PREFACE.

PREFACE.

THE present volume includes a more interesting series of accounts than did the last, though, as might be expected from the unsettled state of the country at the period dealt with, there are several blanks, some of these unfortunately occurring just at the very times they would have been of value. At the opening of the volume Kirkcaldy of Grange is still in office as Treasurer, an appointment which he had held since 1538. He gives up the first account, which extends from 7th September 1541 to 16th August 1542. After this the accounts have been lost, but a few loose leaves which have been found in a bundle of miscellaneous papers in the Register House supply details for the months of November and December of the last mentioned year, up to the date of the King's death, which occurred on 14th December 1542. We get some glimpses of the funeral expenses and mourning habits, but the accounts are evidently far from complete. Then follows the disbursement on wine for the King and sundry costs for the outfit and provisioning of ships. After this is the discharge side of another account of Kirkcaldy, the charge side being amissing, which begins in January 1542-3 and goes down to the beginning of the June following. There is then another blank for the space of two months, but the story is taken up by an account which begins in 3rd August 1543 and extends to 1st October 1546, an unusually long period of time for one account to cover. Kirkcaldy had fallen from power owing to the enmity of Cardinal Beaton, and John Hamilton, a natural son of James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, had been appointed in his place. He was at the time of his appointment only thirty-three years old, and though he is, in the preamble to the account, designated Bishop of Dunkeld, he had not when he became Treasurer attained to that rank, but was Commendator and Abbot of Paisley. His career is a matter of history, as he was one of the leading men of his time. Made Archbishop of St. Andrews, after Beaton's death, he incurred the enmity of the Protestant party, and having been taken prisoner by them at Dumbarton was hanged at Stirling, 7th April 1571. With his first account, which is, as above mentioned, a very long one, the volume closes.

On the 18th October 1541, shortly after the first account in this volume opens, Queen Margaret Tudor, the mother of King James V., expired at Methven, the residence of her third husband, Henry Stewart, who had been created Lord Methven, 17th July 1528. So ended a troubled, stormy, and passionate life. Leaving her English home when she was little more than out of the nursery, she had spent thirty-eight years in Scotland—years which had not redounded to her credit either in the way of her private character or public acts. She had latterly wished to divorce her latest husband, and it was only the influence and decision of the King himself which prevented such a scandal. There is not much notice of her death in the accounts: habits of black satin and black velvet were delivered to the King on 25th October, and on the 30th a “dule gown” was provided for him, with a hood and coat, probably to wear at the funeral, which took place at the Carthusian monastery in Perth. Summonses for attendance at the ceremony were issued on 1st and 5th November to the Earls of Huntly, Marischal, and Moray, and other gentlemen in the north; the Abbots of Newbattle and Melrose, Lord Yester, and the nobles and lairds of the Lothians, the inhabitants of Fife, Strathearn, and Menteith, the Earl of Cassillis, the Lords Semple and Ross, and others in the west. Beyond numerous entries for mourning attire for the King, the Queen, and the Court, there is no other mention of the decease of one who played such a prominent part while she lived in the history of Scotland.

The next few months were historically uneventful, though matters were shaping themselves which were to culminate in the tragedy of Solway Moss. The borders were, as usual, troublesome :

the Provost of Selkirk had been slain by the Kers, and the King evidently intended to go to the south country himself in November, though it is uncertain if the expedition was actually carried out. Meanwhile things went on peacefully enough, so far as the Treasurer's department was concerned. There are the usual lengthy entries month by month in connection with the dresses of the King and Queen. These, though not so elaborate as in the previous reign, were sufficiently magnificent and costly. In November 1541, John Mossman, the goldsmith, got £326 for gold chains and other gold work which had been purchased in France. In the following month there is a curious item of £3 2s. in payment of a clam shell of silver for the King to put his tooth-powder in, which is probably the earliest notice of this toilet luxury in Scotland. A case for toothpicks is mentioned later.¹ A similar, though much more expensive, clam shell was provided at the same time for holding the hawks' meat.²

There is an interesting entry in January 1541-2 of a payment of £400 to Sir David Murray of Balvaird "in recompance of his landis of Dudingstoune tane in to the new park besyde Halyrudehous".³ The credit of the inception of the King's Park must be given to James, and for this cause alone, if for nothing else, his name should be kept green in the memory of the inhabitants of Edinburgh.

There is nothing in the accounts of the opening months of 1542 to presage the misfortune that was hanging over the country. James, influenced by French interests, had failed to meet with the English King at York the summer before, as had at one time been arranged; and Henry was now preparing to strike. But things at the Court seem to have gone on the even tenour of their way. There are the usual entries for dresses, for building expenses, and miscellaneous items. The Queen is evidently, woman-like, fond of sumptuous apparel, and in May the large sum of £67 10s. is paid for fifteen ells of Venetian crimson damask to be a gown for her, while at the same time she gets a kirtle of yellow velvet, and had two chairs covered with red velvet.¹ In June, also, there was a considerable addition made to both the Crowns of the King and Queen, the former having 41½ ounces of Scottish gold added to it and the latter 35 ounces. It is singular that these additions should have been considered necessary, seeing that the King's Crown had been entirely re-made, and the Queen had got a new Crown altogether only two years previously.² At this time considerable amounts were spent upon jewellery and goldsmith's work for the King and Queen. In July the King got no less than four rings, one with a pointed diamond, one with a ruby, another with three emeralds and a diamond, and a fourth with a large sapphire. The first two together cost £9 18s., an exactly similar sum being paid for the one with the emerald and diamond setting, while the sapphire ring alone cost upwards of £16. In addition to these there were some plate for the table, two dozen gold buttons for the King, and apparently the clam shell for the hawks' meat previously mentioned was re-made into a new and bigger receptacle.

¹P. 75.

In July there is little indication in the accounts that the peace of the country was so soon to be disturbed. On the 26th of that month £33 were paid to the laird of Swinton in order that he might make redress for the value of a horse that he had taken from Sir William Ewers, the English Warden, the Commissioners for the Borders having found him liable. But no overt act of hostility had as yet been committed. There were, however, an extra number of letters sent to nobles and lairds both in the south and north, which seem to point to the summoning of an array. Early in August gunners, ammunition, and artillery were sent to the Hermitage Castle, that grim Liddesdale stronghold to which four-and-twenty years after this date James's daughter galloped furiously from Jedburgh to pay a visit of two hours to the severely wounded Bothwell, who was lying there. The inhabitants of the Merse, who had upon warning of danger fled from their homes, were ordered to return to their dwellings and help to defend their country. By the 10th of August matters were getting more acute. John Cob, the messenger, was sent throughout East Lothian to charge the carters, the substitute of the day for the Army Transport Department, to be ready with their horses at twenty-four hours' notice. Letters, too, were sent throughout the land as far west at least as Kyle and Cunningham, and as far north as Aberdeen and Banff. And men were swept in from far further afield : in the west, Dumbarton, Glasgow, Ayr, Irvine, and Whithorn were charged to send boats to bring over the Islanders, who would thus not only swell the ranks of the Scottish army but be kept from the chronic state of rebellion in which they seemed to live at home.¹ Urgent letters were sent to many noblemen, and on 15th August all the tenants and freeholders in Coldingham were ordered to remain there for the defence of the place. Such were the local preparations for the invasion which the Scots must have known was now imminent.

But apart from the mere summoning of men, there is more in the accounts to show that James was not neglecting other measures for the defence of the country. For some time back, as may be seen from the last volume of accounts, much attention had been paid to the preparation and manufacture of artillery. And in the first of the present accounts there is ample evidence to show that much effort was made during the year preceding the King's death to get this branch of the service into a satisfactory state. A Dutchman of the name of William Fandyk seems to have been employed in the casting of guns.¹ But a considerable number were already on hand: in November 1541 no less than four hundred and thirteen hagbuts of the smaller size and eight culverins, together with gunpowder, bullet moulds, and other accessories, were lodged in Edinburgh Castle.² In the following March the ship Mary Willoughby brought home from Flanders a large double cannon with its carriage, but without wheels, and two large culverins of the medium size, with suitable ammunition. The former was so heavy that the team of horses provided for the purpose was unable to drag it up from Leith to the Castle, and the services of a gang of labourers had to be employed in addition.³ What the actual calibre of the double cannon might be it is impossible, except, perhaps, for an artillery expert, to say; but if conditions remained the same about half a century later we find that a cannon royal had a bore of $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches, weighed 8000lbs., and fired a shot of 66lbs. with a charge of 30lbs. of powder. It could only shoot point blank 16 yards, but the "shot randome," as it was called, could carry a distance of 1930 yards. The demi-culverins were only about half the size, and, of course, carried a much lighter bullet, weighing only 9½lbs. Their range, however, was considerably more than the heavier weapon, and they could throw their shot as far as 2500 yards.¹ Not only were guns imported but creditable efforts were made to manufacture them in Edinburgh. For nearly six weeks five men worked under Paris, the gunner, in making a clay mould and running metal into it for the making of a gun. Their first attempt was unsuccessful: the mould proved defective and "the pece felzeit." Not to be baffled, they set to again, and nine men worked for two months at a fresh effort. Again they were doomed to disappointment: "at the quhilk melting the pece failzeit, becaus of the rysing of the spindill efter the metell wes all run." This probably means that something went wrong with the bore, but with true Scottish determination the task was once more tackled. This time the superintendence was not entrusted to Paris, but John de Lyoun, and four men worked strenuously at it for the space of two months and eighteen days. At last success crowned their efforts: the new piece was dragged to the "Cragheid," probably the west part of the Castle rock, to be tested and shot. It passed its trials triumphantly and was dragged back again to the "munitione hous".¹ It may be noted that the cost of the drawing of this gun and another to the place of trial was five shillings, while for bringing them home again only three shillings is put down, the explanation probably being that in one case it was uphill and in the other downhill. The new piece was evidently highly thought of—£13 6s. 8d. was paid for the engraving of the Royal arms, "with unicornis, thrissilis, and flour de lyies" upon it and other pieces. It was mounted upon a carriage of elm wood, which was cut at the "brig of Halis."² This is the last record before the King's death of the actual manufacture of guns in Edinburgh; but on 23rd May sixteen small hagbuts and nine culverins were taken into the Castle, a number augmented in July by the addition of forty-two hagbuts. There are several entries for olive oil used for the preservation in good order of all these guns, a precaution which was undoubtedly needed, as there is reference made to "the auld culveringis quhilkis wer fund in the castell roustit and the rammes brokin," a state of matters not very creditable to the superintendence of the master of artillery.

¹P. 119.²P. 120.

³P. 123.

