have, I think, of late years begun to manifest themselves. In the revival which has been vouchsafed to the Presbyterian Church at large, by her only Head, the section of it which exists in England has not, I trust, been altogether overlooked. This has been evinced by the return which is now taking place to first principles, and by the consequent efforts which are now being made to unite, reconstruct, and consolidate our Church; and thus to build up that portion of the wall of Zion which is over against ourselves. By the formation of this Synod, a great step has been gained; and the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland have, in that alliance which they have offered us, and which, I doubt not, will be most gratefully closed with by this Synod to-day, not only drawn the two Churches together, but have laid down principles, and granted privileges, which, if wisely used, will, in all time coming, prevent many of the most grievous disorders and evils under which Presbyterianism in England has suffered so long and so much.

But because somewhat has been effected within the last few years, we must not, on that account, think that all has been accomplished. Our efforts must not be relaxed. The wall has not yet been built—the foundations have, indeed, scarcely been laid; there are still several Presbyterian Churches in an isolated state, and one or two Presbyteries are not yet associated to the Synod. Forbearance should be shown, and means employed, in brotherly kindness, to gather together in Synodical union with ourselves these detached portions of the Presbyterian denomination. Every Scriptural effort should be made to gather together into one body the scattered fragments of the Presbyterian Church. Few things are more calculated to occasion misunderstandings than the different views which, from various causes, are apt to be taken of the same object by religious bodies in the same neighbourhood, professedly in communion, but neither in connection nor in co-operation.

Attention should also be directed to such localities as may present a favourable soil for the implantation of our principles. I am convinced that there is much land that may, without insuperable difficulty, be reclaimed—many minds that may, with enlightened and sustained effort, be Presbyterianized. It is frequently said, that Presbyterianism is unsuitable to England. Those Presbyterians should bear in mind, that if it is scriptural it must be suitable to every nation, and tribe, and people under heaven; and that, if it is not scriptural, they themselves ought not to profess it. But, in endeavouring to disseminate our principles over the land in which we dwell, care must be taken not to present them with a false aspect. We must exhibit them as an emanation from the Bible; which, in reality, they are—not as a mere off-set from a Scottish institution. Our Church should not be made to assume an exotic appearance; it should not receive an exotic name, nor have an exotic character impressed upon it. Every thing lawful should be done to Anglicize it. It should both be called, and be what, in reality, it is, the English Presbyterian Church. Ministers and elders, congregational Sessions and Presbyteries, ought to be very careful in observing the laws, and diligent in working out the constitutional principles of Presbyterianism; and the Synod should, and will, it is to be trusted, exercise a gentle, but firm and scriptural, discipline over the whole. Such measures would not be long in operation without resulting in the most beneficial consequences.

In order to render discipline more efficient among us than it is, it would be well if the Synod could devise a method, by means of which a more authoritative control could be exercised than at present can, over every one of its members. Such an arrangement as would, in all time coming, secure this, is, I think, attainable; and it is undoubtedly most desirable. Some method might also be devised, by which, without any thing of an inquisitorial nature, the Synod might annually be made acquainted with the religious and moral statistics of the different congregations. Yearly statements on these subjects, made by the different Sessions to the Presbyteries, and by the Presbyteries to the Synod, and thereby disseminated over the whole Church, would, I firmly believe, be productive of the most beneficial results. Weak congregations, also, might in many ways be looked after and assisted.

And here I cannot refrain from expressing my most decided conviction, that, amidst all the methods which should be had recourse to for the purpose of gathering together, consolidating, and extending our apostolic Church, one of the most efficient would be, the Synod's devising and enacting some measures by means of which, as a body, we could evince our desire to promote and extend the Redeemer's kingdom amidst benighted and perishing men. This is one of the chief purposes for which the Church at large, or any particular section of it, was instituted on earth. "Go ye forth into all the world, and preach the Gospel unto every creature." In nothing is the greater blessedness of giving than of receiving more signally realized than in sustaining and helping forwards missionary enterprise. The generous Church, as well as the generous individual, devises generous things, and by generous things shall stand. The liberal Church, as well as the liberal soul, shall be made fat. The Church that waters the parched wilderness, shall be watered itself. Glory was given unto God for the liberal distribution made by the Corinthian Christians to the necessitous; and Paul prayed that "He that ministereth seed to the sower, might both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness."

Let us, then, my beloved brethren, exert ourselves for the purity, peace, and comfort of that portion of the "Church of God, over which the Holy Ghost has made us overseers;" let us faithfully, plainly, and fully preach the Gospel of salvation, never shunning to "declare the whole counsel of God;" let us endeavour, with kindness and courtesy, to gather together, and unite with this Synod, the scattered fragments of the Presbyterian Church in England; let us rise up and restore the wall of our Zion, that we be no more a reproach; and let us strenuously exert ourselves, in a humble dependence on divine assistance, to build it up into a holy temple unto the Lord. But "except Jehovah build the house, they labour in vain that build it." Let us, therefore, be actuated by a single desire for the glory of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and the Spirit of the God of heaven, he will prosper us.—Amen.

THE GRAVE.

[From "IX. Poems by V."]

I stood within the grave's o'ershadowing vault;
Gloomy and damp it stretched its vast domain;
Shades were its boundary; for my strained eye sought
For other limit to its width in vain.

Faint from the entrance came a daylight ray,
And distant sound of living men and things;
This, in th' encountering darkness passed away,
That, took the tone in which a mourner sings.

I lit a torch at a sepulchral lamp,
Which shot a thread of light amid the gloom
And, feebly burning 'gainst the rolling damp,
I bore it through the regions of the tomb.

Around me stretched the slumbers of the dead,
Whereof the silence ached upon mine ear;
More and more noiseless did I make my tread,
And yet its echoes chilled my heart with fear.

The former men, of every age and place,
From all their wanderings gathered, round me lay;
The dust of withered Empires did I trace,
And stood 'mid generations passed away.

I saw whole cities, that in flood or fire,
Or famine or the plague, gave up their breath;
Whole armies whom a day beheld expire,
Swept by ten thousands to the arms of Death.

I saw the old world's white and wave-wept bones,
A giant heap of creatures that had been;
Far and confused the broken skeletons
Lay strewn beyond mine eye's remotest ken.

Death's various shrines—the urn, the stone, the lamp—
Were scattered round, confused, amid the dead;
Symbols and types were mouldering in the damp,
Their shapes were waning, and their meaning fled.

Unspoken tongues, perchance in praise or woe,
Were characterized on tablets time had swept;
And deep were half their letters hid below
The thick small dust of those they once had swept.

No hand was here to wipe the dust away;
No reader of the writing traced beneath;
No spirit sitting by its form of clay;
No sigh, nor sound from all the heaps of Death.

One place alone had ceased to hold its prey;
A form had pressed it, and was there no more;
The garments of the grave beside it lay,
Where once they wrapped Him on the rocky floor.

He only with returning footsteps broke
Th' eternal calm wherewith the tomb was bound;
Among the sleeping dead alone He woke,
And blessed with outstretched hands the host around.

Well is it that such blessing hovers here,
To soothe each sad survivor of the throng,
Who haunt the portals of the solemn sphere,
And pour their woe the loaded air along.

They to the verge have followed what they love,
And on th' insuperable threshold stand;
With cherished names its speechless calm reprove,
And stretch in the abyss their ungrasped hand.

But vainly there they seek their soul's relief,
And of th' obdurate grave its prey implore;
Till Death himself shall medicine their grief,
Closing their eyes by those they wept before.

All that have died, the earth's whole race, repose,
Where Death collects his treasures, heap on heap;
O'er each one's busy day the nightshades close;
Its actors, sufferers, schools, kings, armies—sleep!

A AFFECTION AND FRIENDSHIP'S TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF

THE LATE REV. GEORGE GORDON, MINISTER OF KNOCKANDO, SYNOD OF MORAY.

AMONGST the many respected names of worthy and pious clergymen, whose decease we have had to record in our pages during the last year, few have descended to the grave more beloved and lamented, than the late Rev. George Gordon, minister of Knockando; and never was the uncertainty of human life more clearly and strongly exemplified, than in the sudden and melancholy death of this young and respected clergyman. He had been employed during the forenoon in catechising his parishioners, and in visiting the sick and afflicted at Elchies House, where Mrs Grant and family were in deep distress, and where not many minutes before his death, he had been caressing (and it was the last act of his life), the infant and then motherless grandchildren of the family, the accounts of their mother's death having that day been received. He then ordered his horse, in order to return home to the manse; but, having gone into the garden until it should be ready, he dropped down, and died of apoplexy, or, perhaps, an affection of the heart, before he was seen, or medical assistance obtained. There was no appearance of the least struggle, his death seemed to have been instantaneous; and his countenance in death, as in life, was mild, placid and gentle,—the angel spirit had, in a moment, departed, "but left its traces there." Inscrutable and dark, are oftentimes the ways of Providence to man,—having finished the work which was given him to do on earth, the Almighty saw fit to call him to himself.

" Servant of God, well done,
Rest from thy loved employ;
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy."

Mr Gordon was engaged to his last hour, in the performance of his parochial duties, and in his heavenly Master's work. He was settled minister of Knockando, on February 16, 1834, a year or two after being licensed; he died in the thirty-first year of his age, and sixth of his ministry. During his short incumbency, he had been most assiduous in his parochial duties, establishing and superintending Sabbath schools in the different districts of his extensive parish, in which he took a deep interest; and often preaching on the Sabbath evening in a large and populous village, which was at a considerable distance from the parish church. In his visits to the sick, the afflicted, and bereaved, he was ever ready to afford them the best assistance and consolation—to offer up his prayers in their behalf, and to direct them to the Alone Sufficient Comforter in the hour of trial and of sorrow. To the poor, he was ever a liberal benefactor, and a kind and generous friend;—and in this part of his duty the heritors of his parish were ever ready to join, and to promote his views, and second his wishes. He was justly considered as an excellent preacher. His pulpit appearances had attracted early notice, and made him very popular and acceptable. He endeavoured to declare to his people the whole counsel of God, keeping nothing back—ever desiring to win souls to Christ—seeking not the honour of men, but their eternal welfare and the approbation of God. He preached Christ, and was the herald of his Cross. In the young he was particularly interested, and gave much attention to them, as well as to the aged of his flock. The labours which his extensive parish required at his hands were very great, and in winter the roads were often almost altogether impassable; yet no rigours of the winter's storm, nor the oppressive heats of summer, could withhold him from the discharge of his parochial duties; and there is no doubt that he seriously injured his naturally strong constitution by his exposure in all kinds of weather and at all seasons.

From his very earliest days, there appeared in him a loveliness of character, which not only engaged the warmest affection of those connected with him, but called forth the pleasing expectation of what he should afterwards become. As he advanced in years, these hopes were realized. Although naturally reserved and shy, which drew to him the hearts of all who knew him well, the young whom he had trained up looked upon him as an elder brother, and were linked to him in the bonds of the strongest attachment; and when these were cut asunder by the sudden and sad event of his death, the strength of the love cherished towards him was evidenced, not only by the unutterable anguish of his own family, but by the general sorrow that pervaded his own parish and the surrounding country. It was felt by hundreds that they had lost a much-valued friend, and a pastor ever ready to do them service. The remains of Mr Gordon were followed to the grave by a very large and respectable company, including the ministers of the Presbytery and neighbourhood, by whom he was much esteemed, and not only by the parishioners of Knockando, but also by those of the neighbouring parishes. His own people requested to be allowed to carry his remains to their last resting-place, a distance of five miles. This was, indeed, one of the most affecting tributes which could have been paid to the memory of a devoted pastor. Numbers of women and children were to be seen, at different turns of the road, drowned in tears as the funeral passed to the place of interment, where so many mourners were proceeding to convey the remains of their beloved minister to "the house appointed for all living." They felt that they had, indeed, lost a friend; and the grief which was depicted in their countenances told, in most emphatic language, that he whose loss they bewailed had been a good shepherd, who cared for his flock. He was a most affectionate, dutiful, and beloved son; and he was ever a kind and warm-hearted friend. Amongst his numerous clerical friends (and no man of his standing in the Church had more) were numbered the Rev. Drs Chalmers and Gordon of Edinburgh, Dr Leslie of Fordoun, and many others of both sides in ecclesiastical matters. We think the following extracts of letters from some of these attached and sorrowing friends, addressed to his afflicted relatives on receiving intimation of his death, will best portray his excellent heart and character:—"I have," said one, "lost my earliest and longest tried friend on earth. In him I have indeed lost a brother; one who, I am sure, felt the most lively interest in all that concerned me. None knew the amiability of his character, the kindness of his heart, better than I did. I can say, that the lamentation for him here," (in Aberdeen,) "amongst his old friends and companions, is very great. He was, I am sure, a faithful servant of his heavenly Master; and, while earnest that his people should be brought to a saving knowledge of Him who is the sinner's friend, made earnest and heart-work of being himself united to Him. And O how glorious, then, is now his state! He preached of the love of Christ—he is now a partaker of that love, in all the unalloyed sweetness of Christ's presence. He told, while on earth, of the joys of heaven, and of the blessed occupation of the redeemed—now he has entered on these joys. On earth, he prayed for Christ—now, Christ is his portion." Another very dear clerical friend, (Mr Stewart of Oathlaw,) his companion in theological study, writes thus:—"I have not been able to summon resolution to write sooner, and now fear to give vent to my feelings. In him I have lost a brother—the companion and friend of my youth; and who, I fondly hoped, would be that of my advancing years. But mysterious are the ways of God to man; he had accomplished the work given him to do on earth, and now he inherits the promises. Short, indeed, has been the time of his labours; but they have been greater than those of many of his years. Last week I gave myself no rest until I had written a sermon in memory of my lamented friend—as well to console my own heart, as to testify to my people the uncertainty of life, and of all earthly things; for they had very recently seen him occupy the place in my pulpit, and now we are sorrowing, but he is rejoicing." Another very excellent and venerable clergyman writes:—"Knowing him so well from his earliest years, having been well acquainted with his excellent religious principles, his affectionate heart, and his many amiable qualities, he was sincerely and tenderly endeared to us all; and we trusted he would have been long spared to his relatives and friends, and to his people, amongst whom he had laboured so earnestly; but the decrees of Providence, although they may often appear dark to us, are, we are sure, ever gracious, and, to his own people, ever merciful. Our excellent friend was ripe for the kingdom of glory, and the Lord has called him away in the meridian of life, from this world of sin, of sorrow, and of trial, to be for ever, through the merits of his divine Redeemer, in his more immediate and glorious presence."

"A few short years of evil past,
We reach the happy shore,
Where death-divided friends, at last,
Shall meet to part no more."

PART VI.

THE CHURCH AT ALEXANDRIA—INTERVIEW WITH THE PATRIARCH.

WHILE prosecuting our inquiries at Cairo, into the general condition of the people of Egypt, our attention was especially directed to the present fallen state of the Coptic or Christian Church of that once highly-favoured land. First of all, however, we may remark, that the aggregate population of modern Egypt is nearly the same as that of Scotland—being about two millions and a half; of which number, the Egyptian Arabs, Fellahs, or peasantry, including husbandmen and artisans, are believed considerably to exceed two millions. The other principal races are, the Copts, one hundred and fifty thousand; the Turks, twenty thousand; the Greeks, ten thousand; the Jews, ten thousand; the Syrians, ten thousand; the Armenians, five thousand. The Fellahs, constituting the great body of the people, are an exceedingly mixed race; composed of the descendants of the different classes whom the Sarcenic conquerors, in successive ages, drove, by fraud, corruption, or violence, to embrace the Muhammadan faith. The Greeks may be regarded as the posterity of the original Grecian colonists; whose vernacular language has now become a dialect of the Arabic. Both the Greeks and the Armenians have each a resident Patriarch. The former have two convents, the one in Alexandria, the other in Cairo; the latter, one convent, in Cairo. The Jews reside chiefly in Alexandria and Cairo. South of the latter city there are few Jews, if any, in Egypt. In physiognomy and personal habits, in manners and pursuits, in servitude and oppression, they present a counterpart to their poor, despised, persecuted brethren in every region of the earth; but they, or their children, are reserved for a brighter day. With what intensity of feeling ought every Christian to breathe the aspiration, in all its literality and fulness of import, "Oh! when shall the salvation of Israel come out of Zion?"

The Copts are, in many respects, the most interesting class of the native inhabitants; they are the lineal descendants and representatives of the ancient Egyptians. Their own proper language, the Coptic, is, from the interpretation of hieroglyphic inscriptions, fully proved to have been the tongue of that ancient race which covered Egypt with such lasting monuments of their skill and power. Their hereditary name, the Copts, may, as already hinted, be a corrupt and abbreviated appellation from Aia-gyptos, Æ-gyptos, Kyptos, or Coptes. In primitive times, it is well known that multitudes of native Egyptians embraced the Christian faith, which, first introduced amongst them by the Evangelist Mark, was subsequently defended and propagated by a succession of some of the mightiest champions which ever pealed the trumpet from the battlements of the Christian Zion. The pure pellucid stream of the early apostolic faith gradually became woefully sullied by the turbid jets which, ever and anon, burst forth from the exhaustless but troubled fount of controversy, speculation, and schism. At length, the entire current of the waters of salvation was threatened with incurable corruption, from the Monophysite heresy and its out-branching errors. In the seventh century, the Muhammadans invaded Egypt. The descendants of the Greek and Roman conquerors, at that time, monopolized all offices of rank and dignity in the state; against these, therefore, the new invaders waged a war of expulsion or of extermination. The great body of the people, then professing the faith of Christ, and consisting of husbandmen, artisans, and merchants, passively submitted to the arm of conquest. Soon, however, were they doomed to experience the effects of Moslem fanaticism. Before the close of the century, the Governor of Egypt commanded their crosses to be broken, and blasphemous inscriptions to be posted on their sacred edifices. Then followed the swift routine of a growing persecution—fines and capitation taxes, confiscations and imprisonments, tortures and deaths. Numbers of the pious laity, with priests, and bishops, and patriarchs, fled to the deserts and the caves of the mountains. Numbers, in rivalry of their noble Alexandrian ancestors, submitted, for the testimony of Jesus, to the ordeal of martyrdom. Of the rest, it is not to be wondered at, that, deprived of pastoral instruction, ordinances, and other means of grace, and scorched in a furnace of fiery trial which kept blasing for ages, vast multitudes were tempted to abjure and apostatize from the faith of their fathers. Still, a poor, scattered, though constantly diminishing, remnant continued to survive. That surviving remnant is to be found, at the present day, in the Coptic population—the only representatives of the once noble, wide spread, and flourishing Church of Alexandria and Egypt!

Who, after a statement like the preceding, need be surprised at the present ignorance, degradation, and even barbarism, of the scanty and dispersed members of the Coptic Church? Their very language (the Coptic) has now ceased to exist as a living spoken tongue—having been supplanted by a jargon of Arabic; and though it is still retained as the language of sacredness in their public services of worship and devotion, like Latin in the Popish churches, it is intelligible to few or none of the hearers. As the litany and liturgy must be recited or repeated without a book, many, even of the priests, can neither read, write, speak, nor understand it. How, then, can their worship be a reasonable, edifying, or soul-reviving service? In all heathenism there is not a form more absolutely profitless and meaningless. Of all real life it is as destitute as any of the mouldering mummies in the catacombs. Almost the only education known amongst them (and that, too, limited to a few,) is the humble acquirement of reading and writing the common Arabic, and casting accounts, to enable them to earn a livelihood as copyists in public offices, or head servants in the families of Turkish grandees. When a priest is to be chosen (one of whose indispensable qualifications always is, that he be not unmarried,) some of the former occupants of the sacred office fix on a friend, without asking his consent. He may be, and usually is, some illiterate artisan. "Voluntary humility" having now become the established rule and hereditary custom, he is expected, and therefore must, in the first instance, decline the intended honour, and expatiate on his utter unworthiness. To the entreaties of his friends he must continue deaf as an adder; and must, in consequence, resist, till, after being dragged by main force into the presence of the Patriarch, his benediction has been pronounced, amid protestations and remonstrances. The doom of the reclaiming and intruded man is now sealed. He is then hurried away from the Patriarchal presence into a church, for a month or two, to be initiated into the ceremonial part of the priestly functions; and to learn, by rote, those portions of the litany which he may have publicly to recite. Such is usually the entire course of scholastic and theological training that is deemed requisite for a Coptic priest! From the body of the priesthood the bishops are chosen. Their attainments, except in the addition of years to their span of life, generally do not rise higher than the dead flat mass whence they have been severed. Nor need the qualifications of the Patriarch himself be of a much higher order. Contrary to the essential prerequisite for the ordinary priesthood and episcopate, he must be an unmarried man. For this end, the bishops and priests apply to the most ancient of all convents (that founded by the famous St Anthony, in the desert of the Red Sea) for a genuine monk to fill the Patriarchal chair. The Superior's duty then is, to nominate nine or ten of the brotherhood of celibacy. Of these, one is chosen by lot, to occupy a see which is believed to have been founded by St Mark, transmitted by Athanasius and other eminent fathers, and perpetuated in unbroken succession to the present occupant. The Patriarch-elect is always expected, like the ordinary priest, to express an unconquerable reluctance to assume an office of such dignity and responsibility. The usual remedy is, to apply to the acting governor of Egypt, even though a Turk, to coerce the recalcitrant into compliance by the strong arm of civil and military authority. The present Patriarch, who exalts in being accounted the lineal successor of St Mark, as much as the present Pope in being regarded the lineal successor of St Peter, was actually conveyed from the convent to the chair of the evangelist by the soldiery of Mahomed Ali! From such a source and mode of election, what else, except ignorance, superstition, and bigotry would be anticipated? Accordingly, as an amusing illustration of the ignorance and unthinking credulity of the existing successor of St Mark, it may be stated, that he firmly believes the original Pharos, or light-house of Alexandria, to have been so lofty, that, from the summit thereof every harbour in Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, France, and England, could be distinctly espied,—that intelligence of any hostile fleet or armament, fitting out on any of these shores, could thus have been communicated to the Egyptian authorities, weeks and months before their possible arrival,—and that to the destruction of this famous tower is to be attributed much of the misery and degradation of modern Egypt; inasmuch as the fleets and armies of invaders ever since can pounce upon its coasts and borders, without any seasonable warning or premonition to sound the note of preparation!

Roused by recollections of faded glory, we felt moved with a burning desire to know how life could be re-breathed into the shrivelled skeleton of so fruitful and so noble a Mother of churches. Various plans suggested themselves in the abstract, which, on examination, could not abide the test of practicability. It is easy to be ingenious in theory, and comprehensive on paper. It is not so easy to be ingenious in practice, or comprehensive amid the complexities of the real field of labour. Given the length and breadth, and general outlines of the surface of a country, the most scientific plan by far of a projected campaign might be delineated on a map. But the impediment of some small streamlet or narrow ravine, or obscure marsh, which had escaped unnoticed amid the striding outlines of an average description, may often be found to transmute the theoretically best into the practically worst. So, in the grand campaign against the powers of error, and the principalities of sin in a hitherto uncharted moral territory! Our scheme, composed of sweeping generalities, however skilfully arranged, may be utterly frustrated by the untoward uprising of certain latent points, which may have eluded the eye of speculation—certain minute peculiarities of time, place, and circumstance, which, from being unprovided for, may dislocate the best laid plans, and convert the theoretic wisdom which projected them into practical folly. In the case of the Copts, however, we were not left without the guidance of experience. At Cairo, there are two missionaries of the Church of England—Messrs Leider and Krusá with their wives—admirably fitted to occupy a position in many respects so unique. Mr Leider, in particular, is a man of energy, enterprise, and high literary accomplishments; and Mrs Leider has been honoured, as an able and prudent instructress, in securing an influence over the females of the Pasha's harem which, in our day, is without a precedent or a copy. As it is no part of Egyptian "regeneration" to allow the liberty of publicly preaching the Gospel to the faithful, or to repeal the stern law which dooms to death an apostate from the creed of the Koran, these Protestant missionaries have been compelled to restrict their labours mainly to the Coptic population. At first, even by this class, they were suspected, avoided, or repelled. But, by acts of kindness and conciliation beyond all praise, they have at last succeeded in gaining the confidence of many of the laity and priesthood; and eventually of the Patriarch himself. The irgradual rise, in the esteem and good opinion of the latter, was progressively manifested by the different and significant ways in which he addressed them. At first, when any of them had occasion to visit him, his way of address was,—"O my son!"—some years later, "O my brother!"—and, last of all, as the highest mark of respect, "O my father!" Due advantage has been taken of this footing of reciprocal friendship. Elementary schools have been opened for the young. Hundreds of Coptic children, male and female, are permitted to attend them—while a system of private reading and conversation has been maintained with not a few of the parents. All this is well; and, so far as it goes, highly encouraging. Still, when the problem is, How most effectually to revivify the withered form of a church so fallen and corrupt as the Coptic?—it does admit of a serious question, Whether there ever can be a real revival, by a process of slow, creeping, climbing renovation?—or, whether such revival is not rather to be expected, as the result of a process of rebuke and chastisement on the part of God, and of heartfelt penitence and humiliation on the part of man? Since, however, it is our duty to leave no legitimate means untried, it seemed desirable—seeing that elementary education had been accepted of at the hands of the English missionaries—to ascertain, how far it might be practicable to found a higher seminary, under their superintendence, for the instruction of those destined for the office of the holy ministry? In the extreme desirableness of such an object the missionaries at once concurred. Indeed, the idea of some such measure had often suggested itself to their own minds. But no steps even of a preliminary nature could be taken without the full knowledge and sanction of the Patriarch; whose voice is absolute with the whole crowd of ignorant and superstitious adherents. We were determined, therefore, if possible, to discover his sentiments on the subject; and, for this end, solicited an interview, which was kindly and promptly granted.

Accordingly, accompanied by the missionaries, and Mr Grimshaw, a revered clergyman of the Church of England, then travelling in Egypt on account of his health, we proceeded through the Frank department of the city, to the patriarchal residence. Entering from a mean and narrow street, or lane, of sombre high-walled houses, by a small wicket, in the centre of a huge and massive gate, we found numbers of priests assembled in the passages and ante-rooms. To the audience-chamber we were conducted by the bishop of Jerusalem—a man of noble mien and of a singularly intellectual cast of countenance. There, the Patriarch, a dark-complexioned, placid, good-natured, venerable old man, clad in his pontificals, was seated on the durbar, in oriental style, to receive us. After the ordinary salutations and the ceremonial of drinking coffee, &c., small cushions were brought; and on these, laid down on the floor close by "his holiness," we were beckoned to be seated. Of statements, inquiries, and replies which occupied altogether nearly two hours, it is impossible to furnish even an epitome. Suffice it to set forth one or two of the results. Having explained the anti-popish character of the doctrines of the churches of England and of Scotland, as well as of other Protestant denominations; and having referred at some length to the original prosperity and subsequent decline and persecution of the Church of Egypt,—we expressed our deep regret at the obscurity of their light, our sympathy for their past and present sufferings, and our earnest concern for their restoration to more than primitive excellence. The Patriarch admitted that many grievous errors had formerly crept in—that much deadness still continued to benumb, and much darkness to overshadow them—and that there was need for the infusion of new life and new light. When, in making this admission, he pointedly referred to the sufferings of their martyred fathers, he seemed greatly moved, and melted into tears. What then was to be done towards a revival and a re-illumination? Might not, it was asked, might not the Bible be freely circulated, not in the Coptic, which was a dead language studied by few, but in the Arabic, which, read by numbers, was understood and spoken by all? Without qualification or reserve, the Patriarch declared, that it might; adding, with emphasis, that whatever else might be alleged against his church, this at least had never ceased to be one of its distinguishing characteristics, viz., that the Bible should be held as the ultimate standard of appeal on articles of faith, and that to it, through any intelligible medium, the laity and the priests should, all alike, have the right of unrestricted access. Again, it was asked, Whether, in order to aid in reviving and diffusing a knowledge of Christian doctrine, tracts or small books, in the form of extracts or selections from the most celebrated fathers of the Alexandrian school, who are still regarded with profoundest veneration by the Copts themselves, might not be compiled, translated, and distributed among the people, or introduced into seminaries of education? Without hesitation, the Patriarch—smiling with evident delight at our respectful recognition of names which have reflected honour on the Christian Church—replied, that there could be no possible objection to such a measure,—yea, that he would consider such tracts and books an invaluable boon. The object of raising, or rather new-creating, a standard of instruction for the clergy next occupied the main part of conversation. Not to arouse the fears and suspicions of an ignorance so profound—not to tear up by the root a plant so sapless and feeble by sudden stretches of innovation—it was asked, in the first instance, Whether a seminary might not be established, in which candidates for the ministry could pass through a systematic course of theological tuition—making the Bible itself the great text-book, and selections from the most venerated of the fathers important auxiliaries—superadding, with a view to the expansion of the mind by an enlargement of the range of ideas, a course of instruction in geography and general history, ancient and modern—placing the whole system under the patronage and supervision of a committee, composed of the Patriarch himself and other leading members of the Coptic community, together with the English missionaries—and intrusting the latter with the entire practical and professional duties of the proposed institution? After much initial explanation, the Patriarch eventually signified his own acquiescence in some such scheme. He, accordingly, announced his consent and sanction that Mr Leider should forthwith prepare, in writing, a well-digested syllabus of the projected plan, to be submitted formally to himself and his council of bishops and presbyters for their united approval and ratification; and that, when approved of and ratified, an authenticated copy thereof, signed by the Patriarch and sealed with the patriarchal signet, should be furnished to the missionaries, to be by them forwarded for the satisfaction of the British Churches, with a view to secure and guarantee their countenance and support. After replying to many other questions relative to the present doctrines, discipline, and ceremonial of his church; and after thanking us for the interest which had been manifested in its re-invigoration and prosperity, the Patriarch rose up and solemnly pronounced his benediction,—subjoining, with tearful eyes and quivering lips, which betrayed deep emotion, the simple but devout aspiration,—“If we should never meet again in time, my prayer is, that we may meet in heaven, before the throne of our common Lord and Saviour!”

Whatever may be the practical result of this long and interesting interview, we shall ever feel grateful to God for the precious opportunity thereby afforded, of expatiating on the causes of a Church's decline and fall, and the real sources of a Church's restoration, in the presence of one who is revered by the remnant of Egyptian Christians as the successor and representative of the Evangelist Mark. Over the portals of a Church, once the most celebrated in the world, may now be inscribed in largest characters,— “Fallen, fallen, fallen,

Fallen from its high estate.”

Still, in its unbounded admiration of many of the soundest of the ancient fathers; in its heart-stirring remembrance of by-gone ages of persecution and martyrdom; and, above all, in its profound reverence for the authority and majesty of the Word of God—that mightiest of renovating instruments when wielded by an omnipotent Spirit of grace—we cannot but discern rallying points of revival, the possession of which, in the same proportionate degree, can scarcely be claimed by any other of the fallen Churches of primitive times. Degenerated it has into what is little better than an effete machine of external observances, evacuated of all spirit and of all life; but it has never formally or wholly apostatized from the faith. Even its mono-physite error has long been a naked scholastic dogma, rather than an operative principle of evil; and at no time did it lead the Church, as such, to reject from its creed the divinity of the Saviour, or the all-sufficiency of His atonement as the sole ground of the sinner's justification. To it, perhaps, the apocalyptic description is still applicable, “Thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name.” Oh, that that Word may speedily be armed with more than its wonted sharpness in piercing the hearts of sinners; and that Name fraught with more than its wonted preciousness; and that “little strength” restored to more than its wonted plenitude!

Meanwhile, it is our duty to proclaim the fact, that the Church is steeped in the very depths of poverty. Neither tracts, nor books, nor Bibles, nor seminaries of improved education, can it, by its own unaided resources, possibly secure. For all of these instrumentalities of recuperative power, it must depend wholly on the benevolence of others that have been more amply replenished with the riches of time, as well as the treasures of eternity. These are the British and American Churches. Why might they not send fraternal epistles—faithful in remonstrance and expostulation, surcharged with sympathy and good-will, and lightened all over with Divine love? The present missionaries would form the most effective media of communication; since men, in judgment more sound, in sentiment more enlightened, in disposition more conciliatory, it would not be easy to find. Why not accredit and substantiate every profession of loving-kindness by the spontaneous largesses of a wide-expanding charity? And why not, by means of these and other heaven-appointed agencies, confederate in originating the principles, and in propelling the cause, of a real Egyptian “regeneration?” True believers—the disciples of the Lord Jesus—members of his mystical body—called, quickened, and sanctified—are “the salt of the earth—the light of the world.” Let the fallen Church of Egypt be made to rise in renovated life and purity, beauty and strength; let the salt of her reviving doctrines display its sanative efficacy; let the light of her rekindled holiness stream out in its diffusive energy; and then will the portentous shadow, which at present enshrouds the destinies of Egypt with a gloom as impenetrable as the darkness of the plague, be disenchanting of all its mystery. The redoubted Pasha of so many subjugated provinces will then be proved to have been, all the while, but a rod in the hands of Him who is King and Governor among the nations, for the furtherance of designs which it had never entered into his imagination to conceive, and the accomplishment of purposes which it would have been his policy to have covered with irretrievable defeat. The violence of a tyrannous usurpation, the desolating tide of a lawless conquest, the sudden fall of old dynasties, the spread and consolidation of new empire over the hitherto dismembered realms of barbarism;—all, all will then be found to have been subordinated by an overruling Providence, to facilitate the Progress of Gospel Truth, in its march to the throne of universal dominion.

THE BELIEVER'S DELIVERANCE FROM THE DOMINION OF SIN:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. JOHN CHARLES,

Minister of Garvock, Kincardineshire.

“Sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace.”—ROM. vi. 14.

BRETHREN,—You all know that fundamental doctrine of Christianity, so emphatically taught in Rom. v. 12.—“By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; so death passed upon all men.” Why? “for that all have sinned,” that is, because all fell with Adam, in his first transgression. Of this the death of infants, who have never committed any actual transgression, is a clear proof. But blessed be God, our text assures us, that all are not under the dominion of sin.

In speaking from these words, let us consider, first, What is meant by the dominion of sin;

secondly, To whom the promise in the text is made; thirdly, The reason of that promise. And may God, by his grace, enable me to speak, and you to hear, as for eternity.

1. Let us consider what is meant by the dominion of sin.—Sin is here personified or spoken of as a person, whose dominion over us, signifies that power over our wills and inclinations, which leads us to violate or break the law of God. And this power it is daily endeavouring to obtain over all the descendants of Adam.

We come into the world, not like Adam, when he came from the hand of his Creator, in the image of God, but tainted with original sin. And none have been spared till capable of distinguishing between right and wrong, but have become likewise tainted with the guilt of actual transgression. Differences there are—some are better and some are worse. But while inhabiting this mortal body, although by grace, they may be improved, yet, none ever arrive at sinless perfection. This is no theory of man's invention—it is the positive declaration of the Word of God—it is the declared experience of the best of men—it is the doctrine taught by Jesus Christ.

In Genesis vi. 5, God says, "Every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil continually." In Ecclesiastes vii. 20, He says, "There is not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good and sinneth not." In Romans iii. 10, He says, "There is none righteous, no, not one." In James iii. 2, He says, "In many things we all offend." In 1 John i. 8, He says, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us."

Look next at the examples in the same inspired Word. Job, Daniel, David, and the apostles, are reckoned the best of men. What say they of themselves? Job ix. 20, says, "If I justify myself, my own mouth shall condemn me: if I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse." Daniel ix. 5, confesses himself a sinner with his countrymen. In Psalm li. David repeatedly confesses himself a sinner. In Romans vii. Paul complains, that although he delighted in the law of God, in his mind, yet he found "a law in his members warring against the law of his mind, striving to bring him into captivity to the law of sin." In Galatians ii. 11, you find Peter, although he had been baptized with the Holy Ghost on the memorable day of Pentecost, yet, through the deceitfulness of sin, induced shamefully to dissemble; for which Paul withstood him to the face. And to crown all, Jesus Christ, in the Lord's prayer, teaches us all to pray for daily pardon, as well as for daily bread.

What preposterous folly then—nay, what sinful self-conceit, for any sect or party of Christians, to follow the example of the self-righteous Pharisees, whom our Lord so severely condemns; and to boast with these hypocrites, that they are not as other men are—that they are arrived at sinless perfection. To press forward, in the strength of supplicated grace, toward perfection, is, indeed, the duty of all. At this Paul himself (Philip. iii. 19 and 13) aimed, for he did not reckon himself perfect. And in the strength of this grace, we may attain to what may be called Christian perfection, which consists in three things,—first, an upright and sincere endeavour to obey God; secondly, a sincere endeavour to obey him, not in one only, but in all his commandments; thirdly, a delight in thus obeying him. But beyond this, at sinless perfection, neither prophets nor apostles ever arrived on this side the grave. This is not the time of retribution; yet because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil, that is, to give themselves up to the dominion of sin.