Besides the guns, several other munitions of war are mentioned. Many stands of harness or armour were provided, some of these being brought home from the Low Countries. James Henderson had also brought from the same locality a lot of pikes on trial. They were of various lengths: there were twenty-three of the length of twenty feet, five of fifteen feet, a dozen of twelve feet, and eight of eight feet. These, however, were but specimens, and did not amount to much: a larger supply was taken in in November, consisting of 3000 pikes of white ash, and 500 of Spanish ash, together with 500 halberts. These were all stored in a house at the gate of Holyrood Abbey, belonging to "the preist of St. Leonards," whose chapel stood on an eminence not far off to the south of the Pleasance, but of which not a vestige remains at the present day. In addition to these there were some old and faulty weapons, consisting of 3500 pikes and 466 halberts, for the repair of which a thousand "takettis" were provided. These had been stored in a house belonging to Sir Alexander Boyd, near the Abbey, and for which a rent of £5 was paid. On the first and second days of March 1541-2, however, they were all collected and taken up to the Castle: there were fifty-nine cartloads of them altogether, and it may be imagined that the progress up the steep slope of the Canongate and High Street was not very rapid. About the same time, too, William Smythberd, the armourer, received from Flanders two large cases full of armour, fifty stands, all with "pissantis" or gorgets of mail. The use of mail as armour for the tilting lists had by this time disappeared, the armourer's art in making of plate armour having made knights fully equipped as secure as a lobster in his shell, but for campaigning work no doubt mail was found still useful, as being less cumbrous. Some corselets and a few javelins were also brought in from Dunbar. It must, of course, be borne in mind that the comparatively small number of these pikes and staves (for it was the day of fighting with such weapons) is accounted for by the fact that they were not intended for the whole Scottish army, but only for the more immediate followers of the King himself. The multitude of pikemen and halberdiers which came from the country districts were each under their own leader, and every man was expected to bring his own weapons: there was nothing like an imperial force provided out of a general armoury. But it was the King alone who provided the artillery, and it has been shown what efforts were made to make this branch of the service efficient. Not only were guns manufactured or purchased out of the Royal revenues, but there was a powder mill in the Castle which supplied the pieces with gunpowder. From a modern point of view its output was but feeble. Charcoal was made from wood cut in the Dalhousie domains, and a sufficient quantity of saltpetre was provided, though there is no mention of the purchase of sulphur. Five men, working from the 27th March to the fifth of August, seem to have turned out eighteen large barrels of powder, each barrel containing fifteen stone weight.¹ But home manufacture was not entirely depended on, as more than one purchase is mentioned of “Duchepulder.”² When it is stated that a considerable quantity of ropes, traces, horse and ox harness, shovels and ox goads were made, the preparations of the munitions of war at this period are exhausted.

To return to history : in August 1542 Sir Robert Bowes, accompanied by the Earl of Angus and his brother, Sir George Douglas, invaded Teviotdale at the head of a force of 3000 men. But their attempt was not successful: met by the Earl of Huntly at Hadden-rig, on the 24th of the month, they suffered a crushing defeat, and Bowes and six hundred of his men were taken prisoners, Angus and his brother only escaping with difficulty. The English King was much incensed, and another expedition was despatched under the Duke of Norfolk: Roxburgh, Kelso, and about twenty villages were burned, but the English Commander was forced to withdraw, and James found himself in the month of November at the head of a large army in Fala Moor, prepared to invade England in chase of the retreating Norfolk. His nobles, however, refused to follow him out of their own country, and the King, to his great chagrin, was compelled to disband his army. The next month another effort was made: messengers were sent post haste throughout the country. With some effort a force of 10,000 men was raised, and marched toward the Western Border. On the 23rd November it was at Langholm and Merton Kirk: the next day it had crossed the Border and commenced to raid the country. But they were speedily met by the English deputy warden, Sir Thomas Wharton, at the head of a considerable following, though far short of the number of the Scottish troops. The King's favourite announced that he had a commission as leader of the army, an appointment which did not make for contentment in an already discontented army. The engagement commenced between the Leven and the Esk, and the Scots were gradually driven back. They reached a narrow ford on the Esk, their only way of escape, and then the retreat degenerated into a panic. Only twenty men were slain, not many were drowned, but 1200 were taken prisoners, including Oliver Sinclair, with the Royal standard. James heard the fatal news at Lochmaben, and covered with shame and humiliation he fled north, first to Edinburgh and then to Falkland, perhaps, as may be inferred from an undated entry in December, paying a hasty visit to the Queen at Linlithgow by the way.¹ There on 6th December he took to that bed from which he was never to rise. Tidings of the birth of his daughter were carried to him on the 8th of the month. "It came with a lass and it will go with a lass" were the memorable words which he is said to have uttered on receipt of the news. This last disappointment of not leaving a male heir to his throne was the culminating point of his misfortunes, and heartbroken he expired within a week. The exact date of his death is generally stated to have been the 14th of December 1542, but the Treasurer's accounts give the 16th as the date.¹

| ²Pp. 120, 122.

So passed away one of the most unfortunate of Scottish Kings. With all his faults, largely due to a very bad upbringing, he was a very popular King, though he fell far short of the administrative capacity of his father. He made himself, however, beloved by his people, and tradition yet records how freely he mingled with them—sometimes in disguise—and made himself acquainted with their wants and aspirations. He, too, inherited all that charm of personal manner which was so characteristic of his race, and which in the case of his daughter has made itself felt centuries after her death, and has raised her to the position of a heroine of romance. Once more it was the destiny of Scotland to be deprived of its Sovereign in the full vigour of his years. But the accounts of the Treasurer, as may be imagined, do not reflect the national feeling about the national disaster. The last item of expenditure during the King's life is ¹See Sir Archibald Dunbar's Scottish Kings for a critical examination of the point. He comes to the conclusion that the 14th is the correct date.

dated 12th December. There is a little break, and then they go prosaically on. They state that they will firstly deal with the expenditure involved "upoune the suffrage done for our said Soverane Lord as follows," and then comes an entry on the 21st December "deliverit to the tapischer to be ane claytht of stait, xxx elnis of blak velvet" at a cost of £83.¹ This cloth of state had a cross of white satin, and was probably used to drape the scaffolding or platform on which the coffin was placed. It was not the pall which covered the coffin, as there is a separate entry for that. It also was made of black velvet, measuring $23\frac{1}{2}$ ells, and was heavily fringed with black silk. There was probably an effigy of the King, dressed in his royal robes, laid on the top of the coffin, though there is no detailed account for this, the only indication of its having been made being an entry of a sum paid to the "tapischare," or tapestry man, for a cushion or mattress of canvas "to lay the effisy on," and another entry of a sum allowed the painter "for the collouring and painting of the effesay, crown, and septur."² It is possible, of course, that the "effesay" may not refer to a full-length effigy of the King himself, but only to a painted model of the crown and sceptre to lay on the coffin. It must be remembered that the death took place at Falkland, that the actual regalia were in Edinburgh, and it may have been considered too great a risk to bring them to Falkland for the lying in state. There was the usual heraldic display : cloth of gold and crimson cloth were delivered from the Royal wardrobe to make the red lion of Scotland on its golden field, and the achievement was lined with purple taffety of Genoa. There was also a banner of red taffety, fringed with red and gold, on which was painted the armorial bearings of the King, and according to the custom of the period there was an immense quantity of "greit and small armes," to the number of 1648 altogether. These must have been mostly of small size, seeing that they were painted at a cost of nine shillings a dozen. Many of them were, no doubt, mere repetitions of the Royal arms, which could be reproduced almost mechanically, while others may have been the various families from which the King traced his descent. There was a chapelle ardente which was funereally decorated with clubs, spears, chandeliers, &c., all in black. This was executed by Robert Denys, painter, at the cost £4. The tomb at Holyrood, with the necessary work for the preparation of the church for the burial, and sixteen feet "casting lead," probably for wrapping the body in, cost, according to an account rendered by William Paterson and certified by Lyon, £27 13s. 1d.¹ Andrew Mansioun, a carver, who has been previously mentioned in the accounts of the Treasurer, was employed in making the figure of a lion set above the crown, probably the lion sejant affrontée of the royal crest, and to engrave the superscription on the tomb in Roman letters, an inscription measuring altogether eighteen feet: the very moderate sum of fifty shillings was paid for this work. The arrangements for the interment were completed by January 1542-3, and some time after the fourth of that month¹ the body of the King was brought from Falkland to Edinburgh, and laid to rest in Holyrood. One other glimpse was had of James: in 1683 the vault appears to have been opened in presence of the Earl of Forfar and others. They say—"We viewed the body of James V. It lyeth within ane wodden coffin, and is coverit with ane lead coffin. There seemed to be hair upon the head still. The body was two lengths of my staff with twa inches more, which is twae inches and more above twae Scots elnes, for I measured the staff with an ellwand afterward. The body was coloured black with ye balsam that preserved it, and which was lyke melted pitch." On the coffin was the inscription Illustris Scotorum Rex Jacobus, ejus Nominis V., with the dates of his age and his death. After this rather unnecessary disturbance the royal remains seem to have been left in peace for some time. Apparently they escaped to some extent the wanton desecration which the Abbey suffered in 1688, though it is said that the lids of the coffin in the Royal vault were then carried off. With culpable carelessness the church was allowed to fall into ruins in 1768, and it remained open to all prowlers and pillaging ruffians for years. No thought of their great historical past animated the souls of the people of Edinburgh at that time. Still, the body of the King remained in its tomb till, at all events, 1776, in which year Grose, the antiquary, expressly says he saw it. Grose again visited it before 1788, and by that time the royal bodies were no longer shown; it is, indeed, doubtful whether they were there to show.

At this point of the accounts, after describing the carving of the inscription on the Royal tomb, there is an unfortunate and irritating blank. Two pages of the original are wanting, and it is probable that these very two pages would have given us some interesting details as to the expenses connected with the funeral. As it is, the first entry after the hiatus is one of a rose noble (53 shillings) given to the Earl of Arran, who had been appointed Governor of the Kingdom on the 22nd December, to offer as a poll penny. This poll penny, or pow penny, as it has been called in previous accounts, is always mentioned in connection with royal funerals, but what its precise significance was has not yet been elucidated. The Eleemosinar, George Cook, rural dean, and the Collector of St. Giles got a certain (unspecified) sum of money for distribution to the poor and for the chaplains and others that were present at the masses said for the soul of the King. The Heralds got mourning habits according to their degree. That of Lyon consisted of $10\frac{3}{4}$ ells French black costing 38 shillings an ell; Rothesay Herald, for some unexplained reason, got ten ells of the same stuff costing 31 shillings an ell, while four other heralds, Snowden, Ross, Albany, and Marchmont, while getting as much cloth, got it of slightly inferior quality, their habits only costing 30 shillings an ell. The pursuivants, six in number, Carrick, Bute, Dingwall, Ormond, Kintyre, and Unicorn, had similar mourning, but in their case and in that of the macers the material only cost 28 shillings an ell.

No accounts are extant to show whether the Royal Household was put into mourning. The fashion of wearing mourning had not been long in use in Scotland, and it is very doubtful whether such an expense as clothing all the servants in "dule weids" would have been authorised. But the Queen and her immediate attendants were given 246 ells of Paris or French black, this being delivered to her Comptroller, besides Holland cloth, black velvet, white satin, and other stuffs. In her stable she had foot mantles—a kind of long saddle cloth—and harnessings of black, and the "chair" within her "cheriot" was also lined with black, an interesting entry as showing that possibly wheeled vehicles may not have been unknown in Scotland at that period, though it may be pointed out that the entry may perhaps refer to a horse litter, consisting of a box-like structure with a seat inside which was slung on poles, the ends of which rested on the backs of horses.