There are two principal circumstances which bring men under the dominion of sin: first, the delay of punishment. This gradually lessens that fear which alarms a sinner, when he first enters on a wicked course of life. But when he still finds himself safe, and that no evil has overtaken him, foolishly forgetting a future judgment, his dread of punishment gradually wears away, and he goes on to yield himself up to the dominion of sin with more and more boldness. The second cause is the deceitfulness of sin. Sin insinuates itself into the heart of men, under various disguises. For did it appear in its own true colours, in the day of temptation, as it does in the day of affliction, or at the hour of death—as it really is, a thing hateful to God, pernicious to man, and contrary to reason and conscience, they could no more choose it, than they would choose death. But it hides its deformity, and cunningly says, like the serpent, "Thou shalt not surely die," and sets before them only profit or pleasure.

Sin seldom introduces itself under its own name. Thus, you find excess and intemperance frequently called merely a social and hospitable disposition. Pride and resentment are varnished over with the titles of honour, high spirit, or dignity of mind. Vain pomp, luxury, and extravagance are called taste, elegance, and refinement. Levity, giddy, and foolish language unbecoming a Christiana, is smoothed over with the gentle name of cheerfulness and good humour. Nay, overreaching the ignorant, that is, cheating a less informed neighbour in buying or selling, is honoured with the name of being up to business, or understanding trade.

Sin likewise brings men under its dominion, by cunningly suggesting excuses to palliate its guilt. This plan you find that Adam and Eve foolishly tried. And the language of excuse is ready with most people, "I am not singular, many one has done the like before me." This is a weak and wicked excuse. It is expressly forbidden, Exod. xxiii. 2, and Rom. xii. 2.

Reflect that, while you are going on in the service of sin, and neglecting the Gospel, you are in danger every hour of being overtaken by one of two most tremendous evils. Death may seize you in a moment, and then your doom is fixed in eternal misery; or you may be given up to judicial blindness of mind. Rom. i. 28. Then you become a vessel of wrath, fitted to destruction—the door of repentance being shut against you. You may, as you have heard of others, die in peace—feel no remorse of conscience on the bed of death; but you will open your eyes in that awful place, where the worm of conscience never dies, and the fire of Divine vengeance never shall be quenched.

II. Consider, next, to whom the promise in the text is made.—What is it that keeps men under the dominion of sin? It is evidently unbelief—want of a true and living faith in the Gospel of Christ. Hence, it is plain that the promise is made to believers, and to them only. It is surely, then, of the utmost importance to understand fully this short question, What is faith? Our Catechism, that invaluable compendium of Divine truth, says, “Faith is a saving grace, whereby we receive and rest upon Christ alone for salvation, as he is offered to us in the Gospel;” that is, faith includes such a firm persuasion of the truth of the Gospel, such a deep sense of its importance, and such a cordial acceptance of its gracious offers, as affects the heart and regulates the conduct, producing willing and sincere performance of duty both to God and to man.

The plain Christian believer may neither have learning, nor time, nor ability, to enter so fully on the subject as some others; but this is made up to him, by the internal evidence brought home to his own reason and experience. He sees and feels it is a doctrine according to godliness, tending to make men holy and happy; and thus he has the witness within himself. This true faith is the gift of God; but it is a gift which He has pledged his word that He is ever ready to bestow (Luke xi. 9–18); and he who has this faith is born of God.

But look at the mere nominal Christian. The only foundation of his faith is this:—The Christian religion is the religion of his country—his friends, neighbours, and relations, are of this persuasion, and he believes as they believe. But, alas! to that deep sense of the importance of Divine truth, which ever accompanies a true and living faith, he is a perfect stranger. The true believer, on the contrary, comes up to the house of God, solely that he may join with pious sincerity in the worship of his God, and be either informed or reminded of his duty; and, therefore, while seated in that house, he not only listens with decent and becoming attention, but carries home with him what may comfort and assist to direct himself and family, through the week, in that path which leads from earth to heaven. But the mere nominal believer comes up to the house of God that he may avoid singularity—that he may gain or keep up a respectable character, which he knows may, on many occasions, be useful in his worldly affairs; and, therefore, while, for his own selfish worldly views, he behaves with a kind of outward decency, you can easily see by his vacant or wandering eye, or the means which he uses to keep himself awake, to the annoyance of all who wish to listen in silence, that he considers the short time spent here as a weariness; and, before he reaches home, all he heard is gone, and can neither benefit himself nor his family through the week. Through the six following days, therefore, he speaks and acts, just as if he had never heard nor believed the Gospel—just as if he neither knew nor cared about the salvation of his soul.

This is no imaginary character I have endeavoured to set before you. Look around you in this house now, and I am afraid you will see it exemplified. Look around you on the busy scenes of labour to-morrow, and I fear you will see it really before your eyes. Ah! how lamentable is it to hear of, or to see such characters!—but how much more lamentable must it finally prove to themselves!

In what way, then, is the promise in our text fulfilled to the true believer? How does faith free him from the dominion of sin? This is a subject of inexpressible importance to us all. What was the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage—their protection and support through the wilderness—their settlement in a land flowing with milk and honey?—what were all these, great and glorious as they were, but mere shadows in comparison to that great, glorious, and inestimable deliverance wrought for all true believers by Jesus Christ? It includes not only deliverance from moral, natural, and penal evil, in its widest extent, but enjoyment of happiness in its highest perfection.

Man, although created in the very image of God, is now sadly disgraced and degraded by sin. Sin has darkened his understanding, perverted his will, and polluted his affections. But from all these evils every true believer in Jesus, even here in a great measure, is freed, and shall hereafter be completely delivered. For all true believers, Jesus has purchased pardon, and reconciliation to God, and sends down his Spirit of grace to renew their hearts to holiness, and enable them to do his will. Through this Divine Spirit, the doctrines of the Gospel illuminate the benighted mind, restore peace to the troubled conscience, give a new bent to the will, and direct all the affections to their proper objects.

From natural evils—as poverty, pain, sickness, and sorrow, which are the consequences of sin too—Jesus sets believers free. Not that they are exempted from sharing in the common afflictions of life; but these causes, to them, are converted into blessings. To them, they are only the salutary corrections of a kind Parent, and shall “work out for them an eternal weight of glory.”

But, above all, from the punishment of sin beyond death and the grave, Jesus sets believers free. While they who have voluntarily lived under the dominion of sin in this world shall be sent away into everlasting punishment, to pass an eternity under the dominion of sin and sorrow—

while this is their doom, believers, placed on the right hand of their Judge, freed from all moral guilt and pollution, and restored to the glorious image of God, shall be welcomed to enter into heaven, and to share for ever in the joys of their Lord.

III. Consider the reason why this promise is made to believers only; because they are not under the law, but under grace.—It is of the very highest importance, for you and for me, and for every one who has a soul to be saved, to have a clear and distinct idea of the meaning of these words, "You are not under the law, but under grace." Why so? Because every individual in this house is under the one or the other. And whoever is, and continues under the law, is lost; but whoever is, and continues under grace, is saved.

Remember, too, you can never truly believe what you do not understand; and you know God hath said, "He who believes shall be saved, but he who believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 16. Surely every individual here must feel—the alternative is awful.

Carefully observe, then, that by the law, here, is meant the moral law, or covenant of works; promising life and happiness for perfect obedience, but threatening death for a single transgression. It was broken by Adam, and thus he and all his posterity were brought into "a state of sin and misery." On the one hand, sin strove to have dominion over their now depraved natures; and, on the other, the law demanded not only perfect obedience, but complete satisfaction for transgression. This, man was quite unable to yield to the law, and therefore, all were under condemnation; for the law knows nothing of pardon, nor of aid to help the miserable sinner: so that all who are under the law are likewise under the dominion of sin; for the law is the strength of sin—it enables sin to pierce the sinner's heart, by clearly holding up before him the heinous nature and guilt of sin, and yet affording no method nor possibility of recovering from it. Although the law is just, and holy, and good, it cannot justify those whom it has already condemned.

By grace, here, is meant the Gospel, or covenant of grace—the glad tidings of pardon—the most joyful news that ever reached the ears of fallen man, of relief from the condemnation of the law; for all having "sinned and come short of the glory of God," all are condemned sinners in the eye of the law. But the Gospel brings them the glad tidings of justification, pardon, and acceptance with God, by his undeserved mercy, and sanctification by his Spirit of grace—all purchased by the atonement of the cross of Christ. By this glorious atonement, the law which man had broken was completely fulfilled, in man's nature, and in man's stead; and divine aid purchased, and freely offered, for the subduing of sin, and for the destruction of its dominion: so that the believing sinner can now with comfort and joy say, "I can do all things, through Christ strengthening me.

There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God who justifieth; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ who died; yea rather, that is risen again, and who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

You must see, then, that to be under the law, is to look for salvation from your own obedience to the moral law of God, while it is as clear as noon-day, that I, and you, and all, having often violated that law, it is impossible that you or I can be saved, in whole or in part, by that law by which we are already condemned. Hence, the promise in our text is made to those, and to those only, who are under grace,—that is, the Gospel, or covenant of grace; to those only who have fled for refuge from the terrors of the law, to the grace of the Gospel—fled from the terrors of a broken law, to faith in a crucified Redeemer; for God warns you, that there is salvation in no other. Under this most gracious covenant, pardon, which the law could never grant, is offered to the guiltiest of us all, and "grace to help in every time of need."

But here, carefully observe, that while we remain in our present state of trial, we have still to "fight the good fight of faith" against sin. We are still surrounded by enemies; without—the allurements of an ensnaring world, and the temptations of our cunning foe, the evil one; and within, we are still in danger—from our own depraved and deceitful hearts. Although sin may be dethroned, as to its complete dominion over us, yet our complete victory over it will not be in the state of grace, but in the state of glory beyond death and the grave—when the soul has winged her flight to the happy region where dwell the "spirits of just men made perfect." The apostle, indeed, says, "Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin," 1 John iii. 9,—that is, he who, by grace, has become a true believer, a real Christian, doth not, and cannot, live in the practice or habit of sin; for he cannot flatly contradict what he himself has said, (i. 8.)—he cannot flatly contradict both the prophets of the Old Testament and the apostles of the New Testament—he cannot flatly contradict the doctrine taught by Jesus Christ.

During this life the aids of divine grace, under the Gospel, are not given us to render us completely proof against the power of temptation. But these gracious aids are afforded us, on our sincere supplication, to enable us to fight successfully against sin—that it may be so "crucified," so "mortified," so gradually weakened and destroyed, that it shall not ruin our spirituality, or be able to disannul the covenant relation between God and our souls. And we are assured, that by this gracious plan, if we be not wanting to ourselves, we shall be enabled steadily "to die more and more unto sin, and live unto righteousness;" that is, we shall be enabled to become more and more holy, and, consequently, more and more happy till the cords of our earthly tabernacle be loosed; and then, through the cleansing of the blood of Jesus, we shall have acquired a complete meetness for heaven.

Cheered and comforted, then, by this glorious prospect before us, let us all, in the strength of that grace so freely offered us, "be up and doing whatever our hands find to do;" and if sin, in some unguarded hour, should lead us astray, let us seek to exercise sincere repentance, and pour forth fervent prayer for pardon, through the merits of Him who can alone restore us to the favour of a sin-forgiving God.

THE WIDOW'S SON.

[From "Recollections of the Lakes and other Poems."]

Throw wide the gate, and clear the way
For you advancing throng;
'Twould seem a solemn festal day,
But that the voice of song
Is wanting, nor upon the ear
Comes sound of harp or timbrel clear.

For festal train they move too slow,
Too dark each brow appears;
Alas! another glance will show
A sadder task is theirs:
Well may they move with mournful tread,
They bear along the youthful dead.—

Yes, yes, of youth full many a token
Still shines on that pale brow;
He seems like arch or column broken,
By storm, not time, laid low;
Just smitten when life's wing'd hours
Seem each to other link'd with flowers.

But why is such deep sadness flung
O'er that unnumber'd crowd?
Is it because the brave, the young,
To Death's strong arm hath bow'd?
Not that—the grave doth daily close
O'er youth's blithe brow and cheek of rose.

Alas! around this early bier
Hangs interest yet more deep:
Stranger, wouldst thou the story hear?
List, and thou too wilt weep:
He was his mother's only son,
And she, oh, she a widow'd one.

Behold her there, too well her look
Reveals the tale of woe;
Not time alone her frame hath shook,
And furrow'd her pale brow,
Or changed to grey her raven hair;—
No—sorrow hath been busy there.

She hath a widow's vigils kept;
Has life a darker doom?
Yes—for a son then watch'd and wept
With her beside that tomb;
And while she saw and felt him nigh,
Her widow'd heart own'd earthly tie.

Thenceforth that heart's sole love was his,
She lived but in his smile;
Nay, when he spake of hope—of bliss,
She veil'd her grief the while;
As not for worlds she would alloy
His bright expectancy of joy.

'Tis hard, when youth and health are by,
To think upon the grave;
She never dreamt that he might die,
And she the tempest brave.
Oh! when she view'd his cheek's bright bloom,
How dim and distant seem'd the tomb!

Fair hope, but false! another tale
She learns beside his bier;
That cheek of bloom is cold and pale—
The spoiler hath been there.
And now the home love used to bless
Is chang'd into a wilderness.

On, on they move, the grave is near,
Soon dust with dust must dwell;
Now, childless mother, now prepare
To speak a long farewell;
But look the while to holier sphere,
Perchance the loved, the lost, are there.

Why stays the march of death? Whose hand
Upon the bier is laid?
Who bids the awe-struck bearers stand,
In tones might rouse the dead?
His form is human, but his eye
Gleams with the light of Deity.

Now joy for thee, forsaken one,
He bids thee cease to weep;
And ne'er did gentler, kinder tone
Lull dark despair to sleep.
Speak, mourner, speak—what wouldst thou crave?
With Him to pity is to save.

Oh! mark what high expression beams
Around His brow of power;
Such look may bless a saint's pure dreams,
But ne'er his waking hour.
He speaks!—but not of earth His tone,
Well may the dead its influence own.

A change comes o'er the pallid brow;
Who may that look forget?
It seems as life and death were now
In fearful conflict met;—
The strife is o'er—the victory won!
Now, mother, clasp thy living son!

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

The Christian in humble life.—Let us survey a man in the humble walks of life, actuated by the principles of the Gospel. His circumstances and education have never permitted him to explore the spacious fields of literature, nor the boasted regions of philosophy. The book of God alone he deeply knows; and by its influence upon himself, he is every day proving, that it alone is worth knowing deeply. View him in the affairs of common life, in society, and in his family. View him especially in a religious capacity. Listen to his conversation, his instructions, his prayers. Of God, of the human soul, of the nature and circumstances, the duty and prospects of man, and of the origin of evil, and of its remedy, he speaks,—in homely phrase it may be, but, with a distinctness of knowledge, a clearness of discernment, a fixedness of principle, and a stability of hope, which leave at an infinite distance, the vaunted attainments of Socrates,—which soar above the lofty visions of Plato,—which prove, that "the Word of God giveth understanding to the simple." Pure in heart, he walks with God. Unelated by prosperity, and undepressed by calamity, he sympathizes in the distresses of others, and is unmoved by his own. He has no desire, but that of fulfilling the will of his Maker; no hatred, but that of sin; and no fear, but that of offending his God. Behold him, with an eternal world full in view, and about to close his eyes on all temporal things. Mark the steadiness of his soul, his unmoved tranquillity, his patient resignation, his firm, yet humble hope. The heroism of an Alexander and of a Cæsar was fed by the admiration of a gazing universe, and the anticipation of everlasting fame. But behold a mightier hero than either, although unknown to the world and to fame; one who is a conqueror, and "more than a conqueror." Behold, with what placid serenity, or triumphant joy, he bids adieu to the world. Listen to his last words, as, supported by the "rod and staff" of the great and "Good Shepherd," he enters into the "dark valley": "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory! Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."—REV. DR J. CORMACK.

The Responsibility of Christians.—Christians cannot too often or too solemnly repeat the question of their Lord, "What do ye more than others?" It is not enough for them to equal, they must excel, their neighbours. They have mercies, motives, means, peculiar to themselves. They have a living principle of righteousness in their own hearts; and, in their great Redeemer they have, as the fountain of their supply, "all the fullness of the Godhead." It is but reasonable that much should be required of them to whom much is given. Let your whole persons, O believers! be temples of God. Set your affections on things above, where Jesus Christ sitteth at his right hand. Remember that every one who hath the hope of seeing Jesus as he is, "purifieth himself even as he is pure." Walk in love, as he hath loved you. Let this amiable grace shed her radiance over your character, and breathe her sweetness into your actions,—compel by her charms, the homage of the profane. Cleave not to earth, because your treasure is in heaven. Make use of it to exercise the benevolence of the Gospel, to glorify your Father who is in heaven, to diffuse comfort and joy among the suffering and disconsolate. "To do good and to communicate, forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased."—REV. DR J. M. MASON.

"Bring forth the best robe and put it on him."—There the love of the Father concealed till now, breaks forth in torrents without restraint, to the view of all around. How must the son feel when he hears his father addressing his servants, and saying unto them, Go and bring hither the best robe; not a robe, or something that you can find to clothe him; but bring the best robe in existence—the very best, and put it on him, and he shall wear it for my sake. What has the son done to call forth such strong affections and delight in the father's heart? He came home, and that is all. The sinner returned unto the Lord his God; and that was all that the eternal Father required. Let sinners only do this, and they may have all things of God, for his affections will now flow for ever towards them. He pitied, and took compassion on them when they wandered; but when they return, he delights in them, and will take care of them. When the servants received this commission, did they say, "Where in all the earth can we find such a robe? Shall we go into the courts and palaces of kings, and seek for it there?" "No," says the Father, "that will not answer my purpose,—none there good enough. You must bring one down from heaven, and the best that can be found there—the very same as the saints wear round about the throne,—the robe of righteousness, which is of God by faith; the righteousness of Christ, which is called the righteousness of saints."—REV. T. JONES.

Love to God.—The first and greatest duty that God demands of us, is supreme love to him, for where he is not loved above all, he is not loved at all; and nothing must be loved beside, but what is loved for him. Love is the sum of the law and the Gospel; it is therefore the summary of all real religion, and to love God as ours, is to love him because he is ours. Where there is not this supreme affection, nothing good is done, or not done long. But loving God with all our heart, will take off from, and arm against all reigning sin, because love, with faith, are the leading graces in the renewed soul. The more we love God the more we enjoy him, and the better we can trust him; it is therefore of great consequence, that by spiritual exercises our love may be kept bright and burning.—REV. M. HENRY.

A PASTORAL ADDRESS.

BY THE REV. CHARLES FORBES BUCHAN, Minister of the Scotch Church, North Shields.

"See, I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil; I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live."—DEUT. XXX. 15, 19.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN,—In the providence of the wise and righteous Disposer of all events, I have been called to labour among you in holy things. Ordained over a congregation of accountable and immortal beings, who are rapidly hastening from this state of probation to the tribunal of God, I feel my awful responsibility; and, seeking to watch for your souls as one that must give an account, I hasten to place before your minds some of the principal privileges and duties which are incumbent upon you to embrace and discharge. Suffer, then, the word of exhortation, while I remind you of

Prayer.—It is to be feared that too many professing Christians live, if not in the habitual, yet the occasional, neglect of communion with the Father of their spirits; they do not seem to be aware that they require mercy to pardon and grace to help them in the time of need, and hence that freedom of access which they enjoy to the "holy of holies" is contemned by perfect disregard or partial improvement. To be permitted to approach the footstool of the King of kings is surely an honour, the nature and extent of which we cannot conceive. How great the dignity to be admitted to an audience with an earthly potentate! And shall we lightly esteem the invitation which warrants and welcomes us to "draw near with boldness" to the throne of the Sovereign of the universe? Continue instant in

Secret Prayer.—"When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to the Father who is in secret, and thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." For its observance, then, we have an express command, which it is both ingratitude and rebellion to transgress; but its necessity and advantages will appear sufficient reason why it ought to be regarded. Prayer, to be profitable, must be personal. We have sins to confess of which our families and friends are ignorant, and of which they would be ashamed; we have wants to be supplied which none but ourselves feel, and with which the most intimate cannot sympathize; we have sorrows to disclose, arising from our constitution and circumstances, to which all must be necessarily strangers; we have desires to express, fervent and infinite, at which infant believers themselves would be amazed, and nominal professors would scoff, so that it is prudent and proper we should pray in private. But, oh! the benefits resulting from the fellowship of seclusion are inexpressibly sweet. It is then that the child of God, retiring from the world, holds felt intercourse with the God and Father of his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—then that he is translated with the Patriarch to the plains of Peniel, transported with Moses to the top of Pisgah, or wafted with Paul to the third heavens—then that his views are enlarged, his conscience pacified, his will submissive, and his affections free—then that he realizes his interest in Christ, his title to happiness; and therefore, in the assurance of the one and prospect of the other, is enabled to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Need we adduce illustrations? David and Daniel prayed in their chambers three times a-day, Luther is recorded to have spent many hours in intercession, and Welch, a confessor of our Church, the greater part of his life; and above all, have we not our blessed Lord often going into a mountain apart, and continuing whole nights in prayer? The man who is given to commune with God in private, will consider it a duty equally absolute to maintain

Family Worship.—"Serve him, every family apart." As priest of his household, he will convene his children and servants around the domestic altar, and there offer up with them "the morning and evening sacrifice." Being the head of a family, he is bound to set before its members an example becoming the Gospel; and that obligation certainly extends to collecting them for the purpose we have just named. How delightful the scene, of a father, mother, children, and dependants, all kneeling in the attitude of suppliants, unitedly deploring their sins, and beseeching forgiveness; with one accord entreating counsel in perplexity, comfort in adversity, and support in trial.

You are anxious about the temporal welfare of your offspring, and it is right that you should; but what, I solemnly ask you, is the amount of your solicitude about their souls? Did it ever strike you that what will survive the annihilation of all sublunary things is committed to your charge, and on the great day of retribution that you will be brought to render a reckoning for the trust consigned to your care? Pause, then, parents and guardians. Let me press one question on your attention. Conscience, thou faithful monitor, answer it! Are you not sensible of having overlooked their interests, and of being unfaithful to the objects of your concern? You reply, that you are unable and afraid to undertake a task so difficult. Such an excuse is never preferred when you ask favours from your fellow-men; inability and fear are never the characteristics of your addresses to them; you find language and courage to frame and present your plea. Anticipate the period when ye shall stand in the presence of God, and try whether such apologies will suffice you there! Besides, you are not called to the performance of this duty in your own might; but it is distinctly declared, as a ground of confidence and encouragement, "My grace shall be sufficient for thee, and my strength shall be perfected in thy weakness." "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" Be persuaded, then, to erect in your homes an altar to the Lord, and be assured that the blessings which will accrue from its institution will be inconceivably, incalculably precious. You will see your sons and your daughters grow up in the fear and favour of God, an honour to yourselves, a praise in the Church, and luminaries in this dark world. When you come to die, you can leave them without a tear, convinced of having done your duty towards them, and commending them to a covenant God, you will depart, if not with the full assurance, yet with the hope, of meeting them around the throne, where prayer, unneeded and unknown, is merged into praise.

Reading the Scriptures.—"Search the Scriptures." For what purpose was Revelation given? The answer must be obvious. To discover to us the character of the great "I AM," the plan of redemption, and the condition and destiny of man; to tell us what nature, and philosophy, and conscience, could never disclose; to enlighten the understanding, dissipate the doubts, dispel the fears, and elevate the hopes of men. What book has ever appeared which has attained these ends but itself? All other compositions, when treating on these subjects apart from its sacred dictates, have only served to bewilder and destroy. The Bible alone gives light and life. It was realizing this that the Psalmist made it "the man of his counsel;" that the primitive Christians bound it to their breasts; that the learned Salmasius exclaimed, "Oh! I have lost a world of time—if one year more were added to my life, it should be spent in reading David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles; that a Sicilian king asserted, "The Holy Books are dearer to me than my kingdom, and were I under any necessity of quitting one, it would be my diadem;" that Boyle, the celebrated philosopher, declared, "I prefer a sprig of 'the tree of life' to a whole wood of bay;" that Locke, the eminent metaphysician, thus wrote to a friend, "Study the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament: therein are contained 'the words of eternal life,'—it has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error for its matter;" and that Sir Walter Scott, when dying, requested his son-in-law to produce to him its message of mercy: how beautiful his own lines are on its excellence!—

"Within this awful Volume lies
The mystery of mysteries:
Happiest they of human race
To whom their God has given grace,
To read—the fears—to hope—to pray—
To lift the latch—to force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born,
Than read to doubt, or read to scorn."

There was a period when it was sealed to the people, and even the priesthood, by the dark and deadly decree of the Roman hierarchy—when it was guarded to the approach of the laity by the most awful fulminations; but, blessed be God, we live in other and happier times, when all indiscriminately may "take of the waters of life freely." Have our forefathers bled, and suffered, and died, to rescue the charter of our freedom, to be immured for weeks, and months, and years, in the privacy of undisturbed repose? Alas! it is but too true that in many, shall I say the majority of instances, their struggles have been in vain. Is it not the case, that to thousands in this Christian land it is a sealed book—save on the Sabbath-day, when habit or the laws of society prompt them to go up to the house of God, where, for the first time since they were there, they come in contact with its saving truths? By how many more are its precepts contemned, its warnings unheeded, its promises despised, and its invitations slighted? From the gorgeous palace of the peer to the humble dwelling of the artisan, its "still small voice" is either altogether unheard, or drowned in the vortex of luxury and dissipation.

Can you, then, individually, lay your hand on your heart, and say, that a different line of procedure has been hitherto adopted by you; that you have taken it as "a light to your feet and a lamp to your path," and are now having fulfilled, in your daily experience, that it is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness?" Is its spirit purifying your thoughts, hallowing your words, and regulating your actions; or are the opinions, and maxims, and policy of the world the standard of your belief, appeal, and obedience?

As the ambassador of Christ, I charge you, that ye think on these things ere it be too late: and if, in the days that are past, ye have been unmindful of your duty in this respect, now to betake yourselves, without delay, to its discharge. Does not the mariner follow the guidance of his compass, and the traveller the direction of his chart?—and shall we be indifferent to the guidance of that Word which God, in the riches of his grace, has been pleased to bestow, in order that we may be

"Led to brighter worlds, and everlasting realms?"

Let not, then, a death-bed alone be the scene of your earnest resort, nor a judgment-day testify against you;

but be persuaded to consult, study, and carry into practice, all the truths of the Sacred Scriptures; that in life ye may be happy, in death peaceful, and throughout eternity blessed.

Attendance on the Means of Grace.—"Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is." It is but too palpable, beloved brethren, that the conduct of many demands such an injunction. Following the course of this world, "that lieth in wickedness," they consent to absent themselves from part, and not unfrequently the whole, of the services of the sanctuary. Bear with me while I faithfully, yet affectionately, set before you some of the causes which prevent them from obeying the decision of their consciences, and the command of God. The mechanic has been so severely wrought during the week, that he indulges a little longer in bed on the Sabbath morning, and the hour of meeting arrives and passes by ere he can get himself prepared; or if he happens to attend, he is so wearied out with the exercises, to him tedious and tiresome, that he remains at home during the rest of the day, reading the newspapers, lolling in listless apathy, or entertaining a friend. The man of business is so much immersed in his merchandise that he can find no time to go to the house of God; what with arranging his books, answering letters, and conversing on the present position and future prospects of trade, he is entirely engaged; and if perchance he may drop in occasionally, his restless deportment and discontented aspect bespeak that his mind is not there. One considers he fully discharges his duty when he goes once to church; more than that he esteems unnecessary and inconvenient. Such seize upon the quiet that prevails, to amuse themselves with their families, spend an afternoon with a neighbour, or take a walk in the fields. Others are only found in the house of prayer, on the fashionable diet, forenoon or afternoon as it may chance to be; they would not be obeying the rules of etiquette if they departed from this custom, and if they transgressed would certainly be included among the common people, or be counted too serious and strict; after this they could not appear at the gay tea-table, the theatre, or ball-room; and to be excluded from any one of these is a punishment greater than they are able or willing to bear. Ought these things to be so? Surely every candid and reflecting mind is ready to exclaim in the negative; and yet with those views and convictions, it is but too obvious that not a few among ourselves are addicted to absence from the public ordinances of religion, who if pressed for a reason, would be obliged to confess that they have none. If, then, you cannot satisfactorily account for your conduct to your fellow-creature, how will you appear at the bar of your Judge? There you must stand, and answer for all the privileges with which you have been favoured on earth. Oh! it is an awful and overpowering reflection, but not more alarming than it is true, that for every sermon which you have not heard, you will have to account, if you had an opportunity to hear it, but thoughtlessly or wilfully allowed it to glide past unembraced and unimproved. In the light of eternity, then, we earnestly entreat you to permit nothing to deter you from going with the assemblage that keep holy-day, save bodily sickness, infirmity of age, or death.

With rapture the king of Israel entered the sacred precincts of the temple, with transport he beheld the ark of the covenant, and hear his bitter lamentations on being bereft of what to him was a source of the purest and most perfect pleasure—"When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me, for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God with the voice of joy and praise." "O my God, my soul is cast down within me." He forgot the persecutions of Saul, the ingratitude and rebellion of Absalom, and the enmity of his adversaries, in the deprivation which he was then sustaining, and his desire is not for release from his enemies, nor elevation to his throne, but a return of the Sabbaths and services of the city of his solemnities. How touching the strains in which he gives expression to the unquenchable longing of his heart—"As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God; my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God, when shall I come and appear before God?" And, brethren beloved, have not we souls of the same mould as his—suffering the same wants—capable of similar views and affections; these are specially to be realized and obtained, when mingling with the great congregation, in the ministrations of the sanctuary. There Jehovah principally reveals himself to saints and sinners. If ye despise the services of the Church militant, how do you expect to join those of the Church triumphant? By an immutable law of our nature, our happiness does not consist so much in the objects that surround us, as in the harmony which subsists between these and our own dispositions and tastes. Now suppose you were this instant translated to the General Assembly and Church of the first-born, do you think you could find any satisfaction in the fellowship of the saints above, when it is uncultivated and even avoided below? The song of Moses and the Lamb would find no response from your lips, and no echo in your heart; your only endeavour would be how to escape.

Be prevailed upon, then, my dear brethren, to forego all the inclinations, avocations, and society, which would detain you at home; and seek ever to be waiting and watching at "the gate of heaven."

Let us, then, hear the conclusion of the whole matter—"Fear God and keep his commandments," and "this is his commandment that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ." This is the first step to the scriptural performance of every duty. Calvary must be your starting point, and thence you must walk by faith, onwards to "honour, glory, immortality." Without this all will be in vain. You may pray in secret and with your families, read the Scriptures, and attend the ordinances of religion, but your devotions and your duties will be unacceptable to God, and unprofitable to yourselves. Not being personally and savingly united to Christ, every thing you do will be offensive to him who is holy, just, and true, for out of his Son he is a "consuming fire." In him alone he is well pleased. Seek, then, to be convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment; to close with your Saviour in the offers of mercy; to have his Spirit abiding in you, and thus resting on the atonement of the Redeemer, and sanctified by the Holy Ghost, you will be made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.

Remember, that the "redemption of the soul is precious," and that every day detracts from the opportunities you have of saving it; delay not until death, for it may be sudden, or if lingering, you may be racked with bodily pain, so as not to be able to direct even a thought towards the "one thing needful;" but now give heed to the things that belong to your peace, ere they be for ever hid from your eyes; and at last that we may meet together in the land of bliss, to recline on the banks of that stream which flows from the throne of God and of the Lamb, and bask under the shade of that tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations—is the sincere prayer of your loving pastor.

OUR FEMALE SERVANTS: THEIR MORAL CONDITION, AND THE BEST MEANS TO BE EMPLOYED FOR ITS IMPROVEMENT.

To every intelligent observer of society, and especially to every truly benevolent mind, it must be apparent, that while there is no class of the working community more important than that of female servants, there is scarcely any whose condition and character calls more loudly for consideration. When the position they occupy, the connection which they have with our children, and the influence they exert in a household, are soberly regarded, it will be evident that the claims of no class of persons are more powerful and urgent on the sympathies, and the benevolent and Christian exertions, of parents, masters and mistresses, and ministers of the Gospel.

While, however, the claims of our female servants are so obvious and pressing, it is beyond a question, that no order of society has been more neglected. Whether this has arisen from heedlessness, from mistaken notions of delicacy, from ignorance of the most efficient means to be employed, or from a feeling of reluctance to make any decided effort for the melioration of their condition, we know not; but from whatever cause it may have proceeded, it is but too manifest that there has been a want of specific, vigorous, and combined exertion, calculated to bear immediately on their moral character, and to prepare them for the important duties of their station.

Contributions have been raised, plans have been concerted, noble undertakings have been achieved, important societies have been established, and the most extended circle of operation has been described, to benefit and bless one portion of the community after another, but female servants have been almost forgotten; scarcely any public prayer has been presented, or any benevolent and religious exertions specifically and directly made for their welfare. On the contrary, they have been to a great extent passed by as strangers, and regarded as aliens and outcasts, even by the professedly Christian community of the British empire.

It is high time, however, that there should be an alteration in this respect—that more correct views should be formed with regard to the position of female servants, and their influence on society—that a different tone of sentiment and feeling should be cherished respecting them—and that their moral and religious claims should be more distinctively and urgently enforced.

The number of female servants in this country is very considerable. They abound in the metropolis, and in all parts of the country; and multitudes, from almost every district of the empire, annually visit the capital, in order that they may obtain situations. Parents, whose circumstances are limited, generally make arrangements for sending their daughters to service; and, in the agricultural districts, villages will be found where the daughters of the cottagers are nearly all either engaged as servants or in quest of situations.

The temptations to which female servants are exposed, especially in cities and large towns, are very numerous. The thief, the pedlar, the fortune-teller, and the libertine, alike reckon upon them as their prey. Nor is their danger exclusively from without. The love of dress, the lax state of morals which exists among the great majority of female domestics, and the unrestrained and unrestricted communication which commonly occurs with their fellow-servants of the opposite sex, with the irregular and dissipated habits of many of their employers, are temptations great and powerful—before which many female servants fall, and make shipwreck of character and of a good conscience.*

When the position of female servants in our households is regarded, how alarming do these considerations become! How vast is the amount of property intrusted to their care! To how great an extent is the safety, the health, and the character of a family, in their power! What influence do they often acquire over an excellent master! What control do they frequently exert over an amiable mistress! How great is their authority in connection with the children and younger branches of a family! These are constantly witnessing their example, listening to their conversation, and receiving their instructions; consequently, their power over them is such as to operate, either as an invaluable blessing, or as an evil of the direst kind.

The foregoing observations demonstrate how necessary it is to regard the moral condition of female servants, how desirable it is that every exertion should be made, in order that their condition may be improved—and how deeply important it is that their character and influence in society should be duly recognised! They must never be considered as individuals who have no weight, and who can command no degree of moral influence. If due regard were paid to their character—if their minds were properly disciplined, if they had the wisest lessons instilled, and the best principles implanted, above all, a good example set before them, they would, by their correct and judicious views, their simplicity and modesty, their industry and frugality, their truth and sobriety, be the instruments of communicating unnumbered blessings to the households of which they form a part.

To ameliorate the condition of female servants, it is very important to attend to their intellectual, moral, and religious culture.—The majority of our female servants are in a state of great ignorance: many are unable to read, a still larger number are unacquainted with the simple truths of the Bible; and of those who possess some portion of religious and elementary knowledge, there are many who have little regard to the Word of God, as a rule of faith and practice. They should not be permitted to continue in this condition. Their minds should be enlightened by well-directed and useful education; and that their moral character may be elevated, and those blemishes by which it is now disfigured be removed, it is indispensable that every exertion be employed to imbue them with the spirit of Christ, and to bring them under the purifying and ennobling influence of the great principles of the Gospel.

That the moral and religious improvement of our female servants may be promoted, it is exceedingly important that ministers of the Gospel do regard them as a part of their charge. Servants are too much neglected, even by the most zealous ministers, and too often forgotten in pulpit exhortations and appeals. In every large congregation, a considerable number of female servants will be found; an occasional discourse, therefore, specifically for their benefit, or the establishment of a Bible class among and for them, might prove of material advantage. Servants as well as their employers, require attention from the ministers of the Gospel; and they can and do appreciate the kindness and benevolence of that minister, who makes it his object to seek their instruction.

That the moral character and condition of female servants may be improved, it is desirable to have a number of appropriate tracts addressed especially to them. There are few publications, simple, clear, and concise, which are directed exclusively to female servants, and calculated to bear on their situation, duties, and dangers. If these publications were penned in a simple, affectionate, and impressive manner, and a large number of them were distributed among female servants, the effect might be very powerful, and the moral advantages resulting therefrom soon be apparent.