The only other matter in connection with the King's death which need be mentioned here is an interesting entry of £200 paid to "Maister Michael Durahame, Doctour in Medecyne," for his services to the King and for the rest of his fees. This may mean that he had been retained at a salary as Household physician and that he got payment of this salary, with an added sum, for his special attention to the King on his death-bed, but nothing definite on this point can be stated.¹ He may have been of the family of Durham of Grange, but his name does not appear in any of the accounts previous to this period.

Before referring to the accounts which deal with the Regency, there are one or two matters which may conveniently be mentioned here. One of them had given great distress to James, and was a very real grievance to him on his death-bed. John Ponde, Somerset Herald, had been with Sir Robert Bowes at the engagement of Hadden-rig. Somehow or other, although it is stated² he was actually in his tabard, he was killed. It is probable that the affair was either an accident or an action of private revenge. Certainly no combatant, as Society was then constituted, would have dared to lift his hand against such a sacred person as a herald in his official costume. As a matter of fact, the deed was not committed by a Scotsman, but by two fugitive Englishmen—Leach, “bailiff of Lowth” (probably Leith)—Edward Leach, his brother, and a priest. Of course the circumstance created great consternation. Henry sent peremptory messages demanding reparation. All was done that possibly could be done. Rothesay Herald and Dingwall Pursuivant were sent to England with Somerset’s servant and a sum of £143 was given them, partly for their own expenses and partly for a gratuity to the servant. Not only so, but the suspected culprits were apprehended; one of them was sent to Dunbar in February, 1542-3, but they were all ultimately delivered up to the English. One of them—the “bailie of Leith”—was executed at Tyburn as a traitor, 8th May, 1543, and the other two on 12th June following.

There are some entries relating to the week before the King’s death which show that Beaton or some person in authority was taking measures to prevent the further invasion of the country by the English. On the 8th of December the Roxburgh men were charged to rise with the Warden of the East Marches; it was also proclaimed that all Scotsmen might “buy” or redeem their horses and arms and such like effects which had been "tint be aventur at this last raid," and were in the hands of the English soldiery. The lairds of Berwickshire, Selkirkshire, and elsewhere were charged to have their strongholds put on a proper defensive footing, and all men "baith on hors and on fute" were to be ready "at the heicht of this next mone be skry, bale or uther sing to pass forwart for resisting of the Inglesmen"; in other words, that there was to be a forward movement at the time of the next full moon, or whenever a summons might be made by proclamation, beacon fire, or other signal. And on 19th December letters were sent to the sheriffs and noblemen throughout Scotland south of the Tay to "ressave wappinschawingis," that is, to muster all their men capable of bearing arms, while the Provosts of Ayr, Dumbarton, and Irvine were to arrest all the ships in their respective ports. On the same date there was a sum of 22 shillings given to John Hamilton "to pas with my lord governor" to Tantallon, which seems to indicate that Arran had been chosen governor rather earlier than the date usually given, the 22nd December.¹

Before the accounts dealing with the period of the Arran Regency actually open, there are several miscellaneous accounts which may be briefly referred to. The first is entitled "The Compt of the New Hevin," but as a matter of fact it has nothing to do with the construction of that harbour, being the expenses connected with the purchase of copper and gunpowder in Denmark. In 1538 the Treasurer sent several sums, amounting in all to £2520, to that country, and they were expended. Nearly £800 were spent on the purchase of copper of different qualities. It is curious to note that a woman was sent from Copenhagen to Elsinore to weigh the metal and received 15 shillings for her trouble.¹ In addition to this there was purchased 13,446 lbs. weight nett of gunpowder at a cost of £1008, and at the same time 709 lbs. of powder for the culverins were bought, besides 405 pounds of saltpetre for the manufacture of powder at home. A Danish horse was also bought for the King which cost £39.

The next account is for wine, and relates to the period when the King was in France wooing his first wife. Unfortunately, while the names of the sellers are all carefully given, the kind of wine is never mentioned; once only it is indicated to be red, and once white, but the great bulk of it was probably what is now known as claret. Altogether some 107 tierces of wine were purchased at prices varying from 8 to 14 crowns of the sun, coins which were current at about 19 shillings. If a tierce of wine consisted then, as now, of thirty-five gallons, the total amount of wine imported for the

Royal cellars must have amounted to 3745 gallons, a very considerable quantity.

The last accounts in connection with the expenses of the King refers to the furnishing and provisioning of the ships in 1538. They are of no special interest, though a few items are worth mentioning. Between two and three hundred men seem to have received wages. There were at least four trumpeters, besides other musicians, in the fleet. The sailors drank cider when on the French coast, 162 francs being expended on that liquor. The window of the Queen's cabin cost the comparatively large sum of 22 shillings to glaze, while the sum of eighteen shillings and sixpence for four "horologis" and a compass seems wonderfully little. The other items are connected with provisioning and outfit, and do not call for any special remark.

In the next account which follows in this volume, and which was also given up by Kirkcaldy of Grange, the charge side is missing. The precise day of its commencement is not stated, it being merely said to be from the — day of December 1542, and it extends down to the month of June in the following year, after which there is a blank for nearly two months. It may be presumed, however, to begin from the date of Arran being declared Governor of the Kingdom, though there is no date earlier than January 1542-43. The first item relates, not to the Governor himself, but to his wife, Margaret, the eldest daughter of James Douglas, third Earl of Morton. Her first procedure on attaining her new dignity was to get provided for her a "dule caip of stait" of Paris black, but, to do her justice, she does not appear to have been extravagant in the matter, as it only cost 40 shillings per ell, while that provided for the Queen Dowager cost 70 shillings. The household of the Governor had to be duly supplied with mournings. Five ladies-in-waiting got black gowns and kirtles, while John Hamilton, a brother of the Governor's, got a very elaborate set of clothing. The Governor had two half-brothers called John, both illegitimate sons of his father, but from one of the items being for "ane gounne of the clarkis fassoun," it is probable that he was that John Hamilton who at this period was Commendator and Abbot of Paisley and afterwards Bishop of Dunkeld and St Andrews successively. He was the leading ecclesiastic of the day after Beaton's death, and was a strong opponent of the Protestant party, by whom he was ultimately hanged in 1571. The late King's servants were not forgotten in the distribution of mourning and money. An Edward Stewart, who may be the "familiaris regis" who got a grant of lands in Ayrshire on 13th September 1538,¹ got a suit comprising a dule gown, coat and hood, while the master cook, Thomas Marshall, got a somewhat similar outfit. The King's foster mother, Margaret Kynnynmouth, got a present of £22, while two of his lackeys got £20 apiece. There is also an entry for a payment of £4 6s. to Mr James Haliburton's wife owing to her for the expenses of Sir Robert Lowis and the English prisoners the first night they were brought to Edinburgh and for the cost of sending the news to the King. Lowis is here an evident mistake for Bowes, and the entry refers to the capture of the English leader and his men at the battle of Hadden-rig in the previous August. Two other items in the January account are worth mentioning: one is for 54 shillings which was disbursed by Alexander Durham, a gentleman in the service of the Queen Dowager, for white Genoa taffety for the baptism of the recently-born Princess Mary: the other is a very belated laundress's account of £6 for the washing of the clothes of Lady Jane Stewart, the illegitimate daughter of the late King, and who was afterwards to become Countess of Argyll.

In February 1542-3, there seems to have been considerable negotiations with the English King, who had already begun to prosecute his scheme of a marriage between his son Edward and the infant Queen of Scots. Harry Ray, Berwick Pursuivant (an office which he held for a long time, certainly up to 1565) was twice in Scotland this month, once with dispatches from Lord Lisle (afterwards Duke of Northumberland) Warden of the English Marches, and again from the Duke of Suffolk. Another messenger from the latter nobleman also came in the person of Richmond Herald; this was Gilbert Dethick, a very trusted Herald of several English Sovereigns, and who was afterwards knighted and became Garter King of Arms. It will be remarked that while Suffolk sent an English herald with his dispatches, the answer, which related to a period of truce till the next June, was not sent by Richmond but by a Scottish herald, Rothesay, an office at this time filled by Robert Hart. At the same time letters were sent to the Wardens of the East and Middle Marches and the inhabitants within their bounds charging them to keep good rule, or, in other words, not to provoke any aggression on the part of their English neighbours.¹ Not the least interesting among the general items of expenditure in February is a payment of 40 shillings to Henry Wardlaw for making an inventory of the late King's clothing, jewels, and other effects. And another entry gives the information that on 13th February Carrick Pursuivant was sent to St. Andrews and Cupar to proclaim "the Act tuicheing the doing of Devyne Service, and letters rasis thairupone." As Parliament did not sit till 12th March, this must relate to the series of acts passed by the Parliament of 1540 in support of the old religion, one of which called on the clergy to see that the churches were kept in proper repair "to the honour of God Almighty, the blessed sacrament and devine service."¹ As to the meeting of Parliament in March, at which important business was done, there is not much said in the accounts. A dress for the Governor was, however, provided for the occasion of the opening, consisting of a cape of state and a kirtle, made of $13\frac{3}{4}$ ells of "French brown of the seill." It was lined in front with white taffety and had a purple belt of the same stuff. When Parliament did actually meet the first question it had to consider was the proposed marriage of the infant Queen to Henry's son, and English interests being at the time in the ascendant it was decided to appoint three ambassadors to treat with Henry on the subject. A notable act was also passed making it lawful for any person to have and read the Old and New Testaments in the vulgar tongue, but no man was to dispute or "hold opinions" thereanent.² This act was sent by a messenger on the 28th March to be proclaimed at Dunfermline and Perth.

But it is only here and there in the accounts that glimpses are got into public affairs: they concern themselves rather with the chronicling of domestic details. The family of Hamilton, in general, was, as might be expected, not neglected by the Governor during his term of office. Some of them, such as David Hamilton of Broomhill and Matthew Hamilton, evidently held offices in the household, while others were provided for or had gifts made them from the funds at Arran's disposal. Two of his Grace's sisters were furnished with riding cloaks in April, and his son, the Master of Arran, who must then have been only a child of five or six years, got what must have been a very voluminous coat for his size, consisting as it did of six ells of purple velvet; a costly coat, too, as no less than £21 were paid for it, exclusive of £5 2s. for gold trimming to it. A very complete equipment of clothing, also, though a much less costly one, was given to James Hamilton, the son of the Governor's eldest half-brother, Sir James Hamilton of Finnart, who had met with an unfortunate end more than two years previously. An Isobel Hamilton got about this time a gown of tanny velvet: she may have been that half-sister of the Governor who married John Bannatyne of Corehouse. It may be observed that in April the young Queen's Great and Privy Seals were made by Patrick Lindsay, goldsmith, at a cost of £31.¹

In May, Arran appears to have gone to Hamilton, as ten carriage loads of tapestry were sent there. It was, of course, quite common to dismantle a room of its hangings and put them up in the next house to which their owner went. Besides the tapestry, two standing beds were purchased and sent to Hamilton. Standing beds were probably beds with hangings, not merely lits de camp. How long Arran remained in the west is not specified in the accounts, but during his stay there he had the services of Rothesay Herald at his disposal, probably for the carrying of any important despatches he might have to send off. At all events, it may be supposed that he escaped the May east winds of the Metropolis, but as the accounts come to an abrupt end in the early part of June no definite information is afforded.

On the 3rd of August a new account opens, given up by a new Treasurer in the person of James Hamilton, the Governor's brother. Kirkcaldy had fallen from power, and a man who was to show himself a very powerful politician had taken his place, probably owing his elevation to power to the secret influence of the great Cardinal. In the interval, which is not dealt with in the accounts, Beaton had made an attempt to carry off the infant Queen from Linlithgow, and had so far succeeded that it was agreed that she should be removed to Stirling, so as to be out of the way of the English King, of whose marriage projects the Cardinal was a determined opponent. This was accordingly done on 26th July, and Mary was placed in the custody of four persons, two being named by Arran and two by Beaton. The expenses of the Queen's stay at Holyrood had been defrayed by Lord Livingston, her guardian, and in the end of August £143 was paid to him by way of re-imbursement.¹ There are also entries at this time of the payment of sums of £46, £10, and £600 for "certane men of weir" in the westland "the tyme of the taking of the Quenis grace furth of Linlithgow." It is not quite clear whether these "men of weir" were a body raised to defend the Queen and to prevent her being carried off by Beaton, or whether the latter had so exercised his increasing influence over Arran as to induce the vacillating and weak-kneed Governor to pay for the troops which had been collected for the very purpose of counteracting the English designs which Arran was still supposed to support.

Two items of personal expenditure may be noted in this month of August. Thomas Menzies, comptroller, got £300 for the support of his office (whatever that may mean) and for the furnishing of the Governor's house. This probably refers to the house of Hamilton, as the official residence at Holyrood must have been in a state of absolutely good repair as to furniture, seeing the late King must have had it put in good order before he brought home his wife. It is only fair, however, to say that Arran does not appear to have been extravagant in his personal tastes, and that the wardrobe and such like expenses compare very favourably with those in the reigns of the last two Kings. But he was evidently very fond of horses : the stable accounts testify to his equipages being kept in excellent order, and in this month of August he paid to the Master of Semple what must have been a very high price for a horse in those days, no less a sum than £105 12s. Not only is the price of the horse given but also its name : it was called "Gray Storye," though what the origin was of this not very suggestive appellation is difficult to imagine. In addition to the purchase of Gray Story, more horses were bought within a very few weeks. On 12th October the laird of Johnston, John Johnston, the Warden of the West Marches, received £165 "to by hors" for the Governor. How many were bought is not told, but the number cannot have been great, as two servants were sufficient to bring them home, while a brother of the laird (probably John, who got £24 to buy a horse for himself in December following) got £3 6s. as "kepar of the foresaid hors."

The little Queen was crowned at Stirling on Sunday, 9th September, and Beaton's victory over the Governor was complete. But there is no hint about the ceremony in the accounts, which is rather surprising, as it would be imagined that some at least of the expenses in connection with it would have been paid out of the funds in the hands of the Treasurer. Nothing is said at all either about the Queen or the coronation, but there is an increased expenditure upon "men of weir." One band of 400 get £1200, being at the rate of £3 a month each, while their officers divide £100 amongst them. There was another smaller band commanded by Hew Hommyll on which £46 is spent. Evidently these were raised as a bodyguard to the Queen. Her expenses, it may be remarked, from the 23rd September, when she was removed from Linlithgow to Stirling, down to the 31st of October, amounted to £180, which was duly paid to Lord Livingston.

Meanwhile the English party in the State was giving trouble. The feeling of the country in general was undoubtedly with the interests of France. So strong was it that Sadler, the English ambassador, was forced to take refuge in Tantallon, the stronghold of the Douglasses, who were the friends of his master. On the 3rd of the month Rothesay Herald was sent there with despatches to him, but their nature is not mentioned. Angus and his adherents assembled their forces hoping to make some movement in favour of Henry's designs before the meeting of the Parliament which had been summoned for December, but Beaton anticipated them and induced the King to seize upon the castles of Dalkeith and Pinkie, both Douglas houses. Of the latter there is no direct mention in the accounts, but there is considerable detail as to what is called the "siege" of the first. On the 7th November fourteen horses were hired at the rate of 3s. 6d. a day each to draw a cannon to Dalkeith, while twenty-three horses were employed in the carts which took the small artillery and the ammunition to the same place. A few days later more guns were taken from Edinburgh Castle down to the port of Leith. These are stated to be "lent" to the Earl of Huntly, who was doubtless keeping watch over any attempted invasion of the country by the English. Two letters were sent within a month to Angus, who was then at Douglas in Lanarkshire. The contents of the first are not disclosed, but the second was a peremptory demand that he would dismiss Sadler from his refuge at Tantallon.¹

However important the incidents of December 1543 may have been to the fortunes of Scotland, there is little echo of them in the accounts, which are peaceable in the extreme. It might be thought that the most exciting incident that took place was the gilding of a chalice for the chapel of Hamilton, or that the Governor was furnished with £160 to play at cards with the Queen at Christmas time. The reference must be to the Queen Dowager and not to her little daughter, then little more than a year old. The one sign of impending trouble is a summons for the lieges of Haddington, Lauder, Jedburgh, Selkirk, and Peebles to appear at Edinburgh on the 28th, and another charging the barons of Fife, Forfar, and Kincardine to come to Stirling on 7th January.

Robert Forman, afterwards Lyon, at present Ross Herald, was sent to London for a safe conduct for ambassadors to Henry, but the year closed without any overt act of war.

In January 1543-4 more stirring events occurred. The English lords, Angus, Lennox, Glencairn, and Cassillis, raised a considerable force and marched on Stirling. Artillery was hurriedly sent up by water to that place, while Hans Cochran and seven ordinary gunners, together with thirty gunners extraordinary, were despatched by road. Fifty-four cart horses were also sent to receive the guns on their arrival. But the artillery was unfortunate: hardly had got embarked at Leith when a storm arose in the Firth and the boats were "seperat be ane gret wound."¹ A Leith seaman, with his boat and servants, had to be sent to collect the scattered fleet together. Further measures of resistance were taken, and three hundred men were enrolled into a company under the command of James Dog. But this, as will be seen, was a mere temporary expedient. Meanwhile, what of the artillery? Did it come into collision with Lennox's force or not? It certainly did not remain at Stirling long, for on the 6th of January £3 is paid for the expense of its return. But the entry is significant, and may be quoted in full. "For ane boittis fraucht quha brought doun agane the rest of the said artalze unspulzeit be the Erll of Levinax at Striviling agane to Leith." Does this mean that the Earl had "spulzeit" some and that it was the saved remainder that was brought home? Certainly some colour is lent to this interpretation by the fact that while it took three boats to transport the artillery from Leith to Stirling, one boat sufficed to bring it back again. On the other hand, it may be that the other boats had been lost or blown away by the "gret wound" and were not collected by the mariner who went to look for them. Whatever may have happened, the guns that returned did not get home too soon. On the 10th of January the watchers at the Castle saw the wintry sun gleaming on the white tents of Lennox's array as they lay before the town of Leith. The Cardinal, for it was probably he and not the Governor who took the most active measures in the way of preparation for resistance, at once raised a new band of 525 "men of weir"; it, and the band previously raised, had four principal quarter masters who got 40s. in addition to their ordinary monthly pay of £3; twelve "servandes" (? serjandis) of the bands got 20s. additional to their monthly wage; three "playarris upon the swesche," or, in modern parlance, drummers, got 22s. extra; the lieutenant and the provost (provost-marshal) were each paid 40s. more than their £3; while the pay of the "captain of the ensign" of the last raised band is stated to have been in all £9 monthly. These rates of pay are interesting and show that while the services of men-at-arms may not have been required for any lengthened period they were sufficiently, even generously, requited while they did last. By the 24th of the month three hundred of this force had been disbanded, but the remaining 500 were still kept under arms. Meanwhile, on the 10th, as above mentioned, the English Lords are lying at Leith. Energetic measures were taken by the Governor, and messengers were sent riding night and day throughout the surrounding country to collect horses and men.¹ The ferrymen at Kinghorn and Queensferry were specially charged to pass over all lieges coming to the assistance of Arran, "upoun ane reasonable fraucht," that is, that they were not to take advantage of their haste by demanding extortionate fares. Careful observation was made of the doings of Lennox's troops, nine shillings being paid to a spy who kept the Governor informed of their movements.² It was evidently the intention of the Lords to entice the Edinburgh garrison out into the open and try conclusions with them there, as they had no siege artillery with them and could not hope to be successful in an attack upon the Castle. But Arran knew too well the advantage which he had. Some of the guns which he had, both great and small, were drawn out of the Castle down the ridge of the

High Street and placed "before my lord Borthwellis logeings," where probably they could command any attack on the city with better effect. The Governor's cannon had a fair enough range, but it is a curious commentary on the artillery of the period to find 4s. given to some poor men who found "foure bullates quhilkis war schot furth of the Castell of Edinburgh to the toun of Leith," and brought them up to the fortress, where they were in all probability used a second time. The English Lords' attempt came to nothing; an "aggreance" was made whereby they seem to have given up their case, but in these days of sordid intrigue men seem to have said and promised what at the moment was most convenient for them. Hardly had this matter been concluded when Arran and Beaton started on a heresy hunt to Perth and Dundee, an occupation eongenial, no doubt, to the Cardinal, but for which poor Arran had probably no great enthusiasm. They did not go unsupported: perhaps they feared a rising, but not only had they a guard of 500 men, but a certain amount of artillery was taken with them. The punishments inflicted by the Cardinal were not only savage but stupid, for by his ferocity the tide of popular opinion, which, from the natural distaste to an English alliance, had hitherto been rather in his favour, was now turned against him, and the success of the new doctrine was decidedly hastened instead of hindered. This, however, does not concern the accounts, which merely show that the Governor, after visiting Perth, Dundee, and perhaps Forfar, Montrose, and Brechin, was back in Edinburgh by the end of February, in time to make arrangements for the marriage of his half-sister Elizabeth (called Barbara in the accounts by some mistake) to the young Master of Semple. There is an entry of the payment of £1000 to him in name of the lady's tocher : she is also called his "spouse," which might indicate that the marriage had already taken place ; but the marriage contract was dated at Hamilton on 27th May following. Another marriage in the Hamilton family was also imminent at this time. The Governor's niece Margaret, daughter of his half-brother, John Hamilton of Samuelston, married James Johnston younger of that ilk. The bride's brother Gavin (he is called "cousin" of the Governor in the accounts, but this only connotes relationship) also got a present of £22, while many others of the family got tokens of the Governor's generosity.