That the moral condition of female servants may be improved, it is very important for mistresses to converse with, catechise, and endeavour, by an interesting and familiar style of address, to make their domestics acquainted with the great subjects of religion. These duties are too much neglected, even by mistresses possessing piety and leisure; we are not therefore surprised that there are so many bad servants, and so few who fear God, and keep his commandments. We are persuaded, that if mistresses would take an interest in the moral and spiritual welfare of their female domestics, the most important and permanent benefits would arise. How many opportunities have thousands of mistresses of conversing with their domestics on the best subjects—of giving them enlightened and judicious counsels, and preparing them for the duties, and fortifying them against the temptations and dangers of life! They might point out to them the evil of sin, the value of the soul, the importance of early piety, the vanity of the world, the beauty of humility, and the necessity of living daily under the influence of the fear and love of God. Such mistresses would prove inestimable blessings to thousands and tens of thousands of servants; and our domestics, thus taught to know and to feel that they have a Master in heaven, would be led to show all good fidelity to their earthly employers.

The writer is acquainted, at the present moment, with a family, who have had in the course of years upwards of twenty servants, and all these have been brought to God while residing with them. The kind attentions shown—the Christian example presented—the constant moral and religious instructions addressed, and the affectionate appeals made to their servants, were, under the blessing of God, instrumental to their sound conversion.

In order that the moral condition of female servants may be improved, it is very important that masters and mistresses should secure to their domestics, on the Sabbath, an attendance at the house of God. A large number of female servants in every large town, live in the total neglect of public worship. The Sabbath dawns, but it brings to them no cessation of toil or labour. The doors of the sanctuary are opened, but they are not permitted to enter them. The ministers of the Gospel proclaim to listening thousands the words of eternal life, but a large portion of our "maid-servants" are not found among their hearers. The employers care for none of these things, and therefore their domestics are excluded from their enjoyment. In families also, who make a profession of religion, there is too often found a culpable remissness upon this subject. The occupations of the kitchen, and an attention to what are called the hospitalities of social life, are frequently allowed to interfere with, and subtract from the servants' opportunities of attending public worship. Even in households where the employers make conscience of allowing their servants to attend the house of God, the late hours at which many such families rise; the attention paid to the decoration of mistress and children; the ordinary, and often extraordinary culinary preparations for the family dinner, so distract the minds, and fatigue the bodies of their domestics, as completely to unfit them for a devout, a serious, or even a wakeful attention to the duties of the sanctuary. If this be the state of things prevailing, can we expect that the character and conduct of female servants will bear the test of the Word of God? Can we hope that their moral condition will be elevated, or that they will stand firmly in the hour of temptation? If the concerns of the soul be neglected—if the claims of religion be violated, on what basis can their moral character rise? what shall check their innate depravity, or lead them to cultivate fidelity to their employers? The writer is aware that a disposition prevails among many servants to abuse the privilege allowed them, and to substitute a walk or a visit, for an attendance at a place of worship; but a kind inquiry on the part of the mistress, would soon detect the evil practice; and an earnest and faithful remonstrance setting forth its sin and danger, would lead, ere long, to its discontinuance.

That the moral and spiritual improvement of female servants may be secured, it is desirable that a good example should be constantly placed before them. Masters and mistresses must practise what they teach, or their instructions will be, in a great degree, powerless. There must be no extravagance in the parlour, if economy is to be observed in the kitchen. There must be no undue attachment to personal adornment in the employers, if such employers would have neatness and plainness of attire among their servants. Every thing like duplicity and detraction must be discountenanced in the drawing-room, if slander and evil-speaking is to be banished from the "servants' hall." There must be order and system at the head of households, if regularity and management are to be expected from the inferior members. "Whatever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report," must be exhibited in the life and conduct of those employers, who desire that their domestics should esteem and love the truth as it is in Jesus.

If masters and mistresses desire the improvement of female servants, they must treat them with consideration and kindness. There should be no disposition or endeavour to reduce their wages to the lowest point; neither must the payment be postponed beyond the period when due. No undue and excessive labour should be exacted; but reasonable time allowed for refreshment, personal improvement, and repose. Praise and blame must be impartially administered, and all severity of censure carefully avoided: the practice of re-proving servants in the presence of strangers, is also very objectionable. There should be sympathy and attention shown, when a servant is suffering from pain or sickness. If families would have good servants, they must regard them as intelligent beings, capable of being acted upon by reason and motive. The moral improvement of any portion of a community is an advantage to the whole.

In order that the moral condition of female servants may be improved, it is most important for masters and mistresses to warn them against evil associates. Bad company is the ruin of a vast number of female servants. They will have acquaintances, and, unhappily, they are not of the most desirable character—they are usually ignorant—frequently fond of dress—pay little or no regard to a correct standard of morals; and as it respects religion, they have no fear of God before their eyes. Very many female servants have admirers of the other sex, whose character, in most cases, will not bear investigation; and whose influence over young girls, wishing to escape from the restraints of servitude, is very powerful. Masters and mistresses cannot too frequently, nor too solemnly, warn their servants on this subject. It is one of the greatest evils by which they are surrounded, and one of the most formidable dangers to which they are exposed.

If masters and mistresses desire the improvement of female servants, they must guard against every thing that would have a tendency to destroy or weaken their moral principles. They must not instruct their servants to say they "are not" when they are "at home." They must not unnecessarily expose them to the dangers which abound in our streets at night. They must forbid the improper use of ardent spirits, and the introduction of novels, cards, dice, &c., into their dwellings. Neither must they be indifferent to the moral character of those who become inmates of their houses: should apartments be let, it is not enough that the "respectability" of the "gentleman" be ascertained; his moral character and conduct should also be the subject of inquiry. Seeing that servants are, to a great extent, what their employers make them, masters and mistresses should guard against every thing likely to give their mind, temper, and deportment, an improper bias, or to impair their moral character. Should any circumstances arise to render the dismissal of a servant necessary, care should be taken not to send her away, without sufficient time being allowed to provide for herself a respectable lodging.

In order that the welfare of female servants may be promoted, it is important that their friends ascertain the character of the families into whose service they are introduced. There are many families in which the Bible is not read—prayer is not offered—the Sabbath is not duly observed. The world and worldly duties alone are regarded, while the claims of Jehovah are habitually forgotten. Other families there are in which the rules of morality and virtue, as well as the precepts of religion, are disregarded. The masters are immoral in their language and conduct, and the mistresses intemperate in their habits; the Bible is with them a subject of ridicule; and the doctrine of man's future accountability altogether impugned: yet, into such families are the daughters of our peasantry, and the children of our schools too often sent; no inquiry being made, as to the moral character of the household into which they are to be introduced. The wages the young woman is to receive are settled, the duties she is to perform are defined; but whether she is to enjoy any religious privilege in the family, or whether her morals will be injured, are inquiries altogether neglected.

How momentous is the subject which this short Essay embraces, and how deeply should it be regarded by those who are really solicitous to advance the best interests of the human race! How closely is it identified with our domestic order and happiness, and with our moral dignity, as a nation; and how powerfully should it commend itself to every enlightened understanding and well-regulated conscience, as in the sight of God! Friends of the poor! do you take a deep interest in the case of female servants? Let them not be neglected—let not the elevation of their moral character be considered by you as a matter of comparative indifference! Friends of humanity! compassionate the condition of female servants, who are often isolated and friendless, far removed from a father's reproofs and a mother's counsels; and let every effort be made to protect and preserve them from the temptations and dangers to which they are exposed, and to render them useful members of the community.

Friends of religion! reflect on the position of female servants. Consider their trials—their duties—their weaknesses. Contemplate the few moral and religious advantages which the mass of them have enjoyed, and throw around them the shield of your sympathies, your prayers, and your benevolent and Christian exertions. Let it be your endeavour to promote their best interests. Let your inquiry be, What can we do to meliorate their condition, and to elevate their character? Do not entertain the opinion that you can accomplish nothing. Every Christian may be instrumental, in some degree, in communicating the most valuable moral and religious blessings to this important, but too much neglected, class of the community.

Come, then, British Christians—come, then, masters and mistresses—come, then, ministers of the Gospel, try what you can accomplish in this great work. Let not "our female servants" be neglected by you—let not their temptations be multiplied, through your heedlessness and apathy—let not the laxity of their morals be increased, through your supineness. Consider the situations which you occupy; call to mind the special kindness of Providence towards you—the obligations the Christian religion imposes on you. Dwell on the thought, that every female servant is a fellow-creature for whom you should care, and a fellow-immortal for whose salvation you ought to be deeply solicitous; and then, we are convinced, you will, each in your several spheres, employ your efforts to bring "our female servants" out of the paths of error and folly, into the ways of truth and wisdom, and, eventually, into the blissful mansions of heaven.

SHALL WE CONTINUE IN SIN?

SHALL the believer dare to sin,
Because his sins have been forgiven?
Shall sovereign grace, which makes him clean,
Be thus abused?—Forbid it, Heaven.

Shame on that heart which does not melt,
And shame on that unfeeling eye,
Which feels no anguish, for that guilt
For which the Saviour came to die.

If yet those sufferings were to come,
Which should a guilty world redeem,
Oh! could he bear to swell the sum
Of what must be endured for him?

Oh! could he bear to add, by sin,
A sharper point to every thorn;
And make each cruel strife more keen,
By which the holy flesh was torn?

Yet every sin he dares commit,
If he, indeed, have tasted grace,
More sharply pierced those hands, those feet,
And marr'd with deeper lines that face.

Dear injured Saviour! ne'er may those
For whom thy precious blood was shed,
Give cause of triumph to thy foes,
But shrink from sin with holy dread.

Nor let the cruel sight be shown,
That He whose love all love transcends,
Was wounded in the house of one
Of those who call themselves His friends.

DR STROCK.

BRIEF NOTICE OF

THE LATE REV. FINLAY STEWART,

MINISTER OF THE ASSOCIATE CONGREGATION OF BURGESS
SECEDERS, FOLLOESHAWS.

BY THE REV. JOHN ANDERSON,

Minister of Helensburgh, Dumbartonshire.

THIS highly esteemed and justly regretted minister of Christ, who, like the priests of old "has not been permitted to continue by reason of death," was born at Kincardine, in 1785. From his earliest years he was dedicated to the office of the holy ministry; and when not much more than twenty years of age, was licensed by one of the Presbyteries in connection with the Associate Synod, to preach the everlasting Gospel. Shortly after his becoming a licentiate, he was called by the Associate congregation of Pollokshaws, to the pastoral charge of which, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Glasgow in 1806. Here he continued to labour till his death, which took place on the 4th February 1841, being in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth year of his ministry. The ministerial life of Mr Stewart was one continued period of dedication to the Lord. Others may have shone with greater splendour. None burned more constantly. The duties of his sacred calling engrossed his whole time, talents and attention. In obedience to the apostolic injunction, "he gave himself wholly to these things." He was, in deed, and in truth, "Christ's minister, attending continually upon this very thing."

As a preacher, he belonged to the good old school—in our day growing somewhat thin—of the Bostons, the Willisons, and the Erakines. His sermons might not, it is true, be very profound or philosophical, but what is better, they were always exact in method, and rich in matter. The characteristic and the charm of all his discourses was, that they pointed to "Christ and Him crucified." On the "fulness that is in Him"—its suitability and sufficiency for fallen man—its unsearchable riches, and its unconditional freeness, it was his delight to dwell. His sermons were the fruit of long and laborious study. Whatever causes of regret he might have in reviewing his ministerial career, this, we are certain, was not one of the number, that he had "offered to God that which had cost him nothing." Some men live for the world; the world is their field;—some live for the Church generally, and spend their strength in struggling "with giants" in its "high places." Mr Stewart lived for his congregation, and the people of his town and neighbourhood. Besides visiting his own people once a-year from house to house, and holding district diets for examination, much of his time was devoted to visiting the sick and the dying, of almost all of whom for many years, owing to the distance of the residence of his venerable and respected father and friend, the parish minister, from the scene of spiritual labour, and, perhaps, to his own peculiar fitness for this duty, the care fell on him. In the discharge of this sad but important duty, no one was ever more unwearied and devoted. At all hours of the day and of the night, and in all cases where the disease was of the most infectious nature, he was prompt to obey the call of mercy, and would hasten without a murmur to the scene of misery. Of his devotedness in this matter, we have a striking example in his conduct, during the period this country was visited by the cholera. The dismay which this mysterious disease struck into every heart, how the infected were avoided, and how even the ministers of mercy "stood aloof at their sore," are things which we all remember. To that of many of his brethren, the conduct of Mr Stewart furnishes an honourable contrast. Multitudes in the town and neighbourhood of Pollokshaws, were smitten with this modern plague; some of them were attended in their own dwellings, but most of them were conveyed to an hospital, erected at the public expense for the occasion.

To the private dwellings of the infected, and to the public hospital, Mr Stewart paid regular daily visits—

"———In duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd, and wept, and pray'd for all,
Beside the bed where parting life was laid;
And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismay'd
He stood;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
And his last faltering accents whispered praise."

When referring to those visits, we have heard Mr Stewart say, that frequently, when the dying lay insensible to all earthly objects, when the voice of love itself failed to reach the ear, growing dull in death, the sound of his voice in prayer recalled them to sensibility, and for a short while restored them to communion with the living. His townsmen soon after made him a public present, in token of their admiration of his conduct, and gratitude for his services on that dark and trying occasion.

If ever minister could say to his people, with something of apostolic truth, "I seek not yours, but you," and, "Ye are in our heart, to live and die with you;" and if ever minister found that the nearest way to a people's heart, is through their houses,—it was Mr Stewart. How deeply he was beloved, the hundreds who, on the day of his funeral, lined the road from his darkened dwelling to the churchyard, and who crowded the churchyard to catch a glimpse of the coffin in which the body of their loved and lost pastor was about to be lowered to its last resting-place, and many of whom were in tears, in some measure testified. Among them, and in the town itself, there were few who did not feel, that on the day when the sad and startling intelligence spread of his death, they had lost not a minister only, but a friend.

Mr Stewart devoted much of his time to the religious education of the young—superintending a Sabbath evening school in the church, and conducting a class for young people farther advanced, on Monday evenings.

The character of Mr Stewart it is not our object to delineate. One feature, however, we think it right to mention—this was his perfect freedom from any thing approaching to envy, or jealousy of superior merit. Differ he might, and did, from others; but however much he might differ from another, that individual had no ground to fear, at his hands, detraction. Ready to praise, and to speak good of others, we scarcely remember an instance of his speaking evil. In this, he has left an example which is well worthy of imitation.

About the time of Mr Stewart's receiving license, the controversy that had rages so fiercely of late, respecting civil and national establishments of religion, had its origin, and led to a division in the Associate Synod. Mr Stewart ranged himself on the side of the party holding the principle of a national establishment to be right and scriptural. Of this principle he continued till his death the consistent asserter and defender. It is true, that when the late happy reunion was effected between the reforming National Church and the Associate Synod, Mr Stewart was found in the minority. This, we have reason to believe, however, was owing rather to the state of his congregation than from any convictions of his own that the time for reunion was not fully come, or that it could not yet be consistently sought or made. However this may be, we know that on his dying-bed his advice to his elders was, that they should unite with the National Church;—an advice which, we hope, they will ere long carry into effect.

Though slightly indisposed for about eight days previous to his fatal illness, which was inflammation of the stomach, Mr Stewart may be said to have died suddenly. Early on Sabbath morning he became ill. His heart had been much set on preaching that day, and in his preparations on Saturday he had had great enlargement and pleasure. For several weeks he had been lecturing on that magnificent portion of holy writ, the 15th chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, wherein the apostle celebrates the mystery of the resurrection of the dead; and had come to the last verses, wherein the Christian is made to chant his glorious triumph over death and the grave,—“O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? The sting of Death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.”

Several times, as the disease seemed to abate that morning, he said to his wife, “I’ll be able to preach yet.” Alas! the harness which he had often loved to gird on, and which he longed so much to gird on once more, he was never to gird on again. The triumph which he was to have described in the pulpit, he was to exemplify in his own person, and to win in his own experience. And this triumph, through faith in that mighty Redeemer, on the glories of whose person, and the riches of whose grace, he had so often loved to expatiate, win he did. Death came sudden, but not too soon. He had his armour on, and was prepared to meet and overcome the “last enemy.” All that he had to set in order was “his house,” which he did with the most perfect composure. This done, from the scene of his labours—from the bosom of his beloved family, several of them yet of tender years—with the most perfect resignation he awaited his final summons. It was the happiness of the writer of this brief Notice to spend several days with Mr Stewart, and to preach for him the Sabbath immediately before the one on which he was seized with his fatal illness. During these days he was much struck with the singular gentleness, graciousness, and what he may be permitted to call heavenliness of Mr Stewart’s manner. So much was he struck with the heavenliness of his conversation and whole conduct, when he heard of his illness, he said to several young friends with whom he happened to be at the time, “This sickness, I am afraid, is unto death;” and assigned the above peculiarity in his manner as the reason of his fears. It was unto death, even as he feared. The writer of this was not with him at his death. Several of his brethren in the ministry were, who witnessed that his “latter end was peace.”

“Is that a death-bed where the Christian lies?
Yes—but not his—’tis Death itself there dies.”

In the truest sense of the term, Mr Stewart now lives in that sphere, and in that society, of which it is said, “they all live unto God.” Though dead to us, by his labours, and life, and example, let us hope that to multitudes he yet speaks. The cedar has, indeed, fallen, but its fragrance still lingers on the winds. “A sower who went out to sow, bearing precious seed,” has left the field of labour. Let us hope that the precious seed will continue to spring up in the souls of men, long after the heart and the hand of him who scattered it are cold in the grave; and that on that great day, when they “who went forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall come again with rejoicing,” he will appear among the glorious reapers, bringing, as the fruit of his toil and tears, “his sheaves,” the souls converted by his ministry, “with him.” Meantime, we think it due to the memory of our departed brother, and to the grace of God which made him what he was, to record this much of his life, and labours, and death; and to add, in the words of the good Bishop Ken, that in no inferior degree he did

“Of an ambassador the grave address—
A father’s tenderness—a shepherd’s care—
A leader’s courage, which the Cross can bear—
A watchman’s wakeful eye—
A pilot’s skill, the helm in storms to ply—
A fisher’s patience, and a labourer’s toil;”—

And to record our belief, that many, in the day of the Lord, will rise up and call him blessed.

THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—THE NIGER EXPEDITION.

BY THE EDITOR.

In a former Paper, we called the attention of our readers to the Cruelties and Barbarities of the Slave Trade, stating, at the sametime, from the data furnished by Sir Thomas Buxton, that, instead of being on the decrease since its abolition by Great Britain, it has advanced to an extent almost incredible. In these circumstances, the question naturally suggests itself to every benevolent and humane individual, How is this appalling evil, not to be mitigated but utterly eradicated? The reply to this question will form the subject of the present inquiry.

The means which may be resorted to for putting an end to this shameful traffic in human beings, are obviously of a twofold nature. They are either physical or moral. In other words, actual force must be employed to defend the poor injured Africans from the fearful effects of European cupidity, and their oppressors must be visited with the severest punishments which the arm of law can inflict; or an attempt must be made to elevate Africa in the scale of civilization; and to bring her ample internal resources so effectually into operation, that there will be no temptation, and far less inclination to second the efforts of the European men-stealers. The remedy for the Slave Trade, it is obvious, must be either of the one kind or of the other. Sir Thomas Buxton proposes to combine both, and, therefore, he advises Government to strengthen their squadron for the capture of slave ships; while he calls upon the benevolent to join him in a scheme for elevating the minds of the African people, and calling forth the capabilities of the African soil. The former, is a plan which has been long in operation to a certain extent. Ships have been stationed along the African coast, to prevent the export, and near South America and the West Indian islands, to prevent the import of slaves. In this way something has been done for the discouragement of traders in slaves; but it is certainly desirable, that the squadron, particularly on the African coast, should be as efficient as possible. Sir Thomas Buxton accordingly suggests, that a chain of vessels should be stationed along the African coast, extending from Gambia to Angola.

It is plain, however, that so lucrative a traffic as the Slave Trade, is not likely to be done away with by a system of brute force merely. The evil must be checked at its source. Means must be taken to operate upon the minds of the native chiefs in the interior of Africa, so as to persuade them to suppress the Slave Trade in their dominions, and to encourage the substitution of legitimate merchandise. Obstacles will thus be thrown in the way of procuring negroes from the interior, and this, taken in connection with the proposed increase of the squadron on the coast of Africa, would render the Trade in Slaves so difficult and so hazardous, that, in process of time, it might totally disappear.

But what will not covetous men risk with the prospect of one hundred and eighty per cent. profit? This is a temptation which the reckless votaries of Mammon can scarcely resist. The remedy, therefore, must plainly go farther. If an appeal is made to the love of money, in favour of the Slave Trade, let an equally effective appeal be made to the love of money, against the Slave Trade and in favour of legitimate commerce. Even on this low mercantile view of the subject, it were easy to demonstrate, that man is worth much more as a labourer than he is as a subject of merchandise. He could produce far more by his work, than he could be sold for in the slave market. Convince an African chief of this, and you will make him an enemy to the Slave Trade. Higher views cannot reach him in his present state of heathenism, ignorance, and degradation. You may argue with him upon the iniquity and the barbarity of the traffic in human beings. Your reasoning will be vain. But show him that as a trading speculation, the Slave Trade is far less lucrative than other kinds of commerce which are immediately within his reach, and from that hour the barbarous chief will renounce the profitable for the more profitable traffic. Now it so happens, that such a mode of reasoning may, with safety, be adopted. "Central Africa," to use the words of Sir Thomas Buxton, "possesses, within itself, every thing from which commerce springs. No country in the world possesses nobler rivers or a more fertile soil; and it contains a population of fifty millions." And again, "I believe—and every word that I have read or heard on the subject confirms me in the impression,—that Africa has within herself, resources, which, duly developed, would compensate for the gains of the Slave Trade, if these were twenty times as great as they are."

To a country abounding in the advantages which Central Africa possesses, legitimate commerce, if introduced and encouraged, would be productive of indescribable benefits. But how is this to be accomplished? Our author proposes that an effort should be made to cultivate districts of Africa selected for that purpose, thus pointing out to the natives the actual capabilities of their soil, and how these may be most successfully brought out. The advantages of this mode of proceeding are thus briefly hinted at by Sir Thomas Buxton in his work, entitled "The African Slave Trade and its Remedy:"—

"Two things must be achieved, or we shall fail; the one is, to call forth and elevate the native mind; the other is, to provide a larger source of revenue than that derived from the trade in man. By agriculture—both will be accomplished. The ransom for Africa will be found in her fertile soil; and the moral worth of her people will advance as they become better instructed, more secure, more industrious, and more wealthy. And then will be felt the influence of cultivated intellect on rude reason; the children will be taught by our schools; our very machinery, doing easily what is impossible to their unaided strength, will eloquently speak to others, and beget that allegiance of mind, which is uniformly yielded by the untutored, to beings of superior capacity. The ministers of the Gospel, the best civilizers, will, as gently, as irresistibly, work out a change in the current of opinion, and effect the cheerful renunciation of bloody and licentious customs."

A striking instance of the efficacy of this plan may be mentioned. The Pasha of Egypt, the celebrated Mehemet Ali, in consequence of remonstrances on the part of some of our countrymen, particularly Dr Bowring, resolved to take measures for the abolition of the Slave Trade in his savage territory of Soudan. For this purpose he repaired thither in the autumn of 1838. On arriving in the district with his retinue, he thus proceeded to accomplish his benevolent design. We quote the description as given by our author:—

"The Pasha collected round him a great number of the sheikhs, made them presents, and addressed them in a speech, remarkable not only for its good sense, but for the quarter from whence it was delivered. 'The people of other parts of the world were formerly savages; they have had instructors, and, by labour and perseverance, they have civilized themselves; you have heads and hands like them; do as they have done: you also will raise yourselves to the rank of men; you will acquire great riches, and will taste enjoyments of which you can at present, from your profound ignorance, form no conception. Nothing is wanting for this purpose: you have a great quantity of land, cattle, and wood: your population is numerous, the men strong, and the women fruitful. Up to the present time you have had no guide: you have one now:—it is I!—I will lead you to civilization and happiness. The world is divided into five great parts; that which you occupy is called Africa: in every country, except this, the value of labour is understood, and a taste for good and useful things prevails; men devote themselves with ardour to commerce, which produces wealth, pleasure, and glory—words, which you cannot even comprehend. Egypt itself is not an extensive country; yet, thanks to labour and the industry of its inhabitants, it is rich, and will become more so: distant provinces are acquainted with it; and the territory of Sennar, which is twenty times larger than Egypt, produces almost nothing, because its inhabitants remain as idle as if they were without life. Understand well that labour produces all things; and that without labour nothing can be had.'

"His Highness then explained to them, in detail, the advantages of agriculture and commerce. His auditors, astonished at what they heard, begged him earnestly to take them into Egypt, that they might be instructed in these arts. 'It would be better,' replied his Highness, 'that you should send your children there; they will learn more easily, because they are younger, and will remain longer useful to these countries, when they return to them. I will place them in my colleges; they will learn there all that is useful and ornamental. Be not uneasy about their welfare, they shall be my adopted children; and, when they are sufficiently instructed in the sciences, I will send them back to be happiness to you, and to these countries, and a glory to you.'

"The sheikhs very willingly accepted the offer:—every one wished to send his children into Egypt; the most powerful among them, named Abd-el-Kadir, having no son, asked the favour for his nephew. His Highness then urgently recommended Ahmed Pasha to labour for the welfare and civilization of these people; and, for the purpose of encouragement announced, that he should himself return next year, in order to judge the progress that might be made, and incite them to fresh exertions.

"The Viceroy departed the next morning, and returned to Fazoglo on the 1st of February, when he renewed his exhortations to the sheikhs of that district; and proceeded to Kartoum, where he was delighted to find the good effects of his late visit, in some land being already in full cultivation. From thence he visited, in like manner, the White Nile, and, on returning to Kartoum, he set on foot the building of a Christian church. Before leaving the place, he proclaimed the freedom of trade in indigo, which the provinces of Dongola and Berber produce in considerable quantities, and ordered the governor to supply implements, and every thing necessary, for the development of its cultivation. After which, he embarked with his suite, leaving M. Lambert, with the charge of making two reports,—the one, upon a projected railroad, in that part of the desert which separates Abu-Mahammed from Kurusku; the other, on the formation of a canal between the White River and Kordofan, destined to furnish water for the irrigation of the land, and to facilitate the carriage of the iron-ore of the mines."

The consequence of this admirable conduct on the part of Mehemet Ali has been, that he has found better cotton in Soudan than that which is grown by himself in Egypt. And this is only a solitary example of what may yet be accomplished throughout the whole of Central Africa. Let but commerce and agriculture be introduced and take the place of the unhallowed traffic in human beings, and the benefits to poor injured Africa none can calculate.

But all this will be utterly unavailing to the ultimate abolition of the Slave Trade, unless the mind of the African people shall be enlightened and elevated. For a long period the negro race have not been merely injured, but insult has been added to injury. They have been calumniated and despised as an inferior race of mortals; nay, they have been denied the standing of men, and ranked with the beasts of the field. And whence this degradation? It is in fact the natural and necessary consequence of slavery. A slave is rightly defined by Franklin, to be "an animal who eats as much and works as little as possible." The truth is, he has no motive to labour, but the dread of the lash. His impulses are all of a physical, not one of them of a moral description. The best feelings, the most generous motives of these men, have been overborne. Let but the unnatural pressure be removed, and the poor oppressed African will take his place among rational and civilized men. Make every endeavour to instruct him in useful, but especially religious knowledge. The objection may no doubt be raised, that the climate is unsuited to Europeans, but Sir Thomas Buxton meets this objection, by proposing, that missionaries to Africa may be found among the liberated Africans in our West Indian Colonies. Many of these, have, by the Divine blessing, been converted to God, and may be trained to preach the Gospel in their native land. By a strange coincidence, the thought of a mission to Central Africa, has actually begun to be entertained by the Christian negroes in Jamaica; and the most earnest prayers are daily offered, and anxious desires entertained, for the conversion of the land of their fathers. Through the exertions of the Church Missionary and Wesleyan Societies, some steps have already been taken, by the establishment of a school at Sierra Leone, for the education of native teachers.

It is to the Gospel alone that we can look for the ultimate civilization of Africa, and her deliverance from the awful horrors of the Slave Trade. To use the language of Sir Thomas Buxton,—

"The hope, therefore, of effecting Africa's civilization, and of inducing her tribes to relinquish the trade in man, is, without this assistance, utterly vain. This mighty lever, when properly applied, can alone overturn the iniquitous systems which prevail throughout that continent. Let missionaries and schoolmasters, the plough and the spade, go together, and agriculture will flourish; the avenues to legitimate commerce will be opened; confidence between man and man will be inspired; whilst civilization will advance as the natural effect, and Christianity operate as the proximate cause of this happy change. If, indeed, it be true, that such effects will follow in the train of religion, and that Christianity alone can effect such changes and produce such blessings, then must we pause before we take a single step without it. The cause of Africa involves interests far too great, and results far too stupendous to be trifled with. The destinies of unborn millions, as well as of the millions who now exist, are at stake in the project; and the question is one of life or of death, of comfort and happiness, or of unutterable misery. I believe that Christianity will meet the necessities of the case, and will prove a specific remedy for the moral evils of Africa."

Proceeding on the important principles which we have thus developed, an association has been formed for the extinction of the Slave Trade, and for the civilization of Africa. At the instigation of Sir T. F. Buxton and this benevolent Society, the British Government have fitted out an expedition to the River Niger, with the view of obtaining the most accurate information as to the state of the countries bordering on that river. The immense importance of this preliminary step must be at once acknowledged. It will enable Government to form treaties with the native rulers of Africa, with the view to the suppression of the Slave Trade. Accurate information will be acquired, as to the best localities for commercial or agricultural settlements. Investigations will be instituted into the languages and dialects of Western and Central Africa, with the view of having them reduced to writing, and thus additional facilities for intercourse with the natives will be opened up, and steps may all the more readily be taken, for the introduction of Christianity among them. The following letter to Sir Thomas F. Buxton, dated 24th August last, we extract from the "Friend of Africa," a periodical recently commenced by the above mentioned Society. This letter shows the interest which the Expedition is awakening on the Continent.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I cannot quit the hospitable castle of Königswart without relating to you (while the impression is fresh on my mind,) the substance of a long conversation which I have just had the honour of holding with Prince Metternich, on the subject of African Civilization. Although occupied with the intricate question of Eastern politics, the Prince immediately received me in the most friendly manner; and having listened attentively while I stated the great object to be aimed at, before mentioning the Remedy you had proposed, he interrupted me and said, 'Sir, there is nothing but the Gospel and the plough which can civilize Africa.' I confess that I was not less surprised than gratified at hearing these remarkable words fall from the lips of this eminent statesman; and opening your work which lay on the table before us, I pointed out that they might be termed the very motto of the Society, so entirely do they accord with its views for the civilization of Africa, and that this association was formed expressly to carry those views into effect.

"The Prince stated that, he had long taken an interest in the welfare of the Africans, and when the subject of the extinction of the Slave Trade was brought before the Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, he had given it his decided support; although he at that time saw that there were difficulties to overcome, many of which no longer exist,—and now especially, said the Prince, 'the general peace—the power of steam navigation—and the discovery of the outlet of the Niger—seem to point out the very road to which all our efforts should be directed.'

"After inquiring minutely into the details of the expedition, the Prince said, 'It will afford me much pleasure to become an honorary member of the African Association; and assure your Society from me, that I am with them both heart and soul, and that in any thing in which I can serve them, they may confidently rely on my influence in Austria.'"

THE PERPETUAL AND UNIVERSAL OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH:

A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT WALLACE,

Minister of the Scotch Church, Birmingham.

"Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," &c.—
EXODUS XX. 8-11.

PERHAPS there is no command, obedience to which is more wilfully neglected, and more carelessly rendered, than the very important one just read. It is but needlessly occupying your time, to state, that the most flagrant acts of Sabbath desecration abound; for this is what all who have their eyes open, and who have any true sense of the manner in which the Sabbath ought to be sanctified, must very well know.

But, in addition to these flagrant acts of Sabbath desecration, which abound on every hand, the observance of this holy day even amongst professing Christians—nay, even amongst the people of God, hath wofully degenerated in our times; and is far, very far indeed, from being what the Word of God requires.

This, I believe, is in a great measure owing to loose and erroneous sentiments as to the continued obligation of the fourth commandment. I believe the impression prevails far more generally than is supposed, and exercises a baneful influence in many who would not dare to avow it, that the Sabbath law does not apply to men so strictly and literally under the Gospel as it did under the law. This impression is entirely unfounded, as we hope to prove in the present Discourse.

The fourth commandment is just as applicable to us as it was to the Jews, and as are any of the other commands of the decalogue; and it required nothing, not one jot or tittle, of the Jew which it does not require of the Christian. It required of them to rest from all worldly labours one whole day in seven—and it requires the same of us; it required of them the sanctification of one whole day in seven—and it requires the very same thing of us.

I am most desirous, my brethren, that your minds should be dispossessed of, or fully armed against, all loose and latitudinarian opinions as to the obligation of the Sabbath, and the manner in which it ought to be kept; and also, that you should be stirred up, by such motives and arguments as may be brought to bear on this subject, to the strict and scriptural observance of that holy day. It is with these ends in view, I purpose to address you on the subject of the Sabbath: and my humble prayer is, that the Lord of the Sabbath may so bless his Word; as to render it effectual in promoting the ends intended by it, and all the good pleasure of his goodness.

In the present Discourse I shall address you on the perpetuity of the Sabbath; or endeavour to prove, that it is a divine institution, applicable to, and binding upon, men in all ages.

You are aware, my brethren, that this has been called in question—nay, that it has been denied. You are aware that the opinion has been declared, and I fear it is an opinion which gains ground in our day, and is practically acted upon by very many,—that the Sabbath was a Jewish institution, applicable only to that people during the period of types, and ceremonies, and ritual and external observances, and not at all applicable to Christians, or binding upon those who live in the full sunshine of the Gospel.

There are some who consider the law of the Sabbath abrogated with those other laws which were for the regulation of the ceremonial, and ritual, and typical part of the Jewish worship; and who consider that it is a law no more binding upon Christians, or upon mankind generally, than is the law of circumcision, or any other law confessedly applicable to the Jews alone, and merely typical and ritual in its nature, use, and end.

Now, in answer to this, and in proof of the perpetuity of the Sabbath, or, that it is an ordinance of the Almighty, binding alike upon all men, in all ages, many most powerful and unanswerable arguments may be brought forward.

I. The first argument I would adduce against the supposition that the Sabbath was instituted for the Jews alone, and was therefore binding on them alone, is derived from the fact, that we read in Scripture of the institution of the Sabbath thousands of years before the calling of Abraham, and before the Jews were formed into a distinct nation, and had any peculiar legal economy administered to them.

In Gen. ii. 1-3, we read as follows, "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made.....And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." Now, herein we plainly read of God's institution of the Sabbath—of God's resting the seventh day, and blessing and sanctifying it, in commemoration of creation's work.

Now, what could be the meaning of God's resting the seventh day, and hallowing and blessing it, if he did not do so with respect to mankind? Surely no one will be so obtuse as to say, that he blessed and sanctified it with respect to himself; or, that he within himself might observe it! And if God blessed and sanctified the Sabbath with respect to mankind, whilst as yet there only existed Adam and Eve, is it not reasonable to conclude, that he blessed and sanctified it with respect to them, and all their posterity; and most unreasonable and inconsistent to suppose, that the Sabbath, instituted with respect to man immediately after creation, was yet only to be binding on the Jews, who, as a nation, or in any sense, did not live for thousands of years afterwards?

But to this it is objected, that from Adam till the time of Moses there is no mention of the Sabbath in Scripture,—that Scripture is entirely silent on the subject during the antediluvian and patriarchal ages, and until after the deliverance of the children of Israel from the land of Egypt. Now, observe, all that can be said is, that Scripture is silent on the subject. It cannot be said that that portion of Scripture which refers to the period in question contains any thing positive against the Sabbath. It contains no law repealing the Sabbath as instituted immediately after creation, and in commemoration of it. And are we to take its silence on the subject as a virtual repeal of this positive institution? This is a most dangerous and unreasonable mode of argument; and just as well might we argue, that there was no Sabbath during the government of the Judges in Israel,—a period of four hundred and fifty years,—because during that time there is no mention in Scripture of the Sabbath; and yet we know, and it is confessed on all hands, that then, when the law of God, both moral and ceremonial, as published by Moses, was in full and vigorous operation amongst the Jews, the observance of the Sabbath could not have fallen into entire desuetude.

It may also be observed, that the next passage of Scripture after that in Gen. ii. 1-3, relating to the Sabbath, refers to a period previous to the publication of the ceremonial law, and even that of the moral law, by Moses, and makes mention of the Sabbath as a day already known to the Jews, and familiar to their thoughts. That passage is, Exodus xvi. 23, "And he" (Moses) "said unto them, This is that which the Lord hath said, To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord."

The announcement is made, not as unto men who knew nothing of the Sabbath, but, even as one would make a similar announcement now to those well acquainted with its institution, its character, and its uses. And the fair conclusion seems to be, that, although there is no mention of the Sabbath in Scripture during a very long period previous to this, men were not ignorant of it and its duties during that period, but that the remembrance of it was a thing handed down from father to son, from Adam till Moses's time. We say the remembrance, not the practice of it; for it is not to be supposed that the Jews were allowed to observe the Sabbath whilst they groaned under the yoke of Egyptian bondage. But they remembered it; and therefore soon after their escape from Egypt, and before the publication of any new law on the subject, we find the strict observance of it established amongst them.

Neither are we to suppose, that all knowledge of the original institution of the Sabbath was confined to the Jews. Traces of it are to be found in the history of other ancient nations. "Assyrians, Egyptians, Indians, Arabians, Persians," says a respected author on this subject, "unite with the Israelites, in retaining vestiges of it. In the earliest remains of the heathen writers, Hesiod, Homer, Callimachus—the sanctity of the seventh day, is referred to as a matter of notoriety. Philo, the Jew, declares that there was no nation under heaven where the opinion had not reached."

But admitting the original institution of the Sabbath as stated in the 2d chapter of Genesis, and its application to mankind generally, may it not be held that it was originally instituted as a type of Christ, which, after His death, is no more to be remembered and observed than other types? To this I answer, that the Sabbath in its original institution was not typical of Christ. Man had not yet fallen, he was still in a state of innocence; and it is unreasonable to suppose that whilst in this state, and still under the covenant of works, Christ was in any way revealed to him.

II. But the second and strongest argument for the perpetuity, and continued, and universal obligation of the Sabbath, is derived from the fact,—that the law most fully and expressly enacting it, namely, the fourth commandment, is one of the commandments of the decalogue, or a portion of the unchangeable and universally obligatory moral law of God.

It is admitted that the moral law, in contradistinction to the ritual and ceremonial law of the Jews, is universally applicable and binding on men as a rule of life and duty. In token of its perpetuity and universal obligation, the moral law was engraven by the finger of God himself upon two tables of stone. It was solemnly deposited in the ark of the covenant and testimony. And none but the most ignorant and blinded fanatics have imagined, that this moral law has been abrogated, like the ceremonial laws of the Jews, by the Gospel.

The truly scriptural and evangelical doctrine in respect of the moral law is this, that it is still binding upon men as a rule of life and duty, although the perfect fulfilment of it, for which sin has incapacitated men, is no longer required of them as the condition of eternal life,—that condition, in mercy to our helpless and hopeless state, God having freely provided for all who believe, in the righteousness of Christ. Still, however, whilst God demands not perfect obedience to the moral law as the condition of salvation, He demands of all his people as their duty and service unto him, obedience as full and perfect to it as possible. And accordingly, our blessed Saviour, after delivering those moral precepts which we find in the beginning of the 5th chapter of Matthew, says, verses 17-19. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

Now, if the moral law, as comprehended in the ten commandments, be, as we see it is, of perpetual obligation when taken as a whole, is not each part of it of perpetual obligation also? Or, what reason have we to say, all the commandments are of perpetual obligation but the fourth? What reason have we to make such an invidious exception as this? Has it been any where declared in Scripture that the fourth commandment is not as binding as the other nine? No. Scripture teaches that the whole of the moral law is binding: why then except the fourth commandment? Was not it engraven by the finger of God upon the table which himself had fashioned, as well as the other nine? Is not it comprehended in the law which our Saviour said, "He came not to destroy, but to fulfil," republish, and bring home to men's hearts and consciences by stronger motives than any by means of which they had as yet been operated upon? At the least, is not it one of those "least commandments," which it shall be woe unto a man if he break, or teach others to break?

But in answer to this it is said, all the commandments of the decalogue with the exception of the fourth are moral in their nature, and therefore perpetually binding upon all; but the fourth is merely positive, preceptive, or arbitrary, and therefore what may be dispensed with at any time, like other arbitrary institutions of the Jews.

Now this argument seems to me to display great ignorance and want of consideration; and to be perfectly insufficient for the purpose for which it is brought forward. For even supposing we admitted, which we are not at all prepared to do, that the fourth commandment is merely a positive institution, not necessarily of a moral nature, or in any way essential to moral duty, it does not necessarily follow from thence, that men are to be relieved from the obligation of it. I suppose it will be admitted that God might, if he chose, ordain a perpetual institution, though of only an arbitrary and positive nature; and that it would be men's duty to observe it in all their generations, supposing Him to have ordained it.

And if the Sabbath be merely a positive institution, it would appear from what we have already seen that this is really what God hath done. We have seen that the Saviour declared, that the law, implying all the commandments, was not to be destroyed; and from thence we conclude, that the fourth commandment, which is part of the law, be it moral or be it merely preceptive, is not to be destroyed; but, on the contrary, that it is applicable to, and binding on men under the Gospel, even as are the other nine commandments.

But we deny that the fourth commandment is merely positive, and has nothing in it of the nature of morality. We hold that it is essentially a moral command, even as the other nine.

Laws termed moral are those whose obligation arises from the nature and state of things, or from the general state and nature of mankind, as well as from God's revealed will. Now we believe the fourth commandment to be strictly of this sort. It is obligatory, not merely as a divine institute, as the ceremonial laws and observances of the Jews were obligatory; but, moreover, from the nature of things, and the state and nature of mankind, considered in relation both to this world and the next.

It will hardly be denied that a season of rest from labour, such as the Sabbath supplies, is, if not absolutely necessary, at least most conducive to the bodily health and life of those who have to gain their livelihood by the sweat of their brow, and not to their life and health only, but also to that of the lower animals which minister to man's comfort and necessities.

There has been abundant proof afforded from time to time, that the Sabbath cannot be systematically and habitually broken,—that, instead of being observed as a day of rest, it cannot be used as a day of traffic, trade and business, except at an immense and cruel sacrifice of animal health and life. So that, looking at the subject merely in this light, looking at the Sabbath merely as it affects present and temporal interests, we cannot but feel that the law instituting it—the law which says, "Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates,"—has an obligation, which arises not merely from the fact that it is spoken by God, but also from the very nature and state of things, like the obligation of confessedly moral laws.

But if the Sabbath be essential, or most conducive, to animal life and health, as a day of rest and relaxation from labour, it is still more necessary to the life and health of the soul of man, as a day set apart for devout meditation, and religious worship and services. Reason itself teaches us the propriety of such a day,—the propriety of a stated and appointed time for men to banish from their minds all worldly cares and thoughts of business, in which much of their time whilst here below must necessarily be spent—to withdraw themselves from the world, and engage in the worship of God, and in the most solemn and devout consideration of those things which most concern them, as responsible and immortal creatures. And experience has abundantly taught us that reason is perfectly right in its calculations as to this matter, and that such times of worship and abstraction from the world cannot be neglected; nay, that the Sabbath cannot be forgotten, and profaned, and desecrated, except at the expense of all personal religion and godliness. So that we conclude, that the Sabbath was made for man, because it was necessary to him, viewed in his highest character, and with respect to his highest, even his eternal, interests; and that it has been an obligation, which arises not merely from the fact that it is an institution of God, as was circumcision, but, moreover, from the very nature and state of man, as a being who hath a moral and religious part to act, and a soul to be saved or damned.

We see abundant reason, therefore, for God's having placed the fourth commandment, not amongst the ceremonial laws and institutions of the Jews, but, in the very heart and centre of his moral law. And they who would tear it from this position, and class it amongst the positive and exploded institutions of the ceremonial law, as being of the same nature with them, and because it has no origin in the nature and state of things, manifest at once little regard to the Divine Mind, and an amazing ignorance and inconsideration of the state and character of that world of which they form a part.

The argument for the moral character and obligation of the Sabbath law receives great weight from the fact, that the Sabbath was instituted for man, even in his state of innocence. God saw that it would be good, even for Adam in paradise, to have a certain portion of his time set apart for bodily rest, and special intercourse and communion with Heaven. And this proves that the Sabbath law is no mere arbitrary precept, demanded by changeful circumstances, but a law which has its necessity and its uses in the nature and constitution of man, even in his most perfect state here below.

It is sometimes admitted by those who argue for the Sabbath, as I now do, that the appointment of the seventh portion of our time, and that weekly, as a Sabbath, is an appointment merely positive and arbitrary. But this is too much to admit, unless we are prepared to assert, that there is some other portion of our time that would have answered all the ends and purposes of a Sabbath as well as the seventh. If we are not prepared to assert this—and he would be a bold man who would dare to assert it—we are not called upon to admit that God fixed upon one day in seven as a Sabbath to himself, for any other reason than that He knew such a proportion of man's time more calculated to answer all the ends of a Sabbath than any other. Amongst other valuable observations of Edwards on this subject, is the following:—"The command of God, that every seventh day should be devoted to religious exercises, is founded in the universal state and nature of mankind, as well as other commands; only man's reason is not sufficient, without Divine direction, so exactly to determine it; though, perhaps, man's reason is sufficient to determine that it ought not to be much seldomer, or much oftener, than once in seven days."

Many additional arguments might be brought forward in proof of the moral character of the Sabbath law, and its continued obligation, even to this day. For example, we frequently find the observance of it inculcated in immediate connection with other duties, confessedly of a moral character, and binding upon all men. Thus (Lev. xix. 3, 4), "Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father, and keep my Sabbaths: I am the Lord your God. Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to yourselves molten gods: I am the Lord your God."

Again, the due observance of the weekly Sabbath is spoken of by the prophets, as that wherein practical religion very much consisted, and on which God's special favour and blessing would certainly attend. Thus (Isaiah lviii. 13, 14), "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a Delight, the holy of the Lord, Honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

Thus, then, whilst there is abundant Scripture to teach that the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies were not of a moral character, but merely positive and arbitrary institutions, an importance is invariably attached in Scripture to the law of the Sabbath, equal to that ascribed to any other law of God whatever. And is it not reasonable to conclude, from hence, that the Sabbath law is as much a moral law as any other?

III. But, lastly, the observance of the Sabbath, in Gospel times, is clearly foretold by the ancient prophets, and precious promises are made by them to those who should then hallow it.—The 56th chapter of Isaiah is, by all the best commentators, held to apply to the Gospel age. But in that chapter the prophet says, "Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant; even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer: their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar; for mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people." This passage might be held, as of itself, sufficient to decide the controversy as to the perpetuity and universal obligation of the Sabbath; and yet it is by no means the most powerful of the arguments by which we have endeavoured to establish that point.

What, then, do we say to the words of St Paul (Col. ii. 16), "Let no man, therefore, judge you, in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holiday, or of the new-moon, or of Sabbaths?" To this we answer, that the apostle, in these words, refers not to the weekly Sabbath at all, but to other days observed by the Jews as Sabbaths; but the appointment of which forms no part of the moral law, but only of the ceremonial—that law which instituted meats, and drinks, and holidays, and feasts, the things here classified by the apostle with Sabbaths, and which all Christians allow has been abolished by the Gospel. Or, if this interpretation of this passage is not allowed, as I believe it ought, and it is held that it is to the weekly Sabbath the apostle here refers, all that can fairly be inferred from his words is this, that Christians were not to be judged or condemned for not observing the seventh day, or Jewish Sabbath.

COME AND WELCOME TO JESUS CHRIST.

COME, ye sinners, poor and wretched,

Come—'tis Mercy's welcome hour;

Jesus ready stands to save you,

Full of pity, join'd with pow'r:

He is able,

He is willing—doubt no more.

Let not conscience make you linger,

Nor of fitness fondly dream;

All the fitness He requireth,

Is to feel your need of Him:

This He gives you—

'Tis the Spirit's rising beam.

Come, ye weary, heavy laden,

Lost and ruined by the fall;

If you tarry till you're better,

You will never come at all:

Not the righteous—

Sinners Jesus came to call.

Agonizing in the garden,

Lo! the Saviour prostrate lies;

On the bloody tree behold Him;

Hear Him cry, before He dies,

"It is finished!"

Sinners, will not this suffice?

Lo! th' incarnate God, ascended,

Pleads the merits of His blood;

Venture on him, venture wholly,

Let no other trust intrude:

None but Jesus

Can do helpless sinners good.

Saints and angels, join'd in concert,

Sing the praises of the Lamb,

While the blissful seats of glory

Sweetly echo with His name:

Hallelujah!

Sinners here may sing the same.

The Shortness of Time.—If time be so short—if the space allotted to each one of us be so narrow—if already but a small remnant of our lives be left to us—and if much evil and suffering be apportioned to us all, surely we may with truth observe, THAT TIME IS NOT WORTH LIVING FOR. What can there be in this perishing world that is worthy the pursuit of an immortal soul? True, there are many things very attractive to the sense, very fascinating to the imagination. Many delightful objects around us solicit our attention; many that are fitted to charm every faculty of our mind, and gratify every passion of our nature—riches, and gaiety, and dissipation, and honour; all the innocent and all the guilty gratifications of life: and these things have a natural and almost irresistible hold on our affections. But look at them through the medium of eternity, and what are they? Day-dreams—short, uncertain, fleeting vanities, fashions of this world that are passing away! They will not bear minute investigation; they have in them all the seeds of corruption and decay; they elude the eager grasp, and disappoint the most anxious devotee to their charms; they are like those fog-banks which often deceive the oldest and most experienced mariners, and delude them with the hope of land—but when their imagination is wrought up to the highest pitch of expectation, and they already fancy that they discover the well-known headlands and the desired haven, the sun breaks through, the wind arises, and the deceitful phantom vanishes in air! So are all those things of time and sense which men idolize and adore in the place of God and eternity. The Scripture reveals their nature and their doom; they are transitory; they "perish with the using." And can they, then, satisfy an immortal spirit? The soul of man is formed to embrace the noblest ideas and the highest enjoyments, even those of infinite duration; it is formed for God and heaven, and with these alone can it be fully satisfied. Therefore it is that men devoted to this world and to the things of time are never contented; they discover, after all their eager pursuit of business and pleasure, that, as the Scripture expresses it, they are but "feeding on ashes!" They hunger and thirst, but their hunger is never abated nor their thirst quenched. How strikingly are such persons addressed by the prophet Haggai—"Now, thus saith the Lord of hosts, consider your ways; ye have sown much and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes!" Such is an inspired description of the utter folly and vanity of living for time; and were these words written on our hearts, we should need no further instruction in this respect.—REV. FRANCIS CLOSE, A. M. (Lectures on Genesis.)

"The sower soweth the word." Mark iv. 14.—And then there is no more that he can do. The seed is not his, the ground that it falls on is not his, and if it grow to perfection, the honour is not his. He cannot make it grow, he cannot make it bear, he lets it fall as he is bidden, and that is all he can do. We all too much forget this—both they who teach and they who learn; we all too much forget that the effectual teaching of the Word of God is not the work of man. We think we can do a great deal, and with zealous earnestness we set about it. We seek access to the thoughtless sinner, provoke occasions to enter into talk with him, and pour the words of truth on his unwilling ear. We do well, for this is the sower's task; but then we are surprised that it succeeds not. The seed grows not up—the fowls have picked it up—the thorns have choked it—the sun has scorched it: we are surprised, discomposed, impatient; the minister of the Gospel complains that he hath preached in vain; the teacher of the Gospel complains that he hath taught in vain, and so we fret ourselves, and say that we have lost our work. But we err, in that we mistake what was our work. We drop the seed, and there our task is ended;

if it grows up, it is the work of another. The owner of the seed may complain that it makes no returns—the owner of the ground may complain that it bears him nothing—but the sower has no complaint to make. If the seed dies, it is not he that is wronged—if it grows up, it is not he that makes it grow. And in like manner we forget this truth, when we are to be the receivers of the word. We look to this one and to that one for assistance—we think if we could listen to such a minister, we should be benefited. If we had such advantages of religious intercourse as some others have, we should advance more rapidly. If we could bring the friends on whose account we are anxious to hear a particular preacher, or to discourse with a certain individual, it would surely be effectual. Nay, but he is no other than the sower, and the sower soweth the seed, and what becomes of it? He cannot make soft the heart it falls upon—he cannot fence it round that Satan shall not enter there—he cannot displace the engrossing, captivating world that is already in possession of it. The seed must be received indeed or ever it can grow, and it is well for us to be wherever the messenger scattereth the sacred words of truth; but we have need to beware lest we look more to him that soweth than to Him that giveth the increase, and, whether the benefit derived be for ourselves or others, in our eager pursuing of the means, forget the prayer that should bring down the blessing on it.—Miss FAY.

We love God because he first loved us.—The essential element of religion is love. But how could I love the being who was a tyrant; the stern interrupter of my lawful enjoyment; and who, reversing the statement of Scripture, desired that his creatures should perish? The discovery of God as a Father, is constantly the turning point in religion. Suppose that we should discover some individual, whom we had conceived to be a mere stranger, to be a long lost parent, how would this indifference be melted into love! And when the soul makes a similar discovery, with regard to God, the frost of indifference dissolves, and the heart surrenders itself at once and altogether to his service. "One is your Father which is in heaven." To believe this truth, as explained and illustrated by the Gospel; to value it, and to act upon it, is genuine religion. God is my reconciled Father in Christ; then I must love, and trust, and cheerfully and unequivocally serve him. Is the Father in heaven? then I must mingle reverence with affection, and tremble at his displeasure, even when I repose upon his love. Is one only my Father? then I must oppose no authority to his; I must admit none to wield his sceptre, or to occupy his throne in my soul; I must obey God rather than man. Lord, we have too long halted between two opinions. Come, thou that art the Father of our spirits, come and dwell in us and rule in us. Wash us with the blood of atonement, sanctify us by the Spirit of truth, clothe us with the white robe of the Redeemer's righteousness, and give us at once the adoption and the dispositions of sons,—the delightful portion of those who are admitted to be heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ.—REV. J. W. CUNNINGHAM.

God works in us.—Those who have been brought under serious impressions, must be conscious, that this gracious work was at first begun, and has since been carried on, in perfect consistency with the obligations that rested upon them, to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling; that the very commencement of that work consisted in awakening in their minds solicitude and concern about their spiritual state; that their knowledge and belief of the truth, were accompanied with an earnest desire and an honest effort on their part to know and believe it; that in every subsequent step of their progress, the Spirit of God gave them the will, at the same time that he gave them the power of advancing; and that from first to last, they have never been able to separate between the aids of divine grace, and the exertions which they have themselves been required to make.—REV. DA. GORDON.

ON HEROES AND HEROISM.*

We are not in the habit of entering into critical disquisitions on the various new works which issue from the press. The interests of the readers of a practical Work, like our own, are better consulted by extracts from publications really meritorious, than by strictures, however elaborate, on those which may happen to be of a different character. In some cases, however, a deviation from our general plan is allowable; and the work before us is one in which it may not be out of place to dilate for a little. It professes to expound the philosophy of greatness—to unfold the lights and shadows in the character of those whom the world has regarded as Heroes. This is a vast subject, and one which can be effectually grappled with only by a master mind. It requires no ordinary discernment to be able to trace the great man from obscurity to elevation—to point out the causes by which, either in times of peace or in the bustle of revolutionary excitement, one person bursts from the mass and becomes famous in history. To explain how his fellows regard him with jealousy, and are chagrined that a similar notoriety has not attended their efforts; and how, impelled onward in the pursuit of fame, they task every faculty to gain the same summit, till, in despair and frenzy, life is consumed in the hopeless struggle. To such men, and could we unveil the heart we would find that they are many—to such men, it would be useful to lead them to the contemplation of greatness in all its littleness. It would especially tend to subdue the vapouring of many an ardent youth, if he could but be led to think of the heart-burnings and soul-withering agonies of Heroes, who, by their very elevation, are precluded from a share in the sympathies of our common humanity. Great men never leave their pedestals; they must be great in their joys—great in their sorrows. They dare not think or feel like other men. Their jaded souls, indeed, court the repose of other men, but pride forbids the acknowledgment; and, self-tortured, they continue to defy the laws of their being. Lord Byron would not attend the remains of his mother to the grave, but called for his boxing-gloves. Napoleon would rather cheat, than lose a game at cards. What humiliating sacrifices does such conduct imply? At what immense cost do Heroes play their part, and fret their little hour on the stage? Like meteors, they dazzle for a time; but when history records their transactions, we find that they have been guilty of conduct so paltry, that they extort not merely our contempt, but our pity. For much of this the world is to blame. It blindly worships genius, regardless of the many criminal qualities with which it may be blended, and thus fosters the morbid passion.

It is vulgar and indiscriminating to pay homage to a man, because one element in his character stands out with commanding prominence, while in other respects he may be little better than a monster in human form. There is a deficiency in the moral sense, when we allow ourselves to be captivated by the glitter of a military reputation, when we know that its possessor had for his master-passion an insatiable ambition, which scrupled not to deluge a continent with blood. It is not enough for his fellow-men that another should have been able to wring, as it were, fire from poetry's harp, if, at the same time, he outraged the ties of domestic life and prostituted his genius to the service of immorality. It is not enough for his species that a third was the philosophical annalist of his country, if, from first to last, he laboured to enthral his race in the cold gloom of scepticism, and tried " To quench their immortality,

* "On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History." Six Lectures. By Thomas Carlyle. London: Fraser, 1841.

And shake their trust in God."

And yet we hang on the very lips of these men, and dwell with infinite relish on every incident of their lives. Their names are household words. Nothing connected with them is too minute to be recorded; and the time, it would seem, will never come when we will cease to be interested in their sayings and doings. The world thus holds out a premium to heroism, and far from trising in the guilt which is thus contracted. Noble spirits, who might have adorned the middle and, lower walks of life, have sacrificed themselves in the vain pursuit. They deemed the legitimate path to elevation too long, too circuitous,—the crown of glory and the hoary head they considered incompatible—they would have a royal road to fame, and in that road they leaped, not walked. It matters not that Chattertons and Keates have been immolated there, still the path is crowded with aspirants.

It will not, we trust, be imagined that we wish to set aside such an important principle in human nature, as the love of approbation. Like every thing else in our moral constitution, it has been planted there for noble ends; and it is against its abuse alone that we argue. He who is solicitous for real fame should court the approbation of the thinking few, and not the noisy plaudits of the many. Channing, himself great in his genius as he is heterodox in his theology, has finely classified the different kinds of earthly eminence. The lowest form of it, he conceives, to be military prowess; as here all the obstacles to be contended with are material, and consequently do not require the exercise of intellect in its loftiest capacity. The second form is that of philosophy and poetry, which call into requisition the most elaborate processes of mental power. The third and highest form of eminence is, that of subduing the corrupt tendencies of our nature; in other words, to be a Christian. If this classification could be made patent to the world, an important point in social reformation would be achieved; and we would be spared many exhibitions of the mock-heroic, and of tinselled sentimentalism, which ever and anon obtrude themselves on public notice.

When we mention, that Mr Carlyle does not to a sufficient extent contemplate his heroes through the medium of religion, we give an intimation significant enough as to the philosophy of his work. However much literary men may profess to analyse character by the boasted ethical acuteness which has enlightened the present age, they will find that there is much which still defies their solution. Christianity is the only key which can effectually unlock the anomalies in man; for it was divinely appointed to regenerate him, and his risings and falls, his joys and his sorrows, could we only be capable of perceiving it, always have a relation to his adherence to, or his departure from, the genius of the system which came from God. It is pusillanimous in ecclesiastical historians to limit their province so much to details about Synods, Councils, and Presbyteries. The history of the world is the history of Christianity; and it should always be treated as such. Our literature is on a false basis, so long as it deals merely with the lights which diplomacy and statistics afford. Mere human science can no more illustrate history than botany can explain astronomy. It is time, then, for the friends of religion to bestir themselves, and to keep abreast of the pseudo-intellect which arrogates to itself so much potency.

In point of literary execution, Mr Carlyle's work is, to our taste, decidedly faulty. It is written in the German style, and is marred by mystical phrases and abrupt transitions. Instead of giving us finished portraits, he presents a series of chalk outlines, angular and wiry, as it were, in many instances; but still faithful enough to establish identity. We shall, in the meantime, extract a portion of his paper on Knox; as, from recent circumstances, any thing connected with the great Reformer will, we presume, be interesting to our readers. It will be seen, that although Dr M'Crrie has failed in convincing some as to the character of his hero, he has succeeded in awakening in our author something like a proper appreciation of Knox. The whole Sketch breathes a generous spirit, and is indeed, without exception, the best in the volume:—

" It seems to me hard measure that this Scottish man, now, after three hundred years, should have to plead like a culprit before the world; intrinsically for having been, in such way as it was then possible to be, the bravest of all Scotchmen! Had he been a poor Half-and-half, he could have crouched into the corner, like so many others; Scotland had not been delivered, and Knox had been without blame. He is the one Scotchman to whom, of all others, his countrymen and the world owe a debt. He has to plead that Scotland would forgive him for having been worth to it any million 'unblameable' Scotchmen that need no forgiveness! He bared his breast to the battle; had to row in French galleys, wander forlorn in exile, in clouds and storms; was censured, shot at through his windows; had a right sore fighting life: if this world were his place of recompense, he had made but a bad venture of it. I cannot apologise for Knox. To him it is very indifferent, these two hundred and fifty years or more, what men say of him. But we, having got above all those details of his battle, and living now in clearness on the fruits of his victory, we, for our own sake, ought to look through the rumours and controversies enveloping the man, into the man himself.

" For one thing, I will remark that this post of prophet to his nation was not of his seeking; Knox had lived forty years quietly obscure, before he became conspicuous. He was the son of poor parents, had got a college-education, become a priest, adopted the Reformation, and seemed well content to guide his own steps by the light of it, nowise unduly intruding it on others. He had lived as tutor in gentlemen's families; preaching when any body of persons wished to hear his doctrine: resolute he to walk by the truth, and speak the truth when called to do it; not ambitious of more; not faneying himself capable of more. In this entirely obscure way he had reached the age of forty; was with the small body of reformers who were standing siege in St Andrew's Castle, when one day in their chapel, the preacher, after finishing his exhortation to these fighters in the forlorn-hope, said suddenly, that there ought to be other speakers—that all men who had a priest's heart and gift in them ought now to speak; which gifts and heart one of their own number, John Knox the name of him, had. Had he not? said the preacher, appealing to all the audience: What then is his duty? The people answered affirmatively; it was a criminal forsaking of his post, if such a man held the word that was in him silent. Poor Knox was obliged to stand up; he attempted to reply; he could say no word;—burst into a flood of tears, and ran out. It is worth remembering, that scene. He was in grievous trouble for some days; he felt what a small faculty was his for this great work; he felt what a baptism he was called to be baptized withal:—he 'burst into tears.'

"Our primary characteristic of a hero, that he is sincere, applies emphatically to Knox. It is not denied any where that this, whatever might be his other qualities or faults, is among the truest of men. With a singular instinct he holds to the truth and fact; the truth alone is there for him, the rest a mere shadow and deceptive nonentity. However feeble, forlorn the reality may seem, on that and that only can he take his stand. In the Galleys of the River Loire, whither Knox and the others, after their Castle of St Andrew's was taken, had been sent as galley-slaves,—some officer or priest, one day, presented them an image of the Virgin Mother, requiring that they, the blasphemous heretics, should do it reverence. 'Mother? Mother of God?' said Knox, when the turn came to him: 'This is no Mother of God: this is 'a pented bredd,'—a piece of wood, I tell you, with paint on it! She is fitter for swimming, I think, than for being worshipped, added Knox; and flung the thing into the river. It was not very cheap jesting there; but come of it what might, this thing to Knox was and must continue nothing other than the real truth: it was a pented bredd: worship it he would not. He told his fellow-prisoners, in this darkest time, to be of courage; the cause they had was the true one, and must and would prosper; the whole world could not put it down. Reality is of God's making; it is alone strong. How many pented bredds, pretending to be real, are fitter to swim than to be worshipped! This Knox cannot live but by fact; he clings to reality as the shipwrecked sailor to the cliff. He is an instance to us how a man, by sincerity itself, becomes heroic; it is the grand gift he has. We find in Knox a good honest intellectual talent, no transcendent one;—a narrow, inconsiderable man, as compared with Luther; but in heartfelt instinctive adherence to truth, in sincerity, as we say, he has no superior; nay, one might ask, What equal he has? The heart of him is of the true prophet cast. 'He lies there,' said the Earl of Morton at his grave, 'who never feared the face of man.' He resembles, more than any of the moderns, an old-Hebrew prophet. The same inflexibility, intolerance, rigid, narrow-looking adherence to God's truth, stern rebuke in the name of God to all that forsake truth; an old-Hebrew prophet in the guise of an Edinburgh minister of the sixteenth century. We are to take him for that; not require him to be other.

"Knox's conduct to Queen Mary, the harsh visits he used to make in her own palace, to reprove her there, have been much commented upon. Such cruelty, such coarseness fills us with indignation. On reading the actual narrative of the business, what Knox said, and what Knox meant, I must say one's tragic feeling is rather disappointed. They are not so coarse, these speeches; they seem to me about as fine as the circumstances would permit! Knox was not there to do the courtier; he came on another errand. Whoever, reading these colloquies of his with the Queen, thinks they are vulgar insolences of a plebeian priest to a delicate high lady, mistakes the purport and essence of them altogether. It was unfortunately not possible to be polite with the Queen of Scotland, unless one proved untrue to the nation and cause of Scotland. A man who did not wish to see the land of his birth made a hunting-field for intriguing ambitious guises, and the cause of God trampled under foot of falsehoods, formulas and the devil's cause, had no method of making himself agreeable! 'Better that women weep,' said Morton, 'than that bearded men be forced to weep.' Knox was the constitutional opposition-party in Scotland; the nobles of the country, called by their station to take that post, were not found in it; Knox had to go, or no one. The hapless Queen;—but the still more hapless country, if she were made happy! Mary herself was not without sharpness enough, among her other qualities: 'Who are you,' said she once, 'that presume to school the nobles and sovereign of this realm?'—'Madam, a subject born within the same,' answered he. Reasonably answered! If the 'subject' have truth to speak, it is not the 'subject's' footing that will fail him here.—

"We blame Knox for his intolerance. Well, surely it is good that each of us be as tolerant as possible. Yet, at bottom, after all the talk there is and has been about it, what is tolerance? Tolerance has to tolerate the unessential; and to see well what that is. Tolerance has to be noble, measured, just in its very wrath, when it can tolerate no longer. But, on the whole, we are not altogether here to tolerate! We do not tolerate falsehoods, iniquities, when they fasten on us; we say to them, Thou art false and unjust! We are here to extinguish falsehoods in some wise way! I will not quarrel so much with the way; the doing of the thing is our great concern. In this sense, Knox was, full surely, intolerant.

"A man sent to row in French galleys, and such like, for teaching the truth in his own land, cannot always be in the mildest humour! I am not prepared to say that Knox had a soft temper; nor do I know that he had what we call an ill temper. An ill nature he decidedly had not. Kind honest affections dwelt in the much-enduring, hard-worn, ever-battling man. That he could rebuke queens, and had such weight among those proud turbulent nobles, proud enough whatever else they were; and could maintain to the end a kind of virtual presidency and sovereignty in that wild realm, he who was only 'a subject born within the same'; this of itself will prove to us that he was found, close at hand, to be no mean acrid man; but at heart, a healthful, strong, sagacious man. Such alone can bear rule in that kind. They blame him for pulling down cathedrals, and so forth, as if he were a seditious rioting demagogue; precisely the reverse is seen to be the fact, in regard to cathedrals and the rest of it, if we examine! Knox wanted no pulling down of stone edifices; he wanted leprosy and darkness to be thrown out of the lives of men. Tumult was not his element; it was the tragic feature of his life that he was forced to dwell so much in that. Every such man is the born enemy of disorder; hates to be in it; but what then? Smooth falsehood is not order; it is the general sum total of disorder. Order is truth,—each thing standing on the basis that belongs to it; order and falsehood cannot subsist to-ether."

THE ADAPTATION OF THE BIBLE TO THE PHYSICAL CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

It is impossible to peruse the Sacred Volume, however cursorily, without being struck with its remarkable adaptation to our common nature. It is obviously addressed to human beings possessed of those peculiar qualities which characterise not any given class of men, but the race in general. And hence arises an irrefragable argument in favour of the truth of revelation, as well as in favour of the universality of its design. With what additional force may not the command of our Lord be urged, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," when we know that in that very Gospel there is an intimate correspondence with the constitution of every individual of the human family—a correspondence which will only become the more obvious and palpable as we proceed in our inquiries into the meaning and analogy of Scripture truth.

The whole tenor of the Word of God evidently shows that the individuals to whom it is addressed are possessed not only of a mental, but of a physical nature. It speaks to us of things spiritual and divine, in such language as is exactly suited to the peculiar mechanism of the whole man. The physical structure of our bodies is well known to affect, in no small degree, the aspect of our thoughts and emotions; and more especially in the attainment of knowledge, are we constantly reminded how powerfully we are influenced, in all our modes of thinking and feeling, by the material frame-work which our souls inhabit. We dwell in tenements of clay, and hence it is, that ere an abstract conception can be either formed in, or conveyed to our minds, it must pass through a process of transmutation, which may be styled material; or, in plainer language, before we can form a general idea, the particulars included under it must have been presented to our bodily senses. We are far from denying the doctrine of Locke, that reflection is equally entitled with sensation to be regarded as one of the sources of our knowledge; but still, we imagine there is in this no real inconsistency with the doctrine of Condillac, that all our ideas, even of reflection, have, as their true origin, without which they could not exist, the objects of sense. Long was the saying admitted to be true, which indeed had passed into a proverb, "Nothing can be an object of intellect which has not been previously an object of sense," and it was accounted no small triumph of human genius in Leibnitz to have made the grand addition, "Except the Intellect itself." This, in fact, is declared, by Madame de Stael, to have given origin to a new era in the science of mind. Nevertheless, we are inclined to regard the triumph as rather nominal than real. With the exception, perhaps, of a few transcendental notions connected with space and time, all our ideas, even those which are in themselves most abstract and intangible, are derived from sensible objects. And it is curious to observe how closely we are compelled, in analyzing the most intricate trains of thought, to make use of language drawn entirely from external objects,—a necessity which shows how remarkably we are under the influence of our material frame. Nay, perhaps, could we ascertain, in conducting our investigations into the phenomena of mind, how much we are indebted to the analogical language which we employ for our apparent discoveries, we would perceive still more clearly the all-pervading influence of our physical constitution. We cannot think except in language, and that language uniformly founded on the material objects which every where surround us. To convey spiritual instruction, therefore, successfully, to beings so constituted, must have implied, on the part of the great Author of the Bible, a perfect knowledge of that fundamental law of our being, in virtue of which we are subjected to the unceasing influence of our corporeal system, and of the material world to which it is adapted.

In perusing the Sacred Writings, the intelligent reader cannot fail to be struck with the uniformity with which the subjection of our minds to the influence of matter is kept in view. If they speak to us of the Divine Being, they represent him as possessed of those attributes and qualities which we ourselves comprehend as being in some degree allied to the characteristics of our own nature. Not that God hears, and sees, and handles as men do; but, to describe the Supreme Being, it is necessary to use such language as shall convey to us ideas as nearly as possible consistent with the reality. The language expressive of such conceptions can at best be no other than analogical, just as we ourselves, in treating of phenomena purely mental, are nevertheless compelled to clothe our thoughts in expressions which, in their primary sense, refer to material objects alone. The transition from the primary to the metaphorical meaning of words is, in most cases, simple and easy, and we are in little or no danger of confounding the one with the other. In regard to matters spiritual and divine, however, the transition is accompanied with no little difficulty, and we run considerable hazard of resting contented with notions which are almost wholly material. And yet, though thus bound down by a necessary law of our existence, to sensible objects, the very fact, that revelation entirely proceeds on the supposition that we are thus framed, is to us a striking proof that the hand which penned it is divine.

The physical constitution of man is strictly subordinate to his intellectual and moral nature, in so far as it can be considered at all dependant. There can be little doubt that the mere physiological structure may be gradually developed, and may even progressively decay, with little reference either to the intellect or moral feelings of the man; but in treating of the influence of truth, whether viewed simply in itself, or in the mode of its communication, we must be understood as referring, when we speak of man's physical nature, not to the bones, and muscles, and nerves, and other materials which go to make up his bodily frame, but to the intimate connection which subsists between all that is mental and all that is material, in or about man. In this view of the subject, we allege that the human mind is under an unceasing material influence, of which it cannot, in this world, wholly divest itself. Whenever, in fact, it would speak even of its own acts, which, it might be supposed, would form an exception to the alleged law, it uses, and, in reality, can use no other language than that which is employed in treating of material objects. In early life, whether we refer to the infancy of the individual, or of society, both the intellectual and moral are, in a great measure, subjected to the influence of the physical department of man's nature; and it is not until a considerably advanced period of human existence, that this predominance of the material over the mental is to some extent subdued. And hence it is, that in the earlier stages of society, as in the earlier years of the individual, the imagination is so remarkably strong, and bold figurative language is almost uniformly employed in expressing the thoughts of the writer or speaker. As society advances, the judgment acquires the ascendancy over the other powers of the mind, and a chaster mode of expression begins to be adopted.