Not only are givings in marriage alluded to in the accounts, but the dissolutions of unions are occasionally hinted at. Thus, in the beginning of March 1542-3, his Grace's sister, "the maistres of Kelmawaris," gets £6 12s. for her own and her servants' expenses. This seems to indicate that she was not being supported by her husband at this period. Janet Hamilton had been married in 1526 to Alexander Cunningham, then Lord or Master of Kilmaurs, who became, after his father's death in 1548, fourth Earl of Glencairn. It is certain that they were divorced before 15th July 1545, and it seems likely that they were separated even at the date of this entry. A more mysterious allusion is that to the Governor's own wife. He had been married in 1532 to Margaret, eldest daughter of James Douglas, third Earl of Morton. No Peerage writer has mentioned any serious disagreement between them, and it is certain that she survived her husband and was alive as his widow in 1579. It is surprising, therefore, to find that, on 22nd March 1542-3, a payment of £12 was made to Mr. John Hamilton of Mylnburne in part payment of the expenses disbursed by him in the plea and cause of divorce between his Grace and his spouse.¹ The case appears to have been then going on—there are further references to it: on 13th April, Patrick Stewart, “servand to his grace's spouse,” got £10 11s. And on the 23rd of the same month Mr. George Strang, “procurator for his grace's spous,” got £50 in part payment of the taxed expenses in the action of divorce, from which we may infer that the lady had successfully defended the action.

The Leith attempt of the English Lords having failed, Lennox retired to his castle in Glasgow, and the chief interest of the March accounts is in the details of the expedition made against him by Arran, Beaton, and their party. In the first place, letters were sent throughout the country forbidding all persons to assist Lennox, and calling on the lairds and noblemen to assemble at Stirling, with eight days' victuals, "to pas forward with his grace aganis the Erll of Levenax."¹ At the same time a hundred men-at-arms were ordered to go to Glasgow with artillery and a cannon, and two culverins of different sizes and some smaller guns were taken out of the Castle of Edinburgh. This siege train must have been of considerable strength, as 153 horses were hired for their conveyance to the west; there were besides four cart loads of ammunition, each drawn by four horses, two horses with paniers full of extra harness, while 60 labourers with pick and shovel accompanied the train in order to come to its assistance when the roads proved too bad for the passage of such heavy guns. With no permanent establishment of horses it must have been no small labour getting together the number required for the work. They were drawn from the districts within easy reach of the capital, Musselburgh, Prestoun, Tranent, Dalkeith, Newbattle, Lasswade, and Leith: and, of course, those in the city itself did not escape the impressment, the horses of Potterrow, the Canongate, and the West Port being all requisitioned for the service. It is but fair to say that the owners were liberally enough dealt with, each horse receiving for the day three shillings, though whether this included the services of its master is not mentioned. If a horse was lost due recompense was made, £5 being given to "ane of the pure men cartaris that had his hors slane at the assage of Glasgw,"¹ and the owners of those horses which were not fit to be used got some remuneration for their trouble. Twenty-five horses were found to be in such poor condition that they "mycht not indure travell" with the ammunition cart, so they were despatched home again with two days' wages in their masters' pockets.

The siege of Glasgow proved no child's play. It was well defended, and the accounts clearly show what strenuous efforts were made by the Governor for its capture. But by the 18th of April, Lennox had surrendered, and eighteen of his followers were hanged as traitors.² Thirty-two shillings were spent in the erection of a gallows which was erected opposite the Tolbooth of Glasgow, and the ropes which hung the unfortunate victims who "tholit deid" there cost fifteen shillings. The castle was not apparently given up to be plundered, or, if it was, the spoil was redeemed by the Governor from the men composing his force for a sum of £373. What Arran's loss was is not stated, but it was probably not very serious: one poor woman got forty-four shillings as compensation for the loss of her husband, who was killed with a culverin shot¹: she would have got much more had he been a horse. It is difficult to know on what principle compensation was made: a "wageour," or soldier, who got daily pay received twenty-two shillings for being shot through the cheeks. But, as a rule, everyone who had helped to make the expedition a success were liberally rewarded. The only other casualty mentioned on Arran's side is the breaking of two drums, in compensation of which the owners got forty-four shillings. Macfarlane and Macgregor, probably two of the Highland chiefs who had been imprisoned by the late King, now took the opportunity of proving their loyalty, and they each received the not inconsiderable present of £22. The ordinary gunners received a similar sum amongst them, while Roquenow and Schouffene, two foreigners who took charge of the heavy artillery at Dunbar, but who had been summoned to the siege, got £6 12s.

Mixed up with all those entries of dealing with affairs of war are many domestic and homely concerns. The Governor's sister Elizabeth gets quantities of clothing, evidently in connection with her marriage to the Master of Semple; while his daughter Jean, or Gene, gets a very handsome gown and kirtle on the occasion of her departing to the Abbey of Haddington. This may have been for purposes of safety, as she was one of the younger children and cannot have been very old in 1544; she was not married to the Earl of Eglinton for ten years after this. But how it took eleven ells of camlet to make a gown for a child like this, besides an ell and three-quarters of taffety for a kirtle, passes masculine comprehension.

But more serious matters were about to happen. Henry, furious at the failure of his plans about the marriage, and at the vacillating conduct of Arran, let slip the dogs of war. He brought his troops up by sea from Tynemouth, thus avoiding all chance of interception on the borders. The English fleet of about 200 sail arrived in the Forth on the 3rd of May. They burned St. Monans and took with them thence some boats which were useful to them afterwards in effecting a landing. They anchored under the lee of Inchkeith, and the next day the troops landed apparently without opposition, the disembarkation being completed in four hours at Granton. The Governor, with the Cardinal and some of the nobles, waited their arrival, according to an English account,¹ in the valley of the Water of Leith with 5000 or 6000 horsemen, besides a good number of foot, but it is unlikely that nearly so large a force had been assembled by the defenders, though news of the mobilising of the English ships must have reached Scotland some time before, as on 23rd of April all the east coast towns were warned to entrench their bounds "for resisting of the Inglesche mennis navye."¹ Be this as it may, the defence failed, and some guns were lost. Arran and the Cardinal retired to Linlithgow. The English took the town of Leith, brought in their ships, or some of them, to the Newhaven and landed their heavy artillery and stores without difficulty; the two Scottish ships of which such frequent mention has been made in the accounts, the Salamander and the Unicorn, being made prizes. On the 5th, after the Provost had refused to surrender the town, an attack was made on Edinburgh. Some days before a hasty summons had been sent ordering all men between 60 and 16 years of age in the counties of Fife, Forfar, Kincardine, Stirling, Clackmannan, and Kinross to muster on the burgh moor of Edinburgh on the 5th May. Whatever may have been the result of that levy, it was powerless to prevent the victorious entry of the English. Hot fighting took place at the Netherbow, but the gate was ultimately carried by the English with some loss. The guns which had been posted in the High Street for the defence of the town were hurriedly withdrawn into the Castle. The fortress itself was too strong for Hertford's forces, though they made a vigorous assault on it. The shot from the Castle guns, however, "did continually beat along the High Street, and struck and dismounted one of the English pieces." The invaders found they had had enough of it for one day, and after setting fire to the town in three or four places retired to Leith again. It is needless to continue the tale of Hertford's wanton and cruel spoliation. It is sufficient to say that after burning Edinburgh and some forty villages and castles, besides destroying all the shipping in the Forth, the English army evacuated Leith on the 15th May and retired to Berwick, having lost, according to their own account, only forty men altogether. It is only with the reflection of this—the most dreadful experience that Edinburgh ever passed through—in the accounts that concerns the present pages. It is strange that more efficient measures were not taken for the defence of the town. Probably there was little idea that the invasion would be so sudden and from such a quarter. On the 23rd of April, as has been shown, the intention of the English leader to come by sea was known, but this was all too little time in which to prepare an effective resistance. Probably many men-at-arms were still at Glasgow after the siege of the castle there. Arran himself was not well, a "doctour of medecyne" having been summoned to him on the 21st April, though, no doubt, the general direction of affairs was in the hands of the more capable and energetic Cardinal. The accounts chiefly deal, so far as they touch the incidents of Hertford's invasion at all, with the defence of the castle. The gunners are frequently mentioned: £110 was distributed among certain gunners of Leith and others, and for furnishing other necessaries to the castle. Four artillery men came in from Kinfauns, and, besides the ordinary gunners who were on receipt of monthly pay, there is mention of a good many men who were engaged in a similar capacity. We get the names of two of the quarter-masters, William Forester and John Bruce, and there is a curious entry of a payment of £4 8s. to a priest and two other men for helping to bring victuals from the town to the castle during the siege. There were both a drummer and a trumpeter in the castle, the former getting £3 8s. for his services, while the latter had to be content with 33s. Two barbers unnamed were also there, but they probably acted more in the capacity of surgeons than that of "tonorial artists." Another person of the same profession, called Andrew Mylne, certainly did, as he got £11 12s. in payment of drugs "for curing of the hurt men quhilkis war within the castle of Edinburgh,"¹ and John Brown, probably another "barber," got 43s. for the same purpose. Of hurt men there were no doubt many, but few are specially mentioned. Blair, a gunner, was "brunt with pulder," and cost 22s. to mend; and Andrew Mansioun, one of the ordinary gunners, seems to have been more seriously hurt, as his doctor's bill came to 43s.

In addition to actual combatants, there were other persons in the castle during the siege. The Governor took care to get most of his valuable effects removed from Holyrood in time and sent to the castle, from which they were ultimately sent to Hamilton, £11 being paid to certain "pure men" who assisted in carrying them up the High Street, while another "pure man" got 10s. for saving fifty pieces of the Governor's platè which would otherwise have fallen into the hands of the English. Faithful Malcolm Gourlay, too, whose name so often occurs in the accounts, stuck to his post and remained in the castle to take care of the tapestry and certain of the Governor's "coffaris and otherris geir."

Hardly had the smoke from the towns devastated by the English blown away when Arran found himself compelled to take the field again. By this time Angus and the Douglas party had joined forces with the Governor and the Cardinal, but Lennox and Glencairn entered into an agreement with the English King to support his cause. A large force was speedily gathered together, amongst which were at least twenty-sx gunners, and the rebel lords were encountered near Glasgow, and after a sanguinary conflict, in which Glencairn's second son Andrew was slain, were completely defeated. But there were many casualties on both sides: Hamilton of Colmskeith, the Governor's Master of Household, also fell. There is an entry of £5 6s. given at this time to his son, perhaps as some compensation for his father's death. But the greatest inconvenience caused by the loss was, if the Treasurer's Accounts only are to be considered, in connection with the Governor's supper on the evening of the battle. Perhaps Colmskeith was responsible for its preparation, or at all events for the arrangements concerning it, and he not being there a sum of 33s. had to be paid, though for what, or to whom, is not specifically stated.¹ Mylne, the barber surgeon, was busily employed in the care of the wounded, his charges amounting to £4 8s.; while a professional brother of Glasgow got 22s. for similar services.