On this principle we would explain the remarkable difference which subsists between the style of the Old and that of the New Testament; and not only is this difference apparent in the style of the Jewish writings, but also in the whole spirit of the Jewish economy as compared with the Christian. If the one be essentially a spiritual, the other is essentially a physical system, addressed to that portion of our nature which may be viewed as material. The whole Jewish ritual being designed as strictly symbolical, is addressed to the senses in the first instance, and conveyed instruction to the Jews only through a sensible medium. Such a mode of teaching abstract truths was admirably suited to the local circumstances and peculiarities of the favoured people, and it was no less adapted to that early age of the world. Abstract truths conveyed in plain language would have failed to reach the understandings of the Jews; but by forcible and expressive symbols, they were taught to see what they could not otherwise learn. In addition, however, to the general fact, that in all men, in an earlier and unrefined age, the physical prevails over the other parts of the constitution, there seems to have been some peculiarity in the character of the Jews which called more especially for an economy so grossly material as that which they possessed. And nothing more remarkably proves the existence of such a peculiarity than the frequency with which, in spite of all the remonstrances and judicial inflictions with which they were visited by Jehovah, they fell into the most degrading idolatry. We speak not now of the ultimate, but of one of the proximate, causes of this idolatrous disposition exhibited by the Jews, which we allege to be the obstinacy with which they adhered to the most grossly material conceptions in regard to subjects purely spiritual.

This beautiful adaptation of the Jewish Scriptures to the physical nature of man, was not more consistent with the character of the people for whom, and the circumstances of the age in which, they were written, than with the peculiar subjects which they were intended to elucidate. The main truths emblematically revealed, related to events which belonged to a future and remote age, and to a mode of acting on the part of deity, which required to be seen before it could be understood. Nothing analogous had ever happened in the history of the world, and all that was known upon the subject anterior to the divine revelation, was limited to a few vague undefined thoughts, or rather feelings of the human heart. In conveying information, therefore, in reference to a subject of this nature—so intimately connected with events which were only to be evolved by the free agency of man—so alien from all that had hitherto come within the sphere of human knowledge,—what more effective mode could be adopted than the exhibition to the sense of a system which was material and typical in its nature? And, accordingly, in the varied and interesting observances of the Jewish ritual, were embodied the grand abstractions of the Christian system, which were thus brought to bear with peculiar force upon the minds of the people.

It has been often remarked, that under eastern climes the imagination greatly preponderates over the reasoning powers. Hence the poetry of Oriental nations is richly luxuriant; and even their ordinary language abounds with figures and metaphors of every kind; and in conveying intellectual, but especially moral instructions, fables and allegorical descriptions are in these countries almost invariably employed. To whatever cause this peculiarity of mind may be traced, it affords us an additional reason why the sensible and material are the conspicuous features of the Jewish economy. The abstract conceptions involved in the whole scheme of redemption, were represented as it were in a visible and tangible shape to their bodily senses, and thus what would have required a considerable extent of intellectual power to comprehend—the facts with which the principles were connected having not yet happened—was set forth to the view of the people in a mode at once simple and deeply interesting.

Throughout the whole of God's dealings with his ancient people, we cannot fail to discern that the most scrupulous attention is paid to that law of our nature, by which we are connected with material objects. If he wished, for example, to make any communication to man, he condescended to appear in some material form; and when Jehovah himself did not hold intercourse with earth, often did angelic spirits, in bodily shape, wing their way to our lower world, on errands of mercy from the throne of the Eternal. What mean the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai, if not to awe the minds of the Israelites, by an impressive manifestation to their senses, of the power and majesty of the great lawgiver? Why were they, in all their wanderings, accompanied by the cloud and the fiery pillar, if not to preserve upon their minds a habitual impression of the presence and protection of Jehovah? Visible symbols or signs, in fact, through the whole course of the Jewish history, were the medium of communication between heaven and earth. Even posterior to the advent of our Lord, we find that the same mode of instruction appears to have been adopted: and the condition of the Jews at that time rendered its adoption the more expedient. So rude and uncultivated were they; to such a degree had they lost sight of the spirituality of the moral, and the great end of the ceremonial law, that simple external signs were absolutely necessary to convey any religious ideas to their minds. They, at least the great mass of them, trusted to their sacrifices and external offerings for the pardon of sin, thus substituting the letter for the spirit, the type for the antitype. In these circumstances, our Lord resorted to a mode of instruction, admirably adapted to the exigencies of the case—we refer to the employment of parables. Accustomed as the Jews of those days were to think of religion as consisting merely of external observances, and employed as they were in sedulously tithing mint, and anise, and cummin, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law, parabolic instruction was the simplest and easiest mode of leading their minds away from such a false view of divine truth, to the spiritual perception of it. Their ceremonies were originally intended to point their thoughts to a higher and nobler economy. When our Lord, therefore, appeared upon earth, with the express design of introducing a new dispensation, there was a beautiful propriety in his adopting a mode of teaching, which combined somewhat of the material nature of the old with the spirituality of the new scheme. Under a plain and possible story, finely wrought in all its details, the divine teacher revealed some sublime doctrine or enforced some necessary duty; and many, no doubt, who listened with interest, would remember with advantage the doctrine in the one case, and the duty in the other, long after the narratives themselves were forgotten.

And how forcibly did our Lord often convey instruction to the mind, by the miracles which he wrought—instruction, not merely in reference to the fact that he was sent from God, but also in reference to the benevolent and gracious feelings by which he was actuated. In many instances the cure of some severe bodily distemper was rendered subservient to the inculcation of an important moral lesson upon the subject of the miracle, as well as upon all who witnessed it. The impression, of course, produced upon the mind, by the doctrines taught, was rendered the more deep and lasting by the clear and forcible manifestation of its reality, afforded both in the simple narrative, and in the visible exemplification of it, set forth in the providential arrangements of God. The works of the Redeemer were often performed with the express design of illustrating and enforcing his word. To see at once the propriety of an abstract principle, to feel its importance so vividly, and to perceive the extent and variety of its practical bearings so clearly as to admit of its full operation upon the character, are by no means within the reach of an ordinary mind. But as soon as the principle is exhibited in action, it carries along with it all the force and efficacy of living example, and thus tends more completely than any other mode of instruction which could be adopted to arrest the attention, enlighten the understanding, captivate the heart, and influence the conduct of the most ignorant and illiterate. To this class of people, accordingly, the discourses and miracles of our Lord were peculiarly pleasing; for we are informed by an evangelist, that “the common people heard him gladly." It is a great exertion of human genius, and an exertion which comparatively few are capable of making, to trace out general principles, or abstract truths. Such speculations, therefore, when addressed to the unlettered, may fall with a grand, an imposing sound upon the ear, but are by no means fitted to renovate the heart. This aversion to abstract reasoning is beautifully overcome, by showing rather than relating the point to be illustrated; and hence our Lord usually taught in Parabolic figures, which were often rendered clearer and more impressive by His wonderful works.

THE SONG OF THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

[From "Heures Chretiennes des Eglises Lutheriennes." A Frankfort-sur-le-Mayne. 1740. "Il faut que chaque homme meure."]

'Tis God's decree that all shall die.
The earth is not my home;
My native land is far on high,
Beyond the starry dome.
I ne'er can reach the heavenly sphere,
To gain the heavenly crown,
Until in vile corruption here
I've laid my body down.

O Thou, to whom all worlds pertain,
From earth Thou callest me;
And gladly I, through sickness, pain,
And death, shall come to Thee.
My trust and hope, O heavenly Sire,
On thee I still repose:
Do thou, through Christ, when I expire,
Thy bliss to me disclose.

How vast the love of Christ, who came
To die for men below,
And underwent the cross's shame,
That I may 'scape from woe!
His death's to me the source of life;
And where he's now on high,
Afair from death, and sin, and strife,
A home obtain shall I.

My heart's already there: I long
To quit my fleshly load—
To leave these scenes of grief and wrong,
And reach the bless'd abode.
There pleasure reigns, and jubilee;
And mighty quires proclaim,
"Jehovah's holy—holy He,
And holy, too, his name."

'Tis there that all the ancient sires,
Apostles, saints, and seers,
Exult in songs which love inspires,
And God in favour hears.
There's nought but triumph, nought but song;
With plaudits ring the skies.
To Christ, they cry, our joys belong;
To Christ our anthems rise.

O glorious Zion, thou who far
In heav'n hast rear'd thy walls,
All bliss is thine; nor want, nor war,
Nor sickness, thee befalls.
Thrice happy they, who now thy day
Of bliss and glory see.
Oh, when shall dawn the blissful ray
That lights my feet to Thee!

I see it come—it now is nigh:
The moment hastes apace.
When Jesus in the lofty sky
"Shall give my soul a place."

And now shall I the crown obtain,
Which waits his folk on high.
Receive me, Lord; now let me reign
With thee in th' azure sky.

Farewell to kin and friends; farewell
To all whom here I love:
I now depart, and go to dwell
With God and saints above.
And now, my kin, my friends, be true
To God and duty here,
That, when to earth ye bid adieu,
In heav'n ye may appear.

ON THE PERFECTIONS OF GOD, DISPLAYED IN THE FIRMAMENT.

BY THE REV. JOHN THOMSON,

Minister of Yester, East-Lothian.

[Being the Conclusion of a Course of Twenty-four Lectures on Astronomy, delivered in that Parish in 1840 and 1841.]

HAVING thus called your attention to the Law of Gravitation, that law by which a stone falls to the earth, and by which also the moon and planets are retained in their respective orbits; having seen that

"That self-same law which moulds a tear,
And bids it trickle from its source;
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
And guides the planets in their course;"—

having also endeavoured to explain the cause of the Tides in the Ocean; I must now bring to a conclusion the Course of Lectures which I have given you on the interesting science of Astronomy. And I do so, with a mingled feeling of pleasure and regret;—pleasure, in looking back on the delightful meetings which we have had in this place, and on the noble field of lofty contemplation through which it has been my privilege to lead you;—but also regret, in the thought that these meetings must now be brought to a close. The pleasure which I have felt, during the course of these Lectures, in meeting with such a crowded and attentive audience,—a pleasure, inferior only to that which I feel in proclaiming to you the glad tidings of salvation on the Sabbath,—must now cease. At such a moment, I feel as if I had been privileged to conduct you to the threshold of a spacious and magnificent temple constructed of gold, and silver, and precious stones, wrought by the most exquisite art, and from whose sacred courts issued sounds of sweetest melody, and the fragrance of "Araby the Blest;"—but while we enter to behold the gorgeous furniture within, and gaze with wonder on the diamonds, and rubies, and sapphires, which blaze in glorious radiance around us, suddenly a dark curtain descends to hide from our view the splendid garniture of the temple, on which we looked with admiring interest and silent awe. The material universe is indeed a magnificent temple, an house not made with hands, but called into existence by a word, by the powerful word of Him, who in the beginning created the heavens and the earth, and who still upholdeth all things by the same word of his power. We have merely reached the threshold of that glorious temple; we have seen only a part of God's works:—far though we have travelled in thought beyond this Solar System, to distant suns and systems, far as the imagination can reach, yet we have obtained but a faint glimpse of the extent and beauty of the boundless universe. It is not in this world, not in this imperfect and limited state of being, that we can hope to obtain so extensive a view of God's works as our curiosity prompts us to seek. This can only be expected in a new and nobler state of being. Here we know in part; but there we shall know even as we are known. How important then that we should be prepared for that holy and happy world, where our view will be widened, and our mental capacities increased, and where the just shall throughout eternity advance in knowledge, and rise in endless progression to higher and yet higher degrees of felicity and glory. And if the material world be so full of riches and fraught with glory, how infinitely more rich and glorious must the moral world be! As the body is inferior to the soul, as matter is inferior to mind, as this whole earth, yea, the whole material universe, is less valuable in the sight of God, than one immortal soul; then surely, if the combinations of insensate matter be so interesting to us, the combinations of immortal mind must be tenfold more interesting; if God's works be so great, then how great and glorious must God himself be, who is robed with infinite perfection, and clothed with light as with a garment!

What an elevated view of God's majesty, and wisdom, and goodness, is presented to us in the subjects which successively have come under our consideration. When we look even to this lower world which we inhabit, an immense globe eight thousand miles in diameter, attracted by the sun from which it receives light and heat, moving through space at the rate of nineteen miles in a moment of time, and furnishing subsistence to the eight hundred millions of human beings who inhabit its surface; we cannot but perceive that He who "hangeeth the earth upon nothing," and guides it with unerring precision in its appointed course, is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working, a constant and kind Benefactor to the unthankful and the evil. But when we farther reflect that there are other worlds, revolving like ours, around the sun, bearing a close resemblance to the earth, diversified with hill and dale, with land and sea, surrounded with an atmosphere, and supplied with clouds, we can scarcely resist the conclusion, that these worlds, like ours, are also inhabited by beings capable, as we are, of knowing and adoring their Creator, of admiring his works, and celebrating his praise in loftier strains than we, guilty and polluted, can reach. We find, in this world, every blade of grass, every leaf, every drop of water, teeming with life. The microscope shows us in a drop of water, multitudes of animalcules, formed for existence and happiness. Thus, when we go down in the scale of creation, we find all things full of life; and is it not then reasonable to suppose, that, when we go up in the scale of creation, we should also find all things full of life? If the drop of water, seen by the microscope, contains life, organised existence; is it not at least highly probable, that the planets seen by the telescope, also contain living beings? There is a striking passage in the forty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, which seems to intimate that there is a close connection between the creation of a world and the creation of intelligent beings to inhabit it:—"Thus saith the Lord that created the heavens, God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited; I am the Lord, and there is none else."

And yet even the sun, which is more than a million of times larger than the earth, and the planets which revolve around it, and which are guided in their vast and varied courses by Almighty power and unerring Wisdom,—even all these form but a small portion of the universe. The whole solar system, which occupies a space nearly four thousand millions of miles in breadth, would dwindle down to a small point, if seen from the nearest of the fixed stars; and our earth would from thence be invisible. It has been ascertained too, that our sun is in motion, like many of the "fixed stars," carrying the planets along with him, by his attractive power, over the wide fields of space. And hence it has been supposed, that there is some vast central body, around which the innumerable fixed stars or suns, with all their attending planets, revolve;—a vast central body, which may be the peculiar residence of Deity, the metropolis of creation, the centre of the universe. Of this at least we are sure, though Astronomy never could have revealed it, that there is a heaven, a place of glorious light and endless joy, where God has fixed his throne, and into which his people shall enter, when their probation on earth is finished. The Bible has revealed to us this incorruptible inheritance, this everlasting kingdom which shall never be moved. And a promise has been given in that book to the sinful sons of men, that if they believe in the Son of God, they shall enter beyond the grave into that rest which was purchased by the Saviour's atoning blood. Christ is the way to the Father, and the truth, and the life. Seeing then that a promise has been left us of entering into God's rest, let us beware lest any of us should even seem to come short of it. Let us especially beware of the evil heart of unbelief. And while we delight in the study of science, let us delight more in the study of Scripture, which alone is able to make us wise unto salvation.

 BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

 MAJOR-GENERAL ANDREW BURN, OF THE ROYAL MARINES.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART I.

THIS excellent and truly Christian officer was born at Dundee, in Forfarshire, on the 8th September 1742. His parents were very godly persons, and as soon as infant reason began to dawn, they endeavoured to instruct their family in a knowledge of divine truth; combining, along with their exertions, the influence of ardent and persevering prayers, and of a consistently pious example. The good seed thus sown in childhood sprung up after many days. The fruits of his early education were not apparent for some time; but at length, in advanced life, he was filled with the fruits of righteousness, to the praise and the glory of God.

When nearly three years old, he and his elder brother were committed to the care of their grandfather, a faithful minister of the Church of Scotland. Under his roof at West Anstruther, the utmost attention was paid to their education, and they were carefully trained up in an intimate knowledge of Scripture. At the age of fourteen, after having pursued his studies at the grammar school of the place, Andrew's father proposed to him that he should choose a profession; at the same time, strongly recommending the law. The young man readily yielded to the suggestion of his parent, and accordingly he was put in the office of a lawyer with whom his father was acquainted. On his entering upon this line of life, the old man gave his son many useful admonitions; accompanying them with earnest prayer to the Almighty in his behalf. For a year, he paid close and unwearied attention to his business; and so well was he succeeding, that he began to entertain golden dreams of future prosperity and wealth. This, indeed, was the highest object of his ambition; "totally ignorant," as he afterwards confessed, "that 'the blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow with it.'"

It was not, however, the will of Providence that young Burn should continue in the profession on which he had been persuaded to enter. Accordingly, an event unexpectedly occurred which turned his thoughts into a very different channel. His father having about this time been visited with some heavy losses, particularly by the foundering of a vessel which was not insured, became, in consequence, reduced in circumstances, and found it necessary to take a situation, as purser, on board a sloop of war. From that period the son was seized with an invincible desire to follow in the footsteps of his father. His mind became quite unsettled, and the result was that he quitted his employment, and, with the consent of his father, set himself to the study of mathematics and navigation, with the view of preparing himself for a naval life. After spending a few months in the acquisition of these necessary branches of information, the ardent, enterprising youth, embarked, in the year 1758, on board the vessel in which his father sailed.

The young man had just entered his seventeenth year when he first engaged in the adventurous life of a sailor; and, exposed as he was to all the temptations of a man-of-war, it was providential that he was placed immediately under the eye of a kind and pious parent. Through his father's influence, he was employed in the captain's cabin, assisting his clerk in keeping the ship's books and his father's accounts. His companions, while on board this vessel, were, unhappily, of the worst description; but, under the salutary guardianship of parental care, he was restrained from many wicked practices into which he would otherwise have fallen. A few days after he embarked, the ship sailed from Leith for the North Sea, where it was stationed during the winter, for the protection of the cod-fishery on the Dogger-bank. Here he was exposed to incessant sickness and very violent storms, which often threatened shipwreck. But, to his great relief, in the beginning of the following January (1759), the vessel was ordered to the Nore, and having remained there about two months, they sailed on a cruise toward the north; but soon meeting with heavy gales of wind, were driven over to the coast of Holland, where they remained wind-bound for three weeks. The damage which the ship suffered occasioned their return to Portsmouth, whence, after being repaired and fitted for foreign service, they sailed for the West Indies. While cruising round Jamaica, in consequence of his father's health suffering severely from the climate, and being obliged to resign his situation as purser and return to England, young Burn also procured his discharge from the service, and got a place at Kingston, as clerk in the office of the deputy-secretary of the island.

The circumstances in which he was now placed were by no means favourable to his improvement in spiritual knowledge and feeling. No longer privileged with a father's counsels, example, and prayers, his religious impressions gradually became enfeebled; and although the frequent deaths which happened among his associates in that unhealthy climate occasionally roused him to reflection, his better feelings were too often transient and temporary. Alarmed by the prevalence of an epidemical fever in Kingston, he left his situation, and became a book-keeper on a plantation in the country. Here he remained for nine or ten months, in the course of which he was not unfrequently exposed to danger, by the general insurrection which took place among the negroes all over the island. Upheld by a kind Providence, he was kept in safety; but notwithstanding the long-suffering patience of God towards him, he plunged into many vices, and rushed rapidly, with the wicked multitude around him, along the broad road that leadeth to destruction.

While thus familiarizing himself with sin, in all its varied and most degrading forms, he was seized with a sudden and irresistible impulse to leave the island. In vain did his employer attempt to detain him, by the offer of a higher and more lucrative employment. Neither arguments nor entreaties would avail. He had formed his resolution, and was determined to abide by it. On the 24th of August 1760, accordingly, he embarked as a supernumerary on board of a ship bound for England. Shortly after the vessel had sailed, he was reduced so low, by an attack of fever, that his life was despaired of; but it pleased the Almighty to interpose in his behalf, and he was restored to health. The voyage was a stormy one, and the ship being leaky, the passengers were in imminent danger of their lives; but Mr Burn and a few others took advantage of a Virginia trader, bound for Whitehaven, which came to their rescue, and having secured a passage in her, they reached England in safety. The Edinburgh, in which he had left Jamaica, after encountering many hardships, actually reached Plymouth a fortnight before the other vessel entered Whitehaven.

No sooner had Mr Burn landed on the shores of England, and acquainted his friends by letter with his arrival, than his father wrote him, sharply reproving him for leaving his situation in Jamaica. This communication, which contained a small remittance of money for the supply of his immediate wants, conveyed, besides, the melancholy intelligence of the death of his venerable grandfather, under whose roof he had been reared. The tidings affected the young man deeply, but the impression soon wore off, and he was as thoughtless as ever. In search of a situation, he travelled from Whitehaven to London; and, on his arrival in the metropolis, he waited on one of his fellow-passengers, a man of property in Jamaica, who had promised to take him back with him as a clerk if he was unsuccessful in finding employment at home. His friend, however, received him with great coolness, and stating that he had made up his mind to remain in England, expressed regret that he could do nothing for him. Mr Burn was cut to the heart by the disappointment of his hopes, and he resolved as a last resource to return to Jamaica in the first vessel he could find. Before putting this design into execution, he waited upon his father's agent at Tower-hill, and to his astonishment, he was informed that an appointment had been procured for him as purser in the Sea-Horse man-of-war. The office had been intended for his father, but on his declining it, Sir Harry Erskine had succeeded in getting the name of the son substituted in the appointment for that of the father. Overjoyed at the announcement, Mr Burn set off to pay his respects to his generous benefactor. But alas! the cup of promised enjoyment was speedily dashed from his lips. Sir Harry Erskine assured him, that the situation had been obtained, but as no intelligence could be got concerning him, and as the ship was ready to sail, the Admiralty had found it necessary to bestow the place upon another. Thus frustrated in his hopes of procuring a situation in London, he applied to his kind patron Sir Harry Erskine, who promised to procure for him, if possible, a commission in the marines, but at the same time, observed that he had very little prospect of succeeding.

From Sir Harry Erskine's, Mr Burn went, disappointed and chagrined, to call on Mrs Hay, one of his father's friends; and although he had never seen the lady before, she took a lively interest in the young man, invited him to remain in her house, and treated him like a son. In a few days she advised him to go to her husband on board the Royal George, and as he was secretary to Sir Edward Hawke, he would probably be able to provide for him in some way or another, and in the meantime would employ him as a clerk in his office. After some difficulty in finding out the ship, he was received on board the Royal George, and entered on the ship's books by his kind friend Mr Hay, who showed him every attention in his power. He had scarcely been two months on board this vessel when he was informed by the commanding officer, that Sir Harry Erskine had obtained for him a commission in the marines. Having been discharged from the Royal George accordingly, he proceeded to London, and on the 6th of June 1761, he joined head-quarters at Chatham.

Thus, after passing through many changes, Mr Burn was now, in the good Providence of God, placed in a situation which raised him far above the reach of want, and which possessed many advantages. He had much spare time on hand, which he sought to spend usefully. His early habits of reflection and seriousness now returned. He laid down a regular plan for the performance of religious duties, to which he strictly adhered. As he had been brought up in the communion of the Church of Scotland, he constantly attended divine service in a Presbyterian meeting-house at Rochester. As to all outward forms, he was faithful and strictly conscientious in the observance of them; but by his own confession he was still to a great extent under the influence of the world. He spent much time in the company of his brother officers, joining with them in cards, and other useless and dangerous amusements, and although he often resolved to occupy his time more profitably, the love of gaming became every day stronger.

On this subject he thus expresses himself in his published Autobiography:—

"The more I resolved, the stronger grew the sin. A multitude of broken vows heaped guilt upon guilt, and brought an accumulated load of sorrow to my mind. So much so, that on one Lord's day, when I was to receive the sacrament, before I approached that sacred ordinance, my conscience so keenly accused me on account of this beloved idol, that I hardly knew what to do with myself. I tried to pacify it by a renewal of all my resolutions, with many additions and amendments. I parleyed and reasoned the matter over for hours, trying, if possible, to come to some terms of accommodation, but still the obstinate monitor within cried out—'There's an Achan in the camp: approach the table of the Lord if you dare.' Scared at the threat, and yet unwilling to part with my darling lust, I became like one possessed. Restless and uneasy, I flew out of the house to vent my misery with more freedom in the fields, under the wide canopy of heaven. Here I was led to meditate on the happiness of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked in a future state. The importance of eternity, falling with a ponderous weight upon my soul, raised such a vehement indignation against 'the accursed thing' within, that, crying to God for help, I kneeled down under a hedge, and taking Heaven and Earth to witness, wrote on a piece of paper with my pencil a solemn vow that I never would play at cards, on any pretence whatsoever, so long as I lived. No sooner had I put my name to this solemn vow, than I felt myself another creature. Sorrow took wing and flew away, and a delightful peace succeeded. The intolerable burden being removed from my mind, I approached the sacred table of the Lord with an unusual degree of pleasure and delight. This was not my only idol. I had many others to contend with. But while I was endeavouring to heal my wounded soul in one place, ere I was aware sin, broke out in another."

During his stay at Chatham, Lieut. Burn became acquainted with some pious people, in whose company he acquired a more intimate acquaintance with divine things, and was strengthened and encouraged in the good ways of the Lord. On the restoration of peace in the beginning of 1763, he was discharged on half-pay, and he lost no time in visiting his parents, whom he had not seen for several years. He set off accordingly for Scotland, and having spent a few months under his father's roof, he returned to London with the view of endeavouring to get into full-pay, and if that should fail, to try to procure a place in some public office, or merchant's counting-house. On reaching the metropolis, he took up his residence in the house of his kind friend Mr Hay, and after remaining nearly a year with no prospect of finding employment, a proposal was made to him by Mr and Mrs Hay, to accompany their son to France. Without consulting his parents, accordingly, he set out with his young charge for the Continent. A residence in France was not likely to advance his spiritual interests. He felt himself irresistibly seduced into the vortex of gaiety and idle frivolity, and his religious impressions were almost entirely effaced. During the first year he was so constantly employed in the study of the language, and the acquisition of some useful branches of knowledge, that he was less exposed to temptation than afterwards. But even then, a spiritual coldness and insensibility crept over him, which paved the way for the more serious declension which afterwards ensued. Through the influence of some false impression upon her mind,

Mrs Hay withdrew her son from under his charge and carried him to England; leaving Lieut. Burn in a strange country, far from home, with nothing more than his half-pay to subsist on. Mr Hay, notwithstanding the unhappy disagreement which had taken place, sent him a remittance of money to bring him home; but intoxicated with the ensnaring pleasures with which he was surrounded, he resolved to spend the remainder of his days in France. He now gave himself up to cards, the billiard table, and the theatre. When at any time he engaged in reading, the works of the French sceptics were his favourite authors. With the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, and D'Alembert, he became quite familiar, and gradually he began to doubt the authenticity of the Scriptures, the immortality of the soul, and even the existence of a God. Harassed with tormenting doubts, he was reduced to a most unhappy and feverish state of mind. His feelings are thus described in his journal for the last day of December 1768:—

“The sun is just set, and ere it again tinges the top of yonder mountains with its cheering rays, the past year (short portion of human life!) will no more be reckoned among the number of those which the Supreme Being has destined to measure the duration of our abode in this world. I cannot then better employ the little that remains of it, than in seriously reflecting upon the end of my existence, which approaches with such constant rapidity. A thousand doubts arise, one after another, in my soul, and make me tremble; ignorant of what I now am, and still more so as to what I shall be. If death is to destroy in me this part which thinks, which reasons, and with so much ardour breathes after an assurance of its existence in a future state, what a despicable being do I appear in my own eyes. Beyond all expression miserable! If my soul is nothing more than an organ of my body more delicately wound up, whose secret and wonderful movements lie beyond the reach of human conception, but which, notwithstanding, will one day moulder into dust with the rest, and return to its primitive nothing—how much reason have I to curse the day in which I was born! And what a horrid idea must I entertain of Him who has only endued me with the faculty of thinking, that I may better conceive his Almighty power thus exerted to make me wretched? O Death, if thy dominion extends to this dreadful length, I have too much reason to tremble at thy approach. What! lose all at once my flattering hopes of immortality, fall in one moment from that state of perfection where I fondly placed myself after this life, into all the horrors of non-existence? Dreadful thought.”

Amid these strange conflicting doubts, Lieut. Burn still continued to keep up a form of religion—praying twice a-day, and every morning reading a chapter in the Bible. The substance, however, was to all appearance gone, though the shadow remained. He plunged deeper and deeper into sin, until at length, encompassed with difficulties on every side, and reduced to a state of pecuniary embarrassment, he began, like the prodigal, to bethink himself. He was anxious to return to his native land, but the state of his worldly affairs was such as to forbid his entertaining such an idea. He retired from company, became reserved and melancholy, and his health began to be impaired. To extricate himself from debt, he resorted to gaming; but, as might have been anticipated, matters only became worse, instead of better. He now began to indulge the hope that, by engaging in literature, he might at once realize a fortune, and raise himself to distinction. For a year and a-half, accordingly, he devoted himself to laborious study. Having acquired a thorough knowledge of the French language, he wrote several short papers for the periodical press, which were favourably received. He now devoted himself to the preparation of a tragedy, by which he wrapped himself up in the golden dream of mounting at once to the summit of “Fame's proud temple.” In this, however, he was miserably disappointed. His tragedy, on being sent to a stage-manager in Paris, was politely declined. He was now reduced to the lowest possible distress. “My body pained and emaciated,” to use his own language, “my soul bowed down under the weight of the most pungent sorrow—with the dismal prospect before me of perishing at last in a strange land, far from every one that was near or dear to me.”

How often has it been realized, in the experience of the Christian, that “man's extremity is God's opportunity.” It was remarkably so in the present instance. Reduced to a state of almost complete destitution, He who has the hearts of all men in his hands, raised up for Lieut. Burn a kind friend, who generously sent him money, which, along with a remittance from his father, was sufficient to pay all his debts, and defray his travelling expenses to England. Rejoicing in his emancipation from a land which, amid all its fascinations, he had viewed for some time past as a land of bondage, he bade adieu to the shores of France without a sigh; and, in the month of May 1770, he set foot in England once more, after an absence of six years. So different were his views and feelings from what they had formerly been, that his acquaintances, particularly those at Chatham, were struck with the change. On his arrival in Scotland, however, the alteration in his whole deportment excited still greater surprise than even in England. His pious parents mourned over him as fallen and degenerate. “France has been your ruin,” were words which often escaped from their lips: and although he felt conscious that there was too much truth in the remark, he was unwilling to renounce the sceptical opinions which he had imbibed. Many an admonition was tendered to him by his pious relatives, and many an urgent letter reached him from Christian acquaintances in England; but while his reason was convinced that all was not right with him, pride forbade him to yield.

After he had been only a few months in Scotland, Lieut. Burn was unexpectedly ordered upon actual service. He set off accordingly to London, and while there the melancholy intelligence reached him of the death of his only and much loved brother. This sad event produced a powerful impression upon his mind, and tended more than any thing to break asunder, by the Divine blessing, the chain of ignorance and scepticism in which, for several years, he had been bound. While in a disconsolate frame on account of the severe loss he had sustained, he had a very remarkable dream, which, in the excited state of his feelings, tended still farther to arouse him to an anxiety about his awful condition as a backslider. He now sought to return unto the Shepherd and Bishop of his soul. The returning penitent was welcomed by a gracious and merciful heavenly Father, and from that time he strove to act as a consistent follower of the Lord Jesus. In the kind providence of God, he was stationed at Chatham, where he enjoyed, as formerly, many precious spiritual privileges, and the society of many warm-hearted Christians. He was now united to one whom he had long loved, and whose pious and judicious counsels were of great advantage to him. Thus comfortably settled in life, he felt quite contented and happy. But this is not, perhaps, in every case the state most fitted to promote the progress of the Christian. Lieut. Burn was insensibly drawn away by the influence of an ensnaring world, and his soul began to cleave to the dust. He was somewhat in the situation of Demas, who loved the present evil world, and therefore forsook the cause of the Redeemer. In this situation, the Almighty thought fit to visit his backslidings with a rod, and by sending a severe bodily trouble, to remind him that this was not his rest, for it is polluted. By this disease, he was brought to the very gates of death; but the effect upon his soul was of the most beneficial description, and no sooner was he restored to health, than the consequences were apparent in the increased devoutness of his heart and the holy tenderness of his walk. He delighted in communion with God, and in the company and fellowship of God's people. The Bible was his constant companion, and he rejoiced when it was said unto him, "Go ye up into the house of the Lord."

SONG OF PRAISE.

[Supposed to express the feelings of a Lady, who, by a skilful operation, was at last enabled to know the blessing of sight.]

BY A. PARK,

Author of "Blindness, or the Second Sense Restored and Lost," &c.

ALMIGHTY God! thy holy light
 Illumes my marvelling eyes—
 A world of bliss, in radiance bright,
 Rolls 'neath thy star-strewn skies.
 In vain I breathe at Nature's shrine,
 The new-born blessings that are mine!
 When darkness, like a mantle, hung
 Around my orbless soul,
 I deem'd not such enchantments flung
 Their charms from pole to pole:
 Nature!—I've heard thy praises sung;
 But now thou speak'st with matchless tongue!

My soul was all entomb'd in night,
 Though sunshine smil'd around,
 And threw its thin ethereal light,
 Like gold-veil, o'er the ground!
 I could not see the heavenly sight,
 Though all rejoiced in summer night!

But now I roll mine eyes on high;
 O bliss adored by me!
 I mark the splendour of the sky—
 The grandeur of the sea—
 The valleys sweet, where flowrets vie—
 The hills, where snow-like vapours lie!

I see the soaring birds of love,
 Which charm'd my listening ear,
 Dart joyfully far, far above
 In their cerulean sphere;
 Or in the groves, or in the bowers,
 Singing sweet anthems to the flowers!

Sweet moon, bright stars, and glorious sun
 On whom no spot appears!
 Thou dazling, though unwearying one,
 Lord of six thousand years!
 Great emblem of the Deity,
 Whose throne is in the seventh sky!

O earth, and sea, and heaven, and man,
 Ye are most wondrous things!
 Who can the meanest creature scan
 Of thine, great King of kings?
 What wisdom change the unerring plan,
 Which perfect with the world began?

THE LAMB OF GOD:
A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON,
Minister of Dunnichen, Forfarshire.

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."—JOHN i. 29.

THE long night of the Church's desolation, is drawing near a close; and the faithful in Judea, are waiting, with intense anxiety, for the tokens of an opening day. The Church may be regarded as fulfilling the words of the prophetic description, as longing for the dawn, and sending frequent messengers to the guards stationed on her highest battlements, with the eager inquiry,—“Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?” And often had the messenger returned sorrowing with the answer, “The morning cometh, and also the night; if ye will inquire, inquire ye; return, come.” But now, after ages of darkness, lo, a faint streak of light is seen tinging the distant horizon, and the morning star is announced, which betokened the speedy appearance of “the Sun of Righteousness.”

Every prophecy had now been fulfilled,—every promise had been verified,—every preparation had been completed; and now, that every thing was ripe and ready for Shiloh's coming, the herald of Messiah appeared, about to fulfil the lofty predictions that were uttered at his birth—“And thou, child, shalt be called the Prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways; to give knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace.”

In the wilderness of Judea, did John commence his ministry;—and there was his voice heard in tones as rude, and with a message as stern, as the scenery by which he was surrounded; “convincing of sin,”—denouncing wrath, and calling upon “men every where to repent.”

The message which the Baptist bore, was, first of all, a message of terror and of awakening,—for, in preaching repentance, he “concluded all men under sin;” but amid the sterner notes of judgment, which peculiarly characterized his preaching, was blended the soft music of mercy and of hope, for while he published unto men their guilt and their peril, he was also privileged to publish the near approach of a Deliverer, inasmuch as the “kingdom of God was nigh at hand.”

His message, indeed, was as it were, the connecting link, that united the law and the Gospel together, and, therefore, did it partake somewhat of the elements of both; for while he proclaimed the law with its terrors, he also pointed forward to the Gospel with its salvation; and thereby was it that he fulfilled the high duties of his office,—for the convictions of sin, the apprehensions of wrath, and the terrors of condemnation, which his preaching awakened in the minds of the people, by proving the necessity of a Saviour, prepared their mind for closing with the offers, for grasping the promises, and for clinging to the Cross of that “Lamb of God, who was to take away the sins of the world.”

Thus, then, did the Baptist point forward uniformly to one Mightier and Holier than himself, who was about to appear for the redemption of his people; thus did he preach not himself, but his Muster; not works, but grace; urging repentance, in order that men might be prepared for appreciating this grace: and, therefore, as soon as our blessed Redeemer had, after his baptism, triumphed over Satan, and “returned, in the power of the Spirit,” to the banks of the Jordan, and when now commencing his public ministry, to him the Baptist pointed as the Deliverer so long expected; to him the Baptist testified, as the Messiah promised to the fathers,—the substance of all the types and shadows of the Old Testament economy; the end of all the sacrifices,—himself indeed the great—the all-sufficient sacrifice—“the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.”

In proceeding to the further illustration of these words, permit me, in humble dependence upon the teaching of the blessed Spirit, to direct your attention to three separate topics; 1st, To the character in which our Saviour is represented in this testimony of John; 2d, To the design wherefore our Saviour was manifested in that character, and 3d, To the invitation to behold him in that character.—And may the Lord grant that you, yea, every one of you, for himself, may, by the eye of Faith, be enabled to behold this Lamb of God, as taking away your sins; so that, from the heart, you may all be able to say—thou art my Lord, thou art my God, thou art my Saviour, “thou art all my salvation, thou art all my desire!”

I. Permit me, then, as was proposed, to direct your attention, in the first place, to the character in which our blessed Saviour is represented in this testimony of John, “the Lamb of God.”—The words of our text are addressed to men as lying under sentence of condemnation. Man’s liability to condemnation, however, is all of himself. Sin, of which condemnation is a necessary result (when an all-seeing and a holy God is the Judge), was the voluntary act of man, and therefore does the Almighty remonstrate with the perversity of his creature, in terms of tender admonition—“O Israel,” he says, “thou hast destroyed thyself.” Thus, then, is man’s liability to condemnation all of himself; deliverance, again, is all of God, flowing forth from his grace and his free favour; listen to his own words, “O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help: I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues! Oh grave, I will be thy destruction!”

For the purpose of effecting this deliverance, God devised a scheme of substitution, saying, by the mouth of his inspired prophet, “Thou speakest in vision to thy Holy One, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty.” This coming mighty one was shadowed forth to men by sacrificial rites; and through these emblems of redemption, the Old Testament worthies, looking across the altar of sacrifice, beheld, in the vista of years before them, “the day of grace afar off;” and having “obtained a good report, they were justified by faith.” What the sacrificial rites prefigured, was at last revealed; and when the mighty one “came travelling in the greatness of his strength,” to save us, God himself, even the Father, who provided the Deliverer for men, commanded his servant to point out the Saviour, to the sinner, by publishing the announcement of our text—“Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world.” And how meet was such a title! how descriptive alike of the Redeemer’s character and office! As to the character, this title indicated first, the innocency of that Saviour, who was “like a lamb, without blemish, and without spot,” “manifested to take away our sins, although in him was no sin.” How strikingly, too, does it reveal the meekness, the lamb-like meekness of him, “who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; who, when he suffered, threatened not, but committed himself to him, that judgeth righteously;” and how descriptive, moreover, is the title, of that humble patience which characterised him, of whom the prophet testifies, that “he was oppressed, and he was afflicted; yet he opened not his mouth: that he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.”

In every particular, indeed, did the metaphor illustrate the character of Him, “who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners.” But still more strikingly does the metaphor apply to his official character as Mediator, as appearing to fulfil all the sacrifices of the Old Testament dispensation, and “to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself.” What was the daily atonement that was made for the sins of God’s people of old? The blood of a lamb was shed upon the altar of burnt-offering, day after day; “not that the blood of bulls, or of goats, or of lambs, could take away sin,” or possessed any efficacy for its expiation; but that the sprinkled blood had a direct reference to the “blood of sprinkling,” to the sacrifice of that spiritual Lamb, who was to “justify many, in that he bare their iniquities.” And what, moreover, was the victim that was offered at that great annual sacrifice, which commemorated that night of mingled terror and triumph, when Egypt’s first-born was slain, and when Jehovah redeemed his people from the “house of bondage?” “and Moses,” saith the inspired record, “called for all the elders of Israel, and said unto them, draw out, and take you a lamb, according to your families, and kill the passover. And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel and the two side-posts with the blood that is in the basin; and none of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning;—for the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the side-posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you."

The people of Israel, wisely and willingly, obeyed the injunction, thus mercifully issued,—the lamb was slain, the blood was sprinkled, the people of God reposed in safety, under the shadow of the everlasting wings, while the morning's sun beheld Jehovah triumphing, Egypt desolate, and Israel free. And, therefore, as long as Israel continued to be a nation, the annual celebration of the paschal sacrifice was gratefully preserved and cherished, in order to commemorate their deliverance from captivity, and to serve as a memorial of the mercy of God, in sparing their first-born, through the efficacy of the sprinkling of blood, when the destroying angel passed through to smite the Egyptians. Now this paschal sacrifice and the deliverance which it commemorated, pointed forward to a redemption still more glorious, to a sacrifice still more precious, even to "Christ our passover, who has been sacrificed for us," and to the forgiveness of sins through his blood.

The Son of God came as a sacrifice—a sacrifice for sin—a sacrifice for the sins of men; and therefore, when "he that was mighty," stooped so low as to become a sojourner in this vale of tears, he qualified himself for the "work which the Father had given him to do." Coming as a substitute for men, "it behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren:" therefore, "took he not upon him the nature of angels; but he took upon him the seed of Abraham;" "for, inasmuch as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." He took unto him a human body and a human soul, in order that, in that human nature, he might at once suffer for men as a sacrifice, and that also he might triumph over their enemies as their head; in order that, on the one hand, that human nature which had sinned should be made to suffer; and, in order that, on the other, that human nature which had been held in bondage by Satan, sin, and death, might itself burst asunder the fetters wherewith the enemy had bound it. He took upon him flesh, in order that that flesh might be broken; he took to him blood, in order that that blood might be shed, that thus he might be fitted for becoming a sacrifice for his elected people. Thus, then, was he a Lamb prepared for a sacrifice; but who was it that provided this Lamb, this pure, this perfect victim? The words of our text give the answer, he is the "Lamb of God;" it is "the grace of God, that bringeth salvation."

The Saviour was the Lamb of God, because he was his Son; of the same Divine nature, professing the same power, enjoying the same glory, for, "from everlasting was the Son with the Father;" "from the beginning," saith he, "was I by him, as one brought up with him; and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him." He was the Lamb of God, because begotten of him, by a miraculous conception,—"The Holy Ghost," saith the angel, that announced the glad tidings to the Virgin, "shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore, also that Holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God." He was the Lamb of God, because, in that holy person, even in Christ Jesus, the nature of God was united to the nature of a pure man; for this was necessary, in order to uphold him under the load of guilt which he had to bear, under the inflictions of wrath wherewith he was to be visited; under the temptations whereto he was to be subjected; for had the substitute sunk under the weight of transgression, which he was called on to endure,—had he repined under, or shrunk from the vengeance which these transgressions had merited,—had he yielded to the temptations whereby he was assailed,—then had sinners been yet without pardon, and men without hope. Therefore was it necessary that in him, the words of the prophet should be fulfilled, "He shall not fail, nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment on the earth." He is especially the Lamb of God, in his character as Mediator, because appointed to the work of man's redemption by God the Father, "who raised him up as a horn of salvation, in the house of his servant David." He was the Lamb of God, because prepared by God for the work; "a body," saith the Son, "hast thou prepared for me;" and "God gave the Spirit without measure unto him." He was the Lamb of God, because devoted to God's offended justice as a sacrifice; having been made the "propitiation for our sins." And he was the Lamb of God, because God accepted his sacrifice, and was well pleased with his offering, "whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand, in the heavenly places, and put all things under his feet, and given him to be head over all things to the Church,"—being to the Church in heaven the source of their glory, and the subject of their praise; and being to the Church on earth, the fountain of their salvation, and the foundation of their hopes. Thus, then, is the Redeemer the Lamb, yea, the Lamb of God, the Lamb of God's sacrifice, the Lamb of God's love.

II. But let us now proceed to consider, in the second place, the design wherefore our Saviour was manifested in this character. He is the "Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world."—The world after the fall, presents a scene somewhat resembling the valley of Ezekiel's vision, a scene of ruin, havoc, and desolation; as in this valley of death, the winds of heaven, and the storms of winter had bared and bleached the bones of the slain, so in the valley of spiritual slaughter, the dead souls of God's fallen creatures were exposed to the storms of wrath, to the winter of ruin. Angels might have asked, in pitying doubt, "Can these dry bones live?" can these dead souls be quickened? And, no doubt, from the very first, these messengers of God's love might have been told of some scheme of substitution whereby God's justice might be satisfied, and his mercy magnified. But then came the question—a question similar to that which, of old, Isaac asked of his Father—"Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the Lamb for a burnt-offering?" and then would God the Father reply, as of old did Abraham, "God will provide himself a Lamb for a burnt-offering." And as of old, Abraham approved his faith toward God, by not "withholding his son, his only one," when God claimed him as a victim; even so has God approved his love to the sinner, in that "he spared not his own Son, but gave him up for us all." And while angels wondered, and waited for the development of this scheme of marvel and of love—"Lo," saith the Son, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God!" And then did Jehovah reveal, in the face of astonished heaven, "the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh," saying, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world,"—the Lamb which God has provided for a burnt-offering.

In order, however, that this Lamb of God's providing should be available for man's relief, it was necessary that that Lamb should be smitten—that He should be sacrificed; and, therefore was this sacrifice "fore-ordained, before the foundation of the world, though not made manifest until these last times." Adam had caused death by the fall; and this punishment would have been inflicted, to its full and eternal extent, upon the commission of the first trespass, were it not for the provisions of the covenant of grace, ratified in heaven, whereby the Son of God was pledged to give himself as "a sacrifice for the sins of the people," and also to fulfil the conditions of this new covenant, an perfect obedience to the Divine enactments—an unswerving conformity to the Divine law—and thus to work out a righteousness, not for himself, but for as many as were to experience the benefits of his redemption.

From all eternity, therefore, was he, the Lamb, slain in the councils of Heaven! Virtually, the sacrifice was offered as soon as the creature had transgressed, and yet been spared, through the operations of the covenant of grace; typically, the sacrifice was offered in every victim whose blood was shed upon the altars of the faithful; and, actually, the sacrifice was offered when Calvary beheld the spectacle of woe—even the incarnate Son of God bound, and bleeding, and dying on the cross!

Such, then, was the object and design of this manifestation of mercy! Such was the sacrifice whereby the object was to be accomplished! Such was the scheme of redemption, displaying a miracle of wisdom and of love, of which the fountain can only dwell in the mind and in the heart of the Eternal! This glorious scheme, indeed, is like an archway thrown across creation, whereby the believing sinner may reach the heaven which, by transgression, he has forfeited, and whereby he may escape the deluge of desolation which shall yet sweep into perdition the whole world of the ungodly. Its commencement is hidden by the cloud which overshadows the eternity that is past, and its close is concealed by the veil which shrouds the eternity that is coming, from the eye of mortality. But the centre-stone of the arch is fixed in time—the key-stone that connects and upholds the whole fabric is visible to man; for the whole mystery of redemption rests upon this one fact—"God was manifest in the flesh," and this incarnate God was crucified and slain!

Oh, what a miracle of love is here manifested! "Greater love," saith the Saviour, "hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend;" but who can fathom the love of God, in that "when we were yet sinners," he sent his Son to save us! Who can fathom Christ's love to the ruined, in that "when we were yet enemies," he came to die for us! His was a love high as that glory which, for a time, he resigned—deep as that abasement to which, for a time, he submitted. Truly, when considering this scheme of mercy, well may every heart exclaim, with the apostle, "Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and the knowledge," and well may we add, of the love, "of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Reflect, but for one moment, upon that dignity which he originally possessed; reflect on the humiliation, the sufferings, the death, to which he submitted; reflect on the object of these sufferings and of that death—that ruined sinners might be saved; and reflect, still farther, on the character of those for whom he endured all this—that not only were they ruined, but also rebellious; and when you have surveyed the whole, then well may you exclaim, with the apostle, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us!" Well may you long to be "able to comprehend, with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge;" and, having understood the mysteries of that love, then be it yours to adopt the apostle's conclusion, "The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them, and rose again."

POETRY IS TRUTH—THE POETRY OF THE BIBLE.

BY MRS JANE C. SIMPSON.

SELDOM has a greater calumny been uttered than that which some have endeavoured to cast upon the "divine art," when it has been said that Poetry is intrinsically opposed to Truth, and that fiction is her native and proper element. They who speak thus, have not studied the character of the Muse, and cannot feel so as to appreciate her power. Every thing in this world has its counterfeit. The faculty of imitation has attained, we admit, almost to its perfection. The brass and the gold glitter with equal lustre. Nothing is too pure but it may be adulterated—too intricate but it may be forged—too sacred but it may be profaned. Both body and mind are alike the subjects of this deluding traffic; and, while the one may be painted and decked out with the vain semblance of beauty, the other may be garnished with the mere shreds and patches of intellectual wisdom and moral goodness. But though the outward appearance of things may be copied with nearly universal dexterity, the inward qualities are placed far beyond the reach of falsehood; and the experienced eye distinguishes in a moment between the worthless paste and the costly pearl. And so, in like manner, is it with every metrical effusion of which Truth is not the foundation and the centre. It is not the genuine production of the precious mine—it is but the bauble of glass mocking the regal splendour of the diamond. Poetry (at least all of it that merits the name) is essentially and severely true; true to the natural reason and best judgment of the mind, and true, ever true to the lively impulses and warm emotions of the heart. Apart from these, there may be the sound, the jingle, the mere harmony of words; but the main-spring is wanting, and so the strain must fall dull and cold on the ear of slightest discrimination.

What is Poetry? is a question which has been asked almost as frequently as that other celebrated query—What is beauty?—and with nearly similar unsuccessful results. The two points have afforded matter of manifold discussion; but still, in as far as relates to a standard of either, no permanent system has yet been established. Now in regard to Beauty (whose essentials, we cannot deny, let us etherealize the subject as much as we will, lie so much in external advantages), it is scarce to be wondered at, that diversity of disposition and association should create diversities innumerable of taste. With Poetry, however, the case is different. For while the analysis of personal perfection must ever remain, from its very nature, a thing inexplicable and indefinable, there are certain sure characteristics which all must concur in connecting with mental excellence; and of these, it cannot be denied, that the leading and prime ingredient is Truth. To say, therefore, that this noblest element may be altogether discarded in the formation of Verse, implies nothing less, than that the sphere of the muse is too insignificant for the exhibition of Truth, and tends, in consequence, to the futility and degradation of the Art.

Is there, then, no Poetry in fiction? There is much, most assuredly—provided it be fiction that does not contradict reality, but that rather soars into regions where reality cannot enter. In such effusions, however, the imagination must do every thing, while the heart may continue comparatively cold and unaffected. For as soon as the ideal world becomes all in all with the bard, his compositions can have but little or no affinity with human sympathies and affections. And where then will be the charm of his works? They may please an idle hour; they may dazzle, like a transient and useless dream, the senses of the reader for a moment; but the short-lived excitement past, they are remembered no more, they leave no salutary impressions behind. The pictures they exhibited were beautiful, they were wonderful, they were gorgeous, yet they were shadowy, empty, and profitless. But the Poetry of Truth!—it is the masterpiece of intellectual and moral power. It is the loftiest thunder of mental intelligence, skilfully blending with the softest melody of the heart's own music. Its appeal is not to one class of tastes, or habits, or opinions; it speaks a universal language; and the voice of such minstrelsy, (breathed from the very depths of sincerity,) finds an instant response in every bosom of sensibility.

Peruse any production which has been the fruit of long labour and study, perhaps of severe calculation. It may contain much sound judgment and solid learning; it may be brimful of science, and evidence the author to be a man of varied lore, and acute discernment. But, is there any Poetry in such a disquisition? None. Truth, to be sure, is there; but it is only the truth of the head, and Poetry takes higher ground, and demands the combined enthusiasm of both head and heart. Poetry is something more than the mere abstract positive discoveries of reason and experience; it is the sincerity of feeling as well as of observation. It is nature in its rarest and least earthly guise—but still it is nature through every part.

It follows then of necessity, that there are some subjects to which the exercise of Poetry ought never to be applied. Any bare detail of dry historical facts, for example, taken singly and without reference to human interests, could never call forth the energies of the inspired Muse; or if attempted to be expressed in the flow of Verse, could never arouse the sympathies of the plodding reader. Yet let the spirit-stirring events of history be coupled with the fire of patriotic zeal, and the author's generous ardour in the cause of virtue and liberty, how thrilling then is the strain which gushes spontaneously from the poet's soul; and how deep the involuntary sympathy of every listener to his lyre. We need not look far to find abundant evidence of this very obvious statement. Even in the daily routine of social correspondence it is well known, that the impression made by the speaker is exactly in proportion to the earnestness with which he handles his theme. And if this rule hold good in every species of communication with our fellow-creatures, whether oral or written, why should not its force be equally imperative when thought assumes the garniture of Verse? Truth is surely an essential of the highest Poetry; and though there may be Truth without Poetry, and Poetry independent of Truth, it is the part of genius to array the immortal principle in such sublime yet simple guise, that the taste shall be charmed, the fancy satisfied, and the feelings touched and elevated; while the mind at the same time is imbibing new and important lessons of purest wisdom.

But if farther confirmation of this point were wanting, it is ready at hand. And that Poetry may not only become the vehicle of Truth, but that it has been made the channel for conveying the deepest and most sacred Truth that can engage the spirit of man, let any reader of the Bible judge; and oh! let none think that when we talk of God's Word as the most magnificent Poetry of which heart can conceive, that its inestimable value, as the real record of the Divine will to a fallen race, is for a moment lost sight of. No; the truth of the Scripture is the foundation of all the matchless grandeur of its Poetry. And sincerely are we persuaded, that whatever excellence and beauty of conception or expression the mere worldly reader may imagine he finds in its pages, it is the Christian alone who can appreciate the full splendour of its hallowed announcements. Who weeps so sympathizingly over the orphan's tale of sorrow, as a brother or sister left alone in similar orphan solitude? Who listens with such lively delight to the pastoral strains of his native hills, as he whose bosom beats high with patriotic fire? In other words, Do we not understand best what we love and have studied most? And say, then, with what mighty power all the unrivalled sublimity of God's own unerring Book must fall upon his soul who reads in faith, and ponders as he reads, those everlasting truths which make wise unto salvation? What is Poetry? It is thought and feeling based upon sacred eternal reality—thought the most profound—feeling the most refined, and clothed (as such ideas and emotions involuntarily clothe themselves) in language simple, impassioned, eloquent. Now, if the Bible be tested in this manner, where, save to its own pages, can we look for whatever is loftiest in conception, tenderest in pathos, grandest in diction, and holiest in truth? What themes so momentous as those of which it discourses to us?—so far removed from aught that is idle and earthly—so redolent of heaven's pure dignity—and so deeply fraught with that spirit of perfect poetry, which is nothing less than an emanation from His transcendent excellence whose name is Love!

Reader, have you ever felt that the whole world in which you dwell was full of poetry—every thing, at least, in which the finger of God was manifest—and that all the prose of our universe was only to be found in those things of which man was the maker? The vegetable kingdom, even as we now possess it, altered and defaced from its original fair proportions; the natural aspect of the ever-varying landscape, hills and vales, rivers, woods, and meadows; are alike breathing with the loveliness that is not of earth, and tuneful with the melody of celestial song. The gigantic ocean is sublimely beautiful in the deep mystery of its fathomless waves, and the noonday and midnight firmament both present the most animated and expressive pictures of ethereal power and goodness. The soul, too, which the Almighty has breathed into his creatures is a noble emblem (though, alas! how faint!) of His glory who maketh angels his ministers. These all are his works, and on each, therefore, is impressed the visible seal of the Divine supremacy. Whatever God has touched, he has rendered it fearful, wonderful, beautiful, poetical. The sin and degradation of humanity have alone caused the existence of the wicked, the insipid, the forbidden, the prosaic. And if this be the case with all the works of Jehovah generally, how doubly certain must it hold good with that eternal Word of Revelation which is, indeed, purely and incontrovertibly his own written message to man! If there be loveliness, if there be grandeur, if there be power, if there be goodness, if there be excellence, if there be harmony, if there be truth, if there be poetry, perceptible to our eyes in any single creation of Omnipotence, here is the very concentration of all that is elevated and profound, whether in feeling or conception.

The Bible, then, is Poetry—the highest Poetry—and Poetry is Truth; nay, more, it is the very Truth of God. And, just as in dealing with one who preferred the worthless brass to the sterling gold, the genuine votary of song might reply to him who questioned the sincerity of the Muse, "If you are contented to admire the counterfeit, you know not the superior value of the original." Even so, with tenfold force of conviction, the Christian may urge upon every godly reader of the Holy Book, "Oh, if you love and extol the mere sound and semblance of what is great and excellent, how would you be exalted, delighted, thrilled, lost in astonishment and praise, if you but knew how indestructible is that Truth of which all this Poetry is the foundation!"

Conviction of Sin.—Until we know sin, and feel the burden of it in some degree, we shall be blind to every thing else in Scripture, whether of nature or grace; we shall pray with great reserve, and never mean half of what we say.—ADAM.

CHARITY.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE PRESBYTERY OF LANCASHIRE, ON FEB. 2, 1841.*

By THE REV. ALEXANDER RENNISON, A.M.,
Minister of Risley Presbyterian Church, Lancashire.

CO-PRESBYTERS AND BRETHREN IN CHRIST,—After determining in my own mind the propriety of submitting to you a few thoughts on charity, I was almost deterred from the prosecution of my task by reading in the 1st epistle to the Thessalonians (iv. 9.) "But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you; for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another." The reflection on this verse was,—“Surely my purpose is vain and presumptuous: let me fix on a more suitable topic:—it may be taken for granted that the messengers of peace—the heralds of divine love—the ministers of the meek and lowly Jesus, are deeply rooted in the faith of the Gospel, and, therefore, deeply imbued with the benign spirit of the Gospel, and wholly subject to its gracious influence.” The next verse, however, re-established the original design:—“but we beseech you, that ye increase more and more.” Accordingly I do not authoritatively enjoin the assumption of a virtue which you want, but * A pleasing coincidence occurred on the occasion. When the author had concluded his address, a reverend member of the Court, concurring in the views and sentiments which had been delivered, expressed his pleasure in being able to testify to the existence of a few who were distinguished alike by Christian charity and beneficence. Having obtained permission of the Court, he read some extracts from a work on the state of religion in America, where, as appeared from various facts, certain Presbyterian Churches had contributed largely both to the support of their pastors and to missionary schemes. While the perusal of these extracts was proceeding, the officer brought in a letter, which was laid on the table. At the close of the reading, the reverend gentleman announced that he was commissioned by a friend, who wished to conceal his name, to present L. 50 to the Presbytery (Home Mission) Fund, and begged to add on his own part the sum of L. 5. The letter which the officer had brought in, was then opened, and to the agreeable surprise of all, was found to contain L. 5 from an American. These largesses were cordially welcomed to an exhausted treasury.

I would, with the apostle, beseech you, and provoke myself, to cultivate with additional care a grace which we may be expected to possess. Human nature is the same now as from the beginning, and will show its weakness even after the renewing of the Spirit; and though the transgression of Judas may seldom occur among those who divide the bread of life, yet there may be found a drowsy watchman or lukewarm soldier on whom a reasonable warning or friendly admonition may not be lost. Nor may the few remarks that follow be without good to others of my audience.

The importance of charity as an element in the composition of Christian character, is soon determined by Scripture. Paul describes the finest eloquence, unaccompanied by charity in the heart and language of the speaker, as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The gift of prophecy, the understanding of mysteries, the most extensive knowledge, and a miracle-working faith—these, without love, weigh in the balance of the sanctuary as chaff; and this, too, is the judgment of the inspired apostle. "And though," he continues, "I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." "Above all things," exhorts Peter, "have fervent charity among yourselves."

To secure a proper definition of the term, we must enter at large on the nature of this—styled "one of the three grand theological graces." A foregoing quotation from one of the epistles to the Corinthians guards us against the vulgar error of applying the term exclusively to alms-deeds; whereby the effect is confounded with the cause, or a solitary manifestation is made to occupy the place of an inward principle, beneficence being nothing more than that principle or improved condition of soul operating in a particular form and in one direction. In the original of the New Testament the same word is rendered both charity and love; and it is necessary to remark this, in order to avoid the labour of some wire-drawn distinction.

There is an instinctive love, such as forms the tie of attachment, and works an interchange of sympathy, between parents and offspring; and this, of course, is only common to man with the lower animals. The charity of the Christian belongs to a higher order of affections. It is not natural; nor is it even acquired, though it may be improved, by human effort and the use of means; but it is a grace—a divine gift, partaking of heaven in its derivation, essence, and exercise. Hence, in the epistle to the Galatians, it is said to be "the fruit of the Spirit."

Love, comprehensive of both the inborn affection and the spiritual bestowment, may be defined—an inclining towards an object which the mind approves, or according to Dr Brown, "the analysis of love, as a complex feeling, presents to us always at least two elements,—a vivid delight in the contemplation of the object, and a desire of good to that object." This definition is borne out by the word of God. It is applicable, whether the Supreme Being or the creature be the object; but it is right to employ different terms when we speak with reference to objects so diverse, and indeed usage has established charity as suitable only in the latter case. "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." 1st John iv. 20. "Put on, as the elect of God, bowels of mercies, kindness, . . .

long-suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another. . . . And above all these things put on charity," Col. iii. 12, 13,—charity, of course, to one another.

And we can now farther certify that the gracious principle in view is not an indolent habit of mind, or a negative virtue of harmlessness; that it has no alliance with that sentimentalism which weeps at the recital or representation of fictitious distress, while it cannot spare a drop of pity or the help of a finger to the really wretched; but that it is an active principle, which the definition supposes, and Scripture makes evident, its activity being more or less extended and fervent according to the worth or need of the object,—and that it indicates its vitality by zealous and substantial efforts for the relief of destitution as well spiritual as temporal.

Hitherto we have made mention of "the bond of perfectness," and in ordinary language it is spoken of as a solitary and separable virtue—as a grace single and distinct from others. After a little consideration, however, it seems more correct, not only to consider charity as a complex feeling, but also to view it as acting only in concert with other emotions of the heart. In almost every instance where the term occurs in Scripture, it appears to notify a certain gracious influence, proceeding as from a fountain, and communicating to one or more individual qualities, or virtues, a lively, or refreshing, or softening influence, as the case may be, which marks such qualities as peculiar properties of a regenerated soul, and distinguishes them from any similar virtues in the mere moralist of the world. Shortly after its implantation this spiritual grace may manifest itself as bearing the stamp of individuality, and it is only in its after-growth that we are enabled to discern its multiplied and diffusive influences; at first it resembles a single stalk headed with a lonely bud, but by and by it is seen as a strong plant with many shoots, and each shoot crowned with many flowers in full expansion and loveliest bloom. Or it may be likened to a perfume redolent of the paradise of God, filling each chamber of the heart with its sweetness, and gratifying the moral sense of every one who approaches near enough to perceive the fragrance. Or, once more, its capability to affect every mental faculty and every virtue may be illustrated by that mysterious power of nature which emits a subtle matter—sufficient to thrill a thousand bodies with strong sensations. We again appeal to Scripture for the truth of the averment. An admirable comment on the subject is afforded by a notable passage in 1st Cor. xiii., which must be familiar to all. There charity is drawn as possessing both passive and active qualities; as at once a curb on bad feelings, and an incentive to benevolent desires; as holding sway over the conduct and intercourse, over the passions and thoughts, of Christians; as prelate among the cardinal virtues; and as fashioned to endure after various gifts shall have become obsolete, and boasted acquisitions shall have served their purpose. In the epistle to the Colossians (iii.) it is described as "the bond of perfectness," completing and uniting many elements of the Christian character, as mercifulness, kindness, humbleness, meekness, long-suffering, and forbearance; so that without it the new creature should present disjointed members, not one of them perfect, and all acting in independent confusion. Paul in his first epistle to Timothy, represents it as the "end of the commandment," coming "out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." We are (1st Cor. xvi.) to watch, and stand fast in the faith, and quit ourselves like men, and be strong; but, as if all else were otherwise useless, it is immediately subjoined, "let all your things be done with charity." Such is the complexity, and such the extensive influence, of this grace.

Another idea suggests itself. As men may be born again of the Spirit, and yet retain their constitutional peculiarities, modified, indeed; so Christians may be distinguished by peculiar gifts and graces, but among them all charity should be as common as regeneration itself; and the spiritual state of every man, absolutely or relatively, may be surely tested by its presence or absence, by its vigorous or feeble operation. The test is not, that charity must in equal measure impart itself to each faculty and feeling of the soul, but to each in some measure; for it sometimes happens, and will happen, that the whole mental energies and moral force, and consequently the whole charity, of an individual are concentrated upon one scheme of benevolence—a Howard for the prisoner—a Wilberforce for the slave—a Chalmers for Church extension. Wherefore, whether we contemplate the mighty men of valour in the armies of the Redeemer, or those who are ordinary in the ranks of the faithful, we shall find charity to be all-pervading; though in one it may be consolidated, and in another diffuse. In all of them it will ever flow, even while life is ebbing, and will only be at full tide after life shall have been absorbed by the grave.

If the preceding observations have tended to throw the smallest portion of light on the nature of charity, we may now recur to alms-giving; for the sake of furnishing a proof of the existence or genuineness of the grace. No wonder that such fruit is vulgarly identified with the tree itself, though it bears all manner of fruit; for deeds of beneficence must ever follow from love, or be in proportion to the believer's means. But, alas! what spiritual poverty do the life and conduct of numerous professing Christians reveal! Nay, I should be afraid to apply the term Christians to some—it might offend; they could not but regard it as an address of mockery—so conscious are they of living to the world, of turning a deaf ear to the voice of compassion, and of setting less value on immortal souls than the merchant on his perishable merchandize. There are men, members of the Church, too, with whom gold is plentiful, and who add thousands yearly to their coffers, so ill-disposed to the cries of the needy, and so indifferent to the progress of Messiah's kingdom, that they hear with impatience the pleadings of the poor, and frown in anger on the importunate apostles of the Saviour. Nevertheless, these are men who, by their profession, ought to possess a large share of charity; but let not ministers lay the flattering unction to their souls, that they have discharged their duty. Possibly, they contribute to the utmost limit of their means; but it is worthy of reflection, whether they have told others their duty with sufficient plainness, and with all boldness. We are too much in the habit of soliciting, for a good cause, the aid of the wealthy as a favour only to the receiver, instead of urging it as a greater favour to the giver himself, or demanding it as a deodand from those riches which injure and destroy. The servants of the Lord may be divided into two great classes—those who bestow money, and those who bestow labour; and let the truth be told, however unpalatable it may be to some tastes—the latter bear the burden and heat of the day, while the former have an easy task when they can give, even to large amount, without abridging their personal comforts, or trenching on the lawful provision for their family. It is well for the Presbyterian Church in this quarter, and most encouraging to the pastors, that the raling elders, as a body, are exemplary in their benefactions; an index, I trust, that they are rich in charity, and every spiritual grace. And were others, who have been richly endowed by Providence, to meet the Lord's cause with like liberality, "righteousness would flow down our streets as a stream;" the Macedonian cry, from the shores of India and the islands of the sea, would be largely responded to; "where the thorn and the brier grow, would come up the fir and the myrtle tree; the parched ground would become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water."

If you, my clerical brethren, cannot do all the good that ye would, nourish the grace in your hearts, and let it be manifest; it may appear as a thread of gold in the texture of every pulpit discourse, it may mingle as an exquisite seasoning in social intercourse, and it should sweeten the bitter medicine which you may often feel it your duty to administer in private. Let charity reign in your breasts, and influence your conversation; and then, whether you entertain with flashes of wit, or dazzle by the coruscations of your genius, or tender the grave deliverance of a deeply-sought knowledge, men will love you, while they admire. Michael, the archangel, durst not rail against Satan; Christ, "when he was reviled, reviled not again:" were we even so moderately charitable as to ascribe every act and word to the best motives—to interpret every thing in the best sense—never to regard as personal what we ought to think is dictated by conscience, and advanced on public grounds—our meetings of Presbytery might gradually look like feasts in which are no spots. Let us, then, be examples of the believers in charity. By this shall all men know that we are the disciples of Christ. What farther saith the great apostle? He beseeches us to approve ourselves "as the ministers of God . . . in labours . . . by kindness . . . by love unfeigned . . . as poor, yet making many rich." 2 Cor. vi. "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another." Rom. xii. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." Phil. ii. 4. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Gal. vi. 2. Whoso followeth after charity, knowing experimentally, and practising it to the benefit of others and the glory of God, will assuredly realize the poet's quality of mercy, which

"Droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed—
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

ON THE OBJECT WHICH GOD HAD IN VIEW IN SELECTING CANAAN
AS THE RESIDENCE OF ISRAEL:

BY THE REV. JAMES BRODIE,

Minister of Montmail, Ffeshire.

In order to understand the purpose which Jehovah had in view when he gave the promised land as a habitation to his people, it is necessary to advert, in the first place, to the great object which he sought to attain in calling them out from among the nations to be a holy and a peculiar people unto himself.

When Abraham left the country of his fathers, the worshipping of idols and other forms of false religion were beginning to overspread the earth. We learn from the account of Rachel's stealing her father's images, that the worship of God was speedily corrupted even among the kindred of the Patriarch; and reference is made in the book of Job to the early prevalence of those superstitious services, which many nations still continue to offer to the heavenly bodies. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand; this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above." Chap. xxxi. 26. The Lord, therefore, selected from among the idolatrous children of men a people for himself, he made known to them his character and name, he gave them a record of the work he had wrought in former times, he revealed to them the gracious purposes he had in view for future ages, and constituted them the guardians of the "lively oracles," in order, that, through their instrumentality, the revelation thus made might be preserved to after generations, and communicated to the nations around.

To fit the children of Abraham for this important office the Lord gave them, in the first place, rites and ceremonies altogether different from those of other nations, and, in the next place, he bestowed upon them many marks of Divine favour. The peculiarity of their ceremonies made such a separation between them and the Gentile world, that we find them spoken of by Haman in the book of Esther, as hindering the consolidation of the Persian empire by their obstinate singularity; "There is a people," said he, "scattered abroad, and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all people, neither keep they the king's laws: therefore, it is not for the king's profit to suffer them." These peculiarities were designed, on the one hand, to keep the Israelites in remembrance of the purpose for which they were made the chosen people, and, on the other, to lead the heathen to inquire into the origin and meaning of the rites which characterised the religion of the Jews. A similar purpose was in view, when God bestowed his favours. His gifts were not only designed to excite the gratitude of those to whom they were given; but to manifest to the nations the greatness and the goodness of Jacob's God. These objects, indeed, we find pursued in all Jehovah's dealings both with Abraham and his descendants.

During the sojourn of the Patriarchs in Canaan, they were enriched with numerous flocks and herds, and these required such an extensive tract of pasture land for their support, that Abraham and his descendants were, in a great measure, obliged to keep themselves at a distance from their neighbours. Even the nearest kinsmen had to separate; Lot left his uncle Abraham, and Esau his father Isaac. The wealth of the Patriarchs was not only a proof of God's favour towards them, but was designed to be a means of keeping them distinct from the surrounding idolaters.

While they sojourned in Egypt, in order to keep them from intermingling with the servants of Pharaoh, they had a separate province, "the land of Goshen," assigned for their residence, and were instructed, even when basking in the royal favour which Joseph's service had procured, to pursue an avocation which made them "an abomination to the Egyptians." At the same time, the evidences of Jehovah's favour to his people were made manifest to all. The beneficial effects of Joseph's miraculous wisdom continued to be kept in mind for many generations; and when, at last, "another king arose that knew not Joseph," even in the midst of persecution, the Lord showed his regard to his servants—for the more they were persecuted, the more they multiplied and grew; and, in the end, they were brought out with a high hand and an outstretched arm, while their enemies were made monuments of Jehovah's vengeance to all generations.

In the wilderness, though their continuance there was intended by God as a punishment for their distrust and murmuring, along with many peculiar ordinances, they received signal marks of Divine protection. They were guided "by night by a pillar of fire, and by day by a pillar of cloud;" they were fed with manna, the "food of angels," and had "meat to the full;" they were supplied with "water from the flinty rock;" and "their clothes waxed not old" upon them, nor "their shoes upon their feet."