It may be said that the accounts for May are almost wholly taken up with expenses in connection with the fighting that was going on in the country at the time; but more prosaic matters had also to be attended to, and among the most interesting of these pacific entries, as they may be called, is one relating to the payment of £27 9s. for the feeding of the Governor's horse Gray Story for a period of six months. This is at the rate of a little more than one pound a week, which, considering that it presumably is confined to feeding alone and does not include either stable rent or grooms' wages, shows how high the price of fodder was in those days compared with the present. Of course, the pound Scots was intrinsically worth much less than a pound sterling, but the purchasing power was so much the greater.

For some time the country continued in a most unsettled state. There were raids and counter-raids on the Borders. On 27th June, Home of Cowdenknowes sent news to the Governor of a foray which had been made by himself, Buccleuch, and Mark Ker upon the English, but the advantage lay with the other side, and the country was continually devastated by bodies of English soldiery. The Queen Mother, too, was at this time in favour of the English alliance, and she made every effort to thwart Arran, and even to remove him from his office of Governor. She was, however, on 3rd of June, at a meeting of nobles at Stirling, put under a council of twelve lords and four bishops, and on the 22nd 43s were paid to James Lindsay, macer, for carrying a letter to Stirling "dischargeing the Quene of hir autorite." But whether this applies to the Queen Mother or to the infant Mary herself, now apparently in the hands of the Douglas faction, is not clear. Each party were desirous to hold a Parliament in Edinburgh at an early date, and Arran was determined to prevent this being done on the part of the Queen Mother. He took care to supply the Castle with fresh ammunition, and there is an important entry in the accounts which shows that however much damage Hertford had done in the capital he had not succeeded in so destroying Holyrood as to make it utterly uninhabitable. On 13th July six barrels of beer were furnished for the palace, which was then garrisoned by certain "men of weir . . . because it was understood be my lord governour that the quene and lordis being with hir, suld have cumyn to Edinburgh to have haldin ane Parliament there."¹ Not only so, but the very churches seem to have been garrisoned. Six barrels of beer were bought and "laid in the stepill" for the use of certain men of the Governor that remained there for the same cause. It was probably the steeple of St. Giles that was so provisioned. The Holyrood men who served as a bodyguard to the Governor were composed of 62 "hagbuttarris," who received the usual wage of £3 per month.² The party in the steeple consisted of eighteen hagbuters, besides other servants of the Governor. Their stay there was not apparently at first expected to be a lengthy one, as on the 15th June 36s. was paid for their dinner and supper. After that the number seems to have been reduced to twelve, but these remained on in their elevated position for seventeen days at a cost of £10 4s. for their entertainment. Now this was only at the rate of a shilling a day, while, when there were eighteen there, the cost had been at the rate of two shillings. Evidently there was room for discontent here; and there is a quaint entry of a payment of 15s. to the three principal gunners "to caus the laif be contentit of xiid. on the day." It is difficult to see how the payment of three of them on a higher scale satisfied the demands of the others. The men-at-arms got food, no doubt, but whether they got beds is another matter. 13s. 8d. were paid for bedding "of certane servandis of my lord governours" during the time they were in the steeple; but it is not mentioned if the gunners were included in these "servandis." The steeple garrison, indeed, was not altogether withdrawn till the 7th August. As to Holyrood, not only was it full of men-at-arms, but artillery was brought down from the Castle, and was also ready to be placed in the High Street. Meanwhile fulminations were issued against the Queen Mother and her adherents. They were forbidden to come to Edinburgh to hold a Parliament on the last day of July, and all officials were warned against making any proclamations against the authority of the Governor. The Queen Mother appears to have coined some "bawbees" on her own account, and these were now repudiated.¹

For some weeks there is nothing specially worthy of note in the accounts. Arran's wife was living in the Castle, as Holyrood, though habitable, was not very fit for a lady's residence after the treatment it had received at the hands of the English. Her expenses there from the 12th to the 26th September amounted to upwards of £30. The Salamander and the Unicorn having been carried off by the English, the ship Lyon was put on commission at an expense of £840, and a body of culverin men were sent aboard of her at least for some days. But the purpose for which she was going to be used was the conveyance of an embassy, probably to France.¹

In the beginning of November the Governor held a Parliament, in which Angus, Bothwell, and George Douglas were forfeited.² Towards the end of the month an expedition was undertaken to recover the Castle of Coldingham, then held by the English. Six cartloads of artillery were taken out of Edinburgh Castle and duly despatched on the road. Messengers were also sent to the towns on the route Arran's army of seven thousand men were to take, ordering them to thrash their corn and prepare victuals for the troops. In many of the towns nearer the Border there cannot have been much corn left by the English raiders to thrash. A standard of taffety of three ells in length was provided for the Governor, and many messengers were sent throughout the country both to summon the nobles, lairds and other men, and also to raise a sum of £26,000 for the expenses of the expedition.¹ The army arrived at Coldingham, but suspicion and treason rendered the attempt abortive, and a much inferior body of Englishmen succeeded in driving the Scottish army northwards again. Two gunners, John Crawford and Theobald Roquenow, were injured during the siege, but not apparently very seriously, as they were able to ride home in two days. If the Lyon had set sail with an embassy in October she must have returned by this time. She had probably taken the Governor's Secretary to France and Flanders, as there is a payment of £300 for his expenses at the end of December. She may have brought back a French ambassador, La Croix, of whom mention is made at this time, and for whom a gold chain was made very hurriedly, the artificers working all night at it, probably in view of his early departure. At this period, too, Alexander Guthrie, Snowdon Herald, was sent to the Secretary, who was still in France, with a collar from the Emperor Charles V. It is not stated of what order of chivalry the collar was, nor the reasons why it was bestowed on the Secretary.

Much is said in the accounts about the preparation for expeditions against the English, but little can be gathered, as the reader may readily understand, about their result. In February 1544-5 another force was got together to try conclusions with the English on the Borders. Arran and Angus, the latter now relieved from his forfeiture, proceeded southwards to Lauder with 200 horse from Edinburgh, besides a fair proportion of light artillery. They started on 23rd February, and met the English force, consisting of 3000 men under the leadership of Sir Ralph Eure, at Lilluart's Cross, or, as it is more usually called, Ancrum Moor. This time the expedition was completely successful, and the Scots inflicted a crushing defeat on the English force. Eure himself, with many of his English leaders, was killed, and Arran and Angus, it is said, fell weeping into each other's arms in an excess of joy. The Scottish losses were but slight: the only casualty mentioned in the accounts is the broken arm of a servant of "the maister of entres," for which he got 40s. One of the carters lost a horse, for which he was paid £8.¹ Besides many prisoners (as to the ransom of one of which Pringle of Yair was summoned to come to Edinburgh), several of the English guns were captured, a smith in Melrose getting 4s. 2d. for mending one of the wheels of an English gun, and an English standard was taken by Robert Hamilton of Garen, for which he was rewarded with £5 10s.

The country was, however, still in an unsettled state, and there are indications in the accounts of a summons for troops to assemble at Edinburgh on 23rd March,¹ and again in May there was evidently another English invasion feared.² In April there was a convention held in Edinburgh, at which, through the influence of Beaton, Henry's attempts at conciliation, made through the Earl of Cassillis, one of the Solway prisoners, were rejected. In May a large force of 3000 foot and 400 horse arrived from France under the command of Lorges de Montgomery, who brought two French chargers as a present to the Governor.³ The French expedition seems to have come up the west coast and to have disembarked near Greenock. Besides men and horses, the French ships brought guns and other munition of war. Two culverins were brought up from Greenock to Glasgow in lighters and put in the castle there, together with hagbuts, upwards of 600 pikes, besides a large quantity of bullets and powder. The whole made 108 cartloads, each of which was drawn by two horses from Glasgow Bridge to the castle. Most of this was sent through to Edinburgh by land, but twenty cartloads of cannon bullets were sent "doun the watter" in boats and transhipped on board the Lyon, which carried them round the north of Scotland to Leith. It is not unlikely that some of the munition, having made the journey by land so far, were put on board a vessel on the Forth and taken down the river to Leith, for it is said that on the 21st of June 46 barrels of powder, 403 culverins, about 27 dozen pikes, and other stores were conveyed from Leith to Edinburgh Castle. It is difficult to understand the mention of so many culverins, as they cannot possibly have been the heavy guns which culverins were; it is more likely that by a clerical error the word "bullets" has been omitted from the entry. The reason for supposing that these must have come down the river is that the Lyon, and two other vessels which were chartered with her, did not arrive with their freight till late the following month. They brought a "moyane" which took 13 horses to drag up to the castle,¹ 386 cannon bullets, twelve barrels full of "bastard" and "moyane" bullets, besides horse harness and other stores. These filled 180 "sleddis and creillis," in which they were put for conveyance to the castle.²

The two culverins "moyane" first mentioned were taken from Glasgow by land, this not without difficulty. A large force of the Bishop of Glasgow's tenants and horses were employed in their carriage.

¹ It is stated that it was brought from Linlithgow, but the context seems to infer that this is an error for Leith.

Twelve labourers attended them with shovels and picks to make the roads passable for them, and Andrew Littlejohn, wright, and two of his men were detailed to accompany them so as to make any repairs which might be necessary. Nor was this a superfluous precaution: dreadful weather was experienced, and it took three days to reach Linlithgow “because we mycht nocht compleit our journey na sonar be resoun of the gret storme and spait quhilk was the tyme of our voyage.¹ The wheels of one of the culverins had to be patched up, while the axle tree of another got broken, testifying to the exceeding badness of the road. The rain came down in torrents, and the streams which had to be crossed were in full flood. Two of the men forming the train “had thair clothis tane frae thame with the watter,” and altogether it must have been a very drenched and battered company that found themselves at last at Linlithgow, after starting at four o’clock in the morning from Glasgow Castle gates three days before. The newly-arrived Frenchmen themselves cannot have had a high opinion of the amenities of a Scottish summer from their first experience of it. The carriage of two culverins moyane from Linlithgow to Edinburgh was undertaken free by “the hors of the Schyre”—the journey, with the help of ten labourers to smoothe the way, seems to have been made without incident.

¹P. 380.

These, however, were not the only pieces of artillery brought to Scotland by Monsieur Lorge Montgomery. The "granitor" of the Abbey of Paisley was paid, in July, £12 16s. 6d. for the carriage of two culverins "bastard" from Greenock to Glasgow. A "bastard" was a slightly smaller gun than a "moyane." The tenants of the Bishop of Glasgow were again impressed to bring these guns and their ammunition as far as Linlithgow. This time the transit does not appear to have been so arduous as before, though it was not unattended with accident. The first stage is said in the accounts to have been to "Kirkcubrycht," but this is evidently a mistake of the scribe for some other place, probably Kirkintilloch. There one of the wheels of the guns broke, and a smith had to work all night to repair it.¹ By the time they had got to the "Inche Wod" one of the axle trees had given way, and a new one had to be cut then and there from the wood itself. Kilsyth was the next stage, and from there the train proceeded to a place called the "Holene bus," or holly bush, and so to Linlithgow. Before arriving there, however, a nasty accident had happened. Andrew Littlejohn, the wright, who had superintended the transit of the previous guns, had in his anxiety for the safety of his charges been run over by one of the "bastards," with the result of broken bones. Messengers were despatched to "the Falkirk" and other places for surgeons, and he was placed on a hastily-improvised litter and carried to Linlithgow. He apparently recovered, as there is an entry of a payment of 22s. to him in November.

The artillery train stayed one night at Linlithgow, where another of the wheels had to be patched up. But they did not manage to get to Edinburgh in one day. For some reason or other the supply of horses gave out, and the guns had to lie overnight at "the new brig," perhaps the bridge across the Almond, near Kirkliston, till oxen could be got to continue the journey.

So far the artillery ; meanwhile Monsieur Lorge and his staff, if not the whole of his troops, had made a more rapid transit. They were in Edinburgh early in July, Gavin Hamilton and James Dog, "commissiaris deput to my lord Governour and lordis of counsale," having been sent on to arrange about quarters. On the arrival of the Frenchmen in the capital they were entertained at the Castle with wine, spice, "manebreid" (a very light, savoury fancy bread), and other luxuries, or, as it is rather put in the accounts, "necessaris." But they were not allowed to remain inactive. Tidings of English incursions were brought, and Lennox, in company with Donald, Lord of the Isles, and a body of Irish, were reported to be meditating a descent on the West Coast. A summons of treason was issued against Donald, and the men of Ayr, Irvine, and the adjacent country were charged to repair to the coast "for resisting of the Erll of Levinax and his cumpanye of Irland men being with him."¹ Meanwhile preparations were made for an advance south of the Scots and their French allies. Seven tents were sent off for the use of the Governor, and an array was summoned to meet him at Roslin Moor on the 28th July. Oxen were impressed for the carriage of the artillery, and the inhabitants en route were ordered to thrash their corn and prepare food for the army. The result of the expedition is matter of history. The brilliant and well-appointed host, of which so much was expected, was honeycombed with dissension and treachery, and the whole array returned discomfited, having only been a very few days on English soil. In September, Henry hurled Hertford and his troops on the Scottish borderland, and there they wrought fearful havoc. Melrose, Dryburgh, Kelso, Roxburgh, Coldingham, were all given to the flames, and their ruins testify to this day to the thorough manner in which the English did their work. Efforts were, no doubt, made by Arran to stay this reckless harrying of the land, but without much success : it is only glimpses of the warfare that are had in the prosaic accounts of the Treasurer. Some effort must have been made to save the great and beautiful fane of Kelso, as 22s. was paid "to ane of the gunnaris that was hurt within the Kirk of Kelso.¹ The burning of that town is repeatedly alluded to : a poor woman that had her husband “hangit be the Inlischemen at the burnyng of Kelso” got 22s. as some compensation. On 12th September reinforcements of artillery were sent from Edinburgh “toward the bordour with my lord Governour at the byrning of Kelso, etc., for resisting of the Inglischemen” ; and at the same time an urgent summons was sent to Dumbarton charging all men to repair to the Governor, with six days’ provisions, for resisting the English “instantlie byrnand Kelso.”² As days go on the summonses become more insistent, and on the 20th a pursuivant is sent to Stirling with “the fiery cross” to cause “the pepill cum fordward to my lord Gouverneur for resisting of the Ingleschemen.” By that time, however, the trial which the Border counties had gone through was nearly over ; within a few days Hertford’s troops, sated with plunder, and probably weary of their work of wanton destruction, had been ordered south, and were soon disbanded. Arran called together a Parliament at Stirling on the last days of the month, Malcolm Gourlay being sent to Edinburgh for the sword of honour, crown, and sceptre to do due honour to the opening of the assembly.

At this Parliament Lennox and his brother, the Bishop of Caithness, were forfeited, and their lands were divided amongst the nobles, Argyll and Huntly coming in for the greater share. Meanwhile Lord Maxwell, who was a prisoner in England, had been prevailed upon to give up to Henry his Castles of Lochmaben, Caerlaverock, and Threave, but Arran lost no time in endeavouring to repair their loss. The barons of Nithsdale, Galloway, Cunningham, and Kyle were summoned on the last day of October to meet the Governor on the following Wednesday, the fourth of November, at Dumfries to pass to the siege of Caerlaverock.¹ On 2nd November two culverins "moyane" were taken out of the Castle of Edinburgh and sent south with their attendant ammunition. The train consisted of 35 horses and 12 labourers to make the roads passable, besides, of course, the requisite number of gunners. They seem to have made the journey quickly, and the recapture of the castle did not take long, as by the 8th of the month it is stated that Caerlaverock was "ouregevin," and the horses were ordered to Dumfries to await the arrival of further supplies from Hamilton. Five cartloads of bullets, powder, axles, shovels, and such like stores were sent from Edinburgh to Hamilton, and two cannons and a culverin "bastard" were sent from the latter place to Lochmaben for the siege of the castle there. This was evidently a large siege train. The 12 labourers who had come originally from Edinburgh

¹P. 414.

to Caerlaverock were sent to Hamilton to assist in bringing down the new artillery : they got “drinksilver” to the amount of 22s. in addition to their wages.¹ Besides them there were no less than 41 men hired in Hamilton, and seven wrights and masons. Three gunners “extraordinar,” Anderson, Lowresoun, and Pettigrew, accompanied the guns ; one of the labourers met with an accident en route, and had his thigh bones broken by one of the guns, in compensation for which he received 44s., double the sum that was usually paid in such cases.² The first halt was at the water of Avon, where they stopped two nights : on the 18th they were at Corehouse Mill, and the officer of the nether ward of Clydesdale, who rejoiced in the curiously German name of Herman Gotter-soun, got 46s. to buy food for the oxen which were kept all night upon the field “to lift the artalze tymelie in the mornying.” Their “gad men,” or drivers, shared their nocturnal vigil, and got 57s. 4d. to buy themselves and their oxen food. One of the guns had to be left there for want of cattle to draw it, and next day, when the rest of the train had got to Lesmahagow, a man was sent back for it.³ The next stage from Lesmahagow was Douglas, and after that Coldchapel. By the next night they had reached Clydeshead, near Crawford, the captain of Crawford getting 43s. for food for the oxen. The day after, the 24th November, some of the cart wheels were mended in Moffat. At this place 18d. was paid to some one who found a "cannoun stane" which had been shot to warn the workmen to come and lift the artillery. One can hardly understand how a bullet came to be fired out of a signal gun.¹ The further progress of the guns is not so clear: they may have made a stop at Lochwood, but apparently they had arrived at their destination by the 26th of the month. That night was spent in making gabions, a shilling being disbursed for candles. But the Castle seems to have surrendered to the besiegers very soon, as by the end of November the artillery was homeward bound again. They were detained at Ericstane for a week for want of oxen, the men sleeping in the fields, which cannot have been a pleasant experience among the Dumfriesshire hills in the end of November. The return home was made by way of Crawford, Cont, and Carnwath. It was always an object to vary the route as much as possible in order that the people of the district who supplied the oxen and horses for the guns might be as little distressed as possible. The casualties during the expedition do not appear to have amounted to much. There is no reference to any fatality amongst the men, though it is more than probable that more than one humble "pyonar" may have succumbed to the hard work and exposure. A march through the uplying districts of Dumfriesshire in December must have been very trying for all concerned; and yet there is mention made of only two tents which, with their furniture and bedding, were sent from Edinburgh. These were presumably for the Governor's own use; the other officers either lay in the open or billeted themselves in any shelter that might be at hand. The cattle did not escape so easily; nine oxen belonging to the laird of Johnston were either "tint or slain," and he got compensation to the extent of £27. At this time of year, proper winter feeding being unknown in Scotland in the sixteenth century, the oxen would be in poor condition and unable for very heavy work. One horse only is recorded to have been slain, the cause being "ane our sair charge," or, in other words, overwork.¹

The accounts for January 1544-5 contain a few entries illustrative of the state of the country at the time. From them it may be gathered that the artillery which had accompanied the abortive raid into England, after the coming of the French troops, had been left at Hume Castle, and £3 was paid to a gunner to go there and make an inventory of it. For the young Queen's expenses at Stirling, from 24th April to the beginning of January, Lord Livingston was paid the sum of £482. In February little of note occurs: the Governor had his cloak stolen from "Maister Henry Lauderris logeing," and had to get a new one at a cost of £4 10s. Cardinal Beaton, now nearing his end, get £600 repaid him which he had advanced for the despatch of artillery in one of the recent raids, and Arran's eldest son, the Master of Hamilton, now at the University of St. Andrews, had two books (the only books, except service books, mentioned in the volume) sent him, the Rudimenta Despauterii, and Æsop's Fables, in Latin.¹ Hardly a word in the accounts reflects what must have been the great sensation of the day, the burning of George Wishart at St. Andrews on the 1st of March. Only once is his name mentioned: he had been apprehended at Ormiston, and Cockburn, the laird of that place, together with Sandilands of Calder, had been also taken and lodged in the Castle of Edinburgh. Cockburn had succeeded in making his escape, and on the 10th of March a pursuivant was sent to summon him "to underly the law in Edinburgh the xiii day of Aprile nyxt to cum, for resetting of Maister George Wischeart, he being at the horne, etc., and for breking of the waird within the Castle of Edinburgh."² The lords and barons of East Lothian and other counties were summoned to his assise on that day.³

¹P. 430.

There is hardly a trace in the accounts of the great tragedy in May, the assassination of the Cardinal. The arch-plotter and determined enemy of Beaton, Crichton of Brunston, had been served with a summons for treason on the 16th, and on the 28th there is an important entry of 8s. being paid to a boy with a letter of the Governor to Argyll "to schaw the slauchter of the Cardinall." It may be noted that most authorities give the date of the murder as the morning of the 29th; Leslye and Birrel make it the 30th, while Buchanan and Pitscottie say the 7th. The last date is clearly wrong, and unless the clerk who wrote the entry in the accounts has made a mistake the date must be taken to be either the 27th or 28th. Such important news would almost certainly arrive in Edinburgh by the evening of the day on which the event occurred, and Arran would lose no time in communicating with Argyll. It is probable, therefore, that Beaton was murdered on the 28th of April 1546. It was not till the 18th of June that a summons of treason was served on Norman Leslie and his accomplices in the deed.¹

Notwithstanding the stirring and epoch-making events which were going on in the country at this time, it is, as might be expected, with more domestic and peaceful matters that the accounts are principally concerned. Hardly had the excitement caused by the great Cardinal's death died away when the Governor is found assisting at the baptism of one of his own children. Four torches were provided for the ceremony, which took place in the Castle of Edinburgh, and four candles weighing four lbs. each. The child whose "heving" was thus celebrated was probably Arran's fifth son, Claud, afterwards Commendator of Paisley, and the founder of the great house of Abercorn.