In Canaan, in like manner, "the people dwelt alone, and were not reckoned among the nations." The geographical position of their country was almost enough of itself to keep them from amalgamating with the empires that rose on either side. The land given to the children of Abraham—among whom, by God's appointment (Deut. ii. 9), the children of Lot had their possession—was bounded on the north by mountains, on the west by the Great Sea, and on the south and east by deserts: it was thus, as it were, hedged around, and familiar intercourse with other tribes prevented. At the same time, as was formerly observed, it was admirably situated for being the centre of trade, and a thoroughfare for nations, so that ample opportunities were afforded for making known to the world the character and work of the God whose name was worshipped there. In Canaan, too, the Lord gave them many proofs of his goodness. It was not only a land abounding in natural fastnesses, but it was miraculously defended from all invaders, so long as Israel continued to walk in the ways of the Lord. It was not only a land naturally fertile, "flowing with milk and honey," but it was one which "the Lord God cared for; the eyes of the Lord were always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year." It becomes us also to remark, that many of the favours bestowed, such, for instance, as the miraculous increase of the field in the seasons preceding the years of rest, and more especially in those that preceded the jubilee, were of such a kind as could not fail to attract the notice of even the casual traveller.

All these varied circumstances were evidently intended to lead the nations around to know and adore the gracious name of the great Jehovah.

And, to a certain extent, this effect was produced. The Romans termed their principal deity Jove, which is evidently a corruption of Jehovah; and adored him as "the Father and Origin of gods and men." The oracles of Greece confessed, that "of all the gods, Iao is the greatest;" though they acknowledged themselves ignorant of his character and abode: and other proofs might easily be adduced of the influence exerted on the worship of distant tribes, by their intercourse with the Jews.

With a similar intention, God gave to Solomon his wisdom and dominion. In the reign of that prince, the promise made to Abraham with regard to the possession of his descendants was fulfilled; for Israel's dominion extended from "the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates;" the Mosaic economy was completed, by building the temple, and establishing its service; the favour of God was most eminently displayed, and the chosen people completely furnished for the work assigned them. The purpose that God had in view, in giving Solomon that peace and wisdom which formed the foundation of his wealth and glory, is clearly shown in the charge that he received from his father:—"My son, as for me, it was in my mind to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God: but the word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight. Behold, a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build an house for my name; and he shall be my son, and I will be his Father." 1 Chron. xxii. 7-10. God gave rest and prosperity to David, in his latter days; and he bestowed the same gifts yet more abundantly upon his son—that the temple raised to his name might be the glory of all lands—that its magnificence might attract universal regard, and lead mankind to honour the mighty One whose name was there adored. He gave to Solomon wisdom, that he might show forth the praises of the Lord; and made Jerusalem a place of almost universal concourse, that the inhabitants of distant lands might be taught to worship the God of Israel.

During the first years of his reign, Solomon seems to have kept this glorious object in view; for the sacred historian tells us, that the Queen of Sheba, the most distinguished of all the earth, that came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, after viewing his magnificence, and listening to his conversation, said, at her departure, "Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighteth in thee, to set thee on his throne, to be king for the Lord thy God." Had his after conduct corresponded to the promise of his youth, the temple had then been according to David's wish, "the glory of the whole earth,"—they that came to trade, would have learned to pray—they that came in search of temporal gain, would have found the treasure that is eternal in the heavens; but, alas! Solomon ceased to be an example of fearing the Lord. "He went after Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites. He built an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab; and for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon." Jerusalem no longer stood alone among the nations, the only seat of a pure and rational religion; its king no longer retained his prophetic character, —no longer called on all, by precept and example, to turn from idols, and to serve the living God; Solomon failed of performing the office for which he was designed, therefore the Lord pronounced the judgment, "I will rend thy kingdom from thee;" and Judah having turned unto idols, instead of holding the highest rank among the nations, became a poor and a despised community.

In Judah's fall Britain may find a lesson. This country, like Canaan in the days of Solomon, is the great centre of commerce; foreigners from every clime come here to trade, and British navies sail on every sea; here, too, the great Jehovah is worshipped, and the light of his Gospel shines more brightly than in almost any other land; can we, then, fail of drawing the conclusion, that these gifts have been given us that we may be enabled and induced to make known the God of Redemption to all with whom our intercourse is carried on? This parallelism points out at once our duty and our danger. There is a loud call on us to "preach the Gospel to every creature;" and there is a voice of warning, which bids us beware lest, as a judgment on our indifference towards the perishing heathen, our dominion also be taken away, and our candlestick removed.

But we must not limit our view to the present and the past, we must not speak only of the former glory and the present degradation of Canaan; the sure word of prophecy tells of a time, when Jerusalem shall be a glory and a blessing to all the ends of the earth. The land will not only be restored to its former fruitfulness; but, the language of Scripture seems to imply, that a far more wonderful proof of Jehovah's goodness will be given to those that call on his name, and the curse pronounced on the earth because of Adam's sin shall be removed from the inheritance of the Lord. Canaan shall no longer bring forth "thorns and thistles," but "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree." The curse, under which the "whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain" shall be taken away from the inheritance of the Lord; "the mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands." The lower animals shall no longer raven and devour,—"the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion, and the falling together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp; and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain." The king that reigns in Salem's towers shall no longer raise altars to Milcom and Moloch, and harden the Gentiles in their sin. "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." He shall be "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel." Jerusalem shall be made once more the place of universal concourse: they shall come from all the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of its king, for a "greater than Solomon" will be there. The paltry objects of temporal gain will no longer allure; but the call will be, "Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths;" "for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

And when does this millennial glory dawn? If we read the prophecies aright, it is even now at hand; but a dreary hour of darkness is to precede the day. A time of trial, such as has not been, hangs over the Church.

But we may not presume to speak of the day or the hour. Let our desire and prayer be, "For present trial, and for future glory, may Jacob's God prepare us!"

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

The Lord shall come! the earth shall quake;
The mountains to their centre shake;
And, withering from the vault of night,
The stars shall pale their feeble light—
The Lord shall come! but not the same
As once in lowliness He came,—
A silent Lamb before his foes,
A weary man, and full of woes,
The Lord shall come! a dreadful form,
With rainbow-wreath, and robes of storm;
On Cherub-wings, and wings of wind,
Appointed Judge of all mankind.
Can this be He, who wont to stray
A pilgrim on the world's highway,
Oppress'd by power, and mocked by pride,
The Nazarene,—the Crucified?
While sinners in despair shall call,
"Rocks, hide us; mountains on us fall!"
The saints, ascending from the tomb,
Shall joyful sing, "The Lord is come!"

THE BLESSED EFFECTS OF FAITHFUL REPROOF: *

ILLUSTRATED IN AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR OF 'A SAILOR'S RETROSPECT.'

In the autumn of 1829 I met with an accident of so serious a nature, that, had not surgical assistance been rendered almost instantaneously, I should not have lived an hour. This happened on a Sabbath morning. When the necessary operation had been performed, and I was able to speak, my first exclamation was, "Doctor, I thought I was off!"—which I accompanied with an oath.

* "A Narrative of Facts." Published in Dublin,—1836.

The worthy surgeon, who was a very young man, replied, "You were indeed nearly off this world's stage; but, may I take the liberty of asking you, were you prepared to meet that great Being whose name you so lightly treated?"

I cannot describe the confusion I felt at this merited reproof, any more than the astonishment it occasioned. I confessed that I feared I was not in a state to meet my Maker in judgment.

"Pardon my observation, sir," said he; "you may perhaps think that I am stepping out of my province, in interposing in spiritual matters; but, sir, I should consider myself an unworthy member of the mystical body of our Lord Jesus Christ, if I suffered you, or any one I may be called upon to attend, to imagine that I felt any thing short of deep sorrow, when I hear the name of my Maker irreverently treated."

I apologized for my unbecoming levity, assuring him, that I used the expression most unthinkingly, and with no intention of disrespect to my Creator.

"Believe me, my dear sir," he replied, "I do not accuse you of any intentional disrespect to your Creator, much less to me; but allow me to observe, that I should have thought the most natural sentiment of your heart would have been, to have returned your sincere thanks to God for your preservation; for no man was ever nearer death, that did not die. I was merely the instrument of rescuing you from so sudden an end—the success of my endeavours belonged to God; and to him are your praises and thanksgivings due. May I request you to consider seriously the events of the last hour? Think that, in that short period of time, you were perfectly well, and on the verge of eternity, and again restored; think what might have been your fate, had it pleased the great Disposer of events to have called you into his presence. I will say no more at present, as I am sure, when you reflect on these matters, you will not wonder at my rebuke."

I was left without a reply. He took his leave, promising to call for me on the following day. Perhaps at no period of my life did I ever feel more ashamed of myself, or a greater degree of admiration and respect for an utter stranger; for he was not our family surgeon, but was called in as the nearest at hand. In this apparently accidental circumstance I trace the finger of Divine Providence. Another practitioner might, no doubt, have been equally successful in his operation, but I might have used the same observation unnoticed, and have been left equally unthankful to my Maker, as I was at the moment I used the expression. This providential accident afforded me an opportunity of contracting an intimate acquaintance with this pious, humble-minded Christian; who was a man of intelligent mind, and capable of giving instruction in the great truths of Christianity. He first opened my eyes to the real beauties of the Gospel, though I thought I knew them perfectly well at the time. He first brought me to understand what was meant by "justification by faith," and the doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ. He was born of Socinian parents, and educated in that unfortunate system until he arrived at the age of eighteen; at which period he was walking the hospitals in London, and was the gayest among the gay and thoughtless. His conversion was brought about in rather a singular manner. Having one evening gone out with some licentious object in view, his attention was attracted by the sound of music and singing. He drew near to the house whence the sound proceeded. There were a number of respectable people singing a hymn. The singing was so good, that, instead of setting up a laugh at the "swaddlers," as he termed them, he remained stationary until it was ended, when one of the men, who must have observed him while the hymn was singing, came out and asked him to walk in. He did so, though merely in order to furnish himself with a subject on which to exercise his powers of ridicule. A chair was placed for him, and then one of the men read a chapter from Corinthians, which he afterwards commented on; and then followed a sort of conversational disquisition, in which several took a part. "I liked," said he to me, "all that I heard so much, that I felt gratified by being invited to meet the same parties on the following Wednesday." After a very short acquaintance, he made known his sentiments, or rather those in which he had been educated, and which he entirely renounced in less than a month; and from that time became a steady Christian.

As I have already stated, I owe to him, under God, a change of ideas which I sincerely believe will tend to my eternal benefit. I feel their grateful effects at this moment. I know, and feel an inward assurance of my Redeemer's love, that enables me to bear misfortunes, at least with resignation—conscious that "all things will work together for good to them that love God."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MAJOR-GENERAL ANDREW BURN, OF THE ROYAL MARINES.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

FOR five years Lieutenant Burn was stationed at Chatham, and during that time he was subjected to various changes in his spiritual feelings; but a delightful tone of confidence in the Redeemer breathes throughout his Journal, showing that, though sometimes "cast down," he was not "forsaken;" and though sometimes "perplexed," he was never in "despair." At length, the American war having commenced, he was ordered on active service; and in December 1775 he parted with his wife and family, and embarked, with a detachment of marines, on board the Milford frigate, for America. Detained by calms and contrary winds, they did not reach Spithead till the 1st of January. Having been allowed to go on shore, Lieutenant Burn took advantage of the opportunity, to visit Portsmouth. On entering the town, he was forcibly reminded of the events of former days, and the contrast between his past and present condition, both in regard to temporal and spiritual matters. He thus describes the feelings that were awakened on the occasion:—

"O how my heart glowed with gratitude the instant I began to recollect that there was a time I travelled round these walls, when my situation in every respect was most wretched, compared to what it is at present!

Blessed be the name of the Lord, who brought about the happy change. Then, tired out with hunger and fatigue, I passed one tedious hour after another, not knowing where to satisfy a craving appetite, or to lay my head at night; no money to purchase either, and without any solid prospect of a future maintenance in the world; and, what is worst of all, my eyes sealed to the true light of the Gospel, and my mind as yet ignorant of the saving knowledge of Christ. Now, glory to his name! I am neither tired nor hungry; I know where to go for a good dinner, and where to lay my head peaceably at night, with a sufficiency in my pocket to purchase whatever I want. My fortune in the world is not great, but sufficient. Blessed with the woman I love, and my dear little prattling babes, I desire no more. But, what is far preferable to all this, I humbly trust the Lord hath opened the eyes of my understanding, to see my ruined state by nature, and to know and embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. Transported with pleasing reflections on what God had thus graciously done for me, I could not forbear tuning a hymn of thanksgiving to his praise, while I cheerfully tripped along the ramparts; my outward gesture sufficiently demonstrating what joy and satisfaction reigned within. Surely, I thought, God must be my God, or he would not thus have blessed me."

The voyage across the Atlantic was a stormy one, and not unattended with danger; but, by the good Providence of God, they reached the port of Boston in safety, on the 16th of March 1776. The state of his mind, and the actual position of public affairs, on his arrival, are thus described:—

"Glory be to God, who hath brought us to our destined port in safety! Surely the Lord himself was our pilot. O that he would deign to be our guide and protector, while he is pleased to continue our stay in this hostile country. God only knows what will be the issue of this unnatural war. Hitherto he has defeated all our attempts, baffled our counsels, and given repeated, unusual, and unexpected success to our enemies. We have not a foot of ground here that we can call our own, but a few small islands of no use, except one on which we get a little fresh water. They become stronger and stronger every day, and we weaker and weaker. What military stores they wanted, we have supplied them with, not being able to hinder their taking them from us; provisions, and other things, with difficulty brought from England in transports, have been seized before our eyes, for the use of their army instead of ours; and now, after much bloodshed, fatigue, and hardship, we are obliged to fly, to avoid starving, or surrendering ourselves prisoners of war."

The Milford was now ordered on a cruise, to clear the coast from the enemy's armed vessels. They had scarcely set out, however, when the vessel almost foundered upon a rock; after having, the day before, been very nearly cast ashore upon an island. The wonderful escapes which they had made struck the mind of the captain so strongly, although he was by no means a pious man, that he said in the cabin, before several of his officers, "Gentlemen, you have heard me often say, and I repeat it again, since we sailed from England, we have been so frequently on the brink of destruction, that nothing but the goodness of God could have saved us from it." In the various cruises of the Milford on the American station, which continued for two years, more than thirty prizes were taken—most of them without bloodshed. On one occasion, where considerable resistance had been made, Lieutenant Burn thus paints the scene which he witnessed on boarding the conquered ship:—

"The mangled bodies of my fellow-creatures lying pale and breathless on the deck; some dying, and others begging me to put them out of their misery; while a hungry dog was feeding on the blood that was streaming all about the ship; exhibited a spectacle that would have extorted tears of compassion from the bitterest enemy, and the sigh of pity from the hardest heart. The captain and first lieutenant wounded, the latter dangerously; the first pilot and ten more men killed; twelve men wounded, some of them mortally; but what is astonishing, and ought to stamp lasting gratitude on the heart of every man on board the Milford, we had but one man slightly wounded in the arm; some had their clothes shot through, some the skin grazed, and others the hair shot off their heads; but every shot was directed by the hand of God to do us no other harm. Examining the different shot that took place in the Milford, every one is ready to exclaim—'What a wonder nobody was killed!' O that we could be but truly thankful to Him to whom alone we are indebted for this favour."

Besides the perils of war, Lieutenant Burn had various remarkable escapes from dangers of different kinds; but in all, he invariably recognises the watchful care of a kind Protector and Friend. "O what a treasure," says he, on one of these occasions, "is a throne of grace; and how blessed the man who has learned to approach it! Not all the riches of the Indies can be compared with this. Here I can get freely, for Christ's sake, what gold cannot purchase—the protection of the Almighty." At length the Milford was ordered home; but for some time the Lieutenant was uncertain whether it would be his lot to return to England in her, or to remain in America. This state of suspense, however, was not of long continuance, for on the 27th of January 1778, he had the pleasure of setting sail on his voyage homeward. When they were more than half way across the Atlantic, they were assailed by a storm, which for two days seemed to threaten them with instant death. From this impending danger they were mercifully relieved; and, after a passage of twenty days from Halifax, the Milford was safely anchored at Spithead. On the 28th of February Lieutenant Burn says:—

"This afternoon, by the blessing of God, I arrived safe at home, to the great joy of my family, all of whom I found in tolerable health. I would now pour out my soul in gratitude to that indulgent Father, who, for above these two years past, hath so amazingly preserved me. When I look back upon the path I have travelled, there is a redundancy of love and mercy attending every step. O Lord! I adore thee, and bless thee; and from the bottom of my soul desire to be wholly thine."

The happiness which he enjoyed in the bosom of his family was not of long continuance; for at the end of ten weeks he was ordered on the recruiting service. In this service he was engaged more than six months; but, as he returned to head-quarters with the recruits, he had an opportunity of visiting his family two or three times during that period. Having been called in from recruiting, he spent a month or two at Chatham, when he was appointed Captain-Lieutenant, and ordered to sea again. His feelings on leaving his family may be more easily conceived than described; but, committing them to the care of the Almighty, he proceeded to Portsmouth, and in less than a fortnight from the date of the order, he entered upon duty on board the Eagle, bound for the East Indies. While the vessel lay at

Spithead, there was some prospect of Captain Burn being relieved by another officer. In this he was disappointed; and, instead of repining, he remarks in his Journal, the day before the ship sailed, "Now I have given up every hope of being relieved from this India voyage; and I trust the Lord will, ere long, make me to see it was good for me I had not my own will."

On reaching India, after a prosperous voyage, Captain Burn was removed from the Eagle, having received an appointment to the Rippon, as captain of marines, in consequence of his health being so much affected by the climate, that it was necessary for him to return to England with as little delay as possible. Accordingly we find him making the following entry in his Journal, of date 4th April 1780:—

"This morning I left the Eagle, and embarked on board the Rippon. I would now lumbly approach a throne of grace, and solicit the same favours which were graciously granted to me on my arrival from America. May the Lord take me soon, in health, peace, and safety, to my native country! May I find my wife in health, earnestly seeking after God; and our dear little ones alive and well, to prove future blessings! May I find my parents still alive, to give me their blessing ere they go home! May I find the Gospel of Christ flourishing in England, and those I am more intimately acquainted and connected with at Chatham increased in number, faith, hope, and love! Lord! hear these prayers, and the glory shall all be thine!"

The voyage was a very tedious one, and in the course of it Captain Burn suffered much from bodily weakness and languor. At length, on the 9th January 1781, the fleet reached Ireland; and after remaining on that coast upwards of three weeks, they sailed for England, and anchored in the Downs on the 9th of February. There the Captain received intelligence from home that his father had died upwards of a year before. The tidings were painful to him, but he felt comforted with the thought, that he whom he mourned was safely landed on the shores of a brighter and a happier world. In the month of March, Captain Burn having obtained a month's leave from the Admiralty, paid a visit to his family. It was a source of great joy to them that they were again permitted to see his face in the flesh; but he had not been above a fortnight at home, when it pleased the Lord to make a breach in the family. "My youngest child," he says, "a sweet, healthy boy, about two years and a quarter old, was playing with me in the garden, on the twenty-first of March; and the next day, after a few hours' illness, his soul took its flight to heaven, and left his disconsolate parents to mourn their loss."

Shortly after Captain Burn had returned to his ship, she was condemned as unfit for service, and ordered to Chatham. This unexpected event gave him another opportunity of spending a few weeks in the bosom of his family. About the end of July he was appointed to the command of ninety men, including officers, on board the Sampson, which was ordered to cruise upon the coast of Holland. Here his health rapidly declined, and he was induced, by the advice of the ship-surgeon, to procure leave of absence without delay. This he readily obtained, and he returned home. During the four months which he spent with his family, he was raised to the rank of full Captain. His health being re-established, he returned to the Sampson, which then lay at Sheerness, but soon after went round to Spithead to wait farther orders. Apprehensions were entertained, for a time, that their destination would be the West Indies. A residence in a climate so unhealthy would have been almost certainly fatal to Captain Burn, in the now shattered state of his constitution; but, by the kind arrangements of his heavenly Father, his fears in this respect were disappointed. The Sampson was appointed one of the Channel fleet, and was on the point of sailing, when a captain of marines, who was to go ashore in consequence of the party he commanded being drafted into other ships, came on board the Sampson, and proposed an exchange of duties with Captain Burn. This was effected, and he returned to Chatham, where he remained with his family—the only service required of him being the charge of a recruiting party for a few weeks at Rumford.

In the opening of 1783, peace was restored, an event which Captain Burn notices with feelings of the liveliest gratitude to the Almighty:—

"To-day the news arrived that the preliminary articles of peace were signed on the 20th instant at Paris. Rejoice, O my soul, at this long-looked-for blessing! Stand amazed at the goodness of God to thee: he has now brought thee safe through two bloody wars without loss of life, limb, or liberty; while thousands younger and more deserving have been hurried into the eternal world by the fatal bullet, or pestilential climate. How many of my messmates, companions, and friends, can I call to mind, who at the beginning of this eight years' war were much more likely than myself to see it out, but who are now no more! O my soul! praise the Lord for his mercy!"

In consequence of the war being ended, the marine corps was reduced, and Captain Burn retired from the service upon half-pay. He now experienced the sweet pleasures of a calm domestic life, free from the turmoil and bustle to which for many years he had been subjected. To his own religious concerns and those of his family, he devoted himself with the utmost ardour. It was not to be expected, however, that he should long continue exempt from "chastisement of which all are partakers." He was visited accordingly in the beginning of the year 1785 with one of the severest calamities to which any man can be exposed,—the loss of an affectionate and beloved wife. His feelings on suffering this painful bereavement, he thus briefly but pathetically notes:—

"Of all the trials I ever had to sustain, none is to be compared to what I have gone through for these three or four days past. My wife, in whom all my earthly happiness centered, suddenly taken from me! O how hard, to say with the heart, The will of the Lord be done! I am like one in despair; all nature seems clothed in sackcloth. Lord, help me in this hour of darkness!"

And again, a short time after, he writes:—

"God be praised! the melancholy, despairing frame of mind which my late loss had thrown me into, seems to be wearing off. And happy for me that it is so; for, had it lasted in its first force much longer, I must have sunk under it.—I still find God the hearer and answerer of prayer, and this encourages me to persevere. Like a kind parent he has always been near to succour me in my greatest conflicts. What a blessing to have such a God! I should be the most miserable of all wretches if I had no access to the throne of grace. But my troubles and distresses, however great, keen, and heavy they may be, when brought there, lose all their force and bitterness."

Captain Burn now directed much of his attention to the perusal of theological works; and having carefully studied the various branches of the Christian Evidences, he wrote a work which has attained considerable celebrity, "The Christian Officer's Panoply; containing arguments in favour of Divine Revelation; by a Marine Officer." To the second edition, published in 1806, he affixed his name; substituting the words, "Complete Armour," for "Panoply," as being more intelligible. The favourable reception which this work received from the public encouraged him in his literary labours; and, accordingly, in the same year, 1789, he published a pamphlet entitled, "Who fares best; the Christian, or the Man of the World? Or, the Advantages of a Life of real Piety above a Life of Marine Dissipation; by a Marine Officer." This dialogue was still more successful than even the former, and the profits were given to a religious object.

The year before the "Panoply" was published, Captain Burn was called in upon full pay, but employed for some time chiefly on the recruiting service. At length, however, in the spring of 1791, he was ordered to sea in the ship Arrogant. For six months he remained on board this vessel sailing only between Portsmouth and Chatham; and at the end of that time he disembarked with his party, and went into barracks, the ship being paid off. In May of the following year a proposal was made to him by the Directors of the Sierra Leone Company to accept the post of second in command at their new settlement on the coast of Africa. This offer he reluctantly declined, chiefly on the ground of his bodily weakness, although he could have wished to have helped forward in the promotion of the abolition of the slave trade, a subject on which he published some tracts, which were considered as effectively written.

About this time Captain Burn was appointed to the Assistance, in which he made a voyage to Newfoundland, and on his return he went to Corunna and Gibraltar. In the course of this last voyage he suffered severely from almost constant attacks of illness. On his return from Gibraltar, therefore, he found it necessary to apply for leave of absence for two months. This he obtained, and providentially during that interval the Assistance was ordered off to the West Indies, so that Captain Burn escaped from the dangers of a voyage which would in all probability have terminated his life. In consequence of the state of his health his term of leave was extended to four months, at the end of which he was again employed in the recruiting service.

For some time past Captain Burn had found great difficulty in supporting his numerous family, and with the view of diminishing his expenses, he thought of retiring to the country. About Michaelmas 1794, accordingly, he entered upon a small farm consisting of a cottage and thirteen acres of land, of which he took a lease for fourteen years. This speculation was by no means successful, and he became embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs. In a state of great anxiety he applied to a nobleman with whom he had been formerly intimate in France, but whom he had not seen for the last twenty years. To his surprise a letter arrived in a few days, enclosing an order for one hundred pounds. This reasonable supply filled the mind of Captain Burn with the warmest gratitude to his heavenly Benefactor, who had put it into the heart of his friend to assist him. The money sufficed to pay off all his debts, and thus relieved his mind from anxiety.

In the autumn of 1795 Captain Burn was called in from the recruiting service, in which he had been employed for two years, and was ordered to hold himself in readiness for sea-duty. After a short time he was appointed to the Goliath, and embarked at Portsmouth on the 24th of March 1796. Before setting sail, an incident occurred which must have been gratifying to his mind. It is thus noticed in his Journal:—

"Last Monday I breakfasted with Captain Wilson, who is destined to command the vessel that is to carry out the missionaries to Otaheite, and had an hour's comfortable conversation with him; while he related the very pleasing account of his conversion, effected in a very striking manner by sovereign grace, through means of "the Christian Officer's Panoply," which upset his infidel principles, brought him to the Bible and to Jesus Christ, the friend of sinners, where, after a dark and painful night of true contrition, he found, and rejoiced in a complete salvation; O that the Lord would daily make me thankful for his wonderful condescension in employing such a worm as I to call in any of his chosen vessels. But such is His pleasure, to employ base and weak things to confound the great and wise."

The Goliath sailed with a convoy, first to Gibraltar, then to Corsica, and thence to Leghorn. From Leghorn they proceeded to join the fleet, under the command of Sir John Jervis, then blockading the port of Toulon. After cruising about for some time, the Goliath was present in the hot engagement with the Spaniards off Cape St Vincent. This memorable battle is thus noticed by Captain Burn:—

"God be praised! the battle is fought, the victory gained, and my worthless life preserved. The Goliath had two three-deckers upon her at one time, and suffered much in masts, sails, and rigging; but, thank God! had only eight men wounded. What shall I render to the God of all my mercies for hearing my prayer, giving me courage, and protecting me in the day of battle!"

Captain Burn's health having suffered much in the campaign, he was discharged from the Goliath, and appointed to the command of the marines on board one of the Spanish prizes; and, by this arrangement, he expected to reach home in the course of the summer. After this removal he remained at Lisbon nearly six months, during which his health was much improved. In the passage home they encountered some stormy weather, but at the end of four weeks they arrived at Plymouth; and Captain Burn returned to his family. In consequence of his valorous conduct in the recent engagement with the Spaniards, he was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the army. This honour, which brought him no pecuniary advantage, was attended with considerable expense; and as, during his absence, the management of his farm had been far from successful, he now found himself plunged anew into debt.

In April 1798, a major in the Plymouth division of marines being reduced to half-pay, Colonel Burn was fixed upon as his successor. The satisfaction which he felt on receiving this promotion was somewhat diminished by the thought of removing to such a distance from all his old friends and connections; but, happily, this was prevented, by his appointment to a vacancy which occurred a few days after in the Chatham divi sion. This arrangement added a hundred pounds a year to his income, and exempted him from all sea-duty in future. He now disposed of the lease of his cottage and farm, and removed his residence to Stroud where he employed himself actively in promoting the cause of religion all around him. Notwithstanding the rigid economy with which his domestic affairs were conducted, the expenses of his numerous family, for shortly after the death of his first wife he had entered a second time into the marriage connection, exceeded his income, and at the beginning of the year 1803, the amount of his debts was about sixty pounds. This circumstance led him to wish for promotion, and about this time he had some hopes of attaining it. But his expectations were not fulfilled; and in great depression of mind he cast his burden upon the Lord, earnestly imploring, that in his own good time he might be relieved. The same week his prayers were answered in a way the most unexpected and wonderful. We give the statement in his own words:—

“Last week, just as my heart was poring over the disappointment I met with in my expected promotion, and anticipating all the miseries of accumulating debt, a dear friend of mine, in the military profession, called upon me; and taking me aside into a private room, made me promise I would ask him no questions: which when I had done, with some hesitation, he put a bank note into my hand, saying, he was desired to give it me, but with the strongest injunctions never to divulge whence it came. I put it in my pocket without looking at it, repeatedly thanking him and my generous benefactor for the very acceptable present. Dinner being upon the table, we went in, sat down and dined; my mind all the while occupied about which of my creditors I should pay off first, imagining I had perhaps a ten or twenty pound note, which I longed to look at, out was ashamed to do it before my friend. Soon after dinner I took an opportunity to step out of the room to satisfy my anxious curiosity. But oh! how was my heart filled with grateful emotions when I found two notes, one of five and the other of a hundred pounds—a present of one hundred guineas! To attempt a description of my feelings at this time would be vain; those who have experienced the overflowings of a grateful heart can only guess at them. I was so overcome with a view of the Lord’s goodness, that I knew not how to express myself, and was afraid my friend would think me insensible of the favour bestowed. When he was gone, and I had communicated the purport of his visit to Mrs Burn, we both wept, and in broken accents, with eyes and hearts directed to heaven, expressed our obligation to the God of all our mercies, for this seasonable and ample supply, in answer to our united and repeated prayers. I have now enjoyed the pleasure of paying all my debts, of contributing to the relief of others, and of purchasing many articles absolutely necessary in the family. O how good the Lord has been to us, unworthy as we are of the least of all his mercies!”

Soon after this marked interposition of the Almighty in his behalf, Colonel Burn received a considerable accession to his income in consequence of his being appointed inspecting field-officer in the Cambridge district. His family accordingly left Stroud, and removed to Cambridge. No sooner had this change been effected than he was unexpectedly appointed second Colonel-Commandant, and stationed at Chatham. The expenses of two removals, losses by two sales of furniture, and furnishing two houses within six months, involved him in new debts; but with unhesitating confidence he cast himself and all his concerns upon the care of that gracious and merciful God, who had hitherto so remarkably cared for him. In the evening of his days Colonel Burn was not exempt from the infirmities incident to old age. In the summer of 1804 he was attacked with a slow fever, which reduced him to great weakness. From this disease, however, he speedily recovered, and had the comfort of thinking that the affliction had been sanctified to his progress in the Divine life. The following summer he was called to part with one of his infant children, two years and three months old. This bereavement he bore with calm submission to the will of Him who doeth all things well.

As his days advanced, Colonel Burn found his health and strength gradually declining. He continued, however, to promote as far as he could the cause of the Redeemer, which was ever dear to his heart. His own pecuniary affairs were still in a very embarrassed state, and he was very desirous to rise in his profession, that he might be able to pay his just debts. Through the Divine goodness, his wish was gratified, by his appointment, towards the end of 1808, to the office of Colonel-Commandant at Woolwich. Thither, accordingly, he and his family removed. Old age was now creeping on apace, and he felt, to use his own expression, that he was “travelling post-haste to an eternal state.”

On the 25th of July 1810, Colonel Burn obtained the rank of Major-General in the army—a promotion not attended with any additional emolument. In the course of this year, also, he was enabled to accomplish the discharge of all his debts—an event which had been long the object of his strenuous exertions and fervent prayers. From this time, nothing remarkable occurred in the life of this good man. He continued on active duty till the year 1814, when he was discharged on full pay. He now removed with his family to Gillingham, a retired village near Chatham. Here he spent the remainder of his days, in calm contemplation of those things which are unseen and eternal. After about two months of sweet enjoyment in this retired situation, the family of General Burn were alarmed early in September by the return of his annual complaint, with symptoms more dangerous than usual. The fever raged with great intensity, the difficulty of breathing was distressing, and continual coughing left him scarcely an interval for repose; but, even in the midst of these accumulated sufferings, he manifested the utmost patience and resignation to the Divine will. The account of his last hours we extract from the published Memoir:—

“The day after his first severe attack, on his third daughter inquiring how he felt, he replied, with a countenance expressive of humble confidence, ‘I hope I shall meet you in heaven;’ and a few days after, when she again approached his bed, he said, ‘Ah! is it you, my love? You will have need of faith; exercise faith. His own faith was deeply exercised at one period of his illness. The reader will recollect that the General had, during his residence in France, unhappily imbibed infidel sentiments, so far, at one time, as to doubt the immortality of the soul. Though these sentiments and doubts were afterwards removed, not only by a thorough conviction of the truth of Christianity, after diligent investigation, but by personal experience of the power of religion on his own heart; they, nevertheless, did him lasting injury, and in after-life often afforded Satan the means of distressing this holy man. At one period of extreme weakness and suffering during his last illness, the great enemy of souls was permitted to harass him, by suggesting the thought, that perhaps annihilation would follow death. He mentioned this temptation to one of his children standing by the bedside, who replied, 'Life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel.' This passage of Scripture immediately dissipated his fears, and proved a shield against the fiery darts of the devil. He reclined his head again on the pillow, and for some time after his beaming countenance indicated the sweetest serenity and joy.

"On Tuesday the 13th September, the General revived considerably, and the hopes of his friends were excited that they should still be blessed with his beloved presence. During this interval of ease, all the temporal concerns of the family were settled. This subject had been a source of great anxiety to him for many of the latter years of his life; and if one circumstance more than another made him shrink from death, it was the fear of leaving his numerous family destitute. It is a delightful instance of the tender mercy of God, and of the power of faith, that this anxiety was completely removed during his illness, and that no trace of it was left to disturb his last moments. After making every necessary arrangement, and doing all in his power towards the future comfort of his wife and children, he commended them in faith to the guardianship of his God and Saviour, and seemed to feel that they were safe in His hands.

"On the Wednesday and Thursday after the temporary revival just now mentioned, he gradually grew worse; and on Friday the fever increased, and the cough became so violent, that all hopes of his recovery were abandoned, and he himself felt that his end was drawing nigh. The severity of the disease entirely prevented any continued attention to heavenly objects, and all the dear sufferer could do was to pray aloud for patience, and a speedy removal to his eternal rest. He at one time expressed a desire that, if it were God's will, he might die on the Sabbath morning, and spend that holy day in the worship of heaven. The disorder continued unabated throughout Saturday, and, after a night of extreme suffering, he ceased coughing about nine o'clock on the morning of Sunday the 18th September. His friends saw that the symptoms of death were upon him, and he was asked if he wished to see any one in particular; he replied, with much emphasis, 'Nobody, nobody, but Jesus Christ. Christ crucified is the stay of my poor soul.' These were the last words he uttered; and at half-past nine he gently breathed his last, according to his desire and prayer, worshipping that Sabbath in heaven!"

Such was the life and such the death of a truly eminent Christian officer, whose whole career, for the last forty years of his life, was marked by that high-toned piety and uniform consistency of character which fitted him to shine as a light in the world, holding forth in his conversation and conduct the word of life.

ALL THINGS FULL OF GOD.

THESE lives and works
A soul in all things, and that soul is God.
The beauties of the wilderness are His,
That make so gay the solitary place,
Where no eye sees them. And the fairer forms,
That cultivation glories in, are His.
He sets the bright procession on its way,
And marshals all the order of the year;
He marks the bounds, which winter may not pass,
And blunts his pointed fury; in its case,
Russet and rude, folds up the tender germ,
Uninjured, with inimitable art;

And, ere one flow'ry season fades and dies,
Designs the blooming wonders of the next.
The Lord of all, himself through all diffused,
Sustains, and is the life of all that lives.
Nature is but a name for an effect,
Whose cause is God. One spirit—His,
Who wore the platted thorns with bleeding brows,
Rules universal nature. Not a flower
But shows some touch, in freckle, streak, or stain,
Of his unrivall'd pencil. He inspires
Their balmy odours, and imparts their hues,
And bathes their eyes with nectar, and includes,
In grains as countless as the sea-side sands,
The forms with which he sprinkles all the earth.
Happy who walks with him! whom what he finds
Of flavour or of scent in fruit or flower,
Or what he views of beautiful or grand
In Nature, from the broad majestic oak
To the green blade that twinkles in the sun,
Prompts with remembrance of a present God.

THE LAMB OF GOD: A DISCOURSE.

BY THE REV. DONALD FERGUSSON,

Minister of Dunnichen, Forfarshire.

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."—JOHN i. 29.

LET us now allude, more specially, to the means whereby this Lamb of God achieved redemption for man. Redemption may be viewed under a twofold aspect,—1st, As the fruit of a power which He exerted; 2d, As the fruit of a price which He paid. On the one hand, dominion may be usurped; and, for the overthrow of that dominion, it is necessary that power should be opposed to power. On the other hand, a dominion possessed of right may be exercised righteously, and this righteous dominion may be offended; and for the propitiation of this offended authority a ransom must be paid.

Now, in both of these lights, had the Lamb of God to work out salvation for fallen men. Satan had usurped an unrighteous dominion over the sinner, and the Saviour overthrew Satan by his might. God's law, again, had asserted a righteous claim to man's obedience, and man had contemned its authority; and to the violated honour of this law had the Saviour to make satisfaction. The former, as I have said, the Saviour conquered by his power; the latter, he appeased by a price. When, therefore, the Saviour came to redeem his people from the power of sin, he entered into a deadly contest with the great enemy of souls. By his "obedience unto death," he baffled all the temptations, and foiled all the plans, of the adversary. All his venom and malignity were concentrated against the divine Redeemer; and when he died, all the enmity of sin, all the power of Satan, were overthrown. Others conquer by a life of triumph—he conquered by a death of anguish and of ignominy; for, on his cross, "he overcame principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it." Sin, who had struggled with, and wounded the glorious Redeemer—sin himself fell exhausted in the conflict, and the Saviour crushed the serpent in his fall. By his very death, he made Death himself a prey. True, he went down to the sepulchre in humiliation; but as sin had no temptations that could seduce him, so neither had death terrors that could appal; nay, the king of terrors himself was affrighted at the glory of his victim, and allowed some of his captives to escape. Amid the mysteries of the tomb, the career of the Saviour was one of success; and, at last, he burst forth with all the might and the majesty of a conqueror, arrayed in the spoils of victory, and bearing the treasures of redemption, as trophies of his triumph; so that his redeemed ones can now raise the exulting anthem, "Thou hast ascended on high; thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God should dwell among them." And even now are heaven, and earth, and hell together raising a united testimony to the completeness of those triumphs, which the victorious Redeemer has achieved. Heaven gives its testimony by its crowds of grateful worshippers; hell bears its testimony by sin's bruised head, and death's broken sting, and despair's rifled chambers; and earth bears her testimony by her thousands of rejoicing believers, who are looking and longing for the day when they also shall be made "conquerors, through him that loved them."

Thus, then, did the Lamb of God accomplish the overthrow of Satan; and this is one of the elements of that redemption, whereby he took "away the sin of the world." But when the justice of Jehovah appeared, claiming satisfaction for a violated law, the Saviour resisted not its demands. He acknowledged that the claim was righteous; and, therefore, he offered a price, in order to make expiation—he offered a ransom, in order to purchase salvation; yea, he offered himself, his body and his soul, as a sacrifice. When, therefore, he appeared as an atonement for the sinner, all the transgressions of an elected world were imputed to him. "He bare our sins," saith the believer, "in his own body, on the tree." In his people's stead, he assumed them as his own; and who can tell the depths of our Saviour's agony, when he felt himself laden and bowed down by that load which his righteous soul abhorred?—when he felt the combined guilt of the past and the future transgressions of an elect world clinging closely to him? Our blessed Lord, however, participated in nothing of sin, except its pain; this, however, he experienced to the full. The consequences of sin were all tasted by him—hunger and thirst, weakness and want, weariness and woe. Satan allured with unholy suggestions the pure desires of his human nature; while his righteous soul, loathing alike the tempter and the temptation, was often plunged into grief, and gloom, and depression. Men tortured and persecuted him, while his generous heart mourned over the perversity of the beings whom he came to save; and, at last, the agonies of the cross, and the pangs of dissolution, closed the scene of his bodily anguish! Of all the woes that sin had brought upon the body the divine Saviour tasted. "In all our afflictions he was afflicted;" for "he neither despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted." But, severe as were these visitations which he experienced at the hands of men and of devils, yet were not these the bitterest pangs which he had to undergo. Men did their worst to torture—Satan exerted all his skill to seduce, all his might to overcome; but when earth and hell had vented their united fury upon the Redeemer, the Father himself came forward, to exercise his righteous indignation against those sins which his well-beloved Son had assumed as his own! In the midst of his deepest afflictions, "it pleased the Lord, even his Father, to bruise him!" Oh, then was the hour of his sorest trial, when his Father hid his face! Then was fulfilled the fearful prophecy, "Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin." Then was it that, in his deep desertion, he exclaimed, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." This it was that drew from him the pleadings of agony, "How is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour! If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But it was not possible! It was not possible that God's law should remain unfulfilled—God's honour tarnished—God's mercy unemployed; and, therefore, did not the Father abate one jot or tittle of the punishment which sin had merited, spotless and beloved though the sufferer was! The cup of trembling was in his hands, and that cup required to be drained to the dregs; the fire of wrath had descended to consume the sacrifice, nor were its flames withdrawn until they had scorched away all the transgressions of an elected world; and oh, what heart of man can conceive, what tongue of angel can describe—nay, what but the Eternal Mind itself can comprehend, the agony of that hour of desertion, which wrung from his lips the cry of anguish, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" At last, the sacrifice is closed—at last, the avenging fire is quenched, and for ever, towards the faithful; but not until the Lamb of God, with expiring voice, declared his work complete, "and bowed his head, and gave up the ghost." And not merely has the Saviour himself declared his work complete, but the Father has given evidence of his complete satisfaction therewith, in that "he hath highly exalted him, and given him a name that is above every name;" so that the Lamb of God, when "he had by himself purged our sins, hath now sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," where he still retains the Mediator's nature and exercises the Mediator's office. And not only so, but the Father's satisfaction is manifest in his acceptance of all such as come to him, claiming an interest in this all-sufficient sacrifice. He is holding out to men, not denunciations of wrath because of transgression, but, like Noah's dove, he now holds forth the olive-leaf of peace, proclaiming that the deluge of sin is abated, and that there is ample security in Christ Jesus, the ark of the sinner's hope.

Thus, then, my friends, has Christ Jesus not merely set before us an open door of access unto the Father's presence—not merely has he purchased salvation for as many as believe, but he has actually purchased themselves. "Souls were the hire" which he laboured for. He has bought them at full value—he has paid for them the full price. "With his own blood has he purchased his Church;" so that, as aforesaid, God could not be a just God if he pardoned the unrighteous; now God cannot be a just God, if he refuse to grant a free pardon and a gracious welcome to all those whose salvation has been purchased by the blood of sprinkling.

But here, it may be asked, If "the Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the world," why are not all equally benefited? And what, my friends, is the reason? Just because all will not receive the offered gift. Is not the invitation free as the winds of heaven? Is not the offer universal as the sun's bright radiance? Is not the call tender as the melody of the upper sanctuary? "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth!" And the "Spirit and the Bride say, Come; and let him that heareth say, Come; and let him that is athirst, come; and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye will find rest unto your souls; for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." And, to confirm these gracious invitations, are there not thousands who are ready to testify, that as soon as they asked, they were answered—that as soon as they sought, they found—that as soon as they knocked, the door of mercy was opened to admit them? Yea, every individual who has received the Saviour, is able to testify, "He was crucified for my offences, he was raised for my justification." And if so be, then is it not true that every reprobate, who refuses to listen to these invitations, is just trampling under foot the charter of redemption, which has been sealed by the blood of the Lamb of God?

It is quite true that, in a saving sense, Christ has died only for those who are "given to him of the Father." It is quite true that of these, and these only, he speaketh, when he saith, "For their sakes, I sanctify myself" (as a sacrifice), "that they also might be sanctified, through the truth." It is perfectly true that for these, and these only, he made satisfaction; for what saith the Father, by the mouth of his prophet? "For the transgressions of my people was he stricken." It is perfectly true that it is for these, and for these only, that he presents his intercessions in his Father's presence; and it is only those who have been justified by his blood that have a right and title to believe, with the apostle, that they "have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the Righteous." It is perfectly true that there is a roll of elected ones, whom God hath chosen unto everlasting life. All this is true; but equally true is it, that no man has ever seen that record wherein the catalogue of the elected is enrolled, and that the decree of election shall be a barrier in the way of none, who really and truly wish to obtain a participation in the blessings of the Saviour's purchase.

In offering, therefore, Christ Jesus to sinners, we have nothing whatever to do with these eternal purposes of God, which are hidden; all we have to do with is this fact, which God has written in his Word as with a sunbeam,—that the obedience and sufferings of the Lamb of God, considered in themselves, are, on account of the infinite dignity of the Saviour's person, of a value that is incalculable; that every man and every woman under heaven will find them to be so, if they seek an interest in them; and that, on the other hand, if a man voluntarily and perversely reject the promised gift, then is that man's damnation of his own choosing. With the revealed benefits, then, and not with the mysteries of the covenant, have we to do; and the first benefit which we meet with, is a free and a full offer of grace to every sinner under heaven,—a faithful promise, that the Lamb of God taketh away the sins of every human being that accepteth his salvation; that he "taketh away the sin of the world,"—the sin not of the Jew only, but also of the Gentile; that he "taketh away the sin of the world,"—even the sin with which an ungodly world has tainted the souls of his redeemed people; that he "taketh away the sin of the world,"—even the world of the elected unto everlasting life: and here, in the name of God, and by authority from his Word, am I privileged to say, that every man and woman in this house of God is of this elected number, if they obey the Baptist's injunction—"Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world."

Thus, then, brethren, is the Lamb of God the author and finisher of redemption; upon the cross he achieved it—when he was lifted up as a sacrifice between earth and heaven; to the one, offering satisfaction; to the other, publishing salvation. Yea, there is salvation in his name; for he is Jesus, the Saviour of his people from their sins. There is salvation in his acts; for he has come as the Lamb of God, and by the sacrifice of himself, he has averted the wrath of the Father; by the price of his blood he has purchased the redemption from the penalty of sin; while, as the Lion of the tribe of Judah, he has combated and conquered all the soul's enemies, and gained his people's deliverance from the plague and pollution of their trespasses. There is salvation in his words; for they are words of mercy, and his promises are full of tenderness. "I," saith he, "even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgression, for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins."

III. But, in the last place, let us now, very briefly, attend to what was proposed as the third

head of Discourse; the invitation "behold" the Saviour, in his character as "the Lamb of God."—I have already attempted to point out to you the source of the sacrifice—the grace of God; I have told you of the sacrifice itself—the Lamb of God; I have explained the object of the sacrifice—the removal of the sins of the world; let me now speak of the manner in which you are to appropriate the benefits of this sacrifice.

You are to behold him—to behold him "as the Lamb slain;" you are to look to him with the eye of faith—for by faith alone are you able to obtain a participation in that redemption which grace has provided, for "by grace are ye saved, through faith." You are accustomed to gather the emotions of the heart from the expression of the countenance; whether they be the meltings of sympathy, or the anguish of bereavement, or the awakenings of terror, or the glow of tenderness, or the eagerness of desire, that animate the heart; and even so does the heart of the Christian speak, in the very look which it directs to the Saviour.

Oh! naturally our souls are blind to all this; and unless we receive the eye-salve of the Spirit of God, never shall we be able to obtain a saving view of Christ Jesus. But let a soul be once awakened, by the preaching of repentance, to a sense of its transgression; let a soul be quickened to a perception of its danger, and to a dread of coming doom; let a soul be thus startled from its slumbers of carnal security, and led to cry out, with the disciples of the Baptist of old, "And what shall I do?"—oh! when a soul is led thus to acknowledge its poverty, its pain, and peril, and, amidst tremblings and tears, to seek relief, then, how gladly will he listen to the gracious invitation—"Behold the Lamb of God!"

1. The first look, therefore, which the awakened soul directs towards the Saviour is a look of desire—an earnest longing after Him who is the soul's only refuge. And when the sinner, under such awakenings, has turned his eye to the Redeemer, the first feeling in the soul of the penitent is, an appalling sense of his distance from the Saviour, and a hopelessness of ever reaching this city of refuge. The language of the penitent sinner is, Will he look on me, who have so dishonoured him? Will he ever help me, who have strayed so far from him? Will he have pity upon me, who have had so little pity for myself? Oh! then he thinks that there can be none so helpless, so desolate, so despairing, as himself. He sees Christ able and willing to save every other; but he trembles as he lifts up his eyes to gaze upon that merciful Saviour whom he has so often pierced by his trespasses; nor dare he appropriate to his own soul the same free and full offer of deliverance which has cheered the heart of others. But although thus the eye wherewith he attempts to look to the Redeemer may be dimmed with tears, still does he look, and long, and pray; amidst doubts and misgivings he may oftentimes lose even the faint glimpse which he had of the Saviour, but still he presses on; and having once seen, he still seeks: and such faithful and earnest desires never fail, in the end, of being gratified. Fear not, brethren, although the day of comfort may be deferred; fear not, though you have to sow in tears; fear not, though your first glimpses of Christ may be weak, although your first perceptions of his beauty and of his mercy may be faint and dim; let it be yours to obey the advice of the Psalmist—to "wait upon the Lord," to "be of good courage," believing that "he will strengthen your hearts." Let your gaze be earnest and incessant; and even as you look, the light from the cross will reach your hearts, refreshing and cheering you; and, having once found comfort there, you will always be resorting thither, for larger manifestations of the Redeemer's goodness; and the oftener you apply, the more shall you be welcome.

2. But again, this look, which you are called on to direct to the Saviour, is a look of love—love towards him who first loved us. It is fear, unquestionably, that first of all induces the sinner to look to the Saviour—fear of God's righteous indignation—fear of hell's consuming fire; but although it be fear that induces the sinner to seek safety in the Saviour's cross, still, it is not fear that keeps him there. A perception of the Redeemer's love produces, in its turn, a responsive glow of affection in the heart of the sinner towards the Saviour. Love increases upon intercourse, until the believing soul regards the Saviour as "the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely."

The believer's love to his Lord combines all that is beautiful in those elements of affection whereof the heart of man is susceptible. It is a brother's love which the believer feels towards Jesus. He is our brother, as well as our Saviour; he has been our brother in sorrow, and is about to become our brother in glory. In him, "we are begotten of God unto righteousness and true holiness;" becoming "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." It is a son's love to a parent which the believer feels towards Jesus. We are his spiritual offspring, receiving from him the seed of grace within us, and daily experiencing at his hand the watchful care, the support, the protection, which a parent bestows on his child. It is the love of an espoused one, which the believer feels towards Jesus. "Thy Maker," O believer, "is thy husband; the Lord of hosts is his name." And the language of the Church regarding him is, "Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips; therefore God hath blessed thee for evermore."

Thus, then, does the believer's love to his Lord combine all the elements of affection. The firm friendship of brotherhood is tempered by the devoted reverence of filial affection; and both are knit together by the burning fervour of conjugal love.

3. But farther: this look which you are invited to direct to the Saviour is a look of confidence. Love and confidence abide together; as soon, therefore, as the sinner has been united to the Saviour by the bonds of love, the believer will confide implicitly in his Lord's affection—in the preciousness and permanency of his Lord's promises. The believer confides in him, because his satisfaction is all-sufficient—because his intercession is all-prevalent—because his stores of grace are ever full, and ever overflowing—because, having died to purchase blessings for his people, he now lives to bestow them. The believer confides in him, because he is unchangeable, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever"—because his salvation never faileth—because his intercession never wearies—because his love never cools—because "he is able to save to the very uttermost all those that come unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Therefore has the believer confidence, in looking to the Lamb of God; for in every season of exigency and trial, in every season of doubt or of fear, by looking unto Christ he never fails of obtaining the desired relief.

Are you, then, panting with thirstings after righteousness, in this wilderness of sin? "Behold the Lamb of God!" He is the spiritual Horeb, ever pouring forth streams of living waters. Are your consciences still smarting under the wounds of "the old serpent, the devil?" Then, "Behold the Lamb of God." Look to the brazen serpent that hangs on Calvary, giving life to the dying, and health to the diseased. Is sin accusing you? Look not to your sins, but "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world;" and say, He hath taken away my sins—he hath carried them away into "a land not inhabited." Is Satan trying to tempt, or to terrify your souls? "Behold the Lamb of God," bleeding and dying on the cross, and say, Lo! this is the Captain of my salvation; he broke my chains, and ended my captivity. Or, are the terrors of the Lord upon you? Do the fears of judgment appal your souls? Again would I say, "Behold the Lamb of God." Point to the altar and to the sacrifice, and cry, "Behold, O God, my shield, and look upon the face of thine Anointed."

Oh! the Christian never wearies in this exercise of faith, in this exercise of looking at his Lord; he is never willing to withdraw his gaze of rapture. As he looketh, peace enters into his troubled soul; as he looketh, conscience is charmed into silence; as he looketh, the face of an offended God begins to smile; as he looketh, heaven begins to unclose, and the bright prospects of a far eternity are disclosed to view; as he looketh, his faith becomes stronger, his hopes become brighter, his love becomes warmer, and all his spiritual graces are awakened into more lively exercise.

Such, then, brethren, are the blessings which are imparted by a saving view of this Lamb of God; and let me merely remind you, that the invitation to behold him is universal. "Look unto me," saith the Redeemer, "and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." Allow me, then, to ask you, brethren, have ye beheld this Lamb of God?

Have ye seen this "Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world?" Have you seen him taking away your sins? Say, have ye looked to Calvary? Have ye looked to the Cross? If so, then what did you behold? Did you behold the Lamb of God, wounded, and bleeding, and dying—yea, wounded, and bleeding, and dying, for you, in order that your souls might be revived and redeemed? And are you now shrinking from a salvation which has been purchased with such bitterness, and such blood? Why brethren, should you shrink from that upon which God smiled?—even the fulfilling of his law—the magnifying of his justice—the free exercise of his sovereign mercy. Oh! brethren, shrink not from looking, shrink not from beholding this scene of woe. Shrink only from rejecting the tender proffers of this sacrificed Redeemer; shrink from reproaching and wounding him anew, by your unbelief; shrink from "crucifying him afresh," by your ungodliness.

But look yet again to the Cross, and what do you behold? See you not that it points to a throne; that a crown of glory hangs over it; and that, under the mantle of suffering, sorrowing humanity, the Lamb of God, who hangs upon that cross, has concealed the might and the majesty of the God? Brethren, the glory of your Saviour is his cross; Calvary was the path to his crown; his woes and his shame are the foundations of his triumphs.

Behold him on Mount Zion! We can picture forth but little of the glory of that habitation of blessedness; but "the beloved disciple" hath somewhat withdrawn the veil. Behold, around the throne, the company of worshippers! Their number is "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands;" but the redeemed of the Lord are nearest to the throne, and loudest in their praise. "And I beheld," saith John, "and lo! in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain." He is there, brethren, with the traces of his weakness and of his woes; and these form the subject of the anthem that echoes day and night in the vast sanctuary of heaven. "And they sung a new song, saying, with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing."

Oh! then, brethren, seeing that the Church of the Redeemer in heaven are raising such a chaunt of thanksgiving, let the Church of the Redeemer on earth respond, in notes of holy harmony, and sing, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and the Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

Diligently use the means of Grace.—Remember the eunuch of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, who albeit he was of a wild and barbarous country, and occupied with worldly duties and business; yet, riding in his chariot, he was reading the Scripture. Now consider, if this man, passing in his journey, was so diligent as to read the Scriptures, what thinkest thou, is it likely he was wont to do so sitting at home? Again, he that read, albeit he did not understand; what did he then, thinkest thou, after that, when he had learned and gotten understanding? For that thou mayest well know that he understood not what he read, hearken what Philip saith there unto him, Understandest thou what thou redest? And he, nothing ashamed to confess his ignorance, answered, How should I understand, having nobody to show me the way? Lo, when he lacked one to show him the way, and to expound to him the Scriptures, yet did he read; and, therefore, God the rather provided for him a guide of the way, that taught him to understand it. God perceived his willing and toward mind, and therefore he speedily sent him a teacher. Therefore let no man be negligent about his own health and salvation. Though thou have not Philip always when thou wouldst, the Holy Ghost, who then moved and stirred up Phillip, will be ready and not fail thee, if thou do thy diligence accordingly.—ARCHBISHOP CROMMER.

Sin, and its effects.—The evil effects of sin are graphically described by the peniel of Jehovah in his revealed will, that sinners may take warning. In Psalm vii. 12, the Lord speaks of his enemies, that if they turn not he will whet his glittering sword. Here is one instrument. "He hath bent his bow, and made it ready,"—one in a state of readiness, and the other to be made ready. "He hath also prepared for them the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against them;"—showing us that God, who has his quiver full of all the shafts of justice, will eventually visit his enemies. His bow is in his hand at the present moment; it is already bent; the shafts of his vengeance will soon be laid upon it, and they will continue to fly through the countless ages of eternity, and will find their mark, without one exception, in the centre of that bosom which has delighted in sin here on earth.—HOWELS.

The benefits of affliction.—Afflictions are God's most effectual means to keep us from losing our way to our heavenly rest. Without this hedge of thorns on the right and left, we should hardly keep the way to heaven. If there be but one gap open, how ready are we to find it, and turn out at it! When we grow wanton, or worldly, or proud, how doth sickness or other affliction reduce us? Every Christian, as well as Luther, may call affliction one of his best schoolmasters, and with David may say, "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word." Many thousand recovered sinners may cry, O healthful sickness! O comfortable sorrows! O gainful hope! O enriching poverty! O blessed day that ever I was afflicted! Not only the green pastures and still waters, but the rod and staff, they comfort us. Though the word and Spirit do the main work, yet suffering so unbolts the door of the heart, that the word hath easier entrance.—REV. R. BAXTER.

CURSORY REMINISCENCES OF THE CONTINENT—FRANCE.

By D. D. SCOTT, Esq.

No. II.

NORMANDY, at an early period, was one of those districts of France in which both the Romanist and Reformed religions were represented by men of great learning and ability, and where mutual toleration largely prevailed. The academy at Caen is said to have owed its origin to the influence of such sentiments—it being intended as a common ground, on which both parties might meet and appreciate each other's love of learning and friendly dispositions. The terms of respect and friendship with which the learned men, on both sides, spoke of each other, indicate a state of society much resembling what now prevails in many countries and courts, not excepting the British Parliament. No doubt, persecution then appeared a thing too absurd and abominable, ever to be tolerated by the calm and enlightened minds of Normandy. But events soon proved that the educational and monastic institutions of the Popedom, with its one idea of universal domination, inculcated and cherished, under the shade of gloomy and tyrannical socialism, are ever ready to pour abroad over Christendom, and to insinuate into all the avenues of civil and ecclesiastical government, principles and agents tending to intolerance and persecution. Were Protestants as familiar with the lessons and the training pursued in Papal seminaries, as they are with the candour and toleration of the Romanists when they meet with in the business of life, they would less wonder that the apparent cordiality indicated by such memorials as the Porroniana, should have been followed so soon by the incipient persecution which we find so well detailed in the Life of the celebrated Du Bose of Caen, and by the horrible atrocities which disgraced Normandy, as well as other provinces in France, about the middle of the eighteenth century, although that province was mildly dealt with, compared with others, during the dragoonades of the preceding century.

Calais and Boulogne seem to be decidedly the most Anglified points on which a Briton can set foot on the French shore. Dieppe—so interesting to Scotchmen from its associations with John Knox, and now the Brighton of Paris, the most fashionable resort of Parisian loungers during the bathing season—I have never seen. As for Havre, which lies, like Dundee, at the confluence of an estuary with the ocean, and on a flat shore backed by steep rising grounds, it possesses many interesting features. Knowing it to be the Liverpool of the north of France, remembering its commercial connection with Paris, and that it is the entrepôt between the United States and other countries beyond sea, and vast inland territories extending as far as Lyons, we were surprised at the comparative insignificance of its trade, as indicated by the number and size of the vessels in its basins, and still more surprised were we to find so few of these French. Indeed, all seemed foreign, with the exception of a few old, dirty, ill-equipped Indianes, and some handsome whalers, employed in that traffic with the encouragement of large bounties from the Government. Havre was founded by Francis the First, and soon grew into importance, especially under the administration of Colbert. But Popery and Paris had not then blighted the commercial prosperity of the provinces of France. Had the maritime population of the northern coast, which, about two hundred years ago, we are told, was almost exclusively Protestant, been left unmolested, very different would Havre have been now. With such a country behind, it might have exceeded Liverpool, in the extent of its commerce, as much as France, in extent of surface, exceeds England.

Havre has lain open to our commerce, and might be expected to show the same signs of intercourse with our ports, that instantly strike one on arriving at Rotterdam; yet, with plenty of United States ships, it hardly shows a single British. The awe of Portsmouth and Plymouth, even after the lapse of a quarter of a century, seems to freeze the channels of intercourse, which, by this time, might otherwise have been opened up, and multiplied until every tide brought in and carried out one or more vessels from and to our shores. But this non-intercourse is owing neither to the fears nor to the jealousy of the Normans, who are too brave to dread, and too proud of their ancestral connection with England, to dislike our countrymen. The fear and the jealousy lie higher up the Seine, higher even than Rouen; they are to be found among the French, or rather the Gauls, of Paris, who now make laws for all France, and in that respect are really the oppressors of the still fertile, and once powerful and intelligent Normandy, even while eager to make its ports wealthy and flourishing in the interests of the kingdom, as if these could consist with a narrow and jealous policy.

I had seen what peace had done for Holland, for Belgium, for a considerable part of Germany, and for several of the Swiss towns and cantons. In all these cases, capital and industry, flowing in a thousand quiet channels, are fast obliterating the blight and ruin caused by the stagnation as well as by the havoc of war. And, no doubt, great improvements had been made, and were still in progress, at Havre. But the town itself seems to lie dull and torpid, while docks are excavating and quays forming for its trade. You can see it is not the public spirit of the place, but a distant policy that is doing all this—not Havre, in fact, but Paris.

It is indeed extraordinary, that, in spite of all its advantages, Havre, with only thirty thousand inhabitants, should be so much inferior, in point of population, even to Dundee, which it resembles so much in its site; and still more remarkable did it appear, to meet no fewer than three vessels from the Tay, coming down on the first occasion of our ascending the Seine, and to be informed that a good deal of the carrying trade of that river is done in Scotch vessels.

There are but two Roman Catholic churches in Havre; besides which, beyond the fortifications on the landward side, as we went up a steep road to enjoy the view from the rising grounds, we passed an ancient and venerable-looking church, or chapel. Even the Roman Catholic religion seems to be at a low ebb; depending for its very existence, we should think, far more on the force of habit and deference to established usages, than on conviction, even in the priests. That in this part of France, however, there is some disposition to religious inquiry may be seen from the partial success of the Evangelical Society's agent, M. Panchand, and various other circumstances. The following incident reveals a state of mind which we believe to be far from uncommon in many parts of France. I was alone in one part of the Paris diligence as it stopped at Boulogne, when two passengers entered; the one, a heavy-looking man, who growled forth something about "esprits bien faibles," in alluding to a religious tract having been offered to him at the door; the other was a tall middle-aged man, with fine features, a nobly formed head, and an expression in which intelligence and susceptibility were strongly blended. On hearing the remark made about the feeble-mindedness of persons who could occupy themselves with the distribution of religious tracts, I put down a book which I had been trying to read, and said, it was curious that irreligion should be thought the mark of a strong mind on the French side of the Channel, while on the English it was associated with weakness and shallowness of intellect. This called forth a second growl from the first spokesman, who threw himself into a corner, and seemed more disposed for sleep than conversation. Not so the Norman, as I set him down to be, from his marked resemblance to the finest specimens of the Norman race, as exhibited in the nobles of England. He eagerly caught at the words as they fell from my lips; but hardly had we begun to converse on the subject when the diligence stopt, and an old lady entered, who during the two hours or so that she was with us, wholly engrossed the handsome gentleman with the volubility of a tongue at once female and frank. On her leaving the coach, our friend informed us that the lady's eloquence, which the confidential tone she assumed had prevented me from attending to, had been expended in a fruitless attempt to prevail on him to propose for her daughter! An Englishman would have laughed at this, as a joke; but it seemed to be any thing but a joke to the poor Frenchman, who gave us to know, that both mother and daughter had become sufficiently annoying to him. The old lady's departure, meanwhile, gave us an opportunity of resuming our conversation; of which my friend eagerly availed himself. He had never been in Britain, and put many pertinent questions, relating to our domestic and religious usages;—Whether the Bible was really held in such respect as he had been told? Whether it were daily read by families and individuals? How the Sunday was observed? Whether religion was a matter of conviction with many?—He put these questions with all the seriousness of a man who was in earnest, and frankly said he would give the world to have faith; but he found his mind totally unsettled, and unable, he feared, to arrive at any fixed belief. I said, that no one could wonder at the wide prevalence of infidelity in France, who was aware of the persevering pains that had been long employed, by the Jesuits particularly, to demonstrate to the youth of the country, that there could be no religious convictions worth trusting to, except an implicit and unreasoning faith in their Church; a principle which, however it might be adopted by a few minds prone to credulity, and fain to lay hold of any thing that might supply the want of enlightened and conscientious conviction, was sure to revolt the greater number, and to throw them into absolute scepticism. This he acknowledged, and wished to know how we treated the evidences: on which I gave him, as distinctly as I could from memory, a sketch of the plan on which our chief writers on the evidences conduct their proofs—including Paley, Butler, Chalmers, T. Erskine, &c. To all I had to say he listened with great interest, and took from me the address of Mr Risler, the Protestant bookseller in Paris; from whom he was to purchase what books of that description he could find in French.

How is Protestantism represented in Havre? I found two professedly Protestant Churches; the one, the temple, as the churches of the Reformés are still called, with a pastor salaried by the Government as a preacher of the doctrines set forth in the Rochelle Confession, and yet notoriously an enemy of those doctrines—as illiberal, exclusive, and so forth; the other, a handful of people, meeting in what was little better than a large upper ware-room, under the pastoral care of M. Panchand, a Vaudois, holding the Rochelle doctrines, with the most profound conviction of their truth, but neither owned nor paid by the State. I was farther gratified by visiting a school taught by a lady from the United States, and designed for poor children using the English language, and resident in Hâvre. That was on my first visit to Hâvre; when, also, I heard the Rev. Dr Buckland of Oxford, of geological celebrity, preach to the English in Hâvre, in the temple of the Reformed Church. The congregation was large and respectable.

Honfleur, on the other side of what we should call the frith of Seine, is a much more ancient town than Hâvre, and consists of a number of narrow steep streets, huddled together about and above some antique jetties and basins, and these again overtopped by hanging woods and orchards, giving to the whole scene an aspect of the richest and most picturesque description. Such an old-fashioned inn as the White Horse, we thought we had never seen, and a fine specimen of the old Norman cunning we had in the landlord, who first got us to take up our quarters for the night in his hostelry, saying, we might start next morning by the steamer for Rouen, which would touch at Honfleur; and then on the arrival of a coach that same night for Rouen, in which he had a share, inducing us to make sure and go by it, as the mists on the river would positively prevent the steamer from fulfilling its engagement. Alarmed at the prospect of detention, we took our places in the diligence, but found we had to pay for our night's quarters, nevertheless! It was some consolation for having been so outwitted, that the rogue belonged to the race which, by superior acuteness, had found its way to almost every throne in Europe; but none to be so jaded by furious driving on deep, sandy, uneven roads, as to be hardly able to crawl out on reaching Rouen, and there to find the steamer, which was to have brought us, arrive in the course of a glorious day, after having duly touched at Honfleur, in spite of the morning vapours.

We had some time to spend at Honfleur before the zoming up of the diligence, and amused ourselves during the evening with an excursion through its narrow streets with their truly ancient-looking shops, and along the shore, towards the south-west. On leaving the town you have your choice of ascending a steep path or of keeping on the same level along a road which skirts the shore from which it is separated only on the right by a strip of wooded broken ground, through whose openings you see the Seine expanding itself into the channel. A steep slope on the left, ascends to a sort of table-land, crowned with noble trees, and the point which looks most out to the sea is rendered conspicuous by an immense cross and chapel dedicated to Our Lady of Grace. To this, on his rounding his way up the Seine, the superstitious mariner directs his eye and his devotions; and exactly as of old, under the absolute domination of paganism, the chapel walls are studded with thanksgiving and votive offerings to this lady of grace for escape from shipwreck, &c., while on the descent towards the town, cider and wine shops prove that Bacchus as well as our lady is wont to have offerings, or rather libations poured out to him by the same class. An open shop close to the chapel is stored with a vast variety of gewgaws and nicknacks, offered for sale as memorials of the spot, and from among these I purchased a few small cups ingeniously turned from the outer shell of the cocoa nut; having first clambered our way directly up the acclivity through rocks and wild thyme, to the no small amazement of a party of ladies and gentlemen, who had gone up by the proper path. While seated on one of the benches, placed among the trees for the convenience of those who resort to the spot in fine weather, and enjoying the magnificent view of the sea, we observed a gay young lady, who had come up leaning on a young gentleman's arm, suddenly dart from him to the step at the foot of the cross, and having spent a few minutes in apparently profound devotion, she rose in an instant and was again by the side of the gentleman she had left, and was laughing and coquetting as before with all imaginable gaiety. The worship was no doubt paid to the Virgin, and knowing how much such worship has come in the place of that formerly rendered to one of the heathen goddesses, we seemed as if taken back to the times of ancient paganism. Although a full length figure of our Lord was represented on the cross, outside the church there was one of the Virgin and child, which seemed to be regarded with exceeding veneration. Altogether we had enjoyed a most delightful walk, but as we wended back into the town, we could not but feel oppressed at the thought of the thick and inveterate superstitious proofs which we had witnessed, that there were "dark places of the earth" so near our own shores. We learned that a good many English had found their way to Honfleur, and that some were actually residing in the town; with what influence on the popular religion we could not learn. Caen, which is at no great distance, has happily had the privilege, for many years back, of enjoying the ministry of an excellent and spirited reformed pastor, M. Martin Rollin, one of the eight who, in 1836, wrote from Paris to our General Assembly an excellent letter, till now, we fear, unanswered. Quite on the other side of Hâvre, at the small town of Bolbec, M. de Felice was for several years settled in the same capacity, but that accomplished person has lately been transferred, as a professor, to Montauban. Towards our own channel islands, Cherbourg has a Protestant pastor and minister; and near to that, Siouville was some years ago the scene of an extraordinary secession from Rome, which has issued in the formation of a new Protestant Church. The Channel Islands, in fact, forming part of the diocese of Winchester, are now the abodes of much active Protestantism, and may eventually exercise a most propitious influence on Normandy. We regretted that we could not visit Caen, Avranches, and other interesting towns in that direction, though the perusal of Davis's "First Impressions" had given them a fresh interest.

THE ADAPTATION OF THE BIBLE TO THE PHYSICAL CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

BY THE EDITOR.

PART II.

In making the remarks we have already offered on the manifestation of abstract truth to the senses, both in the ancient economy and in the introduction of the new, we must by no means be understood as adverting to the ultimate design for which such a mode of instruction was adopted. It may be adduced, nevertheless, as a striking proof of the remarkable adaptation which obtains between Scripture truth and the physical constitution of man. One great end, no doubt, of the symbolic representations of the Old Testament, and of the parabolic figures of the New, was to conceal to some extent the doctrines thus emblematically inculcated. It was not expedient, in existing circumstances, to develop fully and without a figure, certain truths which it was still expedient, nevertheless, dimly to reveal. And, accordingly, the mode of teaching singled out was strikingly fitted to accomplish at once both these important purposes. It so far concealed the truth as to give merely a figurative representation of it, and thus performed the part of a judicial veil, covering the hearts of the people; and it so far made known the truth as to give a sensible, and therefore an impressive and permanent view of it. An abstract conception might have soon faded from the mind, and more especially if the subject with which it was connected was imperfectly understood; not so, however, when it was incessantly held forth by some striking emblem to the senses of the Jews.

The very fact that the Gospel scheme was so imperfectly made known, rendered it more improbable that any strong or abiding impression of its reality and truth would be preserved upon the mind; but, by being thus mingled up with all that they saw, and heard, and felt in the material world around them, and being repeatedly exhibited to their view in beautiful and befitting figures, it came in for a share in the operation of the ordinary laws of thought and emotion. A permanence was given to the conceptions of the people, in so far as they were correct, and an opportunity was afforded them of attaining a more complete and accurate acquaintance with the subject by minute and prayerful examination.

But why, it may be asked, if this adaptation of Scripture truth to our physical nature be so remarkably advantageous, was the Jewish economy brought to an end? The answer may be drawn from the remarks we have already made. It was suited to an age in which the physical prevailed over the intellectual energies of man—it was suited to people among whom, from whatever cause, the tendencies to materialism in their ideas were peculiarly strong—it was suited to the exhibition of a class of truths, the clear development of which belonged to a future age of the world's history, and to which nothing analogous had ever occurred in the past. In its very nature, therefore, the Jewish system was strictly temporary, and as soon, of course, as the purpose of its appointment was accomplished, it was for ever abrogated and annulled. The type gave place to the antitype—the shadow to the substance; instead of the grossly material economy of Moses was substituted the clearer and more spiritual economy of Christ.

The period had now arrived when the most impressive display was to be made, before the eyes of man, of the character and dispensations of the Almighty. The Son of God, the express image of the Father, assumed the human form, and was clothed in the nature of man. Hitherto the Deity had adopted various modes of representing himself to our bodily senses, and conveying through a medium suited to the materiality of our constitution, those truths which, abstract though they were, it was absolutely necessary that we should know. In the mission and mediation of the Son,