All parties now united in an attempt to restore public order in the distracted kingdom. On 23rd May the Privy Council met in Edinburgh, rejected all idea of the English alliance, and appointed the Earl of Huntly Chancellor in succession to Beaton. On 10th June the Estates met. On the 18th a summons of treason was issued against Norman Leslie and his accomplices in the murder of the Cardinal. At this time, too, the Bishop of Caithness, Lennox's brother, arrived from England with a few followers (nineteen according to Pitscottie), and took refuge in the Castle of Dumbarton. Arran, accompanied by Angus, Glencairn, and other nobles, at once set out to invest the fortress. A lad was sent from Paisley on the 29th "to espye quhat thai war doand in the toun and castell of Dunbertane,"¹ and pressing messages were sent to Argyll to hurry forward with some artillery he was bringing from the west. The siege did not last long; it was certainly over by the 20th July, and probably a good deal earlier. There was some resistance, no doubt, and a soldier was wounded by a gun shot fired from the Castle, for which he got the usual solatium of 44s. By the 20th the Governor was back in Edinburgh again, and three days after Robert Hart, Ross Herald, was sent to London for a safe conduct for a projected embassy to the English King. Later in the month letters were sent to Fife charging the inhabitants not to molest, trouble, or make any impediment to Norman Leslie and his accomplices in their coming to Edinburgh to make their defence.¹ Of course Leslie and his friends had no intention of coming to Edinburgh; they shut themselves up in the Castle of St. Andrews, a strongly-fortified and well-provisioned place of defence, and prepared for eventualities. The Government took up the challenge forthwith. In the middle of August a summons was sent to the Earl of Rothes and many other nobles throughout Scotland to meet the Governor at St. Andrews on the 25th of the month under penalty of "tynsall of lyf, landis, and guidis."² On 9th September a summons was affixed to the gate of the Castle of St. Andrews, a "boy" getting 2s. for so doing. This must have been replied to by the garrison, as "ane of the fute band callit Blane" got a present of ten shillings for bringing the Governor certain writings that "wer castin owre the new castell wall."³ The siege, however, dragged, and a further summons was sent to the north of Scotland charging the inhabitants there to come to the assistance of the Governor. All this time there was a certain nervousness as to what the "auld enemie" England might be doing. An attempted succour of the Castle by sea was quite on the cards, and the people of Linlithgow, Stirling, Strathearn, and Menteith were ordered to be in readiness on six hours' warning to come to St. Andrews "for resisting of the Inglesch shippis," and at the end of September Allan Turnour was sent to England "to espy the purpos thare of the Ingleschmen."

The accounts in this volume close in the middle of the siege of the Castle of St. Andrews, and it only remains now to notice a few points not hitherto referred to, so as not to interrupt the historical sequence of events.

Arran was no "kinless loon," and, as might be expected, many of the offices of the household were filled by members of his family, and his more immediate relatives were plentifully, though perhaps not excessively, supplied with clothing and other necessities from the funds at his disposal. His own expenditure seems to have been moderate enough. Matthew Hamilton of Binning, his Master of Household, gets in December 1545 an account paid him of £1712 "for the furneising of his gracis hous, paying of gentillmennis wages, and other necessaris," though what period this covers is not mentioned. It is probably for a year. His eldest son, James, was only a boy of about nine years old at the conclusion of the accounts, and seems to have been at St. Andrews for his education, two Latin books having been sent to him there in February 1545. During the currency of the accounts he received from his father, besides a yearly allowance of £20, the sum of £195, chiefly for clothing. Another son, John, afterwards Marquess of Hamilton, gets £13 for clothes; he was, of course, a mere child at this time, and not above a "tip" of 11s. which he got in May 1544. The "youngest son," who got some white and gray dresses in April 1544 was David, then a mere infant. His eldest daughter, Barbara, got £117, including a trousseau costing £49, on the occasion of her marriage to the son of the Earl of Huntly in 1545. This points to the marriage having actually taken place, which has been doubted.¹ Her younger sister, Jean, got £72 for clothing, but some of this was shared with Barbara. Of Arran's half-brothers, the illegitimate sons of his father, there is frequent mention. The most famous, Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart, had played a conspicuous part in the political troubles of his day, and had fallen a victim on the scaffold to the machinations of his enemies in 1540. He left a son, James, the ancestor of the Hamiltons of Gilkerscleugh, who appears to have been a special favourite of the Governor. He was rather a delicate lad, and is frequently mentioned as "sick." He had a weekly allowance of £1 2s. for lodgings, &c., and had a taste for music, as on one occasion £1 2s. 4d. is paid for "lutes and a saddle" for him. Altogether, he was the recipient of money and clothes or other articles to the amount of £223. Andrew, Agnes, Elizabeth, and Cuthbert are other children of Fynnart who are mentioned. There is no allusion to John, the Commendator of Paisley, who was made Bishop of Dunkeld just at the period of the closing of the accounts, unless it was he and not the next mentioned John who got in January 1542-3 clothes to the value of £94. Another John, styled of Samuelston, and Sheriff of Lanark, is the recipient of £38. It was an illegitimate daughter of this John who got, as Margaret Hamilton, "his gracis brother douchter," a wedding outfit to the amount of £25 on her marriage in March 1543-4 to James Johnstone, younger of that ilk. She was afterwards the wife of David, seventh Earl of Angus, and, after his death, of Patrick Whitelaw of that ilk. Another brother of Arran, James, got in 1544 £33 for clothes. This may possibly be the James who married Marion, daughter of Patrick Hepburn of Fairnington, but there were two brothers of the name: the youngest of them had a monthly pension of £7 10s., besides getting considerable sums for clothing. There is also a payment of £336 to "Maister James Hammyltoun, his gracis broder, in pairt of payment of his bygane pencioune granttit to him be my lord Governour quhill he wer beneficite." This was probably that James who became in 1553 Bishop of Lismore or Argyll, and also held the subdeanery of Glasgow. He joined the Protestant party in 1560. There is also mention made¹ of a brother styled Jacob, but nothing is known of his existence, and it may merely be a Latinisation of James.

The sisters of Arran who are mentioned were all probably illegitimate, like his brothers. The Isabella Hamilton, who got gifts of clothes in March and May 1542-3, may have been the wife of John Bannatyne of Corehouse, though her relationship to the Governor is not precisely stated. But as she received dresses to the value of upwards of £64 it is likely that she held a high place in the affections of Arran. A still more favourite sister was Jean, or Janet, generally referred to under the designation of the Mistress of Kilmaurs. She had been married in 1526 to Alexander Cunningham, Master of Glencairn or Kilmaurs, but was separated from him before 11th July 1545. She got frequent supplies of dress, amounting altogether to £201. Another sister, Elizabeth, who was married in May 1543 to Robert, Master of Sempill, was similarly provided to the extent of £81, and her dowry of £1000 was guaranteed by the Governor. The only other lady mentioned as a sister of Arran is one designed "Lady Weems," but her identity has not been ascertained.

Apart from the Governor's own family, many other Hamiltons are to be met with in the preceding pages. John Hamilton of Raploch got £5 10s. for the expenses of his journey in September 1543, when carrying despatches to the Isles. There was at this time no laird of Raploch of the name, but it may be meant for the youngest son of James Hamilton of Raploch, who was afterwards known as of Neilsland, and under that designation had, in February 1543-4, a gift of clothing costing £5. Archibald Hamilton, his brother, who succeeded to Raploch, is also mentioned in the accounts. The John Hamilton of Bothwell, who got grants of clothing in May 1544 and July 1545, was in all probability the third son of David Hamilton of Bothwell; he afterwards became Prior of Blantyre. The Hamiltons of Milburne occur frequently. John of Milburne was Master of Works, and got a salary of £40 a year; Matthew, of the same place, was Captain of Blackness; and there is mention of a Walter Hamilton of Milburne in receipt of wages of 11s. a month. Andrew Hamilton of Letham was wounded at Leith in January 1543-4, and got a solatium of £6; in November 1545 he is designed Captain of Linlithgow, and gets £22. There is also a Robert of Letham mentioned in May 1544. The James and David Hamilton, both designed as of Orbiston, were probably the sons of Gavin Hamilton of that place; David had grants of clothing to the extent of £45. Their father was the grandson of Gavin Hamilton, Provost of Bothwell, who was fourth son of Sir James Hamilton of Cadzow, the Governor's great grandfather. The Gavin Hamilton mentioned as Arran's "cousin," and who was the recipient of several grants amounting to £76, may have been the laird of Orbiston. Many of the castles in the country were put under the care of members of the family. Andrew Hamilton was Captain of Linlithgow in 1544; Robert Hamilton was Captain of Dalkeith in the same year, and in the following year he, or someone of the same name, is found as Captain of Dunbar. There were several persons of the name of Andrew. Andrew of Letham has been already referred to: he may possibly be identical with the Captain of Linlithgow. There was also, as has been shown, an Andrew, the son of Sir James of Finnart, and an Andrew Hamilton was "maister of entres" at a salary of £60 a year. There are many more of the clan who make an occasional appearance in these pages. The Lairds of Perdwie, Torrance, Shawton, Preston, Livingston, Haggis, Arniston, Humble, Turnbull, Bathgate, and some others are all met with as holding offices, carrying despatches, or making themselves useful in some way to their kinsman and patron the somewhat weak, but evidently affectionate, Governor.

The only other matter which may be mentioned before concluding this introductory sketch is the expenses incurred in building or repairing a dwelling for Arran in Edinburgh Castle. This was probably what is now called the Royal Lodging, though it has been added to or repaired since Arran's day. Where "Craglyoun," where the Governor had a "chalmer," was is not certain. It must have been in the vicinity of Edinburgh, as timber was purchased in Leith to the value of £8 16s., and sent there in May 1545.¹ At the same time, too, a large amount of wood, consisting of fifty-three cartloads of planks, costing no less than £72, was sent up to the Castle. A great deal of work was going on there at this period. Sir Andrew Walker, the Master of Works, got £1074 for material and work done in the Castle between October 1544 and 31st August 1545. In the summer of 1546 there was evidently a great deal of work going on, and there are detailed accounts for the wages of wrights, masons, smiths, quarriers, barrowmen, &c. The lime seems to have come from Straiton and Cousland, both places in the vicinity of Edinburgh. The quarry used is not mentioned, though it was probably Ravelston, as given in the last volume. Where the Governor actually lived at this period is not to be gathered from the accounts ; in all likelihood he had a house in the town itself, for there is no indication of his inhabiting Holyrood, which, indeed, had been nearly destroyed by the ravages of the English forces. He may have lodged in the house of Mr. Henry Lauder of St. Germain's. He certainly lost a cloak which was stolen out of that house, and it appears to have been a residence of some pretension, as four shillings was paid in December 1544 for the hanging of some tapestry "to the Quene" in it, which seems to infer that either the Queen Dowager or the infant Mary was accommodated there. Lauder's wife, too, got a handsome gift of material for dresses, which may have been in way of acknowledging her services as hostess.

The above remarks do not exhaust all the interesting matters which are contained in the accounts, but they may serve to show how much there is to reward a more detailed study of them by the student, both of the social and political life of the period.

I have once more to acknowledge the labours of Mr. Joseph Davidson in providing what is absolutely indispensable to the study of a book of this kind—a very full and complete index. The Rev. John Anderson, Curator of the Historical Department in H.M. Register House, had added to that debt of gratitude which the present editor, in common with all historical students, owes him by his ungrudging assistance and advice.
